OFFICIAL REPORT

Speaker: The Honourable W. Ross Macdonald

Thursday, February 16, 1950

SECOND SESSION—TWENTY-FIRST PARLIAMENT—OPENING

The parliament which had been prorogued on the tenth day of December, 1949, met this day at Ottawa for the dispatch of business.

The house met at three o'clock, the Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Speaker read a communication from the Governor General's Secretary, announcing that His Excellency the Governor General would proceed to the Senate chamber at three o'clock p.m. on this day, for the purpose of formally opening the session of the dominion parliament.

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly the house went up to the Senate chamber.

And the house being returned to the Commons chamber:

VACANCY

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that during the recess I received communications from several members informing me that the following vacancy had occurred in the representation, viz.:

Of the Hon. Colin William George Gibson, member for the electoral district of Hamilton West, consequent upon his acceptance of an office of emolument under the crown.

I accordingly issued my warrant to the chief electoral officer to make out a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

OATHS OF OFFICE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the traditional usage, I beg leave to introduce Bill No. 1, respecting the administration of oaths of office.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that when the house did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both houses of parliament. To prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy, which is as follows:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

The conference with representatives of the provincial governments forecast in my speech closing your last session was held in January. This conference marked a promising beginning in working out a satisfactory procedure for making within Canada whatever amendments to the constitution may from time to time be required. Agreement was reached on certain general principles and a continuing committee was established to further the work of the conference.

The governments of all the provinces have also been invited to participate in a general conference between the federal and provincial governments early next autumn to consider other matters of mutual concern. The several provincial authorities have been asked to make suggestions as to the principal topics they will wish to have discussed at this conference.

In the meantime negotiations are proceeding with the provincial governments for the implementation of the legislation adopted at your last session respecting housing, a transcontinental highway and forest conservation.

The national health program has been extended to the province of Newfoundland and further satisfactory progress has been made, in co-operation with the provinces generally, in the development of more adequate health facilities and services.

In the international sphere, our country continues to give full support to the charter of the United Nations. A Canadian delegation is now attending a session of the economic and social council to which Canada was elected at the last session of the general assembly.

The recent conference in Ceylon of the foreign ministers of the nations of the commonwealth demonstrated that there is a continuing and substantial community of outlook among the nations of the commonwealth both in the east and the west in their approach to current problems of foreign affairs.

The measures for the preservation of peace and the restoration and maintenance of prosperity contemplated by the North Atlantic treaty are being devised and applied as expeditiously as circumstances permit. The wholehearted co-operation of all the signatories to the treaty is encouraging evidence of their determination to deter aggression by a combination of actual and potential strength calculated to remove the possibility of successful aggression.

The cold war nevertheless still continues and imposes on all the free nations heavy burdens for the provision of defence forces and modern armaments. Preparedness to meet any sudden onslaught is essential and the means must be provided. But the free nations also face a test of endurance, and our staying power could be endangered by attempting to achieve complete preparedness at the expense of our adaptability to new developments in weapons and techniques of warfare or the efficiency of our social and industrial systems.

In the development of Canada's defence forces, constant attention is being given to the best use of our resources, to the encouragement of joint research and experimental development and to the co-ordination of Canadian efforts with those of the other signatories of the North Atlantic treaty.

The measure to consolidate existing legislation respecting our defence forces and to provide for a purely Canadian disciplinary code to be made applicable to all the forces will be re-introduced.

Employment and prosperity remain at a high level in Canada. The prospects are good for continued private investment in construction and capital development throughout the present year. The demand for consumer goods of all kinds continues to be strong. However, seasonal and local factors have given rise to a significant amount of temporary regional unemployment during the past few months and the security provisions established under unemployment insurance legislation have been called upon to meet the first important test since they were brought into effect.

Although a high proportion of persons temporarily unemployed are actually in receipt of unemployment insurance benefits, you will be asked to give consideration to a bill to widen the scope and extend the benefits of unemployment insurance.

Circumstances outside Canada have been responsible for some downward adjustment in the price of farm products. Measures have already been taken to reduce the impact of these adjustments. In order to provide authority for continuing price support to that end for the primary products of our farms and fisheries, you will be asked to amend the Agricultural Products Act, the Agricultural Prices Support Act and the Fisheries Prices Support Act.

Within the past year, the international wheat agreement has been brought into operation. In view of Canada's participation in that agreement and the recent decision to market coarse grains through the Canadian wheat board, you will also be asked to consider a measure to renew the existing powers of the board.

During the past year Canadian exports were maintained at close to record levels, but continued difficulties arising out of the world-wide dollar shortage have resulted recently in reduced purchases of a number of our export products.

Canadian representatives continue to participate actively in co-ordinated international efforts to bring about improvement in the underlying conditions of world trade. The government is also pursuing policies designed to develop new markets for our products and to assist overseas customers to increase Canadian earnings. My ministers will continue their efforts to secure reductions in trade barriers. To this end preparations are actively under way for further multilateral trade negotiations later in the present year.

While prevailing exchange difficulties will require continued readjustments, we have reason to expect that our export trade as a whole will remain at a high level during the present year.

[Mr. Speaker.]

You will be asked to give consideration to the legislation required to implement the policy concerning the control and the orderly decontrol of rents announced by the government during your last session.

A measure will be introduced to amend the Canada Shipping Act to incorporate changes suggested by the Safety of Life at Sea Convention of 1948 and to define duties of Canadian consuls and conditions of registration in Canada of Canadian ships.

You will be asked to consider a bill for the revision of the Indian Act.

A bill will be submitted to substitute a uniform and systematic procedure for existing legislation concerning publication and tabling in parliament of regulations and orders made by the governor in council or ministers or other agents of the crown in the exercise of powers conferred by statute.

Bills will be introduced to implement the policies announced at the last session respecting prize money; the inclusion of veterans of British and allied forces within the scope of the War Veterans Allowance Act; and grants to municipalities in which there is an exceptional concentration of federal property.

Other measures requiring your consideration will include bills to amend the Militia Pension Act; the Criminal Code; the Government Annuities Act; the Post Office Act; the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act; the Currency Act; the Trust Companies Act; the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1932; the Foreign Insurance Companies Act, 1932; the Customs Act; the Maritime Marshland Rehabilitation Act; and the Northwest Territories Power Commission Act.

Members of the House of Commons:

You will be asked to make provision for all essential services for the next fiscal year.

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

I pray that Divine Providence may bless your deliberations.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MOTION FOR PRECEDENCE OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to move, seconded by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner):

That the speech of His Excellency the Governor General to both houses of parliament be taken into consideration on Friday next, and that unless and until otherwise ordered by this house, this order have precedence over all other business except introduction of bills and government notices of motions, on every day of next week, and thereafter on Mondays, Wednesdays and Thursdays until disposed of.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, before this motion is put I should like to say that this is a new procedure which we accepted during the war because of the desire of hon. members of all parties to facilitate the business of the house. Again last session it was accepted because we knew the government had a certain program of legislation, and we were anxious to facilitate its consideration.

I believe, however, that this is a precedent which should not be accepted without some protest on behalf of the private members of the house. What it actually does is to interrupt debate on the address and, in a way, to take interest from it and prolong it. I believe that in the interests of debate it would be better to proceed with the debate on the address, and to conclude it, as the normal procedure of the house requires.

I would point out, too, that if interruptions prolong the debate to any extent, the house loses at least one of the private members' days. The rules of the house indicate that the first four Thursdays shall be allotted to private members. Today is the first of those four, and there are three others. If the debate on the address goes beyond the next three Thursdays, then private members will lose one of the opportunities they have to discuss private members' motions.

I had thought that at this session, which is not one crowded with legislation, in all probability the government would revert to the normal procedure of the house. I wish, therefore, on behalf not only of my own associates but also of other private members who, I know, share this view, to make protest, and to say that I hope once again the house will not accept this as a precedent to be followed in future.

Motion agreed to.

THE LATE THOMAS LANGTON CHURCH

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all hon. members of the house were much grieved to hear last week of the death of one of the oldest and most respected, and, I would add, best loved members of the House of Commons, Mr. Thomas Langton Church, member of parliament for the constituency of Broadview, Toronto, since 1935.

Mr. Church's death brought to a close a remarkable career of public service to the city of Toronto and to the nation. I doubt if there are many who enjoyed the confidence of their electors over such a long period of time, because he occupied public office, practically without interruption, from 1898 to the date of his death. He was first elected to public office in 1898 as a member of the high school board in the city of Toronto. In 1905 he became an alderman, and he remained a member of the city council until the end of 1921. In 1910 the electors promoted him to the board of control, and from 1915 to 1921 inclusive he was mayor of that city. That, I understand, is a record which has not been equalled by any other mayor in the history of Toronto.

The late T. L. Church

Mr. Church was also for seventeen years a trustee of the Toronto General hospital, and for fifteen years a director of that great institution, the Canadian national exhibition.

In 1909 and 1910 he brought forward a proposal for the development of a harbour at Toronto worthy of the growing importance of that city, and became a member of the reorganized board of harbour commissioners, and afterwards its chairman. As mayor he was chairman of the Toronto board of police commissioners, and was also for seven years a member of the Toronto Hydro Electric Commission.

Mr. Church was president of the Union of Canadian Municipalities for two terms, and at different times he was president of the Ontario Municipal Electrical Association, the Hydro Radial Union, and the Ontario Municipal Association. He had been called to the bar of Ontario in 1897, and for many years acted as general counsel for the Toronto Electric Commission.

He was first elected to parliament in 1921, and, though he suffered a defeat in the general election of 1930, returned to the House in a by-election in 1934. I am sure all hon. members are agreed that at Ottawa he displayed the splendid qualities which endeared him to the electors of Toronto during all those years. Perhaps his two most outstanding qualities were his capacity for making and keeping friends, and his devotion to the welfare of his native city.

He was always kind, generous, honest, and uncompromising. He held views which perhaps were not widely supported throughout the country, but he was a man of principles to which he adhered constantly and unswervingly. There never could be any doubt as to where he stood. He knew it himself, and he made it known to his constituents, to the house and to the nation. Perhaps no man in public life ever fought more fiercely for his convictions, but I doubt if any was ever more considerate of his opponents. He always treated his bitterest political antagonists as gentlemen, and I do not believe there was ever a grudge in his whole make-up.

There was a striking contrast between, on the one hand, his progressive outlook as an official of his native city of Toronto and the great achievements and developments which he inspired and promoted in the affairs of that city, and, on the other, his staunch conservatism in respect of everything which had to do with the evolution of Canada from colonial status to nationhood.

Mr. Church was a staunch believer in British imperialism, and seemed to be quite unhappy that Canada should not always remain a dutiful daughter in her mother's house. His great sincerity, his unswerving consistency, the courtesy and warm-hearted kindness in all his dealings with his fellow men endeared him to us all; and the manner in which he represented those who elected him will, I believe, for those who follow, stand as an example which will be his best memorial.

I am sure all hon. members of the house will wish to extend to his two sisters, to his countless friends, as well as to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) and to his colleagues, sincere condolences on the passing of one who had become affectionately known and will long be remembered by all of us as Tommy Church.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, joining with the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in paying tribute to one of the members of this house who had endeared himself to all his fellow members, no matter in what part of the house they sat, I wish to emphasize particularly one aspect of his life which impressed itself not only upon those who knew him intimately but upon the whole country. If there was one word more than any other which will always be associated with the memory of the late T. L. Church—or Tommy Church, as he was known to everyone—that word is friendship. All through his life he followed the injunction of St. Luke: Make to yourself friends.

I doubt if any Canadian ever had more personal friends. It is certain that no Canadian ever knew as many people by their first names. He had an extraordinary memory, but that memory was not a mere device by which he sought recognition from others. It was a part of his interest in other people, in the human beings whom he knew.

My own friendship for Tommy Church goes back a great many years. I knew him first when I was a boy in Toronto playing games. He was interested in everyone who was on the track team, who played football or hockey, or other games of the kind. He was interested in people.

I well recall the kindly and generous things he used to do for young people who came to the city of Toronto for the first time. I know that many people who occupy positions of responsibility, in his own home community and in other parts of the country as well, owed to Tommy Church the opportunity to make a good start in life.

Mr. Church knew people of all ages and of every walk in life. It was all a part of that deep affection and concern for all he met. During the first world war, when he was mayor of Toronto, I think he saw every train that left with men who were going overseas. I am sure he met every train coming back that carried servicemen—wounded, on leave, or about to be demobilized. He was in all reality what he was so often described as—the soldier's friend. That friendship was extended particularly to wives and children of the men who did not come back, and to those in difficult circumstances who found not so easy the adjustment to life when they returned.

As has been said by the Prime Minister, Mr. Church loved Toronto. In fact, throughout Canada his name was symbolic of Toronto. If he spoke in this chamber of the city council, of the harbour, of the general hospital, of the Canadian national exhibition, we all knew, and we were intended to know, that he was speaking about the Toronto city council, the Toronto harbour, the Toronto General hospital or the Toronto exhibition. He would have been surprised if anyone suggested that they were not the best in Canada. That did not mean that he was restricted in any way in his views as a Canadian, but his first loyalty was to the city in which he was born and brought up, and to which he had contributed so much.

But he had infinitely wider interests, and I think it is proper at this time to recall that along with Sir Adam Beck he did perhaps more than any other single man in Toronto to bring to reality the Ontario Hydro Electric Power Commission, which has been of such great advantage to the people of that province.

His friendships—and it is by those that he will be so well remembered here and elsewhere—were built on an unselfish foundation of abiding and real interest in the welfare of all with whom he came in contact. As has been said already, he was a man of strong beliefs. At a time when it may be helpful that people of strong beliefs do adhere to their principles, he left no doubt as to where he stood on any subject in which he had some interest.

Mr. Church believed in his own city first. He believed in Canada. He believed in the great and continuing purpose of the British commonwealth and the empire. He believed that Canada's full growth as a nation, Canada's greatest opportunities in the years ahead as a sovereign state, lay within that partnership in whose association we had grown to nationhood and in which he saw the greatest future for the years ahead. He certainly did not fail to express that belief on any single occasion when the opportunity presented itself.

Mr. Church did an infinite number of kindly things which meant much to many people. I for one shall never forget the scene in St.

James cathedral in Toronto and at the cemetery where people stood with tears streaming down their faces as they remembered the man they loved, as they remembered perhaps in many cases the things that he had done in an unselfish way to help them along the road to life.

Tommy Church was one of those rare beings to whom these words of Alexander Pope apply in their full meaning:

> Who broke no promise, serv'd no private end,
> Who gain'd no title, and who lost no friend.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, not only on behalf of those associated with me, but perhaps as one who has had a fairly long membership in the house, I wish to express both regret at the passing of Mr. Church and sympathy for his sisters who have survived him. As the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) has said, when a young man arrived in the city of Toronto the one person who was almost sure to welcome him was Tommy Church—just as, on the arrival of a new member, Tommy was the one older parliamentarian who was sure to greet him. No matter what his views were, no matter what party he belonged to, no matter under what auspices he came, Mr. Church immediately took an interest in him as a younger member of the house.

I am glad that, although we differed so much in our views, I was able to form a friendship with him, a friendship that was possible because there were some things we had in common.

I think it was obvious to all of us at the last session of parliament that Mr. Church was failing fast. The manner in which he went through the session, the energy which he put into the debates of the house, the way in which he spoke of policies for which he will long be remembered, was amazing.

The leader of the opposition has spoken of the interest of the late Mr. Church in the Ontario hydroelectric system, that great publicly-owned institution. We shall all remember, because of that interest of his in the public ownership of public utilities, how prominent a part he played last session in the discussion of certain matters which came before the house. I said to some of my friends one evening when Mr. Church was speaking that he was failing, and I thought that what we were witnessing was like the bright flicker of light before the candle goes out. Therefore I was not surprised when I heard with sorrow over the radio that Tommy Church had passed to the great beyond, upon which he had fixed a sure and certain hope.

Mr. Church loved this House of Commons; he loved this parliament. He was old-fashioned, as the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has said, in his adherence to the British empire rather than to the commonwealth. He preferred the old term. I am sure my hon. friends of the official opposition will not misunderstand me when I say that Tommy Church was a survivor of an old-fashioned conservatism which served its day and generation well. We shall miss him here because of the views that he invariably expressed, and the forthright manner in which he expressed them.

As has already been said, Mr. Church's life was one of kindnesses. He represented Broadview, a constituency in which there are a good many underprivileged Canadians, and Tommy Church was the friend of all, poor and rich alike. I have heard it said that when he went into his constituency he could meet almost everyone there and call them by their first names. I believe there is little exaggeration in that statement. He was a friendly soul, a man greatly beloved and respected by all who knew him. I recall the words of William Wordsworth:

> That best portion of a good man's life,—
> His little, nameless, unremembered acts
> Of kindness and of love.

I think those words might well serve as an epitaph to Thomas Langton Church.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, we in this corner wish to associate ourselves with others in paying tribute to our late good friend and colleague, Tommy Church. Our very high respect for Mr. Church grew as a result of his warm friendly personality, his integrity and his deep devotion to his public duties. We respected and admired him also for the courage he displayed in remaining true to his strong and deep convictions to the very end. I am glad that I knew Mr. Church and gained inspiration from what I consider to have been a good life.

Mr. Church viewed with some sorrow and considerable alarm the steady and progressive disintegration of the British empire during the past few years. On numerous occasions in this house I heard him express that alarm. Indeed he was among the few to voice his fears about the forces that appeared to be wrecking the British empire. I think his courage and devotion reached their highest peaks on the occasions when, almost alone, he expressed his keen desire to see the empire preserved, with Canada playing a leading role in its regeneration.

In Mr. Church's death the house has lost a good and faithful member, the constituency of Broadview a devoted servant, the Conservative party one of its pillars, and his relatives and associates a warm and true friend.

The late T. L. Church

We express our sympathy to his party and to those who are left to mourn the loss of a fine man.

Mr. J. H. Harris (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, perhaps there are not many in this house who knew our late departed friend as well as I did. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) mentioned the year 1898. I am unable to go back that far, but I remember well that in 1905 I drove a pony and cart to take voters to vote for the late Mr. Church. I remember so well coming into this house for the first time as the youngest member of that day. Mr. Church was then a member and at that time he represented a western portion of the city of Toronto and I the eastern. With the change in population and other changes brought about by time, it was necessary for him to find another seat. My riding was split into two and he took over a large number of my people. I took the remainder.

I can see the late Mr. Church, during the last election campaign, at the corner of Gerrard and Broadview in Toronto. I can see him entering stores and greeting storekeeper after storekeeper, all of whom knew him well, and many of whom supported him because they loved him. They not only loved him; they also loved the principles for which he stood.

I know these people. I learned to know them when I was quite young, and I know what they thought of our departed friend. I know that they realized, as the Prime Minister said a moment ago, that the late Mr. Church was a champion of all the merits of a worthy daughter of the empire. We appreciate the sentiment of the Prime Minister, but I also know that the valiant sons and daughters who came back from two world wars after serving Canada loved the late Mr. Church more than any other person from that great metropolis of close to a million people. They appreciated the fact that he saw every troop train leave, and met every train that brought them back. These sons and daughters of Canada knew where they stood, and they knew they would have a supporter in this assembly to look after their interests.

I feel it a high privilege to have this opportunity of paying a tribute to the late member for Broadview. It was also my good fortune to know his sisters, one of whom has also passed on. I knew the late member for Broadview for forty-five years. Far too many men of that calibre have been lost to Canada. If any young men or young women within range of my voice this afternoon are still considering their future course, particularly in reference to their leaning toward the empire or otherwise, let them take a leaf out of the book of Thomas Langton Church, who, whatever you may say, in my opinion was one of Canada's greatest statesmen. He accomplished much, not for himself but for Toronto, for Ontario and for Canada, and much for the empire, which is playing such a vital part in the events of this day and generation.

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, may I join the countless friends of the late Mr. Church in conveying to his family, to his native city of Toronto and to his party my deepest sympathy in their great loss. Seldom have we heard such fine tributes as those which have been paid this afternoon to the memory of a great Canadian and a great man who is no longer among us.

I knew Mr. Church for many years; he was exceedingly kind to me. I remember that the first occasion I had to thank him was when I was fighting some private legislation which concerned my constituency. I did not ask for his support, but I received it in most generous measure, and from that time on we were friends. We also had mutual friends in the city of Toronto, and he did me the signal honour of introducing me to the primate of his church.

Reference has been made to his natural congeniality and his ability to make friends, but nothing has been said of the high regard in which he was held by the high clergy of his church. During the last Christmas season he had an invitation from the primate of that church to spend some time with him in Halifax. Unfortunately the invitation could not be accepted, but when I saw the report of the funeral I was not at all surprised to learn that for many hours before the service he lay in state in his church, and that the service was conducted by the primate, the Most Reverend Archbishop Kingston, assisted by the Dean of Toronto.

That did not mean that Mr. Church was at all narrow-minded. He represented a constituency named Broadview, and he deserved to represent it, because he was so broad-minded. For the dignitaries of other churches, in particular the Roman Catholic church, he had the same respect he held for his own clergy. Often he told me that he had attended celebrations to honour Monsignor Casey in Toronto, and he was on the most intimate terms with His Eminence Cardinal McGuigan, the present Roman Catholic archbishop of Toronto.

I never heard Tommy Church say anything nasty about anyone in the House of Commons; that is why he enjoyed the respect of all. He held deep convictions; and in that regard I should like to read a very fine sentence which was uttered by one of our mutual friends, Bishop Renison, speaking of him in St. James cathedral last Friday:

> He was one who was touched in youth by the glorious spiritual conception of the British empire.

Personally I did not always agree with him on certain matters, but we could remain friends without sharing the same views. That is the great privilege of members of the House of Commons. We come from all corners of this country; we do not always hold the same views, but we remain friends because we respect each other and understand the point of view of the other man, though that point of view may be entirely different from our own.

The late Mr. Church did a great deal for the city of Toronto. During his lifetime I said of him, without desiring to give offence to anyone else, that no one had done as much as he had done for his native city. In regard to the transportation system, for example, he saved the city twenty-four or twenty-five million dollars; and he was known to be honest. If he had not been, we would not have heard the eulogies that have been uttered today.

Sir, the memory of Tommy Church will live for ever. He did a great deal for our soldiers, as has been said. He did a great deal also for the underdog, for those who seemed to have no friends, who were turned away by all. They found a friend in Tommy Church because they were weak, because they were poor, because they were ill. He wanted them to be well and happy.

I always admired Mr. Church's courage and his deep conviction every time he spoke in the house. During the last session he was more active than any other private member. It seemed to be his swan song. He wanted to accomplish as much for his country, in this House of Commons, as he did during the time he occupied the chair of the first magistrate of the queen city of Toronto.

May I conclude with a personal recollection? A few days before his death eight or nine years ago, Mr. Lapointe was piloting his estimates through the house. He did not seem to be very well, and he was having trouble with some members of the opposition who were repeatedly harping on the same matter. It was very hot, and Mr. Lapointe was tired and ill. Tommy Church was instrumental in putting an end to the questioning, so Mr. Lapointe sent him a note of thanks. It read, "My dear Tommy: You are the prince of them all." I have no doubt that those who have charge of Tommy Church's correspondence will find that note. He kept it and showed it to me and to some of his friends, because he was quite proud of it. I shall close by paraphrasing that quotation; Tommy Church was the prince of them all.

THE MINISTRY

ANNOUNCEMENTS OF RESIGNATIONS AND APPOINTMENTS

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I should like to mention the changes that have taken place in the ministry since the last session.

Hon. Colin Gibson resigned as Minister of Mines and Resources on January 18. Hon. J. J. McCann was appointed Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, retaining his present portfolio of national revenue, also on January 18.

Hon. Robert H. Winters resigned as Minister of Reconstruction and Supply and was appointed Minister of Resources and Development on January 18.

Hon. Walter E. Harris was, on the same day, appointed Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Because I was standing I did not applaud that announcement, but I share with other hon. members their pleasure at seeing the member for Grey-Bruce assume additional responsibilities in the conduct of the affairs of the country.

I should like to table the relevant orders in council dealing with those appointments, and to add that Mr. Harris, of course, prior to taking the oath of office as a minister of the crown, resigned as parliamentary assistant to the Prime Minister and president of the privy council.

PARLIAMENTARY ASSISTANTS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF RESIGNATION AND APPOINTMENTS

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I should like to announce that Mr. Ralph Maybank resigned as parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Mines and Resources on January 18, and on the same day was appointed parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys.

Mr. George Prudham was appointed parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Resources and Development on February 1, 1950.

I wish to table the orders in council relating to those appointments.

TRANSFER OF DUTIES

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES COMPENSATION ACT—QUEBEC BATTLEFIELDS COMMISSION

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I wish to table orders in council dealing with the provisions of the Public Service Rearrangement and Transfer of Duties Act. The functions of the Minister of Transport under the Government Employees Compensation Act, 1947, were transferred to the Minister of Labour. The control and supervision of the government employees compensation branch of the Department of Transport were transferred to the Department of Labour. It was felt that the functions to be performed in connection with the service were somewhat similar to the functions that were being performed by the Department of Labour in connection with unemployment insurance and like services. It would therefore be more convenient to have those services administered by that department.

The duties and functions of the Minister of Finance under the act respecting the national battlefields at Quebec and amendments thereto were transferred to the Minister of Resources and Development. They are functions similar to those the department has to exercise in connection with national parks in other parts of the country, and it was felt it would be conducive to the expeditious handling of business, as well as more economical administration, to have the minister charged with the administration of other national parks entrusted with the responsibility for the operation of the battlefields commission at Quebec.

I table the orders in council relating to these transfers.

REPORTS AND PAPERS

CONSTITUTIONAL CONFERENCE—DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I should like to table two copies in English and two copies in French of the proceedings of the constitutional conference between the federal and provincial governments, January 10-12, 1950.

There are also copies in English and in French of the further correspondence between the Prime Minister and the premiers of the provinces respecting the constitutional conference, January 10, 1950, and the proposed general conference to be held in the autumn of this year. The previous letters dealing with these matters were printed as appendices to Hansard. If it be the desire of hon. members to have these letters appear as an appendix to today's Hansard, I might ask Your Honour to make that order.

There are also copies in English and in French of the correspondence which took place last summer with Premier Campbell of Manitoba and Premier Douglas of Saskatchewan on the subject of dominion-provincial relations. Since there have been so many of these letters published, I thought it might be the desire of hon. members to have all the correspondence that has taken place in that connection made available. Perhaps hon. members would wish also to have these letters printed as an appendix to Hansard of today.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house that these documents should be printed as an appendix to today's Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(For text of correspondence, see Appendix, pages 13 to 21.)

ORDERS IN COUNCIL

TABLING OF SUMMARY—DECEMBER 1, 1949, TO JANUARY 31, 1950

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I should like to table two copies of the summary of orders in council passed during the period December 1, 1949, to January 31, 1950. A previous summary of these orders in council was tabled on December 9. This is a summary of all the orders in council passed since the previous summary, and up to the end of January.

STANDING COMMITTEES

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That a special committee be appointed to prepare and report, with all convenient speed, lists of members to compose the standing committees of this house under standing order 63, said committee to be composed of Messrs. Fournier (Hull), Claxton, Casselman, Knowles and Weir.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMISSION

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) presented the following message from His Excellency the Governor General:

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons a certified copy of an approved minute of council appointing the Honourable Alphonse Fournier, Minister of Public Works, the Honourable D. C. Abbott, Minister of Finance, the Honourable J. J. McCann, Minister of National Revenue, and the Honourable F. G. Bradley, Secretary of State of Canada, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons as commissioners for the purposes and under the provisions of chapter 145 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, intituled: An act respecting the House of Commons.

SUPPLY

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That this house will on Friday next resolve itself into a committee to consider of a supply to be granted to His Majesty, notwithstanding the provisions of standing order 57.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think it is appropriate that this motion should be examined and the effect of its presentation at this time carefully considered.

Already this afternoon it has been pointed out that what is done now without objection may become a precedent. Practice becomes established simply by repetition. This same type of motion, in somewhat similar form, was introduced at the beginning of the session which opened last September. When the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) introduced the motion at that time he explained that he was doing so because it was necessary, in order to prevent any disturbance of the public service, to ask then for additional supply. No similar reason exists on this occasion. Because of the fact that supply had run for some time without the ordinary procedure being followed, we did not raise objection to the adoption of such a motion on that occasion. Today there is no reason for the presentation of this motion, and there are many strong reasons against it.

If this were merely a case of dealing with a motion as one which requires consent, then I would not be making the objection I now propose to make. If the question were simply whether we deal with this motion today without notice or deal with it a few days from now with notice, I should not be inclined to press the point strongly, because we all know what the purpose is. No one can suggest that there is any measure of surprise involved in the motion itself. Any point that I now make applies, I submit, with the same force to this motion, as if it were coming forward after due notice had been given.

I think it will be recognized by every member that in any event this motion cannot be dealt with today unless there is unanimous consent. But I think it is appropriate that we should deal now with the principle involved, so that discussion of this same subject on a second occasion may be avoided; the procedure will then be more convenient to the government as well as to members of the house generally.

This motion is made under standing order 57, which reads as follows:

> The house shall appoint the committees of supply and ways and means at the commencement of every session, so soon as an address has been agreed to, in answer to His Excellency's speech.

I know it has been contended on other occasions in this house that the words "at the commencement of every session, so soon as an address has been agreed to" are not intended to prevent the appointment of these committees by motion before the address has been agreed to, but that they are a direction that the committees must be proceeded with when that address has been agreed to. I submit, however, that this is not the interpretation which should be taken of the wording of that rule. Since it seems desirable that we be in no doubt as to what the meaning of the rule is, I should like to read what I believe to be one of the clearest arguments I have read in the records of this house in support of the proposition that this rule means that the committees must not and cannot be appointed until after the address has been dealt with.

I will quote from an extended speech made by Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King in this house on February 6, 1934. I am reading from page 287 of Hansard; I shall cover only a limited part of his remarks. I start to quote from the point at which he was dealing with the interpretation which should be placed on this section:

> It is obvious, from the reading of the rule of this house, that it is copied literatim et verbatim from the rule of the House of Commons at Westminster. There are two words which appear in the order at Westminster that do not appear in our order, the words "in future," but they in no way affect its purpose. The order of the British house is standing order No. 14; it reads as follows:
> "This house will, in future, appoint the committees of supply and ways and means at the commencement of every session, so soon as an address has been agreed to, in answer to His Majesty's speech."

Then Mr. King's words continue:

> The interpretation to be placed upon the order by the British house is best given by the leading constitutional authorities on procedure in the Commons, and on the law and custom of the constitution. I shall therefore quote from three or four of the most eminent authorities. It will be apparent, once the quotations are given, that there is no longer room for doubt as to what the intention of the order is.
> May's Parliamentary Practice at page 520 of the thirteenth edition, published in 1924, has the following:
> "The action taken by the House of Commons upon the demand of aid and supply for the public service made by the speech from the throne is the appointment, pursuant to standing order No. 14, of those committees of the whole house which are known as the committee of supply and the committee of ways and means. Motions setting up these committees are made immediately after the house agrees to the address in answer to the speech from the throne, and are put forthwith from the chair, no debate being permitted thereon."

Mr. King continued:

> Hon. members will observe that the wording is not that they "may be" or "must be" established, but that they "are" established immediately after the house agrees to the address in reply to the speech from the throne.
> Anson's Law of the Constitution, volume I, fifth edition, 1922, page 286, states:
> "The speech from the throne always contains a demand from the crown for supply, and as soon as the House of Commons has agreed upon an address in reply to the speech, it has for many years passed two resolutions—one that on a certain day it will resolve itself into committee of supply; another that on a certain day it will resolve itself into committee of ways and means."

Mr. King then said:

Here we have a positive statement of the customary method of procedure. I submit it is custom that governs in matters of this kind. I refer next to Redlich's Procedure of the House of Commons, 1907, volume 3, page 133:

"In response to the speech from the throne the Commons, as soon as they have voted the address in reply, appoint the two great committees before which the whole finance of the year has to be discussed—the committee of supply and the committee of ways and means."

That is very specific language; as soon as they have voted the address in reply they appoint the committees. It is, I think, conclusive in its wording and meaning.

There are reasons why this practice should not grow by failure to observe what the precedents have been. It is customary—and I may say that practice will be followed on this occasion by the opposition—to move an amendment to the motion for an address in reply to the speech from the throne which is a motion indicating lack of confidence in the government. That is customary practice, and it will be adhered to. If this procedure were followed, then a similar motion might be made to the motion to go into supply, and you would have two motions of want of confidence before the house at the same time. It is certainly no answer to a question of procedure in this house to say that the government enjoys so large and assured a majority that no question can arise as to the disposition of a motion of that kind. I would hope that no such suggestion will be made. I still have hopes that there may be members who will assert their independence sufficiently to give real meaning to a motion of this kind. But the procedure that we are following may apply to instances in which the numbers in the house are very close, and in which two debates relating to confidence of the house could go on simultaneously.

I would ask any hon. members who are interested in that particular point to examine the words of Mr. King, spoken on that very subject on the occasion to which I have referred. In that same speech Mr. King made a statement which I think is appropriate on this point, and I quote his words:

What I am afraid of is that in this house we may be changing a custom by the exceptions we are making, that the government is not viewing the proposed course so much as an exception as it is seeking to make what has been an exception in the last session or two a custom which will govern in the future.

Then there is a discussion of the importance of the debate on the speech from the throne. There are two great debates each session, namely, the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, and the debate which follows the presentation of the budget. In the debate on the address in reply it is customary for hon. members who have returned from their constituencies to interpret, at the time the session opens, what they have found there of major public concern. Any argument that can be put forward in favour of the motion which has been already presented by the Prime Minister, that the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne should have precedence over all other business, unless any other motion is made, supports the contention which I am now making, namely, that there should be no interference with the established practice in dealing with the debate on the address in reply.

What we do now may be a precedent for other occasions. There may be occasions—as there have been in the past—on which government will not receive a vote of confidence from the house. If the government does not receive a vote of confidence, and under our procedure is then called upon to go to the people or to have a new government formed, any debate that has taken place on supply will simply have been wiped out and proved useless. That is one of the reasons why the discussions in committee of supply or in committee of ways and means have been intended by the established practice of this house and of Westminster to be deferred until the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne has been dealt with.

Having regard to the precedents, and what might happen in the future, and considering the desire to preserve our parliamentary practice, I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this motion should not be proceeded with now. We know it cannot be dealt with now without consent. So that there may be no question of that, for the very reasons I have given I cannot accord consent to this motion today. But I do not believe the motion should be proceeded with in any event, on notice or otherwise, until the debate on the address in reply has been concluded.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I agree with what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) has said. If anyone looks through the records of the House of Commons over the past fifteen years during, to a very large extent, the prime ministership of Mr. King, he will find that the views which have just been quoted by the leader of the opposition were expressed by Mr. King not only when he was himself in opposition but when he was prime minister and head of the government.

I would also point out in support of the leader of the opposition that, while the two motions may be made immediately following the adoption of the address, as moved today it would fall within the category of an ordinary motion. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I submit it would come under standing order 45, which reads:

> Forty-eight hours' notice shall be given of a motion for leave to present a bill, resolution or address, for the appointment of any committee, or for placing a question on the order paper; but this rule shall not apply to bills after their introduction, or to private bills, or to the times of meeting or adjournment of the house.

This being a motion for the appointment of two important committees, it would fall under standing order 45, and would therefore require forty-eight hours' notice. I imagine that is what the leader of the opposition had in mind when he said it could not be proceeded with without the unanimous consent of the house.

I support him, not because I wish to obstruct the business of the house or to obstruct anything the Prime Minister has suggested today that might conceivably facilitate the business of the house. With the leader of the opposition, I believe these rules are made to protect minorities in the house, and on every occasion on which a motion is made to vary the normal procedure, as occurred this afternoon in connection with the motion concerning the debate on the address, I say we should be wary and exercise great care. That care must be exercised when there is any attempt to vary these long-established rules for the protection of minorities and private members in the house, or when there is an attempt to set them aside, or a suggestion that they should be set aside.

Therefore I support the leader of the opposition in his contention, and submit that this cannot be proceeded with without the forty-eight hours' notice required by standing order 45, or without the unanimous consent of the house to set it aside.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, it occurs to me that at times the government may require that the rules of the house be streamlined. I imagine that the motions moved this afternoon by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) might well have been moved for the purpose of streamlining procedure and getting ahead with the business. With that I am in sympathy.

At the same time it is obvious that if we are to streamline the procedure of the house we will have to pay attention to changing the rules and standing orders as they are found in this book. I would suggest that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) and the leader of the C.C.F. party are quite in order in protesting against this way of doing business. I propose to support them, and to make the further suggestion that, if we want to change procedure with respect to the setting up of these committees, we should first of all pay attention to changing standing order 57, after which we would be perfectly in order.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult to know just what hon. members do want. They say they do not want to rely upon the objection that this motion would require notice, and that they want to decide the question on the merits—at least that is what the leader of the opposition said. He wanted to decide on the merits, but then he pointed out that it was one of those motions which require forty-eight hours' notice.

I am not going to take time to debate it and waste a whole lot of time on this first day of a session discussing a matter of procedure. I endeavoured to do something which the government thought was going to meet the desires of hon. members as expressed at the last session of parliament. Statements were made at the last session that it would facilitate the business of the house if the estimates were brought on at an early day, and if an announcement was made that the first item for administration of such and such a department would be called on such and such a day, and that there would be general debate upon that item.

Ever since I have been here I have heard the complaint that the estimates are kept back until the dying days of the session, and then that they are rushed through without very much consideration. We have been working hard and working persistently to get the estimates into shape, and it is the hope of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) to table them this week. We thought that immediately after they were tabled it would suit the convenience of hon. members, as well as meet the exigencies of the public interest, to agree as to which department we would call on each one of those days upon which government business can be considered; so that, in order to make a speech hon. members would not have to rely upon prolonging the debate in reply to the speech from the throne.

There have been allusions here to procedure in the parliament at Westminster. It was the hon. member who leads the C.C.F. party who expressed in this house his admiration for what went on in the parliament at Westminster, because he had been there; he had heard the speech from the throne, and then he had attended the debate and within forty-eight hours the address in reply to the speech from the throne had been adopted.

Immediately thereafter committees were set up to deal with the concrete business of the house.

At that time the leader of the C.C.F. party expressed admiration for that procedure. But here in this house, it does not matter how hard the government tries to meet the wishes expressed from time to time by parties on the other side, those parties switch and have other objections to make.

I am not going to ask you, Mr. Speaker, to put this motion today, because there may be something in the contention that under standing order 45 there should be forty-eight hours' notice. But I do give notice here and now, from my seat, that these motions will be put on the order paper, and that we will attempt to get a decision on the merits of them.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I just wish to leave one thing clear. If the Prime Minister will take the trouble to read the record of what I said, he will see I left no doubt whatever about the fact that I was not raising objection to having it dealt with today, beyond the merits of the general argument. I pointed out that the Prime Minister could not proceed today, whether he wished to or not, without consent—and he was not getting consent. But I said I was hoping to save time by preventing the argument. Then I might say I think we have precedents from the man whom he succeeds, and whose views I think he still respects.

Mr. Speaker: I take it that the motion at the present time is withdrawn?

Mr. St. Laurent: I take it the motions are not withdrawn but I understand there is objection to their being considered at this time. I submit to the objection; but I do say that I will give notice on the order paper, so that they may, after forty-eight hours have elapsed, be considered on their merits—and I hope we shall not have to have the discussion again, though I am afraid it is a vain hope.

Motion stands.

Report of the chief electoral officer on by-elections held during the year 1949.—Mr. Speaker.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. St. Laurent moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: It is my understanding that, in accordance with the special order, we will proceed tomorrow with consideration of the address in reply to the speech of His Excellency, and, when the mover and the seconder have been heard, it might meet the wish of the leader of the opposition to have the debate adjourned at that time, to be continued on Monday. If that is the wish of the leader of the opposition the government will be prepared to agree to the suggestion that the debate be adjourned after the mover and the seconder have made their addresses.

Mr. Drew: That arrangement will be satisfactory.

Motion agreed to, and the house adjourned at 5.25 p.m.

Correspondence between the Prime Minister and Premiers of the provinces with respect to constitutional conference, January, 1950, and proposed dominion-provincial relations conference

OFFICE OF THE PRIME MINISTER
Canada

Ottawa, January 27, 1950

(The following is the text of a letter sent to all provincial premiers.)

My dear Premier:

I have now received replies from the premiers of all the provinces to my letter of December 7, in which I proposed that a conference should be held early in the autumn of this year to discuss general questions of common concern to the provincial and the federal governments. The replies, as well as the discussion of this matter at the constitutional conference of January 10-12, indicate general agreement on the desirability of having the conference at a convenient date in September or October.

While the precise date for the conference can, I think, be left for determination somewhat later, it might be desirable to endeavour to draw up immediately a tentative agenda in order that the necessary preparations may be carried forward by the respective governments. Several of the premiers indicated in their letters a desire that this should be done in ample time to allow full consideration of all the subjects for discussion. In order that such an agenda may be prepared it will be helpful if I can have your suggestions as to the matters which you think should be placed on it. When suggestions have been received from all the premiers, I shall have the tentative agenda circulated for comment and revision. In this manner I hope it may be possible to get agreement on the principal items for the conference in ample time for adequate preparations.

Yours sincerely,

Louis S. St. Laurent

Right Hon. Louis S. St. Laurent, K.C., M.P., Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa.

Dear Prime Minister:

Your letter of December 7, with regard to the holding of a dominion-provincial conference in the fall of 1950, reached my office just after I left for Ottawa. I read about the proposed conference while I was in Ottawa.

We think the idea is a splendid one, and we will be very happy to attend and to co-operate.

With best wishes.

Sincerely yours,

J. R. Smallwood

THE PREMIER
Nova Scotia

Halifax, January 7, 1950

My dear Prime Minister:

In reply to your letter of December 7, I may say that I doubt if it is possible to prepare any agenda for the conference which is to be held on January 10. As I see it, there is only one matter before the conference, and that is the evolution of a method of amending the constitution. While there well may be different views as to what the method should be, there still remains only one fundamental question before the conference.

In reply to the latter part of your letter, I may say that a conference in September or October, 1950, between the representatives of the dominion and the representatives of the provinces should be useful, and representatives of this province would be prepared to attend. I think definitely that the question of financial arrangements between the dominion and the provinces should be discussed at that time or earlier.

Yours sincerely,

A. L. Macdonald

Dear Mr. St. Laurent:

With reference to your letter of December 7, which I had not acknowledged, the first two paragraphs do not now require an answer inasmuch as the constitutional conference is concluded.

The third paragraph, however, seems to call for a promise to attend a general conference of the premiers in the early autumn of this year. I cannot determine whether or not you will discuss a new tax agreement at that conference, but in any case our province will be represented as usual.

Yours sincerely,

J. Walter Jones

THE PREMIER

Right Hon. Louis S. St. Laurent
Prime Minister of Canada
Ottawa, Canada

Dear Mr. Prime Minister:

I received in due course your letter of December 7.

With regard to the coming conference to discuss constitutional matters, now set to open in Ottawa on January 10, the views advanced by you with respect to the procedure to be adopted thereat are fully noted. For the reasons given one can readily see the difficulty that would arise in attempting to define an agenda, there being only one subject for discussion at the conference, namely, a possible method or plan of making amendments in Canada to the constitution in respect to matters of concern both to federal and provincial authorities.

Appendix

The suggestion advanced by you that the procedure for bringing about a full discussion of this subject be left for settlement by the conference itself is satisfactory to the government of this province.

The other question arising from your letter has reference to the proposal that a general conference be held early in the autumn of 1950 to discuss other questions of common concern to the dominion and the provinces. I have discussed this suggestion with my colleagues and am in a position to advise you of our willingness and desire to attend such a conference.

It is generally recognized that there are various subjects of common interest which could be discussed to advantage at a general conference between the federal and provincial governments. One could readily instance several of them.

If the provinces generally will undertake to participate in discussions of this nature we shall welcome the opportunity to take part in such a conference. It is obvious that much good may come from such studies if all parties approach them in a cooperative attitude and with a desire to find solutions to problems of real concern to the people of Canada.

I assume that it will be known shortly whether or not the proposal for holding this conference has the support of the provinces generally. Should arrangements for it be proceeded with, we will gladly give consideration to the questions and subjects which might constitute the agenda.

Yours sincerely,

Dear Mr. Prime Minister:

I wish to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of November 7, advising that January 10 next has been definitely set for the opening of the conference on constitutional matters.

I wish to assure you again that this province will be represented at that time.

PROVINCE OF MANITOBA

Winnipeg, December 23, 1949

Right Hon. Louis S. St. Laurent, P.C., K.C.,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Mr. Prime Minister:

This will acknowledge your letter of December 7 last.

In our letter of October 6 last, accepting your invitation to attend the federal-provincial constitutional conference I made it clear that the government of Manitoba realizes that a conference such as this will be dealing with difficult and complex constitutional problems, and that progress towards a solution of them can be made by representatives of Canada and the provinces meeting together. Because of this our government was of the opinion that a preliminary conference comprising constitutional experts, though not necessarily limited to them, would be useful in clarifying many of the issues involved, and we therefore supported the calling of such a preparatory conference.

It seemed to our government that such a conference could have made progress in discussing some of the constitutional and procedural issues that are certain to arise, and in this way would have been of value to the plenary conference when held—one of its accomplishments perhaps being a suggested agenda for that full conference. Inasmuch, however, as many of the premiers did not feel that such a preliminary meeting would serve any useful purpose, it is probably advisable to leave the matter of an agenda and general procedure to the full conference for final decision. I would assume, however, that your government will prepare a tentative agenda so that the greatest progress possible can be made when the conference assembles. This basis will be satisfactory to the Manitoba government.

The other matter referred to in your letter is the proposal of a general conference to discuss various questions of interest to the federal and provincial governments, including tax agreements. The government of Manitoba will welcome such a conference and will be glad to take part in it, either in September or October, whichever is found to best suit the majority of the participating governments.

Yours sincerely,

Douglas Campbell

PREMIER'S OFFICE
Saskatchewan

Regina, December 10, 1949

Right Hon. Louis S. St. Laurent, K.C.,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Ontario.

My dear Prime Minister:

Thank you for your letter of December 7 in reply to my letter of November 29 regarding an agenda for the conference which is to consider the procedure of amending the constitution of Canada.

Since your government is convening the conference which is to open on January 10, the decision as to whether or not there shall be an agenda lies entirely within your jurisdiction. However, in view of the fact that most of the provincial representatives will be anxious to get back to their respective provinces in order to prepare for the meeting of their legislatures, the Saskatchewan government is of the opinion that a good deal of time could be saved and some useful conclusions more speedily arrived at, if an agenda were drafted setting forth the specific items to be discussed. As an alternative, it may be that the federal government would be prepared to put before the provinces a series of specific proposals for the purpose of discussion on how the constitution of Canada could be amended in respect of dominion-provincial matters.

Your proposal that a general dominion-provincial conference be held early in the autumn of 1950 meets with the complete concurrence of the Saskatchewan government. This is something we have been advocating ever since the previous dominion-provincial conference was adjourned sine die on May 3, 1946. When I wrote to you on July 15 last, it was in the hope that your government would see fit to call a general conference this fall. Your reply of August 18 caused us considerable disappointment. You will remember that at that time you said:

> "I am not convinced, however, that the best way for us to attempt to discharge that duty is to come together at once in a full-dress dominion-provincial conference."

The fact that you have reconsidered your decision and are prepared to call a conference in the autumn of 1950 meets with our approval, although we are naturally disturbed that the calling of the conference is to be so long delayed. A meeting in the fall of 1950 will mean that over four years will have elapsed since the adjournment of the previous conference. This is a long and, in our opinion, unwarranted delay in coming together as governments to discuss the many perplexing problems that were left unsolved when the last conference was adjourned. When seven of the provincial governments entered into taxation agreements with the dominion, they did so in the belief that some of the social security proposals made at the reconstruction conference in 1945 would be implemented in whole or in part. The fact that a discussion of these important matters is to be further delayed for another ten months or a year gives us serious cause for concern.

The government of Saskatchewan will be pleased to forward to you in the course of the next few months our recommendations regarding subjects for discussion in the general conference which you propose convening in the fall of 1950. I trust we can take it for granted that the basis of these discussions will be the recommendations of the Rowell-Sirois commission which was appointed by the dominion government and whose proposals have not yet been implemented. Furthermore, I trust we can be assured that the dominion proposals of August, 1945, which would have implemented only in part the Rowell-Sirois report, will also be on the agenda as a basis for discussion.

While the government of this province is prepared to co-operate in every way possible, both in the conference called for January 10 and the one you are proposing for autumn, 1950, I think I should state quite frankly that in our opinion the calling of these conferences should have been reversed. Certainly if we are to discuss procedures for amending the constitution of Canada and re-allocating responsibilities between the dominion and the provinces, we ought first to have a clear understanding as to the financial responsibilities which our respective jurisdictions are to assume. It is difficult for me to see how we can discuss what constitutional responsibilities we are able to assume until we know what financial resources will be at our disposal. However, since your government has seen fit to call the constitutional conference first and the general conference later, we will do our best to make both of these conferences a success, although we are convinced that the problems to be discussed are inseparable and that there will have to be a good deal of latitude when these matters are under consideration.

Yours sincerely,

T. C. Douglas

OFFICE OF THE PRIME MINISTER

Ottawa, December 19, 1949

Hon. T. C. Douglas, M.L.A.,
Premier of Saskatchewan,
Parliament Buildings,
Regina, Saskatchewan.

My dear Premier:

Your letter of December 10 was placed before me today on my return after a brief absence from Ottawa.

Appendix

I am pleased to know that my proposal for a general conference to be held early in the autumn of 1950 meets with the concurrence of the government of Saskatchewan. The matters for discussion at that conference will, as I indicated in my letter of December 7, depend upon the views of the respective governments as to what should constitute the agenda. I shall be very glad to receive the recommendations as to subjects for discussion which the government of Saskatchewan plans to forward in the course of the next few months. Meanwhile I shall not attempt to set out the views of the federal government nor shall I make any comment on the various observations in the third paragraph of your letter concerning the appropriateness of the time suggested for the general conference or the implementation of earlier proposals.

With regard to an agenda or specific proposals for the conference on constitutional amendment which is to open on January 10, my colleagues and I have noted your comments and shall see that they are carefully considered in the light of views expressed by the premiers of the other provinces.

We have been somewhat surprised at the suggestion that the order of the two conferences proposed should have been reversed. It seems to us that this view rests on a misapprehension as to the scope of the January meeting. As I mentioned in my letters of September 14 and November 7, and again in my letter of December 7, our object in proposing the conference is to have consideration given to devising a satisfactory procedure for amending the constitution of Canada. We did not suggest that the conference should consider "re-allocating responsibilities between the dominion and the provinces". And the federal government does not intend to suggest any such amendments at the conference.

We would like to see established in Canada a procedure for making amendments which may be required in the future. The general conference proposed for the autumn of 1950 may result in agreement that certain amendments are desirable. If so, it is our hope that the constitutional conference of January 1950 will have prepared the way by deciding the procedure by which such amendments can be made.

Yours sincerely,

My dear Mr. Prime Minister:

I have for acknowledgment your letter of December 7, and may say that I heartily concur in the suggestion contained in paragraph two of your communication. I think that no purpose would be served at this time in setting a fixed agenda.

With reference to a proposed dominion conference in the fall of 1950, please be advised that the government of this province will be only too happy to be represented at that meeting.

With kindest personal regards.

Right Hon. Louis S. St. Laurent,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Ontario.

My dear Prime Minister:

My colleagues and I have given careful consideration to the matters outlined in your letter of December 7.

We concur in your views that it is not desirable to attempt to prepare in advance of the forthcoming conference an agenda which might be interpreted as restricting the discussion on constitutional amendments to certain specific subdivisions of the question with which the conference will be concerned. Our view rather is that there should be the widest latitude for full and frank discussion not only of procedure in the matter of constitutional amendments but of the whole question of constitutional authority as it concerns the respective governments of Canada and the Canadian people as a whole.

With reference to your proposal that a general dominion-provincial conference should be held next fall to discuss questions of common concern to the federal and the provincial governments, we are in full accord with this suggestion and feel that such a conference at the earliest convenient date is desirable and necessary.

Yours very truly,

Mr. Prime Minister:

With reference to my letter of the 12th of December, my colleagues of the executive council of the province have today been informed of the content of your letter, dated the 7th and received on the 9th December, concerning both the forthcoming intergovernmental conference and the one which you suggest for the fall of 1950, to be held in either September or October.

The government of the province of Quebec is always pleased to co-operate in the pursuit of the provinces' and the country's welfare and prosperity, on a basis of fairness and within the framework of constitutionality.

The Ottawa conferences obviously involve a considerable amount of trouble and inconvenience for provincial authorities. Nevertheless we accept that with pleasure when it results in greater prosperity and progress for the Canadian confederation and for the provinces of which it consists and which have given it birth.

It is our opinion that at the January meeting in Ottawa the provincial and federal delegates should discuss the opportunity of holding conferences upon set dates, as well as the places where such conferences might be held and the items which might be studied and settled.

We therefore believe, my dear Mr. Prime Minister, that the matter raised in your letter should be submitted for the consideration and decision of the delegates attending the forthcoming conference in January.

Yours sincerely,

My dear Premier:

I duly received your letters of the 12th and 14th of December in which you express the view that the question of holding a general conference of representatives of the federal and provincial governments in the autumn of 1950 should be considered and decided by the conference to be held in January next.

I feel, in this connection, that I should advise you that the premiers of five of the provinces have already indicated their acquiescence in the suggestion for such a conference and that, up to the present, replies have not been received from the other four premiers.

Yours sincerely,

OFFICE OF THE PRIME MINISTER
Province of Quebec

Quebec, February 1, 1950

Right Hon. Louis S. St. Laurent, K.C., P.C.,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa.

Mr. Prime Minister:

On Monday of this week I received your letter of the 27th of January, concerning a proposed intergovernmental conference in Ottawa next fall. At the first session of the council of ministers following the above-mentioned date, I brought it to the attention of my colleagues on the executive council of the province.

You write about "a unanimous approval of the proposal to hold a conference on a suitable date in September or October." On this point there is certainly a misunderstanding.

As it was noted by everyone, it is the desire of the government of the province of Quebec loyally to co-operate toward a just, fair and constitutional settlement of every problem that may arise in the field of federal-provincial relations. As a matter of fact, agreeable and durable memories linger in the minds of those of my colleagues who attended, as well as in my mind.

To my mind, the attitude and opinion of the government of the province of Quebec have been clearly stated, especially during the sessions of the recent conference in Ottawa. I am sure it will not be necessary to repeat the statements I then made on behalf of the province of Quebec.

You will undoubtedly admit that the drafting of an essentially Canadian constitution, studied and decided upon in Canada, by Canadians and for Canadians, is a task of capital importance.

In so far as the province of Quebec is concerned, I believe that the stand we took cannot possibly be ambiguous for anyone.

During the recent conference in Ottawa, all provinces have brought suggestions, taken a stand, expressed opinions. The federal authorities alone neither presented suggestions nor expressed any opinion.

To us, at such conferences, it would appear useful, just and necessary that all participants share their views and suggestions so that the best possible achievements may come from the body of this work. The old proverb is always true which says that light springs from the impact of ideas.

Undeniably the federal authorities have a right to opinions, and even convictions, and we are led to add, most respectfully, that an exchange of opinions and suggestions is not only a federal and a provincial right, but it is a duty arising from the spirit of frank and loyal co-operation that is desired and desirable among the different governments in Canadian confederation.

That is why we would like to know, in order to study them, the opinions and point of view of the federal government.

In the circumstances, you will agree that it is not a question of anyone imposing his views, and that if the federal authorities omitted to voice their opinions and suggestions, they would unfortunately be giving the impression of a lack of co-operation in the working out of a Canadian constitution and of a confederation strongly united in the integral respect of the rights of everyone.

There is no doubt that money is far from holding first place in the scale of values; nevertheless it should not be forgotten that we are living on earth and that financial means are essential to life.

One of the important problems which, in our minds, has to be settled in a precise way so as to prevent any serious dispute, is the problem of the fiscal powers which are indispensable to the various governments. To govern is to foresee, and thus it is necessary to have sources of income with which present as well as future needs may be met.

On many occasions we have suggested what seems to us to be an excellent method of obtaining perfect co-operation.

We are convinced that in spirit and letter the Canadian constitution grants to the provinces a priority at least in matters of direct taxation. However, since there are contrary opinions, which we respect without sharing, there would be an occasion to define clearly, the taxation powers of each and all the authorities of Canadian government.

We believe further that a delimitation beyond question of federal powers and provincial powers is needed even if we are convinced that certain contestation of provincial powers is ill-founded. Also, we believe it advisable to find and establish an appropriate and fair system that would take into account the rights of the ever-ignored taxpayer while maintaining for each government authority the powers essential to a responsible government.

Would you be good enough, Mr. Prime Minister, to let us know the opinions and attitude of the federal authorities on these subjects?

Appendix

You may be assured that we wish wholeheartedly to co-operate toward the progress and prosperity of the country as well as to the progress and prosperity of the provinces, our province in particular; such a co-operation could only take place, in our minds, on federative bases, with due regard to the elements which are indispensable to responsible government.

As we have stated on several occasions, the delegates of the province of Quebec take part in these Canadian intergovernmental conferences not as leaders of a political party but as representatives of a province; we likewise consider the delegates of Ottawa not as leaders of a political party but as representatives of the federal authority. It is our very sincere desire always to be guided by these principles which seem suitable and appropriate for everyone.

On behalf of the province of Quebec, I take pleasure in renewing the cordial invitation, which I extended, to hold these conferences, or at least some of them, in the old capital which was the cradle of Christian civilization in this land of America and even also the cradle of the Canadian confederation.

Please accept, Mr. Prime Minister, with my salutations, the assurances of my complete devotedness to the highest interests of our country in general and of the province of Quebec in particular.

OFFICE OF THE PRIME MINISTER

Ottawa, February 6, 1950

Hon. Maurice L. Duplessis,
Premier of the Province of Quebec,

My dear Premier:

I acknowledge receipt of your letter of the first of February, concerning the general conference of the federal and provincial governments proposed for early autumn; if there is any misunderstanding as to what I interpreted as being "a unanimous approval of the opportunity of holding a conference on a suitable day of September or October", I hope that such a misunderstanding can be cleared up.

The January conference had a special purpose which was to try to reach an agreement on a procedure for studying and deciding in Canada, in the future, every question concerning amendments to the Canadian constitution. I share your view that this is "a task of capital importance which deserves to be carried out with great care and without ever sacrificing the desired and desirable objective to the temporary and more than dubious advantage of hasty and insufficiently mature decisions".

Apparently, our colleagues of the other provinces also share the same view; I believe this is why we agreed to establish a committee to which every government will impart its views in writing on the best and most practical way of solving the problem. It is the federal government's intention to conform to this.

But there are other problems of interest to both the federal and the provincial authorities. It is with a view to discussing these problems that I made my proposal of a general conference next fall.

The premiers of all the other provinces have expressed their desire to take part in it, and the general tenor of our discussions in January led me to believe that everyone was taking the fall conference for granted, regardless of what progress took place in the constitutional conference. It was my understanding also that your invitation to meet in Quebec was for the resumption of the constitutional conference discussions. As for me, I should be delighted to accept it if it were also agreeable to the representatives of the other governments.

With regard to the general conference which the governments of all the other provinces desire, and which would undoubtedly deal with problems such as those you mention in the last part of your letter, I should like as soon as possible to tell the other premiers whether the government of Quebec will attend and, if such is the case, what questions you would want to have on the agenda.

I am hoping for your favourable reply, and I express the same wish as you that, during all these conferences, we keep on co-operating as we have done during the constitutional conference "not as leaders of political parties but as representatives of the province" on the one hand, and "of the federal authorities" on the other.

With my salutations please accept, my dear Premier, the assurances of my very distinguished consideration.

ONTARIO

Office of

The Prime Minister and President of the Council

Toronto, February 3, 1950

Dear Mr. Prime Minister:

I have your letter of January 27 relative to agenda for the forthcoming dominion-provincial conference which it is contemplated will be held in September or October next. I shall give this consideration and advise you within a short time.

The fact that there is a dominion-provincial conference called for this fall need not stand in the way of discussions between the federal government and the government of Ontario relative to a wide variety of subjects. I have such things in mind as the following:

1. The integration of dominion and provincial plans relative to public investment. The province of Ontario, with its municipalities and commissions, at the present time has a very large public investment program in operation which is necessary because of the expansion of the province. We have a great many other plans which can be gone ahead with if economic conditions are such that this is required. If the unemployment situation is such as to justify a program of public works, we are quite prepared to discuss this matter with you at any time. Our present public investment program is involving expenditures of approximately $25 million a month. We are most anxious to be co-operative in this matter and if the present unemployment situation justifies concerted federal and provincial action, I am prepared to discuss the matter at once.

2. Ontario is one of the provinces retaining the right to impose corporation and personal income tax and succession duties. There are many matters which might presently be considered to simplify this situation in so far as the taxpayer is concerned. I believe that this can be quite easily worked out and again I may say we are prepared to discuss the simplification of our present systems without waiting for the conference this fall.

3. There are many other matters upon which discussions might be held, such as any overlapping in old age pension administration, division of responsibility in the matter of relief, and things of this sort. My own view is that many of the problems which we have can readily be solved by direct approach and consideration. As far as the government of Ontario is concerned, we are prepared to start now if you so desire.

Relative to the conference this fall, I shall give consideration to the agenda at once.

Yours sincerely,

Leslie M. Frost

My dear Premier:

I wish to acknowledge your letter of the 3rd instant regarding the dominion-provincial conference which it is contemplated will be held next autumn.

I understand you have already been in touch with the Minister of Finance with a view to arranging, at an early date, informal conversations on some of the subjects mentioned in your letter.

I shall look forward to receiving your views as to the agenda for the conference in due course.

PROVINCE OF MANITOBA

Winnipeg, August 6, 1949

Right Hon. Louis S. St. Laurent, K.C.,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Mr. Prime Minister:

Dominion-provincial relations continue to be of great concern to the people of Manitoba. This concern has prompted the Manitoba government to give careful attention to methods by which the two levels of government can work together to improve the general welfare of Canada. Our citizens would be greatly encouraged by evidence that some progress was being made towards achieving a more complete working relationship between Canada and the provinces, particularly in the major fields of public services. To the members of the Manitoba government it appears that the present would be an opportune time to make a careful appraisal of these matters in the light of experience and in the light of present circumstances and prospects. Attention might be directed toward what has been accomplished in this direction through the presently operating seven-provinces agreements and toward such extensions or modifications of present dominion-provincial agreements as might yield mutually beneficial results.

Such discussions would undoubtedly involve the consideration of suggestions which have been made at other conferences and such variations of these suggestions as may seem desirable in the light of present circumstances and of new suggestions which the dominion or one or more of the provinces may wish to make. In view of the extreme complexity and the wide variation in the nature of the issues involved, it does not seem to us advisable to attempt to list specifically, the items which should form the core of the discussions at such a conference. Our first concern in Manitoba would be in regard to the development of plans designed to insure the financial stability of the provinces and to develop sound productive policies on public investment, on development and conservation of natural resources, on social security measures of various sorts, and on measures designed to encourage industrial and agricultural development generally.

The government of Manitoba is prepared to make its recommendations and suggestions and believes that there is an urgent necessity for bringing under review these and such other recommendations and suggestions as may be made by the dominion or other provinces.

The government of Manitoba, therefore, urges that plans should be made for the calling of a dominion-provincial conference at as early a date as is practicable.

Yours very truly,

Douglas Campbell

OFFICE OF THE PRIME MINISTER
Canada

Ottawa, August 18, 1949

Hon. Douglas L. Campbell, M.L.A.,
Premier of Manitoba,
Parliament Buildings,
Winnipeg, Manitoba.

My dear Premier:

I have discussed with my colleagues the matters dealt with in your letter to me of the sixth instant and particularly your suggestion that plans should be made for the calling of a dominion-provincial conference at as early a date as is practicable.

We of course feel that it is the duty of all those who have responsibility for government in Canada to co-operate with each other to advance the welfare of the people whom we represent.

I am not convinced, however, that the best way for us to attempt to discharge that duty is to come together at once in a full-dress dominion-provincial conference.

In such a conference it would no doubt be felt by some that fiscal matters should be those to be considered first, and even quite recent press dispatches have shown that there are still some who insist that before attempting to go into details "there should be clear recognition of the priority of the provinces as regards direct taxation".

Now, it is quite out of the question, for those who have the responsibility for all matters coming within the classes of subjects enumerated in section 91 of the British North America Act (including national defence), to even consider restricting in any way the legislative authority of the parliament of Canada for "the raising of money by any mode or system of taxation".

That, of course, does not mean that there are not many matters about which there can be and should be wholehearted co-operation between the federal government and the provincial governments.

It has seemed to us that, in view of our past experience, more progress can be made towards bringing about that co-operation by preparatory work consisting of frank discussions with individual provincial administrations about separate concrete questions; and such discussions which, I hope, will be fruitful and prepare the way for a general conference that would not again become abortive, have already been initiated.

As you know, the existing tax arrangements with the seven provincial governments who have entered into agreements with us extend only to the 31st of March, 1952, and we are committed to the calling of a conference not later than one year before the expiry of those arrangements.

It may be that as a result of the separate discussions that have been initiated it will be found desirable to call this conference considerably earlier than one year before the date of expiry of the arrangements, and it may be also that it will be found desirable to have at an earlier date some general conference, with a more restricted agenda, to deal with specific problems about which general agreement might be expected.

That, however, is something about which one cannot be specific until the prospects of being able to accomplish something really useful have been further explored.

Thanking you again for your promise of co-operation, I remain,

Yours sincerely,

Louis S. St. Laurent

PREMIER'S OFFICE

Regina, July 15, 1949

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent, K.C.,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Ontario.

My dear Prime Minister:

Please accept my sincere congratulations on the overwhelming vote of confidence which the Canadian people gave to you and your government on June 27. It is now the duty of all of us who believe in democracy and who desire to see our nation progress to co-operate with you and the members of your government to advance the welfare of the people whom we represent.

You will recall that the dominion-provincial conference on reconstruction was adjourned sine die on May 3, 1946. At that time the federal government felt that no good purpose could be served by continuing the conference because of certain fundamental differences of opinion that had arisen. While it is true that subsequently dominion-provincial taxation agreements were signed by seven provinces, many of the important questions which the conference was convened to discuss still remain untouched.

Although the federal government may have had reason to feel during the past four years that there was some doubt as to the attitude of the people of Canada with reference to the differences of opinion that occasioned the adjournment of the conference, certainly there can no longer be any question as to the attitude of the Canadian people. On June 27 the electorate gave very emphatic approval to the underlying principles contained in the dominion-provincial proposals of August, 1945, and this was especially true in those provinces where the federal government had some reason to entertain doubt in respect of the public mind on these matters. It is for this reason that the government of Saskatchewan feels that the dominion-provincial conference should be reconvened at the earliest possible date in order to discuss some of the more pressing matters that have been left in abeyance since the first conference nearly four years ago. The problems which the federal government recognized as crying for attention then are even more pressing now.

We would like to see the matter of health insurance tackled without further delay. Saskatchewan, and later the province of British Columbia, have instituted province-wide hospitalization schemes which are placing a very heavy financial burden upon the individual taxpayer and upon the provincial treasury. The widespread acceptance of these hospitalization plans is ample proof, if proof were needed, of the keen desire on the part of the Canadian people to have some system of prepaid health services established in some of the provinces at least. I believe most of the provinces would welcome an opportunity to discuss a health insurance program and the immediate steps that might be taken toward its implementation.

At the 1945 conference the federal government offered to relieve the provinces of all responsibility for old age pensioners, seventy years of age and over, and in addition the federal government would pay 50 per cent of the cost of providing a pension with a means test to those from sixty-five to sixty-nine inclusive. While we are opposed to the means test feature of this proposal, we are convinced of the necessity of providing a pension for the people in this age group. The plight of those between sixty-five and seventy is more serious now than it was four years ago. As jobs become more scarce, the plight of this particular age group will grow more serious. I am sure that most of the provinces would welcome an opportunity of discussing with you and your ministers the steps that might be taken during the next few years to care for a group, who, I am sure, are giving all of us a good deal of concern.

One of the reasons why the government of Saskatchewan looked favourably upon the federal government's proposals in 1945 was that they made provision for maintaining "full employment and a high level of national income" during times when an economic recession might restrict purchasing power and precipitate unemployment. The danger of such a state of affairs is just as imminent now as it was four years ago and there are signs that would indicate that it is even a greater potential menace than it was in 1945. The government of Saskatchewan believes that nothing but good can come of discussing and preparing plans that would be available to provide large-scale public works projects of socially useful undertakings. We have every reason to believe that the municipalities of our province, both rural and urban, would co-operate wholeheartedly in the preparation of such plans, and, if it becomes necessary, in their implementation.

The matters referred to above are of vital concern, not only to the people of Saskatchewan but to the other provinces of Canada as well. I am sure that the other provincial governments must feel as we do that the time is long overdue when the federal and provincial authorities should seek to find a solution to these and related social and economic problems. Since the dominion government convened the conference in 1945 and the matter of reconvening it was left to their discretion, I think I am not putting it too strongly when I say that the responsibility for immediate and effective action now lies with you and the members of your cabinet.

I trust that you will not think that I am pressing you unduly so soon after a federal election, but I know that you will agree that these and other related problems are of an urgent nature. We are hopeful that the federal government will now be prepared to give the necessary leadership to tackle these problems with vigour and sincerity.

Assuring you of our willingness to attend such a conference, should it be called, and promising you our co-operation in anything that will prove beneficial to the welfare of the people of Saskatchewan,

I remain,

Sincerely yours,

My dear Premier:

When I returned to Ottawa after a much appreciated holiday, your letter of July 15 was brought to my attention.

I thank you for your congratulations, and I assure you that I agree it is the duty of all of us who believe in democracy, and who desire to see our nation progress, to co-operate with each other to advance the welfare of the people whom we represent.

I am not convinced, however, that the best way for us to attempt to discharge that duty is to come together at once in a full-dress dominion-provincial conference.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Ontario.

My dear Prime Minister:

Thank you for your letter of August 18, which contains your reply to my request for the reconvening of the dominion-provincial conference.

The Saskatchewan government learned with a great deal of regret that you felt that no good purpose could be served by holding a full-dress dominion-provincial conference. I have reason to believe that our regret is shared by many of the other provinces, and indeed by large numbers of people across Canada. May I respectfully suggest that the main reason given in your letter for not holding such a conference is hardly germane to the question under discussion. After all, the dominion-provincial conference on reconstruction was convened by your government and the agenda was drafted by the members of your cabinet. I would take it for granted that if you chose to reconvene the conference you would again accept responsibility for preparing the agenda. It is true that in my letter I suggested that such matters as health insurance, old age pensions and responsibility for able-bodied unemployed should be subjects for discussion, but only because these were placed on the agenda by your government in the first place. At no time did I suggest that we should "consider restricting in any way the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada for 'raising of money by any mode or system of taxation' ". I can quite appreciate the fact that the dominion government would not look with favour upon restricting its fields of taxation, but I made no such suggestion and I doubt that anyone would expect your government to place such an item on the agenda in preparation for such a conference.

Your suggestion that more progress can be made by frank discussions with individual provinces about separate concrete problems is open to question. It is true that there are specific problems regarding difficulties which are peculiar to certain geographical areas which can be handled better by individual discussions. However, this is not true when we come to deal with matters which affect the whole Canadian economy more or less uniformly. I am sure that there is hardly a province in Canada which is not already wrestling with the problem of responsibility for the able-bodied unemployed. This is a responsibility which the Rowell-Sirois commission recommended should be assumed by the federal government, and in August 1945, this was one of the proposals advanced by your government on their own initiative. Already our urban municipalities are confronted with the problem of caring for the employable unemployed, and I am sure that their experience can be duplicated in almost every urban centre of Canada. The Saskatchewan government contends that this is a state of affairs which ought not to be dealt with on a piecemeal basis, but ought to be the subject of general discussion of all the governments concerned and some uniform policy adopted across the Dominion of Canada.

I am pleased to note that you hold out the hope that it may be found desirable to convene a conference with a limited agenda. As I have already stated, the matter of the agenda lies largely with your government and you will have to accept the responsibility as to how limited the agenda will be. If it is so limited as to exclude matters which vitally affect the welfare of the people of Canada, then your government must accept the responsibility for the limited results which the conference can achieve. Certainly it seems to me that the items which are listed in my previous letter are the irreducible minimum which ought to be on the agenda of such a conference, but whether extensive or limited it is the firm conviction of the Saskatchewan government that the dominion-provincial conference should be reconvened before some of the difficulties confronting the provincial and municipal governments reach alarming proportions.

May I urge upon you and your colleagues the reconsideration of this whole question. Indications from other provincial governments would lead me to believe that some of them are also vitally concerned lest there be further delays in tackling some of the pressing problems that are the concern of all who are charged with governmental responsibility.

Yours sincerely,

T. C. Douglas

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on November 26 last, during the course of the discussion on the bills that were then before the house for the establishment of three new departments, the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) suggested that when the departments were set up it would be convenient to have charts prepared showing the branches of the service that would be included in each new department.

The departments were set up in accordance with proclamations which were published in the Canada Gazette of January 28 at pages 320 and 321. We have had charts prepared showing the distribution of the branches of the service among the new departments, and I should like to table two copies of each of these charts and to say that they have been made available for distribution to all hon. members of both houses.

Mr. Graydon: They have been distributed already.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REDUCTION IN PASSENGER TRAIN SERVICES—COAL SUPPLY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport. When may we expect the service of the Canadian National Railways in Canada to be restored to normal?

Mr. Coldwell: Perhaps the minister might answer at the same time the question I sent him a day or two ago. I will not repeat it.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell) was good enough to send me some two days ago notice of a question similar to that which the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) has asked. In fairness to members on this side of the house who have also been pressing for a statement on the subject, I think I should say that at the time I received notice from the hon. member I already had a statement prepared on the situation, because I expected that some such question would be asked. With the permission of the house I should like to read it now.

On December 28, 1949, the Canadian National Railways announced reductions in passenger train service equivalent to approximately 25 per cent, effective January 9, 1950. These were made necessary by the reduction of the stockpile position of coal on the Canadian National Railways. Neither the government nor myself was previously advised of this decision.

Since the reductions were announced, officers of my department and myself have been in constant touch with the management of the Canadian National on this question of coal supply. I have asked the new chairman and president, Mr. Donald Gordon, to give me a memorandum setting out in detail the events leading up to the decision curtailing passenger train services. At my request, Mr. Vaughan, the former chairman and president, has given me a letter of explanation of the circumstances which brought about the present situation.

I would like to summarize to the house these events.

First of all, the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways, at its meeting in October, 1948, approved an objective of 2,365,000 tons of coal for stockpile as at December 31, 1949—this being about four and one-half months' supply. I am advised that if this stockpile objective had been obtained, a reduction in train services would not have been necessary unless there had been a complete interruption of supplies covering, say, a three or four months' period. Early in June, 1949, Mr. Vaughan, then president, gave instructions to the purchasing department to keep the coal stocks of the C.N.R. at approximately three months' supply. He was of the opinion that such reserve was ample to meet any emergency. The events which occurred in the coal industry, coupled with the decision of Mr. Vaughan, had the effect of reducing the stockpile objective, as set out by the board of directors in October, 1948, from 2,365,000 tons to 1,043,000 tons at December 31, 1949. This meant that a condition of emergency existed, since the coal supply in the heavy traffic region of the Canadian National was at that time only from twenty-four to twenty-six days. I may say that the over-all position of the Canadian National was somewhat better than the twenty-four to twenty-six days which I have just indicated.

It is well known that there has been a series of work interruptions in United States mines from June, 1949, to the present time. There were work stoppages, vacation periods, a three-day-a-week work program, a fifty-one day strike, a walkout, and at the present time a general strike throughout United States coal fields since February 13.

While orders for the purchasing of United States coal have been held to a minimum in accordance with the government policy of the conservation of United States dollar expenditures, the actual orders placed for Canadian and United States coal generally would have been sufficient to meet requirements if regular deliveries had been maintained from the United States mines. Unfortunately such a condition did not prevail, and late in December the Canadian National had to curtail passenger train services in order to maintain coal supplies. The reduction in passenger train services put into effect totalled some 89,000 miles, bringing about an estimated reduction in coal consumption of approximately 1,000 tons per day. The passenger train miles which were cancelled were distributed as follows for the various regions:

Central region	45,800
United States lines	3,200

The development of the labour disputes in the United States mines, and the interruption of coal deliveries, found the Canadian National with an inadequate stockpile position, and action had to be taken to conserve system stockpiles and use them to the best advantage so as to reduce public inconvenience to a minimum. I am firmly convinced that the precautionary measure taken by the Canadian National to reduce temporarily passenger train services by 25 per cent was fully warranted by the conditions which I have described, and I also believe that it was only fair that all sections of Canada should be treated in the same way so far as the reduction in passenger train services was concerned.

It is most unfortunate that the situation which I have reviewed culminated in a temporary reduction in the Canadian National passenger train services. I can assure the house that as soon as the coal supply situation improves, the passenger train services which have been curtailed will be reinstated. I wish also to assure the house that at no time did the management of the Canadian National consider reducing its passenger train services with a view to financial economies. On the contrary the reduction in passenger train services was resorted to in order to conserve the dwindling coal stocks, and to prevent, if possible, subsequent greater reduction in train services, as happened in the case of the railways in the United States.

Mr. Graydon: I should like to ask a supplementary question which is being asked by many people, including the employees of the Canadian National Railways. While train services are being curtailed by the Canadian National, apparently the Canadian Pacific has plenty of coal. Surely there should be some explanation of this error in judgment on the part of the Canadian National management, as a result of which the Canadian Pacific is said to be now getting a great deal more business.

Mr. Chevrier: I tried to bring that out in the statement I have just made; but I would say that the positions of the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific in this country are entirely different. The main mileage of the Canadian Pacific is in western Canada, whereas the greater part of the mileage of the Canadian National is in central Canada, Ontario and Quebec. Speaking from memory, I believe the Canadian National have some 11,000 miles of railway east of Manitoba, as opposed to some 5,600 miles operated by the Canadian Pacific. In other words, for the most part the Canadian Pacific is operating in a region where there are coal mines, whereas the Canadian National is operating in central Canada where there are none.

Mr. Brooks: I should like to know if it would not be possible to get more coal from the maritime provinces, and why more coal was not obtained there by the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. Chevrier: That is a question which it would require some little time to answer in detail. Generally speaking, however, the Canadian National is taking from the maritime provinces, as well as from western Canada, all the coal it can get at the moment.

Mr. Brooks: That is not the impression in the maritimes.

Mr. Chevrier: Even if the Canadian National had taken all the coal it could have obtained in 1949 in the maritime provinces and in western Canada, the present position would have been no different.

Mr. Isnor: Can the minister tell us what quantity of the 2,365,000 tons of coal in the stockpile came from the United States and what quantity came from Canadian mines?

Mr. Chevrier: I am sorry, but I have not that information at my fingertips.

Mr. Isnor: Perhaps the minister would be good enough to give it later.

Mr. Graydon: Why not tell us yourself?

Mr. Gillis: Will the minister say whether in his opinion, in view of the statement he has just made, a 25 per cent reduction in train services in the maritimes was necessary, having in mind the fact that plenty of coal was available there to provide the service?

Mr. Chevrier: My hon. friend bases his question on the assumption that there was plenty of coal.

Mr. Gillis: The provincial government said so.

Mr. Chevrier: I am telling my hon. friend now that according to the information I have in my possession, emanating from Canadian National Railway sources, there was not available in the maritime region all the coal that they hoped to get. They are receiving full co-operation from the maritime region at the moment, and are taking all the coal they can obtain; but that did not always prevail.

As to why the reduction in service was carried out all over Canada, the Canadian National management thought—and I am of the opinion as well—that the fair thing to do was apportion the reduction in all parts of Canada. If that had not been done the transcontinental trains probably would not be operating.

Mr. Coldwell: In view of the circumstances I should like to know whether the government and the railways will give consideration to the greater utilization of Canadian coal and oil in the operation of our railway systems.

Mr. Chevrier: My hon. friend raises quite an important point. As he probably knows, it has been the policy of the Canadian National to change from coal-burning to oil-burning locomotives in western Canada. I think the hon. gentleman knows that in all British Columbia and in parts of Alberta and Saskatchewan, oil is used exclusively. It would take about six months to convert from oil to coal. In an emergency situation such as this, consideration could not be given to that action. In eastern Canada, by which I mean the central region, the same situation would obtain if we had to convert from coal to oil; it would take several months. The Canadian National had to come to a decision quickly when this emergency position developed, and in the circumstances I think it took the logical and best decision.

Mr. Graydon: If I might impose upon the minister by asking one other question, can he tell us what proportion of the coal used by the Canadian National is mined in Canada and what proportion is mined in the United States?

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think I can answer that question accurately, other than to say that some 19 million tons of coal are produced in this country, of which some 6,500,000 tons coming from the maritime region and 5 million tons coming from the western region can be used for railway purposes. In the past it has been the policy of the Canadian National Railways to get coal for the central region from United States sources, because they were closer. To haul coal all the way from Nova Scotia to western Ontario is not a profitable enterprise. But the Canadian National have tried to buy all the Canadian coal they could; and, following the policy of the government in curtailing expenditures in the United States, in the recent past they have been looking toward a greater consumption of Canadian coal.

Mr. Graydon: Perhaps the minister would give us the percentages later?

Mr. Chevrier: I shall be glad to do so.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSIONER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will the Minister of Justice say how soon an announcement will be made concerning the appointment of someone to fill the post of commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I can give an estimate, Mr. Speaker. I would say in about one week.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CHINESE NATIONALIST BLOCKADE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Has the Secretary of State for External Affairs been advised of the blockade the Chinese national government claims to have established in relation to certain portions of the Pacific ocean adjacent to China? If so, have Canadian shipping interests been advised of the dangers their vessels may encounter in traversing those waters?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): We have been advised of that situation, and Canadian shipping companies have been informed of it.

MEETING OF COMMONWEALTH FOREIGN MINISTERS AT COLOMBO, CEYLON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): In view of the interest being taken in the Far East generally, and in the Ceylon conference, can the Secretary of State for External Affairs say when he expects to be able to make a statement to the house with respect to these very important matters?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I hope to be in a position to make a statement on this matter at an early stage in the debate on the address.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

ADDRESS IN REPLY, MOVED BY MR. F. H. LARSON AND SECONDED BY MR. ARMAND DUMAS

The house proceeded to the consideration of the speech delivered by His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of the session.

Mr. F. H. Larson (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, in the face of the ability and eloquence that are found in this house, I feel that the task which has been assigned to me this afternoon could have been placed in more capable hands. I would feel much more qualified for this task if I were able to add a few words in French. I hope the members who were born into the oldest society in this country will realize that, although I do not feel capable of using their language, I have the kindest feelings towards them. Indeed I already number many of them among my personal friends. Were it not for the fact that I number so many of the members on all sides of the house as my personal friends, I would have been extremely reluctant to accept the invitation to carry out the task now before me.

I have received several communications from people of my constituency expressing the honour they feel has been done them this day, and I ask your permission, Mr. Speaker, to say a few words on their behalf, as well as on behalf of the western part of this country which is my home.

About the turn of the century, the tide of Canadian growth was pushing steadily westward into the plains of western Canada. Our fathers and grandfathers brought their families to this immense prairie country to settle on farms and make their homes. I should say there are few countries in the world that did not make their contribution to the settlers who poured into western Canada. In direct contrast with central Canada, where the people came mainly from two great racial stocks, British and French, the people of the plains came from many.

To live together in any degree of peace, these people were determined to understand each other; tolerance, therefore, has become the keynote of cultural development. Personal liberty and freedom are the intense desire of all. The people of Kindersley constituency are typical of this development, and tolerance to their neighbours has eliminated fear of them. They live by either farming or ranching, and those who live in the towns or villages depend on farming for their livelihood. There are several large cattle ranches. In an area in the south of the constituency, large-scale wheat farming is carried on, while in the north there is an area in which the people tend to live closer together and carry on mixed farming, much as you would find it in Ontario.

In the years of prosperity our farmers and ranchers derive a large annual income from their occupation. At this point may I say that they have asked me to tell the minister that, while they do not mind paying their fair share of the income taxes, their methods of bookkeeping are such that it is extremely difficult to keep detailed figures for years back. It would help them immeasurably if, after filing their income tax returns the department would make a final assessment within eighteen months, and, after that, consider the period closed. When a farmer plants his crops he has not the slightest idea what his eventual profit will be from that crop. Even if he tried to estimate it the day before he harvested the crop, he could still not do so with any degree of accuracy.

I believe that if a man is in a position to do so, he should attempt to keep at least one crop in storage on his farm. Then if anything happens to him, in all fairness to his family some part of these salable commodities should be considered as corpus in his estate.

When our people came to the plains, they naturally gravitated towards places which exhibited the same soil characteristics as those which were found in their homeland. Few figures on climatic conditions were available. It was like grabbing out of a hat and trusting you were right. Since that time universities and government departments have carefully tabulated these things. Cyclical theories of climate have been worked out.

From this data our government has accepted the fact that a resettlement program for many parts of the western plains is necessary. Indeed, under the direction of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) this resettlement program is well under way. As I mentioned, Mr. Speaker, the large grain farm and the large ranch provide the livelihood of a number of our people. In time of war or other national emergency, our sparse population produces a tremendous surplus of food to give life to our fighting forces and hope to whole populations that have lived under the shadow of starvation. The sight of millions of acres of waving grain or luscious ranchland brings to the observer a sense of spaciousness and freedom not possible in any other place. It is a mystery to many how all this wealth can disappear and leave desolation, as happened generally twenty years ago and in some areas during the past few years.

It is all a matter of rainfall. We live continually under the threat that not quite enough rain will fall to mature our crops or support our herds of cattle. It is true that those who were fortunate enough to get heavy gumbo land or pasture land have continued to prosper on the plains with few setbacks. Many were not so fortunate; so you are asked from time to time to vote money for prairie farm assistance and prairie farm rehabilitation, in an endeavour to put everyone on a more or less equitable basis. It is the earnest hope of the Minister of Agriculture, whose policies have done so much, that as the years go on, and irrigation, reclamation and resettlement develop, such expenditures as prairie farm assistance will disappear. Then, the plains can fulfil the hopes that the governments of Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Wilfrid Laurier envisaged when they supported plans to push railroads and settlers into the vast plains country.

It is to be regretted that the very things that make Canada great, far beyond her years, are the barriers to complete understanding and unity of our people. The beauty of our Rocky mountains is unsurpassed by any others in the world. They produce tremendous wealth in minerals, but many people never cross them to know their neighbours on the other side. In the same manner the plains are divided from central Canada by a region tremendously rich in minerals, but many westerners never cross that region to know the people in the east, as we call it. When we think of the maritimes, it is practically a different world.

While these appalling distances tend to divide Canada into virtually several countries, we must realize how much these sparsely inhabited regions contribute to our national wealth, and conscientiously make an effort to overcome the disadvantages. The present government is to be highly commended for its policies which fully recognize the nationhood of Canada, and stay strictly away from attempts to break Canada into its various components.

I feel that I may be open to criticism for not taking issue with the government on some of the matters of a more contentious nature. I, however, do not believe that localized matters, where there may be some hardship, should be allowed to colour the entire assessment of the general policies.

I express only my own opinion, but I believe a recent event was used as a field of trial for the policies of this federal government. My good friend, the late Paul Prince, M.L.A. for The Battlefords in Saskatchewan, passed on and I feel that there is not too great a tribute I could pay to his memory. His passing precipitated a by-election. It was apparently necessary to hold the election in the middle of a severe winter, making it a real hardship for the farmers to get to the polls. I am reluctant to rehash elections in this house, but the Liberal leader in Saskatchewan, Mr. Tucker, endeavoured to keep the campaign on a provincial basis; others, however, came in criticizing the federal government as to its agricultural marketing policies and as to all the other contentious matters that were discussed in this house last session. We had to defend those policies.

For years the seat has been evenly divided. All factors tended toward putting the federal government on a real trial. You all know the result. In spite of this the people backed up the policies of the federal government. For this reason I feel that I have no real licence to criticize too severely the policies of the federal government.

The trans-Canada highway is a huge undertaking considering the vast distance involved, and the government's determination to complete this project will do much toward unifying Canada. At this point, Mr. Speaker, I hope you will not mind my suggesting to the minister, if he has any control over the matter, that after the highway leaves Swift Current in Saskatchewan it should turn north to a point directly east of the city of Calgary; in that way the thriving city of Saskatoon would be put within easy reach of its facilities.

It is the duty of every Canadian to support his government in its endeavour to more solidly unify this vast and wonderful country. I appeal to everyone to learn all he can about other parts of Canada, even though he cannot visit them; to understand the problems which face his neighbours one or two thousand miles away; to understand their racial or religious culture and to appreciate their economic successes and difficulties.

I note with great satisfaction the gradual disappearance of the term "fight for the east" or "fight for the west" or "fight for the maritimes" or fight for some other group. The past decade has shown that our thinking on these matters has become more and more mature. I hesitate to state the causes for this gradual binding together of the Canadian people, but there are several factors which definitely enter into it.

I would say that meeting the common danger in the two great wars had a great effect on unifying the people of this country. The moving around of people both in and out of the services also contributed. Air travel has become common, and transcontinental fares have become low enough to allow many people, otherwise confined by press of business and press of affairs, to meet their business associates and friends across the country, and to get to know them.

Your government now carries all first-class mail by air if it will bring your letters to their destination any quicker. This means a tremendous saving especially to businessmen, who can now correspond where formerly they had to wire or telephone. I still feel, however, that the policies I have the privilege to support are the largest single factor. Indeed, I have the honour to move, seconded by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Dumas):

That the following address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada:

To His Excellency Field Marshal the Right Honourable the Viscount Alexander of Tunis, Knight of the Most Noble Order of the Garter, Knight Grand Cross of the Most Honourable Order of the Bath, Knight Grand Cross of the Most Distinguished Order of Saint Michael and Saint George, Companion of the Most Exalted Order of the Star of India, Companion of the Distinguished Service Order; upon whom has been conferred the decoration of the Military Cross; Governor General and Commander in Chief of Canada.

May it please Your Excellency:

We, His Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the House of Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both houses of parliament.

I am happy to note that once again, as in the past, the policy of the government is to continue to carry out measures to unify this country. At the dominion-provincial conference no attempt was made to force the majority viewpoint on any minority. It is realized full well by the government that to attempt to force any measures through such a council without unanimous agreement would serve only to disrupt the forces of unity in this country. Only the principles which were obviously necessary and concurred in by all were established. Agreement was reached concerning the contentious point that, in any matters which concerned parliament only, the constitution could be amended by parliament alone. This was a great step, because there are many in this house who feel that any such move should be made only after consultation with the provincial authorities. The provincial premiers, themselves, however, have agreed that, in a general scheme of amendment, matters concerning parliament alone can be dealt with by parliament alone.

Further, it was established that in fundamental matters the consent of all the provincial authorities should be required and that in any matters, except fundamental rights, which concern parliament and all the provincial legislatures, provision should be made for amendment by an act of the parliament of Canada and acts of such majority of the legislatures and upon such additional conditions, if any, as may be decided upon.

It has now become apparent that the federal government has no intention of forcing its will on the provincial authorities. It also becomes apparent that the entire matter will not be settled at one fell swoop but rather will be a development which will take place over a period of months or even years. It appears to me that the effect will be to foster a condition of mutual trust between the provincial authorities and the federal government. If this tendency can be carried along without violent disagreement, necessary changes of even a contentious nature can be negotiated, thereby fostering within the country the spirit of unity that this government and the citizens of Canada themselves so earnestly desire.

In the broader realm of international affairs we also attempt to show the spirit of neighbourliness which is so important to world peace. With our own country showing this spirit of co-operation within itself, our representatives can go into the councils of the world confident that they can help this spirit to permeate the international councils. It is to be regretted that the United Nations is not yet the final council for settling world affairs. We earnestly pray God that mutual defence pacts within the United Nations will eventually become unnecessary. In the meantime the Atlantic pact nations are to be commended on their ability to ensure a block of peace-loving democracies strong enough to make aggression an extremely hazardous undertaking, while still being able to work within the council as a whole.

It affords a great deal of comfort to the people of Canada, indeed to North America, to know that the signatories to the North Atlantic pact are working so well together, and that plans are well advanced for the defence of this hemisphere in the event it becomes necessary. However, with the knowledge that those whose activities tend to disrupt world peace might launch a blitz attack with a great deal of force and terror, there is the fact that they are not yet industrially strong enough to carry on a protracted war. The show of strength in the western hemisphere should deter their hand until some formula for settling international differences around the council table can be worked out.

I am a great admirer of both Great Britain and the United States; but we have the almost impossible situation of inconvertibility of our currencies. Commenting on the British position to Beland Honderich, financial editor of the Toronto Daily Star, Sir Stafford Cripps touched on this particular subject, and it appeared in the February 11 issue of that paper. I feel that his actual words portray the situation, and with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote them:

> The dollar problem is so complex and deep-rooted that no simple or easy solution can be expected. The acceptance by Canada of sterling instead of dollars in payment for some United Kingdom exports would not in itself solve the problem.
> This wouldn't really solve anything. It would only defer payment. Some day you would have to tear up the sterling and forget about it or receive payment in some form or other. It is not a permanent solution. It would really be a Canadian credit given without interest.

No matter how rich and powerful the great republic of the United States may be, it cannot continue to lend or give billions to Europe for rehabilitation.

The western nations of Europe are making great strides toward economic recovery but this recovery can never be complete until currencies can be exchanged on the world markets. I am very much afraid if this is not accomplished very shortly the economic result will have a disastrous effect on the strength of the Atlantic pact. Since the United States must take the lead in this move I earnestly appeal, and I know it is with the concurrence of this government, that she make a most diligent attempt to correct this difficulty.

Speaking to the Canadian Society in New York, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) made certain suggestions regarding the solution of this problem of currencies, and I cannot do better than use the words which he uttered at that time. The Prime Minister said:

> But I do not think we can afford to lose sight of the fact that it is even more important to the economic strength of the free world that the European countries and, indeed, all countries suffering from a dollar shortage, should also be able to export as freely as possible to North American markets.
> It is, after all, only by accepting imports from other continents that we in North America can hope to reduce the real cost to ourselves of our contribution to the common security of the free world.
> And it is only by accepting imports that we can hope to provide stable and profitable markets outside our continent for those agricultural and other surpluses beyond our own needs which both our countries do actually produce.
> Canada, in this matter also, is in a somewhat different position than the United States. Though we still export rather more than we import, our over-all exports and imports are not too far from a balance. But, as I have already said, we in Canada import from the United States far more than we export to this country, and we export to Europe far more than we import from Europe.
> That is why Canada, too, has a dollar problem.
> We, therefore, have a special interest in freer multilateral trade and, though I am not an economist, that seems to me to mean freer entry to this country both for European exports and for our own.
> I would not venture to advocate the reduction of tariff and other trade barriers as any special favour to us. But it does seem to me that such a policy might make a tremendous contribution to the security of the free world generally and the United States in particular.
> A century ago, England found herself in much the same position the United States has today. England was then the greatest industrial nation, the wealthiest nation and, therefore, the greatest potential market.
> She opened that great market freely to the world and, whether as a result or merely as a coincidence, the world—herself included—enjoyed more than half a century of comparative peace and economic progress.
> Might it be possible that history has there a lesson for this continent and this country at the midpoint of the twentieth century?

That is the end of the quotation. The greatest assurance of peace lies on a high level of international trade. The critics of this government say that we are losing our trade, but I believe the policies of the government will insure a high level of trade for many years. If we can, in the not too distant future, sell our food products to Britain for pounds and then pay the United States for our imports in those pounds, I see no immediate cause for worry. This may be theorizing but in my opinion the adjustment is necessary and must be made soon.

In our own defence activities the policy of keeping agriculture and industry at a high level of efficiency will ensure food and equipment in the event of emergency. It would be impossible to retain very large standing forces in Canada. Our industrial efficiency would suffer and our economic position would be impaired. However, we can train, and are training, an adequate number of men in all the services and giving them such training that if an emergency develops we shall have a good number of expert teachers who will soon be able to bring our fighting forces up to emergency requirements.

The policy of developing prototypes in aeroplanes and other equipment and keeping our factories at the ready is the only correct policy. In the second war Germany built a huge reserve of planes which were far ahead of their time, but as we developed our aviation we outdistanced them in quality and numbers. The matter of carrying a force to be ready always to withstand the shock of an attack by the aggressor and carry the attack to him is beyond the ability of a nation like Canada. But we can be thankful that our powerful partners, Britain and particularly the United States, have an industrial and economic strength to fill this vital role.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us examine for a moment our domestic affairs forecast in the speech from the throne. If employment is kept at a high level and agricultural prices are good we have the basis for a sound internal economy.

Let us turn for a moment to the position of labour. During the war employment and wages were at an extremely high level. This winter there has been a good deal of talk of excessive unemployment. I believe that a good deal of this difficulty has come through the extremely cold and stormy winter that we have had west of the great lakes. Also the war drew many men from agriculture into industry. There is talk of unemployment in the larger centres but I find farmers having a hard time to get good men to do farm work. I also know that many farm buildings and homes in small centres are going unpainted because of lack of men to do the job. Carpenters, plumbers and men in all such trades are difficult to get in the smaller centres.

I am glad to hear that a measure will be brought before parliament to extend the benefits of unemployment insurance. However, I feel that a move of a good deal of labour from the cities to the smaller centres would add security to those individuals and greatly minimize the hardship they may suffer.

In the history of the industrial revolution are many instances of management exploiting labour, and the trade union movement was forced on labour. The result of this movement has been that people who sell their skills have reached the position where they can now walk in the same dignity and the same pride as the richest men in the country. This adds immeasurably to the unification of the nation, because there is nothing quite so disrupting as a large dissatisfied group within a nation. I must sound a warning here: trade unions are becoming so powerful that they can disrupt the whole economy if they choose to do so, as evidenced by the coal strike in the United States.

I feel that the leaders of these great movements would do invaluable service to the country if they realized that, through their efforts, they had put labour on an equal footing with anyone in the country, and that there is no longer a struggle for equity. Their position should now be that of statesmen with the welfare of the entire nation their responsibility. I find it hard to believe that the coal strike in the middle of winter, bringing with it such hardship, was necessary to the welfare of the miners.

In the matter of public health, so vital to the nation, measures are being introduced for the further benefit of all. I strongly urge that, with the greatest possible dispatch, the matter of old age and other pensions be incorporated into an over-all social security scheme.

Veterans' legislation is to be expanded. As a veteran myself, I feel that the treatment of world war II veterans will stand as a monument to the fair-mindedness of the Canadian people in accepting the increased taxes necessary to carry out those great veteran rehabilitation plans.

I do not wish to bore you, Mr. Speaker, by endeavouring to go into every single detail of His Excellency's most gracious speech. I feel that, to the best of my ability, I have covered, in all phases, most of the principles involved, with the exception of agriculture.

I should like to conclude by speaking briefly on this subject. The entire Canadian economy is perhaps affected more by the economic position of our farmers than by any other single class of people. The downward adjustment in prices of agricultural products, which was not unexpected, has been cushioned by government support, to take up seasonal surpluses. This has the effect of giving adequate prices to the producer when his crops come on the market, and protects the consumer in the cities against prohibitive prices when products are out of season. He can still buy them, rather than leave them on the shelves of a merchant's store.

With reference to wheat, which is our major agricultural export commodity, different methods must be used. We have had a large portion of our wheat under contract direct to Britain. In some ways this method is good, but the idea of a world food pool, out of which importing countries can draw, is probably a more equitable way of distributing food to the world.

It should be noted that, even at the price of $2 a bushel, wheat is still the cheapest food people can eat; but at whatever level this commodity is traded, I can safely say that what the wheat producers desire most is an orderly, steady market for a large portion of our crop. I do not believe that agriculture, organized or unorganized, will ever be satisfied with an uncontrolled open market. We have developed a good market for our cattle and meat products; and with this industry on such a stable basis I believe it will continue to grow and to develop.

The Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act has taken many of the hazards out of mixed farming by providing farmers with technical help, and has shared the expense of providing water supplies. The community pasture program, linked with resettlement, has stabilized the economy of many communities. I urge strongly that the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act be expanded so that no one will be trying to grow wheat on ranch land. Irrigation is the answer, and I sincerely hope that in the near future all Canada will be receiving benefits from this program of irrigation and reclamation. The maritime marshland reclamation project, as well as that in British Columbia, give definite evidence that the government is behind the move of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) in his great undertaking to make most efficient use of those three vital factors in an agricultural economy—people, land and water. I do not believe any department which could be set up to carry out this work could combine as effectively these three vital factors as could the Department of Agriculture.

It is evident from the deliberations of various organizations which have held conferences since the last session of parliament, including the dominion-provincial conference, that that conference as well as the farm organizations feel that the government is doing all within the power of any government to keep our economy, both internal and external, at a high level.

There is evidence that agreement will be reached among the provinces and the federal government on matters affecting constitutional changes. As a nation we are more united than we have ever been in the past. In the light of these accomplishments, and future proposals, and with the knowledge that the Canadian people have confidence in His Majesty's ministers, I take great pleasure in moving the address.

(Translation):

Mr. Armand Dumas (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, it is with deep emotion and a justifiable feeling of apprehension that I rise in this house to discharge the honourable but delicate duty entrusted to me. Needless to say I expected to experience those feelings, which are probably common to all who make their maiden speech in this house. Nevertheless I felt duty bound to accept this mark of confidence and to seize this opportunity of speaking on behalf of my constituents. I am convinced the house will not deny me its usual forbearance towards beginners.

I am very happy to second the address in reply to the speech of His Excellency the Governor General to both houses of parliament on the occasion of the opening of the second session of the twenty-first parliament. I am pleased to do so because the honour bestowed upon me is reflected on the population of the district of Villeneuve, which I represent here. This honour is well deserved by the pioneers of northwestern Quebec, whether they be settlers, farmers, forest workers, prospectors or miners. The land surveyors' guild and the association of forestry engineers, both professional groups to which I belong, also feel honoured. On behalf of all of them, I wish to express my sincere thanks to the Prime Minister and the members of his cabinet.

(Text):

My first duty, Mr. Speaker, is to extend to you my salutations and to pay you my respects. Throughout the last session you presided over the debates of this house with great dignity and impartiality, and hon. members are pleased to see you once more in the chair, because they know they can rely on your kind disposition and the manner in which you will exercise your authority.

I should like to add a personal word to the tributes that have been paid to our late colleague, T. L. Church. The confidence which his electors showed in sending him steadily to this house for a quarter of a century is the best evidence there could be of the esteem in which he was held by all. Tommy Church was a model for us all. He was a hard worker; he knew what he wanted, and he wanted what he knew. His memory will remain for ever with us.

The time has now come to congratulate the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Larson) upon the brilliant way in which he has moved the address. His substantial exposé brings to our minds the golden and nourishing crops of his province, and the logic of his argument suggests the iridescent symphony of wheat fields undulating in the breeze.

There is now missing from this house a familiar personality whose memory I should like to evoke. Hon. Colin Gibson served brilliantly as Minister of National Revenue, Minister of National Defence for Air Services, Secretary of State, and Minister of Mines and Resources. It was in his last capacity that I had the privilege of knowing him well, when during last fall I accompanied him on a tour of the mining establishments located in my constituency. In his new position as justice of the Supreme Court of Ontario Mr. Gibson will honour the judiciary as he honoured this house.

To the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Harris) I extend my congratulations upon his becoming a member of the cabinet. There are no doubts in the minds of those who have known him that he will be competent and successful as Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

On January 10 last, the intergovernmental conference called for the purpose of considering a procedure to amend the constitution opened in this chamber. We all know the importance of that conference and the significance of the decisions taken. The earnestness and discretion shown by the press from the Atlantic to the Pacific in discussing the problems involved is adequate evidence of the concern of the Canadian population and of the common desire to reach a fair and equitable solution. The very future of Canadian sovereignty is at stake.

I am glad to recall the great courtesy and the remarkable political insight shown by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in directing those proceedings. I would like also to recall how fully co-operative were all our provincial premiers, especially those of my own province, of Ontario and of Nova Scotia. The Canadian people have been pleased with the initial results of the conference. There is no doubt that the intergovernmental committee which was set up to continue its work will carry on with the same concern for harmony, and seek to achieve unity in Canada through respect for the rights of all Canadians. May God assist its members in their endeavours and bless their work.

We hope to witness in the near future the birth of the Canada charter, a model of fairness and justice. May it be flexible enough to guarantee the rights of all the provinces as well as those of the two great races which make up the whole country, while at the same time providing the federal government with the necessary powers to look after the interests of a united Canada, of a Canada whose wealth is a guarantee of strength.

The electoral district of Villeneuve, which I have the privilege to represent, has been named after an illustrious and holy prelate and a great Canadian. It was created during the last parliament by dividing the old district of Pontiac. It is located in the northwest part of the province of Quebec. The people there are engaged in farming, lumbering and mining. Half rural and half urban, Villeneuve county is proud of having, in the order of their foundation, such cities as Rouyn, Noranda, Val d'Or, Bourlamaque, Malartic, Duparquet and Cadillac. The oldest are not twenty-five years old. I could also mention mining villages like Sullivan, Perron and others. Farm settlements are rapidly being replaced by fine, fully organized parishes. A few years hence, Villeneuve county will, from an agricultural standpoint, compare favourably with any other area in Canada.

I would be remiss in my duty, Mr. Speaker, if I failed to praise before the house the courageous people of my constituency for the splendid way in which they have developed, in record time and often under difficult conditions, the vast resources which Providence has bestowed upon the county of Villeneuve. The settlers and prospectors of my constituency, who daily add to our national heritage, show the same courage and perseverance as our pioneering forefathers and the same initiative and endurance as the coureurs de bois who discovered and channelled our wealth.

Because it is not yet fully homogeneous, because it daily faces the problems inseparable from the development of a new country where everything awaits to be done and where the slightest deficiency may prove fatal, because it lacks the security afforded by long standing assets, the population of my constituency, though very industrious, can better than any other appreciate the benefits that stem from social legislation initiated by liberal governments. My constituents warmly cheer the throne speech proposals to widen the scope of previous enactments.

To mention only housing legislation, for instance, the cities of Rouyn and Val d'Or have, already, to a great extent availed themselves of opportunities offered to them, while the town of Malartic proposes to do likewise within a few months. May rural centres and farming communities soon have their turn!

Though most people in Villeneuve county are of French-speaking origin, a considerable number of them are of British descent. In addition there are in our cities several new Canadians and citizens of tomorrow. Let me proclaim to the country at large the friendly relationship that prevails among us. It is not a feeling based on sentiment, on elegant phrases and platonic wishes but on a practical sense of mutual respect, active cooperation and brotherly help. At Malartic for instance, where I live, and elsewhere in the county, people can sing: "Vive la Cana-dienne, et ses jolis yeux doux" and follow up at once with "Oh ye'll take the high road, and I'll take the low road". I can assure you that anyone interested, no matter what his racial origin, can understand, the difference being that, as opposed to the lyrics of the song, the tryst is always kept.

Thanks to federal grants, the towns of Rouyn and Val d'Or now have municipal airports which allow quick transit to Montreal from our district. This service, which is provided by the Canadian Pacific Air Lines, is popular and necessary. However, to be as useful as they should be, these two airports require many improvements. Founded only a few years ago, the towns of Rouyn and Val d'Or have had to meet heavy obligations in order to provide their people with proper municipal services; they may, therefore, be unable to maintain those fields and improve them as they should be.

A look at the map of Canada, Mr. Speaker, will show us that, as the crow flies, Rouyn and Val d'Or lie along the air route which joins the great military base at Fort Churchill to the eastern centres of Quebec, Montreal, Toronto or Ottawa. The Department of National Defence would be well advised to develop those two airports, Rouyn and Val d'Or and convert them into advance bases for the protection of the industrial centres of eastern Canada.

If the county of Villeneuve is part of northwestern Quebec, it is also fully comprised in that vast natural area known as the Canadian shield, and partakes of its economy. That V-shaped region surrounding Hudson bay takes up half of the Canadian territory. It includes part of the province of Newfoundland in the east, covers four-fifths of the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, the greater part of Manitoba, the northern sections of Saskatchewan and Alberta and loses itself in the Northwest Territories, at the mouth of the Mackenzie river.

Before the twentieth century it was said of that area, then a wilderness and an essentially Canadian region if there is one, that it divided Canada. As a matter of fact, the railways hastened to cross it to create an artificial link between the east and the west of Canada. The industrial development of Canada, which started with the first great war, has changed the economy of that region.

First of all, in Ontario, silver was discovered at Cobalt, then nickel at Sudbury, and gold at Timmins and Kirkland Lake. Then came the tremendous discoveries of copper, gold and zinc at Noranda, Malartic and Val d'Or, and the discovery of gold at Red Lake in Ontario, of iron at lake Superior, of gold and copper at Snow lake, at Flin Flon on the border between Manitoba and Saskatchewan, and finally at Yellowknife in the Northwest Territories. These were followed by the discovery of uranium deposits, which are all-important for our country, and quite recently by the discovery of iron ore and titanium in New Quebec and Labrador. The Canadian shield, formerly so underestimated because its value was unknown, is now the arsenal of Canada and supplies the raw material of our industry in times of war or of peace.

The fabulous Mesabi iron mines in Minnesota gave rise to the great American industry. Economists already agree that New Quebec and Labrador will do the same for Canada and eventually for the whole of North America. Although not easily accessible these ore reserves would be easy to work. Already the preliminary work has been completed in order to build a railroad of more than 350 miles.

Within a few years, the St. Lawrence will see many ships carrying this ore to central Canada and when the deepening of this great waterway is completed, it will be due to the mining contribution of New Quebec. The tremendous amount of water power available allows us to foresee the day when electrical blast furnaces will be built and the ore smelted locally. At Sorel, in the Richelieu valley, such blast furnaces are being set up and titanium-bearing iron ore from lake Allard will be smelted there.

Spectacular though they be, those discoveries are but a beginning. To mention an example, the county of Villeneuve has been open to prospecting for twenty-five years but it was only in 1947 that the extent of the copper-bearing deposits of the East Sullivan Mines, Limited, near Val d'Or, was established. It is essential that prospecting be continued and any measure intended to facilitate prospecting will increase potential mining production.

While this district is rich in native gold-bearing minerals, it is also covered by an evergreen forest which supplies most of our pulp and paper industries and provides lumber for local use and exportation purposes.

The forest resources of the Canadian shield are to be found for the time being in its southernmost part, that is, in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. Thus that wealth benefits Villeneuve county.

Agriculture gradually becomes a basic industry in that part of the Canadian shield. In the northwest area of Quebec and the northeast area of Ontario, for hundreds of miles the soil is covered with a thick layer of clay. In Chapleau county, on the northern border of the district of Villeneuve, the first farming establishments were founded only forty years ago. From Hearst in Ontario to Senneterre in Quebec, the rural parishes are always increasing in number.

(Text):

It is generally true to state, Mr. Speaker, that the search for gold and the resulting mining industry have attracted the attention of the other regions of our country to the marvellous riches of the Canadian shield. During the war, circumstances beyond our control, arising from the general state of the world's economy rather than from the Canadian economy, caused our gold industry to decline considerably and even threaten to disappear for a time. Happily, however, the Canadian government recognized the importance of the industry in our national development and instituted pioneer measures in the new regions, coming to the rescue with emergency assistance to the gold mining industry. After this beginning the government increased the efficiency and duration of its benefits, and it is owing to this measure that many mines in my constituency have been able to carry on their operations. It is owing to this measure that thousands of miners in my constituency have been able to continue to earn an honourable living, and many of our veterans to build up promising futures for themselves.

My constituents have been pleased to learn of the creation of a separate Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. Is this not an assurance that the government of Canada will pay increasing attention to the mining problem, and will bring about improvements in the salutary measures it has instituted? I take this opportunity to congratulate the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. McCann) upon his appointment as head of this important department. He is already familiar with mining problems. I am sure that he will know how to present to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) the difficulties of the mining industry, and that the latter will not fail to listen to his suggestions.

(Translation):

In the county of Villeneuve, the development of agriculture depends on the mining industry, whose financial contribution enables the settler to live through the difficult years when he has to work on virgin soil which will bear fruits only after years of unceasing labour. The settler finds in the mining centres a ready market for his garden produce. The mining enterprises purchase his lumber and provide work for him during the dull season. And so, gradually, the settlement lot becomes a prosperous farm, and the settler, a prosperous farmer. In turn he will help the mining centres to survive, and the mines may then disappear. They will have played their part in our economy. A stable population will remain and there will not be that sorry sight of deserted towns.

That clay belt of the Canadian shield which runs through northwest Quebec as well as through the northeastern constituencies of Ontario is eminently suited to production of fodder plants and consequently to stock farming, either for meat or dairy products. Before very long, a more rational distribution of our farming industry will bring about specialization in market-gardening and small-scale farming in the lowlands of the St. Lawrence valley, while our district will devote itself to large-scale farming and supply eastern Canada. I hope to see more and more model farms in order that their example may help to transform our farming industry. Our people will also welcome any steps taken by the government to increase the number of abattoirs, cold storage plants and centres for the grading of agricultural products.

Finally, so that the farming industry may fulfil expectations, let us hope that a program of drainage will be undertaken with the co-operation of both provincial and dominion governments in the whole pre-Cambrian clay belt, which lies at the height of land. In addition to improving arable land, it would help reforestation and development of large marshlands which are now absolutely useless.

This brings me to a brief discussion of forest management. In 1948, Bishop Labrie wrote:

"There will come a day when mines have yielded their last, but forests will keep on growing bigger and better trees if we take the trouble of caring for them and of managing them intelligently and with foresight."

How true and how timely were his words. Like other mining and colonization settlements, the constituency of Villeneuve has been cleared of far too many trees. Though crown forest lands come under the jurisdiction of the provinces, as a forestry engineer highly devoted to our forests I urge the government of Canada to help them more and more in conserving and protecting our forests without, however, interfering with provincial autonomy. Our people need to be educated in the management, protection and conservation of forests through reforestation.

May I be permitted to draw the attention of the house to the magnificent work carried out in this field by the Association Forestière Québecoise, by the Canadian Forestry Association and by other provincial groups affiliated with the latter. If the interest shown by the Canadian public in regard to forestry matters has constantly increased in the last few years, it is due to a great extent to the policies of these various associations. The remarkable Canada Forestry Act passed at the last session makes for closer cooperation between the state and these forestry organizations, and all those who have the conservation of our forestry resources at heart welcome this measure.

The Canadian shield, but recently a desert region, is being rapidly populated and developed. Not only does it provide the whole of Canada with metals, lumber and timber, farm products and furs, but its growing population, its purchasing power, its needs stimulate the manufacturing industries of our cities.

As can readily be ascertained by a look at an up-to-date map, the economic face of the Canadian shield is undergoing a complete change. Wherever a means of access has been opened into that part of the country, we have witnessed a shift of population. I shall only refer to the Hudson Bay railway in Manitoba, to the Northern Ontario railway which goes from North Bay to James Bay, to the Senneterre-Noranda line which traverses my constituency and that of Chapleau, as well as to the mining and agricultural communities whose establishment was made possible through the building of those railways. There are many more districts still waiting for the railways and modern highways which will allow them to play a leading part in our economic life. I am thinking now of the Mégiscane valley, of the Bell river basin, of the great Mattagami lake basin, of the Bachelor lake and Chibougamau regions, of the northern part of the constituency of Chapleau, which I know particulary well. There are in those districts productive lands where thousands of Canadians could settle, virgin forests and mines which should be developed without further delay.

Last year, the Canadian National Railways opened a new line of approximately forty miles from Barraute to Beattyville. Already five or six settlements have been opened because of that trunk line. I firmly hope that this new railroad will soon be extended to Chibougamau in order to connect eventually with the lake St. John system. If the Canadian government undertakes public works, I do not know of any that could be more useful than those aimed at the development of our natural resources. Not only would this give work to those who need it, but new sources of employment would thus be created.

When modern civilization reaches all those new areas, the economy of our country will be entirely changed. The Canadian shield which now divides the natural regions of Canada will become a link and will direct our economy in an easterly-westerly direction which will counteract the present northerly-southerly trend; this will extend the frontiers of Canada while fostering a greater measure of unity. In the economic and social fields, and even in the political sphere, the results of such unification will become a decisive factor in our country's future.

I do not wish to take undue advantage of the indulgence of this house, but I should not like to conclude without recalling that for the great majority of the people of the constituency of Villeneuve and for a considerable part of the people of Canada, 1950 is a holy year. May the whole world soon realize that our civilization will survive only if it puts into practice the teachings of the Sermon on the Mount. While protecting ourselves against the forces of evil and the communist virus, let us hope, for our common honour, that 1950 will recall to our children and great-grandchildren not the universal hatred and destruction that could be spread by the super-bomb but the defensive union of the north Atlantic democratic countries intent upon maintaining world peace. As far as our people are concerned, the year 1950 will remind them of the signing of a charter which will really be the acknowledgment of an enduring national fellowship and mark the advent of the Canadian nation. Such appreciation from future generations will be our best memorial.

On motion of Mr. Drew the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. St. Laurent moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: The business on Monday will be the continuation of this debate.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 4.45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, February 20, 1950

The house met at three o'clock.

TRANSFER OF DUTIES

MERCHANT SEAMEN COMPENSATION ACT

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I should like to table copies of an order in council passed on the 17th of February transferring from the Department of Transport to the Department of Labour the administration of the Merchant Seamen Compensation Act, chapter 58 of the statutes of Canada, 1946.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR ABOLITION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 2, to amend the Criminal Code (capital punishment).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Thatcher: The purpose of this bill is to abolish capital punishment in Canada and to substitute therefor life imprisonment.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

AMENDMENT OF CHAPTER 54, STATUTES OF 1947-48—VOLUNTARY REVOCABLE CHECK-OFF OF UNION DUES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 3, to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act (voluntary revocable check-off).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, this bill will add a new subsection 3 to section 6 of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. The effect of the new subsection is to provide for the voluntary revocable check-off of trade union dues.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADA DAY ACT

SUBSTITUTION OF WORD "CANADA" FOR WORD "DOMINION"

Mr. A. Phileas Cote (Matapedia-Matane) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 4, respecting Canada day.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): This bill is intended to repeal the Dominion Day Act and substitute therefor a Canada day act. The changes are in the title and section 2, where the word "Canada" is substituted for the word "Dominion". For the benefit of those who were not here in the last parliament I should like to inform them that the same bill was introduced in the House of Commons on the 27th day of March, 1946, and was passed on the 4th day of April, 1946.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING PAYMENTS TO PRODUCERS IN CHURCHILL AREA

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 5, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Wright: The effect of this amendment would be to make the port of Churchill a basing point under the act, and place that port in the same position as Port Arthur, Fort William and Vancouver.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CROWN PROPERTIES

INQUIRY AS TO PAYMENTS TO MUNICIPALITIES IN LIEU OF TAXES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Has the Minister of Finance received further representations in connection with the proposed payments to municipalities in lieu of taxes on federal properties? If so, is the government prepared to review its policy in the light of any such representations?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I have received a number of representations of one sort and another, but the policy announced by the government has not been altered as a result of those representations. I might add that regulations to implement the policy as announced have now been prepared, together with forms to be completed by the municipalities setting out information with respect to federal property in their jurisdictions. I hope those regulations will be adopted and made available in the course of a few days.

Inquiries of the Ministry

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO PAY INCREASE FOR MEMBERS' STENOGRAPHIC STAFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): I should like to address a question to Your Honour. What action has been taken to increase the pay of those employed on the members' stenographic staff?

Mr. Speaker: I shall be glad to discuss the matter with the hon. member, but it is not customary to address questions to the Speaker when he is in the chair.

INCOME TAX

ADVERTISING WITH RESPECT TO RETURNS AND REFUNDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I would like to address a question to the Minister of National Revenue, whose department has been sponsoring spot advertisements on the radio every day. This morning the announcer on CBL said—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Fraser: —that the government would return a generous refund on last year's income tax if the returns were sent in now. My question is, what is generous about returning a person's own money?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): The announcement is by way of an advertisement, and is not intended to advertise generosity at all.

Mr. Fraser: That was the statement—"a generous refund".

Mr. McCann: This step has been taken with a view to getting the returns in quickly in order that the assessments may be made and the refundable portion collected in the months of January, February and March returned as soon as possible. The sooner the returns are in, the sooner the refunds will be made.

RADIO BROADCASTING

INQUIRY AS TO SETTING UP OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the Minister of National Revenue if the government will proceed this session to set up a special committee on radio and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Yes, Mr. Speaker, it is the intention of the government to set up the committee as soon as possible, and I expect to place a motion on the order paper this week.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Friday, February 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. F. H. Larson for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I wish to express my personal respects to the mover (Mr. Larson) and the seconder (Mr. Dumas) of the motion, who have discharged that duty in keeping with the customs of this debate.

As to the speech from the throne itself, it contains so little of a definite nature that any remarks which may contribute to the effective consideration of our problems necessarily must be related more to what the speech from the throne does not say than to anything it does say.

There was one significant comment in the excellent speech made by the hon. member who moved this motion, and did it so well. He said, at page 27 of Hansard:

> I feel that I may be open to criticism for not taking issue with the government on some of the matters of a more contentious nature.

Then he went on to explain why, on balance, he felt justified in approving what they had done. That brief comment, however, reflected what is in the minds of so many members on both sides of this house. There has been widespread and justified criticism of the government since last we met; and that criticism is directed not only to particular acts of omission or commission by this government but also to the very important fact that neither parliament nor the people were given information which the government have admitted they had in their possession for some considerable time. That brings before us an issue which goes to the very root of the established principles of responsible government and, in turn, to the very root of freedom itself.

There comes a time when all wise parliamentary bodies must carefully examine abuses which have crept into their procedure and practices, and correct them before it is too late. Not only here in Canada but in other free nations as well the emergency powers, conferred upon the executive and intended only for the purpose of meeting the desperate demands of war, were carried forward into the years beyond. Although many of those powers and controls have since then been repealed or diminished, the state of mind and the attitude toward parliament which those powers created do persist to an extent that may threaten the survival of our parliamentary system.

During the war, governments found it necessary, or claimed that they did, to keep a considerable amount of information to themselves, and, on the grounds of security, refused to parliament information which ordinarily parliament would have not only the right to obtain but the right to be given voluntarily as the basis of informed debate. Men who have been in the habit of treating information as their own special prerogative may find it difficult to throw off this habit, but the time is long past when it can be accepted as an excuse for withholding information from parliament, without serious danger to the continuance of our parliamentary system.

I think every hon. member of this house must be gravely concerned about what has happened in this country since we were last in session, and there should be equally great concern about the suppression of information which should have been given to the representatives of the people in this house. As recently as December 1 the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) gave a glowing account of the prospects for production, export trade, prices, and employment. It was only on the last day of the session that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) indicated in some slight degree the extent to which our food exports to the United Kingdom might drop in 1950. That was serious enough in itself. What has happened since then is infinitely more serious. The loss of our assured markets for wheat, bacon, cheese, eggs, and other food exports, has had an immediate and disastrous effect on domestic farm prices. It is hard to realize that it is only a few weeks ago that the government was telling us we had no problem of surplus food products. Now the problem of surplus food, and the threat of even greater surpluses, is endangering our whole agricultural price structure, and threatening the security of our farmers.

The Minister of Agriculture now says that he expected this situation for two years. If that is so, why were we not given this information during the early days of the last session, when steps could have been taken in advance to meet the situation with which we are now confronted? The failure of the government to take effective steps in this matter has produced immediate and serious consequences which are being felt in every part of Canada.

When the trades and labour council of Canada and the Canadian Congress of Labour made a joint representation to the government on January 2, they said:

> The unemployment situation in Canada has become so serious as to cause apprehension throughout the nation.

In response to that statement the Department of Labour announced on January 7 that there were 261,000 unemployed, and that—> —a considerable portion of the current unemployment results from the continuing growth of the Canadian labour force, rather than from a decline in employment.

On January 19 the Minister of Finance stated that the unemployment situation in Canada was purely seasonal. As recently as January 30 the unemployment insurance commissioner said in Winnipeg—and I quote his words, as reported in the press:

> The labour unions are exaggerating the total of unemployed in Canada.

The figures of unemployment released two days ago give some indication, but only a partial indication, of how serious the situation really is. Total unemployment is now said to be 375,600. Such a figure is hardly in keeping with the statement in the speech from the throne to the effect that unemployment is due to seasonal and local conditions. The percentages in different parts of Canada tell the story. They are highest in British Columbia, where they are shown as 15·8 per cent of the labour forces. Next come the maritimes, with 10·2 per cent of the labour forces unemployed. Quebec, with a percentage of 7·8 per cent, comes next, largely because a great part of that province is affected by the same conditions which affect the maritimes and British Columbia. Ontario and the prairie provinces are still the lowest, with the same figure of 5·3 per cent.

These figures disclose that a considerable proportion of our unemployment is not seasonal or due to local factors, but is the direct result of the loss of seaborne trade. Undoubtedly the British Columbia figures are to some extent accounted for by the abnormal weather conditions of the past two months, and it is partly for this reason that their figures are so much higher in percentage than those of the maritime provinces.

One of the extremely disturbing factors is that unemployment insurance figures seem to be used in determining the number of unemployed. It will be noted also that in the press release of the Department of Labour which gives the total of 375,600 unemployed, that figure is under the heading, "Persons seeking work through the national employment service, February 2, 1950." There is not an hon. member in this house who is not fully aware of the fact that a large percentage of the unemployed do not seek work through the national employment services. It is well known that throughout the rural areas, and in many occupations, individuals seek employment on particular jobs. These figures are undoubtedly far below the real figures for unemployment at this time.

In considering the unemployment insurance figures as the basic factor in arriving at estimates of the unemployed, it is necessary also to remember that less than half of the employed in Canada are covered by unemployment insurance. Every social service worker, every welfare mission, knows that in addition to those receiving unemployment insurance there are many unemployed whose numbers are difficult to determine and whose plight is a cause for grave concern to this house.

The situation is serious. It is not too much to describe it as critical, because of the rapid acceleration of the unemployment figures in so short a time. It is to be hoped that this house will receive detailed information today from the Prime Minister as to the steps which will be taken to meet a situation of which the government has certainly been aware for many months.

The problem itself is serious and urgent. But what is of special importance to the members of this house is the fact that any indication of the real situation was withheld from hon. members, and is in fact not disclosed in the speech from the throne which we are now asked to approve. The statement of one of the senior members of the government only three weeks ago, that the unemployment situation in Canada is purely seasonal, simply emphasizes the fact that members of parliament have the responsibility not only to deal with unemployment itself but also to consider the action of the government in relation to parliament, and its effect upon our parliamentary system.

The fact is that unemployment is considerably above the figures given by the government, and is steadily rising, for reasons which the government refused to admit to this house during the last session.

The serious threat to our farmers, both in the loss of markets and in the severe drop in prices, is also something that has happened in the two months since the end of the last session. We received no indication of any condition such as that which has now become apparent, although the government has been repeatedly warned of the danger and measures were urged to meet the situation.

[Mr. Drew.]

Our forest industries, particularly those engaged in overseas export business, are already severely hit. So also are the mining industry and the fishing industry, particularly in the new province of Newfoundland. Where is there any indication of this situation in the speech from the throne and when has the government given us any indication of its knowledge of what was coming?

The fact is that this speech from the throne, which after all is simply a statement put in the mouth of the king's representative by the government, is a statement of propaganda about the excellent things this government has done. In the face of conditions which are disturbing Canadians from coast to coast, there is nothing but a suave assurance of everything being perfectly satisfactory. There is this unemployment, which the figures of the Department of Labour made so clear on Saturday—not so much in their present total, but in their acceleration within the past few weeks. Yet what do we find in the speech from the throne to suggest any action by the government to meet that situation? There is the promise that the provisions for unemployment insurance will be extended. Certainly they will need to be, unless the government recognizes that the people of this country desire unemployment insurance when it is necessary, but want the chance to work, and want the necessary measures taken right away that will provide work.

It will be recalled that a motion was presented to this house calling upon the government to take steps to restore and expand our overseas trade. It was pointed out then that employment and the prices of our products depended upon the maintenance of that trade in a country where three out of every eight workers depended upon export trade for their daily jobs. The government not only failed to meet this situation; it refused to act when the danger was clearly forecast by members of this house.

The loss of export business, particularly to overseas markets, is the cause of the very real difficulties with which we are now confronted. Here again we have a record of suppression of information which is a direct and continuing challenge to the supreme authority of parliament. As long ago as April 25 of last year the Canadian Exporters Association, which is made up of men whose business is the export of goods, in a statement presented to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, expressed the combined judgment of those who know what is taking place. I should like to quote from that presentation of April 25 last, in order to show how clearly those who are in this business were warning the government then of exactly what was impending. This quotation is from their brief:

> We question the wisdom of frequent announcements which have been made by government spokesmen to the effect that Canada's export trade of 1948 set a new peacetime record in dollar value, without qualifying such statements by emphasizing that such record was only made possible by the expenditure of ECA money and the excessive dependence of Canada on the United States for so large a percentage of Canadian exports in raw commodities and finished goods. As a result of these announcements, the Canadian Exporters Association finds that Canadian producers and the people of Canada are largely unaware of the markets Canada has lost abroad, of the danger that continues to threaten our export trade, and the extent to which Canada's present and future economy is menaced, with the attendant problems of unemployment and consequent lowering of our standard of living, and the exclusion of Canadian products in countries where they are badly needed.

We all know today that every statement made by the government gave a contrary impression to that which was so clearly put forward by those who were actually engaged in the export business. The people of Canada were told that the situation was entirely different from that which the Canadian Exporters Association indicated and which events, unfortunately, proved to be true.

In the same formal presentation we find reference to another example of the kind of statement that has been given to the Canadian public and which has created a false sense of confidence while the government has withheld the vigorous action which should have been taking place to meet a situation of this kind. I quote again from their brief:

> The announcement made in January of 1949, that increased trade with the British West Indies had been made possible by arrangement with the United Kingdom government of new dollar allotments to the British West Indies colonies, was greeted with enthusiasm by Canadian exporters. It was, however, a great disappointment when we later learned that the amount of money involved was limited to only three and a half million dollars and that this amount was to be used in trade with the whole dollar area and not for trade with Canada alone. We submit that, contrary to the government's press release of January 4, this was less than what could be considered token shipment and has had very little effect in even partly restoring Canada's export trade.

That quotation refers to a situation that is serious, particularly so in Newfoundland and the maritime provinces, where there has been such a long record of trade with the British West Indies. This statement by the Canadian Exporters Association was completely accurate, and indicated once again how unreliable so many of the statements of the government have been in regard to export trade. When it is realized that at least seventy-five per cent of all our unemployment amongst employables is directly attributable to the loss of export trade, we are better able to judge the seriousness of withholding this information from parliament.

What makes the situation doubly serious is that in addition to industrial unemployment there has been a severe drop in prices of agricultural and other basic products directly related to overseas exports. Now we see unmistakable evidence of resistance growing in the United States to Canadian exports in certain lines to that country. It should also be remembered that industrial exports are being affected as well as commodity exports. On July 22, 1949, the Canadian Exporters Association made the following statement to the Minister of Trade and Commerce; and whatever reasons there may have been for not acting earlier, on July 22 those reasons certainly were not apparent. I quote again:

> Our members are concerned about the losses of so many markets for manufactured goods and the present and future effect on industry and particularly employment. We submit that it is in the production of manufactured goods rather than our primary or agricultural products that Canada's greatest labour force is employed, and losses resulting therefrom will affect the Canadian economy more substantially. Our members who have spent so much money and effort in developing exports are now wondering whether Canadian consumers' goods have a legitimate place in world markets. Many are indeed closing up their export departments and are relying more and more on domestic trade, which, while satisfactory now, may not be maintained under changing conditions.

That statement also has proved to be all too correct.

One thing which is apt to give a misleading impression as to the relationship between export business and employment is the fact that the most recent figures of export in dollars relate to production which has already taken place and for which employment has already been given. Particularly in the field of industrial production much that will be exported in the months to come is already made. Present employment is related to anticipated exports; those engaged in the export business are relating their production program to what they may expect to sell some time ahead. As a result, figures of exports in dollars give no indication of the extent to which employment is dropping as a result of shrinking exports and anticipated loss of exports in the months ahead. This is related to the fact that those who know the situation are expecting a still greater reduction in the months ahead. The government is well aware of this fact, and has been well aware of it for many months.

I ask the members of this house to compare the statements and information we have received, with the reality which is now disclosed in unemployment figures, in the prices of our primary products, and in the statements of those who are actually engaged in the export business. All across Canada businesses built on export are releasing employees because the government is doing nothing effective which offers any reason for confidence in the optimistic statements contained in the speech from the throne.

The way in which the representatives of the people in this house have been treated by the government in this respect is in keeping with its attitude in many other matters of importance to the people of Canada. When we find that essential information has been kept from parliament in regard to employment, production, and export trade, the suppression of the report on the milling combine simply becomes part of a uniform pattern.

If there has been any tendency to regard that subject as a closed book, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) disposed of any such tendency when he travelled across the country during the past few weeks explaining how virtuous the government had been in dealing with that particular report. In his explanations to the public there was no hint of apology for the flagrant and unqualified breach by the government of a law passed by the parliament of Canada. Not only did he seek to justify the law-breaking by the government, but felt called upon to offer the justification for the action of the millers themselves. In Vancouver, on January 27, according to a Canadian Press dispatch he said:

> Had the millers been allowed to engage in competition for price reduction, the whole cost would have fallen on the taxpayers in the form of increase in the flour subsidy.

I have no doubt that the millers will welcome the new special pleader for their cause. He went on to say:

> Mr. McGregor missed that point in his report.

That is something we were not told in the last session. We were told a great many things. It was just like a case of hiccoughs; something new came up every time that the Minister of Justice spoke, and most of it had just about as much body to it as the speech to which I referred. But this is a new one. The minister said:

> Mr. McGregor missed that point in his report.

Thus we find that the Minister of Justice, in his recent trip of self-glorification and self-justification, indicated quite clearly that he did pass judgment on Mr. McGregor's report. We were under the impression that he had not. His statement in Vancouver would have had no meaning unless it was intended to convey the impression that this had something to do with the government not acting upon the report. In fact that was what he was explaining. He said at the same time that had the government prosecuted the millers—and I quote:

> There wouldn't have been a case in fifty years when the crown would have looked so cheap.

It becomes necessary to remind the Minister of Justice, and the government which has identified itself with this, including the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), that the real issue is not whether the government should or should not have prosecuted, but that the government suppressed this report until it was impossible for anyone else to prosecute, even if the government did not feel like doing so, and also that the government suppressed the report at a time when it would have been extremely interesting to the people of Canada to know of the special concern of the government about the milling industry.

A new angle to this unpardonable breach of law by the government has emerged since the last session. It will be recalled that the last of several explanations of the Minister of Justice, which kept occurring to him from time to time for his breach of the law, was that he had discovered how difficult it would be in any event to publish the report within fifteen days. As that was the last explanation offered to this house, and as it was the last explanation for his own conduct, we must presume that it was intended to be taken seriously. Nevertheless we find that two subsequent reports under the Combines Investigation Act have been delivered to the Minister of Justice: one on the glass industry, and one on the match industry. The report on the alleged glass combine was submitted to the minister on December 13. It was published fourteen days later, on December 27. The report on the alleged match combine was submitted to the minister on December 27 and published thirteen days later, on January 9. Thus we have positive evidence, produced by the Minister of Justice, that publication can be made within the fifteen days required by law, and it was with good reason that no one had ever suggested that fifteen days were not adequate. When the Minister of Justice says that never in fifty years would a government have looked so cheap as this government would if it had prosecuted the milling industry, he overlooks the fact that no government has ever been made to look so cheap as this government has by the different explanations he has given for breaking the law.

There are a number of aspects of this report about which little has yet been said. Not only was the law broken; not only did the government fail to take any action on the report itself; not only did it follow a course which prevented others from taking action that ordinarily could be taken; but there has been no explanation about one very remarkable feature of this report, which is no explanation of the solicitous attitude of the government toward those engaged in this industry. On page 79 of this report we find the statement of the commissioner that:

> It is clear that the association had in effect a double set of minutes. One of them, official and signed, gives little or no indication that the members reached agreement, or even discussed agreement, regarding domestic prices and related matters. The other, which was apparently regarded as even more confidential than the minutes, discloses the details of many such agreements which were obviously designed to lessen price competition in the sale of flour and other related products.

I have not yet seen any statement by the minister which suggests that Mr. McGregor missed some point in connection with this. If he thinks that Mr. McGregor did, then it would be well to explain why that view is held.

It is only for the courts of this country to say whether anyone was guilty or was not. It should be pointed out, however, that a consideration raised by the finding of the commissioner was the question not only of the breach of the Combines Investigation Act, or the breach of the section of the Criminal Code in regard to combines, contrary to the public interest, but the possibility of a breach of section 413 of the Criminal Code. That section provides that a director, manager, officer, or member of any company or corporate body who omits or concurs in omitting to enter any material particulars in any book of account or other document with intent to defraud is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to seven years' imprisonment. If there was a double set of records, as the commissioner reports, and as is set out in detail in the report, then certainly it is a subject which should have received the most careful consideration.

One of the details disclosed was that there was an agreement in restraint of competition in one set of records and not in the other, if the findings in the report are correct—and that does not relate to the judgment of the commissioner; it relates to the actual words quoted from the records put in evidence. Therefore more was involved in this report than a mere breach of the Combines Investigation Act or that section of the Criminal Code which is ordinarily invoked in such cases.

Only the courts have the right or power to decide guilt or innocence in a case of this kind. But the explanation made by the Minister of Justice on behalf of the milling industry should include some explanation of the reason for keeping a double set of minutes, if those engaged in that industry were satisfied that the government approved what they were doing. Surely there are obvious reasons why lawbreakers must not be lawmakers. The courts might well find the milling industry was innocent of any offence. But, no matter what the courts might find, the government broke a law of this parliament, hid the facts as long as it could from the public, and then offered no apology at any time to parliament for what had been done. On the contrary the minister primarily responsible has recently once again been justifying what the government did. Others prosecuted under the same law, or any other law, have a right to feel a sense of grave injustice when prosecutions are launched by a department of the same government which deliberately placed itself above the law and above parliament.

There is another reason why it is appropriate that this subject should be discussed today. When we met at the beginning of the last session this information was not before the house. Mr. McGregor had not yet reached the point where he found it necessary to resign because of the conduct of the government, and, by his resignation, force this matter out into the open. This, therefore, is the first time members of the house have had an opportunity to pass in a formal way upon the conduct of the government and to say by their votes whether the government is responsible to parliament or is free to decide what laws it will break and what laws it will observe.

This very same attitude, all part of the same pattern, was displayed by the government when an effort was made on a number of occasions during the last session to find out what information the government had in its possession about communist operations, and what steps it was taking. Right up to the last day of the session questions were asked continually about information in the possession of the government regarding the national film board, which it was admitted was no no longer making secret films, because of screening for communist activities.

It was even suggested it was unfortunate that this subject had come up for discussion in the house—unfortunate that hon. members representing the people of Canada should have an opportunity to discuss a situation regarded as so serious that even the ordinary films made for educational purposes in the armed forces were no longer being made by the national film board, but were being entrusted to private film producers as being a safer method than through the government body itself. The impression left was that there was nothing unusual in the situation; and that was the attitude of the government right up to the very last day.

It will be recalled how question after question was directed first to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), when he admitted that the films of his department were no longer being made by this board, and later to other ministers. In an effort to find out what information the government had in regard to activities which caused sufficient concern to cause to be withheld from that board such relatively simple productions as those described, these questions were asked.

The attitude of the government was that this was simply an ordinary screening. Then we learned through the press a short time afterwards that a new film commissioner had been appointed to the national film board, and that he had been asked to take that position some three weeks before. Thus we learned that, while the House of Commons was still sitting, and while we were trying to get information as to what the government knew about this department, and were left with the impression that there was nothing positive they could tell us, they had information sufficiently positive to make them decide to change the commissioner of the national film board and to have a housecleaning in that government agency.

Just to emphasize the fact that the government has a great deal more information in its possession than it has given to the house, in spite of the repeated questions, the Minister of Justice only last week stated that communist spies are operating in this country and that the government is taking action to deal with the situation. It is strange how necessary it seems to be for the elected representatives of the people to depend upon our very excellent press for information they seek in the house, and to which they are entitled, in full detail, in the house.

In view of the gravity of the international situation, and the lessons taught by the admissions of Dr. Fuchs, this house should insist that immediate steps be taken to prosecute any spies known to the government. If the government knows that there are spies, then there should be prosecutions. If the government does not know who the spies are, then the Minister of Justice was just talking through his hat; it is one or the other. Action in regard to this menace is long overdue—action to restrain the subversive activities of the communist party in this country, in accordance with the recommendations received by the government long ago.

This statement of the Minister of Justice serves to emphasize the failure of the government to act upon the recommendations in the report of the royal commission on espionage. Do not let the government place any cloak of virtue about itself for those prosecutions. It is necessary only to go back to the record to find how difficult it was to get the government to act on that occasion, and to realize that it was only under pressure it acted, even then. But the government did not carry out the details of that report. It did act upon the positive findings that there were grounds for prosecution against certain individuals implicated in a spy ring directly related to the Russian embassy here in Ottawa. But the commission also found that there were other spy rings—and this House of Commons has a right to know what has been done in regard to those other spy rings. It has also the right to demand that the government act upon the recommendations made in that report to deal with possible communist activities within government agencies themselves.

There was one recommendation to the effect that there be careful consolidation of all supervision of that kind. Yet, if the house was correctly informed during the last session, there has been very little in the way of an effective method of dealing with this important subject. The report certainly made it imperative that these activities be dealt with in a way that would be in keeping with the seriousness of the disclosures made in the report. What may have appeared urgent then becomes doubly urgent now, in the light of recent events. If there are secrets in this country which are of sufficient importance that certain government agencies are denied the right to deal with them because of suspected communist activities, then there are added reasons in these last few days and weeks why the most vigorous and effective steps should be taken to deal with subversive communist activities in every part of Canada, and of every kind. The whole tendency has been to minimize the importance of this subject. Certainly we are awaiting information as to what action has been taken in keeping with the seriousness of the disclosure.

In the meantime communist activities are going on apace and wide open. Although communist publications are being permitted to circulate the most outrageous statements about Canadian public men, there is no apparent attempt to act under existing laws which are being broken, to say nothing of the necessity of more effective provisions in the Criminal Code, to deal with subversive activities of this kind. It will be recalled that there have been repeated requests for an amendment to the Criminal Code which will make it possible to bring before our courts those who are engaged in an organized effort to destroy our free democracy. Having regard to the seriousness of the statement made by the Minister of Justice last week in regard to known spying in this country, the silence of the speech from the throne as to any action to be taken to suppress communist activity can only indicate a continuing failure to appreciate the real nature of the menace which we face.

Another significant omission from the speech from the throne, which must cause great concern to a large number of Canadians, is any positive assurance that the government intends to take effective action concerning old age pensions. For several years we have urged the introduction of a national contributory old age pension plan with adequate pensions payable as a right, without a means test, which the late Tommy Church so properly described on a number of occasions as the "meanest test". Those who now constitute the present government were lavish in their promises only a short time ago. Now we find no assurance in their official statement of the business of this session as to what they intend to do on this subject. We find on the order paper notice of a motion to set up a committee of inquiry. There are occasions when committees are essential. There are occasions when committees are the only way in which essential information which should be before this house can be properly brought forward, as in the case of national defence, external affairs, and subjects of the kind, where experts cannot satisfactorily appear on the floor of the house to answer the questions which must be asked if adequate information is to be available.

Surely this is a subject on which the government has all the information necessary. Certainly we have been assured that it has been giving the matter full and adequate consideration for a very long time. The government certainly has the staff available for that purpose. It has had this subject continuously under consideration for many years. It was considered by both dominion and provincial governments in 1945 and 1946, and statements were made which were presumably based upon an examination of the subject. If the government still lacked information on this matter when we met last fall and an inquiry by such a committee was necessary, then that committee should have been set up at the beginning of the last session and not at this time. Certainly it was not because the matter was not brought to the attention of the government during the last session. Members on both sides of the house are well aware that this is a subject on which the government has given assurances. They are well aware that all the plans of the various governments dealing with the question are already available to the government. In the end the government must assume the responsibility for the decision it will make, and the time is ripe for the government to make a decision in keeping with the assurances upon which it received the support of the people.

Mr. Rowe: They want to use them over again.

An hon. Member: They did not do badly last time.

Mr. Drew: A very significant remark was just made: "They did not do badly last time." It would be well if members of the house carefully examined what was said on that occasion in regard to a number of vitally important subjects.

Members on both sides of the house are well aware that there is widespread dissatisfaction with the way in which the government has dealt with the subjects I have mentioned this afternoon, and that was very clearly indicated by the mover of the motion. The most urgent subject for consideration is the rising tide of unemployment caused by the loss of our export markets, with a sudden resulting drop in prices for agricultural and other primary products, as well as decreasing demand. These and the other questions before us can only be dealt with effectively if the house reasserts its authority over the government and declares in no uncertain terms that parliament is supreme over its executive committee. We have a right to know, and to know immediately, with what measures the government proposes to meet this situation. We have been told on many occasions, publicly as well as in this house, that plans for public works of various kinds are being held back only until a demand for employment presents itself. That time is now. What are the plans, and when will they be put into operation? The speech from the throne gave us no information of any kind on that subject.

We will support every effective measure which will give employment to those who are looking for work in every part of Canada today. There are new resources to be developed, which will in turn create great new opportunities for employment. There are different types of public works which can be carried out. Do not let anyone make the suggestion that emphasis upon the need for steps that will deal with employment is an attempt to undermine confidence in this country. The thing that will undermine confidence in this country is the people being unable to see immediate and positive action on the part of this House of Commons and the government which is its executive.

In examining the new resources and the new things to be done, we may as well examine first of all the immense possibilities of the development of power across Canada; because there is no single public undertaking which in turn creates so much employment as the development of electric energy. It is true that in most provinces the development of electric energy is under provincial commissions, but there can be no doubt whatever that this government, with the support of this House of Commons and of parliament, will find the provinces and the municipalities ready and willing to develop those resources which in turn will provide productive bases for new employment in the years ahead.

There are great irrigation undertakings long overdue in many parts of Canada. Such undertakings would also create great new productive capacity in every part of this country. In the prairies there are areas where some of the richest farm land in the world is just a short distance away from soil which affords a bare living. The difference is only the want of irrigation. There are great possibilities in the use of the Saskatchewan and other rivers in the west, just as there are possibilities in the use of rivers right across this country for the enrichment of the soil, the expansion of our great productive capacity, and, what is so important to all, an increase in employment which will provide a livelihood and bring happiness to many people in this country. There are great land reclamation projects to be carried out. There are great conservation programs which will increase our productive resources and afford employment in the years ahead.

All these things I have mentioned are self-liquidating public developments in which every dollar spent would be a sound investment in the future of Canada, and a safe investment, under the most stringent definition of safety. In fact it has been demonstrated already that public developments of this kind can be financed by private investment if the government should feel that any of them should not be carried forward through the investment of public funds. That has been done in province after province—and it is interesting to note that the securities issued to finance public developments of this kind sell as readily as dominion government bonds, and yield as high a return to the investor. From Newfoundland to British Columbia there are things to be done for the advancement of our country which will create employment now, and many times that employment in the years that lie ahead for a nation far larger than Canada is today.

There is one thing we must keep in mind, however. No new road, no new power plant, no new irrigation project, no newly-productive area in itself will give employment in the years ahead unless we can find markets for that greater production. Let no one say that we are painting a gloomy picture because we examine realities. Let anyone who is concerned as to that go into the missions and other places across this country where people are fed, and see the men and women there looking for food; then ask whether this subject should be discussed in this house. Our task is to find ways in which to give those people new hope, and immediate hope, for the months and years ahead. In all humanity there can be no excuse for a continuation of the situation with which we are now confronted. A hungry world wants the food we produce; and while I have indicated disagreement, which I think is soundly based, with what was contained in certain statements by the Minister of Agriculture, I do believe the minister said something in London just over a year ago that badly needed to be said—that there was something wrong when here in Canada vast quantities of food were available, while artificial barriers prevented that food from reaching the hungry people who needed it.

Other nations need our industrial and other products. The barriers to trade must be broken, and as a nation we must get out and sell. The position has been that the world demand for the things we produce in such abundance has limited the necessity for ordinary selling. This is a real world, and in this world the daily bread of people must be earned by work. The things we produce will be sold only by ordinary, sensible selling methods. There is a world that needs our food. There is a world that needs the industrial products that the skilled workers of this country can turn out in such quantities, and it is for us to find a way by which they can reach the markets of the world. The job of the government is to take every possible step to break down trade barriers so that we can get out and sell. The job of the government also is to break the log jam that exists now because of the inconvertibility of exchange. I do hope we will not hear a repetition of those assurances that nothing can be done, such as we heard a year ago. Many hon. members will recall that we urged the government to face reality and assist the export trade by getting the Canadian dollar to somewhere near its real exchange value in relation to United States funds. We were told that was nonsense; yet it was not long afterward that the nonsense became a reality.

Let no one tell the members of this house that no steps can be taken to make exchange convertible. It was always convertible, prior to the last few years. It was convertible before Canada even became a nation with its own currency. This is not a time for Canada to sit back and wait for the lead of others.

We are the greatest exporting nation per capita in the world. We can become an exporting nation far beyond anything we dream of if we will develop our resources and use the productive capacity that God has given us. To no other nation in the world today is such an opportunity offered; no other nation is faced with such a challenge to give leadership. Surely what has been done in the past can be done now and in the future. Surely some way is open to sensible human minds by which our food products and our excellent industrial production can get to the markets of the world which want what we have to sell and which, by that very demand, will afford employment and bring about expansion in every part of Canada.

So much for the practical problems presented by this situation with which we are confronted. Quite apart from those practical problems, however, the conduct of the government has raised an issue which will determine whether we are in fact a true democracy here in Canada. Government of the people, by the people and for the people was not first used as a definition of democracy by Abraham Lincoln. It was used at least twenty-three hundred years ago to describe the democracy that had emerged in ancient Greece. Even in those earliest democratic city states, however, democracy did not mean government of the people by all the people meeting to discuss their affairs. Democracy meant government of the people in their own best interests by the freely-chosen representatives of the people. Democracy has always been government of the people by the elected representatives of all the people. All the people of Canada are represented by the members of this house. The 14 million people of this country find their collective voice amongst the members who sit on both sides of the house. This is the structure of democracy. The mere existence of this chamber, however; the mere fact that members representative of all the people sit here; the mere existence of this magnificent parliament building in Ottawa; the beauty of the decorations and all the dignity that may accompany the tradition associated with this parliament, do not in themselves offer any guarantee that in reality there is government for the people by their own representatives.

The most beautiful house of parliament in the world is that in Budapest. Representatives from every part of Hungary meet in that lovely building by the Danube. But there is no democracy, and there is no freedom.

Neither is any freedom found because of the fact that men and women from all over Russia gather within the stern and majestic walls of the Kremlin. Those who have seen the semi-oriental beauty of that building know that if dignity and impressiveness were any assurance of the real machinery of democracy, it would be found in the Kremlin itself. That is not the test. The test of democracy is, first of all, whether the people know the essential facts when they choose their representatives; and then, in turn, whether their representatives who meet in parliament are fully informed as to every important fact upon which decisions are made by their executive committee, the government.

Today I am discussing the information available to the present members of this house. Our last session ended only two months ago. Were we fully informed in regard to all the information in the government's possession about trade and the threat of unemployment, lower returns to our producers, and decreasing production? Were we informed, as we should have been, about the way in which the government dealt with combines, which can restrain the trade of this country and reduce the price advantage that comes from free competition? Were we fully informed as to what the government was going to do about communist activities in this country, which have assumed such importance? Were we fully informed as to what the government knew about communist activities within the national film board, to say nothing about several other boards which are of equal interest to the members of this house, and will be throughout the session? These are questions which are of quite as much importance to those who belong to the party from which the government is formed as they are to the members of the opposition.

I hope that no one will say that the majority of government supporters is so great that it is a waste of time to raise these questions here today. The size of that majority, in itself, imposes upon those who belong to the government party the highest obligation to observe those principles of responsible government which rest upon the supremacy of parliament. In fact it is to those who belong to the parties from which the government is formed that we must look for action in keeping with their own belief as to the responsibility of parliament, if this situation is to be dealt with as it should be.

It would be like a breath of cool air on an extremely warm day—not a day like today, but on such a day as doubtless we shall have before this session comes to an end—if some hon. gentlemen who are not members of the opposition were to say here some of the things they have already said outside this house.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): Name them.

Mr. Drew: If any government feels safe in the conviction that whatever it does it will receive the support of its party followers, then our parliamentary system stands in very real jeopardy.

The issue placed before the house by the conduct of this government is an issue which is being drawn clearly throughout the world today. If any hon. members are unaware of a place in which they can find an excellent discussion of this very point, I would commend to them the speech of one of the candidates for the Liberal leadership a year ago last summer. The issue placed before this house was stated then, and it is one which has been emerging more clearly all the time. It has been simply stated, perhaps too simply to be sufficiently impressed on many minds, by one of the greatest modern students of democracy, Sir Norman Angell, in these words:

> The Russian view is that the power of a government should be used to repress heretical objections to the true doctrine; to forbid political oppositions, even in its satellite states.
> The western view is rather that the function of power in a free society is the precise opposite: To ensure the right of political opposition, the right of access to the facts upon which governments base their policy, the right to discuss those facts and to oppose the conclusions drawn by the government.

In that simple statement the emphasis is placed, as it is throughout the excellent book from which the quotation comes, upon the importance of access to all the essential facts by the representatives of the people, as well as the importance of all essential facts being voluntarily furnished. It is obvious that those who are not within the secret confidence of the government cannot be in a position to know all the facts that come to the government from its many agencies.

To some people, this quotation from Sir Norman Angell's description of the problem of modern democracy may seem an oversimplification. To some it may not seem that the issue can be so simplified. There are many stopping places between those two points. But these are the two distinct and opposite points of view. On one side is government, which, having attained power, seeks to limit the opportunity of free discussion, either by preventing criticism or by suppression of the facts. The other is government which insists upon the right of the people's representatives to all the facts, and the right of those representatives to discuss those facts with complete freedom, so that decisions may be made with the full advantage of all the advice that can be gained from the representatives of all the people with the special knowledge of the particular parts of the country from which they come.

While there are many intermediate points between the two, those who steer their course away from the widest interpretation of the meaning of democracy are challenging democracy itself, no matter what they declare to be their purpose or what they say their belief really is. What it is so essential for us to remember is that the vote at the ballot box is not the proof of democracy, and that the presence of members here in this house is not the proof of democracy. There are ballot boxes in Russia, in Hungary, in Germany, in Czechoslovakia, and in all the countries today under the domination of the cruelest form of dictatorship the world has yet known. There undoubtedly will be ballot boxes throughout the whole of China, and a vote will be taken which will probably be close to a one hundred per cent vote, when communists will be returned with great acclaim in every polling subdivision. No, the ballot is not the proof. It is what the voters know about the issues, and it is what the voters know about the things that are before the people for consideration. Then, having made their choice—

An hon. Member: They did.

Mr. Drew: Yes, they did; and this government will in due course be answerable for what the people did not know. You have the members sitting here in this house, and those who sit here are displaying limited knowledge of the machinery of democracy if they laugh at the suggestion that it is important that the members know what the facts are. Unless and until the members of this house, of all parties, assert their supremacy over the executive by their vote in this house; until they tell this government that it has no right to decide which laws it will observe and which it will not; until they tell this government that the laws passed by this parliament are the laws of the land to be observed, first of all and not last of all, by the government; until the members of this house, and particularly the members who belong to the party from which the government is drawn, assert their voice—until then, our own parliamentary system will continue under an ever-darkening cloud.

With a return to responsible government, and with the supremacy of parliament restored, we can look with confidence to the future. Wider opportunities are available to this country than were ever open to our vision in the past. The great oil developments of the west and the iron developments of the east are merely an indication of the vast expansion which lies before us. But we shall only be able to do the job we were chosen to do as representatives of the people of Canada if we insist upon receiving, and receive, full and accurate knowledge of every essential fact that the government is able to obtain through its large and highly-trained civil service.

It is because of my confidence in what can be done to meet the tests that lie ahead if we really assert the full supremacy of parliament, and because of my confidence in what can be done by a free parliamentary system, that I present to this house the following amendment. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon):

That the following words be added to the said address:

"We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that Your Excellency's advisers have:

(1) failed to take adequate measures to preserve and expand markets for Canada's surplus products of farm, forest, sea and mine, and to deal with the problems of increasing unemployment and reduced income to Canadian farmers and other producers; and

(2) failed to take steps to inaugurate a national contributory system of old age pensions without a means test; and

(3) deliberately violated a law of this parliament by illegally suppressing the report of the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act on the flour milling industry for ten months, including the period of the recent general election campaign, and denied to parliament information essential to the performance of its duty and the maintenance of responsible government; and

(4) failed to take adequate measures to curb espionage and other harmful activities of communists in Canada.

For these and other reasons we respectfully submit that Your Excellency's advisers are not entitled to the confidence of this house."

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): It is indeed a pleasure, Mr. Speaker, for me to join with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) in extending the usual congratulations to the hon. members who moved and seconded the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Larson) and the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Dumas) are among the younger and newer members of this house, having come into parliament for the first time at the last general election. For this reason, if for no other, we as their colleagues are proud of the way in which they addressed the house. I think Kindersley and Villeneuve may also be proud of the manner in which they are represented here. The speeches made by the mover and the seconder reflect credit upon themselves, upon those who sent them here, and upon this parliament itself. The hon. member for Kindersley made a speech which, I am sure, we all felt deserved our congratulations and which was highly gratifying to us in its demonstration of the forensic ability he has brought to this parliament. He is one of the youngest members of the house, and has farmed in Saskatchewan since his college days, with the exception of four years when he was a member of the Royal Canadian Air Force, where he served with great distinction. He was decorated for that service. I think it is safe to say that the hon. member has a promising career before him.

The hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Dumas) spoke in both French and English. Those of us who were able to follow him in both languages heard, I think it is fair to say, an address of high merit. It was something that we expected from the hon. member, and we were not disappointed. The last election was not the first time that the hon. member had been elected to public office. He had established for himself a reputation in municipal affairs as manager, alderman and then mayor of the town of Malartic. The hon. member is a qualified land surveyor and forestry engineer, and I am sure that his professional knowledge and experience will be of value to us in the consideration of many of the problems with which we shall have to deal. The electors of Villeneuve can feel that they have made a happy choice in the selection of their representative in this parliament.

Of both I think it is fair to say that no finer introduction could have been made to the consideration and discussion of the questions with which we shall have to deal during this session than the utterances of these hon. members who respectively moved and seconded the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I repeat, I am very happy to extend to them sincere congratulations.

I think I should also extend congratulations to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), not of course upon the assertions contained in his motion of amendment to the address in reply to the speech from the throne, nor upon the sentiments in the last paragraph of his amendment, but upon the ingenuity of some of the arguments submitted to us here today, upon the expression of his confidence, which I share, in the great future of this country, and in the abundance and varied nature of the resources with which it is blessed. Perhaps I might also offer congratulations to the leader of the opposition on, shall I say, the realism of his followers—perhaps the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) might call it the optimism of his followers—in providing him with a permanent residence here in Ottawa as leader of his party. The hon. gentleman—

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I should explain that I understand it will be available for the present Prime Minister.

Mr. St. Laurent: I had understood that it was being vested in a trust made up of representatives of the party of which my hon. friend is the leader, and I would not expect anything else from that party but the establishment of a permanent residence for their leader.

The leader of the opposition seems to be somewhat concerned about the future of democratic institutions in our country. Well, he from time to time imparts some wisdom to his fellow citizens, and I was gratified to note that he was reported as having said this in London on February 8. I quote from the Globe and Mail of February 9:

> Our democratic system rests on the faith the people have in those offering themselves for public office.

Well, that is probably a lesson he learned from the last election. It was demonstrated in something like 73 per cent of the constituencies of this country that they did believe in a true democratic system, and that they did place their faith and confidence in the members of this party to discharge for them those functions of their citizenship which it is not convenient for them to deal with themselves in town meetings.

In his following words I think the hon. gentleman explained why there was that confidence and trust in those who were offering themselves for public office. He continued:

> The basic word in that system is truth. In the end it will be the people who will decide, and they will turn invariably to the party which they have come to trust and rely on.

And that is what they did; and that is no doubt what impressed itself upon the hon. gentleman and moved him to make that declaration.

Mr. Rowe: They did not have the McGregor report then.

Mr. St. Laurent: I am afraid that what I was going to say about the leader of the opposition might apply to his right-hand neighbour. I was going to add that the whole of the lesson that might be drawn from the result of the last election had not been absorbed by the hon. gentleman, because only four days later, in my own home city of Quebec, the hon. gentleman is reported in the Gazette of February 13 as having said this:

> In spite of its clear and unqualified promise that there would be no change in the constitution without consulting the provincial governments, steps were taken during the last session, without consulting any provincial government, which provided for very substantial amendments to our constitution which could have far-reaching effects upon the rights of the provinces.

Well, now, of course the people of my home city knew that that was just not true. They knew that no promises had been made that there would be no change in the constitution until after consultation with the provinces. They knew that what the hon. gentleman was referring to was a statement that I had made in a broadcast that after the election it was our intention to hold a conference with the provinces to try to devise a system under which we would be able to make in Canada all future amendments to the constitution; but that was not a statement that, until that arrangement had been arrived at, there would be no other amendments to the constitution on matters that did not concern the provinces. I am happy to say that the promise which had been made was carried out. As indicated in the speech from the throne, we did have this conference with the provincial representatives; and as was pointed out by the mover of the address the other day, there was unanimous agreement by all the governments represented at that conference that there were certain parts of the constitution that could be amended without reference to provincial governments or provincial representatives.

So that there may be opportunity to refer to it if hon. gentlemen care to do so, I would quote from page 99 of the published reports of the proceedings of the conference, where it is shown that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), as chairman of the committee, brought in a report of a committee which had been set up to determine just how far we had progressed in the three days' discussion:

> Mr. Prime Minister and delegates: I am happy to read this report of the committee of the attorneys general of the constitutional conference of federal and provincial governments. In so doing, I announce with extreme pleasure that it was a unanimous report.
> Your committee recommends the following resolutions:
> 1. That the provisions of the British North America Acts 1867-1949 and other constitutional acts be grouped under six heads, namely:
> (1) Provisions which concern parliament only.
> (2) Provisions which concern the provincial legislatures only.

Then there are further paragraphs which I need not read, followed by this:

> 2. That in respect of group (1) amendment shall be made by an act of the parliament of Canada.
> 3. That in respect of group (2) amendment shall be made by an act of the provincial legislature.

That unanimous report of the attorneys general of Canada and the provinces was unanimously agreed to by the conference. A permanent committee was set up to recommend into which of these categories these various provisions might be placed. So that, if one wishes to receive support as a consequence of the assertion that the basis of confidence is truth, and that in turn the public will turn invariably to the party they have come to trust and upon which they can rely, it is unwise, I suggest, to build up a straw man for the purpose of knocking it down, and build it up upon distortions of what the public knows to be the real facts.

Then, there is one other matter to which the hon. member has referred today. He has pointed out that when, about a year ago, devaluation of the Canadian dollar was suggested it was treated by us as nonsense, but that nevertheless shortly after the election of last summer the dollar was devalued. Well, I suggest it would be wise to see what changes occurred in the meantime.

A year ago it was proposed that there be devaluation of the Canadian dollar, and this at a time when the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the United Kingdom was declaring that sterling was not going to be devalued. The suggested Canadian devaluation would have been for the purpose of increasing the possibility of exports to the United Kingdom. We said it appeared to be nonsensical, because it would have made it all the more difficult for the United Kingdom to pay for Canadian exports by selling their goods to us; because if we had devalued at that time an import from the United Kingdom costing 90 cents would thereafter have cost one dollar. But when the United Kingdom devalued their sterling and made their price, instead of a dollar, 70 cents in Canadian currency, we found that that was going a little bit too far.

We had contended that their prices were too high to enable them to earn Canadian dollars in our market and be able to use those Canadian dollars to pay for our exports. But we felt that a 30 per cent devaluation in terms of Canadian dollars was rather more than the circumstances justified and, instead of leaving it at 70 per cent, we devalued our dollar by 10 per cent, thus making it 80. That was a very different situation from the one which existed at the time hon. members were suggesting that the Canadian dollar should be quoted at its real value. Whatever they meant by "real value" at that time, it was of course impossible for anyone to determine.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) talked today about the reasonableness of making currency convertible. The difficulty is not with respect to the converting of currency, but is rather with respect to the exchange of goods. Trade is not the passing of pieces of paper from one person to another. Trade resolves itself into the exchange of commodities; and the difficulties about the non-convertibility of exchange arise from the fact that there have not been commodities which could be delivered to us in exchange for our commodities exported to the United Kingdom.

The hon. gentleman has dealt at considerable length, and I propose to do likewise, with the unemployment which has developed to a significant degree in the last few weeks. This is a development which everyone regrets, both because of the hardship it imposes upon the families and individuals involved, and because of the loss of productive effort to the nation which is involved in any increase in unemployment.

But before we rush in with any rash generalizations, or are too much impressed by memories of the hungry thirties, I think it would be well for us to look at the real facts of the situation. The first real fact is that we have now, including Newfoundland, the largest labour force in our history. This labour force totals more than five million men and women. Our labour force is not only the largest we have ever had, but it is the best trained, the most skilled, the most diversified, and most productive.

Our greater productivity is attributable not only to the experience the labour force itself has gained through its varied skills, but through the experience management also has gained. I think it is fair to say that our labour-management team, that combination of labour and management today, is equipped with new and modern plant, machinery and power facilities resulting from the wartime and the post-war capital investment program which have been very large indeed.

I suggest we may speak with some pride of our labour-management team in Canada. With only a few regrettable exceptions, over the last few months labour and management have been able to get along together; and whenever any differences have arisen they have been able to sit down at a table in a practical and common-sense way. We have avoided the bitter, industrial strife which inevitably tends to develop class hatreds and leads to political as well as economic anarchy. When we consider the situation in some other parts of the world I think we can be sensible of the good judgment and reasonableness most of our management and labour leaders have shown in the post-war years.

The composition of our labour force is varied, and this fact must be kept in mind when one is considering the measures required to meet an unemployment situation when it develops. It is true that there has been a great increase in the mobility and adaptability of Canadian labour in general; but there are practical limits within which that adaptability and mobility can be exercised. For example there is no point in providing a girl who has been laid off from a small textile plant with a job which would arise from the construction of a sewer project nearby.

In round figures about one million of our five million labour force are farmers and other agricultural workers. Another half million are normally employed in other primary industries such as mining, forestry and construction. Manufacturing, in terms of employment, does not bulk as large as some might think, and accounts in fact for only a little over a million operatives. The balance is made up by the wide range of service or professional occupations, transportation, merchandising, distribution, and civil service at all levels of government. This break-down is of some importance. Unemployed people are not just statistics. They are persons with special individual skills and adaptabilities. This is a part of the background we must appreciate when we speak of unemployment in general terms.

This consideration of the size, skills and composition of our labour force is one of primary importance in thinking of remedies for any unemployment that develops. Another obvious factor is the extraordinary times in which we live, and the exceptional conditions we have experienced. It is still difficult to grasp in their proper perspective the magnitude of the changes of the last decade. In 1939 Canada was a civilian economy organized on a normal peacetime basis. About one-quarter of one per cent of our labour force was in the armed forces. Our armament capacity and production were practically nil. Five years later two million of our people, four out of every ten of our labour force were either in the armed forces or directly engaged in war industries. Our whole economy had been transformed from a peacetime to a wartime basis. It may sound rhetorical, but it is true that Canada had become one of the most important arsenals of embattled democracy. In the next couple of years that economy was to experience another violent reorientation. The war establishment was dismantled and the two million people directly involved had to be re-established in civilian life.

No argument or apology is necessary for the fact that the government of the day viewed with considerable misgivings and concern the possible disruption of the economy as a whole, and the individual lives of so many of our citizens. Precautionary steps were taken on an extensive scale. The government made generous and comprehensive provision for our veterans, and incidentally have provided thereby through provisions made for veterans, through unemployment insurance, family allowances, and the increase in old age pensions, for a wide distribution of purchasing power in Canada.

At the same time our assistance in providing relief and rebuilding the western European economy, which is admittedly of such vital importance to us, far exceeded on a proportionate basis even the generous efforts of our great southern neighbour. War plants were reconverted. The labour force found new employment in satisfying the war-deferred demands of our civilian economy. The shift was made from a war to a peace basis with an expanding level of production, employment, income and general well-being, and with an almost unbelievable minimum of friction and discomfort. We have no regrets that some of the emergency measures which were prepared to meet possible distress were found unnecessary.

Nevertheless, as I said, the recent growth in unemployment is now a matter of serious concern. It would not have been surprising if this had occurred before or even if it had been more extensive. When we consider the terrible destruction of the war in Europe and Asia, the fearsome partition which has since developed between the two great armed camps, the disruption of normal trade and exchange and the break-down of the complex pre-war international economic and political system in many parts of the world, I think it is really extraordinary that Canada has been able to maintain such an exceptionally favourable position for so long.

I do not suggest for a moment that we are immune or that we can make ourselves immune to the violent dislocations which have occurred and are continuing to occur in so much of the world. A country as dependent as Canada on a free flow and high volume of international trade, which has always been and will always continue to be a necessary consequence of the nature of our resources, is inevitably vulnerable to external developments over which we have no direct control. Some part of our unemployment, and no doubt much of the concern which farmers, fishermen and other primary producers now feel, arise directly from marketing difficulties abroad. These difficulties of course are basically difficulties of our traditional overseas customers, but they are in time passed on to us.

Another unfortunate development has been the most unusual seasonal weather this winter. We may well echo the standard complaint that everybody talks about the weather and no one does anything about it. The fact remains that the weather, in a country such as Canada, plays a very important part in our whole economic life. Too much snow stops railway trains. We know that happened in the west. Too little snow puts ski lodges in a very precarious position, and we know that happened north of Montreal. A bare winter kills pastures, and too much snow in the bush impedes forest operations. Every one of us is affected in some way by the vagaries of the weather. This year, in the last few weeks, the combined result of these various factors—marketing difficulties arising from the dollar shortage of our chief customers, the impact of sterling devaluation on a few of our industries, adverse weather conditions—is felt now more sharply because we are just approaching the normal seasonal peak of unemployment for the year.

I have said that the impact of the devaluation of sterling has meant some distress to a few of our industries. That was foreseen, and it is something which I think we just must not attempt to prevent. For the good of the nation in general we want an increase in the exports of Great Britain to ourselves, our imports from the United Kingdom, so that the price of these imports can be converted into dollars usable to pay for the surpluses we must continue to export to the United Kingdom. Such distress is something unfortunate that has to be considered. We have to attempt to deal with it, but we must not attempt to deal with it in a way that would shut out such imports from our country because they are harmful to some of our local industries. It is the only way in which we will secure the restoration of world trade, and of the trade that is essential to the prosperity of this country.

The seasonal ups and downs of employment are basically of course simply the effects of nature and climate. Nature and climate determine when crops can be sown and harvested; nature and climate determine when is the best time to perform outdoor work. In Canada we normally expect our peak of seasonal unemployment in February or March. There is some variation according to the different regions of the country. We get our peak of employment in August or September. The seasonal rise in unemployment this year has been accentuated to a substantial degree by a reduction in woods operations which normally absorb a large number of farmers and construction workers who otherwise would be idle during the winter. This reduction in woods operations is due in part to the loss of overseas markets, especially for pit props from northeastern New Brunswick, but it is due in much larger part to other conditions. The three previous operating seasons had been seasons of favourable weather conditions, and the pulp and paper companies rebuilt their stocks to rather more than normal size. About eight or nine months ago, as hon. members know, there was an indication of some slackening of economic activity in the United States. Our pulp and paper people felt that it would be a prudent thing to reduce the size of their inventories in which so much of their working capital was tied up at rather high costs of production.

I am informed the result was that this year there were about 35,000 fewer jobs in the woods than in previous years. That does not mean unemployment merely for 35,000 men. With that number of men not working in the bush there is the indirect effect on the producers of mackinaws in the Ottawa valley, the producers of blankets, and those who furnish supplies of all kinds; and in certain localities this has had a pretty serious effect on the number of people out of work. I am informed that the usual cut of wood for pulp and paper is of the order of seven and one-half million "cunits", a cunit being one hundred cubic feet, but that for this season it will not exceed five million eight hundred thousand cunits, a reduction of some twenty per cent. It has been expressed to me in another way. The pulp and paper companies have been carrying supplies to last them on an average of about thirteen and a half months. Those supplies now are down to something of the order of ten and a half months.

The fears that were entertained in regard to a falling off in the United States demand were not realized. As a matter of fact the January consumption of newsprint was higher this year than in any previous January in history. There was a period last summer, as we all know, when the demand for wood pulp was quite low, and several operators were either working a short week or closing completely. I am told that at the present time, however, the demand for wood pulp has picked up, and that there are orders for the normal production of our plants.

That, I think, is an illustration of a point I might make here. Let us not harm ourselves with fear. The present unemployment situation would have been very much easier if those 35,000 jobs in the bush had been available this winter. As it turns out now, conditions were such that the companies would have been perfectly justified in providing those jobs. Their woodpiles will have to be rebuilt. For the future, therefore, there is not a definite loss; they will have to rebuild those woodpiles, but the unevenness in the process of doing so has increased the difficulty.

Then there are the weather difficulties. The other day I was handed a report from a Vancouver newspaper which said some 3,400 men were going back to work in the mills in that locality the following Monday morning because weather conditions had improved, and because it had become possible to get trains moving over the tracks that had been cluttered up with snow. That is a seasonal situation.

I am not trying to minimize the difficulties we are facing, but I am trying to place them in their proper setting, to indicate that much of this problem is seasonal and that already there has been recovery of a certain portion of the extent by which the seasonal unemployment this year exceeded seasonal unemployment in normal years.

Because of these conditions it is true that some 370,000 persons were listed with the national employment service as looking for work; and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) is also correct in saying that these are not accurate statistics of persons out of work. A large number of those listed with the employment service already have jobs but want better ones. On the other hand it is true that quite a large number of those out of work and wanting jobs are not listed with the employment service. But those employment service figures are kept from day to day, and they do show a trend.

The dominion bureau of statistics makes a quarterly sampling all over the country and gets a pretty accurate computation of the number of people without jobs during the week the sampling is made. Those figures do not always jibe exactly with those of the national employment service, because they are not made up in the same way. To repeat, the figures of the employment service do not contain all those who are out of work, and do contain quite a number who have jobs but want better ones. However, they do indicate a situation about which we are all concerned, because they show 120,000 more than there were at the end of 1948 and the beginning of 1949, and 120,000 more than is normally the case.

Seasonal unemployment is a normal situation; it is unavoidable, and it is the kind of situation for which unemployment insurance was provided. If no one was going to be out of a job it would be quite senseless to be taking contributions from the workingmen, from the employers and from the government to build up a fund that never would be drawn upon. It is because we have this seasonal unemployment that we have unemployment insurance. This time unemployment insurance has been called upon to meet the most serious test since it was inaugurated, and we have come to the conclusion that it should be extended. It does not go far enough to take care of what is happening this year and what may recur in the years to come, perhaps not with the same severity but to a greater extent than we have known in the past, in the years to come.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): May I ask just one question? I know the Prime Minister will permit this question. Is that unemployment insurance fund clear of all other obligation, and is it immediately available for the purposes for which it was designed?

Mr. St. Laurent: It is. That fund is intact and is available. Of course, there may be portions of it which have been invested in government bonds, but they can be converted within hours and paid out if there are claims which are due under the act.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): It has not been dissipated in any way?

Mr. St. Laurent: In no way whatever, and it has been growing all the time. Even through these last periods, it has shown an upward curve. It is our view, and we are going to submit that view to parliament for parliament to deal with it, that there should be a further extension of security by the unemployment insurance fund.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Why have parliament deal with it? Is it not an unemployment insurance fund?

Mr. St. Laurent: The unemployment insurance fund is governed by a statute. All the payments that can be made under that statute have been made. It is proposed now to ask parliament to amend the statute, so that cases which could not be compensated before will be allocated funds in the future.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Before, but not after?

Mr. St. Laurent: After the amendment is made.

This report of unplaced persons shows a considerable regional variation in numbers applying for work in relation to the labour forces. The figures are proportionately higher in British Columbia, largely concentrated in Vancouver. Generally, that is so, but they are higher this year than for other years. The next region, taken as a whole, is the maritime region, although there are certain spots in my own province of Quebec, such as Port Alfred, La Tuque, and Shawinigan Falls, in which the figures are higher than the average for the maritimes. This is due to the fact that so many of these localities are normally engaged in forest operations, which were curtailed during this last season.

In Ontario and the prairies, with the exception of a few special areas such as the head of the lakes, the figures have remained low. In fact, in most of these areas and in southwestern Ontario in particular, the figures are at such a level as before the war would have been considered as indicative of full employment. There is an irreducible minimum in unemployment that has to be taken care of by unemployment insurance. At the present time, the situation is clearly not one of mass national unemployment. It could better be described as spotty unemployment, applying to particular localities and industries with special severity. That is not to suggest it is any less serious or important, but it does call for a different approach and different treatment than would a general, national situation.

In that connection, I should like to say something about the state of the economy of Canada as a whole, and of the outlook as it appears to us from the information we get from those efficient civil servants to whom the hon. leader of the opposition has paid a well-deserved tribute.

We started the twentieth century with high hopes. I believe it is somewhat appropriate, at the halfway mark, to appraise the degree of achievement that has been realized. The bureau of statistics has just issued what seems to me to be a timely report entitled, "Canada at the Halfway Mark of the Twentieth Century". I understand it has been distributed to hon. members. It is published as a supplement to the February issue of the Canadian Statistical Review. It is not a detailed review, but simply a summary of the highlights.

The most significant flows and factors in our economic life, which determine our final gross national product and our standard of living, have been selected and shown in a brief, simple form. Where it has been possible, volume comparisons have been made, and comparisons between the volume at the present-day dollar, and at the dollar with a greater purchasing power. This document includes many of the figures which illustrate points I am trying to make. For example, the statistics on the labour force and unemployment, to which I have referred, are summarized in convenient form. I would point out that the bureau supplement is limited to matters of factual record, and does not include estimates and forecasts for the present year, to which I shall shortly be referring.

A glance through it shows that we have come a long way indeed since the opening of the century. Perhaps the period most interesting to us would be that of the last ten years. Production, and with it individual consumption, has increased 50 per cent per person, in terms of real goods and services, since 1939. There can be few cases where a whole nation's standard of living has increased so rapidly in such a brief period. The increase has been a balanced and healthy increase. Farm income has trebled, while farm debt has diminished quite substantially. Labour income has trebled. Our gross national product, that is the total value of all goods and services produced in the country, has tripled. Our foreign trade is nearly four times what it was in 1939. Those gains are striking in themselves, and they are striking in comparison with what has happened in other countries.

Mr. Brooks: What about the cost of living?

Mr. St. Laurent: The cost of living index is now about 161, I believe, as against 100. With farm income three times what it was and labour income three times what it was, while the cost of living is up about one and six-tenths what it was, there is justification for my saying it has been a healthy increase.

Of course, this is due in a certain measure to the terrible destruction of the war in Europe and Asia, and to the virtual elimination for the time being of Germany and Japan as important producers, as well as the crippling of the rest of European resources and industry. But Canada showed it had a capacity to step into the gap, and consolidate and further develop this great economic expansion which has continued in the post-war years. We are today the third trader in the world in absolute terms. This may sound surprising, but per capita we trade three times as much as they do in the United States, and twice as much as they do in the United Kingdom. Ten years ago we were of little international significance as an industrial power, while today we are among the first half dozen in the world. We hold similar rank in commercial agriculture, in mining, in forestry production and in fishing. These are no mean achievements for a country with about one-half of one per cent of the world's population; they have combined to give us a prosperous, diversified, sound economy. It is important to keep this general and really remarkable background in mind when we turn to some of the problems that face us today.

The economic outlook for 1950 is one of continuing general buoyancy, but with an increasing number of special industrial and associated area problems. Forecasts of the economic outlook are made by the economic research and development branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce for the use of the government. They provide us with a scientific and complete economic appraisal of the foreign trade and domestic business outlook, and of the trends of other significant factors, which is helpful to us in formation of policy. They are not made for publicity purposes, but are made to advise us what we have to expect, so that we may attempt to shape our policies accordingly. The forecast this year is for a gross national product of about $16,250 million, as compared with the record hitherto of $16 billion in 1949.

We anticipate little over-all price change. That means that we expect a proportionate increase in physical volume.

The outlook, however, for two of the major supporting factors in our economy, domestic investment and export trade, has some marked differences. An extensive survey of the investment intentions for 1950, covering some 17,500 firms and covering all levels of government, reports an anticipated new capital expenditure in plant, machinery, equipment and housing of $3,600 million. This will be about 5 per cent in volume and value above the record figures of 1949. The direct government portion, our portion, of that is estimated at $553 million, and that figure is some 21 per cent higher than last year. This is a total of 22 per cent of the gross national product for 1950. That 22 per cent of the whole income of the country being put into development of further resources, into capital savings, to increase the productivity and amenities of the country, is an extraordinarily high figure. I agree with the leader of the opposition that all these investments are going to be good ones, and I think that they will be self-liquidating, to use the expression he himself used. But there is a limit beyond which it is not possible to go. Twenty-two per cent of the whole product of the nation going into development for its future generations is a fairly substantial sum to be putting into such development.

We must realize that, in order to have profitable and self-liquidating investments, we must have peace in the world and in order to have peace in the world we must do our share in the North Atlantic arrangement. That means that a portion, and unfortunately quite a substantial portion, of our gross national product must be devoted to the maintenance and preparation of armed forces and equipment in order to create that situation which will inspire respect in those who might be aggressors. I do not think that those armed forces and the armaments with which we are providing them are ever going to be called into action but I believe that if we did not have them we would require them. The only way in which we can make ourselves reasonably sure that what we are investing in the development of the national resources of our country will be self-liquidating is to make, with the other signatories of the North Atlantic treaty, our contribution in maintaining a united and strong aggregation that no aggressor will feel it is an easy job to attempt to overcome.

I have mentioned these figures that are going into development according to the surveys that were made; these expenditures have a tremendous bolstering effect on both income and employment, and they obviously modernize and strengthen our productive equipment. In the five years since 1946, when this method of accounting for capital development was started, we have put more than $14 billion into the development of our country, that is including the $3,600 million that is anticipated for this year. That of course has gone not only into plant and machinery but into all the institutional services, the hospitals, and the homes, all that can be regarded as capital investment to increase the comforts of the people of the country.

This figure is all the more striking because of the uncertainty that was felt concerning the future at the end of the war. The possibility of a sharp recession was feared and the general thinking of 1945 was that the government should be prepared to step in and help support employment and income by various measures including a large public works program should it be needed. One of the steps taken to this end was the provision of a so-called shelf or reserve of fully-planned public works which could be undertaken as conditions required. To make this particular project effective, it was felt that the active co-operation of provincial governments and municipalities should be enlisted since they normally account for about double the capital expenditure made by the federal government. This was attempted at the 1945 conference; and in addition, financial assistance was offered to stimulate and develop planning in advance, and special inducements were proposed to make it financially advantageous for provincial governments and municipalities to co-operate in the shelf project and to co-ordinate the timing or execution of these public works. It was felt that with that kind of co-ordination it would be possible to time the execution not only of such projects as were of national concern but also of those which were local responsibilities of provincial or municipal administrations, and that would have made it possible to deal not only with conditions that are apt to affect the whole economy of the nation but also with the localized or spotty unemployment situations which might arise and which could be taken care of by works that do not come under federal jurisdiction, such as municipal water works, sewers, sidewalks and pavements.

As the leader of the opposition will remember, there was even some question as to whether or not plans for a subway system in Toronto could not be part of the shelf for which planning grants would be made and toward the cost of which a contribution might be available if the work was carried out at a time when it was required to meet unemployment situations.

But we know what happened to those plans. Although the effectiveness of a shelf was greatly reduced by the absence of provincial participation, the federal government has tried to go ahead with the effort to apply the principle of proper timing to its own direct capital expenditure. But as events developed, it rapidly appeared that the immediate problem was not to plan for additional government expenditure but rather to hold public building down to the minimum in order to make labour and materials available to satisfy the private investment boom and not to intensify the strong inflationary pressures which existed.

I am sure we who are believers in private enterprise would all prefer to see the employment necessary to give a job to every Canadian man and woman who wants to work come from work provided by private enterprise, and that we feel it is only whenever it might appear that private enterprise was lagging that we should stimulate public investment so as to maintain employment and prosperity. As a further practical consideration, adequate technical personnel to carry out a program of advance planning over and above the regular departmental work was simply not available unless we attempted to compete, for those who were capable of performing that work, with private enterprise that was already employing them, and we felt that that was not the right thing to do.

It did not seem desirable, in face of the over-all shortage of scientific and technical personnel, for the government to undertake to compete for their services at the cost of restricting private business expansion. And as a result the shelf as such never reached large amounts. It was limited to a relatively narrow category of projects for which standardized plans could be prepared and filed.

As events developed, the situation evidently called for a re-examination, and a new approach was made last year.

Not only has the nature of the unemployment we were providing for changed radically from the possibilities envisaged in 1945, but the practical experience acquired in attempting to develop a shelf without provincial and municipal co-operation indicated the need of a more flexible method of preparing to meet possible eventualities. A survey was made last year of the state of planning of all capital projects of the federal government, including some, like the trans-Canada highway, to be executed jointly with provincial governments. I am talking now about government projects only, federal, provincial and municipal. Projects which were completely planned as of March 31 last year, and in some cases already under way, totalled $722 million. Projects in various stages of planning from the survey to the detailed preparation stage, amounted to approximately $1 billion. A third category of projects to which preliminary consideration had been given, and for which preliminary plans were ready and which could be executed within a period of not more than five years, were put at $1,300 million. The total of these three categories, themselves amounting to some 5,000 projects, had a value of some $3 billion, quite a substantial sum, but less than is going to be done in this one year under the intentions we have ascertained from the survey of private enterprise as well as government authorities.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the Prime Minister permit a question? He gave us the figure of federal expenditure for the coming year. Has the Prime Minister the provincial figure?

Mr. St. Laurent: No, I am sorry I have not. I understand that it is very large. It is included in the $3,600 million. I understand that in the province of Ontario it is something of the order of $25 million a month for the year.

There are also obvious practical limitations in launching any large building project in the dead of winter to meet some abnormal seasonal unemployment. That just cannot be done. No relief could have been afforded to Vancouver at any time since this situation developed by launching any further building project out there.

The results of the survey satisfied the government that the shelf concept, when limited to its own public investment program, was not the best approach at the present time. The approach now is one of greater co-ordination and expansion of departmental programs for such works as are purely federal, and renewed efforts to secure provincial co-operation in such national undertakings as the trans-Canada highway, natural resources development and conservation and local housing schemes.

A word of warning should be sounded about the effectiveness of a public works program as a cure-all for unemployment. Such a program necessarily operates through the construction industry. Where that industry is lagging, anything done to activate it stimulates the whole economy. But ever since 1945 our construction industry has enjoyed a very high level of activity, and our survey indicates that private enterprise is going to keep it very active throughout the whole of this year.

It is also true that construction costs remain high though the availability of supplies and the greater productivity of labour have brought about some reduction. Still any unnecessary competition by government with private enterprise for the available supplies and the available skilled labour in the construction industry at this time would not appear to be very helpful in increasing over-all employment in that industry. Unless it could be likely to increase over-all employment there is no point in spending public money instead of having private enterprise invest its own money in its own way.

Another consideration which is sometimes overlooked is that the type of public project which the federal authorities could undertake might not be at all suitable for the kind of people in a given area who are in need of work. In considering the possible role of public works today, and the present usefulness of a shelf, we must give particular emphasis to the nature of the unemployment and the general conditions prevailing in the economy. As I have said unemployment today arises from a softness, to some extent seasonal, which is concentrated largely in a few specialized industries and areas. The national responsibility to which this government is committed is to do all in its power to maintain a high national level of employment and income. And this, in spite of some serious external difficulties, we have succeeded in doing and we are confident that we shall continue to do so. This is a very different matter, however, from taking federal action to meet special local situations when the general level of prosperity is as high as it is in Canada today.

Whenever it is felt that some local situation should be taken care of by proceeding with works which are of concern to the authorities of that locality, it must not be forgotten that municipal institutions are agencies of the province; and if provincial autonomy means anything, it must mean that we should not attempt to deal with municipal problems without the intervention of the provincial governments. That does not mean that we are not concerned with the well-being of all Canadians, wherever they happen to be, and that we will not always attempt to time our own public works and expenditures so that the residue of any local problem over and above the national average may be as light as possible. But there will inevitably be some residuary problems from time to time in some areas, and the initiative in dealing with them must be taken by the local authorities. If they need assistance they should go first to their provincial governments, and if both they and the provincial authorities feel that there are grounds for federal help in the interest of the nation as a whole, the request for federal intervention should be made by and through the provincial authorities.

It is not very consistent to talk about provincial autonomy and then attempt to put on the federal doorstep every practical problem that crops up.

I believe that in looking to the future special emphasis should be placed on natural resources development and conservation policies. In that I find myself in agreement with the leader of the opposition. This is a field that today has more promise than ever before, and has particular interest for us because of the eventual effect it will have on our trade picture. Alberta oil, Steep Rock and Labrador iron ores, and Quebec titanium, and more scientific use of our forest resources, are outstanding examples of resources development which can and will make a radical change in our present unbalanced trade picture vis-à-vis the United States. While our domestic investment boom promises to continue at increasing records, there are many to whom our export prospects do not appear to be so encouraging. Our primary difficulty can be put as simply as one, two, three. One, we buy more from the United States than we are able to sell them; two, we sell more to the rest of the world than we buy from them; and three, our customers are unable to provide the United States dollars which would enable us to balance one against the other. And that is not just a problem of convertibility. The dollars or pounds are merely symbols; and unless there are the commodities available that those dollars or pounds would call for, they are of no immediate use.

I noticed the other day that Sir Stafford Cripps answered the same question put to him, in an interview, when he was asked about the possibility of Canada taking sterling for our sales to them. He said, "Of course that would be merely another way of extending a further loan to us, without interest." That must be realized—and I am sure it is realized, that the people of Canada know that we want to export. As the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) has said, we want to find markets for our increasing production; but we do not want to find markets which will absorb our products and give us nothing in return. That is why we are doing our best, as stated in the speech from the throne, to facilitate the earning of Canadian dollars by our European customers. It is going to be a little painful for some of us in some quarters; but I think it is the only way by which we can reach that goal of convertibility—that is to say, that goal where we would not be giving our goods away, and where we would not ourselves continue to be providing by loans the Canadian dollars with which they will pay. Because those loans of Canadian dollars will eventually have to be either written off or reimbursed in commodities. We will have to take goods for everything owed to us—or take nothing.

It is true that at the present time part of our overseas exports are dependent upon the continued extension of United States credit and grants to Europe. Perhaps we would not lose very much of our present sales to Europe through ECA offshore purchasing if this were discontinued. But it would be an important fraction, particularly to some individual groups and areas, if it were not offset by increased imports from Europe. Our own balance of payments position now gives us very little room to extend further credits ourselves.

At the same time a significant amount of our industrial raw material and consumer goods requirements is dependent on our finding the United States dollars to meet our deficit there. We are therefore in a vulnerable position on both export and import accounts. That is why the development of our resources, particularly in such things as oil and iron for which we are so heavily dependent on the United States, is of double advantage. It expands our own production income and wealth, and it helps meet the United States dollar problem to which our trade is so vulnerable.

May I give only two examples, one of the saving of United States dollars, and the other of the earning of United States dollars. Our exports to the United States in 1947 were valued at about $1,056 million, while in 1949 they were $1,524 million. This is an increase of half a billion dollars in 1949 over 1947.

In 1948 our petroleum imports were valued at $301 million, and in 1949 we had reduced them to $274 million. The crude we produced in Canada in 1948 amounted to 12,287,000 barrels at an estimated value of $37,419,000. The crude produced in Canada in 1949, to the extent of 22,210,000 barrels, had an estimated value of $62,333,000.

We believe, and indeed I should think everyone in the house believes, that there are oil resources in Alberta sufficient to equal the consumption of the whole Canadian nation. It may not be possible or economical to deliver that oil to consumption points throughout Canada. But we can hope that what we will have over the requirements of those who can get it at economical transportation costs can be sold elsewhere so as to provide us with the dollars necessary to continue to purchase from the United States equivalent quantities to be consumed in eastern parts which are not accessible, under economic conditions, to the oil wells of Alberta.

Then, concerning the export of iron ore, I have before me only those figures for the Steep Rock mine. They show that in 1948 there were 670,000 tons, and in 1949, 1,068,000 tons. That is increasing; and there are prospects from the tremendous deposits in northeastern Quebec and Labrador. There are possibilities of tremendous expansion in the export of titanium ores from the north shore of the St. Lawrence river.

I believe we have reason to look to the future with some confidence. We have these balance-of-payment difficulties, but we expect our balance of payments with the United States will be improved during 1950. On the other hand, for reasons which are not within our control or significant influence, we must accept some reduction in our sales to the rest of the world. The net over-all effect is estimated to be that our 1950 imports will remain at the 1949 level, although with some change in national sources of procurement. We hope that more will come from sterling sources and less from American-dollar sources.

Our total exports and our balance of trade may be down as much as $250 million. This has serious implications in that it will be borne unequally by different industries and different areas, and it will contribute to the spotty nature and rather specialized soft spots of our economy during this year. However, that should not be a major factor in increasing unemployment.

Up to now, thanks to the buoyancy of the domestic market, many of the manufacturing industries adversely affected have been able to replace lost export sales with domestic sales. More adverse effects may be felt by some relatively specialized groups of primary producers for whom Europe has been the chief, or price determining, market.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, the last point I was endeavouring to make before the dinner recess was that the two major factors expected to have a significant influence on the level of employment and income during 1950 were the level of our domestic investments and the level of our overseas exports. It is true it so happens that in dollar terms the rise in domestic investment will just about offset the expected drop in the volume of our overseas exports, but we must recognize the fact that things will not average out as neatly as all that for the individuals concerned. That is why the measures which the government will take to deal with our economic problems this year will of necessity be flexible, be selective and be designed to meet special situations rather than anything in the nature of a grandiose over-all blueprint for the general economy of the nation.

I have already indicated that these measures consist first of all of the extension of unemployment insurance to take care of a larger volume of unemployment than was normally to be expected; second, the extension of authority for price support of agricultural and fisheries products to ease the impact of the readjustment which is necessary, and which everyone had realized would be necessary. Then we wish to go ahead as rapidly as possible with the trans-Canada highway, and negotiations are being pursued actively with the provincial administrations to bring that about. We are also anxious to get ahead with further housing. Further housing is required, and hon. members know that the provisions of the National Housing Act were liberalized by amendments made at the last session to provide for maintaining activity in the construction of residential housing. We are also negotiating with the provincial administrations along the lines authorized by the legislation adopted at the last session with respect to forestry and the conservation of other natural resources.

In addition to what will be taken care of in that way there may remain some residual local problems, but there is probably no locality where there is unemployment today that could not stand more housing construction. If they will co-operate that will do much to relieve all that can be relieved by means of the construction industry. There are probably not many localities where there is unemployment that could not stand more municipal improvements such as water works, sewers, sidewalks, paving, and so forth. Our municipalities are all in a good sound situation at the present time, and can consider the prosecution of local improvements if they feel that the employment situation in their midst would be benefited thereby.

During the dinner recess I saw an editorial in today's Ottawa Journal which may require me to take a little more than the ten minutes I anticipated before the recess. The editorial is headed:

> Unemployment insurance doesn't make jobs.

That is partially true. Unemployment insurance does not create new jobs, but unemployment insurance, like all other measures which have been taken to distribute purchasing power, maintains jobs and maintains economic activity. As I said before, that results from the distribution of purchasing power under the veterans' charter, from its distribution under the Family Allowances Act, from the increase in old age pensions, and from the substantial amounts that have been paid out under existing legislation respecting unemployment insurance.

As to pensions, it is true there was no specific reference thereto in the speech from the throne, and that a motion has been put on the order paper calling for the setting up of a committee to look into the whole matter; but I do wish to repudiate the charge that there has been any change in the attitude of the government. In December, 1948, shortly after I had assumed the responsibilities of the office I now occupy, I stated what the policy was in that respect. Part of what I said at that time was:

> There are also old age pensions. The Liberal party is not fully satisfied with the present old age pension scheme even though old age pensions were started by a Liberal government. The Liberal aim is a contributory scheme in which everyone can pay in something during his working years to help provide security for his old age. But a contributory plan will require an agreement with the provincial governments, and so far it has not been possible to reach such an agreement.

That is exactly the substance of what I said during the election campaign. I referred to it in a national broadcast made from Moncton on the 19th of May, 1949. At that time I said:

> In a broadcast last December I said it was the policy of the Liberal party to improve the present old age pension scheme. One big advance was the increase of $10 a month in the pension made last month.

I was speaking in May, and the increase of $10 had been provided in legislation adopted in April.

> But the Liberal aim is a contributory system in which everyone can pay in something in his working years to help provide security as a matter of right in his old age. Contributory old age pensions, like health insurance, require an agreement with the provinces, and so far it has not been possible to reach such an agreement.

It has not been possible yet to reach such an agreement. I added at that time:

> But we are going to continue to work for an agreement, and meanwhile, as I have said, something substantial has been done this year for the old age pensioners.

We have provided for another conference with the provincial authorities to take place early in the fall. In the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) there is a charge of failure, in these terms:

> Failed to take steps to inaugurate a national contributory system of old age pensions without a means test.

I am wondering whether that means that our failure consists in not doing it without an agreement with the provinces. We do not think it can be done. We do not think there can be contributions required for the specific purpose of old age pensions, or any other security benefits, without an agreement with the provinces. I find it rather strange that the hon. gentleman who is so insistent about provincial autonomy should be charging us with failure to do something which cannot be done without that agreement.

Mr. Drew: Which you never sought.

Mr. St. Laurent: I did not catch what the hon. member said.

Mr. Drew: And which you never sought.

Mr. St. Laurent: Which we never sought?

Mr. Drew: Never.

Mr. St. Laurent: The hon. gentleman has a memory that does not go back as far as 1945 because I was there in 1945, and the hon. gentleman was also there in another capacity than that of leader of the opposition in this house. Well, we both know whether or not an agreement was sought, and we both know why no agreement was reached. We are going to have another conference in the autumn of 1950 and the hon. gentleman will not be there as a provincial representative, so we may get an agreement. From the difference in the tone of the deliberations at the dominion-provincial conference in January of this year and that of 1945 and 1946, I have reason to expect that something may be accomplished.

This same article which bears the title "Unemployment insurance doesn't make jobs" goes on to point to another straw man which is raised by some distortion of the facts from which the inferences are drawn. The article says:

> The government's position with respect to trade is a poor one, no matter how examined. If it believed what it was telling the country six months age, which was that trade was at "unprecedented peaks" and would likely stay there, then it must be convicted of not knowing its business. If it didn't believe what it was telling the country six months ago, and knew that trade was in a bad way and might get worse, it must be convicted of deliberate deception.

Part of that is true, but part is not true. We did say six months ago that trade was at unprecedented peaks, and that was true. But we did not say it was likely to stay there. We did say there were serious difficulties; that we would do our best to overcome those difficulties; and if they were difficulties that could be overcome there was no man better qualified to do what might be required than the then and present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). Let us see what I said in Port Arthur, the home town of the minister, on April 22, 1949; I have the text here:

> The whole future of Canadian trade—and Canadian prosperity—depended on new resourcefulness and new energy and bold initiative on the part of government. Almost overnight the Department of Trade and Commerce became one of the most important in the government—and it was then that Mr. King turned once more to Mr. Howe.
> Now, I am not going to claim that Mr. Howe has solved all our trade problems, because, if I did, he would get up at once and tell me I was mistaken.

Some hon. Members: He sure would.

Mr. St. Laurent: Oh, yes; hon. gentlemen may laugh about that; but the minister does talk even to his best friends, whether or not he agrees with them, in such a way that we always know where he stands and what is his position. I said and I believed that if I were to make that statement he would get up at once and tell me I was mistaken. Then I added:

> He knows the problems are still thorny and there is no easy solution—but I will venture the prediction that if Mr. Howe and those who are working with him don't find a solution, there won't be one to find.

I made a similar statement on May 18 at Amherst, when I said:

> Now it is quite true that the maintenance of markets for our surplus production is a problem. It is a problem not because of any condition in Canada but because of the dislocation of trade and the destruction of productive capacity in our former markets overseas. The restoration of the British market and western European markets has been a problem, a continuing problem, ever since the end of the war. And it is going to continue to be a problem for a good many years yet. But the fact is that up to the present, Canadian exporters, with pretty active co-operation from the government, have been able to find markets for nearly all they produce which cannot be sold profitably in Canada.

I made similar statements on May 19 in a broadcast from Moncton; on June 1 at Owen Sound; on June 4 at Hamilton; on June 15 at Pembroke; on June 21 at Toronto; and on June 24 at St. John's, Newfoundland. In those statements I said it was a serious problem but I did not believe—and I do not believe—any man in Canada is better qualified to handle it than the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Now I should say a word about old age pensions. We are asking the house to set up a committee to look at all aspects of the problem, because there are aspects as to which it will be very valuable for all hon. members to have as much information and as much of the factual background as possible. I have gone into the matter to a certain extent, though not the extent to which it will be gone into by the committee. I have obtained some preliminary figures. As of September 30, 1949, some 265,000 old age pensioners were qualified under the means test. At that time if there had been no means test and the pension had been payable as a matter of right to all persons over seventy, some 670,000 persons would have been entitled to receive it. The expenditure, instead of being $99 million at the rate of $40 a month, would have been $322 million. At the rate of $50 a month it would have been $404 million; at $60 a month it would have been $485 million; and at $100 a month, as some suggested, it would have been $807 million. If the age limit were reduced to sixty-five, at $40 a month the cost would be $528 million; at $50 a month it would be $660 million; at $60 a month it would be $790 million; and at $100 a month it would be $1,319 million.

I also inquired as to the estimated revenue to be derived from the personal income tax for the year 1950. I was told the estimate was $603 million. Of course government revenues must be devoted to other things as well as old age pensions. The estimate of the amount to be distributed under the family allowance scheme in 1950-51 is from $306 million to $307 million. With respect to the means test, some people suggest that if it were abolished we would get back most of what was paid out in old age pensions in the form of income tax from those who would receive it. Well, I had that suggestion looked into also. I find that of our population of about 13,500,000 some 8,500,000 are twenty years of age or over. Of that number some 2,311,000 are subject to income tax. But in order to pay at a rate that would give back as much as half in income tax, one has to be in the $25,000 bracket. It is only over $25,000 that the income tax amounts to 50 per cent of the income. The number of those with incomes of $25,000 or over in the whole population, out of the 2,311,000 taxpayers, is 5,735, or one-quarter of one per cent of those who are liable to income tax. Of the 670,000 who would be 70 years of age and entitled to old age pensions without a means test, if the distribution were the same, 36 per cent of them would be liable to income tax, that is 241,000. However, less than 1,000 of them would be in the $25,000 bracket and liable to return to the treasury, in income tax, as much as one-half of what they received in the form of old age pensions. I think that clearly demonstrates that the only practical way in which an old age pension scheme without a means test could be provided is through a direct contributory system. It is that goal towards which we are working.

Mr. Knowles: That was not the federal government's offer to the provinces in 1945. Was that offer not made without its involving a contributory system?

Mr. St. Laurent: No, it was not. I think that if the hon. member will refer to the proposition he will find there never was any offer of a pension without a means test and without a contribution. There could not be, because it just would not work. We cannot have that proportion of the income of the nation derived from ordinary taxation devoted to old age pensions. We are all sympathetic to the old age pensioners, but why should I, within the next two years, get a pension of $40 per month and hand back only something of the order of 45 or 50 per cent of it to the treasury? Is that required in the interests of the Canadian nation?

The means test has been called the meanest test. It is unfortunate that there must be some kind of inquiry as to whether or not it is proper that a pension should be paid at the expense of the taxpayer, unless it is a matter of contract under which the one who gets it without a means test has made some contribution. This is an extremely difficult problem to handle. It is no doubt desirable that our aged citizens be provided for reasonably well. But there are other requirements of the national economy that have to be considered. I am convinced that the only way in which a pension, as of right, can be paid to Canadians who reach the age is on a direct contributory system. Then, when we have a direct contributory system, we will get what we pay for, and we will pay for what we get. When suggestions are made that the old age pension be increased by 50 per cent, it will be something for consideration. It will mean, however, that the contributions will also have to be increased by 50 per cent, so we will get what we pay for, and we will have to be prepared to pay for what we are going to get.

Mr. Rowe: That was not what you said before the election.

Mr. St. Laurent: The hon. gentleman says it should have been mentioned before the election. Was he not here when I read the statements that were made?

Mr. Rowe: I was in the country, and I heard you in the country.

Mr. St. Laurent: My hon. friend never heard me say anything else.

Mr. Rowe: But I heard your supporters say it.

Mr. St. Laurent: If my hon. friend heard all my supporters, he must be a ubiquitous gentleman, because there were many supporters all over the country from one ocean to the other. If the hon. gentleman heard that, his ears must be even longer than those of an animal whose name I shall not mention.

Mr. Rowe: The animal you mention would not put it that way. We heard you before the election, do not worry about that. You never made that explanation yourself before the election.

Mr. St. Laurent: I think my friend is hearing more than he likes to hear now. He should perhaps join the club of those who have ears and do not hear. There will be an opportunity for the hon. member to make his speech if he thinks he wants to make one.

Mr. Rowe: I will make one, and I will answer you, too.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. St. Laurent: I have dealt with two of the extraordinary assertions of this motion to amend the motion for an address. Number 1 said:

> failed to take adequate measures to preserve and expand markets for Canada's surplus products of farm, forest, sea and mine, and to deal with the problems of increasing unemployment and reduced income to Canadian farmers and other producers . . . .

There may be some who say we are facing a national emergency which requires extraordinary measures. I do not believe we are. I think that these are localized situations which require special measures, and that the special measures I have indicated will take care of that problem.

The next paragraph states that we failed to take steps to inaugurate a national contributory system of old age pensions without a means test. We are going to have a conference in the fall. In the meantime, we intend to secure all the information that could have a bearing upon conclusions it would be proper to arrive at at that conference.

> deliberately violated a law of this parliament by illegally supressing the report of the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act on the flour milling industry for ten months, including the period of the recent general election campaign, and denied to parliament information essential to the performance of its duty and the maintenance of responsible government . . . .

I am not going to rehash the debate on the report of the commissioner with respect to the milling industry, which we had during the last session of parliament.

An hon. Member: It is true.

Mr. St. Laurent: If hon. members want to hear it discussed, there will be other members on this side who will discuss it.

Mr. Rowe: There is nothing more to say about it.

Mr. St. Laurent: I would appreciate it if, for the next three or four minutes, the hon. member had nothing more to say.

The fourth item concerns the failure to take adequate measures to curb espionage and other harmful activities of communists in Canada. The leader of the opposition said in that connection that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) had made a statement admitting the existence of spying activities, and so forth. There was a report, published by the B.U.P., which was later corrected. I have here exactly what the Minister of Justice said in that respect, and I am going to take the time to read it if I may. It reads:

> In considering our security position now and what it might be in the event of another world war we can reach certain conclusions from what has happened in other countries, and from the attitudes of some of our own citizens and residents in Canada itself. In several countries, espionage, infiltration, sabotage and fomenting of discontent and disaffection, the staging of coups d'état have been used as weapons of war. In our own country we have those who have given repeated demonstration of their unsympathetic and disloyal attitude towards our institutions and our form of government.
> Those of us who have some share of responsibility for security take cognizance of these and other facts and have already taken measures to guard against them. But just as those who plot against the security of Canada do not discuss their plans in the forum or from the housetops, so we who prepare counter-measures to frustrate their plot could make few greater mistakes than to specify and advertise what we have done and what we are prepared to do. To follow this course would transform our security measures into their very opposite.

Hon. members will ask themselves whether or not that is a reasonable position to take.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Would the Prime Minister permit a question?

Mr. St. Laurent: Certainly.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Do I understand the Prime Minister to say that that is what I think he called the retracted statement? Is that the corrected version of what was in the press attributed to the Minister of Justice?

Mr. St. Laurent: That is the statement which was given to the press before the wrong version was put in.

Mr. Rowe: It is too bad that the press is not fair to you.

Mr. St. Laurent: The hon. gentleman is not the only person who we think is sometimes unfair to us. With respect to communist activities, in our understanding measures are other things than mere words, and we think that actions speak louder than words. When action was required, action was taken; and I was obliged to submit to fairly severe criticism from the other side of the house for the action that was taken. I did not regret it then and I do not regret it now. But when action requires to be taken, we think that we shall have the courage, as we had then, to take it and to carry it to its full implementation.

I should like to close by calling attention to an editorial in the Montreal Star, because it is not everybody in Canada who has this gloomy view of what this year 1950 portends because it happens to be a year when the affairs of the country will be under the direction of a Liberal government. The article is entitled, "1950, A Year of Adjustment". This article appeared in the Montreal Star of February 17, and it reads as follows:

> The probable pattern of future parliamentary debate can be seen more readily in the pre-session speeches of opposition leaders than in the studiously colorless language of the speech from the throne.

Perhaps it was studiously colorless because we did not think the occasion required any flamboyant language. The article continues:

> It can be predicted therefore that the storm of criticism shortly to descend on the government will concentrate on two points—the rise in urban unemployment and the decline in farm prices.
> It is important not to add fear to the factors which contribute to any period of adjustment, for fear can induce declines greater than the basic economic situation calls for.

We know from experience that fear added to the motives which induced the pulp and paper companies to reduce their cut of pulpwood substantially during the last season in spite of the fact that their sales are at higher levels than ever before. The article continues:

> A pendulum swing can be created instead of a minor oscillation. For this reason it may be hoped that the public will keep its head when the oratory starts. We have had rising employment and rising farm income every year now since 1939. The Bank of Canada statistics show that we have safely absorbed our increase in population and that the actual net production of wealth has been steadily going up.
> Without minimizing the difficulties that arise from unemployment and lower prices, it is important to remember that things are not going badly with Canada. There is no reason to doubt the fundamentally optimistic statements in the speech from the throne. Judged by any reasonable standard, 1950 should be a pretty good year.
> On the other hand, it would be idle to play ostrich and pretend that there are no clouds on the horizon. There are. Canada remains fundamentally a country built upon its export trade. Its farm and industrial capacity both are far greater than any required for domestic needs, and the international trading world is in a sorry state. The first stage of post-war reconstruction has been completed. Production is rising steadily and this means stiffer competition in export markets.
> On top of that is the basic difficulty in creating a sound balance of international accounts. The world is being divided into trading blocs, and the Canadian position in it is obviously an uncomfortable one. We buy in one bloc, and we sell in another, and there is no quick solution for this problem. Very slowly certain new trends and patterns of trade are being established but this involves transition, and that kind of change is not easy to effect.
> It is, we think, in the light of that basic fact that the government's policy should be judged. We are not likely to see introduced into parliament any fine, new, permanent cure-all of our difficulties. More likely we will see remedial measures of one kind or another, and these should be judged by special standards. On the one hand, do they help us over an immediate hurdle? On the other, do they tend to create a situation which will make eventual solutions more difficult of attainment? If the answer to the first question is, Yes, and the answer to the second question, No, it would be rash to reject them.
> The situation is one that calls for moderation in both policy and the criticism of it. The impatient prince in ancient days who complained to his tutors that they were making him work too hard was told that there was no royal road to knowledge. There is no easy, royal road to a stable and prosperous world either. We must work our way along it, step by step.

I think we shall take the proper steps during this session of parliament.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): May I, Mr. Speaker, join with the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) and the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in congratulating the mover and the seconder of the address. I think it is always well and acceptable to the house when two young men, recently come into this chamber, are given the honour of making this motion. It is both a privilege and an honour to be selected for this purpose, and I congratulate them.

With most of the criticisms made by the leader of the opposition this afternoon I find myself in agreement. Last session we had before us the matter of the flour-milling report and it was discussed fairly thoroughly. We raised the matter first because we discovered that the report had not been made public. Consequently I agree with the criticism made by the leader of the opposition this afternoon with regard to that episode. The same thing, of course, applies to the rising unemployment, the loss of markets, the lowering of farm prices and so on. Because of the fact that my time is limited by the rules of the house I propose to deal with only two or three matters this evening. Before I do so, however, I want to comment on the omission from the speech from the throne, which we immediately regretted, of any reference to old age pension legislation. It is true that a resolution to set up a committee of both houses of parliament to review old age pension legislation and to consider the means test has been placed on the order paper by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin). As the Prime Minister has just indicated quite clearly, this matter has been under discussion in this house for a good many years. In fact, largely owing to the efforts of the first leader of the C.C.F. movement, Mr. J. S. Woodsworth, the first old age pension bill was introduced into this chamber in 1926. We have taken great interest in the matter ever since and have raised it at practically every session of parliament since we have been here. Hence it seems to me that the proposal to set up another committee to consider the matter of old age pension legislation in all its aspects may be criticized in language used by the former prime minister of Canada, Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, when Right Hon. R. B. Bennett set up a committee some years ago to consider the matter of current price spreads, a matter which was fairly well understood across the country. Mr. King said this as reported at page 190 of Hansard, February 2, 1934:

> The motion is in large part one of postponing action. What the country is interested in is not so much further inquiry with respect to matters about which nearly everyone knows a great deal, but legislation, if more is required, to meet a situation that is already understood.

That is a very apt quotation and could be applied to the old age pensions legislation and to the proposed resolution of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin).

I was amazed just now to hear the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) contradict the statement made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) and by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) when he questioned the Prime Minister concerning the proposals that were actually made by the federal government in 1945 to the dominion-provincial conference. One of my colleagues went upstairs and got me the green book containing the official proposals of the government of Canada. What did the government say? At page 37, under the heading "Summary of the federal government proposals", the following appears:

> The federal government's proposals are twofold:
> As part of the general proposals now put before the conference, it is proposed that the federal government would establish a system of national old age pensions entirely financed and administered by the federal government, and paid at the uniform rate of $30 per month regardless of means to men and women aged 70 and over in all parts of Canada.

Then the proposal went on to say:

> The cost of national old age pensions by 1948, for example, is estimated at $200 million. (For details see table I below.) There would be a partial recovery from people over 70 paying income tax.

The other proposal was that the age for old age pension should be reduced to 65 but that from 65 to 69 the pension would be shared fifty-fifty between the provinces and the dominion.

There are the proposals.

Mr. St. Laurent: That is not the whole—

Mr. Coldwell: I know of no other proposals placed before the dominion-provincial conference in August, 1945. I believe these were the last proposals. May I say this? From time to time during election periods advertising has appeared put out by the National Liberal Federation which clearly promised old age pensions without a means test. As a matter of fact I have a copy of one of them.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): What year?

Mr. Coldwell: The one to which I referred was published in all the metropolitan daily papers of Canada on June 5, 1945. This one says, "Old age pensions, higher pensions, lower age limit, no means test." But the proposals that were placed before the dominion-provincial conference were placed there as I have read them from the official record of the government at the time.

Mr. St. Laurent: If the hon. member is not using the book, would he mind sending it across to me?

Mr. Coldwell: Certainly. This evening I am going to discuss two or three problems which should receive the consideration of the house. I take it that thoughtful Canadians, like thoughtful people everywhere, are worried at the present time about the international situation. Economically, clouds have been gathering on the horizon, but more disturbing still, I think, is the intensification of the so-called cold war and the dangers of it developing into a staggering and devastating conflict, a development which the plain ordinary common people in all places dread and fear.

One phase of the problem of peace is uppermost in many minds, the international control of that mighty power inherent in atomic energy, of atomic bombs and of radioactive material which exists in quantity and indeed in sufficient quantity to wipe out all life over wide regions of this earth. But I doubt whether more than a few people have yet grasped the significance of President Truman's announcement that he had authorized scientists to proceed with the production of the hydrogen bomb. Scientists are endeavouring to tell the world what this really means. Two weeks ago twelve of the leading physicists of the United States issued the warning that the hydrogen bomb is not a weapon of war but an agent of mass destruction. They said this:

> The thermo nuclear reaction on which the H-bomb is based is limited in its power only by the amount of hydrogen which can be carried in the bomb. Even if the power were limited to one thousand times that of the present atomic bomb the step from an A to an H-bomb would be as great as that from an ordinary TNT bomb to an atom bomb. New York, or any other of the greatest cities of the world, could be destroyed by a single hydrogen bomb.

Then they went on to say that, in case we believe we can rely on our security because our side is making it first:

> It is certain that the Russians will be able to make one too.

They added that it was indeed possible that the Russians were engaged at the present time in making such a bomb. Those of us who have had the privilege in this house of knowing something about atomic energy through visiting Chalk River and sitting on the committee that was set up and, I hope, will be re-established, and who followed the developments and the discussions on atomic energy since the first bomb was dropped on Hiroshima, can be under no illusions as to what or who has blocked an effective international control of atomic weapons until now. Putting it baldly, it has been the insistence of the Soviet union on complete national sovereignty and their refusal to agree on more than limited and therefore ineffective control and inspection by an international body under the United Nations. The new developments make the outlawing of atomic weapons more urgent than ever. But any outlawing of these weapons must be accompanied of course by effective control, effective inspection and control such as will remove any possibility of atomic weapons being made secretly in any country in the world. I say that up to the present time all efforts to achieve this desirable end have failed; but I believe that new attempts should be made to secure an agreement now. I say to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) that I believe Canada might take the initiative in this regard. At the same time, if that is done, it should be accompanied by a new crusade for world peace, which I believe can be secured to all mankind only by the abolition of war itself as an instrument of national policy. That was the idea behind the United Nations when it was organized. Now that the Russians at least have the atomic bomb and the monopoly on our side has gone, perhaps there may be greater chances of success in reaching an agreement than there were before; I do not know. But let us hope so. In any event it seems to me we are now faced with two alternatives: One is to despair, to organize our side of the iron curtain and engage in a furious and intolerable armament race; the other is to bend every effort to find an acceptable plan for international control and inspection, and proceed at the same time to remove from the world the age-old causes of war.

In support of the second alternative no less a person than the joint chairman of the United States congressional committee on atomic energy, Senator McMahon, has made a significant and worth-while proposal. He calculated that at the present time the United States is spending $15 billion a year on armaments and war preparedness. He therefore proposed publicly the other day that the United States might begin by offering the world, through the United Nations, two-thirds of that sum for five years—and on two conditions: the first condition was a general acceptance of a satisfactory program for the effective control of atomic energy and, the second, an agreement by all countries, and enforced by inspection, that two-thirds of their present spending upon armaments would be devoted to constructive ends.

This proposal received amazing support, as I think, from members of all parties in the United States. Even an old and unyielding isolationist like Senator John Bricker of Ohio said this:

> If we can get an agreement for air-tight control and true international inspection for $50 billion, I would grab at the chance.

Senator McMahon said that he desired the development of atomic energy everywhere for peace and that he was prepared to give general economic aid and help to all countries which would accept the two conditions he made, and he included Russia. Then he added:

> Such a global Marshall plan might combine with the marvellous power of peacetime energy to generate universal material progress and a universal co-operative spirit.

Such a proposal surely is one which, if we have the opportunity, Canada should support, both from the idealistic standpoint and, to place it on a lower level, for selfish reasons. Because of world impoverishment we face a grave crisis both in agriculture and in labour. It is no good saying that we should not fear. If we do not fear we may not find any solution, and indeed we may find ourselves in the position of the ostrich, with our heads buried and not seeing what is threatened around us.

I have said that this is a crisis in both agriculture and labour. But of course, in reality, the welfare of all Canadians is involved, and the problems faced by farmers and industrial workers are a part of a single problem, not two separate problems.

At present we are told, and told authoritatively, that only one-third of the world's two and a quarter billions of people receive sufficient food. The other two-thirds, as they did before the war, live on a marginal level of existence, a state of semi-starvation. We now have, as never before, the possibility of removing from men this age-old struggle against undeserved poverty, misery and want. That is what the right use of this challenging new power offers as the alternative—to what? —to war and mass destruction. Stealing across the world today, feeding on the misery of the exploited and the distressed masses, is what?—the promise of improved conditions in exchange for those freedoms of thought, speech and worship which we believe to be essential to the good life.

This explains of course what has happened in China. It may happen elsewhere if the democratic nations fail to take effective steps immediately to feed the hungry, clothe the naked and rescue the exploited. Of course the former policy of giving unconditional aid to corrupt regimes, as in China, has played right into the hands of the communist leaders, and scattered in the Far East seeds of distrust against the west.

I believe we must now try to undo as much of the evil of the immediate and the distant past as we can. I say to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) that I do not think any gain can be had by cutting ourselves completely off from the teeming millions of China and a large part of the Far East. In other words, I think we shall lose, rather than gain, by refusing to recognize that the Chinese have a new, if revolutionary, government. Recognition, as we well know, does not in fact involve the approval of any regime. We have recognized, and properly so, governments of countries whose people assisted in winning the war against the fascist, nazi and Japanese aggressors, as did the Chinese, even when we have disliked or abhorred their political philosophies.

Hence we should make no exception in the case of China. In our opinion the government should grant recognition at an early date. As the Secretary of State for External Affairs is reported to have remarked recently, the centre of world interest is now Asia, and perhaps more explicitly southeast Asia. At the moment Indo-China, Burma, Indonesia and other countries are feeling the impact of a new and threatening conquest. The offensive is largely ideological—in the realm of ideas, which fall on fertile ground because of age-old poverty, suffering and exploitation.

This cannot be met with military might. Soviet communism, fascism, or any other totalitarian threat, cannot be stopped by guns and bombs alone. I am not implying that, with the dangers existing all around us, we should not, until we get proper collective security, take measures to protect ourselves. But surely we should understand by now that communism, like fascism, feeds on poverty, hunger, misery and insecurity. The best and, indeed, the only way eventually to defeat communism or any of these other totalitarian cults is to offer and establish conditions so that people are well fed, healthy, properly clothed and housed and—I add one other—free.

So we say we believe that unless economic assistance is forthcoming, perhaps particularly for the people of southeast Asia, and soon, we shall have lost the cold war in that part of the world. That is why I think a new attempt to stop the armament race and the acceptance of proposals to utilize our common resources for human progress should appeal so strongly to all of us, particularly if we can hope to succeed in bringing such an idea to fruition.

I noted that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) was reported to have said that Canada had already overextended herself in giving economic aid. I am glad he shakes his head, although that is what the press report indicated. If that were said, may I say that we and the United States are the only countries with surpluses of food and raw materials so necessary for the winning of the war against poverty. As long as we have farm surpluses, as long as we have unemployment, we have the means, if we will use them, of making a still greater contribution to the winning of the cold war which is, as I have said, made possible by widespread poverty, misery and want. I am not implying, nor have I implied, that we can do this alone, but we should be pressing and urging on every occasion for the acceptance of an international economic plan or plans for meeting the needs of the undeveloped, war-devastated and impoverished countries of the world.

By international planning I do not mean planning primarily for private gain but international planning for the common good. Such planning, democratic and socialist, is as essential to us as it is to other people. The plight of our own primary producers and of nearly 400,000 workers reported a day or two ago to be unemployed underlines the necessity of our taking a vital and direct interest in the making of such a plan. As I have stated several times, we believe that the proper solution of world economic problems is essential to the solution of the dangerous political problems which face the world at the present time. Even without a comprehensive international plan we should devise ways and means of protecting our own people from depressed farm prices and lack of remunerative employment. After all, settlement in the international sphere will, I readily admit, take time, but our domestic difficulties are immediate and require immediate and maybe short-term solutions.

I think everyone will admit that our Canadian economy is particularly vulnerable because of the manner in which it has evolved. Until recent years we were in the happy position, as the Prime Minister (Mr. St.

Laurent) indicated in his remarks today, of being able to sell our surplus commodities in one area and buy most of the supplies that we needed in another area. Two world wars have changed this picture. That is the basis of what we are apt to call the dollar problem. Some people say that henceforth we must sell more in the United States in order to obtain dollars to pay for imports from that country, and we should do this if we can. Unfortunately the main commodities upon which our farmers and certain other primary producers depend are competitive with the same commodities in the United States. The figures the Prime Minister used this afternoon confirm that it is upon agriculture and other primary products that the majority of our people on the land, in rural towns and villages, in the distributing centres, and indeed in the industrial cities, depend. The lack of markets for these commodities will be reflected in general depression and unemployment everywhere in Canada. Already there is genuine alarm at accumulating surpluses due to shrinking markets for primary products, and of course the rising number of unemployed. The two things are related.

What do we suggest should be done to offset the difficulties that are arising? First, of course, steps must be taken by parliament to maintain and increase domestic consumption by planning for full employment and widely distributed purchasing power. Our best market is still our domestic market. At present we are told we have some 375,000 persons unemployed and seeking work. Yet what is the government offering to relieve this situation? An extension of unemployment insurance is the solution mentioned in the speech from the throne. That is a palliative. I agree it is a necessary one under certain circumstances, but surely in this country it is a confession of failure when there is so much to be done. Tonight we learned what has become of the public works shelf of which we heard so much in 1945, and which was recommended in the white paper dealing with post-war employment plans which I believe was placed before the house in that year. If we are to achieve full employment I say first that this country cannot possibly allow primary products to fall drastically in price. Consequently farm purchasing power will require the establishment of adequate floor prices based on parity with the goods farmers must buy. I submit that is of immediate concern not only to the government, but also to this parliament, and this parliament must grapple with it.

I imagine whatever we do now will be in the nature of expedients to meet a threatening crisis. Expedients are what we have usually adopted throughout the years. In the light of a completely new world situation what we need and must have is a properly planned and comprehensive farm policy for this country, something we have never had. Such a policy should be formulated in conjunction with a national economic plan for the development of all our resources having in view the maintenance of full employment and improved standards of living for Canadians generally. I do not suppose that will be undertaken immediately, since agriculture may be faced with increasing difficulties at once. But at least an outline of a comprehensive plan for agriculture should be formulated. That should be the subject of a conference of representatives of farm organizations, provincial governments and the federal authorities. Therefore we urge that, while taking short-term steps to relieve the situation now, Canada should be formulating a long-term policy for this basic industry. Because the government failed to take effective steps to protect agriculture from the severe dislocation with which it is threatened, or to meet rising unemployment, I had intended to move an amendment in simple terms condemning the government for its failure in these two particulars. The official opposition has moved an amendment; but because some of the phraseology and some of the statements are not altogether acceptable to my colleagues and myself I am going to move an amendment to the amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), as follows:

> That the amendment be amended by deleting from subparagraph (2) thereof all the words after the word "inaugurate" and substituting instead thereof the words "an over-all social security program including national health insurance and the removal of the means test from the old age pension"; and also by inserting in subparagraph (4) thereof, immediately after the word "measures," the words "to protect civil liberties and at the same time," and also by inserting, in the same subparagraph, immediately after the word "communists," the words "and fascists."

Standing by itself that is rather incomprehensible, so I shall read the amendment as it will appear if the subamendment is adopted:

> We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that Your Excellency's advisers have:
> (1) failed to take adequate measures to preserve and expand markets for Canada's surplus products of farm, forest, sea and mine, and to deal with the problems of increasing unemployment and reduced income to Canadian farmers and other producers; and
> (2) failed to take steps to inaugurate an over-all social security program including national health insurance and the removal of the means test from the old age pension; and
> (3) deliberately violated a law of this parliament by illegally suppressing the report of the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act on the flour mill industry for ten months, including the period of the recent general election campaign, and denied to parliament information essential to the performance of its duty and the maintenance of responsible government; and

(4) failed to take adequate measures to protect civil liberties and at the same time curb espionage and other harmful activities of communists and fascists in Canada.

Through the years our best market for primary products has been the United Kingdom. They still badly need our foods. They can only buy from us if we make that possible by buying from them. As has been said already by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), Canada cannot continue to make gifts to Great Britain. One of the barriers against the exchange of goods to which he referred this afternoon has been the Canadian tariff and other prohibitions and quotas. I hope the recent announcement of the removal of some of these quotas and prohibitions will result in an increase in Britain's supply of Canadian dollars, which will enable her to buy more Canadian goods. But we should give attention to the removal or lowering of tariffs against many classes of goods from the United Kingdom and the sterling area, even if this means temporarily discriminating against the same kind of goods coming from the United States.

Under present conditions we cannot expect to sell Britain two dollars' worth or more of goods and take in return only one dollar's worth from the United Kingdom. She cannot find the funds now, as she once did, to balance the account. Nor can we, under similar circumstances, buy two dollars' worth or more of goods from the United States and sell that country only one dollar's worth. Recent announcements from Washington indicate clearly that with the temporary exception of beef, malting barley, seeds and perhaps some fruits, the agricultural products we wish to market are surplus in that country, and there is no outlet for them there.

There is no doubt that many of the goods we import from the United States could be obtained just as well, and perhaps sometimes even better, from the United Kingdom. I do not mean to imply that there can be a complete or absolute balance between our two countries. It is improbable that this could happen. That being the case some other method must be found of meeting the immediate situation, and I want to deal with that point as briefly as I can.

We are suggesting that instead of demanding payment by the sterling area in dollars, it would help bridge the immediate gap if we accepted more goods and then part payment in sterling. This sterling could be used to buy some of the goods we shall need in future from Britain's ever-increasing production; but what is much more feasible and important, it could also be used for Canadian investment in the sterling area. In that way we would not be giving credit to Britain; we would be establishing an asset somewhere else in the world. The countries of southeast Asia and the underdeveloped areas of Africa, controlled as they are by sterling area countries and particularly by the United Kingdom, are trying to build up and expand their economies. They need machinery of all kinds, and I can see no reason why Canada could not export to Britain foodstuffs and other commodities which we have in surplus supply to feed and house the British workers, who would produce many of the machines needed in the underdeveloped areas. Thus payment to Canada could be made in the form of capital investment in the underdeveloped areas. In this way each country could specialize in the kind of production for which it is best suited, and at the same time help build up the underdeveloped areas of the world.

In this way too we would assist the British people to obtain badly needed food and other supplies and at the same time assure Canadian producers of badly needed markets, at least in the immediate future, for the vast surpluses which otherwise will accumulate and become a burden on our economy. Not only will they be a burden on our economy; inevitably they will lead to drastic curtailment of purchasing power on our farms and unemployment in our cities. A plan of the kind we suggest—and we are suggesting it for the consideration of the government and of this house—would not only be beneficial to the Canadian economy but would secure for us the good will of old and new territories containing millions of potential customers for Canadian commodities.

The proposal we are making does not involve the accumulation of frozen sterling balances which one day Britain or other countries in the sterling area would have to redeem in dollars. If that were so the proposal, as the Prime Minister has said, would be unacceptable to the British. Last fall at the food and agriculture conference their spokesman, Mr. Harold Wilson, stated, according to his official text, that—was a policy which he could not accept. What we are suggesting is that sterling accepted as part payment for Canadian exports should be used for investment purposes in the sterling area, or in payment of goods to be delivered as production increases in Britain.

—the accumulation of large and growing amounts of inconvertible currency on the assumption that they would one day be made convertible—

The point is often ignored in a discussion of this matter that every responsible economist whose opinions I have been able to read has underlined the importance of the flow of investment funds from North America to the sterling area and the territories controlled by the major sterling countries.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): Would my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. Coldwell: I would prefer to continue for the time being. Last September the Washington conference stressed the need for both public and private investments from the dollar area to the sterling area. Quite recently, at the meeting of the commonwealth foreign ministers in Ceylon, this phase of our commonwealth relationships I understand was again underlined. Indeed, in the very speech to which I have referred, that of Mr. Harold Wilson last September, the importance of international investment by North America, that is by Canada and the United States, was emphasized, in these words:

> . . . since it is one of the most hopeful and speediest means of increasing the flow of scarce currencies into the rest of the world.

Hence the suggestion we are making in respect to sterling balances being used for investment purposes is strictly in line with these suggestions. Moreover, early this month a Canadian Press dispatch from London quoted a British treasury official to the effect that Britain would be prepared to extend her purchases in Canada if we could consider accepting sterling in payment.

The development of such arrangements of course would require agreement between us; but we are trying to suggest some basis of discussion to enable us to maintain those external economic relationships upon which I firmly believe the welfare and prosperity of our own country depend.

Let me make this clear. This is not a plea for aid to Britain. That must be an incidental consideration to a Canadian primarily interested in the welfare of his own country. I believe, however, that if a solution along these lines could be worked out it would be a measure which would be helpful to the British people and would assure Canadian primary producers of badly needed markets. One of the points I think I should make is that we are not suggesting that the purchase of United States goods should be denied to Canadians. We suggest nothing of the kind. We do suggest that our balance of payments to the United States is, under present world conditions, a burden which is difficult for Canada to bear.

We suggest, too, that there are some Canadian expenditures for United States products and services which could be curtailed without causing much hardship to the Canadian public. Canada's prosperity in the future, as in the past, depends, in our opinion, upon our ability to trade as freely as we can with the rest of the world, and particularly with the sterling area including our best customer, the United Kingdom.

In so many respects our economy is competitive with that of the United States. In the same respects, it is complementary to that of the United Kingdom, and indeed of other countries in the sterling area. Apart altogether from sentiment, apart from the desirability of maintaining our commonwealth associations—and that is desirable—our material and economic interests lie in maintaining and expanding our economic relationships with the United Kingdom. To assure the maintenance, and indeed the expansion, of this vital economic relationship must be, I believe, a primary purpose of Canadian public policy.

I have therefore outlined at some length suggestions which we believe to be worthy of consideration and discussion. In conclusion, I should like to say this. Only by examining every possible channel can this country's producers, and the people dependent upon them, be protected from grave hardships, and of course that means practically all our people, because we are all dependent, more or less, on the prosperity of our primary producers.

How simple it would be if nations could exchange goods freely, and settle their balances in a universally accepted currency under an international economic plan. Of course, one realizes that that plan would involve the exchange of goods, which alone make any currency acceptable at any time. How simple it would be if we could pay our debts to the United States in pounds sterling. But since the United States demands dollars, and her own dollars, instead of goods or sterling from Canada, the United Kingdom, and indeed all countries, we must devise other ways and means of maintaining farm prosperity and full employment.

These are two problems that are really one problem and one which, obscured by the war and post-war demands, including Marshall aid, is again casting its shadow across this country from one ocean to the other. So, Mr. Speaker, I hope that during this session we shall give every attention to the wider international matters, both economic and political, that we shall try to solve the problems that face our own farmers and workers in the form of depressed prices and unemployment, and that we shall find policies that will assist this country to go forward, prosperous and free.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): May I now ask my question? After listening to my hon. friend, and on the eve of a general election in England, may I ask my hon. friend whether he would be in favour of something he has not mentioned as yet: that is, everything being equal in England and this country, would he suggest that the shares of the Canadian Pacific—

Mr. Ferguson: How about the crown jewels? They don't need them.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): Just let me finish. Would the hon. member be in favour of repatriating the shares of the Canadian Pacific?

Mr. Coldwell: I think the answer to that question can be found in a speech I made some years ago, and which appears in Hansard. I advocated bringing back all Canadian securities to Canada in payment of loans that were made some years ago. In the interim, however, I believe that many of the Canadian Pacific securities have found their way into the United States, and are not now available to us.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, before entering upon a discussion of His Excellency's speech, there are three pleasant tasks that I should like to perform. I wish first to offer my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Larson) and the seconder (Mr. Dumas) of the address, upon their tempered and very eloquent addresses. Second, it is my desire to congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) upon what I thought was a most skilful and creditable job in presiding over the recent dominion-provincial conference, which I had the privilege of attending as an onlooker. In my judgment, the success of that conference was, to a very great measure, due to the way in which the Prime Minister handled the chairmanship, and steered the provincial delegations along their course with finesse and quite obvious sincerity. Let us hope, then, that the work so well begun by that conference can be carried to an early and successful conclusion.

Third, may I tender my congratulations to the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Harris) upon his appointment to an important post in the government. Mr. Harris was a popular choice for the new Department of Immigration and Citizenship. If he gets the support that he should get from his cabinet colleagues, I feel quite confident that this long-neglected orphan department will receive the type of leadership it has deserved for many years. Immigration has long been kicked around, and has been left without anything that could remotely resemble a policy. The people of this country from coast to coast are now expecting something different, something in the way of an announcement of a definite design that will make it possible for the officials of that department to know what to do with the thousands of cases that have had to remain suspended for lack of specific direction from the government.

Now, Mr. Speaker, from a study of His Excellency's speech one receives the impression that the government thinks it has made quite elaborate provision for Canada's security. A close examination of the terms of the speech reveals that considerable emphasis has been placed on our external security, our relationship with the other countries of the world. But there are plain indications of serious neglect of many of those things which do constitute our internal security.

I cannot deal with all of them tonight in the limited time at my disposal, but I do intend to deal with three or four examples of that lack of consideration. In the course of the last session in the fall of 1949, there was such universal recognition of the need for federal aid to education, and indeed such widespread demand for it that the people of Canada felt justified in expecting that something would be done about it this year, that some provision would be made. In my estimation such a thing would be important enough to warrant mention in the speech from the throne. I can, however, find no reference whatever to it there; and I feel let down as I am sure a good many thousands of other Canadians will feel let down because they have found in the speech from the throne no reference to federal aid for education.

Nothing can contribute more to the internal security of our country than a broad understanding on the part of its citizens. If a democracy is to work properly and yield the results which the people want from the management of their affairs, there must be a high general level of educational achievement amongst the people. In a country as large as Canada, with such widely varying resources and productive possibilities, there are bound to be areas of much lower incomes than others. One can find almost every degree of prosperity amongst our provinces and municipalities. As a result, and also because we have got into the habit of raising the bulk of educational costs from taxes on real property, there is a wide divergence of educational opportunity for Canadian girls and boys. Enough facts and figures were put on Hansard in the 1949 fall session to convince anybody that this is so. For that reason I do not require at this time to repeat what was impressed upon us in that respect during the last session. As Canadians our aim should be equality of educational opportunities for all our people. Boys and girls who live in rural areas should not have less opportunity to develop, grow and mature than have their fellows in the cities and towns. The residents of those districts where production is usually low and incomes therefore small should not have lesser opportunities to become good and useful citizens because of lack of education and training. We must realize the need for some equalization of opportunities. We must also recognize the danger of continuing to take seventy per cent or more of the cost of education out of taxes imposed upon the farms and homes of the people.

We cannot possibly achieve equality of educational opportunity across Canada without definite and substantial federal aid. I could talk for some time about the teacher situation and the need for higher salaries to attract and hold the best teaching material. I could talk at length about the need for higher qualifications on the part of teachers and for better equipment in the schools; but of course the government would probably accuse me of advocating the spending of moneys from the federal treasury while at the same time seeking tax reductions. With the high cost of defence during these uncertain and fearful times, with fixed government costs running at the highest level in our whole history, I know that the government is going to find it exceedingly difficult to balance its budget. But I charge that the government has failed to do anything like what it is perfectly possible to do, or to use its imagination. Otherwise it would easily have seen that aids to education could have been provided this year without in any way impairing the financial or economic soundness of our country.

One of the most pressing educational needs of this day is for proper school plants and capital equipment. There are, unfortunately, still many hundreds of school districts and divisions in Canada that are forced to carry on with obsolete and rundown buildings and equipment utterly unfit to be used for the purpose of education. There was a time when school district debentures were considered to be a good investment and they were rated amongst trustee securities, but in a great many areas in Canada they are no longer considered to be trustee securities. Most of the school districts therefore must finance building and capital equipment out of current revenue. This situation puts a severe strain on the taxpayers as well as a short limit on the salaries that can be paid and the educational services that can be given. As a result, education languishes in many parts of our country. The sad part of it is that it does not need to languish. We have in Canada plenty of building materials and a sufficient amount of labour to do the building. If the federal government would give some help to the provinces to meet the terrific need for new buildings they would be rendering a real service to general education in this country.

I suggest there are several practical ways by which this aid can be advanced without having to dip into the treasury. The first one is this. In the late thirties an act called the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act was passed through this house. It provided for loans to municipalities and school divisions for self-liquidating projects, at a low rate of interest, namely two per cent, and covering up to twenty years in time. The loans were guaranteed successively by the municipalities, the provincial authorities and the federal government. To my knowledge and in my experience this act worked well until loans under it were suspended as the war situation became more intense. I suggest that the act be taken out of the mothballs, and that the federal government make some contribution to the welfare of education in the provinces by resuming the loans for self-liquidating projects under that act. Certainly school plants and improvements could be classed as self-liquidating projects to qualify for such loans.

Another way by which aid could be advanced is this. In certain provinces, notably Saskatchewan and Alberta, it would be possible for the federal government to give substantial aid to the cause of education by agreeing to release all or substantial portions of the school lands trust moneys for the purpose of setting up a capital loan fund from which school districts could borrow at low rates of interest in order to provide new school accommodations that are so urgently needed in those two provinces. The Alberta fund, which is administered under this government, now amounts to more than $12 million. It is invested in dominion securities, the income from which is supposed to be paid over to the province for educational purposes. Since the cost of education has grown to such large proportions, I can see no logical reason why the provinces and the dominion should not revise the school lands trust fund agreements so as to make available the substantial moneys as a revolving loan fund for capital purposes in the field of education. I urge the federal government to give sympathetic consideration to this proposal and even to go so far as to find out if the provincial governments that are concerned, notably Saskatchewan and Alberta, would be ready to revise those agreements.

There is a third way by which federal aid could be extended to education. Many school divisional and district boards, especially in rural areas, are making commendable efforts to provide better educational facilities through setting up centralized schools. It becomes necessary for them to buy vans and school busses to convey the pupils to those centralized schools. Such purchases are increasing in number year by year, but the federal government continues to impose sales and excise taxes on these vehicles; this action puts a heavy penalty on the educational facilities that are to be provided. Here then, I say, is a place where the government can do something for education; and I urge that at this session there be brought in an amendment to the various excise and taxation acts providing that the purchase of busses and vans by school boards be made tax free. Surely, Mr. Speaker, if we are not prepared to make grants in aid for education, we can at least get off the backs of the school districts; and here is a good chance to do it.

There is a fourth way of course. This one would involve some moneys out of the treasury. The best way to help the provinces to carry their educational burdens would be by grants-in-aid on a weighted basis to favour the poorer localities. Surely, a country as wealthy as ours should not find it too difficult to provide some money for this purpose. No argument to the contrary can possibly be valid as long as Canadians spend hundreds of millions of dollars on intoxicating liquors and other things with which we are trying to destroy ourselves.

The Social Credit Association of Canada declares that no financial consideration should be allowed to stand between any worthy Canadian boy or girl and the utmost in educational attainment he wants and is prepared to achieve and is capable of achieving.

Closely related to this whole business of federal aid to education is the problem of public relations. During the past two years this government has made a wretched failure of its part in the democratic process. I agree with what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) said this afternoon in this respect. The government has failed to keep the electors informed about the facts of the situations that have developed. Somehow or other the ministers of the crown have come to feel that there is no obligation on their part to keep the electors informed about the real facts of trade, agriculture, unemployment, and the many other things that do develop from time to time. These things affect the lives of the people most materially. A good many people now feel that the government has not only failed to keep them informed about things they are entitled to know but that various ministers at various times have actually misled them and tried to lull them into a sense of false security.

All during the general election of last June and during the fall session of 1949 government spokesmen contended that all was well with Canadian trade and agriculture. The fact is that we faced at these very times a serious trade crisis which kicked back on our farmers as well as on some of our manufacturing industries, so that they too now face a serious crisis. We only have to recall the press reports for the months of December and January last to know how Canadian farmers feel. In many of their forums and conventions they were actually advocating production strikes in protest against conditions imposed upon them as a result of this government's bungling and vacillating policies. Thousands of farmers feel that the government is now trying to crawl out from under their responsibilities. During the period from 1942 to 1948 the Liberal government imposed certain policies upon our farmers under which the latter had to accept much less for their products than they would have received if those policies had not been imposed upon them. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has said so himself. The farmers did not complain because they were given to understand that these policies were part of a long-range stabilization program. Now the farmers are beginning to realize that Liberal talk and promise were unadulterated anaesthesia. There is general restlessness amongst them because they cannot now see any possibility of realizing the stabilized prices the government promised them. It will certainly be a serious breach of faith if this government of Canada does not keep its promise to provide stabilization for agriculture.

I wish to repeat, there is restlessness amongst Canadian farmers and many of our smaller manufacturers. Why is it?

This government has complicated and further confused Canada's already serious trade and agricultural problems, and has put us in that position where the possibility of depression stares us in the face, by refusing to face up to realities and to take independent action based upon the facts of the situation. Let me repeat that—by their refusal to take independent action based upon the realities of the situation. How can this fail to affect our security? As an example, the government has steadfastly refused to accept non-convertible sterling in payment for those foods and other things which Britain did not have the dollars to buy. I quite agree with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) that right from the beginning we should have attempted to preserve our traditional markets in Britain and in Europe by accepting sterling for these balances for which the British and other markets in Europe could not find dollars.

Canada could have used blocked sterling to shop around the sterling area for goods we need and can use. This is not to say that we should neglect the full development of the United States market or, for that matter, any other possible market for Canadian goods. But the fact remains that we have lost a substantial part of our traditional British and European markets which we could very well have kept, and it is going to be most difficult to get it back.

Some critics of this proposal say that Britain is not willing to buy Canadian goods with non-convertible sterling. Recently food minister Strachey made it quite clear that he was ready to buy more Canadian and United States produce if we would buy more from the sterling area. In his recent interview with Reynolds News Mr. Strachey's statements indicate quite clearly that Britain would be glad to buy more Canadian foods and other things if we would accept the only form of currency they have got, namely, non-convertible sterling, which could be exchanged for goods at any time in the future.

The Minister of Agriculture and his colleagues have not given support to the proposal for an international commodity clearing house for disposing of surpluses which could not be sold for convertible currency in world markets. As a matter of fact the minister has discouraged it. Here is one international organization which really offers some good and effective results. But whereas, since the war ended, the Canadian government has blindly plunged into all other proposed international organizations, some of which have proved to be merely interesting pastimes, they now say through some of their ministers, notably the Minister of Agriculture, "This problem of marketing surpluses is one which can be best taken care of by each country by itself." If that is the case why have not they been doing it? The international federation of agricultural producers' committee, which met last autumn to consider the international commodity clearing house proposals, reported in October in these words:

> The problem of surpluses can be tackled by operations that bring together marginal supplies and marginal needs, and normal trade can continue unimpeded and even strengthened by such operations.

The committee then proposed the international commodity clearing house which provides a world pool of surpluses from which the countries of the world can make purchases using their own currencies. This is along the line of the international pool of such surpluses that we Social Crediters have been advocating for several years.

It is true that the food and agriculture organization committee, at its meeting held in Washington in November and December last, temporarily turned down the international commodity clearing house proposal. But it is noteworthy that the conference was guided to its decision by the financial advisers of the international monetary fund and the international bank for reconstruction who were present. These world financial organizations thus indicated their determination to prevent the distribution of commodity surpluses on a mutually satisfactory basis of exchange of goods for goods, or of goods for non-convertible currency, which amounts to the same thing. Evidently they insist on forcing all exchanges of goods to continue on a basis of convertible currency through financial channels which they themselves control. Everybody knows that the Bretton Woods proposal for a convertible currency pool of the world is a fool's dream of paradise under present circumstances, and will continue to be until such time as the great creditor nations like the United States and Canada are prepared to buy, in the markets of the world, goods in dollar volume equal to the goods they sell to the world. Of course Canada has become a comfort to their plans, the plans of these internationalists to control the exchanges of the world, by her failure to give support to the international commodity clearing house proposal.

I will say this, that until such time as some such idea as the ICCH—the international commodity clearing house—is adopted, Canada will find plenty of difficulty in disposing of unsalable surplus foods and other things which are now beginning to appear. It will be a sad reflection upon the intelligence of responsible officials of government if we ever begin the wholesale destruction of food products, or the restriction of their production, so long as there are on the earth people who need those things to keep them living in a state of health and happiness.

Dr. Kenneth Galbraith, professor of economics at Harvard university, and guest speaker at a recent conference of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture at Niagara Falls, stated he doubted if Canada and the United States will be able to expand, to any great degree, the flow of agricultural products abroad, because most European nations are striving hard toward self-sufficiency. Already they have made great strides in that direction.

Professor Galbraith declared that Canada and the United States must take a large share of the blame for that situation, and for two reasons: First, we priced ourselves out of the European market, and, secondly, we failed to provide the machinery by which Europe might be able to buy our products. Professor Galbraith further stated at Niagara Falls that, before we are justified in asking Europe to put an end to their policy of self-sufficiency, Canada and the United States must do a number of things among which are these. First, we must assure Europe of the means by which she will be able to buy our goods after Marshall aid ends in 1952. If convertible sterling is not available, then we will have to accept non-convertible sterling.

Then, secondly, we must remove and reduce certain tariff barriers. At the present time agriculture in Canada is taking the rap for what the secondary industries have done. Secondary industries have maintained excessively high prices which, in turn, increased farm costs. Our government must share the blame for the fact that these barriers have been allowed to exist and to continue. The government must know that the inevitable consequence would be that we would price our farm products completely out of the European markets.

The third point made by Professor Galbraith is that some program to expand the internal consumption of farm products must be adopted both here and in the United States. We contend—and I am speaking of the Social Credit Association of Canada—that the best program for bringing about this expansion would be one based upon the social credit compensated price-discount mechanism. This would be especially valuable and effective when applied to those surplus products where just a slight increase in per capita consumption would cause the surplus to disappear entirely. Let me give an example: If each Canadian were to consume just one more egg per week than he or she is now consuming, they would use up an additional 60 million dozen eggs this year, and the poultry producers would not have to worry about surplus eggs. But the Canadian people have to be able to buy those additional eggs if such a happy condition is to be made possible. Our proposal assures them the purchasing power.

The social credit compensated price-discount mechanism will do more to extend the internal consumption of farm products than any other mechanism now known, and it is worthy, I suggest, of the closest study in connection with the problem posed by Professor Galbraith.

The fourth suggestion made by Professor Galbraith, along with the three I have already mentioned, is this one, that for the present at least some form of two-price system will have to be adopted by which Europe can be allowed to buy our goods at a lower price than the existing internal price level, and this notwithstanding Geneva.

The implications are clear. We will have to adopt some system of seeing to it that our farmers have an internal price based upon parity with the cost of goods they have to buy; and secondly, we will have to see to it that exporters are compensated for any loss they may take by selling their goods or farm products, particularly in European markets, at a lower price than they can be sold internally.

I wonder if this government has independence and imagination enough to take the action required to meet the situation? The speech from the throne does say that the Agricultural Prices Support Act will be brought before the House of Commons for amendment, so that it can be continued. There is no indication, however, whether it is the intention of the government to make the act permanent; nor can we take much comfort from the declaration in His Excellency's address until we see what kind of bill it is going to be.

We fervently hope it will not be a mutilated shadow of a thing, another attempt at window-dressing. Canadian agriculture must be kept prosperous. If that is assured, then all other elements of Canadian life can be kept prosperous.

For a moment I should like to turn to the consideration of a fourth matter of great importance to Canada's future internal security. I have in mind the prospects for continuing high employment and prosperity. The speech from the throne says this:

> Employment and prosperity remain at a high level in Canada. The prospects are good for continued private investment in construction and capital development throughout the present year.

Then follow some statements about unemployment and unemployment insurance which not only cast some doubt on the optimism expressed in the part I quoted, but also serve to mislead the people. Actually, and just to review what has already been said for the purpose of what I wish to say in this connection, as of February 2 it is indicated that ten and four-tenths per cent of the total number of Canadian wage earners were out of work. The consequent strain upon the unemployment insurance fund is very heavy. I wish to emphasize however that the more serious aspect of the situation is the feeling of restlessness spreading among the people who cannot help remembering the sequence of events which led up to the hungry thirties.

They see in the present combined situation too close a parallel to feel anything but grave concern about the future. I remember well that in 1929 very optimistic declarations were being made about the future, exactly as they were made today by the Prime Minister (Mr.

St. Laurent). Let me say here a word about the Prime Minister's speech delivered this afternoon. First let me compliment him, especially upon that part of his speech in which he dealt with the state of the nation. I compliment him particularly for demonstrating that he can face facts—for he was doing it pretty well this afternoon. I think his forecast for 1950 was most reassuring, especially when he mentioned, as I believe he did, that the anticipated investment in new developments for 1950 was estimated at 22 per cent of the gross national production—a figure which is much higher than that of last year.

This is remarkable, and we fervently hope that it comes to pass exactly as anticipated. But let me point out that the investments he mentioned will be made only if there is confidence that the production resulting from them can be sold. I would point out to the Prime Minister that a very large part of the $16 billion of gross production is still financed through production loans obtained from the chartered banks by acceptable borrowers. Moreover, the proceeds of these loans filter through long chains of transactions, to become the purchasing power with which consumers must buy the food, clothing and shelter they require. If anything should interfere with this flow of consumer purchasing power as, for example, curtailment of production loans by the chartered banks, and perhaps calling in old demand loans for repayment, then very quickly the whole outlook as presented to us this afternoon by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) could be changed. Such a thing could happen again as happened in the years 1930 to 1933. During that period the chartered banks withdrew and cancelled out of existence $932 million of purchasing power in the manner I have indicated. We all know of the disastrous results in those years and the years following. That power still rests with the chartered banks, and I see nothing to prevent the shrinkage of substantial portions of consumer purchasing power if the banks should again begin to feel that their usual customer borrowers could not repay their loans within the usual short-loan term. Thousands more people now know that fact than ever did before. Therefore, as markets abroad are lost, as primary production prices begin to skid, and as even as little as 10·4 per cent of Canada's labour force begins to find itself unemployed, it is only natural that considerable restlessness would be evident amongst people who have experienced a few of the difficult periods of the past.

There is a way by which the government can reassure the people and thus keep up the confidence on which the prosperity of the future must be based. It will not help to tell the people of Canada that we will continue sending more goods abroad than we bring back in trade. The use of a foreign investment program to balance trade is no long-term solution. I disagree strongly with my hon. friend from Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) when he advocates that such a course be taken. It is a palliative for the immediate years ahead. It may be used successfully for a short time in an effort to give help to certain countries of Europe and southeastern Asia that require our help, but it is no long-term solution. We would be opposed to its introduction as a long-term solution. All we have to do is to look at the situation in the United States today to be frightened away from it. That is what the United States of America has been doing for a good many years, and that is why they find it impossible today, because of the flow of interest from these investments, to buy as much from the other countries of the world—and therefore balance their payments with the rest of the world—as they export in goods and services to them.

The use of a foreign investment program therefore does not offer any long-term solution, but what would be really effective would be a positive declaration by the government that they will revise the laws and practices governing financial policy so as to definitely assure the people that never again will they allow wanted goods and services to be destroyed or remain unproduced or unsold from lack of effective purchasing power in the hands of Canadian consumers. When that positive kind of assurance is given to the Canadian people, there will inspire them a confidence in the future that will make Canada the greatest and happiest country in the world.

I read with some interest just the other day an editorial on the front page of the Financial Post for February 18 under the caption, "Let's not be panicked by the gloomsters." I presume that was what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) was referring to this afternoon, and I commend him for the strong terms that he used. I will use some a little stronger. There was some pretty good sense in the editorial, but there was also some stupid nonsense such as this sentence, for example:

> The socialists and the little clutch of Social Crediters are, of course, intent upon destroying the economic system.

I cannot speak for the socialists—they will speak for themselves—but I can for the little clutch of Social Crediters, as these apologists and pundits of high finance call us. There is an old trick which the guilty have used since time began. When their nefarious practices are about to be exposed they resort to accusations against others to try to divert attention from themselves. I wonder who it is who is intent upon destroying the economic system? Who is it that has caused society to suffer through twenty-three depressions in the past 160 years?

Mr. MacInnis: The operators of the system.

Mr. Low: Surely they cannot blame the little clutch of Social Crediters for we have only been in existence as an organization for the past fifteen years. These same false accusers used to try to make people believe such foolish things as this, that the business cycles of boom and bust were somehow linked with the seven-year cycles of return of sun spots. I think a good many of you remember that was taught.

Mr. MacInnis: A good many still believe it.

Mr. Low: Yes, that is the unfortunate part of it. For many years these same people have carefully hidden the facts from the general run of the citizens of the country. We now know that depressions arise as the result of deliberate policies conceived and imposed upon governments by these same Shylocks who are the sole beneficiaries of the system, and who are after their pound of flesh, no matter how many people suffer in the process. Certain it is that the Financial Post, their subservients and associates, and their predecessors, have already destroyed the economic system by their insistence upon retaining as a part of it those stupid and unrealistic practices that ensure that every seven years we have to throw men out of work under a deliberate policy of unemployment, destroy huge quantities of our precious production, bring on a first-class depression, force countless thousands of our people to live in poverty in the midst of abundance; and finally bring on a war and start the whole cycle over again. I say, let them show their good faith by bringing forward some effective proposals to cure our economic ills. When they do they may have some room to talk.

What Social Crediters are trying to do is to remove the abuses of the so-called free enterprise system so that it can be given a chance to demonstrate its superiority over any other system in the world, and it can. Just get these old men-of-the-sea off its back, and one of them is the Financial Post. Social Credit thinks of full enjoyment. We do not lay the stress on full employment, but we do declare that not one single willing worker should be idle if he wants to work. We claim that as long as there is demand for them anywhere in the world, no goods possible of production should go unproduced. If we ever come to the point where overproduction really threatens, then cut down the hours of work and see to it that there is a fair distribution of the leisure time possible, without reducing the take-home pay of the workers. There never has been a sound proposal, except from Social Crediters, whereby these things can be accomplished in our Canadian economy.

We are not "gloomsters". No one has more faith than Social Crediters in the future of our great country, and in its ability to yield abundance and happiness to its people. No one works harder than we do to preserve the good things in our private enterprise economic system. There will be no question in our minds about a brilliant and secure future for Canada and the world if the government of this country will assert its independence of the control of the people who subscribe to some of the policies held dear by the Financial Post.

Kick them body and breeches out of the driver's seat; make a few fundamental changes in financial policy; take a sensible attitude towards trade and the other factors of internal security I have mentioned; let the government settle down to do what it was originally designed to do, that is, make its most important task the removal of all those barriers and artificial restrictions which prevent individual Canadians from achieving by their own efforts security for themselves and their families. Do these things and the private enterprise economic system will successfully weather the stresses and strains of the days and events that are to come.

I hope I have thrown out some suggestions, Mr. Speaker, and made some sort of positive contribution to this debate. If I have, and if those things are seriously considered, I certainly will not feel that my time has been wasted.

Mr. E. T. Applewhaite (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, it is a real pleasure for one representing my constituency to take part in this debate on the address, because to all intents and purposes the adoption of the address is a vote of confidence in this government. This is the first time I have participated in a debate of this nature, and I find it not only a pleasure but also a natural duty to support anything in the nature of a vote of confidence in this government. Having just returned from my constituency there is one thing of which I am very certain; that is, that this government has the confidence of the country.

I returned from the west prouder than ever of Canada and of Canada's government. I found that our leader, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has captured the respect, the esteem, the affection and the confidence of at least my part of British Columbia to an extent I think never before equalled by any other prime minister. I hope in some small way to contribute to a continuation of that confidence, but I remind the government that such a continuation will depend to a large extent on their continuing to deal with the many local problems of the Skeena district, as well as the problems of the country as a whole, in an intelligent, sympathetic and encouraging manner. As far as our local problems are concerned, I propose to assist the government in dealing with them in that way; and further, as best I may, to insist upon their being dealt with as I know they deserve to be.

Before proceeding further may I offer my humble congratulations to the mover and seconder of the resolution we are now debating. Their constituents will read with real pride the many favourable comments their speeches have evoked. While I may be laying myself open to the charge of painting the lily, I should like also to thank and commend the right hon. Prime Minister on the fair, full, frank and comprehensive review he gave us this afternoon and evening.

Now, Mr. Speaker, without apology or hesitation I propose to take advantage of the time-honoured custom of using this debate as an opportunity to tell this house a little about the district I am trying to represent. The Skeena district of British Columbia is an empire in itself. I am not going to compare its size with that of some provinces or countries, but if I were to do so the comparison might be surprising. Skeena extends over nine degrees of latitude, from 51 north to 60 north. At a rough estimate it covers about 164,000 square miles, and I believe is the second largest dominion electoral district. Incidentally, this would not be such a difficult district for its member to cover if he could go so far and say, "From here on there are no residents, so I need go no further". It just happens that there are settlements in the remotest corners of the district; Lower Post in the extreme northeast, Bennett on the White Pass and Yukon railway on the extreme northwest; Allison Harbour on the very southern tip, the Queen Charlotte islands on the west and Endako on the eastern border.

That is not only a very large district; it is one of increasing importance to the country. Ours is one of the finest mineral areas in Canada, still barely scratched yet, with a marvellous record of production to our credit. We have one of Canada's major fishing industries which has contributed greatly to the world's food supply for many years. Our timber resources are extensive; not only do we supply many parts of the world with lumber and poles, we are also the source of supply for at least two of Canada's major paper mills. Agriculture in Skeena is a small industry compared with some other parts of Canada, yet it is still an important factor in our economic life. We are now becoming the scene of industrial activity. Many hon. members know of the hydroelectric potentialities of the Skeena district which at this moment are of real interest to some of the world's leading industries.

It is lack of time, not of material, that causes me to end the list there. In my constituency is the famous little gold mining town of Atlin, and the lake and district of the same name. Early in 1898 Fritz Miller, a German, and Kenneth McLaren, a Canadian, left the Klondyke trail at Bennett and travelled on the ice across Taku Arm and Atlin lake. I am much more interested in the present and future—the immediate future—of this district than in its past, but there is always a certain amount of interest in the origin and discovery of new districts. The discovery of gold in the Atlin country by Miller and McLaren resulted in an influx of between five and ten thousand miners and tenderfeet; and from that day to this gold seeking and gold recovering in that district have never entirely ceased. Even today Transcontinental Resources and others are operating on a large scale. Atlin has a great deal of production ahead of it yet. Atlin is also a beauty spot; a district not unlike the Kootenays, with a series of lakes running north and south, it provides a spot of scenic beauty unexcelled anywhere in the world. Even the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) would admit that were he to visit Atlin.

This government is to be highly commended for the part it played, together with the provincial government, in building a road from the Alcan highway into Atlin last year. Atlin will become a mecca for the wise angler and big game hunter. I sincerely hope the time is very near when the government will see fit to reopen the customs port of entry for aeroplanes there. The lake is the largest and most beautiful in British Columbia. Given the publicity and the transportation it deserves, the Atlin area may well become the most important tourist and recreation centre in western Canada.

Among the many outstanding attractions of the Skeena district is its large number of lakes, large and small. The names of some of them may be familiar to some hon. members: Babine, Takla, Francois, Ootsa and literally hundreds of others. These lakes lie mainly due north from Tweedsmuir park, and centre on one of the grandest fishing and hunting districts imaginable, covering thousands of square miles. As might be expected of an extensive area still sufficiently virgin to provide so much game, the district numbers among its population many North American Indians.

That brings me to a subject which really justifies a full forty-minute speech in itself —in fact, I might make one. In the meantime, I should like to say a word about our Indian population. These people are people, Mr. Speaker, just as you and I. They are citizens of Canada. They are not only worthy of the interest and concern of this house, they are the responsibility of this house. It is a responsibility we must face up to. To what extent they are today inferior citizens, to that extent I am afraid we are largely to blame. Some betterments must, of course, take time; others can be speedily made. For instance, we have in many places native Indian villages which are headquarters for quite large bands. Some of these villages are remote and fairly expensive to reach. Nevertheless, I submit we should see that they are supplied with the same facilities with which we would supply white settlements of perhaps smaller population.

In this connection, the Post Office Department could be of tremendous help. Here, I should like to express my gratitude for and appreciation of the recently opened post office at Fort Babine, which will prove a real boon to many. But such other villages as Kitkatla and Kispiox and Kitimaat and so on, also justify such service. This is one very small way in which we can assist our Indian citizens to become a more integral part of Canada. I hope that the department and the house will continue to see that the advantages of better and improved services are given to the Indian villages.

I have a resolution from the northern district native brotherhood of British Columbia urging, among other things, the immediate consideration of the revision of the Indian Act. I note with pleasure, as they will, that this matter is to come before us at this session. I trust that it will come before us early, so we may give it ample study.

There is only one incorporated city in my whole district and that is the city of Prince Rupert. Built as the terminus, not a terminus but the terminus of the Grand Trunk Pacific, Prince Rupert, through a combination of circumstances entirely beyond local control, has lived through thirty years of depression, disappointment and frustration, to emerge in the recent war as one of British Columbia's most important cities. Originally visioned as a port for transpacific shipping, Prince Rupert now finds itself achieving its destiny along other lines. It has always had a large fishing industry. It is the halibut capital of the world. More halibut is landed at Prince Rupert than anywhere else on the globe. I hope that fishing will always continue to be a major factor in Prince Rupert's economy. Fishing deserves, as it is getting under the present Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew), the attention and consideration which is due a major industry. My hon. friends from Newfoundland will agree with that.

Two large organizations, I regret to admit that neither of them was originally Canadian, have now realized and acted upon the strategic value of Prince Rupert's location. First, the United States government in the recent war chose Prince Rupert as one of its chief Pacific ports. That activity, of course, is over now. Second, the Celanese Corporation of America, through its Canadian subsidiary, Columbia Cellulose Limited, saw the true picture of a combination of Prince Rupert's location and the resources of the district. They have under construction an immense pulp plant which will provide payrolls and industrial activity in perpetuity.

Prince Rupert, by geography, is the logical supply port for Alaska. I sincerely trust that this government will continue to work along all possible lines to ease all restrictions on international trade, and thus encourage our American friends to do likewise. In this way, Prince Rupert and other Canadian ports may take their logical place in the Alaskan trade. Nothing can stop Prince Rupert's forward march, but governmental help can easily speed it up.

There is just one other section of my district which I wish to mention specifically, the Portland canal-Alice Arm district. This is one of the best known mineral producing areas in British Columbia. The old Granby Consolidated copper mine at Anyox produced a gross value of close to $96 million. The famous Premier mine at Premier near Stewart, British Columbia, has to date a gross production value of $75 million. At Alice Arm, Torbit Silver Mines are today in regular production of silver which, incidentally, is all going to the photographic industry in the United States, thus materially helping our dollar situation. The little mining town of Stewart, a most picturesque spot, situated at the head of the Portland canal right on the Alaskan border, is the centre of a mineralized area whose potentialities I predict will still not be fully known one hundred years from now.

I was up there the other day, and I saw some of the electrum they are now shipping from that place. I saw some ore recently shipped from Tide lake, which is about 25 miles from Stewart, from a property owned by one A. L. Phillips. This was a small shipment and it assayed 1,896 ounces of gold and 2,386 ounces of silver per ton. A small shipment which weighed 40 pounds netted after smelter costs $1,306. Mr. Speaker, I am not claiming that these values are usual but they do indicate that the mineral is there. At Tide lake this winter, ore is being mined which is so valuable they can afford to fly it from Tide lake to Stewart by chartered planes equipped with skis.

When the real Alaska highway is built up the western route from Hazelton to Whitehorse and that district has land connections with the rest of Canada, there will be more wealth produced from "them thar hills" than has as yet been dreamed of. When that happens, Stewart will take its logical place as another important north Pacific port.

I should like to turn my attention for a few moments, Mr. Speaker, from the physical aspects of the district to the reactions which we may expect from the people I represent to the speech from the throne. The people of Skeena, and I think I am capable of speaking for them, will welcome and receive a lot of comfort from this speech from the throne. My people happen to take quite an interest and a deep concern in matters of more than purely local interest. We are naturally interested in the outcome of the dominion-provincial conference because we realize that the final solution of many problems which are worrying us today must depend first upon some working formula between dominion and provincial governments. The people of Skeena riding, therefore, will welcome those words in the speech from the throne:

> This conference marked a promising beginning in working out a satisfactory procedure—

And again:

> Agreement was reached on certain general principles and a continuing committee was established to further the work of the conference.

I do not think it would be letting any secrets out to say that we rather feared for the future of the conference. We are now extremely happy to know that it is working, and working as well as might be expected.

It would not be the truth, Mr. Speaker, if I were to claim that the people of my district are happy about the international situation with regard to the security angle. It is not surprising that the district which borders upon Alaska and the north Pacific ocean, and upon what is advertised in so many sensational and not so sensational magazine articles as the highroad between Russia and the United States, should be somewhat worried. They will therefore welcome the evidence in the speech from the throne that this government is conversant with the necessity of doing two things at once, of taking every possible step to prevent threats of aggression and yet at the same time taking the necessary steps to do what we can to avert that aggression should it take place.

I wish to read from the speech from the throne certain words which will be of great comfort to the people of my district:

> . . . our country continues to give full support to the charter of the United Nations.

Again:

> The cold war nevertheless still continues and imposes on all the free nations heavy burdens for the provision of defence forces and modern armaments. Preparedness to meet any sudden onslaught is essential and the means must be provided.

And again:

> In the development of Canada's defence forces, constant attention is being given to the best use of our resources, to the encouragement of joint research and experimental development and to the co-ordination of Canadian efforts with those of the other signatories of the North Atlantic treaty.

It would be surprising, Mr. Speaker, if the people of a riding situated where mine is did not get comfort from such a clear statement and such clear proof that this government realizes the situation.

There is another aspect of the speech which will also bring comfort—admittedly it may be delayed—to the people of my district. Representing a riding which produces almost entirely primary products and which will pin its hopes for the future to quite a large extent on building up international trade and providing the seaports for such trade, these words will be of comfort:

> My ministers will continue their effort to secure reductions in trade barriers. To this end preparations are actively under way for further multilateral trade negotiations later in the present year.

If the people of Skeena riding had been given the opportunity to write one sentence and put it in the speech from the throne, I think that is, to all intents and purposes, the sentence they would have written. But all cannot be perfect. I regret, as I think they will regret, an omission from the speech from the throne. In spite of suggestions which have reached us from various quarters in this house that one who occupies an obscure position on the back benches of this side of the house dare not raise his voice in criticism at any time, I still propose to express my regret that the speech from the throne does not contain some definite statement of intention with regard to a coastguard service. I speak, of course, particularly for the Pacific coast. I realize that a subcommittee of the Canadian maritime commission on search and rescue has been doing some work upon this matter, and I dare say further action will depend upon their submitting a report. But, Mr. Speaker, it is impossible to overemphasize the importance of providing on the Pacific coast—I cannot speak for the other one—an adequate coastguard service. I use the word "coastguard" for want of a better one, because I think the service provided by the United States coastguard is just about what our people want. I am not going to try to tell this government or the officers of the department exactly what that service should consist of. That is a job for the specialists and the experts. But as this move started, so far as I am aware, about seven years ago in Prince Rupert, and as it has certainly received the backing of practically every major organization within my riding within two hundred miles of the coast I feel that I must—and I gladly do it—add my word of support to it.

Proceeding logically from the question of a coastguard service, next comes the question of radio as it affects ships and ship-to-shore communication. I notice that the speech from the throne tells us that the Canada Shipping Act is to be reopened in conjunction with the international convention for the safety of life at sea. I am no expert in reading international conventions; and while I have spent hours with the international convention for the safety of life at sea, I still have some doubts as to what it covers in certain districts and as to certain tonnages. I therefore want to make this suggestion most strongly to the government in conjunction with but not dependent upon a coastguard service. That is, that the Canada Shipping Act or other appropriate legislation should provide that every ship of, shall we say, fifty tons or more, and every ship chartered for the carrying of passengers, should carry at least one full-time radio operator who shall have no other duties but the maintenance of radio equipment and the keeping of radio watches.

The answer which is likely to be made is this: "On your coast practically every ship of any size carries a radio operator who is also perhaps assistant purser or freight clerk or something of that sort; but what does that matter, because if the ship gets into difficulties he can easily go up to his little shack and send out his message?" But that is only half the situation, Mr. Speaker. That makes it fine for that ship itself if it strikes a rock, but it makes that ship absolutely useless to give any help to another vessel twenty-five or thirty-five miles away, and out of sight, if the first ship has not a radio operator keeping watch. What is the use of a radio operator on the ship which is being wrecked dashing up to his cabin and sending off SOS's if no other radio operator is going to be in his shack until he too has an SOS or a message to send? I grant that is a reductio ad absurdum but it is not so ad absurdum as it sounds because that is how the thing will work out in practice.

I do not want to waste words by repeating myself, but I urge that, when the Canada Shipping Act is being opened this year, we make absolutely certain that no vessel of, say, fifty tons or more and no vessel carrying passengers for hire be allowed to sail without a full-time radio operator—and I mean "full-time", not having other duties as well.

The speech from the throne announced a long-desired decision in the matter of veterans' affairs. At last the imperial is to receive the war veterans' allowance. The only criticism one can possibly make of that proposal is that we should like to have seen it sooner. At the same time, we cannot expect to have everything at once; neither can we expect to have everything as soon as we ask for it. I wish to commend the department and the minister most strongly for their decision at last to bring the war veterans' allowance to the imperial. This means that the War Veterans Allowance Act is going to be reopened; and I do not doubt that every minister in this government knows that the minute you open an act for one purpose, you are going to have some other requests. Hence they will not be surprised if we mention another matter in connection with the war veterans' allowance. Let me make this matter clear, Mr. Speaker. I know, and this country knows, that this government has given the veteran in Canada generous and more than generous treatment. Of that there can be no criticism. All one has to do is to compare it with any other country in the world. Unfortunately it aways happens that some injustices may creep in, and some unforeseen difficulties may arise. As I understand, the veterans' allowance act—in fact I know what I am talking about because I was for fourteen years secretary of a Legion branch—was brought in primarily on the basis that a veteran who had served in a theatre of war during world war I was prematurely aged, and therefore the war veterans' allowance was given to him at age 65, whereas he would have to wait until age 70 to get the old age pension. Assuming that that is so—and it is so—we find a most unfortunate situation. We find that in certain generous provinces, such as British Columbia, the old age pensioner finds that he can draw, assuming he is single, $50 a month. I grant you that that does not all come from the dominion, whereas the war veterans' allowance does. I know that when that situation was brought to the attention of the departmental officials a year or so ago a subsidiary allowance arrangement was brought in, and that it is the intention of the department to give that special allowance an opportunity to see how it works.

I want to express my personal thanks for the courtesy and consideration which the minister and the rest of his department have given to me on every occasion on which I have approached them on this subject. But I do wish to suggest that it would be the wish of the country that those old men who draw the war veterans' allowance should not draw less than the old man who draws the civilian old age pension.

The people of the Skeena district, Mr. Speaker, on whose behalf I have been speaking, do not suspect this government of being perfect. They realize that this government is composed of human beings, and that as long as human beings are human, and as long as this world is going to be an interesting place in which to live, human beings are not going to be perfect. And so they, and their representative, realize that at times there may be some reason for criticism or some places where something might have been a little better. But I want to tell you that the people of my district would sooner put their confidence in the sponsors of this speech from the throne, who mean what they say, than they would in the apostles of gloom and despair who presumably also mean what they say, and incidentally who in the past six months—and it has been my pleasure to be opposite them—seem to have spent a very great part of their time, effort and energy in twitting the Prime Minister upon the size of his majority and in advising the Prime Minister what to do with his majority, and in advising the majority what to do with their Prime Minister. That may not be hard to understand, Mr. Speaker. It is possible that the leaders of the opposition and some of their followers may have quite a feeling of responsibility for the size of this majority, because they helped to put it here.

I want to conclude on the note on which I started these rambling remarks. In company, I think, with every hon. member in this house, no matter where he sits, I would like to offer my personal assistance and co-operation to the government and to each member thereof in so far as local problems of our district are concerned. I will even go further than that. I will promise not to support or endorse any expenditure or undertaking which I am not fully satisfied is in the best interests of the country. Quite apart from where we sit, we know that local ambition and local pride will cause many communities to ask for government expenditures which we cannot really state are justified in the public interest. I do not think any of us want to endorse that. I do not think any of us would want to support harebrained legislation. On the other hand, I would respectfully submit to the government that we who are the elected representatives from the different districts and who have, or who should have, or else we do not belong here, an intimate personal knowledge of the problems of our districts, should have our representations and our views, irrespective of whether they are from the opposition or from the government side, given consideration. Our local knowledge should be given consideration.

I should like to say to the government that as long as they will continue to operate along these lines and to conduct the affairs of this country as they have been doing, with the willingness to serve, with the courage and with the faith in Canada's future that they have, they and we will continue to enjoy the confidence of the country.

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, as it is approaching eleven o'clock I would suggest that you call it eleven o'clock and I would move that the debate be adjourned.

On motion of Mr. White (Middlesex East) the debate was adjourned.

Mr. St. Laurent: I move that the house do now adjourn.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. St. Laurent: Tomorrow we will continue with this debate.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.50 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, February 21, 1950

The house met at three o'clock.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REDUCTION IN PASSENGER TRAIN SERVICES—COAL SUPPLY—CORRESPONDENCE

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in my statement to the house on Friday last, February 17, concerning the reduction in passenger train service on the Canadian National Railways, I made reference to a memorandum which had been given to me by Mr. Donald Gordon, president and chairman of the Canadian National Railways, as well as a letter of explanation given to me by Mr. Vaughan, the former president of the railway. In view of the comment that has appeared in a certain portion of the press I think I should read these documents to the house.

The memorandum prepared by Mr. Gordon reads as follows:

The significant events surrounding the development of a shortage of coal which forced the emergency reductions in passenger train service in the Canadian National Railway system are as follows:

1. The program for coal stocks approved by the board of directors at its meeting in October 1948 contemplated an objective of 2,365,000 tons as of December 31, 1949, about four and one-half months' supply. In actual fact, the stock position at December 31, 1949, was only 1,043,000 tons, which, taken in conjunction with a serious interruption of supplies arising out of labour disputes in United States mines, meant a condition of emergency with only twenty-four to twenty-six days' stockpile in the heavy traffic region.

2. If the stockpile objective as approved by the board of directors had been attained, a reduction in train service would not have been necessary unless there had been a complete interruption of supplies covering, say, a three or four months' period.

3. On June 9, 1949, Mr. R. C. Vaughan, as president, took responsibility for directing the purchasing department that the coal stockpile objective should not exceed approximately three months' supply, in the belief that, under normal conditions, such a supply would be ample.

Mr. Vaughan's judgment in making this amendment in the coal stockpile objective was based upon:

(a) a desire to reduce the financial cost of maintaining a large inventory, which already stood at $72 million, and to avoid the possibility of having to make further borrowings for working capital purposes;

(b) a belief that serious labour disputes in the United States mines would be avoided and that coal supplies were likely to be ample with prices likely to soften;

(c) the desirability of reducing expenditures in United States dollars as requested by government;

(d) the fact that traffic was showing a declining trend.

4. In the event, as is well known, there have been a series of work interruptions in U.S. mines as follows:

June 13, 1949: five-day work stoppage.

June 25, 1949: two weeks' vacation period.

July 11, 1949: three-day-a-week work program.

September 19, 1949: strike, fifty-one days.

December 1, 1949: walkout. Modified by resumption of a three-day-a-week program December 5.

January 3, 1950: wildcat strikes throughout United States coal fields.

As well, unprecedented bad weather conditions resulting in floods and slides in the open pit mines seriously reduced production.

5. While orders for the purchasing of United States coal had been held to a minimum in accordance with government policy for the conservation of United States dollar expenditures, the actual orders placed for Canadian and United States coal jointly would have been sufficient to meet requirements if regular deliveries had been maintained from the United States mines. However, as a consequence of these work interruptions current shipments on orders to meet consumption could not be maintained, and the C.N.R. stockpile, which by December 28, 1949, had fallen to only 1,043,000 tons spread over the entire system, was not sufficient to take the risk of an extended interruption of coal deliveries.

6. The reduction in passenger train service put into effect totalled 89,000 miles, as follows:

Atlantic region	13,700
Central region	45,800
Western region	26,300
U.S. lines	3,200

—bringing about an estimated reduction in coal consumption of 1,010 tons per day. The number of train service employees affected by this reduction is estimated at 500.

7. In summary it seems clear that the work interruptions in the U.S. mines form the basic reason as to why the Canadian National Railways were unable to maintain coal supplies. Canadian coal is used on all Canadian regions, but the supply of usable Canadian coal available to the C.N.R. falls far short of meeting the over-all needs of the system, particularly in the central region. The development of the labour disputes in the U.S. mines and the interruption of coal deliveries found the C.N.R. in an inadequate stockpile position, and action had to be taken to conserve system stockpiles and use them to the best advantage so as to reduce public inconvenience to a minimum. While the stockpile at the end of the year still showed about fifty days' supply over the whole system, it was, of course, not spread evenly, and a critical area of shortage had developed in the heavy traffic central region; consequently, in order to prevent more drastic reduction in passenger service later on, Mr. R. C. Vaughan and the operating and the purchasing officers of the railway deemed it necessary as a precautionary measure to put the temporary twenty-five per cent passenger train reduction into effect, and it was considered only fair that all sections of Canada should be treated in the same way so far as that reduction was concerned.

That is the end of the memorandum prepared by Mr. Gordon.

Mr. Isnor: What was the date of the memorandum?

Mr. Chevrier: February 6. Now I shall read the letter from Mr. Vaughan to myself dated February 13, 1950:

Dear Mr. Chevrier:

On the eve of the opening of parliament I thought I would drop you a line to indicate the basic reasons which brought about the twenty-five per cent curtailment of passenger services on the Canadian National Railways as announced on December 28, 1949, just before the expiry of my term as chairman and president of the Canadian National Railways.

I have no doubt that the coal problem on the Canadian National has given you considerable concern, and I am only too glad to take this opportunity of bringing to your attention that early in the month of June, 1949, instructions were given by me to the vice-president of purchases and stores to keep the coal stocks of the Canadian National Railways at approximately a three months' supply. That reserve I considered ample to meet any emergency such as work stoppages in the mines in the U.S. Over a period of thirty years three months' stock has been sufficient, and as a large part of the coal we use in Ontario comes from the U.S., we wanted to do our part in assisting to save the expenditure of United States dollars.

There is no need for me to bring to your attention the fact that there were many work stoppages, strikes, and diminishing hours of work in the coal industry in the U.S. during 1949. At no time in the history of this industry has such a situation occurred as prevailed during this last year. I would like to state that the one and only reason for the present coal situation as it affects the Canadian National was the inability to get delivery of the coal it contracted for early in the season of 1949 due to strikes and work stoppages in the mines in the United States in 1949.

It was unfortunate that stories carried the suggestion that the management of the Canadian National was reducing passenger train services in order to bring about financial economies. I have noted the strong denials of Mr. Donald Gordon and yourself in the press on this matter, and I wish to add that this was furthermost from my mind when the management decided to curtail passenger services. All we were interested in was to conserve our fast dwindling coal stocks, and to prevent, if possible, a subsequent greater reduction in train service.

I regret that you were not advised, until after the notice was issued, of the reduction in train service. This was something that had to be dealt with quickly. We operate a substantial mileage in the United States. We knew that the situation there was desperate and that drastic action was to be taken by the interstate commerce commission of the U.S. to reduce train service. We were still getting a substantial tonnage of coal from the U.S., but not in anything like sufficient quantity to replenish our diminishing coalpiles, and we were fearful that if we did not take some action our coal deliveries would be interfered with because the U.S. railways had so much less coal on hand than we had. As you know the reduction in train service put into effect in the U.S. had greatly exceeded the cut made by us in Canada. We, of course, have had to follow the U.S. railroads on the lines we operate in the U.S., because that was brought about by an order of the interstate commerce commission. We were daily expecting, as were all the U.S. railroads, that the miners in the U.S. would be ordered back to work.

Sincerely yours,

R. C. Vaughan

Those documents speak for themselves, and I have nothing to add.

While I am on my feet, perhaps I might deal with two of the matters which came up at that time. The senior member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor) asked a question as to the proportion of United States and Canadian coal contained in the amount of 2,365,000 tons. The Canadian National Railway inform me that they have not that information, because it cannot be broken down in a satisfactory manner. I believe the information I have here, however, will satisfy my hon. friend, and will answer the question of the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon).

The only information which the Canadian National has is as to the receipt of Canadian and United States bituminous coal. I have a break-down of those figures for five years. It is quite lengthy, but perhaps the house will allow me to give it for a year or two and table the remainder. If the house wishes, I can give the whole table.

In 1949 the total amount of the receipts of Canadian and United States bituminous coal was 5,100,000 tons. Of that, 2,000,000 tons was Canadian coal; 2,600,000 tons was United States coal for Canadian lines; and 500,000 tons was United States coal for United States lines. In 1948 the total was 7,500,109 tons. Of that total, 2,123,641 tons was Canadian coal; 4,584,594 tons was from United States mines for Canadian lines, and 791,874 tons was from United States mines for United States lines.

I could continue with the table, but I think that is sufficient.

Mr. Coldwell: Will the minister put the rest of the figures on Hansard? The minister said he was going to table them.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes; the remainder of the table deals with the years from 1945 to 1947, and if the house will allow I shall put it on Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Will the house permit the minister to put on Hansard the table to which he has referred?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Chevrier: The table is as follows:

	Canadian coal	U.S. for Can. lines	U.S. for U.S. lines	Total
1949 (est.) ..	2,000,000	2,600,000	500,000	5,100,000
1948	2,123,641	4,584,594	791,874	7,500,109
1947	1,733,255	5,197,702	994,532	7,925,489
1946	2,270,548	3,909,514	896,490	7,076,552
1945	2,116,780	4,010,193	891,184	7,018,157

Mr. Graydon: We are getting more from the United States than from our own mines?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. In the war years a large proportion of the coal for Canadian National Railways use came from the United States mines. It went as far east as Moncton, and as far west as Winnipeg.

Mr. Graydon: Has it never occurred to the government that a Canadian-owned institution such as the Canadian National Railways could surely adopt some policy to utilize coal from Canadian mines, which would give employment to Canadian workers?

Mr. Chevrier: It is and always has been the policy of the government to utilize Canadian coal to the fullest extent.

Mr. Graydon: It has not worked out, though.

Mr. Chevrier: I said during the war years it was impossible to get Canadian coal, and the house knows it; because even in certain parts of the maritime provinces it was necessary to haul United States coal. At the moment, and last year and the year before, the Canadian National Railways are purchasing as much coal as they can get from mines at both extremities of Canada.

Mr. Graydon: Is the minister sure about that?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Graydon: That is not my information.

Mr. Carroll: I wish to ask one question of the Minister of Transport. Is he aware of the fact that in June and July of 1949 the railway attempted to cancel, and did cancel, a contract for 65,000 tons of coal—that is, a contract with them by the coal mining industry of the province of Nova Scotia; and the result was that it was necessary for the coal industry of that province to get the intervention of the Minister of Transport to have the contract renewed and fulfilled?

Mr. Graydon: That is letting the cat out of the bag.

Mr. Fraser: A fool policy instead of a fuel policy.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

AMENDMENT OF CHAPTER 54, STATUTES OF 1947-48—ENFORCEMENT REGULATIONS

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 6, to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act (enforcement).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Gillis: This bill, Mr. Speaker, has for its purpose the amending of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. It aims at replacing the present sections 43, 44, 45 and 46 of the act by section 43 as indicated in this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CONSOLIDATION AND REVISION OF EXISTING LEGISLATION—ORGANIZATION FOR DEFENCE—CODE OF SERVICE DISCIPLINE, ETC.

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (for the Minister of National Defence) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to revise and consolidate in one act the several acts respecting the Department of National Defence and the armed services of Canada, with provision inter alia for the payment of pay and allowances of officers and men of the forces, the salaries and expenses of members of the defence research board, fees and allowances of the members of the court martial appeal board, the compensation for loss or damage due to the exercise of emergency powers, advances to meet expenses and costs of calling out forces in aid of civil power, the acquisition and disposition of property and generally the costs of and incidental to the operation of the act, and all other matters directly concerning defence.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

APPOINTMENT OF DEPUTY CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES OF THE WHOLE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That Louis Rene Beaudoin, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Vaudreuil-Soulanges, Quebec, be appointed deputy chairman of committees of the whole house, notwithstanding the provisions of standing order 56.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That this house resolve itself at its next sitting into a committee to consider of a supply to be granted to His Majesty, notwithstanding the provisions of standing order 57.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) I do not desire to repeat the arguments which were so eloquently and forcefully presented by him on the first day of the session; but it must have been impressed upon the minds of hon. members generally that, as was indicated by the leader of the opposition on that occasion, a custom had grown up which should not be allowed to become a precedent in this house, though it is rapidly moving in that direction. What the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) is attempting to do in this resolution, of course, is simply to change the order which has been the custom in peacetime sessions of parliament for many decades.

I think you will recall, sir, the words of the leader of the opposition when he pleaded with the Prime Minister not to make this move, and quoted the words of none other than the former prime minister, Mr. W. L. Mackenzie King. While it is not possible for those on this side of the house to endorse everything that the former prime minister said, there is no reason why we should not pick out some of the good things; and we are doing so on this occasion.

I should like to say to the Prime Minister and to the government that the opposition does not feel that it can concur in the suggestion contained in this resolution. We think we are departing from a custom and a practice, and also from the rules. For that reason we must insist upon the debate on the speech from the throne being concluded and the issue brought to a vote before dealing with matters that normally should be dealt with only after the debate has ended. I ask the Prime Minister if in view of the circumstances he will not withdraw his motion.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. St. Laurent) which was agreed to on the following division:

WAYS AND MEANS

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That this house do at its next sitting resolve itself into a committee to consider of the ways and means for raising the supply to be granted to His Majesty, notwithstanding the provisions of standing order 57.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, the observations I made in connection with the preceding motion would apply to this one.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Graydon: On division.

Mr. Coldwell: On division.

Motion agreed to on division.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

SUPPLEMENTARY BENEFITS DURING WINTER SEASON—VARIOUS AMENDMENTS

Hon. Paul Martin (for the Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend The Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940, to provide for supplementary benefits during the winter season in any year and government financial contribution in consequence thereof, for additional insurance coverage, for readjustment and simplification of rates of contribution, and for consequential amendments; to provide also for an increase in the membership of the unemployment insurance advisory committee from six to eight members; and to provide further that the members of the national employment committee shall receive the same remuneration as the members of the unemployment insurance advisory committee.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSING

QUESTION AS TO SUBSIDIZED PROJECTS UNDER NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Resources and Development. Has the government reached agreement with any of the provinces for the construction of subsidized housing projects under section 35 of the National Housing Act which was passed at the session of last fall? If not, can the minister say whether negotiations in connection with such projects are under way?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question. Several provinces have indicated their intention of bringing in complementary legislation during the sessions this year of their legislatures. In the absence of authority, agreements cannot be entered into with the provinces for projects, but discussions have been and are taking place.

WHEAT

FINAL PAYMENT ON SALES BETWEEN 1945 AND 1949—INTERIM PAYMENT ON OATS AND BARLEY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce, or his parliamentary assistant, arising out of a number of resolutions passed by farm organizations. In view of the financial needs of farmers generally, particularly those in the drought area of Saskatchewan, has the wheat board given consideration to making a final payment in connection with the sales of wheat made between 1945 and 1949 so that farmers may be provided with the necessary resources for carrying on their spring work.

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): I had intended to ask a similar question, but I would carry it a bit further. Has the government given consideration to making interim payments on the oats and barley marketed by the board this year?

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): I would prefer to treat the two questions as notices and bring forward the answers in a day or two.

AIR TRANSPORT

QUESTION AS TO PROPOSAL FOR CONSTRUCTION BY U.S. OF AIRPORT IN CANADIAN TERRITORY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I have a question of some urgency and of great importance. If the answer cannot be given today I hope that it will be given tomorrow. I refer to a proposed aerodrome which Detroit, Michigan, or the United States government, is planning to build in Canadian territory in the vicinity of Windsor. I should like to ask if this proposal has actually been discussed by the United States and Canadian authorities. Will it mean the granting of extraterritorial rights in Canada to the United States? Who will build the aerodrome, and who will own it if it is built?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I may say that the proposal has not been discussed, but it is the intention to discuss it at a future date. In reply to the question whether extraterritorial rights will be granted to the United States, I think my hon. friend well knows that the answer is no. I have forgotten the third question.

Mr. Pouliot: Who intends to build the aerodrome? Who will own it if it is built, and who will operate it?

Mr. Chevrier: If the project comes to fruition in Canadian territory, the airport will certainly be operated by the Department of Transport. As I say, there have been no discussions but I am informed that it is the intention to have some. Until those discussions have taken place it is impossible to give more definite information.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

EMPLOYEES OF HOSPITALS AND CHARITABLE INSTITUTIONS—PUBLIC HEARINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) I should like to ask his parliamentary assistant if the public hearings that were called by the unemployment insurance commission to discuss the bringing of employees of hospitals and charitable institutions under the Unemployment Insurance Act have been cancelled, and, if so, for what reason. The meeting was called for February 24.

Mr. Paul E. Cote (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): This proposed meeting has not been cancelled. I believe that the date has been delayed somewhat in order to meet the convenience of a number of delegates.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

CHARLOTTETOWN—QUESTION AS TO CALLING FOR TENDERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Have tenders been called for the erection of the dominion public building at Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island? If not, when will they be called? Perhaps the minister would prefer to make a statement with reference to this matter, and if so he can take this question as notice.

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): To the best of my knowledge, tenders have not been called, but they will be called as soon as the plans and specifications are ready, which I hope will be soon.

POST OFFICE

RURAL MAIL COURIERS—INQUIRY AS TO COMMITTEE ON POST OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT BILL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): I should like to ask the Postmaster General if when the bill with respect to the Post Office Act, envisaged in the speech from the throne, is introduced, it will be sent to a committee to consider the problems of the rural mail couriers.

Hon. Edouard Rinfret (Postmaster General): We have not discussed the matter yet. I shall take it under advisement.

Mr. Graydon: The Postmaster General can take this as notice that we should like to have that done.

TARIFFS AND TRADE

MEASURES ARISING OUT OF GENEVA AND ANNECY CONFERENCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance if it is the intention to bring before parliament at this session any measure arising out of the conferences at Geneva and Annecy?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): No decision has yet been taken as to whether any such measures will be brought before parliament. One factor in arriving at such a decision will be the action which may be taken by the congress of the United States.

RAILWAYS

ADDRESS OF MINISTER OF TRANSPORT IN TORONTO, FEBRUARY 20

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can he say whether in the speech which he is reported to have delivered yesterday in Toronto on railway matters he was enunciating government policy, and is he prepared to table a copy of that speech in full so that hon. members may have it?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): The speech which I delivered yesterday in Toronto dealt with a general consideration of railroad matters. It dealt with the position of the railroads today; it dealt with the arguments of the railroads; it dealt with the argument of the provinces, and it dealt with the argument of the consumers. It was a factual statement of the position as it stands today.

Mr. Knowles: That is not the way it was reported.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Monday, February 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. F. H. Larson for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, with the galaxy of speakers that we had yesterday I wonder if I am going to be able to follow adequately in their footsteps. Like other speakers I wish first of all to convey my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Larson) and the seconder (Mr. Dumas) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne and compliment them upon the presentations they have made of the problems affecting their particular constituencies as well as of the broader picture of the Canadian position today.

When the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Low) spoke yesterday he referred to federal aid to education. I agree with what he said because of the burden that education imposes in many cases upon the home and land owner. They are the very best people in the land; they produce the wealth from which all our taxes must come. If this burden can be eased in any degree it will certainly be acceptable to the municipalities.

The hon. member also mentioned the possibility of accepting blocked sterling in payment of agricultural and other products sent abroad. I would point out to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the house that a couple of sessions ago I offered this very suggestion, so possibly we are coming closer to realizing that objective.

I was interested in what was said last evening by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Applewhaite) about his very interesting constituency. The hon. member also offered the suggestion that we of the opposition parties were apostles of gloom. I refute that suggestion, but I do say to the hon. member that we are not among those who are afraid to face the facts; and those facts are not too encouraging at the moment. Denying their existence does not answer the problem at all.

Before I go further with these marketing problems I want to deal with a few general questions that have come up since last session. I feel it is my duty first of all to interpret the opinions, the wishes and the desires of my constituency, which comprises the rural area of Middlesex East and about one-quarter of the city of London. Thus in my constituency there are both rural and urban interests. Many think they conflict, but actually they are closely associated, because if one part of our economy suffers it is not long until all other parts suffer as well. It seems to me that in a very limited way the speech from the throne reveals the condition of the ship of state; and it shows that in two particulars all is not well. I think it shows the state of mind, shall I say, of the temporary crew, which seems to be this: We fooled them in June; we can do it again. Hon. members will recall that years ago the Insull public utilities empire collapsed. When its assets were being liquidated they found a warehouse full of empty cartons. Here we have a warehouse full of empty promises by the government dealing with long-term price stability and what have you. If I were to give a short description of the speech from the throne I would do so in these words: Two bells, all's well; hell's bells, call out the watch.

From 1939 to 1949 we had 143 contracts with Europe. In 1936 we had 23 contracts. In 1950 we have 4, written in invisible ink on tissue paper. I want to point out the effect these disappearing markets are going to have on my people, not only those in the country but those in London and all the cities of Canada. I have figures from the dominion bureau of statistics showing the percentage of the consumer's dollar that trickles back to the producer. From 1913 to 1919, a fairly good, prosperous period, from 45 to 51 per cent of the consumer's dollar went to the primary producer. In 1920 a levelling off period commenced which continued until 1924, and during those years the primary producer received 40 per cent or less of the consumer's dollar. During that period there was a bit of unemployment and some unrest in the country. From 1925 to 1929 the primary producer received from 42 to 43 per cent of the consumer's dollar.

I do not need to recall to hon. members what happened in 1929. In 1930, the year of the great collapse, only 39 per cent of the consumer's dollar went to the producer, and by 1934 this had dropped to 32 per cent. Those were the years of mounting unemployment in our country. From 1935 to 1939, the first year of the war, the primary producer received only 39 per cent of the consumer's dollar.

During the period from 1942 to 1948, however, the percentage varied from 48 to 54 per cent. Those were the years when everyone was employed and the basic primary producer received a good percentage of the consumer's dollar. Now we are getting back to the point where in some particular lines—and I could mention eggs—a very small percentage is being received by the producer.

Those are the facts which must be faced at this time by this government, this parliament and the people as a whole. They are pertinent and significant facts. The picture today is very different from the picture last June. Then we had these promises of high employment, overseas contracts, buoyant revenues, stability of prices and markets. Today we have alarming unemployment figures; and even those figures are not correct, because they indicate only the number who have registered with the national employment service. There are many people who are out of work who have no reason to go to the national employment service office. They cannot find a job there, because all these other people are there looking for work.

It is noticeable also that, at the very time these contracts were being cancelled and the prices the farmers were receiving were dropping, Mr. Mosher and Mr. Bengough called upon the government to declare an emergency. They desired the government to commence a program of public works across the dominion to alleviate the unemployment situation. It would seem, therefore, that Canada's export trade markets are closely linked with the unemployment problem.

Reference was made today to widening the scope of the Unemployment Insurance Act. This matter is dealt with in the speech from the throne. On my desk there are resolutions from two of the main hospitals in the city of London, protesting against being brought under the Unemployment Insurance Act. What is actually happening is that many people are being called upon to pay into that insurance fund, without any hope of being able to collect from it during their lifetime. It has been intimated that possibly farmers and farm labourers will come under that act. How many of you know of unemployed farmers? I would urge the government to give serious consideration to the proposal to bring hospital employees under the act.

While I am speaking about unemployment insurance, may I say that an individual case was brought to my attention in London last week. This man had contributed towards unemployment insurance for a year and a half. He was considered old enough to pay into the fund, but when he became unemployed the officials forced him to prove his age before he could draw upon the fund. If he was old enough to pay into it, I believe he should have been considered old enough to receive payments from the fund.

I must say that London is one of the most favoured spots in Canada so far as unemployment is concerned. There are various reasons for that. Because of the diversity of its industry, because of its position as a financial and educational centre of western Ontario, London is not dependent upon seasonal employment as are some of the other areas in Canada. I noticed that yesterday the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) mentioned the fact that this unemployment was seasonal and temporary. I hope it is not as temporary as some of the jobs in the civil service, because I know of civil servants who have been temporary for twenty years. If the men who are unemployed today thought the situation would last for twenty years, they would be quite disturbed. Let us find out what temporary means. Does it mean today, tomorrow or five years from now?

What are the causes of this unemployment? Probably the biggest factor is loss of trade. Fear of the future and the destruction of incentive by excessive taxation are two important causes. The excessive taxation is brought about by government waste. I suppose someone will ask me to point out this government waste. I shall just mention one case, and it is in the Department of National Defence. It has been estimated that it costs approximately $30,000 to train an officer. This figure was supplied by reliable authorities in the educational field. Similar figures can be found in a return tabled in my name during the last session. This question of excessive taxation will become more difficult as trade diminishes, and unemployment mounts. Now, before the situation becomes too serious, is the time for the government to make some constructive move towards solving the problem.

The lack of purchasing power by all those engaged in the primary industries in this country is another factor causing unemployment. There is also the fact that we are pricing ourselves out of many markets. I should like to draw to the government's attention the fact that millions of dollars have been spent to build up Europe, while our own country, with all its resources, has been neglected. We could quite well spend all the money we have spent trying to rebuild Europe in building a better Canada.

Trade barriers are another cause of unemployment. Many of you will recall that we were summoned to Ottawa in haste in the autumn of 1947 to ratify the Geneva trade treaty. As yet, those treaties have not been placed before us for ratification. A year ago, another meeting was held in France, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) mentioned today. It is about time we finished the conference stage, and started producing results.

I have before me the throne speeches for the past three sessions. I would advise the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Applewhaite) to study those three speeches. He seemed to get a good deal of satisfaction from the things that were forecast in the speech from the throne. If he will consider the three speeches I mentioned, he will find that paragraphs 6, 8, 9, 10, 21, 22, and 23 of the January, 1949, speech have never been carried out. Paragraphs 7, 8, 9 and 10 of the September, 1949, speech have not been touched. Those paragraphs contain the meat of the speeches from the throne at the last two sessions, so it is obvious that we have left unfinished many of the things we hoped to accomplish. What comfort there is to be gained from the speech from the throne is more than I can understand.

All three speeches from the throne mentioned the problem of exchange and monetary control. We have too much control. Neither trade nor money is allowed to flow freely. As I said before in a speech in this house, if the nations who joined the Atlantic pact can make a gun or a tank that is universal, surely they can find a trading dollar that is universal. This would enable us to trade freely with one another. How are we going to build a strong western defence unless we can trade with one another?

I have noticed that there are proposals in the throne speech concerning amendments to the Agricultural Products Act. The federation of agriculture recommended that producer boards be set up for the marketing of Canadian farm products. That was changed, however, to government boards. But now, as I understand, another proposal is made and we are going to hand it back to the producers. There is only one reason why that is going to be done. It is just like the situation where a bully takes a toy from a child; when the toy is broken he says: Here it is; see what you can do with it. That is what happened with regard to our market; it is a broken toy. So they say: We will hand it back to you; see what you can do with it. There is also provided a place to put the blame if things go wrong.

I just want to read into the record part of an article that appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press of December 21, 1949:

> They are now discovering that the law of supply and demand has not been repealed and that having foolishly given away the "ups" of the market, the farmers must now bear the "downs".

The bitter consequences of foolish leadership are rapidly becoming clear.

I said once before in this house, and I am going to repeat it, that it does not take a great deal of ability to sell scarce goods at a low price but it takes a considerable amount of ability to sell goods in surplus for more than they are worth; and that is what we should like to see being done now but are not likely to see.

The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. McCubbin), at a meeting in London, Ontario, suggested that these farmers take back their marketing problem, and that that is where it should be. I just want to say that if that is the right policy the minister has been wrong in all the years he has been here; or if he is wrong now, he was right then. But he cannot be right both times.

Mr. Gardiner: I might surprise you.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): They should never have taken it from the farmers. I agreed with what the parliamentary assistant said in London. They should never have taken it away from the farmers. Now when the situation is tough they say: We will give it back to them. The farmers are worried about this situation, because it is a breach of promise.

Mr. Gardiner: That is the same argument the hon. member's friends put up out in Battleford.

Mr. Graydon: The minister may yet be sued for breach of promise.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): The situation is this. During the war years we were told if we took less then, when the war was over and times got tough we would have a stable and long-term market. It is not very stable and it certainly was not a long-term one. In fact, I sometimes think we have two ministers of agriculture, namely the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and the Minister of Agriculture. As you will recall, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Trade and Commerce came back last May and said he had a $25 million contract for Canadian products. I have never yet been able to find out whether or not we sold that extra $25 million worth; and until it has been proven to me, I am going to say that it was a phony contract. When he comes back this time, he had better bring something more than a suntan with him.

During the war years when we could get a fair price for our products in other markets, embargoes were placed on many primary products so that they could not go to the best markets. When cheese and other things became scarce, they were requisitioned to fill those contracts. We did not have a chance.

But now the government says: We will hand the problem back to them and see what they can do with it.

This is a serious problem. I do not want you to think that I am dealing with it lightly. The United States is facing a problem with regard to floor prices; and from articles appearing in the press it appears that the officials of the Department of Agriculture here are going to set a floor price, but the indications are that the price is going to be low. It is going to be a bargain basement price, I am afraid; and that was not what the farmers had in mind in 1945 or again in 1949 when the Agricultural Prices Support Act was dangled before them prior to the election. But now they are told that the situation has changed; the officials point to the United States with their accumulation of potatoes and other products and so they are saying: We cannot set this floor too high or we are going to get into difficulties, so we will put in a bargain basement floor.

As long as I can remember I have heard tariffs talked of. Some have said that a floor price for farmers is a subsidy. If tariffs are not a subsidy, I do not know what they are. I believe that farmers and others are quite prepared to do away with subsidies if all the rest of our economy is prepared to do the same thing. I think possibly it would be better for all of us if we gave some serious consideration to that matter because it is, no doubt, one of the things that are stagnating trade.

I have here a resolution passed at the last annual meeting of the Middlesex County Federation of Agriculture, and I should just like to read it:

> Whereas the future market outlook for farm products is uncertain; and
> Whereas farmers in this country produced and sold farm products during the war years below world market prices; and
> Whereas promises have been repeatedly made that farmers would be sustained by satisfactory floor prices;
> Be it therefore resolved that proper measures be taken to implement the provisions of the Agricultural Prices Support Act whenever the need arises.

This resolution was carried unanimously at that meeting.

For a moment or two I want to deal with the proposal in the speech from the throne to set up a committee to look into the national health plan, along with old age pensions and other things. This is going to take some time, and it looks to me as if it was a delaying action. If we examine these national health proposals, we shall find that they were first put forward as a policy of the Liberal party in 1919, and they have been brought out at the correct time practically ever since. In one of the throne speeches mention was made of the house committee on prices. We received three copies of it, it is true; but that is all that was ever done. It had the effect of drawing people's attention from the government's shortsighted policy to the troubles they were in; and in this way got the government out of the hole at the time. Nothing was ever done. That is about what is going to happen with this national health program. It has one purpose only, to attract attention and delay action.

Mention was made of the cold war. I just want to refer back again to the fact that if we are to fight an effective cold war we must have a healthy economy not only in Canada but in all the rest of the signatory nations to the Atlantic pact.

People are quite prepared to pay heavy taxes to maintain and strengthen our defences; but they also feel that there is very little to show for the $400 million that was spent on national defence last year.

In the speech from the throne we find the following:

> The measure to consolidate existing legislation respecting our defence forces . . . will be re-introduced.

I have made some reference to that, and reference was made to it in the two previous speeches. During the recess I heard more criticism back home of the Department of National Defence than I had heard in any of the past four or five years. I was asked such questions as these: What are you doing with the $400 million? What have you to show for it? We have one aircraft carrier that we are not able to keep in operation all the time. We have very few of the jet aircraft that we were taken to Rockcliffe to see some years ago. We have few of them today. A veil of secrecy has been cast over that $400 million of the people's money. Our people are worried about national defence. I should also like to refer to the fact that all the various branches of the service have a dental corps. One dental corps should be able to take care of the teeth of all the men that we have in the forces.

We need a realistic approach to the world's needs. We hear of people needing food. We know that there is a serious dislocation of distribution. We need a convertible currency, not a controlled currency, in the western community of nations. We cannot be strong militarily if we are weak economically. I think the whole thing can be summarized in what is taking place at the royal mint. They are making a new silver dollar. On the old silver dollar the good ship Matthew appeared, commemorating the entry of Newfoundland into confederation. On the new dollar they are taking to the canoe.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): I count it a great honour to represent a constituency like Fort William, a constituency that is so progressive and so up to date in everything. When you ride in one of the trolley busses in Fort William and then start out on a trip in a streetcar in Ottawa you hope that Ottawa will soon come in line with Fort William.

I admired the Prime Minister's choice of speakers to move and second the address in reply to the speech from the throne. He combined the progressive intelligence of the west and the steady wisdom of the east. I think hon. members will agree with me that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell) and the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Low) never spoke with more reserve and intelligence. I do not know whether they were afraid or just careful. I also noted that the Prime Minister showed remarkable reserve, but once in a while the Irish in him came bubbling out, which was a great thrill to a man like me.

I was greatly interested to see the prominence given to old age pensions in the speech from the throne. I was criticized last year for not voting for the resolution of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Under the same set of circumstances I would act in the same way because I am not going to vote want of confidence in the government when I can "beef" all I wish to in caucus.

The minister has shown wisdom in bringing in a resolution dealing with old age pensions at the present time. I have always been in favour of abolition of the means test. I think there should be no means test; but wisdom does not die with me. I am not the end of all wisdom and I do not know everything about it. So far as I can see, the means test should be removed, but when we are in committee we shall have an opportunity to give our reasons. On the order paper the following resolution appears in the name of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin):

> That a joint committee of both houses of parliament be appointed to examine and study the operation and effects of existing legislation of the parliament of Canada and of the several provincial legislatures with respect to old age security; similar legislation in other countries; possible alternative measures of old age security for Canada, with or without a means test for beneficiaries, including plans based on contributory insurance principles; the probable cost thereof and possible methods of providing therefor; the constitutional and financial adjustments, if any, required for the effective operations of such plans and other related matters:

Then he goes on to show how he wants this done. I think this is wise. If any hon. member has anything that he thinks would help the old age pensioner he should bring it to this committee.

I should like to pay my tribute to the officials in Toronto who administer this act. I do not care to what party they belong, they are giving a splendid service. They have given me some very fine thrills in the form of answers to requests I have made. They are administering the act in an honest way. I shall have more to say on this subject when the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Little) brings in his resolution, because I intend to second it.

When I went home after the last session a good many people called me up and interviewed me. They asked me what had happened to the crime comics bill. One school principal said that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) must be a generous man to take a bill from the opposition and incorporate it in the Criminal Code. I said: "He is not only a generous man, he is intelligent, notwithstanding those who think he was a little bit slow in bringing in the report on the combines act." I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that there are other men in this house who are also slow. Some of those on the other side of the house were just a little bit slow last year. I am slow sometimes, and a little dull in thinking; but when we keep at it we get there in the end.

I should like to tell the Minister of Justice that we at the lakehead appreciate the service that he has given to those children and to those teachers and other workers who are trying to make good Canadians out of our boys and girls.

We have at the lakehead a number of paper mills. Last year I made the statement that we have the largest paper mill in Canada. Let me prove that now by saying that not only have we the largest paper mill, but it is manned by men who have made it the mill with the greatest production record. In that plant we have another mill, not as large as the first one I mentioned; but, taken together, these two mills have the greatest production of any two paper mills in Canada. I know there are plants with more mills, but I would take off my hat to the men who man these. They work harmoniously and, I am told, are well paid. An hon. member who occupies a front seat in this chamber is president of that company. He has exercised his own wisdom and intelligence in its operations, and is doing a good job.

At the lakehead we have a growing interest in farming. It is all very well to make a statement, but it is much better to offer proof. We have potato clubs of 500 bushels to the acre; and if anyone would care to look at the picture I now hold in my hand he would see the picture of a bachelor who raised 733 bushels to the acre of Chippewa potatoes. Is there any other man in the house who will stand in his place and tell me of any other farmer in Canada who raises 733 bushels to the acre—and, oh boy, they are clean potatoes; not a spot on them!

A contest among thirteen growers in that area showed an average yield of 350·8 bushels to the acre. Surely that is a clear indication of progress. This is an indication of hard work, particularly in the instance I have outlined, where a man did not have someone at home to cook his meals for him and to cheer him when he returned home, tired.

I am greatly pleased to note the progress being made in connection with the trans-Canada highway. At this moment there are in Toronto delegates who are trying to convince the provincial government on certain points—and we believe that, at least up to this point, the government is open to conviction. Those delegates are backed by myself and by others who know the conditions. We believe we should have a lakeshore route, down through Nipigon, Schreiber and Sault Ste. Marie. In our view this would offer one of the greatest tourist attractions in Canada.

The editor of the Fort William Times Journal says this:

> For decades while roads were being constructed from south Ontario into northeastern Ontario, northwestern Ontario has been left to constitute a gap impassable by motor car.

There are many people in the east who think we have only a backwoods city, that we are out in the bush and not worthy of consideration. Just a short time ago there were some at the lakehead who thought we should form another province. They made quite a noise about it, and I think they made some headway, because things are now moving. It is our belief that this road would be one of the finest attractions for tourists from the east. Those who make the trip to Fort William will see the beauty spots around there; and having eaten lake Superior trout they will be convinced that the trip was worth the effort.

If the route goes through as suggested it will mean that Fort William will be only 600 miles from Toronto, and Kenora 850 miles from Toronto. People will take great pleasure from travelling that route, and seeing what it offers. It is our view that it should follow the north shore, because there are the towns which must be opened up, and many attractions are offered.

Let me state briefly why farming is developing at the lakehead. First, we have several graduates from Guelph. Secondly, we have the services of a most efficient man representing the agricultural interests of the province. Then, thirdly, we have an experimental substation in charge of an outstanding farmer expert who goes throughout the country giving advice to farmers concerning matters of fertilization, grazing and other features of this occupation. The result is that work on the farms in that area is growing.

May I turn now to our needs, and state that there are still some things we require, not only from the provincial but from the dominion government. My first suggestion is that the Canadian National Railways should have at our airfield an administrative building. The office staff of the board of transport commissioners is now housed in accommodation which, from the standpoint of health, is unfit for their purposes.

Secondly, we require a protective building at the Canadian National Railways yards at Neebing and Port Arthur. Anyone living in Port Arthur or Fort William in January who had to go out to repair cars in winter temperatures ranging from 15 to 40 degrees below zero, with a northwest wind blowing, would wonder what is the matter with the C.N.R., when the C.P.R. rolls a car into a building in which the men may work. Thus they are able to do much better work and under healthier conditions, with less danger of frostbite. The need for protective buildings is as great in Fort William as it is in Port Arthur. We know, too, how difficult it is to work in hot weather, without some protection.

Large quantities—hundreds and hundreds of carloads of the finest hematite iron ore—are coming down from Steep Rock, with the result that the cry at the lakehead is for the construction of a smelter. Here, again, wise men from the east say it would not pay. Perhaps it would not pay the men who want to have the plant in the east; but we say it would pay anyone who would undertake to build a smelter at that point. We are told that our ore is of such high quality we can sell it to others producing lower grades of ore, so that it may be used for mixing purposes. Then, after the mixing process has taken place, they would sell their ore back to us, and a profit can be made. But in our view that is not good enough, and offers only one more reason for our having a smelter. I am sure when the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) gives further thought to the matter, in addition to that he has already given, he will see to it that we have a smelter.

There is an agitation afoot for a public park at Mount McKay. We want a skyline road. We already have one road, but we need one coming in the other way from the Scott highway so that those who travel it may look back and see all that beautiful country. Reaching Mount McKay, the whole panorama opens out to one's view, and offers the greatest scenery in Canada; there is nothing to surpass it in this country.

I come now to the Shebandowan district, which is said to have many varieties of ore, including gold, silver and platinum. I shall not attempt to mention them all because of the danger of confusion. The fact remains that the Shebandowan area offers many varieties of ore. Last year I placed a resolution on the order paper asking that the men who had patented their claims should receive some assistance from the then department of mines and resources. I suggested that they be given a drill, that tests be made, and that the costs of such operations be taken from the receipts from production. We have in the Shebandowan district a district which offers outstanding possibilities for the future.

I should like to say a word on unemployment. If there is one thing that we think we should not have in Canada, it is unemployment. It is all a matter of planning. Something will have to be done at the lakehead to plan so that the seasonal workers will have work the year round, although I admit that that will be difficult. I notice the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) is proposing an amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act. The act should be extended and this amendment will do considerable good.

The labour unions of Fort William are doing a great job. I take my cue from them when I say that if all trade unions in Canada were like them there would be greater harmony in labour relations. Many of the officers of the labour unions up there attend their churches on Sunday, the churches which their fathers and mothers taught them to worship in. I venture to say that when labour realizes that in the Christian church they have an ally that has fought against monopolies which would crush the workingmen, when labour and religion are ready to work side by side, greater security will be achieved.

We have a splendid example in the former prime minister. An English member of parliament once wondered at his good judgment, but I want to say that anyone who begins his daily task by reading a chapter from the old book and taking the Master Workman as his guide will not be afraid of anything. Such a man will be able to stand on his own feet and think for himself.

I should like to speak at greater length but there will be other opportunities. If any hon. members feel like visiting the beauty spots at Fort William they will soon have an opportunity when the trans-Canada highway is completed.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the debate so far, and particularly to government members, I begin to wonder whether I live in the same country as they. I get around quite a lot when the house is not in session. I held a lot of meetings and I met a lot of people since we were here last. Many of the statements I have heard so far in this debate certainly do not sound like the things I heard outside. It may be that other members do not get around as much.

My impression of conditions in the country today is reminiscent of 1939. I definitely get the same feeling. Pretty much the same conditions are developing outside and pretty much the same attitude prevails in the house. There seems to be apathy; we are going to do it tomorrow. We have to start to plan, as the last speaker said, but I thought the planning was all done. There are one or two things on which I should like to focus attention and I do this because of their immediate urgency. The time has passed for talk. I think the time has come for action in connection with the matters to which I am going to refer.

First, I am going to deal with the means test. I think the time has passed for talk on this particular matter. We have been talking about it ever since I came into the house. The last speaker said that he was pleased to see a reference in the speech from the throne to the abolition of the means test in connection with old age pensions. The hon. member must have read a different speech from the one I read because there is no reference to that in the speech. I think what the hon. member is referring to is a resolution that is now on the order paper. The speech from the throne is a forecast of the legislation which the government is going to present to the house and for the benefit of the last speaker I would say that there is no reference in the throne speech to the abolition of the means test, which would indicate that the government is not going to do anything about it.

We should not kid ourselves about the value of a committee in connection with a matter of this kind. Anyone who has been in the house for any length of time realizes that when the government wants to shelve a hot potato it is passed over to a committee of this house to talk about, to write a report on it which is then put in the archives to gather dust. But in the meantime you cannot say much about it because a committee is to handle it.

I am rather surprised that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) should have placed this resolution on the order paper at this time. I thought he was a better politician. In the near future I expect that that particular thing will boomerang on him pretty badly. Many hon. members remember the issue as to the maintenance of price controls. The same Minister of National Health and Welfare was the chairman of a committee that was handed the job of getting all the facts on that matter and making recommendations to the house. In the meantime price controls went down the drain, the report was written, and I think I am safe in saying that seventy-five per cent of the members of this house never read it. Nevertheless it was a way of getting clear of an obligation which the government should have assumed, and I am afraid the same thing is happening in connection with the abolition of the means test.

Yesterday the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) referred to this when he said that it was part of the program for the institution of old age pensions on a contributory basis. However, that has been part of the program for a long time. I remember reading it first in 1919 when it emanated from a convention of the Liberal party which was held in that year. There have been two wars since that time, the world has been torn to pieces, conditions have changed drastically, and as far as they have gone with that pension program is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare to place a resolution on the order paper to pass it over to a committee to study the matter and make a report to the house.

I have seen this done several times in the past. Questions have been shelved and taken out of the realm of public discussion and then nothing has been done about them. Something should be done at this time about this matter. The argument will be advanced that it will cost more money, but I do not think anyone should get up in this house and talk that way any more. We can remember when prior to the war that was the stock argument against many questions that were raised—where will we get the money? But it did not take very long to find where to get the money when war broke out. We were able to take the jobless off the streets and put them in uniform; we were able to provide the planes, tanks and all the rest of it. That money is still around. It is a question of the members of this house, regardless of the section they may represent, having the courage to stand up here and say this is a job that should be done. This is not a question of planning and that kind of stuff; it is a matter of honesty, of having the courage of your convictions, of taking your position in this house and saying that the means test in connection with old age pensions is one of the greatest blots on the history of Canada today, that it should be removed, and as far as we are concerned we are going to see that this is done.

The money is there. Put on the excess profits tax again, perhaps fifty per cent lower than it was during the war. You will get sufficient money to pay the old age pension without the means test. Why all the argument about it? The little bit of money that would accrue to old age pensioners as additional income would merely create additional purchasing power in the hands of Canadian citizens. It would only provide the necessities of life, but it would stimulate your machinery of production and provide additional markets. Right today we are screaming about markets for our products. Here is an internal market that we can create, and all the money will travel back to where it first came from.

It is a lot of nonsense to talk about appointing a committee to study the matter. Surely the members of this house have as much courage as some of our big industrialists. I have on my desk a letter written by the president of Dominion Steel and Coal, one of the greatest employers of labour in Canada. No other corporation in this country employs as many people as does Dominion Steel and Coal, with all its ramifications across the country. The president of that organization, speaking on behalf of the coal company and its subsidiaries, stated definitely just a few weeks ago that as far as his company is concerned it believes the means test should be abolished immediately. They have a non-contributory industrial pension scheme of their own. It does not amount to very much, perhaps $30 a month to a man who has been employed for forty years and who retires at the age of sixty-five, but it is something. But because a man has that little pension, given through the charity of that corporation, it militates against him in obtaining the old age pension that is paid today. So the president of this company thinks it is unfair and unreasonable, and that the means test should be abolished. Surely the members of this house are just as humanitarian as the president of Dosco. That company is a big taxpayer, but the president of the corporation says the means test should be abolished. There is no necessity for taking it over to the railway committee room, calling in experts and so on. We have done that sort of thing year in and year out. The necessity is there; the money is there; the people of Canada are demanding it. I think it is time the members of this house said, "We are going to vote for it and authorize the government to do it," because if this country cannot afford to provide its aged people with the bare means of subsistence we have no right to say that we are a great nation, that we are able to face the future and work out our own destiny. That is one problem that can be solved and should be solved without further delay.

One of my main reasons for saying this session was reminiscent of 1939 is the unemployment situation. I remember that in 1939 and early 1940 you could go to Toronto and see the missions and church basements packed with unemployed. On the front page of today's Globe and Mail there is a picture of a few hundred of Toronto's unemployed huddled together in a basement mission. It was ten below zero outside when that picture was taken; they had no place to go, so they gathered there; and that situation is general across the country. We have 375,000 unemployed registered with the employment service, and the unemployment problem is serious. I am reasonably sure that another 100,000 could be added to the number of which the national employment offices have a record.

We should not start planning now to deal with this situation. I thought the planning was all done. During 1942 and 1943 a large committee of this house—again a committee—was set up, called the reconstruction committee. The members were serious; they were hard workers, and did a good job. We went all over Canada, taking industry after industry and making a survey of the possibilities of employment in the post-war period. We had before us the heads of the construction industry, and all large employers. They went to a great deal of trouble; they prepared briefs, and we blueprinted the employment possibilities in all our major industries. We had the labour bodies, the chambers of commerce and all the others, and they all submitted briefs. After that the federal government probed the possibilities of public works projects. A report was made to this house containing a blueprint of public works projects right across the country. That report was adopted unanimously. The policy of the government announced at that time and repeated many times later was that they would assist private industry in any section of the country, but that where private industry failed to solve the problem of unemployment and a higher standard of living the government would step in and supplement private enterprise. That planning was done; the blueprints were there, but they went to the archives and now we are facing what we planned against at that time.

There is no use planning unless you put your plans into operation. Yesterday I listened to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). I was rather disappointed when he said the unemployment was seasonal, that it was regional and temporary. He went on to say that all the plans that had been made, including the shelf of public works to take up the slack of unemployment, had been practically thrown overboard, and that they could not do all the things they would like to do because they did not want to come into competition with private enterprise. The picture today of the developing unemployment problem shows clearly that private enterprise has fallen down in certain fields. The government program was intended to supplement private enterprise where it was not doing the job, which was to bring about as nearly as possible full employment. That program is gone. The shelf of public works is gone. After listening to the statement of the government's position by the Prime Minister I am afraid the problem is going to continue to grow. The government has nothing in mind to offset this increasing unemployment, and there is concern right across the country.

I am very disappointed that the government is not going to do anything to improve the situation. With regard to both these matters, the means test and the increasing unemployment, thousands of cards, letters and resolutions are being showered upon the members of this house. As far as the government are concerned, however, we have no program to deal with either of these matters in the immediate future. The speech from the throne says the government is going to broaden the scope of the Unemployment Insurance Act. That is no solution. They may take in the lumber workers, as they should have done long ago. They may extend it to other groups, but those other groups will have to make 180 contributions under the act before becoming entitled to relief, so that is not much of a solution.

Seventeen per cent of those 375,000 unemployed in this country today are without any income whatever. Seventeen per cent of them are not receiving benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act. As the front page picture in the Globe and Mail indicates, they have no place to go, no place to sleep and don't know where breakfast is coming from tomorrow. It is difficult to make that person understand he is considered regional, temporary and seasonal. All he understands is that he has no place to sleep, and no breakfast tomorrow morning. These men are human beings. Every one of them is affected just as we would be. It would be cold comfort to read in the press that the official attitude of the government is that you are only regional, and seasonal. You have no feelings. We have no plans to do anything for you. I believe immediate relief should be made available to the municipalities.

In my part of the country we have not the highest, but close to the highest, unemployment in Canada. Ten per cent of our total labour force is unemployed. It is not seasonal, it is permanent. This situation will remain until the government has some definite plan for the establishment of a small subsidiary industry in the maritimes, and the restoration of some of the markets, particularly in New Brunswick, that were lost because of the mix-up in international marketing. The situation in the maritimes is not seasonal, it is permanent. The thing to do is to immediately find the spots where the problem is serious, such as Toronto, and then the federal government should make available the Unemployment Relief Act, at substantial rates, until such time as the unemployed find gainful employment.

It is rather frightening when you think that we have just come through a major conflict. The unemployed in Canada were the ones who fought it. A few years after their return, with a threatening international situation and the possibility of another war, whom do you think those fellows are going to shoot at the next time? They have had one experience. They are human, and many of them are the boys who came back from this war. Rather than take the complacent attitude we have taken on this question, the federal government, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), or his assistants, should announce that in sections in which there is a large percentage of unemployed not in receipt of unemployment insurance benefits, relief will be made immediately available. This would provide them with shelter and something to eat until such time as they could find employment. Serious repercussions will be forthcoming from this situation unless something like that is done.

The main point to which I wish to address myself this afternoon is the question of the Canadian National Railways and its purchasing policy in the field of fuel. I am sorry the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) is not in his seat. Theoretically, the Canadian National Railways is the property of the people of Canada. Any time anyone outside this house criticizes the Canadian National, it is always characterized as a government operation. It is a good example of government management. You pay a large deficit each year, and it is attributed to mismanagement, or something of that sort. I am glad this controversy came up because it at least gives us a chance to do one thing.

When the Minister of Transport made his statement to the house on February 17, there were one or two significant paragraphs in it on that particular point of government management. I am going to read that back into the record. It will be found on page 23 of Hansard for February 17. He said:

> Since the reductions were announced, officers of my department and myself have been in constant touch with the management of the Canadian National on this question of coal supply. I have asked the new chairman and president, Mr. Donald Gordon, to give me a memorandum setting out in detail the events—

And so forth. The minister said that prior to the reduction in services of 25 per cent, neither he nor the government had been consulted by the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways. Does that sound like government management? Does it sound like a government-operated road? So far as this house is concerned, the balance sheets are brought before us once a year, and the minister asks for the necessary funds to wipe out a large deficit. That statement clearly indicates that the president and board of directors operate the railroad as they see fit, without any consultation with the minister or the government. I believe that is slack business. I am not blaming the Minister of Transport for that, because the government as a whole has to take the responsibility for the actions of any of its ministers.

In view of the minister's position, one would have thought that before such a drastic step was taken by the board of directors they would at least have called in the minister and asked for his advice as to whether or not the reduction should be made. The minister says they did not do that. I am not blaming the Canadian National Railways for that. I am blaming the government, the cabinet as a whole, for not having the necessary foresight to compel the management to consult with the Department of Transport if and when difficulties arise that warrant public attention, and particularly such a difficulty as this which so seriously affects the public from one end of the country to the other.

This afternoon the minister read statements from Mr. Vaughan and Mr. Gordon. Mr. Gordon's statement clearly sets out that the blame for the present difficulties of the Canadian National rests with the United States, because of the disruption in coal mining; that is his alibi. In another letter Mr. Vaughan states that the trouble is in the United States. Contracts were made for the delivery of certain American coal, and if that coal had been available for stockpiling purposes no trouble would have been experienced. Again, the blame is laid over in the United States. This situation was well known to the government some time ago, or at least to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). I am sorry he is not in his seat this afternoon. According to the press, he is roaming around Rome.

It appears that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is able to see what is coming, but he seems to be powerless to influence anyone in the government to do something before it hits us.

Mr. MacInnis: Leaving out the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson).

Mr. Gillis: I am not going into that now. I have a copy of a statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce on February 13, 1947, during a speech to the Empire Club in Toronto. This article appeared in the Toronto Star. It reads as follows:

"Mr. Howe noted the United Kingdom's plight today as what would result from even a temporary shortage of coal without constant vigilance on the part of those responsible for our continuing coal supplies. Canada may yet be in a similar position. Our coal industry has a responsibility to the nation of no small magnitude," he said.

"The maritime situation," he said, "has presented an increasingly difficult and distressing problem. Unless the problems facing the industry are quickly solved the industry is headed for disaster."

But the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) in 1947, looking at the fuel situation in Canada, told the Empire Club what could happen in this country in the event of a shortage of coal. I think every member of this house realizes what could happen if coal supplies from the United States were completely cut off. Industry in this country could be closed off, and the railways could be stopped; we depend to that extent on United States fuel.

The point I want to make is that this situation did not creep up overnight on the Canadian National Railways or the government. They were watching the coal situation in 1947. The Minister of Trade and Commerce knew what could happen, but nothing appears to have been done about it.

Then again, I would ask hon. members to let their memories go back to the last session, to June of 1949, July and on to the end of the year. Hon. members will recall that I rose on several occasions and asked the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) why some of the coal mines in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick were not operating at all at the time, but were shut down completely, and why others were working part-time. Hon. members will recall the answers we received at that time. As indicated this afternoon by the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. Carroll), when he pointed the matter out to the Minister of Transport, a coal contract in the maritimes between some of the small operators and the Canadian National Railways, for 65,000 tons of coal a year, was discontinued last June when this situation was developing, and these mines were idle.

The alibi given to us at that time by the Minister of Transport was that the railways were not using as much coal, and that was why they were not taking the coal from the maritimes operations. The reason they were not using as much coal was that it was a mild winter. That was rather nonsensical, was it not? It would take as much coal to run an engine in the summer as it would in the winter. But that was the excuse given at that time.

This afternoon the minister says that if our contracts had been filled and our stockpiles kept up we would not have had to curtail traffic. The answer that Mr. Vaughan has to give to this house, as far as I am concerned, is why they did not get their stockpiles and keep them up from mines in the maritime regions that were close, economic and available to them and why their stockpiles were not built up there when mines were working half-time in that area. He has to answer that question, and he has not answered it yet. There is no excuse for the answers we have received from both Mr. Vaughan and Mr. Gordon on this particular question. They are ducking the issue. The whole thing adds up to a faulty fuel policy on the part of the federal government and no policy at all on the part of the Canadian National Railways, except to market United States coal.

There is no excuse at this time for the curtailment of traffic by twenty-five per cent in the maritime provinces. As to the minister's statement that we had to hit everyone in the country to the same extent, in order to equalize the situation, that is nonsense. Why should you have curtailment of services where coal is available either in the west or in the east? I can understand it in central Canada where the railways depend completely on the United States for their fuel.

Yesterday, in a short answer to me, the minister indicated that coal was not available in the maritimes. We have a dominion coal board, and the function of that board is to provide subventions, allocate markets and all that kind of thing. They have that authority under the act that sets them up. The member on that dominion coal board who represents the maritime provinces, clear of the operators, is D. W. Morrison. Just a few days before this house opened, in commenting on this particular question of the availability of coal in the maritimes, Mr. Morrison as a member of the coal board stated that there was no shortage of coal in the maritimes, but that plenty of coal was available. The head of the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation, when questioned, made the same statement, namely, that there was in the maritimes plenty of coal available to the Canadian National Railways if they wanted to accept it. The minister of mines in the provincial government of Nova Scotia—and he would not be a propagandist against the government or the Canadian National Railways; he is a good Liberal minister—made a statement on the question also, and he was much more emphatic about it than either the coal board representative or the head of the coal company. The statement is quite a lengthy one, but I shall quote only briefly from it. It is taken from the Post-Record of Sydney, Nova Scotia, of February 1 and reads in part as follows:

> Mr. MacKinnon said it was "hard to understand" the claim of Canadian National Railways that train services had to be curtailed because of coal shortage.
> In 1945, he said the C.N.R. used 122,000 tons of Canadian coal in central Canada and in the same year 7,296,000 tons of U.S. coal. The situation today was fairly similar.
> The C.N.R. got most of its coal in Ohio.

And so on. He is commenting on our complete dependency on United States fuel and he goes on here to make a strong statement—I do not want to take up the time of the house with it—against our present fuel policy, if we have any. All of this argument of Mr. Vaughan and of Mr. Gordon has been completely knocked into a cocked hat by people who sell coal, who say that coal was available in the maritime region particularly.

There is no excuse for the present situation. Better excuses than those offered by the minister must be found. The matter should be no mystery to this house either, because time and time again I have risen in my place in this house and hammered away at this matter of a national fuel policy and the development of our own resources. We are only starting to get this thing working in the field of fuel, and as time goes on if we do not develop our own resources we are going to have much more serious repercussions than we are having at the present time. John L. Lewis, the disrupting of the industry, and his quarrel with the operators is a problem that belongs to the United States government; but the problem of keeping trains running in this country and supplying our industries with fuel is that of the Canadian government. If the Prime Minister and the members of this house are going to depend exclusively on private enterprise to do the job, then we are going to have just what we have at the present time; because, as far as I can see, the fuel policy of the Canadian government and the Canadian National Railways has been to market United States coal.

It is hard to understand how a government-operated road would buy the major portion of their coal in the United States, in Ohio and West Virginia, transport it all across the country and stockpile it down in Campbellton, New Brunswick; yet within a few hundred miles there is plenty of coal available in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick to operate that end of the system.

The question of competition comes up. Well, the United States certainly cannot compete with maritime coal in that particular region. They can compete to some extent in Quebec. We cannot compete with them in Ontario. Year in and year out I have emphasized the necessity of the government formulating a fuel policy, whereby the markets for our own coal within Canada could be made available to our own production. This whole question of the problem of the Canadian National Railways certainly places it in focus. We have been losing money. The Canadian National definitely must have been paying more for United States coal in that area than they would pay for maritime coal.

This whole question of the curtailment of traffic by the Canadian National Railways should be gone into because the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) and Mr. Vaughan, the former president of the Canadian National Railways, have got into a press controversy on the matter. I saw one statement by Mr. Vaughan in which he took the minister to task for the first statement that he made in the house. The matter of whether the Canadian government has anything to do with the management of the road should be ironed out. If the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways can take the kind of action that they took without reference to the minister or to the government, and affect the whole system, as they have affected it, then I think it is pretty near time that the House of Commons found out something about it. We have a standing committee of this House of Commons known as the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. I believe that committee should be set up and called together immediately. The heads of the Canadian National Railways, Mr. Vaughan, Mr. Gordon, and others concerned in the question, should be examined before that committee of the House of Commons. That is their job. A policy should be devised under which the kind of thing that has happened would never be permitted to happen again.

I always try to boost that road; I travel on it as much as I can. I assumed that it would belong to us, and as such it should be patronized by us. Every bit of business that we can give to it we should give to it. But I am certainly not satisfied with the kind of management that can run this thing by remote control without any reference to the government or to the minister. I am seriously suggesting to the minister, Mr. Speaker, that that committee be set up immediately. It should be convened for the purpose of having a thorough investigation into all the factors leading up to the present difficulties on the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. Sinnott: I wish to ask the hon. member a question. I have listened attentively to him and I should like an explanation of one remark he made. He referred to the boys who went overseas in the last war, and spoke of those who were unemployed at the present time. He then asked this question: If there was another war, whom would they shoot at? I should just like to know what remark he was casting?

Mr. Gillis: I was not casting any remark; I was making a statement based on some understanding of human nature. My observation was this. You were unemployed previous to the first war. War broke out. Lots of money was found to put you in uniform, and you went over and fought and went through a lot of hardship. A lot of promises were made to you. You come back and you are sleeping in a soup kitchen again. Another war breaks out. It is threatening and could break out. If another war breaks out what do you expect that boy to do who is sleeping in the soup kitchen for the second time in his lifetime? I do not know whom he would shoot.

Mr. Sinnott: I suppose the hon. member—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Sinnott: —knows that there are those who save their money and those who do not. There is a big difference.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I believe we have all enjoyed the session up to the present time. I am afraid however we all feel very much as the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) has expressed himself, namely, that we are just getting ready for another period of inaction similar to that which laid a blight upon the house in 1937, 1938 and 1939. We could talk in those days about anything and everything except something that would do us some good. Today it looks as though we are getting ready for the same sort of thing unless somebody drives us into war and makes us do something.

The Prime Minister's speech is to be commended because it faced facts. I think he was quite honest in his general approach. He was at a disadvantage, because he had to begin to explain why all the glowing promises which were made across the country by everybody on the Liberal side have begun to fade already. For example, people had the idea given to them everywhere during the election that all people had to do was to get this wonderful Liberal party in and there would be floor prices for all agricultural products. The other day, I understand, someone said, "Well, it must be borne in mind that floor prices can be in the basement just as well as up where you would naturally expect them to be." I could spend quite a lot of time discussing this kind of betrayal which the Liberal party has been guilty of ever since 1935, but I do not think there is much use saying more about it at the present time. The Prime Minister had to bear the brunt of all that.

Of course someone will say, Why did the people elect them again? Well, one good reason is that the Liberal party has a remarkable capacity for propaganda. It seems to have limitless funds and limitless influence over the press. Then generally speaking, I imagine the people look upon the Conservative party as just a pale-faced Liberal party, a second one, so that there is no use trying to get anything done through Conservatives. People are mortally afraid of the C.C.F. because it seems to mean so many things. They have not yet learned that if they want genuine honest-to-goodness government from a people who will keep their promises they must elect Social Crediters.

Mr. Graydon: Don't be so modest.

Mr. Blackmore: Well, we have a wonderful example of what a Social Credit administration will do and can do. The example is in Alberta. Those who treat Alberta lightly just do not know Alberta. Judged by every standard the work that has been done by Social Credit in Alberta is a magnificent job, and anyone who does not really acknowledge that—

Mr. Whitman: Does not know Alberta!

Mr. Blackmore: —either does not know or is not honest, one of the two. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) was, as I have said, at a serious disadvantage. In his speech there was little or no hope for any solution of the problem of markets outside Canada, or increased markets inside Canada. There was no hope, worth speaking of, for solving the problem of the cost of living, which is almost crucifying our people from coast to coast, right now. There was no real hope for security of employment.

As I have also said, the Prime Minister faced some facts. But I would hope he would be prepared to face a great many more. He went down the other day into the United States and delivered to the people of that country a speech which, in the light of all facts, was absolutely impudent. He was talking to a people who have grown into a great power on this continent, through generations of developing the ability to produce their own supplies of goods. He went down there and advised them to discontinue that policy, so that they could help us out. How far his suggestion will get, I do not know; but I do not imagine it will be very far. I should like to spend some time discussing the matter, but I shall defer it to some future occasion.

Suffice it to say that in a broadcast in October, 1944, Mr. Roosevelt said that he meant to find jobs for 60 million Americans by trebling the exports of that country abroad. Then this Canadian Prime Minister goes to that country and asks President Truman, the successor to President Roosevelt, to decrease exports abroad. It is pretty hard to get much sense out of that.

The Prime Minister at one point in his speech on the address placed great confidence in the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). I am glad he did. It seems to me there are those in the house who would appear to endeavour to undermine that great Canadian. They need not undermine him, because he is not to blame for the troubles of this country. He has done a magnificent job wherever he has had the chance to do it, and has been given a free hand. Let us spend our time on someone other than the Right Hon. C. D. Howe when we wish to lay the blame.

The Prime Minister made two statements which pleased me. Speaking about the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Rt. Hon. C. D. Howe), and quoting himself, he said this:

> He knows the problems are still thorny and there is no easy solution—but I will venture the prediction that if Mr. Howe and those who are working with him don't find a solution, there won't be one to find.

I will say this, to qualify the Prime Minister's general remarks, that if the Right Hon. C. D. Howe and those working with him do not find a solution, it will probably be because there are restrictions placed upon them which prevent their doing the things their native intelligence and understanding would prompt them to do. The Prime Minister later said:

> In those statements I said it was a serious problem but I did not believe—and I do not believe—any man in Canada is better qualified to handle it than the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

I am not sure about that; I think I could find several men who have the vision and understanding which would enable them to know what to do without having to learn it, as I fear Mr. Howe will have to do. But they would not be able to do it if the present Liberal government were in charge, telling them how far they could go and how much they could do.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

There is a solution to the trade problem, beyond question. Whether or not Mr. Howe will find it will depend upon several things. Meanwhile I should like to ask the Prime Minister this question—and I wish he were here, because I think the Canadian people deserve an answer to my question: Would the Prime Minister give the Right Hon. C. D. Howe a free hand if he were to come to the Prime Minister and were to say, "Mr. Prime Minister, after the most careful study of everything pertaining to our trade problem, I have become convinced that the only means whereby that problem can be solved is through the principles of social credit".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Blackmore: Oh yes, we hear the silly laugh. These people would sit over there, and see us go right down into the depths of a depression 75 per cent worse than the one in the thirties. They would still shrug useless shoulders and wring helpless hands; they would still refuse to listen to anyone who knows what to do, and would continue never to give any suggestion, themselves, what to do. I have watched such people for fifteen years, all Liberals. I know what those men will do. They do not know anything, and they do not want to know anything. All they can think about is promises.

Mr. Hansell: All they can do is giggle.

Mr. Blackmore: Yes. Another question is this: If the Right Hon. C. D. Howe came to the Prime Minister and asked for permission to employ social credit principles and the Prime Minister in turn came before a caucus of the Liberal party and asked permission, what would Liberal members do? I wonder how long their confidence in the Right Hon. C. D. Howe would last? I wonder how long it would be before they demanded his resignation?

An hon. Member: Let us get back on the rails.

Mr. Blackmore: We are just exactly on the rails, and the hon. member will understand that, if he will give it some thought instead of giving quite so much thought to politics. The point is that someone has to find a way out of the difficulty; someone has to suggest a means of solving the American dollar problem and the Canadian dollar problem, so that we can sell a greater quantity of goods to Great Britain.

Up to the present time there has not been any hint of a solution of that problem, or anything looking like a solution from anyone in the Liberal party, or, indeed, anyone from the Progressive Conservative party.

An hon. Member: What about the Social Credit party?

Mr. Blackmore: Social Credit literature is full of it; and if the hon. member will look into it and prepare himself he will understand it. He cannot if he does not prepare himself, any more than he could understand algebra if he did not give it some thought.

What answer would the leader of the official opposition give if he were asked the same question about using social credit principles by the Right Hon. C. D. Howe? I wonder how long the Minister of Trade and Commerce would last before him? I imagine it would be just a little bit shorter time than he would last before the Liberal party.

It is too bad one has to say this about the Progressive Conservative party, but one hears long speeches, as we did yesterday from the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew),—excellent, beautiful, sonorous speeches, delivered with great dignity, and all the rest of it. They make a fine appearance—but there is not one single hint of what to do about our problems, not one single suggestion that they really understand what is wrong. I say we have a right to a little more than that.

If the Prime Minister were so courageous as to give Mr. Howe the green light as regards Social Credit, as I have suggested, I am wondering what the Department of Finance would do? Would they co-operate with Mr. Howe? These questions must all be answered before all the talk about solving our problems can mean anything at all.

Here we are with thirteen and a half million people, one of the richest countries on the face of the earth in resources, human and material. We have a fine accumulation of capital in our railroads, our banks and our industries. We have everything that it takes to manage this country and make it a country in which everybody would be happy to live—everything except just a little bit of common sense.

Anyone must realize that when people are living in a very rich country and are mortally afraid of increasing production beyond a certain point for fear prices will go down and everything come to ruin, then there must be something fundamentally wrong with their thinking—when it is believed that the more production you are capable of, the worse off you will be and the more you will have to worry about. Whenever the Liberals get to feeling that they can make light of what other people say, in such a situation, the time has come for them to tackle the problem themselves in the dark hours of the night until they reach a solution. It just does not make sense to do otherwise.

I hope hon. members will tolerate me when I put forward a supposition that is rather far-fetched. I am going to suppose that the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) would come to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) as he will have to when he gets all the facts. He comes to the Prime Minister and says, "I have been giving a lot of thought to the problems which confront us, to this shortage of dollars that is everywhere apparent within our own country and out of it, to the fluctuation of prices and the general dangers, and have come to the conclusion that there is only one possible solution, the solution which the Social Crediters offer."

An hon. Member: That is far-fetched.

Mr. Blackmore: I said it would be, but it is correct. It is just as correct as the radio was correct 75 years ago, but hon. members of that time never knew it. He would say, "I find that Social Credit means the use of the full productive capacity of the community working together to produce desired goods." Then the right hon. minister would go on to say: "Full production requires that money shall be the servant of the producers. In other words, when a farmer wants to produce sheep and the nation needs sheep, he could get money to produce sheep. Full production requires that the consumers shall be able to consume our production as well as what we trade our production for."

"This means that money must also be sufficient in the hands of the consumers as well as in the hands of the producers. The key to our problem then must be money."

"How would Social Crediters proceed if they were dealing with the complex problem with which we are now confronted? A Social Credit administration would accept as a definite principle of national policy that the Canadian finance department would create debt-free Canadian dollars sufficient to enable consumers to consume Canadian production." There should not be any serious objection to that, should there? If we create dollar bills to lend for production, why not create them to be put into circulation to consume our production?

An hon. Member: What about wheat?

Mr. Blackmore: The hon. member will remember that I said what we produced or what we exchanged our production for, although he may not have caught that. If we cannot buy all our wheat ourselves we cannot buy the goods for which the wheat is traded when they get here. That is quite obvious and I am sure the hon. member sees it.

Social Crediters would lay down the fundamental principle that if the government can create a dollar bill to put into a person's hands as a loan for production, it can just as easily create a dollar bill with which to pay a pension to consume goods. If it is possible to create dollars to produce Canadian production, it is possible to create dollars to consume Canadian production.

A Social Credit administration would bring down living costs by what Social Crediters call a compensated discount. In effect such a device amounts to a consumers' subsidy scientifically computed from period to period by the employment of a formula based upon the demand and supply situation currently prevailing within the nation. The money would not be taken out of taxation.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Blackmore: Before six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I was discussing the solution of our trade and marketing problems. I had suggested that the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), in seeking their solution, had satisfied himself that the only possible method lay in the adoption of social credit principles. I was supposing that he was telling his Prime Minister what a social credit administration would do and how it would do it. I had him saying that a social credit administration would accept as a definite principle of national policy that the Canadian finance department would create enough debt-free Canadian dollars to enable consumers to absorb Canadian production. Second, a social credit administration would bring down living costs by what Social Crediters call a compensated discount. Such a device in effect means a consumers' subsidy scientifically computed from period to period by the employment of a formula based upon the demand and supply situation currently prevailing within the nation.

I now have him proceeding with the third thing a social credit administration would do. That is, by various means resembling dividends, allowances, pensions and so on it would distribute to consumers additional purchasing power sufficient to balance consumption or effective demand with supply.

Then I would think the minister would say something like this: "Now, my dear Prime Minister, bearing in mind that the No. 1 problem of Canadians is to find markets for their products, any informed and thoughtful man must concede that the general idea and approach of the Social Crediters appear to be realistic."

"Many are averse to critically examining our money system; but why should we assume that our financial system is perfect? Everything else is changing. What reason can be advanced to suggest that our use of money needs no streamlining?" In the Bank of Canada report of February 10, 1944, Mr. Towers wrote:

> A working force of this size, at present rates of efficiency, will be able to produce a vastly greater volume of civilian goods and services than Canada has ever known before. By the same token, a vastly increased volume of consumption and capital development will be necessary if this output is going to be fully absorbed and high employment maintained. The adjustments required will clearly be of unprecedented magnitude, and bold planning on the part of labour, farm and business organizations, as well as governments, is urgently needed.

Why should we not expect to have to make in our financial system at least a few of those adjustments of unprecedented magnitude? Nothing in the report by Mr. Towers indicates that he would rule out adjustments in the Canadian financial system.

Careful consideration has been given to possible appropriate adjustments to be made in the Canadian financial system. In this connection an impressive pronouncement was made by Right Hon. Reginald McKenna, for years chairman of the Midland Bank in England. The statement appears in the London Times of January 30, 1936, in the course of a report to the shareholders of that bank. It reads:

> Additional currency, however, can now be furnished by the authorities, if they choose to exercise their powers without reference to the central bank's holding of gold. Thus the nineteenth century, which brought into general use a means of payment hitherto scarcely known outside London, brought also the machinery whereby it could be subjected to intelligent control.
> We learned that a shortage of money may be just as vicious in its effects as an excess, though deflation has still a touch of virtue about it in the minds of many people. Nevertheless it is becoming more and more widely recognized that greater productivity calls for an increased supply of money, for otherwise prices will fall, business will stagnate, and the growing productive capacity will be unused.
> For money to be truly "sound" there must be enough of it to finance an ordinarily growing volume of trade, yet not so much as to give rise to an inflationary movement of prices.

Those words raise this question: What have we Canadians a right to expect of our financial system? Most orthodox financiers would reply, "Well, we expect our financial system to give Canada a sound money system". Quite true. Very well; what is a sound financial system? What should it provide for a country? And is ours a sound financial system when judged in accordance with those requirements? I wonder if anyone would disagree when I contend that a sound money system should first enable us to have money for public financing; second, money for all the production our resources render possible and our people need; third, for exchanging our goods; and fourth, for consuming our goods?

Beyond all question our system is failing to supply adequate money for consumption. Otherwise why should so many people be without the means of buying goods, and why should so many people who are producing be without the means of selling? Our system is resulting in a very serious debt burden. It is failing to provide our people with a standard of living commensurate with our productive capacity. To put it in another way, in Canada today the government has no means by which it can render financially possible what is physically possible.

These four deficiencies in our financial system constitute a severe handicap to Canadians. These deficiencies justify an exacting scrutiny of our financial system. It is time for the adjustments which probably were envisaged in Mr. Towers' report. The only proposals that seem capable of remedying these deficiencies in our financial system are those of the Social Credit party. I invite hon. members to examine the statements I have made, bearing in mind that no matter how many people were elected as Liberals on June 27 last the people of Canada have a right to expect that this parliament shall deliver the goods, and that it will find a solution to the vexatious world-wide problems now confronting us.

I am sure that all hon. members, who remember exactly what has been said and done up to this moment, will contend that we have fallen far shorter of the objective we ought to have than makes us feel comfortable. Is there some way out? I maintain there must be a way out because we have learned how to produce more goods than we can use.

If a realistic financial system were adopted, such as I have indicated but not gone into in great detail, it would make a tremendous difference to many problems with which we are confronted in our country.

In the first place, we could solve our international trade problem in this manner. We could create debt-free money in Canada, Canadian dollars which are necessary in paying for the things we desire to export, and which Britain and the other countries need. We could lend these dollars to Britain or other prospective customers to allow them to buy our goods directly. Some will say that does not make sense. If hon. members will read a fine document in the library entitled "The United States in the World Economy", they will find that the United States adopted a very similar lending policy in 1920. That policy was continued all through what was known as the roaring twenties, when the United States sold her goods with great success. In the process, of course, other nations incurred to her a debt that would never be repaid. Only when the United States ceased this foreign lending policy did the depression commence.

It can be shown that lending money to neighbouring nations to buy our goods has been practised time and again with great success, particularly by Great Britain. If this method were adopted, I shall not discuss the matter of repayment, but that could be arranged or the debt could be cancelled. The important thing is to sell these goods. Before anyone has too much to say, I should remind him that if he wants to ask any questions, that is all right. Do not say something that is going to reveal a lack of judgment. Before men have too much to say, just let them look into these matters. Read the book entitled, "The United States in the World Economy", and you will be greatly enlightened. You will realize that we are facing a problem similar to that which faced the United States in 1920.

If the advice which social credit has given were applied to our internal problems, it would result in increased consumer purchasing power. It would put the purchasing power in the hands of the people enabling them to buy the goods which the nation produces. This would result in raising the standard of living for everyone, and would provide markets. It sounds strange to those who have never thought about it before, but the further one delves into a study of it, the more convinced one becomes that the Social Crediters have something.

Now, what would social credit's use of this debt-free money do in respect to old age pensions? Last night the Prime Minister gave us a rather forbidding picture of what he expected would happen to us if we began to pay all the people over sixty-five $100 per month. The bill would amount to something over a billion dollars. Why worry about a billion dollars?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Blackmore: That sounds funny, but does it not sound ridiculous that a nation that is producing $16,500 million worth of goods in a year cannot provide a billion dollars for its aged people. Laugh that off. A nation that can produce $16,500 million worth of milk, butter, cheese, clothing, shelter, etc., cannot produce one and a half billion dollars for the elderly people! Such a nation needs to have something done to its head. There is no doubt about that. What leads people into bewildered thinking is the belief that all the money we use to distribute goods has to come out of the taxpayer's pocket. This is not so, as the Right Hon. Reginald McKenna clearly indicates.

In respect of old age pensions, let me say that we would not pay them according to how much we could take from the taxpayer; we would pay them in accordance with the amount of goods we were producing. Certainly, if every person in Canada over sixty-five years of age were receiving $100 per month, it would represent an important factor in the event of the onset of a depression. If it could be done without increasing taxation, surely it is the responsibility of the members of this house to see that it is done.

Suppose we turn now to the Indian problem. I believe everyone in this house will agree that the aged Indian should be receiving an old age pension. Everyone agrees that we have neglected our Indians in the matter of education. Everyone agrees that there should be an Indian claims commission to give the Indian a fair deal such as he was promised by those with whom he made the first agreements a hundred years ago. Everyone agrees that the Indian ought to have the money with which to start out. Yet, in all these ways we are neglecting our Indians in a manner which is a public scandal. Indians are not being neglected because we do not want to do right by them but because we do not know how to finance; not because we cannot produce all the goods and services to provide the Indian with all the fine things he ought to have, but because we do not know how to put those goods and services in the hands of the Indians.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this whole situation constitutes a cause for serious thought. It has been said that the people of my group are engaged in being gloom mongers, but that is far from the case. When I first came here as a member 14 years ago, the Hon. W. R. Motherwell, whom some members may remember, who was the premier of Saskatchewan at one time and federal minister of agriculture, one of the finest men who ever sat in this house—

Mr. Boucher: May I ask the hon. member who has the floor to tell me the year in which the Hon. Mr. Motherwell was premier of Saskatchewan?

Mr. Blackmore: I shall finish my speech first. He was the minister of agriculture in this House of Commons. If I made a misstatement as to his having been premier of Saskatchewan, I shall take it back, but it has nothing to do with my general argument.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Blackmore: If I have said something bad about him, it would be a terrible thing.

Mr. Boucher: It certainly would.

Mr. Blackmore: But I did not.

Mr. Boucher: You could not.

Mr. Blackmore: No, I did not. Mr. Motherwell said that this Social Credit group constituted the only bright spot in this house. As the days go by, you will find that this group does constitute the only bright spot in the house, because it is the only group that can see its way through the difficulties. Others cannot see, not because the light did not shine, but because the people who should have seen it were blind and could not see it.

The point is that the Social Crediters, being the people who think in terms of the new economy, see only cause for rejoicing in the great increases in production. Why should there not be rejoicing when we can produce more of everything than man can consume? If we were unable to do so that would be a real cause for worry, but we are able to produce so much more with our wonderful machines, with our wonderful ability to use solar energy, our knowledge about plastics and many other things. We have now reached the point where we can produce more than the world can use. Yet, Mr. Speaker, there are now at least a billion people in the world who are on the verge of starvation; people who are actually suffering for want of the goods that we can produce. In the face of this, we are contemplating methods of limiting our production because we do not know how to distribute those goods in our own country, much less among the people abroad.

The group of people who see in this wonderful productive capacity of this world a cause for joy certainly cannot be called gloom mongers. The world has never been in a happier time than it is today, if we only knew how to live in an age of abundance, instead of continuing to try to live in an age of abundance by using a financial system adapted only for an age of scarcity. Our financial system was built up to meet conditions of an age of scarcity. We now have reached a time when we have an age of abundance. The use of machines, solar energy and other devices has displaced man; and because we cannot employ men and give jobs, we do not know what in the world to do with them, and we do not know what to do with the goods which they could buy if they could get the money with which to buy them. I contend, Mr. Speaker, that there is every reason for rejoicing. No generation in this world has ever been so blessed as this generation, and no people on this earth are more blessed than the Canadian people. Let us look up. Let us think our way out of the difficulty. It will require new thought and new energy; but in my judgment the members of this house are capable of that new thought and of that new energy for devising new means.

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): In taking part in this debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, Mr. Speaker, my first remarks should be those of congratulation to the mover and seconder of the address. I thought they both did a masterly job, especially the mover, who was extremely tactful in the delivery of his speech.

I also want to congratulate one who has become a sincere friend of mine since I have been in the House of Commons on his elevation to a cabinet portfolio; I refer to the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Harris). I am sure that he will do justice to the position he now occupies, judging from his performance in the years I have known him in this House of Commons.

In the speech from the throne there is reference to the proposal of a general conference early next autumn between the provincial governments and our federal government in order that matters of mutual concern might be discussed. I would think that the welfare of municipal organizations throughout Canada, both urban and rural, should be of some concern now. With that in mind, I believe that heads of provincial and municipal organizations should be invited to participate in this proposed conference. Within this federal cabinet there is apparently a complete lack of understanding of many basic municipal problems. According to the Canadian Parliamentary Guide, I find that not one of the present federal ministers is shown as having had municipal administrative experience. That situation is unique, when you consider the fact that the ministers represent all parts of this nation from coast to coast.

I want to refer especially to the matter of grants to municipalities in lieu of taxation. This matter is also mentioned in the speech from the throne. I happened to receive a copy of lengthy correspondence which the Winnipeg and Manitoba chambers of commerce mailed to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) under date of January 30, 1950. I want to endorse wholeheartedly the arguments contained in that correspondence, but I do not intend to quote it. I wish, however, to say that with respect to Winnipeg, in which there is federal property valued at over $7 million and assessed at $5 million, that is slightly over 2 per cent of their assessment; therefore under this 4 per cent regulation of the federal government they are not entitled to any grants. As I say, I want to endorse that argument wholeheartedly.

More than that, at our Manitoba municipal convention last fall, which is recognized as the municipal parliament in Manitoba, the province from which I come, there was keen discussion on this matter of federal grants in lieu of taxation, and a strong resolution was passed there requesting reconsideration of that matter. I would hope that the government would reconsider their attitude, because most if not all of the cities west of the great lakes do not qualify at all under the present regulations.

Then there was the matter of federal aid to education. I do not intend to repeat the arguments that I set forth on this issue at the last session of parliament, but I want to endorse all of the remarks so ably made in debate yesterday by the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Low). I thought he did a splendid job with respect to his arguments on federal aid to education. Having regard to my own leader, Mr. Drew, the people of Ontario especially recognize what a splendid job he did and what a splendid reputation he now has as the result of being minister of education in a government in Ontario; and he fully endorses federal aid to education.

In Manitoba the cost of education is borne to the extent of 75 per cent by a levy on real estate. That is an absurd situation. We have districts in which the highest-assessed land in the district has not produced any revenue over a period of three or four years: in one district that was because of flooding. Yet that property pays the biggest tax of any property there, for school purposes. When you think of such an inadequate system, under which 75 per cent of the cost of education throughout the province is obtained through a levy on real estate, you can see that it is completely out of date. Without repeating my arguments of last session, I want to endorse wholeheartedly the matter of federal aid to education and also to say, as was said by the leader of the Social Credit party, that I am greatly disappointed, after our debate last session, that no mention of this matter was contained in the speech from the throne at this time. That matter also was dealt with at the municipal parliament of Manitoba or the municipal convention last fall, and a strong resolution was passed asking federal aid for education and also criticizing severely our provincial department of education in Manitoba for not doing more than they are doing. I am sorry to have to be so critical of our Manitoba Department of Education, but they have failed miserably with respect to their financial contribution to education throughout the province, and they have failed in other ways apart from that. I am sorry to say that they are so far behind the departments of education in many other provinces.

Reference was also made in the speech from the throne to the downward adjustment in the price of farm products. That is an important issue from coast to coast in Canada at this particular time, and all the more so when you consider the manner in which the producers have been misled by various federal government ministers throughout the past years and encouraged to expand their production. I wish to remind the house and the country that this government from 1942 to 1949, by their policy of, as a neighbour of mine said, "Gardinerizing" Canadian agriculture, has cost the farmer producers of Canada approximately $2,000 million that they might have had if they had been permitted to market their production on the same basis as the farmers of the United States, that great nation to the south of us. That is a great deal of money which they might have had in good times in order to tide them over the depressing market situation that now faces us suddenly. That is what it cost our producers through controls and embargoes imposed by our own government throughout those years. A recent survey of the Sanford Evans bureau in Winnipeg has pointed out that, with respect to wheat, in the period 1945 to 1949, the Anglo-Canadian wheat agreement has already cost the Canadian farmers $536,229,978. That is the loss, the difference between what the farmers in the United States received for a like number of bushels of their product and the amount received by our agriculturalists. According to that bureau, the average half section in western Canada had a loss each year of $1,064; or on a bushel basis the United States farmer received approximately 50 cents more per bushel for his wheat than his Canadian neighbour all during those four years.

At a given point, North Portal, where the main street divides the village, and the United States farmer delivers his grain to the elevator on one side of the street and the Canadian farmer delivers his grain on the opposite side of the street, according to market prices of February 7, 1950, which is not many days ago, the United States of America farmer received at the elevator, equal to Canadian funds, $2.14 per bushel. The Canadian farmer received $1.58½ per bushel, or a difference of 55½ cents per bushel. Therefore you will see, Mr. Speaker, that since the survey of the Sanford Evans bureau, instead of our loss improving since it was made it is becoming greatly aggravated as the days go by.

Then quite recently the federal government have changed the terms of the final year of the wheat agreement, not in the interests of the wheat producers but rather in the interests of certain other producers who had received much better treatment from this government throughout the war years than did the wheat producer. In that respect I should like to quote from part of an editorial of the Winnipeg Free Press of December 23, headed "Sacrificing the prairies."

> Latest reports from Ottawa are to the effect that by agreement between the United Kingdom and Canadian governments $2,500,000 is being diverted from the purchase of wheat to lumber. This is the third diversion of this kind to be reported in the past few days. The three amount to $30 million or to 15 million bushels at $2 per bushel.
> Under the United Kingdom-Canada wheat agreement the British government is pledged to buy 140 million bushels at $2 per bushel, Fort William, in the crop year ending July 31, 1950. This is the fourth and final year of the agreement. Beyond July 31, 1950, there is no contract and, according to Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner, Minister of Agriculture, no likelihood of one. It is clearly understood, however, that the quantity of wheat not sold under the contract because of these diversions will be bought by the United Kingdom at the price of $2 per bushel in the crop year 1950-51.
> There has been a good deal of loose talk about the diversion from wheat to bacon, lumber and salmon. It has been presented here in the west as a mere postponement of the sale of a few million bushels of wheat, which will not really touch the pocket book of western farmers.
> This is not true. The wheat producers of the west should note carefully what is happening to them under the political control of their business. This so-called diversion of cash from wheat to other products means the loss by the wheat growers of this money. There is no diversion at all. To the extent involved—$30 million as the figures now stand—the people who will receive it will not be wheat producers here in the west but hog producers largely in the east and lumber and salmon producers. This money will be irretrievably lost to the wheat producers.

In debates in past years I have pointed out the great advantage that the eastern hog producers had over our western people. In any successful business I think that we should feed our stock on the farm where the feed is produced rather than clutter up the transport system and the manpower problem; but at one time in Canada, owing to free freight on feed grain coming east, and other advantages, there was an advantage to the eastern hog producers of $9 per hog. That was a matter of $125 million of subsidies of free freight which all the taxpayers of Canada paid for. That is only one little example of very much of this business. Both the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and his parliamentary assistant encouraged agricultural producers of wheat, bacon, poultry, dairy products, fruit and vegetables, and so on, to expand their production year after year throughout this country, telling those producers that, by taking less than prevailing world prices during wartime and after the war, they were assured of good overseas markets in the future. You know of the glowing pictures of future export trade which were painted during the election campaign last year by both the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and the Minister of Agriculture.

In a recent speech at London the Minister of Agriculture stated that he had information and had known for two years past, that Britain did not want to buy further produce from Canada other than her wheat. Can you imagine a responsible minister of the government, who had that information, encouraging as far as possible the expansion of agricultural production in this country? I know of many poultry people and others who had invested their money in plant expansion. Now they are suddenly informed that they had been misled, that there are no markets for them. I think it is most unfair that if these ministers had that information it was not imparted to those producers throughout the country.

I have been amazed to read in papers from coast to coast reports of the speech of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture. I shall quote a paragraph from the British Columbia Country Life:

> Advice of Robert McCubbin, parliamentary assistant to Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner, Minister of Agriculture, to his fellow farmers, so the Canadian press reports, is that they develop their own markets and do not rely on the dominion government to help them secure outlets. Under normal circumstances, that would be sound advice but under present circumstances it is difficult to understand how such advice could be followed, because the farmers are helpless, in respect of developing markets within the British commonwealth of nations and in foreign countries.

It is difficult to understand. I have great respect for this gentleman to whom I am referring. He is the parliamentary assistant to the minister and assisted him in encouraging the farmers from coast to coast to expand their development; and by controls, embargoes and so on made it impossible for these same producers to obtain what they might have obtained during those years. Now when they find themselves in this dilemma they are put on their own to find markets to sell their produce. I say that is a very surprising statement to come from one occupying the position of parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture. He apparently spoke as one of and for the government. He supported every one of these measures of control and embargo to which I have referred, and which prevented those producers from obtaining as much revenue as they otherwise might have obtained.

Also during those war years the ex-prime minister, the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, and the Minister of Agriculture, assured us repeatedly that by taking less money than they otherwise might have obtained these overseas markets were being assured to those producers in the future. Therefore it is all the more disappointing. I cannot find language strong enough to emphasize the seriousness of this situation. Since I am one of those who have spent their lives studying agriculture, I believe it to be the basic industry of this country upon which all other industries must build if we are to have a prosperous and united people in Canada. Therefore a great and serious obligation rests upon this government to make good some of those losses during the very trying and difficult days that lie ahead of us in the near future.

There is another matter to which I wish to refer. I want to urge the government to set up a standing committee of the House of Commons on veterans' affairs. I think that is very important. There are many problems which face our veterans in this country. Reference has been made in the speech from the throne to bills which will be introduced having to do with veterans' problems. That in itself is further proof of the necessity of what I suggest.

In my opinion the consolidated measure in connection with national defence, when it is introduced, should be referred to a committee for consideration. I realize that last year the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) had strong arguments against the formation of such a committee. If he still retains those arguments, then I would point out to him that he himself is a veteran and I am sure every veteran, irrespective of the corner of the house in which he may sit, is vitally interested in national defence at this time. I would imagine that, if a special committee were set up to consider matters connected with national defence, many of the members who served on veterans' committees would be members of such a special committee at this session. Therefore I urge with all the power at my command that a veterans' committee of the house be set up to look after veterans' affairs, and that this very important measure should be referred to it.

I wish to quote some observations of the Minister of National Defence which appeared some time ago in Maclean's magazine. He stated:

> One reason why parliament has not functioned better is that 245 members cannot get down to close grips with a subject. Also there is not enough time for the whole house to deal with everything. Hence, the practice of referring specific matters to committees for study and report should be extended.

Then he states further on:

Committees should sit regularly on matters like manpower and labour, financial and economic questions, reconstruction, external affairs and information, munitions and supplies, agriculture,—

And then the very points contained in the new bill—

—the navy, the army and the air force.

This is his own expression as published in Maclean's some time ago.

He says:

The United States Senate has forty-seven committees exercising great power. We do not need anything like that number. The close connection of our executive with our legislative branches makes it unnecessary. Fifteen working committees of our house, most of them only meeting through half the session, would do the job. My fifth point, therefore, is: Whenever possible a matter of major importance should be referred to a committee of parliament and where necessary the committee should be provided with adequate research assistance.

I am sure there is no one in the country who would not agree that this is a very important matter and that the committee should deal with those very items set forth so well by the Minister of National Defence. As I say, I know there would not be many who would not be interested in a veterans' committee, and I urge the necessity of such a committee so that this bill may be referred to it for consideration.

I have already referred to the speeches of one parliamentary assistant, when I have been discussing this matter of veterans' affairs. There is another parliamentary assistant, a very good friend of mine, the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch), to whom I would refer. Knowing him, as I have known him most of my life, I find it most difficult to understand the speech he made only the other day to a businessmen's club in Toronto. More especially do I find it difficult to understand when I point out that he is parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Gregg). His speech is reported in the Toronto Daily Star, a newspaper which, after all, has been rather friendly at times to this government, I believe. The article is headed "Social Security under Fire" and states:

In addressing the Toronto Liberal Businessmen's Association, Mr. Leslie Mutch, Liberal M.P. for Winnipeg South, had some hard things to say about social security. He is quoted as stating that "social security in Canada is an ill-fitting garment that hampers our development and could strangle us." Mr. Mutch might have stopped there and felt he had put social security in its place. But he saw fit to add that social security "is the excuse of the lazy, the narcotic of the weak-willed and the refuge of the coward."

[Mr. Ross (Souris).]

With those remarks and more along the same line, Mr. Mutch left no doubt that he does not approve of social security. The revelation might be of slight interest were it not that Mr. Mutch is parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs in a Liberal administration.

I recollect that this hon. member was out campaigning against me in my riding last summer. I happen to have with me one of the advertisements which appeared so frequently in all newspapers throughout Canada, and which dealt with social security. "Vote Liberal For Your Future Social Security". Is this not a strange set of circumstances? It is difficult to find a reasonable explanation for it.

There is another matter I should like to mention, and my reason for bringing it up now is that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) did make reference to it yesterday. He referred several times to the House of Commons, and the overwhelming majority this government received last June. As to the number of members elected, I am bound to agree with him. I believe he stated yesterday, if I heard him correctly, that 73 per cent of the constituencies in Canada by their votes certainly approved of this government and its policies.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Very good.

Mr. Rowe: Just approved the part he told them.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): And it will be repeated.

Mr. Ross (Souris): There have been very few sessions since I came to the House of Commons that I have not spoken in favour of the transferable vote. Therefore I cannot be accused of advocating something new because of the present set of circumstances. However, it could happen the opposite way in another election.

Let me place on record some figures released to the Canadian Press on August 24. The article states:

A record total of 5,856,307 votes was cast in the June 27 general election compared with 5,246,130 in the 1945 election, it was disclosed Tuesday by Jules Castonguay, chief electoral officer.

The Liberal party, returned to power with an overwhelming majority, received 2,926,029 votes in the last election compared with 2,170,625 in 1945.

The Progressive Conservatives, second largest group in the commons, polled 1,742,235, compared with 1,455,453.

Then the article gives the figures for the C.C.F. and Social Credit parties.

The point I wish to make clear is that it is indicated by this statement from the chief electoral officer that the majority of people who cast their votes on June 27 did not vote for the present government in Canada.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Oh, oh; that is a good one.

Mr. Ross (Souris): To break that down, just a shade under 50 per cent of the electors obtained 75 per cent of the government seats. Approximately 30 per cent elected 16 per cent of the seats occupied by the Progressive Conservative party; 13 per cent of the voters elected 5 per cent of the seats occupied by the C.C.F.; and approximately 7 per cent elected the 4 per cent occupied by Social Credit and other members.

In other words, on the basis of these figures it required approximately 15,160 votes to elect a Liberal last June, as compared with about 42,540 to elect a Progressive Conservative. Then, at that general election there were some 121 members elected to this House of Commons by minority votes within their ridings.

Mr. Cruickshank: And some by majority votes, too.

Mr. Ross (Souris): The balance were majority votes. I am stating my argument in favour of the transferable vote, as it has been in operation in Manitoba and Alberta for many years. In each of those provinces, before a candidate can be elected he must have received a majority of ballots cast on election day. In my view that is the only democratic way.

Mr. Gardiner: It made a difference in only three by-elections.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I am not saying anything about that. I do say that members should be elected by a majority of the people. I have been here as a minority candidate—on other occasions as a candidate elected by a clear majority. However, I feel strongly in the matter because I believe some day we will find ourselves in great difficulty because a majority of the people have not elected our representatives to parliament. I admit that I have been on both sides, and I think I made that quite clear. I urge the government to amend the Dominion Elections Act to provide for the transferable vote before another election occurs in this dominion.

Mr. Cruickshank: That will give us a larger majority.

Mr. Ross (Souris): That is O.K. with me if the electors so decide. Then we had the withholding of the report of the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act on the flour-milling industry which was dated December 29, 1948, but withheld until November 7, 1949. In the debates that followed we had both the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) and the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) absolutely contradicting the statements they had previously made during the last session of parliament.

Then on December 9, 1949, as recorded on page 2983 of Hansard, there is the silly statement of the Minister of Justice that it was quite impossible for him to comply with the act and make public the report within the required fifteen days. Then he reversed himself by the action he took later on when he made public the reports on the glass and match industries within the fifteen-day period required by the act. In that connection I should like to quote from an editorial in Maclean's magazine of December 15, 1949, as follows:

> This government has been guilty of deliberate defiance of the law, by the very men sworn to administer it. This is an offence that ought not to be forgiven.
> By the Combines Investigation Act, the Minister of Justice is obliged to publish any report of the combines investigation commissioner within fifteen days of receiving it. That clause has been kept in the act by the government's own insistence. A couple of years ago John Diefenbaker urged them to modify it—he thought it too rigid, leaving the minister no option but to publish even an unfair report. The government brushed him off. The "white light of publicity" was just what they wanted, they said; abolition of that clause would defeat the main purpose of the act.
> That was their attitude until December 29, 1948, when Fred McGregor turned in his report on the flour milling industry.

And then again:

> So, in the words of justice minister Stuart Garson, the government "took the responsibility" of ignoring the law. Instead of publishing the McGregor report, they sat on it until after the election.
> This action is indefensible—as the government well knows. No coherent defence of it has been attempted. Liberal M.P.'s admit cheerfully that the government is wholly in the wrong, but they add cynically that the voters will have forgotten it by 1953.
> If we forget that easily we deserve the kind of treatment we've been getting.

Then this afternoon I listened to my good friend, the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor), refer to the generosity of the Minister of Justice. I am sure the hon. member would have obtained endorsation of his statement if he had consulted with the officials of the millers' association. I am sure they would have told him that they also appreciated the great generosity of our Minister of Justice. At page 79 of the report it is stated that in effect the millers' association had a double set of minutes. Surely that matter should have been looked into, but yet the report was withheld until the time had expired when anybody could institute legal action against the millers. Only the courts of this land could decide whether they were guilty or not.

As I say, I am sure that my hon. friend would have found endorsation of his statement as to the generosity of the Minister of Justice. I wonder about the people in our country, especially those in our high schools, our universities and churches. They are endeavouring to teach our young people respect for the law of the land. I can well remember my teachings and that previously I had never known of a minister of justice, irrespective of what political affiliation he may have had, who was not possessed of character and high principles or who could be pushed around.

There should be respect for our parliamentary institutions. That respect should be instilled very strongly in the minds of the younger people of this nation. Yet those young people are today openly saying that this session of parliament has opened with the same minister at the head of that great Department of Justice for which we have had such great respect, and that is considered to be a direct reflection on the Prime Minister of this nation who is responsible for his appointment. I feel keenly about this. I do not think it matters whether certain ministers on the front benches are here, individually, or whether I am here, but I am concerned about the example being set before the rising generation, especially when they are faced with the difficulties they have to contend with in growing up to manhood and womanhood.

I have been amazed at the lighthearted attitude of the Minister of Justice toward such a serious matter as this. We held him in deep respect when he was in Manitoba. I regret his attitude toward such a serious matter and the example he has set as head of this important department to the young Canadian citizens who are growing up.

In conclusion I want to urge as strongly as I can upon the government that as agriculture is the basic industry of all national progress upon which all other industries in Canada must build, the same basis of income tax exemption should be allowed to the Canadian farmer for building, equipment or plant expansion during 1949 or 1950 as has been allowed to industry. Respectable floor price legislation should be provided immediately for agricultural products. The policy for the handling and disposal of the 1950 wheat crop should be made known before the Easter recess so that our farmers may have this information before seeding time.

I urge that the Crowsnest pass freight agreement be left on the statute books and be not placed in the hands of the transport commission. I urge that provision be made for the granting of federal aid to education. This is most essential, as has been pointed out by members on all sides of the house, as in different parts of the country there is great inequality in the opportunities afforded for education. There is nothing more important in this nation today than education.

I urge that the federal properties grants in lieu of local taxes scheme be reconsidered and a more equitable and reasonable plan worked out and offered to the municipalities. I urge that the committee of the House of Commons on veterans' affairs be set up and that when the consolidation measure in connection with national defence is introduced it be referred to this committee for consideration. I urge that the elections act be amended and provision made for the use of the transferable vote.

I shall support the amendment moved by my leader and seconded by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), which reads:

That the following words be added to the said address:

"We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that Your Excellency's advisers have:

(1) failed to take adequate measures to preserve and expand markets for Canada's surplus products of farm, forest, sea and mine, and to deal with the problems of increasing unemployment and reduced income to Canadian farmers and other producers; and

(2) failed to take steps to inaugurate a national contributory system of old age pensions without a means test; and

(3) deliberately violated a law of this parliament by illegally suppressing the report of the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act on the flour milling industry for ten months, including the period of the recent general election campaign, and denied to parliament information essential to the performance of its duty and the maintenance of responsible government; and

(4) failed to take adequate measures to curb espionage and other harmful activities of communists in Canada.

For these and other reasons we respectfully submit that Your Excellency's advisers are not entitled to the confidence of this house."

(Translation):

Mr. Pierre Gauthier (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, it is always comforting to note that in the House of Commons we can use either of the two languages said to be official in Canada and speak in our mother tongue or in the language which is said to be that of the majority. We wish Canada to become a bilingual country and I think that where there is a will there is a way. Moreover, the example set in this house should spread throughout the country. The friendly tussles of days gone by have ended. This means that Canada, with its religious and political freedom and its dual culture can, nay should, become one of the great countries of the world.

It is customary, and the tradition is commendable, to congratulate the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I am delighted to do so because these two gentlemen, younger members of the house, acquitted themselves like veterans.

Naturally, I am better acquainted with the riding represented by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Dumas) since I toured it a few years ago. I notice that he devoted special attention to the mining problem.

The constituency of Portneuf and especially its population are concerned with mining matters because the county has very rich mineral deposits. In fact, one mine is already in operation and another soon will be. Moreover, I am sure others will be developed in the near future.

I therefore congratulate the two hon. members for a good job well done and I am certain that the house and their constituents are very grateful.

Mr. Speaker, last week we received the sad news of the death of Judge Lucien Cannon, of the superior court. Portneuf county, which he represented for a few months only, is especially saddened by his demise.

If the bench has lost an eminent jurist, the body politic cannot remain indifferent, since it too loses one of its most brilliant orators. In the course of its many sessions, the House of Commons of Canada was the scene of important discussions, famous in our parliamentary annals, to which Lucien Cannon, then member for Dorchester, brought many assets, his remarkable power of expression, and his exceptionally fine and powerful talent as a debater.

Those who have crossed swords with him know better than anybody else how keen was his blade, how quick his hand. His political battles in Dorchester and Portneuf have not been forgotten; they are still well remembered by those people who love good and brilliant speeches. They love fighters and Lucien Cannon had no peer on the hustings.

As for us, we had him in our midst for three months, during which time we were able to appreciate his broad mind, his heart ever open to all requests from his electors, his utter devotion to all those who had placed their trust in him. During those three months, Mr. Cannon worked methodically and devotedly for the welfare of his new constituents.

The bench took him away from us in 1936, but he left behind him fond memories.

A brilliant man, he served his country well and will be remembered as an outstanding figure in our political and legal life.

At the risk of again passing for a fascist, a supporter of Franco, I wish to thank the government for having allowed a peaceful invasion of Spain by our commercial attachés. I feel sure that both our country and theirs will profit much by it and I hope that the Canadian government will even go further and appoint an ambassador so that we may take advantage not only of commercial exchanges but also of cultural exchanges since all the members of this house know the high value of Spanish culture or of any other Latin culture for that matter.

I trust that in making this request to the government again as I have during the last three sessions, I shall not be branded as a fascist or a supporter of Franco. Even if I were, the only explanation I could give would be that, first of all, I believe in the full enjoyment of all political, social, economic and religious liberties under a moral law. If I requested, interceded and prayed for the re-establishment of our relations with Spain, I did so for two good reasons which were, which are and which will ever be all-important. First, Spain was the anti-communist bulwark in Europe; second, Spain is a strategic point which could close the entrance to the Mediterranean sea should our enemies, the communists in this case, take a part of Africa and definitely invade the European continent. Those are the two reasons I have given and I repeat them. I am proud of having insisted on renewal of our relations with Spain.

I wish to thank the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) and the Postmaster General (Mr. Rinfret) for the construction and completion of a splendid public building at Donnacona. The Post Office Department took possession of it recently. Service is perfect and I am sure that the people of Portneuf are grateful to the two hon. ministers and to the government.

I now come to a subject I have already dealt with in this house. I believe it to be important. I refer to the digging of a channel between Deschambault and Lotbinière. I know that the amount required for the dredging of this channel may seem huge to the layman and may cause the Minister of Public Works to frown. Even so, I still say that this project is necessary and unavoidable for reasons which I shall mention as briefly as possible.

The parishes concerned, the parishes of the district of Portneuf, fully aware of the necessity of this ferry have asked me to submit resolutions they have sent me to the Minister of Public Works and to the government in order that the necessary appropriations for digging the channel may be made. The parishes of Deschambault, Grondines, St. Casimir, St. Alban, Donnacona, Portneuf and St. Marc des Carrières, have sent me resolutions asking that these works be undertaken. The reason is that because of a considerable trade in fertilizers between the counties of Lotbinière and Portneuf, the digging of this channel has become absolutely necessary.

In St. Marc, they use a fertilizer known under the name "Calco", made up of pulverized stone. Farmers use it to increase the yield of their land. It is manufactured by the Deschambault quarries which sometimes employs about five hundred men during the year. Four other limestone quarries are located at St. Marc des Carrières and produce cut stone. Altogether these quarries employ over a thousand men. St. Marc des Carrières is the centre of a considerable trade which, from an economic standpoint, interests not only my constituency but also that of the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Lapointe), who knows what I am talking about and is familiar with the situation.

A resolution was forwarded to the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) requesting that certain works be carried out. I know that the hon. the Solicitor General is aware of the farmers' needs and that he will support my request to the Minister of Public Works and to the government.

Again, Mr. Speaker, the amount of money spent on those works may seem very high with respect to the needs of those two areas, but they are not for those digging operations are absolutely essential to the development of those areas. Indeed they will promote the welfare of farmers and workers of St. Marc des Carrieres and many other parishes in the constituency. These vast works would also be important from a touristic standpoint, as a ferryboat would operate 24 hours a day, eight months a year, and the money thus brought in could be spent in those two counties. I feel it would be superfluous to quote figures on the production of the various quarries I just mentioned: Deschambault Quarries, Gingras et Fils, Standard Lime, Canada Lime and J. O. Gauthier, Ltd.

Other parishes have also sent me requests. I hope that my efforts and those of the hon. member for Lotbiniere will be successful and that the government will grant our request. It is fair and reasonable and is prompted by a real need. At any rate if the government can perform these works, they will be of great benefit.

I trust I have been able, in my brief remarks, to fully convince the Minister of Public Works and the government of the necessity of these works. I trust they will carefully consider the requests of the members for Lotbiniere and Portneuf and see that the work is done during the summer so that the farmers, first of all, and then the labourers and the tourists may at last benefit from this absolutely essential ferryboat.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have a matter which may concern the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. McCann) rather than the Minister of Public Works. I see the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) is laughing but I shall come to it later.

Mr. Chevrier: I expected it sooner.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): I recently received from La Corporation de St. Marc des Carrières a resolution in which I am asked to bring pressure to bear on the government so that work on the drainage of the various quarries I have mentioned may be started. I wish, Mr. Speaker, to read the whole of this resolution dated November 21, 1949:

Whereas important drainage operations have already begun within the municipal limits;

Whereas the municipality must, in order to complete said projects, make a considerable outlay;

Whereas such drainage works are of vital importance to the operators of our quarries and, consequently, to the whole population;

Whereas the development of these quarries comes under the federal Department of Mines;

Be it therefore moved by Omer Béland, seconded by Henri Petitclerc and resolved unanimously:

That a request be made to the Minister of Mines with a view to securing a grant of $25,000 for completion of these important undertakings. And that a copy of this resolution be sent to our federal member of parliament, Dr. Pierre Gauthier.

Passed at the regular meeting held on November seventh, 1949. Certified true copy.

Jean Louis Frenette,
Secretary-treasurer

I would therefore ask the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys to accede to their request and to help these municipalities in order that this drainage may be carried out as soon as possible to improve the location and nature of these lands.

I have very little to say to the Minister of Transport, but I must thank him for having taken a hand at the right moment and when the need for it was felt. His intervention was sufficient to convince the Canadian National and certain projects were carried out in the municipality of Deschambault. May I be permitted to state here that I believe the Minister of Transport has always been friendly and, so it seems to me, that he has a soft spot for the people of my area who gave their all, not only in wartime but in peacetime, when it devolved upon them to do the piloting between Montreal and Quebec and between Quebec and Pointe-au-Père. The Minister of Transport was always willing to consider all requests, not only those that had to do with the railroads but also with piloting. I wish to thank him, until such time as I have other more specific requests to make or I have to meet him with a delegation.

I must also note, Mr. Speaker, that my hon. friend from Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Fournier) has supported all the requests made by those who sail the St. Lawrence. I do not forget either the hon. member for Levis (Mr. Bourget) who also has something to do in this connection.

You might say that I am congratulating the government pretty often. However, when the government does the right thing, I like to say so just as I like to point out the errors of its ways. When the government brought in a bill for the protection of our forests I was happy to support it and I am convinced that this act will bear very useful fruits and that the provinces will co-operate in order that our forests may be more adequately protected. I remember that when I spoke on this matter I paid particular attention to the necessity for educating our people in general, with special regard for our youth. I will make so bold now as to quote an article in English, even though I am no great hand at it, on the necessity of intensifying this type of education in our schools. This article, entitled "Schools Need Forestry Books", is taken from the publication Woodland World.

(Text):

Study programs being revised in schools of seven provinces lay more emphasis than ever before on conservation and forestry. That an encouraging pattern of conservation teaching is unfurling in elementary and secondary schools is indicated in a new handbook for Alberta teachers. It notes that teaching of conservation has traditionally been approached as our responsibility to the world of the future, and adds that present trends, however, bring out "that even in this rich new land of Canada, conservation programs are of direct significance to our present generation."

There's one discouraging factor in what otherwise looks like a promising picture. It's the lack of tools (graded reference material and suitable visual aids) to put across the program effectively. Practically all provinces deplore the fact that what material is available, particularly in elementary grades, is above the child's level of interest and comprehension.

One immediate step toward the solution of this problem would be the bulk purchase (at a special low rate) by education departments of "The Children's Book of Trees" from the Canadian Forestry Association. This book written by Leonard Knott with the editorial co-operation of C. F. A., tells the story of forests, forest protection and conservation in a way that will hold the interest of every child of elementary school age.

Still another help would be the placing of "Woodland World" and "Forest and Outdoors" in all schools for supplementary reading purposes. Through the generosity of 60 sponsors some 700 schools in outlying districts get F. & O. The same could be done for all schools through a similar but more extensive sponsorship system in which subscriptions are available at a special low rate.

Woodland World is certainly to be commended for this fine article. I hope that in the minds of the general public the impression will be created that an intensive teaching program should be started among our youngsters, and that the importance of our forests should be impressed upon them so that future generations will look on our natural resources as the real ones necessary to keep Canada in the forefront of the concert of nations.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I like to revert fairly often to certain subjects. I believe that in so doing, the words which I dare speak on this matter will have the same effect as water constantly dripping on stone where it finally leaves its mark.

Already, I have vehemently assailed drunkenness in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario and, indeed, throughout the country. I have stressed the enormous amount of hard liquor consumed in these two provinces.

If I revert to the subject, for the hundredth time perhaps, it is not for political purposes, but because, in my opinion, there is a lack of earnestness in certain quarters when it comes to canvassing taxpayers for funds for educational pursuits. On the other hand such education is useless if we waste it by making it possible for our people to drown it in a glass of beer or hard liquor.

People, especially in my province, often talk about respect for authority, which they demand at all cost. I wonder if those who so strongly advocate that respect are fully aware that they lay themselves open to ridicule. When we ask our people to respect authority, it is inconceivable that they should be taught to do so by giving them every possible means of destroying their intelligence and their health, as well as their moral, intellectual and spiritual values through inconsiderate use of alcohol.

Constitution is often discussed in my province. We should give more thought to the physical constitution of our people and to the immoderate use of alcoholic beverages not only in Quebec but in the other provinces as well. Statistics show that fabulous sums of money are spent on liquor.

Quebec and Ontario are, at the present time, launching an offensive against excessive drinking. A similar offensive may have been launched elsewhere, but I have not heard about it. We have organizations dedicated to the eradication of this evil. If these organizations are to attain results which will be of value to our nation, in a moral, physical, intellectual and spiritual sense, the governments must help them.

I do not dare ask the federal government to help those organizations, since there will most certainly be shouts from those who are afraid for their autonomy. I will nevertheless ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who seems to be listening attentively, to insist upon preventive measures, to launch, with the help of his department, a campaign for preventive medicine especially directed against alcoholism. I would ask him to give his patronage to an educational campaign with all the courage, initiative and frankness which I know him to possess, so that these associations may succeed and therefore be in a position to ensure better protection for our people.

I know that among physicians, many colleagues have no great faith in prevention. I will refer only to a case where often the members of the medical profession hesitate to speak with the necessary unanimity. Let us take for instance the use of B.C.G. vaccine against tuberculosis. I know that many doctors do not believe in constant or widespread use of B.C.G. but the minister should not be discouraged. Results obtained in the United States and Canada will soon be conclusive enough to induce the people to believe that constant use of B.C.G. can really protect the future of our population. These results will enable the minister to keep on advocating the use of the vaccine and to insist on preventive medical protection in order that unanimity may be achieved and that this preventive measure against the dread disease of tuberculosis may come into constant use and that it may emerge victorious in the battle it must wage at the present time against this disease.

While campaigning against excessive drinking the minister could, with the help of his experts, point out all the imminent perils with which our people are faced. We are even now able to see what dire results this excessive drinking has had among our youth. I ask the minister to conduct this campaign vigorously, and to help the various associations in their fight against alcoholism. Moreover all the responsible authorities in this country could rise together and build a wall in order to defend us against this danger which grows greater day by day.

(Text):

Now I shall continue in English. An inquiry was made in the state of Massachusetts on the cost of drunkenness. This is an extract from the report of the legislative commission to investigate the problem of drunkenness in Massachusetts. It reads as follows:

One of the specific requests made of this commission was that we interest ourselves in the cost of drunkenness in Massachusetts. This we have done. From the information we have been able to obtain it seems that this cost may be represented as follows:

A. Tangible Costs

1. The annual cost of caring for those mental patients whose illnesses have been caused or precipitated by alcoholism approximates	$ 4,000,000
2. The annual cost of crime due to inebriety approximates	6,000,000
3. The annual cost of financial dependence on others (or charity or whatever name one chooses to call it) due to inebriety approximates	51,000,000
Total annual probable cost	$61,000,000

Parenthetically, it might be pointed out that against this cost figure, the commonwealth and its cities and towns received $13,139,266.79 from alcoholic beverage taxation in 1943.

On the other hand, I know that if the government is receiving taxes on the consumption of alcohol, electoral funds receive money as well from liquor vendors, from tolerances, especially in my province. The electoral fund in my province is enormous from tolerances, especially where there are no licences. In my county, in my parish and in the parishes around mine, there are no licences, there is only what we call tolerances. These people are obliged—and I know it, and we can prove it any time—to give funds to the organization to help the party in the next election. Without fear of being too greatly mistaken I would say that the electoral funds coming from these tolerances would amount to over $2 million in four years.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): That is the situation.

Mr. Gibson: What party gets this?

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): In Quebec province the government is Union Nationale. Mr. Speaker, I should not like to go past my time. I have been speaking for a long time now. If I come back to the question it is because I see the danger, I see the evil done by the immoderate consumption of liquor. I repeat my request to the Minister of National Health and Welfare to help the different organizations in the country, and especially in Ontario and Quebec, so that these organizations will not see their work fade away and get discouraged after many efforts carried on and many years of battle on the right front.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, may I join with those who have already taken part in this debate by offering my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Larson) and the seconder (Mr. Dumas) of the address. Both of them carried their task through in an admirable manner, worthy of the highest traditions of this house.

In the time at my disposal I desire to make a few observations regarding the intimation that was given in the speech from the throne that amendments to the Canada Shipping Act would be introduced during this session. My remarks will be based upon various occurrences which have happened during the last few months on the Pacific coast.

In the first place I understand that the amendments will be mainly based upon recommendations which have been received from the international convention on the improvements for safety at sea, and they will also be prompted by the findings of the court of inquiry which investigated the tragic disaster of the burning of the Noronic last year. I do not intend to go into details regarding that aspect of these amendments, but I should like to say at this time that I hope restrictions placed on small vessels operating in waters that are not far removed from the shore will not be so stringent as to make it impossible for those vessels to carry on their normal trade. It might be that recommendations will be made, which would be more applicable to the larger vessels, that would cause such a heavy expense upon the smaller passenger-carrying vessels as to put them out of action, and make it impossible for their companies to carry on effectively. It might be that recommendations can be made applicable to larger vessels that would cause such an increase in the weight of the smaller vessels plying in safer waters as to very seriously reduce the carrying capacity of these smaller vessels and ferries.

Also there is the danger that if some types of automatic sprinkler systems were installed there might be just as great a danger from flooding as might exist from the danger of fire. I just close that part of my address with these remarks.

I now want to refer to an occurrence which happened last November just off the coast of Vancouver island. I refer to the sinking of of the tug George McGregor, which left Bamberton on Vancouver island at midnight on November 25 destined for Victoria. After passing into the open sea she ran into very heavy weather and sank with the loss of the entire crew of seven men with the exception of one young deckhand. A very thorough and efficiently conducted court of inquiry was held in Victoria this year on the sinking of that vessel. The finding of the court was that the George McGregor had foundered through losing her stability under adverse weather conditions. Reading from that report the statement is summed up in these words:

> After reflecting on all other potential factors we—

That is, the court.

> —took the view that this was lack of stability in that the vessel once inclined had a righting lever too low for all conditions of weather that might reasonably be encountered and in particular of the conditions of the vessel in the weather that night.

Then the court went on to examine the various causes of this disaster. It exonerated the crew, the company, the steamship inspectors and all those who were connected with the loss. In fact, the court gave high credit to all those officials and to the members of the crew for having done everything that might reasonably have been expected of good seamen to have saved the vessel.

Referring to the steamship inspectors, after complimenting them upon having carried out to the best of their ability the inspection of this vessel some time before she had gone on this voyage, the court reported:

> The steamship inspectors knew that the vessel had been classed in a recognized classification society of the United States, and there was nothing whatever in her construction or otherwise to raise any question in their minds as to her stability. In these circumstances it has not been the practice to carry out inclining experiments.

Then, a little later on, the report goes on to make recommendations, one of which was to call to the attention of the Department of Transport the advisability of applying inclining tests to foreign-built vessels hereafter coming under Canadian registry and steamship inspection for the first time, failing satisfactory proof as to the vessel's stability having been established while under foreign registry.

That seems a reasonable recommendation, and I hope it will be possible to include it, or some modification of it, in the amendments introduced this session to the Canada Shipping Act. Subsequently the steamship inspection board in Vancouver called a meeting of the owners of fish boats and tugs to discuss this question of having stability tests. I believe the board of steamship inspectors there stated that stability tests would be carried out by steamship inspectors in future.

I think that that was a slightly different practice, or was notification that a slightly different practice would be followed from that which had been carried out on the Pacific coast in the past when, if a stability test was required, naval architects were invited to come in and to carry out those tests in the presence and to the satisfaction of the steamship inspectors.

There is a difference between the steamship inspector carrying out the inspection himself, and calling upon an expert naval architect to carry out the test in his presence. It is questionable whether the examination for entry into the steamship inspection service calls for high enough standards in mathematics to enable a steamship inspector, once he is admitted to the service, to carry out the rather complicated tests demanded, if the stability of a vessel is to be thoroughly tested.

It is questionable whether steamship inspectors without the adequate knowledge might not constitute a very serious danger to shipping and seafaring men in the future as, if the tests were not carried out efficiently, it might result in a considerable loss of life.

Without going into all the technical details required to carry out these inclining tests, I might say that they consist of shifting known weights through measured distances across the surface of a vessel, and at the same time measuring the angle of heel of that vessel as the weights are shifted across its surface. The weight of a vessel is then obtained by the volume of the displacement of water. Hence what is known as the GM or metacentric height in the condition in which the vessel is then inclined is obtained. Then follows an analysis of the stability of the vessel under various conditions—that is, the amount of cargo she may be carrying, whether it is a full or a half cargo, whether her tanks are full or only partly filled, the number of passengers and so on.

As a result of that analysis it then becomes possible to plot the hydrostatic curves—that is, the height of the metacentric above the baseline at the various drafts. Then, through the means of a rather expensive instrument known as an integrator, the curves of the righting lever are plotted. Those in the trade are known as the GZ curves. These show the maximum righting lever tending to return the vessel into an upright condition. They will also show the range at which the righting lever may disappear when, of course, the ship would capsize.

I understand there are no precise or fixed mathematical standards which can determine these actual ranges or distances at which the vessel may right herself, or at which it is inevitable that she will collapse. That is where the personal and professional experience of the naval architect can be brought into play. From the data that he has acquired from his calculations, and from his experience, he is able to advise as to the stability of the particular vessel under examination.

The point that I should like to have considered is whether it is now advisable to have these stability tests carried out entirely by the steamship inspectors and whether it might not be desirable to require a higher standard of education in order to enter that service than has been considered necessary in the past. It might still be advisable to call in qualified professional naval architects to carry out these inspections, as has been done in the past in the presence and to the satisfaction of the steamship inspector who was present. In view of the unfortunate experience that occurred with this particular vessel I believe it is most desirable that ships being brought under Canadian registry from a foreign flag should be required to take the stability and inclining tests that are now considered essential.

I come now to another occurrence in Pacific waters during the last few months and I refer to the experiences of the S.S. Lake Canim. Last summer the Chinese national government informed various governments of the world that they were going to close to foreign vessels certain ports then held by the communist forces of China and the territorial waters adjacent to certain parts of China, that they would in effect establish a blockade of certain ports and the entrance to certain navigable rivers of China. Great Britain, the United States, and I believe Canada, refused to accept that announced blockade as being valid because according to international law a blockade must be real and effective. The Chinese national government were not able to produce evidence that would lead the other great powers to believe that they were able to establish a real and effective blockade of the waters which they claimed they were going to close to foreign vessels. I believe that the great powers, including Canada, announced that they would retain their freedom of action to deal with any incident that might occur.

At the same time Canada warned interested shipping companies that if their vessels were trading in these wtaers they might expect attack by Chinese national forces or Chinese air forces which might try to intercept their vessels as they were moving into or out of the ports in question. A little later, I believe December 20 was the exact date, the announcement was made that these waters would be mined and warnings were sent out, certainly to United States vessels, that such action was taking place.

A Canadian ship, the Lake Canim which I have mentioned, owned and operated by the Western Canada Steamship Company of Vancouver under the command of Captain J. Wright, was in Far Eastern waters. She had been to Japan and then had been ordered to proceed to Hong Kong. According to a statement by the president of the company, Mr. J. Racine, she was instructed to take on a cargo in Hong Kong and to proceed to Shanghai, one of the ports designated by the Chinese national government as being closed. I believe that the crew of the ship took objection to embarking on the voyage, but the voyage was carried out, the so-called blockade was run successfully, the cargo was delivered at Shanghai and the Lake Canim returned to Hong Kong.

She then took on a second cargo and again was instructed to proceed to Shanghai. When she came near to the entrance of the river leading up to Shanghai she ran into trouble. She was shelled by a Chinese gunboat, according to press dispatches. She ran aground and only just managed to get off before the Chinese war vessel came. After a third attempt she had to abandon her efforts to reach Shanghai. She was chased away by a Chinese gunboat and had to land her cargo some 400 miles to the north of Shanghai at Tsingtao, after which she proceeded to Hong Kong where she went into drydock.

On January 27 of this year a letter was published in the Victoria Daily Colonist written by Mr. H. Mobsby, the engineer on that vessel. He describes some of the experiences undergone by this ship in attempting to run the blockade at Shanghai. I shall read this letter because it contains a graphic description of this vessel's experiences. He says:

> So far we have tried to run for it twice. The first time it was seven a.m. with a heavy rain and mist. We were about two and a half to three miles past the gunboat—apparently we caught them asleep at the radar apparatus—when the weather cleared and he saw us.
> He (the gunboat) straddled us with a couple of shells, so we had to stop and return to anchor outside the three-mile limit.
> His placing of the shells was perfect and the next one, I am sure, would have popped us.
> On our next attempt, it was 3 a.m. with heavy fog, we went into the darkness with all lights blacked out, even the running lights.
> This time we went aground four miles up the channel. He—

That is the Chinese gunboat.

> —must have spotted us, for his searchlight began working as we were making a frantic effort to get free of the mud bank . . .

Then a little later, describing the third attempt, he said:

> . . . we have real opposition, a destroyer, roughly 35 knots and armed to the teeth . . . blocking the narrow channel. Besides this he has the usual naval large-screen radar, so it would be foolish to attempt it.

It was then that the Lake Canim turned around and delivered her cargo at another port. This cargo, I understand, was of considerable value, consisting mainly of chemicals. Apparently there were no Lloyd's surveyors at Hong Kong at the time; therefore Lloyd's did not pass on either the nature or the storage of that cargo. With respect to the reaction of the crew Mr. Mobsby writes:

> Then when . . . the news came through, destination for cargo was Shanghai, everyone exploded and asked to be paid off and sent home. However, same was refused . . . We were politely informed that our agreement was for one year, and to break it at this time would mean three to six months in jail. Consequently, here we are at the mouth of the Yangtze.

I have been shown letters from other members of the crew of this vessel which also indicate that the crew very much disliked the idea of going into what they described as a war zone, where they would have to run abnormal risks, in order to deliver their cargo at a port which the Chinese nationalist government had declared closed and as to which the Canadian government had advised all concerned that if they entered those waters they were liable to be intercepted by hostile air and naval craft, and also that mines had been laid.

We have all kinds of regulations to protect the man working in a factory, but here were men who had signed on for a sea cruise for a year. They were prepared to run all the normal marine risks which might be described as acts of God, such as hurricanes and tempests, in the course of their normal duties. Suddenly, without being asked to volunteer and without their consent, they were told they must enter a zone in which they would experience exceptional dangers because of the hostile attitude of the nationalist government. It does seem to me these seafaring men, who are required to sign on for a year and who may be punished with jail sentences if they desert ship or seek to be paid off at other than a Canadian port before the end of that year, deserve more protection than they are getting at the present time. The mere warning to the ship owners by the government that vessels traversing these waters would be in danger seems hardly adequate to protect Canadian seafaring men.

With respect to these one-year contracts I noticed that the report of the maritime commission, in referring to the strike of Canadian seamen, had this to say:

> The system whereby owners and the union make an agreement governing wages and working conditions for one year allows grievances to be built up on both sides over that period, so that negotiations for the renewal of the annual agreement usually commence in an atmosphere of mutual hostility and mistrust. In our opinion many of the difficulties would be overcome by the establishment of a national maritime board, representative of both employers and seamen, similar to the national maritime board in the United Kingdom, which provides in effect for continuous negotiation of wages and working conditions at any time whereby grievances can be quickly dealt with through the operation of port panels.

I bring this to the attention of the government in the hope that this matter may be given consideration so that if it is practicable and desirable some amendment to the Canada Shipping Act may be introduced to deal with these points.

Just before I conclude my remarks I should like to stress the difficulties our seafaring men are experiencing at the present time due to the reduction in the number of vessels in the Canadian merchant marine. As everyone knows, our merchant marine has been drastically reduced, with the result that thousands of Canadian officers and seamen have been thrown out of their jobs. The reduction in the number of Canadian merchant vessels has also had a very serious effect upon the operations of the shipyards on Vancouver island, both with respect to shipbuilding and the repair of ships. As a result many men in these associated trades are also out of jobs. I do hope the government will lose no time in authorizing the commencement of work on the new minesweeper which it was announced last year would be built by the Victoria Machinery Depot Company, on which work has not yet begun. It will relieve the unemployment in those shipbuilding trades, and will help those men to bridge over a period of readjustment, which is causing them the greatest anxiety and the greatest difficulty, because many of them have to seek occupation in trades quite different from those in which they have been brought up from their early days of apprenticeship.

Mr. Raymond Bruneau (Prescott): Mr. Speaker, I believe it is a great privilege for any representative in this house to be able to rise and voice the opinion of those he has the honour to represent in the management of the country's affairs. In the name of the people in my constituency, I wish to support all those who have so eloquently and admirably proposed the adoption of the speech from the throne which, in itself, constitutes a vote of confidence in our present government. To those who have doubts as to the confidence which the people of Canada still hold in the party in power, and to those to whom the people have accorded acknowledgment in the form of such a huge majority on June 27 last, I would advise a trip through my constituency. It would soon convince them that the farmer, the workman, the man in business, and the man on the street, have greater faith than ever in this administration.

With regard to our leader, Mr. St. Laurent, my people, the majority of whom are of French origin, and our brothers of other extractions, hold him in the same esteem that our predecessors had for another outstanding Liberal leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier. In that capacity, we all expect as much from him as those who came before us achieved through the Laurier administration. Let me congratulate, sir, our Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on the wonderful exposé he gave us while commenting on the speech from the throne. His great sense of duty and serious interest in finding a solution to our present problems are worthy of commendation.

I join with all my colleagues in congratulating the mover and seconder of the resolution now under debate, the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Larson), and the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Dumas). I am sure that the province of Saskatchewan, and Canada at large, has reason for rejoicing in the election of this young representative from Kindersley, and are justified in entertaining high hopes for a promising career.

(Translation):

As for my hon. friend, the member for Villeneuve (Mr. Dumas), I wish to congratulate him heartily, on behalf of all my colleagues, for the wonderful manner in which he discharged his heavy responsibilities a few days ago. I feel, without exaggeration, that all the French-speaking members in this house were rightfully proud of their compatriot in whom they have great hopes.

(Text):

Before commenting further on the salient points in the speech from the throne, Mr. Speaker, it is my duty to give you certain information concerning the constituency I have the honour to represent. The county of Prescott is situated halfway between the capital city of Ottawa and the metropolis of Montreal. It covers a strip of land equidistant between our two main waterways, the St. Lawrence river and the Ottawa river. Geographically speaking, I am sure it compares most favourably with any other constituency in our vast dominion.

Situated in what we call the golden triangle of the eastern tip of Ontario, in the midst of the Ottawa valley, the farming class which I represent in this house cultivate the richest soil on the North American continent. The largest centre in my riding, Hawkesbury, is an industrial city which has a population of approximately 7,500 people. Three highways pass through it. I hope that the Minister of Resources and Development will permit highway 17, which will form part of the trans-Canada route, to pass through this municipality. Highway 34 leads from Cornwall and the state of New York, and there is the interprovincial bridge which connects with the Quebec north shore highway.

My people can claim also the possession of the wickedest river in Canada, the Nation river. Unfortunately, every spring it floods the northwestern tip of Prescott. I would therefore ask the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) to embark upon a construction program to check this overflow of water. If that is not possible, I would ask the Minister of Resources and Development to implement a program of reforestation which could remedy the situation. I am informed that there are approximately 3,000 acres of waste land in the region which could be used for that purpose.

Furthermore, in the county of Prescott there are three airports; one in Pendleton, another in St. Eugene, and the third in Hawkesbury. The first two mentioned airports thrived during the war, and I am sure we could persuade the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) to find a way of putting those three airfields to good use. Considering all those assets, and the ideal geographical factors concerning my constituency, it will be seen it has undreamed of possibilities. I am sure therefore that the cabinet ministers will lend a sympathetic ear to any project I have the opportunity of presenting during this twenty-first parliament.

I was glad to hear in the speech from the throne, that the federal-provincial conference "marked a promising beginning in working out a satisfactory procedure for making within Canada whatever amendments to the constitution may from time to time be required." Let me say at once, sir, that since we have now done away with appeals to the privy council and have chosen to rely upon our own supreme court, Canada is now a truly sovereign country. I believe it would not be expecting too much to have, in the very near future, a national flag acceptable to all, towards which we could proudly lift our heads, and which would be a living symbol of the true sovereignty of our great Canada.

One was also pleased to hear in the speech from the throne that negotiations are well under way for the implementation of programs adopted during the last session respecting housing, the transcontinental highway and forest conservation. All these are great problems of urgent necessity. With regard to health facilities and services, which will be under consideration during this second session, I hope consideration will be given to passing a bill for the assistance of invalids.

In the international sphere, it is comforting to know that our country is giving "full support to the charter of the United Nations". We all hope that the Canadian delegation now attending the session of the economic and social council, to which Canada was elected at the last session of the general assembly, will do its utmost in co-operation with the other peace-loving countries represented at the world government to achieve a true and lasting peace and, if necessary, keep communistic Russia at bay. The seventh paragraph of the speech from the throne is a true indication of the will of our government to strive towards the achievement of peace. It reads as follows:

> The measures for the preservation of peace and the restoration and maintenance of prosperity contemplated by the North Atlantic treaty are being devised and applied as expeditiously as circumstances permit.

With that in view we are giving constant attention to the best use of our resources and the development of Canada's defence forces.

As regards employment, I believe that the security provisions established under unemployment insurance legislation are the best means to counteract the ill effects brought about by seasonal factors.

In the sphere of markets for our farm products, which have suffered from readjustments in the sterling area, we are securing other markets throughout the world; and I will say here, Mr. Speaker, that at a meeting with farmers of my constituency in Plantagenet on January 16 last, when I informed my people that we were trying to secure markets for our basic products on a cash and carry basis, I had occasion to find out that they were more at ease. I even went so far as to tell them that we should not meet with any difficulty in selling those goods abroad because they could compete with the exports of any other country in the world.

You may rest assured, Mr. Speaker, that I was more than pleased the other day when I heard our Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) say in this house, as reported at page 58 of Hansard, that we were now striving to find markets—

> . . . for our increasing production; but we do not want to find markets which will absorb our products and give us nothing in return.

I will add here that it will please those I have the honour to represent, particularly those of the farmer class, to read further in the same speech of the Prime Minister:

> . . . those loans of Canadian dollars will eventually have to be either written off or reimbursed in commodities. We will have to take goods for everything owed us—or take nothing.

This is undoubtedly the right attitude; and with the preparations actively under way for further multilateral trade negotiations later in the present year, as stated in the throne speech, we will surely find better markets to the advantage of all. In this way, if we can assure our farming population of a steady income, it will in turn have the purchasing power necessary to buy the commodities manufactured in the factories by the working class; and we shall thus be in a position to avoid unemployment and ensure the true prosperity which we truly deserve, having regard to our position in the economic field and the wealth of our natural resources.

Finally, as a result of consideration of the policy concerning the control and the orderly decontrol of rents, let us hope that we shall be in a position to afford the worker housing within his means. In this manner and with Divine Providence blessing our deliberations, I am sure our great country will continue to go ahead and that all of us here, as legislators, will be in a position to make come true the prophecy of Sir Wilfrid Laurier: "The twentieth century will be the century of Canada."

Mr. F. S. Follwell (Hastings South): At the outset of my few remarks, Mr. Speaker, may I compliment the two young new members, like myself, who moved and seconded the address in reply to the speech from the throne. They have already been complimented, but may I join in complimenting them once more. They certainly did a really good job.

May I also congratulate the government on the progressive manner in which they have proceeded—as they usually do when the Liberal party forms the government—in establishing a Department of Citizenship and Immigration. I am sure all the members in this house agree that it is a department that can be of vital service in helping this great country of ours to achieve its ultimate destiny. In looking around for a man to head that responsible department I am sure the government have chosen the right one in the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Harris), who has been privileged to serve in this House of Commons for a number of years. He is from a constituency that has thrived; he is from the grass roots of a farming community. He knows full well the humility and the greatness of Canadians.

May I refer to a remark that was made here this evening by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross), who mentioned the fact that in the cabinet today there are no men with civic experience. As he has said so, it no doubt is so; I shall have to admit that I do not know whether that is right, but I presume it is. May I point out to the hon. member however that on the government benches there are many men who have served through the municipal offices in civic councils and who are at the present time serving in that capacity. I am pleased to say that I have had ten years' civic experience and was honoured by my own city of Belleville on three occasions in serving them as their chief magistrate.

Mr. Gardiner: I used to be mayor of my town too.

Mr. Follwell: May I say to the members of the opposition that with men with civic experience sitting on the government side at the present time and with those men joining in the government caucuses, the cabinet ministers have the ear of the people through their private members. Through my association of only this one term, I am convinced that the cabinet are prepared to listen to the requests from private members. I believe that our cabinet today is in that respect unlike the cabinet of the late Right Hon. R. B. Bennett.

In the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne I believe some latitude is allowed with regard to the subjects on which a member may speak. I should like to make just one or two observations with regard to experiences that I have been able to absorb through sitting in this house for one session. On the day on which I first came to parliament last session, I had the pleasure of visiting with one of the older members who had served for a number of years. He recommended to me that it would be wise to sit through the session and endeavour to absorb as much of the parliamentary procedure as possible and to observe the way in which government was carried on in the House of Commons. I admit that I still am a very new student of parliamentary affairs; but I assure hon. members that I am endeavouring to absorb, and I sincerely hope and trust that I shall have the opportunity to continue, as long as I am here, to learn some of the things that are vitally necessary to the Canadian people.

I should like to bring to the attention of hon. members something which I think needs a bit of streamlining. I think the leader of the Social Credit party in this house said the other day that probably it would be a good thing if some of the parliamentary rules and regulations were streamlined. I believe that hon. members on all sides agree with these remarks. I am sure that I do. During the two openings of parliament that I have been privileged to attend I must admit that during the time that the speech from the throne was being read by the governor general I do not think I heard one word, and I doubt very much whether many of the hon. members who were standing at the rail in the Senate chamber heard anything more than I did. Therefore I would suggest and recommend that whoever is charged with the duty of seeing that it is done should see that we modernize at least to this extent, and instal a public address system if only on the occasion of the opening and prorogation of parliament so that the words of the governor general may be heard, and heard clearly. I would even go further than that and say that, in installing this public address system for the use of the governor general at the opening, it would be well to instal loudspeakers throughout the rest of the parliament building. I observed many hundreds of Canadian citizens here for the opening of parliament, who I am sure would have liked to hear the address of the governor general on the radio. I believe it would be good Canadianism and good public relations for this parliament to broadcast from coast to coast the ceremony of the opening of parliament. We now have ten provinces. The province of Newfoundland is the baby province of our great dominion of provinces. I am sure that all the people in Newfoundland are very much interested in the rest of Canada, as we are in Newfoundland. These people at the far end of our country may never have the opportunity, as you and I have, of attending the opening of parliament or even viewing these beautiful parliament buildings and the beautiful surroundings here in Ottawa. Since we have the government-sponsored Canadian Broadcasting Corporation I believe we should make the fullest use of it. We should bring to every citizen the opportunity of hearing a full word-picture of the complete opening of parliament at all sessions.

We might even go further than that. We might prevail upon the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to broadcast on certain days the debates of this House of Commons. I am sure there are many thousands of people in Canada who would be pleased to take the time to listen to a broadcast coming direct, on the spot, from this house.

While speaking of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation I should like to congratulate the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann), who heads that department, on the way in which, under the direction of this parliament, his department is proceeding to establish television broadcasting stations. I understand that these stations are to be established in Montreal and Toronto in the first instance. I am sure that as time goes on more television stations will be established from one end of the country to the other, so that all people may enjoy the benefit and pleasure of television as they now enjoy the pleasure of radio.

In my constituency I find that there are many people who have television receiving equipment at the present time, but unfortunately they are limited as to the reception and the length of reception that they can get. I believe that in my constituency they are limited to two stations, Rochester and Buffalo, and these two stations are not very clear on the television screen. Therefore I compliment the minister on the way he and his department are proceeding to establish these stations. They will be a boon and a pleasure to all the people within receiving distance. But I urge this parliament to consider also the people who are at either end of the country.

In the constituency of Hastings South we have a Royal Canadian Air Force station. It is known as the Trenton air station. It is the largest Royal Canadian Air Force station in Canada. During the war, under the commonwealth air training scheme, the air force station at Trenton trained many of our Canadian boys and many of our allied boys from Great Britain, New Zealand, Australia, yes, and many who came to enlist from the United States.

In that connection may I pay a just tribute to the man who was then the Minister of National Defence for Air, namely, the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power). It is a well-known fact that his leadership and his counsel made this scheme an outstanding achievement, and one that contributed in no small way to the winning of the great conflict. I am sure hon. members join with me in paying this tribute to the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power).

On September 30 last, in company with the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Robertson), the county which adjoins Hastings, I had the pleasure of being present at the dedication of the memorial gates commemorating the sacrifice made by the airmen of the British commonwealth air training scheme. I would urge every hon. member who has the opportunity of passing that way to stop and inspect those magnificent gates presented and erected by the governments of Great Britain, New Zealand, Australia and the United States. They are a work of art and an inspiration to all the young men who are now in training under the national defence scheme at the Royal Canadian Air Force station at Trenton.

Also at Trenton we have what is known as No. 6 repair depot. This is the largest repair depot maintained by the Royal Canadian Air Force, and is and has been of great value and service not only in the prosecution of the war but in maintaining the equipment necessary to keep the defence force on the alert in peacetime. May I add that upon the occasion of the opening of the gates at Trenton we were honoured by the presence of Lord Tedder, chief of air staff, as the representative of Great Britain.

Hastings is one of the greatest cheese-producing counties in Canada, and may I say with pardonable pride that in 1949 it led all other counties in this wide dominion in the production of cheese. Not only does it produce an abundance of that commodity but it is also noted for its production of apples.

During the recess of parliament, as no doubt did every other hon. member, I attended a number of farmer protest meetings dealing with the falling prices of farm products. I remember distinctly attending a meeting of the cheese producers association in our county, where the statement was made that there was a surplus of cheese. I suggested at that meeting that, through co-operative efforts of the dominion and provincial governments, it would be well to set up a method of merchandising cheese products. There was also a discussion concerning prices.

During my remarks I pointed out that I had—and I still have—the utmost confidence in the leadership of our Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). I said to the people assembled there that I knew we could count on the minister to see to it that the farmers got a square deal. After my remarks I was followed by my good friend the member of the provincial legislature who said that the farmers did not want a fair deal, but that they wanted 30 cents a pound for their cheese.

At that time the support price of 28 cents had not been established. Soon after that meeting however it was established. This price was set up because the dominion government was prepared to pay a subsidy of three cents per pound above the contract price. At following protest meetings I said to my good friend who had pointed out that the farmers did not want a fair deal, but did want 30 cents for their cheese, that the dominion government had now seen fit to support the price at 28 cents and to provide a subsidy to the extent of three cents per pound. I stated further that in my view it was up to the provincial government of Ontario to pay two cents per pound so as to support the price at 30 cents—that is, on the assumption that a price of 30 cents is necessary. Indeed I believe it is, because it is my contention that no matter what is being produced, whether it be on the farm or in the factory, it must be produced at a profit.

Before the war the per capita consumption of cheese in Canada stood at three pounds while that in Great Britain was sixteen pounds.

I believe that with a proper merchandising scheme the per capita consumption in Canada can be boosted. Indeed I am informed that it has now risen to approximately five pounds per capita; and if it can be doubled to ten pounds I am convinced we will have no surplus problem. We would then have very little cheese to export and we could afford to give that away to help the unfortunate people in Europe.

I believe that all governments, provincial and dominion, ought to, and I am sure they will, co-operate in the merchandising of apples. If the per capita consumption of apples could be increased we would then be in the same position as we would be with cheese. We would have such a small surplus that we could give it away and yet everyone in Canada would be better fed and the producers would find their operations more profitable.

The dominion government has established a floor price of 38 cents a dozen for eggs and since that action was taken egg prices have tended to level off. I was informed only today by an hon. member that his wife had paid 54 cents per dozen in Ottawa for eggs.

Mr. Hodgson: She was taken in.

Mr. Follwell: She may have been taken in, but I submit that that gives a nice profit. I am sure that the producer who received the 54 cents did not feel that he had been taken in.

I am gratified to find on the order paper a resolution to set up a committee to study contributory old age pensions and the means test. This committee should also study the problem of those who are permanently incapacitated but yet have not reached the age at which they would become pensionable. There are a number of people in my constituency who have been stricken fairly early in life but who at the moment are unable to claim a pension or allowance of any kind. I am sure that every hon. member has constituents in the same position. Many have been stricken with arthritis or have been incapacitated through accidents and, as I say, are not eligible for old age pensions.

I am pleased to know that we can look forward this year to a dominion-provincial conference which will lay the foundation, not only for a contributory old age pension scheme but for a contributory health scheme. I think those two matters are uppermost in the mind of every Canadian, and have been for a long time. I am sure that those matters are uppermost in the thoughts of many hon. members who have sat through previous sessions of parliament.

With the streamlining of our constitution no doubt it will be much easier to work with the provinces and it is hoped that before too long these social services will come into being. But I think the people of Canada should be informed that the extent to which these social services can go and the speed with which they can be brought into effect depend upon their ability to pay. All taxpayers should know that whether they are paying civic, provincial or federal taxes, all taxes are paid by the same taxpayers.

May I conclude by saying that I am still among the younger Canadians and I do not view with fear the future of Canada. I glory in its opportunities and I regret that our opponents are asking us to believe that we face disaster. I assure them that we look forward only to achievements. Canada is the greatest frontier now available to the world. We breathe optimism, not pessimism.

On motion of Mr. Weir the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will continue this debate.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, February 22, 1950

The house met at three o'clock.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REDUCTION IN PASSENGER TRAIN SERVICES—COAL SUPPLY

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I should like to correct a statement I made yesterday, appearing on page 85 of Hansard, where I said:

> At the moment, and last year and the year before, the Canadian National Railways are purchasing as much coal as they can get from mines at both extremities of Canada.

I find that statement is only partially accurate, and I have also learned that the manner in which it was made might be unfair to the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation. So far as 1950 is concerned, the statement as made was wholly accurate. So far as 1949 is concerned, I am informed that Dosco offered the Canadian National Railways 998,000 tons of coal, but the railways were able to place orders for only 646,000 tons. For the year 1948 I have no information.

Mr. Gillis: I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport, arising out of the statement he has just made. Can he tell the house why the Canadian National Railways could not stock the additional coal that was offered by Dosco?

Mr. Chevrier: The information that I have is that the reason is one concerning price. I believe that negotiations had been going on between the company and the railway as to the question of price, and because of that consideration it was not possible to take the full amount. Perhaps I did not say this, but in any event Dosco was not able to deliver the amount which the Canadian National Railways finally decided to take. They were some 90,000 tons short of the 646,000 tons. In fairness to Dosco I think I should say that, as the house knows, the output of a mine must be contracted for some time in advance, and if negotiations had been carried on earlier it might have been possible for Dosco to fulfil the total amount of the offer, namely, 998,000 tons.

Mr. Brooks: May I ask the minister a question arising out of his remarks? He used the words "in fairness to Dosco". Dosco produces perhaps eighty per cent of the coal produced in the maritimes. Are there contracts with any companies other than Dosco?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, there are contracts with independent mines down there; I am not familiar with the position in that regard. By that I mean that I do not know the number of tons of coal they were able to furnish. It was drawn to my attention, however, that the statement which I made yesterday might be misleading with regard to Dosco, and I thought in fairness to them that I should make the correction.

ATOMIC ENERGY

EXCHANGE OF INFORMATION BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES, GREAT BRITAIN AND CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): In view of the International News Service dispatch from London carried in yesterday's Toronto Daily Star, which stated that the United States has suspended an agreement for the exchange of atomic information with Britain and that the ban might also apply to the exchange of such information with Canada, I would ask the Prime Minister whether the Canadian government has been advised officially or unofficially by the government of the United States of any intention or desire to suspend the existing agreement dealing with the exchange of atomic information.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I have not seen the dispatch to which the question refers, but there has been no intimation whatever from the government of the United States to the government of Canada that would have any bearing on the statements made in the International News Service dispatch.

Mr. Graydon: If I may ask a supplementary question, has there been any discussion between this government and the United States government with a view to having the restrictions under the McMahon Act partly lifted so far as we are concerned?

Mr. St. Laurent: I would not like to give a concrete answer to the question as put. There have been discussions, and there are constant negotiations between those who represent Canada and their opposite numbers in the United States about the most effective way of taking advantage in both countries of all information available.

Inquiries of the Ministry

WHEAT

DEFICIT ON 1945-49 POOL ACCOUNT—QUESTION AS TO REFERENCE OF WHEAT BOARD REPORT TO COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): In the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Yesterday the report of the Canadian wheat board for the crop year 1948-49 was tabled in this house. In exhibit IV it is shown that there is a deficit on the 1945-49 pool account of $5,235,621.37. In view of this deficit, and of the borrowings which apparently the board has had to make from the banks to meet the last twenty-cent payment made to the farmers, will the Minister of Agriculture or the cabinet have this report placed before the agriculture committee as soon as it is set up, so that the report can be thoroughly studied and the reasons for this deficit ascertained?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): There is nothing new in the statement which has just been made. The matter was discussed at the time the announcement was made that it would be necessary to borrow some of the money that would have to be paid out at that time. The payment was made on the estimate of what the position would be at the end of the year in order to meet the situation when the farmers required the money before they went into seeding. The same request was made yesterday with regard to this matter as was made last year. In order to meet that situation the money had to be borrowed in advance. There is nothing new about it. It is a condition that has existed in the past.

Mr. Wright: The minister has not answered my question as to whether this report would be placed before the agriculture committee when it was set up. The former minister of trade and commerce had promised that.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Gardiner: My understanding is that the Minister of Trade and Commerce in previous years agreed to the submission of the report to the committee, but I think the matter can wait until he comes back and makes his own decision.

Mr. Wright: It has not been done since 1947.

FISHERIES

INQUIRY AS TO EXTENSION OF SMELT SEASON IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Why was the extension of the smelt fishing season not granted to the Prince Edward Island fishermen as it was to New Brunswick and Nova Scotia fishermen?

Hon. R. W. Mayhew (Minister of Fisheries): I will give an answer tomorrow. I did not know there was any change in the restrictions.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO SETTING UP OF COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. In view of the representation of the Canadian Legion, is the government considering setting up a special committee on veterans affairs this session?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Veterans Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

QUESTION AS TO PROSECUTIONS IN THE MATCH INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Can he say whether a decision has yet been reached in the matter of prosecuting those connected with the alleged combine in the match industry?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): The answer is yes; a prosecution will be instituted.

TRANSFER OF ARMY PERSONNEL—HOUSING ACCOMMODATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the fact that soldiers belonging to the permanent army must obey orders and move where they are directed, and there are men in the ranks with families moving to Ottawa, is any provision being made for the housing of these men, or must they continue to seek any shelter they can possibly obtain and pay exorbitant prices? Is any attempt being made to provide dwellings for these people?

Mr. J. A. Blanchette (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): In the absence of the minister, may I take this as notice of the question?

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Tuesday, February 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. F. H. Larson for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): In rising to participate in this debate, Mr. Speaker, I should like in the first place to join with other members who have already spoken in warmly and sincerely congratulating the mover (Mr. Larson) and the seconder (Mr. Dumas) of the address. They have discharged their duties in a manner which brings credit to themselves and, I am sure, satisfaction to their constituents.

In the speech from the throne reference is made to the international situation; and members who have already participated in the debate, notably the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), have enlarged on that aspect of the speech. If time permitted I should like to make some general observations on matters which have been referred to by other speakers, but on this occasion I will not do so. I hope to have an opportunity shortly, when the estimates of my department are called, to deal with some of the points which have been made by other hon. members during the course of the debate. Today, however, I think it would be desirable if I made a report to the house, as briefly as I can, on the visit of my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) and myself, from which we have just returned, to Ceylon and certain other countries of the Far East which we were able to visit after the commonwealth conference at Colombo.

During that mission, Mr. Speaker, the members of our party travelled some 27,000 miles; and for a considerable part of that time we were in the efficient and courteous care of the Royal Canadian Air Force and a North Star plane of that air force. I should like to convey the thanks of the members of our party to the R.C.A.F. for the way in which they took care of us. The aircrew were a credit to their service in the air, and they were good representatives of their country when they were on the ground.

I should like also to express our gratitude to the officials who accompanied us on the journey, and who gave us that efficient, informed and industrious help which we expect from the public service of Canada.

During that trip, Mr. Speaker, we received very much kindness and warm hospitality from all the countries that we were able to visit. On this occasion I should like to acknowledge that kindness and that hospitality. We realized, of course, that it was shown to us not in our personal capacity but because we represented Canada, a country whose reputation and good name stands high in those parts of the world.

If I may I should like to divide the observations I am making today into two parts. The first part will be an attempt to deal with the commonwealth conference which took place at Ceylon in January. In the second part I shall deal with some matters of interest in our journey to countries in the far east after the conference.

The Colombo conference took place in the week of January 9. Its official title was: "Commonwealth meeting on foreign affairs." It was the first meeting of this kind that has been held. Of course commonwealth meetings on foreign affairs have taken place in the past. We have discussed foreign affairs at meetings of prime ministers; we have had discussions between heads of commonwealth delegations at United Nations assembly meetings; but this was the first time that a commonwealth meeting was held which was composed mainly of foreign ministers of commonwealth countries, and which dealt exclusively with questions of foreign affairs.

It was the first time also, Mr. Speaker, that a meeting of commonwealth ministers had been held on the territory of an Asian member of the commonwealth. This is a fact, I think, of some significance. It is a recognition of the fact that today the commonwealth has no fixed centre in London or anywhere else. It is a recognition also of the importance of the Asian members of the new commonwealth, whose culture and traditions are very different from those of the rest of us, but whose association with us in the commonwealth is of such great value and is so highly esteemed by the other members.

The fact that we met in Ceylon is also a recognition of the importance of Asian problems today, and of the necessity of looking at world problems from an Asian point of view as well as from that of Europe and the north Atlantic. It is just as well to remember that the three Asian members of the commonwealth at Colombo represented 440 million people, while the rest of us, in our home territories, represented only 75 million. This new commonwealth is providing not only a link between the Asian and the other nations that comprise it, but also a very valuable link between the east and the west.

During our conference, Mr. Speaker, we were the guests of the government of Ceylon; and we were grateful, as I am sure the other delegations were, for the hospitality that was shown to us by the government of Ceylon and for the arrangements which it so efficiently made.

The chairman of the conference was the Prime Minister of Ceylon, Mr. Senanayake, who presided over our deliberations with urbanity and good nature, and did much to make our meetings a success. He introduced one custom which to me, at least, was new at international meetings, and I am not sure that it would not be a good idea to copy it at other meetings which I have attended and which have not always been characterized by the good nature and the friendliness of the one we had in Ceylon. When the discussions became a little, shall I say, overzealous, or when we began to get a little tired and lost some of our patience, it was the invariable practice of our chairman to bang the gavel and say: "We will now have a cup of tea". That happened normally three or four times a day, and it proved to be a very useful expedient indeed. I think it might be introduced at Lake Success.

The agenda at our meeting at Ceylon was short, and the subjects set down for consideration were very broad. The agenda included the following questions: The general international situation; Chinese situation; Japanese peace treaty; situation in southeast Asia and the situation in Europe, more particularly the development towards European political and economic union, and the effect of such development on the commonwealth of nations.

In the discussion of these subjects we held eleven meetings. The discussions were informal, friendly, and frank. Straight talk was possible at this meeting because a good understanding existed between the participants. We could disagree, and we did disagree, without danger of anyone wanting to walk out. There were no appeals to passion or prejudice, because there was the honest desire, as is customary at commonwealth meetings, to get together. There were no appeals to the gallery, because we did not have a gallery.

So far as the value of these discussions is concerned, it is true of course to say that nothing spectacular resulted, nor was anything spectacular intended. Commonwealth discussions now do not customarily result in spectacular decisions; in fact they do not result in decisions at all. They result in recommendations to governments for the consideration of those governments. The recommendations made at Colombo are now before the various governments for any action they decide to take.

No single policy was laid down or was attempted, on any of the questions before us at Ceylon. We listened to each other's points of view, and I think that we gained something from doing so. An exchange of views of this kind between governments representing countries from five continents of the world—from Asia, from Europe, from Australasia, from Africa and from North America—is bound to be useful in modifying points of view which may have been held prior to the meeting.

So far as the Canadian delegation was concerned, we inevitably tended to give the North American viewpoint on the political questions which were discussed, and a dollar viewpoint on the economic questions. Though we all had our own point of view, a discussion of this kind helps to correct the inevitable distortions in our thinking which may arise, in the case of Canada, for instance, because we have traditionally looked on the world from the north Atlantic, North American viewpoint of a people whose civilization for the most part comes from that of western European Christendom.

The fact that the discussions were held at Ceylon was particularly valuable at this time, because, as I see it, the centre of gravity in international affairs has, to some extent at least, moved to Asia. What I mean by that is simply this: In my view the advance of Russian communist imperialism has been stopped in Europe, at least for the time being. It has not been stopped in Asia, where it is now trying desperately to win power over those millions of people, by allying itself with forces of national liberation and social reform.

It has had great success in China. Until now, continental China, at least, is under the control of a communist government which is allied to Russia. In spite of the publication of the recent Russian-Chinese treaty we are not yet however quite certain what form the alliance has taken. The nationalism of the people of Asia has now finally and fully asserted itself. It is even true to say that in some quarters in this part of the world, people, if they were forced to make the unhappy choice, might prefer even communism to a return to colonialism. The existence of this feeling is recognized now by the nations of Europe and America.

The political mould into which south and southeast Asia was gradually poured during the years following the European incursions four hundred years ago, or more, has now been broken finally, and the great colonial empires of the nineteenth century have either disappeared from that part of the world or are in process of disappearing. No one yet knows what pattern will emerge from that disappearance. No one can be certain, as I see it, that the independence which the people of this area are now exercising can in all cases be maintained in its present form, or whether their internal problems will prove so great that, through weakness, they will fall prey to confusion, to disorder and to those subversive forces which try to provoke, and certainly know how to exploit, such a situation.

At the present time the countries of south and southeast Asia are making impressive efforts toward the establishment of strong modern nation states, and we of the western world should do what we can to encourage and to assist these efforts. This surge of nationalism in Asia has resulted in political independence for twelve—and if you include Indo-China for fifteen—Asian states in less than twenty-five years. The political danger from this is that, exploiting this movement, communist expansionism may now spill over into southeast Asia as well as into the Middle East. In my opinion there is no more important question before the world today than this possibility.

The social and economic danger arises out of the fact that the people out there are learning that independence is not enough. The agitation for freedom has stirred up in them other desires; for improvements in their conditions of life; for a change from distress, privation and even starvation; for a change from a life expectancy of twenty years and an average income of less than $50 a year. These new democratic governments are attempting to meet these new hungers, these new hopes, these new demands. There is danger not only to their own countries, but to the rest of the world, if they do not succeed in that attempt. But they are meeting these dangers as responsible, free, democratic governments, proceeding stage by stage, without, as they progress, destroying the framework of society or of government.

Communism, however, in Asia as elsewhere, is irresponsibly trying to capitalize on misery and distress and the understandable impatience for change, by promising not only immediate freedom where colonial status remains, but, where freedom has been achieved, a better life at once if only the people will rise in their might and create the chaos out of which communistic rule may emerge. In India, China and Burma, which are now free states, the appeal is to a fuller and better life at once; in Malaya and Indo-China it is to political freedom. Both appeals are strong, for millions of Asian people do not know that from communism both appeals are false.

It was in the light of these conditions that we discussed the situation in various Asian countries at our conference in Ceylon. Malaya, where the situation is now better—although communist bandits, and it is right to call them that in Malaya, are doing their best to dislocate economic life—is moving ahead to ordered independence under the fine and distinguished leadership of a man we know both well and favourably here in Ottawa, Right Hon. Malcolm MacDonald.

In Burma, which is now free, but which is rent, not by civil war but by civil wars, the position is difficult indeed. Indonesia, now free, and recognized by Canada as a free state, is being attacked by forces from the right and forces from the left. It is having a difficult time. Then there is Indo-China which I propose to discuss separately, because it is a very important point in that part of the world.

It seemed to all of us at the conference that if the tide of totalitarian expansionism should flow over this general area, not only will the new nations lose the national independence which they have secured so recently, but the forces of the free world will have been driven off all but a relatively small bit of the great Eurasian land mass. In such circumstances it would not be easy to contemplate with equanimity the future of the rest of the world.

That, then, Mr. Speaker, was the background against which we held our discussions in the lush and lovely island of Ceylon. Now a few words, if I may, about the understandings and conclusions we reached as a result of those discussions.

In the first place we agreed at Colombo that the forces of totalitarian expansionism could not be stopped in south Asia and southeast Asia by military force alone. They cannot be checked, if, through stupidity or shortsightedness on the part of the democratic powers, totalitarianism is able to ally itself successfully with the forces of national liberation and social reform. If southeast Asia and south Asia are not to be conquered by communism, we of the free democratic world, including the Asian states themselves which are free, must demonstrate that it is we and not the Russians who stand for national liberation and economic and social progress.

The problem, then, for these states is to demonstrate that they can improve, by democratic methods, the standard of living of the masses of their people. That is their problem—one of self-help. But there is also our problem, that of mutual aid.

The conference discussed that problem. We agreed, for instance, to recommend financial help for the state of Burma which had been a subject of discussion among the sterling countries before the conference met. The Canadian government was not included in that earlier discussion. The question is one of a sterling loan to strengthen the financial position of the Burmese government. We are now considering here the position of dollar Canada in relation to that sterling loan. Our special position in this regard was recognized at the conference.

One of the important developments of the conference was the recommendation to set up a commonwealth consultative committee for south and southeast Asia. I was vividly impressed during my brief transit across this area after the conference by the need for capital development in all the countries stretching from Pakistan to Indonesia. There is a great need to increase agricultural yields through the introduction of irrigation systems and the greater use of fertilizer; also for the establishment of at least some new industries. I was impressed also by the very great need for technical help in those countries.

But if the need is obvious, so are the difficulties. In fact, most of the difficulties arise from the very magnitude of the need. There are so many development projects which clamoured for attention that it is very difficult to decide what should be done. Further difficulty is created by the comparative inexperience of the administrative systems of most of these countries. It is only natural that for some time after obtaining experience, these countries, which are so old in history and tradition but so new to full sovereignty in the modern world, should have to struggle with many administrative problems, which inevitably complicate the task at the present time of long-range planning to raise the standard of living.

Already in this field some useful work has been done by the United Nations in listing and analysing the economic needs of this part of the world. The United Nations four point program, as we call it, also has a bearing on this problem. The economic commission for Asia and the Far East, the international labour office and the food and agricultural organization are all working in this field. Therefore I think that we must be careful in setting up any new agency to avoid overlapping or duplication. We do not want a new committee merely because it looks like an attractive piece of international furniture for an already cluttered-up home.

Yet it is hoped that this new committee which was recommended to the governments at Colombo will be practical and useful and in its results go further than any previous agency in that area. It is hoped that before long the committee will be able to relate the needs of these countries to the possibilities of financial and technical help. But it should be understood that in considering the problem of what the commonwealth countries can do through this committee to help the area—and I attempted to make this clear at Colombo—the contributions of members of the commonwealth will have to be determined in the light of their financial commitments, not only in this area but elsewhere.

We in Canada have undertaken, along with the United Kingdom, heavy responsibilities in the north Atlantic region which are not shared by other members of the commonwealth. I suggest that those responsibilities must be a first charge on that portion of our national production and income which we may be able to apply as a form of mutual aid toward the support of other countries whose systems of government are similar to ours and which, like us, are threatened by totalitarian aggression. But, within the limits imposed by those prior responsibilities, we in the government are now investigating ways and means of co-operating in the work that might be done if and when this consultative committee is set up. When a further meeting is held in Canberra, probably shortly, to discuss this matter, the Canadian government of course will be represented.

The establishment of this committee represents only a small beginning, although small beginnings can lead to great results. I do not conceal my own belief, however, that any such committee must have a broader basis than the commonwealth; that unless the co-operation of the United States can be enlisted in its work, its accomplishments may prove to be meagre.

However, the commonwealth nations have on this occasion taken the initiative and I think that is all to the good. I think also that the initiative was a sound one, and that the step we have taken may prove to be a valuable one. It certainly is in the right direction.

Now a few words about the situation in Indo-China. We had a thorough discussion of that at Colombo, and we had vigorous differences of opinion as to what the situation was and what might be done to meet it. However, we all agreed that Indo-China occupied a key position in southeast Asia, politically because of the clashes that have occurred there between the communists and the nationalists, and economically because this country is the rice bowl of that part of the world. The communists are now making their greatest effort in Asia in the state of Viet Nam, which is one of the three in Indo-China, the others being Cambodia and Laos.

If for no other reason, our very close and friendly ties with France would ensure our special interest in the progress toward freedom in that area which the French government are seriously sponsoring, and for which I think they deserve our gratitude. We must be concerned, however, over the long continued disturbances in Viet Nam. I hope that these will soon be ended. I feel that the recent ratification by France of the agreements which it had entered into with the three Indo-Chinese states is a commendable step forward in the attempt to restore peaceful and stable conditions in Indo-China. I believe there is good reason to expect that these agreements, which set up three autonomous states within the French union, will provide a means by which the national aspirations of the people of Indo-China will be met.

More particularly we wish the government of Bao Dai every success in its efforts to bring unity and freedom to Viet Nam in the face of a serious communist menace, which has become a greater menace because of the political support it is being given by the U.S.S.R. and communist China. We recognize that only under the autonomous government of Bao Dai has Viet Nam at this time the opportunity to acquire freedom and unity and stability.

Then we came to the question of China, which also caused much discussion. In my review on November 16 last in this house I made some observations concerning the nature of the communist revolution in China, and also about some of the great underlying mutual interests which would always serve as a bond between the Canadian and Chinese people, regardless of such changes in government as might take place in China. I spoke also about the factors that had to be taken into account in weighing the question of recognition.

Since then four commonwealth governments—the United Kingdom, India, Pakistan and Ceylon—and a number of the western European governments, have accorded de jure recognition to the Peiping regime. At Colombo there was a frank and useful exchange of views between those commonwealth governments which had not recognized the Peiping government—Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, and Canada—and those which had. There was also discussion of future relations with China. From our point of view it was very helpful to have the points of view of the Asian members of the commonwealth on these questions.

The fact that some governments have recognized the new regime in Peiping and others have not has created an awkward situation in the United Nations and other international bodies; one which may become even more awkward in the not too distant future.

The Soviet delegations, in an exhibition of childish arrogance, have now withdrawn from United Nations bodies until such time as the representatives of the Peiping government are admitted in place of the present nationalist representatives. This is a form of pressure which, of course, we can only condemn, and care must be exercised to see that the precedents which are created in dealing with this change of government in China do not give rise to further and greater difficulties in the future when analogous problems may have to be faced elsewhere in the United Nations.

This whole question of recognition of the Peiping government is now before the government, which is giving it active consideration in the light, among other things, of the report that I have made to the government, on our recent discussions in the Far East. At the moment I can say no more than that on this question.

We also had a pretty thorough discussion of the question of a Japanese peace treaty. Hon. members will recall that during my review of external affairs on November 16 last I said that, in spite of the difficulties to be overcome in convening a Japanese peace conference, I thought there might be even greater dangers in its indefinite postponement, and I hoped that another effort might be made to push forward with that conference. Since that time I have had an opportunity to discuss this problem at the Colombo conference, and also during my short but very interesting visit to Japan, where I talked about it and many other subjects with that most distinguished American, General Douglas MacArthur. As a result of those talks I am now more impressed than ever with the need for seizing every opportunity that might lead to a satisfactory early settlement with Japan. The occupation of Japan has continued now for more than four years. During that period the physical demilitarization of Japan has been thoroughly accomplished. Indeed, the act of stripping away from Japan her overseas possessions was itself a drastic curbing of Japan's war-making capacity. The punitive and preventive side of the occupation has, I think, been virtually completed. The Japanese have made many changes in their domestic legislation, in compliance with allied directives of the eleven-power Far Eastern commission which meets in Washington. They have subscribed to all orders of the occupation regime, and have taken the steps which were demanded of them.

I do not mean to conclude from this that the Japanese by now, in the course of four years, have completely changed their habits of thought, their approach to politics, and their way of life, although there appear to be some in Tokyo who think this has happened. Whatever may be the truth about this, it is clear that the Japanese have fulfilled pretty well the requirements that have been imposed upon them by the occupation, and it seems to me that from here on we must give them some incentive to maintain and strengthen the democratic way of life, and to wish to maintain close and friendly relations with the western world. I suggest our security lies in this as much as in keeping them disarmed. This point of view was brought very forcefully to us by the Asian members of the commonwealth in their observations on a peace settlement with Japan. The other point of view—or more accurately, if you like, the other emphasis of the same point of view—was given by the Australian and New Zealand representatives at Colombo, who were anxious, as indeed we all are, that Japan should not be restored to a point where she could again become an aggressive power, and that the peace treaty should include clauses designed to prevent this.

Perhaps this prolonged occupation period will have served a purpose in enabling us to acquire a better perspective on the type of peace treaty we should make with Japan, which will, we hope, be a lasting one; one that should be realistic but not one that would be bitterly opposed as unjust by the Japanese people. We know the damage to peace and security that such a punitive peace treaty can cause. I am persuaded myself that, from here on, the disadvantages involved in military occupation, of which I have spoken before, will outweigh the advantages, and that a point of diminishing returns has been reached, if not passed. Therefore I hope that all governments interested in a peace settlement with Japan will not overlook any opportunity to further this end, even if—and this would certainly be an undesirable alternative, a second best—we had to have a peace conference with some powers absent because they refused to accept reasonable conditions for participation on which all other powers were agreed.

I was interested to note that the recently signed treaty between the Soviet union and the Peiping government contains an article providing that these two governments will expedite the signature of a Japanese peace treaty jointly with the other powers allied during the second world war. I should like to be able to take this article at face value, as indeed I should like to be able to take the other articles of that treaty at face value. As you know, the greatest difficulty in the way of the conclusion of a peace treaty with Japan in the past has been the difference of opinion with the Soviet union over the procedure to be followed in the drafting of the treaty and the holding of the conference. Recently there has been added a further complication, as to which government from China, nationalist or communist, should represent China at the Japanese peace conference. China suffered most grievously at the hands of the Japanese aggressor, and, as Japan's most important neighbour, she cannot be ignored in any lasting peace settlement with Japan. The Canadian government is certainly anxious to see both the Soviet union and China play their full part in a Japanese peace conference which could never be a completely satisfactory one without them. But in this conference, as in other international conferences, we cannot accept dictation by one or two powers through arbitrary use of their veto. If such dictation is insisted on by these powers, I suggest we may have to go along without them.

We in Canada recognize that the United States government has a primary responsibility in respect to the settlement with Japan, and I gave expression to that recognition when I talked about this matter at our conference at Ceylon. For this and for other reasons I was particularly glad to have an opportunity to exchange views on this subject with General MacArthur in Tokyo. As a result, I hope now, more than ever, that all the recent statements that have been made favouring an early settlement with Japan will soon result in action, and that at least one major problem may soon be erased from our slate of problems in the Pacific. I may add that I found no objection in Tokyo from any quarter to this view of the desirability of a Japanese peace conference at the earliest possible day.

These were the main political subjects that we discussed at our conference; but we also talked about economic and financial questions. Some of these came up in the course of the discussion we had on the European situation, on developments towards European economic unity; the part that should be played more particularly by the United Kingdom in that development, and how the United Kingdom could reconcile her European and her commonwealth positions. Mr. Bevin, the foreign minister of the United Kingdom, who played such a wise and important part at our conference, made a statement on this matter. A statement was also made by the Canadian delegation on the same subject. It was, I think, the only formal statement we made at the conference. I should like to put on the record some excerpts therefrom, because I think it deals with an important matter of international economic policy. I should like to quote as follows from the statement I made at Ceylon:

For our part—

That is the Canadian delegation's part, and it is also the policy of the Canadian government.

—we welcome the prospect of closer economic co-operation among the countries of western Europe. Such a development might be expected to contribute to the military strength of the democratic countries concerned and also, by eliminating uneconomic production and encouraging competitive efficiency, to hasten the day when they would no longer require extraordinary financial assistance from abroad. It would also restore to countries occupied and ravaged during the war that sense of hope which they need now more than they need United States dollars. Western Europe could once again look forward to playing in the world the great role for which its history and the resourceful intelligence of its people qualify it.

During the past few months a great number of proposals for closer economic co-operation in Europe have been put forward. Some of them are perhaps as frivolous as the names they bear. Others, however, are more solidly based and deserve careful examination.

In examining them I would suggest that two tests should be applied. First of all it should be determined whether the plan has substantial content or is merely a gesture. Does it take account of present-day economic realities in western Europe and the rest of the world? Is it likely to further the ends which it purports to serve? Secondly, each plan should be tested against the criterion of whether or not it will lead to a progressively wider co-operation in trade and other economic matters between all the countries in the free world.

Some of the proposals made recently seem to my government to be as likely to encourage the development of new high-cost industries and increased high-cost agricultural production in Europe as to lead to the objectives of greater efficiency and lower costs and prices at which they purport to be aiming. What must be avoided is the creation of a closed, high-cost, inflationary economic bloc, whether a sterling bloc, a commonwealth bloc, a European bloc, or a North American bloc, which would make progress toward a wider multilateral system of trade and payments more difficult. We recognize, at least under present conditions, the advantages to world trade of the sterling area. We have always contended, however, that the sterling area as we know it today should be regarded as a transitional stage on the way to a trading system where currencies will be convertible and where exchange controls and quantitative restrictions will be drastically reduced. In the same way I would argue that any new economic bloc which might be set up in Europe should be so designed as to facilitate rather than retard progress towards this goal.

It is often said in Canada that, in the short run at least, such a bloc might do some damage to Canadian trade. I would hope that it would not be serious. Nevertheless, it might be better for us in Canada to suffer some temporary disadvantages rather than to see the prospect of closer economic co-operation which we believe to be necessary in western Europe made impossible because the United Kingdom is unable to participate.

During the conference there were also economic and financial talks carried on by officials of the delegations represented there. They were carried on at the same time as the ministerial talks, and the reports of those discussions have been made directly to the ministers of finance. We were fortunate to have highly qualified experts at these talks, and they took an active part in them. They concerned in the main the present position and future prospects of the sterling area. The Canadian position with respect to participation in talks of this kind was, if I may say so, a little equivocal. It certainly was not the same as that of the other participating representatives, who without exception came from sterling areas. In fact our role at those talks, if I may put it that way, was that of a persistent but very friendly dollar gadfly. We made clear to the others that naturally we could not be associated with any efforts of the sterling countries to reduce imports from Canada as a dollar country, but we hoped that the balance which we admitted they must achieve could be brought about, at as high a level as possible, by increasing dollar earnings through increased exports to dollar markets, and by encouraging the inflow of capital investment from dollar sources.

Other subjects discussed at these talks were the short-term prospects for the sterling area on dollar account; forecasts of dollar earnings in the year ahead; the sterling balances, especially those of Pakistan and India, and the effect of those on the United Kingdom financial picture; the over-all as well as the dollar deficit of individual sterling area countries. These discussions were useful, and I hope will help in solving these important financial problems which face the commonwealth countries today.

So much, then, for the Colombo conference itself. After that conference my colleague the Minister of Fisheries and I, with our officials, had an opportunity to visit a number of countries in the Far East. Wherever we visited, we attempted to discuss trade as well as political questions of mutual interest. I think hon. members will agree that in Canada there is a growing interest in the potential demand for Canadian products in the Asian market; and of course we share the great interest of the western democracies in the development of trade with Asia as a means of contributing to the growth and stability and healthy economic development of that part of the world which is so important to us. In addition, an increase in our trade with the countries of Asia would serve in our case a dual purpose. To the extent that imports into Canada from the countries of Asia could be alternative to imports otherwise made from the United States, that would assist us to balance our trade with the United States and would provide those countries of Asia with exchange for the financing of additional Canadian imports.

On this aspect of our journey I hope my colleague the Minister of Fisheries will report later in this debate in more detail. On our journey every effort was taken to explore the possibility of increasing and expanding Canadian trade with the countries visited. Without exception, wherever we went we found not only a great friendship but a lively interest in achieving that objective of greater trade. In Tokyo, for instance, we had one discussion with General MacArthur devoted exclusively to trade matters, and he expressed his great desire to do what he could to increase Canadian-Japanese trade. He added —and this is an addition which will be of particular interest to my colleague the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann)— that there was no desire in Japan to indulge in commercial chicanery of the kind that disturbed us in Canada so much in the years before the war. He went on to say, and I hope he is correct, that we now had a guarantee against dumping by Japan in the removal of government subsidies on the one hand and the building up of the trade union movement, with protected wages, on the other. Therefore he considered that Canada need not fear in the future the menace of Japanese trade of the pre-war variety, but could rather look forward to trade built on a sound basis of mutual benefit. I told him that was the kind of trade, and indeed the only kind, in which we were interested.

I apologize for trespassing on the indulgence of the house. I must have long since exceeded the time allotted to me under the rules.

Some hon. Members: Go on.

Mr. Pearson: I should like to say just a word about one or two of the countries we visited on the way back; and the political situation we found there. After the conference, we first visited Pakistan. We were all very much impressed by the drive and energy of the essentially frontier, desert town of Karachi, where the capital of a new nation is being constructed in a hurry and in the face of terrific obstacles. The achievements of two years in that country of Pakistan have been notable, to say the least. The difficulties facing Pakistan are very great, but they are being met in a spirit of eager and deep patriotism. In fact, to those people Pakistan seemed almost as much of a religion as a state. I know that all hon. members will be glad to know that the Prime Minister of Pakistan, who is one of the great statesmen of that part of the world, on his trip to this continent will before long be visiting Canada as a guest of the Canadian government.

We left Pakistan after an all-too-short visit, and our next stop was India. He is indeed a brash person who attempts to say anything about India on the basis of a visit of two or three days; but it was impossible not to be impressed by the potentialities as well as the problems of that great country. We stayed at New Delhi, but we had the opportunity also of seeing something of Indian village life, where life goes on as it did centuries ago, though even there the people have been stirred. We spent in New Delhi the last three days of the old era of India under the crown and we left New Delhi the day the republic was proclaimed.

My colleague and I had the privilege of attending in New Delhi the last state dinner given, in the state dining room of the viceroy's palace, to the last governor general of India under the crown; to Mr. Rajagopalachari, the colleague and disciple of Gandhi for so many years. It was difficult to visualize in him the last in a long line of succession from Warren Hastings, with whom indeed he had little in common. I think all of us felt that the atmosphere that night was heavy with history. Yet it was good to know that the break with the monarchy which was occurring the next day was not a break between peoples; in fact, the relations between the Indian people and the other nations of the commonwealth are probably on a friendlier and stronger basis now than they have been for generations. Mr. Nehru, that great man and great Prime Minister, was presiding that night at this dinner. He had himself been the king's guest at Buckingham palace and in various of His Majesty's jails; and when he rose and proposed the king's health, we felt that it was no empty gesture. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that we in this house and in this country wish the people of India well; we wish for them good fortune and great success as they face, as a republic, the great opportunities and the difficult problems which lie ahead for them.

There was, however, one shadow which fell across our proceedings in Ceylon and our visit to Pakistan and India; that was our knowledge of the existence of a number of serious and stubborn disputes between the governments of those two countries. These questions were not, of course, included in the agenda of the conference; and none of us considered it his business to attempt to intervene in them. There were, however, occasions to discuss these questions privately and informally at the conference, and later in Karachi and New Delhi. I myself was reassured by the frankness with which both Indian and Pakistani leaders talked about them, and by their insistence that sooner or later they must find peaceful and just solutions for them. But I could not help being distressed by the intensity and bitterness of feeling on both sides in regard to these questions, and by the wide and serious differences which must be bridged before there is reconciliation.

I was distressed also, as I think any visitor would be, by the serious consequences which flow from the continuation of these disputes, which are spreading enmity between the people at a time when they should be concentrating on the many things they have in common. The disputes are also, I am afraid, destroying the natural economic links which exist between these two countries; they are causing the sacrifice of valuable markets in North America, and they are jeopardizing the solvency of the sterling area as a whole.

Our concern for these problems as Canadians is direct and urgent, because these countries are both friends and associates of ours in the commonwealth, and because we know that the dangers to peace and welfare in the Indian subcontinent are also dangers to the peace and welfare of the whole world. The governments of India and Pakistan themselves must, of course, find a means of settling their disputes over Kashmir and other questions. If, however, there is any way in which we can assist them in finding a solution—and I think we in Canada have given an earnest of our good intentions in this regard—we in the government shall certainly be glad to do what we can. We have already, through our participation in discussions in the security council of the United Nations, where our representative, General McNaughton, played such an active and constructive part in attempting to solve this problem, made one effort to assist; and we regret that it did not prove to be more successful. We must hope, however, that the fine qualities of statesmanship which the leaders of both India and Pakistan have already displayed will make it possible for these two great countries to work out, by accommodation and adjustment, solutions to the disputes which now so unhappily divide them, and that they will therefore be able to continue to make an important and progressive contribution to the political life of Asia and the world.

When we left India we were on our homeward journey from Burma, which is an unhappy country today; to Malaya; to Hong Kong, where on a few square miles around a rock are clustered more people than inhabit the dominion of New Zealand; from Hong Kong to Tokyo; and from Tokyo home.

In conclusion, I should like, in a word, to attempt to give you a general impression which I am afraid will be almost as confused as this statement has been. I feel certain, however, of one thing—and I am more certain of it now than I was before I left Ottawa on January 2—namely, that a great tide is moving in the affairs of more than one-half of the population of the world who live in Asia; a great tide which can lead to progress, peace and good things, but which also, if it sweeps in the wrong direction, can lead to chaos, reaction and destruction. But whatever the result, Mr. Speaker, our own country, Canada, which once may have seemed to be so remote from these matters, and which now stands on the threshold of such great developments, will be deeply and directly affected by the outcome of what is now going on in Asia.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the house has listened to a very important and interesting statement from the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). Since we in this part of the house have sought at all times to keep our external affairs on a non-partisan basis, perhaps the house will fully understand me when I say that if in this country we must, unfortunately, it seems, for the next several years, have a Liberal administration, nevertheless we are very glad that in that Liberal administration the portfolio of external affairs is in the very capable hands of Mike Pearson.

Sir, first, his review has emphasized again what is one of the miracles of all time, namely, the adaptability to changing conditions of this British commonwealth of nations, which, within the past year and a half, has extended its reaches to embrace three new partners in Asia. It seems to me that what he had to say to us this afternoon emphasizes again how valuable a contribution that commonwealth, buttressed, as it is, with the presence and active participation of these three great new partners, has made, and what a beneficent mission it has to fulfil for the benefit of all mankind. Think, sir, what a truly marvellous thing it is that our partners in India, whose leaders only so short a time ago were suffering confinement in prison because they were at variance with the policies of Britain, now find it in their hearts to dismiss all thoughts of bitterness and to regard British representatives, as well as those from the other partners of the commonwealth, as brothers, and to work with them toward common ends for the good of all mankind.

About four months have passed since this house last debated the vitally important subject of Canada's external relations. The gravity of the world crisis has not abated in those four months. It is true there has been a stabilization of the situation in Europe, due in no small part to the success of the North Atlantic pact; and we may well, sir, derive useful lessons in establishing policies with respect to other quarters of the globe from the success which has already attended that agreement among the western nations. It is true that the communists are not inactive in Europe. It is true, sir, that in those unhappy countries behind the iron curtain the persecutions are still going on, and the trials which are a travesty of justice. Nevertheless, in a broad sense stabilization has been achieved. But southeast Asia has now become the cockpit of the world and in what has been happening in China, to the extent that events there indicate that the government of that great nation and of that great peace-loving people has come under the direct influence of the Kremlin, it does represent a major catastrophe for all mankind. We wish the people of China well. We know that there were grave faults in the previous government but we do want to see the independence of China maintained. Whatever government she may choose for herself, it is vital to the peace of the world that it be under no submission to the Kremlin.

And, sir, in those countries south of China which were visited by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, we see events unfolding similar to the plan of those that we saw unfolding in Europe in recent years. Civil war, well, yes, civil war sponsored by the communists. Yes, communists never operate simply on an internal basis. Communists are always operating internationally because they take their orders from the Kremlin, and as the communists of these countries are deriving succour and support and material assistance from the communist forces to the north and the communist forces of Russia we see there, sir, a situation that is fraught with the utmost danger for the peace of all the world. Every day we find increasing evidences and naked exposure of the determination of the Kremlin to dominate the whole world. India today occupies a pivotal position in this situation that is developing in southeast Asia. It brings heart and courage to us all, I am sure, sir, to hear the kind of report that the minister brought to the house this afternoon as to the great strides that are being made by these three new partners in the commonwealth, namely, India, Pakistan and Ceylon.

The minister concluded his remarks with a summary of one or two sentences. Sir, I am going to draw this lesson from his statement and from events in that part of the world as one has watched them in these recent months. It is the lesson that was learned in Europe not long before, that while we may deplore the necessity of building armaments, while we may deplore the necessity of colossal expenditures upon armaments, the fact remains, and is incontestable by anybody, that we in this country dare not be unprepared for any eventuality. We cannot trust communist designs either abroad or in Canada.

Now, sir, a word about certain matters that touch us directly in this house. At the outset of this new session I should like—and it is in no perfunctory way that I do it—to extend my congratulations to the hon. members for Kindersley (Mr. Larson) and Villeneuve (Mr. Dumas), who moved and seconded the motion that is under debate.

I should like to extend my hearty congratulations to the new Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris); and if the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) will accept them, my congratulations to him on having made such a good choice. It is a happy thought, sir, that in this portfolio two kindred subjects, immigration and citizenship, are directly united.

If I have any criticism of immigration policies in the past, it is less on account of questions of numbers or terms of admission than it is of the fact that so often, when we have admitted to our shores those who came here by choice and in accordance with the laws of this land, after they have arrived they have been ignored. They have not received at the hands of Canadians that welcome and that consideration which ought to be extended to them, when we realize that these are to be our fellow-Canadians. When they come to these shores to make their homes here now and in the future they come here as Canadians-to-be; and, sir, it is in that spirit, it seems to me, that we should at all times receive them.

In this country we want to build unity on the sure foundation of tolerance and mutual respect of people of whatever race they come. Once they come to Canada, regardless of their ethnic origin, they should be received as Canadians-to-be, and they should be welcomed as such. It is well to remember, sir, because we have increasing evidences of it on every hand every day, that we do not sacrifice anything of a truly distinctive Canadian culture by welcoming those who bring to us great cultural endowments and backgrounds from other lands. In my own city of late we have seen the flowering of grand opera on a scale which I think has not been seen in this country before, and made possible by the contributions to our culture which have been brought by those from other lands or their children who have derived a rich culture from other lands. Therefore, sir, I hope that with those newcomers to our land, whatever be their racial or ethnic origin, we shall be enabled, with the strength that they bring to this land, to build here a greater and freer Canada.

Now a word about the conduct of business in the house at this session. It is well that in this traditional debate on the speech from the throne we give thought to the machinery of the house, and the ways and means by which the house may seek to improve the methods by which it discharges public business. I have always felt that at all times, without sacrificing the dignity of the house, we should seek to expedite proceedings and to achieve greater efficiency in the dispatch of public business. It will be no surprise, therefore, when I come back to a theme on which the house has listened to me before, namely, the necessity for a greater extension of the use of committees.

It is high time the procedure of the house was modernized. We are labouring today—and I use the word advisedly—under the handicap of antiquated procedure. It is high time we undertook resolutely to streamline house procedure, and I believe it can be done without sacrificing in any way the essential rights of hon. members.

Let me say in the first place that I am not going to repeat the arguments I used in the last session by pointing out how many of the standing committees have not been meeting for years, and could be dispensed with in favour of new committees which would deal with questions arising every day, and which the house can deal with adequately only through committees.

One of the most important and primary duties of the House of Commons is to scrutinize expenditures—not just after they are made, but to scrutinize the requests coming from the government for the provision of funds for future expenditures. Therefore I say the time has long passed when the house should set up a committee or committees on estimates. As all hon. members know, under our present clumsy and awkward procedure it is quite impossible to scrutinize estimates or derive needed information in a proper fashion. It can be obtained only at second hand from ministers, and without any opportunity of getting down to details of expenditure. Under these circumstances it is impossible to discharge our duties of supervising and controlling public expenditures.

Already we have a useful precedent in the standing committee on external affairs—and I hope that committee will be set up again at an early date, and that the minister will follow the excellent procedure he followed last year of coming before the committee for more detailed discussion of Canada's external relations than is possible in debates in the house. That committee has had referred to it in each of the last three years the estimates of the Department of External Affairs. It is only fair to say that the estimates of that department have had a better and a more understanding scrutiny than have those of any other department, owing to the fact that in committee it is possible to review estimates in detail, and to elicit firsthand information.

Hon. members will recall the debate on this subject on October 26 last year in which, during a useful discussion as to the methods of reviewing expenditures, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) said, as reported at page 1159 of Hansard:

> I must say I do not think the House of Commons satisfactorily discharges its responsibility of examining in detail the estimates of proposed expenditures for a year.

And again at page 1173, at the conclusion of the discussion, he said:

> I want to conclude by saying that I think we have had a most helpful discussion. I do not think members of the committee expect me to express any specific views as to the different suggestions that have been made, but—

And this is the part I would stress.

> —I shall be very glad to consider, between now and the next session, what the government might do to expedite the efficient study of the estimates. I think with the co-operation of all parties we should be able to effect some improvement in our system.

Some improvement in the system is urgently needed. I therefore look forward with interest to hearing from the government its concrete proposals for the improvement of that system.

Some are saying that the committee on public accounts is a committee which could undertake this task. If I may say so, that is a complete misconception. The public accounts committee is established for the purpose of reviewing expenditures that have been made. What is needed in this instance is a committee which will review estimates of expenditures before the house makes the money available to the government.

I shall not dwell upon these other matters, because the suggestions have been put forward and debated by others. A committee on national defence is urgently required today, as is also a standing committee on veterans affairs. We require, too, a standing committee on social security—none of your special or mushroom committees, but a standing committee. As has been recommended on several occasions in recent sessions by the special committee on radio broadcasting and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation there should be a standing committee in that field.

We are meeting under conditions very much changed from those faced by the house a year ago—trade losses, unemployment and a record of illegality on the part of the government. Those who are raising cheap cheers and who are doing the desk-thumping in the house, and a good deal of crowing over the results of the election of last June, would do well to ponder the conditions under which that verdict of the people was obtained. They should consider the changed conditions which have followed that verdict, and also the exposure of some of the things the people should have had brought to their attention at that time, but which they were kept from knowing through the deliberate action of the government.

The unemployment situation, already of emergent proportions, is alarming, not simply because of the numbers of unemployed—the 375,000 who have been seeking employment through the national employment service—but because of the very rapid increase in those numbers in the past two months. The figure of unemployed, or of those applying for employment through the national employment service—and we have already heard from the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) that these are not complete figures of the unemployed—was 261,000 at December 22. On January 12, three weeks later, it had risen by 62,000, and in the succeeding five weeks by another 52,000. The figure on January 12 was 100,000 larger than on the same date in 1949.

The Minister of Finance cannot brush this situation aside any longer by saying that it is purely seasonal unemployment. This problem is much more deep-seated. We will have to have expedients to meet it now—of course we will. But a more deep-seated and far-reaching remedy is required, because the situation has arisen directly out of our loss of markets.

It is a tragic fact that agriculture, the basic industry of this country, is today bearing the brunt of the loss of markets abroad. The whole structure of this country's sale of its agricultural surplus abroad in recent years, particularly to the United Kingdom, is in danger of collapsing. Today we have only three contracts left for the sale of food to Great Britain. Figures from the dominion bureau of statistics show that the value of our field crops alone in Canada in 1949 fell by 16 per cent as compared with 1948, from a total of $1,696 million in 1948 to $1,427 million in 1949.

[Mr. Fleming.]

The farmers of this country, the essential food producers, were promised by this government that there would be great and continuing benefits from the control system. Under that control system they sacrificed more than $500 million as a result of the government's wheat policy alone. Our farmers were not permitted to sell their wheat on the free markets of the world. Today those same farmers are being deprived of the promised fruits of that policy.

The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) may be able to persuade himself that no great importance should be attached to the withdrawal of ECA funds for purchases by the United Kingdom of our agricultural products, but I suggest to him that the farmers of this country are not shrugging off that matter quite so lightly, especially when they saw on January 19 that ECA funds are no longer to be available to the United Kingdom for the purchase of Canadian bacon. They have seen that fund in the process of being cut off so far as other Canadian products are concerned, and they remember that that fund made possible the purchase by the United Kingdom of many of the food products of this country in recent years. Our farmers are beginning to experience a feeling of the gravest disquiet. The Canadian loan to the United Kingdom which has been providing $10 million per month is on the point of being exhausted. These are matters of the gravest concern, not merely to the farmers but, because agriculture is still the basic industry of this country, to all Canadians.

I am not going to dwell on themes about which I spoke at the last session. While we are glad to see an extension of our exports to the United States and our trade with that country placed on a more balanced basis than it has been heretofore, nevertheless such trade with the United States will be no substitute for the loss of our markets in the United Kingdom. To a great extent the economy of this country is dependent upon our being able to move our primary products eastward to the seaboard to find a market in the United Kingdom. While needed markets are being lost to the Canadian producer, at the same time the British government, pursuing a policy of state trading which has not been helpful to Canada, has been entering into contracts for the purchase from countries in Europe, such as Russia, Poland, Hungary and Denmark, of the very products that are fast becoming surplus in this country and for which the Canadian food producer would like to find a market in the United Kingdom. While this has been going on, what have we had from the government? We have had attempts to use plausible and airily optimistic statements as a cloak for apathy and inaction.

It will not be forgotten that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) said in this house last April that our trading relations with the United Kingdom were normal. The only interpretation that can be made of that statement, if it is a true statement, is that the Minister of Trade and Commerce accepts as normal the loss of our market in the United Kingdom for our exportable food surpluses. Apparently the Minister of Trade and Commerce has somehow mesmerized the Prime Minister if the Prime Minister can make the kind of statement that he made in this house two days ago in the face of the way in which the Minister of Trade and Commerce misled the house—under the rules of the house I cannot say it was done intentionally. Nevertheless the people and the electors and this house were misled with regard to Canada's trading relations with the United Kingdom.

What goes on in the executive council when this question of the loss of vitally necessary markets for Canadian products is discussed, if it ever is? I am reminded of the chorus in the Gilbert and Sullivan opera, the Mikado. One can just imagine the Minister of Trade and Commerce getting up and in his baritone singing, "I am right," and the cabinet replying in chorus, "And you are right, and all is right as right can be". Is that the only reaction we can get from hon. gentlemen opposite in the face of a developing crisis in our trading relations with the United Kingdom?

We see unemployment raising its ugly head in this country on a widespread scale. Just lately we have had nights here in Ottawa when the thermometer dropped to 21 or 22 below zero and we were glad to climb into our comfortable beds and pull up the covers. But there were men in the city of Toronto who had no beds, who had no covers to pull up. They have been forced to sleep in temporary shelters and in missions. There is the same story of frustration and the blighting of lives that inevitably follows unemployment. This house will be false to its duty if it accepts on the part of this government that same apathy, that same self-satisfaction in the face of this situation which it has manifested heretofore.

It is not enough for the Prime Minister to say that the municipalities of this country ought to be in good condition by now and should embark on public works. Are the municipalities of this country in position to meet emergent unemployment conditions? It is a thousand pities that hon. gentlemen on the treasury benches, particularly the Prime Minister in the light of what he had to say in this house two days ago, have not had some experience in municipal affairs. If the Prime Minister had had some experience with municipal government he would not be saying the things he has been saying about the ease with which this problem can be fobbed off on the municipalities.

Those urban municipalities that are being faced with the problem of unemployment are municipalities to which the unemployed have largely come from other parts of Canada. It is grossly unfair to expect those municipalities to meet this situation. They are having a most difficult time in meeting increasing demands upon them. We have heard appeals in this house for increased support from the federal treasury for education because the burden of education has been falling so heavily upon the provinces and the municipalities. Yet in the face of that situation, in the face of sound arguments for federal assistance while preserving the autonomy of the provinces with respect to education, the Prime Minister says, "Let the municipalities undertake public works to provide employment for the unemployed".

Are we back in the same old plight of ten or fifteen years ago with the federal government just passing the buck? While we are not very numerous in this part of the house, I think I can say that we will maintain an unremitting fight against this government's attempt to fob off this problem on the municipalities and the provincial governments.

An hon. Member: What of it?

Mr. Fleming: My hon. friend over here can take what comfort he likes out of what I have been saying, but he will not get very much out of what I am going to say. If he is anxious to support the Minister of Justice in a deliberate and calculated breach of the law then let him vote against our amendment and condone illegality.

The Prime Minister had something to say about the dominion-provincial conference. We of the Progressive Conservative party were the ones who throughout the life of the twentieth parliament pleaded for a resumption of the general dominion-provincial conference and we can take a good deal of satisfaction out of the fact that at long last the government did reconvene a general dominion-provincial conference in January of this year.

When the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) talks as he did two days ago about the difference in tone of the deliberations, let me tell him that the extent to which the tone raises more hope of agreement was largely due to the fact that he abandoned the tactics that his government practised in 1945 and 1946 when it wrecked the conference by its stiff-necked, take-it-or-leave-it attitude. I commend the Prime Minister for his change in attitude and tactics at this time, and to the extent that his tactics have changed and he has abandoned that stiff-necked, take-it-or-leave-it attitude we may look forward hopefully to the kind of agreement, the necessity for which we of the Progressive Conservative party have been pleading.

When the Prime Minister undertakes to refer to the 1945 proposals of his government to that dominion-provincial conference he had better check up next time on exactly what those proposals were, because if ever a man was completely mistaken in what he was talking about it was the Prime Minister when speaking about these proposals in the house two days ago. It was in the course of the Prime Minister's remarks referring to that portion of the amendment of my leader which condemns the government for its failure to take any proper steps in the direction of bringing about in Canada a national system of contributory old age pensions which will permit the elimination of the means test. When questioned about this point the Prime Minister undertook to say to the house that it was impossible today to eliminate the means test. He said that you could not have the elimination of the means test without a contributory system. He may have been right in that, but he was completely wrong in saying that the proposals of his government in 1945 for a change in old pensions and the elimination of the means test were based upon a contributory scheme because you will look in vain, sir, through these proposals of the government of Canada submitted to that conference in 1945 and 1946, for so much as a syllable about any contributory scheme. On the contrary, you will find the federal government proposing the elimination of the means test, the very thing that the Prime Minister says is impossible today, the very thing the impossibility of which he marshalled figures in this house two days ago to prove.

At page 38 of his own government's proposals we find words like these:

> . . . it is proposed that the federal government would establish a system of national old age pensions entirely financed and administered by the federal government, and paid at the uniform rate of $30 per month . . . to men and women aged seventy and over in all parts of Canada.

Then he goes on to talk about the benefit of partial recovery through income tax, the very thing he argued against in this house on Monday last. When are we going to get a little consistency on the part of the Prime Minister? Further down the page there are these words:

> The principal feature of the proposed national old age pensions is the elimination of the means test after reaching age seventy.

Again we find the following:

> The removal of the means test would make it possible for these pensions to be administered by the federal government alone on a uniform national basis, without the necessity for provincial participation, and would therefore considerably relieve provincial finances.

Yet the Prime Minister comes along and attempts to refute, without realizing it, every syllable of the proposals that his government made in 1945. He says that the means test cannot be eliminated. He also says today that you must have provincial participation, when in 1945 he, as a member of the government, was saying: If you adopt our policy with regard to old age pensions for those seventy years of age and over, without a means test, you will not require provincial participation. It is about time, Mr. Speaker, that we had more frankness and knowledge on the part of the government as to this problem. We do not want them trying to push this problem aside again with the kind of fallacious argument and mistake on the facts that we heard in this house from the Prime Minister two nights ago.

What have we got from the government at this session in the way of a proposal for dealing concretely and resolutely with this problem? We simply have a proposal that we appoint another committee to get some information. In this country and in this parliament today the lack is not one of information. There is plenty of information. What is required is a little courage, a willingness on the part of the government to act, and some honesty in keeping promises made to the people.

So far as time permits, I wish to mention two other subjects, communism and the rule of law. As to communism I can only conclude from a statement made by the Prime Minister in the house on February 20 that he considers no action necessary. Referring to action in the light of communist activities he says at the bottom of page 63 of Hansard:

> But when action requires to be taken, we think that we shall have the courage . . . to take it . . .

The Prime Minister did not indicate that the government is taking any action today. He had plenty of opportunity to indicate to the house and to the people of Canada any action that was being taken. In all fairness to the Prime Minister we can only conclude that no government action is considered necessary in the light of the activities of communists in Canada. The events of recent years, and particularly of the past two years, including the fall of freedom in Czechoslovakia, must have made it perfectly clear that the activities of communists all over the world are directed from one source and centre, and one alone. It is the Kremlin. Communists do not operate independently in different countries. They operate under a system of international strategy directed by the Kremlin. If the government thinks it is perfectly right and proper that the same freedom of action should be extended to communists in Canada as they have exercised hitherto, then let them so declare.

The recent revelations of the spying activities in this country of Dr. Klaus Fuchs should wake up some of those on the treasury benches who hitherto have been sleeping so soundly on this subject. These and other matters, not to mention what was said to the house last fall by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) to the effect that his department was not prepared to entrust to the national film board the making of films involving matters essential to the defence of Canada, and the remarks of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) in referring to screening being carried on, screening—which the government apparently considered necessary—of those engaged in broadcasting overseas in foreign languages over the C.B.C. shortwave facilities, ought to be enough to put members of the house on their guard, and to call for resolute action on the part of the government.

What do I propose? In the first place I suggest that the government should be frank with us. It was none other than the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) who, in a speech to the Montreal Rotary Club on July 19 last, said this:

> The domestic threat of communism must be met "by strengthening, if necessary, our Criminal Code against actions which threaten the security of the state."

These are the words of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, a man who has seen with his own eyes the sinister depradations of communism in other countries, who has shown by his statement on July 19 last that he is aware that these activities are being carried on in Canada. Just what is the strengthening of the Criminal Code that he recommends? What are the activities of these communists against which he recommends that action should be taken by way of strengthening the Criminal Code? I agree with him that the Criminal Code should be strengthened. I want him to come forward and tell us, as he should, about the activities on which that comment was based.

Let me remind this house that almost four years have passed since the royal commission on communist espionage in this country made its report. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has made much of the action that was taken thereon. There have been trials of those who were named in the report of that commission, but the government have not exhausted the recommendations that were made. In the light of world events it is well that the house should be reminded today of what those recommendations were. They will be found at pages 689 and 690 of the report. There are seven recommendations in all, and I shall be brief with them. The first relates to withholding publication of certain exhibits at the inquiry, and I need not dwell on that. This is the second one:

> 2. That the proper authorities in each service, department and organization take such steps as may be considered desirable and effective, in the light of this report and of the evidence and exhibits, to prevent further unauthorized transmission of information and to set up further safeguards.

What has the government done? Here four years later we are told that certain departments and branches of the government are not entrusted with certain government business because their employees have not been screened. I repeat, that is four years after the recommendation made by the royal commission.

> 3. That all security measures should be coordinated and rendered as uniform as possible.
> 4. That the evidence and exhibits accompanying this report be placed before the proper persons in the various services, departments and organizations affected, for study so that a complete evaluation of the information and the material handed over can be made in each case to ascertain in detail what has, and what has not, been compromised. That consideration be given to whether the findings so made should be communicated to the proper authorities in the United Kingdom and the United States.

Then consider the importance of the next recommendation:

> 5. That the Official Secrets Act, 1939, be studied in the light of the information contained in this report and in the evidence and exhibits, and, if it is thought advisable, that it be amended to provide additional safeguards.

The government has not introduced in this house any bill to amend and strengthen the Official Secrets Act.

> 6. That consideration be given to any additional security measures which would be practical to prevent the infiltration into positions of trust under the government of persons likely to commit acts such as those described in this report.

What has been done in the light of that recommendation? Here four years later the screening is still not completed.

> 7. That the practice and procedure in connection with the issue of Canadian passports be revised. While not elsewhere referred to in this report, we have had evidence indicating that naturalization and birth certificates have also been improperly obtained. We therefore suggest that the conditions surrounding the issue of these documents might be the subject of consideration by the proper authority.

We would like to know what action the government propose to take. There have been some routine inquiries, in the usual way, into the matter of the issuance of passports and certificates of naturalization, but where is that detailed scrutiny and investigation which was called for by the commissioners?

So, sir, I ask that the government do four things. First, that they carry out the recommendations of their own royal commission. Second, that in keeping with the proposal of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) they take steps to strengthen the Criminal Code. Third, that they get on seriously with this work within the government service. I want to make it abundantly clear that I advocate this not only because of the necessity for finding, wherever they are, those whose first loyalty is to the Kremlin and eradicating them from the service of Canada, but also to remove any suspicion from faithful civil servants whose patriotism and loyalty never should have been called into question, and never would have been called into question if this government had done its duty as it should.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member has exhausted his time.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the hon. member has unanimous consent he may proceed.

Mr. Fleming: I thank hon. members for their indulgence, and I assure the house I do not intend to trespass upon it.

I indicated a few moments ago that I wished to say something about the rule of law. The hope for the future of mankind, depending as it does upon the preservation of peace in the world, lies in the establishment in international affairs of the rule of law. Within Canada it is fundamental to our freedom as citizens. It is just as important as the freedoms we enjoy in this parliament or at the ballot box. Equally important are the freedoms assured to us by the rule of law, by which we mean simply that all men are equal before the law, and not only before the law but under the law. Whether it be the Prime Minister or any citizen in any walk of life, all men are equal and none may override the law with impunity.

Closely coupled with that is this further fundamental principle, that when parliament legislates it does so, according to the terms of its enactment, for all people. Its laws are binding upon all. It rests with one branch of the government, namely the Department of Justice, to maintain the law through the avenues of enforcement that have been set up under our democratic processes. There has not been a graver or more deadly blow struck at that fundamental guarantee of the freedoms of all Canadians or that hope for the future of mankind in the relations between nations, than was dealt by this government by its illegal suppression last year of the report of the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act. The law, in express terms, required that this report, which was delivered to the government in December, 1948, should be made public within fifteen days. It has been shown that this would have been perfectly possible; but for reasons best known to itself, and not frankly admitted yet, the government chose to suppress that report for a period of ten months. I say with confidence that it would not have been made public yet had it not been for the resignation of Mr. McGregor. The same reasons that led this government deliberately to suppress that report for ten months would have led it to continue to suppress the report even to this day had not Mr. McGregor's resignation forced it into the open. Why was it suppressed?

An hon. Member: There was an election coming on.

Mr. Fleming: Yes.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): I do not like to interrupt, Mr. Speaker, but I am next on the list, and my hon. friend has already had 60 minutes.

Mr. Fleming: A moment ago, when the house indicated that it was prepared to extend my time, I said I would not take advantage of the kindness of hon. members, and I do not wish to ask the further indulgence of the house. So if the hon. member wishes me to bring my remarks to a close, I shall do so.

I shall limit myself on this occasion to saying that the government has shown itself since to be utterly unrepentant; and it behooves this house, as the custodian, guarantor and champion of the freedoms of the people, to cleanse the treasury benches of lawbreakers and substitute for them those who will respect, obey and carry out the law. What has happened in this instance is simply the culmination of what has been going on here for a very long time. The ministers have long treated parliament with contempt, and it was only a short step until they felt perfectly free to override, disregard and disobey an enactment of parliament.

Mr. A. C. Stewart (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join those who have already congratulated the new minister of the crown and the new parliamentary assistants on their appointments. I wish also to congratulate the mover of the address. Not only do I congratulate him on what he said, but being one of those perhaps more experienced in the legislature I would suggest that he follow his air force training, make sure of his route, and make sure that his landing gear is down at all proper times.

Politics are somewhat different from overseas service. Referring to the seconder of the motion, I was pleased indeed to hear him speak in both English and French, something which I unfortunately cannot do. I have, however, had the opportunity of going through his province extensively. The hon. member who moved this address happened to mention the maritimes, and I noted his remarks about them. He said that all Canadians should make it a point, particularly the members of this chamber, to visit all parts of Canada and all provinces of Canada. I had the pleasure of visiting the maritimes about twenty years ago and my friend the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black) was good enough to drive me over from Digby, Nova Scotia, to Lunenburg, at which time we spoke at the Bridgewater apple convention and also at the Lunenburg fishermen's convention. May I say that you have not seen the maritimes until you have had one of their real fish dinners such as the one which Judge Arsenault of Prince Edward Island was good enough to entertain me with. The maritimes are not foreign to the west.

As to the province of Quebec, you cannot say you have seen that province by visiting Murray Bay or Lucerne in Quebec. You must really go around the Gaspe peninsula to see the province of Quebec, and you have to see these people who have been in there for three or four hundred years. The late Mr. Perrault, who was then minister of roads, some twenty years ago was good enough to take me around that drive and take me into all the villages in that part of the country. They had one of the worst storms in history on the Atlantic at that time, and the people were up against it. They had only the cow, the boat, and the old seigniorial system of holding land. But those people are of a steady race. They have been in there three or four hundred years. They do not kick every time something goes wrong. They are a steady people. No one will ever make socialists or C.C.F.'ers out of that bunch. Incidentally, speaking as a westerner, and having been born in the west of parents who were both born in Ontario, I want to say this. I saw more oxen between Lunenburg and Digby than I ever saw in western Canada; and my father was there in 1882 along with the father of General McNaughton.

As to the debate, I want to compliment the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) despite what has been said by the feeble opposition in connection with his remarks to this house. I do not think I can add very much to what he said. We hear that we have too strong a group on this side of the house, that the government is too powerful, and that we should have a stronger opposition. I wish we had a stronger opposition. I think it would be helpful. But we have on this side of the house what is known as the rump and we really represent the largest group sitting on the side opposite to the government. I can assure the opposition that if they cannot do the job, we will help them along a bit at times in order to see that we get good government.

As to the Conservative party, may I say that I should like to see us get down again to the two-party system. In that way I think we would get better government. In the Conservative party are some splendid men. You have such members as the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black), and the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross), who was in the same battalion as myself. You have good material, and I cannot understand why the party have not done more with the material they have. We have sent you, or you have taken from the west, some of your leaders. There was Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, and he disappeared. Then you took honest John Bracken, and he disappeared. You tried to get one of our younger fellows, but you did not give him the job. You have a leader now. I have listened to him speak in this house, and I think he is doing a good job. He speaks quite sincerely and he is covering his platform. Don't change leaders every day. We want you to "stay put" behind the leader that you have. We notice factions in your group already. I can see certain fellows who would like to be leader. Don't change leaders again. Keep one leader for a while, and then we shall get down to brass tacks.

We have now before this house an amendment moved by the Conservative party, and they have a right to move such an amendment. Then we have an amendment to the amendment moved by the C.C.F. If there are two groups that are co-ordinating in this house, it is the C.C.F. and the Conservatives.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): To a certain extent. I do not think the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) will ever really co-operate with the C.C.F., but I am talking officially about the record. People will be astounded at this co-operation when they read it in Hansard. In connection with that co-operation, may I say that it is a peculiar thing that when the C.C.F. moved their amendment, instead of following the usual practice and striking out all the words after "that", they agreed with most of the amendment of the Conservatives and added only a few touching words. The C.C.F., of course, never totally agree with anybody. In connection with that and with this unholy alliance that is taking place in this house, I should like to quote Mr. Coldwell, speaking at Brantford on May 26. The newspaper article is headed "Unholy Alliance Seen by Coldwell" and reads in part as follows:

Asserting Premier Duplessis and George Drew, Progressive Conservative leader, have entered into an "unholy alliance," Mr. Coldwell told a political campaign meeting "a vote for a Tory candidate is a vote for another form of invisible government at Ottawa controlled by the irresponsible hand of Maurice Duplessis.

I am sorry that the hon. member for Papineau (Mr. Houde) is not in his seat—I have not seen him there yet—though he has not been coupled in this article. It continues:

He referred to an address by Mr. Drew in Flin Flon, Manitoba, in which the Progressive Conservative leader quoted Mr. Coldwell as having advised voters: "If you can't vote C.C.F., then vote Liberal." "I have said no such thing," Mr. Coldwell said.

He does not need to say it any more out in our country.

The main complaint of the opposition in their amendment is with regard to markets. I think that complaint was fairly well answered by the Prime Minister himself. If later on there is any doubt about that, I think the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) will be quite capable of dealing with the matter. As hon. members know, the markets were lost in England to a certain extent not by the action of this government but by the action of the British government itself, and by an action which Sir Stafford Cripps on many occasions said he would not take; I refer to the devaluing of the pound. That is why the market was lost. There is no question about that. Why then try to pass the buck to the government?

The hon. member for Souris, speaking in this house yesterday—and as I said, I have every respect for the hon. member for Souris—mentioned a $2 billion loss. He has jumped four times over the amount of the Winnipeg grain exchange and the pamphlet that he read from. We did not lose $2 billion as against the United States farmer; and as a matter of fact, the comparison is odious in any event because, after all, the people of the United States consume the greater portion of their wheat production. In addition, they have subsidized and carried a load of farm products to the extent of over $3,500 million; and I do not think anybody in this house would advocate our present government doing that.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member wants to be fair when he says I jumped the price. The $2 billion has to do with all agricultural production. I separated it from the wheat. I know he wants to be fair.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): The hon. member did not separate it in his speech. I checked his speech.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Agricultural production.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): It is the speech that I am referring to. If the hon. member will check it he will find that I am being fair, and that he did not divide it.

In addition I want to say this. In connection with these wheat agreements, in connection not only with the international wheat agreement, but with the other wheat agreements that were made, they were entered into with the absolute endorsation of the wheat pools and of the organized farmers throughout this country. They were endorsed completely by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, which speaks for a million and a half organized farmers, and outside the Winnipeg grain exchange and a few of its subsidiaries nobody in this country was complaining about the government entering into these contracts. I venture this assertion, that these contracts did help Britain at a time when she needed help; and if they had not been entered into, and if we had put upon the British people the full load and the full price for these products we might have had a slump in our markets more than two years ago, and we would not have got the benefit that we are getting today from a fairly steady market.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is very generous. I apologize for interrupting one of the newer members, but I want to ask a question. The question I have in my mind is this. If, as he says, the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) is out in his figures, perhaps it would help him to some conclusion—

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): You ask the question.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): —if he adds all the other industries in Canada apart from the growing of wheat to the general equation. Prices were pegged in Canada, Mr. Speaker, but they were not pegged in the United States.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): My hon. friend has been long enough in this house—and I have been in a legislature before; I am not a new member—to know that that is not a question. The hon. member did not ask me a question. He made a little speech. I have no objection to that.

In connection with the matter of our wheat market I want to say this, that the people of this country, whether the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) agrees with it or not, did in their judgment less than a year ago endorse the government of this country, the government which carried Canada through the days of the war and has done so since. The people watched their records; the people made their decision, and it was an overwhelming decision.

I am not going to profess that every minister of this government is a perfect minister; I do not think the government would contend that for one minute. But they did a good job when the going was tough, and I feel that as far as these markets are concerned, and as far as the negotiating of markets is concerned, they are fully seized of the fact that the western farmer feels, and properly so, that during the war he was called upon to take a reduced price; that he feels that the general taxpayer of Canada should assist him if times get tougher. I think they feel that. In addition I think the government will see, as they have already done by fixing certain minimum prices, that the farmer will be properly secured as far as the government can secure him, we being an exporting country.

This afternoon the Secretary of State for External Affairs spoke for over an hour. Hon. members will note that he made certain references to matters of economics and conversations with regard to trading that they carried on all along the line. I venture to say that the staff left behind—I understand that staffs have been left behind in some of these countries for trading purposes—are busy trying to see that other markets are procured for Canada. I do not think you will find that the trip to the Orient was wasted at all.

I submit that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) is not over in the old country just on a health trip. He has been visiting certain other countries in Europe. It was obvious at the conclusion of the last session that he was tired out. I venture to say that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has not been entirely enjoying himself over in the old country. The matter of obtaining these markets is a matter of negotiation. I feel sure that the government is seized of the importance of securing a market for the surplus wheat particularly.

Of course we now have the international wheat agreement for the next two years, and other markets, I venture to say, will be found. The situation in England has not been ideal. The previous speaker, the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), said that England today was buying from Russia, Czechoslovakia and other countries. Well, there is an election tomorrow in England. I am not speaking for the Liberal party, but personally I hope that Winnie Churchill goes back in there, and then we may get a little better deal than we have got so far.

Mr. Knowles: I will take you up on that.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): The C.C.F. are always so optimistic in politics; they are pessimistic in everything else. You were very optimistic up in the Battlefords, and you know what happened up there the other day.

Considerable emphasis has been laid on the matter of unemployment. Every hon. member in this house has been surfeited with printed pamphlets prepared, no doubt, by the C.C.F. braintrust, sent and labelled "Canadian Congress of Labour", which is either their left wing or their left foot, I do not know which. But in any event they are the political arm of the C.C.F., or the C.C.F. is their political arm. In any case, the Canadian Congress of Labour has been responsible for sending to every hon. member these printed pamphlets having to do with the abolition of the means test.

The matter of unemployment is referred to in the amendment of the C.C.F. party. I personally listened to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) speak on unemployment. He did not say that the municipalities would have to take the load. He implied that they should take their share of the load. I made a survey of unemployment in the three constituencies surrounding Yorkton and served by the employment office there. The situation there is that less than 4 per cent of the employables are unemployed. I was assured by the man in charge of the employment office that directly spring opens up not only will every one of them be employed but there will be a shortage of labour up there. That is not an invitation to Cape Breton South to send that 10 per cent of his up to my particular constituency.

I respect the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis). On many occasions he seems to talk the same language as some of us talk. Sometimes I think he should move his seat in the house, but apparently his associations have spoiled him. When he spoke yesterday he dealt with unemployment. In connection with unemployment he made certain statements that I do not think he was really serious about. These statements do not help. They do not build up morale. They never built it up in the army or out of it. This is his statement as reported at page 98 of Hansard:

> It is rather frightening when you think that we have just come through a major conflict.

According to the hon. member's statement only 10 per cent are unemployed in Cape Breton South. I continue with his remarks:

> The unemployed in Canada were the ones who fought it. A few years after their return, with a threatening international situation and the possibility of another war, whom do you think those fellows are going to shoot at the next time?
> They have had one experience. They are human, and many of them are the boys who came back from this war.

As the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) well knows, the unemployed of Canada did not fight the first war. Very, very few in our battalion, or any of the battalions, were unemployed. Nor did the unemployed of Canada fight the last war. Only a very small percentage of the soldiers, sailors or airmen who fought in the last war were unemployed—a very small percentage, indeed.

In addition, by his own admission, 90 per cent of the Cape Breton workers are employed —and I venture to say most of them are returned men. Furthermore, in my own branch of the Legion, and I think in every branch of the Legion, as every hon. member can say, when the question is asked, "Are you unemployed?" I have yet in the last year to hear of any legionnaire in the city of Yorkton or vicinity who has answered by saying, "I have no employment."

So that situation is not at all as it is painted. It is exaggerated, and purely for political purposes. In addition, so far as Yorkton is concerned, according to the figures 95 per cent of the unemployment there is seasonal. Eighty-three per cent have applied for and obtained unemployment insurance. We are told the government is about to bring before the house certain provisions to increase the number who may come under the Unemployment Insurance Act, and that provision will help many of those who are at present unemployed. I believe, with respect, that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has adequately covered the situation, and that nothing more need be said in connection with it.

So far as the attitude of the people is concerned, while I do not know what other hon. members have found, in my constituency, which is largely rural and composed of farmers, there has been no complaint about prices. My constituency is composed largely of people from other lands, many of whom are of Ukrainian ancestry. They have made developments, and are educating their sons and daughters in our universities. They are improving their farming methods—and it pleased me to see the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Decore) rise in his place at the last session and point out that the three prize winners at the world grain fair were from Vegreville and of Ukrainian ancestors.

These people are advancing. What was the attitude of those farmers when I returned to my constituency? I never had one delegation of farmers complaining about prices—not one. I never talked with a farmer who was worrying about the pork market—not one. He knew he could go into pork in two or three months, and get out of it again, if he wished to—and they are still raising pork. I never heard one complaint about cattle prices—and I have raised a great many cattle. Cattle prices are good; they are very satisfactory, and will continue so, so long as we can keep the embargo removed by the United States. Incidentally, Canadian cattle sold there last year amounted to only one and a half per cent of the cattle butchered in that country. That is a very small percentage. If the cattle market in my district is sound, farming in that district is also sound.

In that connection the only complaint I received—and I object to all this depression talk—was in connection with eggs. I took that up immediately with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). I received a request from the president of the Saskatchewan poultry association, which is composed of representatives of all branches of the poultry industry in that province, and includes the producers, the co-operatives, the produce dealers, the hatchery men, the feed manufacturers and the poultry division of the university.

When the announcement was made later by the Minister of Agriculture that a floor price of 38 cents a dozen had been fixed I received a letter written by the president of this association while on the train on his way to the Niagara Falls convention. The last paragraph is significant, and states:

> The announcement was received yesterday of the support price being invoked for eggs. To me, again personally, the price has been very well chosen. The reasons are that an efficient operator can cover practically all, if not all his expenses and overhead costs, but with so low a present margin that he will not expand his operations, while the less capable manager will curtail or cease operation, and so bring in a reduction in production, and some measure of stability for the future.
> Thanking you for your assistance in securing this welcome solution.

And that is signed by D. L. Davis of Vanscoy, the president of the Saskatchewan poultry association. They do not get the prices or have the market of the Ontario poultry raisers, because of the much larger population in the triangle in which your cities are located down here. These are the feelings of the president of the poultry association in Saskatchewan.

On the matter of unemployment I should like to speak briefly. Speaking particularly with respect to strikes, let me point out that in this government we have as Minister of Labour the Hon. Humphrey Mitchell. He is a labour man himself and knows about labour. It seems to me he has also a very efficient staff who are familiar with labour conditions, and who are capable of judging things as they are. In Canada today, and for the last number of years, the labour situation has been much better than in the country to the south of us. But where we have a C.C.F. or socialist government we find complaints about unemployment—and I am referring to Saskatchewan.

I hold in my hand a picture taken from the Leader-Post, showing some of the government's own employees out on strike. It is headed by a bunch of these young people they think so much about—or profess to think so much about. This is a strike of the Saskatchewan insurance office employees. We see that 120 employees walked out, and stayed out for a while. The signs they carry say, "Profits are high; so is the cost of living." The government was opposed to what was being made on insurance, because they said it was a monopoly. Naturally the employees wanted a share of the profits. They say they are on strike because they are not getting enough pay. On another sign we see this, "We are willing to negotiate in good faith." And on another, "You are getting the profits; we are getting low wages." And all this with a C.C.F. socialist government in Saskatchewan.

One does not find that under the Social Credit government of Alberta, because that government is giving them a little better break than in Saskatchewan.

An hon. Member: More oil.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): At least they allow the people in to investigate and to find oil, and do not threaten to rob them when they find it. In our province in the last five years the government has scared everybody out. Nobody would take a hundred thousand dollars to Saskatchewan, because he would be afraid he would lose it. The same is true of the bus line, and everything else. They are not putting it in, with the result that we have lost to other provinces about half of our normal increase in population. However, that situation will be cleaned up three years from now.

When I hear them talking about what they do, and do not do, in connection with social services, and all the rest of it, I am reminded that the very men who are attacking the government here, men with whom at least temporarily the Conservatives have an alliance for the purposes of this debate—

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Oh, no.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Well, the hon. member for Danforth does not like my reference to an alliance, and I am glad he is sitting nearer to us than those who sit over there.

In connection with old age pensions we have had the most flagrant abuse in our province. During the last federal campaign there was sent out with every old age pensioner's cheque a slip signed by J. H. Sturdy, Minister of Social Welfare and Rehabilitation, under date of May 31, 1949—just before the election—and stating:

Dear Pensioner—

And this is just a crack at the federal government, just propaganda against the government that was paying 75 per cent of the pension.

Dear Pensioner:

You will undoubtedly have heard recently that old age and blind pensions have been increased from a maximum of $35 a month to a maximum of $42.50 in the province of Saskatchewan. The increase in pensions will be payable retroactive to May 1. Unfortunately the agreement with the federal government providing for the increased pension did not reach us in time to include the adjusted pension for May with the May cheques.

Just listen to this:

We are disappointed that the federal government did not authorize an increase in the allowable income, so that every pensioner might benefit more equally in the increase.

That was pure propaganda that was sent out with every old age pension cheque by the socialist government in Saskatchewan. In this legislature last session one hon. member mentioned the fact that when an old age pensioner in Saskatchewan went to a hospital part of his cheque was deducted. They were promised free hospitalization in Saskatchewan but they did not get it. It was said that it would not increase taxation, that they would take it out of the big fellows and pass it on to the small fellows. That was the propaganda that was put out in Saskatchewan.

Another hon. member was questioned last year by an hon. member over there as to whether any prosecutions had been carried out for the non-payment of the hospital tax, and the inference was that there were none. The fact is that there have been plenty of them. I should like to quote from the journals of the legislature of Saskatchewan, page 173 of March 3, 1949, as follows:

Q. How many prosecutions for non-payment of hospital tax have been initiated?
A. One hundred and ninety-two between January 1, 1947 and February 20, 1949.
Q. How many cases were brought to trial?
A. One hundred and twenty-two.
Q. How many convictions were there?
A. One hundred and thirteen.
Q. What were the total fines and costs?
A. $1,053.85.

That is the party that was going to help the old people, but those are the facts as they appear on the record. We were told that hospitalization was going to be free. Then they charged $5 per head. They waited until the election was over and a week later raised it another $5 to $10 per head. Now they are taking another $5 per head out of the general revenue, making a total of $15 that they are collecting and they are still in the hole.

Yet they criticize the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) and this government for being lax in matters of social welfare. It is a significant fact that in connection with hospital grants you can get the Ottawa contribution but you have to wait for the Saskatchewan contribution. They are short of money in Saskatchewan despite the fact that the federal government is giving them an annual grant of over $14 million in lieu of income and other taxes.

They are nearly a year behind in paying road contractors and for other things that should be paid for. Yet we hear these criticisms and the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) has joined in them. We hear about certain things not being done for the old age pensioners, and reference is made to the means test. If the hon. member will read that blue book—some of us have looked it over—he will find reference to a pension on a contributory basis. He should remember that another dominion-provincial conference took place nearly five years ago. He should remember also that at that time the people logically believed that the cold war would be over. The government of Canada was then spending roughly $250 million on defence, but last year they spent over $380 million and this year the expenditures will be considerably larger. Anyone who has been in government will tell you that you cannot spend money without getting it from somewhere, from the taxpayer.

Mr. Wright: You are going to take it out of the old age pensioners.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): The hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright), who is not in his seat, has asked a question and I shall answer it. I am not going to take anything out of the old age pensioners.

Mr. Wright: That is what you said.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): I want to point out to the hon. member for Melfort that during the course of the last campaign my statements were quite clear. Some of my friends like the hon. member for Melfort do not even follow their Bible, which says:

For he that hath, to him shall be given; and he that hath not, from him shall be taken even that which he hath.

Even the bees kill off the drones, but the C.C.F. encourage them all the time. I do not believe in that. The people who settled western Canada came out in 1882 and they were not asking the government all the time to help them. What I said in connection with old age pensions was that I did not believe in the means test, that I did not believe in one person trying hard to save a little money while another person spent everything and got the same pension. In addition I said that the whole matter of welfare should be on a contributory basis and carried out under a settled scheme.

I went further and said that certain corporations in Canada already had their own pension schemes. At 15 years of age I worked in a bank which had a pension arrangement. There is a need of this committee to study all these things. The government may well take into consideration the fact that certain corporations and companies already have their own pension arrangements and allowance may be made in connection with income or corporation taxes. There may be some differentiation between those corporations that have such schemes and those that have not. This committee may recommend that all private schemes should be brought into the general scheme. Welfare is something that I think can be considered by the committee.

Mr. Wright: That is not what you said when you were before the electors last June.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): That is the exact statement I made over the radio, and if the hon. member for Melfort had dug out his ears he would have heard it. That is my exact statement and that is why I am putting it on Hansard. I invite the hon. member to come into Yorkton any time he likes and I will repeat that statement.

I am not going to dwell upon what the leader of the C.C.F. (Mr. Coldwell) said about China because the situation has already been covered, as I was going to imply it would be, by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). The leader of the C.C.F. has always an international view on something, but that international view has always changed along with those of Sir Stafford Cripps. I have here the report of the view the hon. member expressed at Halifax, but I do not know whether he will subscribe to it today. This reads:

> Mr. Coldwell is quoted by the Canadian Press as saying in Halifax that he wished "there were an ocean between Canada and the United States." The neighbouring republic, he said, was "the last citadel of capitalism," and contained the seed of another depression and possible war. "Practically all the leading economists," he added, "agreed that the United States would pull the world with it when its financial structure collapsed, and herein lies the danger of a future war."
> In wishing for isolation from the United States, Mr. Coldwell takes a view precisely opposite to that of the British Labour government. Within a few days of Mr. Coldwell's Halifax speech, Mr. Bevin was pledging the fullest co-operation of his government with the United States in the reconstruction of the world economy. Mr. Coldwell wishes for an ocean between Canada and the United States. The British government, separated from the United States by an actual ocean, is trying to span it with a bridge of friendship.

That was a statement he made on international affairs, but, as I say, he changes his views from day to day and from year to year. He has changed them ever since 1914. He has said that we should not participate in a war, that we should do this or that we should do that. Thank goodness we have in this country a government that does not change its mind on every one of these problems from day to day.

In conclusion, I am sure that members of the House of Commons are all enjoying themselves, and I hope I have helped to wake them up because the debate has been rather quiet so far. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has already made a move towards streamlining our constitution. An amendment has been introduced affecting the rules of the house. Reference was made to it by the previous speaker, and I presume I am also in order in referring to it. The new procedure will speed up consideration of the estimates. Members will have a chance to study them and will be able to say that they did not pass millions of dollars in a day without knowing what they were voting for. I think it was a good move. I think the Prime Minister will streamline a lot of other things before he is finished.

Certain remarks were made by the previous speaker about the last dominion-provincial conference. I am sure that those of us who have studied the proceedings of the conference carefully will agree that the Prime Minister should be congratulated on the urbanity, cleverness and decency with which he presided over it. I will go further than the member who just spoke and say that in my opinion the premier of Ontario adopted the right attitude, and made a much better contribution than the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) when he was premier of that province. Some of you are older than I, and possibly the duties of the opposition are much better known to you. We have a marvellous country. If you pick up a map of Canada you will see a little triangle running from lake Superior over to Sherbrooke, Quebec, and in that area live most of our people. I would suggest that members representing constituencies within that triangle travel over the rest of Canada and see what it is like just as some of us from without the triangle have travelled over the rest of the dominion. You will then have a better feeling in the house and a better knowledge of the country.

Canada needs development, and before we have further immigration the development of our north country should take place. You have cities such as Flin Flon in the northern portion of our country with a population of twelve thousand. With proper access to the northern section of our country we will be able to develop it, and cities will grow up which will help to consume some of our own products. Probably you have drawn the inference at least that I am not in favour of the amendment to the amendment and will vote against it.

Mr. Ross (Souris): The hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Stewart), who has just taken his seat, insisted on misinterpreting or misrepresenting my remarks as recorded in the first column on page 108 of Hansard with reference to the gigantic loss to Canadian agriculture. I do not suppose I have the privilege of repeating them, but any hon. member who cares to check up on the matter can do so by referring to the first column on page 108 of Hansard.

On motion of Mr. Knight the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, I understand that the Acting Minister of Labour has been discussing with the leaders of the several groups the possibility of taking up tomorrow, notwithstanding the special order made in respect of this debate, resolution No. 10 on today's order paper dealing with unemployment insurance in an effort to have that resolution considered and the legislation enacted so that the payments it would authorize could be made as from the first of March. I understand that the Department of Labour, anticipating that the amendments probably will be enacted, has all its preparations completed and will be ready to pay the supplementary benefits as soon as the legislation is passed. If my understanding is correct, the leaders of the several groups have said that they realize it would relieve distress to have that done as soon as possible. If that is our understanding at large, we would like, as the first order of business tomorrow, to call this resolution and see how far we can get with the legislation necessary to make these payments possible.

Mr. Graydon: The Prime Minister is quite correct in his statement concerning the consent and approval which were given to proceeding with this legislation tomorrow. Originally there was some suggestion that it might be proceeded with today, and we would have liked to facilitate that action, but the request came too late last night, and it was impossible to arrange our speakers, those who might perhaps want to participate in the debate. In view of the urgency which the Prime Minister has indicated, and which the Acting Minister of Labour indicated last night, we felt there should not be any delay in having the legislation dealt with because no doubt there will be considerable discussion in connection with it. We thought that a start should be made on it as quickly as possible. For that reason we felt we were justified in consenting to the legislation being considered tomorrow, as the Prime Minister has indicated, and that is quite agreeable to this group.

Mr. St. Laurent: It is understood we will ask to have this resolution considered and see how far we can go. I know that all hon. members, without distinction of party, would like to see the legislation implemented as early as it can reasonably be done. I am not asking that we should determine now how far we will go. It will depend upon what hon. members will find out in the course of the debate. We will go just as far as we can.

Mr. MacInnis: Because of the motion that has already been passed I understand that it will require unanimous consent to implement the request of the Prime Minister. I understand the leader of the C.C.F. party had a conversation with the acting leader of the opposition and the Minister of National Health and Welfare last night, and that we will not oppose the introduction of the measure in any way.

Mr. Graydon: If the resolution receives first reading and passes through committee in the resolution stage what will we do afterwards?

Mr. St. Laurent: The bill will be ready for distribution. Hon. members will then see whether they will be prepared to proceed with the bill or whether they will prefer to wait until the next day. As soon as this matter is disposed of we will continue the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, February 23, 1950

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING

Bill No. 7, to incorporate Alberta Natural Gas Company.—Mr. Maybank.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

FLAT GLASS AND MATCH INDUSTRIES—REFERENCE TO ANSWER TO QUESTION ON FEBRUARY 22

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I should like to make a correction to an answer which I gave yesterday, as reported at page 128 of Hansard. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) yesterday asked me a question without previous notice. When the Hansard proof came to my office for correction I realized that I had mistaken the question asked by the hon. member as dealing with the flat glass report rather than with the match report to which it did refer.

The answer I gave yesterday was quite correct in relation to the flat glass industry. The situation with respect to the match report is as follows: In accordance with the usual procedure, the match report, after being considered by the law officers of the Department of Justice, was submitted to outside counsel on February 6, 1950, for an opinion as to whether prosecution is warranted. It is expected that this opinion will be received in the near future.

INQUIRY AS TO ASSOCIATION OF EDDY MATCH COMPANY WITH E. B. EDDY COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. I gave him a copy of it, and I know he is prepared to answer it. In view of the minister's intimation a few days ago of impending prosecutions in the match industry, will the minister inform the house whether the Eddy Match Company, mentioned in the McGregor report, is affiliated with or associated with the E. B. Eddy Paper Company in Hull, just across the Ottawa river from this building?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I want to thank my hon. friend for giving me notice of the question. From such inquiry as I have been able to make in the short time since I received notice of the question, I find that the E. B. Eddy Company, of Hull, and the Eddy Match Company, which has a factory at Pembroke, Ontario, are separate corporations. That is all I can say.

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I know personally that there is no relationship between the Eddy paper company in Hull and the Eddy Match Company. I understand that in 1924 the E. B. Eddy Company sold its interests in the Eddy Match Company to some other firm in this country or outside. The local company in Hull has no relationship with the Eddy Match Company.

Mr. Knowles: In view of the publicity given to the minister's answer of yesterday, will he inform the house as soon as a decision has been reached with respect to this matter?

Mr. Garson: Yes, I will, Mr. Speaker, in accordance with our usual practice.

Mr. Knowles: Not the way you did it last time.

WHEAT

INQUIRY AS TO PAYMENT ON SALES, 1945 TO 1948 CROPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I wish to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, arising out of the widespread desire of western farmers to know whether or not the wheat board will in fact make an interim or final payment in connection with the sale of the 1945 to 1948 crops. Is the parliamentary assistant now in a position to give some information with regard to that matter?

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): I am not in a position to give much information that would be helpful. The situation is that a great many messages have been received from members, producers and farm organizations with respect to this matter. The subject matter of the representations has been passed on to the wheat board, and they are now considering the whole question. Beyond that I have nothing to say that would be helpful.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

INQUIRY AS TO AGREEMENT WITH PROVINCES AND BEGINNING OF CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Resources and Development. Will the minister inform the house what progress has been made in signing agreements with the provinces in respect of construction of the trans-Canada highway? Will he also tell the house when actual construction work will begin?

Mr. Speaker: With regard to these questions, I might say that I have allowed some latitude because questions on the order paper are not being answered. If I allow at this time questions which in the ordinary course would appear on the order paper, I hope that hon. members will not take advantage of my leniency.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the house passed the act last session. Immediately after parliament prorogued there was a conference to discuss technical matters. That conference was very cordial and in my opinion a successful one. We continued discussions with the provinces on various points, including the choice of routes through their respective areas, and the discussions have progressed to the point where I hope to be able, within the course of the next few days, to send to all provinces a draft agreement.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

QUESTION AS TO ISSUE OF NEW GOVERNMENT TELEPHONE DIRECTORY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): May I address a question to you, Mr. Speaker, or to the appropriate minister? I believe this matter comes under your jurisdiction, sir. I should like to ask when members of parliament will be supplied with a new telephone directory, showing the changes of telephone numbers of the new ministers, deputy ministers, and so forth. As things are at the present time there is much inconvenience.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I shall make inquiries and endeavour to give my hon. friend and hon. members generally the information as soon as possible.

[Mr. McIlraith.]

FISHERIES

INQUIRY AS TO EXTENSION OF SMELT SEASON IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. W. Mayhew (Minister of Fisheries): Before the orders of the day were called yesterday, the hon. member for Queens asked me a question about the extension of the fishing season for smelts in Prince Edward Island. He did not send me notice of the question. I regret that I did not hear his question distinctly, but I am prepared to give him an answer now.

The fact is that we have no requests from the fishermen of Prince Edward Island for an extension of time. When the extension was being considered for New Brunswick and Nova Scotia we did make inquiries as to whether in Prince Edward Island they wanted an extension or not, and we found that there was no general demand for it.

Mr. McLure: I wish you had asked me.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO SETTING UP OF COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I have not given him notice of the question, but I did not think he required it. In view of the fact that during the past fifteen years it has been customary to set up a special committee on veterans affairs at the start of each new parliament, will the minister give me the grounds for refusing to set up that committee this session? I should like to remind the minister that this is the second session of a new parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Unless the minister particularly wishes to answer that question, it seems to me to be a controversial one which could be reserved for later. I did say that in respect to questions on the orders of the day I was allowing considerable latitude at this time, but I hope that hon. members will not, for that reason, refrain from putting questions on the order paper which should appear thereon and will ask only such questions as are urgent when the orders of the day are called.

Mr. Quelch: Numbers of us have received several telegrams. We thought the minister would like to have an opportunity of answering them.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

SUPPLEMENTARY BENEFITS DURING WINTER SEASON—VARIOUS AMENDMENTS

Hon. Paul Martin (for the Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940, to provide for supplementary benefits during the winter season in any year and government financial contribution in consequence thereof, for additional insurance coverage, for readjustment and simplification of rates of contribution, and for consequential amendments; to provide also for an increase in the membership of the unemployment insurance advisory committee from six to eight members; and to provide further that the members of the national employment committee shall receive the same remuneration as the members of the unemployment insurance advisory committee.

Mr. Graydon: Mr. Speaker, I know that the Acting Minister of Labour wishes to make a full explanation of this resolution, and we are most anxious at this time to facilitate his desire.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. MacInnis: No, Mr. Speaker. Under the circumstances I think it is due to the house that the minister should make at this time a statement of what is involved in the resolution before us. After that is done we can decide whether or not there is any urgency. If we can facilitate debate later on, I think we had better do so; but we must have the co-operation of the minister to begin with.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that I express the view of all hon. members when I say that we all regret the necessary absence of the Minister of Labour, and we look forward to his return within a very short time.

Of course I agree with what the hon. member who has just taken his seat has said, namely, that there should be an explanatory statement of the general scope and purposes of the amendments contemplated by the resolution now before the house.

We have in Canada a well-established and comprehensive national unemployment insurance scheme, which has been in operation since July, 1941, covering employed workers in industry and commerce. This act has provided and will continue to provide a first line of defence for workers and their families against unemployment. It gives protection in an automatic and systematic way for more than two and a half million workers. Including these workers and their dependents, over 7 million persons are offered a measure of protection, as a right and not as a dole or a charitable gift.

Since the first benefit payments were made in 1942, over $223 million have been expended in unemployment insurance benefits. A complete system of regional and local insurance and employment offices has been established across Canada to administer the insurance provisions of the act and the national employment service which has been established in conjunction with the insurance operations.

These offices facilitate the placement of labour by informing persons in search of work of the jobs obtainable, and by informing employers of the type and number of persons seeking work. It offers a common meeting ground for employers and employees. Workers obtain employment sooner than would otherwise be possible, and employers' recruitment and placement costs are lower. As an illustration of the importance of this service to employees and to employers, as well as to our economy as a whole, it should be mentioned that 684,179 placements were made by these employment offices during the past year. Of these, 127,059 were casual and 557,120 were regular placements.

The protection provided to workers by the provision for unemployment insurance benefits in periods of unemployment has added very substantially to the stability of our national economy.

The government proposes in this bill to make provision, by the enactment of a new part to be added to the Unemployment Insurance Act, to give added protection to insured workers against unemployment in that period of the year when, due to the rigours of our winter climate, employment is normally at its lowest level, namely, in the period from January 1 to March 31 of each year.

The added protection to be provided takes the form of a provision for the payment of supplementary insurance benefits for periods of unemployment to persons employed in industries and occupations which are under the insurance coverage. These supplementary benefit payments will, subject to compliance with the qualification conditions provided in the legislation, be payable to persons unemployed in the period January 1 to March 31 in any year, but in the present calendar year will be payable from the date the legislation comes into force until April 15, 1950.

Mr. Ferguson: Does that affect unemployed members of parliament?

Mr. Martin: It would depend upon whether they come within the act.

The payment of supplementary benefits under the new part of the act will be in addition to and without prejudice to benefit rights otherwise established by payment of insurance contributions under the act.

The groups of persons who may qualify for payment of supplementary benefits within the specified winter period which I have just defined, and the extent of the supplementary benefits payable, are as follows:

Class one: Insured unemployed persons, whose benefit rights under other provisions of the act have become exhausted or otherwise terminated since the March 31 preceding the date of claim, may claim supplementary benefits payable during the specified winter period up to the same number of days of benefits to which they were entitled under their last regular benefit year, but not exceeding the number of days in the specified winter period.

Class two: Insured unemployed persons who have not made the minimum number of insurance contributions required to qualify for payment of benefits under other provisions of the act, namely, a minimum of 180 contributions within the two years preceding claim, but who during the period since March 31 preceding the claim for supplementary benefit have made a minimum of ninety daily insurance contributions under the act, may claim for supplementary benefit payable during the specified winter period for the number of benefit days arrived at by dividing the number of contributions made by five, but not exceeding the number of days in the specified winter period.

The ratio of one supplementary benefit payment to five contributions corresponds to the ratio of benefit payments to contribution under the existing provisions of the act.

As I have already stated, the payment of supplementary benefits does not exhaust, interfere with or diminish rights to benefit payments accrued under other provisions of the act.

Class three: Persons who have worked in lumbering and logging in any area where contributions have not been required up to the present for such employment or in an employment of this category, and in other insurable employment, for a minimum period of ninety days in any consecutive twelve-month period within the eighteen months preceding the date of claim, may claim for supplementary benefit payable during the specified winter period for the number of days arrived at by dividing the number of days so employed by five, but not exceeding the number of days in the specified winter period.

Class four: Persons who since the 31st of March preceding the date of claim have worked for a minimum period of ninety days in an industry which has been made insurable employment in the twelve-month period preceding the date of claim, may claim for supplementary benefit for the number of days arrived at by dividing the number of days so employed by five, but not exceeding the number of days in the specified winter period.

The supplementary benefit rates payable will be eighty per cent of the standard benefit rates authorized to be paid under provisions of the act.

Provision is made for financing the payment of supplementary benefit payments by increasing the daily contribution rates payable by employers and employees by the amount of one cent per day each, to which will be added the government contribution equal to one-fifth of the combined employer and employee contributions, derived from the additional one cent contributions payable by them. These amounts will be paid into the insurance fund.

In addition, the government will pay into the insurance fund the amount of the supplementary benefits paid out to unemployed persons in the classes three and four which I have described, namely, the groups who are to be or may be brought under insurance or have been brought under insurance in the year preceding claim, and who have accordingly not had the time to make the prescribed number of insurance contributions to the fund.

While it is estimated that the financial provision outlined above will be sufficient to provide for supplementary benefit payments, nevertheless, since the provision is novel, and in order to safeguard the insurance fund, the fund will be guaranteed against any loss which is sustained in the payment of supplementary benefits up to March 31, 1952.

Now, the whole purpose of this new part of the act is to endeavour the better to adapt our unemployment insurance scheme to fit the normal Canadian employment pattern, in which, in many areas of Canada, unemployment is substantially higher and employment correspondingly more difficult to secure during the winter season.

Our seasonal employment trends are, because of our climatic conditions, more pronounced than in other countries, such as the United States and the United Kingdom, and, subject to compliance with fundamental unemployment insurance principles, I believe we should endeavour to shape our insurance scheme, as far as may be practicable, to take these conditions into account.

The supplementary benefits provision, which is an extension of the present insurance provisions, conforms in its basic principles and operation to the present insurance provision and will be financed in a similar manner.

I know that hon. members will wish to know what effect the bringing into effect and the application of the supplementary benefits provision will have in relation to the present group of unemployed persons. Well, the known figure of applicants for work registered in our employment offices as at February 2, 1950, as has already been indicated, is 375,600. Of this total, at least 250,000 are either drawing unemployment insurance benefits, or have claimed benefits and the claims are in the process of adjudication. This leaves approximately 125,000 persons looking for employment, who might be grouped as 75,000 who have either exhausted their benefit rights or had insufficient contributions to enable us to pay them benefits; an additional 25,000 who would be normally employed in lumbering and logging, and a similar number in regard to whom we have no knowledge which would enable us to put them in any specific category at the present. It is expected that the proposed amendments which we are seeking at the earliest possible date will benefit approximately 100,000 individuals.

The amendments to the act will also bring additional workers under insurance coverage. At present the act insures salaried workers on weekly or monthly rates if their earnings are $3,120 or less per annum. It insures workers on hourly, daily or piece rates, regardless of the amount of earnings. The amendments which are covered by this resolution propose to raise the ceiling on such salaried workers to include those earning $4,800 or less per annum. The estimated number of persons who will be brought under insurance coverage by this amendment is 90,000.

Other amendments to the act include provisions to give effect to a number of recommendations of the unemployment insurance advisory committee, which, as the house knows, includes in its membership representatives of both labour and management. The more important other amendments to the act are:

1. The reduction in number of the existing contribution classes from nine to six, and the creation of a new contribution class for employees earning $48 or more per week.

2. The equalization of employer and employee contributions. Employed persons under sixteen years of age or earning less than ninety cents per day whose contributions heretofore have been paid by the employer, and who have not been entitled to benefits will hereafter pay their own share of contributions and will be entitled to draw benefits in like manner as other claimants.

3. Modification of the first statutory condition in the act. At present a claimant is required to have 180 contributions during the two years preceding his claim, at least 60 of which must have been paid since the commencement of the previous benefit year. It is proposed to relax this to some extent by providing that of these 180 contributions, 45 must have been paid within the six months prior to the claim, or 60 contributions within one year prior to the claim.

4. Changes in the present non-compensable day rule. At present the first day of unemployment in any week is non-compensable unless it follows or is in a complete week of unemployment. As amended, in future the first day of unemployment in any period of unemployment will be non-compensable unless it follows a period of employment of three days or less. If a person is working short time, the first day of unemployment in any period of unemployment is non-compensable in every case.

5. The number of members of the unemployment insurance advisory committee is increased from six to eight, to give added representation to labour, and of course correspondingly another representative to management. In addition there are a number of amendments to strengthen the enforcement provisions of the act, or to clarify uncertainties in some sections of the act.

6. The permissible earnings which the claimant for benefits is permitted to earn in subsidiary employment without impairing his right to receive benefit is raised from $1.50 per day to $2 per day.

All these matters I have explained in a general way, and I commend the resolution to the house because of the important provisions that it contains.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker in rising to make a contribution to the debate on the resolution introduced by the Acting Minister of Labour (Mr. Martin), I should like to say that when one views legislation of this kind one cannot help but think it is too bad that we have to consider a substitute for work instead of legislation that would be creating work for the Canadian people. What I say this afternoon will not be said in any critical way, because I think most of us feel heavy at heart in having to deal with legislation made necessary by the fact that people are out of jobs or may be out of jobs in the future.

It is a matter of deep concern to all of us that a change in legislation such as this is necessary. Those who experienced the conditions of certain previous days will rebel at the very thought of having again to go through anything approaching that type of condition in our Canadian national life. It is my fervent hope and prayer that the legislation to follow this resolution will not have to be used in the days that lie ahead in a way similar to that in which relief was granted at one time to our Canadian people.

When the government gave notice of the introduction of this measure, and indicated the urgency therefor, we were anxious to facilitate their action as much as possible, for reasons which of course will be obvious to all. We wanted to have these payments made available, with the least possible delay, to the people entitled to them. For this reason we are prepared to facilitate the legislation and to have the bill brought in for consideration.

The minister and other hon. members of the house will at once recognize the complexity of the explanation which the minister gave. I think it was as clear an explanation as it was possible to give, having in mind the changes which it is proposed to make. I do not complain about that, but there were a number of matters dealt with by the minister which perhaps should be left for more mature and detailed consideration when the bill comes before the house for second reading and is considered afterwards in the committee stage. Nevertheless, time being of the essence, we hasten to indicate to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the house that we support the resolution so that the bill may be introduced at the earliest possible moment and there may be no possible reason for delaying the payments to be made under it. I express the wish, however, that its purpose was to create work rather than to provide a feeble substitute therefor.

The minister said that unemployment insurance was the first line of defence against unemployment. Of course that was about all that those of us who took part in the proceedings of the committee on unemployment insurance when the bill was first brought into the house ever thought it would do. I think it is only fair to workers and to industry generally to say that, because the benefits arising from unemployment insurance at their best have never been great. They can only be regarded, as I said before, as a weak and feeble substitute for a job.

I have taken a personal interest in unemployment insurance legislation, largely because of the fact that in my own riding there is a great body of working men and women who come under its provisions. My interest arises also because of the fact that when the committee was set up in 1940 I was a member of it, and I was extremely interested in the work it did. Without introducing any note that should not be introduced, I think I may say that although I was not in the house at the time, I take some pride in the fact that a former prime minister of Canada, who was then the leader of our party, introduced unemployment insurance into Canada for the first time in 1934.

I think it is the proper time now for me to say a word on the question of unemployment; because at the root of this change in the legislation is the fact that the government recognizes that jobs are in jeopardy in certain parts of our land. I do not know whether everybody realizes it, but we must recognize that when a man is out of work and without any income, and unemployment insurance benefits are not available to him, for any of the various reasons that may be advanced, in most parts of Canada there is no way in which he can secure any help from public agencies other than welfare organizations to which voluntary contributions have been made. It is true that in some places that is done on a municipal basis, but generally speaking in many parts of Canada all he can do is sit there without any means of support. We cannot afford to allow that to happen to anyone in Canada so long as we have the power to remedy the situation.

We have heard enough in the house since the session began a week ago to be convinced that, while there may be an argument over the extent of unemployment in Canada, there has been a substantial increase in unemployment in many sections of the country. I should also like to point out to the minister that, while his figures and those of the government seem to hover around 380,000 unemployed in Canada, as others have said, that does not indicate the true picture. Apart altogether from those who may never have intended to register under the Unemployment Insurance Act—and there must be many thousands across Canada who do not utilize its provisions—the minister well knows that if a man does not renew his registration at the end of thirty days from the date he first registers, his file becomes dormant. He may not have a job at all; nevertheless in the records of the unemployment insurance office he is regarded as a man to whom no more attention need be paid so far as a job is concerned. It is taken for granted, and I suppose naturally so, that he has obtained employment elsewhere. There must be a substantial percentage of people who are in this category, and in the category I originally mentioned. Therefore the number of unemployed in Canada must be well over 400,000, a figure which I think would be nearer the mark today.

I am not taking part in this debate for the purpose of trying to paint a dark picture as to the unemployment situation. There is nothing to be gained by that; there is nothing to be gained by exaggerating the unemployment situation in Canada. Neither is there anything to be gained by not looking at the true picture and seeing what the actual position is. One of the things which has impressed members during the present session is that in view of the warnings which have been given as to falling markets and prices, and the warnings and cautions which come from those who are in the exporting business generally, the question of finding work for Canadian citizens is one of the major jobs of the government, parliament and the people. I suggest it is not good enough to wait until things get worse. That is too much like locking the stable door after the horse is stolen. Unemployment should be nipped in the bud; we should not wait until it reaches unmanageable and uncontrollable proportions. I am quite sure the government will take heed of the warnings that have been given. That is the very purpose for which parliament exists—to bring forcefully to the attention of the administration any situation that may develop in the country.

I am not an expert in economics, as I need hardly tell hon. members; and there are many people in Canada who, like myself, are not economists, so this is one of the infrequent occasions on which I find myself in the majority. But speaking in a simple way as a layman dealing with economics, I believe the ordinary man in the street is asking certain questions which might as well be asked on the floor of this house now as any other time. One question has peculiar force to me, as I think it will have to hon. members generally.

It may be said that 380,000 or more unemployed is not a very large number; still it is a substantial group of our people, and I am sure the government regrets that unemployment exists even to that degree, just as we all regret it. But one of the questions the people are asking is this. Why did we have to wait until a war engulfed the world before people were able to have full employment? This parliament and this country are striving to the very limit of their ability to see that we never have another war. People are saying: Surely we do not have to have a war so that people may find work. And of course we do not have to; because for a man-made economic recession there must be a man-made cure. The nations of the world have made great advances in science, in medicine, and in every other line. Surely the world is not going to admit that on the economic front somehow or other we are unable to keep people fully employed and enjoy a high standard of living from one end of the country to the other, short of having a war.

It seems to me this is particularly significant so far as the ordinary people are concerned. The world has been able to master so many problems; why can we not master this one? Apart altogether from the anguish, privation, starvation and suffering that come with recessions and major or even minor dislocations of our economy, there is something else we should bear in mind. Democracies generally—and I am not especially referring to Canada, because this runs all through the picture—must find a way in which to provide full employment and prosperity for their people. There never was a time when democracy faced a greater test in competition with another ideology than the present time. Another group, now comprising one-third of the world's population, a group competing with our way of life, is watching how successful the democracies are going to be in handling these periodic dislocations of our economic life. I am afraid that in the days to come many people in the world may come to the conclusion that if we in a democracy cannot master these problems, which we ought to be able to solve; if we cannot handle the periodic recessions which bring misery and poverty to our people, we have weakened our appeal for the support of those sceptical millions throughout the world who must make their choice between our free way of life and another way which is much less free. As a democratic state we should be able to show those who would follow the communist way of life that, with the maximum of individual freedom and the minimum of regimentation, democracy can provide prosperity and a high standard of living and happiness for the masses of the people.

I commend this resolution to hon. members of the house so far as its broad principles are concerned, with the details to be considered during the second reading and committee stages. I hope, as I am sure we all hope, that unemployment legislation will not be needed in the coming months. It seems to me that we have a responsibility not only to our own people, but also to democracy as a whole, to make democracy work; and to do so we shall have to provide our people with jobs, prosperity and good times.

Unemployment Insurance

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, the Acting Minister of Labour (Mr. Martin) preceded his statement in connection with these proposed amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act with a short review of the provisions and purposes of the act itself. It was my privilege to have a part in the adoption of that measure when it was introduced here in 1940. Not only did I support it in the house; I also supported it outside the house, among many working class organizations where it was perhaps not properly understood. Because of that I must say that I regret very much to have to rise today and express myself as being extremely disappointed with the measure the government is presenting to this house at a time of emergency, a time of serious unemployment, and with what the government is proposing to meet that situation. It should not be lost on this house that the unemployment condition throughout this country is so serious that, when the government brought down this measure and asked that we postpone discussion on the address in order to allow the measure to go through, we readily agreed to do so. But let me tell the house that the measure now before us does not begin to meet the needs of the present unemployment situation. Whatever it does—and I am accepting it and will support it as a forward step—it will not prevent unemployment. It will not meet the need of those who are now unemployed; in my opinion, it will not meet the need of even the majority of those who are now unemployed. When the government asks the members of this house to clear the way for legislation of this kind, surely they should have something better to present than what is now before us.

A report in the newspaper the other day on the unemployment situation gave the number of unemployed as 375,600. In two sections of the country the percentage of the labour force unemployed had reached what is considered to be the danger point; that is, where even the present Unemployment Insurance Act, over an extended period of time, would not be able to cope with it. In the maritime provinces the percentage of the labour force unemployed is 10·2 and in British Columbia it is 15·8. I should just like to tell the minister that the people in my province are disturbed about the unemployment situation. Along with other members of parliament from the greater Vancouver area, I met with labour organizations, veterans' organizations, and attended several meetings called by the Vancouver city council. They are all disturbed about this situation, and I am quite satisfied that they will still be disturbed about the situation after they have seen the provisions for meeting it in this measure.

Let me briefly go over what is proposed to be done. It is proposed to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940, to provide for supplementary benefits during the winter months; and I understand that the winter months as defined by these amendments are from January 1 to March 31. Ordinarily, in my part of the country, those are the winter months. But that is not so in other parts of Canada and it was not the case in my province this winter. In British Columbia there was a tremendous amount of unemployment in November and December and, as I shall show the minister and the house shortly, there was a large amount of unemployment across the dominion in October of last year. It is also proposed to provide for additional insurance coverage. That is all to the good and I shall have more to say about that point later. Those are the two points in the resolution that will in any way help the unemployed; and when I say that, I am not leaving out of consideration the explanations made by the minister.

There is provision for some other matters such as simplification of rates of contribution, increase in the membership of the advisory committee from six to eight, and that members of the national employment committee shall receive the same remuneration as the members of the advisory committee. All that, however, is of no particular importance to those who are now unemployed.

This measure stems from the government's fallacious belief that the present large scale unemployment is seasonal or temporary, owing to weather conditions and circumstances of that kind. Unfortunately, in my opinion, that is not so. Unemployment is as natural to the capitalist system as is profit. As a matter of fact, the strongest supporters of the capitalist system insist that a certain amount of unemployment is essential to the proper functioning of the system and that it is bad only when it goes beyond a certain point.

The government should have taken the trouble to inform itself of the ups and downs in employment in this country during the last thirty years. If the government had informed itself and was prepared to act in accordance with what it found, it would not present such a measure as this to deal with an unemployment condition of the magnitude that now confronts us. Let me direct attention to an item in the seventh report of the unemployment insurance commission for the fiscal year 1947-48, at page 27:

> Statistics for the past thirty years show that in fifteen of them unemployment in certain months has been greater than 10 per cent of the working force. That would have been high enough to deplete the fund. In five of these years unemployment was very serious, rising to over 21 per cent in 1931, and to a figure as high as 26 per cent in certain months of 1933, a condition that would deplete any unemployment insurance fund. While no one wishes to contemplate a recurrence of unemployment on that scale, it is only sound to make provision for an unemployment insurance fund based on past experience.

Of course we do not want to contemplate unemployment on the scale on which we had it in the 1930's. But if we have the same conditions as prevailed in the 1930's, or if we have the conditions that prevailed in the 1920's out of which developed the conditions of the 1930's, then we shall contemplate it or we shall face unprepared the conditions that we then faced; and we are not going to meet them with a measure such as this.

A realization of the present stiuation could have been obtained by careful attention to the developing unemployment during the last two years, and a perusal of the budget speeches of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), when he was consistently and continually drawing attention to the fact that, despite the large financial resources that were in the hands of the people at the end of the war, by 1947 these had been practically used up and people were not only using their current earnings but were going into debt.

These are things that the government should be aware of, and should have in mind, when bringing in legislation of this kind for the approval of parliament. During the second session of 1949 I put certain questions regarding unemployment on the order paper, and received answers from the Department of Labour. In my first question I asked for the number of persons receiving unemployment insurance in the months of September and October, 1948, and the number receiving unemployment insurance in the same months of 1949. Here are the figures:

September	44,761	83,525
October	55,384	105,064

My next question was how many persons made application for unemployment insurance in the same two months of 1948 and 1949. Here is the answer:

	1948	1949
September	28,143	51,935
October	38,104	69,349

Surely the government could see the trend. That growing unemployment was not a result of conditions of weather; that it was the result of declining employment at a time when employment is normally at its peak.

In my last question I asked the number of unplaced applicants registered in 1948 and 1949. The information I received is as follows: October, 1948, 101,622; October, 1949, 156,106. In view of these facts, the government should be bringing before this House of Commons a measure to provide employment. It is employment that the workers of Canada want. They know already by experience, and indeed by experience over many years, what kind of subsistence doles and even unemployment insurance will provide. Let us take cognizance of the fact, and keep it always in our minds, that unemployment insurance is a device to carry workers over short periods of unemployment, that is, from the time they lose one job until they find another. It is not supposed to be something to carry them over a long period of time.

There is one other thing that we should ask of this government, and it is not something that should have been left until now. I think there has been too much higgling between the dominion government and the provinces as to whose responsibility it is to care for the employable unemployed. I claim that the full responsibility for all the employable unemployed in Canada rests on the federal government. I have a logical, and I believe a legal and constitutional, basis for that assertion.

The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) mentioned the Unemployment Insurance Act that was passed in 1935. That act was referred to the courts by the government that followed the government of Mr. Bennett. It was declared ultra vires the powers of the federal government. Then in 1940 the federal government asked for an amendment to the British North America Act. The amendment to the British North America Act was to make unemployment insurance one of the matters that came exclusively under the jurisdiction of the federal authorities, as enumerated in section 91 of the British North America Act. That means that either the federal government is responsible for all of the employable unemployed or it means, that the federal government says it will take care of those who can be actuarially insured by contributions of the employee and the employer and a small contribution by the government; and the provinces must take care of those who cannot be insured under such conditions. The thing is just absolute nonsense. The provinces are debarred from going into the unemployment insurance field; and consequently if we insist that there is any responsibility at all on the provinces for unemployment we must say that they will provide the money out of the consolidated revenue fund of the provinces. I do not see any other way by which they can provide it.

On the other hand, in looking after unemployment this government will get the money from contributions under the Unemployment Insurance Act, as they are getting it now. The time has come when we should get away from that idea, and have it made clear beyond possibility of all doubt who is responsible for the employees of those concerns that do not lend themselves to unemployment insurance principles.

I said at the beginning, Mr. Speaker, I regretted that I had to approach this legislation in the critical manner that I have. I am not really criticizing the legislation for what it proposes to do; I am criticizing the government for bringing in a measure of this kind to solve a problem that a measure such as this cannot solve. Apart from that, Mr. Speaker, I shall facilitate the passage of this legislation through the house to the best of my ability.

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon my colleagues and I listened intently to the statement made in the house by the Acting Minister of Labour. I must confess that it was a bit difficult to hear him upon certain occasions during his remarks, but on the basis of what we thought we heard we are prepared to assert at the moment that we shall find it possible to give our support to the proposed amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act.

When the Unemployment Insurance Act was brought before the house in 1940 we expressed certain very definite convictions which we held with respect to it. Some of the convictions we held at that time have been referred to by other speakers here today. In 1940 we stressed that we could not for a moment either consider or accept unemployment insurance as a substitute for a balanced economy, wherein our national affairs are managed in such a way as to ensure an opportunity for a decent income to each Canadian. We stressed another point on that occasion, namely that we could foresee a condition such as this arising, where the buoyancy of the national income might not be the same as it has been during the past few years. We emphasized that the employer's share which he contributes toward the unemployment insurance fund reduces his current purchasing power by that amount. Moreover the contribution paid by the employer is in many, probably in most instances charged in the price of the commodities he sells to the employee. Thus it reduces the value of his dollar by that amount.

In the third place, we stressed that the government's contribution is derived from taxation, most of which is taken from the pockets of employees. So, in the final analysis the employee pays the whole shot. If times are not reasonably buoyant and if his income is fairly low we can see that the act itself, by virtue of its operation, could make his lot an extremely difficult one.

We pointed out, too, that if we are faced at any time with an abnormally large body of unemployed, this fund could be rapidly depleted. That would simply mean that the government would be setting in operation a glorified form of dole, which it would not be obliged to call relief, and which therefore politically could be considered as better than a straight relief program.

We also took exception to certain sections of the act, such as those which stated that if a man paid over a long period of time, and then became unemployed as a consequence of becoming unemployable, he had no recourse whatsoever to the fund for assistance. We stated further that we doubted the wisdom of that section in the act which gave the board, or whatever the body is called, the right to ship a man, forcibly if necessary, from one part of the country to another.

Further we could not see a great deal of reason in that section wherein an employer, if firing an employee, would put him in a position where—and this has happened in many instances—he would not be able to procure benefits under the act. I am not suggesting for one moment that all such persons should; but certainly I know of a number of instances where such employees should have had the benefit of the doubt.

What I have said does not mean that we are opposed to the Unemployment Insurance Act. I hope it will be understood however that I am re-emphasizing what I said at the commencement of my remarks, namely that we cannot accept unemployment insurance in any form as a substitute for a balanced economy, wherein our national affairs are managed in such a way as to ensure our people of an opportunity for a decent standard of income.

I entered the House of Commons in 1940, after the election in March of that year. After entering the house I was chagrined to find that much of our discussion still centred around such subjects as one will find listed in the index to Hansard for that year. These include unemployment and agricultural relief, unemployment relief and assistance, agricultural aid, relief legislation and homeless transient men.

After all, we had been at war for nine months, but we were still faced with a serious unemployment problem within our country. The minister of labour of that day, speaking in the house, asserted on June 17, 1940, as reported at page 824 of Hansard:

> After all, it is a vital problem.

The "it" refers to unemployment.

> It is a problem which has baffled us.

I want to underline the word "baffled" because I propose to come back to it.

> It is one for which every member of this committee, certainly including myself, would like, if possible, to find a panacea, a solution, a cure-all.

That statement was made in reply to a question which had been asked by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell). The minister then went on to point out, as reported at page 825:

> May I add that I am not putting these figures on Hansard with any great pride of achievement; they are too large; I am first to recognize and realize that, and I state it quite frankly.
> These are the revised figures. The total number in receipt of material aid in some form or another in March—

Remember, that was 1940.

> —was 772,542. I know it is no answer to say that this figure is 25 per cent less than that for the same month last year. The question is why there should be any at all.

It appears that 80·4 per cent of the heads of families unemployed at that time were reported by the minister as being employable persons. It has been said in the house already this session that anyone bringing the question of unemployment before the house, especially if he does it forcefully, will be accused of being a gloomster or a pessimist. I would say no, we are not gloomsters. The gloom has already been spread; all we are endeavouring to do is to pierce a hole through it so a little light may come in to give some comfort and encouragement to those thousands who are now without employment.

Every time I turn over in my mind this figure of 375,000 registered persons, I am shocked. I agree firmly with the previous speaker that it undoubtedly falls far short of the actual number of unemployed persons in Canada today. Yet such a condition of unemployment is described as temporary, regional, spotty, pockets and the like. It seems to me those words are used in order to lull the people of Canada into a false sense of security, so far as this acute and growing problem is concerned. It would appear that the government of Canada has now come to the view that all it has to do is say to the people of Canada, "All is well" and all must be well. We heard a lot of that from the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) last spring, and what an eye-opener we got a little later on!

In his observations in the house the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) did an extremely neat job of beclouding the issue, if I may use that term. As far as the unemployed are concerned, this problem is upon us now. It is serious and it is slight comfort to them to try to secure any consolation from the assertion that unemployment is spotty or regional, that it is only in pockets or temporary.

A moment ago I referred to those who accuse us of being spreaders of gloom, who tell us that we should be optimistic, that we should endeavour to paint these things in the most glowing colours possible. Those admonitions came from the government itself. As a result I went back to 1935 to find out if the Liberals at that time could possibly have been spreaders of gloom and I found a most interesting broadcast on this subject that had been made by the former prime minister, the Right Hon. Mr. King. Here are a few of the phrases that I picked out of just one broadcast: Terrifying problem, cruel privations, physical suffering, a condition of despair, an appalling situation, menacing shadows, terror stalks the land, a prevailing and hazardous situation, privation and suffering, human anguish, mental anxiety. Those were all in one broadcast and I dare say I missed more than I got. That was an impassioned appeal. I agree that there was much terror in the land. I agree that there was much anguish and that there was a great deal of privation and suffering. There was no question about it. But were I to coin those same phrases today I would be accused immediately of being a pessimist, of being unrealistic in my outlook, of being a spreader of gloom. In fact I would be accused of exaggerating the condition.

Let me point out that the conditions were not entirely parallel. By 1935 we had passed through a number of years of depression and unemployment. However, who can stand on the floor of this house today and say that five years hence we will be able to say that we have not passed through a similar five-year period? The record of the Liberal party is none too good between 1935 and the outbreak of war, and I shall refer to a few figures covering those years. Then following that I am going to give several quotations from that broadcast because, as far as the appeal which the Liberals made to the people in 1935 was concerned, there was no question about their ability to meet and solve this problem. In fact they even named several things which they could and would do. I want to emphasize that we were never out of the depression until the outbreak of war in 1939.

When the former prime minister made that broadcast and used that collection of choice phrases he estimated the unemployed in Canada at that time as being 400,000. He said that he might be conservative, that he personally thought the figure was 500,000, but he was going to work on the figure of 400,000. We have 375,000 unemployed at the present time, plus a number more who are not registered.

I should like to quote some figures from the bureau of statistics and in passing I want to pay my respects to the employees of that branch who show such generous co-operation when requested by members of parliament to assist in the procurement of information. Here are the unemployment figures:

1937	340,400
1938	411,100

Then here are the figures for 1939, the war year:

January	485,000
February	491,000
March	494,000
April	473,000

An hon. Member: The war was on.

Mr. Shaw: No, the war had not broken out yet, but I will come to that. They were supposed to be getting ready for it. The figures follow:

May	395,000
June	369,000
July	352,000
August	332,000
September	300,000
October	283,000
November	296,000
December	364,000

Only a few moments ago I gave the figure for March of the following year. After asserting in 1935 that unemployment was the hardest cross which any man had to bear, the former leader of the Liberal party went on to say, and he emphasized that he was speaking in the name of Liberalism:

> A solution of the unemployment problem must be sought in two directions. Long-range policies and permanent measures must be instituted which, through the revival of trade and industry, will serve to bring about a measure of prosperity. This, of itself, by providing employment, will more effectively than anything else reduce unemployment.

It makes one wonder when he stops to consider what the Liberal party has brought upon us in the field of international trade.

Mr. Kickham: Give us the figures for unemployment while Bennett was in power.

Mr. Shaw: May I suggest that I am not a Conservative nor am I defending any Conservative administration. I have often described on the public platform the period 1930-35 as being one of the bleakest and most dreary five-year periods Canada had ever experienced outside a war period.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): And every other country too.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Mr. Gardiner: You are not right with regard to the Liberal period in spite of the fact that you say that.

Mr. Shaw: The mere fact that the Minister of Agriculture makes that assertion does not alter fact. I still remember the first six months of 1949 and the assertions he made in various parts of the country. I quote again from that same broadcast in which the former prime minister said, and I ask hon. members to listen to this:

> Only by removing the restrictions which have strangled the movement of goods into and out of the country and through persistent and persuasive endeavour to regain markets which have been closed against us, can there be a revival of trade and business, and the return of work for the men and women of our land.

Mr. Gardiner: Give us the figures.

Mr. Shaw: All one has to do is to recall that between 1936 and 1939 we were still in the throes of a depression. We still had unemployment at that time and this whole speech was designed to give assurance to the electors that the Liberals if elected would by the application of those policies correct the situation which existed at that time.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, may I ask my friend to permit me to say that during the period he is speaking of trade went up from 50 per cent to 100 per cent and unemployment went down by 50 per cent.

Mr. Shaw: The former prime minister used the figure 400,000 on August 5, 1935, when he delivered this memorable broadcast, the text of which I now have here between two red covers. He was working on those figures. In 1938, according to the bureau of statistics, we had 411,100 registered unemployed.

Mr. Gardiner: Take the bureau of statistics figures for both periods.

Mr. Shaw: They are bureau of statistics figures.

Mr. Ferguson: You cannot believe even the Liberal figures.

Mr. Shaw: Is the minister implying that the leader of the opposition, as he was at that time, could not possibly be right in his figures?

Mr. Gardiner: I am not saying that.

Mr. Ferguson: The Liberal government is wrong again on the figures.

Mr. Gardiner: Take his figures for both periods and I will still be right. Take either one or the other.

Mr. Shaw: All I have to do is to emphasize that it takes more than an assertion on the part of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr.

Gardiner) to establish proof in my mind. I quote again, and this is an interesting one also:

> Relief from, rather than an increase in the burden of the cost of government, reductions rather than increases in taxation . . . must be delivered, if commerce and industry are to revive.

I shall hurry on to another one or two. This is an interesting one because he refers to world war I. It is as follows:

> Who, with a knowledge of what was accomplished in the years of war, and in the years of strain and stress which immediately followed, will venture to say that a government with vision and determination will not be able to effect, in times of peace, a nation-wide co-operative effort equal to any previously achieved? . . . Are privations and sufferings, the loss of occupation, and the inability to secure employment, not just as great, where they arise from economic causes in our own country?

Then he goes on to refer to the many projects. They were even going to paint farmers' fences for them. The excerpt reads:

> . . . The country would welcome, above all else, a comprehensive scheme of urban and rural improvements. Such a scheme would appropriately include the clearance of slum areas, housing programs, the painting and repair of buildings and fences, both in cities and the country; and of scenic development, which would serve to make all Canada a country second to none for tourists.

Mr. Ferguson: Whitewash themselves.

Mr. Shaw: It continues:

> Indeed all projects might readily be made to contribute to these ends.

History records, Mr. Speaker, that in October of that year the Conservatives were swept out of office and the Liberals were swept in, but history also records the statistics to which I have referred. History records that in 1939 we were catapulted into war, and we were not far advanced into that period of war, a couple of years—the Minister of Agriculture may not agree with that and I may be out two or three days—

Mr. Gardiner: You are always out a little.

Mr. Shaw: —when there was created a terrific demand, as has been so often pointed out in this house by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch), for almost everything that we were capable of producing, and manpower suddenly became an asset instead of a liability. The war ended in 1945. There was still a seller's market in the country, and a backlog of demand for capital and consumer goods. People still had their accumulated savings. Money was being paid out for reconversion, and foreign credits in the form of money we had loaned were being expended in Canada for goods which were shipped abroad. Marshall aid dollars were also being spent here. That was 1945. This is 1950. In other words, this is where we left off in 1939. There is almost the same number of unemployed today as there was at that time. It was not the record of the Liberal government in this field which put them into office, nor was it, I dare say, their record in any other field. It was not their record that enabled them to win the succeeding elections. The next one will be the test.

Mr. Hatfield: A different story.

Mr. Shaw: They will not be faced with the situations that existed in 1939, 1945 and 1949.

Mr. Gardiner: You have made that suggestion every session since I have been here.

Mr. Shaw: It is rather unfortunate that one should have had to continue coming back for ten years in order to keep reminding the government that these suggestions will still have to be made.

An hon. Member: Twenty-five dollars a month.

An hon. Member: Give us a solution.

Mr. Shaw: It is a tragic thing when it takes a war to bring us out of such a condition as that which we suffered from in the ten years prior to the outbreak of war. Booms and depressions, with a war thrown in here and there, seem to me essential and necessary to enable policies such as those pursued by this government to work, at least in a measure. Before I left home to come down here for the present session I could not help hearing the grumblings that were rising throughout parts of the country. Farmers were becoming acutely disturbed as a consequence of the future facing the industry reflected through what has happened in our trade relations. It was pointed out to me that in the local employment office at Red Deer they had 609 registered unemployed in January. They were fearful because they could see coming upon us the shape of things which were upon us prior to the outbreak of the last war.

So far as the present legislation is concerned it will provide a certain amount of assistance to a great many workers. I admit that, but it is a drop in the bucket, as someone has said. Take the prevailing prices today for food, clothing and shelter, take the cheque which a man with a wife and three or four kiddies receives from the unemployment insurance fund when he becomes unemployed, try to draw up a budget for him, and see how far you will get. Moreover, the fund is certainly exhaustible, and the benefit is definitely limited.

We will support the measure in the absence of sound concrete policies which, as we have asserted time and again, must be put into operation if a balanced economy is ever to be established in the Dominion of Canada. We repeat also that, without the establishment of such a balanced economy, it is utterly impossible for Canada to lay down a sound, realistic and workable foreign trade policy. A country such as Canada will always depend to a certain measure, and possibly to a very great measure, upon a workable policy for exchanging the real surpluses produced within the country.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add a few words to this discussion, though I will have some further questions to ask when we get into committee. I agree with some of those who have spoken that it is the duty of governments, federal, municipal and provincial, to aim at full employment. However, I do not believe there has ever been full employment in any country, because there are always some men who by their conduct unfit themselves for work.

This legislation is welcomed by the workers and employers at the lakehead; and I think it comes as the result of information that has been supplied to the department by officials there, among others. There were many people who could not qualify for unemployment insurance on the basis of 180 days, but who could qualify with 90 days. I do not agree with the acting leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) that we have to wait for war in order to find a remedy.

Mr. Graydon: I did not say that.

Mr. McIvor: We have the same brains that enabled us to do our part in winning the war. If those brains could do that; if they could convert our war workers into industrial workers, we should be able to do better now, because we should be wiser. The government did not wait for war before bringing in unemployment insurance or the family allowance. Compare the unemployment insurance cheques and the family allowance cheques that are being received now with what was coming in back in 1930, when the unemployed received sweet nothing. That, I think, is worth considering; and these amendments will help a great deal more.

We have unemployment at the lakehead. A person would have to be dishonest or blind not to see that. I expect that as long as we have seasons, which I suppose will be as long as we live, we shall have some unemployment there. The seasons affect employment on the lakes; they affect employment in the elevators and on the railroads. All three are affected when shipping is shut down. The weather also affects employment there. This winter we had some weather during which it would have been impossible for men to work, especially in the bush. I know that in other years our seven or more big pulp and paper mills had to overcut their needs because of the budworm pest; and because they overcut their needs they did not need to cut so much this year. Another reason we have unemployment at the lakehead is that nearly all our saw mills were shut down through a lack of saw logs. Perhaps I should not mention this, since it is a provincial matter; but when it affects employment I think I have a right to touch upon it. I believe the premier of Ontario is going to remedy that situation; so we will give him credit for it ahead of time.

There is one further change I should like to see made. When a man quits work he should not have to wait any time at all before receiving unemployment insurance. Multiply one day, two days or three days by his salary, and see how much less he is going to have with which to buy groceries. I believe unemployment insurance should start immediately. If it takes a week to put through an application, the insurance should be made retroactive. Ninety days is a great improvement over 180 days, and I am sure we all commend the department on the way they have thought this out. I believe these changes will help in another way. They will help keep money in circulation, and even the Social Crediters tell us that the more money you keep in circulation the more employment you create.

Mr. Graydon: I suppose there is no one in the house who would be less likely intentionally to misrepresent statements made by another member than the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor); and I am sure he could not have understood the purport of my remarks when he made the statement he did. I did not say we should wait for a war to cure unemployment. I said we should not have to wait for a war for unemployment to be cured. I think when the hon. member reads my remarks he will realize that.

Mr. McIvor: If I did not hear the hon. member correctly, I ask him to forgive me. I understood him to say what others have said, that we must wait for a war before we get full employment. If the hon. member did not say that, he has more sense than I thought he had.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have one or two suggestions to offer the Acting Minister of Labour (Mr. Martin) in connection with this resolution. I am not going to enter into the controversy over the question of unemployment, for there will be other occasions on which that subject may be discussed.

Very little remains to be said from this side of the house, in view of the remarks made by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), who set out generally the viewpoint of the opposition. As the hon. member said, we intend to support these changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act, while at the same time taking the stand that what is being done is merely a driblet or makeshift to meet the present situation, and in no way constitutes a solution to the problem facing this country.

The problem is one which this parliament will have to face and solve if it is fully to discharge its responsibilities. Today in this country some 375,000 people have registered as being out of work; and that is an unemployment picture of challenging proportions. I realize that there has been a material increase in both the population and the working force of this country since the depression years of which we in this party have heard so much for so long. I would point out, however, that during the period from 1932 to 1934 the number of unemployed in Canada—and it was the total number of unemployed, not a selected list based on registrations under the Unemployment Insurance Act—ranged from 497,133 to 402,760. In my opinion, if consideration is taken of those who did not register, the number of unemployed now exceeds the number in 1934. Indeed, according to such information as I am able to obtain, the figures supplied by the department in connection with unemployment insurance are at least twenty-five per cent below the actual number of unemployed in this country. I am not going into the question as to who is responsible, but my mind goes back—

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend says the department admits that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, I certainly did not say it was admitted. Indeed, I do not quite understand why, a few short weeks ago, the Department of Labour made an order preventing the figures as to unemployment from being given out month by month. Economists agree, even though the Department of Labour may not agree, that the figures given by the unemployment insurance commission are at best twenty-five per cent below the actual unemployment figure.

I am not going to enter into a controversy as to who is responsible, and I am not going to rehash the government promises of recent months and recent years. The problem is a national one; and all of us in this house must endeavour to make our contribution to the end that this parliament will effectively meet the situation.

That was not the attitude of the opposition during the years 1930 to 1935. There was in the dictionary no word of opprobrium that could be used which was not used at that time by those then in opposition, who now sit on the government side of the house, when they held the then administration responsible for what was taking place. We who believe in and espouse private enterprise and its preservation must meet this problem and provide a solution for it.

Unless in the days and months that lie ahead this problem is solved and not by solutions such as those which were referred to the other day by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) as makeshift, haphazard and, ad hoc, our failure to meet the situation and to assure jobs will in fact mean that those who advocate the destruction of private enterprise will have their innings in this country.

You say to me that these amendments are not in their nature a makeshift proposition. I will read from what the Prime Minister said, speaking in the House of Commons, as reported at page 60 of Hansard. He refers in general to measures that will be introduced, and he says this:

> That is why the measures which the government will take to deal with our economic problems this year will of necessity be flexible, be selective and be designed to meet special situations rather than anything in the nature of a grandiose over-all blueprint for the general economy of the nation.

The amendments are merely a temporary measure, not a solution, to meet the unemployment situation that exists; and the success of the action being taken is entirely dependent on whether unemployment is merely seasonal. For if it is permanent unemployment that this country faces and not seasonal unemployment dependent on climatic conditions, the legislation being introduced will afford no solution and will be merely a temporary stopgap.

The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) in his speech indicated that unemployment is the result of private enterprise and is part of the capitalistic system. I challenge that statement. Is there any member in this house, regardless of whether he believes in private enterprise or not, who wants to see unemployment? The hon. member went so far as to suggest that unemployment is necessary to the proper functioning of private enterprise. That statement also, which is easy to make, is in fact without foundation. My hope is that we are approaching the day when we shall ultimately solve the problem of depressions and the ups and downs in the economic field. I am not a pessimist, and I am not looking at this matter from the point of view of a Conservative trying to take advantage of the situation. I am looking at it from the point of view of those who believe in private enterprise in this country. We must either find a solution for these problems, or we must in fact admit defeat and the justice of the criticism so often levelled against the system of free enterprise.

I am encouraged in my view that a solution will be found by the statistics which I obtained while the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) was speaking. During the half century between 1850 and 1900, when industrial development was first taking place on a modern and major scale, there were six depressions totalling 195 months. In the fifty-year period from 1900 to 1950 there were periods of depression, but the number was reduced to five and totalled 102 months. I should like to see the unemployment situation met with a declaration of government policy in regard to trade. After all, a considerable proportion of unemployment is due to the fact that our markets have been lost within the last year and a half. What has the government to say? What is its plan? I should like to see an over-all trade plan enunciated instead of a piecemeal plan for unemployment. What legislation is to be placed before this house to increase jobs and employment? Men and women out of work are not asking for unemployment insurance, except as a temporary measure. They are asking for jobs.

Surely this house has the right to know whether the government intends to bring in a plan of public works such as the development of irrigation plans to increase productivity and assure the certainty of production. I know of no better time than the present one, with incipient unemployment as evident as it is, for the commencement in this country of irrigation developments such as the one envisaged in the South Saskatchewan river development plan; and there are many others. Three years ago I asked the appropriate minister: What are the government plans when unemployment comes? Two years ago I asked: When the Marshall plan ceases to operate, what were the government plans? Parliament is in the dark, as it has been during the past several years, as to what if anything the government intends to do in order to provide jobs through the establishment and inauguration of public development schemes. Surely parliament has the right to know what plans, if any, the government has, and what is to be done to meet unemployment where it is not seasonal. It would be most helpful if, in addition to the very complete statement of the Minister of National Health and Welfare with regard to these amendments, the government had also placed before the house its over-all plans, its ideas and its conception of what must be done in order to assure employment and to put back to work the half million who are unemployed in this country.

I come now to one further matter, and I bring it to the attention of the minister. The act is being amended. These amendments reveal a very adroit manner or plan to increase contributions, namely, by raising the level of the salary limit from $3,120 to $4,800. That is a novel and indirect taxation of those with salaries over $3,120. It brings in 90,000 other workers, most of whom in that salary list are executives. Certainly those with salaries over $4,000 are mainly executives. It provides a system whereby another tax will be imposed to meet the extra costs of the proposed amendments.

In view of the fact that 90,000 more are going to contribute, may I suggest to the minister an additional amendment to the existing law. I am asking hon. members in other parts of the house to join me in this. The law now provides for unemployment insurance benefits being paid under the following conditions. Section 27, subsection 1, reads:

> Every person who, being insured under this act, proves that he is
> (a) unemployed;
> (b) capable of and available for work; and
> (c) unable to obtain suitable employment, . . . be entitled to receive payments.

There are men and women everywhere who have paid unemployment insurance contributions over the years, and who finally as a result of illness striking them are unemployed. These people are denied unemployment insurance benefits. I have one instance in mind of an employee of a railroad who was employed for 17 years. During the period that he could contribute since the act was in effect he contributed to unemployment insurance. A year ago he was stricken with an incurable disease. He is not entitled to unemployment insurance for the contributions that he has made. The only persons who are entitled are those unemployed who are "capable of and available for work". Now that the act is being revamped would it not be possible to add, as those who should be entitled to receive benefits under this act, such persons who having contributed for the requisite number of months, are by reason of accident or disease unable to work, and therefore are not capable of or available for work? They should be included as eligible and qualified for entitlement.

I know another man who has contributed since 1941. Six weeks ago that man became disabled but not as a result of accident, and therefore does not come within the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act. That man has nothing to look forward to but fear, alleviated by the uncertainty of charity, and yet for a period of years he has contributed. According to the figures I have received, to include those I have mentioned would not add more than a quarter of a million dollars to the expenditures under the act. To include them would be fair; it would be just; it would mean that these men who find themselves unemployed in consequence of illness and unable to work through no fault of their own would at least be assured of consideration.

I think too of the many employees in banks and other such institutions who are required to make their contributions and who under normal or even abnormal circumstances will never conceivably qualify for payment. I think that those who make payment of their contributions under classifications to which entitlement never, or seldom if ever, comes, should be placed in a category where for their contributions they would receive benefits for unemployment while unable to work for the statutory period.

I listened to the Minister of National Health and Welfare analysing the amendments to the act. It occurred to me that here was one provision that every hon. member in the house would support, and one that deserves the support of all of us who believe that those who contribute should have the opportunity of securing some benefit for the contribution that they make.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to take time to repeat the arguments already put forward in this debate. Rather I rise to contribute something which I feel has not yet been done. Before I do so I want to say that I support wholeheartedly the position taken by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) and expressed by others who have taken part in this debate, namely, that the real issue facing this country and this parliament, and particularly this government, is the finding of ways and means to provide employment. What I shall say will, I think, highlight particularly the need for taking steps in that direction at the earliest possible date.

The job that I should like to do for a few moments is this. I should like to analyse in terms of dollars and cents, in terms of days and weeks, what it is that is being provided for our unemployed people by the measure that has been introduced by the Acting Minister of Labour (Mr. Martin).

The minister gave us certain figures. Naturally we have no printed document before us, but I took the notes down. He gave them quite clearly, and I think I have them down fairly well.

Mr. Martin: Would it not be better to wait?

Mr. Knowles: I think it should be done right away.

Mr. Martin: You have not the bill or anything before you.

Mr. Knowles: I have my own notes on the speech that the minister made; and in this parliamentary institution of ours one has always the hope that, by arguing on the resolution stage for things that ought to be in the bill, the government might reconsider and improve the bill before it introduces it.

I want to point out that the minister said that the supplementary benefits to be paid would amount to only 80 per cent of the normal benefits for which the unemployed person would otherwise qualify. Please note what that means. It means that an unemployed person who comes under the usual categories in the act, and who was earning $35 a week, would normally qualify for benefits to the extent of $18.30 a week. That is a man with one or more dependents. But under the supplementary provisions being brought in by the minister that person will be entitled to only $14.64 per week by way of a so-called supplementary benefit.

Mr. Martin: You see, that shows the undesirability of drawing deductions without having the facts. The conclusion the hon. member has drawn with regard to the class to which he has referred is not accurate. When the bill is before the house I think the hon. member will see at once that, with regard to class one, what he has said is not so.

Mr. Knowles: I am talking about class eight.

Mr Martin: There is no class eight.

Mr. Knowles: At the present time, according to the act as I have it, a person with a dependent paying 36 cents a week is in class seven and is entitled to a benefit of $18.30 a week, if he meets the statutory conditions. The minister has said the new provision will provide 80 per cent of that; and 80 per cent of $18.30 is $14.64 a week.

Similarly a person, with dependents, earning $30 a week will be entitled to a benefit to the extent of 80 per cent of $15.60, which is only $12.48 a week. Likewise a person whose income is $25 a week, with a dependent or dependents, will be entitled to 80 per cent of $12.90, which is only $10.32 a week.

Mr. Speaker, relief rates in my city are better than that. I say again that to bring forward a measure like this at this critical time does only one thing: it underlines the fact that what is really needed is not an improvement in the Unemployment Insurance Act but a policy to provide employment.

May I point out also, if the minister will permit me to do so, that the details, of which he gave us a forecast in his speech, indicate that for large numbers of people who will have to get along on supplementary amounts at these low rates, even these rates will not be available to them for the whole period of their unemployment. It will be available to them only for such number of days as they can qualify. In no case can they draw these supplementary benefits beyond April 15 of this year or March 31 of any other year.

But the House of Commons must not assume that these 70,000, or so, referred to, or the other 25,000, are going to receive even those low rates I have quoted up until April 15 of this year. They will get them only for the number of days for which they can qualify under the new part being added to the act.

The minister has said that there would be four classes. The first class would be the person who has qualified for benefits and has been drawing benefits, but whose period of qualification has been exhausted. He will be entitled to these low rates I have indicated for a period equal to the period for which he qualified previously. That previous period might be only 36 days, which is one-fifth of the minimum requirement of 180 days of work. Thus there is no guarantee that he will get even these low rates for the full time he is unemployed.

In class two we have reference to those who cannot meet the requirements of 180 days in the last two years. They will be permitted to qualify if they have had 90 days since March 31 last. But the person who meets that minimum qualification will get the low rates I have quoted for a period of only 18 days. Well, 18 days at those weekly rates will not see an unemployed person and his family through a winter in this country.

The same applies to class three. Those in lumbering and logging who previously were in excepted occupations can now qualify, provided they have had 90 days' employment in the last twelve months. But the person who meets that minimum requirement would be able to get this so-called supplementary benefit at the low rate I have quoted for a period of only 18 days, or one-fifth of that 90-day period.

The same applies to those in class four, who are engaged in employment that has been brought into a state of insurability within the last twelve months.

I know the government becomes impatient with our forever finding that every time they take a small step forward they do not go far enough. But if ever that criticism was justified, then certainly it is with respect to this measure. This is a pitiably small amount of relief offered, as I say, at rates lower than those paid by the public welfare department in the city from which I come; and it is no credit at all to the government to bring it in at this time.

I felt when the minister was reading the statement the impression was being gained in some parts of the house—"Well, here is something pretty good; here is something that will at least provide some dollars and cents for these people." The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) talked about the money that will be put into circulation, the purchasing power. But please note that the people who cannot meet these new qualifications do not qualify at all; those who have been unemployed too long and need it the worst do not get anything out of this legislation. In other words, any notion that this additional part of the act, with these supplementary benefits, is going to provide even a kind of living sufficient to tide people over, these hundreds of thousands of unemployed in this country at the present time, is completely false and erroneous.

While I am speaking on this subject let me say it seems to me there is something strange about the way in which daily premiums are to be increased. If I understood the minister correctly he said it was to be one cent a day. Well, I shall wait until we have the details before us; but I hope he did not mean one cent a day across the board. Because, if he did, that is an increase of 50 per cent in the amount to be paid by those in the lower brackets and an increase of only 14-2/7 per cent on the part of those in the upper brackets.

Here again we have a case of this government's paying so little on the dollar. They are a great organization to make promises and then, years later, to come through with just a portion of what they promised. I hold in my hand a copy of a document frequently quoted in the house, the report of the dominion-provincial conference of 1945 and 1946. I find at page 387 that the prime minister of that day, the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, making his statement summing up the government's proposals, said this about unemployment assistance:

> In addition to unemployment insurance, the dominion will set up a system of unemployment assistance under which it will pay benefits equal to 85 per cent of unemployment insurance benefits, to unemployed persons able and willing to work who are not entitled, or who have ceased to be entitled, to unemployment insurance benefits. This assistance will be limited to two years of continuous assistance, but a person will again become eligible for this assistance following an approved period of employment.

That was the proposal in 1945—85 per cent of the normal rate over a period of two years. Now, when we really have a crisis so far as unemployment is concerned, we have an offer of 80 per cent over a maximum period of three months; and it is likely to be much less, depending upon the new qualifications laid down.

I will agree with the minister to this extent, that any further examination of the minute details of the program will have to wait until we have the bill before us. However, I am willing to submit the analysis I have made to the scrutiny of hon. members, after they receive the bill; because I am not unfamiliar with this act, and I paid pretty close attention to what the minister said.

My submission is that when the unemployed people in this country really figure out what they will receive in terms of dollars and cents and in terms of the number of days for which they will get it, they will not be very grateful to the government for bringing in a measure of so meagre description.

There is one other point I should like to bring up before sitting down. It has to do with the whole question of getting to the root of the problem, of creating employment rather than fiddling around with these less than relief rates. I quote again from the report of the dominion-provincial conference of 1945, this time from page 386 where Mr. King is speaking and is reported to have said:

3. Dominion program: The dominion will extend its natural resources development and conservation projects, and research program, as soon as the situation respecting labour and materials will permit.

What is the government waiting for? "As soon as the situation respecting labour will permit"—that was the promise—the government will go in for public investment and for the launching of its share of a public works program. I continue:

These activities, where possible, will be varied in execution in accordance with the general employment and economic situation.

If the general employment and economic situation today does not call for the immediate implementation of the program this government has been talking about, then what is the government waiting for? The previous paragraph in this report reads:

2. Timing grants: The dominion will contribute to provincial and, through the provincial government, to municipal public investment projects on a scale and to an amount to be determined by the dominion and to be announced in January of any year in which in the light of the general employment and economic situation the dominion considers such assistance to be desirable.

I know that many municipalities and cities across this country took those words at their face value when they were enunciated a few years ago and prepared blueprints of public works and schools and hospitals that needed to be built. Those blueprints and plans are waiting now for the government "when the labour situation permits"—and certainly it permits today—to launch them. Instead, we find that the whole idea of a shelf of public works seems to have been completely forgotten.

When the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) was talking about this matter the other night he just tossed the ball back to the provinces, back to the municipalities and back to private enterprise. That is not the way the government talked when the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) published his white paper in April of 1945. That is not the way they talked when this dominion-provincial conference was held. That is not the way they pictured it to the people of this country in the election of 1945 and again in 1949.

At that time we saw great posters on the billboards across the country, reading, "Jobs for all". I have a sample of that poster in my office and one of these days I shall have to bring it down. Apparently it did the trick in 1945 because they repeated it in 1949 and we again saw the same posters, "Jobs for all". They said they had a program composed of public investment with high levels of employment and over-all social security. Surely the time has come to go ahead with that program.

I stress very strongly the two things I have been saying. The measure before us is only a half measure. It does not provide anything at all for many people who need it. For those for whom it does make provision, it will not provide it for the time they need it and the rates suggested will be utterly insufficient in the light of present-day costs of living. We will have to support it because we could not think of doing anything less, but the government need not expect to get from the unemployed or the working people of this country any thanks for this measure. The other point I want to emphasize, which this measure will not settle, is the extreme need for immediate action and a comprehensive program designed to bring about increased employment and real security for our people.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, ordinarily I would not take up any time discussing a resolution because I generally like to wait for the bill itself, but like the hon. member who has just taken his seat I listened carefully to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) make his statement this afternoon. I took notes and I got exactly the same impression of his proposal as did the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I do not think a bill based upon the recommendations contained in the statement of the minister should be accepted by this house at this time as a measure to relieve the present crisis in employment. I am sorry to see the Minister of National Health and Welfare mixed up in this because I have a high regard for him. The minister who blundered his way into this thing is the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) and he should be present here in the house.

Mr. Martin: Wait until you see the bill.

Mr. Gillis: Before he closes this discussion I should like the minister to tell us whether the unemployment insurance advisory committee have examined these proposals and recommended them to the minister. I cannot conceive of the labour representatives on that committee putting their O.K. on this kind of proposal.

If the circumstances were ordinary, if we did not have a crisis in employment, if the minister came in with this as a straight suggestion to improve the Unemployment Insurance Act, I would say that it was all right, that they were just taking a step to advance the thing. I cannot think that these proposals have been brought into the house for the purpose of curing the present unemployment situation, but I judge that the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) is speaking for the members on the other side of the house when he accepts it as such.

The matter is serious because there are 375,000 people in this country who are without jobs today. They are looking to this house for a solution of their problem. If this is the only solution there is going to be cold comfort for them. If the bill is to be based upon this resolution then it means exactly what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said it means. It will provide practically no relief to the men who are unemployed today.

Mr. Martin: That is not true.

Mr. Gillis: There are at least 17 per cent of the unemployed who will not come under these benefits because they are not in receipt of unemployment insurance. Seventeen per cent of 375,000 is a lot of people. A large percentage of that group is composed of people over 40 years of age. We know from recent discussions in this house that industry in this country has taken the position that they will not hire anyone over 40 years of age. A large percentage of the men on the streets today are in that age group and will not come under these benefits no matter how high you jack them up.

There is absolutely no solution being offered, and I am particularly concerned. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is fortunate because he said his welfare department have a better scale of relief, but in the section of the country from which I come unemployment is not regional, it is not seasonal—it is permanent. According to the last figures I received from the unemployment insurance commission there are 59,000 people unemployed in the maritimes and there is no relief for them under this legislation. At least 30 per cent—we are higher than the national figure—of those who are unemployed will receive no benefits because they have gone years beyond the time when they could receive unemployment insurance. Many of them have never had employment.

This legislation does them no good. I am getting up at this time because I do not want the people I represent to think that I am accepting this kind of legislation as a cure for the situation that exists at this time.

Mr. Martin: It is not offered for that purpose.

Mr. Gillis: The figures indicate that there are 21,000 unemployed in the city of Toronto and soup kitchens and missions are operating. This legislation will benefit very few of those people. If the minister will tell us that this is not designed to cure the present emergent unemployment problem, that it is simply a step the government is taking to extend and throw around the benefits under the act, then that is all right. Before you can get these things operating to benefit the men who are on the street you will have to bring in a bill. Then you write regulations which must go back to the unemployment insurance commission. Then they are sent across the country. It will be a year from now before you will be ready to put this into operation and in the meantime the unemployed are shivering on the streets.

I also think, as has been said by almost every hon. member who has risen to speak, that what the government wants is a planned program of public investment in order to take up the slack. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) is not in his seat now, but he is doing the right thing. He is going to build a bridge in Nova Scotia which will cost $13 million, and he is putting an item in his estimates for it. That is the kind of thing the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) should be recommending this afternoon. If he could say that in addition to these feeble steps they are taking to bring a little relief—

Mr. Martin: Let us get this first.

Mr. Gillis: —we are going to have a public works program, we will drag along until May with this and then we are going to put people to work, it would be helpful. A lot of the members are new, but I can remember sitting here and listening to the previous prime minister stand up in his place in 1944 and tell the house how much Canada owed to the men who were then fighting the war. We all agreed with him. He said: When they come back to this country this time they have got to come back to a brand-new order, a new order of society. Those were his actual words. I remember them very well. Now he is over on Laurier Avenue watching the unemployment figures and the brand-new world that the boys came back to. When he reads the complicated and twisted statement made this afternoon by the minister, who really fooled the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor)—

Mr. Martin: Apparently you understand it.

Mr. Gillis: Certainly I understand it. I understand exactly as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) understands it. That is why I am standing up on my feet. A lot of the new members on the other side of the house probably are fooled. If the minister will admit to the house that this measure is not designed to take care of the present unemployment emergency and is merely a step forward in the unemployment insurance legislation to bring in loggers and so on, and also a readjustment of the rates, then I am quite prepared to let it go through, but tomorrow or the next day we want someone over there to get up and tell us what they are doing to meet the emergency. We want them to get up and tell us that they are making enough money available to the city of Toronto to help look after the 21,000 unemployed there, and also in these other regions where there is a concentration of unemployed. In Windsor, the minister's own city, there are approximately 9,000, and in St. Catharines and Hamilton—

Mr. Martin: The figures my hon. friend has are not accurate.

Mr. Gillis: Are they not? They are taken from an Ottawa dispatch dated the 17th of February and reading as follows:

> The labour department today issued the following table on the unemployment situation . . .

Then there is a break-down and they segregate the various centres where unemployment is most aggravated. For the information of the minister the figures I have here are: Hamilton, 8,023; Kingston, 1,200; London, 2,340; Ottawa, 4,991; St. Catharines, 2,465; Sudbury, 1,910; Toronto, 21,493 and Windsor, 5,803.

Mr. Martin: That is not the figure you gave a while ago.

Mr. Gillis: I said approximately 9,000. I was only out a few. If the minister is prepared to accept this measure as I have indicated we are prepared to accept it—

Mr. Martin: Admit that was my strike.

Mr. Gillis: If the minister will say that he is going to do something to give immediate relief, particularly to those centres where there is a concentration of unemployment, then we are quite prepared to go along with him and let the measure pass.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, I shall not delay the house long, but there are a few things that I want to say on this question. First of all I am sure it is most disappointing to a great many members of the house to find the government offering this resolution as a solution of the present unemployment situation.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend is repeating what is obviously not true. This measure is intended to do exactly what I said. This is a measure, in so far as supplementary benefits are concerned, to supplement the provisions based on an actuarial basis in respect of insurance payments. That is all the measure is. No one has said that it was any more than that, but to the extent I have indicated it is a matter of great significance.

Mr. Knowles: It is your answer to the emergency.

Mr. Noseworthy: We are very happy to have that statement from the minister, and within a few days we shall expect a statement as to just what the government intends to do to meet the unemployment situation. Regardless of what the minister has just said, the impression has gone abroad and has been created by government speakers that this amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act is being made for the purpose of meeting the present unemployment situation. It has been accepted as the government's proposal to meet the problem.

I certainly want to emphasize again—and this has already been done—that an increase in unemployment insurance is no substitute for work. If it is the government's policy for meeting unemployment then it is a complete reversal of their policy for the post-war years. From finance minister after finance minister we have heard year after year that the government's policy to meet unemployment was to provide a shelf of public works which could be put into operation whenever unemployment became serious. I submit that the time has come for the implementation of that policy. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), speaking particularly of the construction industry, was quoted in one of the Toronto daily papers on February 17 as follows:

> Activity in the construction industry is still as buoyant as it has been since the end of the war, but it may be that we will shortly be moving into a new phase in which demand will not be quite so insistent.
> That may not be altogether a bad thing. I am sure that many of you must have felt in recent years that a period of consolidation would have to come; that the spiral of increasing costs could not continue; and that, in the long run, everyone in the community, including your own industry, would benefit by the return of some pressure for higher productivity and somewhat lower production costs.

I take this statement to mean that it is the accepted policy of the government to invite such a period of unemployment as we have at the present time in order to provide a surplus of workers, so that costs of production may be reduced and productivity increased.

I think we should accept as a fact that the unemployment situation as it exists in Canada today is the responsibility of the federal government. In 1945 and 1949 the Liberal party took credit for the number of jobs that were available and for the general prosperity of the country. That, they told us from billboards and in other advertising, was the result of the policies of the Liberal government. By the same token, if they are going to take credit for the prosperity that existed during those years, they must take responsibility for the lack of jobs that is developing today. Whether or not the federal government should assume the financial responsibility in connection with providing jobs, certainly it is up to the federal government to take the initiative in bringing together governments at various levels so that when unemployment does strike us, as it is striking us today, public works programs will be available. Today we are actually back where we were before the war, as far as the unemployment situation is concerned. The federal government is passing the buck to the provincial governments; the provincial governments are passing it to the municipalities. The municipalities are coming back to the provincial governments and the federal government, and there has been practically no improvement in the last ten years, though it was realized that some steps should be taken to co-ordinate the efforts of governments at the three levels in order to meet this situation. Not until this fall are we to have a dominion-provincial conference to deal with responsibility of governments at various levels in regard to such social measures. For years opposition groups and others have been clamouring for the government to bring together provincial and municipal authorities and take the initiative in bringing about some agreement so that when such situations develop we may be prepared for them.

Reference has been made to the fact that unemployment insurance, even as it may be improved by these amendments, will still provide less than the amount of relief paid in some of our municipalities. Unemployment insurance was never intended to take the place of employment. It was never intended to do more than tide a worker over the period of transition between losing one job and finding another; and we should never come to look upon unemployment insurance as a substitute for employment itself. From what I can gather the average married man receiving unemployment insurance gets something like $16 a week. In the case of a man with three or four children $16 a week, even if he were getting it for a period of time, would not be sufficient to maintain his family. In York township we pay in relief to a family of three $60.88 a month, plus rent; to a family of four, $84 a month plus rent; to a family of five, $92 a month, plus rent; and to a family of seven $125, plus rent. Unemployment insurance does not begin to maintain a family with five or six children, and can in no circumstances be expected to take the place of a weekly pay cheque.

Now there are one or two questions I want to ask the minister before I conclude. Within the last hour I have been informed by a member of the unemployment advisory committee that the amendments brought in this afternoon have not come before that committee, and that they have not been before the representatives of employees and employers who form that advisory committee.

Mr. Martin: Why not ask your questions later, on the bill, and let us get along?

Mr. Noseworthy: I have been informed that recommendations to the government by the advisory committee have been ignored in the measure now before the house. Further, I should like to know why the public hearing which was advertised for next Friday, having to do with bringing hospitals and public charitable institutions under the act, has been cancelled; and why no mention is made of that matter in this amendment.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Mr. Martin: Could we not report the resolution? I think we are all agreed on it.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Green: I should like to ask the minister to give a little further explanation about the effect of these amendments. In order to put the question, I must refer to the situation in my own city of Vancouver. We have had extensive unemployment there; it has been as bad there perhaps as anywhere in Canada in recent weeks. As I understood the minister this afternoon, the only groups who would be helped by these amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act are those whose benefits have been exhausted or those who would be eligible for unemployment insurance if they had made further contributions. Then there is to be provision for two new groups who have not been making contributions; and as I understood it, they are groups which will be brought under the act eventually. But is any provision whatever being made for those people who do not come under any one of the four groups?

For example, although I do not know how many are involved, quite a few of the men who are unemployed in Vancouver this winter would not be in any of these four categories. A great many of them are younger men, and in many cases I think they have drifted to the coast with the belief that we always have a mild winter there. No doubt a good many of them came there with that belief in mind, but I am afraid they have been sadly disillusioned this winter. The situation, however, is tragic. These young men cannot be cared for either by the province or by the city, because they are employable. The city and the province will care only for those people who are not able to work. The result is that there is this large group who can get food only by going to the Salvation Army or to one or other of the churches. These agencies have done excellent work during the winter weeks, but that situation simply cannot go on. These men are considered, by the provincial authorities and by the municipal authorities, to be the sole responsibility of the dominion. Rightly or wrongly, that is the belief; and action is based on that belief. There is a good reason too for that belief, because the dominion, in making its proposals in 1945, said that it would undertake the responsibility for all the employables in Canada.

Will the minister tell the committee just what can be done for these men? Their plight is tragic. There is a gap there which must be filled, and I believe it must be filled by the dominion government. It is unfortunate that action has not already been taken to do something about that particular group. Will the minister tell the committee now whether they can be helped in any way at all under these proposed amendments to the act?

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend has raised a larger question that is not envisaged by the amendments or by the Unemployment Insurance Act. We must keep before us what we are seeking to do in this measure, although we may have our views about its adequacy or inadequacy. What we are dealing with here now are amendments to the existing Unemployment Insurance Act which provide for supplementary benefit payments in the case of four different classes of workers. Admittedly these amendments will not cover all the workers, but they will cover those who come within the ambit of the four classes I have mentioned.

With regard to the question as to the responsibility for unemployed employables, that is not germane to this particular bill. I do not wish by any means to depreciate the importance of that matter, but this is not the place to discuss it; we would be out of order. Admittedly it is a problem that exists, but we can deal now only with the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act.

As I pointed out in my statement this afternoon, what we have done is this. We have observed the principles underlying the Unemployment Insurance Act itself, we have recognized the actuarial basis of that act, we have recognized the insurance aspects of that act, and have provided supplemental payments for those who come within its ambit during a certain period. First there are the individuals who have exhausted their benefits after March 31. Second, those who have not made the required 180 contributions but who made 90 contributions within the period after March 31 before the moment of claim. Such people will be covered as well as those who, if they have not made any contributions, have worked for a period of 90 days within the last twelve months of an eighteen-month period in lumbering and logging. And then another group who work in newly insured industries for 90 days. The amendment is to cover those. We are seeking to deal with those four classes; and the extent to which we deal with those four classes is a matter that alone is germane to the discussion at the moment, in my opinion, without in any way failing to appreciate the quality and the character of the general problem which does not come within the ambit of this measure.

Mr. Green: Will the minister explain in what way the third and fourth groups come into the insurable categories? I do not think he has made that clear.

Mr. Martin: I shall be very glad to do that. The third class deals with a person who, for not less than ninety days within a period of twelve months falling within an eighteen-month period immediately preceding the time he makes his claim, was employed in lumbering and logging in any province other than British Columbia—my hon. friend will appreciate why we say "other than British Columbia". Logging in British Columbia many months ago was made one of the groups that are covered as fully insured groups under the Unemployment Insurance Act—and in any insurable employment in any place. The man might be engaged for part of the year in an insurable employment, or he might be engaged in eastern Canada in logging, a non-insurable occupation. If he comes within both of these categories he will be required to work for ninety days, with the qualifications that I have mentioned. The fourth group—

Mr. Green: Ninety days at logging?

Mr. Martin: Ninety days at logging or any insurable employment. The fourth class is a person who, for not less than ninety days subsequent to the 31st day of March immediately preceding the day on which he makes a claim for a supplementary benefit, was employed in (1) employment that was made insurable employment at any time during the twelve months immediately preceding the day on which he makes a claim for supplementary benefit. Take a concrete case. Let us say that on the 26th of December a man is engaged in an uninsurable employment which is made insurable, under the general powers given the commission under the act, let us say, on the 28th of December. He obviously has had no prior opportunity to make contributions under the Unemployment Insurance Act, but nevertheless he will not on that account suffer. In this fourth class he will be deemed to have been in, provided he has worked for ninety days since March 31. The other subdivision in that class is the person who has worked ninety days since March 31 and is in any occupation in the group that I have already described and as well in insurable employment. These are the four classes we are seeking to cover and which we say will embrace at least a hundred thousand persons.

Mr. Lesage: May I ask the minister a question about class 3. Does he mean that in order to obtain benefits a person engaged in logging in eastern Canada must have worked in another insurable trade for ninety consecutive days during the last eighteen months? Must the two conditions be put together? Must he have worked in any insurable trade for ninety consecutive days in the last eighteen months, or can he get benefits if he worked for ninety consecutive days in logging work?

Mr. Martin: Either logging or insured.

Mr. Lesage: Either?

Mr. Martin: Either one. I may say I hope tomorrow to be able to make an announcement about eastern logging. It will be put down at a later date.

Mr. MacDougall: I feel that hon. members in this house ought to be acquainted with the situation that developed on the Pacific coast. Hon. members of all parties from the greater riding areas of Vancouver, together with the hon. member for New Westminster and the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond, took it upon themselves, at the invitation of the city council and also a general invitation of the trades and labour council and the Canadian Legion in that area, to do what we felt would be a benefit in an endeavour to solve this emergency of unemployment, which we had on the Pacific coast this year to an unprecedented extent, of some 12·9 per cent. All of these hon. members whom I have mentioned attended all or some of these meetings. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, I think, as well as myself, had the honour of attending all of these meetings.

I am perfectly content with this legislation as it has been presented, because in large measure, perhaps to the extent of 90 per cent, it embraces the needs and requirements of the spokesmen of labour at these various meetings we attended in the labour temple in Vancouver during the months of December and January last.

The bringing in of these additional groups is, in my opinion, a farsighted and humanitarian legislative enactment by the government, and for that I give them full marks, despite any derogatory remarks that may be made to the contrary before this legislation receives its final readings. But in that regard no one can possibly conceive of the Unemployment Insurance Act as a complete payment over a long-extended period in lieu of employment. It was never so intended, and I do not believe any government in Canada will at any time endeavour to make it of that type; but it does cover the emergency conditions which come to the various parts of Canada at different times. It is also now embracing a large field that was not subject to benefits and which, in my opinion, it was justifiably entitled to. This legislation brings it to a consummation.

I cannot look upon this legislation as other than a great step forward. This afternoon reference was made to the fact that we are not developing employment by amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. That is quite true. But, in heaven's name, we are dealing with the Unemployment Insurance Act, and the amendments are not measures designed to bring about continuous and full employment for all.

A question was raised this afternoon by hon. members who I am quite sure are better acquainted with the legislative program contained in this legislation than I am, because they have been here longer than I have been. When they said that this legislation does not create jobs, I agreed with them. Certainly, it does not create jobs, and it never was intended to create jobs. It is a cushion and a barrier against continuing unemployment caused through emergencies or seasonal operations, and nothing more.

We ought to stick to the principles of the legislation rather than run foul of it, in connection with suggestions about creation of jobs. If we stick to the principles of the Unemployment Insurance Act I believe that we will all be able to go back to our constituencies—I for one will be, and I am quite sure this will apply to all the Vancouver members—and be proud of the legislation that is proposed in these amendments.

In my riding of Vancouver-Burrard there are possibly as great a number of those who will benefit from the bill, and who had previously been excluded from benefiting under the act, as there are in any riding in British Columbia. I shall be proud to go back to that riding of workmen, men and women who are, I am quite sure, going to be extremely satisfied with the amendments introduced to the Unemployment Insurance Act by the acting minister, the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Croll: My understanding of the government's position is that they do not for a moment suggest that unemployment insurance is a way of life. What they are saying to the committee is that the act has been on the statute books for a period of almost ten years—nine years, I believe, to be exact. Now, in the light of experience, that act has been tested and in some respects found wanting. So today we are tailoring it to the needs of the country.

To my mind that seems reasonable. The problem troubling me at the moment is not what is contained in the amendments, but rather what is not contained in them. We are doing something for people who have not been covered previously. I do not know how that will work out, but I am prepared to wait and see. At the moment it seems acceptable to me.

At this time let me deal with those people who have been covered by the act for many years, by asking this question: Did the minister give consideration to one of the sections causing great hardship, a section which in my opinion is unfair, namely the one which makes provision for the nine-day waiting period?

Those people who have been covered by the act for a considerable length of time feel that this is too long a time, and that it is a provision which imposes great hardship upon them. They believe it does not serve any useful purpose. It would seem to me that if actuarially it is possible to cut down the waiting period from 180 days to 90 days under certain circumstances, then the most which people should be expected to wait is the ordinary working week—seven days at the outside.

That would seem reasonable to me. It is pointed out by the hon. member for Fort William and by all members in all quarters of the house that that is one of the great weaknesses in the bill. It seems to me that in coming to the house at this time to ask amendments, something should be done along these lines.

The Chairman: Order. We are not yet discussing the bill.

Mr. Croll: I was referring to the resolution.

The Chairman: I believe that is a matter which comes up in the bill.

Mr. Croll: Is it contained in the bill?

The Chairman: I do not know; we shall see.

Mr. Croll: I was referring to the act. When I said "bill" I meant "act". Perhaps I am somewhat premature in my question. Nevertheless I am asking the acting minister now whether consideration has been given to that section, and if any decision has been made.

Mr. Martin: I am glad the hon. member has spoken because, while I may not be able to answer his question at the moment, it does give me an opportunity to say something which possibly I should have said at eight o'clock, and that is that the resolution before the committee is, in its very nature, lacking in the generalities that often attend resolutions introduced prior to the introduction of money bills. On that account there is some difficulty, obviously, because of the particularities of the resolution, rather than the fact that it does not declare or contain one general principle.

The question the hon. member has asked is one to which I should like to address myself, and I believe that question as well as others which have already been put might more appropriately be put and, I believe, with perhaps better appreciation, when the bill is actually before us, so that we may see what is involved, instead of being put on the resolution stage when the bill is not before us, and when I am precluded under the rules of the house from giving all the information I should like to give.

It seems to me, if I might make the suggestion, that we should proceed from the committee stage, have first reading of the bill and distribution of it, so that we may have adequate discussion on second reading and in committee, at which time all these questions could be put and I would have a fair opportunity to reply.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: Before the applause becomes too voluminous may I remind hon. members of the experience we have frequently. We have these measures brought before us, and we attempt to discuss the details by asking questions such as that asked by the hon. member for Spadina. We are told not to raise the question now, when the discussion is general, but to leave it until we reach committee stage of the bill. Then, what happens when we get into committee? We are restricted to a discussion of those points contained within the actual clauses of the bill.

It seems to me we would gain time in the long run if we were to have some of the discussion right now, and have some of the general questions cleared up.

Mr. Fulton: In the preparation of the bill was any consideration given to reducing the waiting period? In common with other members, I have had brought to my attention the fact that while the benefits when paid are found most welcome, as naturally they would be, nevertheless when a person is suddenly faced with unemployment, because of seasonal hazards, harsh winter conditions or the like, the waiting period of nine days imposes a great hardship.

I know of cases where men have been unable to provide properly for their families in the matter of fuel and food, and would have suffered unduly had it not been for the charity of institutions which have already been mentioned. Sometimes the condition has been aggravated by delays in adjudication.

This would seem to be a pressing point, and I would be grateful if the minister would say whether consideration was given to it, and whether it is possible that the waiting period might be reviewed.

Mr. Martin: I shall be glad to go into that when we reach committee stage.

[Mr. Martin.]

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Chairman, I feel the time is opportune to make suggestions as to what should or should not be in the bill. We have all experienced the difficulty of making changes, once bills are brought down.

I am not rising either to extol or to condemn the bill. Some changes are necessary. Neither do I rise to depict the serious unemployment situation, but simply to ask a question or two which I hope the minister will see fit to answer before the bill is introduced.

I have not had an opportunity to digest the minister's speech delivered this afternoon, and it is possible that he may have made some observations which I did not hear. I am sure all of us have had some communications or representations from certain classes of labour which are not now included under the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act. I would refer particularly to hospital employees. I am not going to take the time to make an extended speech on that, but are we to believe now that those employees are about to be included in the act?

Mr. Martin: No.

Mr. Hansell: That is a definite answer. That being the case, I can resume my seat with some degree of comfort. I am sure that the hospitals, many of which are run by municipalities and governments, many of which are almost charitable institutions, will feel as comfortable as I from now on.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is the minister in a position to deal with the suggestion I made regarding the inclusion in the act of those who are unemployed by reason of illness but who have contributed to the fund? Can the minister advise what attitude the government will take with regard to the inclusion of those people within the amendments to the act?

Mr. Martin: I listened this afternoon with great interest to what the hon. member had to say and I appreciate the significance of his remarks. The cash sickness benefits principle which he defends is not covered by the amendments. I would not want that answer to be taken as meaning that consideration and study are not being given to that problem.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I had hoped that more would have been done in view of the fact that the act is being amended. The class that I mentioned are now being denied any benefits under the act. It seems to be most unjust and unfair that those who have contributed to the act should be denied any benefits when they are unemployed by reason of illness. There must be a great number of people in this country in occupations to which unemployment does not come as a rule. I refer particularly to banking. Those engaged in banking pay into the fund over the years and in my experience I have heard of no case where anyone so engaged has been able to qualify himself for payments under the act.

We have always taken the stand that one should not be taxed without advantage, particularly when it is taxation of the individual. However, in view of the statement of the minister, there is nothing one can do about this as amendments such as that can be introduced only by the executive.

I should like to secure some information with regard to one statement made this afternoon by the minister. If I took his words down correctly he stated that the fund is guaranteed against loss until 1952. He was dealing with the inclusion of certain new groups and he seemed to indicate that the additional revenue, or taxation if you will, that would be derived from the inclusion of 90,000 more employees whose salaries range from $3,120 to $4,800 would be sufficient to meet the demands of those who are now being included in the act.

Is the minister in a position to give an estimate of the extra payments that may be expected to be made from the fund, and of the additional revenue incident to the inclusion of these 90,000 employees with a salary range from $3,120 to $4,800? I think the committee is entitled to that information. Only a few moments ago the minister said that all these amendments recognize that there must be an actuarial basis for the fund; yet this afternoon he made the statement that should there in fact be a shortage in the fund between now and 1952 it will be made up in some other manner, apparently by the state as a whole contributing to the fund.

Mr. Martin: I am advised by the officers of the commission and the department that it is not possible to make a satisfactory estimate of the cost such as one could responsibly make. The general situation is that there will be one cent per day premium imposed upon the employer and the employee with the government underwriting the balance until 1952 so as to avoid impairment of the fund. It is thought that the totality of the premiums paid by the employers and the employees in their accumulated quality will be sufficient to take care of the situation. If the situation should be otherwise, it would then have to be reviewed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister must have information as to the anticipated contributions from the 90,000 with salaries between $3,120 and $4,800 because statistics showing the various categories of salaries and the numbers receiving such salaries must be available. The government has been able to estimate that 90,000 will be added to those contributing to the fund and it must also have—

Mr. Martin: The figure of 90,000 referred to the increased coverage.

Mr. Diefenbaker: But the increased coverage implies that there are 90,000 with salaries of between $3,120 and $4,800 who will be included. Surely the department could estimate the contributions that those 90,000 will make so that the committee would have some knowledge of the amount that will be received in consequence of their inclusion? The minister cannot say that they have no information in that regard because the statistics I am talking about are available.

Mr. Martin: If any modification is required in the answer I have given already I will make it at a later date. I shall have the matter looked into carefully.

Mr. Hatfield: I should like to inquire about the man who worked in a war plant during the war and paid into the unemployment fund, who went to other employment, perhaps farming, when the war plant was shut down, and is now unemployed. Can such a man draw unemployment insurance when he has paid into the fund for perhaps five years?

Mr. Martin: This is an insurance act. The risks are there and it would all depend upon the particular case. If the man had made 180 contributions within two years he might get some benefits. This is exactly what it says; it is an unemployment insurance act.

Mr. Fulton: Would the minister give a further explanation as to category No. 4, I think it was, among those who are going to receive additional coverage, or perhaps among the recommendations made by the unemployment advisory committee having to do with the reduction in the number of non-compensable days? I was not able to follow him as he made his statement this afternoon.

Mr. Martin: Persons covered in clause 4 would be ones who have not less than ninety days—

Mr. Fulton: The minister has not understood me. It was No. 4 of the recommendations made by the unemployment advisory committee having to do with the reduction, as I understood it, in the number of non-compensable days.

Mr. Martin: Would you mind leaving that until we come to the bill? The details are not right before me.

Mr. Fulton: The minister made a statement on it this afternoon.

Mr. Martin: Yes, I made a general statement, but when we come to the bill I will be able to explain in greater detail. I may say that we have accepted the recommendation of the advisory committee.

Mr. Fulton: If the minister will not give me further details I must ask my question without benefit of full knowledge of the amendment proposed. What I wanted to ask, following the explanation, was whether this adjustment will have any effect on the nine-day waiting period.

Mr. Martin: Yes.

Mr. Fulton: What will that effect be?

Mr. Martin: It just reduces it; that is all.

Mr. Fulton: I think there are a number of members who are interested, and who would appreciate it if the minister would give us an answer to the question so that we can understand the situation.

An hon. Member: He does not know.

Mr. Martin: I am sorry if I did not make myself clear. That is the difficulty we get into when we do not have the details of the bill before us. I think it will be better all round if we wait until we have the actual bill before us. We will deal with that particular item in the bill, and I think you will find it more satisfactory for all purposes.

Mr. Fulton: I hope you will allow a latitude of discussion on that.

Mr. Martin: I shall be glad to hear it.

Mr. Knowles: There are one or two questions I want to ask, but before I ask them I should like to make this comment. During the discussion today we have made criticisms of the bill from this side of the house as to its inadequacy, and the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, the minister and others, have replied that this measure is not the answer to the unemployment problem, that it is just a case of further tailoring of the Unemployment Insurance Act. May I remind the minister, and those who have said this sort of thing, that the only reference in the program of the government for this session—in other words, in the speech from the throne—to anything it proposes to do about unemployment is to the effect that changes are to be made with respect to unemployment insurance. These members have said that this is not the solution to the unemployment problem, and in that respect they agree with us.

Well then, what is the government's solution? When do we get some answer to this pressing problem? If we are not getting that, surely we are only doing our duty to point out the gross inadequacies of this measure in terms of the small amounts workers are to receive, the small number who will receive them, and the limited period of time for which they will receive these benefits.

The question I want to put to the minister was put to him perhaps more than once during the discussion this afternoon. Did the unemployment insurance advisory committee have a chance to consider these proposals? I mean the major ones, the ones having to do with these four new classes, the fact that there is to be only an 80 per cent benefit for a certain number of days, and so on. Did the committee have these proposals before them and did they concur in the proposals that are now in this measure?

Mr. Martin: I cannot tell my hon. friend what the committee did. I know that the chairman of the committee was a member of an interdepartmental group and, along with the members of the unemployment insurance commission, sat in while there was a discussion about the principle of supplementary benefit payments.

Mr. Knowles: The minister knows as well as I do that is not a very satisfying answer. It is getting around the question without answering it yes or no. He also knows, if he has followed these matters in the house, that in discussing unemployment insurance matters we have made suggestions such as the one the hon. member for Lake Centre made this afternoon having to do with people who pay in for years and do not get any benefit when they are unemployed due to illness, and other suggestions about people who are sick after they go on benefit. The reply we always get from the Minister of Labour is that these matters will have to be referred to the unemployment insurance advisory committee. They are an important body when you have some hot potato you want to get rid of, but now when the government has a proposal to bring in that is inadequate it is pretty obvious they were not consulted at all.

Mr. Brooks: Unfortunately I was not here this afternoon, and I am not altogether clear on some points. This question may have been answered in my absence. As the minister knows, unemployment is perhaps worse in the province of New Brunswick than in any other part of Canada. It is in the lumber woods that we are having most of our difficulty. As I understand the minister, unless a man employed in the lumber woods was employed for ninety days previous to that in some insurable employment he would not receive unemployment insurance. Suppose he had only worked in the lumber woods for a month or a month and a half; unless he had ninety days employment in some insurable employment before that he would not receive the insurance. Is that correct?

Mr. Martin: I think I have already explained that two or three times. There is an implication in my hon. friend's question as to what we are going to do about eastern logging. I have said already that tomorrow I hope to be able to make a statement to the house in that connection.

An hon. Member: He does not know now.

Mr. Martin: I cannot let my hon. friend know now. There are four classes of people who will benefit from this supplementary benefit arrangement. One of these classes will be those who have exhausted their benefits. Although they have paid 180 contributions they have exhausted their benefits after March 31 last. Another group consists of those who have only made ninety contributions since March 31 last prior to making claim. Then there is another group who have worked ninety days within the last twelve months of the eighteen-month period, and then there is the group who have worked ninety days in a group just recently made insurable. Many of the persons whom my hon. friend has in mind would be covered by this measure.

Mr. Brooks: I should like to ask the minister about the case of a young man, for instance, who is employed in the fishing industry for ninety days. As is the custom in our province, fishermen and farmers work at seasonal employment in the woods. These men are not going to receive the benefits of this insurance at all. When the bill is considered it would seem to me that these are points as to which we could very well have new amendments. We are trying to suggest to the minister now some of the weaknesses of the act. I think matters of that sort should be taken under consideration because the present measure is going to be of very little benefit, so far as I can see, in helping the unemployment situation in the province of New Brunswick. I know it is not in the act, but it seems to me when we bring in a bill of this kind to assist men who are out of employment we should prepare a bill which will be of benefit to the men who really need it. That is the point I wish to make.

Mr. Martin: I can only say that under the first schedule of part II of the act my hon. friend will find that fishing is one of the excepted groups along with agriculture and other groups.

Mr. MacInnis: I want to ask the minister one or two questions about the advisory committee, but before I do so I wish to say a word about the insurance feature of the Unemployment Insurance Act. I think if we insist upon saying that everyone who contributes towards the fund must get something out of it, we are just being unrealistic. This is insurance against unemployment. If a person contributes to the act for thirty years and does not have to call upon the fund for benefits, it seems to me that it is his good fortune. It is a social arrangement where the fortunate person who continues in employment helps out the person who is not so fortunate. So much for that part of it.

We should always try to make sure that, when a person has paid into the unemployment insurance fund and then leaves that employment and goes into uninsurable employment, without a period of unemployment, then the insurance fund he has accumulated during the time he was contributing should not be lost to him. He should be able to take advantage of it at some other time. I do not know to what extent the contributor is protected against such an eventuality. I think we should see that he is protected so far as possible.

I should like to ask a question about the advisory committee. Who are the members of the advisory committee? What interests will the two new members represent? I understand that the members on the advisory committee represent either employer or employee interests, and I was wondering whether the minister could give that information. Is the advisory committee not important enough to refer amendments of this kind to it for its decision? If it is not that important, why should the advisory committee be enlarged?

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend asks a perfectly reasonable question. The purpose of the enlargement, I may say offhand, is to take in representatives of the railroad brotherhoods. At the moment, I cannot give the personnel of the committee. I could give the name of Mr. George Burt, and I know Mr. Mackintosh is the chairman. There are several others, and I have sent for a list of the names.

The advisory committee is a body which seeks to advise the commission in respect of the act. It is exactly what its name implies. It deals largely with the ways and means of improving the existing provisions of the act. For instance, it deals with such questions as the waiting day period. Quite a number of the amendments that are going to be introduced are amendments to the existing act which have been considered by the existing advisory committee and, in most instances, unanimously approved.

The supplementary benefit is an entirely new procedure. It is not something that arises out of the existing act, but is something that is supplementary to it. It is the sort of matter for which the government, after consideration by an interdepartmental committee—at which time the commission had an opportunity of making its point of view known—has to accept the responsibility, which responsibility the government is accepting.

Mr. Graydon: I should like to ask the minister a question about the contributions which are now being increased for certain insured classes. During the time the Unemployment Insurance Act was being considered in committee, a good deal of stress was laid on the actuarial position of the unemployment insurance fund. As the minister will perhaps recall, there were a number of alternate proposals which the government declined to accept, because they were trying to put the fund on what was known as a proper actuarial foundation. I am only speaking from memory now, but I think my memory is fairly clear, when I say that was one of the reasons advanced at one sitting for not including certain special groups in the original plan. It was felt it would disturb the actuarial soundness of the fund.

I take it that now the government has stepped into the picture it has, in some way, destroyed the actuarial position in which the fund was. When I say that, I am not suggesting I am opposed to it, because at this time I think that is essential. I do believe, however, if we are going to disturb the actuarial basis—

Mr. Martin: There is not going to be any disturbance whatsoever of this fund. The supplementary benefit payments will be taken care of in the way I have indicated, by premiums imposed on the employee and the employer, and the difference will be provided for out of the consolidated fund. The insurance fund now amounts to $589,642,210.67, and will not in any way be depreciated.

Mr. Graydon: I do not think the minister understands my point. Perhaps I did not state it clearly. It seems to me the very fact that the government has now decided to guarantee the fund indicates that the actuarial position will be changed. One thing that disturbed me particularly about the bill, as described by the minister in the resolution stage, was that the workers are now going to have to pay one cent a day more than they were paying before; that would apply to industry as well. If the unemployment situation increases as it has, and becomes general, I am wondering whether or not the government is fair in asking the worker to put up that extra money to cover a nation-wide condition, instead of having the government take care of that by guaranteeing the fund. If the actuarial position is being disturbed, then it seems to me that the government is going a long way in asking the workingmen of Canada to put up another cent to cover a condition for which I think this federal government has some responsibility.

Mr. Martin: I can only repeat, because it is important that I should repeat, that the actuarial soundness of the fund, in the opinion of those who are by training and experience qualified to judge—I mention no less a person than Mr. Watson, the actuary, and others—is not being disturbed in any way.

In regard to the other question raised by the hon. member about imposing a cent a day on the worker and employer, all we are doing is simply maintaining the insurance principle. Upon reflection, I think the hon. member will agree that is the thing to do.

Mr. Johnston: I should like to direct a question to the minister, but it is one that has already been asked by the hon. member for Vancouver East. Where a man has been employed in an insurable job, and has been paying into the unemployment insurance fund for a number of years, and then takes a non-insurable position or starts to work for himself, what protection is there for this man's investment? He may have contributed for four or five years, and then finds himself in a non-insurable job. Is there any protection of the money he has paid into the fund?

Mr. Martin: That man has been buying insurance, and that is what he has obtained. I believe that sort of person is in the fortunate position mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver East; he did not have to use the unemployment insurance fund, but he was protected.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): I just wanted to make an observation with regard to the actuarial position which has just been mentioned. I think the minister will agree with me that it is not precisely the same as it was when this plan was inaugurated. In other words, what I am trying to say is this. The moneys that your employees put into that fund find their way into the consolidated revenue fund. The Minister of National Revenue shakes his head, saying no. I hope he is right. Even if it does, it would be on a sound basis. I should like to see tabled in this house a statement showing where this $589,642,210.67 actually is, not that I am afraid that it will not be immediately available when it is called on, but if the record is checked carefully—

Mr. Martin: I think it is in the public accounts.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Yes, it is in the public accounts; that is quite true. Our good friend, Mr. Graham Towers, whom I should like to call as a witness, made sure it went into the public accounts. But the public accounts, when they are all added together, show overwhelming surpluses. Let us remember that $589,630,000 of this money does not belong to the government of Canada. Let us be ordinary practical bookkeepers. It belongs not to the government of Canada but to our employees. Some day, and I hope it is not too soon, it will have to be paid back to those of us who have served industry and what not. Perhaps that day may not be too far distant. It will be paid back rapidly, and when the public accounts are dissipated to the extent of half a billion dollars or more we and the people of Canada, on looking at the financial statement of Canada's affairs, will not be quite as happy as we are today, with revenues which are so high. I do not mention this matter particularly to be critical. I mention it merely that we might be sensible about the position in which we find ourselves. I do not want in any way to detract from the necessity of unemployment insurance; but our bookkeeping system should be of a kind that would show the exact position, so that we would not be carried away by the almost overwhelming, I would say, superfluity of funds, some of which, to the extent of $589 million, is not our money. It belongs to those of our employees who each week have had so much deducted from them. I think the minister could explain to the house that with the advent of Graham Towers our bookkeeping system was changed just a little bit. A great number of members of this chamber have a wrong idea with regard to the surpluses that we, on the whole, have in Canada. We have a bad habit of carrying into those surpluses some of the moneys that belong to some of our employees, in the same way as many men perhaps carry some of the money which belongs to their wives in their own account. I think we should tell the public the position and be quite frank about it. I think we should tell them that that is not our money, but that it belongs to those who have served industry and otherwise since the advent of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Mr. Martin: I am sure my hon. friend would be the last one who would want to convey the impression that the situation was otherwise. This is a trust account.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Quite so.

Mr. Martin: It is administered by three trustees.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Quite so.

Mr. Martin: The trustees are the deputy minister of finance, the governor of the Bank of Canada and Mr. M. M. Maclean.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Quite so.

Mr. Martin: My information is that there is about $17 million in cash, for obvious purposes, and that the rest is in government securities. That is a trust account. That is the way it should be. That is the way the act provides it should be, and there is no intention on the part of anyone that it should be treated otherwise. That money belongs to those for whom it is held in trust; and I know that no one would want to give the impression that the situation is not as I have stated it.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): I merely rose to emphasize the fact that the money does not belong to the government but belongs to those who have served industry.

Mr. Graydon: May I direct one question to the minister, arising out of the practical arrangements to be made for payment of these additional amounts on March 1, as I understand the intention to be.

Mr. Martin: As quickly as possible.

Mr. Graydon: What notice have the unemployment insurance offices all over Canada received with respect to the government's intention to make this change? It will be a tremendous burden upon the offices unless sufficient notice has been given by the government of the intention to make the change, and I am hoping that it has not just been given within the last few days; because, if it has, then of course the difficulty with respect to the men getting the cheques will be just that much greater.

Mr. Martin: We could not say what parliament would do. That decision depends upon the decision of this house. But preparatory steps have been taken to minimize any delay.

Mr. Graydon: Does the minister expect that the first cheques will be issued under the new scheme on March 1?

Mr. Martin: Just as quickly as possible. I would not want to specify a date.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Martin thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 8, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read a second time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Knowles: Next sitting.

Mr. Martin: I wonder if we could proceed with the bill now?

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) and I, if not others, had a conversation with the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) last night in which he agreed that, with all these technical details, it would not be unreasonable for us to ask that the rules be observed at this point. Let us get the bill printed and into our hands before we are asked to proceed further.

Mr. Martin: Tomorrow, then. My hon. friend is very helpful, and I recognize that fact.

Mr. Speaker: Next sitting of the house.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Wednesday, February 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. F. H. Larson for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, may I join those who have spoken in this debate in congratulation of the mover (Mr. Larson) and the seconder (Mr. Dumas) of the address. In addition I venture to congratulate the leaders of the various parties in this house upon the excellent speeches which they have made on this occasion. I was particularly pleased that the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) spent a good portion of the time allotted to him in advocating federal aid for education, a cause to which I have myself in the past given some time and effort, and one which I hope to promote further in the future. But it is not with that subject that I wish to deal tonight.

The speech from the throne was just what one would have expected. Its failings have been advanced by various opposition speakers who have preceded me. To me it was a vague admission that the state of things in the nation was not quite as it should be, and the pious hope that the deterioration would not continue. Apparently we must wait and see. We are, forsooth, not the masters of our own destiny, but rather its victims. There is little sign of action on the part of the government to guide it.

I hope to say a word or two on foreign affairs. After the speech of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), one feels somewhat diffident in approaching that subject; but my courage is bolstered by the fact that, as I have been thinking, it is no mean thing to be a free member of a free parliament possessing a right equal to that given to all others, to express freely one's own ideas in this House of Commons, whether those ideas may be considered right or wrong.

It has often occurred to me that a very small proportion of the members in this house do discuss foreign affairs, or in fact many matters outside our own boundaries, even when these matters pertain to our own affairs and have a direct bearing upon them. The average member appears to shun such debates. I have sought in my own mind for a reason for that. Is it perhaps a relic of the long period in which our international diplomacy was handled almost entirely by the mother country, Great Britain? Can it be that, awed by the wealth and power of our immediate neighbour, we are diffident about advancing independent views on international matters, letting the United States speak to some extent for us? Is it perhaps an insularity produced by our geographical position and the fact of our remoteness from the ferment of Europe and of Asia and of being surrounded, as we are, by two great oceans? Well, sir, insularity in these days is a difficult position to maintain. The impact of world affairs must be felt even by those who would avoid them or who have no interest in them. World problems have become our problems.

I have said that there is little discussion of international affairs in this house. Such debate as there is is largely in the form of pronouncements made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. We listen with an awe invoked perhaps by envy, or perhaps to some degree by the recognition of his greater opportunities to obtain information upon those particular subjects. But let me say, sir, that we must not, with all due respect to the minister, leave the evolution of Canada's foreign policy to the mind of one man, however brilliant that mind or that man may be.

The recent speech of the Secretary of State for External Affairs was to me a disappointment. I have no doubt that it was a disappointment too to the diplomats who crowded into the galleries to hear him. It was a delightful and interesting travelogue by a genial globe traveller. It might just as well have been given by the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew), who shared the minister's journeyings.

A moment ago I spoke of the minister's speeches as pronouncements. Well, in this speech there was certainly no pronouncement, no announcement of a firm decision, no statements of government policies. Are these decisions, if any have been made, to be clothed in that same cloak of secrecy in which the government has been so successful in wrapping certain other matters? Or could it be that this Canada has perhaps no independent foreign policy and must wait until that policy is formulated for her by other governments? We would have liked to hear what decision has been made in regard to the recognition or the non-recognition of China, upon which an early statement had been promised. We would have liked to be given a gleam of hope for betterment in what we call the cold war situation, and to have been told that some action had been taken by the government upon which such a hope could have been based.

Throughout the speech there was one welcome note. The minister said that he and the government realized the need for supporting with sympathy and with material aid the new nations of the East to the end that they may preserve their independence and their freedom, and here I might suggest investment of sterling which we can obtain for our surplus products and which we could invest in those countries. But again apparently no firm decisions have been made or at least announced as to the amount of our commitment in that direction.

The minister made the point that our commitments in the East would necessarily be limited by the fact of our commitment in the Atlantic sphere. In the light of the minister's statement that the centre of gravity of world affairs has moved now to eastern Asia, one might ask if there had been any review of commitments in the western sphere. We should like to have heard how successful in that sphere we have been in promoting the objects for which those commitments were given.

There are feelings of unease in the country in regard to that. The government's opinion, and the opinion I think of the great majority of Canadians, is that those commitments were necessary as a security measure against possible aggression, and as an active step towards promotion of economic co-operation and world peace. There is a small body of opinion —and I am glad that it is small—which would oppose any co-operation, through their desire to aid a foreign power. Their numbers, as I have said, are fortunately few. Then there is a third and honest and loyal group of thinking people who are worried lest our commitments may involve us, not in co-operation and in human understanding, but in a struggle not necessarily based upon ideologies, but upon the rivalry of two powerful nationalistic and sovereign states. We would have liked some reassurances which might have been for us a renewal of our faith. So much for the speech of the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

The speech from the throne too was disappointing, in that it lacked any constructive proposal for the improvement of what we call loosely the international situation. An absence of expressed optimism is easy to understand. For indeed the situation there does continue, if one may accept the opinion of the press, to deteriorate. We as a nation seem to have no solution, and we are pinning a shaky faith to an increased and crippling program of defence.

The minds of the peoples of the world, sir, are possessed with deadly fear, the fear of war. This fear is shared equally by the people of my constituency and of my province. The people of England are thinking about the same thing. Mr. Churchill knew that very well when he introduced into one of his election speeches the other day a promise that if he were elected he would try to do something about bringing about a cessation of these war preparations which presage disaster. He would have been the last man to have suggested discussions with the Soviet union at the highest level, unless he had known that there was in the hearts of the people a response to that desire and that call for peace. The people of England have much to fear from another war. They know that in such an event their little island will simply be an advance air station, an advance depot and air base for one of the two mighty antagonists; and as such they can be only a target of the life-destroying missiles of the other.

Dare one in these times, in this nation and in this assembly, lift up his voice in the cause of peace, without having his motives misunderstood? Dare one suggest the truism that war settles nothing permanently? Dare one warn this house that, with the atomic bomb and the hydrogen bomb extant, war would be the ultimate disaster? Dare one say that it would promote the spread of the very scourge which we now by our every effort oppose? To me it is an awful thing that men can even contemplate the use of the destructive weapons which they have under their hand. We are not in these days training great armies of fighting men. They have become obsolete. War has been robbed of any of the manly attributes that it might ever have had.

No, we do not train infantry soldiers any more; we put our faith in scientists and technicians. And by that very fact we are admitting that war in the future is to lose those manly attributes, if it ever could be said to have had any, and become a conflict as to which side can destroy first and most completely the civilian populations of unarmed men, women and little children.

Sir, these are gruesome things to contemplate, but I think once in a while the truth about them should be said. I have pictured to the house Hiroshima to the nth degree. The survivors will be the winners and there might not be too many of them to get ready for the next contest.

Someone, I have forgotten who, upon being asked what would be the weapons in the third world war, said that he did not know what the weapons of the third world war would be, but he did think that the weapons of the fourth world war would likely be bows and arrows.

Somehow or other the people of the world will have to get together and solve this problem. Somehow or other mutual distrust and misunderstanding, among peoples and among nations, will have to be dispelled. I am familiar, as we all are, with the attempts which we have made in that direction. I make no excuse for any government that has been the means of blocking those attempts, nations that indeed have shut off their populations from intercourse with the rest of the peoples of the world.

I, myself, believe in freedom of communication, freedom of discussion, freedom to choose for ourselves any form of government that we wish. In short, I believe in democracy—political, social and economic. But my whole life—and this has been the experience of most hon. members in the house—has consisted of two great cycles, each composed of three parts. Each of those parts has been induced by the one which has preceded it. They are all interdependent, one upon the other. Two great cycles, I say, or a series of the three states—depression, war and prosperity. And each of them is the cause of the one which follows upon it.

At what stage of that cycle do we now find ourselves? Well, hon. members will have to decide that for themselves. But the year 1912 and the year 1929 keep intruding themselves upon my own thinking as corresponding to the present time. We must somehow or other learn to break that cycle. It would be a disastrous thing if people were to accept such a cycle as necessary and inevitable. And it would be a greater tragedy if our young people were to accept war as a necessary prelude to the good life, to the extent that when faced with a state of depression they might become reconciled to accepting, in the course of things, war as an alternative.

The problem of peace, at the moment apparently insoluble, must be solved. I know not what such a solution may involve. It may involve some sacrifice of national sovereignty. It may ultimately involve some form of world government. We have been called upon many times and oft to make sacrifices in the cause of war. Someone, somewhere, somehow—probably some nation—may be called upon to make sacrifices in the cause of peace. And when I speak of peace I do not do so in any sentimental or emotional way. I do not mean peace at any price. I am well aware that a state of peace can be a state of uneasy mistrust and suspicion.

The peace which I hope for must be based upon law and order, and that will have to be on an international level. I should like to ask Canada to take some initiative in the pursuit of a peace of that kind.

There are many people in this country who think that the diplomacy of our own Department of External Affairs is guided by the corresponding government department in the United States. The fact that we are allied with the United States for purposes of defence certainly does not, nor should it, imply that we should follow the lead of that nation in all matters, nor that we should imitate it slavishly in its decisions upon international relations. Personally I have no wish that Canada should become, either in peace or in war, the tail of the American comet. Perhaps it may sound ridiculous that I, in my humble place, should pass judgment upon a nation of 180 million people; but I venture the suggestion that the United States has given evidence of some naïveté in its foreign policy which has not been evident in the foreign policy of other nations—and I am thinking notably of Great Britain. I am thinking of how Great Britain handled the problem of India, bowing to the inevitable, and at the right time and, may I say, under circumstances which left little if any of the old bitterness as between what had been master country and colony, but rather left a feeling of friendship and co-operation for the years to come.

I am considering, and I am sure the Asiatic nations, too, have been considering, the support by the United States of the unscrupulous regime of Chiang Kai-shek. I do not know whether the influence of the United States has prevented us in any way up to the present time from recognizing the government of China. I think we have been mistaken in postponing so long such recognition. I do not know whether the government even now is prepared to recognize the Chinese government, and a pronouncement from our Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) is in my opinion long overdue.

While the revolution in China is communist-led, in my opinion it is not a communist revolution as such. A friend of mine who was in a position to follow closely and to judge what has happened returned recently from that country and he tells me that until a short time ago there were groups representing distinct divisions in Chinese governmental opinion and there was a possibility that one of those divisions might lead the government of China away from Stalinist affiliation. The picture from the democratic standpoint seems to have been darkened in recent days by the news that a comprehensive trade treaty has been signed by the Chinese with a group of iron curtain nations. I wonder if our tardiness in the recognition of the government of China has had anything to do with the opportunity which another great power has grasped to make a treaty of that sort. Perhaps once again it is a case of being too late. Perhaps we have played into the hands of Moscow.

My friends will tell me that I do not know anything about it. Admittedly, I do not know much about it, and I can only use such judgment as I have and apply it to the facts which I can ascertain. So far as this government is concerned, the matter of external affairs has not been one about which we have been taken into its confidence.

The white and western races of the world have been none too wise in their treatment of Asiatics. We have looked upon them consistently as being people to whom we could sell something or from whom we could extract cheap labour. Up to the present time we have not devoted our energies to sharing with them a better life. If we are honest with ourselves we must admit that never in our own minds have we granted to them the status of equality.

Now the western world is in a different position. The western world is now under the cool and critical scrutiny of the millions in the east. They have looked upon our support of the oppressor in China. They are considering our refusal to recognize that government. They know of the tardiness in making a permanent settlement with the great country of Japan. Many of the eastern races have won their fight against foreign domination and now they are at the crossroads and they have to decide which way they are to go. They have to decide what they are going to do with their new-found freedom.

India, Indo-China, Pakistan, Burma, Malaya: they are all looking on. They are studying democracy as we practise it. This democracy of ours is under the scrutiny of people who have never had an opportunity to practise it, who have never known its blessings and its satisfactions, and can judge it only by its effect. They want to know if it feeds the hungry. They want to know if it uplifts the downtrodden, if it cares for the sick, if it guarantees an equality of opportunity to its adherents. Let us hope that we have not been tried and found wanting, for it may be later than we think.

We have better weapons than the atom bomb with which to deal with people. We have better weapons than the hydrogen bomb with which to handle communism, which nearly always is the result of poverty, hunger, misery and social injustice. Perhaps even at this late date we can set out to win the friendship, respect and gratitude of the eastern people. Either we shall do that or we shall continue to drive them into the arms of Soviet Russia.

Asia looks at our attempts to solve the problem of surpluses of food and other material wealth, and our general acceptance up to now of the idea that the waste of war is necessary to do away with embarrassing surpluses. They can tell us how to put those surpluses to better use. How will they look upon the proposals being made in many quarters that the production of consumer goods, particularly of agricultural foodstuffs, shall be curtailed? How will they look upon proposals for the curtailment of production while their children, and perhaps some of ours, are starving for lack of the necessities of life?

I noted what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) had to say the other day in his speech when he advocated the promotion of schemes within this country designed to increase that same consumer production. One of the things which he was advocating was irrigation. Irrigation will produce foodstuffs in great abundance, but the leader of the opposition did not suggest how any surpluses were to be got rid of in a world which is already beginning to be cluttered up with surpluses.

The dividing line between poverty and plenty always appears quite suddenly; there is no space between the extremes. We come through a period when we are all short of goods, and then suddenly, just like that, we have more goods than we know what to do with. They are there upon the shelves and the only solution to that particular problem we have evolved up to the present is to destroy as many of them as possible in the process of war, or to substitute for those unsalable consumer goods weapons which are destroyed but which absorb the human energy of the worker.

I take it that the leader of the opposition is not prepared to offer a solution for the disposal of this increased production. It is an unfortunate fact that every country in the world, even those not so highly industrialized as our own, under the queer economic set-up now extant wants to sell and on the other hand no one is willing to buy or has the money, or the right kind of money, with which to make purchases. Our own refusal to accept money or goods has forced Europe into the uneconomic production of grain and other foodstuffs. Every government in western Europe, and for all I know in eastern Europe as well, although it is difficult to obtain information from that source, at the moment is subsidizing its own farming industry. They are helping the farmers with free chemical fertilizers, with farm loans, with advice from the extension departments in their universities. This is being done for one particular purpose, so that the countries in question may become as nearly as possible self-sustaining in the matter of food supplies. These people have not forgotten the hunger of the last war; they have not forgotten the devastation that fell from the skies upon their fields, and they are not unaware of the threat of war that overshadows them now. All this forms the main impetus for the process which I have just described.

Thus it is that the production of grain, notably wheat, dairy products, eggs and meat is climbing steadily and the need for imports is decreasing proportionately. Some of those countries which will be self-sustaining before very long, and are almost self-sustaining now, are Denmark—notably Denmark—Belgium, France, Holland, Sweden and Eire and last but not least Britain herself. If you think of these countries you will remember that some of them have been the best markets for some of our own products. I am afraid that they will be so no longer. To whom shall we sell our goods? Nobody seems to know. The purchasing power of our own people is diminishing because of unemployment. The people of the United States normally produce surpluses of the very things which we produce ourselves. That nation, instead of becoming our purchasing customer, is becoming our rival in the sale of the things which we have available for export.

I take it that our United States friends are often misquoted, or perhaps the sensational journalism to which we have become accustomed quotes those sayings of public men in any country which are startling and dramatic. Thus I am in no position to judge whether or not United States opinion is correctly reflected in the reported outbursts of some of its public men. Some of them seem to hold opinions which I hope the government leaders of our country do not share. The secretary of defence of the United States, Mr. Johnson, is reported to have stated on a recent occasion, in language more vigorous than judicious, that "we should lick hell out of the Russians." Granting provocation, and I do grant provocation, I suggest that is a type of bravado in which one should not indulge. I do not want to lick hell out of the Russians and I do not want anyone to lick hell out of me. May I respectfully suggest that licking hell out of anybody is not the way to defeat communism. I suppose we licked hell out of Germany. I would ask you, sir, whether the fact that we licked hell out of Germany has decreased the number of communists in that country or has increased them.

What has been the over-all result of trying to lick communism by force in Germany or elsewhere in the world? What kind of people become communists?

An hon. Member: C.C.F.'ers.

Mr. Knight: I will tell you about that in a minute. My hon. Liberal friends from Saskatchewan can never forget that one thing which occupies their every moment asleep and awake. I should like to speak seriously for a moment if I may. What kind of people become communists? It is precisely the people who take a licking, whether that licking be spiritual, economic or physical. Communism is the result of poverty, social injustice, hunger and despair. You will see why I am discussing this in connection with foreign affairs, and I am thinking now particularly of the eastern nations to which I referred at the beginning of my remarks. War produces those very conditions, does it not? It is to be hoped that the discovery five or six months ago that the Russians have atomic bombs in their possession, and that the general realization of the awfulness of the latest weapon of total extermination, the hydrogen bomb, will bring about a new approach to the matter of the international control of such weapons. When we find Einstein declaring, as he did in New York a week or two ago, that if the H-bomb is developed annihilation of any life on earth is within the range of technical possibility, then it is time to do some thinking and to act upon the thought.

The possession of the hydrogen bomb will give no security to the United States, Canada or anyone else. The United States people either have not now or will not long continue to have a monopoly of that particular weapon. Its creation is a menace to all the peoples of the earth, and efforts should be renewed to have it and all weapons of that degree of frightfulness—you can include them all so far as I am concerned—outlawed by all nations by United Nations organization agreement.

Might I urge the Canadian government that it might well initiate, or support, if it has been initiated, a new approach or any approach to this problem which might have a chance of a successful conclusion. Inspection and control of weapons, within the machinery of the United Nations, would seem to be implicit in any agreement, and by a successful conclusion I mean one which would accomplish the aim of making it impossible for either side in this particular struggle to use such weapons as I have been discussing.

The other day a former United States secretary of state, James F. Byrnes, declared that socialism and communism are identical perils. Perhaps I will now answer indirectly the interjections of my hon. friends on my right but who are to the left of Mr. Speaker. Muddy thinking of that type as evidenced by the statement of Mr. Byrnes, the secretary of state, who declared that socialism and communism are identical perils, muddy thinking of that type on the part of North American leaders will ill serve them in their professed attempt to save western Europe from communism, a Europe in which there remains hardly a capitalist nation and only one fascist nation of any importance. The only political force active at this moment against communism between the iron curtain and the Atlantic coast of Spain is the socialism of the democratic socialist nations such as Belgium, Norway, Sweden and Great Britain. Such socialist nations stand on guard for democracy in the Europe of today. I doubt if there is a member in the house who can deny that. I mean an intelligent member who is prepared to face the issue and debate it intelligently.

The communism of Moscow has never practised democratic socialist principles and has suppressed them everywhere in the territory which it has overrun. There is a real danger that we are going to miss the boat again. There is a real danger that the people of the United States may be no better informed than is their former secretary of state, and they might consent to an isolation of themselves from these groups which up to the present have succeeded in retaining their freedom. Withdrawal of the support of the North American nations from these groups would be disastrous to the cause in which we are all involved.

Neither the United States government of the day, nor the Canadian government of the day, may agree with the political philosophy of the majority of the people in those countries, but what is the alternative to socialism in those countries? Do we desire that alternative? One of the best ways to bring about that alternative, is to belittle and neglect the friends and potential allies who are organized to oppose it. One thing that those countries need is hope. As the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) said yesterday, and I use his words, most of all they need hope. They need friends even more than they need American dollars.

The existence of these misunderstandings, such as has been illustrated by the interjection of the hon. member and such as have been shown by the former United States secretary of state, might well provide a mission and a challenge for our own Secretary of State for External Affairs. The correction of these blunders, the interpretation of the ideas of various people to men of different political philosophies, but united by a passionate desire for political freedom, might well present a challenge to him.

The other day I read that a slogan had been adopted by a group of Republicans in the United States. It was this, "Liberty versus socialism". It is the same kind of thing that one might hear from my hon. friend. It is the same kind of thing you might see in an election pamphlet, but that you would not take very seriously.

Where is Britain today? Where is the Britain who has proven on many blood-soaked battlefields her love of liberty and the willingness of her sons to die for it? In the aftermath of the last holocaust, Britain adopted democratic socialism as the only method of preserving the liberty of her people. I fancy she is doing it again tonight, as her election returns come in. Irrespective of the result of the election which took place today, I say that by so doing she was able to accomplish that object at that time, and since then has advanced some distance at least along the path of freedom, social, political and economic.

It has been the great genius of the British people that they were able to reconcile that love of liberty, that love of freedom, with the attainment of social and material benefit over the last five years. That these advances are of a permanent nature is generally conceded; indeed, that fact is admitted by all, even by those who would form a government in England alternative to the present one. At the moment, the likelihood of that alternate government being formed is not very great. I say that even if there had been a Conservative government elected in England today, that government would not dare to ask England, in her present mood, to take one retrograde step upon the path of progress which she has been pursuing.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I was surprised and disappointed when the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Gregg) yesterday stated that it was not his intention to set up a special committee on veterans' affairs at this session. During the past fifteen years that I have been in this house, it has always been the custom to set up that committee during the first session of each new parliament. That was the case in 1936, 1940-41 and 1945-46. I believe there will be a good deal of resentment amongst the veterans when they hear that this committee is not to be set up. They were taking it for granted that the committee would be set up at this session to deal with a number of their problems. They will wonder why the government should now consider their problems of less importance than they have been considered in the past.

I believe that anyone reading the speech from the throne, and the speeches of a number of Liberal members who have spoken in the house this session, might easily come to the conclusion that the blame for the loss of Canadian markets in Europe rests outside Canada. I would say that anyone who will face this situation with an unbiased mind must admit that a large share of the blame rests squarely on the shoulders of the Canadian government. I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Stewart) yesterday blame the loss of markets upon the devaluation of sterling by Britain. I do not want to be charged with misrepresenting what he said, so I shall quote his words, which are to be found on page 146 of Hansard:

> As hon. members know, the markets were lost in England to a certain extent not by the action of this government but by the action of the British government itself, and by an action which Sir Stafford Cripps on many occasions said he would not take; I refer to the devaluing of the pound. That is why the markets were lost. There is no question about that. Why then try to pass the buck to the government?

Well, Mr. Speaker, there is a very large question, because that is not a statement of fact. If the hon. member will read a speech that was made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) before the Canadian chamber of commerce in London, England, in 1948, he will find that the Minister of Agriculture was complaining over the fact that our contracts were being cut down; we were losing markets. That was nine months before devaluation, so it cannot be charged that devaluation had anything to do with that.

Neither can it be charged that Sir Stafford Cripps voluntarily brought about devaluation. Time and again he had stated he did not intend to bring about devaluation, but what happened? For over a year in the United States, and to a lesser extent in Canada, and by the international monetary fund, a strong campaign of propaganda was carried on to make people believe that devaluation was inevitable. People were told that the only way Britain could expand her exports to the dollar areas was by reducing the price of her goods. It was stated that the price of British goods was so high they could not get into the United States market and, therefore, Britain would have to devalue the pound. After some time people believed that the thing was inevitable, that devaluation was bound to come about. Consequently, many of the great importing firms deferred their purchases from Britain waiting for the day when this devaluation would come about. That, of course, accentuated the dollar shortage and created a crisis in Britain which finally forced devaluation. By no stretch of the imagination, therefore, can it be charged that the loss of markets is due to Great Britain's action in devaluing sterling.

During the last session of parliament the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) charged that many of us on this side of the house who were asking for a more realistic approach to international trade problems were adopting a pessimistic attitude. He said we were confusing realism with pessimism. I believe that the past few months have shown that our fears were well founded, and that the minister was either indulging in wishful thinking or living in a fool's paradise.

If that is not evident to the minister or to the government, I may say that it is quite evident to the farm organizations and to the farmers who, as a result of the loss of markets, are facing quite a drastic reduction in income. Today, with unemployment figures climbing and the income of agriculture being reduced as a result of the loss of markets, discontent and fear is spreading throughout the country; that fear is with regard to what is going to happen in the future. I would say that the speeches that have recently been made by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. McCubbin) and the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mutch) have not helped to create confidence; they have merely added insult to injury.

With the world becoming divided into two armed camps we cannot afford to allow fear and discontent to undermine the morale of the people in the western camp, as a result of poverty expanding in the face of potential plenty. The situation would be different if there were an actual lack of resources in the world to provide for its needs. But today we are faced with this situation. Certain countries are talking about cutting down their production because of the lack of markets while at the same time people of many countries are facing starvation. It seems to me that the tragedy of this whole question is that back in the years 1944 and 1945 it was crystal clear that the international financial policies that this government were supporting were bound to lead to the present situation of a so-called dollar crisis. Plenty of warnings were sounded, by various organizations in this country and others, as to what would happen if we continued to follow that road. Certainly this group in this house in 1945 did everything in their power to convince the government that, if they followed out the policies they were sponsoring at that time, the inevitable result would be a falling off in production as a result of the loss of foreign markets.

At the end of the war we were faced with two main problems. First of all, there was the need to bring about the reconversion of wartime industries to peacetime production and also the need of rehabilitation of the devastated areas. In the second place, there was the need to provide for the distribution of the production of nations, once reconversion and rehabilitation had taken place. I think everybody would agree that, as to the first problem, we have made good progress. Production in this country is up to a high level, and even in Europe I understand that production is about 20 per cent higher than it was prior to the war. But we have not made any progress whatsoever in solving the other problem, that of getting surplus production to people who need it. It is exactly the same problem we faced between the two wars, during the hungry thirties. We failed to solve the problem at that time, and we had to wait until the war came along, when large markets were created, to be able to get out of that situation. But today our problem is far greater than it was in the years between the two wars, because our powers of production today have greatly increased.

I do not want to labour this point, but just let me remind the house of the post-war financial program that was not only supported but actually sponsored by this government. In 1944 certain international financial proposals for financing the post-war period were presented before the reconstruction committee of this house. In 1945 the Bretton Woods agreement was placed before this house, that is the proposal to set up the international monetary fund and the international bank for reconstruction and development. Since that time I have heard many people state that it was not the purpose of these institutions to provide for the entire financial needs of international trade in the post-war period but that they were set up only to provide a breathing spell. It is interesting to note what John W. Snyder, secretary of the treasury of the United States and chairman of the board of governors of the international bank for reconstruction and development, stated at the first session in 1946. His words were as follows:

> The fund and bank were designed to meet both the immediate post-war and the longer-term monetary and financial needs of the world.

That was the purpose as stated by Mr. Snyder. I think that everybody would admit today that those two institutions have failed to provide for the monetary needs of the world; not only have they failed, but they have failed miserably.

In 1945 we criticized the international monetary fund on the ground that it had a definite pro-creditor bias. It was supposed to provide for the stabilization and the balancing of trade in the world, but it placed on the debtor nation the full responsibility for bringing about that balance of trade and placed absolutely no responsibility or obligation upon the creditor nation to play its part. It is true that a debtor nation that is unable to meet its payments can obtain foreign exchange from the international monetary fund in exchange for its own currency. But if that nation is unable to redeem its currency that is held by the fund in excess of its quota, that country is obliged to pay an expanding rate of interest. The rate of interest increases every year until it reaches the figure of 5 per cent. Once the rate of interest reaches 5 per cent, the international monetary fund is permitted to charge that country any rate of interest it likes.

I wonder how any member in this house would like to sign an agreement whereby he guarantees to pay any rate of interest his creditor names in the future, if he is not able to meet his commitments. I do not think any member of this house would be prepared to sign an agreement of that kind. Many nations in the soft currency area were not anxious to sign it, but they were forced to do so, as the Bretton Woods agreement was made the price of help given to them by the United States of America. There would not be the same danger involved in a nation's incurring a debt to the fund if some obligation was placed upon the creditor nation to buy goods from the importing nation. The importing nation would then be able to secure the foreign exchange necessary to redeem the holdings of its currency held by the fund. But in view of the fact that no obligation is placed on the creditor nation to buy goods from the importing nation, the debtor nation is therefore in an uncertain and unfortunate position.

We therefore repeatedly warned that the implementation of the Bretton Woods agreement would breed a program of self-sufficiency within the soft-currency countries; and of course that is exactly what is happening today. In an endeavour to balance their trade, the soft-currency countries are steadily curtailing their imports from the dollar area. They have no other alternative. We today urge, as we have consistently urged in the past, that we recognize that the true purpose of international trade is the exchange of goods and services as between nations on a basis of mutual advantage. Therefore, since the only currency required to buy the exports of the sterling area is sterling, we should accept that in payment of our exports.

We have also advocated the setting up of an international clearing house, upon which credits held in one country could be exchanged for credits in another. It is interesting to note that today there are many organizations now advocating a somewhat similar procedure. The London chamber of commerce of England, probably one of the oldest institutions of its kind, an organization that has had more experience in international trade probably than any other organization in the world, have for long advocated such a procedure. Now we find that farm organizations in Canada, in the United States, and in other countries are advocating a somewhat similar procedure. The international federation of agriculture producers and the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and the commodity experts of FAO are now advocating the setting up of an international commodity clearing house, which in many respects is similar to the international exchange which we have been advocating in the past.

In his speech the Secretary of State for External Affairs referred to the sterling situation. I want to quote his remarks, which are found at page 135 of Hansard:

> We have always contended, however, that the sterling area as we know it today should be regarded as a transitional stage on the way to a trading system where currencies will be convertible and where exchange controls and quantitative restrictions will be drastically reduced.

[Mr. Quelch.]

I would say that the achievement of that goal can only be brought about by the dollar area being willing to accept exports from the sterling area in payment for their exports. I would say that that is the only long-term solution. True, the United States of America and Canada can make foreign investments in soft-currency countries but that would be a short-term solution. I say it cannot be regarded as a long-term solution, because finally we shall have to accept exports from the sterling area to pay the interest on our investments in addition to their exports in payment for our exports. Therefore on the long-term basis it merely aggravates the situation because we would then have to accept an unfavourable balance of trade in order to make it possible for the sterling area to balance their payments.

I was very much interested in the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), because I think he dealt with this thing in a very straightforward and frank way when referring to the question of the convertibility of currency. I quote his statement, which is to be found on page 51 of Hansard:

> The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) talked today about the reasonableness of making currency convertible. The difficulty is not with respect to the converting of currency, but is rather with respect to the exchange of goods. Trade is not the passing of pieces of paper from one person to another. Trade resolves itself into the exchange of commodities; and the difficulties about the non-convertibility of exchange arise from the fact that there have not been commodities which could be delivered to us in exchange for our commodities exported to the United Kingdom.

I agree entirely with the first part of the statement. Of course the second part is not entirely correct in so far as the present situation is concerned. It was true in regard to the situation immediately after the war; but it is not correct today to say the reason that Britain has an unfavourable balance of trade is that she has not got goods to export to us. There are many goods that Britain is able to export to us, but we are not prepared to accept them. Furthermore, let me point out that it has not always been the policy of this government to accept exports from Britain in payment for our exports. Our policy in the past has been to insist that Britain pay for our exports in dollars. In order that there be no doubt about that let me quote from a debate that took place back in 1946 when Mr. Ilsley was Minister of Finance. At that time we were discussing our loan to Britain. At page 764 of Hansard of that year Mr. Ilsley said:

> We must be able to use the proceeds of our exports to the United Kingdom and the continent of Europe in paying our own bills and debts in the United States.

In other words, we must be permitted to demand payment for our exports to Britain in dollars in order that we may pass these dollars on to the United States to make up our deficit. Then I asked Mr. Ilsley this question, which may be found at page 919 of Hansard:

> Will Canada be prepared to accept goods from the United Kingdom in payment of loans? How will the United Kingdom maintain convertibility of the pound if Canada and the United States do not provide the United Kingdom with dollars by purchasing British goods to the extent of the British credit?

I had pointed out that in view of the fact that we were making loans to Britain then, in the future not only would Britain have to export to us goods to pay for our exports, but, in addition, would have to export to us goods to pay interest; so the net result would be that we would have to be willing to accept an unfavourable balance of trade in the future. Mr. Ilsley replied:

> It is not necessary that there should be adverse balance of payments between Canada and the United Kingdom in order to enable the United Kingdom to repay the loan. She can pay for Canadian goods by exports to other countries as well as to Canada. Under a multilateral trading system and convertible currencies—

I would like to hear Mr. Ilsley's opinion on that statement today. It is true that prior to the last war Britain had large-scale foreign investments in other countries. She received interest on some of those investments in the form of dollars. She was able to transfer those dollars to her creditors in the dollar area. That is not the situation today. Many of those nations in which she had large investments prior to the war are today Britain's creditors, for instance, India, Pakistan, Egypt. I noticed from a debate in the House of Commons in England that today 40 per cent of the exports from Britain go to pay debts incurred during the last war.

The minister says that she can sell goods for dollars to other nations. What nations? In view of the fact that the United States of America has a favourable balance of trade with the sterling area of over $6 billion, it must mean that there is a deficit of around $6 billion as between the sterling area and the dollar countries. Certainly, Britain will not be able to get a surplus of dollars by exporting goods to the United States of America, and therefore naturally in the final analysis if we want to get paid by Britain on account of her indebtedness to us, and if we want Britain to buy goods from us, then we must be prepared to provide her with dollars by buying her exports. There is no other alternative, because Britain is apparently making it quite clear to the world today that she is not prepared to continue to go into unrepayable debt. Therefore I would say that the policy that we have insisted in pursuing is very largely responsible for our loss of markets today.

I want to deal specifically with the question of markets for farm products. We hear a lot of talk about surpluses; we hear a lot of talk about lack of markets; and we are starting to hear talk about the need to curtail production, owing to the fact that markets are shrinking. But when we hear that kind of talk we should also recall what the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) told us yesterday concerning the tremendous degree of poverty in many parts of Asia, where people are suffering from a very low standard of living, and are desirous of obtaining goods from other countries.

Also the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), speaking before the FAO, referred to the need for expanding production to meet the needs of the world. A quotation from his speech as it appears in Foreign Trade is as follows:

> Although agricultural production throughout the world has regained pre-war levels, it has not kept up with the increasing population of the world. Supplies available on a per capita basis are therefore still below pre-war levels.

He also went on to say that:

> Monetary difficulties are threatening to prevent freedom of movement of foods and other necessary products from "surplus" to "deficit" areas. This might lead to a slackening of the productive effort in some countries and an increase in costs which might deny food to the people of other countries.

He goes on:

> Our monetary difficulties today threaten to reproduce the situation which existed twenty years ago, a lack of that free movement of food from those with food to spare to those in want.

> Unless some way can be found of solving this problem, we cannot hope for that "all-out" effort by exporting countries that is needed, if the people of the whole world are to be adequately fed.

Therefore I think all members will agree that, that being the situation, it would be an act of criminal folly on the part of any government to reduce production at a time when that production is so direly needed in other parts of the world.

The Minister of Agriculture has frankly admitted that this is a monetary problem. I think that the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and the International Federation of Agricultural Producers are to be warmly commended for the research work they have done in connection with this question, and the proposals that they have put forward for a commodity clearing house.

I attended the annual convention of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture held at Niagara Falls last month, and was greatly struck by the unanimity reached by the delegates from both east and west in Canada on all problems coming before the convention. That has not always been the case. I think it augurs well today, when great problems are arising, to see that eastern and western farmers are able to work together in complete accord.

At that convention a speech was delivered by Professor J. K. Galbraith, professor of economics at Harvard university. He delivered a most thought-provoking speech on the subject of international trade and foreign markets. May I quote briefly from one part of his speech which struck me as being of special interest. He said:

> It is still our common faith that somehow we are going to work out of the present unbalance in international trade. To that I subscribe. It is our common illusion, however, unconscious but real, that in doing so we shall re-establish the flow of agricultural products, of food and foodstuffs, from this continent to Europe, through the ordinary channels of trade. That I doubt. Anyone who honestly examines the trend must reach an exactly opposite conclusion.

And then he goes on:

> First we must abandon the notion that 1952 is the day of decision in balancing the trade accounts. So long as it remains so, we must expect that the balance will be achieved largely at the expense of our agricultural exports. Western European countries need to be given assurance that we in this hemisphere will reciprocate their efforts with assistance. This does not necessarily mean a continuation of the Marshall plan in its present form or with some skilfully contrived pseudonym. It does mean an assurance that western Europe can purchase food and fibre from this hemisphere beyond 1952 and that help in doing so will be forthcoming if necessary. It was partly such an assurance that the proposed International Commodity Clearing House of the FAO was designed to offer.

I think it was a great tragedy that the conference of FAO turned down the proposal for the setting up of an international commodity clearing house. I wish to analyse briefly the reasons given by the conference for turning these proposals down. First of all, however, I should like to give a brief summary of the functions of this international commodity clearing house.

In June 1949 the International Federation of Agricultural Producers presented their proposals for the stabilization of prices and the distribution of surpluses of agricultural products to the council of FAO. These proposals embodied the idea of an international commodity clearing house. Then the director of FAO appointed a committee of six commodity experts to prepare a report on commodity problems for the FAO conference to be held in November of 1949. These experts proposed the setting up of an international commodity clearing house, and this was supported by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, the International Federation of Agricultural Producers, and farm organizations throughout the United States. However, as I said, the FAO conference turned the proposal down.

Before discussing the reasons why this proposal was turned down I should like briefly to summarize the functions of this institution. I have made the summary from the IFAP Bulletin of October, 1949.

Functions of ICCH would include the following:

1. Subject to provisions outlined below the purchase of stocks of commodities that are in surplus in the country in which those stocks appear.
2. The negotiation of sales in inconvertible currencies in order to assist in maintaining the flow of trade during periods of exchange disequilibrium; such payments being guaranteed by the buying countries against losses from exchange depreciation.
3. The negotiation of sales at special prices below the market to countries in need, under strictly defined conditions of use, for example, for relief purposes, special nutritional programs, or for development projects.
4. As a long run function, the holding of stocks acquired in periods of surplus as reserves to protect the interests of consumers in periods of shortage.
5. The negotiation of bilateral or multilateral trading agreements, or exchanges of commodities on a barter basis.
6. The co-ordination of the negotiating and administration of international commodity agreements and arrangements pending final disposition of these functions by the economic and social council after the charter of ITO has entered into force.
7. The organization of consultations between governments and other institutions in respect of commodity policies, agreements and transactions, and in respect of the readjustment of the uses of land and other national resources in order to implement such policies, agreements and transactions, and to meet the changing structure of world demand and world supply.

It is clear from the report that the committee considers the long range functions of ICCH should be left to later experience but in the short run ICCH would use mainly two methods for constructive disposal of surpluses. Using wheat as an example ICCH would operate in the following ways:

(1) The exporting country would sell surplus wheat to ICCH at full market price and the purchases would be financed by the exporter contributing the value of the wheat to ICCH as additional capital. ICCH would then sell quantities of wheat to the importing country in addition to and not as a substitute for its usual purchases. ICCH would take in payment the currency of the importing country, even if it were, at the time, inconvertible. The importing country would guarantee against loss by currency devaluation. ICCH would hold this currency to the credit of the exporting country until enlarged trade or restored currency convertibility permitted clearing the account.

(2) The exporter would sell surplus wheat to ICCH at a reduced price if the payment were in an immediately acceptable (presumably convertible) currency and provided that the quantity of wheat went to some special use in addition to regular consumption by the importing country. Such transactions would be financed from the revolving fund of ICCH, established by the initially paid-in twenty per cent of capital, but would not normally involve any loss to ICCH.

The reasons given by the FAO conference for turning down those proposals are, to say the least, somewhat peculiar. I should like to summarize a few of them. In rejecting the short-term trading functions of the ICCH, the conference observed that the accumulation of inconvertible currency would represent additional indebtedness by the deficit countries involving the burden of eventual repayment in terms of additional exports of goods and services and would have the effect of delaying the general convertibility.

I would say that anyone reading that statement would be justified in doubting the sincerity of the people who wrote that paragraph. What is the purpose of these proposals? The purpose is to get surplus goods to the people who need them. Yet we are told here that this might delay convertibility and therefore the proposal should be turned down. I think it is quite obvious that that body confused the means with the end and the shadow with the substance.

We are often told that convertibility will facilitate the expansion of trade, but here we have a situation where surpluses are accumulating and a proposal is made whereby they can be got to people who need them but it is said that that might delay convertibility. I am satisfied that the people of the world are more interested in getting surplus goods to people who need them than they are in restoring convertibility. If we do not take steps by which these surplus goods can be got to the people who need them, what happens? Production will be reduced and we will not then have the goods available to meet the needs of the people. That, mind you, is suggested in the name of convertibility.

The next reason for rejecting the proposals was this:

> The expenditure of such accumulations on purchases in the soft-currency areas would, in the main, be for the purchase of commodities which would ordinarily earn hard currency.

The ICCH only proposes to sell goods that would not be sold through the ordinary channels of trade and therefore there could be no fear of the ICCH proposals interfering with the ordinary channels of trade. Goods going through the ordinary channels of trade as a result of the exchange of goods would continue to move in that way, but to the extent the exporting nation was not able to dispose of its exports the international commodity clearing house would provide a means by which those goods could be got to the people who needed them.

Then the conference suggested that the financial functions proposed for the ICCH could be performed by the governments directly involved. I was very much interested in the stand taken by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). Here is a proposal by which we can get our surplus products to the country that needs them and the Minister of Agriculture says, We do not need that, we can do it ourselves. The government has now stated that they can get surplus goods to other nations, so there will be absolutely no excuse in the future for this government saying they are not able to sell our surplus production. They have turned down a suggestion that would have made it possible on the ground that they can do it without that suggestion. The farmers will be waiting to see the government take action in the immediate future to dispose of our surplus products. I hope we will not have any more talk about not being able to export our goods to other countries.

Then the conference decided to establish an FAO committee on commodity problems which would work under the supervision of and be responsible to the council. I do not think that that committee is going to be very enthusiastic. The committee of six experts drafted the ICCH proposals which were turned down because it was claimed they would interfere with the normal methods of financing international trade. All this committee will be able to do is to make proposals that will not interfere in any way with the recognized methods of financing international trade.

I think the most interesting statement made by the conference was in connection with financial facilities, and I quote:

> The conference called attention to the fact that although existing national economic development plans required international funds far in excess of those currently available, international financial institutions have not received a sufficient number of well-documented loan applications. The conference instructed the director-general of FAO to strengthen co-operation with the international bank for reconstruction and the international monetary fund and to propose specific arrangements with those organizations.

I think you have there the real reason why the conference turned down the proposal of the ICCH. It is quite evident that representatives of the international monetary fund and the international bank for reconstruction and development were at that conference and advised against the adoption of this proposal. Not only have the international monetary fund and the international bank for reconstruction failed, and failed miserably, to devise methods by which our international trade can be financed; but they are now blocking other measures that might take their place.

I noticed that when the Minister of Agriculture was speaking with reference to the Agricultural Prices Support Act he stated that that act was no alternative to markets. I think everybody will agree with that and I think the farmers realize that only too well. But the farmers will remember also that the Minister of Agriculture has turned down a proposal which would have made it possible to export our surplus commodities to other countries on the ground that the government can do what this international commodity clearing house would do. The farmers will feel that the obtaining of markets is a responsibility of the federal government and the Minister of Agriculture need not make any excuse in the future that the federal government is not able to dispose of farm surpluses. I was interested in a report appearing in the press as to a statement by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). The heading of the article is:

Gardiner charges some people making food distribution difficult.

The article reads:

He said some people are making it difficult to move these surpluses to the areas where they can be consumed.

Then the press dispatch goes on:

Mr. Gardiner did not identify these persons. However, it appeared to be a reference to the Canadian proposal for establishment of an international commodity clearing house, turned down by the United Nations food and agricultural organization.

Obviously the press statement is wrong because Mr. Gardiner was one of those who opposed an international commodity clearing house. I think the house has the right to expect the Minister of Agriculture to tell it who these individuals are who are making it hard for Canada to dispose of its surplus products to nations that need them. I have a pretty good idea who they may be because I recall that, when he spoke before the Canadian chamber of commerce in London in December, 1948, he blamed our troubles on a bunch of what he called financial crackpots who call themselves economists. He still did not name them but we know very well who the men are who control our international financial policy. They are largely the men who control the international monetary fund, the international bank for reconstruction, institutions for which Mr. Gardiner himself voted in 1945.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would say this. When people ask who is to blame for Canada not being able to dispose of her agricultural products, let us place that blame where it fairly belongs, fairly and squarely upon the shoulders of this government, because up to the present time they have insisted upon policies which make it impossible for the sterling area to buy from us, by insisting that they must pay us in dollars instead of our being willing to accept payment in goods.

Mr. Studer: Mr. Speaker, in view of the lateness of the hour and the fact that many members would like to listen to the interesting news on the radio this evening, I should like to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): As understood, tomorrow we will take up as the first item the bill to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, and then we will continue with the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

On motion of Mr. Fournier (Hull) the house adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, February 24, 1950

The house met at three o'clock.

CURLING

DOMINION COMPETITION IN QUEBEC CITY—VICTORY OF REGINA TEAM

Mr. E. A. McCusker (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I should like to call the attention of hon. members to the fact that sitting in the gallery today are six young curling teams, four from the western provinces of Canada, and two from Ontario. They have been taking part in the dominion competition in Quebec city for the Sifton trophy, emblematic of the championship of school curling in Canada. They tell me that they have had a wonderful time there, and much has been done to cement the entente cordiale.

I am also pleased to announce that the team from my home city, the Scott collegiate institute team, was successful. That in itself is not important. The important thing is that today throughout Canada there are thousands of young boys and girls learning this game, which teaches people to lose gracefully and win graciously.

FEDERAL DISTRICT COMMISSION

TABLING OF FIFTIETH ANNUAL REPORT

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I should like to table the fiftieth annual report of the federal district commission, in English. I am sorry that the French version is not ready. It is in the hands of the translators, and will be tabled as soon as it can be prepared.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

ANNOUNCEMENT OF APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSIONER

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I should like to announce the appointment of Mr. Thomas D. MacDonald, K.C., as commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act. Mr. MacDonald graduated from Dalhousie university in arts in 1931, in law in 1933, and immediately entered the department of the attorney general of Nova Scotia. In seven years he had risen to become the head of the department as deputy attorney general in 1940, and except for a period of war service he occupied that position continuously until 1949, when, in April, he resigned to accept a position with the federal Department of Justice, as superintendent of bankruptcy, and also as counsel. In that post he served until he accepted the present position.

MAIN ESTIMATES, 1950-51

EXPLANATORY STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1951, was presented by Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) and read by Mr. Speaker to the house.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it has been the practice in previous years to table the estimates and move that they be referred to the committee of supply without any explanatory statement in this house. My predecessor as minister and I have usually sent a brief explanatory statement to the press immediately after tabling the estimates. This year, in response to various suggestions, I propose to make a brief explanatory statement to the house itself when presenting the estimates.

It will be observed that the total of the estimates being proposed for the new fiscal year commencing April 1 is $2,308 million. This includes those items for which continuing statutory authority for the expenditure is already available—a total of $1,011 million—as well as the 560 votes for expenditure which we are putting before this house for its approval, and which add up to $1,297 million. In addition, we are proposing votes for loans and investments which will create active assets and which total $105 million. These are, of course, not included in the expenditure totals.

First, I wish to indicate how these figures compare with those for the current fiscal year now drawing to its close in March. As usual, we have shown throughout the estimates the comparable figures for the votes already passed by the house this past year, including supplementary estimates made to date, and the forecasts of statutory expenditure placed before the house with the estimates last year. These add up to $2,335 million—which is about $27 million more than the estimates now presented for the new year.

It is difficult to determine what past figures make a satisfactory comparison with those for the main estimates this year. The figures I have cited for last year—$2,335 million—include, of course, the special estimates to cover the extension of our services to Newfoundland and the supplementary estimates presented last fall to cover developments in programs and policies subsequent to the main estimates a year ago. They do not include, however, the further and final supplementary estimates to be brought in next month at the close of the fiscal year, to cover such things, for example, as the 1949 deficit of Canadian National Railways and Trans-Canada Air Lines—and these, of course, are not covered in the main estimates now being tabled. We have endeavoured to include in the main estimates this year many expenditures of a type that were covered in the supplementary estimates last year, and on this basis the comparison of the figures given is an appropriate one. However, there are bound to be some supplementary estimates this year; there are almost certainly going to be deficits incurred by the C.N.R. and T.C.A. to be covered at the end of the next year, and I would expect to make some provision in our accounts for our reserves against active assets, as we have done in recent years. Expenditures on these heads then will be additional to those provided for in these estimates. I not only hope but I expect that our supplementary estimates this year will be less than the total of $63 million brought in last fall—considerably less—unless we are confronted with a serious worsening in the economic situation or the international situation.

For those who wish to compare these main estimates for next year with the main estimates for the current year, I should mention that the latter were $2,217 million, to which should be added the estimates for the extension of services to Newfoundland, which were $55 million, making a total of $2,272 million.

As usual we may expect some short-fall in expenditure below the amount of the votes requested in the estimates, and this has frequently offset to a large extent the expenditure under supplementary estimates. There will be some such short-fall in the next fiscal year, but I would expect it to be less than in recent years, because I believe we have been able this year to forecast our requirements more accurately than in the last few years.

I shall not endeavour to comment upon the amounts provided for various purposes or departments, but there are two or three points to which I think I should draw attention.

It will be noted that the biggest increase shown for any department is for that of health and welfare and this despite a change in the form of the provision for the health grants that takes account of probable total expenditures on all of them together, rather than voting the outside limit for each one separately. The big increase represents mainly increased payments for family allowances and old age pensions over those that had been authorized last year when the estimates were tabled; the increase results both from the legislation last year and from the growth of the population receiving the payments.

The next largest increase, and the one that is the major development of policy reflected in these estimates, is the $42 million increase provided for defence—raising the defence expenditures from $383 million this current year to an estimate of $425 million next year. This, of course, reflects the government's decisions as to what forces, equipment, and activities are now necessary for defence in the light of the international situation and our position in the North Atlantic alliance. This total for defence will include now substantial payments for new aircraft, ships, radar equipment, and weapons of various kinds, as well as the construction of buildings and bases to replace or supplement those left from the war. To provide this increase for defence and that for health and welfare within what the government has regarded as a reasonable total of expenditure has involved a severe scrutiny of all other expenditures and the elimination of all that appeared of doubtful necessity at this time.

In approving the programs for the various departments' expenditures, the treasury board have had in mind the general economic situation in the maritime provinces and the coastal areas of Quebec, and the government's desire to promote the economic development of this general region, which has encountered greater economic difficulties than the other major regions of the country.

It will be noted that the form of the estimates for the Department of Public Works differs from that which has been used in previous years, the detailed projects to which approval is given in the votes being listed in the detailed appendix to the estimates. This makes it possible to estimate more closely actual requirements for these large groups of projects, and to make some allowance for the inevitable delays and difficulties that arise in securing sites and contractors as well as skilled labour and materials. The total votes requested for this department are less than those requested last year, but they are very much greater than the total expenditures that we expect will be made by the department this year. The new form of estimate, and the improved supply position, should permit total expenditure to approach much more closely to the estimates in the new year than in the current year; consequently I expect a substantial increase in the actual over-all expenditures of the Department of Public Works.

In regard to the construction work generally, there is provision in the estimates as a whole, including the grants to provinces for the trans-Canada highway and for hospital construction, for expenditures on construction projects of one kind or another, amounting to a total of about $210 million, which is just about equal to the amounts provided in the main and supplementary estimates this current year. For the reasons I have mentioned in connection with the Public Works Department, we expect actual expenditure on construction in the new year to be quite considerably above that in the current year—that is, very much closer to the amount actually provided for by parliamentary appropriation. In addition to these expenditures proper, the loans and investment votes of $105 million this year consist almost entirely of construction or building items of one kind or another, including the housing program of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the Veterans Land Act. This loan provision for construction is about the same as that made for this current year. The dominion-provincial housing program will be in addition, and the initial financial requirements for it are already available under the National Housing Act as soon as the provinces are ready to proceed.

In general, our expenditures in the year now closing include substantial items of a financial character, such as the assumption of the Newfoundland debt. It is clear that in the estimates for next year there is less for purely financial settlements and more for job-creating expenditures.

This year, unlike last year and recent previous years, we have not considered it necessary to make any substantial allowance in the estimates for a further general increase in the level of prices and costs, although some particular increases here and there have been anticipated. There are increases in many individual votes this year, reflecting the increases in salaries and wages that took place a year ago and which were provided for in large part in the general salaries vote for the current year. There are also some increases reflecting substantial policy decisions already announced, such as the subsidies for overseas shipping and other increases reflecting the carrying forward of policies of national development, such as expenditures on research, surveys, and the fisheries program. On the other hand, we find this year quite considerable decreases in a number of departments, due to the termination or tapering off of temporary post-war activities, or for other reasons that will be clear when the details are examined or discussed.

I am glad to be able to note that the estimates for my own department show a large decrease, due in considerable part to reduction in interest charges on the national debt, to the provision of a substantial part now of the tax rental payments to the provinces out of the 5 per cent corporate income taxes they are now imposing, and to the dropping of various other temporary requirements in last year's votes that are no longer needed.

In accordance with a suggestion made in the committee of supply last year, I have arranged to have the details of the estimates this year show the number of temporary employees under each vote, though it has not proven practicable to show the number of casual employees, which fluctuates considerably during the year and does not really constitute part of the basic establishment. I hope next year it may be possible to show the distribution of temporary employees by classes or groups of classes, as we do for permanent employees now. Time did not permit us to do that this year.

You may recall, sir, that last session, when we were discussing interim supply, I agreed to give some study to measures that might be taken to facilitate the consideration of estimates in parliament. The first results of that have been the present action in bringing the estimates to the house earlier in the session than has been usual. The government has already indicated its readiness to have the most general vote for each department called at a fairly early day in the session in order that there may be discussion of matters concerning each department before the end of the session approaches. This arrangement should facilitate debate in the committee of supply on general questions or particular points of special concern. I am studying other possible arrangements to facilitate an orderly and detailed consideration of the financial and administrative aspects of the estimates.

I move:

That the message of His Excellency, together with the estimates presented this day, be referred to the committee of supply.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): May I be permitted to make a suggestion which I hope will find some favour in connection with consideration of the estimates? It is not a new suggestion, and I hope the government, having considered the matter from previous sessions, will be agreeable to following it, at any rate to some extent.

Main Estimates

In the past we have been pursuing a rather irregular course in connection with the estimates. Some departments are brought in day after day, while other departments are not touched until the last. My suggestion is that this session we try to find an orderly way of dealing with the estimates so that they may all be covered on something like an equal basis.

I am going to suggest to the Prime Minister that the house devote one day a week to estimates, and that each week the estimates of a new department be introduced. Having in mind the normal length of a session, we would reach the later part of the session with all departments dealt with although they might not be completed.

I think this would meet public desire, because no one could then say that parliament had not given all the estimates fair consideration as they went through. Of course toward the end of the session a number of matters would still require to be examined; nevertheless the examination of estimates would be spread over the entire field, something which, to the knowledge of all of us, has not been done for the past number of sessions.

I make this suggestion in perfectly good faith, in the hope that we may be able to establish a custom and practice in the House of Commons that not only will meet public favour but will prove of great convenience to the government and to parliament in general.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on the very day of the opening of parliament, dealing with the motion for the consideration of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I declared that that suggestion had been made and had been considered, and that it would be our endeavour to try it out. It was for the purpose of getting into a position to do that that the motion was presented in the form in which it was.

We shall be most happy to attempt to get the co-operation of groups in the house to carry out that procedure, namely, the calling one day in each week of a department that has not previously been called, so that on the item covering administration there can be general discussion of the affairs of that department. I hope we shall get the co-operation of the various groups to the extent of not having the whole of that day spent in discussing the motion to go into supply.

Mr. Graydon: That will depend upon the government's removing the grievances.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Graydon.]

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

EXTENSION OF COVERAGE IN THE LUMBERING AND LOGGING INDUSTRY

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to table, for the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), P.C. 474. In connection with this order in council I wish to announce that the government is making an extension of unemployment insurance coverage in the lumbering and logging industry. With this important step about 75,000 workers in industry will receive the protection of unemployment insurance.

It will be recalled that the exclusion of lumbering and logging in the 1940 act was due mainly to the difficulty of administration. The chief difficulties were:

(1) the seasonality of the industry in most parts of Canada except on the west coast;
(2) the inaccessible location of some of the operations;
(3) the high turnover of employees;
(4) the large amount of subcontracting, and
(5) the large number of farmers, fishermen and other non-insured persons who work in logging camps for very short periods.

Initially attention was directed towards the establishment of the over-all insurance scheme, and later, after experience had been gained from the operation of that program, questions of extending the coverage to some of the excepted occupations received consideration in the light of newly-gained experience.

Both the unemployment insurance commission and the unemployment insurance advisory committee have for several years given a great deal of study to the advisability of and ways and means of extending coverage to this industry.

In 1946 employees in lumbering and logging in the province of British Columbia were brought under insurable employment. The government insured lumbering and logging in British Columbia because in that province it is an all-year-round industry, whereas in other parts of Canada the seasonal factor is important. Further, it was considered that it would be useful to gain some experience in one area in Canada before extending coverage to other areas.

Since this time the advisory committee and the commission have reviewed the question of further extensions, and the commission has held public hearings. Every effort has been made to obtain workable provision for the coverage of those employees in the industry who require protection.

As a result of full investigation of the many phases of the industry it has been decided that seasonal regulations under the Unemployment Insurance Act will apply to the industry except in British Columbia, where of course they are now in an insurable state.

This means those people whose only insurable employment is in lumbering and logging can draw benefits only during the logging season. In the prairies this season is for the time being regarded as from November 1 to April 15, and in eastern Canada, from November 1 to March 31. However, people who are employed in lumbering and logging during part of the year and in other insurable employments during the remainder of the year, even to a limited extent, are not affected by the seasonal regulations, which are designed to exclude from benefit in the off-season only those whose employment is seasonal.

Provision has also been made for the voluntary exclusion from coverage of farmers, hunters, fishermen, and others whose main employment is not insurable when these persons do not expect to work in lumbering and logging for more than sixty days in any year. It would be unfair to take unemployment contributions from persons who would be unable to obtain sufficient contributions to qualify for benefit. Accordingly this exclusion is voluntary to allow flexibility that might be needed in certain cases but in the main only affects those whose contributions from their work in this industry would not be sufficient to give them benefits under the act.

Up to the present time certain planing mills and saw mills which work only part of the year have been excluded. These saw mills will also be brought under insurance coverage.

April 1 has been set as the date of commencement of these new provisions, because it is thought to be the most suitable date to begin contribution collections. It comes at a time when employers in the industry will not be in the position of having to apply the regulations to their employees when their payroll staff is overloaded with work. Since insurance books are renewed each year on April 1, it will be an advantage to issue books for the new insurance year 1950-51 rather than to issue books at an earlier date for the current fiscal year, which would have to be renewed shortly afterwards.

These coverage provisions have been carefully adapted to the particular needs of the industry. As I mentioned yesterday in this house, our seasonal trends are, because of our climatic conditions, more pronounced than in other countries, and we believe we should shape our insurance scheme as far as practicable to take these conditions into account. This extension of insurance coverage to lumbering and logging in parts of Canada where the industry is highly seasonal will bring to these workers the protection they need and deserve against the hazards of unemployment. The broadening of coverage under this measure is another important advance in the development of a more comprehensive insurance program as a first line of defence for workers and their families against unemployment.

Mr. Fleming: I should like to ask the minister a question arising out of his statement. Has any decision been reached as to the inclusion of hospital workers?

Mr. Martin: I have already answered that question. The hon. member will find it was answered last night.

Mr. Cruickshank: I should like to ask the Acting Minister of Labour a question arising out of the remarks he has just made. Is he not aware of the fact that three members from British Columbia forced the government to bring loggers and lumbermen under the unemployment insurance provisions?

Mr. Martin: Much as I respect the hon. member and his colleagues from British Columbia, I must say the fact is that the government was not at all forced into the situation as my hon. friend indicates. The government examined the question, and has done so over the years in the light of what it regarded as practicable. While the hon. member and others may have helped, it would be wholly inaccurate to suggest that his actions, or the actions of any other persons, forced the government into the action it has taken.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cruickshank: That does not bother me at all, Mr. Speaker. If the minister will read Hansard for the day the measure was introduced, when he was a very junior member, as I was, he will find that there were only three members who took the stand I did.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUESTS FOR APPOINTMENT OF TRADE REPRESENTATIVES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): In the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. It is based on a reported statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on his return from the commonwealth meeting in Ceylon. Has Canada received any requests, officially or unofficially, from other countries for the appointment of Canadian trade representatives? If so, when were such requests made, and from what countries did they come?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): As the question refers to a statement reported to have been made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I hope the hon. member will not mind receiving the answer from him. I understand he is ready to make it.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the statement to which the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) has referred as having been made by me is apparently one that appeared in the press last week, in which I am quoted as saying, in respect of our visit to the Far East:

> We found very great friendship and admiration for Canada and a general desire to increase trade and economic contacts with this country.

After the quotation of what I had said there followed this paragraph, which is presumably a condensed report of something else I am supposed to have said. It reads:

> There were requests from several countries for Canadian trade representatives.

I have looked up the record of this particular conference. I said at that time that members of the governments of certain countries in that area where we are not now officially represented had expressed the desire that we establish such representation, diplomatic or trade or both, as soon as we found it possible.

In answer to the second part of the hon. member's question as to where such requests came from, I think it would be a little embarrassing if I mentioned in public the names of the countries, because it would possibly give the impression that they are more anxious to receive Canadian representation than we are to receive representation from those countries. The attitude I took in reply, Mr. Speaker, was that we are of course anxious to extend our trade and diplomatic representation in all countries where it is in the interest of Canada to do so, but that the extension of the diplomatic and trade services has to be governed by financial and other considerations.

SUPPLEMENTARY BENEFITS DURING WINTER SEASON—VARIOUS AMENDMENTS

Hon. Paul Martin (for the Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of Bill No. 8, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I intend to make a few observations on the motion for second reading, though most matters were dealt with yesterday in the discussion of the resolution.

Before beginning my general remarks in this connection I feel that mention should be made of the general regret on the part of all hon. members, irrespective of where they sit in this house, at the fact that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) is indisposed and unable himself to move second reading. If there is one member or minister in this house who enjoys the friendship of all—and after all, that is the way it should be in parliament—it is the Minister of Labour. We all trust that very shortly he will be back in the house discharging his responsibilities.

Mr. St. Laurent: It will interest the hon. member if I say that yesterday I received an encouraging letter from the Minister of Labour. I hope, as my hon. friend does, that within a very short time the minister will return to the house in his usual good health.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And saying things, as he always does, in so kindly a manner.

It was only about half an hour ago, Mr. Speaker, that my hon. friend the acting leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) asked me to say a few words on the question of unemployment insurance. In the interval I looked up the representations and recommendations made by the Sirois commission, as well as those made by the dominion government to the dominion-provincial conference of 1945. When one reads those recommendations it is difficult to understand what happened to them; for the extent to which they have been adopted is so infinitesimal, as compared with what was sought by those representations, that it seems beyond comprehension that there should have been any controversy at all in the matter.

The Sirois commission recommended that the dominion should be responsible for the employable unemployed. The bill now before us, as was said yesterday, effective though it may be as far as it goes, omits so many things, having regard to present conditions, that in the opinion of the opposition it is most inadequate to meet the unemployment situation of today. I go back to 1945; I am going to read a few of the recommendations made at that time by members of the government, with a view to offering certain suggestions with respect to further amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. As I see it, on this motion for second reading not only are we discussing the general principle of the bill; we are also discussing the situation facing this country today, the whole matter of unemployment.

At page 6 of the report of proceedings of the 1945 conference, the then prime minister said:

> We are convinced that the people of Canada expect governments—all governments—to accept responsibility for creating conditions which will ensure high and stable employment. To create such conditions, we believe it should be made possible, through reduction and simplification of taxes, and in other ways, for private enterprise to operate boldly and courageously.

I pause here to say that at that time the then prime minister particularly mentioned that in order to encourage employment it was necessary to reduce taxation. Then he went on to say:

> We believe the state—and by the state, may I say again, I mean provinces as well as dominion—should design programs of public development and conservation which can be readily expanded or contracted to help in balancing the rise and fall of other sources of employment.

I point this out because, as was suggested yesterday, I feel that many unemployed people in this dominion will not be covered by the Unemployment Insurance Act as it now stands, or even with these suggested amendments. There are many excepted employments; there are many casual workers. But if they be unemployed, no matter what their classification, they demand and deserve help at this time. I referred to public works. The present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) did so as well at pages 55 to 60 of the proceedings, when he said:

> The purpose should not be to find a "cure-all" for unemployment in huge expenditures on public works. Rather, the problem is one of devising a sound and consistent program of public improvements—

Mr. Martin: I do not like to interrupt my hon. friend, because I know he is approaching his task in all seriousness; but on a point of order I think we must have it clearly understood that what we have before us now is a bill to provide supplementary relief and to make certain amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. Having in mind the stated purpose of that act, it would seem to me, Mr. Speaker, with great respect, that to discuss such matters as public works programs and ways and means of relieving unemployment—not that these are not appropriate matters for discussion—is to go outside the scope of this bill.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All or at least some of these recommendations were made at the dominion-provincial conference of 1945. At that time it was suggested that the question of unemployment should be faced in a certain way. In a moment I am coming to what the Minister of Labour had to say on that occasion. He provided for alternatives first in the Unemployment Insurance Act, and then in provision for those who are employable but are unemployed. He asserted that they were the responsibility of the federal authority. Finally the minister made certain suggestions as to increasing the ambit of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

What I am doing is discussing the principle at issue here. As the member has said, the purpose of the measure now proposed is to meet the situation prevailing today. We in the opposition say that, as far as it goes, it will meet part of the situation, but it cannot provide for the more than 100,000 unemployed who do not come within the ambit of the Unemployment Insurance Act. It is for this reason, sir, that I am discussing the recommendations of 1945. I trust that I may be permitted to continue, even though a reading of the promises made by the members of the government in 1945 indicates that many of those promises have fallen into the limbo of things forgotten and unperformed. I await your ruling, sir.

Mr. Speaker: It is rather difficult to determine just what is the principle of the amending bill before the house. I do feel, however, that it has to do with the bringing of additional workers within the provisions of the present act, known as the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940. I do not see any provisions in the bill which provide for creating employment.

Mr. Graydon: That is the trouble with it.

Mr. Speaker: That may or may not be the trouble with it; I am not giving an opinion on that. This bill, however, is not one for creating employment, as I see it; nor does it deal with questions which create employment. It deals rather with making the act wider in its application, so that persons may be brought within its provisions who do not now come under it. I hope that hon. members will now confine their remarks to the issue.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, bowing to your ruling, I would point out to the house that a portion of this bill in no way deals with unemployment insurance. In fact it deals with what is called unemployment assistance, which is quite a different thing from unemployment insurance, as was pointed out at the dominion-provincial conference of 1945. Supplementary benefits, under sections 87A and following, are not related to unemployment insurance; they are an alternative to unemployment insurance.

What I was trying to suggest, and I shall not pursue it, was that supplementary benefits, rather than meeting the situation in this country, will merely reach a few who are covered thereby. There will still remain a large area of unemployment about which nothing is being done, either under the Unemployment Insurance Act or under the provision which deals with supplementary benefits.

In 1945 the Minister of Labour made his proposals, and they are of interest today. These were the proposals of the dominion government, and in some parts they are as well forgotten as were those other proposals for social security in connection with old age pensions.

The minister said:

> Over the past seven or eight years there have been recommendations by the national employment commission, the Sirois commission and others, that the dominion should assume responsibility for necessary relief to the employable unemployed. It has been generally suggested that the dominion should accept this obligation as part of any general settlement with the provinces.

Then he goes on to say this:

> The dominion government would accept responsibility for ensuring that there shall be provided a reasonable minimum payment for the maintenance of employable unemployed persons through
> (a) the extension as rapidly as possible of unemployment insurance to cover all employees.

I point out, sir, that those suggestions were made almost five years ago, and since that time there have been few additions to those who come within the terms of the act. A reference was made today to the inclusion of people who are employed in lumbering and logging. There still remain many other excepted employments which, under the terms of this bill, will not receive anything.

Then the Minister of Labour said:

> In the period when such extension is being carried out and before insurance benefits properly so-called can be built up, by instituting a system of unemployment assistance to be administered in close co-operation with the unemployment insurance commission.

This is, in fact, what we have here—unemployment assistance. It is called by a different name—supplementary benefits. How far the government has departed from these promises of 1945! With regard to unemployment assistance, which is just another form for the supplementary benefits, the minister said that as part of the government's promises to the provinces, in addition to unemployment insurance—I emphasize those words, "in addition to"—the dominion will set up a system of unemployment assistance under which it will pay benefits equal to eighty-five per cent of the unemployment insurance benefits to unemployed persons able and willing to work who are not entitled or have ceased to be entitled to unemployment insurance benefits. Why has that not been carried out? Why is it now reduced to eighty per cent?

Mr. Martin: I do not like to rise again, but my hon. friend is continuing to talk about unemployment assistance, which does not involve the principle of insurance. If I sit in my seat and say nothing, in spite of your ruling, sir, I shall be admitting the relevancy of what the hon. gentleman is saying. All this should be said on another occasion. I do not think this is the moment to enter upon a discussion of that problem. We are dealing with an amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act, and I submit we should adhere to the ruling.

Mr. Knowles: On the point of order, I believe Your Honour was correct in the previous ruling to the effect that, in debating this bill, we should debate unemployment insurance and not the methods of providing employment. I believe I am correctly stating what Your Honour ruled. Since that ruling was made, the member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) has adhered to it. He has not been talking about a means of providing employment; he has been talking about proposed changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act. I say that as long as we stay within that sphere of discussion of the Unemployment Insurance Act, we should be in order.

Mr. Martin: If we do that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Apparently my hon. friend has not read this.

Mr. Martin: I have been accused of writing some of it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am reading from the dominion-provincial submissions, page 387, a summary of dominion proposals. I can understand my hon. friend's diffidence about hearing a matter such as this discussed, but I am pointing out that it is the same thing as is now brought in under another name, with the exception that the government has not carried out the promise it made in 1945 to provide for eighty-five per cent of the expenditures in connection with these assistance grants.

I submit, sir, that I am in order. If we cannot discuss this matter under unemployment insurance, when the government itself placed it under that in 1945, then my hon. friend is simply endeavouring to throttle discussion of this matter which is so important to the people as a whole.

Mr. Speaker: From what the minister said I did not gather that he was endeavouring to throttle discussion. He was bringing to my attention the fact that this bill deals with unemployment insurance, and not with benefits which are being paid to people who are unemployed. I gather from the act that this bill deals with persons who have been employed and have been entitled to benefits. Further assistance is being given to them if they previously came within the provisions of the act. As I said this is quite a long bill. I do not like to be too technical, but I would point out that in dealing with these amendments we are not dealing with the whole Unemployment Insurance Act; we are dealing with certain phases of the act which are being amended.

I would ask hon. members to endeavour to keep their remarks within the confines of the amendments which are now before the house.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, may I say a word on the point of order?—because I think we may have to have a decision on it before this matter of debate is finally settled. The only way to understand what we are talking about is to know what the item on the order paper says. Item No. 5 on the order paper reads:

> Second reading of Bill No. 8, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940.

I maintain that the whole Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940, is open for debate. If the minister did not want a full debate he should have taken the precaution to limit the debate by having the title read something like this: "An act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940, extension of benefits." If this had been the title of the bill, we would have been limited to a discussion of extension of benefits; but this is a general revision of the Unemployment Insurance Act, and I am going to have something to say on that when my turn comes. We cannot limit discussion on this bill until we get a new title for it.

Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, second edition, citation 753, reads:

> The second reading of a bill is that stage when it is proper to enter into a discussion and propose a motion relative to the principle of the measure.

There is a great variety of principles involved in the measure that is now before us; consequently other amendments can be moved to the Unemployment Insurance Act. Therefore the whole act is now before us.

Mr. Graydon: May I suggest that this is a bill for insurance against unemployment? If the house is not going to be allowed to discuss unemployment in all its phases, how can it properly be asked to discuss insurance against unemployment? There is no place that I can see in our whole sessional set-up that lends itself more properly to discussion of unemployment, and all the factors that enter into it, than the very bill that we have before us. Surely when we are trying to establish an act for insurance against unemployment, that is the time to discuss unemployment itself. If we cannot do it on this bill, the government might as well say that they are going to close the books on the whole question of unemployment so far as the Commons is concerned. They have closed their eyes up to the present time, and now they are going to close the books.

Mr. Green: With great respect, may I point out that I think Your Honour was in error in stating that this bill covered only those employees who have already established entitlement to insurance. That may be true of groups 1 and 2; but if Your Honour will refer to section 20 of the bill you will find in new section 87B that classes 3 and 4 consist of employees who have never had entitlement to insurance. I think that that should make a material difference in the ruling made by Your Honour. It certainly is perfectly obvious that the amendment is not confined to persons who have been entitled to insurance.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to direct the minister's attention to the promise he gave yesterday that he would permit a good deal of latitude if we adopted the resolution. However, sir, some enlightenment may be gathered by looking back at the resolution, which dealt with more than merely special supplementary benefits. The resolution reads:

> To provide for supplementary benefits during the winter season in any year and government financial contribution in consequence thereof, for additional insurance coverage, for readjustment and simplification of rates of contribution, and for consequential amendments; to provide also for an increase in the membership of the unemployment insurance advisory committee from six to eight members; and to provide further that the members of the national employment committee shall receive the same remuneration as the members of the unemployment insurance advisory committee.

Bearing in mind the great importance of this subject not only to hon. members but to the hundreds of thousands of people throughout the country, I feel that the minister should now reconsider the suggestion he made to Your Honour and permit the latitude that he promised yesterday.

Mr. Knowles: For Your Honour's consideration may I also suggest you note that the amending bill proposes changes in the rates of premium that workers are to pay; it proposes changes in the rates of benefits the workers are to receive; it proposes changes in the statutory conditions under which workers receive those benefits; it proposes changes in the rules of evidence before the courts—

Mr Fournier (Hull): That is not a point of order. The hon. member is making a speech. Why not wait?

Mr. Knowles: It is a point of order, because you are questioning whether or not it opens up the whole act. In addition to all these changes, and others that I shall point out in my speech that the Minister of Public Works is talking about, there is a whole new section with regard to supplemental benefits. Actually it is a rewriting of the whole Unemployment Insurance Act. While I stand by my concurrence in Your Honour's ruling that in this debate we have to stick to unemployment insurance, still I submit that Your Honour should recognize that this is practically a whole new Unemployment Insurance Act, and that the whole Unemployment Insurance Act should be up for discussion.

Mr. Speaker: I am not entirely in accord with what was said by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) with regard to this bill permitting a general discussion of the Unemployment Insurance Act. I do not think that merely because a few words are added or omitted in the title of a bill, that would permit or prevent a general discussion. I am inclined to the view that discussion should relate to the principle of the amending bill, irrespective of the title.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) drew my attention to clause 87B. I notice in that clause there is added a class who work in lumbering and logging for at least ninety days in any period of twelve months falling within the year and a half prior to a claim being made. That probably does bring in workers who had never formerly been covered by the act. But they had been employed in a specific industry.

I believe I have made my position clear. The minister did say, and intimated again a moment ago, I gathered, that he does not wish to be too technical. So far as I am concerned, however, I do not think the terms of this bill are wide enough to permit a discussion of the whole question of unemployment. This bill refers, not to methods of providing employment, but to unemployment insurance.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, if I understand your direction aright, I am permitted to discuss the question from the point of view of the 1945 representations made by the government of Canada to the provinces in regard to the question of unemployment insurance, or unemployment assistance.

Mr. Martin: The first is right, but not to unemployment assistance, unless it is on an insurance basis.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, Mr. Speaker, it was all together in 1945, and it is all together now.

Mr. Martin: No.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All the government have done is this: they have changed the name from unemployment assistance to supplementary benefits. Your Honour will have noticed how anxious the minister was to raise this question. Apparently in this way they would endeavour to delude us into believing that they have not departed from the promises they made to the provinces in 1945.

I point out that these were the representations made regarding unemployment insurance and employable unemployed by the Minister of Labour to the premiers and representatives of the different provinces. He made this suggestion:

> As rapidly as possible the Unemployment Insurance Act will be widened to embrace all employed persons.

The question necessarily arises now, after five years: Why is it that there are so many excepted classes of persons today who are being passed by in the matter of assistance?

The minister went on to say this:

> As already stated the objective would be to bring into insurance in a relatively short time the whole employed population; when this had been accomplished the only employees who might require assistance, in contrast to insurance, would be those who had exhausted their insurance benefits or failed to qualify.

Those are the same people today who come within the provisions of the supplementary benefits. Then he went on to say:

> By that time experience with the extended insurance scheme would enable a decision to be made whether to extend the duration of benefits and shorten the period of qualification for insurance.

The question naturally arises here: Why should not the period of qualification be reduced? Mention has been made of the hundreds of millions of dollars amassed as a result of the contributions. A period of five years has gone by now and experience has shown that the period of qualification should indeed be reduced.

Having pointed out what should be done with those who had exhausted their unemployment insurance benefits, the minister said this:

> In the case of an insured person who has exhausted insurance benefits, or who lacks the full qualification for insurance benefits, the scale of assistance would be approximately eighty-five per cent of the insurance benefit to which such person's contribution class previously entitled him or would in due course entitle him.

I ask the minister this question: Why has there been this change from the eighty-five per cent, the promise made in 1945, to the eighty per cent of today? Why has there been this material change?

In 1945 the Minister of Labour undertook as follows:

Payments for unemployment assistance would be made under authority of an appropriation for this purpose, out of the consolidated revenue fund, and not out of the unemployment insurance fund.

Today the new scheme is this—a complete departure from that of 1945.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Today the scheme is that the provision be made for contributions on the part of workers, and in addition to that, in the other provisions, for increasing the ambit of qualifications in the salary limit from $3,120 to $4,800. What the minister is expected to explain to the house and to the provinces—which have no responsibility in connection with unemployables—is why the change that has been made; why the alteration? Who made the recommendation? Did the advisory committee suggest that the promises and pledges of 1945 should be departed from in this manner?

What provision is to be made in connection with supplementary benefits for young men and women who have none of the qualifications to ensure them payment of benefits, and who are unemployed today? What about those in categories not comprised within the act? These are questions which the unemployed in this country expect to have answered.

Instead of saying: Let us not discuss the question of unemployment here, surely the minister's attitude should be: Let us face it; let us endeavour to arrive at some solution. The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) spoke about shutting the book, and about the government shutting their eyes to unemployment. Surely they do not want parliament to shut its mouth on this problem, one which is so important to half a million people in this dominion today.

So far as the general purpose of the bill is concerned, we accept it; but we say it does not go far enough—first, in the matter of the payment of benefits; secondly, in the fact that it is a departure from the promise of 1945, made to the dominion-provincial conference; third, that parliament should consider the period of unemployment for qualification, and its reduction; fourth, that parliament should consider, under this act, the inclusion for supplementary benefits of those who today are unemployed and have no one to look to but the federal authority.

The provinces have no responsibility. The Sirois commission report, which I have here, places the responsibility for unemployment expenditures, so far as employables are concerned, on the federal authority; and that responsibility was accepted in 1945. It will not be discharged by an act as incomplete, with its amendments, as is the Unemployment Insurance Act of today.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to associate myself with the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) when, in his opening remarks, he referred to the indisposition of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) and expressed the hope that he may shortly return to the house in his full vigour. I too sincerely hope so. I have been associated with the Minister of Labour for many years and although we have not always seen eye to eye in connection with certain matters I have the highest regard for him.

I spoke yesterday on the resolution stage of this bill and I do not want to repeat anything that I said at that time. If it were not for certain things that have happened I would be quite willing to let this reading go without saying anything at all. But I do protest as strongly as I possibly can against the way the government has treated the house in regard to this measure. We were told—I shall read the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent)—in so many words that the purpose of this bill was to extend the supplementary benefits and it was desirable that it should go through the house now so that it could be quickly enacted and the benefits paid, despite the fact that on the opening day of this session we passed a resolution providing that the speech from the throne would have precedence over all other business this week and that for next week it would have precedence for three days in the week, with government business having precedence for the other two.

This bill was said to be so important, the purpose it was to fulfil was said to be so important, that we could not wait until next week; it had to be done at once. If the purpose of the bill was what we were told it was last Wednesday I would have no objection. At the adjournment of the house on Wednesday the Prime Minister said, as reported on page 151 of Hansard:

I understand that the Acting Minister of Labour has been discussing with the leaders of the several groups the possibility of taking up tomorrow, notwithstanding the special order made in respect of this debate, resolution No. 10 on today's order paper dealing with unemployment insurance in an effort to have that resolution considered and the legislation enacted so that the payments it would authorize could be made as from the first of March.

Then the Prime Minister went on to say that he was informed that preparations by the Department of Labour were so far advanced that the benefits would be paid as soon as the legislation was passed, and he continued:

If my understanding is correct, the leaders of the several groups have said that they realize it would relieve distress to have that done as soon as possible.

That was the understanding upon which we allowed this measure to have priority over the debate on the speech from the throne. What have we got? What is placed before us? This is not a short measure to extend the benefits of the act; we have before us a bill of seventeen pages dealing with 25 different sections of the Unemployment Insurance Act. I insist that that is not the way the government should treat this house. This is a general revision of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

When the Unemployment Insurance Act was introduced in 1940 it was referred to a special committee and witnesses from all over the country were heard. We now have a general revision of the act and an attempt is being made to rush it through the house. A great many of those who will be affected by it were not consulted or did not see the bill. As a matter of fact, I did not see the bill until noon today.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We are all in the same position.

Mr. MacInnis: A government that wants the co-operation of this house, a government that wants the co-operation of various sections of the community, should not treat this house or the community in that way. I protest the deception that was put over on hon. members of this house.

Mr. Martin: I know the hon. gentleman will not mind my suggesting this to him because he observes the rules so carefully, but I think perhaps the word "deception" in reference to the Prime Minister or to those who made the arrangements is not really an accurate description of the situation and I know he would not want to use that word.

Mr. MacInnis: If the minister thinks that "deception" is a little too strong I am quite willing to have him suggest a more moderate or less extreme or more general word that will meet the situation. In any case I am glad that he admits that there was something put over the house.

Mr. Martin: Oh, no.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Mr. MacInnis: I am quite willing to leave it at that.

Mr. Martin: I protest strongly and say to the hon. gentleman that nothing was put over the house.

Mr. MacInnis: There is no doubt something was put over the house. As a matter of fact, what should be done is to have a special bill brought in dealing with the extension of the supplementary benefits and postpone the rest of the legislation until such time as the labour bodies, the employers' associations and even the members of the advisory committee set up under the act have had an opportunity to look over the amendments proposed.

Mr. Speaker: The minister has raised a question as to the use of words by the hon. member for Vancouver East, to the effect that the Prime Minister has misled the house. I do not think that that is parliamentary.

Mr. MacInnis: I find it difficult sometimes to find a word to express my feelings. I have not had the advantage of a formal education and the fact that my mother tongue is Gaelic does not make it any easier. Words do not come easily to me, and I wish to thank you very much for giving me the proper word—misled the house.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member suggests that the Prime Minister deliberately misled the house that is not parliamentary.

Mr. MacInnis: I did not use the word "deliberately."

Mr. Martin: I think the hon. gentleman ought to withdraw that.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member for Vancouver East did not actually use the word "deliberately" he gave the impression that the Prime Minister had deliberately deceived the house. I think he should withdraw the imputation.

Mr. MacInnis: After what I have said I find it very difficult, even at Your Honour's request, to withdraw the impression that I have left with the house because that is the impression I got. However, if it is unparliamentary to use the phrase, of course I withdraw it.

Here is the kind of thing that we have in this bill, and this is by no means the most important section in the bill.

Section 87E, dealing with suitable employment, has nothing to do with supplementary benefits. It is not required at all to take care of the critical unemployment situation confronting us today. The section reads:

Any employment that, in the opinion of an insurance officer, a person who claims supplementary benefit is able to perform shall be deemed suitable, notwithstanding paragraphs (b) and (c) of subsection 2, and subsection 3, of section 40 of this act.

That is an important amendment. It varies the principle embodied in the act when it was first drafted. It leaves the question of suitable employment to the insurance officer. I submit to you we should not have amendments of that kind put before us and the house asked to rush them through without giving the people who are affected by the legislation, the people who pay the contributions, an opportunity to see what the effect of the amendments is going to be. I deplore the way this matter has been handled.

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word at this stage. I do not intend to go into the subject of general unemployment although, so far as I know, the government agenda does not provide any other place where we might better discuss that problem. As was expressed clearly the other day by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw), we see no great objection to the amendment in that it gives a little bit more relief to some of those who are unemployed if they come under the legislation. Generally speaking, it seems to me that the bill is not going to benefit a great many more than it did before. It is true that there will now come under the bill some industries which were not included before. The ceiling has been raised from $3,120 to $4,800, and that will bring in a great amount by way of extra contributions. To that extent the fund will be swelled. Whether the increased benefits will be in the same ratio as the increase in collections is problematical. Probably the minister will explain that as we go along. Certainly the benefits that are to be paid under the supplementaries are not going to be sufficient to take care of the problem involved.

One thing that concerns me very much is the thousands of unemployed who are not going to benefit as a direct result of these amendments. When the legislation was introduced I was in hopes that the government would see to it that the amendments to be made to the legislation would be comprehensive enough to cover at least a large majority of the people who are now unemployed. I want to join with the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) in his statement as to the procedure that is being followed in connection with this measure. The amendments presented to us are most complicated when you compare them with the original act, and it seems to me that it will take a tremendous amount of work in order to get the thing in proper shape. In my judgment this is no place to do that. I think it would be far better for the bill to be referred to a committee where it can have the thorough study that it deserves. Otherwise when the new amendments come into operation we are going to find ourselves in the position where a great many worthy organizations which should have been included under the bill will be exempt. In that respect it is not meeting the conditions for which it is intended. I should think the acting minister would be only too pleased to have the bill referred to a committee. In that way it could be brought back to the house in a satisfactory form to which the whole house could agree. I strongly recommend that procedure to the minister.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join in the protest that has already been made by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). As members in all parts of the house well know, it took the unanimous consent of the house for this measure to be dealt with yesterday and today. I certainly can speak for myself, and I think for others too, when I say that we gave unanimous consent because we were led to believe that the important part, if not the whole of the bill, dealt with ways and means of getting supplementary benefits to certain people now unemployed and not receiving them.

It was pointed out to us that the department had already made the necessary arrangements and that certain cheques, as a matter of fact, could go out right away if we facilitated the passage of the measure. That is the kind of situation that we frequently find ourselves in, but in view of the obvious distress, to use the Prime Minister's word, and the possibility that this measure would provide some relief for that distress we agreed to upset the established procedure for this week and permit the bill to be introduced. On receiving the bill today, an hour or two at the most before the house convened this afternoon, we find it has in it a number of things that call for changes in the basic part of the Unemployment Insurance Act. It is that sort of thing that led my colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver East, to use language that was regarded as perhaps unparliamentary. But, Mr. Speaker, you can see the situation. I shall not say the same thing, but you can see how we feel. Under the pretext of an emergency we have been given not a simple bill to deal solely with that emergency but a bill that provides pitiable relief of that distress, and along with it makes major and fundamental changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act itself.

The Acting Minister of Labour (Mr. Martin), and the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour, who has also had occasion to express this view, know that when we have asked in previous sessions for changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act—and the same thing happens when we ask for changes in the national labour code—we have been told that this legislation is the result of long consideration. We are told that drafts and subsequent drafts have been referred to the labour congresses, the Canadian Manufacturers Association, and the provincial governments and as a result the legislation that is before the house represents the consensus of the various governmental and other bodies that are interested. Therefore it is said to us that no matter how good the suggestions we offer on the floor of the house it would not be wise to upset legislation that has that kind of support behind it.

This afternoon we receive a bill containing basic and fundamental changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act. I can say categorically that up until three o'clock this afternoon neither the president of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada nor the president of the Canadian Congress of Labour had seen a copy of the bill. I do not know whether the employers have seen a copy of it, but I doubt whether they were able to get one either, because it was available only to a few of us when it was first handed around a couple of hours before the house met. That simply is not playing fair with the house, with the people interested in the measure, or with workers across the country or employers either, for that matter. In addition to the statement I made about the top officials of the two labour congresses, I can say that, since reports have appeared in the press as to what is coming, I have had complaints from representatives of labour in this city today as to some of the other changes that are proposed in the measure. My colleague the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) has referred to the amendment having to do with the phrase "suitable employment". Granted that this is tied to the portion of the act which relates to supplementary benefits; still that phrase "suitable employment" has been one of the greatest bones of contention in the Unemployment Insurance Act. We have discussed it and complained about it on the floor of this house time and again, but we have been told it could not be changed without consulting all these people concerned. Now we have an amendment which makes that phrase even worse than it was before, with respect to the payment of supplementary benefits, and we are asked to rush it through.

We find, too, that there has been a change in the statutory condition which requires 180 days' contributions within the last two years. Now we find that in addition an employee seeking benefits must show that he has made at least 60 of those contributions within the last twelve months or 45 within the last six months. That is not an alternative; it is an addition to the statutory condition which has been there since this act was brought down in 1940. All kinds of workers across this country who have been paying their premiums through the years will feel that in a sense this is the breaking of a contract. True, it is a one-sided contract in that it is legislation which they have to abide by; but these were the conditions under which they have been paying their premiums all this time, and now a change has been made. When I asked officials of the labour congresses here in Ottawa what they thought of this the only answer I could get was, "Well, I have not seen the bill; I don't know what it is all about."

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): If my hon. friend will permit me, on a point of order I would like to say that everything contained in the present bill which refers to the existing act, changing or clarifying any existing provision, has been submitted to the advisory committee on insurance. This has been stated already, and I should like my hon. friend to take note of it. Part IIA of this bill, having to do with supplementary benefits, did not go to the advisory committee on insurance but went to an interdepartmental committee on social security.

Mr. Knowles: I think you will agree, Mr. Speaker, that this is not a point of order, but I do not mind it as an interjection; as a matter of fact it helps me out. I would point out that in the bill now before us there is an explanatory statement in connection with every clause; and in a number of cases it is stated that the clause in question, either in detail or in substance, has been approved by the national unemployment insurance advisory committee. In some cases, however, that sentence does not appear; and because of the zeal with which that sentence is put in whenever that is the case I can only assume that there are a number of these sections, even in the changes to the original act, about which the advisory committee knew nothing. This conflict between the statement made just now by the parliamentary assistant and the statements made to me by responsible labour leaders strikes me as very strange. They have seen reports of this statement that these matters have been referred to them; yet they say they have not seen them.

I repeat, every time we want to make a change we are told that this legislation has been built up after long consideration and that it cannot be changed without equally long consideration, so it seems hardly fair to bring about these amendments in this unsatisfactory manner. I would point out as well that changes are proposed in the rates of contributions which employees will make. There are some anomalous details in that connection which I shall not discuss now but will reserve until we get into committee on the bill. It means that once this bill comes into effect many workers across the country are going to find the deduction from their regular pay a little higher than it was before. They are going to wonder what this government and this parliament are doing down here. They think we are doing something to help out the unemployed who need supplementary benefits; but lo and behold, the deduction from their pay cheques is going to be greater. They are going to discover the rather strange fact that the deduction increases by just the same amount for those in the lower categories as for those in the higher ones, with but slight exceptions.

Then there are corresponding changes in the rates of benefits to be paid, all of which are fundamental changes in the basic act itself; yet we are given really no opportunity to pass upon those. There is a little bit of relief for the distressed in the bill, and if we oppose it or delay it or even have it sent to committee, as was suggested by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston), we will be accused of withholding payments from some of the 70,000 unemployed who might get something under this legislation. There is also a change with respect to temporary unemployment, which seems to be somewhat confused. As a matter of fact a number of the calls I have had today relate to the confusion on that point.

I do think the government does this sort of thing just a little too often. It has something good; it may be little enough, but it is sufficiently good for us to support it. But along with it they include other things that, to say the least, require more mature consideration. So I feel that the protest made by the hon. member for Vancouver East is valid indeed and I support that protest as strongly as I can.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): I have only a few words to say on this matter at this time. We are dealing now with the principle of the bill, and this is the only chance we will have to say anything in that connection. Well, what is the principle of this bill? As I see it the principle of the bill is to raise more money for the unemployment insurance commission and, as to the benefits to the unemployed that will be paid out for the additional period, to reduce by 20 per cent the payments made by the commission. Stripping this bill of all the legal language, that is exactly what it means to me.

I am not going to repeat anything that has been said already by the two previous speakers from this group, but I want to emphasize that this is the principle we are dealing with. Throughout the country there is a crisis in employment; and it is growing. In my opinion this bill was designed by the government to take the edge off that crisis. We get into a discussion on unemployment, and unless this is understood pretty thoroughly a lot of people are going to assume that this legislation is going to do something about our unemployment problem.

Take this business of increasing the amount of money available to the unemployment insurance commission. The bill suggests a change in connection with employees in the boy class. Previously the employer paid the contribution for that employee. Under the terms of this bill the employee will have to make that contribution himself.

Mr. Martin: His own contribution.

Mr. Gillis: That is right; but previously the employer made it for him.

Mr. Martin: But he obtained no benefits.

Mr. Gillis: Yes, he did. We can argue that point when we come to the section; I know Mr. Speaker does not want me to go into the bill clause by clause. That change means more money to the commission, with very little increase in benefits. Then you are giving coverage to another income group, up to $4,800 a year, which will include another 90,000 people. In my opinion that is a pretty select group, who are not going to draw on the fund. They are the men in the executive class, and that means more money for the commission. It is throwing the burden for paying for the upkeep of the unemployed on a group of men who, in my opinion, will never receive any benefit from the act. Then, the one cent increase is going to mean a lot of money to the unemployment insurance fund. It would seem, therefore, that the only connection this bill has with the present unemployment situation is the extension of benefits from January to the end of March and, providing the bill passes this year, until April 15. While the benefits are being extended to people who are unfortunately unemployed for that length of time, the amount payable to them is being cut by 20 per cent. Personally, I cannot justify that principle. So far as I can see, those are the two principles contained in the bill. No. 1 is to get more money for the commission, and No. 2 decreases the rates that are now in existence.

I should like to mention this advisory committee. If you look at the bill, you will find that of all the sections contained in it there are only two concerning which it is emphasized that the advisory committee has agreed to them in principle. The advisory committee is composed of representatives of labour and of the employers. If these representatives are not going to be consulted when basic changes are made in the act, then the committee serves no useful purpose. The bill provides also for an increase in the number of representatives on the committee. I know the program of labour concerning the changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act. These changes are certainly a long way from it. I am reasonably sure that most of the changes, as the bill itself indicates, were not agreed to by the advisory committee.

In my opinion, that is a serious objection. I know that if I were the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and a man who is as honourable as he is, if I were pinch-hitting for the Minister of Labour, who is unfortunately ill, and I was handed a bill such as this, one of the first questions I would ask the parliamentary assistant would be, "Has this bill been before the employer-employee committee?"

Mr. Martin: That was one of the first things I did.

Mr. Gillis: I imagined you would. Then, the parliamentary assistant would have to say, " I am sorry, but only two sections of the bill went before that committee."

Mr. Martin: He said just the opposite.

Mr. Gillis: The bill does not say that. The bill clearly says that the committee agreed upon two matters in principle, one of which was the increasing of the amount of permissible earnings. They are small details. In so far as the basic changes are concerned, such as the rates and the people to be included, I do not think the committee was consulted.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): May I say that on the question of the disappearance of the fraction of a cent in the rate of contribution, the advisory committee was consulted and unanimously agreed the change was reasonable.

Mr. Gillis: I would agree to that myself.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): That is a basic change.

Mr. Gillis: That was not a basic change, that was just a reasonable change. In fact, that was a good change, and I would have agreed to that myself. I do not believe this complicated bookkeeping, and the chasing around of fractions, means anything but a lot of trouble. The committee agreed to that in principle.

As I said before, the drafters of the bill were careful to write into the bill the few places in which they could say the advisory committee agreed to this in principle. Such was the case in only about one-half of one per cent of the bill. The other changes were not agreed to by that committee. I am deeply concerned about this advisory committee. If it is only to be window-dressing, and to be used merely when the department wants to use it, then I think we should have an understanding on it.

If I were a member of the advisory committee representing labour, and a bill with the far-reaching effect of this bill were brought in by the department, I would certainly disclaim any responsibility and quit the committee. I would have my say or I would not remain on the committee. If the members of this house are assured that neither the employer nor the employee representatives are to be consulted about these things, we can take a different attitude in the house. When I know a committee representing the people vitally concerned in these matters actually functions, I am not so inclined to be suspicious as I would be if the committee were not there. I strongly urge upon the minister and the parliamentary assistant that when matters of this kind are discussed in the future the committee should be used, and thus guarantee that the measure receives some consideration by a committee, which is really the only place such matters can be properly considered.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Designated officers may administer oaths.

Mr. Pearkes: Most of the speakers who have discussed this bill, either in the resolution stage or on the second reading, have referred to the implications of it in large metropolitan areas in which there are offices of the unemployment insurance commission. The first section of the bill deals with the administration of that commission, and I should like to address a remark or two to the workings of the commission in the smaller centres which have small offices. There are several such small centres in my constituency. These offices have been flooded during the last few months owing to the sudden rush of men—

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, there is no objection to letting the hon. member say a few words of a general nature on this subject, but it has no relevancy to clause 1 of the bill. It was thought proper to point this out to the committee, so there would be no trespassing upon the rules.

Mr. Pearkes: I have been referring to the administration. Surely clause 1 relates to the administration and conduct of the offices of the commission. I do not intend to speak at any length, but I believe my remarks are in order, because they are pertinent to the administration of this act. In these small centres, the unemployment insurance commission offices have not been able to cope with the sudden rush of men who have been thrown out of employment, because of the shutting down of the mines or the closing of some of the logging camps on Vancouver island. The closing down of these camps is seasonal, but it is a recurring coincidence year after year; and then these men come in and find that they cannot get their claim adjusted immediately because there is either a shortage of staff or a shortage of trained staff; then a great deal of discontent is shown.

The question I should like to ask at the present time is this. Is there to be any simplification in the procedure whereby perhaps additional staff may be brought in immediately so that they may be taught how to deal with these new problems which will arise as soon as this bill comes into force, and whether it would be practicable to increase the number of adjudicators so that the claims would not have to be referred to a central office? In my particular case, claims arising in Nanaimo have to be sent over all too frequently to the central office in Vancouver, where there is a considerable delay because there is not an adjudicator in Nanaimo. I do not know whether it is a case of new and additional adjudicators, or whether the local agent in the small cities should have his powers increased so that he might be able to adjudicate on some of these claims. But I am quite certain that one of the reasons for a certain amount of discontent is the delays that have been experienced in the smaller offices.

I do ask if possible that a simpler form of procedure may be brought in and that the steps be taken now so that the provisions of this act may be implemented immediately that the cheques are available.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): Answering my hon. friend, I may say that the commission has been studying very closely ways and means whereby the servicing of the insured would be increased across the country. To the particular question that my hon. friend asked I may say that the number of adjudicators has been increased by slightly over two hundred. Powers have been asked and are being considered for a further substantial increase of their numbers.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether I may be allowed to make a few observations at this stage. I am not particularly familiar with the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940, which has had a good many amendments in the past ten years. To be confronted with a bill at three o'clock this afternoon, and to be expected to understand it, would require the wisdom of a Solomon. I know there are a great many wise men here but I do not profess to belong to that class. Because I do not know under what particular section I should bring these points out I should like to be permitted to point out to the minister certain difficulties that have arisen to my knowledge in connection with the administration of this act in Newfoundland.

There is the instance of men who were working on public works and who, prior to the provincial election in May, had to be laid off in accordance with the provisions of the Newfoundland election act of 1913. Before the month had expired some of these had occasion to go and apply for insurance, and they drew six days' insurance. Under the law as it applies to Newfoundland since April 8, 1949, unemployment assistance rather than unemployment insurance was granted, because they had not made any contributions. They went back to work on May 31, and then they were laid off as seasonal workers. The work closed down. When they went to apply for the insurance they were not granted any. They were told that they had received six days' insurance, and that was all they were entitled to until six months had expired. The acting minister, and certainly the parliamentary assistant, knows all about it, and I do not suppose it is anything unusual. It seems to me to be an extraordinary thing that men who have been employed for four years can draw only six days' insurance and were refused any further benefits.

The second class that I wish to bring to the attention of the minister is that of workers on other public works who had to wait five weeks and still have not received their insurance. Acting on their behalf I took up the matter with the local office, and was informed that they were swamped with applications for insurance. But surely, if it is to be of any benefit, it should have been attended to before that length of time had elapsed; otherwise the people had to depend upon charity or they would have starved. Therefore I suggest to the acting minister, and to the minister himself when he comes back, which I hope will be soon, that some attention should be given to a proper adjudication of those claims. They should not have to wait so long.

Section agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Rates of contribution.

Mr. Graydon: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make an observation, if I may, on this section, which has to do with rates of contribution. It may properly be said that because the federal government has gone so far into trade, into business and commerce, in the natural flow of events the question of unemployment and the question of workers' conditions, wages, jobs and so on are predicated to a very great extent upon the policies of the government of the day. At least, when things are good the government takes the credit for it. I suppose when they are bad the government will not be quite so prone to advertise their relationship to that condition, but nevertheless they have to take the bitter with the sweet.

That leads me to this point. The change in the Unemployment Insurance Act, both as to contributions and the other sections as well, is largely brought about by the fact that people have not as many jobs as they did have and that the future of their jobs is much more uncertain than it was a year or so ago. That means that the government has a responsibility with respect to the unemployment situation and the insurance against it. That has been recognized by the fact that the government is now guaranteeing the fund. What it means is that if the fund has not enough money by contributions the government puts up the difference. In establishing that principle with respect to unemployment insurance the government has accepted some responsibility for the matters which are causing the situation which would call for greater benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act.

The point on which I find myself in great disagreement with the administration is why the government, which has partially accepted responsibility for the condition, asks the worker to put up more money because there is some unemployment which has been caused by policies or conditions which are under the jurisdiction of the government. I think it is adding insult to injury to ask the worker of this country to underwrite the unemployment situation, even to the degree that the government is now asking him to do so. I do not think the worker should have been asked to do that. In many instances the worker is in a pretty insecure position. I do not think that he should be asked to carry more of his share with respect to unemployment benefits than he is doing now. It is asking too much of our working people to ask them to increase their contributions in order to relieve unemployment, or the results of unemployment, in the country. So far as this financial measure is concerned, that rests squarely on the doorstep of the government. Surely we are not going to put the unemployment situation over on the doorstep of the workers of Canada, who are themselves likely to feel the pinch as the days go on. That is the thing the government ought to be shouldering. Having accepted that principle, surely there is no reason why they should not have gone that far. There may be valid reasons which dictated the government's position on that. But the government will never get the worker to see that they are valid reasons—and, frankly, I have not been able to see them, either.

I suggest that at this stage the government should consider very carefully whether it should not either change or withdraw the amendment it is making which would have the effect of directing the workers in this country to put up more money for the unemployment insurance fund. It ought to be the other way round. We ought not to be shouldering the worker with more burden; we ought to be taking something off his back, rather than putting it on.

For that reason I suggest that the government ought to retrace its steps and retreat from its position. This amendment is feeble and futile enough as it stands. It is a half loaf being accepted by parliament, rather than nothing. Nevertheless it seems to me we have reached the limit of absurdity when we ask the workers of this country to put up more money to solve the unemployment situation. That is the government's job, not the workers'.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say something similar to what has been said by the hon. member for Peel. I feel that the government, through the acting minister or the parliamentary assistant, must give a full explanation of the basis upon which these new rates were arrived at.

I presume it will be said that in return for the increased amount each worker is being asked to pay he will receive the guarantee of a slightly higher rate of benefit, if he has to go on unemployment insurance. That is an argument which seems to have some logic in it. But it is pretty hard to sell it to the worker who is not anticipating unemployment, but who sees this increase in the amount he has to pay brought in just at a time when apparently the government is being generous and doing something for the unemployed.

This will look to the workers of this country exactly as it has been described by the hon. member for Peel. It will seem as though the workers are to be asked to pay an additional tax which is said to be necessary to enable the government to send out these cheques—which will go out if and when the legislation passes.

The minister made the statement that the increase was to be one cent a day. Well, that is pretty easy to recite; it sounds very small—just a cent a day. But it happens to be six cents a week by way of an additional deduction from the average worker's take-home pay. I have one or two observations to make in that connection. The first is that, except for some differences which I shall point out later, that six cents is across the board. A person who is making $10 a week and is now paying 18 cents unemployment insurance will pay six cents more. A person who is making $35 a week and is now paying 42 cents a week unemployment insurance will pay six cents more. That is not a very fair method of taxation—to add the full six cents on to the unemployment insurance deductions of the people in those two different categories.

Let us take the case of the boy to whom reference was made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, the boy working for $5.40 a week or less than that. I hope there are not any of them from whom unemployment premiums will be taken. That is a ridiculous wage even for a boy to be receiving. But the provision is here. Under the act as it stood before, a boy making less than $5.40 a week paid no premium out of that amount.

Mr. Martin: And received no benefits.

Mr. Knowles: Just a moment; you said that before. He paid no premiums, and had no deductions from his $5.40. The total premium paid for him was 18 cents, 9 cents of which was paid by the employer under the employer's name, and 9 cents paid by the employer on behalf of the boy.

Let us get it straight. A boy who was making $5.40 a week paid nothing out of his own earnings.

Mr. MacInnis: Or a girl.

Mr. Knowles: Yes. Anyone making $5.40 a week paid nothing. Under the new provision brought in today such a person will pay 18 cents a week. I have already indicated the gross unfairness of it.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): May I give an immediate reply?

Mr. Knowles: Yes.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): Speaking first of the first class in the old scale, the insured earning $5.40, under the age of sixteen, may I say the aggregate number in that category is one-half of one per cent of the total number of insured under the act.

Mr. Knowles: I was going to come to that. I was about to say that if it were only one boy in the whole of Canada who, thus far, had been paying nothing into the unemployment insurance fund, but who is now called upon to pay 18 cents a week to help the government hand out these supplementary benefits, then that is a shame and something of which this parliament should not approve.

The parliamentary assistant says that it is less than one-half of one per cent. I would assume therefore that it is more than one boy, or that it is a number of boys—perhaps one or two hundred. Offhand I do not know what the number is; but I submit it is bad enough to assess an extra six cents against the person making $10 a week equally as against the person making $35. And certainly it is adding insult to injury to pick out the boy who makes only $5.40 a week, and to ask him to pay 18 cents—

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): This is insurance; this is not assistance or relief.

Mr. Knowles: I know it is insurance; and the parliamentary assistant is now underlining our complaint about the whole bill, namely that under the pretext of an emergency, or the pretext of an extreme urgency to deal with distress, the government has brought in basic changes in the act. I believe changes should be made in the act, and I have argued for those changes ever since I came here. But the time to deal with them is when we have sufficient time to go into them on a proper basis, instead of going at it with a gun at our heads, as at the present time.

I have gone out, as has the hon. member for Vancouver East, and pointed out to working people that this is insurance. That is what labour asked for, and it is a good thing to have. But it is a strange coincidence to have to provide these increases in amounts just at a time when the government is apparently being generous and giving supplementary benefits to some of the thousands now drawing nothing at all.

I submit there is a coincidence here which will be pretty hard for the government to explain. However, I want them to do it. I want them to explain how they arrived at this new scale, and why it is six cents across the board. It is not completely so, because I realize there are one or two places where there is no increase because of an overlapping of the old group with the new; and there are one or two places where the increase is only three cents, and one place where it is nine cents. Also, for those in the highest brackets the increase will be twelve cents a week. I would point out at the same time that the increases on the part of employers are not quite the same. Because of this equalization of payments between employers and employees the extra amount to be paid by employers is not as great as the extra amount to be paid by employees.

There has to be some explanation of this—not just figures drawn out of a hat. I think the question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Lake Centre should be answered now and we should be told how much the government expects to get because of these increased rates. Again quoting the hon. member for Lake Centre, I think when we get to the supplementary benefits section we should be given figures showing how much the government expects it will have to pay out. It looks as though these rates are being increased under the pretext of their being insurance when in fact they simply represent the money necessary to pay out these supplementary benefits.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to say a word about the levies that are provided by this section. I pointed out this afternoon that at the dominion-provincial conference of 1945 representations were made by the dominion government through the Minister of Labour as follows, and I quote from page 387 of the proceedings:

> In addition to unemployment insurance, the dominion will set up a system of unemployment assistance under which it will pay benefits equal to eighty-five per cent of unemployment insurance benefits, to unemployed persons able and willing to work who are not entitled, or who have ceased to be entitled, to unemployment insurance benefits. This assistance will be limited to two years of continuous assistance, but a person will again become eligible for this assistance following an approved period of employment.

As I pointed out this afternoon, unemployment assistance is just another way of saying supplementary benefits, the phrase used in this bill. I feel that the charging and imposition of these levies on the employer and employee are a denial of the representations made to the provinces in 1945 by the Minister of Labour. It is inexcusable and should not be done. In 1945 the Minister of Labour undertook on behalf of the dominion government to provide all of this unemployment assistance.

What is the justification for this further levy? It is a denial of what was promised in 1945. It is all very well to say it is a small levy, but the dominion government undertook at the conference in 1945 to provide unemployment assistance for the persons covered by this bill under the heading of supplementary benefits. Has consideration been given to this by the provinces? Have they been consulted? This is in fact a travesty of what was undertaken in 1945 at the dominion-provincial conference.

Not only do I disagree with the amount of the levy, I disagree with the right to impose the levy in view of what the Minister of Labour said in 1945. I ask the minister: Is not the provision of these benefits the same thing that the Minister of Labour undertook in 1945 would be supplied by the dominion government at the expense of the people of Canada as a whole?

That is what was promised. You can change the name and call them supplementary benefits instead of unemployment assistance as it was called in 1945; it is the same thing. I submit that it is unjustifiable that a further levy should be made in order to meet this so-called extraordinary situation, incidental as the government claims, to peculiarly difficult climatic or local transitory conditions that will soon pass away. That is the government's allegation, it is not ours.

That being so, what justification is there to impose a levy on the man who works to meet a situation that the government says is transitory, to provide for supplementary benefits? As a matter of fact, this whole question of supplementary benefits is being dragged in by the back door into the Unemployment Insurance Act. There is no justification whatsoever for that. There is no unemployment insurance act that I know of that provides for supplementary benefits such as are being provided for here, and I have read the United States and the British acts. This looks like another scheme whereby the responsibility of the dominion government as enunciated by the Minister of Labour in 1945 is being evaded through the subterfuge of changing names.

I protest most strongly against a further levy being made against the man who works to provide for a situation which the government says is transitory and local, which is the result of conditions peculiar to various areas, rather than having this considered as a national unemployment situation. This is the type of expenditure that the government has always had to make since 1945. Prior to 1945, as is shown in the debates from 1928 to 1945, there was an endeavour to place upon the provinces or the municipalities responsibility for those in this category. In 1945 the government accepted the sole responsibility of providing for unemployment in the transitory sense.

It is not a large contribution that is being asked for, but the principle is wrong and unjust. However small it may be, when a principle is at stake there is good reason to object to a levy such as is being made here.

Mr. Noseworthy: I think before we pass this section we should be clear in our minds as to just what is involved. During my speech yesterday the Acting Minister of Labour informed us most emphatically that the purpose of this amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act was not to provide a substitute for employment, that it was not a measure to take care of unemployment, that it was simply a redrafting of the act.

We are told in the explanatory note opposite page six that the purpose of the additional cent per day is to provide part of the money that will be paid out in supplementary benefits and that supplementary benefits are being provided because of the unemployment situation during certain months of the year. Regardless of what the minister has said, this is the government's method of meeting the unemployment situation during these particular months.

Working people are being called upon to contribute from their earnings in order to provide money that the government will pay to the unemployed during certain seasons of the year. The government has completely reversed its policy in regard to providing for unemployment. As yet we have had no indication that the government has any other measure to bring before this house to take care of the unemployment situation. I am quite sure that the workers will resent the government calling upon them to finance an unemployment situation in this country which has always been the responsibility of the federal government.

There is one question I should like to ask. I note that the inclusion of a new class is recommended by the unemployment insurance advisory committee. Did the unemployment insurance advisory committee also recommend the increases that are in this table? I think we should have a direct answer to that question.

Mr. Fulton: Before the minister answers, I should like to add my voice to those who have said already that it is not just or sound to expect workers across Canada to have to make contributions on this increased scale, which will be permanent contributions, made a part of the act, in order to provide, as the explanatory note makes clear, for the supplementary benefits outlined in clause 20. In other words, for the sake of getting benefits for three months in the year under a situation which, as the hon. member for Lake Centre so clearly pointed out, the government itself says is only transitory and results only from extraordinary winter conditions, they are going to increase the contribution by six cents per worker forever or for however long he may work. That is exactly what is being done. It is not justified by the situation. It is contrary to the promises which were made, that the dominion government would assume full responsibility for this. No necessity for it has been demonstrated in the course of the remarks of the minister. I certainly suggest the committee should not pass the section until that necessity is proved, and I personally do not believe it can be proved. Before we go any further I think we should have an answer from the minister as to how much these increased contributions are expected to yield, and how much it is anticipated that the increased benefits for these three months of the year will cost.

Mr. Isnor: It appears to me that the hon. member for York South and the hon. member for Kamloops are taking the stand that workers will be opposed to this increase. If I were looking at it from a selfish point of view, representing merchants and retailers, I could take the same stand, but I am not. Organized labour advocated a measure of this kind for years and they were pleased at the time unemployment insurance was brought into effect because it was insuring their future in the same way that we as individuals insure our lives or make provision for our own protection and that of our families by investments, pension schemes, or annuities. I think you get out of this world what you put into it, and if we are going to ask for greater protection and the extension of the benefits, then it is only natural that we must pay. At the time when the measure was first introduced we enjoyed an exceptionally high state of employment and prosperous times, and I think it was most opportune that it should have been introduced then. Employment has increased since then.

I have particularly in mind the last class, $48 a week or more. That should bring in a large amount, and while I, like other members, am concerned about the actual return in dollars and cents from the one cent addition in the various other classes, I am wondering what amount the category to which I have referred will bring in. Is the minister prepared to tell us the amount expected from that particular class?

I feel that workers as a whole, as well as merchants, realize that these increases must come from one source only. After all, the government makes a 20 per cent contribution to the general fund just as other contributions are made. The more you dip into the fund the more you are going to take from the productive pool created by the efforts of the workers and those who are interested in enterprise. For that reason I am inclined to differ from members who have taken the opposite view, and I welcome the measure if there is going to be greater security so far as the insurance angle of the act is concerned.

Mr. MacInnis: I do not think that those members who have criticized these particular amendments have done so so much because of the increase in the contribution as they have because of the fact that the amendments have been introduced without consultation with representatives of those who are to make the contributions. That is one basis on which we object to it. Before unemployment insurance was provided for on the statutes, organized labour had advocated it for many years. Hon. members of the house will recall when unemployment insurance was eventually put on the statutes. It was not done because the government believed in unemployment insurance but because they wanted to use the contributions to unemployment insurance to prevent the development of the inflationary trend at that time. The two matters coincided, and perhaps it is just as well that they did or we would never have got unemployment insurance.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Fulton: We want an answer.

Mr. Noseworthy: Will the minister answer my question?

Mr. Martin: I have listened with a great deal of interest to what has been said. I have no hesitation in saying at once—and I know something about labour in this country—that I am sure every worker in Canada will be willing to pay six cents a week, as a result of this unemployment insurance amendment, in order to assist, under a pattern of supplementary insurance system, in giving him benefits during the winter months if during that period he finds himself out of work. I have no doubt about this and anyone who does not share that view has not the confidence in Canadian labour that I have. What are we doing in this measure? We are extending the principle of unemployment insurance by way of three partners, the employer, the worker and the state. That is the principle which makes the Unemployment Insurance Act the sound measure that it is.

It would have been possible for the administration to alter its course and, instead of exacting premiums from the beneficiaries, to have paid the whole shot itself. But what does that mean? The government merely represents the taxpayers as a whole, and if the government paid the whole contribution not only would it be betraying the principle of insurance but it would also simply be transferring away from the same quarter moneys that it is collecting now in accordance with insurance principles. I think we are developing in this country, and properly so, the idea that our social services, in so far as they lend themselves to this kind of remedy, should be paid for by contributions from those who are possible beneficiaries. What do we find the situation to be in this house with regard to old age pensions? There is a demand, a desire and an expression of opinion that we should develop pensions on the basis of contributory principles, and in so far as that is practicable I hope, as the Prime Minister has said, that it will be possible to do so.

Could we at this stage, when we have built up a great tradition in the administration of unemployment insurance, betray that principle? I do not think that upon reflection any hon. members, even those who have criticized the bill, will come to that conclusion. As I said last night, and as the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) urged me to say, the unemployment insurance fund must remain intact; it must not lose its trust character. One way to make sure that does not happen is to see that no agency, including the state, is allowed to alter it, directly or indirectly, in such a way as later to lead to impairment of that fund. If my hon. friend will recollect the words of the prime minister of this country in 1935, the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, in addressing himself to the measure he introduced, and which was later declared by the courts to be unconstitutional, he will see that Mr. Bennett made this very point, indicating the necessity of providing safeguards with respect to this fund. I do not think one needs to say any more on that point.

In spite of what the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) insists on repeating, even in view of what I said last night, this is not an employment measure. Anyone in his right senses knows that even a government of which my hon. friend has such a low opinion is not so lacking in ordinary intelligence as to make such a declaration of purpose. Of course this is not a measure to relieve unemployment.

Mr. Knowles: Read the speech from the throne.

Mr. Martin: This is exactly what it says, a measure intended to provide benefits for those who suffer the condition against which provision is made in this act, by way of insurance in which they participate, during a period when historically the unemployment rate in our country is higher than in the other months of the year. That is what this measure is, and nothing more. As far as I am concerned, as one member of the government I shall be ready to deal with that other matter when that is to be done, in the way I think it should be dealt with. But let us keep in mind the matter that is engaging us at the present time.

My last comment is in connection with what the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) has said twice today. He said it well, but that does not make it a correct or valid argument. He keeps confusing unemployment assistance with assistance made possible by way of an insurance measure. By no possible construction does this come within the ambit of unemployment assistance. The hon. member referred to the discussions of 1945. Of course proposals were made at that time by this government, and in their broad objectives those proposals are still in mind and have not been abandoned.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And have not been kept.

Mr. Martin: Undoubtedly they will be discussed when the provinces meet next September, and we will have to face such issues. The matter now before us has nothing to do with that kind of assistance. This is not assistance; it is insurance, to which the state and the two partners in industry, the employers and the employees, are contributing. It is a wise principle, which is not new to unemployment insurance. The only criticism that in the circumstances could be legitimately made, I think, is that instead of thinking about this measure today it might have been thought about in 1940 when the original act was introduced. But of course hindsight is always better and more brilliant than foresight. So I say that instead of in any way weakening this principle of contribution, we on this side believe in it, and we feel that the workers of Canada will subscribe to that belief.

Mr. Ferrie: I want to say just a few words with respect to the actual insurance. I heartily endorse this measure, and I think we should put it through as quickly as possible so the boys who need this money will get their cheques on March 1. As I see it, however, one thing is left out that I should like to see put in. Take the man who comes out of the mine, the man who comes off the railroad, who goes to a doctor and suddenly finds that he has cancer, or something else radically wrong that cannot be helped. He is out of a job; and he is out of unemployment insurance. That man has paid his insurance, and he is going to pay more now; and I believe that man should be taken care of.

Mr. Knowles: I think the minister should try to give an answer to the question we have asked repeatedly, as to the increased revenue to the fund that is anticipated from these higher rates.

Mr. Martin: I do not think I should try to give an answer which cannot be entirely accurate. That depends upon factors not now known. We could give an estimate, but it might not be helpful in the matter. The whole thing has yet to be calculated. This is a new experiment for us, and I submit that, not knowing how many will be employed in any given period or what will be the extent of unemployment during winter months, if it does take place, we cannot with any sense of responsibility give a figure.

Mr. Knowles: How did you set the figure?

Mr. Martin: It is a calculation based upon actuarial principles.

Mr. Graydon: It must have been a guess.

Mr. Martin: It was an estimate, and every estimate is a guess.

Mr. Graydon: But you say you cannot make an estimate.

Mr. Martin: It was an estimate, and in view of that fact I do not think I should give anything that is not reasonably close to absolute certainty. What we do know is that the one cent a day contribution by the employer and the employee, and the commitment of the government to supply the difference in the fund, will be carried out. At the end of 1952, in the light of our experience in the interval, we may have to revise our calculations.

Mr. Knowles: I think the minister should be pressed to tell us the basis on which these figures were arrived at. Surely he does not think the government can just sit down and guess at any figure, which might be this or might be that, and expect us to approve it. We should know the basis on which these figures were arrived at. The minister says it was done on an actuarial basis. I never knew an actuary who did not deal in pretty definite figures. However, I will go on to something else; plenty of others around here will see to it that that question is pressed.

When I was speaking previously the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour interjected a figure the meaning of which in absolute figures—since I was speaking at the moment—I was unable to calculate. He said the number of people in the zero class covered by unemployment insurance was less than one-half of one per cent. Could he give us the number in that category at the present time?

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): Roughly 15,000.

Mr. Knowles: Now, we shall see what that means. If the parliamentary assistant has given me the wrong figure, will he please correct me before I make a calculation based upon it? He says that 15,000 people amongst those covered by unemployment insurance are in the class who receive $5.40 per week or less. In other words, I suppose that covers a lot of boys and girls. They are the people who are now paying no unemployment insurance out of their own pocket. Let us get that absolutely clear. There are 15,000 boys and girls earning $5.40 per week or less, who are registered and covered by unemployment insurance, but who pay nothing out of their own pocket.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): But who get no benefit.

Mr. Knowles: We all know that, but they accumulate benefits.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): It serves to build up the benefit year.

Mr. Knowles: There are 15,000 people who are now making $5.40 per week or less, and who pay nothing out of their own pocket. At the moment 18 cents per week is paid for them, 9 cents in the name of the employer and 9 cents on behalf of the employee, but paid by the employer. In practical terms, therefore, the employer is paying 18 cents and the boy or girl is paying nothing.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): The exact number is 14,850.

Mr. Knowles: Let me stay with the round figure of 15,000. There are roughly 15,000 boys and girls who are going to be asked to pay 18 cents per week—

An hon. Member: You have told us that six times.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Knowles: They are going to be asked to pay 18 cents per week. In 52 weeks that amounts to $9.36. If you multiply 15,000 by $9.36 per year, it amounts to $130,400.

The parliamentary assistant says that the number is less than 15,000, so I shall settle for $125,000. I ask the minister to get away from this high-sounding language he is using, and face what this government is asking this parliament to approve. We are asking the boys and girls of this country who are making $5.40 or less per week to contribute $125,000 per year in order to help provide these supplementary benefits.

Mr. Martin: May I tell my hon. friend that he can do nothing better than to join in the suggestion that that would be a very good lesson to give to the younger people of this country.

Mr. Knowles: The speech the minister makes reminds me of the speeches that were made in England 150 years ago, by some people who said it was good for the children to go into the coal mines or climb up and down chimneys.

An hon. Member: Rubbish.

Mr. Knowles: Rubbish, is it? Members who are crying "Rubbish" should hang their heads in shame that there are 15,000 boys and girls who are working for $5.40 per week.

An hon. Member: We do.

Mr. Knowles: Are you proud of it?

An hon. Member: No.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Really, there must be more order in the proceedings. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has not concluded his remarks. I ask all other hon. members not to interrupt the member who has the floor.

Mr. Knowles: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I want to respond to the challenge of the minister. I do not think this is any sort of lesson to be giving the boys and girls of this country in social responsibility, to put this sort of thing on their shoulders now.

Let me go further. Do not forget that when I first got to my feet I stressed the fact that we want to know what these new rates are going to produce, and I want to know that before this section passes. The senior member for Halifax said a moment ago that employees would be glad to pay these increased rates, because of the increased insurance they were getting for them. I believe he said that, as an employer, he was willing to pay these increased rates too. He has in mind, of course, the statement of the Acting Minister of Labour concerning the one cent per day or six cents per week across the board for employees and employers alike. May I tell the senior member for Halifax and others that in the case of all those earning less than $15 per week, there is to be no increase in the amount paid by the employer. Just let that sink in for a moment.

Let us take the table that is on page 2 of the bill before you, and compare it with the old schedule which appears on page 43 of the latest office consolidation of the Unemployment Insurance Act. Here are the facts. In the case of those who were previously making less than $5.40 per week, the employer has been paying a total of 18 cents. He will still pay the 18 cents, so there will be no increase for the employer, but there is an 18 cent increase for the employee. In the case of those earning between $5.40 and $7.49 per week, formerly the employer paid 18 cents. He will still pay 18 cents, so there is no increase. The employee was paying 12 cents and he will now pay 18 cents; an increase of 6 cents. The next group covers those earning from $7.50 to $8.99. The employer was formerly paying 24 cents per week and he will now pay only 18 cents a week; a drop of 6 cents. In the case of the employee, the payment goes up from 15 cents to 18 cents; an increase of 3 cents. The next group is from $9 to $9.59. Formerly the employer was paying 24 cents, and he still pays 24 cents, so there is no increase. The employee was paying 15 cents and now pays 24 cents, an increase of 9 cents. The next category covers those earning $9.60 to $11.99. The employer was paying 24 cents and still pays 24 cents, no increase. The employee was paying 18 cents and is now paying 24 cents, an increase of 6 cents. The next group is from $12 to $14.99. The employer was contributing 24 cents and still contributes 24 cents, no change. The employee was contributing 21 cents, and will now contribute 24 cents, an increase of 3 cents.

The dividing lines with respect to those categories have been changed, so I have had to break them into different groups so as to make the calculations accurate. I have taken all cases up to $14.99 per week, and have shown you that in no case is the employer paying any more, and in one small section the employer is actually paying 6 cents less. In all cases, the employees are paying more, varying from 3 cents to 6 cents and 9 cents and, in the case of those 15,000 boys and girls 18 cents, to provide $125,000 for the fund. To talk about high-sounding principles with these features of this bill is a distortion of those high-sounding principles. Certainly the members of this house support the insurance principle, and support the value of the people of the country knowing that they are paying for what they are getting. It is a distortion of that principle, however, to ask those people in these lower brackets to pay these additional amounts. I protest against it most strongly.

I still say we should have some explanation as to how this scale of rates was arrived at. We should be told, and I hope the members will continue to support me in that, what the governments expects these new rates to provide by way of actual increase in revenue to the fund.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The Chairman: When the committee rose at six o'clock we were dealing with section 3.

Mr. Knowles: Is the minister prepared now to give us the figure of the total extra revenue expected by virtue of the increase in rates provided in this clause?

Mr. Martin: I shall have to give that information later in the evening, and I shall try to do so. I cannot give it at the moment.

I think I should deal briefly with the point that my hon. friend was making at six o'clock when he was talking about the figure 14,850. I am not saying that we perhaps did not give him some basis for the statement he was making, but the information should have been supplemented by another statement which I neglected to make. When we give the figure of 14,850, that figure is not meant to be only of persons sixteen years of age. That class "O" includes persons sixteen years of age or under, regardless of their earnings. It would require a great deal of statistical information that I have not got available, or is not easily available to me tonight, to show that they by no means represent anything like the majority. I cannot give an accurate figure. It is also made up of course of persons earning less than 90 cents a day, or $5.40 a week.

Now, the total of those persons is 14,850. But as I say, it includes, I am told by the officers of the commission, a majority who do earn much more than that figure. Perhaps it would have been more helpful if the thing had been broken down, but it is not.

The number of persons in (a) and (b), that is those who were earning more than $5.40, and those earning that or less, I have not got. For instance, if a person under sixteen years of age works and earns say $15 a week he will still be in this class. If he earned only $5.40 he will also be in class "O", both on account of his wage and on account of his age.

I am told by the officers of the commission that most of those who earn $5.40 a week are working in part-time employment. If an older man, a pensioner, for instance, works here and there casually on a part-time basis for a couple of days he may earn in the week a low wage of $5.40, but that does not mean that he has been working a full week. In other words, it is not the rate of earnings per week that determines the class of contribution, but the actual earnings in the week. That, of course, gives a different complexion to the situation. Perhaps it does not meet the argument in principle that my hon. friend was making, but I simply do not agree with the argument that he was making.

It would be interesting to know that the people in the first five groups represent but 3·5 of the working insured group—

Mr. Knowles: The first five groups on the old basis?

Mr. Martin: On the old basis. For instance, without going into all of the figures, the group in No. 1 is 6,600; whereas the group in No. 8 is 1,780,075. Therefore that gives a picture which had not been given earlier. It shows that the situation is not exactly as previously argued.

Mr. Knowles: Has the minister figures for each of the groups? If so, will he put them on the record?

Mr. Martin: Well, in "O" group it is 14,850 with the explanation that I have given, including those below $5.40 and the greater majority who are earning over that in a week. In the first group, 6,600; in the second, 7,700; in the third, 16,500; in the fourth, 40,150; in the fifth, 147,675; in the sixth, 303,050; in the seventh, 433,400; and in the eighth, 34 and over, 1,780,075.

Mr. Knowles: Just a word. I am glad the minister did make that correction with respect to the information that was given me before recess. All the information that I had to go on was the figure which the parliamentary assistant had given me. We now have it clear that that 14,850 includes people getting $5.40 a week or less, and people sixteen years of age and under—or is it under sixteen years of age—regardless of their income? The minister will admit that it is still the case, using the argument that I was making before recess, that $125,000 or more is to be taken from two groups of people, namely, those making $5.40 a week or less, and those under sixteen years of age. I submit that there is nothing very high sounding about that. Certainly that is no basis on which to try to meet the needs of the unemployed at the present time.

I am glad that the minister has given us the figures in those various groups. I am also glad that he is prepared to give us the total amount of expected revenue some time during the evening. It will be possible for me now to take the figures of those various groups and multiply them by the average of 6 cents a week and find out for myself about how much it is expected will be brought in. I think it is only fair to the house and to the workers of this country to show the relationship between the extra amount of money the workers are being asked to pay this year and the extra amount that is to be paid out by way of supplementary benefits.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): May I ask the minister whether the figures given on page 2 would not represent the total amount including the one cent additional paid out.

Mr. Martin: Yes.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Perhaps the minister would like me to help him out in the question asked by the senior hon. member for Hailfax about the amount that will be paid by the 90,000 new people who will be brought under the act by extending the benefits from $3,120 to $4,800.

Mr. Martin: I have to give that later.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I will tell you what it is because it is very simple to calculate. On the basis of $1.08 a week and 90,000 people it would amount to nearly $100,000 a week. There are 52 weeks in the year, therefore the total would amount to about $5 million.

Mr. Martin: That is part of the story, yes.

Mr. Johnston: Before I would be in a position to agree to the passing of the section I would have to have the information that has already been asked for by other hon. members. I do not want to repeat it. It was my intention to ask a question that has been asked several times, namely, what is the total amount of expected revenue that the extra cent will bring in, and then the amount that is expected to be paid out to the recipients who come under the section. Perhaps it is the minister's intention to let the section stand until such time as we get the information. It would hardly be fair to ask us to pass this section until we have the information. Certainly I cannot agree to that. I should like to have the information, and then we could pass the section.

Mr. Martin: I hope to give it later.

Mr. Johnston: Would the minister let it stand until we get the information?

Mr. Martin: We can pass it and get it later.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Johnston: No.

Mr. Martin: I will give it later in the evening.

Mr. Drew: Does the section stand in the meantime?

Mr. Martin: I think we ought to pass it.

Mr. Drew: Not if there is something relating to it which has not been given.

Mr. Knowles: May I give the result of the multiplying I have just done? The minister gave us the total number of people in each of the categories, on the old basis. I have taken the figures he gave for classes one, two, three and four, up as high as $14.99 a week, and I have added them together. They come to 70,950. The average increase of the rate to be paid by that 70,950 is one cent a day or six cents a week or $3.16 a year. Multiplying 70,950 by $3.16 we get the figure of $224,202. Now, we have already cleared about the $125,000. That comes from those earning $5.40 a week or less, and those under sixteen years of age, whatever they are making. So, all told, we have those who earn less than $15 a week and those sixteen years of age or under contributing a total of $349,202 into this fund out of which the proposed supplementary benefits will be paid.

The Chairman: Shall the section carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

The Chairman: Shall the section stand?

Some hon. Members: Stands.

Mr. Martin: Carried.

Mr. Drew: Stands.

The Chairman: Stands. Section 4—

Mr. Martin: We ought to deal with the section. I have said I will give the other information. It is not germane to this section. It is germane to the whole amendment, and later in the evening I hope to have it from the commission. Meantime I think we ought to pass it.

The Chairman: Shall the section carry?

Mr. Graydon: This section should not carry because, while we cannot offer an amendment to this section which would be acceptable under the rules, still there are many members in the committee who would like to vote against it and, so far as contributions are concerned, have it revert to the original position. If it cannot be carried with the consent of all the committee—

Mr. Martin: I have already indicated that it has been approved by the advisory committee, so far as the equalization principle is concerned. If the hon. member wishes a vote, then we will have to vote upon it.

The Chairman: Does the section carry?

Mr. Graydon: On division.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Cape Breton South.

Mr. Gillis: I think that this is the root of the whole bill, and that we should have more information. When this act was first passed it came before the house for analysis, and went to a committee. After much work in committee it came back to the house.

In changing the basis of contribution the minister has asked us to vote on that change with practically no information as to how he arrives at the figures he has given us. In my opinion this is not insurance any more; it is an indirect levy. It is taxation.

The minister also states that the advisory committee had looked at this and approved. The act does not indicate that; but there is a section in the bill which definitely sets out that the committee were consulted. So far as I am concerned, the meagre amount of benefit in this for those who are affected by prolonged unemployment is overshadowed by this inequality in the matter of imposing the rates on the lower income groups. As one member who would like to see this bill go through for the benefit of the unemployed, for whatever benefit there may be in it, I am prepared to say that it should stand and go before a committee for a thorough analysis. I say that because the government is attempting to go right to the roots of the whole Unemployment Insurance Act.

Every time I listen to a discussion of this kind in the house it indicates one thing to me, and that is the necessity of the government getting down to the business of writing an over-all social security act for the people of this country, which would embrace all these things on a contributory basis. With the overlapping of administration costs, and all that kind of thing, this is far from satisfactory. I know it is far from what organized labour in this country is asking. If we close this act now and accept the contributions on the basis the minister is proposing to us, it may be a long time before the act is reopened.

I would suggest seriously to the minister that this be done. If he wishes to go through the rest of the bill he will find it is only incidental. This section is the basis of the whole thing, and we should have a better understanding of it before it passes.

Mr. Isnor: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has criticized the point of view as expressed by me on behalf of the contributing employer group. The hon. member for Cape Breton South states that this is a direct tax. If he is correct, then the direct tax, in so far as the benefit is concerned, applies only to the employer group because they pay 40 per cent of the total amount without receiving any direct benefit.

In other words, they pay 50 per cent of the amount contributed, to make up the weekly payments by employer and employee. They receive no benefit directly or indirectly from that payment. The government pays the other 20 per cent. That is why I say the employer is paying 40 per cent of the total amount toward an insurance plan which is entirely for the benefit of the employee.

I believe I should put this on record to offset the argument advanced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre respecting the low scale of the smaller group in this scheme. I wonder if he realizes just what type of employee that includes. In the great majority of cases it would be a part-time employee or a boy or girl working after hours. Perhaps they may receive a small amount for working after school hours. Perhaps that is another point which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has overlooked.

After all, there are only three types of insurance in which we are interested. First there is the type which we pay ourselves by way of individual insurance. These are amounts which we lay aside either in the form of investment, life insurance, annuities or some other forms of insurance from which we benefit. In that connection we pay the direct cost.

The second type is group insurance in which both employer and employee participate. The third is the one we are now considering, which comes under the Unemployment Insurance Act, where the employer, the employee and the government each pay a proportion. As stated before, the employer pays 40 per cent, the employee pays 40 per cent and the government pays 20 per cent, which makes up the total cost of the payments. Through the years the employer pays without receiving any personal benefit.

I submit that the group represented by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Cape Breton South are unfair to the very people they pretend to represent, labour, or at least that is what they tell us. In 1940 and previous years organized labour was in favour of a system of unemployment insurance such as we now have. As far as I know they were 100 per cent in favour of this act. The objections being raised to bringing these amendments into effect come from the group which pretends to represent labour. For the life of me I cannot follow their argument. This should be placed on the record so that the workingman throughout the country will know the position taken by the C.C.F. on this occasion.

Mr. MacInnis: It will need only a short answer to reply to the argument put forward by the senior member for Halifax. The hon. member is correct when he says that organized labour was in favour of the Unemployment Insurance Act of 1940, but this bill is changing that act in regard to a special class of contributors. No evidence has been brought before this committee to show that organized labour either has been advised of the changes or has indicated approval. Unless the senior member for Halifax can bring forward that evidence his argument is so much eyewash.

Mr. Isnor: To answer the hon. member may I say that the employee representative on the advisory committee has seen these amendments and the advisory committee has informed the government—

Mr. MacInnis: We have no evidence that this bill was ever before the advisory committee, or that the committee have approved of it.

Mr. Gillis: The argument just advanced by the senior member for Halifax is really not an argument; it was just wishful thinking. He hopes that someone will read that statement in Hansard and fall for it. A great percentage of the people in this country are a little better informed on that subject than he thinks they are.

Mr. Isnor: That is why they do not take very much stock in what the hon. member says.

Mr. Gillis: If it were not for men like myself there never would have been an Unemployment Insurance Act. I can recall sending resolutions thirty years ago to Liberal and Tory governments in this country asking for an unemployment insurance act. That practice was followed through the years. I was a member of this house when this act was brought down and we welcomed it because we realized that this was the fulfilment of 25 years of effort. We finally convinced those in authority that such an act was a good thing to have.

I remember the opposition there was to this act when this House of Commons was lobbied by representatives of the manufacturers association and other agencies which were opposed to the interests of the working people. They have opposed it right through and they still oppose it. Fortunately for the government and for this act there was a war on which looked as though it might last a little while. It was thought to be a good time to gather a fund against the anticipated depression that would take place after the war.

I have no illusion as to how the workingman feels about this act, but I do not want to get into an argument on that because I am more concerned about this particular measure. I do not want to see the efforts of thirty years chiselled away, perhaps unconsciously, by people who are advocating this bill at this time. I would rather have the old act without this bill.

The senior member for Halifax says that industry contributes 40 per cent toward the maintenance of the unemployed and gets no benefits. He would seem to indicate that they just throw in 40 per cent out of the goodness of their hearts. But at the end of the year when the employer is reckoning his income tax, the total amount paid to the unemployment insurance fund is written off. In the final analysis the taxpayers of the country are making his contribution. If industry did not have an unemployment insurance fund at this time which had been contributed to on a three-way basis they would be paying heavy taxes for the purpose of taking care of the totally unemployed. I just would not want to see this country with the unemployed that we have without this measure to cushion it. It is a good thing for all concerned that the act is there.

There are two main objections that I have. First, the fund was set up on an actuarial basis. The minister is not able to tell us how they arrived at the figures and the chances are that they may upset the actuarial apple cart. We do not want to see that happen. Let us have it understood that the hon. member for Halifax is an employer. He tells us that labour is in favour of this, when the fact is that labour has never seen it. The head of the Canadian Congress of Labour lives in this city.

Mr. Isnor: I said that labour was in favour of the Unemployment Insurance Act of 1940.

Mr. Gillis: This bill is an entirely different thing.

Mr. Isnor: It is on the same principle.

Mr. Gillis: This bill is taking some of the teeth out of the act. The heads of two large labour bodies live in this city but our information this afternoon was that neither had seen this bill.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We did not see it until today.

Mr. Gillis: We got it this afternoon.

Mr. Isnor: Does the hon. member say that the heads of both labour organizations are against this bill?

Mr. Gillis: They have not seen it. They do not know anything about it.

Mr. Isnor: Are they against it?

Mr. Gillis: No sensible person commits himself on something he has not seen. The hon. member for Halifax has failed to indicate that the employer is being relieved of certain contributions by this bill. The $5 per week employee, and there are all too many of them, has to make his own contribution under this bill, whereas under the 1940 act the employer made that contribution. Another thing that must be remembered is that these benefits are going to accrue only to those who have been out of work for a long time or who are on unemployment insurance. I do not think the hon. member for Halifax wants to have his position—

Mr. Isnor: Let the hon. member make his own case; I will make mine.

Mr. Gillis: The hon. member is in favour of the obtaining of $125,000 a year from a group with an income of about $5 per week for the purpose of taking care of an extra problem created by prolonged unemployment. Then there is another $300,000 approximately out of the pockets of the first four groups set out by the minister. The $5 million is additional; that is going to come out of the new group that has been added. Perhaps they can afford it a little better but nevertheless it is an indirect tax. It is not unemployment insurance for that group at all. The executive group is never going to receive anything from the fund. I am sure they will be willing to contribute their proportionate share, but that is the group on which your whole tax structure bears most heavily. They took it on the chin all through the war and they are still taking it on the chin. Now you are going to impose an extra levy on that income group to the extent of approximately $5 million a year in order to take care of the unemployed in this country.

That is why I would like to see it stand. Some people will say that I am not in favour of it. I am not in favour of imposing additional hardship on groups that are in a position where they are less able to bear it in order to get the benefits that are supposed to be contained in this act. I can see very little benefit in it. I suggest we should do exactly the same thing with this bill as we did when the act was first introduced. We should refer it to a committee, call in the representatives of labour and employers as we did before, and get some agreement on the terms of this measure. If we are going to open it up let us do a half decent job. If it takes another week before we can bring it back into the house let us do that so that we will all understand it. I understand that neither employers nor employees were consulted about this particular bill. They know nothing about it. There are in it one or two items about which they were consulted but which do not mean anything, but they have not had anything to say as to the contributions and how they are going to be applied.

Coming from the province of Nova Scotia, as the senior member for Halifax does, I know that unemployment is pretty bad there, and he and I do not want to disagree on this matter. I should like to see the best possible job done. My experience is that you cannot do a good job in a hurry. This measure has been rushed in here too fast to suit me. Until I have more information as to the bill than I have now I am prepared to vote against it and let the Unemployment Insurance Act remain as it is. I am prepared to have it sent to a committee so that a proper job can be done, which is what should be done if we are going to open up the matter at all. In the meantime let the government do something for the unemployed who are now on the streets and living in missions.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Gillis: If the members to my right and the members over here, with the weight of the machine they have in the house at the present time, want to steamroller this through, that is O.K. with me, but remember you will take the responsibility for it in the future. That kind of thing will boomerang on you. Do not make any mistake about that. In view of the present unemployment situation I think what we should be doing now is to try to do something for municipalities such as Montreal, Vancouver and Toronto, where there is a concentration of unemployed and immediate help is needed.

Mr. Lennard: Hamilton.

Mr. Gillis: Hamilton, Windsor, Sydney, Nova Scotia, Halifax, Winnipeg, although, according to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, Winnipeg is doing something about it.

Mr. Knowles: It is doing better than this.

Mr. Gillis: I think something should be done immediately to relieve the bad spots. In the meantime legislation such as this is something I do not want to fool with. If we are going to open up the act and do something about it I want to see it done properly so that it will have proper consideration.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Drew: On division.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Section agreed to on division.

Section 4 agreed to.

[Mr. Gillis.]

On section 5—Persons to be treated as employers in certain cases.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): Before section 5 carries I should like to ask the minister two questions. In this section we are giving power to the commission to require all employers to see that contributions are paid in respect of their employees. In the explanatory notes relating to the clause I read the following:

> In respect of lumbering and logging, the person so required may be the owner or lessee of the property or timber limits where the operations are carried on with his concurrence.

In my district there are many lumber co-operatives, or forestry syndicates, as we call them down there. They represent groups of farmers and fishermen who in their off season work in the forests for their own co-operatives, incorporated under the law of their province. I come now to my first question. Since in this case the employers and the employees are the same persons, and since these syndicates are co-operatives and are not leasing limits from the provincial government but are cutting lumber on stumpage fees only under the supervision of the forest engineers or licensed scalers of the department of lands and forests, in such a case will the commission ask the provincial government through its lands and forests department to see that contributions are paid by both employers and employees? My second question also relates to the same co-operative system. As I said before, the employers are the same persons as the employees. Am I right in assuming that they will be required to pay dual contributions as employers as well as employees to benefit from the proposed amendments to the act?

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Recovery of contributions made on behalf of employee.

Mr. Carroll: Mr. Chairman, I was on my feet to ask a question as to section 4 when it was ordered carried and the hon. member for Gaspe then proceeded to deal with section 5. There is one question I should like to ask the minister as to section 4, and it has to do with subsection 3 of section 19 of the present act, which reads:

> Where the employed person is not paid wages or other pecuniary remuneration by his employer or any other person, the employer shall be liable to pay the contributions payable both by himself and the employed person and shall not be entitled to recover any part thereof from the employed person.

Is that not a much more favourable clause for the employee than existed before?

Mr. Martin: I think that is right. As to the questions of the hon. member for Gaspe, section 5 is merely one of clarification. The matter which my hon. friend has mentioned is, I know engaging the serious study of the commission.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Rates of contribution.

Mr. Graydon: I rise on a question of privilege concerning section 3, which was carried a few moments ago. The chairman will understand that a rather unusual situation arose. When the chairman called "carried", a number of us called "on division". Then the hon. member for Cape Breton South proceeded to make some observations, and the clause was finally carried. I want it distinctly understood, so that it will be beyond possibility of any misunderstanding on Hansard or in your records, that the section was passed on division. I hope it will be so recorded because I think the chairman will say at once that was said.

The Chairman: There is no record in committee, but it will be on Hansard. Shall the section carry?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Section agreed to on division.

On section 6—Statutory conditions.

Mr. Knowles: I hope the minister will give us a pretty full explanation of what is happening to section 28 of the original act by virtue of this amendment. This is a pretty important section, since it sets out what are known as the statutory conditions. One improvement has been made, which I commend; those under sixteen years of age will now qualify for benefits if they meet the other statutory conditions. Another change is obviously an administrative matter; that is, doing away with the old paragraph (c). But what concerns me is the fact that now even the first time an employee applies for benefits he will have to have made contributions for 180 days within the last two years, and in addition 60 of those contributions must have been in the immediately preceding year, or 45 in the immediately preceding six months. I think I state it correctly when I say that is a change; that the 60 days within the last year or 45 days within the last six months, in addition to the 180 days in the last two years, were not conditions previously. The 60-day provision was there with respect to a person coming back for benefits a second time, but it did not apply when the first application was made.

Some of the complaints we have been receiving today from representatives of labour because of reports that have appeared in the newspapers have related to this change in the statutory conditions; and this is something pretty fundamental to the act. If I may put it in these terms, these are the contractual conditions under which millions of workers have been paying premiums into this unemployment insurance fund for a number of years. Now one of the basic terms of the contract is being changed, and I should like to know why. I want to know what is the significance of the phrase in the explanatory note to the effect that the substance of the amendment of the statutory conditions concerning the number of contributions has been approved by the unemployment insurance advisory committee. At least one of the labour congress heads in this city complained to me about this very section. I note that the approval referred to is approval of the substance. Apparently these are things which are open to considerable question, and I believe the minister should give a pretty full explanation of this section.

Mr. Martin: As my hon. friend has mentioned, the advisory committee has approved the substance of this provision, which I think will commend itself to hon. members.

Mr. Knowles: Just what does that mean?

Mr. Martin: Exactly what it says. The government has the responsibility for legislation. It has discussed this matter with the advisory committee; but that does not mean to say every letter has to be discussed. This government is prepared to accept its responsibility, but the principle involved in this matter has been approved by the advisory committee.

With regard to the explanation, at the present time to qualify for benefits a person must have made 180 contributions within two years of his claim. On a second or subsequent claim 60 of those contributions must have been made since the commencement of his last benefit year. This provision worked a hardship on persons who became ill, accepted employment in non-insurable industry, or worked on their own account after setting up a claim. The amendment modifies this second condition, and in future a person can qualify provided he has 180 contributions, 60 of which were made within a year prior to the claim or 45 within six months prior to the claim. So it will be seen that the 45 is a relaxation of the 60, and definitely a benefit. In addition the present provision has been further modified so that the period of one year or six months may be extended after periods of illness, self-employment, or non-insurable employment. This modification is the result of representations made by the Canadian Congress of Labour and has been concurred in, as I stated, by the unemployment insurance advisory committee.

Mr. MacInnis: The minister has said that the latter part of this section, that is the 45 days' contribution in the preceding 26 weeks, is a relaxation that should work to the advantage of a person claiming benefits. That is not what is in the explanatory note on the opposite page. According to that note this is really a tightening up, to provide that the person making a claim will have had more recent employment than might have been the case formerly. Let me read it for the benefit of the minister:

> The amendment would generally require either 60 daily contributions in the last year previous to the claim or 45 during the last six months previous to the claim. This is in order to ensure some recency of attachment to the labour market.

In view of that phrase which has been placed in the explanation the minister's statement seems pretty far-fetched. It is quite contrary to the explanation contained in the bill.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Knowles: I want to ask the minister a question about a later part of the section, but I am waiting to see if he has anything more to say about the earlier part.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Knowles: If the minister is not going to say anything more I shall just state that this is a section concerning which we will have to say "on division" because I think the explanatory note is closer to the text than what the minister had to say. It seems to me it is definitely lessening the benefits accorded to workers under the act. It is a tightening up. The 60-day provision is already in the act with respect to a person applying for a second benefit; now it is being made to apply to a man applying for his first benefit. That short sentence really tells the story: "This is in order to ensure some recency of attachment to the labour market." In other words the poor chap who has been unemployed a little too long is just out of luck.

Now I want to ask the minister a question about the latter part of this section over on page 4. There are some lines underlined ending with the words "shall not in any case exceed two years." That is a change from the old section, which ended "but so as not to exceed in any case four years." This is the part of the act that has to do with giving employees the benefit of the time they have lost owing to illness, in establishing the 180 days in the previous two years. I have read this over several times trying to straighten it out in my own mind. This is my question: Is there any change in the substantial meaning of that section because the words "two years" appear where the words "four years" formerly appeared? Is it just a case of addition, putting two and two together, or has the right of the worker actually been lessened?

Mr. Martin: Let that section stand, because I cannot give the answer at the moment.

Section 6 stands.

On section 7—While following any occupation for remuneration unless outside ordinary working hours.

Mr. Knowles: If the members had been able to see this bill a little sooner, perhaps others would have been able to study it and take more part in this discussion. I should like an explanation of paragraph (d), over on page 5. First of all, I want to say that I approve of the change that is found in line 37 on page 4, where the means test provision for the amount of other income a person can earn has been increased from $1.50 to $2.00.

Clause (d) over on page 5 puzzles me. This clause formerly read as follows:

> (d) On any day of any calendar week during which he works the full working week;

That came under a section which said that was not to be counted as unemployment.

The section now reads as follows:

> (d) On any day of any calendar week during which he works the full working week or four or more days or shifts by reason of a temporary reduction of his working week.

It appears to me as though, whereas an employee could claim a day or two in a week that he lost because of a reduction in work being done as days of unemployment, he now will not be able to claim it if he works four days. I see no indication that this change was referred to the advisory committee.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, it is proposed, and I now so move, to drop subsection 2 of section 7, and that includes subparagraph (d) over on page 5.

Mr. Knowles: Good.

The Chairman: Shall the section as amended carry?

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 8—Rates of benefit.

Mr. Knowles: The part of section 8 which concerns me is subparagraph 2 which says:

> (2) In computing the average daily contribution (a) any contributions paid by the insured person for any period prior to the first day of July, nineteen hundred and fifty-one, at the daily rate of nine cents shall be deemed to have been paid at the rate of eight cents, for the purpose of computing his rate of benefit for periods prior to the first day of July, nineteen hundred and fifty-one;

I believe I understand that, and there is some logic to it. I take it that the new category that is being brought in, those people who are in the $4,800 class, are being called upon to pay 9 cents a day or 54 cents a week. This provision is to keep them from getting the full benefits that 9 cents a day would normally provide until they have paid into the fund for a couple of years. I see the parliamentary assistant nodding his head that I am right on that.

What about subparagraph (b)? It reads:

(b) One cent shall be deducted from each daily contribution paid by the insured person after the first day of July, nineteen hundred and fifty;

What does that mean, and why is it there?

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): Mr. Chairman, this cent is calculated to constitute the premium of the insured for the supplementary benefits only. When a calculation is made on an ordinary benefit year, it should be calculated on the basis of the daily contribution he is paying, less the cent he is placing towards protection for the winter months, as provided in part IIA.

Mr. Knowles: I am not as worried about the people in these higher brackets as I was about the people in the lower brackets, but still I do not think that is fair. You establish that the benefits for a person without dependents shall be 34 times the average of the 180 most recent daily contributions paid by the insured person during the two years immediately preceding the commencement of the benefit year, and for a person with a dependent it shall be 45 times such average, less 10 cents from the product so obtained. That has been laid down as a general principle. Then for this group that are earning $48 per week or more, and whom you require to pay 54 cents per week into the fund, you establish a benefit of the same amount as you give to the people who are paying 48 cents a week. Is that correct? You deduct one cent—

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): That is right.

Mr. Knowles: —from what they have paid, for the purpose of computing the benefit they should receive?

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): That is for the first year.

Mr. Knowles: There is nothing in 2 (b) which says it is only for the first year. It says:

One cent shall be deducted from each daily contribution paid by the insured person after the first day of July, nineteen hundred and fifty;

For how long does it continue? There is no termination to that.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): I have a report of the advisory committee, Mr. Chairman, which deals with the subject being discussed by the member for Winnipeg North Centre. It reads:

The committee has been concerned to see that the contribution and benefit classes should retain the relationship to actual earnings which they had when the act was first passed. It previously recommended the addition of a class 8 and the act was amended to this effect. It now recommends the establishment of a class 9 (in terms of the present numbering) for persons receiving $48 a week or more with contributions and benefits proportionate to those of the present classes. Since, however, benefit rates are now fixed on the average contributions of 180 days rather than two years and the immediate granting of higher benefit rights might occasion a serious drain on the fund, the committee recommends that, though contributions under the new class should start at once, benefits under the new class should be limited to the rates of class 8 until one year after the new class had come into effect.

It will be seen that the report is along the lines of my reply to the hon. member, to the effect that the purpose of this provision was to let the insured in this new higher class contribute for one year on the new rate basis, before he is allowed to receive a benefit on the basis of that contribution.

Mr. Knowles: I can see that clearly as an explanation for 2 (a), but I find it extremely difficult to accept it as an explanation for 2 (b). It says in 2 (a) that if those people who are in this higher bracket, and who have been paying 9 cents a day, claim a benefit any time before July 1, 1951, that benefit shall be computed on the 8-cent basis.

Paragraph 2 (b) appears to be concerned with something else altogether. It comes under the general heading of computing the average daily contribution, and subparagraph (b) reads:

One cent shall be deducted from each daily contribution paid by the insured person after the first day of July, nineteen hundred and fifty.

I do not see any relationship between 2 (a), which sets a deadline for benefits of July 1, 1951, and 2 (b), which talks about this deduction commencing on July 1, 1950, and apparently carrying on forever.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): I think this is the appropriate time to show to the committee that there is a real basic difference between unemployment assistance and what supplementary benefits are intended to be in this particular legislation. One cannot be taken for the other. This is noticeable precisely in the subsection to which my hon. friend has drawn my attention. One cent a day is added to the daily rate of contribution across the board for no other purpose than to assure the entitlement of the insured to the supplementary benefits during the specific period mentioned in the act and under the conditions which are provided.

This additional contribution of one cent a day cannot in any way interfere with the normal administration of the act so far as the regular benefits are concerned. That is why, in calculating the amount of benefit which an insured is entitled to under the act after the new rates have come into force, he has to establish the average of his daily contribution on the new schedule, after deducting one cent from the daily rate of contribution which appears in that new section. I do not know whether I have made myself clear.

Mr. Knowles: You are right. You haven't.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): What I want to emphasize is the fact that after July 1 the insured will be paying one cent more to entitle himself to claim under the supplementary benefits legislation, part IIA of the act.

Mr. Knowles: That will go on for all time.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): That will go on until parliament decides to modify it.

Mr. Knowles: But it does not apply between now and July 1, 1950?

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): The contributions on the new schedule will go into force only on July 1. That is why the date has been set there.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, I am not quite sure which of us is confused, the parliamentary assistant or myself. I think that goes for the rest of the committee as well. Will the parliamentary assistant tell us where the one cent a day will go that is to be deducted? Who gets it, and why? It seems to me that the real purpose of this amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act is to provide work in the unemployment insurance office for people running around looking for cents. Are we to understand also that the funds required for the supplementary benefits are to be kept separate from the ordinary funds of the unemployment insurance commission? If that is so, what is the reason for it?

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): Mr. Chairman, there will not be any special fund for that. The additional contribution made up of the additional one cent a day by the contributor, either employer or employee, will go to the unemployment insurance fund; but a special accounting will have to be made on account of certain provisions which we shall meet a little later on, and which will be necessary for the adjustment of accounts between the Minister of Finance and the unemployment insurance commission, because, as my hon. friends know, the government is underwriting the commission and protecting the fund to the extent of the losses that may occur from the payment of supplementary benefits over the aggregate of what the addition of one cent a day contribution will bring in.

Mr. Knowles: If ever there was evidence that this is a very complicated measure to bring in, in a rush like this, we have it now. I am trying to get this clear, and I shall ask another question of the parliamentary assistant. Section 2 (a) refers, does it not, clearly day contribution will bring in.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): Yes.

Mr. Knowles: I thought before—maybe I was right, maybe I was wrong—that 2 (b) also referred only to those in the 9 cent a day category. I am wondering now—

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): To all the categories.

Mr. Knowles: That refers to all the categories. At last I understand it.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): It means just what it says.

Mr. Knowles: Now that I understand it I am opposed to it.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): We know where you stand, anyway.

Mr. Knowles: I ask the Liberal majority that is getting a little fun out of this to take note of it. It means that when an employee applies for benefits and knows that he has been paying, say 7 cents a day, and looks into this act he sees that his benefit will be $18.30 a week. It means that after July 1, it will not be $18.30 a week; it will be the rate for 6 cents a day, namely $15.60 a week. The heads are nodding over there. One Paul is nodding up and down and the other Paul is nodding a different way.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): We were not discussing this particular point, excuse me.

Mr. Knowles: It is quite clear now that after July 1, 1950, when you compute the rate of benefit to which you are entitled, the figure you take is not the number of cents per day you have actually been paying in but one cent less. That one cent, as the parliamentary assistant has said, clearly is the amount that they have been paying for this supplementary benefit.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): Right.

Mr. Knowles: All right. If the person has been paying 8 cents a day, 48 cents a week, when the time comes to apply for benefit, after July 1, 1950, and he looks at the table and he sees opposite 8 cents, $21, he thinks that he is getting an increase. He is getting no increase at all. He has to move up to the 7 cent line, and will get $18.30 a week. Similarly, the person who has been paying on an average 4 cents a day or 24 cents a week looks at the table and sees that he is going to get $10.20 a week. Not at all. After July 1, 1950, he has to compute on the 3 cent rate, which means that he gets only $7.50 a week. I am taking the cases with the dependent across the line. Mr. Chairman, I have been fooled again. I thought earlier today when we were presented with the increased premiums in class 3, which some of us opposed, that at least these increased premiums carried with them increased benefits for the unemployed, but now I find that such is not the case at all. You are getting it both ways. You increase the premium because you are out to cover supplementary benefits, but when you come to draw the benefits you do not get the benefits specified for that increased rate but rather the benefits specified for the next lower rate. It is quite a game, if you can get away with it. However, I submit there will be an awful lot of nasty letters complaining about this, once the workers in this country understand it.

I say again that the senior member for Halifax was perfectly right that this whole piece of legislation is one of the things closest to the heart of labour. They were involved in the drafting of the thing. Now these drastic changes are being made, and they have no voice in the matter at all. Look at the time it has taken those few of us who are paying attention to these details to get this point sorted out. Here we are paying for these supplementary benefits two ways: you pay the increased rate of premium, six cents a week more—get that clear; and when you come to claim your benefit you get the benefit, not for the number of cents per day you have been paying, but for the next cent less.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): I discussed the matter with the hon. member a few moments ago and I have nothing to withdraw from what I said. However, since then, he has referred to the schedule of the rate of benefits appearing in the bill at page 6. Now that he has referred to that schedule, I would point out that there has been made the precise deduction of one cent which goes direct for entitlement to supplementary benefits. So that if an insured person refers to the schedule which has been prepared for his convenience, and for the service of our administration, he will have no deduction of one cent to make, because it is already made. That is why the highest category, those who make the daily contribution of 9 cents, does not appear in the schedule.

If my hon. friend would compare this schedule he would find that the insured does not lose anything in the amount of benefits to which he is entitled, on the specific daily rate—either 2 cents or 3 cents, or up to 8 cents. He does not lose a penny on it. But he will be paying one cent more to qualify him to get the special benefits involved in part IIA, which will be submitted a little later on.

Mr. Knowles: In the circumstances pointed out by the parliamentary assistant is it not a fact that the 9-cent man looks at the 8-cent rate? There is no 9-cent line in the schedule. And if the 9-cent man looks at the 8-cent line, the 8-cent man looks at the 7-cent line.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): The 9-cent man will be entitled to use the 8-cent rate of daily contribution, for the calculation of his benefits, after a certain period has expired. My hon. friend has agreed as to the soundness of letting the insured in the highest category have time to accumulate a certain amount of contribution. That is, on an actuarial basis, for the protection of the unemployment insurance fund.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—Days not counted for benefit.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, hon. members from all sides of the house, including the hon. member for Spadina at yesterday's sitting, have protested against the 9-day waiting period. I see in line 31 of section 9 a slight recognition of that protest in that the number of waiting days is to be reduced from 9 to 8. My, the Liberals can be so liberal at times! It really should be cut out altogether or, if a change is to be made, surely it is not good enough to reduce it from 9 to 8.

I was pleased to note that when a few moments ago I pointed to one section which seemed to be particularly offensive the minister moved for its deletion. I hope he will move a further amendment at this time to change this 8 days to some lesser number, if the section is to stay at all.

May I call the attention of the minister to the fact that when we reach page 15 of the bill we will find that some recognition of the wrongness of the waiting period has been indicated with respect to supplementary benefits. I am pleased to note that in respect of supplementary benefits a person will not have to wait 9 days after the legislation goes through.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): That is specially provided.

Mr. Knowles: Here, however, we are dealing with those older contributors who have been in the fund for a long time. The only concession we give them is to cut the waiting period from 9 days to 8. Well, it has taken us 10 years of arguing to get that down, and perhaps it will take quite a while to get it any further—unless we can get it down further right now. I hope there is support in all quarters for my contention either that the waiting period be cut out altogether or that the number of days be reduced. I am hoping the government may propose an amendment to do that right now. I would do it, only it would cost money, and as a private member I am not permitted to offer such an amendment.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): This matter respecting the modification in the waiting period has been in the minds of many people, and the commission has given it study. I believe that in a few words I can give a pretty accurate survey of the situation in that respect.

Representations have been received from time to time to reduce the waiting period, and this has been considered by both the commission and the advisory committee on several occasions.

In its report of the 27th July, 1949, the advisory committee states:

> The committee is favourable to such a reduction from 9 to 6 days when it can be done with financial and administrative safety and it has asked its actuarial adviser to report to it on this matter at a meeting to be held later in the year.

Since that time, a report has been received from Mr. A. D. Watson, the actuarial adviser, department of insurance. Mr. Watson's report indicated that, in his opinion, a reduction in the waiting period would add approximately 4½ per cent to the benefits paid out, with possibly an addition of up to 10 per cent in the first few years, and recommended against the reduction. It was further pointed out that since the act came into force there were certain unanticipated drains on the fund, such as the payment of benefits to women after marriage, heavier payments than expected to older age groups, and the payment of benefits to persons who had virtually retired from the labour market on pension. He further pointed out that certain amendments basing the rate of benefit on the most recent 180 contributions rather than on contributions made over a period of two years had increased the drain on the fund; and until such time as ways and means were found to take care of these unforeseen problems it would be unsafe to modify the waiting period.

It is pointed out that in many cases claimants do not lose the benefits for these days and the fact that there is a waiting period merely extends the period over which payments of benefit are made. In more than 50 per cent of the claims all of the benefit days authorized were used up even with the nine-day waiting period.

It is felt that a reduction in the waiting period would mean a large increase in the number of claims filed. At present, persons who only have a short period of unemployment do not bother to file a claim. There is also a possibility that a shorter waiting period might increase the number of short lay-offs.

Certain provisions of the present bill, it is hoped, will rectify some of the conditions which heretofore have prevented a reduction in the waiting period. If these provisions are found adequate, it may be possible at an early date to reduce the waiting period.

Mr. Byrne: I should like to say something about this waiting period. I think I have had more practical experience with working people than some of my friends across the aisle. I have worked with these people and have gained a knowledge of their desires from that contact rather than from ideological literature. I have heard this question of the waiting period discussed on a number of occasions at union meetings by those who were regularly employed but who might because of certain circumstances become unemployed for a day or two. When that happens usually someone comes along and tells them not to wait, that they should get something back from the unemployment fund, but when this matter has been brought up it has been voted down overwhelmingly.

These men feel that when they are steadily employed it is no hardship to be off a day or two and that they should continue to contribute to the fund without trying to grasp something back from it as soon as they see one or two days of unemployment ahead. I have found that ever since the act was brought in there has been no great desire to reduce the waiting period, unless it were reduced to permit a person who had a prolonged period of unemployment to receive benefits back to the first day of unemployment rather than to the tenth day. At such times I have heard it said that they should not go after it now but accept the assurance that when a man retires and is still employable he is able to get some benefits in the way of unemployment insurance. These men look forward to that, but they are not quite as avaricious as some people would have us believe.

Mr. Gillis: I have had a little experience with the rank and file of the workers, and I know they are concerned about this particular angle. There are 4,500 steel workers and around 6,000 miners in my constituency. During the recess I attended at a majority of the miners' locals and all the steel workers' locals and I heard them discuss what they thought would be good amendments to make to this act. One of the things that they stressed strongly was that the waiting period should be abolished. This happened only a few weeks ago.

I did not intend to say anything about this, but I could not let the remarks of the hon. member pass unchallenged. If I did the people who had told me that just a couple of weeks ago would say that I was falling down on the job. I think this waiting period should be abolished and so do the people whom I represent.

Mr. Hatfield: I think the waiting period should be reduced to six days as recommended by the advisory committee. I do not see why this house should accept the recommendation of Mr. Watson. We are sent here to make the laws.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): The recommendation of the advisory committee was based on the actuarial advice being favourable to the recommendation.

Mr. Hatfield: This is insurance. What is the employee going to live on during those eight or nine days?

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): The recommendations of an actuary are of prime importance simply because this is an insurance scheme.

Mr. Hatfield: If you have a sickness insurance policy and are taken sick you do not have to wait nine days.

An hon. Member: Yes, you do.

Mr. Knowles: It seems to me that the memorandum read by the parliamentary assistant enhances the argument for making a change, at least to the six days recommended, although provisionally, by the unemployment insurance advisory committee. I do not like to speak disparagingly of a civil servant, but I have had occasion to read some of the memoranda and documents prepared by Mr. A. D. Watson. He does not belong to the Department of Labour or even to the Department of National Health and Welfare where they have some good research people.

Mr. Martin: Thank you.

Mr. Knowles: He is in the Department of Finance, and one would almost think that he had been brought up in the treasury board. I have in mind a document that was tabled by the Minister of Labour in response to a motion of mine having to do with the old question, whether or not people on unemployment insurance who are taken ill should be cut off, as is now the case, or whether they should be retained on benefits.

That question was referred by the unemployment insurance advisory committee to Mr. A. D. Watson and he gave them an answer of fifteen or twenty, or perhaps thirty pages. I have a copy upstairs. The only reference in the whole thirty pages, or whatever number it was, to the question referred to him by the committee was a footnote on page three that he did not agree with them anyway. That was the social approach of that particular actuary to this whole problem of social insurance.

I think the department would have done much better to have taken the advice of the unemployment insurance advisory committee. It would have been much better to have referred the matter to the labour congresses or to the manufacturers association, if you will, or even to parliament—really not a bad idea—as the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton has just said. We should not be influenced or governed by the advice of Mr. Watson.

I submit strongly that we should not be satisfied with this small reduction from nine to eight days. The distinction made by the hon. member for Kootenay East between those who are on unemployment benefits for a long period and those who are on for a short period is valid, although he cast a reflection on the request we had made. However, he did come along with us so far as those who had been unemployed for a prolonged time were concerned, because he said that they should get benefits right back to the first day they become unemployed. I am sure that the minister and the department would be well advised to reconsider this whole matter and reduce the waiting period.

Mr. Hatfield: Does a man who lives 30 miles away from the unemployment insurance office have to report to that office in person every two weeks during the time he is receiving benefits?

Mr. Martin: He does it by mail.

Mr. Hatfield: What is that?

Mr. Martin: He may do it by mail.

Mr. Hatfield: Can they do it by mail now? They used to have to report in person.

Mr. Noseworthy: Are we right in assuming that the waiting period has been reduced from nine to eight days, or does this not imply eight days plus the first day of unemployment mentioned in part A? Is the waiting period really to be eight days or is it to be nine days under the amendment?

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): It is a matter of making the section more operative. No change is being made.

Mr. Knowles: You were zealous in telling me I was wrong. You were very quick in telling me that I was wrong.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): It is provided that in all cases, except the two mentioned in the section, the first day of unemployment shall not be compensable. This being stipulated the waiting period will therefore be a total of nine days as under the existing statute.

Mr. Green: Just the same as it is now.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): There is no change. The section has been redrafted to make it more operative and to simplify certain difficulties.

Mr. Knowles: I will not withdraw the complimentary remarks I make about the research people in the office of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, but I must withdraw the approving comment I made with respect to the reduction from nine days to eight days. In all seriousness I must protest at the minister and the parliamentary assistant sitting there and letting me welcome a reduction from nine days to eight days when no change was being made at all. All they were doing was dividing it into one day at the top of the page and eight days down at the bottom. That is pretty bad. The hon. member for Vancouver East used language this afternoon that we cannot use, but it is certainly most appropriate.

Mr. MacInnis: This evening is the first time that I have had the opportunity of hearing a representative of labour, or one who claims to be a representative of labour, oppose a reduction of the waiting period. I have before me a list of resolutions received from the British Columbia federation of labour, an affiliate of the Canadian Congress of Labour. I understand that for ideological reasons the organization my friend represents is no longer affiliated with the Canadian Congress of Labour. Among the changes that the British Columbia federation of labour is asking for in the Unemployment Insurance Act is No. 3, that the nine-day waiting period be shortened. So far as I know, at every convention of every labour organization in Canada that is one of the resolutions that are regularly passed. For a so-called representative of labour to refer to us as getting our ideas from ideological sources and saying that is our basis for asking that the waiting period be reduced is enough to make me say that I imagine in their own good time labour will take care of that.

[Mr. Noseworthy.]

Mr. Hatfield: The minister told me a few minutes ago that a person could report by mail now. How often does he have to report by mail, and how many signatures does he have to have on the form?

Mr. Martin: How far is he from the office?

Mr. Hatfield: Suppose he is twenty-five miles from the office.

Mr. Martin: About twice; it depends pretty well on the cost of transportation.

Mr. Cardiff: I should like to ask the minister what extra personnel, if any, will be required to administer the act in view of the changes that are being made?

Mr. Martin: It is pretty hard to estimate. We do not think very many.

Section 10 agreed to.

On section 11—Regulations in respect of special classes.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): Section 11 deals with section 38 of the act. Section 38 of the act empowers the commission to make regulations in relation to some classes of persons. These regulations may be made in regard to—and I cite the act:

> (i) imposing additional conditions and terms with respect to contributions and the payment thereof and with respect to the receipt of benefit,
> (ii) restricting the amount or period of benefit, and
> (iii) making modifications in the provisions of this act relating to the determination of claims for benefit . . .

Among the classes of persons to whom these regulations apply are persons employed in the shipping industry, or transportation by water as it is described in the act. At first employment in the shipping industry was not considered as an insurable risk or hazard under the act, but I believe it was two years ago that this principle was abandoned by the commission and the act was amended to bring the industry within its scope at the particular request, I am told, of the seamen of the great lakes. The industry was, however, brought under the act under certain restrictions or special conditions. These special conditions are set out at pages 44 and 45 of the regulations and special orders of the unemployment insurance commission made under section 38 of the act. Subparagraph 5 (b) of section 12 of "Seasonal regulations" reads as follows:

> "Seasonal industry" means and includes the following respective industries, which the commission hereby declares to be seasonal industries:
> (i) the industry of transportation by water on any of the "inland waters of Canada" as the latter expression is defined in the Canada Shipping Act, 1934, herein referred to as "transportation by water";

(ii) the industry of stevedoring in any of the inland or deep sea ports, herein referred to as "stevedoring."

Subparagraph (c) goes further and says:

(c) "inland port" means a port on any of the said inland waters of Canada.

In subparagraph (d) deep sea port is described as follows:

(d) "deep sea port" means the port of Halifax, Nova Scotia and the port of Saint John, New Brunswick.

In subparagraph 4 of the same section 12 of the regulations made under section 38 of the act it is further said:

(4) The off-season applicable in the case of any such seasonal worker shall be determined in accordance with the following rules:

(a) where the particular seasonal industry applicable in his case is transportation by water, the off-season applicable shall be the off-season for transportation by water, namely, the period commencing on December 16 in each year and ending on April 14 next thereafter.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): If I may assist my hon. friend, I suggest that he is not reading from the latest regulations of the commission. These were tabled just a few days ago, and they are dated at the end of last December. The regulations provide that the line of division between deep sea and inland waters is Cap des Rosiers. To relieve the mind of my hon. friend I suggest that this is a matter which might be placed before the commission, which has power under the act to give consideration to any representations of this kind and to submit proposals to the governor in council if special regulations should be found desirable.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): To deal with the first point raised by the parliamentary assistant, I was quoting from the office consolidation dated October, 1948, which last night he suggested I should get from the library. In any event, I have not yet quoted anything having to do with home trade and inland waters.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): To make the position clear, as far as the act is concerned the consolidation of October, 1948, is the latest; but the latest copy of the regulations dates back to December, 1949, only.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): Nothing I have quoted, I am sure, has been amended in the latest edition of the regulations to which the parliamentary assistant refers. I refrained from speaking on the resolution or on second reading because I did not want to delay this important bill. I shall be very brief, but I make these remarks at this point because I do not quite agree with the parliamentary assistant when he says that what I suggest should be corrected with respect to this particular industry can be done only by order in council or by regulations. I am not sure of that; and I do not know how the parliamentary assistant can be sure of it, because I have not yet fully stated my case. If I may be permitted I should like to proceed, and I shall be as brief as possible.

I was saying that we had created a special category for those employed in the inland shipping industry. If during this off-season period from December 16 to April 14 an employee loses his employment, he has to prove 420 contributions instead of the 180 which are asked of those in other categories. I am not sure of this, and I have been unable to check it, but I am told that recently this number of 420 was reduced somewhat but that it is still very much higher than the minimum of 180 days required in other categories.

Now I come to the other remarks of the parliamentary assistant. The inland waters of Canada were defined in the Canada Shipping Act as, at their eastern limit, commencing at a line drawn from Father Point to Point Orient on the north shore of the St. Lawrence. As everyone knows, a year ago this limit was changed and put some three hundred miles further down the river, so that it is now a line drawn from Cap des Rosiers through the western point of Anticosti island to the north shore. That required no change in the regulations, because the regulations accepted the description of inland waters contained in the Canada Shipping Act, and when the Canada Shipping Act was changed this definition was automatically changed in the regulations.

Now I come to my second point. I want to make it clear that my remarks apply to seamen no matter where they come from, as long as they are engaged in the specified trades to which I am going to refer. But while my remarks apply to all those seamen they are made particularly in reference to seamen belonging to my own province. In Quebec we have ships sailing from the inland ports of Montreal and Quebec but going further down than the eastern limit of our inland waters. They go as far as Gaspe, the Magdalen islands, Newfoundland, New Brunswick and Labrador. Quite wrongly, I am convinced, these have been classified as inland water ships. They are not; they are in the home trade. Their officers must have the certificates of competency required for the home trade of Canada. More than that, the men employed on those ships can very easily, as they have been doing for a number of years, find employment during the off season on the St. Lawrence on ships sailing from Halifax or Saint John or Sydney, and even on ships which during the summer months are engaged in the St. Lawrence trade but in the winter months go to the gulf of Mexico and carry on their trade there. So I say that the risk of unemployment for the men employed in our home trade is not the same as that for those employed in our inland water trade, meaning by that term our great lakes seamen, for instance.

I point out that this situation has created severe hardships in many cases. I feel that, if under this section the commission is to be empowered to make regulations concerning inland shipping, it should be made clear that those regulations are not to extend as they have in the past—unjustly, I say—to seamen engaged in the home trade rather than the inland trade of Canada. That is why I consider it my duty to make these remarks at this stage, when we are discussing the very section which empowers the commission to do the things I am complaining about. I know it might be possible to remedy the situation I have outlined simply by amending the regulations, but I contend that if the commission had not such indefinite power it would not be tempted to pass regulations which would affect our home trade, as it has done in the past.

I have another suggestion to put forward in this connection. When we say that the seamen employed on ships sailing in the inland waters of Canada are employed in a seasonal occupation, and should therefore be asked to comply with severe conditions in order to secure benefits under the act, we are not being fair to these men. We should allow them, before they apply for benefits, to declare themselves available for employment in similar industries, or for employment which can be found for them in other industries.

In order to clarify what I mean, may I cite the example of a cook on a ship. A cook on a ship can be just as good a cook in a lumber camp during the winter months, or any other industry in which a cook is required. Another example is a deckhand on a ship. He is used to doing all sorts of work on the ship, such as handling the cargo and various other deck jobs. Such a man could do similar work in other industries in which employment can be found the year round. The case of motor mechanics is similar to that of men working in other industries whether they are handling gasoline or steam engines. These motor mechanics may be employed on a ship on the great lakes during the summer for example, but that does not prevent them from finding employment in a garage in Windsor, for instance, during the winter, or in any other industry in which motor mechanics are needed. I do not think these men should be deprived of their benefits through the severe restrictive conditions imposed by the regulations, just because they happen to work for five or six months a year in what we call the shipping industry.

The other day I asked an official of the unemployment insurance commission of my province what happened to the employees of summer hotels, such as those which exist in my province. Some of these hotels are operated by the Canada Steamship Lines at Tadoussac and Murray Bay and operate from May or June until September only. Their employees are seasonal employees but because they can find employment in other hotels in other parts of the province or Canada during the winter months they are considered as a regular insurable class. I asked this official why the same thing was not done for the cook, motor mechanic or deckhand on our ships and he had no answer to explain the severe treatment of our seamen.

On many occasions in this house, the senior member for Halifax has mentioned the case of stevedores in connection with unemployment insurance benefits. Recently, I had occasion to join with him in making representations to officials of the government requesting that something be done for them. Surely, those men are eligible for employment during their off-season period in other industries where men are needed to handle heavy cargoes or to perform other work for which stevedores are trained.

As I said, Mr. Chairman, I thought it my duty to make these remarks because I believe it is an important subject. With the decline in our shipping activities, our seamen are finding it difficult to secure employment. I am in favour of the loggers, and the men employed in the lumbering industry in general getting their share of benefits, but I believe our seamen are entitled to the same treatment, because their trade is being severely hit today. I hope these remarks will be taken in good part by the parliamentary assistant, and the minister, as well as the officials of the commission. I hope prompt action will be taken in this respect.

Mr. Hansell: I have been waiting for this clause to be called, because there is a question or two I should like to ask about it. I do not know whether this clause governs those classes that are known as excepted or exempted classes, but I should like to know if the commission has the power to determine what classes shall come under the act and what classes shall be exempted from it. When I refer to classes, I mean people such as I referred to yesterday, hospital employees. They do not come under the act. My question does not concern hospital employees, and I only use that as an illustration. My question is, does the commission have power to include or exclude those particular people?

Mr. Martin: The commission has power, under section 86 (2), to do that very thing. I recall that, because I was reading it last night. Of course, the recommendation of the commission is subject to the approval of the governor in council.

Mr. Hansell: What is the government's reaction to the suggestion that those classes be written into the act instead of being included by order in council, or upon the recommendation of the commission? I believe the act should be changed every time that is done. I refer to classes of people that might number in the thousands. What I have in mind, Mr. Chairman, is this, and you will appreciate the significance and importance of it: When by regulation, whether it is by order in council or whatever it may be, certain classes of people are compelled to contribute to a scheme of this kind, then we are imposing a form of taxation. Some other terminology can be used if one desires, but that is what it is. In principle, therefore, you have a small commission authorized—we shall at least give them this benefit—to recommend to the government, and then the government, by order in council, takes the authority of imposing what I am going to call taxation. So far as I am concerned, that is what it is.

Now, I do not agree with that principle. I believe that action of that sort should be taken by parliament. It is for that purpose the members are here. I should like to know what the government's answer is to the question of why these classes cannot be set out in the act, and the act changed from time to time as required.

Mr. Martin: I must confess that there is a good deal of merit in what my hon. friend says, but he does not state the whole case, although that part of it which he has stated has been well stated. As he knows, classes have been brought in by the commission, subject of course to careful investigation and consideration by the governor in council. These things are not done lightly. For instance, the lumbering industry was brought in, and today I announced the order in council confirming the recommendation of the commission in that regard. Parliament was sitting, of course, and I was able to table the order in council and make a statement.

I should like my hon. friend to know that when I was going over this measure I was struck with that situation. I am not in a position to take any step at the moment, but the matter will be given further consideration in the light of all the circumstances.

Mr. Carroll: I was about to raise the same question as that raised by the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat. My question was in connection with hospitals, which are charitable institutions, and are exempt under the act. I know that hospitals and charitable institutions are exempt under the act. I understand that by order in council or otherwise there is likely to be something, perhaps under the provision of this very section that we are dealing with, so far as seasonal employment is concerned. On two occasions I was given the assurance by the minister, in answering questions put to him by hon. members, that hospitals and charitable institutions were not to come within the purview of this act. Something is said about seasonal employment. I have no doubt that the commission has the power to include seasonal employees who are employed by hospitals and charitable institutions. I only want to say that it will be a real hardship. I do not exactly know how they are going to collect from hospitals on account of seasonal employees. I see some difficulty about that; but even if they had no difficulty about it I am objecting right now to the commission passing any such regulation. My objection may fall on deaf ears because they have the power to do it. But I am objecting on behalf of the hospitals of my province, because there is not one hospital in that province that is making a dollar. They are going into the red every year, and they are supported by the charity of the people. Every year they come around asking for donations from every man, woman and child in the province who has a cent to spare for charitable institutions. It would be a hardship and a wrong to impose upon hospitals down there. I know something about it. I have been chairman of the commission of Victoria General hospital for twelve years. I have connections with some other hospitals in the city of Halifax and also in the constituency I represent. I am only suggesting to the minister tonight that the provisions of this act be not so worked that even seasonal employees of hospitals will come within the purview of the act, thus bringing hospitals within it to a certain extent.

Mr. Martin: As I said the other night, the amendments before us are not intended to cover hospitals and charitable institutions. I need not tell my hon. friend that in another capacity I have a great interest in this matter also.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the minister whether any regulations have yet been made to implement the additional reference to married women?

Mr. Martin: No.

Mr. Knowles: Can we be given any indication as to what additional conditions will be laid down before married women are qualified for benefits?

Mr. Martin: I cannot give those.

Mr. Knowles: Another blank cheque.

Sections 12 and 13 agreed to.

On section 14—Additional penalty.

Mr. Green: May I ask that section 14 be allowed to stand? The hon. member for Lake Centre wanted to ask a question on it.

Section stands.

Sections 15 to 18 inclusive agreed to.

On section 19—Constitution of committee.

Mr. Knowles: This is a minor point. Perhaps there is no harm in getting it clear. The section formerly read:

The committee shall consist of a chairman and not less than four or more than six other members.

The proposed amendment reads:

The committee shall consist of a chairman and not less than six or more than eight members.

Why the omission of the word "other". It seems to me that the previous wording was clear, whereas there could be a bit of ambiguity in the new wording.

Mr. Martin: We will accept the suggestion.

Mr. Knowles: As it reads now the eight members could include the chairman. I move that the word "other" be inserted.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend is quite correct. It was intended to be included.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. Martin: May I revert to section 6 and deal with the question of four years?

On section 6—Statutory conditions.

Mr. Martin: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked me a question about four years. I want to assure the committee that the base period of two years can be increased by an extension of, of course, not more than two years; that was the intention. The old section referred to two years and the extension, two years plus the extension of two years equalling four. The new section speaks of the increase only. The two is as intended.

Mr. Knowles: Therefore there is actually no change in the total amount of time involved.

Mr. Martin: No.

Section agreed to.

On section 20.

Mr. Knowles: Section 20 is a new part which has several sections, 87A, 87B, 87C, 87D, 87E, 87F, 87G. I would humbly suggest that you take up each subclause.

The Deputy Chairman: You wish to deal with the various subclauses separately?

Mr. Knowles: Yes.

On section 20, clause 87A—Right to supplementary benefit.

Mr. Drew: I notice that this subject was under discussion at the dominion-provincial conference in 1945 and that at that time the Minister of Labour said that 85 per cent was the figure that he expected the dominion government would contribute in cases of this kind. There should be some explanation as to why it is now 80 per cent instead of 85 per cent.

Mr. Martin: Yes. Of course, my hon. friend was not able to be here because of other matters today, and I did deal with that. Our argument of course is that the matter to which my hon. friend directs my attention now is not the same as the matter referred to in the amendment. The matter referred to in 1945 was the matter of unemployment assistance. There was no feature of insurance involved whatsoever. The benefit rate fixed here is in the light of the benefit and the rate of premiums to be paid. The case to which my hon. friend refers specifically has to do with non-insurance assistance to the unemployed, but that is a separate and important matter. The rate fixed here is the one which in view of the premium is intended to be in ratio to the benefit.

Mr. Drew: I do not think the Hansard record of that meeting bears that out, because at page 105 of the plenary session of the discussions held in 1945 I find this wording in regard to this particular subject, and it is from the statement by the Minister of Labour:

In the case of an insured person who has exhausted insurance benefits, or who lacks the full qualification for insurance benefits, the scale of assistance would be approximately 85 per cent of the insurance benefit to which such person's contribution class previously entitled him or would in due course entitle him.

I do not think it would be possible for words to make this more clearly applicable to the person who is given insurance benefits than these words which I have just read.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the clause relating to supplementary benefits carry?

Mr. Drew: I do not think the explanation that has been given answers the words I have just read. The words I have just read make it quite clear that the statement of the Minister of Labour in 1945—and that is the position that has been carried forward—related to those who were under insurance benefits, and those benefits have come to an end. It also applied to another group; that I will of course concede. The remarks made by the minister and which, I understand, he made earlier, apply to that other group, but do not apply to those who are under insurance benefits but whose benefits have terminated. I think there should be some explanation as to why the 85 per cent the government then intended to contribute is not now being contributed.

Mr. Martin: I do not think I can say any more than I have said. I am quite sure if my hon. friend will read the text carefully he will find I am right. Assuming the situation were otherwise, to increase the amount we would have to increase the premium paid. It is thought that the one-cent premium is, in the circumstances, as high as one should go.

Mr. Knowles: I think the minister is really stretching a point when he tries to tell us that the unemployment assistance referred to in the green book of 1945-46 is something totally different from the supplementary benefits offered to the committee in this subsection. The leader of the opposition read from page 105 of the report of that conference. I turn now to page 387, where the prime minister of that day, Mr. Mackenzie King, set out what the government would do. Under the heading "Unemployment Assistance" he said:

> In addition to unemployment insurance, the dominion will set up a system of unemployment assistance under which it will pay benefits equal to 85 per cent of unemployment insurance benefits—

Note this:

> —to unemployed persons able and willing to work who are not entitled, or who have ceased to be entitled, to unemployment insurance benefits.

That is an exact description, to the letter, of the kind of people being covered by the section now before us. They are covering people who are unemployed but able and willing to work and who either are not entitled, or have exhausted their entitlement, to unemployment insurance benefits. Then the same paragraph goes on:

> This assistance will be limited to two years of continuous assistance, but a person will again become eligible for this assistance following an approved period of employment.

So the whole idea that was being put forth at the dominion-provincial conference of 1945 and 1946 under the name of unemployment assistance is precisely that of which we are now getting a partial implementation. There can be no argument about it at all. The idea then was the extension of unemployment insurance, and it was noised from one end of the country to the other that that was one of the things the dominion was prepared to do, namely to recognize its responsibility for the employable unemployed.

Because of that promise we have been pleading for it ever since. Now we have a partial recognition of it in the measure before us. When we point out it is only partial the minister tries to say it is something different altogether. That is just skating around it. The fact of the matter is that the offer then was 85 per cent, continuous for two years. We are getting in this section 80 per cent with a three-months limit. I say the minister should give a better explanation as to why we are getting so little of what was promised.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall section 87A carry?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh no. I raised this point this afternoon, and last night.

Mr. Martin: May I just make this observation—

Mr. Diefenbaker: All right.

Mr. Martin: From expressions which have been made I know the house generally is anxious to do everything possible to ensure that we are in a position to make payments by March 1. In order to do that I should point out to hon. members the desirability of having this measure passed tonight, if it can be done. The only reason I am now rising, in addition to saying what I have already said, is that I am sure, Mr. Chairman, we are quite out of order in discussing this particular phase of the matter under the section before the committee. We are now dealing not with classes but with the rate of benefit to be given to these classes. I submit with great respect that the discussion is not in order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker held it was in order when he was in the chair, and permitted a full discussion on the subject. I listened to my hon. friend this afternoon expounding on the necessity for social security, with which all of us agree. But he rather upbraided some of us for daring to make any criticism of what is being done here, a criticism designed to improve the situation. I could not help remembering, Mr. Chairman, that that solicitude was not quite so definite in 1935 as it is today.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, Mr. Chairman, I am going—

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt, but I must remind the hon. member that speeches in the committee of the whole must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration. I do not think that when the hon. member talks about the solicitude of the minister in 1935, or some other year, he is in order. I know the hon. member wants to co-operate and to see that this measure is dealt with as rapidly as possible. I know he will confine his remarks to the section under discussion.

I have heard several references to the green book the hon. member has on his desk, and I have allowed a certain latitude when references have been made to it. I think now, however, that enough latitude has been granted, and that from now on I shall ask all hon. members to restrict their remarks to the section under discussion.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, with all the deference that I can impart to my words, I am in entire agreement with you as to the necessity of confining the discussion to the issue. However, I do object to the minister's attitude, that the discussion is to be limited because of the fact that he wants to have this passed tonight. So do we. But that does not discharge our responsibility to pass a section such as the one in question without a proper and complete discussion. I point out, as did the leader of the opposition—

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member again, but he knows that while I have not made a ruling I have asked him to co-operate with the committee. Now he is trying to discuss again the attitude of other members in the committee. Let us begin the discussion of the item, and continue it; that is all I am asking the hon. member to do.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, Mr. Chairman, I shall read the section—because I doubt whether the section has been read by some. It states:

> Every person who proves in the prescribed manner that he comes within one of the four classes . . . shall . . . be entitled to receive payments (in this part referred to as "supplementary benefit") at weekly or other prescribed intervals, at such rates and for such duration as authorized by this part.

I am directing my attention to that particular portion of the section. In 1945 the period was to be for two years. In 1945 no levy was to be made upon anyone. In 1945 the government undertook to make payments without a levy and that is why I am discussing the promises made in 1945 and indicating that the implementation in 1950 is not in accordance with the representations made in 1945.

In 1945 the Minister of Labour undertook—this may be found at page 105—that there would be no levy, that this system of benefits would be paid for by the government, by the people of Canada as a whole. I am pointing out that what is contained in section 87A is far removed from the undertaking made in 1945 to the provincial governments by the Minister of Labour.

I also point out that, call it what you will, it is not unemployment insurance; it is merely supplementary benefits being paid to individuals who are within certain classifications and which are contributed to, not by those individuals particularly but by all who work. I suggest that section 87A and the succeeding sections do not meet the situation in this country today and will prove to be a hoax as far as the unemployed are concerned. The section merely covers a period of three months at the outset of the seasonal unemployment and that does not meet the situation of the 100,000 in this country who do not come within the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act and who therefore do not qualify under section 87A.

We have indicated the attitude of the opposition. We want something done for the unemployed who deserve to have something done for them. The supplementary benefits provided in this and subsequent sections cannot adequately meet the situation today and will prove within the next few months, if the government's contention that this is merely seasonal be not correct, to be a grievous disappointment to those who demand a degree of hope because of the extending and accelerating period of unemployment.

More than that I shall not say, but fulfilling my responsibility as a member I must say that this and succeeding sections, while they may raise hopes, will not justify those hopes in the hearts of the unemployed who are asking for more than is provided by these sections.

Mr. MacInnis: I wonder if sections 87A and 87B could be discussed together?

Mr. Martin: That is satisfactory.

The Deputy Chairman: That is entirely satisfactory, and it would also be satisfactory to discuss the whole of section 20.

Clause 87A agreed to.

On section 20, clause 87B—Classes of persons entitled.

Mr. MacInnis: I do not know just how far one can go in discussing this clause if we are to be kept specifically to its exact terms which would have to be your ruling if we followed the strict rules of discussion in committee. It seems to me that I cannot say a word in this regard without discussing what was proposed in 1945, because that involves the principle of supplementary assistance.

The first objection to clause 87B is that it restricts assistance to four classes of people. Unemployed workers who cannot qualify under any of these classes will be just as much in need, and in my opinion just as much entitled to assistance as anyone else. That assistance will have to come from somewhere. As was mentioned yesterday, the logical place for that assistance to come from is the federal authorities. Clause 87B and the rest of the clauses fall short of making the necessary provisions for temporary assistance to the unemployed, leaving out altogether the question of providing work or anything of that kind.

I am quite satisfied that no unemployment insurance scheme established on an actuarial basis could take care of all the unemployed. In order to have a complete unemployment insurance scheme there must be unemployment assistance provided outside the Unemployment Insurance Act. That is where the government has fallen down. I agree with the hon. member for Lake Centre when he says that this is really a hoax that is being played on the working people and on this house as well.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Could the minister state what the contributions were in December and January and what benefits were paid out?

Mr. Martin: I will give that information before we have finished.

Mr. Blanchette: Clause 87B reads:

The classes of persons entitled to receive supplementary benefit are as follows:

Then classes 1 and 2 are set out, and then follows:

Class 3—A person who, for not less than ninety days within any period of twelve consecutive months falling within the eighteen months immediately preceding the date on which he makes a claim for supplementary benefit, was employed

(i) in lumbering and logging in any area of Canada.

I should like to make certain representations on behalf of certain Canadians residing in the eastern townships who spend most of their time carrying on logging operations in the neighbouring states of Vermont, New Hampshire and Maine. A large number of men in my county spend the greater part of the year in those neighbouring states, and the same applies to at least twelve or fifteen other counties in Quebec and I believe also to some counties in New Brunswick.

I realize that those persons make no direct contribution to the Canadian economy but they do a great deal in the way of bringing back American dollars. They also assist the Canadian economy by helping to produce logs in those states which supply the demands of our Canadian mills. Therefore I feel that the greatest consideration should be accorded to these lumbermen who come from at least fifteen counties of the province of Quebec and who spend the major portion of the lumbering season in these states. Once again I can only repeat that they have greatly assisted the Canadian economy by the provision of United States funds to Canada, and also by the provision of raw material to some of our Canadian mills.

Clause 87B agreed to.

On section 20, clause 87C—Rates of supplementary benefit.

Mr. Knowles: I wish to say once again that I do not feel satisfied with the 80 per cent figure proposed in clause 87C. I shall not go back again to the 85 per cent figure that was mentioned in 1945. I want to deal with the 80 per cent figure on its merits. I feel that the hon. member for Vancouver East has stated the matter very clearly. We have got to have something more than this if we are going to provide the adequate assistance that people need in times of unemployment. In fact this sort of bill underlines the growing need in this country for a piece of legislation that will provide over-all social security. This piecemeal business simply is not adequate, but in terms of unemployment insurance surely we all recognize that what we need to aim at is a measure that will provide for the unemployed person insurance benefits as long as he is unemployed. The opinion that after a certain period of time it is good for his soul in some way to have his benefits cut down to 80 per cent, and that later on it is good for those benefits to be cut out altogether, is something parliament should not stand for at all. Amongst other things it has the effect of depressing wages.

I feel strongly that ways and means should be found to maintain supplementary benefits at the full amount provided in the earlier part of the act. Let us not feel satisfied. I suggest to the Liberal members of the house, who are trying to get this measure through, that they will rue the day they were so enthusiastic about it. Just wait until July—their supporters back in their constituencies will use the language the hon. member for Vancouver East has used tonight and say that a hoax has been put over on the working people of the country. A measure of this kind will not be satisfactory until it is recognized that it is just as hard to keep body and soul together after the normal period is exhausted as it is during that period, that it is harder still to do so when the benefit has been cut to 80 per cent, and harder still when the benefit has been removed altogether. We have no option but to agree to the passing of this section. We would not for one moment agree to anything less but we certainly protest against it.

I do not know whether or not this might be a good place for the minister to answer the questions that he has promised to answer. I suggest it is because one of them is related to this section. We have asked two main questions. What will the increased rates, provided for away back in section 3, bring in by way of revenue? The other question is what will the payments made under clause 87C amount to for the current year? Perhaps the minister might be prepared to give that information now.

Mr. Martin: I am watching the clock because my primary concern, as it is the concern of all hon. members, is to make sure that we can make these benefits available as soon as possible. My hon. friend says they are inadequate. He has used other words, but to the extent that they have any value in his judgment I am sure he wants to get them out as quickly as we can. That is why I purposely refrained from answering a lot of things that could easily have been answered.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is not in accordance with the facts.

Mr. Martin: That is the reason why.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You said you did not have the information.

Mr. Martin: Let us keep our tempers under control.

Mr. Knowles: As the Secretary of State for External Affairs would say, it is time for a cup of tea.

Mr. Martin: I told the house earlier, with the qualification I have mentioned, that we would endeavour to give the estimates the commission has had in arriving at the proposed formula. It is thought that we might be able to pay benefits if it were necessary, for instance, to 80,000 persons, and I am taking that figure of 80,000 as a fixed figure for the whole period of three months. The distribution would be approximately $34,320,000. Hon. members may call that a hoax, but it is a substantial sum of money.

Mr. Knowles: Let me—

Mr. Martin: Let me finish so that we can get the full picture.

Mr. Knowles: What period would that amount be for?

Mr. Martin: Here is the calculation. Let us assume that 2,750,000 insured persons will be called upon to contribute from July 1, 1950 to March 31, 1952, and take from that let us say 100,000 unemployed over the period, because the figure can only be hypothetical, the result would be a total list of contributors amounting to 2,650,000. In the period of twenty-one months at 25 cents per month the figure of 2,650,000 persons would result in an amount of $13,912,500. The employers' contribution would be the same. The government's contribution would be $5,565,000, and the total would be $33,400,000. As must be obvious, these are rough figures. They can only be estimates, and it is not an easy thing to estimate. This is a novel experiment. Payments will be for seven and a half months or thirty-three weeks during the period. The payment to a person for benefits during all that period would be $429 if his rate was $13 per week, and if it was necessary, as I said at the outset, to pay benefits to 80,000 persons for the whole period it would cost roughly $34 million. These are figures that have got to be taken with reservations because it all depends on a whole set of contingencies that may or may not eventuate.

Mr. Knowles: Just to get the matter clear, the $34,320,000 that the minister said it was estimated would be paid out to 80,000 people is for what period? Did he say seven and a half months?

Mr. Martin: Yes, seven and a half months.

Mr. Knowles: In other words, those two figures are comparable. They are for the same period. The $34,320,000 to be paid out is for the month and a half this year, the three months in 1951 and the three months in 1952, and the $33,400,000 to be taken in is for the period beginning July 1 this year.

Mr. Martin: July 1.

Mr. Knowles: July 1 this year and carrying through to March 31, 1952. Therefore they are roughly comparable except that between now and July 1 of this year no additional payments are being brought in. Payments for twenty-one months just about equal the cost for two and one-half winter periods. We have now got what we tried to get earlier in the day. The basis of the table is an attempt to secure an additional amount equal to what it is anticipated the government will pay out as supplementary benefits.

Mr. Martin: An estimated deficit of about a million.

Clause 87C agreed to.

On section 20, clause 87D—Duration of supplementary benefit.

Mr. Knowles: Would the minister explain paragraph (c)? I have in mind particularly the fact that as I read this clause the supplementary benefits for workers coming under it, that is people engaged in lumbering and logging, will not apply after March 31, 1951. In other words for that class there seems to be no permanent legislation respecting supplementary benefits, but legislation only for this winter and next winter.

Mr. Martin: Because they will then move into the insured class.

Mr. Knowles: In other words they would get supplementary benefits, but they would get them under class 1?

Mr. Martin: That is right.

Clause 87D agreed to.

On section 20, clause 87E—Suitable employment.

Mr. Shaw: This refers to section 40 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, which deals with disqualification for neglecting an opportunity for work or failure to attend a course of instruction. In section 40 repeated reference is made to suitable employment, and they have gone some distance in defining that term. I do not say it is at all clear, but it is defined as being reasonable having regard to both the circumstances and the usual means of obtaining that employment. In clause 87E it appears that we have entirely departed from even that partial definition in section 40 of the act. Now an unemployed person is obliged to take any work which is deemed suitable; it even goes so far as to say he must accept any work he is able to perform. If these supplementary benefits were being given without additional contributions being required from the employees I could understand a more stringent application of this definition, but I can see no justification at all for such application in view of the fact that the employees are buying this additional protection. I am not going to say for a moment that I was ever satisfied with the administration of the act since 1940 with respect to this matter of suitable employment. Some day I should like to see a committee of this house make a thorough investigation into the administration of that section of the act. I do not want to take too much time, but I am registering a protest against this most severe application of the definition of the words "suitable employment".

Mr. MacInnis: Earlier in the afternoon I drew attention to this section as being one of these amendments having far-reaching consequences which, as far as I knew, had not been brought to the attention of the advisory committee or any of the large labour bodies. On this point I must associate myself with the remarks so ably made by the hon. member for Red Deer. The supplementary benefits under this act are being provided by an additional charge on those already contributing to the unemployment insurance fund, as well as by a new charge on teenagers, who are not contributing at the present time. If the insurance officer were a free agent in dealing with matters of this kind, and if he were a man of experience and understanding, he might be able to make a proper and reasonable decision as to what constituted suitable employment. But knowing the pressure that has been brought on unemployment insurance officers during the last few years to insist that people go to work in all kinds of employment that were not suitable at all, I am quite satisfied that the unemployment insurance commission administration is going to be in for a good deal of trouble if this section is adopted as it now stands. I would suggest to the minister that it be deleted and that the conditions governing these supplementary provisions be left as they are at present.

Mr. Martin: So anxious am I to get this legislation through in order that benefits may go to unemployed persons at the earliest possible moment that I propose we drop this section.

The Deputy Chairman: Clause 87E is dropped and clauses 87F and 87G renumbered 87E and 87F respectively.

Clauses 87E and 87F agreed to.

Section 20 as amended agreed to.

Sections 21 to 24 inclusive agreed to.

On section 25—Coming into force.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Before this last section is adopted, the minister promised to give us certain information, and I wish he would give it now.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): The hon. member inquired as to the total revenue to the fund for the months of December and January last, and also the benefit payments made. For December, 1949, the total revenue was $12,533,740.08 and for the same month the benefit payments were $7,177,759.74. For the month of January last the total revenue was $12,025,859.32 and the total benefit payments $11,779,344.89.

Unemployment Insurance

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I have here the Labour Gazette for January, 1950, which gives a registration of 3,594,000 under the Unemployment Insurance Act, while the minister speaks of 2,750,000. What happens to the other 844,000? I am referring to page 139 of this publication.

Mr. Martin: What is the point?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The point is that the minister spoke of an insured labour force of 2,750,000 in estimating the revenue that would be obtained from this one cent a day, while according to the Labour Gazette some 3,594,000 are registered under the act as employed.

Mr. Martin: The figures I gave were estimates.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Then actually almost another million people come under the act?

Mr. Martin: No.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): My hon. friend must appreciate the difference between the number of employed insured under the act and the total labour force of the country.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): But these are registered under the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Mr. Knowles: As a matter of information I should like to ask a question about this section. We have had references two or three times tonight to July 1 of this year as the apparent effective date of some of the operative sections of this act. In at least one case that date appears in the text. Do I understand that it is the intention of the government to proclaim the sections that are to be proclaimed as of July 1?

Mr. Martin: That is right.

Mr. Knowles: It struck me as a strange way to draft it.

Mr. Martin: That is the way the law officers wanted it.

Mr. Knowles: Some of the sections fix that date and it would be confusing if some other date were fixed for the proclamation.

Section agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: We shall revert to section 14 which was allowed to stand at the request of the hon. member for Lake Centre. Shall section 14 carry?

Section 14 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

[Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle.)]

Mr. Martin (for Mr. Mitchell) moved the third reading of Bill No. 8, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I shall not stand in the way of its being read a third time tonight, as is our right under the rules of the house. I am speaking only for myself, but I do want to say that if you ask for third reading tonight, you are doing it over my protest. The reason I am prepared to let the bill be called for third reading tonight is that there is a little bit in it that is good, and no one in the house is going to stand in the way of that little bit of good being made available. But I do protest as strongly as I can against the government coupling with the little bit that is good the objectionable features that we have protested against in this bill.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Before the bill is read the third time, I wish to make it clear that in consenting to the reading of the bill for the third time now, to which consent must be given if it is to be done tonight, it is only for the purpose of making it possible to carry forward the payments that have been mentioned for which the bill provides. It is not to be taken that that implies approval of the way in which the bill is presented, the procedure which has been followed, which has given so little opportunity for adequate consideration of the details of the bill; nor is it in any way to be taken as approval of those parts of the bill to which objection has already been made, and to which there is a continuing objection on our part. I simply place that on record because I do agree that, with whatever limitations there are, it is desirable that the payments the government is prepared to provide, under such limitations as they impose, should go forward on March 1.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): I am not going to hold up the bill at all, nor am I going to say very much. This afternoon I mentioned what I considered to be the government's—I used language this afternoon which you, sir, made me withdraw, so I shall leave it at that. The ordinary procedure of business in this house requires co-operation between the government and the opposition groups. I understand that this measure was simply to make provision for supplementary assistance to persons who are unemployed for long periods of time and have exhausted their unemployment benefits. To bring before us almost a complete review or overhaul of the Unemployment Insurance Act is something against which I must protest. It is something that would make me extremely reluctant at any time in the future to assent to anything that this government brings down, until I see in black and white exactly what they want done.

I protest against it in the strongest possible terms. In passing this act, we have done some things today that should not have been done without consultation in a committee, where those concerned could make representations. It is just an insult to the members of this house to bring a complicated bill of this kind before them on such short notice. Even the government sponsors did not understand the bill.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): I feel that the protests that have been made by the three hon. members who have spoken on the third reading of this bill are well made. My observation has been that since 1945, on all too numerous occasions, the government have brought measures before us with what they claimed was a limited time for consideration. They have pleaded, as the hon. minister pleaded tonight with tears in his voice, that we shut up and let the bill pass. I am serving notice on the minister and on the government not to ask us at any time to give carte blanche for the passage of bills of this kind or for rushing bills of this kind through.

In common with the member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), I am going to see what is in a bill before I give my consent. I just want to say that I am not going to delay the third reading tonight. If I did the right thing for the people of this country, I would. It is a disgrace the way that sort of thing has been handled in this house during the past five years that I have been here. This is the end of it.

Mr. Ferrie: You would deprive the 70,000 boys of their money.

Mr. Low: I may tell my quick-tempered friend over here that he does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. Ferrie: Don't I? I know better than you do.

Mr. Low: The thing for the hon. member to do is to keep quiet.

Mr. Knowles: Enough has been said, but the statements of the member for Mackenzie (Mr. Ferrie) prompt me to get to my feet again. He keeps talking about the people who might have been deprived had we continued our protests against the small benefits that are going out. We are letting the bill go through because of the small benefits, but let it be understood that the provisions for higher payments into the fund will come into effect on July 1, so next summer when the youngsters in his constituency and elsewhere find that they have to start contributing 18 cents a week to this scheme when they are making less than $5.40, when they come to him to complain, let him nor any other Liberal not pass the buck to those of us who have opposed the objectionable features in this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed on division.

Mr. Martin: In spite of what the hon. gentlemen have said, I simply want to thank the house for its co-operation on this measure. With regard to the misunderstandings and the reference to agreements, I only say to those who have made those statements that I indicated clearly this afternoon what I understood the situation to be. I do want to say that this measure, important as it is, was prepared as a result of careful consideration prior to its introduction here, and it was passed as a result of careful consideration here today. It is a measure of great consequence, and it is because of that that I thank the house and hon. members for their co-operation.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On Monday we shall continue the debate on the address. I was astounded tonight to hear what was said before the passing of this bill. During last session I had the honour of leading this side of the house for the government, and I should like hon. members to know that I do not think anything was done to try to put anything over the opposition. I have been reading over what the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said the other night. I did not attend the meetings with the leaders of the opposition, and I cannot say what happened there; but I can assure the house that anything I can do to co-operate with the opposition during the session I shall do with pleasure.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, February 27, 1950

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING

Bill No. 9, to incorporate Prairie Transmission Lines Limited.—Mr. Benidickson.

NIAGARA DIVERSION TREATY

USE OF WATER FROM NIAGARA RIVER FOR HYDROELECTRIC POWER PURPOSES

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table three copies in English and three copies in French of the Niagara diversion treaty, which is being signed in Washington this afternoon by the Canadian ambassador, Mr. Hume Wrong, and by the United States Secretary of State, Mr. Dean Acheson. With your permission I should like to make a short statement on this treaty.

We have been discussing with the United States government the possibility of amending article 5 of the Boundary Waters treaty of 1909 with respect to the use of water from the Niagara river for the generation of hydroelectric power. In these talks we have had the valuable assistance of the chairman of the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario and the chairman of the Niagara parks commission. The discussions have resulted in a Niagara diversion treaty.

The Boundary Waters treaty of 1909 authorized the diversion by the United States of 20,000 cubic feet of water per second, and the diversion by Canada of 36,000 cubic feet per second. Although Canada was thus allowed to use more water than the United States the power produced by the extra Canadian share has been exported to the United States. As a result, each country has had the use of hydroelectric power produced by approximately half of the water made available by the 1909 treaty.

During the second world war, additional diversions of 13,000 cubic feet per second on the Canadian side and 12,500 cubic feet per second on the United States side were authorized on a temporary basis.

The new Niagara treaty reserves adequate quantities of water for flow over the falls and through the rapids, and then authorizes the use of all remaining water for power purposes. Since this water will for the first time be divided equally between the two countries, the United States government is being informed through our embassy in Washington that when facilities have been constructed in the United States to use the full United States share of water, Canadian export licences then in effect will not be renewed unless circumstances existing in Canada at that time make such a course desirable.

It is not possible to say just how much more water this treaty will make available to Canada, since the necessity of preserving the scenic beauty of the falls and rapids is the first charge on the fluctuating volume of water in the Niagara river. However, it is expected that both countries will normally have the use of more water than before. At the same time, the fact that the temporary arrangements agreed upon during the war are being superseded by a permanent agreement will permit the construction of new power plants of the latest design to replace a number of existing plants now in operation which cannot make the most effective use of the available water. For these two reasons, a substantial increase in the amount of hydroelectric power generated at Niagara can be expected once this treaty has been ratified and the new power plants have been constructed.

Nevertheless the demand for power keeps increasing, and this additional Niagara power cannot be expected to meet the full needs of Ontario and New York state. The power requirements of these areas can be met only by the full development of the potential power of the St. Lawrence river. The additional Niagara power should help to tide us over the period required for the construction of the St. Lawrence facilities, but the need for St. Lawrence power is as urgent as it ever has been. The new Niagara diversion treaty does not in any way lessen Canada's interest in, and desire for, early ratification by both governments of the St. Lawrence waterway and power agreement of 1941.

The treaty contains two provisions designed to protect and enhance the scenic beauty of the Niagara river and falls. It calls for early completion of remedial works to ensure an unbroken crestline on the falls by distributing the waters more evenly. It also ensures that the flow over the falls and through the rapids will not be reduced below the amounts which experience has shown are essential for the preservation of the full scenic spectacle.

I have been advised by the chairman of the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario that this treaty meets with the approval of the premier of Ontario, the Ontario hydro, and the Niagara parks commission.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I feel sure that every hon. member of this house will welcome the statement which has been made with regard to the treaty which is being signed today, not only because it will provide more power for one part of this country, but because of the convincing evidence it offers of the friendly and effective association between Canada and the United States in enterprises of this kind.

I feel sure that everyone will welcome also the statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) to the effect that this will in no way be allowed to obscure the immense importance of proceeding with the power development of the St. Lawrence river. This treaty will provide an additional supply of water which, with certain new developments in power plant construction, will be of great help; but at a time when Canada and the United States are looking to the protection of the peace which is the main concern of people generally throughout the free world, I believe it is right to say that there could be no more cogent evidence of an effective working partnership between two countries than the fact that an agreement could be reached for power development of the St. Lawrence, which would add so much to the potential resources of both countries for peace or for any situation that might arise.

TRANSFER OF DUTIES

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION ACT

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table a copy of an order in council passed on February 23 under the provisions of the Public Service Rearrangement and Transfer of Duties Act, transferring, effective as of January 18, 1950, the powers, duties and functions vested in the Minister of Finance under the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act to the Minister of Resources and Development, as was contemplated by the statute setting up the Department of Resources and Development.

The law officers of the crown tell us that, a former transfer having been made from the Minister of Finance to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, whose department ceased to exist when the new department came into being, it is necessary now to have an order in council transferring these functions from the Minister of Finance to the minister of the new department.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question, for the purpose of clarification only. A moment ago the Prime Minister announced that the Minister of Finance has divested himself of certain responsibilities by transferring them to the Minister of Resources and Development, and that prior to that time he had divested himself of those responsibilities by the same method. How can the Minister of Finance transfer to another minister something he has already transferred from himself to that minister? Simple addition would indicate that he had nothing left to transfer after he had done his first job.

Mr. St. Laurent: That was our impression when the statute substituting the new department for the old department was passed, but the law officers of the crown have given the opinion that the order in council which was passed transferring certain duties from the Minister of Finance to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply ceased to have any effect when the statute under which that department was constituted was repealed. The opinion was that it would be necessary to have a new order in council passed to vest these powers and functions in the minister of the new department. Their opinion evidently was that upon the repeal of the statute setting up the ministry of reconstruction and supply the order in council ceased to have effect, and that the powers and functions reverted to the minister who had first been vested with them by parliament.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): In other words, there is no intestacy among departments of government.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

QUESTIONS AND MOTIONS FOR PRODUCTION OF PAPERS

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Perhaps it would be agreeable to hon. members if, notwithstanding the order made for precedence of the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, we should be prepared to bring down on Wednesday answers to most of the questions which are on the order paper. There are already forty-four of them, and I think most of the answers are ready. If it is the wish of the house generally, we could have the questions, as well as notices of motions for production of papers, called on Wednesday and disposed of.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

TRANSFER OF ARMY PERSONNEL—HOUSING ACCOMMODATION

Mr. J. A. Blanchette (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, on February 22 last the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Ferguson) asked the following question, which is to be found at page 128 of Hansard:

In view of the fact that soldiers belonging to the permanent army must obey orders and move where they are directed, and there are men in the ranks with families moving to Ottawa, is any provision being made for the housing of these men, or must they continue to seek any shelter they can possibly obtain and pay exorbitant prices? Is any attempt being made to provide dwellings for these people?

In answer thereto I should like to say that the policy of the Department of National Defence is to press forward with the construction of married quarters in more isolated centres. At Rockcliffe, however, because of the number of service personnel employed, 108 houses have already been erected; 200 more are in the course of construction or under contract, and it is expected that contracts for a further 300 units will be placed this year. In addition, the policy is adopted of earmarking some of the houses erected by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in larger centres for service personnel. A large proportion of married service personnel are also veterans and have access to accommodation for veterans. More married quarters in proportion to numbers of personnel have been provided in Canada than in any other country.

REFERENCE TO ADDRESS OF GENERAL MCNAUGHTON TO CANADIAN GEOGRAPHICAL SOCIETY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I may say I gave notice of it by letter, but the notice was not long because the subject matter in its full form was brought to my attention only a short time before we met this afternoon. I wish to ask whether the speech made by General A. G. L. McNaughton to the annual meeting of the Canadian Geographical Society in Ottawa on Friday, February 24, was authorized by the Department of National Defence or any other department of the Canadian government. Whether authorized or not, does the government now approve the statements contained in that speech?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I shall have to take the question as notice. I had to be away over the week end, and I have not had the opportunity the hon. member apparently has had of seeing the full text of the address. I asked for it as soon as I received his letter, but the best I was able to obtain was the report in the Ottawa Citizen. This it not a full report, and does not contain the paragraph to which the letter of the hon. member refers. I will get the full text. I hope that we may have the opportunity of calling the estimates of the Department of National Defence at an early day, when a full statement will be made as to the matters which apparently were discussed by General McNaughton in his address, and the policy of the government will be outlined.

I may say in the meantime that because of his own personal reputation and the positions he occupies in public affairs any considered statement made by General McNaughton is apt to be given serious consideration by everyone who hears or reads it. This particular statement will receive consideration before the Minister of National Defence makes his statement to the house, and the matters involved therein will be fully dealt with at that time.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—INSCRIBING OF NAMES OF CANADIAN DEAD IN BOOK OF REMEMBRANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. As today is the fiftieth anniversary of the battle of Paardeberg, in which the Royal Canadian regiment so distinguished itself, will the minister give consideration to having the names of the 225 Canadian soldiers who lost their lives in the South African war inscribed in a book of remembrance and retained in the peace tower?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will give attention to my hon. friend's question.

PAYMENT OF BONUS TO EX-PRISONERS OF WORLD WAR II

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. It arises out of a number of letters and petitions from army and navy veterans associations as to the adoption by Canada of a system similar to that in effect in the United States, under which $1 a day for the period of their detention is paid to those who were prisoners in the Pacific or European theatres during the period of the last war, or to their dependents. Instead of asking for leave to table the petitions, I shall ask the minister whether consideration is being given by the government to a similar plan of payment or bonus to veterans of the Canadian army who were prisoners of war, or to their dependents?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Veterans Affairs): The representations referred to by my hon. friend came to my attention for the first time over last week end. I have not discussed the matter with my colleagues; consequently I think the exact answer would be that the question has not received the consideration of the government.

I should add at once that in addition to the views that might be held concerning the use of public moneys for this purpose, I believe that fairly strong exception might be taken to such a step, because of the possible effect it might have on the battle morale of Canadian personnel in any future war.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If the minister will allow me to say so, in the United States those payments are being made out of reparations, not out of taxation.

Mr. Gregg: Without being specific, I would point out that there is quite a difference between the reparations receivable by Canada and those payable to the United States.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

QUESTION AS TO PROPOSALS FOR RELIEVING UNEMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he will consider giving the house a statement at an early date as to the government's proposals for relieving unemployment.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I read with much interest the report of the debate on Friday on the bill to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act. I would commend it to all those who are interested. On the motion for an address in reply to the speech from the throne I outlined the government's policies with respect to what we considered to be abnormal seasonal unemployment at this time. I have nothing to add at the moment to what I then said.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

REQUEST FOR SUSPENSION OF PENDING EXECUTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): Pending the decision of parliament on Bill No. 2, which proposes the abolition of capital punishment, I should like to ask the Solicitor General whether the government will consider suspending executions in Canada, including those scheduled to take place in Vancouver tomorrow morning.

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Solicitor General): The hon. member was kind enough to give me notice of his question. In reply may I be permitted to say that although proposals to abolish capital punishment have been before this house on previous occasions, we have no departmental record of any request such as that advanced by my hon. friend having been considered in the past.

As the hon. member knows, the administration of justice throughout Canada is in the hands of the provincial authorities; and according to practice the postponements of executions are matters to be considered upon their merits by the courts of the province under section 1063 of the Criminal Code. It is felt that to act upon a mere legislative proposal as though it were a statutory enactment could hardly be justified. To suspend executions in Canada, as requested by the hon. member, in my estimation would be an improper and unprecedented intervention by the federal executive authority under the law as it stands and as it must be applied throughout Canada unless and until it is changed by parliament.

P. E. I. CAR FERRY SERVICE

INQUIRY AS TO TAKING OVER OF NORTHUMBERLAND FERRIES LIMITED BY CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): I desire to direct an important question to the Minister of Transport. Are the Canadian National Railways going to take over Northumberland Ferries Limited, operating the Wood Islands-Caribou route; and if so when?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): The answer at this time is no.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Thursday, February 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. F. H. Larson for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. Irvin Studer (Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, living in a democracy as we do, we appreciate the opportunity of taking part in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Even if it were not customary to congratulate you again on having been elected as Speaker of this house, we should still want to do so, because we feel that while everything may not be all right in the world, with your wisdom and guidance everything is all right in this House of Commons.

I should like also to congratulate the mover of the address, particularly since he is one of us from Saskatchewan. We appreciate the fact that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) chose an up-and-coming young man from Saskatchewan to present this motion. We all hope that the ability of the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Larson) will become more generally recognized, and that in future he will have the opportunity to be of even greater service to his country.

All who heard the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Dumas) second the motion for the address must have marvelled at his ability to express himself in both languages. As time goes on we hope to be able to do something ourselves in that direction, and reciprocate the kindness French-speaking members have always shown by addressing themselves to us in English when they know we do not understand their mother tongue. The people of Villeneuve also have every right to be proud of their member.

At the same time I should like to congratulate the new minister and the new parliamentary assistants. The people in Maple Creek who have come from other parts of the dominion I know would want me to ask every hon. member to take their greetings back to the places from which they originally came, in almost every part of Canada.

For a few moments I should like to speak about my constituency. Situated in the southwest part of Saskatchewan, it is one of the largest in the settled portion of Canada. If one were to travel every road allowance that has been surveyed in Maple Creek, he would travel one and a half times around the world. It is in the Palliser triangle, which is an area extending from a point in north central Saskatchewan, catching a corner of Manitoba and running on down in a southwesterly direction into Alberta. When it has rainfall it has great production, but unfortunately it experiences dry spells which bring extreme crop failure. This is another of those years during which the people of that area are suffering extremely, not only from drought conditions but also from one of the most severe winters in history.

It is difficult for anyone in this or any other country who has never gone through the experience to comprehend what it means to have no crop. We may have marketing and other difficulties, but when a man is without a crop of any kind of course he lacks the wherewithal to sustain himself, he receives no return for his work of a year or perhaps a series of years, and is unable to carry on. The people in that area who have had no income for years are hoping that both provincial and federal governments will see that this spring they are enabled to carry on and make the contribution to the country that they are able to make when they have good crops. We should do everything possible to assist those people who, against great odds and with the utmost difficulty, have remained in that country, hoping against hope eventually to make their contribution to the well-being of the country. I believe it would be a great help if payments to the farmers this spring under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act were made equal in purchasing power to the payments made in 1939, when the act was brought into operation. I do not think that is asking too much, if by doing so we can place these people in a position to carry on and plant another crop without being in debt before the seed is even in the soil.

It is not my intention to dwell on this point at great length. Not all is gloom and despair even in that area, however. Maple Creek has the best beef in Canada. I have been told by those who should know that if you want a good steak you should go to Maple Creek, where the restaurants serve the best steaks in Canada. My constituency also has some of the best sheep in this country; it has the best light horses; it has the best wheat, with the highest protein content in Canada. It has the best, or almost the best, light honey, as witness what happened to the exhibits from Valmarie and Maple Creek this past fall at the Canadian national exhibition. It has the best water because the king and queen were served with this Shaunavon water during their western trip. In the Cypress Hills it has a provincial park. There is one lake, Lac Pelletier, and that is where I live. It has some of the best educational institutions, at Gravelbourg and other places. In common with the other constituencies in the land it has, without a shadow of a doubt, the best people in the world.

Today this area comes under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, which has been administered by the dominion government. As time goes on it will be found this area is equal to any other area coming under the operation of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. When the operations of this act are finally completed, no one will be standing in this house asking for assistance to the people of my area. We want to look after ourselves; we do not want to be beggars all our lives. We want to have a chance to make our living as the remainder of the people do, and to be equal with all the other people in this Dominion of Canada. I hope that in 1950 the dominion and the province will co-operate in making farming possible in this area, as well as in other areas similarly situated.

I noticed, Mr. Speaker, that there was an amendment and subamendment to the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I believe one part of the amendment called for the elimination of the means test in respect of old age pensions. I believe that everyone in this country, regardless of party, is in favour of the elimination of the means test. If it is to be eliminated and there is not sufficient money available to carry the additional burden of old age pensions, what particular social service could those who moved the amendment offer to reduce the burden of providing additional pensions for the aged? There is only one way of carrying old age pensions without a means test, and that is to increase production. I would suggest to the mover of that amendment that he do everything possible to see that production is increased throughout the length and breadth of Canada, because it is only through increased production that wealth can be made available to pay for the increased social services. If these people desire to be of service to the aged and blind of Canada, and all the others who are in need of assistance, then they can go through this country preaching increased production.

If it is necessary to work an eight-hour day to accomplish that result, well and good. If it takes a nine-hour day, I suggest they recommend that the people work a nine-hour day. If it takes a ten-hour day, they could recommend that the people work ten hours. On the other hand they may wish to recommend that the people follow the example of the farmers and work sixteen hours a day; and no one may be hurt in the process.

From the terms of the amendment, one would think that the aged of this country were in a pitiable condition. It has been suggested that the means test is the meanest test. Can anyone name any other country in the world, under any form of government, that has a better system of old age pensions, or more deductible income in the calculation of income? If so, I wish he would name it. Let us help the aged and the blind, but let us not consider that Canada has been doing something which would not compare favourably with what is being done in any other country. Which country would they care to uphold to us? Time and again during the last session reference was made to England, New Zealand and Australia, as examples that we should follow. So far this session I have not heard a single reference to those countries. Previously it was said that everything Canada should do should be patterned after what was happening in those countries. None of them, however, can meet what Canada has done in the way of social services. Every country in the world has a means test. If there is one which has not, I wish some hon. member would name it. When the means test is removed, Canada will be the first country in the whole world to remove it.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, I believe the mover of the amendment was a former premier of Ontario, while the mover of the subamendment, I understand, is leader of a party which has a government out in Saskatchewan with which he would like us to become intimately acquainted, or possibly even adopt. It seems to me that when members in this House of Commons advocate what should be done, they should have at least set an example in their own particular province, over which, at some time or other, they may have had some control, directly or indirectly. In the province of Ontario, the richest province in the Dominion of Canada, we find no supplementary payment for the aged. In Ontario, however, there is a mothers' allowance. Among the needy people in the world there are those who, through some unfortunate circumstance, have lost the breadwinner of the family. In Ontario these mothers' allowances are paid, but with a means test. I suggest that some people should start practising what they preach before they come into the House of Commons and tell us what to do.

Furthermore, out in the province of Saskatchewan, in spite of what happens in Ontario, the old age pensioners receive a supplementary payment of $2.50, but only after a means test. This was set up by a socialist government. It is necessary to undergo a means test before even this sum of $2.50 is paid. The province of Alberta pays $7.50 as a supplementary payment, without a means test. In British Columbia there is a supplementary payment of $10, without a means test. The socialist members from Saskatchewan have been preaching the elimination of the means test, yet there is a means test in that province before the old age pensioners receive that low supplementary payment.

The province of Saskatchewan also pays a mothers' allowance with a means test. It is the lowest mothers' allowance payment made by any province in Canada. These members from Saskatchewan, therefore, must be talking with their tongues in their cheeks when they come before this House of Commons and try to tell us that they are the only people who have any regard for the rest of the people in Canada.

Again I would say that, when such a subamendment is put forward, those who favour it should practise what they preach. Let us all work together to make it possible for the aged and blind to receive adequate compensation. Let us find ways and means of increasing production, so that the wealth will be available to enable Canada to be the first country to remove the means test.

I believe the subamendment said that the government had failed to take adequate measures to protect civil liberties, and at the same time to curb espionage and other harmful activities of communists and fascists in Canada. If I recall aright, three or four years ago something happened in regard to espionage in Canada. As I recall it, there were some people in the socialist group who, either directly or indirectly, pleaded for the spies who were arrested and brought up for trial. If I do not remember correctly, I suggest that hon. members look at page 5742 of Hansard of August 31, 1946, and see what the present minister of health in the Saskatchewan government said about the fellows who were arrested for espionage in Canada; at that time he was the member for Swift Current. Read what he said, and then revert back to this subamendment which suggests that the government has not taken adequate measures to curb espionage in Canada. If it were possible for me to move another subamendment, it would read like this: That the government failed to take adequate measures to protect the civil liberties and at the same time to curb espionage and other harmful activities of communists, fascists and, I would add, socialists in Canada. I will not say that they are the same; I will only say that they are related. Blood is thicker than water. Some of the things that are in fascism are in socialism, and some of the things that are in both are in communism. They are therefore related. As someone so kindly told me yesterday, the farther you are from socialism, the farther you are from communism. I think that is true.

In any event, I heard some explanations from some of those over on the socialist benches last session, and there was an indication of it this year in which they tried to tell us that they were not communists, if I remember correctly. My thought on the matter is this. Why speak about not being a communist if you are not one, or if you have no association with them? Why talk about it at all? One thing I have not heard in this House of Commons is a corking good speech against communism by any of those socialists over in the far corner of the house. I suggest that they can all talk on that subject and make real speeches on the evils of communism. They are certainly the people to do so, because there is not a single subject that has ever been brought before this House of Commons on which they have not been able to give an opinion. I have listened to their profound, pontifical and infallible pronouncements for quite a number of days, and certainly they would be the people to do justice to a good speech against communism.

I noticed that the leader of the socialists over in that far corner was telling us the other day what bred communism and fascism. I ask him what breeds socialism; and if it is not exactly the same thing, I will take back everything I have said. No matter where you look around the world, socialism is out of date and is passing out of the picture; and if there are any people living in this Dominion of Canada who have nothing better than socialism to offer, I think they had better go back to their studies, go through all the history of the world and find out all the causes of everything, including the causes of war; because irrespective of what hon. members over there have been talking about, I hope to have the opportunity some time to show this House of Commons that an "ism" practised somewhere in the world—and that includes the last ten years—has been the cause of every war that we have had. Socialism is out of date. The socialists preach about the benefits of socialism. Where has it ever been in existence long enough for anyone to know whether it is good, bad or indifferent? It does not last. It passes out of the picture, because as soon as people see what it is based on, they begin to find ways and means of discarding it as rapidly as they possibly can. It is something that does not stay fixed. It is like this hybrid wheat that the scientists have produced; they take a parent of one wheat and a parent of another wheat, and cross them. They work for years trying to develop a new variety of wheat. One of their greatest troubles is to have that wheat remain fixed. After a variety is established and reseeded, it reverts to the variety of the one parent or the other. Difficulties have been experienced with this hybrid wheat, just as difficulties have been experienced with hybrid corn in the United States. It does not reseed itself. You always have to go back and get hybrid corn. It is the same way with socialism; it does not stay fixed. I think if these socialists, who I believe are good people, would concentrate their efforts on building up some kind of "ism" that does not have to be imported, it would be much better. We must import many things, but let us leave those "isms" in the places where they originated. They have no place in Canada.

Mr. Gillis: What happened to the Liberals in England?

Mr. Studer: I will let the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) have all the fun he wants to. The other day he was talking about shooting. I should like to have him tell us whom he is going to shoot at.

If we want to nip communism in the bud, Mr. Speaker, I believe the best way to do that is to nip socialism in the bud; then we shall have them both. But in the meantime let no one think that we are just concerned with that. Some of the things that are said about the causes of these "isms" are most certainly true. It is up to us in this democratic country to make sure that the conditions that would bring about a situation of that kind are eliminated.

We have heard some talk about unemployment, and we have heard reasons advanced for it; we have been told that some of it is seasonal, some perhaps otherwise. But if there is one thing that the people of this country should guard against, in my opinion, unemployment certainly is that thing. If there is any anguish in the heart of the father of a family in this country who is denied the right to earn daily bread for his family, it may have unhappy results. I repeat what has been said by many others, that hunger will drive people to do almost anything in an effort to sustain the children who are dependent upon them. Therefore I would advise government, whether it is the government I support or any other one throughout the length and breadth of this country, to let no condition appear anywhere that causes suffering, hardship, privation and the anguish that is in the hearts of those who are not permitted to earn their daily bread. No democratic government anywhere in the world can afford to let a condition such as that exist. The only countries that can afford to do so are the totalitarian countries, the dictatorship countries; because they can take their unemployed and put them in the army or put them in a camp. We do not do that in the democratic countries.

So I say that if you eliminate the causes that give concern and anxiety to the people of this country, you will not have very much to worry about. Every resource of every province should be utilized to eliminate this condition, if it exists—and we have been told that it does; otherwise in the future there will not be any resources there to use.

I believe I heard some talk about employment on farms. We sometimes hear people talking about the movement of farmers to the cities. I believe it is a fact. We have the eight-hour day, the forty-hour week, and two weeks' vacation with pay for our labouring people—and that is a good thing; I want the labouring people to have the best of everything; I want them to have all the purchasing power that it is possible for them to have, because as a farmer I want a place to sell my goods, and if labour has no purchasing power —and it is the biggest consumer in Canada— my goods will not be sold. So I want them to have everything they can possibly have that will increase their health, their consuming capacity, and their enjoyment of life. But if labour can maintain a good standard of living by working eight hours a day and forty hours a week, how long are we to expect the farm boys and their fathers to work from twelve to sixteen hours a day and not have a standard of living equal to that of the labouring people with their eight-hour day system?

In my view one of the greatest difficulties facing Canada today is that people have been drawn away from the farms. The time will come when people may have to go hungry either in this or in other countries. Therefore we have to bring those people back to the farms and improve farm conditions. We have to modernize them and create a love of the soil, something which is missing in this country today. Only love of the soil will enable the farmers to nurture it and to give it the care it needs to keep it from eroding. They must adopt a system of rotation, and care for the soil as they would care for members of their families.

That is what love of the soil means. But it is fast disappearing from this country. So if there is anything any of us can do to keep the importance of farming before the people of this country, and the importance of the growing of food, we shall have accomplished something, we shall have made a contribution to the welfare of our country.

Farming is a way of life—a way I would not exchange for any other way of life. But it is a way of life which many people are exchanging for a substance which they think is a reality, to be found in other forms in the cities and elsewhere. Let us remember that there has never been any record in the history of any country of their having a too prosperous agriculture. There has never been any danger of that; let us keep that in mind, over and above many other things which are not of such great importance.

Many of us in the House of Commons and out Saskatchewan way have been giving a considerable amount of thought and have been pondering ways and means of alleviating conditions, not only in the drought areas of Saskatchewan but throughout the province as a whole. Everyone in Canada knows that Saskatchewan has problems which are common to no other province. The missionaries who went through that land seventy-five or a hundred years ago came back with reports about it and gave advice to governments of that day as to what they thought, based on the information they had gained and what they had learned from the first settlers, the Indians, about what the country could support in the future. They indicated what in their opinion would be the proper number of people to be allowed to take up land out there, and they made suggestions as to what the government could do about it. They emphasized the danger of over-government—government at too great a cost for the number of people in any given area. Along with other difficulties in Saskatchewan, it is my view that that is one of our greatest problems. We have too much government for our limited population; the people cannot carry the burden of taxation, and financial difficulties follow which are carried to the dominion government.

It will be recalled that in recent years past the government of Saskatchewan came to the dominion year after year, asking for assistance when the province was unable to carry itself. Again we witnessed the same thing at the dominion-provincial conference held here in Ottawa in January, upon which occasion I was privileged to attend. The premier of Saskatchewan placed before the government of Canada the situation in that province, and described the dire need for assistance and additional help. That was found to be necessary despite the fact that for ten years Saskatchewan has operated under prosperous conditions, the most prosperous she has ever known. Yet if after prosperous years the provincial authorities time after time have to come to the dominion to ask for assistance, what is going to happen when conditions change?—because our socialist friends have been saying during the past year that conditions are going to change. In fact I think many of them have developed cricks in their necks from looking around corners in search of the depression they have been telling us about for the last ten years. When it does come—if it does—I hope it will not be a socialist depression. It appears to me we could get out from under any other depression we might get into; but when you get into a socialist depression you are in it until kingdom come.

I have no intention of living in any country in which there is a policy of rationing poverty. Under our system we can produce the goods; everyone knows we can. We may have some difficulty in the distribution of them, but we can certainly correct that condition as time goes on. But the socialist philosophy is "make the rich poor". That is the first thing they talk about. There are too many rich people, they say, and too many poor people; we will make the rich poor—and then everyone will be poor. That is the result.

So we have the provincial authorities coming to the dominion government asking for assistance in the matter of education; asking for assistance with old age pensions; asking for assistance in health measures; asking for road assistance—everything anyone could want, they will be asking for. But do not worry about that, because the socialists in Saskatchewan have a wonderful answer; they are most efficient at spending other people's money. But when it comes to earning any money of their own, that is different!

I suggest there are too many people from the government of Saskatchewan coming down to Ottawa and asking for things—people who have no qualifications except that all their lives they have been making their living with their tongues. They have no callouses on their hands, but there would be some on their tongues, because they do nothing but talk.

Anyone who will take the trouble to look at the order paper of the legislature in Saskatchewan at this time will find one resolution after another asking the dominion government for assistance. If we have to have a government out in Saskatchewan which has no purpose other than that of spending the dominion's money, then I think some thought should be given to correcting the situation which exists out there.

They seem to have plenty of solutions for their difficulties. One of them was to import a bunch of streamlined planners from other countries. They could not spend the money fast enough themselves. There was $8 million in the treasury when they came into office, but they could not get rid of it fast enough, so they got these planners to get rid of it in a hurry. And how they got rid of it!

Ever since they have been in power, taxes have gone up. I am speaking seriously when I say that taxes have increased in Saskatchewan to such an extent that I am seriously considering whether I can continue to farm. Taxes are just as much an overhead on my farm as are any other expenses which enter into the production of the commodities I produce. If these conditions continue to exist, or even grow worse from year to year, I do not know what will happen to the future of that part of our country.

The socialists have offered a solution. The local school districts got into trouble, and the socialists said: Boys, that is not the way to run a school district; the way to do it is to create a large district, so that if there happens to be a crop failure in a local district you will have the larger district to depend upon.

Mr. Wright: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Wright: I should like to ask a question. Who put the larger school unit legislation on the statute book?

Mr. Studer: It was put on the statute book for people to use if they wished; but it was not forced upon them.

So we have this offered as a solution, that if there is a crop failure in a local school district they will depend upon the larger area. But when the larger area has a crop failure, who do they depend upon? Right away they come racing down to the dominion government to find a solution—to get money. There is another solution offered in Saskatchewan in connection with the larger municipal districts. As a result of the possible larger districts they think the solution is automatically found.

It seems to me that some of the people over in Europe worked things out that way, but on a larger scale. In every communist country it was suggested that the solution of the problem was to bring in a larger area. We see the communist people in Russia expanding their influence throughout the world. They are reaching out to other countries. Hitler had the same idea. There is a trend that way in connection with all these isms. They feel that that is the solution for whatever condition that may exist. Perhaps it is and, if so, I should like to see the school districts stay in the hands of the local people because it keeps government close to the people. The farther away the people get from government, the more danger there is for the people. The same with the municipal districts. I should like to keep them close to the people, so that the idea of self-government will remain in their minds. All these local governments should be kept close to the people.

But in the larger economic sphere of the provinces and the dominion perhaps they could be operated in a larger way without placing undue hardship on any one. I think there is a solution for the financial difficulties facing the government of Saskatchewan. History has proved that this province cannot carry its financial economy without overburdening the people with taxation. The quicker a solution is found, the better it will be and it should not be a piecemeal solution. Let us grapple with this thing in its entirety, in its largeness.

I suggest to the province of Saskatchewan and its government that they provide in the forthcoming session of their legislature for a solution to their financial difficulties. I suggest that that solution could be achieved by taking a plebiscite of the people of Saskatchewan as to what they wish to do. Instead of adopting the practice they have adopted in Europe of acquiring more land, I suggest that the province of Saskatchewan give away part of their land. They should take that area up to the third meridian west of Regina and Moose Jaw and apportion it to Manitoba. They should take that area west of the third meridian and apportion it to Alberta. They would thus eliminate the unbearable cost of extra government now in existence with its highest rate of cost in Canada. A great burden would be removed from the shoulders of the people.

Something definite and desperate has to be done. The area apportioned to Manitoba would be similar in character to the farming land of Manitoba. The area that would be apportioned to Alberta would fit into the economy of that province, because it would be the same type of land. The people in the area apportioned to Manitoba would then receive the social services available in that province as well as the advantages of the power development which the people in Saskatchewan now have to go without. The people in the area that would go into the province of Alberta would receive an extra $7.50 per month in old age pensions without a means test as against $2.50 per month with a means test that is now being paid in Saskatchewan.

This would create better conditions in western Canada and I think it is inevitable that it will be brought into effect. You cannot have 800,000 people carrying the burden of a socialist government such as they have to do in Saskatchewan. I cannot see how they can continue to pay the increasing expenses and greater rates of taxation year by year. If hon. members do not believe that, let them watch the tax situation next year under the most prosperous conditions that we have had. Let them note the high rate of governmental cost brought about by the depopulation of the province. We had one less constituency in the last election and we are going to have three less in the next election.

A lot of people who are in governmental service in Saskatchewan should try to be statesmen instead of being merely politicians. Let them do something that will prove to be of real benefit to the people instead of adopting piecemeal measures. Perhaps some of those gentlemen would not like to be considered statesmen. I understand that the leader out there is more or less of a shrinking violet and might not want to have much fame accrue to him. However, when history is written it will look much nicer if you are considered to have been a statesman in working out the general economy of the country.

The area that would go into Manitoba has the same type of farm land as that province. The people in that area would enjoy lower taxation. Their farms could be modernized as they would have the advantage of the power system of that province. The area that would go into Alberta is made up of the same type of ranch land. The people in that area would have the advantages of the mineral wealth of that province, and the people in the area going to Manitoba would have the benefits of the economy of that province.

Our oil and other mineral resources would be developed as they are not at the present time. The only way oil can be developed in Saskatchewan is to have a tunnel dug under the boundary line. There is a statement in the manifesto, in the handbook or bible of the socialists, to the effect that the C.C.F. will not rest content until capitalism is eradicated from the entire economy, or words to that effect, and I think I am pretty close to the meaning.

If that is the situation how can anyone expect capital to come into Saskatchewan? If you do not allow capital to come in then the state must become the capitalist. How are you going to extract sufficient money from the people so that the state can become the capitalist and develop these oil resources? I like the system we have under which capital can develop oil or anything else and then be taxed according to its production or wealth as is done in any democratic country. In the meantime they talk of safeguarding the natural resources of the province for the people and the oil stays under the ground.

I do not know what kind of arrangement the premier of the province of Saskatchewan made when he went to see the chaps in Wall street or St. James street or Bay street. I do not know whether he told them this, but I wonder if he did not say, "Just disregard this thing about eradicating capitalism; that is just there for the real socialist and fellow travellers because we have to try to satisfy everybody". Even if that was said I still do not think that capital is going to come into that province with the prospects of their saying, "Come into my parlour, said the spider to the fly".

That is one of the difficulties we have out there. We have great overhead in connection with government, a thing that is becoming more unbearable every year through the depopulating that is taking place. This burden is going to increase by leaps and bounds until we will be forced into having two prairie provinces instead of three. In 1895 a proposal was made to Sir John Macdonald that the Manitoba boundary be on the third meridian. In 1901 Sir Charles Tupper had a resolution before the Manitoba legislature which was passed unanimously that the boundary line be on the third meridian west of Regina and Moose Jaw.

Even 55 years ago they seemed to realize what the situation would become in Saskatchewan, and truly it has become the situation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has exceeded his time and may continue only with unanimous consent.

Mr. Knowles: Oh, no, that is enough.

Mr. Studer: My parliamentary assistant told me that I had five minutes left, but I agree with Your Honour's count. I wanted to say a word about marketing, but there will be other opportunities to deal with that matter. In the meantime I will bring my remarks to a close by suggesting that we all work together to try to make this Canada of ours, which is so great in the eyes of the rest of the world, still greater in the future.

There is one thing that stands out in my estimation of this country. We have the best government anywhere in the world. I believe we have the best opposition anywhere in the world. I believe we have the best socialists of any country in the world. I believe we have in Canada the best Social Crediters. We can work together, and if I may I should like to suggest to our friends of the opposition that they should not get all hot and bothered about these inquiries into various organizations. I suggest that they should not make too much of them, and that they should not launch their lifeboats and man their oars in an effort to try to save all the people who might be harmed by a tempest in a teapot. Every member of the opposition has talents, and I suggest that they use them to help to make progress in Canada.

With all of us working together, including the socialists, there is nothing we cannot do. If we are not proud of our country, all the rest of the world is. In every parliament of the world the Canadian parliament and people are held up as an example for other peoples of the world to follow. We are going to continue to hold the lead by the use of the abilities and talents of all the people so that the rest of the people of the world will forever look to us for their guidance. We are a country that is not encumbered by any of the things that afflict the older countries. We have the natural resources and everything else that go to make us the greatest country in the world, and every one of us can make our contribution.

Finally, may I say that we have done it all and retained our freedom, something that should not be overlooked in the world in which we are living today. We have maintained our freedom, and in the future we will continue to do so. All our efforts will be directed towards making Canada great and towards maintaining our freedom so that we can be free and strong, because only the strong can be free.

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with keen interest, as I know all other members have, to the previous speaker, the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Studer). He has at least contributed a touch of humour, and indeed it was a touch of inspiration to find there is at least one Liberal member in the house who is going to get definite and desperate. I certainly realize that he will add something to the party to which he belongs. He will give them a little more incentive to be forthright. I followed his speech with keen interest. There was one feature of it with which I can agree, and that is that the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne is a matter of great concern. There is no feature of our parliamentary system that is looked forward to with as keen interest or as keen a sense of responsibility as the speech from the throne. It is always cautiously written by the government of the day and is graciously read by His Excellency, our popular Governor General.

I feel that I must join the other hon. members of the house in congratulating sincerely the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Larson) and the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Dumas) on the dignity with which they discharged their responsibilities in moving and seconding the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Indeed, each showed marked ability, and I congratulate them and hope that they will be able to render long and useful service either in power or in opposition. On the other hand, I should like to carry my congratulations a little further than was done by other hon. members because it took some skill and ability to find in the speech from the throne, which was so conspicuous for what was not in it, so many reasons for supporting it. In fact it was quite a document. It was full of glittering generalities and boastfulness of the government. It spoke of the splendid demand and high prices for farm products, but it included plans to support prices and take care of surpluses as they arose. It spoke of employment being at a high level in Canada, and of the wonderful times we are enjoying, but it planned also for extension of unemployment insurance. It spoke of controls and the desire for the elimination of controls, but it made provision for more controls. It spoke of the social security that was promised and was said to be ready even before the last election, but it suggested that in the second session of this parliament we should have a committee to investigate whether or not it would be logical to do anything at the next session. Therefore it is a speech which is important from many angles.

Mr. Cruickshank: June 27.

Mr. Rowe: You were lucky last June. It spoke of the responsibility for markets, said that we have had great markets overseas, and that the government took the credit for securing those markets, but in a masterly form of absolution they excused themselves for any of the dangers of losing markets that are confronting us at the present time. The speech from the throne suggests that our unemployment situation is temporary. It was amazing to me to hear the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) say the other day that the situation was temporary and was caused by too much snow in British Columbia to draw saw logs.

Mr. Cruickshank: That is unfair.

Mr. Rowe: Too much snow in British Columbia to draw saw logs, but not enough snow in Quebec to ride skis. The Prime Minister also suggested, even though he promised the people of the country that dealing with unemployment would be one of the first obligations of the government, that if times get more difficult and the situation is not as temporary and seasonal as he has suggested then it is high time for the municipalities to do something because they are wealthy. He said that if a man who has a white-collar job in an office loses it it is high time that the municipality should do something for him by putting him to work digging sewers or cellars, or constructing sidewalks, so as to give him employment, and that it should be paid for by the municipalities.

Mr. Cruickshank: Why do you not do that in Ontario?

Mr. Rowe: It is a haphazard sketch of the bright spots of the past and it is a negative approach to the dark spots that may arise in the future. I agree with the hon. member for Maple Creek that it is not a good thing to be talking about the dark side of things. He and I, and all others who are farmers, know that we do not believe in talking pessimistically, but it is just as foolish to be one of those types of optimists, like the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank), who do not care what happens as long as they do not have to pay more. There is no use in facing the situation with such blind optimism.

Mr. Cruickshank: May I ask a question?

Mr. Rowe: Oh, go ahead.

Mr. Cruickshank: Can my friend cite a greater height of optimism than the provincial convention of the Conservative association in Alberta?

Mr. Rowe: I was not talking about that. I was not there and neither was my friend, but I will say that if he had been there it would not have improved the convention. I agree with the hon. member for Maple Creek that this is a great young country. We should be standing on the threshold of the greatest advancement we have ever had, but the country is pleading for leadership and vision that seems to be so conspicuously absent in the present government, as indicated by the speech from the throne. We know now, and the government knows, that we are experiencing a swift loss of overseas markets, a rapid decline in employment, and the uncertainty of the policies of the government as evidenced in every speech we hear made by members on that side of the house, and the changing speeches we hear from the different ministers. This situation has a tragic similarity to the condition which existed about twenty years ago, in 1929 and 1930. It has a tragic similarity, because the first time we lost a major portion of the British market was during the last year this same party was in power before the crash of 1930. In the last year and a half the Liberal government was in power we lost more of the British market than at any time since confederation.

Mr. Warren: Baloney.

Mr. Rowe: You may produce baloney on your farm, and certainly that is all you have given us in this house. We know, and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) knows, that at this crucial stage in world history we have lost the British market more rapidly than in any previous period; and every hon. member within the sound of my voice fears what will be the effect of the economy of this country. Yet we still hear them harping about the Bennett buggies and the low prices of 1931-32.

Mr. Warren: Why not?

Mr. Rowe: As a farmer the hon. member must know, if he knows anything, that every elevator in the country was full of unsold wheat. That was the position at the time the Liberals went out of power. They knew the depression was on the way, and they slid out in time to absolve themselves from any responsibility for the mess in which they left the country. The farmers of Canada know very well what is happening now. It is quite evident to me, after sitting in this house for a number of years watching the manoeuvres, the inclinations and the trends of Liberal policy. It is quite apparent that the second generation Liberal government is at least consistent in one thing; that is, in its inability to develop and strengthen British commonwealth and sterling area trade relationships.

Mr. Cruickshank: Oh, oh.

Mr. Rowe: My hon. friend laughs; but, Mr. Speaker, the party to your right have been looking north and south for trade instead of east and west all down through the years, as history will show. As evidence of that fact we have the statement by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. McCubbin) not very long ago. Speaking in London on December 29, just before the new year, the hon. gentleman said the United States was our natural market. Further he is reported to have said that we are all Americans; that whether we like it or not we are going to have to stay close to the United States; that we are a dollar country and we will stay that way, even if it means paying a little more for our goods. Apparently this is the twentieth century version of the same type of Liberalism that proposed commercial union with the United States in the nineteenth century.

Such disregard for the British and sterling area markets by a government with such a top-heavy majority in this house is to my mind one of the darkest signs on our economic horizon at this time. No hon. member within sound of my voice will deny that this has been our best market for the last hundred years, or certainly since confederation. When I read that speech by the parliamentary assistant I realized that some men are born to greatness, some achieve greatness, and others must surely have it thrust upon them.

Mr. Cruickshank: Some just aspire to it.

Mr. Rowe: And I am afraid you will be aspiring for a long time. Who will say that the sterling market is a joke? Who will try to laugh it off, as the hon. member is doing? Since confederation this young country, the greatest dominion in the British commonwealth, the senior dominion of all, has sold to the British commonwealth and the sterling area $15,000 million more than they purchased from us, while during the same period we bought from the United States almost $11,000 million more than we sold them. That is a difference of $26,000 million. When the job evaluation of those products is taken into account, our economists tell us that having in mind the more completely processed products that have gone to the sterling area our favourable trade balance with that area has given five times as many jobs to Canadians as the trade balance with the United States. Just look at the rapid increase in unemployment that occurs when our overseas markets fall off.

I urge this house to consider what the loss of those markets would mean; of what vital concern they are to this country, and the unemployment and hunger that will follow if we lose them. For twenty-five years I have listened to members belonging to the party opposite talk about establishing our great national status. I have been hearing that since shortly after the time of the late Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden. I know it was a grand thing for Canada to drop her colonial status; but to listen to hon. members opposite one would think some of us did not know we were no longer colonials. As far as I can see, our status twenty years ago was just about the same as it is now. At that time it was defined by the late Sir George Foster, in Rudyard Kipling's words to the effect that we were daughter in our mother's house but mistress in our own; yet we still hear the Prime Minister telling us of the great thing he has done by removing the colonial status from Canada. You would almost think hungry people could eat this new status; but it won't buy milk for the babies, and it won't give men jobs.

The greatest commonwealth in the world is the British commonwealth. Its leadership in the United Nations is striking proof of that fact. That is why last year I urged that we should try to bring about another commonwealth trade conference. Nothing is more needed today, in my judgment, than a conference between Canada and the sterling area. If we do not do something of that kind, if we do not recover our trade with the sterling area, the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Studer) and his friends in western Canada, as well as those of us who live in the east, will have darker days ahead of us. Those who have been talking about colonial status should have given a little more time to the study of economic statistics, so they might learn something of where we were going.

The recovery of those markets is most essential, though so far this government has refused even to recognize the problem. It has refused to listen to any of the speakers on this side of the house. It refused to listen to my leader and other members of this party who pleaded with the government last year and the year before, and who tried to tell the people the facts during the election campaign.

Indeed, they even refused to read reports issued by their own departments. When the crisis did come, after the election campaign was over, they almost refused to believe themselves.

Mr. Cruickshank: Oh, oh.

Mr. Rowe: My hon. friend laughs; and the louder he laughs the more certain I am that I am right. Speaking at New Westminster, British Columbia, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) stated that Canada's post-war domestic economy was expanding so rapidly that we were actually stuck for something to sell on the overseas market. Then in Toronto on June 21 he said:

> Nothing is further from the truth than the Conservative charge that Canada is losing its export markets. Anyone who suggests we are losing our markets abroad and especially our British markets is talking nonsense.

But on December 5 of the same year we in this house read this statement contained in a report by his own department:

> Severe international factors threaten the level of Canada's exports this year. Total exports for the month 19 per cent down.

Then hon. members will recall that on December 8, only three days after that, I asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether, in view of the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture as to our rapidly diminishing British market, the government would again consider calling a British commonwealth trade conference. The minister replied:

> I do not know of any rapidly diminishing markets overseas.

This is three days after his own department had told him about it. The unanimity with which these political champions ignore the problem could not have been improved upon, even if they had regular rehearsals during the election campaign. I do believe, however, that the first prize should go to one of them. I do not think anyone could surpass the political versatility of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). I believe he was the star performer on this travelling stage of champions of trade overseas.

On June 6 at Spy Hill, Saskatchewan, the minister said:

> When critics of the government claim Canada is losing its overseas markets they don't know what they are talking about.

That is a Canadian Press report of June 7.

On June 23, the Minister of Agriculture was reported as follows:

> The Minister of Agriculture tonight said there is no evidence to support the contention of C.C.F. leader Coldwell that Canada is losing the British food market. Mr. Gardiner said the evidence is quite the opposite.

That seems strange, in view of the fact that in Brantford, Ontario, on December 5, speaking at a board of trade dinner, the Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner—I might tell you, Mr. Speaker, that when the farmers of Ontario want entertainment, they send for the Minister of Agriculture, because he always make a good speech.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rowe: I wanted to say something you could applaud.

Mr. Cruickshank: How could you understand it?

Mr. Rowe: I believe the minister has just as much respect for the intelligence of the Ontario farmer as he has for my hon. friend. Speaking at Brantford, Ontario, on December 5, the minister recalled that Canada had become Britain's chief supplier of wheat, apples, pork, eggs and cheese as well as large quantities of beef and milk. He then said:

> During the last two years a very decided official effort has been made to drive every one of these products excepting wheat off the British market. And now that the four-year wheat contract is drawing to a close an effort is being made to drive off a considerable part of our wheat as well.

Continuing, he said:

> Therefore, if Canada's agriculture was to be threatened further in the "cold war" over exchange, even free trade farmers would have to advise all farmers to buy where they could sell.
> And the only place where we can sell freely for the time being is in Canada.

On December 10, the Minister of Agriculture, replying to the leader of the C.C.F. party, said that there had been a deliberate refusal by the British government to purchase in Canadian markets. He said:

> When we met with them in the fall of 1947 they said they did not want our food products except wheat. The second time they visited us, in 1948, they included cheese, but they did not include cheese in 1947. They said: "We prefer not to have these products." As a matter of fact, at certain stages they said they would not take these products, and at certain stages we said other things which induced them to take the products.

The minister added that the people of Britain wanted the food, but that government officials were objecting to the contract. They are the ones they are blaming now for the loss of our markets. I am not going to say "we told you so," but the hon. members of this house know the history of that. It is well known that these markets have been lost. It is strange to me, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Agriculture knew of those things two years before, but two weeks before the election conditions were never brighter. The Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) told the farmers not to worry, everything would be fine as long as they were returned to power.

The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) himself joined this election chorus of these happy vote hunters, and started out on a similar campaign. I can understand the Minister of Agriculture fooling the farmers, but I cannot understand how he fooled the Prime Minister on this question. Speaking at Moncton on May 19, the Prime Minister assured the good people of that district that his government had been able to find markets for about everything we have to sell. He imagined most of the people felt they could trust the government in the future, since it had been so successful.

The same day at Moncton the Prime Minister said that today the outlook is far brighter than at the end of the war, and whenever there are markets to be found for Canadian exports a Liberal government will find them. These are strange allegations to make, even at election time, when the Minister of Agriculture knew two years before that they were not facts.

On June 13, the leader of our party said that the Liberals were trying to hide the rapid loss of overseas markets, which resulted directly from unsound monetary policies, restrictions, embargoes, and interference with trade generally. He said that the subject was being discussed openly outside Canada, and in a way which was in itself the most severe indictment of the present government. This is the point he made, which I want to urge upon you:

> The Canadian trade picture is deteriorating so rapidly that it is not out of place to suggest that the government sprang the election before the situation became so serious that it could not possibly be returned at the polls. Foreign trade is that important to Canadians and to Canadian politics.

Mr. Cruickshank: How many seats did you get?

Mr. Rowe: I am telling you how you got your seats, by misrepresentation to the public.

I should like to congratulate the Minister of Agriculture, if congratulations are in order in this august body; because, now that the farmers know the truth, they do not love him as much as they love Barbara Ann Scott, but nevertheless for fine figure skating on thin political ice they believe he is without a rival.

It is not my purpose, Mr. Speaker, to rehash what has been said before. It is not my purpose, either, to tell this house what the Minister of Agriculture admits when he visits the federation of agriculture, that these markets are lost. It is not unfair to say that the Minister of Agriculture knows, even if some hon. members do not.

Mr. Cruickshank: I do not know it.

Mr. Rowe: I am not surprised at that, either. The minister has admitted his failure to hold this market.

Mr. Warren: No.

Mr. Rowe: My hon. friend is not admitting it, but he does not know what he is talking about. There are none so blind as those who will not see, but I shall not enter into a controversy with my hon. friend because there are other important matters to discuss. This bulk trading policy has failed, as the Minister of Agriculture knows. His control of lower than world prices for our farmers, to ensure stability of markets in peacetime, has cost the farmers of Canada more than the billion dollars which we anticipated. Everyone in Canada knows that.

Mr. Gardiner: You cut your colleague's figures in two.

Mr. Rowe: I have heard your figures before, and you can still fancy-skate on figures.

This novel experiment has been a costly nightmare for our farmers, destroying their chances in markets at world prices. It is now losing the stability of markets in the country favoured with those low prices at that time. The Minister of Agriculture has at least distinguished himself as the greatest gambler in the marketing of farm products this country has ever known.

It is not surprising to find, in spite of the applause and catcalls of those who do not understand, that the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture is out flying kites on the hustings. He must be speaking for the Minister of Agriculture, and if he is not he should not be the parliamentary assistant. If you do not believe me, listen to what he said in western Ontario.

Mr. Chevrier: What did he say?

Mr. Rowe: I shall tell you in a moment. I think you wrote it for him. He said that, so far as the farmers were concerned, they would rather handle their own business. They should handle their own business. Here is what he said. I still think the minister wrote it, although he would not say so.

> "The sooner the dominion government gets out of handling the farmer's products, the better the farmer will be in Canada."
> "As a farmer," he said, "I wonder if the farmers wish the government to bolster their products with floor prices and subsidies."

Yes, Mr. Speaker, this is the parliamentary assistant to the man who tried so desperately to control our markets in good times and now so cleverly tries to escape from the responsibility in the more difficult times that are ahead. He should be sitting with you. I thought they would raise his salary because he is doing a good job of letting you out of a difficult situation. The government seems to be very astute. First, they ignore the problem entirely. Then when they see the problem, they blame it on the British government or something else. Then when they have to face it, they put the baby on someone else's doorstep, whether he is the father of it or not.

[Mr. Cruickshank.]

Mr. Cruickshank: There is always an orphan Conservative.

Mr. Rowe: I am not going to enlarge on this matter. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) is of course the most responsible man of all for these men of many minds. He was a successful lawyer before he took on this important task and he has at least some excellent qualities and background that fit him to handle it. I know that he entered upon the task and became associated with these hon. gentlemen with the very best of intentions; because speaking at Toronto, as reported in the Toronto Daily Star, which is just as friendly to him as it is to my leader most of the time, he said:

> My experience of men and their reactions has been gained in a long experience at the bar, appearing before judges who wanted facts and only facts —in other words, the truth and nothing but the truth.

That is a most wholesome experience, Mr. Speaker. We farmers are often handicapped in not having such advantages. A legal training is very helpful. I find it helpful when I meet men in difficulties and it is sometimes helpful here in parliament. But as a farmer said to me on one occasion: There is nothing like a legal training. When I listened to the leader of the Liberal party, he said, I was convinced. It enables men to handle the truth skilfully to their advantage; indeed, it seems to make them look more honest than most young men can be. I believe there is something in that.

As one who has sat in this house for many years and has been reasonably close to the policies of the Progressive Conservative party, may I say that I was shocked to read some of the speeches that were made in the last election campaign by our present Prime Minister, especially having regard to one or two items. I would ask the hon. member not to point his finger at me, but to look after himself. Everyone in Canada knows that for at least the last fifteen years, the statement that was made by every leader behind whom I have had the honour to sit in this house with respect to the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway was that our policy was "Amalgamation never, competition ever." That statement was made in this house and it was made on the hustings, and the matter has never been a political issue since. It has never been discussed in a Conservative caucus or in a Conservative convention or any other place.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Rowe: The hon. members have never been in the Conservative caucus and never will be. I know, and every other sensible gentleman in this house knows.

Mr. Cruickshank: There are no sensible men in the Conservative caucus.

Mr. Rowe: I am not assuming that the hon. member is not sensible; but I cannot help it if he does not belong to the Conservative party.

Mr. Cruickshank: When the hon. member questions the honesty of my leader I object.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Rowe: I am not questioning that. I am questioning the strict integrity of purpose having regard to the facts.

Speaking at Smiths Falls on June 18, 1949, the Prime Minister stated, as reported in the Ottawa Journal:

> We do not believe in the amalgamation of C.P.R. and C.N.R. . . . We don't believe in the form of amalgamation as proposed by the C.C.F. nor the other kind of amalgamation we fear is the secret objective of the Progressive Conservative party. We think our transportation system is a good system and one which will meet our needs.

An hon. Member: What is wrong with that?

Mr. Rowe: If there is nothing wrong with it in the hon. member's mind, may I say that it is rather remarkable that a similar statement was reported from another great railway divisional centre.

Mr. Warren: Oh, oh.

Mr. Rowe: I have listened to my hon. friend so often, I can say that he is almost more interesting now when nobody knows what he is saying than he is when he is making a speech.

On June 3, 1949, speaking in Stratford, another select railway divisional point, the Prime Minister said:

> We Liberals want neither the kind of amalgamation the C.C.F. advocates nor the kind of amalgamation the Tories secretly hanker after.

This old, dusty, red herring that was trailed around in front of railway divisions in Canada during the last election campaign by these gentlemen is even more significant in view of the recent speech by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) himself, who could speak with better authority than can some of those who are heckling me, in which he said that the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act of 1933, making possible unification of certain operations in some areas in this country, is an important matter, and that the government had asked the royal commission on transportation to look into it carefully. It was brought down seventeen years ago but they now want the royal commission to study it to find out what it meant; because if it was not a good thing then, he said, we will rescind it now; but if it is a good thing we may apply it to an even greater degree than it has ever been applied before.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend's trend of thought, but I think my memory is fairly good and I do not believe that I said anything that resembles what my hon. friend has just said.

Mr. Rowe: Then I had better read it, Mr. Speaker. It is from the Daily Star; and it will be unique if the Toronto Star is unfavourable to our friends. I do not want to read all of it, but the Minister of Transport is reported as follows:

> Mr. Chevrier recalled that the present royal commission on transportation was asked to look into it. If results of the act have been disappointing or it has served its purpose, it might be appropriate to rescind it, he said.
> "If otherwise, the government may have to enforce its application to a greater degree than in the past," Mr. Chevrier declared.

That is the Toronto Star.

Mr. Cruickshank: A good paper.

Mr. Rowe: As this clipping is of no more use to me, I will send it over to the minister; perhaps I had better not, though, as there is another part to which I should like to refer. I will send it over later. As I say, that is the Toronto Star and they do not even misquote me, let alone those to whom they are more friendly. I am surprised to hear that they have done so; but I will accept the reply, and we had better page the Toronto Star. But it is unique, in view of the pre-election talks, and in view of this old red herring that was trailed around among all the railwaymen in order to get votes; and it is unique in view of the fact that we hear current rumours that ten thousand to fifteen thousand men are going to be let out of the C.N.R. service at the present time. It is a matter of increasing concern to them.

Then the Minister of Transport also said in that same speech:

> But I am convinced that trucking has gone beyond its economic radius of operations.

May I suggest that it is also a warning to thousands of other people. He said either too much or too little. It is too much when the royal commission is sitting and it is too little if he is going to disband the royal commission, take it over himself and tell us what is not economical.

Mr. Chevrier: Does the hon. member not think that, in fairness, he had better read the rest of it?

Mr. Rowe: No. I am going to send the whole thing over to the minister and let him read it for himself; because he does not believe what I have read.

An hon. Member: Read the rest of it.

Mr. Rowe: At the moment my time is much more fully occupied than the hon. member's. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) before the election convinced the people that they should expect more than this because, speaking in Moncton, he said:

> We are a government which keeps its promises. All points in the Liberal platform will be implemented, if we are returned to power.

Mr. Cruickshank: And they will be, too.

Mr. Rowe: Give you time. But in a national broadcast—just think this over and compare it with the speech from the throne of the other day—he said:

> In 1945 the Liberal government asked for a mandate to maintain full employment and to expand social security and that remains the first aim of the government's policy within Canada.

At the present time we have almost 400,000 unemployed; and in spite of that the social security measures of importance are being hoisted over for another session, to an investigation committee, to see if the pre-election promises were sound or not.

If you do not believe that, ask the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs, because he went down to Toronto on February 15 and said that this social security, "for which we have been asked up and down the highways, the sidelines and the byroads of Canada is indefinable, immeasurable and dishonest". He said:

> It promises to all by inference, and directly to many, according to locality and interest, something which is capable of a thousand interpretations and has no reality.

An hon. Member: The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs?

Mr. Rowe: Yes, the parliamentary assistant, I beg your pardon. But if he is a good parliamentary assistant he should either speak as the minister wishes him to speak, or he should speak in unison with him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rowe: I would say so. I am not going to hold this house longer.

Some hon. Members: Go on.

Mr. Rowe: I wish to say only this. Despite the potential greatness of this country—and it is one of the greatest countries in the world —is it any wonder under such a clumsy floundering change of leadership, so far as policy is concerned, that our people are—

Mr. Cruickshank: Change of leadership!

Mr. Rowe: Mr. Speaker, it is better to change leaders than to change leadership, as hon. members opposite are doing. This country needs a different type of unanimity in cabinet circles than has been demonstrated in recent months. It is little wonder that the people are growing restless, doubtful and nervous of the future, when there is such uncertainty of government policy. This is a land which offers more room for growth, expansion and development than any other country in the world, if one keeps in mind all the great resources we have at our command. All we need is a sounder type of unanimous leadership to make this the most prosperous country in the world.

The growth and prestige of our own democratic form of responsible government is not developed on the ruins of such misrepresentation, promises, pledges and drifting expediencies. During these trying days in the world's history, with the dark clouds of uncertainty hanging over many nations, we must face the facts; we must have a more responsible government. We must have more responsibility as individuals, and we must be more responsible in our national life.

We must see that the government accept their responsibility, not only for what they said before the election, but for what they propose to do after the election. I am sorry my time has now expired.

An hon. Member: Go ahead.

Mr. Cruickshank: Take your time.

Mr. Rowe: Probably you want me to take the time that was taken up in interruptions. What I do observe is that we have the greatest travelling government the world has ever seen, that Canada has ever seen.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Peripatetic.

Mr. Rowe: We have the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) visiting Ceylon for the purpose of developing trade; and we have the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) coming back and telling us that they want conferences in other places. And then when I tried to have him tell us about that in parliament, he does not agree. They want trade conferences; and yet the farther they travel the more trade we lose.

It is a strange picture indeed. They are nice fellows, grand fellows. Whatever the United States says, they do. But, Mr. Speaker, let me say this in conclusion: Whether it be called sentimental allegiance or not, in the light of cold-blooded facts and cold statistics, do not forget that the British commonwealth and the sterling area should be cultivated as the greatest market we have ever had.

No one knows that better than the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). And as a last thing let me say this, even to those who do not wish to listen, that I would urge the party to which the minister belongs, especially for that temporary and seasonal time during which they have a majority, that they should at least start to look east and west, rather than north and south.

It was only last year that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) spoke in Montreal. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) spoke in Montreal, coming to the assistance of the Minister of Agriculture. Others say we must look to the United States of America for a place to market our products. Mr. Speaker, why look to a country that produces the same type of surpluses we produce? Let us remember that it is no reflection upon the United States to say that. The finest relationship in the world is found between Canada and that country—a country we love and a country that seems to love us, a country which, if it went to war, would find us following, a country with which we are closely allied.

But, Mr. Speaker, Far Eastern trade is just as important today in the long-range picture as is the building of aeroplanes for the northern part of this dominion. We need protection in our Far Eastern trade. And if we can develop trade in the Far East, then that will be part of the fulfilment of that great Atlantic charter. If we are strong in our trading relationships in a time of peace, we will be stronger in a time of crisis—and God forbid the time may ever come when that condition will confront us.

I do urge upon the government to stop, look and listen before it is too late. Let them not ignore the problem before them. They all admit it is there now. Then, let them call a British commonwealth trade conference taking in the area of the Far East, and all the sterling area as well, to see what can be done. We have traded with them for three-quarters of a century, and we will continue to play the game. A businessman does not change customers merely because of a temporary shortage of markets or a temporary shortage of some sort. He takes the long-range view. And if my right hon. friend, the Minister of Agriculture, will reconsider, I am sure he will apply to this situation the same philosophy he has applied in the operation of his own farm. I am sure he will see the long-term advantage, if he will take one more look.

I would also urge that, no matter what our status may be, no matter what the relationship from a national standpoint, the British commonwealth of nations be not sold short. Because they, with the sterling area, still constitute the greatest hope for national prosperity, fuller employment and the fulfilment of the destiny of this great dominion, that destiny to which we have been aspiring. Let him consider that channel of trade, rather than the other channel, no matter how friendly we may be with them in the future.

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, may I open my remarks this afternoon by congratulating the mover (Mr. Larson) and the seconder (Mr. Dumas) of the address in reply. They did a good job, when one considers what they had to work with.

Before concluding my remarks this afternoon I hope to be able to explain what I mean by that statement. I should like also to congratulate the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Harris) upon his elevation to full cabinet status. Having known him since he came to the house some years ago, I feel the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) showed wisdom in choosing the hon. member for the important portfolio to which he has been promoted, and we shall expect some good results from his administration in that department.

I would refer briefly to one other minister, and not in congratulatory terms, because my reference is to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). We understand he is not enjoying the best of health. With all other hon. members I hope to see him back in his place in the near future, and enjoying good health. He has been carrying a heavy load and, according to figures which have been placed before us, and discussions which have taken place within the last week, it would seem that he still has quite a job on his hands. We hope his health is fully restored and that he will carry on his work in the future as he has in the past.

May I proceed to deal with some matters which are not discussed in the speech from the throne, and I do so because I find it easier to proceed in that way than to deal with some subjects contained in it. May I first of all turn to grants in aid of education. This matter was discussed at length last session and, because of the statement made by the Prime Minister, we felt that it would have been mentioned in the speech from the throne. However, I have been unable to find any reference to it. On another occasion I hope to have an opportunity to discuss this matter more in detail. For the time being I endorse in every detail what was said on Monday last by my leader, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), in connection with all phases of federal grants to education. I think all hon. members realize that the present taxation powers of the provinces are not sufficient to provide the education required by our children. If we are to have the kind of electorate that Canada should have and is entitled to have we must have better educational facilities. When you have illiteracy you have people with poor judgment and as a result you have poor administration of our affairs. Canada is the best country in the world and there is no reason why we should not have the best educational facilities for our people.

I should like to comment briefly on some of the statements made by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on February 20. I should like to quote first from page 53 of Hansard where, after dealing with the pulp and paper business, the Prime Minister is reported to have said:

> That, I think, is an illustration of a point I might make here. Let us not harm ourselves with fear.

The Prime Minister then went on to deal with the unemployment situation. Then on page 56 we find this:

> We must realize that, in order to have profitable and self-liquidating investments, we must have peace in the world and in order to have peace in the world we must do our share in the North Atlantic arrangement.

Those two statements make a person wonder why the Prime Minister has fear in his mind. It will be noted that the defence estimates for this year are for something like $425 million, and yet this is peacetime. We know that conditions the world over are not as they should be or as we would wish, but perhaps there is something more behind the scenes than the common people are allowed to know. The two references to fear by the Prime Minister make me wonder just what is coming that we do not know about. Then I quote from page 59 as follows:

> At the same time a significant amount of our industrial raw material and consumer goods requirements is dependent on our finding the United States dollars to meet our deficit there. We are therefore in a vulnerable position on both export and import accounts. That is why the development of our resources, particularly in such things as oil and iron for which we are so heavily dependent on the United States, is of double advantage. It expands our own production income and wealth, and it helps meet the United States dollar problem to which our trade is so vulnerable.

I would remind the Prime Minister that the present government is responsible for many of our difficulties in connection with the shortage of United States dollars. Back in 1945 the Social Credit party consistently opposed the Bretton Woods agreement legislation in every stage and pointed out some of the difficulties that would occur in the near future. Apparently some of the hon. members thought that we were out in a wood lot somewhere and they cast their vote in support of the legislation on that basis.

In my constituency there is produced the finest grade of oil for use in oil burning locomotives. Because of difficulties, particularly freight rate difficulties, we are not able to dispose of as much of that oil as we would like to. Freight rate discrimination would perhaps be a better phrase to use. The eight per cent sales tax was removed last session and up to that time that was just another discrimination. This question of freight rate discrimination has been brought to the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). I hope in the near future they will take the necessary action to see that this oil field is further developed.

Because of the present shortage of coal the further production of this oil is doubly necessary and the freight rate discrimination should be removed. When passenger train service was curtailed, the oil people at Lloydminster offered to give the C.N.R. oil free of charge for the operation of the train service between Edmonton and Saskatoon, but the railroad did not find it possible to accept that offer. Along with many other sections of the country we are still faced with a curtailed train service. I am not going to discuss this matter any further at this time, but I do hope that the coal shortage will soon be relieved and our train service fully restored.

The Prime Minister went on to deal with old age pensions and devoted a lot of time to that subject. We have on the order paper a resolution to set up a joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons to investigate pension schemes in other countries and possibly make some recommendations. I suggest that before this committee makes its report—I do not expect it will be made until perhaps the next election—we should do something to relieve the distress of certain older people at the present time.

Not long ago an amendment to the Old Age Pensions Act was passed providing for an increase of $10 per month, but we failed, perhaps intentionally, to increase the amount of allowable income. At the present time the allowable income for a single pensioner is $600 and for married pensioners, $1,080. In order to have given all these people that $10 increase we should have provided for an increase of $10 per month in the allowable income. Because that was not done many of these people have been denied the benefits of the $10 increase.

In certain cases, perhaps not many, people are denied pensions because they cannot furnish proof of age. Several methods of proving age can be adopted. A birth certificate may be presented, a marriage certificate or the date of joining some organization. However, many people from Europe have entered this country, sometimes coming here in a hurry. Because of what is to us a peculiar spelling of a name other branches of the government are not able to find any record of these people having entered Canada. As a result they are denied a pension because they are unable to furnish proof of age. I have had such cases myself, and I expect that other hon. members have had similar experiences. Where no other proof of age can be found I suggest that the individual be brought either before a medical doctor, who should at least have some knowledge of age, or perhaps before the old age pensions board for the particular province in which the prospective pensioner resides.

In my opinion—and I think it is admitted by every fair-minded person—the present pension of $40 a month is not sufficient to keep our old age pensioners. Like all other Social Crediters, I believe we should have a minimum of at least $50 per month, and that the age at which the pension is payable should be reduced from where it is at the present time because many of our people, particularly those working in industry and on farms, reach the end of their working days long before they attain the age of sixty. I think unemployment figures will show that when people reach a certain age they are not wanted any more. Employers just do not want them. Where are these old people going to get work? During their lifetime they have contributed their share to the building up of the country, and the country should now see to it that they are provided with a pension that will keep them in reasonable comfort during their old age.

At the last session the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) made a suggestion that the sales tax be removed on hearing aids for old age pensioners. We fully endorse his suggestion, and I would add to it dental and optical equipment. The prices of these things are certainly far too high at the present time and we should be able to afford the loss of the eight per cent tax on these articles. Then we have another class of people to whom I referred at the last session, and to whom I hope to refer again later on, the physically incapacitated. Many of us who are in possession of all our faculties, mental and physical, find it difficult to make a living, and these people who are physically incapacitated through no fault of their own are finding it pretty hard to get along. Their families are responsible for their care, and I believe the government could go a long way towards helping them out. I hope before the session ends legislation will be introduced as to that matter, providing pensions at least equal to old age pensions.

Turning to agriculture, I feel that in the past many people have not given the industry the consideration to which it is entitled. I have here an editorial to be found in the Rural Co-operator of January 24, 1950, a publication printed in Toronto. It refers to a speech by Louis Bromfield, novelist, farmer and internationally famous conservationist, to the Ontario crop improvement association, and reads:

> A "more detestable man never lived than Hitler", he said, "yet Hitler did utter one truth. He said Germany was fighting because it didn't have enough living room and it didn't have enough to eat. That was the true cause of the last two great wars. Naziism was only the political manifestation of that profound economic cause."

The editorial goes on to say:

> If we accept that explanation, and many will, we are at once faced with the question: What are we doing today to make sure that no people in the world shall ever again have that cause or excuse for going to war? Is reduced farm production, in terms of international relations, a practical policy to follow? Could not any country with a farm surplus better afford to give it all away at any expense than run the risk of a further conflict with all its staggering cost in money and lives?

In connection with giving away food, I have figures taken from the Alberta wheat pool budget of February 10, 1950, showing that the United States commodity credit corporation on November 30, 1949, had $3,370,190,000 invested in price support loans or in commodities held. Perhaps that is something we might consider. I have other excerpts from articles that I should like to read for the purpose of building up the case for agriculture. The next one is a report of an address by Mr. C. H. Millard, also to be found in the Rural Co-operator of January 24. The heading of the article is:

> Labor Doesn't Allow for Any Hitch-hikers.

In addressing the Ontario federation of agriculture, Mr. Millard, a director of the United Steel Workers of America, had this to say:

> We don't allow for hitch-hikers in the union. Every member must pay his way. We have learned that you must not go about formulating policies unless you are prepared to pay the cost.

Then the article goes on to read:

> Mr. Millard, one of the best known labour leaders in Canada, had been invited to tell "Labour's story" to the farm people at the convention.

He stated further:

> "Our first objective is to unite all labour people. When we started in at the job of organizing we found the workers badly disunited. They were disunited on the basis of religion, race, fraternity and social barriers. Our next objective was to engage ourselves, with our employers, in the art and process of collective bargaining to ensure an adequate standard of living and good working conditions. Our third objective," said Mr. Millard, "is to win social security for ourselves and our families and to seek to bring about ever higher standards of living." Labour, he said, felt that action on the economic front was not sufficient. Political and legislative action was also necessary if many problems were to be overcome. "We face grave political problems having a bearing on economic problems, particularly in matters of trade."

He went on to say:

Frankly, I am little concerned over the loose thinking of the past few years about the markets for our so-called exportable surpluses. . . . The standard of life everywhere must be raised, here in Canada as well as abroad, so that labour is able to buy the goods the farmer produces, and the farmer can buy ours.

I hope that will be taken into account by many people who have to deal with labour and agricultural policies. To the farm organizations of Canada I would say that it is important that every farmer belong to a farm organization. I would also go a little further and say that it is important for every farmer to attend the meetings of the organizations, particularly those where policy is laid down. It is important that farmers elect the right leaders, and that they see to it day in and day out, week in and week out, year in and year out that those leaders follow a sound and progressive policy on behalf of the organizations. If that is not done, then we may be led down a road that is not good for farmers, for labourers, or for Canada as a whole. That is a warning I have given to farmers before, and I am giving it again today in the hope that farmers all across Canada will benefit from it. I am not saying that as one who is on the outside because, since coming to Canada in 1914, I have had quite a little to do with farmers' organizations.

I also have a report of an address by Mr. Hannam, president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, speaking before the Ontario federation meeting in Toronto on January 12, 1950. The article reads in part:

"Feeding the world is an international task and must be approached on an international basis," he stated. Farmers in all countries want to remove the needless risks and insecurity in the agricultural industry of the old order; farmers in all countries want to produce for a known market with a reasonable measure of stability, he said. "More than ever before our price stability in Canada is dependent on price stability in the world market," Mr. Hannam told the delegates.

Then it goes on:

"If Canada had been buying more goods from the United Kingdom during the past few months we would not be having trouble with U.K. food contracts now," Mr. Hannam stated.

"We have tariffs against British woven woollen products, clothing made from wool, boots and shoes, washing machines and bicycles, to name only a few, and these tariffs are one good reason why there are not more U.K. goods coming into this country."

Then he said that this type of tariff was a subsidy to industry and that farmers should not be criticized for seeking protection for farm products through price supports. I am not going to read any more of Mr. Hannam's statement, but I have something here by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). I am glad he is in his seat at the moment, looking happy; and I hope he continues to do his best for the farmers, as he has done in the past. I was pleased to learn that he has no opposition in the cabinet to his agricultural policies, because many people were quite satisfied that the minister would have been able to do better but for some opposition in the cabinet. The statement recently made gives us the assurance that there is no such opposition, and I hope that is correct. Speaking at the Niagara Falls convention on February 1 the minister is reported as follows:

Mr. Gardiner said the government has no intention of going into the business of buying and selling, although it proposes to put price support legislation on a permanent basis at the next session of parliament.

However, he added, he is going to do everything he can to get trade contracts without utilizing funds from the price support legislation of $200 million, which he felt certain would be voted again without difficulty.

Meanwhile he suggested farmers set up strong co-operatives and distributing agencies in the marketing of produce throughout the provinces.

And a little later:

While it was a tribute to his department that farmers apparently felt pleased at the distribution of food products under emergency conditions during the war—

I might interject that while they were satisfied with the distribution they were not satisfied with the financial return.

—those conditions no longer applied. The job no longer could be done from Ottawa.

The minister said he also wished to dispel rumours that he is meeting opposition from the cabinet in his efforts on behalf of the farmers.

Mr. Gardiner said farmers cannot expect floor prices to be set at the highest level prevailing during the last three years. In most cases, the price was set about 10 per cent lower than the highest level.

Then apparently he went out to Alberta, that province where the sun shines all the time, and at a meeting in Lethbridge had this to say:

"During the last year, or year and a half in some cases, we have been asking all consumers in Canada to make up to the farmer for what he lost during our price controls . . .

"We have no difficult surpluses with any of our farm products. We are not in the period yet when we should feel down in the dumps on farm prices."

Mr. Gardiner declared that the only way farmers could succeed in the west, or in all Canada, was to produce to the limit of their capacities the farm products which they could best produce, especially for the domestic market. Until Britain reached its objective, possibly at the beginning of 1952, of accumulating $2 billion in dollar credits so she could restore her trading to normal levels, Canadian farmers must put their operations on a sound basis. When Britain could again trade freely the Canadian farmer, he felt sure, would be able to compete successfully against any country in the world for British markets.

I think that will serve as a foundation for what I propose to say a little later. When I came to this country thirty-six years ago I remember that the farmers worked anywhere from ten to sixteen hours a day, and even longer during some of the busier seasons. At the same time organized labour was working fifty to fifty-five hours a week. Today we find the farmers still working the long hours they worked then, while organized labour in many cases has brought down the work week to forty-four hours, and is now seeking a further reduction to forty hours. In my opinion that is not too bad. At the same time the farmers have no guaranteed pensions, and no guarantee of any kind if the weather is not kind to them; they have no holidays with pay. Today organized labour has its pension schemes; it has holidays with pay; and in most cases the workers have better homes than the farmers, with electric lights, bathtubs, electric washing machines and things like that. I say to labour it is a good thing they have those things, because the country can produce them and through their organizations they have been able to obtain those benefits for themselves. But what about the farmer; does he have all those conveniences and those guarantees of security? He has not. Many people blame the farmer for the high cost of living. In the Manitoba Co-operator of January 5 I saw a short sentence which may give us an idea of what brings about the high cost of living:

> On Friday, December 30, retail price of No. 1 back bacon was 98 cents per pound at three Winnipeg retail stores, and 77 cents per pound wholesale. The bacon comes wrapped in one-half pound and one pound packages, ready for sale over the counter, for which the retailer takes 21 cents per pound as his mark-up, or 27·3 per cent. The same is true of some other prepared meats. A quick serve whole ham retailed at 67 cents for which the wholesale price was 47 cents, or a mark-up of 42·5 per cent. A regular ham retailed at 60 cents, the wholesale price being 39 cents, a mark-up of 53·8 per cent.

These things contribute to the high cost of living. In many cases the farmer had nothing whatever to do with it, because during the peak prices he was getting 36 cents a pound for Wiltshire sides. That was not live weight; that was dressed, delivered at the seaboard.

In the past we have had many contracts with Britain. Only a few months ago the Minister of Agriculture and some of the other ministers told us we would not be able to renew those contracts. Since those reports were circulated in the press and over the radio there has been a great deal of discontent among our farmers; but we are told that by some good luck or in some way contracts have been entered into again this year for certain quantities of bacon and cheese. They could not renew the egg contract; I guess the British people are getting their supplies somewhere else. In spite of all the statements that have been made by the cabinet ministers I feel that we have suffered a definite loss in our markets in Britain. I have here the report of a speech made by the Minister of Agriculture to the Canadian chamber of commerce in London in December, 1948. I should like to read part of it, because I think it gives his attitude toward our dollar system and other things as well. Speaking of the 1949 contracts he said:

> I am not making these statements to be critical of the United Kingdom government or its agents. I am making them to impress upon you the fact that the British people want our bacon, want our eggs, want our beef, want our wheat. I am making them to impress upon you that if dollar requirements had not intervened we would have been in a position to send you in 1949 over 300,000,000 pounds of bacon, nearly 200,000,000 pounds of beef, 80,000,000 dozen of eggs, several hundred thousand barrels of apples, thousands of bushels of beans and much jam, none of which your traders feel you can afford to have from us because of the dollar shortage. We cannot sell the apples, beans, jam and salmon to anyone at any price under the present dollar arrangements and for the moment we are finding it impossible to dispose of millions of bushels of linseed at 30 per cent less than you are paying others for it.
> They are taking 140,000,000 bushels of wheat and 50,000,000 pounds of cheese from us because they must have them and we appear willing to provide them for fewer dollars than any other will supply them.
> All this is bringing me to wonder if an unknown economist, or was it an Abraham Lincoln or some such individual as Churchill, was not right when he said: 'That he would rather have the money in his pocket tied to the unthinking inanimate substance called gold which cannot change its mind than to the manipulations of some small group of crackpots who fancy themselves as economists or statesmen.'

The minister never told us to whom he was referring, but I should like him to tell us whether he was not referring to those economists they have in the Department of Finance and the Bank of Canada. I think I am right in suggesting that those are the crackpots to whom he had reference.

Further along in his statement, he said:

> I am not convinced that this latter statement is correct, but I am convinced that the world is not in any state of mind where it can be expected to agree that the manipulation of any system or systems of currency is going to be allowed to interfere with the will of those who have empty stomachs when it is preventing surpluses of food to get to them. It might be a good thing for everybody if they would close down the United Nations meetings long enough to permit of the United Kingdom and United States experts getting together and settling some basis upon which dollars and sterling can be converted to allow nations like Canada to produce food to feed the starving millions and distribute it. If that cannot be done then they might provide some means by which we can have an opportunity to fill our country with working people to develop the resources the world needs for its war and other machines, that they may eat the surpluses already piling up but which we are not permitted to sell.

I see that my time is slipping away, so instead of dealing with the world organization as I intended, I shall refer members to the speech made by the member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) on Thursday last, in which he dealt with the whole matter. At that time he showed that the money experts or crackpots had misled the delegates to the meeting of the world organization which considered a plan for the distribution of food. Today we are not allowed to supply that food to the hungry people of the world.

One day last week the member for Yorkton (Mr. Stewart) contradicted a statement made by the member for Souris (Mr. Ross), when he said that during recent years agriculture had suffered a loss of $2 billion because of government policy. I am not sure that I am prepared to go as far as that because I have not calculated the loss. I can say, however, that for the years 1946, 1947 and 1948 the farmers' loss on wheat sales alone amounts to slightly more than $508 million. If the hon. member for Yorkton wishes to challenge that statement, we shall see about it. I have the government figures to bear out what I say. As a result of the losses the farmers have suffered since the outbreak of war, and because of certain things that were done owing to the war, I am suggesting that the support prices be fixed at the 1949 level for a couple of years at least. I do feel that is not an extravagant request, because during that ten-year period since war broke out the farmers have paid rather expensive insurance premiums to guarantee themselves those prices in the future.

As I have said before, the industries receive subsidies by way of tariff protection. There is no reason in the world why farmers should work approximately twice as many hours as the people in other occupations, and have a much lower standard of living in most cases, yet be refused price support. I feel that at the present time, or any time for that matter, there is no need for gloom among the people of Canada, provided their affairs are properly administered. It may mean we shall have to have another government in order to ensure that proper administration. If it is necessary, let us have that change. Last year, I believe we had a national production of approximately $16 billion. Last week we were told that it is expected the national production for 1950 will amount to $16,250 million. We are not working to the limit, by any means, as will be seen from the figures on unemployment that have been recited in this house during the past two weeks. If those people were put to work, production could be increased to a great extent. I feel that the farmers of Canada have done their share of the producing, and they want to know now what the government is going to do about its share. As I said before, if the government is not equal to the job, then let us dismiss the government, and dismiss these crackpot money experts in its service. We Social Crediters have a policy that will, to a large extent, eliminate the difficulties in this and many other countries.

Since the wheat board legislation terminates at the end of July, I believe some legislation should be brought in at this session to continue the operation of the wheat board. I would suggest that, by legislation or some other means, the grain exchange should be eliminated before it has another chance of starving many of the unsuspecting farmers of the western provinces. The grain exchange has had its day, and has brought much misery. I want the government to take effective measures, by legislation or otherwise, to rid the country of this scourge of pests.

Social Credit has got a policy, not only for agriculture but for other industries as well. For agriculture we propose, first, a home market constantly supplied with purchasing power. Many people claim that is not necessary, that we should just let things continue as they are. People will continue buying until they have used their money, and then, if they want to go hungry, that is up to them. Many people, however, are not able to find better jobs. If purchasing power were assured, you would not have the troublesome surpluses that have been built up in some parts of Canada even today.

The second point is a compensating price discount technique for ensuring fair prices to producers without causing inflation. Number three is a two-price system to work in conjunction with an international commodity clearing house to guarantee parity returns to farmers. Number four, extension of export markets and acceptance of non-convertible sterling as a means of recapturing and retaining British and European markets. Number five, provincial-dominion producer marketing boards to serve as a foundation for Number 6, a permanent Agricultural Prices Support Act. Floor prices should be established at a level which would enable farmers to get along.

I see that my time has expired, so I shall discuss many of the other subjects I had in mind as the days of the session go by.

Mr. L. Philippe Picard (Bellechasse): May I first, Mr. Speaker, congratulate the mover (Mr. Larson) and seconder (Mr. Dumas) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. This has become a customary opening for those who rise in this debate. I wish to assure them that the sentiments are none the less sincere, because they have performed their task well. They have shown that they have ability as well as good training for the office they now occupy.

I wish to congratulate the Prime Minister upon his choice of the gentleman who now occupies the post of Minister of Immigration and Citizenship (Mr. Harris). It must be gratifying to the minister to see how well his appointment was received by members of all parties in this house. He is a man of ability and judgment, and it is to be hoped that he will not fall prey to the fantastic plans of those who would open wide the doors of our country and even finance the admission fee at a time when we are experiencing in certain regions of the country temporary difficulties in finding employment for those who were born in Canada or who have been here for a considerable time. In a country such as ours, immigration is an important topic, and although I do not join with those who believe we should not let anybody in, I think our policies in the matter should be carefully weighed and that we should not forget that the timing of a measure is often as important as its provisions. I feel quite sure, however, that with the first Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris) we may expect all the guarantees and the caution that a man of his judgment and intellect would consider advisable in the matter.

While I am distributing congratulations, I think it might be in order also to congratulate the government, and especially the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), on proposing the appointment of a committee to examine and study the best possible method to ensure security.

A moment or so ago the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), in his speech, objected to that method and said that the government had made promises but instead of fulfilling them was just appointing a committee. I cannot see what is wrong in setting up a committee. It is the democratic way to act, for the government to give to all parties in the house an opportunity to study a question before a bill is brought before the house. We oftentimes complain that we are faced with a measure without members having a chance to express their views before the government has already committed itself, sometimes even in detail, to a given proposal. I think the government is to be congratulated on taking the steps it is now taking. Unless there is a change in the motion, however, I must express deep regret that the government has not seen fit to heed the pleas and requests made by many hon. members and in which I have repeatedly joined the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Bertrand), that consideration be given to the possibility of setting up a system of pensions for invalids. For a number of years the hon. member for Terrebonne has proposed a resolution to this effect, and he has done so again this year. His resolution is on today's order paper and reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should during the present session take into consideration the advisability of including in their social security program a system of allowances to every person, without any sufficient income or means of support, who, by reason of an injury, accident, congenital infirmity or incurable disease, is at a disadvantage in seeking or obtaining employment, or incapable of providing for his subsistence, and whose age prevents him from benefiting by the social security legislation now in force.

On a number of occasions I have spoken on a resolution of that nature or one in nearly similar terms, not only because of the knowledge I have of conditions in my own constituency but because, from year to year, each time that I rose in my place I have received a flood of correspondence from all over the province, or from those parts which had been reached by the press which reported my speech. From those letters I have learned of the sad situation of so many unfortunate people. In a speech a year or so ago, by comparison with countries in which such plans exist, I established that the amount necessary to cover such a pension scheme would not be exaggerated. Today, however, I have other subjects to deal with, and I shall not go any further in the matter than to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare to consider the advisability of widening the scope of the reference to the committee so that, at the same time that it considers the question of old age pensions, it may consider pensions for invalids.

There are rumours that there might be in the offing a conference between the federal and provincial health authorities on the question of aid to incurable persons. I wonder if that includes a scheme of pensions for incurables. If that is so, it is all to the good. Even if such a conference is planned, I do not see why an opportunity should not be given to the members of this house, at the same time as they discuss the question of old age pensions, to express their views on the question of pensions for invalids. This question has been brought here time and again. As I said a moment ago, the sad plight of these people cannot be overlooked and cannot, for much longer, be left without special consideration by the government.

Many countries now have such schemes. In some of them they are contributory; in others they are just outright pensions such as we have here up to this moment for the old people. But be it one way or the other, either outright pensions as we have now for the aged or a contributory system, with special allowance or special provisions for those who are born invalid, and never had any occupation of any sort, something should be done but it might be made contributory for those who have an occupation and later become invalid.

As it is one minute to six, Mr. Speaker, and I am about to change the subject of my remarks, I should like to call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Picard: Mr. Speaker, loyalty to those who have made it possible for me to stay in this house for the last ten years, loyalty to those who remained loyal to me at the last general election despite, I might say, the venomous attacks of my opponents, prompts me to devote much of my attention to the future of Canadian agriculture. Eighty-five per cent of my constituents toil and sweat on the land to get from it their daily subsistence, and that of their families. I make my concern the fate of these men and women who, for the great part, toil on the farms, work on the farms handed down from generation to generation in the same families or who, as the younger sons of such families, have ventured into the forests and wrested from nature that lot of land that will become the fertile patrimony of their sons and grandsons.

This is why time and again during these last years I have tried here to explain the point of view of the Quebec farmer. That is why I have endeavoured to understand their problems and to make suggestions which I have thought would produce beneficial results for them. I have never known personally their hardships. I cannot say I have ever shared their tasks, nor can I claim to have an actual or even an indirect experience of their difficulties. But as they kindly accepted me in 1940, as one of them, to speak in their name in this House of Commons, and as they have twice since then renewed the expression of their confidence in me, it is natural that I should devote a considerable part of my activity to the study of the conditions, local, national and international, which may affect their welfare.

I feel it my duty, for these reasons, to express here some of these thoughts which have resulted from the consideration I have given to the fate of Canadian agriculture as regards especially the necessity of finding markets for our agricultural surpluses.

One of the most important matters affecting the economic life of our country at the present time is the marketing of these surpluses of our agricultural products, both as to prices obtainable and the quantities for which we might find buyers. The situation as it stands today is discreetly mentioned in the speech from the throne in the following words:

> Circumstances outside Canada have been responsible for some downward adjustment in the price of farm products.

And later:

> Continued difficulties arising out of the world-wide dollar shortage have resulted recently in reduced purchases of a number of our export products.

These two apparently innocuous statements refer to a problem much vaster and of much greater consequence to our economy than these guarded words may indicate. The whole of our agricultural development and much of our national progress hinges on the successful disposal at reasonable prices of our food surpluses. Not only as a representative of a rural constituency, but from a firm conviction that the well-being of the country is dependent upon the healthy condition of our agriculture, I feel it my duty to devote my time tonight to a consideration of these problems and of the possible remedies to be applied.

Before looking into what the problem has in store for us, it would not be fair not to outline, even if briefly, what has been the result of the government's agricultural policy over the last few years. This afternoon the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) spoke about low prices. Can he find at any time under any administration by his party such prices as we have had under a Liberal administration for the last few years? I do not have to go even as far as the war years which, admittedly, have been years most profitable to Canadian farmers in general. But we have figures for the four years following the war, from 1946 to 1949, for the five products upon which agriculture generally depends for its prosperity—wheat, hogs, cattle, milk and eggs.

In this connection I should like to quote from an address delivered by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to the annual meeting of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture on January 31 last—and I would ask hon. members opposite to take note of these figures, because they are official. On that occasion the minister said:

> During the four years since the war we have marketed on an average 90 million bushels of wheat, more per annum than in the four years before the war, which is approximately one-third more. During the four years since the war we have marketed on an average 345 million pounds more pork per annum than in the four years before the war, which is approximately one-half more. During the four years since the war we have marketed 370 million pounds more of beef per annum than in the four years before the war, which is above one-half more. During the four years since the war we have marketed two billion pounds more milk per annum than in the four years before the war, which is one-eighth more. During the four years since the war we have marketed 150 million dozen more eggs per annum than in the four years before the war, which is more than 60 per cent more.

Prices on those five products will average at least 65 per cent higher. The difference is best represented in the gross farm income in the last four-year period compared with the preceding period. The average annual total for the last four years is $2,133 million and for the previous period $650 million.

For the benefit of those who prefer the net income figures they are, for the last period $1,305 million and for the previous period $435 million. The gross income or the net income is more than three times in the last four-year period what it was in the four-year period before the war. It would appear that it will continue at that average for at least another year, and thus give us the best five years in our experience.

There is no way in which the pessimists can figure us into depression or difficulties up to the present.

Mr. Speaker, let us now see the situation as it is today. That was the situation up to that moment. Let us see what it is now. Again I quote from the same address by the Minister of Agriculture:

At the end of 1949 the three most important contracts are still in existence. The bacon contract continues so far as delivery to the British is concerned for the entire year of 1950, but so far as guaranteed returns to the farmer is concerned, until July 1, 1950.

Under it the government agrees to take delivery of A Wiltshire sides at $32.50 a hundred and to deliver to Britain 60 million pounds at $29 a hundred. If the plan works as intended the farmer is assured a floor price for hogs approximately 2 cents a pound more than we are obtaining for what goes to Britain. This means that the farmer will get about one-tenth of the return over and above the British price from the treasury of Canada, and the other nine-tenths directly from the consumer. $29 a hundred is $2 a hundred more than we received in 1947. It is more than we have received in any year excepting 1948 and 1949.

The farmer has been netting more for some months, under this plan, than he could have obtained in any other way. His price will still be higher than I have been able to find farmers getting in any country, except Britain. These higher returns have been justified because at an earlier time he is presumed to have taken less than he might have secured.

The wheat and cheese contracts are still in existence. The wheat contract ends July 31, 1950.

We are now negotiating.

The cheese contract has been renewed for one year at five cents a pound less than from April 1, 1948, to December 31, 1949, but it is the same price as was received in 1947 and five cents a pound more than in any year before 1947. The government has subsidized the price by three cents a pound and pays in addition a premium of one cent on 93 score and two cents on 94 score cheese.

As far as eggs are concerned, the minister has suggested that we cannot hope to sell eggs in any form to the United Kingdom in 1950. The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) suggested that the markets were lost. I cannot find from those figures that the markets are lost. I shall come in a moment to the remedies that might be applied to this situation as it may develop. I should like to quote again the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who said on December 14:

In the meantime we will be trying to tide you over the year 1950 with an agreement on cheese which we think we can negotiate and one on bacon to cover the remainder of the 1949-50 natural hog year which we have hopes of being able to negotiate.

Then on January 31, 1950, the minister said:

What about the future of the British market? It is still taking approximately $400 million worth of our farm products and therefore is our best outside market. The prospects are that it will continue to be our best market. If they take all our surplus cheese and 120,000,000 bushels or more of our wheat, they will continue to be, if not our best market, one we cannot afford to be without. Any effort farmers have made to remain in it is worth continuing. We are only going to lose $30 million in 1950 from the British market as compared with what we had in 1949 if we lose all we were asking for and did not get.

The present contracts which we have for commodities other than wheat are as follows: 60,000,000 pounds of bacon with a seaboard value of approximately $17 million. The cheese contract may vary with a possible maximum of approximately 85,000,000 pounds of a value of around $21 million f.o.b. Montreal. That is far from the gloomy picture we got this afternoon from the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe. We now have covered the situation as we see it, and as to its causes I cannot find any better words than those contained in an article published in the National Review of October, 1949, entitled, "Canada and the sterling area", by the Right Hon. L. S. Amery. Speaking of Canada he says:

Her economy is, like ours, essentially a highly unbalanced one. It is one of immense surplus productive capacity in respect of foodstuffs, raw materials and minerals. However great her industrial development—and she is destined to be one of the world's great industrial powers—the immense area of her agricultural lands and, even more perhaps, the vast and scarcely tapped mineral resources of the great pre-Cambrian rock shield that covers half her territory, will make it a matter of generations before she can absorb anything like the whole of her vast primary output. On the other hand her economy is a deficiency economy, temporarily in some elements of industrial equipment, but permanently in respect of all the products of the southern temperate, sub-tropical and tropical regions. External trade is for her, as for us, both a matter of existence and the essential condition for the fullest expansion of her resources.

It is an oft-repeated fact that we must buy much of what we need in the dollar area and sell most of our surpluses in the sterling area. Most of our surpluses are food products. Although the problem is national in scope, first and above all it affects the Canadian farmer. On this subject I again quote the Minister of Agriculture in an address delivered at the fifth session of the food and agricultural organization conference held in Washington on November 24, 1949, when he said:

Thus, in relation to some other exporting countries Canada has an economy which is particularly dependent upon exports—both from the point of view of the volume and the consequent reaction of Canadian prices to changes in world prices.

And again:

It is essential for us to export 75 per cent of our wheat. Unless our exports can be maintained we cannot continue to purchase large quantities of goods from the United States and the United Kingdom. We should purchase from other countries, including those two, such goods as they can produce at lower costs than they can be produced in Canada.

And again:

The importance of agricultural exports in our economy places Canada in a unique position. Products of farm origin, while below wartime levels, still represent a substantial part of total exports, and of these wheat alone accounts for about 15 per cent. Canadian farmers, therefore, are still vitally concerned with world markets and are fearful lest monetary difficulties and other trade obstructions deny them entry to their natural market which is the market of Great Britain. We are the nearest of all countries which supplied them in wartime. We still want to supply them until their needs are satisfied. If we did that we would not have any marketing problem in those products which they required from us during the war.

I agree with what the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe said this afternoon that the British market ought to be cultivated. What I cannot understand is why he complains that prices for wheat were fixed during the war. I cannot understand why one of the leaders of the Tory party is objecting to what was done in the hope of keeping the British markets after the war and helping Great Britain during the war. He has talked much this afternoon about the speeches made during the campaign by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Minister of Agriculture. He touched upon almost everything except the North Star, which was made such an issue by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) during the campaign. I cannot help but think of the success that crowned the efforts of the government and I think the same thing will be true one day of the efforts of the Minister of Agriculture in attempting to solve this situation.

With regard to the reasons for the shrinkage last year in our exports to Great Britain the minister made a statement which brings me to the next part of my remarks. He said:

This was not because the United Kingdom did not want our cheese—and many of our other products—but because she did not have the dollars to pay for it. If we could remove the one difficulty of lack of dollars we would have solved many of our problems.

As to the remedy, the minister stated that it would be threefold. First, he referred to the fact that we have lent Great Britain $1,250 million, the expenditure of which was intended to be spread over until 1952; second, we are encouraging purchases in Great Britain for dollars; and, third, we are discouraging the purchase of some commodities from the United States.

I shall try to demonstrate in the third part of my remarks that there is another field which the government does not seem to have explored. I shall come to that in a moment, but first I should like to make a last quotation from the remarks of the Minister of Agriculture. I may be accused of quoting the minister too often, but I admit that I have a weakness for him. Of all the experts in agriculture in Canada he is the one who has most consistently been right in the past and is the one upon whom we can most depend in the future.

Politics aside, I am deeply convinced that Canada has been most fortunate in having as Minister of Agriculture for the past 15 years a man who was so qualified to direct its agricultural policies. The minister has weathered many storms and he has met with outstanding success. He is not the type of man who seeks praise nor does he like empty compliments, but I think in all justice and equity it is appropriate to recognize his outstanding ability and the eminent services he has rendered, both to his country since he has been in office and to the allied cause during the last conflict.

Although the foregoing has been truly said without any political intent, I may add that the fact that he is one of the true Liberals in this house and in the cabinet far from detracts from the personal admiration I have for him.

To get back to the subject of my remarks, I wish to repeat my last quotation of the minister.

If we could remove the one difficulty of lack of dollars on the part of Britain we would have solved many of our problems.

This seems to be substantiated by the conditions prevailing during the war when we supplied the United Kingdom with the necessary amount of dollars to secure in Canada what was needed in the way of food and armament. Let us examine therefore the summary of balance of payments transactions between Canada and the sterling area, mainly the United Kingdom, from 1940 to 1945. We find that total current expenditures in Canada on account of the sterling area amounted to the fantastic sum of $10,430 million. The expenditure of such vast amounts has evidently boosted the Canadian economy and accounts for much of the wartime prosperity for those six years. Sales of food products to Great Britain amounted to $2,290 million. To facilitate an understanding of my argument, I ask the consent of the house to include at this point in Hansard a short summary of the balance of payments above mentioned as taken from page 38 of the Canadian Balance of International Payments, 1926 to 1948.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the hon. member the consent of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Picard: The following is the table:

Summary of Balance of Payments Transactions Between Canada and the Sterling Area, 1940 to 1945

(Millions of Canadian dollars)

Current expenditures on account of the sterling area in Canada:
Exports on United Kingdom account
Munitions and ships	4,047
Food	2,290
Wood products	479
Non-ferrous metals	654
Other commodities	264
Total	7,734
Exports on account of other sterling area	1,113
Freight	822
War services	561
Other current transactions	200
Total current expenditures in Canada	10,430
Current payments by Canada to the sterling area
Imports from the United Kingdom	680
Imports from other sterling area	670
Overseas expenditures of Canadian government	2,597
Interest and dividend payments	357
Freight and shipping	235
Other current transactions	261
Total current payments by Canada	4,800
Net requirements of the sterling area for financing current expenditures	5,630
Methods of financing gap in current account
Billion dollar contribution	1,000
Mutual aid by Canada to sterling area	2,002
Interim advances by Canadian government to United Kingdom and India	206
Loan of $700 million to United Kingdom in 1942 (net)	561
Official repatriations of securities by Canada	703
Private repatriations of securities by Canada	292
Sales of gold and United States dollar to Canada	504
Other capital movements	362
Total capital and special transactions	5,630

There now remains to be seen how the expenditures were financed, which also can be found in the summary just tabled, as divided between current payments by Canada to the sterling area amounting to $4,800 million, and methods of financing the gap in current account which amounts to $5,630 million.

For the sake of my argument I should like to divide the financial operation in the following manner, what was received by Canada in payment and what was actually paid or absorbed by Canada. In the first I would include imports from the United Kingdom and other sterling countries which amounted to $1,350 million, and repatriation of securities, official and private, $995 million. Since these figures are included in the table which has just been put on Hansard, and since my time is short, I will skip over the details. The analysis of this table will show that Canada absorbed or financed $7,216 million, $3 billion as a gift, $2,597 million as the cost of our overseas war expenditures, et cetera. It can therefore be said, Mr. Speaker, without any exaggeration that we have done more than our share, as will be seen from the summary I have just tabled, to help Great Britain in her hour of stress, but it must equally be admitted in all fairness that the Canadian workers and farmers have benefited by the policies of the government.

There is, however, a restriction and an important one to be made. Canada's finances remain heavily burdened by these financial operations while we would have fared better had we asked Great Britain before we became overgenerous to liquidate all her Canadian assets before we entered the contribution or gift era.

Mr. Brooks: Why not take her shirt?

Mr. Picard: The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) said that we should do as much as we can to help Great Britain get the necessary dollars to buy more of our products. I hope he will agree with the proposal I am about to make which will show that she can get the dollars for that purpose. In 1939 British investments in Canada amounted to $2,476 million, and in 1947, the last year for which I could get figures, they stood at $1,642 million. I have already outlined, when I spoke on the mutual aid bill on May 11, 1943, that the so-called repatriation of Canadian National Railways bonds was just a shifting of figures from private shareholders to the Canadian government, but at the time I advocated that we should avail ourselves of a provision contained in the mutual aid bill which read:

That the governor in council may determine the terms and conditions upon which such war supplies are made available to any of the united nations and may require in certain cases payment or repayment in kind or property or reciprocal action or provision of supplies or other direct or indirect benefit as may be deemed appropriate.

I held at the time that Great Britain should buy all the Canadian securities held in that country and turn them over to the Canadian government. This was no extraordinary procedure. It had been followed as to United States securities held in Great Britain and in that regard I wish to quote from a report published in the Federal Reserve Bulletin reading as follows:

At the beginning of the war, in August, 1939, the British owned about $950 million worth of United States securities.

Summarizing the balance of the quotation, between that time and the end of 1940 they had liquidated $334 million, and of the remaining $616 million $389 million were either sold or were pledged to the reconstruction finance corporation against loans that government corporation made to Great Britain during the period January-August, 1941. Another $60 million were held to be pledged with the reconstruction finance corporation at September 1, 1941. This left $167 million in securities which had not been repatriated between that time and the end of 1943.

The same thing was done by Great Britain as regards Argentine securities held in Great Britain. I was not the only one to advocate that at the time. The Financial Post on September 30, 1939, had foreseen the move as inevitable. It even quoted from a government statement dated September, 1939, which ended with the following words:

In the first instance Canada's assistance in supplying food and ammunition to Great Britain will probably involve repatriation of Canadian securities held in London and, at a later stage, the granting of credits.

That was in September, 1939, more than ten years ago, but there are still $1,642 million of Canadian securities held in Great Britain on which we paid during the six years of the war $357 million, and on which we were still paying in 1947 $53 million per annum. However, credits and even gifts were granted before repatriation was asked for. It is evident that some financial experts have changed their minds between the first declaration of the government and the time when the policies were definitely established.

Yet had we then acted as the United States and the Argentine did, we would be one step further in the logical solution of our railway problems, which were mentioned this afternoon by my friend from Dufferin-Simcoe, since the government would have acquired free of charge the control of the Canadian Pacific Railway which we are letting drift into United States hands. In 1937 54·89 per cent of the common or ordinary shares of the Canadian Pacific Railway, representing $175 million, were held in Great Britain as well as 95·09 per cent of the preferred stock, $133 million, and at least $285 million of the company's bonds. If in return for our gifts of $3 billion Great Britain had acquired and transferred the C.P.R. securities amounting to $593 million, she would have had still to thank us, and the first step in the solution of our railway problem would have been made at no further cost to the treasury, a substantial improvement over what was done in the days of the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk railway.

Even if there is no excuse for not repatriating these securities during the war, the opportunity is still there of using this $1,642 million to good advantage. Here comes my suggestion to help solve our marketing problem. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) said:

If we could remove the one difficulty of lack of dollars . . . we would have solved many of our problems.

This afternoon the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe said, "Let us help Great Britain get the dollars". To this I answer that Great Britain has a potential fund of over one and a half billion dollars to purchase Canadian goods which, distributed over a period of years, would ensure Great Britain of her necessary supplies and Canada of her necessary market.

Before examining a method of effecting an orderly repatriation of these securities it may be worth while to investigate the nature of these values. I will just give an outline of what they are. Canadian bonds held in Great Britain in 1946, mainly government and municipal, amounted to $105 million; railways and utilities, $315 million; corporations, $97 million; common stock holdings amounted to $675 million, most of which was in railway issues. The balance of $357 million represented British direct investments in Canadian branches, subsidiaries and other companies controlled in the United Kingdom.

The technique of such a repatriation can easily be established by the Bank of Canada and the foreign exchange control board. The British government knows where these securities are. They have been registered, and they might actually buy them at a price equivalent to their market values. Owners might receive all or part of the purchase price by way of sterling bonds. The securities could then be handed to the Bank of Canada which, with the foreign exchange control board, has facilities for their orderly liquidation on the Canadian market. Some of them could even be sold on the United States market if necessary. Some may say that in this way the ownership of more of our industries would pass to the United States. I do not see that we would be any worse off than if these securities remained in Britain; at any rate the same result is achieved by the private sale of Canadian securities by the British on the United States market, although with the proviso that each time a security is sold it is credited to the British account here in repayment of the loans already made.

No better example could be found than that of the Canadian Pacific Railway, which I mentioned a moment ago. In 1937, as I said before, Britain held 54·89 per cent of the ordinary shares of that company while the United States held 22·22 per cent. According to the 1949 report of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the last report we have, as of December 31, 1948, Britain held only 37·49 per cent of the stock of the company, which meant that these securities had been disposed of privately. At the same time, however, the United States held 43·41 per cent of the stock. Thus control of the Canadian Pacific Railway, instead of having been given to us outright, now is passing into United States hands. If any such liquidation had been part of a marketing deal at least we would have derived some benefit from the transaction.

Furthermore, having control of the Canadian Pacific pass into United States hands might very well have a considerable repercussion on the finances of the Canadian National. What if a powerful United States empire, such as was built a few years ago by Robert Young of the Chesapeake and Ohio, obtained control of the Canadian Pacific? Such a company could immediately route most of its Canadian business through its Canadian subsidiary, or to be more exact the Canadian company it controlled. It is not to be forgotten that seventy years ago the Canadian Pacific received about as much in the way of subsidies as the companies that now constitute the Canadian National. At that time the company obtained from the government vast areas of land, of which a large proportion still appears to be their property. This might be an added incentive for the country to regain control of the railway, rather than see outside interests profit by the accrued values of such lands, particularly in Alberta.

This afternoon the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) put the question: How can we sell to the British if they have no dollars? Well, here is a source of dollars which I suggest to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the hon. member. Of course the main question remains: if there were no dollar shortage, how much more would the British buy from us? The reason given the public for the curtailment of some of the contracts is the lack of dollars, but it might well be that the matter of price is an equally important factor, since it has been customary for Britain in time of peace to be a tough bargainer, to forget the interests of the commonwealth at large and to think only of herself. This afternoon the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe said, "Don't sell the British commonwealth short". I have here an article from New Zealand which says "Britain is turning back to the empire".—Well, the British act like real businessmen and drive a hard bargain, while we are sentimentalists. I do not blame them for that either. During the war we went so far as to give our wheat to Britain for less than we could have obtained for it elsewhere. That was another sacrifice we made in the hope of gaining the gratitude of Britain and keeping those markets after the war. Most of what we have done, and most of the negotiations the minister has carried on, had as their ultimate aim the retention of those same markets following the war.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I hold that we cannot overlook any method which may facilitate the marketing of our agricultural surpluses. Britain appears to be a natural market; in that I agree with the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe. It is a natural market, but it is increasingly restricting its purchases from us, and Britain will continue to be a tough trader in the years to come. The difference between Britain and Canada is that Britain has the practical sense of doing business in a businesslike way, of fighting wars to ensure either her supremacy or her survival. On the other hand we are sentimentalists, who fought wars in the past more because of the attachment of some of our citizens to their former mother country than because of any actual threat to our country. We have also been in the habit of not daring to ask for what others get as a matter of right, such as the repatriation of our securities, and of disposing of our wheat for less in the hope that gratitude might be our reward. At the time that was a good policy; that was one of the efforts made by the government to ensure those markets after the war; but business is not transacted in that way by Britain. She buys where she thinks she gets the better bargain, be it with yesterday's enemy or tomorrow's potential adversary; and she speaks of imperial loyalty only when she expects it from others.

The moment has come, I submit, to try to impress upon her the advisability of reciprocating in time of peace; this also was suggested this afternoon. We have failed to arouse her gratitude; let us try now to convince her that it is in her own best interests to co-operate, that it is in her best interests to trade with us, even if it costs a cent more a pound; and let us provide the dollars she needs by the repatriation operation I have outlined.

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to follow closely the arguments we have just heard from the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard). I may say, however, that I agree with his statement concerning social security measures for the helpless. I also agree with what he said as to obtaining markets for our farmers. I cannot agree that the farmers of this country are better off than ever before. I know that in my own part of the country the farmers are paying more for what they purchase than they ever paid; and I also know that never in the history of this country was the cost of living as high as it is now.

Neither can I agree with the statement just made by the hon. member for Bellechasse that we should liquidate all our assets in Britain. One great reason Britain was such a great market for our produce in the past was that she had these assets, not only in this country but all over the world, which made it possible for her to purchase goods from all countries. So I cannot agree with the suggestion that we should take away practically everything she has. During the war Great Britain suffered more than any other country; Great Britain helped practically every ally she had, except the United States; and now we should not strip her of her assets and still expect her to be the great market she has been in the past.

Before entering upon a discussion of the matters contained in the speech from the throne I should like to endorse the tributes that have been paid to my late seatmate, Tommy Church. He was deserving of everything that has been said of him. I do not altogether agree that he was old-fashioned in many of his ideas. I believe that the principles he held represented the feelings of more people in this country than we have been led to believe by some of the statements made in this House of Commons.

I want to add my congratulations also, Mr. Speaker, to those extended to the mover (Mr. Larson) and the seconder (Mr. Dumas) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. They did a good job, there is no question about that. I think they will be quite satisfied with the just praise they have received. I wish to extend my congratulations to the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Harris), who has joined the cabinet ranks. I have congratulated him personally, and all I can say now is that I cannot wish him many long years in the cabinet; but, for the few years in which I expect this government to remain in power, I do wish him every success.

During the debate on the speech from the throne, Mr. Speaker, an opportunity is given hon. members, as representatives of the people, to discuss conditions in the country, and to present to parliament the views of their own constituents concerning the needs of the country as they see them. I shall only touch on a few items this evening, and time will not permit an extensive review of them. I might say that the aftermath of the great war left many problems. One of the greatest problems, of course, was the rehabilitation of our returned men. It also left us with problems in the readjustment of industry, trade, and the whole economy of our nation. These problems extend over a long period of years, and a wise government prepares for such problems.

After five years of peace, Mr. Speaker, and after the experience of all countries following the first great war, it was expected that the situation in this country would have been well in hand by now. The readjustment should be complete, but unfortunately this is not the case. We are in the midst of an economic situation which has resulted in the worst unemployment problem we have had since the end of the war. Apparently it is growing worse all the time, despite the assurances we have had from government officials. The debate on the unemployment situation, and on the unemployment insurance bill which was before the house, indicated to this house and to the country the grave situation which faces us.

In my own section of Canada, the maritime provinces, the unemployment figures are the second largest for any part of Canada. This is usually the case in the maritime provinces whenever there is a recession. I was greatly surprised upon reading one sentence in the speech from the throne, to the effect that employment and prosperity remain at a high level in Canada. We all know, Mr. Speaker, that is not a fact. Employment and prosperity do not remain at a high level in Canada. This is particularly true, as I say, in the maritime provinces. We in the maritime provinces are the first to feel a recession because our chief asset is the primary producer. We are not secondary producers. Mining, fishing and agriculture are the industries upon which we depend. It is a well-known fact that any country, or any section of a country, which has to depend on primary products is a section which first feels the depression.

I should like to read a short article from the Moncton Times about the situation in the maritime provinces. It appeared a few weeks ago, and is written by J. P. Crossman. It says:

There is an air of grim foreboding throughout the rural areas of Kent county.

I may say that Kent county is one of the counties in the northern part of New Brunswick.

"There is no work in the woods", is the sad tune, and a brief survey of the situation proves this statement to be a fact.

No more does the ring of the chopper's axe or the whine of the saw pierce the stillness of the forest; gone is the feverish activity which had marked the forest industry of this area in past years. Instead, the farmers, the small woodlot owners and the labourers are idle, awaiting a solution to a problem which is of vital interest to their very existence.

That paragraph, Mr. Speaker, represents the situation in a large area of the maritime provinces.

The article goes on to say:

The forest industry is dead.

That is one of our great industries in the maritime provinces.

A slump in the pulpwood market started the decline early in the year and the loss of the British pit prop market had been the final death blow.

As I said a few moments ago, there is no manufacturing in this section of the country. The people depend upon the forests for a living. For years the long lumber which we shipped to Great Britain was the main industry upon which the people of New Brunswick and part of Nova Scotia depended. That market was lost over a year ago. In past years, hundreds of thousands of cords of pit wood and pulpwood have been shipped overseas and by rail. This has been lost as well. The pit prop industry has meant over $9 million a year to the people of the maritime provinces. When an appeal was made to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Gregg) and to this government to see what could be done about the pit prop industry, the laconic reply was that "pit props were out", and pit props were out, Mr. Speaker. Many of the people in the province of New Brunswick are today unemployed as a result of that.

The people in the northern part of the province of New Brunswick have despaired of any assistance from this government. First, they appealed to the minister from our province. Then they appealed to the local government, but they received no assurance of any action. Today they are taking the matter in their own hands and are sending a delegation to Great Britain to see if they can do what the Minister of Veterans Affairs and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and the provincial government failed to do for the people who depend on this industry for a living. It is not only the men in the woods, Mr. Speaker, who suffer as a result of the loss of this trade. There are hundreds of longshoremen in the Miramichi valley, in Richibucto, Chatham and Bathurst, who are also out of work because no pit props or pulpwood have been shipped from the northern part of the province of New Brunswick. In addition to that, the hundreds of men who truck these pit props and pulpwood to the ships are out of employment. The garages have lost business and the merchants have lost business. It is for these reasons that business in the northern part of the province of New Brunswick is practically at a standstill today.

The main reason, Mr. Speaker, for this lack of markets for pit props in Great Britain is the non-convertibility of our currency. For some years, we have pressed for a solution of this problem. If it had not been left to the late date it was, I do not believe we would now be faced with this great problem. A short time ago the Lumbermen's Association met in Montreal, and put forward what they considered might be two solutions for the situation. First, they recommended the lifting of trade restrictions. Second, they said there should be a free exchange of money between countries. I am sure if this could be brought about, Mr. Speaker, it would be of material aid.

I should like to agree with those who have said that the British market is our best market. If that is true for Canada, Mr. Speaker, it is more than true for the people who live in the maritime provinces. For years, we have sold our lumber in Great Britain and in sterling markets of the West Indies. Years ago these were the two great markets for the people of the maritime provinces. Today we have neither of them. We cannot sell to what we call Upper Canada because of the heavy freight rates and the great cost of transportation and also on account of the competition which we have to meet in this market. But if we had the British market and if we had the West Indies market, I believe that the people of the maritime provinces would be prosperous.

I should like to quote none other than a former minister of trade and commerce, Hon. J. A. MacKinnon. Speaking in the city of Saint John a few days ago, when he arrived back from the West Indies, he said:

The people of the British West Indies regret the present trade restrictions with Canada and I heard the proposal advanced that their representatives may approach the Canadian government to see if arrangements can be made whereby this lucrative trade can be expanded.

I hope they do approach our Canadian government, and I hope they come to some agreement; because I believe it would be of great benefit to the West Indies as well as to ourselves.

I sometimes wonder, Mr. Speaker, if we are buying from Great Britain as much as we could and should. It is a sort of habit for some members of the government to blame Great Britain when we cannot sell certain products to her. But are we buying from her as much as we could? I ask this question after reading an article I saw in Toronto Saturday Night a short time ago, on January 10. It had to do with the purchase of television equipment in this country. Great Britain could have supplied this television equipment; but instead of its being purchased from Great Britain, thus giving us a better opportunity to trade with her, it was purchased from the United States. I think the excuse used was that it was not thought that Great Britain could supply as good material. But as this article says, Great Britain has some of the best technical engineers in the world. She is the country which pioneered in radar. She has also been pioneering in television. Other countries are buying their television equipment from Great Britain. If we want to be fair and if we want to get an exchange of currency with which to trade, there is no reason in the world why this large order should not have been given to Great Britain, and there is no reason in the world why the government of this country should not set the example with regard to purchasing from her.

Mr. McCann: Would the hon. member not prefer to have the equipment made in Canada?

Mr. Brooks: It is made by the General Electric Company—

Mr. McCann: Seventy per cent of it is made in the city of Peterborough.

Mr. Brooks: —which is a subsidiary of General Electric in the United States.

Mr. McCann: Ask your colleague behind you which he would prefer.

Mr. Drew: Do the ministers mean what they say when they talk about developing trade with Great Britain?

Mr. McCann: I mean employment for Canadians.

Mr. Brooks: This article goes on to say as follows:

> "If Canada won't give us a chance to get into new fields like this," said one British official, "there is no hope whatever of closing the dollar gap—or of our buying more from Canada."

We in certain sections of this country are starving for trade with Great Britain. Our government says that, if Great Britain will sell more goods to us, we shall be able to sell more goods to her. My point is that when there is an opportunity for us to trade with Great Britain, such as there was in this case, it should have been done if the government is sincere in what it says about developing trade.

I should also like to refer to a similar situation in the United States which also emphasizes the point that I am trying to make. For instance, the city of Seattle in the United States wanted to buy some generators and advertised for tenders. The British put in two bids. The Americans put in certain bids. Great Britain's bids were many thousands of dollars lower than the bids in the United States. What happened? Here is what I read from the Christian Science Monitor:

> Here is the story of the first really big effort by the British to act on Washington's advice and take advantage of Washington's formal promise: The bids were opened, disclosing that there had been seven bidders, of whom two were British, and that the two British bids were very much lower than any of the American bids. Lowest bid was by Ferranti Limited at $515,000. Next lowest was by English Electric at $572,000. Lowest American bid was at $720,000, and other American bids ranged up to $1,321,000.

This was the same company, the General Electric Company; and this article goes on to say that certain excuses were made for not buying from Great Britain. The first one was that the distance from the factory in England to Seattle was too great in case of a breakdown. But as the British pointed out, they had a branch office in Toronto which could have supplied service and attended to any breakdown that might have taken place. They also pointed out that they could have supplied eight generators for the same amount that it would cost to get six generators in the United States.

Then when that excuse did not suffice, it was next said that Ferranti has no experience in building generators for use in such remote and northerly climes. Yet at that very same time Ferranti, that great British company, was building generators for Helsinki in Finland, and had been building this sort of equipment since 1889 and sending it all over the world. The real excuse was given to a reporter by the Seattle purchasing agent who said:

> I imagine we would have had considerable reaction from American manufacturers if we had accepted a British bid.

This article goes on to say:

> One of the American manufacturers concerned is General Electric, chairmanned by Philip Reed, who as president of the Anglo-American productivity council is a leading advocate of bigger British sales in the U.S.A.

The British ambassador said: "Do you really want to buy our goods, or don't you?"

I mentioned those two cases, Mr. Speaker, because I think they illustrate that there is insincerity somewhere in this country and in the United States with regard to our purchases from Great Britain. As I said a moment ago, in my part of the country at least we feel that every effort should be made to make purchases from Great Britain so that we might be able to sell some of the goods we have, on whose sale depends the very livelihood of the people in that part of the country.

I should like to say a few words with regard to a matter which was before the house the other day, namely, the taking off of trains and the purchasing of coal. It is not necessary for me to deal with this matter to any great extent. The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) has already spoken about it, as has the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. Carroll), and pointed out that it was not necessary to take off 25 per cent of our trains in the maritimes, and that a million tons of coal could have been obtained by the Canadian National Railways for the service of trains at least in that part of the country. There could also have been coal purchased from these maritime mines for the service of trains in other parts of Canada, had it been looked after at the proper time. The other day the minister said it was only fair, because there was no coal here in Ontario, that all people across Canada should be used alike. That is, because it was not possible to obtain coal for trains here in Ontario we in the maritime provinces, where there is lots of coal, should have our service reduced by 25 per cent.

The city of Saint John and the city of Halifax used to have a midnight train running from Saint John to Halifax, and back from Halifax to Saint John. We had Sunday trains, but these have been taken off. It is not possible for anyone to travel from either of these two large cities in the maritime provinces from Saturday at noon until Monday at noon.

I do not think such a condition would be accepted for one moment in any other part of Canada, and in my opinion it would not be inflicted upon any part of Canada except the maritime provinces. I believe it was in 1931 when these trains were taken off once before, and they were off for nearly fifteen years. That was supposed to have been a temporary reduction in our train service. However, they were taken off in 1931 and were not replaced until 1946. I hope the minister will not have the present temporary reduction of service last quite that long.

I should like to take some time to mention what I believe we need in the maritime provinces. In that part of New Brunswick which has lost its pit prop and pulpwood business, and where the long-lumber business is out, they need temporary assistance. The government will have to start some public works. But the people down in that section of the country do not want to live on old age pensions, unemployment insurance or mothers' allowances, as they were told by one of the members of the legislature at Fredericton. They want work, and the opportunity to work.

The immediate need, so far as these people are concerned, is a backlog of public works. Towns such as Bathurst, Newcastle, Chatham and others have organized citizens committees, the main object of which is to try to find whatever employment they can for the people living in that section of the country.

Taking the long view of the matter, we want markets for our products. We want the British markets; we want the West Indies market. We also want the development of hydroelectric power in the maritime provinces. In presenting the estimates to the house, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) said, as reported at page 198 of Hansard:

> In approving the programs for the various departments' expenditures, the treasury board have had in mind the general economic situation in the maritime provinces and the coastal areas of Quebec, and the government's desire to promote the economic development of this general region, which has encountered greater economic difficulties than the other major regions of the country.

We approve of that statement, and we are wondering just what he is going to do in order to improve the economic position of the maritime provinces. I would tell him what we need. As I said a moment ago, we need markets and, secondly, we need cheap electric power.

I was interested today, as I am sure all hon. members were, to hear about the further development of electric power at Niagara Falls. We have no objection to that, although it will cost many millions of dollars, and will have to be paid in part by those of us from the maritime provinces. We are willing to assist in that project. Then the question was asked: "Will this interfere with the development of the St. Lawrence waterways?" And the answer was "no". There will be power developed along the St. Lawrence river. We in the maritime provinces will help to pay for it, but we will not receive one cent of benefit so far as utilizing that power is concerned.

We have vast quantities of power in the maritime provinces which could be developed, and in justice to those great developments taking place in other parts of Canada, I say it is only fair that we should receive consideration. As I said before, we want cheap power.

At a recent meeting of the maritime board of trade held in Moncton, New Brunswick, the harnessing of the tides in Passamaquoddy bay was the outstanding matter debated. This is a tremendous scheme, and if undertaken would be one of the largest in that section of the country. It would be a joint undertaking, and has already been investigated by engineers of both the United States and Canada and found feasible.

It is estimated that the development of the tides in Passamaquoddy bay would be capable of producing over half a million horsepower of electricity. This gives some idea of the amount of power that would be available for the development of industry in the province of New Brunswick, as well as in Prince Edward Island and parts of Nova Scotia.

It is believed that the completion of this scheme would witness the beginning of an era that New Brunswick has long looked forward to, and with the cheap power developed that section of the dominion could well be placed on a firm foundation for industrial development. The development of this power has been dreamed of upwards of 40 years.

I repeat, if the government wishes to assist, they should give their blessing to the development of a project such as that.

May I now read from the Toronto Star Weekly of November 19, 1949, regarding this same matter. This article was written by J. E. Belliveau, and states:

"Some day down here in Maine we'll milk our cows by the pull of the moon." That's the prediction of a windbeaten, sturdy old Lubec fisherman. He goes on to say, "and over in New Brunswick," which is so close a bush league pitcher with a fair throwing arm could heave a baseball across the channel and hit Campobello island, "there will be industry unthought of today."

It's not so fantastic as it seems, for strong-minded, down-to-earth easterners long since set out to make reality out of man's ancient dream of harnessing the moon by controlling the tides for electric power. For half a century the idea of trapping the tremendous flow of the Bay of Fundy has been actively considered. One of the world's great hydro engineers, Dexter P. Cooper, started to work out its possibilities as early as 1912. Franklin D. Roosevelt, who was to become president of his country, watched those gigantic tides sweep through the narrow Lubec-Campobello channel in his boyhood. He, too, dreamed dreams and through youth and manhood held on to them. Then, in the 1930's, he went about making them come true.

The Americans started to develop this project in 1930 but, owing to the depression, they abandoned it. But Senator Brewster of the state of Maine, and Senator Smith—I believe the only lady senator in the United States—as well as President Truman, are pressing for it at the present time. We know that at one time Canada objected because it was thought it would interfere with our fisheries. I think that has been disproved. Mr. Emery, who was the mayor of Eastport in the United States, a great fish packer, has said that there is nothing in that at all. I think I should like to quote this gentleman who said:

Our economy is seasonal now, both here and in New Brunswick. Quoddy is our only hope. Every engineer consulted says the power can be harnessed. If it is economically reasonable, we know Quoddy will be built, despite all obstacles. We would like to see it settled once and for all. I'm getting on now, been pushing this for 25 years, and it could do me no good. But I would feel satisfied if I could live to see this magnificent scheme become a reality.

There will be other opportunities to discuss this matter. If the government is sincere in wishing to bring economic benefits to the maritime provinces they, if the United States is agreeable, should undertake this project which would help us most of all, a project which could provide cheap power for our provinces.

I hardly think it is necessary for me to mention the Chignecto canal. I do believe that if this project had been proposed in any other part of Canada it would have been carried out long ago. I hope it will receive careful consideration by this government because it will mean much to the people of the maritime provinces. It is not my intention to dwell at length on this tonight except to say that there is not a board of trade, a branch of the Canadian Legion, a Kinsmen's club or a branch of the Knights of Columbus or any other organization in the maritime provinces which is not one hundred per cent behind the development of the Chignecto canal.

In closing may I say I was pleased indeed to note in the speech from the throne that a bill will be introduced to bring veterans of the British and allied forces resident in Canada within the scope of the War Veterans Allowance Act. This is belated justice and should have been done years ago.

An hon. Member: It is not done yet.

Mr. Brooks: We have not got it yet, but I have enough confidence and faith in our veterans minister to believe that it will be done. As I have said in committee, and as almost every member of the veterans affairs committee has said for many years, these men should have received this consideration long ago. British veterans who fought in the first great war and then came out to this country to raise families who fought in the second great war should receive the consideration to which good Canadian citizens are entitled. I commend the minister for having this proposal in the speech from the throne. I shall have more to say on it later. It will be rendering justice to these men who have deserved it for many, many years.

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, my first words shall be to compliment the mover (Mr. Larson) and the seconder (Mr. Dumas) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne on having been selected by their party for this great honour. The mover, as a young Saskatchewan farmer, in his speech expressed some doubt about the effectiveness of the government's measures to deal with the situation that exists in Canada today. He said, as reported on page 27 of Hansard:

> I feel that I may be open to criticism for not taking issue with the government on some of the matters of a more contentious nature.

I am sure that when he returned to his constituency after the session last year he, along with other Saskatchewan members, was met with criticism of certain actions of the government and expressions of doubt as to the effectiveness of the measures being taken by the government to meet some of the problems facing this country today.

Before dealing further with that however I should like to compliment the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Harris) upon his elevation to the position of Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. I am sure he carries the best wishes of members of all groups in the house that he may have success in the organization of that new department and in instituting policies in connection with citizenship and immigration which will be of benefit to the country.

It has always seemed to me that we have neglected citizenship in this country. I can remember when I went to western Canada many years ago. Many of the new people who had come to the country who wanted to get citizenship papers generally applied to a political party. Then just before an election, if the party thought they might secure their support, citizenship papers were obtained for them. As a result many of our new citizens felt a greater allegiance to the political party which had obtained their citizenship papers than they did to the country of their adoption. I think the department should have some educational program for our new citizens. When they secure their citizenship papers the people in the community where they live should have some function or social gathering at which these people would be welcomed as new citizens.

Then a word with regard to immigration. It takes a brave person to say at a time when there are 375,000 unemployed in this country that we should have more immigrants. However, let us look at the situation in Canada. Consider the great iron resources in Labrador and northern Quebec. Consider the great resources of nickel in Sudbury and northern Manitoba. Think of the immense resources of oil in Alberta and Saskatchewan. Yet with all these resources, with the great need we have for development, there are 375,000 unemployed.

Is there any reason for that? Surely there are things to be done in this country which could provide work for the people we have here. What is the situation with respect to our markets? We ship out our resources, in the form of either raw materials or semi-finished materials, to Europe to be manufactured into articles which are used here and throughout the world. Then we send food to feed the people who are processing our raw materials.

It seems to me that it would be more sensible if we brought some of those industries to this country, with the people to work in the industries, and processed our raw materials here instead of continuing as we are doing today. We have no markets for our food and yet we are sending our raw materials out of the country to be processed. We are finding ourselves in a position where we cannot get paid for the products that we do ship.

It is a matter of organization, a matter of having a planned economy in the country under which we could not only produce but finish the products from our raw materials. An intelligent immigration policy which would bring industries to this country along with the people to work in them would provide at least a part answer to the problem of markets.

I should like to deal tonight with a matter which I raised the other day in the house at three o'clock. When the report of the Canadian wheat board was tabled I asked if it would be referred to the standing committee on agriculture. Hon. members of the house will recall that in 1947, when the Hon. Mr. MacKinnon was Minister of Trade and Commerce, he told the house that these wheat board reports would be referred to the agricultural committee each year. Unfortunately we have had three years go by without one of them being referred to the committee.

On the tabling of the report the other day I was surprised to see some of the information in it. I know that before the last election the government did not give information to the people with regard to quite a few things that were taking place in this country. Among them is the situation which existed as to the wheat board. I hope no one tonight will take anything that I say as criticism of the wheat board or this method of marketing.

What I am criticizing is the fact that it is quite evident from this report that the government used the wheat board for political purposes before the last election.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Wright: To substantiate that claim I am going to read from the report itself and then ask members of the house if that is not the case. On page 18 of the report, under the heading of "Bank loans", it states as follows:

> In accordance with the provisions of order in council P.C. 919 of February 24, 1949, the initial price paid to producers was increased from $1.55 to $1.75 per bushel basis No. 1 northern wheat in store Fort William/Port Arthur or Vancouver. This increase became effective on April 1, 1949, and under terms of the same order the board was directed to pay to producers the sum of 20 cents per bushel in respect of deliveries by producers to the board on the 1945-49 pool account for the period from August 1, 1945 to March 31, 1949. This payment involved a cash distribution by the board of $213,445,541.88 which was commenced on April 1, 1949.

I would ask hon. members to note this:

> To meet this and other cash commitments, the board as at March 31, 1949, had funds on deposit with the chartered banks totalling $25,051,551.87 and investments in Dominion of Canada ⅜ per cent treasury notes in the amount of $40 million.

In other words, they had liquid assets of approximately $65 million to start a payment which involved over $213,445,000. I continue:

> The funds provided from the foregoing sources together with funds received from daily operations of the board, permitted the board to meet its cash commitments from April 1, 1949 to June 8, 1949. On this latter date board funds became exhausted and on June 9, 1949 the board commenced to borrow its daily cash requirements from the chartered banks at the established interest rate of 3 per cent per annum compounded monthly. As at July 31, 1949 loans from the chartered banks totalled $23,795,698.28 and accrued interest thereon to the foregoing date amounted to $3,911.62.

On page 9 it states as follows:

> Interest earned by the board on surplus funds exceeded interest paid by the board during the first three years of the five year pool. In 1948-49 interest paid by the board exceeded interest earned by $1,366,659.59.

I ask members of the house if they were on a co-operative board, or on any other board of directors in this country, would they start a payment of over $213 million when they only had liquid assets of $65 million with which to meet such payment? There was a great deal of criticism in western Canada, and certain people said the government was bribing the voters there with their own money by the 20 cent interim payment on wheat certificates just before the election. According to this report they were borrowing the money from the chartered banks at 3 per cent compounded monthly to make that payment.

[Mr. Wright.]

Mr. Gardiner: May I ask the hon. member if he is not aware that every farmers' organization in western Canada, including the pool locals, were asking for that 20 cent payment before seeding, and is he not aware of the fact that there could not be enough money to pay it without borrowing?

Mr. Wright: I want to answer the minister right there. The farmers of western Canada and the pools never asked for a 20 cent payment. They asked for a payment, and if the farmers of western Canada had known—

Mr. Gardiner: I can produce resolution after resolution where they asked for 20 cents.

Mr. Wright: If the farmers of western Canada had known that the government was going to the banks to borrow the money at an interest rate of 3 per cent compounded monthly to make that payment, when in a great many cases the men who were receiving payment were paying 15 per cent to 30 per cent of it at least back to the government in income tax—

Mr. Gardiner: Only a week ago my hon. friend asked to have payment made for this year. How does he expect payment is going to be made if you do not borrow money at the bank?

Mr. Wright: I asked that question before we had this report tabled in the house.

Mr. Gardiner: Do you want it withdrawn?

Mr. Wright: I certainly know there is nothing left there to make a payment with now. I know that no sensible board of directors in this country, and no co-operative board, with the facts contained in this report before them, would have made a 20 cent payment last year. They should have made a 10 cent payment and kept the other 10 cents to be made this year.

Mr. Gardiner: We are quite satisfied to leave that with the farmers in the drought area who asked for the payment last year.

Mr. Wright: As a result of making this payment it has meant that the farmers of western Canada are paying to the banks several million dollars in additional interest charges on money paid to them, 15 per cent to 30 per cent of which they have had to turn around and pay back in the form of income taxes.

Mr. Gardiner: There is no other way of making payment in the spring when a very considerable part of the crop is still to be sold.

Mr. Wright: A 10 cent payment could have been made with very little borrowing at that time, but to make good fellows of themselves the Liberal government went out and paid 20 cents, and went to the banks and borrowed the money to pay it at the expense of the farmers, not at the government's expense. When the wheat board had money invested in treasury notes they received five-eighths of one per cent interest on it—

Mr. Gardiner: You got a part of it; they all did.

Mr. Wright: —but when the board went to borrow money they had to pay 3 per cent compounded monthly.

Mr. Gardiner: You are the only farmer in Saskatchewan who did not know that.

Mr. Wright: I am certain that no board of directors would act in that manner. I am certain that the wheat board did not make that 20 cent payment of their own volition. It was made by order in council of this government, and if the wheat board had been asked whether or not a 20 cent payment was justified they would have said no.

Mr. Gardiner: That is the way it will be made this year, if it is made, or any other year.

Mr. Wright: That is the situation with regard to these payments. It was a deliberate use of the wheat board by the government for political purposes. I am one of those who believe in the wheat board. I am one of those who believe that is the proper way to market our grain, but this government tries to give it a black eye—

Mr. Harkness: Those were the 20 cent votes.

Mr. Wright: —by forcing it do something which any other business organization would not do.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Wright: If the hon. member for Yorkton will just sit down he can say what he wants to say when I am finished.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): I must remind hon. members that the member who has the floor is not to be interrupted unless he accepts the interruption.

Mr. Wright: Tell that to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner).

Mr. Gardiner: I am finished; go ahead and hang yourself.

Mr. Wright: The minister has hanged himself on this issue; I can assure him of that. He will have a hard time explaining it to his constituents in western Canada.

Now for a little while I want to deal with the general marketing situation in this country. From the speeches that have been made so far in this debate it is quite evident that there is a serious marketing situation with respect to our agricultural products. I am convinced that we have four major agricultural products for which we must find markets: wheat, cheese, bacon and apples. These four products represent the four main groups of agriculture in this country; wheat in the grain group, cheese in the dairy group, bacon in the meat group and apples in the fruit group. If we can find sufficient markets abroad for our surpluses of these agricultural products we will have a chance within our own economy to balance our production of the other grains, dairy products, meat products and fruits; but we must find markets for those products.

Some say the United States is a market. Well, anyone who has read of the situation that now exists in that country with respect to these products knows there is no market there, that the United States is in a surplus position with respect to each of these commodities. The only long-time market there has been in the past or there is likely to be in the future for these products is the European market, and more particularly the British market. Our failure to sell these products in that market is, in my opinion, largely due to the failure of this government, immediately after the war, to deal with the British government on a bilateral or exchange basis covering our major farm products. If in 1947 this government had been prepared to accept British goods in payment for these products we could have had some of the long-term agreements which have been made with the Scandinavian countries, New Zealand and Australia. At that time we were not prepared to make agreements of that type; as a matter of fact we had no legislation under which that could have been done. We had the acts which had been passed during the war to authorize the sale of these products overseas. Nothing was certain as to the period of time for which that legislation would be constitutional, or for how long it would be carried on. We were renewing it from year to year in this house. Instead of developing a long-term policy dealing with our agricultural products we simply frittered away those markets and only now the results of what we did in 1947 are beginning to be felt. Those markets are gone, and the only way we can hope to get them back is by some arrangement whereby we can accept in payment for our products either British goods or sterling, which can be invested in other parts of the world.

In his remarks during this debate the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) suggested that we should accept sterling for some of our agricultural commodities and invest that sterling in other parts of the world. I was rather surprised to read some of the comments that suggestion drew from various people in responsible positions in Great Britain. I have here the report of a statement by "Adelphi", who, by the way, is Beverley Baxter, Canadian-born Tory member of parliament in Great Britain, who states:

> The Times this morning publishes a report that the C.C.F. is urging the Canadian government to accept payment in sterling for a large percentage of its exports to the sterling area. I know that such a suggestion must shake St. James and Bay streets to their foundations, but it is difficult to see how the present rot can be stopped if such a plan is not adopted.

Responsible people in Britain realize that, if they are to buy our products, in some way we must provide them with the dollars or accept their pounds in exchange. Then we can invest those pounds in other parts of the world where such investments can be made to advantage. There are plenty of such places, in the Middle East, in India and in other parts of the sterling area where new developments are needed, and where such developments will help stop the growth and spread of communism. But to insist that we can find markets for those products in the United States is not realistic.

In the speech from the throne it is indicated that we are going to do something with respect to floor price legislation. Hon. members will recall that when the present Agricultural Prices Support Act was introduced in this house in 1944 a great many of us criticized it because it was a temporary measure intended to have effect only during the transitional period. At that time we said this should be permanent legislation, and that the act should contain some formula by which we could determine what were fair floor prices. Neither of our suggestions were accepted. This session, however, we hope to do both those things which should have been done several years ago.

There are two ideas with respect to the method of calculating floor prices for agricultural products. In the United States they have used the term "parity". They have accepted the period from 1909 to 1914, I believe, as the base period, and on that they have established parity floor prices. Under their present plan they pay 90 per cent of parity on some agricultural products such as wheat and cotton; on others they pay 75 per cent and on some perishable products I believe the payment is as low as 60 per cent of parity. In Great Britain and some of the commonwealth countries, as well as Canada, we used a different method to establish floor prices. We used as a basis the long-term contract with Britain. Now, however, as these contracts cannot be renewed, that method of setting a floor has vanished, and we must find some other method. The minister has suggested that the floor will have to be fairly low.

Mr. Gardiner: No, I have not.

Mr. Wright: Yes, you did; at the meeting of the federation the minister suggested that the floor could not be established at a level which would meet the average cost of production.

Mr. Gardiner: I did not say that at all, any time or anywhere.

Mr. Wright: That is the way the minister was reported in the press; that the floor must be low enough to discourage overproduction of any particular agricultural commodity.

Mr. Gardiner: I did not say that, either.

Mr. Wright: That was the way the minister's statement was reported in the press. He claims to be misreported so often that it is difficult to know just what he did or did not say, and all I have to go by are the reports appearing in the press. I want to say this, that in establishing floor prices for agricultural products there are two things that must be taken into consideration. These floor prices should be floor prices which are not merely fair to the farmer; they must be established at a sufficiently high level to enable the farmer to maintain the fertility of his soil. Then the farmer can maintain production over a period of years.

If floor prices are established at a low level, merely as a stopgap, it will mean that the farmers will simply mine the soil of this country. That has been done to a great extent for years in this country. It has been done to such an extent in eastern Canada that you can go to the maritime provinces today and find farms that have been abandoned. Go out in the back counties of the province of Ontario and you will see farms that have been abandoned simply because of the low prices for agricultural products. Our soil has been mined to such an extent that it goes out of production. Perhaps that is all right in a country in which you have unlimited soil resources, and where you are opening up new areas. The point has been reached in Canada now where we have not the new areas available. We have reached the point where we have to start building up the agricultural industry of this country on a permanent working basis, on a basis which will maintain the fertility of the soil. Unless we do that, unless we have floor prices which will enable the farmers to farm efficiently and maintain the fertility of the soil, to prevent erosion and to ensure a proper conservation program for agriculture in this country, we are just building up trouble for ourselves in the future. One of the surest ways we can do this is to set floor prices for our agricultural products so low the farmers will have to continue to mine our soil.

At the last session of parliament, just before the election, the Agricultural Products Marketing Act was passed, under which boards could be set up for the marketing of agricultural products in Canada. I should like to point out, not only to this house but to farm organizations throughout the country, that the farmers themselves have a responsibility in this matter. They cannot expect the government to do something for them which they can do for themselves. The first thing they have to do is to organize their own industry by the setting up of producer boards for the marketing of their particular product. I am however extremely doubtful whether the act that was passed prior to the last election is constitutional, and will give to these boards the power which I believe they will need if they are to be successful.

It seems to me that for any particular agricultural product—let us take hogs for example—if we are to set up boards in this country for marketing, these boards must be set up in each province by the producers in that province. There must be some means, however, by which a central selling agency can be established for the sale of all hogs in Canada. It is not enough to set up a half dozen separate boards with each board having a selling agency, and each agency going out to dispose of that product. If the handling of that product is to be successful, it must all be handled by one board. Not only must it be handled by one board, but that board must keep control of that product until it goes into the wholesale or retail trade of this country. In my opinion, it is not sufficient for the hog producers of this country to set up boards for the sale of their products unless they keep control of that product until it goes into the wholesale or retail trade. It is not enough for them to sell that product to the packers, and then let the packers or cold storage people speculate in that product and make an unfair profit on it.

The Minister of Agriculture himself knows that that is what takes place. When the price of eggs went down last year, he indicated that he was quite displeased with some of the things that had happened in the trade with respect to the marketing of eggs. Last fall, when eggs were bringing approximately 38 cents to the producer, the minister indicated that the consumer was paying 80 cents for the same eggs. Unless these commodity boards set up by the producers keep control of their products and prevent them from falling into the hands of speculators, then I say the boards will not serve the purposes of the producers. As the act reads at the present time, I am rather doubtful whether the boards will have that power. I hope they have, but there is a grave doubt in my mind, and in the minds of many of the agricultural people themselves, as to just how far those boards can go in maintaining control of their product.

It is not good enough to say that these boards should have to take the responsibility for marketing the products when they go outside Canada. I am convinced that we must have export and import boards, controlled by the dominion government, to take control of these surplus agricultural products which must be marketed in the export market. The producer boards have no control over the fiscal policies of this country; they have no control over the tariffs; they have no control over whether dollars will be available for their products when they reach Europe, or the other markets of the world. It is the policies of this government which determine whether those products can be sold when they are exported. This government should take that responsibility, and not throw it back on the producer boards or upon the provinces, as it would appear they are now intending to do.

In this matter of the marketing of agricultural products in the international field, I believe that the government should give serious consideration to backing the food and agricultural organization in its attempt to set up an international commodity clearing house for surplus food products. I was rather surprised to find that the minister, in some of the statements he issued at Washington when this matter was being discussed, indicated he did not believe this commodity clearing house could serve the purpose for which it was intended. On November 25, in the Globe and Mail, the following statement was reported to have been made by the Minister of Agriculture at that conference:

> We can see considerable merit, as a long-run development, in the proposal that stocks of food should be held against shortage situations which experience has shown will develop. As has been pointed out in other conferences, however, national governments can, and do, perform this function and we do not see that stocks held by an international agency will, in the short run, contribute to any improvement in the present situation.

The minister has stated here that he believes that is a government responsibility. I hope the government will accept that responsibility and not turn it back on the producer boards or on the province, when it comes to marketing these surplus products in international markets.

Mr. Gardiner: We carried 600 million bushels of wheat at one time.

Mr. Wright: That is quite right, and I hope the government will continue to support the producer boards or commodity boards that will be set up, with respect not only to wheat but the other agricultural products. I hope they will accept this responsibility for international marketing, which I believe is theirs, but the tendency now seems to be to shelve that responsibility or turn it back to the farmers themselves. I say that the government is quite right in adopting the attitude that the farmers must accept responsibility for setting up these commodity boards for marketing the products within this country. When it comes to the international marketing of agricultural products, however, I say that is the responsibility of this government, and the government should accept that responsibility and see that our markets are maintained.

Mr. Gardiner: If I am to be quoted, I do not want the hon. member to put words in my mouth. If my hon. friend says the government has said that, and I do not know that any other member of the government has said anything about it, may I say that the government has not said any such thing through me; it has not said that we were going to place responsibility for carrying products with the commodity boards in the provinces. We have not said that at all.

Mr. Wright: The action of the government at the present time in failing to make any long-term contracts, in failing to take up this international commodity clearing house proposition, and in every action they have taken to date in the last year, indicates that. All I am saying is that I think it is an indication of the true intention of the government.

Mr. Gardiner: The only surplus today is the surplus of cheese and we are carrying that right now.

Mr. Wright: For how long? Until the first of August next year. You have stated that at that time you are getting out of the market. That is the statement that has been made by this government. That is the position with respect to pork.

Mr. Gardiner: The hon. member is repeating statements his leader in the province of Saskatchewan has been making for the last three months; and none of them is correct.

Mr. Wright: I am repeating things that the minister himself has stated.

Mr. Gardiner: I have never stated that.

Mr. Wright: The minister stated that, as far as pork was concerned, on the first of August the government were out of the picture.

Mr. Gardiner: No, I have not.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. Wright: That their contract was ended with Great Britain.

Mr. Gardiner: The statement was read to you just a few minutes ago by the hon. member for Bellechasse and that is not what I said.

Mr. Wright: You said that the price was guaranteed to the first of August only.

Mr. MacInnis: Only one person may speak at one time.

Mr. Wright: If what I have said is not right, the minister will have a chance to deny it; and I hope he will deny it by action and not promises, as in the past, when it has been mostly a matter of words and not action. What the farmers of this country are looking for today is action, not a lot of glib promises.

Mr. A. A. Elderkin (Annapolis-Kings): If rumours from Nova Scotia are correct, Mr. Speaker, this may be the only opportunity I shall have to address the house before re-election. I therefore wish to place before the government and hon. members of the House of Commons what I understand to be the needs of my constituents in Annapolis-Kings. As one coming from that part of Canada known as the maritimes, of which the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Larson) says "It is practically a different world", I wish to pay my respects and to express my congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the motion.

I am afraid it is only too true that the maritimes are a forgotten, or at least a neglected part of Canada. As a child I was amused by the arguments of the so-called secessionists, or those who would have one believe that they would like to withdraw from confederation and join the United States. As I have become older, and particularly since I have come to Ottawa, I am no longer amused but can see that they were absolutely sincere and had at least some grounds for their complaints.

I do not propose, Mr. Speaker, to go into the matter of maritime rights nor, for that matter, the problems of Nova Scotia as a whole; I propose rather to confine myself as nearly as possible to the grand constituency of Annapolis-Kings which, at the moment, I still have the honour to represent. I think it is a fair statement to make that maritimers, as a whole, know more about Canada than the rest of Canada knows about the maritimes. This is not surprising, because in order for a maritimer to go anywhere he must leave his own section of Canada, and once started, he tends to keep on travelling; whereas the rest of Canada is so large that many residents of Canada outside the maritimes never reach the Atlantic seaboard. I have met many people in the west who have heard of Halifax and Saint John but who did not have the foggiest idea where Nova Scotia and New Brunswick were.

I have heard many hon. members tell of the richness and of the unlimited resources of their constituencies. I am afraid that I can make no such claims for Annapolis-Kings. As a matter of fact, as far as we know at present, we have no great mineral resources nor have we any great industrial areas. We are entirely a rural section. Even our soil is on the poor side, of a type called podzol, derived from a Russian word meaning ash and indicating a soil highly leached of nutrients and chemicals. Even the so-called fertile Annapolis valley is little more fertile than the rest of the land, except for the marshlands, which are rich alluvial deposits. In that connection I should like to express to the government and to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) our sincere appreciation of the work that has been and is being done under the Maritime Marshland Rehabilitation Act which will add materially to the welfare of our country for future generations. About half the total boundaries of my constituency is water, mainly the bay of Fundy and Minas basin. This is the land made famous by Longfellow's "Evangeline" and by many outstanding men. We are a people steeped in tradition, an old civilization as far as Canada is concerned. Port Royal now Annapolis Royal was settled by the French in 1603; and our whole central valley area was settled for long years before the expulsion of the Acaddians in 1755. Whatever prosperity we have in our part has been of slow growth and has been built up by generations of industrious, frugal and thrifty people. We have a feeling of permanency, a feeling of always having been there. It is not uncommon to find the fifth and sixth generation on the same farm and the third and fourth generation in the same house.

We in Nova Scotia are a long way from the markets of central and western Canada, and are traditionally a seafaring race—and especially was that so in the day of iron men and wooden ships—so that the natural market for our products is Great Britain, the New England states, Cuba and the British West Indies.

Before going more fully into this phase of our economy I should like to draw to the attention of the government and hon. members one or two matters of some importance to us. The proposal to extend the coverage of the Unemployment Insurance Act to employment in hospitals and charitable institutions has raised a storm of protest in our part of the country and all through the maritimes. As an example, I might cite the case of the Eastern Kings Memorial hospital in Wolfville, of which little hospital we are very proud. The only reason I choose the Wolfville hospital as an example rather than any of the four other excellent hospitals in Annapolis-Kings is that, as a member of the board of trustees for a number of years, I am very familiar with conditions there. It is a hospital of only thirty-bed capacity, but for a good many years it has been approved by the American College of Surgeons. In this hospital we have an efficient staff of nurses and doctors. Contrary to the experiences of many of the larger hospitals, we have little difficulty in keeping a fine group of nurses. This is largely on account of the "happy family" attitude which prevails among the doctors, nurses and others of the staff. In spite of this harmonious and efficient operation, we had a small deficit in 1948 but in 1949, even after an increase in rates, our deficit was nearly $7,000. I should like to urge the government to consider the matter carefully before they do anything which would increase costs to our hospitals already staggering under a heavy load.

In Kings county we have had for many years at Aldershot a military camp which has been used very little for training purposes since the end of world war II. I should like respectfully to suggest to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) that Aldershot camp be used as much as possible as a peacetime training camp.

Lest I might be considered unduly critical I should like to commend the Minister of National Defence and the government for reopening H.M.C.S. Cornwallis and the R.C.A.F. station at Greenwood. Much as we deplore the necessity of spending so much on defence, I believe all hon. members on both sides of the house agree that these expenditures cannot be avoided.

We have in Annapolis-Kings a good many fishermen who have their special problems of production, processing and marketing. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to explain some of the peculiarities of the fishing grounds from which our fishermen try to wrest a living. Almost the whole coast of my constituency is rugged and rocky, with these rocky shores washed by the tides and storms of the bay of Fundy and Minas basin.

The bay of Fundy, as some hon. members may know, is noted for its extremely high tides—a rise and fall occurs daily from 20 feet to an extreme high of 60 feet or more. For anyone who has no experience with these high tides and consequently with the tremendous currents of this region, it is almost impossible to realize conditions as they are. Even a moderate wind will kick up a very high sea, if tide and wind are opposed. Off Blomidon the rush and roar of the waters at certain times of the tide are almost unbelievable, and although not so spectacular as Niagara, the water that flows over Niagara would be a mere trickle compared with what flows by cape Split four times each twenty-four hours. With these strong currents our fishermen have at all times to contend and they must adapt themselves to the tides and in fact use them to their own advantage.

On this particular coast we have no low-water harbours and boats must enter and leave at half-tide and in many cases at three-quarter tide. This often means that in times of sudden storm they may not be able to run for shelter but have to ride it out until such time as the tide is right. In the case of a bad nor'easter they may not be able to make harbour at all; consequently during the stormy seasons our fishermen are very careful about going out to the fishing grounds for fear that they cannot get in and may be storm-stayed out in the dangerous bay of Fundy.

This makes their fishing season shorter than it might be if there were deep-water harbours. Therefore, anything that may reduce their catch at any time seriously affects their livelihood, and hence their objection to draggers, which they claim not only deplete the supply of haddock and cod but also disturb the feeding grounds so that it is almost hopeless to catch the fish remaining after the draggers are through.

To explain this a little, the fishing grounds of the bay of Fundy are not made up of a continuous shelf or bank. The floor of the bay of Fundy is much like the shore line with hills and hollows, ups and downs, with the feeding grounds generally on the peaks or higher ridges.

When the draggers get through with these ridges the tides take over and move the disturbed feed. It has not yet been determined whether these feeding grounds are merely moved or if they are temporarily destroyed, but it has been definitely determined that some time elapses before feed is again available there.

The fishing section of my constituency extends from Victoria Beach on the extreme west and Delaps Cove in the northwest to Scotts Bay at the easterly end, a distance of roughly 130 miles. The westerly half of this shore line is along that part of the bay of Fundy which could most rightly be called a part of the Atlantic ocean, but the farther east we go the narrower the bay of Fundy becomes, and as the bay becomes narrower, so the objections to the activities of the draggers become greater, as it is here they interfere most with the "inshore" fishermen.

Our Canadian draggers are supposed to keep outside the 12-mile limit but the American draggers may legally come to the 3-mile limit. I do not know that any American draggers have been in this area to which I have reference, but Canadian draggers certainly have been and are quite careless about distance, especially after dark.

Besides the conventional draggers we now have smaller vessels 40 feet long, or shorter, and these smaller ships do not comply with any 12-mile limit nor with the 3-mile limit but may, and often do, come close inshore, dragging lobster traps, herring nets, weirs and trawls.

I should like to urge the government through the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) thoroughly to investigate the fisheries and fishing conditions of the bay of Fundy area in an endeavour to discover the best solution of their problems so that the fishermen of my section may take their proper place in the economy of our great nation.

I should like to go on record as being in favour of a complete and independent survey of the Chignecto canal.

It is thought by many people, even in Nova Scotia, that we in Annapolis-Kings produce apples and little else. This is far from true, for Kings county alone even before world war II produced agricultural products, other than apples, to a value greater than any other county in Nova Scotia.

We had at one time a very lucrative trade with Cuba and the British West Indies, mostly in potatoes and fish. These have now been almost entirely lost with the exception of the sale of certified seed potatoes. Various nefarious jugglings were responsible for the loss of these markets. Perhaps the one most responsible for this loss was "Sugar Daddy" Rhodes, who, while minister of finance under a Conservative regime, put increased duties on sugar. I would ask hon. members opposite if it is any wonder Annapolis-Kings goes Liberal most of the time. After the loss of these markets for fish and potatoes our fishermen became poverty stricken, and our potato growers either quit growing potatoes or went bankrupt.

Shut out by tariff walls from the markets to which we had cheap and ready access by water freight, we became more dependent upon our sales of apples to Britain, which country, up to the outbreak of war in 1939, was a free open market in which we found ready sale for nearly all we could produce.

During the war we were, generally speaking, able to find a ready market for any farm product we produced with the exception of apples, which was a war casualty, and about which I propose to speak later.

I should like here to quote a few figures to show the increase in production of some of our agricultural products during the past few years. Poultry increased in numbers from 300,000 in 1941 to 800,000 in June, 1949; hogs from 13,000 in 1941 to 19,000 last year. Dairy production increased 10 per cent in the last five years. Potato acreage increased 20 per cent since 1941. Pears increased from 300 acres in 1939 to 700 acres in 1949. Plums have increased about 18 per cent in the past 10 years, while small fruits and vegetables have increased 50 per cent.

You can see from this brief summary, Mr. Speaker, that we have been trying to diversify our farm economy. For the first few years after the war we were able to sell our increased production at reasonable prices, but now we find ourselves in about the same position in regard to markets as we were before the war, although local purchasing power is much better than in 1939, and we also have a somewhat increased consumer population.

We farmers have been told and are being told that we should not put all our eggs in one basket but should diversify. This we are quite willing to do and capable of doing if we only have a market for our products.

As I said before, Mr. Speaker, even before the war the rail-haul to the markets of central Canada was too expensive for most of our products; but now, with our freight rates increased from 30 per cent to 50 per cent over former rates, central Canada is just that much farther away.

We are also handicapped in my part of the country by the fact that our season for strawberries, plums, cherries, and all early vegetables is somewhat later than in central Canada, so that at the time our early tomatoes and other early vegetables and fruits are ready for market we find carloads of Ontario produce being dumped in Nova Scotia. It takes only a few carloads of Ontario fruits or vegetables to glut our home market. By the time we are at peak production our market is saturated with supplies from outside Nova Scotia.

Then let us take a look at a product like carrots, which we can grow readily and economically in many parts of my constituency, but for part of which we must find a market outside Nova Scotia. According to government statistics, on February 1 of this year there were in the whole of Canada 8,196 tons of carrots in storage. Of this amount 1,787 tons were in Nova Scotia. With the price in Montreal being only about 2 cents a pound for domestic grown carrots, owing to the new crop coming in from the United States, what chance have we of clearing up the balance of last year's crop, or what incentive is there to plant a new crop?

Another crop which is normally salable in Canada with little difficulty is cranberries. It costs anywhere from $1,000 to $2,500 per acre to put a cranberry bog in proper condition to produce berries. The sprinkler system alone costs $1,500 per acre. Cranberries take several years before they come into production, but with proper care and frost protection will give satisfactory yields of good quality berries for many years.

Normally Canada does not raise sufficient cranberries for her own use and until fairly recent years the volume and quality was so uncertain that a proper demand could not be built up; but now with improved methods and more knowledge both the quality and supply are reasonably adequate.

Cranberries, like many other products, come under the Geneva and Annecy agreements and consequently there does not appear to be any way to impose quotas or restrictions on Cape Cod berries coming into Canada until tariffs come up for revision this year.

In 1948, owing to the imposition of exchange regulations, no cranberries came from Cape Cod into Canada, and as the Canadian supply was limited the prices went very high, the wholesale price in Montreal in November of that year being $9.90 for a 25-pound box, and in December it rose to $11.13 per box.

With the lifting of exchange restrictions in 1949 Cape Cod berries came in a regular flood, a total of 3,725,000 pounds entering Canada last year. Of course, prices dropped until in November, 1949, the wholesale price in Montreal of Canadian-grown cranberries was $2.62 per box; in December the price rose to $2.99. What hopes for cranberries?

If our products are shipped C.P.R. to Montreal they must be handled and rehandled because of the lack of a car ferry between Saint John and Digby. If these products are shipped D.A.R. and C.N.R. to Montreal, they not only have an extra long haul but travel over two rail systems.

As we are all aware, it is impossible to build up and hold a market for perishable farm products without cheap and adequate transportation; as transportation improves so does the prosperity of the country.

In this connection I should like with your permission to quote in part from an announce ment made in this house on December 7, 1949, with regard to steamship service by the Minister of Transport, as reported on page 2829 of Hansard. He said:

> At the present time the S.S. Yarmouth operates between Yarmouth and Boston during the summer months, making three trips per week.

And again:

> It is felt that if this vessel is going to discontinue the service, some method should be found to increase the number of tourist cars which may be carried to Nova Scotia during the summer season. Both governments likewise feel that the situation cannot be left in a state of uncertainty, and that the tourist traffic into Nova Scotia should not only be maintained but increased.
> I am therefore pleased to announce that it has been decided to build a vessel which will not only be adequate to carry the present traffic but which will serve to increase the tourist trade between Nova Scotia and the United States. The proposed vessel will be a fast modern car ferry with a capacity of about 200 cars and about 1,000 passengers. The service will be based on Yarmouth, and will operate between that port and a port in the eastern United States. Being a modern vessel it will offer facilities considerably better than those now available, at a much cheaper cost to tourists and more in line with present and anticipated needs.

With this I am quite in accord but I would suggest that this announcement does not go far enough. We in Annapolis-Kings will welcome any increase in tourists resulting from this move, for we like their money and with possible exceptions we like them for themselves. Moreover, we like people to enjoy the beauty of our very beautiful country.

I would respectfully say to the government that I do not believe our tourist business in itself will go very far in solving the economic problems of our section of Nova Scotia, and I would further suggest that in the planning of the ship, serious consideration should be given to its adaptability for fast, efficient and economical freight. If we had efficient, economical and dependable freight service from Yarmouth to a port in the eastern states near a good market with the ship arriving at the United States port at the proper time of day, the economic problems of western Nova Scotia would be half solved. If, in addition to this efficient water service, we had a reduction in the tariff on our primary products entering the United States, I believe we could solve our own problems as far as small fruits and vegetables are concerned.

If something of this kind could be worked out it would be only a few years until we would be producing large quantities of small fruits and vegetables, strawberries, blueberries, both wild and cultivated, raspberries, plums, and believe it or not, cherries. The lower part of Annapolis county is a natural for the production of cherries. Besides these products we would have an extended market for poultry and poultry products, choice beef, veal and dairy products.

Our fishermen would benefit also from this outlet and could land fresh and frozen fish, lobsters and scallops in the Boston market. Give us a fast, efficient, economical water freight service, with reduced tariffs, and we will do the rest. I do not think that this is too much for us, from that place which is "practically a different world", to ask of a Liberal government, which does not need the name "progressive" tacked onto it to be really progressive.

I should like to speak for a few minutes about our apple problem. I should say at the outset that I know the problem but that I have no ready solution unless we can within a few years regain at least a part of our old market in Britain. I should like, if I have time, to briefly sketch the growth of the Nova Scotia apple industry up to 1939, present the problem as it then appeared, tell what we as growers have tried to do to remedy the situation, what assistance we have had from the Canadian government and what we should like the government to do for us now.

The first recorded plantings of apples in the Annapolis valley was in the early seventeenth century at Port Royal. Apples did not take on any great commercial significance until after 1850, when occasional shipments were made to England in small sailing vessels. But as transportation facilities became better our plantings of apple trees became greater. These plantings were largely of varieties which at that time were acceptable to the British consumers and consisted largely of culinary or cooking varieties to which our soil and climate seemed particularly well adapted. Our production continued to increase with the emphasis in a large degree on volume and economy of production as the consumers of our fruit were mostly people of very moderate or low income.

We always had insect pests in our Nova Scotia orchards but until after 1900 they were of major importance only at periodic intervals. In addition to insect pests we have always had apple scab, or black spot, as it is often called. This scab is a cool-weather fungus and appears to grow best in cool wet weather, of which we have a great deal in Nova Scotia.

It was not until after the first world war that we began to spray in earnest and it took some years for us to find that we could grow varieties like McIntosh which are very susceptible to scab. In fact, as late as 1924 the experimental station at Kentville advised against the planting of McIntosh and similar varieties as they were not deemed suitable for our climate. Moreover, we were catering almost entirely to the British market where even for dessert purposes the taste appears to be different from that on this side of the Atlantic. In Canada the demand was largely for large red apples of somewhat softer texture and by and large sub-acid. In Britain, however, they wanted a crisper, chewier, more acid apple or as they often said, "apples with character". The three most popular dessert varieties which we grew for the British trade were Cox Orange, Golden Russet and Ribston Pippin, none of which can we sell in volume in Canada at anywhere near production costs. It is true that there was a place for large red apples on the English market but they were largely like the King, a dual purpose apple, an excellent cooker but also of good eating quality. Most of our export varieties were of green, yellow or a russet colour.

This was partly because the English growers grew these kinds and the public was accustomed to them and also partly because our climate is such in most years that we can grow that type more economically than the red varieties which require more sunshine and care. During the 1920's we had almost continuous bad growing years. The 1930's were generally speaking good apples years in spite of bad winter injury in 1933-34, of severe frosts in 1936 and two disastrous gales, each from different directions, in 1937. In spite of these handicaps we produced an average yearly crop of almost six million bushels for the years 1936-38. In 1939 we had a crop of slightly over six million bushels.

It was apparent even during the thirties that we must not rely too heavily on the British market as their production was increasing so that in years when they had big crops most of our apples were not wanted and sold for low prices.

Up to 1912, when the United Fruit Company of Nova Scotia was formed, most growers packed and shipped their own fruit or sold to dealers, first largely tree run but later mostly on a packed-out basis. With the advent of co-operative companies there was a decline in grower packing and also in selling to apple dealers. In Nova Scotia a grower had four choices: he could sell on the local market, could himself ship to England, sell to dealers, or market co-operatively. Let us again note that the emphasis was on quantity not quality, economy not excellence. During the years the Nova Scotia fruit growers were constantly striving to get varieties which were more productive and more profitable, but a great many were of little or no value and were only removed by death or grafting. Others like McIntosh, Cortland and Delicious were valuable but they all added to the numbers so that in 1939 we had nearly 200 different varieties.

We packed almost entirely in barrels, which was a strong, cheap package capable of easy and rapid handling. Some boxes were packed as early as 1910 and some progressive growers were forever trying different types of package. In nearly all cases the grower returned to barrels as netting him the most profit. I have seen in the past few years so-called new packages which were almost identical with those we had tried and found unprofitable.

Thus when war broke out in 1939 we found ourselves with a crop of over two million barrels composed mostly of varieties not readily salable in Canada under any condition and owing to the war our overseas market was almost entirely lost. If we had attempted to market this crop in Canada it would have been ruinous not only to us but also to the other apple-producing areas in Canada. After discussions with the federal government it was decided that something should be done. As a result of this the Nova Scotia apple marketing board was set up through which all Nova Scotia apples produced in the commercial apple areas of Nova Scotia must be marketed. In fact, what the government did was to buy up all the Nova Scotia apples which could not be sold on the fresh fruit markets and process them. Of the 1939 crop half a million barrels were sold as fresh fruit overseas and on the domestic market, and over one and a half million barrels were processed. In that way the Canadian market was largely left for Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia. This type of assistance has been rendered to the Nova Scotia apple industry every year up to 1949, except that the form of assistance varied somewhat from year to year. The endeavour was to process enough Nova Scotia apples so that our fruit would not interfere too much with that grown in the rest of Canada.

This scheme really was remarkably successful, as anyone familiar with the apple picture in Canada knows. The last six or seven years have been the most prosperous for the apple growers of Canada of any similar period, with the exception of Nova Scotia growers. Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia growers have never known such prosperity.

What then of Nova Scotia with all the millions of taxpayers' money that was poured into our industry? It is quite true that 1946 was a banner year with over two million barrels of good apples. There was a large sale to Britain at excellent prices and our growers did make a profit. But for all the other years from 1939 to 1949 most growers lost money on their apples. If you accept that statement I must answer two or three questions. First, where did the money go? It went partly to the growers for production costs but largely to pay for processing that portion of the crop that was taken off the fresh fruit market. Perhaps you will say too much went in profit on fertilizers and spray materials. As to that, the margin of profit was fixed by the wartime prices and trade board, and for the past five or six years most of these supplies were furnished by co-operative fruit companies so that whatever profit was left went back to the growers in any event.

How then did they live and thrive if they lost money on their apples? That is the easiest question of all to answer. Up to 1949, and even for part of that year, we could sell at a profit, apart from some exceptions which always occur with farm products, practically everything we produced, beef, hogs, eggs, poultry, milk, plums, pears, potatoes, small fruits and vegetables. Why then were Nova Scotia orchardists so unwise as to continue producing at a loss? Nothing but blind faith in Britain, that she would soon be able to buy our apples again, and the knowledge that we could produce at least as cheaply as any other section. What have we been doing for ourselves? First we have made a concentrated effort to convert our orchards to highly coloured dessert varieties more readily salable in Canada. This has been done largely by new plantings and by grafting. In 1948 alone over 40,000 trees were grafted.

We have removed over 700,000 trees that were either old or of undesirable varieties. We have erected four large modern cold storage plants where boxes and other small packages are stored, packaged and shipped, and all other warehouses are now equipped to pack in packages smaller than barrels. We have had one desk selling for the past eleven years.

The fact remains that there are more apples produced in Canada than can be sold here, and in the meantime we in Nova Scotia are still producing too many varieties which have little sales appeal on local markets and not yet enough of the desirable varieties, for it takes years to change over apple orchards. It cannot be done in two or three years. Even though we have already destroyed over 700,000 trees, I believe we should remove at least an additional 300,000 this year.

I should like to trace briefly tree removal in Nova Scotia from 1939 to date. In 1939 some of us rented heavy tractors from the provincial government and removed old and/or undesirable varieties. No record was kept of the numbers removed that year. In 1940 and 1941 the Nova Scotia government provided tractors free for tree removal. About 100,000 trees were removed in these years. As it is quite expensive to remove tree debris and rehabilitate the land, and as farmers were hard up, the federal government was asked for assistance. From 1943 to 1946, 231,477 trees were destroyed under a bonus of $2 per tree. Trees destroyed had to be from commercial orchards and able to meet requirements as to size and bearing capacity. The Nova Scotia government supplied free tractors for this work.

There was no tree removal policy in 1947. But when it was realized that we would not likely have an open market in Great Britain for some years, an arrangement was entered into with the federal government in 1948 for assistance in the removal of an additional 300,000 trees. We were in this case attempting with government assistance to eliminate good commercial trees of varieties formerly acceptable in Great Britain.

I wish to take this opportunity of expressing the sincere thanks of our growers for all that the government of Canada has done through the years to save this valuable industry. I realize that our growers would also wish me to express thanks for the assistance and co-operation rendered by the government of my province. In conclusion, I would not be doing my duty if I did not impress on the government and hon. members of the house the necessity of making good the loss suffered in the marketing of last year's crop. Until the rehabilitation of our fruit growers is completed, it would seem that the apple growers of Nova Scotia require a government assistance program for that portion of our crop which cannot be sold on the fresh fruit market. In addition to the 700,000 trees that have already been destroyed, it is absolutely necessary to have public assistance that will ensure the removal of another 300,000 trees this year.

Mr. A. E. Dewar (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker and hon. gentlemen—

Mr. Knowles: It is out of order but we like it.

Mr. Dewar: I heard somebody remark that it is out of order to say "hon. gentlemen", and if so I am sorry. I believe it is customary to compliment the mover (Mr. Larson) and the seconder (Mr. Dumas) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. In this particular instance I am more than pleased inasmuch as the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Larson) is a fellow colleague from the province of Saskatchewan. He discharged his duty in a most creditable manner. I am sure all hon. members of the house will join with me in extending to him the highest compliments. The same remarks apply to the seconder.

The qualifications I have as the member for the constituency of Qu'Appelle are those of a woman beater. I do not want that remark to be construed in such a way that the female sex will be prejudiced against me. Frankly, I have a great deal of respect and regard for them, but nevertheless I am here as a woman beater. Turning now to the constituency of Qu'Appelle, at this time I should like to mention a former member, the late Ernest Perley who, while of a different party, was a personal friend of mine. Politically we were opposed, but as personal friends we were very close. Then of course there is the very good lady whom it was my pleasure to defeat in the last election.

The riding of Qu'Appelle is essentially a rural one. It is one of the wealthiest and one of the best ridings in the Dominion of Canada, if not the best. The wealth of the Qu'Appelle riding stems from agricultural products, and by virtue of that quite naturally I am interested in seeing that their agricultural products will be sold at prices which will permit the people whom I represent to carry on their farming operations on a basis that will provide them with a good income and a good standard of living. I stand for the retention of the Crowsnest pass freight rates, as I think every hon. member from western Canada should; and I hope no one anywhere in Canada will ever undertake to alter those rates.

Then we have the wheat board. For the major portion of my business life I was in the grain trade, and during that period I was opposed to compulsory marketing and such things as the wheat board and the wheat pools. However, in later years I had the opportunity of studying some of the hardships which were caused by the rise and fall of wheat prices, and as a result I have come to firmly believe in the principle of wheat board marketing. I stand for that and will fight for it; and I know those whom I represent in the riding of Qu'Appelle will want me to make this statement.

I believe the marketing of coarse grains is being handled in the only sensible way. That is a commodity which for the most part is consumed within our own boundaries. When it is remembered that approximately eighty per cent of our coarse grains are marketed within Canada it will be seen that the board is placed in a rather difficult position when it is expected to be both buyer and seller. Naturally we in the west are on the tail of the wheat board to get the price up; naturally those in the east and in the feeder markets are on the tail of the board to keep prices down.

We have the P. F. A. A., which in my opinion is one of the finest acts ever passed by the House of Commons. The principle is good, and as far as I can see the method is the best that has been devised to date. I do not say something better may not be discovered, but it is the best we have found so far. The only suggestion I would make in passing is that I believe the time is long past when the governments of Saskatchewan and Alberta should also recognize their responsibilities. Unfortunately there is altogether too much of this wanting provincial autonomy and then, when it is offered, saying, "No, it is a federal responsibility". So I suggest that in the borderline or isolated cases the provincial governments should begin to assume some of the responsibility that is rightfully theirs.

I have a note here under the heading "water", and you will notice that I just had a drink. It is a very important commodity. We have the P. F. R. A., which deals with water conservation and the construction of small dugouts for farmers. Those who have not had the privilege, which I have had, of seeing what these have meant to the farmers in western Canada cannot fully appreciate the importance of these projects. The work has been well done; the money devoted to the development of these small dugouts on the farms has been wisely spent. When you see the little orchards, the little groves of trees, the water systems on the farms, the pressure systems in the houses, you realize that this is a wonderful thing.

Then in Alberta we have the irrigation projects. Those hon. members coming from that province who have seen irrigation systems in action and have seen their advantages will appreciate the value of those great works. In the Fraser valley we have the diking—

An hon. Member: Snow banks.

Mr. Dewar: Yes, snow banks. They mean water, and water often means trouble. They have had a lot of trouble in the Fraser valley, and I am afraid they are going to have a lot more. The diking program which has been embarked upon by this government is going to mean a great deal to the people of the Fraser valley. In the eastern part of our country we have the marshland reclamation project. That is also a wonderful thing.

All these matters deal with water. In our own province we have the South Saskatchewan river project. I think I should note in passing that of all hon. members of this house I am the only one who has lived within a short distance of the proposed site of the South Saskatchewan river development dam. I lived there for a number of years, so I think I can speak authoritatively as to the problem, as to the need and as to the urgency of developing this project. The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) has suggested both last session and this session that the minister representing Saskatchewan and the government of that province should hang their heads in shame, but I say that is not so. You just do not embark upon a scheme involving the expenditure of fifty, a hundred or a hundred and fifty million dollars without investigating the potentialities. After all is said and done Canada is a nation; it is not just a matter of one isolated spot. Therefore when I say this is a proper expenditure to be made, I have in mind the need for the project and the urgency in relation to it. Some time ago in the Regina Leader-Post there appeared an article headed "River betrayal plan" by the attorney general of that province, a chap by the name of Corman. He says we have betrayed the people, and that we are going to compel the Saskatchewan government to pay half the cost of approximately $100 million or the dam will not be proceeded with. That statement is absolutely wrong; that was never said. We want to make sure that the provinces where we are spending money on water conservation make use of that water. There is no point in building a dam on the South Saskatchewan if the water is just going to lie there for a few fish to swim in or for someone to take a bath now and again. That water must be utilized.

Then on this continent we have the St. Lawrence waterway development scheme, which has been under discussion for a good many years. If people will just stop and look at the geographical set-up of this country they will see that we have the greatest inland water system of any nation in the world, and it is at our very doorstep. Let us not lose sight of that fact. Everything we have has to do with water. I hear an hon. member say I am full of water. Well, I would hate to say what he is full of. Today we are living in the greatest paradox imaginable in connection with this commodity called water. In Ottawa we are at the junction of two rivers, but we find that in the summertime there is not enough water available to permit people to water their lawns. If you go to Montreal you find the same situation. They have the same problem in Vancouver; yet they are living adjacent to water everywhere. If eight weeks ago I had made the statement that water was one of the most essential and most critical things we have in Canada I might have been laughed at, and possibly I will be laughed at now. Had I forecast eight or ten weeks ago that a city the size of New York would be brought to its knees due to a shortage of water somebody might have said, "Oh, bosh; he doesn't know what he is talking about." Today, New York cannot expand. It is all right for you to laugh, my friend, if you wish, but water is one of the most important commodities we have in Canada. If you have not got water, if it is not conserved and properly utilized, continued existence is not possible.

The point I am trying to make, Mr. Speaker, is this. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is the one man in Canada who has taken a concrete, forward step with regard to this matter. He has fought inch by inch for these water developments. He has had the foresight to do so. I am wondering whether we in this parliament today, whether we of this generation in the Dominion of Canada, are going to have the foresight necessary to make provisions for the development of the water resources of this country. We talk about the Hudson Bay railway, and I am in favour of it. I am in favour of utilizing every facility we have in the Dominion of Canada. We think this railway is a great thing, but it is only a bagatelle in comparison with the development of the St. Lawrence. At least 4 cents per bushel will accrue to the western farmer on every bushel of wheat that is sold, to say nothing of the inland development which will take place.

Today there was an announcement with respect to power. There is a great paradox again, power. We have gone to bed on it, but not the dominion government. Consider the potential power in the St. Lawrence, 2,200,000 horsepower. It is sitting there at our back door. I have been in Ottawa for six or eight months, and about a month ago was about the first time I ever saw all the lights turned on. I tell you it is time we got down to a bit of realistic thinking. Some people say it is the fault of the federal government, but it is not. If one looks at all the documents and follows the correspondence through, examines the research that has been done since the plan originated back in 1938, one finds that the blame can be put on the congress of the United States. Probably I should not say that, but it is not a government statement, it is my statement. For the purpose of keeping the New York state vote, congress has not touched the St. Lawrence development. In the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and the adjacent states in the United States, we have everything at our doorstep short of power. It is for that reason I suggest that the time is long past when we in the Dominion of Canada should recognize our responsibilities, and not be concerned with today or tomorrow, but think in terms of ten years from now. We should develop our water resources.

I am going to turn to the question of trade now, and more specifically to the question of trade with Great Britain. We have heard many references to British trade today. At this time I should like to say that I agree with the remarks the Minister of Agriculture made in this house last fall. I believe he has repeated this statement since then, but he suggested there seemed to be an organized attempt on the part of British officials to do away with trade agreements. Having said that, I expect some comments will be made upon it. I am not saying that the British people do not want to trade with us. They not only want to trade with us, but they want and need our products. During our peak period of trade in agricultural products in 1946 or 1947, it amounted to approximately $450 million. Today, hon. members have said our trade has fallen apart. If they will check the figures, I believe they will find that last year we did approximately $400 million worth of business with the United Kingdom, which is only approximately $50 million less than the all-time high. I do not think this government should hang its head in shame over a record like that.

Further than that if our position today is reviewed, I fully believe the contracts we now have, and the business that will be done with the United Kingdom in the ensuing year, will come close to that figure. I believe all of us in this house appreciate, not necessarily fully understand, some of the suffering and hardship through which the people of Great Britain have passed during those trying years of war and since that time. Great Britain has had a lot of help from Canada. Possibly the trade agreements that were made were made with the understanding that after the war Canada would get a better deal. Apparently, that is not so. I should like to say now that I am rather surprised that the minister in charge of these contracts in Great Britain, or in charge of the purse strings, would do what he did when it came to a matter of making the odd contract for our eggs, cheese and a few such small items. For the sum of approximately $30 million, the British government has engendered the ill will of the producers of eggs, milk and cheese in Canada.

I believe the responsibility for this lies at the door of the ministry in Great Britain. It is my understanding that Great Britain has undertaken to have on hand when Marshall plan aid ends in 1952 the sum of $2 billion in dollar reserves. A few years ago Great Britain started to accumulate this sum. Today she has approximately $1,860 million of that reserve, and there is still about two years to run. If anyone in this house can tell me where the common sense lies in engendering the ill will of the producers of this country for the sake of $30 million, as against $2 billion, when she already has $1,860 million, I should like to be shown. I cannot reconcile it, myself. If that is the type of government Great Britain has, I fear for the future of Great Britain.

I note that in a speech that was delivered by the member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), a part of which appears at page 140 of Hansard, he said:

> Figures from the dominion bureau of statistics show that the value of our field crops alone in Canada in 1949 fell by 16 per cent as compared with 1948, from a total of $1,696 million in 1948 to $1,427 in 1949.

Why did the hon. member not tell the rest of the story? It reminds me of the great Disraeli; you all know Disraeli. During the course of a debate in the House of Commons he is said to have remarked that there are lies, damned lies and statistics. These happen to be statistics which the hon. member is using, but he is using them to misrepresent the facts. The hon. member will point a finger over here and say that we have done this, but you have done that. But it is all right if he gets up and misinterprets. Did he tell you the rest of the story? He mentioned 16 per cent. Did he tell you that practically half of the province of Saskatchewan, the biggest agricultural value-producing area in the Dominion of Canada had no crop and had nothing this year? Does that not more than account for the 16 per cent? He did not tell you that, did he? I am telling you. I want to correct that impression. Then he goes on a little further on and says:

> Under the control system they sacrificed more than $500 million as a result of the government's wheat policy alone. Our farmers were not permitted to sell their wheat on the free markets of the world. Today those same farmers are being deprived of the promised fruits of that policy.

The first comment I am going to make is this. This afternoon the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) stated that the farmers had lost one billion dollars. About a week ago the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) said that they had lost a half a billion dollars. Just about ten days ago or less the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) stated that the loss had been two billion dollars. If they are going to state that the farmers have lost something, I wish to heaven they would get together on the amount; then, having got together on the amount which the farmers lost, they might submit some proposal to the government and the government might act on it. But I suggest that no loss was incurred, and I want to tell you the story.

I do not know whether I am going to have the time in which to do it tonight; if not, we shall have to adjourn the debate and go on at the next sitting.

At the time the war started, I was in the grain business, on the line. Under the Canada Grain Act, the grain companies must buy all the grain that is offered. But the war came. There was no chance for these dealers or grain companies to sell their grain. So what did they do? They came pit pat, pit pat to the Canadian government and said, "Will you help us out?" If the grain exchange had stayed open, the farmer would not have obtained anything for his grain, because they could not sell it. That is the first thing.

Mr. Hodgson: They sold for $1.25 less than the world price.

Mr. Dewar: Did they? Wait a minute and I will come to that. I will tell you something about that. That is all right. We were fighting a war. Don't forget that. The money that was being used to buy that wheat from the western farmers was coming from where?

Mr. Hodgson: Were we fighting a war for the last five years?

Mr. Dewar: You just keep quiet until I get to the point. I will come to it. Just rest there for a minute.

Mr. Whitman: Don't be so impatient.

Mr. Dewar: We were fighting a war and the money that was going towards the buying of that wheat came from where? It came out of the credits that this government established in this country on a lend-lease basis for Great Britain; in other words, it came out of the pockets of the taxpayers. So we could have put the price up to $2 a bushel, but it would not have meant anything. But we said, "No; we are going to hold the line", and we did it most successfully. If the government did nothing else during the war years, it held down inflation; and I am proud to be associated with men who had the foresight to do that. Having said that, I will proceed.

The grain exchange were quite happy to take their profits on storage. They had no chance of losing any money. They took their storage charges. They were able to write off those balloon-type bins they built and charge it up against profits. But as soon as the war ended, when even a Chinaman could have sold wheat to anybody, what did they do? They came to the government and said, "Give us back the wheat. We want to sell it". Do you suppose for one minute that the producer would have shared in those profits?

Mr. Sinnott: He would not.

Mr. Dewar: He certainly would not have; definitely not. So my hon. friend and some of his colleagues have the temerity to rise in their places and suggest that the farmers of this country lost half a billion dollars. One of them says half a billion, another says a billion and another says two billions; I am wondering if it will get up to three billions.

Mr Hodgson: The Minister of Agriculture agreed with the half billion figure. He said so this afternoon.

Mr. Dewar: If I remember correctly the Minister of Agriculture has never stated that, and you will never get him to state it.

Mr. Hodgson: He did this afternoon. Read Hansard tomorrow.

Mr. Dewar: I think probably the hon. member had better read Hansard, and it will put him straight.

Then we come along to the post-war years. Those on the other side of the house are always talking about the great big harvests and the great feeling we as a member of the commonwealth should have for Great Britain; but by the lord Harry, they never miss an opportunity to suggest that we should shove prices up to them and make them pay through the nose. In other words, their charity goes just to the extent that happens to serve their ends. Then another little thing—

Mr. Hodgson: Where are the long-term contracts now?

Mr. Dewar: Just relax for a minute and I will come to that. As a matter of fact, it being eleven o'clock, Mr. Speaker, may I move the adjournment of the debate?

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow as the first item we shall move to go into supply. When the motion is passed we shall call three departments, namely, external affairs, national defence and agriculture. Then we shall resume the debate on the address. But from eight o'clock until nine there will be an hour for private and public bills.

Mr. Drew: I think there should be some explanation as to why it is felt that it is necessary to call three departments at this time. Why is it necessary to call more than one or at the most two at this time?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): At the beginning of any session since I have been in the house we never started off with one department; it was always with two or three. In this instance we are trying to meet the wishes of the opposition who would like to have a day on some department. If I did not have three departments at my disposal, I would not undertake to get the ministers here at a time which would suit the opposition. I think this is a reasonable request to make for the start. As to next week, I shall have further discussions with the members of the opposition. I repeat that I want to co-operate. But on the other hand, there must be co-operation from both sides of the house. I really think that this request is reasonable.

Mr. Coldwell: I should think that two departments would be reasonable, because if one minister were away the other could bring forward his estimates.

Mr. Weir: He might be sick.

Mr. Coldwell: In any event, I would remind the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) suggested that one department a week might be called. If three go through tonight, this must not be taken as a precedent that three or two should be called in subsequent weeks. This may be a comparatively long session; and as we know, when the departments are all in hon. members' opportunities for raising grievances in the house—the age-old custom —are limited. After what the Prime Minister said the other evening, I think we in the opposition must be careful that we do not allow too many departments to go in at this time lest we find ourselves in the position, a little later on, of not being able to raise grievances on going into supply, if we wish to do so, week by week, throughout the session, which may be a longer one than many of us anticipated when we came here.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): A long session, in my experience, is approximately twenty weeks. There are twenty or twenty-one departments that have to be brought in. Even if we bring in three departments today, and bring it up to about five, to give me a little leeway in the calling of departments, there will still be another fifteen or sixteen departments to be called. We could not go into supply on the first three days of the week without putting a formal motion. We have to have a formal motion even if we did not have any new departments to bring in. We could not study the estimates on a Monday, Tuesday or Wednesday without putting a formal motion. Then hon. members can air their grievances.

Well, if I have not a certain number of departments, the order paper having very few bills, I would not like to take a chance of seeing the house without work in advance. The more that is considered the more it will be seen that I am quite reasonable.

Mr. Coldwell: All I am trying to do is to point out that it should not be regarded as a precedent for another week, or for subsequent weeks.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We would not consider it in that way.

Mr. Coldwell: Because, after all, the house has set aside rules pretty thoroughly just lately. The very fact we are going into supply is against all parliamentary procedure until the house has voted confidence in the government. There is no question the house will vote that confidence; but custom is that this shall not be done until after the address has been approved, and, though the debate may be long or short, that is the procedure which the house should follow.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It will not be considered as a precedent. But I believe the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) would agree that, while government business is generally decided by the government, we never follow the rules strictly. Generally we consult with opposition leaders as to what would be the best procedure to follow. That is what we intend to do this year—not to keep to that strict rule whereby the government would just come in and announce its business and proceed in that way. I do not think that would go toward making progress.

Mr. Knowles: Perhaps it was because the minister was interrupted, but I do not think he indicated what the business would be when and if we finish the matter of getting into supply.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I announced we would resume the debate on the address, with the exception of the hour from eight to nine, which goes to public and private bills.

It being five minutes after eleven o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, February 28, 1950

POWERS OF COMMITTEES

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That the standing committees of this house shall severally be empowered to examine and inquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the house, and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon, with power to send for persons, papers and records.

Motion agreed to.

RESEARCH COUNCIL ACT

PROVISION FOR ADDITIONAL VICE-PRESIDENT—DEFINITION OF "INVENTION"

Right. Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (for the Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Research Council Act to provide for the appointment of an additional vice-president of the national research council, and to bring the act into conformity with the Patent Act as to the definition of "invention".

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

EMMA MOIR

EXPRESSIONS OF CONGRATULATION ON HER 106TH BIRTHDAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. E. Roberge (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, there is a severe case of unemployment in my constituency which I hope we shall not have to solve. I refer to a very dear old lady, Mrs. Emma Moir, of Beebe, Quebec, who is celebrating her 106th birthday today. Through you, Mr. Speaker, I wish to send her our congratulations and to wish her health and happiness.

SUPPLY

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

TRADE CONDITIONS—PROPOSED COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, history and tradition combine on a motion such as the one which has just been made, to give to members of the House of Commons an opportunity to bring to the attention of His Majesty's advisers such matters as, in their opinion, are of importance. It is the highest privilege that is possessed by members of parliament. It goes back some 475 years. It enables any member of the house to bring to the attention of the executive matters which, in the view of those who take advantage of the opportunity and privilege so offered, should be given immediate consideration.

On this occasion I shall bring to the attention of the ministry and the House of Commons a question that has been discussed on other occasions; and in order to give the house an opportunity to declare its view I shall move an amendment. Hon. members, realizing, as they must, the situation with respect to trade conditions, will thereby have the opportunity of making their contribution towards the solution of this most difficult problem.

I shall not make a lengthy speech at this time, nor shall I enter into a great deal of statistical detail. I listened the other day, with the interest that a declaration by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) demands, and I was impressed by the view that he expressed—the division of the world as between those who believe in democracy and those who espouse communism. He dealt in particular with the situation in Asia, and indicated that some consideration had been given to the question of trade, but apparently left a more detailed discussion in that regard to the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew), who we hope we shall hear shortly in this house. All of us in democratic nations must realize that only by the preservation of our trade and the maintenance of a high level of employment can communism in fact be prevented from spreading and existing on an even wider scale than it does.

I am not going into the agricultural side of the trade picture at this time; but food is in general the antidote to communism. Food and a higher standard of living spell the answer of the free peoples to communism, when they are combined with a democratic and free way of life. A depressed economy, unemployment, lost markets and the like, will lead to the spreading of false ideologies throughout the world. The United Nations itself has drawn attention to this within the last few days. A report published on February 17 by representative United Nations economists is to the effect, among other things, that the world trade situation became worse in 1949, and that all efforts to achieve trade balances have failed. The space devoted to the world trade situation, says the author of this article, Mr. Norman Altstedter, indicated that economists regard this as the No. 1 economic problem. The article states that world production continued to increase and that employment remained at a high level. As far as Canada was concerned it said:

> But Canada also experienced some difficulty in finding outside markets for some surplus commodities including wood products. She could expect the same for wheat.

Then the reason was given for this situation in the world:

> The basic problem outlined is disruption of the old pattern of three-cornered trade. European countries formerly paid for their imports from the United States by selling commodities to under-developed countries for dollars.
> The under-developed countries now are short of dollars because their exports to the United States have been reduced through war devastation, development of synthetic substitutes in the United States, and increased consumption in the under-developed countries of their own products.

The same view has been expressed by economists regularly in our own country in national periodicals. I quote only one, Mr. P. M. Richards, writing in Toronto Saturday Night of February 17, 1950. He not only deals with the problem but gives the reason for its existence and continuance. These are his words:

> At this moment the world is completing its division into three separate economic areas, each with its own trade fence around it. One is soviet Russia and its satellites; another is the sterling area; the third is the United States of America and Canada. Scarcely anything could be more economically hurtful to Canada. . . . It is important to note that this division between the soft currency countries and ourselves does not originate with them, but with us.

In 1948 the importance of foreign trade to our country was pinpointed in an address by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, at that time under-secretary, when he used these words:

> World trade to Canada is the difference between the full dinner pail and the breadline.

Those words were epigrammatic, powerful and descriptive of the situation; for unless we maintain our trade with the commonwealth countries and other countries—without in any way interfering with our trade with the United States, with which I am not going to deal—our unemployment situation cannot improve; indeed it will deteriorate.

There are some who say that our unemployment situation is not serious. In the February, 1950, edition of The Listening Post, publication of the Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities, these words appear:

> The federation views this trend, this mounting incidence of unemployment, with grave concern. The municipal governments are in no better position today to meet the cost of unemployment relief than they were during the depression decade of the thirties.

This is not anything new, and for the past two and a half years we on this side of the house, without regard to party, have been pressing upon the government the necessity of taking this house and the people of Canada into their confidence and letting us and them know the situation in reference to this question of trade. We warned, but we were ridiculed, and what we said was answered by so-called statistical information. Statistics do not supply employment for men and women out of work. We pointed out the trade position before the last election, but because of the fact that $460 million was made available in Canada by way of income tax returns and wheat payments, there was extra purchasing power and a higher level of employment than otherwise would have been the case. The deteriorating trade situation to which we referred was stressed in the press: in the Financial Post of January, 1949; and in Canadian Business of April, 1949, which contained the report of an address by Mr. Henry G. Birks, in which he used these words:

The enormous shadow of this problem is casting its shadow over this dominion.

The Canadian Exporters Association, made up of men engaged in business, presented a brief to like effect to the government in 1949. In summary they said that Canada was losing old and well-established trade connections with many parts of the British commonwealth and empire. While admitting the need for United States dollars, they argued that the normal pattern of Canada's export trade should not be obscured, and that the needs of the future should be kept in mind. The Canadian Chamber of Commerce also warned the government in 1949. Instead of information being given to us, information was hidden from us. When members of this house asked to be taken into the confidence of the government, the reply was that all was well, in spite of the fact that conditions were gradually deteriorating everywhere so far as our trade was concerned, other than our trade with the United States.

Canada's exports to the United States during 1949 were the highest in our history, amounting to $1,503,500,000; it is only fair to admit that. On the other hand, our imports from the United States amounted to $1,951,900,000, leaving a trade deficit of $427,800,000. That was an increase over the previous year of about $144 million, a situation which should challenge our attention.

In 1949 our imports from the United Kingdom reached a total of $307,400,000 the highest in our history. Canada had a surplus with the United Kingdom of $401,800,000, compared with a surplus of less than that for 1948, thereby widening instead of reducing the trade gap. The situation was known, and yet after the last session we went home, as we did in April, with little information about the true situation. Then, as now, we were willing to co-operate, as Canadians, in assisting the government in its endeavour to find a solution to this problem.

How many members in this house, Mr. Speaker, know much about the Geneva trade agreements? Two years ago there was great haste to call parliament together to consider those agreements. I remember well the night of November 17, 1947, when the then prime minister, Mr. Mackenzie King, indicated that those agreements represented the greatest advance in the history of world trade. Parliament was called together, and what happened? We heard no more about it. Parliament had been called for the particular purpose of ratifying those agreements, but nothing was done about them. What is the situation, so far as Canada is concerned, in respect of the Geneva trade agreements?

I should like to ask the government what happened to the reciprocal trade negotiations with the United States which were undertaken two or three years ago. Much was made of the potentialities of a draft trade agreement with the United States, but we have not heard any more about it. Rumour had it that it was drafted, and then dropped, and all discussion ended by the action of the Canadian government. As recently as March 22 last the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) indicated that when the legislation before the United States congress, known as the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, was passed, Canada would have an opportunity of seeking further trade agreements with that country. What has been done? Must we always be in the dark? Are these not matters that affect parliament and the Canadian people? Must we know what is happening in the matter of trade only after the negotiations have been completed and an agreement entered into? Surely the members of this house should be given an opportunity to discuss these matters tentatively, to the end that in a community of counsel there would be some solutions suggested that would be helpful to the government.

As stated earlier, I am dealing particularly with the British commonwealth. I have before me an editorial from the Financial Post, dated January 29, 1949. It is entitled, "Must we write off our British trade?" Near the end of the article, it states:

It is high time we learned how we fit into this new policy of barter deals—

That is, British barter.

—and colonial food development. Literally hundreds of thousands of Canadian jobs, and scores of Canadian communities, are dependent on our overseas trade, not to mention millions of dollars in land, plant and equipment. If we are not to be hurt, and hurt seriously, in the near future, then we must see clearly what is coming, and if necessary make other plans at once.

That article was published over one year ago. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, what has been done during the thirteen months that has since elapsed? We on this side of the house believe that immediate action must be taken to correct the deterioration of our overseas markets. Canada will not build up markets by optimistic government statements not founded on fact. We shall not build up these markets by bland optimism and diffusive satisfaction expressed by the government.

It has never been explained to us what the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) meant by a statement he made in a speech to the board of trade at Brantford on December 5, 1949. I shall read his words, and I think it is time that parliament and the people of Canada are made to realize their meaning. When the minister used these words he was not speaking off the record; he was speaking from a prepared text. He said:

> During the last two years a very decided official effort has been made to drive every one of these products,—

He was speaking of apples, pork, eggs and cheese, as well as beef and milk.

> —excepting wheat, off the British market. And now that the four-year wheat contract is drawing to a close an effort is being made to drive off a considerable part of our wheat as well. Therefore if Canada's agriculture was to be threatened further in the "cold war" over exchange, even free trade farmers would have to advise all farmers to buy where they could sell.

The time has come when parliament has a right to ask the Minister of Agriculture what he meant by those words. Who were the officials who were making the effort in Britain to drive out those products? Who were the persons who were threatening a continuance of the "cold war?" These are things that only an open conference can determine, when representatives from all parts of the commonwealth get together.

I am not saying the government has not tried to preserve our trade. We have had delegations running all over the world, pilgrimages with boards of advisers travelling hither and yon. What do they bring back but reports? They report on how they enjoyed themselves, how valuable the meetings were; but we never find out what the valuable things are which emanate from these pilgrimages. Certainly it is fine to see our perambulating peripatetic representatives travelling around the world. It is all very well to have Canada attending conferences, but surely we have the right to know what they accomplish, outside of an expenditure of money which parliament is asked to vote for these visits. I am not saying the government has not tried.

Mr. McIlraith: Do you want us to recall the trade representatives?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The parliamentary assistant will have every opportunity to tell us. He has not, however, been one of those who travelled. He has not any of the sunburn some of the others have acquired.

Mr. McIlraith: Answer the question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I cannot hear these babbling interferences, Mr. Speaker, which are spoken in a voice designed to ensure that they be not heard, except by Hansard.

Mr. Robinson: The hon. member does not want to answer.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I shall read, Mr. Speaker, from an article appearing in the Toronto Daily Star on February 11 last. Amongst other things, it says:

> United Kingdom manufacturers today were told unless they increased exports to dollar countries "we shall have to go without many of the essential foods and raw materials we buy from the U.S. and Canada."

Then it quotes the Prime Minister as saying:

> It is very strongly in our national interests to encourage imports of British goods into Canada.

That is a proper statement. According to the article, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) used these words:

> For a long time Canadians have wanted to purchase more from the sterling area.

In other words it has not been a lack of governmental desire, but the representations made to Britain have not been made in an open conference, so that all may know where the responsibility lies for their lack of success.

I quote now from a press report, of February 10, of an interview by Mr. Warren Baldwin, while he was in London, with Lord Swinton, deputy leader of the Conservative party in the House of Lords. Amongst other things, Lord Swinton said this:

> You and I have our own ideas of things that could be done if we get together around the conference table.

The former prime minister used to say that in a conference, when men have their feet under a table, they are able to arrive at conclusions, and more surely provided they represent the peoples and parliaments. May I point out that Lord Beaverbrook, on February 16, said this, as reported in the London Daily Express:

> The Canadian economic situation can only be satisfied if Britain, in her strength, remains the market for empire produce on which Canada's farmers depend altogether. . . .

I shall quote now the chief representative of a group of businessmen, the Canadian Exporters Association. Speaking in Port Arthur on February 22, John A. Marsh, general manager, is reported as follows:

> Addressing the Port Arthur chamber of commerce, he made the suggestion as one point in a program which might be carried out by Canada, the United States and Britain to relieve present trade difficulties.
> He asked that Canada call such a conference, to be held in Ottawa, in the belief that the commonwealth and empire is a "good and honourable association of nations for the good of the world and for trade."

Then he used these words:

> There are many indications that several of the sister dominions would welcome such a conference, and that many of the colonies, particularly the British West Indies, would await the findings with great interest.

That is the suggestion made by a leading representative of a group of exporters. We in this party believe that parliament should be given an opportunity to vote on the question whether such a conference should be convened—not to make the commonwealth an exclusive trading area, but to the end that while continuing our trading relations with the United States and other nations, we might restore to ourselves the markets that have been lost during the last few years. We believe that such a meeting would be advantageous. No longer would information be hidden behind the shrouds of secrecy. Action is necessary.

We have a good trade administration service in most of the countries of the world. The Canadian trade commissioner service has done excellent work. There are now ninety-five commissioners operating in forty-five countries. The men who operate there need as support for their efforts a declaration of policy from all parts of this commonwealth and empire with regard to trade, and particularly the restoration of markets that have been recently lost. Other commonwealth conferences, both economic and political, have resulted in good. None has ever resulted in harm.

As I listened to the Secretary of State for External Affairs the other day I was impressed as he reviewed what happened in Colombo, and as he indicated the pride we have in this commonwealth and in all parts of it. We did not hear much about trade discussions there; we were not let in on that. Apparently it was not a trade conference; in reality it was a conference for discussion and the making of recommendations, but not for implementing in any way the recommendations that were made.

We believe that a trade conference at government level would bring results. We believe such a conference should not be a hush-hush meeting. We believe that the British people should know if there is over there, as the Minister of Agriculture indicated, anyone in official circles who has interfered with our trade and is boycotting us in any way. We should know, as should the British people, who those officials are. We believe that if such a conference were convened, bringing together representatives at government level who have a full realization of the situation facing the commonwealth and empire, and the desire to rehabilitate all parts of the commonwealth and empire by the return of trade to at least its former level, it would go a long way toward providing in this country jobs for the unemployed, whose members may greatly increase within the next few months or the next few years. We believe that if men and women were brought together in such a conference, responsibility would be placed on the shoulders of those who are responsible for diverting trade from Canada; for that is what the Minister of Agriculture's statement means, if it means anything at all. We would have an entire blueprint of production within the commonwealth and empire, and we would have arrangements made in the spirit which has actuated members of this commonwealth and empire in the past, to the end that prosperity may be assured, at least to the extent of preserving the markets which we had and which are lost.

Exercising, therefore, the traditional right of parliament when a motion such as the one before us has been made I move in amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe):

That all the words after "that" to the end of the question be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"this house is of the opinion that the government should take immediate steps to convene at the earliest possible date a conference of the nations of the British commonwealth and the countries of the empire to devise policies to restore our lost markets, and thereby to provide jobs for our Canadian people."

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), Mr. Speaker, has proposed an amendment having to do with a subject which is of great interest not only to the house but to the entire country. I have no doubt that at this session much of the attention of parliament will be given, and properly so, to the problem of our trading relationships; and particularly will hon. members be desirous, I hope, of doing what they can to assist the government in restoring Canada's trade position and protecting ourselves against the loss of markets with which we are now threatened.

I agree with the hon. member when he says that for the last two years, after a very important debate in this house, and statements to the effect, as he has intimated, that the Geneva agreements were a forward step in the history of world trade and trade relationships, we have neither seen nor heard anything of the agreements. There was on the order paper for some time in the session, I believe, of 1948, a resolution calling upon parliament to confirm the Geneva agreements to the extent that they had then been entered into. It was left there because other conferences were being held. Since then we have heard nothing about the Geneva agreements. May I remind the house—

Mr. Abbott: They are in effect.

Mr. Coldwell: They are in effect, but I am going to repeat what I said: this house has heard nothing about the resolution to confirm the Geneva agreements that we were supposed to consider over two years ago. If the agreements are in effect, I say they should be in effect by and with the consent of parliament, not merely by order in council. That is not good enough, particularly in view of the fact that some of us believed, and so stated, that these Geneva agreements, becoming effective as they did on January 1, 1948, would militate against our trading relationships with our best customer—the United Kingdom.

We adopted the non-discriminatory clauses of the agreement, clauses which need not have been adopted for a whole year if the monetary situation as between Britain and Canada remained difficult. Under the agreement, as I remember it, even at the end of that year we could have gone to the contracting parties and asked for further consideration and an extension of time for putting those trade agreements into effect. That we could have done, and that we did not do. The quotas and prohibitions made effective in 1947 with respect to certain classes of imports into this country, having regard to the trade position as between this country and the United Kingdom, militated more against our trade with the United Kingdom than they did against our trade with the United States.

Mr. Abbott: Exactly the reverse.

Mr. Coldwell: Well, let me call the hon. gentleman to witness. A short time ago he made the announcement that quotas and prohibitions were to come off within the next few months, and he said he hoped that would enable the United Kingdom to sell British goods to Canada in larger quantities.

Mr. Abbott: I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend, but when did I make the statement that quotas and prohibitions were coming off?

Mr. Coldwell: The minister made the statement a short time ago that on the first of April and on the first of July—

Mr. Abbott: Just to keep the record straight, again this year, as last year, I announced that there would be further relaxations in the import restrictions, some of them on the first of April and some on the first of July. That follows what was done last year. It implements a policy which I set out as government policy, namely, that they would be removed as soon as our exchange position justified such relaxation.

Mr. Coldwell: That is exactly what I was referring to.

Mr. Abbott: These are the facts.

Mr. Coldwell: As I understood the announcement at the time it was made, it was suggested that it would be of more assistance to the United Kingdom; that the United Kingdom would therefore be able to market more goods in this country. If it was to be of assistance to our trade with the United Kingdom and with the sterling area generally, then the natural inference for one to draw was that these prohibitions and quotas, when they were put on, were barriers against that same trade with the sterling area, and particularly with the United Kingdom.

The hon. member for Lake Centre referred to the statement of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) on December 5. I have not the document before me. I recall that on December 10 last I referred in the house to that speech. I raised the question, and we had a debate upon it. While the Minister of Agriculture did not deny the accuracy of the statement as reported he did very considerably modify it—or, shall I say, explained away to some extent the implications of the speech.

I have been watching carefully over a considerable period of time the discussions in Great Britain about her trading relationships, and I have not been able to find, from any statement made by a responsible British minister, that the British did desire to discriminate—that was the interpretation—against Canada in the purchase of supplies from abroad. Never on any occasion have I seen a statement of that kind. On the contrary, as the hon. member for Lake Centre has already intimated, I have seen what the financial editor of Toronto Saturday Night indicated, namely, that this is not entirely a British problem. It is our problem as well; the earning of dollars by Britain will enable her to continue and indeed to increase her purchases of goods in this country. It seems to me that is the crux of the situation.

Reading in the London Times some of the questions asked during the recent election campaign in Great Britain of the British Minister of Food, and the answers thereto—and in other British newspapers as well that come by air mail; I try to read them as thoroughly as I can—I have noted that one of the difficulties which the ministry faced was the constant criticism of the rising cost of living, and the question why certain classes of supplies were bought in Canada at higher prices than those at which they could be bought elsewhere. It is suggested that there is a desire on the part of the British to restrict purchases of goods from Canada. But that is not so; and I am not thinking only of the present government; if there was a change of government in Britain, the attitude would be the same. No matter what party may be in power in Great Britain, every attempt will be made to trade as much as possible with this country, because of course our economy is so largely complementary to theirs. No matter what government may be in power in this country, we too must realize that their economy is complementary to ours, and that consequently our best market is in the sterling area. For these reasons I have suggested—and I am going to make the suggestion again—that we should discuss with the British ways and means of maintaining our market in Britain; ways and means of enabling them during this temporary period of difficulty to purchase in Canada the supplies they need. I know there may be some doubt as to whether this can be done, but I believe it is worth while discussing with them the possibility of our accepting, on a temporary basis at least, sterling in payment for Canadian goods—not sterling that will be frozen in Great Britain and therefore an obligation upon them at some future day. It might be used as sterling was once used on this continent, namely, to invest in the undeveloped areas of the world, and of the sterling area particularly.

If the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Lake Centre contemplates that the conference to be called will bring about agreements of the kind that were arrived at in this city some years ago, then I do not think we could possibly agree to it. I do not think we should endeavour at any time to build up around ourselves, or around the commonwealth of nations, trade barriers that would result in other trade barriers being placed around other areas. I did not understand that that was the idea the hon. gentleman had in mind, but I wanted to make it clear that we could not approve that kind of arrangement.

One other thing I want to say is that we in Canada can do something else; we can look over our tariff schedules. There are many Canadian industries that years ago received protection from competition from Great Britain and other parts of the world because they were said to be infant industries. Their infancy has long since passed—not only have they passed their infancy; they have passed their adolescence. They have now grown up and are able to compete in the markets of the world. Therefore we should look over our tariff schedules and customs regulations to see what we can do to ease the duties against countries in the sterling area, so that we may receive more goods more freely and thus enable those countries to earn dollars in this country with which to buy the goods that we have to sell and must sell abroad.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

I should like to hear some further discussion by members of the official opposition on what they have in mind with regard to the proposed conference. I do not believe that a conference is ever a bad thing; as the hon. member for Lake Centre says, it is a good thing. But you must have no ulterior motive in attending or calling such a conference. I should like to hear more about what would be considered and what should be done at such a conference. Anything that will enable this country to restore confidence in our markets, that will protect our great agricultural community from the loss of markets with which it has been threatened over the last few months, should be undertaken.

I believe I speak for my colleagues when I say that one of the principal obligations of this house at this time is to review our trading relationships and our tariff structure to see if there is any interference with the sale of our goods abroad. Let us always bear in mind the fact that a tariff wall is not only a wall against imports; in reality it is a wall against the national income. Therefore what we can do to assist in maintaining our production and our income we should endeavour to do, individually and collectively—individually as members of parliament trying to make our own contribution to the welfare of the state, and collectively through the political parties represented in this house, and, perhaps even more so, as the parliament of Canada.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I was surprised that this question should have been brought up in this way, because after all there are before the house amendments to the address in reply to the speech from the throne which deal with this matter. In saying this I do not mean to indicate that the question is not of vital importance. The peculiar thing about the so-called dollar shortage and the loss of markets is that this is not something that just developed all of a sudden; it has been developing for many months, in fact for a number of years. The thing that people in this country are not able to understand is why we have allowed the situation to reach a climax before taking the necessary steps to stop it.

I was amused at an article which appeared in Toronto Saturday Night of February 7 under the heading, "In praise of fear," by P. M. Richards, and I should like to quote briefly from it as follows:

> The silly feature of all this is that the inevitableness of the world dollar crisis should have been obvious from the start. Our politicians and economists and bankers must surely have known it, yet they consented to follow the line of least immediate resistance.

I think we all feel that way. Then the writer indicated what he thought would be a solution for the problem. Perhaps this article was written in a somewhat frivolous vein; nevertheless there is a germ of truth in it. Here is the way in which he says such a depression could be avoided:

> I have a plan for the avoidance of economic depressions. It's simple, but, I think, should be effective. Each nation would appoint an economic czar, pay him handsomely and treat him with honour so long as he did well, but hang him—no excuses accepted—immediately the economy dipped below a certain level. He would get nice cash bonuses, and extras like beautiful Egyptian dancing girls, if results were extra good. If, unfortunately, they were extra bad, the economic czar's staff would be executed too.

I think men who accept positions of great responsibility for which they are well paid should have some obligation to produce results. What happens is that when they fail they are appointed to the Senate or made judges of the supreme court, or are paid higher salaries in order to encourage them to do better in the future. They suffer no penalty because of their inability to accomplish the task given to them.

I have been interested in recent months reading the speeches of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), and I want to congratulate him upon the way in which he places responsibility upon those whom he terms financial crackpots, the economists. I notice that the other day he said that some people are making it difficult to get our surpluses to the areas where they can be consumed. Who are those individuals? I think the Minister of Agriculture, having gone that far, should go a step farther and inform the house just who the people are who are making it impossible to distribute goods that are surplus so that they may be made available to people who need them.

We were told by the conference of the FAO that it would not be wise to adopt the ICCH proposal because it might delay convertibility. I do not believe the people in India, China or other parts of the world who are suffering from starvation consider it a good excuse when they are told that they must continue to suffer, in spite of the fact that there are large surpluses, just because it might delay convertibility of currency. I think they are far more interested in getting goods that might be made available to them than in seeing the convertibility of currency established.

As I say, the matter was crystal clear many months ago—in fact many years ago, back as far as 1944 and 1945. During those years this house debated at great length the question of the financing of international trade, and the matter was referred to the committee on reconstruction. We had Dr. Clark, the deputy minister of finance, before us, and the question was discussed at some length. I criticized the proposals that were placed before the committee, which were the forerunners of the Bretton Woods agreement, on the ground that they did not provide the means, in the first place, by which the devastated areas of Europe could be rehabilitated. It did not provide a method whereby these nations could get back rapidly into production. Furthermore, there was no provision under these financial arrangements whereby the creditor nations would be obliged to accept payment for their exports by taking imports from the areas that had rebuilt their industries.

The same argument was advanced on the discussion of the Bretton Woods agreement. I want to remind the Conservatives that at that time apparently they did not realize exactly what the Bretton Woods agreement stood for. Therefore we are suffering today from the consequences of that agreement because nobody in the house could possibly suggest that the funds provided under it could meet the great unbalance of trade today. Yet we were told then that that proposal would meet the financial needs of the world in the post-war transitional period and for a long time afterward.

The other day I put on the record a statement by Mr. Snyder to that effect. We have been told time and again that we do not want to have a recurrence of the kind of trade restrictions and controls that we had in the depression years. Indeed, anybody who studies that period will find that the reason these controls had to be put into operation was to bring about an adjustment in trade relations. The depression came first and then the controls were adopted to rectify the situation. I think that is made quite clear in a publication issued by the United States department of commerce entitled "The United States in the World Economy". At page 13, under the heading "Future Problems and Policies", I find the following:

> Unless the supply of dollars is more adequate to meet the requirements of other countries, they assuredly will insist on their rights to exercise a close selective control over the use of the amounts available and to promote more intensive relations with third countries under preferential trading arrangements. And unless dollars are made available with greater regularity than in the past it would be both unjust and unwise to demand the removal of restraints and controls largely designed to protect the internal economies of other countries against external shock and pressure.

During the discussion of the Bretton Woods agreement we pointed out time and time again that it had a definite pro-creditor bias, that it placed absolutely no responsibility whatsoever upon creditor nations to accept payment from debtor nations in the only way that the debtor nation could pay, by the exports of goods. At that time we were told it was a question of trade agreements, and that later on international trade agreements would be brought down which would place the responsibility where it should be. Later on we had the Geneva trade agreement. Did that take care of the situation? The Geneva trade agreement made the matter ten times worse. Not only did it leave on the debtor nation the obligation to balance trade, but it also placed upon the debtor nations restrictions that made it absolutely impossible for them to protect themselves against excess exports from creditor nations.

I am referring of course to the non-discrimination clause. The pamphlet to which I have referred, "The United States in the World Economy", emphasizes the fact that debtor nations must be allowed to exercise controls and restraints on trade in order to protect their balance of payments. The Geneva trade agreement was referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce, but was not endorsed by it. It was returned to the house without being endorsed, and it has never been brought back to parliament. Why? It is a very strange thing. This government is operating under the Geneva trade agreement. The government made agreements with other nations endorsing it. It was sent to the banking committee, failed to get endorsation, and has never been brought back before parliament. Nevertheless we are continuing either to operate under it or to pay lip service to it.

Mr. Low: Hear, hear. Where did they get their authority?

Mr. Quelch: The vicious thing about the Geneva trade agreement is the so-called policy of non-discrimination. Surely it must be obvious that if a nation has an unbalance of trade with one nation and a favourable balance of trade with another it should be allowed to restrict its imports from the nation with which it has an unfavourable balance and increase its imports from the one with which it has a favourable balance. Yet, under the Geneva trade agreement, if a nation curtails its imports from one country it must curtail all similar imports from all other nations as well, even though it may have a favourable balance of trade with some of the other nations. The thing is absolutely unjustifiable. It cannot be defended on any score. I notice at the time we were discussing it no real defence was made for the so-called policy of non-discrimination. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) made some slight excuse in the house one day. He said that the United States was very keen on it and he thought we should play along with them, or words to that effect. I am not quoting him exactly, but he certainly gave the impression that just because the United States was insistent upon this policy, and we were very much dependent upon the good will of that country—

Mr. Abbott: Not at all; the Minister of Finance believes in non-discrimination himself, and he said so.

Mr. Quelch: Who said so?

Mr. Abbott: I did, and not because the United States believe in it but because we believe in it.

Mr. Quelch: The Minister of Finance stated that the United States was making a fetish of it, and because they were so strongly in favour of it we were supporting it. Do not forget that under the Geneva trade agreement there were escape clauses which were put in there because it was recognized it would be impossible for certain nations to live up to these proposals. But the Minister of Finance said he was not prepared to use the escape clauses. He thought we should live up to the principle of the agreement. Why were the escape clauses put in there? They were put in because it was recognized apparently that they would be necessary in the transitional period, and it was evidently hoped that within a few years they would no longer be necessary. It is recognized that by 1952 we will not have established an equilibrium in world trade. That is frankly admitted by the interim report of ERP.

A lot of discussion has taken place as to what measures will be taken after Marshall aid ends. I think it is recognized by all people that some other kind of measure will have to be found. I am greatly disappointed that the government did not see fit to support the proposal put forward by the commodity experts of FAO. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) stated he believed in the underlying principle, but on the other hand he was not going to support it because he apparently felt that we in Canada could do many of the things proposed thereunder. He believed we could store our surpluses and could finance directly with the nations concerned instead of financing through the international commodity clearing house. I am not criticizing the government on that score if that is their policy. If the policy of the government now is to take steps to store our surpluses until they are needed, if it is their policy to finance exports of goods to nations that have not the dollars to pay for them, if they will do that, then I will have no criticism of the government for failing to support the international commodity clearing house. On the other hand, if they do not do so then I say they have definitely committed a breach of faith with the people of Canada and other peoples of the world. After all the lip service we have paid to such organizations as the United Nations and FAO, if we allow surpluses to accumulate and production to be reduced when there are starving people in need of them I say it shows a lack of sincerity on the part of the people who are dealing with these measures.

So far as the amendment is concerned it could mean a lot and it could mean nothing at all. If the proposal is that we convene a conference of the members of the commonwealth, if we are prepared to consider realistic proposals such as will recognize that the creditor nations have an equal responsibility with the debtor nations for balancing trade; if we will recognize that to the extent of being willing to accept imports in exchange for exports, investing surplus pounds in the underdeveloped countries, then perhaps we would have some chance of success. Furthermore, if we are prepared to recognize that the so-called policy of non-discrimination under the Geneva trade agreements is not a sound policy, then I think a conference of that kind might accomplish something. On the other hand, if the Conservatives are advocating a conference in order to bring in the kind of proposals they continue to support in this house, such as the proposal to make currencies convertible today, the thing would be doomed before it ever met. We have heard so many statements by members of the Conservative party criticizing the government for not having made currency convertible. To talk of the convertibility of currency in a world where there is an over-all disequilibrium of over $6,000 million is of course absolute and utter nonsense.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to take a great deal of time speaking to this amendment. I had not contemplated doing so, but in the course of the discussion two or three points have been raised on which I might say a word.

The amendment proposed by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) asks that Canada take the initiative in calling another conference, as he puts it, of the nations of the British commonwealth and empire, to devise policies to restore our lost markets and thereby provide jobs for our Canadian people. As the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) said, conferences of this kind are always helpful. I am not just sure what my hon. friend would suggest as the agenda for such a conference. I am not sure, as was indicated by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, whether this would be another conference such as was held in the early thirties, for raising tariffs and creating a special, preferred area. If it were to be that sort of conference I for one, as the hon. member said, would not want to take part in it.

It is true that there are many difficulties in connection with trading in the world today; but my experience has not been that those difficulties are due to a lack of conferences. I have attended some myself, including the Bretton Woods conference to which allusion was made a short time ago. On short notice I went to London last July to a meeting which was attended by the finance ministers of the nations of the commonwealth, at which inevitably trade matters were discussed. It was a very helpful conference, and led to the further meeting in Washington in September, at which trade and financial matters were again discussed, and at which I think certain desirable long-term objectives were laid down and certain short-term policies were agreed upon which have proved helpful. Frankly, however, I do not think the trading problems of the world are going to be solved by simply calling another conference. I for one do not like to either initiate or attend a conference unless I know exactly what we are going to talk about. While I have no doubt it will be found desirable to hold further conferences to discuss trade matters, I do not know that the holding of a full-fledged commonwealth or empire conference at this time would add very much to the knowledge of this or any other member of the commonwealth in reference to specific solutions which can be found for these trade difficulties.

Now I want to say just a word about the references that have been made to the Geneva trade agreements. As the house knows, those agreements have been given only provisional application as far as Canada is concerned. They are in effect, and have been in effect for some eighteen months, I think. They have proved of the greatest benefit to this country; and in my opinion the substantial increase in our exports to the United States last year was in large part a result of the very definite tariff concessions we obtained under those Geneva agreements. They are subject to ratification by the congress of the United States, as they are subject to ratification by this parliament; and it is perhaps just as well that we should not try to rush them through our parliament before they have been brought up for consideration in congress.

Mr. Coldwell: Were they not on the order paper for a long time?

Mr. Abbott: That is quite true; they were on the order paper but were not reached before parliament dissolved.

So much for the Geneva agreements themselves. I want to say just a word about the policy of non-discrimination to which such exception has been taken by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch). If any country in the world had an interest in establishing as a trading policy that one country should not discriminate against another by putting on arbitrary embargoes, prohibitions and the like, that country is Canada. My hon. friend comes from a part of the country which, I understand, is very interested in exporting beef cattle to the United States, as well as other agricultural products. If we got into this ring-around-a-rosy of discrimination nothing would be easier than for the United States to say, "We will just put an embargo against Canadian cattle coming into the United States," and I do not think that would be in the interests of Canada. The same thing goes for a great many other things; and that applies not only to the United States but to many other countries as well. So, as far as I am concerned, and I believe I am expressing the views of the government in this respect, we stand four-square for a principle of non-discrimination. As far as this country is concerned a reasonable tariff is the only form of barrier we want to place against importations; and we are constantly striving to reduce tariffs by reciprocal agreements with other countries.

If hon. members will recall for a moment the history of this country since 1935 they will remember that as soon as this government got back into power it negotiated the first reciprocal trade agreement with the United States. That was followed by two later treaties, one of which was really a three-way treaty with the United Kingdom; and it was then that our trading position with the United States began to improve. Now we sell to that country, speaking from memory, something of the order of a billion and a half dollars' worth of goods and services each year. That is an absolutely vital factor in our trade; and any policy we adopted which might be considered by our southern neighbour as unfriendly would, I think, be an extremely undesirable policy for Canada.

There was only one other point raised to which I want to make brief reference; that is the suggestion by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar that we should accept sterling for some of the surplus products we have available for sale but which some of our customers in the soft currency areas say they have not the money to buy. The hon. member qualified his suggestion by saying we should not accept blocked sterling, but should take sterling we could use a little later to do something or other with, or to invest in some other part of the world. I would point out that, nevertheless, in effect we would be taking blocked sterling, because today sterling is not a convertible currency. Our producers and our workers cannot take sterling and use it to pay their bills. So for the exports we sold in exchange for sterling we would have to provide Canadian dollars to our own citizens; in other words we would be extending additional credit to those purchasers. That may or may not be desirable; but I think the house and the country should realize that in taking sterling in payment for our goods we are extending credit; and in addition, for what it may be worth, we are assuming an exchange risk as well.

My view, which I have voiced here previously, is that if we are able and willing to extend additional credits to other countries, we should do so in terms of our own currency. At the present time, as the house knows, we are continuing to extend credit to the United Kingdom at the rate of $10 million a month on the very substantial credit originally arranged. In my opinion that is all we can afford to extend at the present time, because it must be remembered that one country cannot extend credit to another except in one of three ways. It must consume less than it is producing, and in Canada today we are consuming very close to what we are producing. There is little surplus for extending credit abroad. Second, we can borrow money somewhere else, in order to lend it to a third party. In other words, it would be quite possible for us to borrow money in the United States, in order to extend credit to the United Kingdom or western Europe. But I have never heard it seriously suggested we should follow that course. Third, we could extend that credit out of our accumulated reserves of gold and United States dollars. I do not think I need to tell the house that those reserves today, while they are improving, are certainly no more than adequate for the requirements of a trading nation such as Canada.

By imposing still more rigid import restrictions, embargoes and one thing and another, which would prevent people importing from the United States such essential things as steel and coal, we could reduce our consumption, and so have more available for lending abroad. Perhaps I need hardly point out to the house that Canada today is a country which requires substantial capital investments. The oil fields in western Canada, which are in the process of development, require a substantial capital investment.

I must say, therefore, that I feel it is unrealistic to expect that we in Canada can produce any substantial over-all surplus which would be available for foreign lending. We will do what we can in the future, as we have in the past. I do not think anyone should be under the illusion that we can extend additional credit, whether by accumulating sterling for investment in Burma, India or anywhere else, or any other form of credit, unless we are prepared to restrict our own consumption in this country.

I do not know that there is anything more I have to add. The motion which has been proposed by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), on a motion to go into supply, amounts to a motion of want of confidence. I repeat what I said at the beginning, that I do not think anything is to be gained by a further conference of the kind suggested. Whatever our difficulties may be, they are not due to a lack of conferences. Such conferences, however, are always helpful. We have never refused an invitation to attend a conference of this kind. May I close by saying that I do not think any steps need be taken by Canada to initiate such a conference.

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to second the motion moved by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). I believe it is of vital importance to this country. I am not at all disturbed, and I trust other hon. members will not be disturbed, by the suggestion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) that this is some devious means by which we are going to raise tariffs in some imperial trading club, and thus interfere with the trade we have with the United States of America. Let me assure you, sir, and assure this house that that is not the sort of motion that has been moved. I feel that no one should know that better than the Minister of Finance, or his colleague the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner).

I recall the same bogey being raised in this house long ago. I was here at the time the famous statement was made by Mr. Mackenzie King, who on a similar occasion, about 1930, told us we must not provoke the United States of America. We have grown up, Mr. Speaker, and the United States is prouder of us because we have. A few years after that the countervailing duties were proposed by the same party. Only five years before, they had ridiculed the brick for brick policy of the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen when he led this party. We are not talking about tariffs. Whenever there was any mention of tariffs, there was an immediate cry, "Hush, hush; we must not provoke the United States."

The United States of America, Mr. Speaker, does not look on this great independent country of Canada as a child in swaddling clothes. They realize we are one of the greatest trading nations in the world. I agree with the Minister of Finance when he says that Canada will develop into a great trading nation. As our country grows and develops year by year, whether the Liberals, Conservatives or any other party is in power, the natural evolution of Canada will be to trade more and more with the United States of America. Since we live beside the United States, that is the natural thing. I agree with the Minister of Finance when he says we need that country. I understand that at the moment $100 million is needed to develop the great oil fields of western Canada in that rich province of Alberta. Some day it will be, if it is not now, the richest province in the dominion.

As one who has watched the growth of this country, Mr. Speaker, I can visualize pipe lines carrying oil out of Canada, instead of dusty railway cars bringing coal into Canada. I know that one plant has already spent a million dollars in converting the boilers to burn Alberta oil instead of Pennsylvania coal. No one can think of the future of this country without realizing that we are bound to have increased trade with the United States of America. As a farmer, I can even visualize the possibility of the United States increasing its population to such an extent that it will buy more of our agricultural products. There are now 150 million people in that country, while we, with all these natural resources, have such a small population. During election campaigns, we talk about our great hinterland, the oil of western Canada, our coal and such natural resources—

Mr. Abbott: And our great paper mills.

Mr. Rowe: Yes, we have some great paper mills. They are run just as well as this government is running the country, too, but I do not think that is much of a compliment. I do not mean to say that the Minister of Finance could not run a paper mill quite well, either. I am not going to discuss that, however, or be sidetracked. In all seriousness, I do want to say that this motion does not involve any particular commodity, or any particular group of manufacturers. It involves the general economy of this country. In the utmost sincerity, I say that I am appalled and amazed at the attitude of this government.

Last year I read an article in the Montreal Gazette to the effect that the Minister of Finance inferred there was a great possibility of developing trade with the United States. He seemed to emphasize it. I read another article which stated that the Minister of Trade and Commerce had made the same type of speech. There is not an hon. member in this house, from any part of the dominion, who has not a friendly feeling towards the United States, or a most optimistic outlook concerning trade with that country. It is natural. But, Mr. Speaker, surely we can arouse this government from their lethargy. Surely we can impress upon them that we are trying to find a market for products that the United States now has a surplus of, and which they are trying to sell as well. I cannot understand the government's attitude. For instance, the United States is a country that has 230 million pounds of dried milk, 95 million pounds of butter, 22 million pounds of cheese, 64 million pounds of dried eggs or the equivalent of 192 million dozen, 172 million bushels of wheat, 83 million bushels of corn and almost 4 billion bales of cotton now owned by the government—

An hon. Member: Potatoes.

Mr. Rowe: And somebody says potatoes. There are millions of hundredweight of potatoes going at one cent a hundredweight. How can any sane businessman, let alone a member of parliament, think for a moment—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Rowe: Yes; probably I might have put it the other way round. How can they judge for a moment that we are going to open up trade avenues for the surplus agricultural products of the mixed farmers of Canada? Stop and think about it. What we are doing today, Mr. Speaker, is pleading with all the sincerity that we possess that this government will continue our friendly trade relations with that greatest country in the world, the United States of America. But we ask them to sit down around a table with the prime ministers of the other British dominions and representatives of the other empire countries. It is true that plenty of excuses can be put up, as has been done by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) today, in order to show what cannot be done. But whether it is in business or private affairs, I find that you never get anywhere by sitting down and trying to find a reason why you cannot do something. We want to show the reasons that it can be done. It has been done before, Mr. Speaker.

What alarms me even more is this. We know that today, even outside our economy, probably the most vital concern of every one of us is security. Those of us who have children and children's children coming on are concerned, as is every hon. member of this house, with the safety and security of our people. The government has the Atlantic pact for the defence of our security in that respect. We are spending, I believe, $400 million this year and I understand that perhaps next year we may spend even $800 million. I am not criticizing that expenditure. Perhaps it will be necessary to spend a billion. God only knows. We all pray to God that it will not be necessary to go on and on spending in preparation for war. We can talk all we wish, but it is in the power and control of others whether we are going to safeguard our peace or not.

We have learned through history, in the first great war as well as in the second, that armies march on their stomachs, and that the agricultural production of nations is of vital concern. We know how difficult it was in the first war to feed the troops overseas. We know how, in the second war, the poor children of Europe almost starved to death. We know how the British housewife got along—without going into what has been presented in the magazines—living on three or four ounces of butter per week, and with the shortage of other foods. I should like to urge upon the government the vital importance of our production of food and the maintenance of markets to encourage that production, as it is linked, dovetailed and interwoven with our whole defence policy itself. There is no question about that, Mr. Speaker. What are we going to do?

Not so long ago I heard the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), as did every other hon. member who is here now, telling what might have to happen if the war continued. I remember that one evening he gave an interesting speech in which he told us that the people might have to eat more cereals and less other foodstuffs, and that it might come to the stage where we might have to handle our foodstuffs and our cereals production so that the people could even exist if the war lasted long enough. That is of vital importance. In this cold country, where you have costly machinery and high-priced buildings, you cannot maintain that production unless you have some place in which to market the products at a reasonable rate, even though it is not as high a rate as we have been receiving. I know that some will say, "You are getting better prices today." That is irrelevant. We are not talking about the high prices we have had during the war. There were high prices in 1919, and following the first great war. Wheat went to enormous prices. Hogs went to $26 a hundredweight. I can remember, as can many others in this house, the period back between 1925 and 1930 when even the farmers said, "Oh, this will never end", and so on and so forth. We had enormous markets at that time in Britain.

After 1914 and 1917, when we developed our ability to supply the old land, in normal times when she did not have her food rationed she took enormous quantities from us. In 1921 we sold Britain $77 million worth of meats alone. We sold her 250 million pounds of bacon in 1920. In 1900 we sold her more cheese than we are going to sell her in 1950.

What is wrong? It is all very well to talk about the dollar; but I leave it to you, Mr. Speaker, and to this house to answer that question. Again I say: Would any sane businessman, who had had a customer for fifty years, change customers or forsake him because that customer got a little hard up for a year or two? It is not going to deprive us of the United States markets. The Minister of Finance is only repeating verbatim speeches that were made here when Mr. Robb was minister of finance. I remember an occasion, because I was here in the house at the time—I think it was in 1926—when the same speeches were made. It will be recalled that in our election campaign we used Mr. King's statement: "You must not provoke the United States of America." It was used in one of the monthly books we put out as campaign literature.

Mr. Gardiner: It is a nice thing to belong to a party that can keep its leaders and its policies.

Mr. Rowe: Yes, it is; but, Mr. Speaker, a former leader of the minister's party, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, said that it was better to break a bad policy than to keep it. I think the minister might look over some of that former leader's words; because if you have failed two or three times, you should at least take the hint and start to learn.

In 1922 the Fordney-McCumber tariff cut our markets off overnight for beef cattle in the United States. Then after we tried not to provoke the United States of America, in 1930 the Hawley-Smoot tariff cut us off overnight. There was nothing wrong about their doing that in the United States. Probably the odd cattle man was a little bit sore for a while, but no hon. member in this house thought any the less of the United States of America for handling their own business. We were selling cattle here in Ontario just a while before that time for about twenty cents a pound. I can well recall selling them, after the Hawley-Smoot tariff—and they were just as good cattle—for a nickel a pound. I remember selling hogs for less. That is all very fine, but we had lost that market.

Mr. Abbott: We are getting a lot of them back now.

Mr. Rowe: Will the minister tell me any of those articles that I have mentioned for which there is a permanent market in the United States, when their milk is going rancid?

Mr. Abbott: We are still selling potatoes, coarse grain and beef.

Mr. Rowe: That must be a grand market in which you are selling potatoes, when in that market potatoes are selling for one cent a hundredweight. The minister says sure, that is all right.

Mr. Abbott: We are selling them.

Mr. Sinnott: That is not our worry.

Mr. Rowe: There you are, Mr. Speaker. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof. They do not care what is happening to them.

Mr. Sinnott: That is not our worry.

Mr. Rowe: The hon. member does not seem to worry much about anything in this regard. I should not say that, because I see he is busy writing a letter and did not hear what was being said. Surely, Mr. Speaker, there is no one within the sound of my voice who will say it is not our worry. What would the minister say, as a capable lawyer and a good businessman, and as Minister of Finance? Would he say that it would be wise to sell our products, and hope for a long time sale of them, to somebody who had more of similar products than he knew what to do with?

Mr. Abbott: I believe in selling our products where we can sell them and getting paid for them.

Mr. Rowe: That is exactly what I am trying to say about the market that we have had. The market to which we have sold the most of our agricultural products in the last three-quarters of a century is the United Kingdom. There is no question about that.

Mr. Abbott: We have never sold potatoes in that market.

Mr. Rowe: I am not going to be disturbed about whether we sell potatoes or not.

Mr. Abbott: Page the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Hatfield).

Mr. Rowe: I never grew many potatoes—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Rowe: So far as this issue is concerned at the present time I know that in the United States at different times there has been a market for a lot of potatoes.

Mr. Abbott: There surely has.

Mr. Rowe: There surely has, yes; but in 1920 we sold in the British market 250 million pounds of bacon; and in 1930, when we were in somewhat the same position as the minister indicates today, we were importing from Denmark bacon which was being sold on the butcher shop counters in Regina, and which had been fattened on western grain as well in Denmark. Denmark was selling to Britain over 600 million pounds of bacon a year. We actually lost that market, as the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) so well knows.

It is true that at the present time there is a socialist government in Britain, but even that might change—

An hon. Member: We hope.

Mr. Rowe: But regardless of that, we have been losing these markets, and no one knows that better than the Minister of Agriculture. He seems to say these things himself but he does not like my saying them. He knows we are losing this market. Several years ago he told us in the house how many trade agreements we had with Britain. He named them over and over. We had trade agreements for cheese, for bacon, for wheat, for eggs, for powdered milk. We had all sorts of trade agreements. We have lost them.

Mr. Gardiner: We never had as many as you fellows say we had.

Mr. Rowe: We have lost them so fast it was difficult to keep track of them.

In 1946 the United Kingdom drew up new trade agreements with foreign countries, with other parts of the empire, with other parts of the sterling area, and indeed with countries inside and outside the iron curtain. But, Mr. Speaker, that is not the most alarming feature of these trade agreements. The most alarming feature is that they have been drawn up for five and ten years. That is why in all sincerity I urge this government to take cognizance of the motion that has been moved and try to sit around a table with other members of the British commonwealth and empire to see if there is not something they need. I know very well that we have been importing into Canada in the last couple of years millions of dollars' worth of goods that could have been purchased in the sterling area. I know, and other hon. members know, that the United Kingdom was selling to Russia, to Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, and Poland, heavy steel equipment that we could have used here. Surely, you could sit around with a group of businessmen and work out something on that score. What is going to happen? Why are we going to spend a billion dollars to get ready to support the Atlantic pact unless we are going to be secure in trade? Would it not be the feasible thing to ask around the conference table when you are having a caucus of all the members of the British commonwealth and empire? What is going to happen if some time, like a flash in the night, we are in a death struggle with that great power to the west? Could we not say to one of the members of the commonwealth: You have been getting pit props from there; you have been buying your lumber from there; you have been buying a million tons of barley and wheat from there at a time when we cannot sell our wheat. These are conditions that could be developed.

I know that the Minister of Agriculture, every member of the government and every member of the House of Commons must be a bit concerned about the near future. There would have to be a change overnight because we would have to be their suppliers again. Therefore, if we are so essential to them in time of trouble, and we talk so much about the Atlantic pact, and how we must stick together in time of trouble, surely there is a chance to sit down and talk in time of peace.

Mr. Gardiner: The Tory press will be getting after you.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The Free Press has been getting after you.

Mr. Rowe: I hope I am not like some hon. members. If the Tory press or the Liberal press gets after me I will not say that I have been misquoted.

Mr. Abbott: Sell them the paper.

Mr. Gardiner: Sometimes they misquote you.

Mr. Rowe: No, I don't sell them the paper.

Mr. Gardiner: You may get someone after you because of this speech.

Mr. Rowe: I am not at all disturbed, nor am I ashamed to help make something that brings a lot of money into this country. Not at all. I appreciate the humorous remarks of my hon. friends, but I am still interested in agriculture. I may have too much of agriculture along with the other interests I have at the present time. I have farmed probably as long as the average member in the house, and I still farm a lot of land. I am a little interested in the beef cattle business. I have a hundred head of pure-bred Shorthorn cattle if any of you wish to buy them. I am now doing a little advertising. I am not going to be sidetracked—somebody said "Sell them to Great Britain." In all seriousness, Mr. Speaker, I do say that we should consider trying to hold this sterling market. Contracts were made with the countries that I have mentioned. These countries were buying Britain's heavy material. Forty-six trading contracts were made for bacon, eggs, cheese, grain, apples, fish, lumber, pit props, newsprint and other materials. We use enormous quantities of heavy steel. We use a lot of coal. Before the war we bought a million and a half tons of Welsh coal. We are now buying about 50,000 tons. We use a lot of chemicals and other things that Britain could supply. These agreements that were made with Poland, Hungary, Russia, Sweden and the Netherlands are all agreements for the very things that we want to sell; and they are taking in place of them a lot of things that we want to buy.

I notice in the press, in red headlines, the Minister of Agriculture is reported as having said that he is very confident about the British market. He said that Britain would remain one of Canada's major markets until 1952.

Mr. Lennard: What date is that?

Mr. Rowe: The press clipping is dated February 12, 1950. It said that Britain will remain one of Canada's major markets until 1952 and then she will immediately become one of the dominion's best markets. If he believes it is going to be good until 1950 and then it is going to be one of our best markets, I do not understand it. I can hardly understand why that is. I should like to refer again to the Toronto Star, which I know has never misquoted the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). They report that the minister said that the United Kingdom will be back in two years as strong as ever. You will notice that that is just about the time the Marshall aid is finished, the plan that has helped us to sell what we are selling now. It will be finished in 1952 but that is the time the Minister of Agriculture says they are going to bounce back. I hope that he is correct.

Mr. Towers of the Bank of Canada says that the future is very gloomy, that it will take a long steady pull. He says the over-all picture is very gloomy indeed and that so long as these customers have difficulty in securing enough dollars to pay for their requirements in foodstuffs and raw materials they will certainly give low priority to fully manufactured goods. However, he said that there was a silver lining, that the people of the world would eventually be brought back to a more even keel, through the functioning of multilateral trading.

Then the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) said that the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) had suggested that a conference should be held but he was very much concerned about what the agenda would be. If you want the hon. member for Lake Centre and myself to write an agenda we probably could do it, but I do not think you should expect the hon. member for Lake Centre to make up the agenda for a conference of members of the British commonwealth. We believe he is one of the most brilliant members in the house but we have never felt that he should be asked to lay out an agenda for an all-empire conference in one afternoon. At least you should give him time. He says that he would never agree to any such conference because he believes it would mean tariffs.

Mr. Abbott: I said that if it were to do what was done between 1930 and 1935 I would never agree to it.

Mr. Rowe: Apparently the minister cannot conceive of a conference being suggested by this side unless it was going to bring in the question of tariffs in some way. I can assure you that that has no relationship with this issue. I am glad to get your nod of approval. You believe me this time.

You say that to have a full conference is not desirable, but I do not know what other kind of conference would be desirable. When you get into such trouble as we are in at the present time, that is what must be done. I have every respect for the Minister of Finance; I have a great deal of respect for the Minister of Agriculture because we farmers must stick together the best we can; I have respect for the minister of external affairs. As the hon. member for Lake Centre said this afternoon, these pilgrimages are travelling all over the world and are creating nice public relationships.

Mr. Abbott: Attending conferences.

Mr. Rowe: They are flying here and there. We love to hear them say how well they were received. I think it was grand the other day when the minister of external affairs said that they banged the gavel and said, "Come on with the tea." I wish I had been there. However, these things do not buy shoes for the baby and they do not give men jobs. My friend says that he sold some tea, but I tell you that I do not think it is anything to be proud of if we cannot make money in any way except through what we drink.

I urge the government to really take this matter into serious consideration. I am not saying anything against the members of the cabinet, because they are respected men. Despite the fact that I do not agree with the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in matters of policy, I am satisfied that when he sits down at the table with representatives of the countries of the commonwealth he will represent Canada with dignity and decorum and ability. While he is over there, even we in the opposition will consider that he is our

Prime Minister as well as your Prime Minister, as you claim he is because he happens to be the leader of your party.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Not if this motion carries.

Mr. Rowe: You be a little careful, he might not be Prime Minister if this does not carry. Whether he is going to be Prime Minister or whether you are going to be Prime Minister, let me say: Do not sell the British commonwealth short. Any businessman who is selling the British commonwealth short today should take a look at the record.

Without discounting our contact with and our promotion of sales to the great republic to the south, we should still not sell the British commonwealth short. We will be prouder members of the United Nations, we will be more important associates of the United States, if we develop closer trade relationships with Britain. Then our farmers will be able to pay for their combines and tractors, they will be able to break up new fields. We will be able to develop our great resources so that if we ever have to strike again in our own defence we will be rich in our ability to produce agriculturally and industrially.

It is not only farm products that go to these countries. In Toronto they are building a complete new mill to be set up in India. In Montreal a complete textile mill is being built. I understand that a further 2,000 or 3,000 men would have been employed in Montreal in one plant if they had been able to sell an order for heavy material in the Far East. While they lost that order it indicates that can be done. I know there are other people besides the farmers in this country. My heart aches for the man who cannot get a job. I fear and shudder to think of the return of the days when men will be standing at factory gates waiting for jobs, good men, intelligent men, honest men.

If there is anything we can do, we should do it. I think the Minister of Finance will admit that it would not do any harm. Surely he is not so careful about the treasury of Canada especially when we have groups flying 26,000 or 27,000 miles. The cost of this would not be so great. If you think it would not do any harm, we suggest that it might do some good. If it will do some good, if it will help the farmers of Canada, if it will help the factories of this country to sell articles in the sterling areas, if it will give work to men, then I believe it is the thing to do.

Great Britain has consistently given us great favourable trade balances for three-quarters of a century and I urge the government not to lightly pass that off. If I have the privilege of being in this house much longer I hope I shall never hear again what we heard in the thirties, that we must not provoke the United States. They do not like us any better when we take that attitude. They expect us to mind our own business. They expect us to be strong. They expect us to be grown up. Canada is the greatest producing nation in the world for its population. We are a proud people and we never have provoked the United States of America. We live on a friendly basis beside them and we have great trade relationships with them.

But they have cut our products off overnight. That was not done in any spirit of antagonism or bitterness; it was done because they had to save their own markets. Only two weeks ago it was stated in congress that when a commodity became surplus it would not be allowed into the country. I would like to know what was written in the Geneva agreement which is in effect now before it has even been ratified by parliament. I would like to know what is in that agreement that says, when the man from Texas or Oklahoma states he has more beef or bacon than he knows what to do with: "Keep your steers down in Texas because we are going to buy from the Canadians. They have been very nice to us and have never provoked us so you can keep your cattle on the ranch because we are going to buy from the boys in Canada". Stop and think about it, Mr. Speaker. It has happened now two or three times, and it is in no spirit of antagonism that I suggest it may happen again. It is just because the United States minds its own economic business. They want and expect us to be economically strong, and they believe we are capable of minding our business.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, the question before the house this afternoon is one of great importance to Canada. I certainly think it is too important to be brushed aside in the manner in which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) has just treated the entire question. In a recent poll of public opinion it was shown that there is no other public question today with which our people are so much concerned as that of the loss of our markets. That is not surprising because over the years governments and political parties have been dinning into the ears of our people the importance of our export markets. The reason why our people place so much importance on the loss of them today is that they are associated in their minds with employment. There is a fear in Canada today that their loss will simply be the forerunner of unemployment and another depression such as we experienced in the thirties.

The minister has rejected the amendment. He has suggested that, although there may be no harm, certainly no good could come out of the calling of another conference as recommended by the amendment. He informed us that the government is already in possession of all the information that could possibly be obtained in such a meeting. In other words, he has told us that such a conference would be a mere waste of time. Then he suggested that possibly the Conservatives would be formulating the policy of that conference, and he asked the mover of the amendment to tell him what the agenda for it would be. He suggested he would not want to attend another conference to deal with subjects such as were dealt with in the thirties. Surely there is a difference. I am rather surprised that the minister should even suggest that the Conservatives would have any voice in determining the agenda. Can you imagine the great Liberal government of today asking the handful of Conservatives on this side of the house to suggest the agenda for a conference initiated by the government? Surely the government would be in a position, if it called such a meeting, to determine exactly what subjects should be put before it for discussion.

Of course the minister also forgets that since 1930 the Conservative party has become the Progressive Conservative party, and it is not beyond the realm of possibility that even concerning the matter of foreign conferences the Conservatives may have become much more progressive than they were in the dark days of the depression. Unless the minister can suggest some other alternative for meeting the problem, then I am prepared to support the amendment even at the risk of the Conservatives dictating to the Liberals what the nature of the conference should be.

Our problem today is one of finding markets for our goods. The minister has told us clearly that there are only certain ways in which we can hope to sell our goods to other countries. We must take their goods in return. If, as is the case in many countries which need our surplus goods today, they just have not the goods to give us in return, then we must find other means whereby they can pay us for our products in some way. The export of our surplus products is so essential to the economy of Canada that I submit the house should not allow the motion to go into supply to pass until the government show us that they have something to put before the house that, in their opinion, is a solution to the problem, if the amendment is not the answer to it.

The minister says that we can export our goods by lending dollars to these countries, but he told us that our supply of dollars is not sufficient to warrant our doing so. He told us we could borrow from the United States and lend the money to the countries wanting to purchase our goods, but he suggests that is not the solution and that no one wants to do so. He suggested that a third possibility was the reduction of consumption within our own country in order to accumulate money that we could lend. He suggested that the reduction of consumption in Canada would put us in a better position to lend to those countries that want to buy our goods, but he did not suggest that the government would even entertain the idea of advancing that as a solution to the problem.

I want to say to the minister that in my opinion the Canadian public are far out in front of the government in this respect. It is no credit to us as a nation, and I am quite sure the Canadian people do not consider it creditable, that we should attempt to consume all of our own production that we possibly can while millions of people in other parts of the world are in want, and when at the same time we have surpluses of goods that we ourselves cannot consume and which we cannot sell to them. It might not be as impossible, as the minister suggests, to institute a modified program of austerity in this country whereby we can provide these other countries that need our surpluses with the means to purchase them. I suggested that if the government are not prepared to accept the amendment they should come forward with some other concrete policy to show us that they are taking measures to meet the problem facing the country today.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I feel that the matter now up for discussion is of such importance to the future of Canada and the well-being of the Canadian people that I should say just a few things in connection with it. I believe the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) should be congratulated on bringing this most important question of Canada's trade before the house today. Before I conclude I shall have a brief word to say on the amendment the hon. member moved; but, Mr. Speaker, I have been tremendously surprised at the jaunty attitude this government has displayed towards this most important question facing Canada today, the question of our trade.

My colleague from Acadia (Mr. Quelch) mentioned that step by step this situation has been developing over a period of years. It is nothing new that has suddenly come to our attention. Our trade predicament today has grown up over so many years that if people in administrative positions had been watching the situation and had been free and willing to take independent action, facing the facts, the present situation could have been alleviated and our predicament could have been avoided. Back in 1946 the governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Graham Towers, had this to say in his report dated February 8 of that year:

> Looking to the future, however, there is no reason for complacency. Most of our real problems of post-war adjustment are still ahead. The backlog of demand will not be large in relation to productive capacity when industry has been fully reconverted and inventories built up to normal levels. When the time lag involved in demobilization is over, government expenditures will fall rapidly. Nor will our foreign lending to finance the purchase of Canadian goods remain indefinitely at the present level. The prevailing optimism on the North American continent is dangerous if it diverts attention from the problems which have to be faced.

That is the end of the warning which was given by the governor of the Bank of Canada away back in 1946. That warning has become a prophecy; and the last part of Mr. Towers' statement has been vindicated in the action and lack of action by the government opposite. The Liberal government has continued to consistently disregard the warnings not only of Mr. Towers but of others who saw the situation developing. We do not have to start in 1946; we can go back further than that and point out to this government definite actions they took which have had the cumulative effect of precipitating the present bad trade situation.

With respect to the proposal of the hon. member for Lake Centre, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) says he does not want to go to a conference unless he knows exactly what the conference is going to do. The minister was not a member of the government back in 1944, but he was on the government side of the house. At that time, when the conference was called at Bretton Woods, New Hampshire, did the government say they would not take part in that conference without knowing exactly what it was going to do? I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that they jumped into that conference; they not only went down completely ignorant of what it was going to do but came back completely befuddled and confused as to what it had done. If anyone wants proof of that statement all that is necessary is to go back to 1945 and read the debates that took place in this house in connection with the Bretton Woods proposal.

So I say that while the present minister was not there, he must assume some responsibility for what was done; and let me say just one other thing about this business of not knowing what a conference is going to do. Following the war Canadian influence throughout the world was great. There has never been a time when Canada's word, Canada's counsel or Canada's warning has meant so much. At that time the people of the world would have been likely to heed what Canada said. Well, if at that time Canada had used her influence to see to it that a clause something like this was written into the Bretton Woods agreement: "The creditor nations agree that it is their obligation to accept goods and services in payment for the goods and services they export, and that this obligation will be continuously recognized and observed", I feel satisfied that something of the kind would have been included. But instead of using our influence in that way we plunged in without full recognition of what that agreement was going to do to us and how impossible it would be for the convertibility of currencies to take care of the trade situation which was developing, since the United States insisted upon following the program she had been following for quite a number of years, a program which they think must have attached to it a favourable balance of trade for the U.S.A. every year.

Well, sir, everyone knows that if the United States is not going to buy enough goods in the markets of the world to provide the other nations with dollars, then those other nations cannot buy from the United States, or from Canada. That was patently clear at the time, so I am going to ask the minister why the Canadian delegation went to Bretton Woods without knowing a single thing about what the proposals would be, and why it came away without any definite idea of what it had done. I do not see why in the world he should be afraid of a conference such as that suggested by the hon. member for Lake Centre. I would not want to go to a conference without knowing something of what was proposed, of course; but getting a definite idea of what the agenda might be would not be out of the question. I believe if the government showed some inclination to sit down and discuss this whole thing honestly and straightforwardly with all parties in this house, an acceptable agenda could be drafted; and I am satisfied that such an agenda could be made also acceptable to the other members of the commonwealth.

The minister says the Geneva agreements have been of the greatest benefit to Canada; and as an example he cited the increase in our trade with the United States which has resulted from certain tariff concessions. That is perhaps one of the good results; but I will say the minister certainly has a fetish on Geneva, and I do not think he can possibly justify the weakness in the non-discrimination clause. The great weakness in the non-discrimination feature of the Geneva agreements is that it does not permit a country like Canada to choose her source of supply. Nor does it permit any other country that is a party to it to choose its source of supply. I do not believe it is right in a world which is now crying for fair dealing in trade. As a matter of fact, I thought that the Minister of Finance would be the last person in Canada to try to defend the non-discrimination features of the Geneva agreements, because he was caught in the meshes of it in 1947. Not only that, but he put Canada in a most ridiculous position, by making it impossible for Canadians to buy their own production without paying a tax on it, simply to placate certain interests in the United States who insisted on the Geneva non-discrimination clause.

The Minister of Finance should be the last man to defend that clause, because it prohibited Canadians from buying green vegetables and tomatoes in the fall of 1947, since the minister had prohibited their entry from the United States, in order to protect our dwindling supply of United States dollars. The Canadian people have not forgotten that. They are the people who are demanding that the minister justify that with something more than the assertion that we benefited greatly by having tariff reductions. Those tariff reductions could have been made without the non-discrimination clause. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that any country in this world that wants to be fair and just in its trade relationship will not insist upon a non-discrimination clause. Such a country will first see what sort of reductions can be made in the tariffs without the necessity of such a clause. There would be no need for the non-discrimination clause, if the United States and other creditor nations were to fully recognize their responsibilities in a world in which trade is so seriously unbalanced as ours. This unbalance arises mainly from the serious unbalance in industrial capacity.

I do feel that the United States is not bound to follow the policy which she has been following for many years, that is a policy of economic conquest. Surely it would be possible for Canada, with her influence, to stand up and say that we will enter into negotiations to make trade easier and to help remove the restrictions, provided you will not insist upon this diabolical non-discrimination clause. The minister mentioned Canadian cattle going to the United States. He suggested that the member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) was perhaps wrong in his assumption, because of the fact that the United States was ready to take in many of the cattle from his own constituency. Let me say that the United States ought to be the last to put an embargo against the entry of Canadian cattle into that country. It is a creditor nation and has a favourable balance of trade, which we do not have. I do not take what the minister said too seriously.

Mr. Abbott: Discrimination can work both ways.

Mr. Low: The sort of discrimination the minister suggests is the same sort as Pat said he was going to exercise against the railroad. He said he was going to buy a return ticket, and he was not going back. It is discrimination to balance trade, of course, not unbalance it. The Minister of Finance stated that if we were to accept sterling it is likely we would have to reduce consumption within Canada. I do not take the same position as the member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy). I should like to draw to the attention of this house the surpluses that are here in reality, or that could be here, but for the policies of this government—policies of taxation and restriction that discourage production.

I should like to read briefly from what the Minister of Agriculture said in a speech before the Canadian chamber of commerce in London in 1948.

> It is difficult for us to understand why anyone should expect us to be other than disappointed with the 1949 contracts. They provide for 160 million pounds of bacon, for 50 million pounds of cheese, and no cattle or beef.

A little further along, he says:

> There are no dollars available in the United Kingdom with which to purchase Canadian apples. Partly because of this we have financed the pulling out of 240,000 apple trees in Nova Scotia. There are no dollars available with which to purchase Canadian fish.

I suppose if it were possible to pull out the fish beds, the government would do that, and pay for it. It is a policy of discouraging and restricting production. I say that when you do that you are making it impossible for the Canadian people to help a world that is sadly lacking in food.

It is important for us to keep in mind that the minister went over to England, and negotiated with the British people, not for 160 million pounds of bacon. At another point in his speech the minister said:

> All of our discussions on food bulk contracts were proceeding satisfactorily until difficulties arose in adjusting the relationship between dollars and sterling. We were aiming at being able to provide the United Kingdom with 350 million pounds of bacon, 125 million pounds of cheese, 75 million dozens of eggs and having 400,000 head of cattle which we could dispose of either to the United States or the United Kingdom.

Instead of that, we had to sign a contract for 160 million pounds of bacon and 50 million pounds of cheese. There is no question about it, if the market had been provided under an agreement, the Canadian farmers would have put up the 350 million pounds of bacon. They would have produced to the utmost of their capabilities if the market had been there, and if taxation and other government policies had not been imposed upon them which restricted that production. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that these amounts of food, which have gone unproduced, could be looked upon as at least potential surpluses of goods that would have been available to send to these other countries, making it unnecessary to do what the minister said, reduce consumption. In the light of what has happened, I believe that is stupid in the extreme. I would say that no pound of food should go unproduced, so long as there is a need for it or a market for it anywhere in the world. No man should go unemployed for the lack of producing those things, as long as there is a willingness on the part of other people to buy and consume those things.

There is no question but what we could accept sterling, and finance it internally until such time as that blocked or non-convertible sterling could be traded around the sterling area for goods that we could bring back to this country. I have not been convinced by any argument to the contrary thus far. I would refer the Minister of Agriculture to one other thing. At the C.F.A. conference which took place in Niagara last month, it was brought to the attention of the delegates that poultry production had been reduced by 8 to 12 per cent, because of the failure to keep our markets with Britain. That is a serious reduction. It represents an amount of poultry and egg production that could well be available for trading if it had not been restricted by the fear that there would be no market. When I say, Mr. Speaker, that we cannot just look at the situation as it is, but must look at it as it could be under the proper inducements, you will see what I mean.

Before I close, there is one other thing I should like to mention. In common with the member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) and others who have spoken, I believe that if the government feels this proposed conference is not the answer to our trading problem, if it does not hold out any hope for the success of such conference, the government should bring forward a program that will do something. Until that is done, my followers in this house and myself can do nothing else but support the motion put before us by the member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker).

[Mr. Low.]

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): In supporting this amendment, Mr. Speaker, which has been moved by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), I must join with those who have preceded me in saying that they are unable to understand the reasoning and the attitude of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), in his apparently ill considered and certainly very quick dismissal of the idea of holding at this time a commonwealth conference to discuss trade and related matters.

As I took note of the minister's remarks, he said in effect that he could not see that any good purpose would be served at the present time by having more conferences. It seems to me that the thing we should bear in mind is that, so far, we have not had since 1932 a trade conference of the type envisaged. We have not had a full-scale commonwealth trade conference since then. It is true that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), as he told us in his report recently on his trip to southeast Asia, did discuss or talk about trade matters with the other representatives there; but the fact is that that conference was not called to deal with trade matters. There were no trade experts there. Certainly the impression given was that, so far as trade was discussed, it was an informal discussion and trade was discussed as a side issue. It certainly was not the main subject of the conference. Indeed, from what the minister told us in his report, it became obvious that not only with regard to trade but even with regard to the matters that they did meet to discuss, they had neither intended nor apparently expected to reach agreement. Indeed, he told us that it was rather nice to sit down at the conference table and find out how far apart the different views were without actually coming to blows because of those differences; whether it was merely because the countries concerned were commonwealth countries or whether the tea had something to do with it, the minister did not tell us; but it seemed to me to be an approach to a conference that was almost certain to lead to negative results.

Before coming to the subject matter of the resolution itself, I should like to refer to one other point raised by the leader of the C.C.F. party in his remarks when he said, as I understood him, that he agreed in principle with the amendment but that he would not be able to support it unless it was clear that it was not necessarily a motion in support of the building up of a tariff structure. That matter has been dealt with by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) in his remarks following the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). But if further assurance is necessary, then as far as I can give it—and I can speak for myself, at any rate—I can say that I would not support the motion or speak in support of it if I understood that such was its intent. But I do not understand that to be its intent. I understand it to be a motion advocating the summoning of a conference to discuss ways and means of eliminating trade barriers between the commonwealth countries, and as nothing more nor less than that. In that respect it is the very opposite of a high-tariff conference.

It seems to me that the motion calling for a conference is justified by the fact that the two thoughts uppermost in the minds of the Canadian people at the present time are, first, the increasing unemployment figures and, second, the loss of markets and the declining farm prices with which this country is faced. It was said recently, and I think it is certainly true, that it is not advisable nor desirable, particularly in the House of Commons, to emphasize fears, doubts and dismay as to the future. That is not my purpose in mentioning these two facts of unemployment and declining trade; but certainly those two problems do exist, and, in the minds of our people, they are large.

We shall not solve those problems unless we consider them, discuss them and meet them fairly and squarely. If we do that, Mr. Speaker, I for my part believe that we in Canada can solve our problems. I believe that those problems will disappear if we adopt the policies which can build this country into a great and prosperous trading nation, the senior partner in the commonwealth, the friend and ally of the United States. But as firmly as I believe that Canada can be made into that type of country, I believe that if we drift, if we allow this present tendency to continue, not only shall we not achieve that ambition, but we are in danger of facing conditions which are much worse than they are today.

In dealing with these two problems of unemployment and falling farm prices, may I say that it seems to me they are both the result of the same fact, namely, that we are losing our markets, particularly those in the commonwealth and sterling countries. In the same way they result from a remarkable unbalance in the Canadian economy, in the sense that we produce, particularly in the field of agriculture, far more than we can consume at home; and because of that fact we are dependent, as perhaps no other country is, to such a large extent upon overseas markets for what we produce. Our history up to the present has been one of constantly recurring surpluses in that those markets slip away for one reason or another, and we are left with large quantities of surpluses here at home for which we can find no sale.

I want to discuss the situation both generally under the heading of this amendment before the house and particularly with reference to a problem which is vital to the area from which I come, namely, the problem facing our apple growers. There we have again, as we had in the 1930's and several times prior to that, a condition of recurring surpluses resulting entirely from the sudden loss of a market. As you know, Mr. Speaker, an apple grower's program is one taking from seven to twelve years to come to maturity. The marketing program of the orchardist cannot be changed overnight, because his tree takes some seven to eight years to come into bearing at all, and at least twelve years before it is bearing fully. He is therefore not in the happy position of some other producers who can change their program overnight. When his markets are lost, there is nothing he can do about it. That is the situation facing our apple growers in this country, particularly those in British Columbia today.

It is with that in mind that I want to discuss this resolution suggesting that we have a conference of commonwealth countries to discuss our trade problems, because our great market for apples has always been the United Kingdom. Unless we can restore that market, we are not going to solve the problem facing our particular growers.

Mr. Speaker: We are expecting a message from the Senate at any moment.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps for the purpose of the debate I might be allowed to call it six o'clock.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think it would be regular to call it six o'clock, because we shall return here after the members have gone to the Senate. May I ask the hon. member to allow his speech to be interrupted at the present time.

Mr. Fulton: Gladly.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Right Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly the house went up to the Senate chamber.

Alberta Natural Gas Company

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the house that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give in His Majesty's name the royal assent to the following bill:

An act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

ALBERTA NATURAL GAS COMPANY

Mr. Ralph Maybank (Winnipeg South Centre) moved the second reading of Bill No. 7, to incorporate Alberta Natural Gas Company.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Maybank: Mr. Speaker, there is very little to say, as I think every hon. member knows about this bill. This bill is the same as the one that was introduced last session which was the subject of considerable discussion. I think all that is necessary is to remind the house that it is simply an application for a charter to do business; it is no more than that.

The only difference in the bill this year is in the names of the applicants; otherwise its terms are the same as all the other bills which have been passed by this house. The house will remember that the main objection to the bill before was to a clause which would permit the company, when incorporated, to apply for permission to build a pipe line in or outside Canada. That same right has been given to other companies which have come before the house.

There was a considerable amount of talk in connection with the counterpart to this bill and I fancy that the house is familiar with all the arguments brought forward at the last session. If I spoke further I would only be using up the time for private bills unnecessarily and I think the opponents of the bill will want to use up that time themselves. With that explanation of the matter I might as well stop now.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Where are you going to build it?

Mr. Maybank: I do not know.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): You do know, don't you?

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word or two on this bill. As I said last year, while there are eighteen members from British Columbia no one was prepared to sponsor a bill to permit the building of a pipe line unless it was built over an all-Canadian route. It would appear tonight that that was the unanimous feeling of those members. I am not familiar with the rules of the house, except those that I break. This is not a political bill, yet it was not possible to secure a British Columbia member to sponsor it.

It was only by the indulgence of some of us who believe in an all-Canadian route that the house waited for the hon. member to move the second reading. I am a rather junior member of the house, having been here only since 1940, but it is the first time in my experience that we have had to wait for a sponsor of a bill to make the motion for second reading.

They had to go across this great country of Canada to find a sponsor for this bill, and finally they settled on one from the middle province. I have a great deal of admiration for Manitoba because my father and mother were married there. That was the best thing that ever happened to Manitoba. Any province that can inspire two people to bring into the world the great member for Fraser Valley must have something within its boundaries.

An hon. Member: Cold weather.

Mr. Cruickshank: A few remarks are being made by some of my Manitoba associates. As I said before, while there are eighteen members from British Columbia, not one would sponsor this particular bill, bighearted as we are out there. We have often bled for the maritimes and we have contributed to central Canada. Tonight out of our bigheartedness we waited for the bill to be called. I was almost going to sponsor it myself because I felt it should not be lost in the wilderness.

My attitude to the bill is the same as it was last year. I have no hesitation in so stating and no apology to offer. At the last session some of us were accused of staging a filibuster on this measure. Personally I do not think we did, but nevertheless, together with the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell), may I say that I have no apology to offer for staging a filibuster if it is necessary in order to secure the best results for my riding and my province and if it is in the best economic interests of Canada. It is one of the few weapons a private member has when the interests of his riding and his province are involved.

Some remarks have been made, although belatedly, by the sponsor of the bill. I can appreciate that they hesitated to put before the house what they thought was right. If I were the sponsor of a measure which was not in the best interests of western Canada, or of the majority of the people of the country as a whole, I too would hesitate before appearing to introduce the bill to the house. I want to make myself perfectly clear. I was criticized by some at the last session when I took the same stand that I am taking tonight. I am speaking tonight as the member for the constituency of Fraser Valley, and for no other riding in the province of British Columbia. Nevertheless I think I have the same right as any other member from that province to speak on its behalf. I want to make it clear I am speaking tonight in the interests of my own riding, and I say without fear of contradiction from anyone that I have the full support of each and every individual in the Fraser valley in the stand I am taking, irrespective of party, creed or race. I want to make that clear because it has been suggested that probably I took too much upon myself in speaking for the province of British Columbia. At the same time, I think I have the right to speak on behalf of that province more than any other member from that section of the country because I represent the finest part of the province.

Our attitude is not that of people who are opposed to any particular company. So far as I know, those of us who opposed the passage of this measure last year adopt the same attitude this year. I think I am speaking for the people of the province when I say we are prepared to withdraw our opposition, and certainly I am, the minute that the company, as the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) said last year, insert some five words in the charter of incorporation, that it will be an all-Canadian route. We who are opposing the bill believe that we have a great future in Canada, and particularly in western Canada. In order to fulfil that future we believe we must develop the natural resources of our country.

At this point I should like to say to my friends of the maritimes, who in many cases have not had all they should have secured from the rest of Canada, that we in the provinces of British Columbia and Alberta have done our share to see that subsidies were paid to them. We have endeavoured to see that justice was done to the maritimes. I should also like to point out to the provinces of Quebec and Ontario that they have gained their great place in the nation through the efforts and the wealth of western Canada. We hear much of the St. Lawrence waterway scheme. I should like to say to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec that the only way you can secure the fulfilment of the St. Lawrence waterway scheme is through the support of the people of the west, and Alberta and British Columbia in particular.

Mr. Fulford: And the co-operation of the United States.

Mr. Cruickshank: I am quite prepared to talk on Canada but Harry Truman will have to look after himself. We are prepared to do our share as we have in the past. I wonder who paid for the Welland canal? We paid our share. Why? Because it developed Canada as a whole, not just Ontario. We in Alberta and British Columbia paid our share of the cost, and we are again prepared to pay our share of the cost of the development of the St. Lawrence waterway.

I want to appeal to my friends from Ontario and Quebec. When we are prepared, as we have been in the past, to do our share to develop central Canada, is it not fair that you in turn should do your part to assist us to develop the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia? To hon. members from the maritimes may I repeat that we are aware of the injustices that were done to you since confederation. I defy any member from the maritimes to say that at any time any member from the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia has done anything but support your just claims for subsidies. I am appealing particularly to the new province of Newfoundland, the tenth province, which by its entry into confederation has completed our dominion. You should realize more than any other province what it means to secure justice within your own sphere. That is all we are asking for, Mr. Speaker. We are not interested in any particular company. We are not asking for any particular subsidy or assistance, but we are asking that the resources of Canada be developed within the country for the benefit of Canadians as a whole.

Naturally I am interested in my own riding just as every other hon. member is in his. I want to digress for a minute. There are 262 members in the House of Commons, all of whom are fine men, and all of whom are sincere in endeavouring to do their duty to the best of their ability on behalf of their particular ridings and the country as a whole. There may be one exception so we will make it 261. I want them to look at things as I look at them, and not with any intention of talking against time, because I have no such intention. I want them to look at the welfare of Canada as a whole, and I particularly want them to remember that the prosperity of western Canada means their own prosperity. Too often we have had sectionalism; too often we have had one district pulling against another, one province against another. That is not in the best interests of Canada. I maintain that this bill is designed to disrupt the economy of Canada as no other bill ever brought before us was designed to do.

For a few years, as you know, Alberta was not in the best of circumstances financially. Fortunately for them this liquid gold has come flowing from the earth and we are very glad it has, because it put Alberta in a better position than it has ever been in. It is now able to pay its way, and my information is that very shortly the provincial debt will be liquidated. Paying taxes in British Columbia, as I do, I am not so sure when we will be able to liquidate our debt; but if the action is taken that I and those who are with me recommend, I believe we will soon be in the position that Alberta is in now.

At the present time the best prospects for liquid gold on the North American continent are within the boundaries of Alberta. I am also informed that prospects are equally bright in Saskatchewan. When I say that, I am speaking only of oil and gas, and I am referring to the kind of gas we burn and use, not the kind we hear of in that province at the present time. We in the Fraser valley are of one mind on this matter. I hope during the next four years I may have the same united support, coming from all parties, as I have had on this issue. As I said before, there are not eighteen people in British Columbia who believe in this United States route. They could not even get a sponsor for this bill within our province, because not a person there believes in the southern route.

When I make that statement it is supported by the attorney general of my province. After all, you know, a federal member may be accused of speaking purely in the interests of his own riding. I have not authority to speak for the provincial government. The only person who can do that is a representative of that government. In our province we had a competition for the leadership of the party, as I believe other parties have had competitions; and the man who was defeated for the leadership became the attorney general. I do not know about other provinces, but in British Columbia the attorney general is a very important man; and I want to quote briefly what he has said. I do not want to delay things; I should like this matter to be dealt with one way or the other. I am referring now to the Calgary Herald. I do not subscribe to that newspaper, nor do I know what kind of newspaper it is. I see the name "Calgary", however, which reminds me that I went to the Grey Cup finals last year and lost a little money on the Stampeders. Under date of February 7 this newspaper says:

B.C. declared anxious to get Alberta gas
Attorney general presents government view to hearing

Hon. Gordon Wismer, attorney general of British Columbia, said his government was anxious that natural gas be made available to the people of British Columbia "if and when the government of Alberta determines that in the interests of the people of Alberta a permit for exportation can properly be granted."

Those are the views of the attorney general of British Columbia, the province from which I come; and to the best of my ability I am trying to give the feelings of that province with respect to the export of gas.

He made the statement this morning when presenting a brief on behalf of the British Columbia government to the petroleum and natural gas conservation board of Alberta, presently hearing the application of Westcoast Transmission Company Ltd. for a licence to export gas from Alberta.

Through you, Mr. Speaker, I want to bring this to the attention of hon. members from the central provinces and the maritimes, whom we have supported at all times in their demands for fair play. I ask them to pay particular attention to the remainder of this quotation.

Mr. Wismer said the British Columbia government "strongly supported the proposal that such a line should be built from northern Alberta into and through British Columbia and thence, if sufficient gas is available, to the Pacific northwest states of the United States.

I am sure hon. members will appreciate the significance of that statement, representing the views of British Columbia, urging that this line be built within Canada to serve our own people and in particular those of my province. We have reason to believe that in northern British Columbia we have oil and gas deposits equal to those of Alberta. We also believe there are deposits in northern Alberta equal to or greater than those already developed in that province. The only way these deposits can be developed is by providing an outlet. For that reason I think I am justified in reading a little further from the remarks of the attorney general of British Columbia, as they appear in the Calgary Albertan of February 8:

"If there is an exportable surplus of gas in Alberta the province of British Columbia would like to see Canadian requirements get priority over export to the United States," Hon. Gordon Wismer, attorney general for British Columbia, told the Alberta petroleum and natural gas conservation board Tuesday.

Mr. Wismer was welcomed by the Hon. Lucien Maynard, attorney general for Alberta. Said Mr. Maynard: "We are not so callous as to be unconcerned about the misfortunes of the past few weeks in British Columbia or a possible repetition of disastrous floods. Whatever remarks or suggestions

Mr. Wismer has to make before this board, I am sure will receive the most careful consideration by the board, the people of this province, and the government."

Mr. Wismer's suggestion was this: "We are and have been strongly supporting the proposal that such a line (gas export) should be built from northern Alberta into and through British Columbia, and thence, if sufficient gas is available, to the Pacific northwest states of the United States of America.

That is just part of it. There has been some suggestion that we were opposed to the export of gas to the United States. Those of us who are opposing this bill are definitely of the opposite opinion. We believe that the surplus must be exported to the United States in order to make the building of the line possible. The only stand that we take is that the export of gas must be made from the Vancouver end of the line, instead of having the end of the line come into Vancouver from the United States.

I have here a copy of an advertisement that appeared in the Calgary press last year. I shall not read it in detail because one of the members from Calgary read it. This advertisement was placed in the paper by the company now applying for a charter. It indicates that this company would like to take the gas through the United States, and if there is any left over, providing the United States permits it, that amount will be brought back into Vancouver. I say without fear of contradiction, Mr. Speaker, that Vancouver is the fastest growing city in Canada. The city of Vancouver and the lower mainland of the Fraser valley contain about 58 per cent of the population of the province of British Columbia. One company is proposing to build an all-Canadian route, although it is definitely opposed by the company now applying for a charter. The all-Canadian route has been termed feasible by the largest firm of engineers in that line of work in the United States. This company is prepared to put that line through and deliver gas in 1952 to the city of Vancouver. This route would serve the cities of Vernon, Kamloops, Penticton, Kelowna, and have a side line to the city of Trail. We hear a good deal about this city of Trail, and I am not surprised at that. As we heard over the C.B.C. on Sunday night, Trail is one of the best developed cities in the Dominion of Canada.

While I did not see this event, owing to the fact that I was sick in bed, it was a sad sight to hear of the people of my riding lining up for two sacks of coal to which they were entitled. Surely we are entitled to have this cheaper fuel delivered to us, as the company is willing and prepared to do. One company is willing to deliver gas which may be used as a fuel for commercial or domestic purposes, but the other company desires a charter to deliver it through the United States, and thence back into Canada. I am well aware of the fact that copies of these private bills are not distributed to many homes in the province of British Columbia. It surprised me, Mr. Speaker, that in my riding, as well as the other ridings in the dominion, copies of Hansard are read by so many people. So that the people of my own riding, and I hope the people of other ridings within the province of British Columbia, will be under no misapprehension as to those who desire to develop the resources of Canada not for Canadians but for material gain, I propose to name those who are back of this company. The lust for gold equals the lust for power. I have never been able to understand why some people who are multimillionaires have a greater lust for gold. The only way I can understand it is to believe that they have a greater lust for power.

Because this bill will not be distributed in my riding, or throughout the province generally, I am going to read the names of the directors as they appear in the bill.

John Joseph Connolly, of the city of Ottawa in the province of Ontario, one of His Majesty's Counsel; William Joseph Dick, of the city of Edmonton, in the province of Alberta, consulting engineer; Abner Faison Dixon, of the city of Houston, in the state of Texas, and of the city of New York, geologist and engineer.

I hope the people of British Columbia will take special note of the next part.

Harvey Reginald MacMillan, C.B.E., of the city of Vancouver, in the province of British Columbia, industrialist; John Wray Moyer, of the city of Calgary, in the province of Alberta, oil executive; Cortelyou Ladd Simonson, of the city of New York, in the state of New York, investment banker;

Here is another name to which I hope the people of the Fraser Valley riding will pay attention.

Austin Cottrell Taylor, C.B.E., of the city of Vancouver, in the province of British Columbia, mining executive; together with such persons as may become shareholders in the company, are incorporated under the name of Alberta Natural Gas Company, hereinafter called "the company."

This company could not secure a sponsor from any of the members from the province of British Columbia. I hope the people of British Columbia will pay attention to that.

As I said before, some people may have a lust for power, or some may have a lust for gold. I do not know which one this is. I could go on talking for some time, but I do not want more than my fair share of the time. There has been some suggestion that this company would not be able to finance itself. At least two of us who spoke last year made the statement that it is not practicable to have two pipe lines to the coast, at least for a period of ten years. Everyone knows that these companies must be financed in the general money market, that is in both the United States and Canada. These people are in it to make money, and I presume to make plenty of money. It is not practical to have two companies. It is now suggested that the one company which has had an application before the board in Alberta for almost three weeks, applying for an all-Canadian route, no "ifs" or "buts" about it, have been opposed at every step by this company that wants to go through the United States. I cannot quite understand this. Not so many years ago some men who are a great deal smarter than I am had no more money than I have but they are now multimillionaires as a result of money made out of British Columbia, and they want to exploit Canada and their own province to gain millions by going into the United States and back into Canada.

Here is what the B.C. Electric, the people who distribute gas in Vancouver, say:

> Construction of a natural gas pipe line over an all-Canadian route from Alberta to Vancouver was supported today by the B.C. Electric Company.

The B.C. Electric Company is our largest individual company in the province of British Columbia. To continue:

> The B.C. Electric got behind the Westcoast Transmission Company which applied to the Alberta Petroleum and Natural Gas conservation board for permission to build the line through the Yellowhead pass in the Rockies and Fraser valley to the west coast.
>
> The board is presently hearing submissions on the application in Calgary.
>
> The B.C. Electric brought a brief stating that widespread use of Alberta's natural gas for heating and industrial purposes would result throughout B.C. from construction of the line.
> The company foresaw a swing from coal, wood and oil to Alberta gas—if the Westcoast Transmission Company is allowed to build the line.

So that there will be no misunderstanding about it I want to repeat that, in so far as my objection is concerned, if this company would just incorporate within their application "an all-Canadian route", my opposition would drop immediately; and I have every reason to believe that other members have views similar to those I hold and would adopt the same attitude. The company have the opportunity; it is up to them. The one company is able to proceed, we are informed by a hearing before this Alberta board; and if I had the time I should like to quote from the report, but I am trying to speed up.

I should like to quote the premier of the province of Alberta when he said that no gas would be exported from Alberta unless sufficient guarantee was given that there was a surplus sufficient to take care of the needs of his own province. For that statement I commend him; I think he is using excellent judgment. The premier of Alberta also said that the people of Canada should be served first. That is all that we who are opposing this bill are suggesting. We say that the people of Canada should be served first. After all, if we are to develop a united Canada we must work together one with another. One province must co-operate with the other. Here we have great financiers of Canada, as well as of the United States, offering to finance an all-Canadian route to deliver gas from Alberta, affording opportunities for the development of gas and oil in northern Alberta and northern British Columbia.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): May I ask the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) a question? Will he kindly tell me why the company which he is espousing, and which he favours so greatly, refuses to service the city of Dawson Creek, British Columbia, from gas wells which it owns within six miles of the centre of that city?

Mr. Cruickshank: I am not espousing any particular company, but I am glad my hon. friend raised that question. I do not know how much time I have left, but I wish I had time to go into the matter fully. I would be delighted to answer the question. Apparently I am near the end of my time.

Mr. Speaker: I might inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Go on.

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not think that there should be any extension of time during the hour for private bills, having regard to the fact that we know what happened during the last session of parliament.

An hon. Member: There should not be any interruptions.

Mr. Cruickshank: There were interruptions. May I have one minute in which to finish? I was interrupted, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Certainly.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Cruickshank: Here is the sponsor of the bill telling me to sit down; he need not tell me to sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The only way in which the hon. member may continue is with the unanimous consent of the house.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Apparently it is not unanimous.

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): Between the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank), Mr. Speaker, I was a little bit slow in rising; believing that the hon. member for Fraser Valley is a most influential member in the house, I assumed that his simple request to be allowed to go on for one more minute would be granted in order that he might answer the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Murray). Since he did not have the opportunity of doing so, may I tell the hon. member for Cariboo this. If you want to build a line and its distribution system into Dawson Creek, you can have all the gas in the world. Don't blame anybody else for not spending money on building something that you, a local resident, would build for yourself, if you had any pride in your place.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Is the hon. member speaking as counsel for the Westcoast Transmission Company, Mr. Speaker? Dawson Creek is interested in the proposition.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Cruickshank: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker; the hon. member asks if the member who has the floor is counsel for the Westcoast Transmission Company. He is not, and I ask that the remark be withdrawn.

An hon. Member: Let him speak for himself.

Mr. Cruickshank: It so happens that when he is supporting me, I will support him. That is not a fair question.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I am not asking the hon. member for Cariboo to withdraw anything. Let him get rid of his blast. It suits him all right. It is nonsense, of course, but I accept it as that.

I intend to address myself to this subject, and perhaps I should ask somebody's pardon now because I do not intend to try to be smart with anyone—that is, from now on—and that includes the hon. member for Cariboo, if he will but possess his soul in patience and not get angry when he interrupts speakers who have the floor. I will admit that the little pink colour in his cheeks became him greatly, and perhaps he should continue in the way that he began.

I started to say, and I repeat, that I intend to present this matter with as little repetition as I can, on account of the belief that I have of the seriousness of the proposition which we are considering. Perhaps I may use a homely illustration to show to the house just how important this matter of natural gas is. I have lived in the city of Calgary for forty years; it was forty years last January. I have never burned a pound of coal in any one of the three houses in which I have lived. At the moment I have a smaller house than I had a year ago but it has a fair area. It is rather smaller upstairs than the foundation might indicate; had the builder carried it higher it would have been a reasonably-sized house. December was the coldest month that I have ever experienced in Calgary in those forty years. I use natural gas for heating my house, for the washing which is done in it, for the cooking and in the heating of my garage, which is a separate building. My total bill for that whole month when the temperature was well below zero was $22. I understand that some of you people down here are paying $70 and $80 for houses that I suppose are no larger than mine. I mention these figures to show just how important this is as a matter of fuel at the moment, to say nothing about its value as an intake product in a plant from which many things may be made.

I give you as an example a plant on the outskirts of the city of Calgary. We call it the ammonia plant. The dominion government built that plant in time of war. From natural gas in its raw state, and from nothing else, it was the largest supplier of ammonia, which is a very important product in making explosives. It supplied a very considerable portion of that product used in explosives both by the Dominion of Canada and the United Kingdom, and to some extent by the United States. This used to come from an electrolytic process, but there it was manufactured from natural gas.

That plant has now turned to the manufacture of fertilizer. They added one product—I cannot think of the name of it—which is found in the province of Saskatchewan. In spite of freight rates, the sale of the product is now largely on the gulf coast of the United States. They meet the competition of freight rates and send that product that tremendous distance. The plant now is not owned by the government; it is owned by the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company. It was sold for somewhere in the neighbourhood of $7 million. I want to compliment the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), because after the call for ammonia became lighter the government itself went into the manufacture of fertilizer, and from that manufacture made up the difference between the selling price of the plant and its cost to the government. In other words, it was a war industry investment which the government made, upon which money was, to say the least, not lost.

What has that got to do with the export of gas from Alberta? I want to make this plain,

Mr. Speaker, and I hope not to repeat it. The minute that gas leaves the Dominion of Canada, the Dominion of Canada has lost it; it has no control whatever over it, not the slightest. The control then lies with the persons who live south of our southern border. Let us carry that a step farther, and what does it mean? Let us assume that the people who are behind this bill get in a position to export gas from Alberta. Can you think of any reason why they should not then process it into fertilizer at the point nearest to the fertilizer markets? That is just ordinary common sense and ordinary business, with the result that that splendid manufacturing plant we have just on the outskirts of Calgary would have another hurdle to overcome, namely, the fertilizer converted into that substance from our natural gas.

The other day I read an article by Mr. Ritchie Donald, the honour of whose acquaintance I have. His company is of course among the top chemical engineering firms in Canada, with headquarters in Montreal. He was speaking in Chicago, and among the things of the future that he mentioned, the most important to the whole Dominion of Canada were the things that could be made from natural gas. I cannot remember these fancy names, but some people make table covers that a cigarette will not burn and a glass of whisky will not stain. The future of plastics in this country manufactured from natural gas is limitless because of the great advance that has been made these days in chemical engineering.

I want to make this point clear. Bill No. 7, like the bill we had before us last year, contains no statement as to the route. I asked the sponsor of the bill while he was speaking —I hope apologizing for interrupting him— "Where is it being built?" His answer was: "I do not know." Hon. members heard that.

Mr. Maybank: Quite right.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): That was his answer. Let us examine what we are dealing with, what we are looking at. It is a charter. I know that other things have to be done afterward. It is a charter to build a gas line —from where to where? Nobody has any idea.

It being nine o'clock, I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Smith (Calgary West) the debate was adjourned.

Mr. Speaker: The hour reserved for public and private bills having expired, the house will resume the business that was interrupted at six o'clock.

[Mr. Smith (Calgary West).]

SUPPLY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Abbott for committee of supply.

TRADE CONDITIONS—PROPOSED COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE—AMENDMENT, MR. DIEFENBAKER

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, as I was saying earlier, the trade situation in Canada today is growing desperate and fully warrants the motion that we are discussing tonight, calling for a commonwealth trade conference. In fact, information which has come to hand in a release today from the dominion bureau of statistics more than supports that statement. I shall refer to the release later and to the figures of our declining trade given in that document.

Let us look at some concrete examples of what this loss of sterling markets means to the Canadian producers. To do that we should look at the situation of our apple growers of British Columbia particularly, for theirs is a position which exemplifies perfectly the desperate need of restoring trade with the sterling markets, and the figures which I shall give, Mr. Speaker, fully justify the use of the words "the desperate need". Our apple growers are faced with the complete loss of their market in the United Kingdom and in this connection I intend to refer to our export figures over a series of years. However, before doing that I would like to refer to a statement made last night by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who is reported on page 288 of Hansard as follows:

> The only surplus today is the surplus of cheese and we are carrying that right now.

Our apple growers find that the only way they can get rid of their surplus apples is to make a gift of one million boxes to the United Kingdom. The British Columbia apple growers did just that over a month ago. I find that statement of the Minister of Agriculture one of the most extraordinary made recently. It is completely unsupported by the facts. According to the government's own figures they are now carrying in storage some 28 million pounds of butter. We have a surplus position in apples in British Columbia and according to all appearances the 1949 crop is going to be largely unmarketed.

Our poultry producers will be amazed at the statement by the minister that there is no surplus except in cheese. Our egg producers would be glad to know where they can market their eggs. I am sure the berry growers of the Fraser valley, on whose behalf the member for that constituency raised his voice last year, will be glad to know that there is no surplus in Canada except that of cheese and that the Minister of Agriculture is going to take care of that.

I do know that there is a surplus of apples. When we look at our export figures, when we look at what happened to our production, we see that there is a surplus. We no longer have the great export market that we used to have in the United Kingdom. Figures taken from the Canada Year Book show that from 1933 down to 1939 we exported an average of close to two million barrels of apples a year to the United Kingdom, and I ask you to bear in mind that a barrel contains a little more than three boxes. In 1936 we exported 2,202,000 barrels; in 1938, 2,473,000 barrels. In 1939, which was interrupted by the outbreak of war, we exported 1,427,000 barrels. Trade was interrupted during the war years but in 1946, the first full year of trade after the war, we exported 1,151,054 barrels to the United Kingdom or approximately 3,500,000 boxes.

In 1948 the United Kingdom purchased no apples from Canada, and in 1949 they purchased none. The figures show that our exports of apples pre-war and post-war up to the time when we lost the British market were approximately equal. In spite of what has been said in this house and outside the house, the figures given by the United Kingdom food officials as to their domestic requirements of apples indicate clearly that the British market is still the potential market for Canadian apples provided they can find the means to purchase them. The figures for British imports up until 1946 and 1947 as given by the United Kingdom food mission show that after the war years their imports of apples from Canada were approximately equal to the imports pre-war and that if it were not for exchange difficulties a great market for Canadian apples would still exist in the United Kingdom.

Remember that in 1948 and 1949 the United Kingdom purchased virtually no apples from Canada. The only shipments so far this year have been the million boxes sent as a gift by British Columbia. Naturally enough our apple producers are in a desperate plight. Their economy has been geared to the existence of the British market. Apple production is based on a twelve-year program. It takes from seven to eight years for a tree to begin bearing and it is at least twelve years before it reaches full production. You cannot change such a program overnight.

Certain solutions have been suggested for the difficulties in which the apple growers find themselves. An immediate solution, for this year at any rate, and for the years until there is a restoration of our markets, is the provision of a floor or support price for the apple production of British Columbia and I believe of Nova Scotia as well. A floor price is necessary in the present emergency, but that is not the aspect I want to discuss now. I hope to have something to say about that when the agricultural estimates are up. Representations are being made to the minister and I understand that negotiations are under way so perhaps it is not timely to say anything more at the moment about a floor price.

The provision of a floor price is only a short-term solution, and a long-term solution is necessary for our agricultural problems. It seems to me that our efforts must be directed toward finding an answer to the recurring surpluses of agricultural products here in Canada. It seems to me that that could be done in one of two ways. We produce more than we can eat at home and therefore we must either sell overseas or build up our population in Canada so that it is able to consume at least a greater proportion of what we produce.

It seems to me that the aim and object of the resolution now before the house is the restoration of our overseas market. The first requirement is to remove currency restrictions. In spite of what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) has said, I do not think we have had any proof as yet that the imposition of currency restrictions with their resultant non-convertibility offers much hope for a solution of our trade problem. A commonwealth trade conference should be called. The imposition of restrictions hampers trade, and in this connection I should like to quote an article in the February 13 issue of Newsweek by Henry Hazlitt, the business commentator. He tells a little story which I think is apt to the matter under discussion, and I quote:

> A poor peasant, according to an old folk tale, went to the wise man of his village for help and advice. The peasant lived in a one-room mud hut with his wife and four children. He was driven to desperation by the noise, the quarreling, the smell, the dirt, the poor scanty food, the poverty, sickness, and squalor in which his family lived.
> "I will help you," said the wise man. So the next day he brought a male goat to the peasant's hut, saying: "You must feed this goat and take him in and let him sleep in the hut."
>
> "Why, O wise man?" asked the peasant. "You will see," replied the wise man. "Come back to me at the turn of the moon."
>
> On the night of the new moon the peasant was back. "O wise man, my life is unendurable. The noise in the hut is hideous. The smell is beyond belief. The goat knocks down the children and eats us out of hut and home. I am sunk in wretchedness and despair."
>
> "I will help you," said the wise man. And he came and took away the goat. A week later the peasant came to him again, his face wreathed in smiles.

Trade

"O wise man," he said, "my life now is wonderful. You cannot imagine the change since you took away the goat! The hut is quieter. The horrible smell is gone. My family has once more almost enough to eat. How can I ever thank you enough for taking away that goat? How infinitely wise you must be to have thought of such a marvelous plan!"

We find ourselves in practically the same situation. We heard the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) today, in his discussion with the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Low) or it may have been the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell), say: We are taking off these restrictions and it is having a very beneficial effect on our trade with the sterling area and the United States. Mr. Hazlitt went on to say:

I keep thinking of this tale as I read about the new plans of the bureaucrats all over the world. They impose an endless network of restrictions, burdens, coercions, and prohibitions on their own peoples; they all but strangle production and trade. And then their most happy solutions consist in removing one or two of the burdens and prohibitions that they themselves have decreed.

That is about all we have offered to us by the government in the way of prospects for increasing trade in the future. The Minister of Finance has imposed a few goats on us, and he has taken one or two away. Now he says: Look what I have done for Canadian trade. Furthermore, he says that we have had a number of conferences. There was the one in the Far East that was mentioned this afternoon which was not about trade at all. The Minister of Finance goes to Washington and discusses currency restrictions but he does not have the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) or the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) with him. On another occasion the Minister of Agriculture sits down in Ottawa and discusses food contracts with the United Kingdom authorities but he does not have the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Trade and Commerce with him. The Minister of Trade and Commerce goes overseas and discusses trade but he does not have the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of Finance with him. Nevertheless the Minister of Finance said this afternoon that he thought we had had enough conferences. We have not had a single trade conference, Mr. Speaker, of the sort we are talking about, and the sort which is necessary to solve commonwealth trade relations, since the conference of 1932.

In the face of the conditions which we have described, the situation facing agriculture, the situation facing our apple growers, the situation facing the workmen of this country, it is a sort of fantastic nightmare of unreality to hear the Minister of Finance say today, when we have not had a conference yet, that another conference would serve no useful purpose and that it is not up to Canada to take the initiative.

The other solution which I mentioned is, I think, a long-term one for our agricultural problems and must go hand in hand with the efforts to build up our overseas markets again, something that can only be done by removing currency restrictions and removing them now. It is to take positive steps to build up our population at home because we produce more than we can consume. Although it will help greatly to restore overseas markets, nevertheless if that is the limit of our solution we will still be peculiarly vulnerable to any depression or upset in these overseas markets. As soon as they stop buying we will have recurring food surpluses. The two efforts must go hand in hand. Until the country begins to realize the potentialities of which it is capable, both in terms of population engaged in useful production and as a consumers' market at home to eat more of what we produce, we will be faced with the problem of recurring surpluses. Under these circumstances it is no answer to say that our effort must be in the direction of cultivating our trade with the United States. Look again at the situation of our apple producers. What prospects have Canadian apple growers in the United States market?

An hon. Member: Quite good.

Mr. Fulton: Before this debate is over, perhaps the hon. member will make his contribution and tell us of the growing sales of our apples in the United States market. I will be glad to hear him substantiate his remark if my understanding of what he says is correct, namely, that the United States market offers a useful alternative to the British market. The Minister of Finance also said he would not like to have a conference without knowing what was going to be the agenda. It seems to me that a mere examination of the problem suggests the items for discussion. In order that we may have the problem fully before us, perhaps I might now refer to the dominion bureau of statistics daily bulletin which was released today, February 28. The first paragraph reads:

Canada's domestic exports to the United States—for the third successive month—were substantially higher in value in January than a year earlier. Shipments to commonwealth and other countries were generally lower and the total value of domestic exports to all countries fell below that of January last year.

Further down it continues:

Total exports to all countries in January declined in value to $221,200,000 compared with $237 million a year earlier.

I might interpolate that this was a reduction of $16 million. The release continues:

Shipments to the United States thus accounted for about 59 per cent of the month's total value as compared with slightly more than 50 per cent in the twelve months of 1949.

But the position is that our over-all trade picture is deteriorating. The release goes on as follows:

Sales to the United Kingdom—which have been subject to fluctuations during recent months—were valued at $48,608,000, down from $55,813,000 a year earlier, but only slightly under the December figure.

We might point out that in January sales to the United Kingdom declined by over $7 million. Continuing it reads:

There were decreases also from a year ago in exports to other commonwealth areas. The largest decline was in exports to commonwealth countries in Asia which fell to $3,473,000 from $14,937,000, with shipments to India down to $495,000 from $11,190,000 in January last year. . . . Exports to the British West Indies, including British Guiana, Bermuda and British Honduras, declined to $2,512,000 compared to $4,608,000; to commonwealth countries in Africa to $3,831,000 from $4,991,000; and to the Oceania group of Australia, New Zealand and Fiji to $2,612,000 from $3,145,000.

The paragraph concludes with this sentence:

Total value of exports to all commonwealth countries, including the United Kingdom, was $62,336,000 as against $83,706,000.

For the month of January, Mr. Speaker, there was a decline in our exports to commonwealth countries of $21 million.

With that general background, together with the knowledge all hon. members have of the situation facing individual producers or producer groups in their own constituencies, it is no answer for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) to say that a conference would not serve any useful purpose, and that he does not know just what such a conference might discuss. A conference might discuss ways and means of restoring trade, of removing trade restrictions, of trading between commonwealth countries to our mutual benefit. It might discuss the removal of currency restrictions; it might discuss the kind of goods available in one country for shipment to another and the kind of goods that can be shipped back, and a means of providing for the balance of payments resulting. It might also discuss immigration and emigration as between commonwealth countries. There are many things such a conference might discuss, problems the Canadian people want to see solved. They are problems for which the government so far has offered no solution. While it is not generous to decry the efforts that have been made by various ministers and missions who have been sent abroad, I think it is fair to say that these isolated, separate missions hither and yon all over the map, each consisting of an individual minister or group of experts without any co-ordination such as a trade conference must have, are foredoomed to failure in attempting to deal with the trade situation faced today by this country and the world in general.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to echo what has been said before by hon. members on this side of the house and what I know is in the hearts of all members on all sides. Canada's greatest customer over the years, the nation or group of nations that has taken more from us than it has sold to us, is the British commonwealth of nations and particularly the United Kingdom. We would be making a grave mistake if, as one hon. member put it, we sold that commonwealth short. The fact is that owing to currency restrictions the United Kingdom can no longer buy from us more than she sells to us, because the currency she has with which to pay for what she buys is not convertible. That is the problem that must be solved if we want to restore commonwealth trade and if we want to halt the trend which is going on, as the release issued today by the dominion bureau of statistics makes quite clear.

Together with other hon. members who have spoken this afternoon, in behalf of the group of producers I mentioned specifically, the apple producers of British Columbia, but also in behalf of the lumber producers of that province and of the maritimes and of all Canadian producers of goods which other people need, I hope the government will not close its mind to the necessity of a conference such as that suggested in the amendment moved this afternoon by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), and the beneficial results which could flow from it.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I desire to speak briefly to the amendment now before the house, which asks that the government take immediate steps to convene, at the earliest possible date, a conference of the nations of the British commonwealth and the countries of the empire to devise policies to restore our lost markets and thereby provide jobs for the Canadian people.

Without agreeing with the Progressive Conservative opposition that our trade situation is in a desperate way, and without agreeing with the government that the position is a matter of no great concern, I think there is a general feeling that not only Canadian but world trade relations are getting into difficulties. In my view this would not necessarily be a serious matter were it not for the fact that, as I see it, the present deterioration in trade and in world economic conditions follows a pattern we know so well. That was the pattern after the last war, when we had a few short years of economic activity when we were urged by businessmen to produce more and consume less. But shortly came the debacle, when a great many people could not consume at all, not because the things were not there to consume but because something had gone wrong with the exchange of commodities both between nations and within the nation. At the present time we see the very same pattern developing. When we finished the war we had a tremendous backlog of needs to be met, both in consumer and capital goods. This was more so with the countries of Europe than on this continent of North America, but in four or five short years we have overcome that backlog of consumer needs, we have added to our capital resources so that now we can supply a greater amount of goods and services than ever before. Now, the paradox of the situation is this: just when we are better equipped than ever before to supply the needs of our people and raise the standard of living, the standard of living is going down. How far that deterioration may go on this particular lap I do not know; but if we do not find some way to distribute the wealth we can produce so abundantly, nothing can save us from falling into a depression such as we had from 1930 to 1939, from which we were rescued by the war.

Whether, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) has said, the present trade slump is not due to a lack of conferences, or whether it would not necessarily be improved by calling another conference, certainly I believe one thing is true; that is, that it will not settle itself. Either we are going to try to find a solution for our problems in such ways as solutions can be found, or we are going to throw up our hands and say there is nothing further we can do. For that reason alone, I would favour a trade conference. I am sure that once representatives met at such a conference they would not only discuss the matter of the exchange of commodities, but they could discuss the underlying difficulties, economic conditions and methods of distributing wealth, as well as the mere exchange of commodities.

During the last two sessions, I have been appalled to hear members stand up in this house and condemn the British government for its refusal to buy more Canadian goods. I believe that anyone who has sufficient intelligence to become a member of this house, and who makes a statement of that kind, is unpardonably ignorant. If the Minister of Agriculture made the statement that was attributed to him to the effect that there was some conspiracy in the United Kingdom not to buy Canadian goods, then I have not words to express what I think of that.

It is the generally accepted understanding of international trade that the goods we import are paid for by the goods we export. If we have no goods to export, then we will have to stop importing goods; that is the general picture. Let us look at the situation as between Canada and the United Kingdom. I have in my hand a copy of Foreign Trade, a publication issued by the Department of Trade and Commerce. This issue is dated February 8, 1950. I find that the total Canadian exports to the United Kingdom for the calendar year 1949, excluding gold, amounted to $705 million; that was the value of the goods we exported to the United Kingdom. We bought from the United Kingdom goods to the value of $307,400,000. In other words, for every dollar's worth of goods we bought from the United Kingdom, the United Kingdom bought $2.30 worth of goods from us. Unless there is some way by which the United Kingdom can get dollars or gold, she cannot buy anything more from us than she is buying. It is sheer nonsense, it is sheer hypocrisy, for members of this house to complain about the United Kingdom not buying more goods from Canada.

Let us look at the picture as between Canada and the United States. For the same calendar year of 1949, we sold to the United States goods totalling $1,503 million. We bought from the United States goods totalling $1,951 million. In other words, for every dollar's worth of goods we sold to the United States, we bought $1.30 worth of goods from the United States. Bear in mind that it gives us great concern to conserve our dollars, so that we can continue to buy from the United States. Supposing the trade picture between the United States and Canada were represented by Canada buying $2.30 worth of goods from the United States for every dollar's worth of goods the United States bought from us, would the Minister of Finance be so emphatic about the value of non-discrimination in trade as he was this afternoon?

In 1947 when we imposed restrictions on United States imports there was a certain amount of tongue in the cheek attitude on the question of non-discrimination. Although the balance of payments was not nearly as bad as it is today between Canada and the United Kingdom, restrictions on imports from the United States were imposed, the same restrictions being imposed on imports from other countries, including the United Kingdom. But I heard the Minister of Finance say in this house that although it was quite true we were imposing the same restrictions on the United Kingdom, it did not matter because we were not buying any of the prohibited goods from the United Kingdom. It seems to me we should be realistic in these matters and realize that we cannot sell to a country very much more than we buy from that country. All the nations of the world must realize, and for the purpose of what I am saying now I mean the nations of the free world, that if they are going to expand their economies, increase prosperity, raise the standard of living of their people, then we will have to do much more and go much further than we have so far in the matter of deciding what we can sell to each other, and what we can buy from each other.

In my opinion, it is not just a question of improving Canada's trade position, it is a question of international prosperity—the prosperity of the countries of the western world. But it is more than that; it is as much a part of our defence against aggression as is our military preparedness. If we do not keep the western world prosperous, we will lose out in the struggle with the totalitarian world. Let us remember that to maintain the prosperity of the western world is part of our defence against aggression. It is for that reason this question is so important. That is why increasing unemployment and falling markets are so important to everyone who believes in co-operation and peace. We also must not forget that we cannot have co-operation in military matters to defend ourselves against an enemy, and have trade wars between the co-operators. Surely the time has arrived when we should see that that sort of economics no longer fits the needs of the world of 1950. Whether or not a conference of this kind would accomplish anything, surely it would be an advance if we could bring the nations of the commonwealth close together—the commonwealth now is both east and west—and find out more definitely what each nation has to sell and what each is willing to buy. Surely if we did not do anything more than make an advance in that direction, the conference would be worth while. Unless those who are opposed to such a conference have some better solution for meeting our economic problems, they certainly should not turn this one down without giving a serious consideration indeed.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Before putting the question, I should like to observe that I have had some doubt as to whether the amendment is in order under our rules.

It is true that wide latitude is given in respect of amendments to the motion for going into supply. It is equally true, however, that there are well-established classes of amendments which, for good reason, cannot be moved on such a motion. For instance, a matter of which notice has been given or which stands upon the order paper cannot be introduced as an amendment to a motion for going into supply. See Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure, fourth edition, at page 420.

The opening clause of the amendment to the address in reply to the speech from the throne, moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), reads as follows:

> We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that Your Excellency's advisers have:
> (1) failed to take adequate measures to preserve and expand markets for Canada's surplus products of farm, forest, sea and mine, and to deal with the problems of increasing unemployment and reduced income to Canadian farmers and other producers;...

The present amendment is similar to the amendment just quoted in that it deals with a particular phase or aspect of the broader question, and recommends a particular method for resolving it. The subject matter of the present amendment could be, and I believe already has been, introduced in the debate on the address.

I feel bound to disclose to the house the doubt I entertain as to the admissibility of this amendment. It is a borderline case, but I think that the doubt should be resolved in favour of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). For that reason I am not going to rule the amendment out of order.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Diefenbaker) which was negatived on the following division:

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Monday, February 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. F. H. Larson for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. A. E. Dewar (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, in my opening remarks last evening I had intended to make reference to the illustrious group of governmental supporters in this corner of the house. Having once had a reputation for boisterous behaviour, this group is today quiet and serene. However, let no one think for a minute that we do not lend weight to this august body. As a matter of fact, we are almost the weightiest in the house, including the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Garland), whose home is in North Bay. At the present time we can more than pull our own weight and in time it is our hope that we will be able to lend a lot to other sections of the house.

Continuing along the theme of trade with Great Britain and the so-called lost returns to our farmers, I have a few observations I should like to add to what I had to say last evening. Our good friends in the official opposition have suggested various sums that have been lost because of the contracts that were made for prices below the world level. We are not in disagreement with the statement that the prices were below world level, but why in heaven's name are they not consistent in their arguments?

One hon. member will get up and make a tear-jerking speech with reference to the commonwealth and the British people, and then in the next minute another speaker gets up and says that this country has lost $500 million. Then a day or two later another speaker gets up and says that we lost $1,000 million. Then another fellow, not to be outdone, says that we have lost $2,000 million.

Mr. Fleming: You have lost your seat or your head.

Mr. Dewar: You answer for your own head or for your own seat and I will answer for mine. If anyone stops to consider the limited number of dollars that Great Britain had during the post-war years and where those dollars came from he will not suggest that we should have kept prices up to the world level. The government with which I happen to have the honour to be associated and will be associated with is the government that inaugurated this program. They supplied the dollars with which Great Britain bought our products.

The Canadian taxpayer makes a great holler about the atrocious taxes, but I can assure you that if prices had been fixed at the world level it would have meant so many more dollars that the taxpayer would have had to supply to Great Britain. Do not forget that Great Britain had only a limited number of dollars to spend and as a consequence this government made a deal to provide them with opportunities to purchase the foodstuffs that they could use.

The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) was not in his seat last night when I made this remark, so I am going to make it again. He has confused the 16 per cent decline in farm revenues with that of trade. He states there has been a 16 per cent decline in income.

Mr. Fleming: That was the decline in the value of field crops.

Mr. Dewar: Call it field crops or anything you like, it does not make any difference. We will call it field crops. Before trade can be carried on, goods must be produced and hence the 16 per cent decline is not the result of trade but is an internal production decline due to drought conditions. As a matter of fact when you consider the amount of money that we produce in the west from the sale of our products from year to year, and the fact that about one-third of the province of Saskatchewan has no crop, a 16 per cent decline is only a fraction of the over-all total production.

Much has been said, is being said and no doubt will continue to be said about what Great Britain has done for the commonwealth. I quite agree. As the expression goes, Great Britain cast her bread on the waters and it came back as ham sandwiches. Nevertheless I do not want anyone to forget that everything that Great Britain has been and is today is directly attributable to what she got from the commonwealth. In other words, if she continues on her present path of reneging on what we in Canada feel she should do, it is not beyond the realms of possibility she may some day be sitting alone, a lonely little island on the threshold of Europe. The businessmen of Great Britain are noted for their shrewdness. They are just the same as every individual in this House of Commons. The opposition party or parties would be the first people in the Dominion of Canada to criticize the government if they were to buy from any country a product which they could secure cheaper elsewhere. The same thing applies to the British empire. They are going to buy where they can do so most cheaply.

Mr. Noseworthy: Speak for your own party.

An hon. Member: He has not got a party to speak for.

Mr. Dewar: Therefore the government of Canada has acted in good faith. Unfortunately we have arrived at the position we are in today owing to the ungovernable factors of our existence. At all levels of government in Canada that is an established fact. Similarly, as to external trade, it is the ungovernable elements that have to be mastered. So far as our position is specifically concerned, Great Britain and the United States hold the key. If their moves are wise and sympathetic we in this country are assured for the future. If not, no government group of any party can supply the solution beyond a certain point.

I should like to turn now to the wheat board. On February 21 the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright), together with the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), requested the government to announce further payments on wheat as well as coarse grains. Last evening the hon. member for Melfort charged the government with playing politics when they made the 20 cents per bushel payment on the first of April, 1949. I suggest that this same hon. gentleman was playing politics the other day when he asked his question in the first place, and as soon as he received the wheat board report he thought he was going to hang the government on the hook.

I am rather surprised that he has now reversed his position of concern for farmers receiving payments. As a matter of fact he is not in a drought area himself. I am amazed at his attitude in criticizing government payments made last spring. Contrary to what he led us to believe last night, these payments were announced five months ahead. Drought conditions had been widespread throughout the west and farmers' organizations requested that these payments be made as early as possible. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) challenged the statement that these payments had not been requested. I happen to have in my possession a letter and a resolution sent to the minister on December 7, 1948.

An hon. Member: Where did you get that?

Mr. Dewar: Not from anyone in your group. The letter reads:

Dear Mr. Gardiner:

At the regular meeting of our council held on yesterday's date, the following resolution was passed for your earnest-consideration.

Whereas it is understood that the wheat board is going to make a payment of 20 cents per bushel on the 1945, 1946 and 1947 wheat crop, therefore be it resolved that we request the wheat board to make this payment as early as possible in the new year in this municipality, particularly as it is in the crop failure bonus area and in dire neeed to purchase feed and seed oats prior to spring.

I do not see how anyone can honestly get up and accuse the government of playing politics in the making of the payment in view of the hundreds of letters and request that were received.

Mr. Johnston: The announcement had already been made by the wheat board.

Mr. Dewar: I did not quite get that.

Mr. Johnston: The announcement had already been made that there would be a payment.

Mr. Dewar: Was it not perfectly all right for us to make it? Why should we be accused of playing politics by the hon. member for Melfort?

Mr. Johnston: So you were.

[Mr. Dewar.]

Mr. Dewar: How were we playing politics? The announcement was made months before the election was even dreamed of.

Mr. Knowles: Whom was the letter from?

Mr. Dewar: I will tell you. The address is Strasbourg, Saskatchewan, which I believe is in the riding of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). It is from the rural municipality of McKillop, No. 220, and it is signed by Mr. C. H. Chapin, secretary-treasurer.

Mr. Johnston: Liberal organizer.

Mr. Dewar: The hon. member for Melfort also took exception to the fact that interest payments had been made amounting to $5 million. How in heaven's name can you handle wheat through the wheat board if you do not borrow money at some time? Anyone who knows anything about the grain trade and how wheat is handled knows that the minute the farmer delivers a bushel of wheat he receives payment for it, but the fact that he receives payment does not mean that the bushel of wheat has reached the lakehead or an export port. Therefore the money must be found some place, and the hon. member was absolutely wrong in the point he raised last night by way of criticism of the federal government. There is no other way it can be handled. I rather think that if he were to suggest to his supporters in the Melfort riding that these payments be left until such time as all of the operations of the board for the year are wound up he would not be sitting in his seat very long.

Our good friends in the C.C.F. have been suggesting that we should hang our heads in shame.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: Now you are learning.

Mr. Dewar: They tell us we should hang our heads in disgrace. I have listened to that sort of thing all during the last session and for a good portion of this session. For clarification I should like to reiterate some remarks I made during my election campaign. My supporters and the people generally of the Qu'Appelle constituency know where I stand. I made them no promises. What I did say repeatedly was that I was in favour of anything they wanted provided they were ready and willing to pay for it. I would not insult them, as some have, by endeavouring to buy their votes with wild, rash promises, nor would I degenerate to auction sale tactics to gain their favour and support. Hon. members will notice that I am here in Ottawa.

Last Sunday I was privileged to attend church. At this time I should like to say that our churches are the greatest instrument for good we have in this or any other country of the world. We as Liberals, being a widely assorted and truly national group, acknowledge our errors and omissions. We are possessed of all the frailties of human nature.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Dewar: From the speeches I have listened to which were made by those on the other side of the house I almost expect halos and wings to appear any day. Consequently on Sunday I noted a prayer of confession which I hope the opposition groups will include in their respective manifestos.

Mr. Wylie: Be careful.

Mr. Dewar: It is as follows:

> If thou, O Lord, shouldst mark iniquity, O Lord who would stand? Enter not into judgment with Thy servants, for in Thy sight is no man living justified. In Thy presence, our Father, our disguises and pretenses do not avail, and under the light of Thy holiness we know ourselves for what we are, mean and petty creatures who seek our own in spite of our noble pretensions.
>
> Have mercy upon us. Give us the grace to see our faults more clearly that we may truly repent.

I would like hon. members to note the next words:

> We acknowledge that the world's sin is our own, that the greed which we condemn when it results in obvious inhumanity is in our own heart; that the world is unjust because none of us love justice with sufficient abandon; that the vices of civilization are compounded of the lusts of us all. Give us grace to look into our own hearts before we cast a stone of condemnation.

In conclusion I would say it was faith in the future, and hard work, that built this country of ours into its present greatness. Canada, to fulfil her destiny, must correct her thinking; and when I say that I mean the people of Canada. This thinking has been and every day is being warped by the propagandists of the opposition groups, who are suggesting that the government more and more absorb the problems of the individual. They preach the gospel of "what the country owes me"—don't deny it—rather than "what may I do for my country?" I hope the current generation will say, as the fine men and women who sacrificed their lives in the last war said, "What may I do for my country?"

This brings me to "stop, look and listen." It seems the time has come when we should stop, look and listen before embarking upon vast new governmental projects intended to compel an increase in our material welfare. We should consider not merely whether the professed end is good, but what the process of getting there will do to the people's character if it involves more governmental compulsion and less personal responsibility. Also we should consider whether there are not alternative ways of achieving the desired ends that have more of a voluntary and less of a compulsory character.

Mr. Henri A. Gosselin (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, this is the second time it has been my privilege to rise in this house and take part in a debate on the speech from the throne. In my first remarks I should like to congratulate the mover and seconder, who performed their tasks so well. I shall try to be as brief as possible, but I believe it is my duty to bring to this house matters which I feel have to do with the welfare and future of the coming generation.

As a railroad man I also feel that it is my duty to say a few words with respect to a matter which has been mentioned several times in the house during the last few days; that is, the shortage of coal which has caused a decrease in passenger service on the Canadian National Railways. After thirty-seven years of railroad work I believe I know the routine of its administration; and I feel that we should not be so ready to criticize our railways, which have made such a contribution to the development of this country. It is true that a lack of coal has forced a curtailment of passenger service by the Canadian National; but let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the financial position of our railway companies is not what it should be, and they are obliged to carry on at a loss while giving our people the best service possible. I am sure a great deal of the criticism that is being expressed comes from members of this house who never travel by train if they can possibly get where they are going by car or by plane. Our railway officials have believed it better to maintain the freight service so the people of the country would suffer as little as possible, and have chosen to reduce passenger service instead; and I congratulate them on having done so. It is necessary that those in charge of our railways should look to the future of this country, and at the same time increase the efficiency of our railways and develop more speedy transportation in order to compete with other methods of transportation. So I say we should not reproach those who are making every effort to develop rail transportation in this country. Affiliated with those companies we have ocean transportation and large hotels which give accommodation to the people of Canada and also provide essential facilities for our tourists.

I repeat that the railway companies have greatly assisted in the development of this country. When there was no other form of either passenger or freight service, the railway companies carried on, even at a loss; and as a railroad man for so many years I greatly regret to hear this criticism. Instead of hon. members criticizing they should bear in mind that it is the duty of those administering the affairs of these companies to protect their finances and, in so doing, protect the finances of the country.

Then I should like to congratulate the government on doing everything possible to increase the value of education in this country; yet I am afraid I must say that to a certain extent education has been neglected. An educated population is the most important asset any country may have. I believe that, in many ways, education has been neglected, and that our governments should have taken a more active part in giving the necessary financial assistance to the raising of our educational standards. During the last few years our provincial governments, which are charged with the responsibility for education, no doubt owing to a shortage of finances, were forced to neglect the education of our children. The federal government recognized its duty to enter this field and assist the provinces in providing better education. This will mean, Mr. Speaker, that the professor and the teacher will receive a better income than they have in the past. The character of our children, which is formed in the schoolroom, is carried through life. There is, therefore, no more important question than the provision of an education for the future population of our country.

I wish once more, Mr. Speaker, to congratulate the government on its efforts to assist our provincial governments in carrying forward the principle of education to such an extent that no public man who has that right may criticize the educational standards we have set. I wish to congratulate the government also on the action it has taken in connection with health. There is no category of social service which is more essential, Mr. Speaker, than health services. This is especially true in the years we are going through, because our population is in the mids of dangerous and contagious diseases. I feel it is the duty of the government, regardless of any other department, to use the money necessary to establish hospitalization and medical care for our population. This would enable our people to look forward to all the medical care that is necessary throughout their life.

Regrettably, Mr. Speaker, in this young country of ours, it is impossible to carry on everything at once. I still believe that this government is establishing a sound foundation for social services. I believe that program can be divided into two principal parts, health and education. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that an educated and healthy population is the fundamental basis for the prosperity of any country. I urge the government not to withdraw on those fundamental principles, which are of importance to the welfare of this Canada of ours.

There is another important question, Mr. Speaker, and that is ensuring the aged a pension sufficient to take care of their needs. After spending the greater part of his life in the raising of a family, the aged person will feel that he is protected. I hope that this government will look into this matter, and find a way of guaranteeing the older element of our population a satisfactory pension without a means test. The old age pension, as it is now, is highly appreciated, but I do believe it does not go far enough. I do not like the old age pension being recognized as a matter of charity. Those who have attained the age of 65 or 70, who have given their entire life to their country, are often obliged to degrade themselves to seek this form of charity. I am sure that this government will investigate every possible means of giving these people an old age pension without a means test, so that those who deserve it will not feel there is the stigma of charity attached to it. I know that to many of us, Mr. Speaker, such a pension system seems to be beyond our financial capability. I am sure, however, that the administration of this country will provide some way of overcoming the financial situation, and will solve this problem.

May I congratulate this government on the adoption of family allowances. This administration found the means with which to pay those family allowances to all families, regardless of wealth. This ensures that the younger element of our population will be provided with the necessities of life.

My next remarks, Mr. Speaker, will be designed to give assistance to this government in regard to agriculture. As I stated a few moments ago, I am a railroad man by profession, but I am also a farmer. I am one of those who have followed the occupation of farming since childhood. I am the son of a farmer, and I intend to bend all my efforts towards improving the welfare and ensuring the prosperity of farmers. The farmers in my day, Mr. Speaker, as everyone will admit, were far from prosperous. They were not encouraged to remain on the soil. In the last few years new developments have taken place, as a result of which our products are sold to better advantage. Our agricultural schools have also developed ways and means of obtaining higher revenues for those engaged in farming. But I believe that the present government, or any other government, should give consideration to further measures to ensure the prosperity of our farmers, who are fundamentally the basis of the prosperity and the guarantee of the financial stability of any country in the world. That being so, no government should neglect to maintain their stability, for by so doing they will be guaranteeing the financial stability of the country whose affairs they are called upon to administer.

Before going further in my remarks with regard to the farming situation, I wish to congratulate the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) who is a farmer himself and understands the necessity of maintaining the farmers on the soil. He knows that it is more than ever necessary to provide them with a comfortable living on their farms. He knows that is his duty, and he has shown that he recognizes it by providing for the farmers subsidies commensurate with the financial situation of the country.

We have often heard it said, in the last few months especially, that the farmer is neglected and is going to be discouraged. I say no. As I have said on several occasions, especially in this house before a group of administrators of the country, we should gather together to maintain those principles of guaranteeing prosperity to the farmers, who are, as we all understand, the basis of financial stability, instead of making speeches that may cause them to become discouraged, and stating that within six months or a year our farmers will be in a disastrous position because there is no market for their products. Let us have more confidence in the future, Mr. Speaker. Let us have more confidence that any public man who is willing to devote himself to public life, no matter to what party he may belong, will give this encouragement. Regardless of what the political beliefs of my farmer colleagues in this house may be, I should have preferred to hear them tell the government that at the present time we are facing a decrease in the value of our products but have confidence that we may trade with foreign countries and with the United States so that they may absorb the surplus and that we may maintain our prices for our farm products. By doing so, instead of trying to discourage them in a small political way, I believe they would have rendered a service to the farming community. I state this with all the sincerity that I as a farmer possess, as a result of my experience over many years.

We all know, Mr. Speaker, that after a war it is necessary for an adjustment to be made in the financial situation of a country. No doubt the United Kingdom faces the same problem that we face here, namely a readjustment of finances; and they find themselves in a position in which they are unable to make purchases in sterling and to expand further the exchange of commodities, as has been explained in this house. I believe that it is necessary for all countries to look at the past, but I also believe that it is necessary for them to look to the future. With all the sincerity of which we are capable we hope that we shall not be called on again to face the rigours of another war. If our debts were raised to such an extent, our working population would require higher salaries in order to maintain their families, and this would of necessity cause an increase in the payrolls of their employers. But let us hope once more that we shall not be forced to face another war.

May I congratulate the government on the principles they are adopting to try to readjust all categories of finance in order to protect this country of ours and its future. It is necessary for this house to group together, regardless of politics, and study ways and means of giving to our younger element the encouragement they deserve so that they will not feel themselves in the desert after having had the advantages of—and I feel I must say this—extravagant living as compared with that which men of my age and many years younger have experienced in the past. I do not say this by way of reproach, and I hope that I am not misunderstood. Because of the high revenues in all categories of employment, and the return we receive, we as fathers of families were not obliged to provide a real education in economy as was done in the past. May I therefore once more congratulate the present government on providing, by every possible means, that the finances of this country shall be on a sound basis so that the bondholders of this country shall never have reason to fear that their savings are in danger. It is the duty of the government to look first to the guarantee of its obligations; second, to adopt social laws so that its population may have faith in their security; and third, to establish trade with other countries, and the exchange of commodities in order to ensure the sale of our surplus products. I know that the present government are working on that principle, that they are looking forward, and that they are more advanced than the opposition seems to give them credit for in this house.

I have confidence that when it becomes necessary to export goods to the United Kingdom arrangements will be made, and we shall be assured that we shall continue to trade with the United Kingdom and also with our good neighbour, the United States. We should express words of encouragement to those with whom we are in communication; we should not try to instil il their minds the thought that we are gone forever. It is most important to our country to create in our minds the feeling that the future is worth boking forward to. We should not try to discourage the younger element by saying that the future before them is dark. No matter how we feel, we hold a responsible position in this house, and we should try to eliminate all expressions which might lead any of our younger element to believe that the future before them is dark. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I believe that every public man will do his duty toward the welfare and the future of the country in which he lives.

I believe that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) will provide ways and means of assisting our farmers to increase production.

An hon. Member: Surplus production.

Mr. Gosselin: Hon. members on the opposite side speak of surplus production. We should not look forward to the future as something black; we should do our work and conduct our activities as though the future were bright, and in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred I believe that success will crown our efforts.

I hope that the Minister of Agriculture, in his present capacity, will, in co-operation with the provincial authorities, give the necessary assistance to our farmers to increase production, and that that increased production will be brought about with the same amount of work. By so doing we will give our farmers encouragement to harvest their crops and to deliver the surplus which they will be able to offer to the labourer, at a reduction in price. In that way the farmer will be able to deliver the commodities of his farm to the cities at a lower rate, a rate which will compare with the reduction which is necessary among our working classes in order to stabilize conditions in this country.

May I give an example. So far as wages are concerned, the working classes have no desire to increase wages beyond what is necessary at the end of the week to take care of the obligations which they have toward their families and to buy the necessities for the table. Because of the high prices of commodities it is necessary for the labouring man to ask for an increase in wages.

I remember that during the years from 1914 to 1918 railroad employees were given increases in wages, and after the financial situation became stabilized, the credit for which should no doubt go to the government of the day, a reduction in salary took place in 1923 to compare with the reduction in the cost of living. It was accepted with assurance and satisfaction, as the working classes could buy with that amount of money that which was unattainable before. Farming is the basis of prosperity, and agricultural products are necessities to all classes of people. The farmer should be provided with ways and means to increase production. He should have guaranteed to him the financial assistance which is necessary to enable him to carry on in such a way as to give to himself and family all that is essential to encourage them to remain on the soil. High salaries and short hours of work that prevail in the cities should not be introduced on the farms.

A few days ago one hon. member mentioned that the hours the farmer works are unlimited. I agree with his remarks. However, I believe that if the farmer is given a reasonable return for the long hours he works he and his sons will not be apt to desert the soil.

On motion of Mr. Gosselin the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): As announced by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), before the orders of the day are called tomorrow we shall take up questions and notices of motions for production of papers. After that we shall continue with the debate on the address.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, March 1, 1950

The house met at three o'clock.

RENT CONTROL

WARTIME LEASEHOLD REGULATIONS—DECISION OF SUPREME COURT OF CANADA

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table two copies of the decision made this morning by the Supreme Court of Canada with respect to the wartime leasehold regulations.

[Later:]

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice arising out of the submission to the Supreme Court of Canada with regard to the wartime leasehold regulations. In the judgment did the supreme court state that there was in fact an emergency existing, or did they accept the declaration of parliament, or that contained in the preamble to the regulations, of the existence of an emergency, and base their judgment on that assumption?

Mr. Lesage: Read it yourself.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): May I ask my hon. friend whether he is referring to the judgment which has just been tabled?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Garson: I regret very much I have not yet had the opportunity to read it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Possibly the minister can give us the answer tomorrow.

Mr. Abbott: Perhaps the hon. member can read the judgment.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

AMENDMENT OF ACT OF 1947-48—REINSTATEMENT AND COMPENSATION

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 10, to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act (reinstatement and compensation).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Noseworthy: This bill adds a new section to the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. The object of the new section is indicated therein—to give power to the board to make an order requiring an employer to reinstate any employee discharged contrary to the provisions of the act, and to pay such employee the monetary loss suffered by reason of such discharge.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT TO REDUCE THE ELIGIBLE AGE OF VOTERS FROM 21 TO 18

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 11, to amend the Dominion Elections Act, 1938 (age of voters).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Argue: The purpose of this bill is to take into account the superior education and training now given Canadian youth; also the fact that at eighteen years of age Canadians are considered sufficiently mature to serve in the country's armed forces. It therefore seeks to amend the Dominion Elections Act by reducing the eligible voting age from twenty-one to eighteen.

Mr. Pouliot: Seven is the age of wisdom.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACT

Mr. White (Middlesex East):

1. How much money was voted by parliament in 1949 to make payments to livestock owners under Bill No. 147 to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act?
2. How many farmers eligible for payments under this bill have received payments to date?
3. How much of the money voted has been expended to date?

Mr. McCubbin:

1. None.
2. None.
3. No money yet voted.

VETERANS—DISTRIBUTION OF FRANCE AND GERMANY STAR

Mr. Harkness:

1. Has the France and Germany Star been issued to veterans who took part in the Dieppe operation?
2. If not, what are the reasons for the delay?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. No.

2. The regulations for the award of all campaign stars and war medals were made after consultation amongst the various members of the commonwealth. The France and Germany star was stablished to recognize specifically the campaign in northwest Europe after the Normandy landing, June 6, 1944; therefore participants in the Dieppe operation, August 19, 1942, did not qualify for the award.

Members of the army and air force and personnel of the navy who were engaged in shore operations were, however, awarded the 1939-45 star for the Dieppe operation only, whereas the normal qualifying time for the 1939-45 star is six months for army and navy personnel and two months for the air force. Special recognition was given to personnel who served at Dieppe as follows:

Victoria Cross, 2; Distinguished Service Order, 19; Military Cross, 29; Distinguisher Conduct Medal 20; Military Medal, 65; Mentioned in dispatches, 150; Total, 285.

PRICES SUPPORT—WHITE BEANS

Mr. White (Middlesex East):

1. How many bushels of white beans are now in possession of the agricultural prices support board, 1948 crop?
2. How many bushels of the 1948 crop has the agricultural prices support board sold?
3. To what countries?
4. What price per bushel was received in Canadian dollars for those sold?

Mr. McCubbin:

1. None.

2. None. The agricultural prices support board did not sell any white beans of the 1948 crop, but the board purchased 38,000 bushels and, under an arrangement made by the Department of External Affairs, shipped them for purposes of Palestine refugee relief at a total cost to the board of $194,419.88.

3. Answered by No. 2.

4. Answered by No. 2.

UNEMPLOYMENT—ESTIMATES OF UNPLACED APPLICANTS—AVAILABILITY OF STATISTICS

Mr. Coldwell:

1. On what day of the week does the government receive a new estimate of the number of unplaced applicants registered at the national employment service?
2. What is the lapse of time between this day and the day on which the information is made available to the public?
3. Have there been any changes in government policy with respect to the availability to the public of unemployment statstics since January 1, 1949?
4. If so, what changes have been made?

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle):

1. Local national employment service offices count the number of live applications for employment in their files on Thursday of each week. Processed data on a national and regional basis are available to the government ten to twelve days later.

2. Data, with figures on unemployment insurance benefits and an analysis of the current situation, are released at the middle and the end of each month, about two weeks after date of local office count.

3. No, except frequency of press releases.

4. See answer to No. 3.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES—ADMINISTRATION

Mr. Knight:

1. Is there a government board or commission which administers the affairs in the Northwest Territories?
2. If so, by what authority was that board created?
3. Who are its present members?
4. Is there a local board or committee which acts in an advisory capacity to the government board?
5. If so (a) who are its members; (b) what organizations do they represent?

Mr. Prudham:

1. Yes.

2. The Northwest Territories Act authorizes the governor in council to appoint a chief executive officer, to be known as the commissioner of the Northwest Territories, who administers the government of the territories under instructions, from time to time, given by the governor in council or the Minister of Resources and Development. Under authority of section 8 of the act, the governor in council appointed a council to aid the commissioner in the administration of the territories.

3. The present members of the council are the following:

Commissioner: H. L. Keenleyside, deputy minister of resources and development.

Deputy commissioner: Roy A. Gibson, director, development services branch, department of Resources and Development.

Other members: Stuart T. Wood, commissioner, R.C.M.P.; D. M. MacKay, director, Indian Affairs branch, Department of Citizenship and Immigration; Louis C. Audette, Canadian maritime commission; Harold B. Godwin, Department of National Defence; John G. McNiven, Yellowknife, N. W. T.

4. No.

5. Answered by No. 4. However, under the local administrative district ordinance, local trustee boards have been established at Yellowknife and Hay River.

The members of the Yellowknife board are: Chairman: Dr. O. L. Stanton; members: Dr.

J. D. Bateman, E. C. Rudd, John H. Winter, Mervyn A. Hardie, John M. McMeekan, J. Guy Wheeler, Albert Thomas Rivett.

The members of the Hay River board are: Chairman: D. J. Martin; members: Edward R. Osborne, Robert W. Porritt, Mrs. M. Thorsteinson, William Clark.

*UNEMPLOYMENT—PROJECTS PLANNED IN 1945

Mr. Coldwell:

1. Has there been any change in the policy announced by the then minister of reconstruction in April, 1945, in the white paper entitled "Employment and Income"?
2. If so, what changes have been made, and for what reasons?
3. If not, what is the extent of the "shelf of soundly planned projects" referred to on page 16 of the white paper?
4. To what extent have projects from this shelf been used to relieve unemployment?
5. How many men have been employed in such projects?
6. How many men could be employed in the projects at present on the shelf?

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, after this question was placed on the order paper I made a full statement in the house, and the answers are to be found at pages 56, 57 and 58 of Hansard for February 20.

Mr. Speaker: Answered.

UNEMPLOYMENT—NUMBER BY PROVINCES AS OF CERTAIN DATES

Mr. Knowles:

What was the total number of unemployed persons in Canada, by provinces, as at (a) July 1, 1948; (b) January 1, 1949; (c) July 1, 1949; (d) October 1, 1949; (e) November 1, 1949; (f) December 1, 1949; (g) January 1, 1950, and (h) February 1, 1950?

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle):

The number of persons registered as looking for work at local national employment service offices, by provinces, at the dates specified are given below:

Province	July 1, 1948	Dec. 30, 1948	June 30, 1949	Sept. 29, 1949	Nov. 3, 1949	Dec. 1, 1949	Dec. 29, 1949	Feb. 2, 1950

PATENTS

Mr. Knowles:

1. How many applications for patents were filed (a) by corporations; (b) by individuals, during 1949?
2. How many applications for patents were filed (a) by corporations; (b) by individuals, during the ten-year period ending December 31, 1949?
3. How many patents were granted (a) to corporations; (b) to individuals, during 1949?
4. How many patents were granted (a) to corporations; (b) to individuals during the ten-year period ending December 31, 1949?
5. How many active patents are owned (a) by corporations; (b) by individuals?

Mr. Bradley:

1. (a) 2,403; (b) 10,569.
2. (a) 12,440; (b) 113,543.
3. (a) 5,989; (b) 2,371.
4. (a) 54,706; (b) 21,090.
5. (a) 97,049; (b) 45,767.

WHEAT—COMMISSIONS ON SALES TO OVERSEAS MARKETS

Mr. Whiteside:

1. Does the wheat board sell wheat to Britain or any European country through the grain exchange?
2. Which companies have been used to put these deals through?
3. What have these companies received in commissions for their services?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. No. In selling wheat the board uses the services of shippers and exporters who in turn may be members of or represented by members of the Winnipeg grain exchange.

2. As stated in the answer to No. 1, there are no wheat deals through the grain exchange. Agents of the board for shipment of wheat via eastern and western outlets are as follows:

3. Where the above-listed companies are used in export sales, a commission which covers an allowance for services rendered in moving the wheat from an in store position at the lakehead to an f.o.b. position at Atlantic seaboard ports of one cent per bushel is included in the sales price of wheat which is delivered to the United Kingdom under the terms of the Canada-United Kingdom agreement or has been sold direct by the board to other buyers. On similar shipments via Pacific coast ports, on which no forwarding services similar to those on grain ex the lakehead are rendered by exporters as board agents, the allowance is at present $\frac{3}{8}$ of a cent per bushel. Prior to January 1, 1950, this allowance was $\frac{1}{2}$ cent per bushel. On similar shipments via Churchill the allowance has been $\frac{1}{2}$ cent per bushel.

In cases where the wheat is sold by exporters or agents themselves, either under the terms and conditions of the international wheat agreement or on a class two basis, the selling commission is a matter of arrangement between the buyer and the board's agent, except that in the case of clearances from Atlantic ports a forwarding allowance of $\frac{1}{2}$ cent per bushel for services rendered in moving the wheat from the lakehead to seaboard position is included in the asking price.

In all cases the commissions follow the wheat and are paid by the buyer.

3. The number of persons exhausting their unemployment insurance benefits for the month of November 1949 was 7,029. (December and January figures not yet available).

4. December, 1949, 22,404; January, 1950, 31,039.

UNITED STATES BASES IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Higgins:

1. Has any new agreement been reached with the United States respecting the United States bases in Newfoundland, arising out of the visit of the United States-Canadian joint defence board to Newfoundland?
2. If so, what is the agreement?

Mr. Pearson:

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.

Questions

SHAUGHNESSY HOSPITAL, VANCOUVER

Mr. MacInnis:

Who were the successful tenderers and at what price for each item in the call for tenders No. 1162, December 28, 1949, by the Shaughnessy hospital in Vancouver?

2 to 7. Answered by No. 1.

BONAVENTURE, QUE., FISHERMEN'S WHARF

Mr. Courtemanche:

1. Were tenders called in 1949 for the construction or extension of the fishermen's wharf at Bonaventure, Bonaventure county?
2. If so, what are the names of those who tendered, and the amount of each tender?
3. Who was awarded the contract, and at what price?
4. Was the contractor paid any extras over and above the contract price?
5. If so, in what amount?
6. Who supervised this work, and on what date was he appointed?
7. What daily rate was paid him, and what total amount did he receive?

Mr. Fournier (Hull):

1. Yes, for the extension of the fishermen's wharf.

2. Fortunat Bernard & Arthur Bujold, $15,306.50; Julien Cavanagh, $15,709.50; J. Romeo Allard, $16,490.

3. Fortunat Bernard & Arthur Bujold, $15,306.50.

4. No.

5. Answered by No. 4.

6. (a) Achille Raymond; (b) January 12, 1950.

7. (a) $8 a day; (b) $136 for period January 12-31, 1950. (Work not yet completed.)

INCOME TAX DEPARTMENT—RADIO ADVERTISING

Mr. Fraser:

1. During the year 1949, did the income tax department use the radio for announcements, advertising, or otherwise?
2. If so, what was the total amount spent by the income tax department for this purpose during 1949?
3. Is the income tax department engaging the radio for this purpose during the year 1950?
4. If so, what is the estimated cost for the months of January, February and March, 1950?

Mr. McCann:

1. The taxation division, Department of National Revenue, conducted a nation-wide radio advertising campaign during 1949, at a cost of $8,609.73, for the purpose of:

(a) urging taxpayers to file their income tax returns early and avoid the penalty for late filing;

(b) inviting taxpayers to visit their district income tax office in order to obtain assistance in preparing their returns.

The taxation division is conducting a similar radio advertising campaign in 1950, and the estimated cost thereof, as at 31st March, is $12,000.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. Answered by No. 1.

4. Answered by No. 1.

*GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS—RECOMMENDATIONS BY MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. Knowles:

1. In connection with how many government contracts let during each year since January 1, 1945, by provinces, have the contractors awarded the same engaged any of their employees for work on said contracts after receiving recommendations from members of parliament?

2. To whom was each such contract awarded, what was the contract for and what was the amount thereof?

3. During each year since January 1, 1945, by provinces, how many persons have been appointed to positions in the government service, permanent or temporary, after receiving recommendations from members of parliament?

4. How many were so appointed at Ottawa?

5. During each year since January 1, 1945, by provinces, how many persons have been appointed postmasters or mail couriers after receiving recommendations from members of parliament?

6. How many government contracts let during each year since January 1, 1945, by provinces, have been awarded after receiving recommendations from members of parliament?

7. To whom was each such contract awarded, what was the contract for and what was the amount thereof?

8. During each year since January 1, 1945, by provinces, how many properties were purchased, and how many premises were rented, by the federal government or any department or branch thereof, after receiving recommendations from members of parliament?

Mr. St. Laurent: I think I should answer this question orally. I do not think any member of the government would pretend that members of parliament on both sides of the house do not make representations from time to time about contracts, about appointments, and even about men who might be employed by those who have obtained contracts. But such representations have no official character, and do not appear in any official records. From the rumours which reach me from time to time I have gathered the impression that some hon. members, at least on this side of the house, are not always satisfied with the attention that is paid to their recommendations—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. St. Laurent:—by ministers or deputy ministers or even by the civil service commission. I think all hon. members will realize that inquiries of the ministry can be answered only by reference to official documents; and the correct official reply to this question must be that the information requested is not available.

Mr. Speaker: Answered.

BONAVENTURE WEST, QUE., HARBOUR PROTECTION FACILITIES

Mr. Courtemanche:

1. What amount was spent for repairs to the protection facilities at Bonaventure West, county of Bonaventure, from December, 1949, to February 15, 1950?

2. Who was the supervisor or foreman of such work?

3. What daily rate was paid to him, and what total amount did he receive?

Mr. Fournier (Hull):

1. $3,994.99.

2. Phocas Bernard.

3. (a) $8; (b) $304.

KLAUS EMIL JULIUS FUCHS

Mr. Gagnon:

1. Was Klaus Emil Julius Fuchs interned in Canada? If so, on what date?

2. Was he released? If so, on what date, and for what reasons?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. Klaus Emil Julius Fuchs was interned in the United Kingdom on 12th May, 1940. He was sent to Canada by the United Kingdom and interned at their request in a Canadian internment camp on 13th July, 1940.

2. On 17th December, 1940, he was returned to the United Kingdom at the request of the authorities there.

TRADE WITH GERMANY

Mr. Catherwood:

1. Has the Department of Trade and Commerce given consideration to extending our commercial representation in Germany with a view to the possibility of extending our trade with that country? If so, to what extent?

2. What was the value of our exports to that country in 1949?

3. What was the value of our imports from Germany in 1949?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. Yes. An officer of the Department of Trade and Commerce was first appointed to Germany on February 14, 1947, and an assistant was assigned to him in July, 1949. The officer at present in charge of this post is now, in accordance with the standard policy, due to be moved to another post, and he will be replaced by an officer with more seniority.

2. $23,451,452.

3. $ 7,134,030.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—HAND GRENADE EXPLOSION NEAR CAMP BORDEN

Mr. Fraser:

1. Has the Department of National Defence investigated death and injuries of children near Camp Borden caused by hand grenade explosion during the first week in January, 1950?
2. Have live hand grenades been used by defence department at Camp Borden since 1945?
3. If so, is a check kept on these grenades, as to number issued, and number exploded?
4. Is ground where grenades are used checked after each exercise in order to see if all grenades are exploded?
5. If accident bomb which caused death to children in January, 1950, near Camp Borden came from the camp, is the government paying damages, etc.?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. Yes.

2. Yes, on grenade ranges within the confines of the camp.

3. Yes.

4. Yes. All grenades used are accounted for either as exploded or returned.

5. The investigation carried out did not reveal any facts which would indicate that the grenade which exploded could have come from Camp Borden. The question of damages therefore does not arise.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCES—BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Goode:

1. How many veterans in British Columbia were recipients of the war veterans allowance on December 31, 1949?
2. How many of these were receiving the extra $10 per month?

Mr. Mutch: Return at December 31, 1949. The figures relate to the territory under the jurisdiction of the Vancouver district office of the department, and do not relate to the small portion of British Columbia which lies within the Edmonton district.

1. 6,390.

2. Married veterans, or widowers or divorced veterans with a child or children, receiving $15 a month: 153.

Single veterans receiving $10 a month: 123.

Figures do not include 921 veterans who have been assisted from the assistance fund (W.V.A.) up to December 31, 1949 but who have been helped by (a) a lump sum payment; (b) a monthly payment which had ceased prior to December 31, 1949; (c) a monthly payment, in payment at December 31, 1949 at a rate dependent on need other than $10 or $15 a month.

INDIANS AND ESKIMOS—HEALTH PROGRAM

Mr. Dewar:

1. What facilities and staff are now available for the care of the health of the Indian and Eskimo population?
2. What are the most outstanding effects of the improved health facilities and care which are now available to the Indian and Eskimo population?
3. What aspects of the Indian health program have been of particular value in the campaign against tuberculosis and other preventable diseases?
4. Has a new Indian hospital recently been opened at Sioux Lookout, Ontario?
5. If so (a) how many Indians will it serve; (b) what territory will it serve; (c) how many patient beds will it provide; (d) how many persons are on the staff of the hospital?

Mr. Martin:

1. The Indian and Eskimo population is served by 21 Indian health service hospitals, strategically located across Canada, and by a widely dispersed system of 35 outpost nursing stations.

Indian health services staff numbers 1,000 persons, including 60 medical officers, 5 dental surgeons, 65 graduate nurses in the field and 125 nurses in departmental hospitals.

In addition over 900 doctors and dentists serve part time. In areas where the facilities of the directorate of Indian health services are not available, Indian and Eskimo patients are cared for, under arrangements made by the directorate, in hundreds of hospitals and sanatoria across Canada.

2. The tuberculosis death rate amongst the Indians and Eskimos has been drastically reduced since 1944—by 40 per cent.

Sharp declines are also taking place in other communicable diseases, such as diphtheria, whooping cough, smallpox, typhoid, etc.

3. (a) Greatly increased hospital facilities—nine times as many Indian patients are now being given hospital care as were nine years ago; (b) large increase in hospital and field staffs; (c) active participation by all Indian health services field officers in immunization campaigns against diphtheria and other preventable diseases; (d) a very active program for case-finding of tuberculosis among the Indians—over 70 per cent of the Indian population were X-rayed in 1949.

4. Yes.

5. (a) over 5,000 Indians; (b) over 100,000 square miles, extending east to Nakina, west to the Manitoba border and north to Hudson bay; (c) 65; (d) 30.

CONSTRUCTION OF DAMS, MANITOBA

Mr. Winkler:

1. What was the cost of (a) the dam on the Pembina river at the east end of Rock lake in Manitoba; (b) the dam or dams on the river at Carman, Manitoba, variously known as the Boyne or the Morris river?
2. How many acre feet are stored in each case?

Mr. McCubbin:

1. (a) and (b) combined: Construction, $17,216; land, $4,985; total, $22,201.

2. (a) 75 acre feet; (b) 200 acre feet.

Questions

CANADA LAND AND IRRIGATION COMPANY—EMPLOYEES' PENSION PLAN

Mr. Hansell:

1. Has the purchase of the Canada Land and Irrigation Company been completed?
2. Did the Canada Land and Irrigation Company have a pension plan for its employees?
3. Is this pension plan still in operation, and has the government considered continuing payment to pensioners?
4. How many employees are now receiving pension payments?

Mr. McCubbin:

1. No; general agreement has been reached with the company, and exact terms are now being drafted with the expectation that final execution will take place in the near future.
2. It is understood that the Canada Land and Irrigation Company has a pension plan for some of its employees, but the government has no detailed information about it.
3. (a) No information. (b) No.
4. No information.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCES—BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Pearkes:

1. How many veterans in British Columbia are in receipt of war veterans allowances?
2. Of these, how many receive additional payments under the special war veterans assistance?

Mr. Mutch:

Return as at December 31, 1949. The figures relate to the territory under the jurisdiction of the Vancouver district office of the department, and do not relate to the small portion of British Columbia which lies within the Edmonton district.

1. 6,390.

2. Receiving monthly payments under assistance fund (W.V.A.): 880. This figure does not include 317 veterans who have been assisted from the assistance fund (W.V.A.) up to December 31, 1949 but who have been helped by (a) a lump sum payment; (b) a monthly payment which had ceased prior to December 31, 1949.

MERCHANT NAVY VETERANS—CORRESPONDENCE COURSES

Mr. Pearkes:

1. Are correspondence courses available to veterans of Canada's wartime merchant navy?
2. If so, in what subjects are such courses given?
3. What educational standards are required of the students before acceptance for such courses?

Mr. Mutch:

1. Yes, provided that the former merchant seaman is resident in Canada and received, or was eligible to receive, a bonus under the merchant seamen special bonus order or the merchant seamen war service bonus order, 1944.

[Mr. McCubbin.]

2. Courses are available in each of the seventy-four subjects formerly provided by the Canadian Legion educational services, including elementary courses in reading, writing and spelling; complete courses in junior and senior matriculation; commercial courses in bookkeeping and shorthand; and technical and vocational courses in such subjects as agriculture, gardening, automotive and diesel engines, electricity and sheet metal work.

3. There are no prescribed educational standards for enrolment in such courses.

IMMIGRATION—GERMAN NATIONALS

Mr. Hansell:

Has any change been made in regulations respecting immigration of German nationals to Canada since the minister's announcement on September 26, 1949?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): No.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

PUBLIC WORKS—AMOUNT VOTED AND NOT EXPENDED

Mr. Knowles:

1. How much money voted for public works in the fiscal years ending in 1946, 1947, 1948 and 1949, by provinces, was not expended?
2. In each instance noted above, how much was revoted in subsequent years, but still not expended?
3. How much money voted for public works for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1950, by provinces, has not yet been expended?

DILLON-BULL'S HOUSE, SASK., TELEGRAPH LINE

Mr. Coldwell:

1. Has parliament voted any money for the construction of a telegraph and/or telephone line between Dillon and Bull's House in Saskatchewan?
2. If so, when was the money voted and what was the amount?
3. Were tenders called for the construction work or any phase of it?
4. If so, what were the estimates of each of those who placed tenders?
5. Who secured the contract and what were the terms?
6. When was the construction work begun?
7. When was it completed?
8. What is the exact length of the line?
9. What rate per mile was paid?
10. When was this rate approved by the government?

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUESTS FOR ASSISTANCE

Mr. Coldwell:

1. Has the government received requests from any provinces or municipalities for assistance in meeting unemployment relief costs since January 1, 1950?
2. If so, from what provinces and what municipalities have these requests been received?
3. What reply or replies has the government given to these requests?

ROYAL COMMISSION ON ARTS, SCIENCES AND LETTERS

Mr. Pouliot:

1. Since the establishment of the royal commission on national development in the arts, letters and sciences (Massey commission), what amounts have been paid to each member of the said commission, to each member of its staff and to each expert in its employ for (a) salaries; (b) travelling expenses; (c) living allowances, and (d) compensation, bonus or indemnity?
2. What was the total cost of the said commission for the above-mentioned period?

I shall be satisfied to have this question answered privately.

Mr. St. Laurent: I had intended to ask that this be made an order for return. Since others may be interested in the information I have the return ready to table, and I can give my hon. friend a copy immediately so that he will have the information.

Mr. Pouliot: Thank you.

Mr. Speaker: Order for return, now tabled.

PRICES SUPPORT—AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

Mr. Wright:

1. What agricultural products have been supported by the Agricultural Prices Support Act?
2. What was the price and method used in each case?
3. What amount of each product came into the possession of the government?
4. What amount of each product remained in the possession of the government on February 15, 1950, or the latest available date?

IMMIGRATION—COSTS OF TRANSPORT, ETC., SINCE 1945

Mr. Gagnon:

1. How many refugees and immigrants have entered Canada from September 1, 1945 to December 31, 1949?
2. What was the cost to the government of recruiting, transporting and establishment of such refugees and immigrants to their place of destination?

CUTTING OF TIMBER ON INDIAN RESERVES AND CROWN LANDS

Mr. Wright:

1. Were tenders called for by the dominion government or any agency thereof for the cutting of timber or other forest products on Indian reserves and/or national park areas in the province of Saskatchewan in the years 1947, 1948 and 1949?
2. If so, who were the successful tenderers and for what amounts?
3. What amounts of lumber, pulp or other forest products were cut on Indian reserves, national park areas or other dominion controlled land in the province of Saskatchewan in the years 1947, 1948 and 1949?

UNEMPLOYMENT—"CRITICAL PERCENTAGE"—INFORMATION TO PRESS

Mr. Knowles:

1. By what means is the working force of Canada determined?
2. By what means is the "critical percentage" of unemployment arrived at (a) for Canada as a whole; (b) for specified areas, and by whom is said "critical percentage" determined?
3. Are local officers of the unemployment insurance commission required to clear with Ottawa before giving information to the press regarding unemployment?
4. If so, when was this requirement first made effective, and by whom?

UNEMPLOYMENT—PUBLIC WORKS PROJECTS

Mr. Knowles:

1. Has the government received from employment committees of the unemployment insurance commission at any time since January 1, 1949, any recommendations concerning public works projects?
2. If so, what action has been taken thereon?
3. What federal public works projects have been undertaken in order to relieve unemployment since September 1, 1949?
4. What number of persons have been employed thereon?
5. How much money has been spent thereon?
6. To whom have contracts for such works been awarded?
7. In what areas have such works been undertaken?

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BENEFITS

Mr. Knowles:

1. What is the total number of unemployed persons in Canada at the present time?
2. How many persons are now receiving unemployment insurance benefits?
3. What is the average amount these persons are receiving?
4. How many persons exhausted their benefits between October 1, 1949, and February 28, 1950?
5. How many of these will qualify for supplementary benefits as from March 1, 1950?
6. For what average number of days will these persons qualify for such supplementary benefits?
7. How many unemployed persons who applied for benefits between October 1, 1949, and February 28, 1950, found they had not sufficient contributions to qualify?
8. How many of these will qualify for supplementary benefits as from March 1, 1950?
9. For what average number of days will these persons qualify for such supplementary benefits?

Mr. MacInnis:

How many persons in receipt of unemployment insurance benefits in each of the months of November and December, 1949, and January, 1950, exhausted their benefits before finding employment?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—MONTHLY REPORT ON CLAIMS—MAILING LIST

Mr. Coldwell:

For a copy of the mailing list for the publication entitled, "Unemployment insurance commission cumulative monthly report on claims for insurance benefit", as it stood on August 1, 1949, and as it stood on February 1, 1949, together with a statement showing the reasons for any changes made between these two dates.

DILLON-BULL'S HOUSE, SASK., TELEGRAPH LINE

Mr. Coldwell:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, documents and other papers passing between Mr. L. M.

Marion and the Department of Transport, any minister of the crown, and any official or employee of the government, from January 1, 1947, to date, with respect to the construction of a telegraph and/or telephone line between Dillon and Bull's House in Saskatchewan.

BONAVENTURE WEST, QUE., HARBOUR PROTECTION FACILITIES

Mr. Courtemanche:

For a copy of all payrolls and a statement showing the amount and cost of materials used in connection with the repairs to the protection facilities of Bonaventure West, county of Bonaventure, from December, 1949, to February 15, 1950.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—INSTRUCTIONS TO OFFICES

Mr. Knowles:

For a copy of all directives and instructions issued to unemployment insurance offices, since January 1, 1949, having to do with the handling of unemployment, including ways and means of dealing with applications for unemployment insurance benefits; advice as to the meaning of the words "suitable employment"; any special directives or instructions with reference to displaced persons, and any other related matters.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): Mr. Speaker, will the hon. member allow this motion to stand until the next sitting? Frankly, I should like to study it in order to ascertain to what extent we can meet the request.

Mr. Knowles: In consenting to the request that the matter stand, I suggest that the parliamentary assistant look back at the records of 1945 and 1946, where he will find that a similar request was eventually met.

Mr. Speaker: Motion stands.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—REPORTS TO COMMISSION

Mr. Knowles:

For a copy of all reports made to the unemployment insurance commission and/or to the Minister or Deputy Minister of Labour, dated since September 1, 1949, having to do with the unemployment situation.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): The construction we have to place on this motion clearly indicates that it has to do with strictly interdepartmental matters. Upon that ground it would be impossible for us to agree to the passing of the motion as it stands. If the hon. member has something else in mind, or if he would be satisfied with the tabling of communications to or from any external source, we would agree to the amending of the motion, and the passing of it as amended.

Mr. Knowles: Will the parliamentary assistant permit the matter to stand until we can discuss it as well as the previous motion, to which it is related?

Mr. Speaker: Motion stands.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REFERENCE TO ADDRESS OF GENERAL MCNAUGHTON TO CANADIAN GEOGRAPHICAL SOCIETY

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I should like to answer a question asked by the leader of the opposition on Monday, about a speech delivered by General McNaughton to the Canadian Geographical Society. I had told him that I had not had an opportunity of reading the text of this speech. Since then I have been able to do so and to discuss it with my colleague the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton). I am now prepared to answer the question.

Hon. members will recall that the question read as follows:

> . . . whether the speech made by General A. G. L. McNaughton to the annual meeting of the Canadian Geographical Society in Ottawa on Friday, February 24, was authorized by the Department of National Defence or any other department of the Canadian government. Whether authorized or not, does the government now approve the statements contained in that speech?

There was no official authorization, because the occasion did not call for any official authorization. For some time General McNaughton has been a member of the Canadian Geographical Society. He was speaking to the fellows of that society, and stated in express terms that he was giving them his personal opinion, as appears at page 19 of his text:

> I would emphasize that what I have to say represents my personal opinions alone.

Nevertheless I read with a great deal of interest, as I am sure the hon. member did, the text of the speech. After doing so, and discussing it with my colleague the Minister of National Defence, I have to say that we are in full agreement with the views General McNaughton expressed on that occasion.

The leader of the opposition directed my attention particularly to one paragraph which reads as follows:

> It is on the peaceful aspects of co-operation, current and long term, that I feel that emphasis should be placed in the organization and functions of the commonwealth—much more so, perhaps, than on the commonwealth as an arrangement for the collective security of its members, which by itself under existing circumstances and present dangers it is not well adapted to undertake. In this connection, with the entry of Newfoundland into confederation we have assumed full responsibility for the solution of the significant problems of the defence of our Atlantic seaboard.

That last sentence, of course, is a statement of fact. That part of our Atlantic seaboard has now become a part of Canada, and it is our primary responsibility to defend our own shores. I believe that paragraph has to be considered with the rest of the text. So that it may be understood, I believe the part of the text of which that is one paragraph should be placed on the record.

General McNaughton had been discussing the operations of the permanent joint board on defence; the simultaneous declaration about defence made in this house and in Washington, by my predecessor, as prime minister, and the President of the United States in February, 1947; and the establishment in April, 1948, of the joint United States-Canada industrial mobilization committee. He described how they functioned, and then went on:

With these provisions for the free and intimate discussion of defence matters which are of mutual concern to Canada and to the United States, and for their orderly conduct, no one in either of our countries, or in any other country, need fear that any of the precautions essential to the security of North America are being neglected.

As I have said, Canada, like the United States, is fully aware that its security does not rest on the protection of the territory of that continent alone. We realize that this requires continued association with other peoples of good will, who, like ourselves, are devoted to the cause of peace.

In the first place there is the commonwealth. In addition to being a nation of the American continent, and now a member of the Atlantic pact, Canada is also a member of the commonwealth, and she holds to that association with all the firm conviction which has marked the course of our history since early times. She holds to that association as a nation in her own right, exercising full sovereign powers, and happy to co-operate in all matters which make for peace and orderly progress in the commonwealth and in the world.

There are some who may see a difficulty in reconciling our position as a nation on the American continent with our membership in the commonwealth; others may be still further disturbed as to our relation to the commonwealth in consequence of our entry into an Atlantic pact, but I do not share these anxieties.

In the first place, I believe that fundamentally the real interests of the member nations of the commonwealth are very close to those of the United States and likewise to those of the democratic countries of Europe now associated in the Atlantic pact. We all stand firmly for peace, for individual freedom and for democracy as the proper form of government. In the second place, I think we are a practical people ready to deal with each question as it arises on its merits and on the basis of the facts. We see no reason for conflict in interest, and every reason for co-operation between the commonwealth and the United States and with western Europe, and you can be quite sure, with our deep concern for the welfare of each of these great associations of peoples with whom we are so intimately linked, we in Canada will devote ourselves on every occasion to promoting unanimity in view.

Then the paragraph to which reference was made follows:

It is on the peaceful aspects of co-operation, current and long term, that I feel that emphasis should be placed in the organization and functions of the commonwealth—much more so, perhaps, than on the commonwealth as an arrangement for the collective security of its members, which by itself under existing circumstances and present dangers it is not well adapted to undertake. In this connection, with the entry of Newfoundland into confederation we have assumed full responsibility for the solution of the significant problems of the defence of our Atlantic seaboard.

I believe that is in line with the policy that has been expressed over the years, not only by the members of this government but by representatives of the other commonwealth nations. We do not regard the commonwealth as a defence alliance. As a matter of fact, unfortunately under present conditions and dangers it is not the fitting organization to provide adequate security for each of its members. That was clearly expressed by my predecessor in an address which he delivered to the members of both houses of parliament of the United Kingdom on May 11, 1944, from which I would merely quote these short paragraphs:

Like the nations of which it is composed, the British commonwealth has within itself a spirit which is not exclusive but the opposite of exclusive. Therein lies its strength. That spirit expresses itself in co-operation. Therein lies the secret of its unity. Co-operation is capable of indefinite expansion. Therein lies the hope of the future.

It is of the utmost importance to the commonwealth that there should continue to be the greatest possible co-operation among its members. In like manner it is, I believe, of the utmost importance to the future of mankind that, after the war, there should be the greatest possible co-operation among the nations of the world.

Our wartime co-operation is not the product of formal institutional unity; it is the result of agreement upon policies of benefit to all. Moreover, they are policies that make an appeal "to all sorts of men in all sorts of countries," provided only they are men of good will.

If, at the close of hostilities the strength and unity of the commonwealth are to be maintained, those ends will be achieved not by policies which are exclusive, but by policies which can be shared with other nations. I am firmly convinced that the way to maintain our unity is to base that unity upon principles which can be extended to all nations. I am equally sure that the only way to maintain world unity is to base it upon principles that can be universally applied.

The war has surely convinced all nations, from the smallest to the greatest, that there is no national security to be found in the isolation of any nation or group of nations. The future security of peace-loving nations will depend upon the extent and effectiveness of international co-operation.

That has been repeated time and again by members of this government. As I read General McNaughton's speech, it is an able and well-expressed statement of the same views.

FREIGHT RATES

APPLICATION OF RAILWAYS FOR INCREASE—DECISION OF BOARD OF TRANSPORT COMMISSIONERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. For the information of members will he table the decision reached by the board of transport commissioners on the application of the railways for an increase in freight rates? May I also couple with that request a suggestion to the government that, rather than dealing with this matter on going into supply, an arrangement be made by which members of the house may have an opportunity of discussing the decision before the rates go into effect? This is a most important matter.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): With reference to the first part of the hon. gentleman's question, may I say that it has not been the practice to table the judgment of the court, because hon. members can get it from the secretary of the board of transport commissioners. If that is the wish of the house, however, it can be done quite easily.

With reference to the second part of the hon. gentleman's request, I should think that to grant it would be interfering with the judgment of the court. In the past the government has taken the position that it should not interfere with the ordinary process of law or with judgments of the courts. If any parties are aggrieved, they have their rights within the purview of the Railway Act.

Mr. Coldwell: May I ask a supplementary question? In view of the serious results which may follow the increase in the rates now permitted, and in view of the supremacy of this parliament, will the government not allow, by agreement, a discussion in this house before the rates go into effect?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that the question was not intended to be taken in any critical way. The government does not feel that it allows or disallows discussion in the house. The house is mistress of its own procedure and its own discussions. If I am to take the question to be this: Will the government endeavour to facilitate an opportunity, under the rules of the house, for discussion of the matter—

Mr. Coldwell: That is right.

Mr. St. Laurent: If under the rules it can be discussed, we shall be glad to look into it. As I have stated on one or two previous occasions, it was our intention to call each department early so that on one day there can be discussion on everything that concerns it. The Department of Transport is one of the next to be entered into committee of supply. But if it cannot be reached early enough to serve the desired purpose, we shall endeavour to see whether some other opportunity cannot be found that would enable the members to engage in any discussion about railway matters that would be proper under the rules of the house.

Mr. Coldwell: I want to thank the Prime Minister. My wording of the question was perhaps unfortunate, but the manner in which he took it was precisely the manner in which I intended it.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REDUCTION IN PASSENGER TRAIN SERVICES—RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Will he take into consideration the advisability of setting up the committee on government-owned railways for the purpose of discussing the present disruption of service on the Canadian National Railways?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I presume the hon. gentleman refers to the committee on railways and shipping.

Mr. Gillis: Yes.

Mr. Chevrier: In his question he referred to government-owned railways.

Mr. Gillis: "Railways and shipping" is right.

Mr. Chevrier: If the hon. member refers to the committee on railways and shipping, and if his question is whether the government will give consideration, the answer is that of course it will. But I should point this out to him. The purpose of the committee on railways and shipping is to consider the annual budget of the Canadian National Railways, the annual report of the Canadian National Railways, the report of the Canadian National Railways securities trust, the report of Trans-Canada Air Lines, and the like. Until those reports are ready, it is useless to establish the committee. In view of my hon. friend's interest, and, I am sure, the interest of the house, I will ask the officers of the Canadian National Railways to hasten the report so that we may proceed with its establishment as quickly as possible.

Mr. Graydon: When was that report brought down last year?

Mr. Chevrier: Certainly not before April. I am speaking now from memory, but I am sure not in the month of March. My recollection is that at no time since 1945 has the committee been established before April. I say that subject to correction, however.

Mr. MacInnis: May I ask a supplementary question? I understand that certain items in the estimates are referred to the committee on nationally-owned railways. Could not the committee be set up and these items referred to it, and then perhaps the matters referred to by the hon. member for Cape Breton South could be discussed under that heading?

Mr. Chevrier: Following what I said a moment ago, I think the committee will be set up fairly soon. In the past it has been the practice to deal, in conjunction with the reports, with the items to which the hon. member refers. I am hopeful that it will be possible to establish this committee fairly quickly.

COLLISION OF EXPRESS TRAINS BETWEEN MONTREAL AND HALIFAX

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask another question of the Minister of Transport. Has he received any report on the collision that took place between two express trains between Montreal and Halifax on Friday night? If so, is he in a position to make a statement to the house as to the cause of the collision?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I am sorry I am not in a position to make a report. I shall have an inquiry made, and perhaps I may be able to give the hon. member a reply in a day or two.

POTATOES

EXPORTS TO THE UNITED STATES—PROPOSED VISIT TO OTTAWA OF U.S. SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. H. Hatfield (Victoria-Carleton): I should like to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is the report in the Montreal Daily Star last evening correct in stating that Mr. Brannan, United States secretary of agriculture, will fly to Ottawa on Friday to have a conference with the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) in regard to the international supply of wheat to Japan and western Germany, at the same time taking up the matter of the export of potatoes from Canada to the United States?

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): It will be noticed, Mr. Speaker, that the question asks whether the report in the Montreal Daily Star is correct. The report is a lengthy one and involves a great many matters of conjecture. As there is so much in it I would not wish to say that it is correct or is not correct. I could, however, say that Mr. Brannan, United States Secretary of Agriculture, is coming to Ottawa to meet with the Minister of Trade and Commerce on Friday of this week. The primary purpose of that meeting is to discuss wheat. There are also other matters to be discussed, but the United States secretary of agriculture is the only one who can say what questions he proposes to raise for discussion.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

HEALTH AND WELFARE—EXPENDITURES BY GOVERNMENT AND OTHER AGENCIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. Will he look into the matter of a question under my name which was passed as an order for return on November 9, 1949, having to do with the total amount expended in Canada on health and welfare?

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State): I should be glad to do so.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Tuesday, February 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. F. H. Larson for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. Henri A. Gosselin (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned last night I said that if our farmers were given the necessary encouragement, as in the past, our sons would not be apt to leave the soil. Since I have only a few minutes remaining I feel it is my duty to continue on a very important question, and to express my views on our natural resources. I believe it is the duty of all hon. members to bend their efforts toward the development of our natural resources for the good of our coming generations. Providence has provided Canada with tremendous natural resources for our future generations. Each province has different natural resources, and I believe it would be regrettable if we neglected to develop these resources for the benefit of our people.

It is our duty to spare no expense in order to develop our natural resources so that our younger element will realize that those who are in charge of the affairs of this country have provided for their future and have made it possible for them to share in the future prosperity of Canada. I believe that every hon. member in this house will support the government in its efforts to develop our natural resources. In this country we have a population of which we should be proud. We should feel confident that they will carry on in the future to the best of their ability. In the past we have shown that we can be united. Unity is the basis upon which the prosperity of the country depends. The example which was given to us by our soldiers during the last war proves that unity and good understanding assure us of that prosperity which we desire and which we appreciate so much.

My time is just about exhausted. I feel that I should call on all hon. members to unite and to carry on in the best way possible to assure our people that whatever is necessary to provide for their future and welfare will be done. I regret that the time allotted to me does not permit me to continue with what I feel would be a remedy for some of our ills. I still believe that the present government is not neglecting in any way to provide that which is necessary to provide for the future of Canadians.

I wish to say a few words about unemployment. At the present time, Mr. Speaker, unemployment may appear to be disastrous, but as we look around us we realize that the difficulties of the people are not those which they have experienced in the past. Our people face the future with confidence. They are well aware that adjustment is necessary. They are well aware that the government has to proceed with caution. Our government has to proceed in such a way that its acts will be beneficial, and it is providing security measures against the aggressor. Our people are proud of its actions, because they feel that our enormous wealth will be distributed if possible. Let us join together and give our people the assurance that we are working for their welfare, that we are working to provide for every one of our people and that there is a future for them. By so doing I believe we will be establishing a principle whereby we will be guaranteeing the matter of financing. We will be guaranteeing the future prosperity of those in our country who look to us for an assurance of their welfare and of the opportunity to make an honest living. We will also create friendship in the United Kingdom and throughout Europe among those who look to us to perpetuate the principles for which our soldiers fought so valiantly.

I must now conclude my remarks because the time at my disposal is exhausted. I do so however in the expectation that I shall have the opportunity to join in other debates upon those occasions when I may feel that I can express myself for the benefit of those whom I have the honour to represent.

[Mr. Gosselin.]

Mr. G. S. White (Hastings-Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, rising to take part in the debate I should like first to extend my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Larson) and the seconder (Mr. Dumas) of the address in reply. May I also extend my congratulations to an old army friend who has been promoted to the post of Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris). In my opinion this is a well-deserved promotion and, for my part, I wish him every success.

I was sorry to hear the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Gregg) state the other day in answer to a question that it was not his intention to set up a committee on veterans affairs at this session. Most hon. members are aware that the Legion has presented to the government a brief which deals with various matters connected with veterans affairs, a brief which could very well be considered by the committee.

The announcement has been made in the press that the minister will introduce at this session certain amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act. These amendments could be considered by the committee. Then, there appears on the order paper a resolution standing in the name of the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Goode) which states:

> That in the opinion of this house the government should give early consideration as to the advisability of increasing the basic rates of the war veterans allowance to $50 per month for single veterans and widows, and $85 per month for married veterans and widows with dependent children.

Anyone who looks over the large number of resolutions already appearing on the order paper will agree I am sure that there is no hope of this most important resolution being considered by the house at this session. If the minister would reconsider his decision and set up a committee, the subject matter of this resolution could be given every consideration. At the last committee on veterans affairs this subject was considered and certain conclusions arrived at. It is my honest opinion, and I believe that of many veteran members in the house, that those conclusions were slightly in error, and that the committee should be given an opportunity to make the necessary change.

If however the minister has finally decided that he does not intend to recommend the setting up of the committee, I would suggest to him that he advise hon. members who are interested in veterans affairs—and that would include every hon. member, no matter where he sits—just why he has chosen to refuse to have the committee set up.

At the last session of parliament, just before armistice day, I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) if it was to be considered a legal holiday, and whether or not the house would sit on that day. The Prime Minister replied that armistice day was a legal holiday, but that the house would sit as usual.

The matter of establishing armistice day as a legal holiday has been considered by various sections of the Legion in my district, and the members of the Legion feel that it should be observed in Canada as a national holiday in the same manner as we observe Good Friday, Christmas, Labour day and other holidays. Armistice day has a deep significance to the majority of people in Canada. However, when the government does not choose to observe it as a national holiday one cannot complain very much when the rest of the country fails to do so.

I have received a copy of a resolution passed by the county council of the county of Hastings, in which I reside, asking that armistice day be observed as a national holiday. I trust that before next November arrives the government will have taken some action to see that this day of remembrance is observed as a national holiday.

While we are speaking about holidays I would suggest to the government the advisability of having all holidays, with the exception of Christmas, Good Friday and armistice day, observed on the Monday closest to the day on which the holiday falls. A statutory holiday in the middle of a week is of little benefit to many people. On the other hand a holiday on a week end, preferably on Monday, not only gives a long week end but makes possible the taking of trips by many people who would not be able to do so if the holiday were permitted to remain in the middle of the week. I understand such a change would involve only a slight amendment to the Bills of Exchange Act. I suggest to the government that these matters referring to the holding of holidays on Mondays and the observance of armistice day as a national holiday be seriously considered.

I would bring to the attention of the Minister of Veterans Affairs the rumoured proposal that the office of the Department of Veterans Affairs in Peterborough be closed. This office serves a large number of veterans in that area, and if it is closed it will be necessary for them to do their business and have their consultations with veterans affairs offices either at Toronto or at Kingston. In many cases, the necessity of travelling to either of these centres would involve long, expensive and sometimes most inconvenient trips. Before the office is closed I hope the minister will give serious consideration to the inconvenience which would be caused to the large number of veterans in that area who take advantage of the Peterborough office.

Another resolution from the county council of Hastings which I would bring to the attenition of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) is as follows:

> Whereas county homes for the aged are compelled to pay sales tax on all goods purchased to which sales tax is applicable;
>
> And whereas hospitals are exempt from payment of such sales tax;
> Be it hereby resolved that the Hastings county council petition the Minister of Finance of the federal government to remove this sales tax in respect to county homes for the aged.

I commend this resolution to the minister in the hope that he will give these homes for the aged the same consideration now given to hospitals.

I see the hon. member for Hastings South (Mr. Follwell) in his seat, and I should like to congratulate him upon his maiden speech in the House of Commons. In that speech he referred to the importance of cheese to the economy of the county of Hastings, and stated correctly that not only does that county produce the largest quantity of cheese of any county in the province, but that it produces the best. Black Diamond cheese, produced and cured in Hastings, is world-famous.

The importance of the cheese industry to the county of Hastings is indicated in a press announcement appearing in the Belleville Ontario-Intelligencer of February 21, 1950, which announced that the first producer storage plant to provide cheese curing and storage facilities, and a research laboratory, is being erected in the city of Belleville.

Mr. Heath, secretary of the Ontario cheese producers association, stated that the warehouses when constructed would serve the following purposes:

> (1) When cheese is assembled in large quantities it enables the producers to classify it according to indications of good keeping qualities, freedom from foreign material and other physical characteristics, and sell it according to classifications, which should encourage competitive buying as the trade could be provided with their preferred requirements.
> (2) It also provides the producers with a building in which to store their cheese should the market at any time appear unsettled and unfavourable.
> (3) It provides the producers with the facilities to investigate new methods of marketing.

In addition to a large amount of cheese, Hastings county also produces many other farm products including a large number of pork products. As Hastings county is largely an agricultural district it is only natural that the farmer producers are most keenly and vitally interested in the falling prices affecting their products. Agriculture is the most basic industry in the world. It produces the greater portion of the food required to feed the world, and Canada despite its industrial growth is primarily an agricultural country. It is one of the few countries left in the world in which agricultural production can still be expanded. A prosperous agriculture can contribute to a sound and balanced national economy and means much to the general prosperity of our nation.

The growing difficulties of agriculture were caused by the war and the mistake of continuing compulsory marketing in closed markets at political prices. Hindsight reveals that the restoration of open food markets at the end of the war, with the financing of some foreign customers, would have resulted in fair prices for Canadian food. Natural prices would have given farmers reasonable wages in relation to the earnings of urban workers. The financing of food exports, with some outright gifts of food, would then have been shared by all citizens of Canada and would not have been borne wholly by the farmer producers. The very serious inequity which existed between urban and rural producers at the outset of the war could not be corrected by wartime controls. At that time labour was in a position to demand more pay for much less work than the farmer was doing, and there was nothing to do but to give labour as much as was necessary to maintain production. No government can create prosperity by compulsion, but any government can manipulate the economy for the benefit of the most potent pressure groups as long as the majority of the people are willing and able to supply pressure groups with more than they earn.

In a controlled economy such as we have had in Canada it was inevitable that urban pressure groups should benefit at the expense of the rural producers. Urban people outnumber farmers more than two to one. Compulsory marketing with political prices has now ceased to work to the advantage of urban consumers, who never have understood farm problems, and never will. It is only natural that they now see the folly of maintaining political prices above market levels.

Now that it is quite clear to all of us that unavoidable wartime controls and unnecessary peacetime compulsory marketing at political prices have cost Canadian farmers hundreds of millions of dollars, action should be taken to cushion the shock of lower prices with stop-loss guarantees. Such guarantees should prevail until the liquidation of compulsory marketing schemes and the extension or organization of true co-operatives can be carried out in an adequate manner.

During the war years we were never faced with any question of overproduction or a surplus of farm products. In fact the government encouraged farmers to increase production in every way. The government urged the farmer to carry more stock, to bring more acreage under cultivation and to do everything possible to increase the production of food. During the war years farm labour was scarce. Few men wanted to work on farms. They preferred to work in industry in the cities at a much higher wage. New farm machinery was scarce and expensive, but despite all the handicaps that the farmer faced he was able to increase greatly the stock carried on his farm, he was able to bring a large number of new acres into cultivation, and he was able to greatly step up the production of food.

During the war years the farmer did not have a price tag on his products because the prices of all his products were strictly controlled by the government. This did not apply to industry, which in most cases operated on a cost-plus basis during the war period, and still operates that way today. Every article produced by industry sells for a figure that will return not only the cost of production but also a fair profit in addition thereto.

The Ontario milk commission of 1947 found that it cost $2.69 to produce 100 pounds of milk. The report also showed that the farmer received from $1.95 to $2.10 for his 100 pounds of milk. I should like to read a paragraph from the report dealing with this matter. It is headed "Cheese and cheese milk", and reads as follows:

> The results of an over-all survey made by the accountants attached to the commission are set out at pp. 126 and 127 of the report and show an average net cost of producing 100 pounds of cheese milk in 1946 to be $2.34, to which an administrative allowance of 35 cents was added, making a total cost, including administrative allowance, of $2.69 per 100 pounds of cheese milk. At the time of the inquiry before me, the return to the cheese milk producer was estimated at between $1.95 and $2.10 plus the value, which seemed doubtful in many cases, of whey returned for each 100 pounds of milk. If the average figure is one of general application, as I believe it is, it would seem to substantiate the contention brought forward by the cheese producers' association that the price structure existing at that time did not permit a return to the farmer sufficient to pay his cost of production and give him even a modest profit.

Perhaps as a result of that investigation the price for the cheese contract of 1948-49 was placed at 30 cents. In 1950 the cheese producer is to get less than 30 cents. I suggest to the minister that if it was necessary for the farmer producer to have a price of 30 cents in 1948-49 it is necessary that he have 30 cents or more today in order to keep pace with the increase in the cost of the production of milk. I should like to quote a few figures showing the increase in the cost of various things that enter into the production of milk. First I should like to deal with the eastern Ontario prices for feed in carload lots. These prices are a comparison between the 2nd August, 1948, and the 2nd August, 1949.

1. Feed (per ton), carload lots delivered eastern Ontario:

	Aug. 2 1948	Aug. 2, 1949
Dairy ration 16 per cent.....	$62.25	$65.00
Dairy concentrate 24 per cent	67.50	75.00
Dry and freshening ration..	61.00	66.00
Calf meal	83.00	89.00

Freight rates, even without the increase announced today, have also risen in the same period. The rate on bagged feed increased from 21 to 24 cents per hundred pounds between 1948 and 1949, while the rate on loose grain increased from 35 cents to 38 cents. The cost of shipping cheese from Belleville to Montreal by rail increased from 28 cents to 32 cents per hundred pounds in the same period. Then I might give a few examples of the increased cost of farm machinery as between 1948 and 1949:

	1948	1949
Tractor	$1,372.14	$1,482.14
Binder	365.00	405.00
Tractor plow	148.50	195.00
Heavy mower	154.50	179.00
Milker	291.35	325.41
Cream separator	129.75	141.05

During the same time the cost of small farm utensils increased by at least 25 per cent. Gasoline prices have gone up; hydro rates, at least in Ontario, have increased; telephone charges are to be increased. All the supplies required by cheese factories increased in cost in 1949 as compared with 1948. I do not think there can be any dispute when I say that the cost of producing milk for cheese in 1950 is going to be considerably higher than in 1948 and 1949; and I would remind the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) that since 1941 some 150 cheese factories in Ontario have closed. That is approximately 25 per cent of the total number of cheese factories in this province. During the war cheese was considered a most important food product both for the armed forces and for civilians; and I suggest to the minister that even as a defence measure the remaining cheese factories in Ontario should be maintained.

Then for the last few years the county of Hastings has produced approximately 70,000 hogs a year. According to a report issued by the bureau of statistics the number of hogs on Canadian farms was 19 per cent greater, as of December 1, 1949, than as of December 1, 1948. Just what is going to be done in connection with the marketing of these surplus hogs has yet to be determined. The remarks I have just made in connection with the cost of producing milk for cheese apply with equal force to the cost of producing pork for the market.

The Address—Mr. G. S. White

I am not going to repeat the many arguments that have been advanced already during this debate, especially by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), with respect to the enormous benefit the United Kingdom market has been to Canadian producers. I am sure the Minister of Agriculture realizes that the United States market can never take the place of the United Kingdom market. In this connection I should like to quote some remarks of a former farmer premier of Ontario, as reported in the January, 1950, issue of a publication called The Rural Scene. I refer to Mr. E. C. Drury, the former leader of the United Farmers of Ontario, who was interviewed by Mr. E. J. Young, who is described as having been a Saskatchewan farmer for forty-four years and formerly a member of the House of Commons. This is an account of the interview:

I suggested we begin with the United States and asked if he believed there might be a market there for our surplus agricultural products.

"In spots and at times we could sell them, but only in spots and only at times," he replied. "The American market is limited by the fact that it is a protected market and therefore a narrow one; furthermore you can never depend on it.

"It is an article of faith with the Americans to encourage their own producers by buying at home; and they have never hesitated to shut out imports by government action whenever their own producers complained of outside competition.

"Outsiders who depend on that market live always under the threat of being excluded from it by sudden changes in the American tariff. Canada has had this experience several times.

"The British market," he added, "on the other hand, has been our most dependable market in the past and in my opinion it can be again if we cultivate it properly.

"Let us consider for a moment what made it such a wonderful market. It was a free market. All the world was welcome to ship its surpluses to Britain; and all the world looked to Britain as a market in which it could buy anything it wanted."

The remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) during this debate, and the report in this morning's newspapers of his interview yesterday with a delegation from Montreal, do not bear out the large posters that appeared throughout Ontario prior to the election, which told of everyone having a job under the Liberal government. Under date of February 18 of this year the Belleville newspaper contained an appeal by the manager of the local national employment office for jobs of any description for the relief of the large number of unemployed in that city and in the county of Hastings. That gentleman is reported in the press as having said some 1,440 persons were drawing unemployment insurance through his office, and those figures do not include a large number who are not registered, or another large number who are not entitled to unemployment insurance and so do not pass through that office. When one considers that Hastings is an agricultural county, the presence of several thousand unemployed there would hardly bear out those glowing advertisements which appeared before the election.

For nearly ten years the government has sold all the farmers' produce. My county is particularly interested in cheese; and that cheese was requisitioned by the government. With the scarcity of food during the war it was not difficult to sell any farm product; but now that our markets have faded away, and when we are faced with the additional difficulty in connection with the convertibility of sterling, it seems that the whole problem of marketing farm products is to be dumped back into the lap of the farmer producer, and this despite the fact that everyone recognizes that the Canadian farmer made a great contribution to our war effort. The farmer producer was told during the war period that he would be assured of future markets, and in many cases he was forced to accept for his product a price which was below the world market price. So I suggest to the minister that some step must be taken to cushion the shock during this readjustment period.

A drop in farm prices will affect a large number of Canadian veterans who have used their gratuities and re-establishment credits to get started on farms. All these veterans have made heavy financial commitments; and if they are to be successfully re-established in our peacetime economy they must receive a fair and just return on their investment and fair prices for the commodities they produce. If we in Canada, Mr. Speaker, wish to keep all Canadians fully employed, and maintain our standard of living, then I submit that the farmer producer must be put on a basis somewhat comparable to labour. He must receive a fair and equitable return, not only on his investment but on his labour as well.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to read a resolution which was passed by the federations of agriculture of Northumberland and Hastings counties, at a meeting recently held in Belleville. The resolution reads as follows:

Whereas, the economic future of the farmer is very unstable and at stake, and, whereas the farmer and his family worked long hours during the war without thought of cost plus as received by industry,

And, whereas over one-third of the armed forces were farm boys who fought and died not only for democracy but for the rights of everyone,

And, whereas many thousands were established on farms and have large obligations to meet,

And, whereas the farmers were assured by the government that their rights would be protected in the years after the war as they had not received cost plus during the war,

[Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough).]

And, whereas many people in Great Britain and Europe and Asia are rationed and short of food, while we have surpluses of farm products accumulating,

And, whereas manufactured goods are advancing in price and labour is receiving the largest weekly pay envelope in the history of Canada,

And, whereas under the present price ratio, an hour's average wage of industrial labour will today purchase more farm products than at any other time since 1913,

Be it resolved that this meeting of the federations of the counties of Northumberland and Hastings commend the federal cabinet for the price support already given, but feel that support prices should be further advanced to be on a parity with labour and industry.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the amendment to the amendment moved by the member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). I wish to deal particularly with the first two clauses of that amendment, as found on page 68 of Hansard, which read as follows:

We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that Your Excellency's advisers have:

(1) failed to take adequate measures to preserve and expand markets for Canada's surplus products of farm, forest, sea and mine, and to deal with the problems of increasing unemployment and reduced income to Canadian farmers and other producers; and

(2) failed to take steps to inaugurate an over-all social security program including national health insurance and the removal of the means test from the old age pension;

Before proceeding with my remarks on the amendment to the amendment, I wish to express my support of the remarks of the member for Rosetown-Biggar, my leader, concerning the international situation, when he was speaking on this address. Without a doubt, thoughtful people everywhere are seriously concerned about international developments. While there is widespread concern over the loss of markets, and unemployment, recent information concerning the hydrogen bomb and its terrible possibilities has focused the attention of the average Canadian, as well as average people everywhere, on the urgent necessity for international control of this frightful weapon of war. I agree, Mr. Speaker, with the member for Rosetown-Biggar when he said there were two alternatives facing us. This is reported at page 66 of Hansard of February 20, and reads as follows:

One is to despair, to organize our side of the iron curtain and engage in a furious and intolerable armament race; the other is to bend every effort to find an acceptable plan for international control and inspection, and proceed at the same time to remove from the world the age-old causes of war.

The evidence of growing concern about the development of this terrible weapon comes from many quarters, and those quarters are increasing from day to day. As has been said before, Senator McMahon, the joint chairman of the United States congressional committee on atomic energy, has made a generous and worth-while proposal. According to his calculations, the United States is spending $15 billion a year on armaments and war preparedness. Quite recently, he proposed that the United States might give a lead by offering the world, through the United Nations, two-thirds of that sum for five years on two conditions. His first condition was a general acceptance of a satisfactory program for the effective control of atomic energy. The second condition was agreement by all countries, enforced by inspections, that two-thirds of their present spending on armaments be used for constructive purposes.

This proposal, Mr. Speaker, continues to receive surprising support from all groups in the United States. It has been welcomed by many individuals and groups in Canada as well as in other countries. In my opinion, the generous spirit of this proposal should receive every encouragement from the government of Canada.

As an indication of the thinking of many Canadians, I wish to quote briefly from some newspapers. I do this because the editorial I wish to read now puts in brief and concrete terms what I have found in letters written to me, and what I have discovered in conversation with my constituents. I am here to present the views of my constituents, Mr. Speaker, so I want to quote an editorial that appeared in the Kootenaian, February 16, 1950. It reads as follows:

> Peace cannot be secured through bombs
> After the first world war the sincere efforts for world peace of the league of nations were sabotaged by the ruthless agents of international capitalists living in London and New York. Such men in the United States broke Wilson's heart when they steered the support of their country even from membership in the league of nations, and, as they were the world's richest nation, this action resulted in the failure of the league to achieve lasting world peace.
>
> The winning of the second world war was followed by the forming of the United Nations Assembly with whom the establishment of world peace has been entrusted. But the failure of Russia to agree with the western democracies on terms seems to have resulted in stalemate again and there is open talk of a third world war. Entrenched behind possession of the A bomb by the United States, we have been lulled to rest by the fact of United States military might.
>
> We do not wish to enter into an argument over who is right and who is wrong. As we pointed out in our last issue, the great majority of humans in all nations want lasting peace, but it seems that the extremists in both camps keep us from arriving on ground where this can be attained. Is it not inevitable that militarists are the worst possible men to be entrusted with our world peace discussions? And does anyone doubt but that the international armament trusts are again using their large financial powers to keep peace from being established?
>
> Science up to now has given its discoveries to the entire world, irrespective of national boundaries. Prominent scientists of Egypt, Greece, Italy, France, Germany, Britain, United States and Canada have all contributed to the sum of scientific information that is used universally today for man's welfare.
>
> Now come the A bomb and the H bomb, and they are being treasured up as bolsters to ensure peace. It just won't work. Already the Russians seem to have caught up with the United States in bomb manufacture; and when we imagine them in first place in atomic research, we are brought face up to the futility of such securities for peace.
>
> True peace is a world away from the enthroned materialism which finds expression in militarism and lethal weapons. Peace is the natural expression of culture; it is of the spirit—the spirit of Christianity. We are living (or are we?) in Christian countries; so, if there is any sincerity in our search for peace, why do we not entrust the Christian church with a fair share of the work of establishing it? In our opinion the main missionary strength of the church today should be turned against the pagan influences in our governments and diplomacy, which are gradually but surely driving the world into the biblical Armageddon.

I quote that, Mr. Speaker, because it contains, in brief, passages from many of the letters I have received from a number of people.

Before proceeding further, I should like to quote from the Rural Co-operator, Toronto, February 14, as follows:

> But we do believe that peace should be sought at almost any price. We believe that peace in our time cannot be had without paying some price, and with the ever-more-terrifying prospects of the consequences of another war we believe that even a very high price for peace is worth considering.

Then, in conclusion, I see in this morning's Ottawa Citizen a news item headed "York calls for talks on H-bomb", which reads in part as follows:

> Dr. Cyril Garbett, Archbishop of York and second highest dignitary of the Church of England, yesterday appealed for an immediate attempt "on the highest level" to reach agreement with Russia on the hydrogen bomb.

Those editorials, Mr. Speaker, and those requests by leading churchmen and church groups, reflect a growing opinion all over the world that our countries on the western side of this world must make every effort possible to see if an agreement cannot be reached before we go on with the greater development of these terrifying weapons of war. In my opinion the belief that the world crisis can be resolved merely by resisting and containing communism is a delusive one. Many have persuaded themselves that this resistance and this containment must take precedence over everything and that Canadian social objectives even must not only be subordinated to the work of containment but, if some people had their way, in many fields sacrificed.

To anyone who is greatly concerned with the whole world situation, and the trend of social thought and development in our country, it is interesting to read the comments on the present developing situation made in the writings of prominent people. For the information of the house I wish to quote briefly from an article in The Atlantic of August, 1949, entitled "The conquest of America" by Archibald MacLeish, professor at Harvard.

Everyone who has followed that gentleman knows of his high position in the United States and the great contribution he has made there to education and culture. I would advise everyone to read the article because it contains a great deal of thoughtful material. I read these excerpts because they indicate clearly the dangers that can develop within a democratic society owing to the fears engendered because of the possibility of aggression of other powers:

> The inadequacy of the position we have taken, even within its own narrow and negative purpose, is only too obvious. Neither communism nor any other body of positive belief can be overcome in a period of world-wide dissatisfaction and unrest merely by denying it, or by offering, as a substitute, the world of things as they are. It can be fought only by facing it with a true alternative. And the true alternative to communism is not the world of things as they are; nor, even more certainly, is it some other kind of authoritarianism.
> The real choice is the choice between all forms of authoritarianism on the one side and, on the other, the dream of a whole and responsible human freedom. . . .
>
> For, by putting the hatred and fear of Russia first we have opened the sacred centre of our lives, our most essential freedoms—the freedoms of mind and thought—to those among us who have always hated those freedoms and who know well how to use our fear of Russia as a mass to cover their disguise attacks. The spread of legalized thought control from points of infection in the congress to state legislature after state legislature across the country is not the work of chance. It is the work of freedom-hating men. And we have laid the nation open to them by our fears . . . .
> It will not be possible for us to argue, when the finger of time is levelled against us, that we did not see what needed to be done. The wisest and soberest and most realistic statesman of our generation warned us three years ago that the job we had to do—the job we had to do whether there were communists around or not—was to make freedom a reality in the post-war world; and Henry L. Stimson did not speak alone.

As one of my correspondents I think so rightly said, at this time if to these problems we are going to have, shall I say, a collective approach which is wider than the bounds of political parties or wider than the bounds of various religious beliefs and faiths, we need a positive and dynamic Christian approach to meet effectively the problems that face us at home and abroad. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, this government should support to the full the principle of the appeals made by church leaders and statesmen for further efforts toward agreement with the Soviet union.

I wish now, Mr. Speaker, to deal briefly with the first clause of the amendment to the amendment which reads as follows:

> (1) failed to take adequate measures to preserve and expand markets for Canada's surplus products of farm, forest, sea and mine, and to deal with the problems of increasing unemployment and reduced income to Canadian farmers and other producers;

Before I conclude I think I can produce evidence which will justify on sound ground the supporting of this amendment to the amendment moved by my leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). The loss of markets and the growing unemployment are evidence of the government's failure to give effect to its former pledges and promises. On that basis, this amendment is fully justified.

First of all, going back to 1945, we had the political promises of the government made during the 1945 election. Throughout this country we had large posters which said "Vote for a new social order", which implied a new social order. In the recent election we had posters which said "Vote for more jobs for more people" and posters which said "Vote for markets and prosperity". In my opinion this government, since 1945, has completely changed direction in its attitude to the question of full employment and the question of foreign markets. I shall attempt to prove that statement by a few quotations from various official documents. First of all, article 55 of the United Nations charter has this to say:

> With a view to the creation of conditions of stability and well-being which are necessary for peaceful and friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples, the United Nations shall promote:
> (a) higher standards of living, full employment and conditions of economic and social progress and development;
> (b) solutions of international economic, social, health, and related problems; and international cultural and educational co-operation; and
> (c) universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion.

Then article 56 reads as follows:

> All members pledge themselves to take joint and separate action in co-operation with the organization for the achievement of the purposes set forth in article 55.

We must not forget that our government signed the charter of the United Nations.

Then we come to the white book on "Employment and Income" tabled in this house by Right Hon. C. D. Howe, Minister of Trade and Commerce, early in 1945. I just want to quote from that document briefly:

> It has not been possible during the war to accumulate a large "shelf" of ready-planned public projects. The war program has necessarily taken precedence and the engineering staffs of all governments have been denuded by war demands. Particularly has it been impossible to embark on the planning of new types of comprehensive projects of far-reaching extent. On the other hand, all governments, dominion, provincial and municipal, have a considerable backlog of public projects of the normal sort for maintenance and expansion, which have been deferred during the war years. Some of these are fully planned and others are capable of rapid planning. Governments will wish to carry out these projects as soon as labour and materials are available once more . . .

Accordingly, as an appropriate policy for this period, the dominion proposes to press ahead with the planning of its own deferred works and invites provinces and municipalities to do the same . . .

The deliberate use of public investment expenditures as a permanent instrument in employment policy has to be undertaken experimentally.

Now, after five years, we learn that this program, as set forth in this white paper, has not been fulfilled. We come into an unemployment situation in which the government admits that it has no shelf of public projects planned over a period of years, as there should have been, to which effect could be given when unemployment arose. I will admit that in previous years in the immediate past there was not the necessity to use this shelf of public works; but in 1945 we were promised by this government that they were making plans for a shelf of public works to use as soon as necessary.

I read the Prime Minister's speech carefully. After reading that speech I would say that there is concrete evidence there of a change in direction in government policy since 1945. In 1945 there was emphasis on the necessity for public investment to maintain full employment. Now without question, this government, believing in free enterprise as it does, is emphasizing the ability of private enterprise to provide employment. We must not forget this. Regardless of what the supporters of private or free enterprise, as it is called, say, free enterprise always comes to government to rescue the casualties of unemployment.

What were the proposals of the government of Canada in the green books of August, 1945, Mr. Speaker? I quote again:

In familiar terms, our objectives are high and stable employment and income and a greater sense of public responsibility for individual economic security and welfare. Realization of these objectives for all Canadians, as Canadians, is a cause in which we would hope for national enthusiasm and unity.

The government has clear and definite views on how these objectives can be attained. These views may be summarized very briefly as,

First, to facilitate private enterprise to produce and provide employment;

Secondly, to promote bold action by the state in those fields in which the public interest calls for public enterprise in national development;

Thirdly, to provide, through public investment, productive employment for our human and physical resources when international and other conditions adversely affect employment; and Fourthly, to provide, on the basis of small regular payments against large and uncertain individual risks, for such hazards and disabilities as unemployment, sickness and old age.

It is quite safe to say, Mr. Speaker, that the government has not taken bold action with respect to providing a shelf of employment projects, and it certainly has not brought before this parliament so far an overall security scheme.

On the basis of this government's statements, on the basis of public statements in the press, speeches by members of this government in 1945 and in the preceding years, 1943 on, various provincial governments in Canada were stimulated to make plans with respect to the post-war rehabilitation period. I know that in the province of British Columbia, as a result of action by the legislature, we formed the post-war rehabilitation council of British Columbia. There was a great deal of enthusiasm and unity concerning the possibilities of joint action between the federal, provincial and municipal governments for the development of an economic order that would provide full employment and markets for agricultural products. That post-war rehabilitation council travelled all over British Columbia. It received briefs from municipal councils; it went to a great deal of trouble to prepare briefs, to outline schemes of development and possibilities for work over the years. It received the same co-operation from trade unions, co-operative organizations and veterans' organizations. I can say that the whole community in British Columbia co-operated to present their views to this post-war rehabilitation council; and without any doubt those efforts were put forth, and that very comprehensive report was drafted, in the belief that this government was going to take the lead in a public investment program in co-operation with provincial and municipal governments. I may say I was a member of the provincial legislature at that time. When we were discussing this question the question of public works was brought to the attention of the government, and it was said that $210 million was to be used for the development of roads and highways. The question came up in the legislature as to how it was to be financed. A member of the cabinet rose at that time and said: "On the basis of the information we have, the federal government will be making generous contributions". That was the expectation.

I want to refer to one or two conclusions in the British Columbia post-war rehabilitation council report. It has this to say with regard to market extension:

> Market extension is promised on the conviction that one of the basic principles of reconstruction is that of increased world purchasing power.

Then it continues:

> The post-war problems in British Columbia, as elsewhere, will be so complex and complicated they cannot be solved by the government alone. They require the fullest co-ordination between the three governments, federal, provincial and municipal.

I say without any hesitation, Mr. Speaker, that the people of British Columbia, working through their government and organizations representing various groups of people, farming and industrial, made these recommendations in the belief that this government was going to take the lead in a program of national and public investment in this country.

Their report continues—this is a very interesting sentence, in view of what has happened:

> One of the other weaknesses of public policy in the last depression was that of public expenditures being too little and too late.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that history will not repeat itself in that respect, although to a limited extent that is true today because if this government had its plans fully developed it could have relieved to a considerable extent the unemployment that exists in this country at this time, which does not result entirely from seasonal conditions.

What has been the attitude of this government with respect to full employment in the international sphere? I should like to draw to the attention of the house the recommendations of the United Nations which dealt with national and international measures for full employment. The United Nations assembly was urged through the economic and social council to take up the question of full employment and to put forth definite proposals for international projects designed to maintain full employment.

In December, 1949, the five economists to whom the secretary-general of the United Nations referred the matter presented their unanimous report. This report opens up tremendous possibilities and is entirely different from any report that would have been proposed under such auspices a few years ago. In view of the developing economic situation, what these leading economists asked for is an automatic system for the maintenance of world purchasing power to be brought into force at once upon the appearance of any serious signs of recession in any leading country. What they asked was that each country shall not only take on measures in its power to prevent a fall in its own domestic level of demand but that it shall guarantee to put at its disposal for the rest of the world a staple surplus of its own currency.

They contemplate the use of such funds largely for advancing development in the borrowing countries and they ask for drastic revision of the statutes of the international bank and of the international monetary fund.

The interesting point of these proposals is the recognition that private investment by the leading countries in the less developed countries is incapable of reaching the volume or stability that the maintenance of full employment requires, and that lending by governments to governments through a neutral international agency provides the only possible answer. That is very clear and definite in the report, and I have read it most carefully, Mr. Speaker.

What was the Canadian government's reaction to the proposals on an international level? As evidence that this government does not believe in international planning, or in domestic plans, to meet the problem of unemployment or markets I want to quote from the Montreal Gazette of January 20, 1950, which deals with the Canadian reaction to the proposals. It is headed:

> Canada Snubs Jobless Plan
> UN Committee told Rigid Work Controls Impracticable Here
>
> Lake Success, New York, January 19—Canada today told a United Nations economic group that rigid automatic measures to counter unemployment are not practicable for the Canadian economy.
> John Deutsch, director of international economic relations in Canada's finance department, said Canada's economy is dependent largely on development of natural resources and sale of its products abroad. He said automatic readjustment of taxation and expenditures when unemployment threatens would therefore not be realistic for Canada.
>
> He spoke before the fifteen-member economic and employment commission which is studying recent recommendations by a group of five top economic experts for global and national measures to maintain full employment.
>
> Deutsch urged that the committee refrain from taking direct action on the recommendations, but circulate them among United Nations members requesting views of all governments on the problem.
>
> Turning to the experts' proposals for international action, Deutsch said the unstable equilibrium of world trade and payments is of overriding importance for Canada.
> Re-establishment of an adequate flow of international investments as proposed by the experts would be an excellent development, he said. But it does not appear likely in view of the present outlook, he added.

That is the end of the quotation from the Montreal Gazette. But it means this, that the Canadian representative turned down the proposals made by this committee of the United Nations to deal with the question of full employment as a result of international planning.

What are we doing about the development of our markets? I see my time has almost expired, but before taking my seat I should like to say that anyone who is interested in the question of the marketing of agricultural products would be well advised to read the speech of the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch), as it is reported at page 190 of Hansard for February 23. As usual, the hon. member gave a most intelligent and comprehensive review of the situation.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) admits that the standard of living of eastern peoples must be raised and must be improved if democracy is to be developed in those areas. On the one hand we refuse opportunities to develop full employment through international planning and, on the other hand, we see people starving. Yet we admit that if democracy is to be developed these peoples must have access to our surplus products.

What has happened in that respect? We have world food plans. In September of 1946 Lord John Boyd Orr submitted his proposals for a world food board to stabilize agricultural prices of commodities on the world market, and included in those proposals the provision of funds for stabilizing functions, and so on. Time will not permit me to place on record all the details of his plan, but I would comment briefly by saying that the plan was rejected. Canada was elected to the world food council in September of 1947, but hope for the plan was smothered by a revision of these proposals. Nowhere do I find any evidence of Canada's having supported them.

Again, the conference of the International Federation of Agricultural Producers was held at Guelph in June, 1949, and made proposals for intergovernmental commodity agreements providing for an international agency which would deal with the commodities concerned.

In addition, the International Federation of Agricultural Producers recommended special action programs to move surpluses of agricultural products which already exist in certain countries to other countries where people remain ill fed and ill clothed because they lack the means of production and purchasing power. I find no evidence of Canada's having supported those proposals.

The meeting of the food and agricultural organization at Washington in November, 1949, made plans to establish an international commodity clearing house to channel agricultural surpluses into countries where food was badly needed. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has made it quite clear that this government is opposed to all such schemes. Referring to the international commodity clearing house the minister is reported to have said, "We don't need that; we can do it ourselves."

Without question our government has turned its back on proposals for international planning, for the creating of full employment and the marketing of world surpluses in what would be considered an unorthodox way.

What is the attitude of the farmer? I have not time to deal at length with that subject, but we do know that the farmers in this country are behind these proposals. The British Columbia fruit growers association at its last annual convention, in January, passed a resolution in which it heartily supported the action of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, and the resolution passed by that federation was in these words:

> Whereas the FAO international commodity clearing house seeks to establish:
> 1. The maintenance of a high level of production and employment.
>
> 2. The reduction of trade restrictions, including tariffs and quantitative and monetary restrictions.
>
> 3. An increase in the standards of productive efficiency, particularly in western Europe.
>
> 4. International investment to finance export and import surpluses and
>
> 5. The restoration of convertible currencies and multilateral transactions as a basis of world trade—all of which is designed to feed properly an undernourished world and thus utilize all presently available and potential food and fibre production.
> Therefore, the British Columbia Fruit Growers' Association in its 1950 annual convention commends the Canadian Federation of Agriculture for promoting so effectively the world food pool principle and the sixty-one countries which make up FAO for planning to put this world-essential principle into active operation, and urges the Canadian government to give this project its complete support.

The fruit growers of British Columbia are keenly interested in this proposal, because they are facing a serious situation in connection with the returns from this year's crop and the disposal of the new crop. I shall not deal at length with this phase of the matter because the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Jones) intends to do so later in the debate.

To maintain our markets I support the proposal of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) that, instead of demanding payment in dollars by the sterling area, we accept more goods and part payment in sterling, and the reinvestment of this sterling in the undeveloped sterling areas. That is not a complete solution, but it is an immediate approach to the present world economic difficulties.

In addition to that, we support international planning along the lines suggested by the international commodity clearing house for the distribution of our greatly required agricultural surpluses.

In addition to that, and above all, I am sure if we are going to play our part in the restoration of the world economy we will find that in some cases it will be necessary to make gifts to certain countries. I should like to see agricultural surpluses disposed of in that way, and paid for out of taxation, rather than see large sums being spent on unemployment relief. By being able to produce we will maintain morale and do something effective towards solving economic questions.

Before taking my seat I should like to speak briefly about unemployment. At this time we have in Canada about 400,000 unemployed —these are the numbers registered. We have these unemployed, despite our great natural resources, and our great human resources. How does this figure compare with those of the United States and Great Britain? The latest figures for Great Britain show 329,000 unemployed, a labour force of 23 million, and a percentage of 1·4 unemployed. Similar figures for the United States show 4,800,000 jobless, with a labour force of 60 million, and a percentage of unemployed of 7·5. On the basis of 323,000 jobless and a labour force of 5·1 million, Canada has a percentage of 6·3 unemployed.

What about Australia and New Zealand? They are both in a position quite different from ours. There is full employment in New Zealand; and on the basis of information radioed from Australia today they have about 1,000 registered unemployed; but they have 107,000 jobs for which applicants cannot be found.

Let us compare the position in Australia with that of Canada. Here we have greater natural resources and greater opportunities. I will admit that we have seasonal unemployment, a form of unemployment which can be taken care of through the use of the Unemployment Insurance Act. Over and above that however, as evidenced by the mounting numbers of unemployed in the early fall months, we have in this country a genuine unemployment situation which has no relationship to weather conditions.

We believe that the government should give effect to the promises it has made commencing in 1945, and should develop public investment policies which can only be successfully developed as the result of planning over a period of time. That is my major criticism of the government. These projects were not planned and developed so that they could be put into operation when the need arose. We know now that the government is proceeding with the proposal for a trans-Canada highway. It is making expenditures under the Canada Forestry Act, as well as other departmental expenditures. Nevertheless the bare fact is that at this time there are thousands of Canadians unemployed and wasting their ability to labour because the government has not put into effect plans to put them to work.

I now want to deal with my own constituency for a few minutes. In Kootenay West at the present time there are about 2,000 registered unemployed. I admit that undoubtedly some of these men are seasonally unemployed, but I think if the government had given previous consideration to the question many of them could have been working to the advantage of Canada. I suggest that there are projects which are feasible in the winter months. I will admit there are difficulties in the wintertime in carrying out certain types of projects in some parts of Canada, but for the information of the house I shall give a few projects that with proper planning could be undertaken in the district I represent in order to absorb those who are unemployed at this time. For instance, we need a million dollar expenditure on the extension of the river wall alongside the Columbia river to protect the city of Trail. I am not going to lay the primary blame on the dominion government in that respect because I believe the principle the government has established is sound, namely, that provincial governments should place their plans before the dominion government. I believe that the municipalities should deal with the problems first, and that the province concerned should make application on behalf of the municipality. The government has a sound reason for saying that nothing has been done because the provincial government of British Columbia has failed to make suggestions to the federal government as to the need for the building of a river wall at Trail.

Then there is other work in unincorporated areas along the Columbia river which could well be done in the wintertime. In previous years it has been done then. I refer to the prevention of erosion of the banks of the Columbia river at certain points. We also need a new federal building at Trail, but to construct such a building in order to absorb the unemployed in a certain period of the year requires previous planning and, shall I say, an abnormal direction of effort. We also need a new federal building at Nelson. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that these are some of the things that could be accomplished in my own constituency even during the winter months.

I have not time to speak about clause 2 of the amendment to the amendment which criticizes the government for not introducing an over-all security program. One is fully justified in supporting clauses 1 and 2 of the amendment to the amendment because the present government has not brought before the house proposals for an over-all security program. Are we going to continue to waste our human and natural resources? In the direction of our economic affairs are we going to continue to accept what I would term the philosophy of the money-changers who still have control of the economic policies of the western world? On the other hand, are we going to justify our claim to be a Christian democracy by using our human and natural resources to the advantage of Canadians and of all mankind? In view of the record of the government and the evidence and facts before us, I think the house would be fully justified in supporting the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. W. M. Mott (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, this is the first time I have risen to speak in the house. As one of the junior members on the government side, with only five weeks in the house during the last session and two weeks during this session, I want to say it is a real privilege for me to have the opportunity of expressing my thoughts and views to the house, and also certain ideas I have which may be of some benefit to the whole of the great Dominion of Canada. First of all, I should like to join in the congratulations and expressions of appreciation that have been extended to the mover (Mr. Larson) and seconder (Mr. Dumas) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I am certain I could not find words to add to those which have already been uttered in commendation of them. I am sure we are all proud of these two young members and that we all look forward to hearing from them on many occasions in the future.

I have the honour to represent the constituency of New Westminster, which includes three large municipalities in the surrounding area. Over twenty years ago Senator Tom Reid, the previous member for that district, came here as a new member of the house. No doubt on first entering the house he put forward his views as to his constituency. Therefore I think it is only right and proper that I should say something on behalf of my constituents. Hon. members presume, when a member rises to speak about his constituency, he has some knowledge of his subject. Before dealing with that question, on behalf of the citizens of New Westminster and the surrounding district I should like to say how much they appreciate the honour that has been conferred upon Senator Tom Reid by his elevation to the Senate. He served his early term as an apprentice in this house faithfully and well. I am sure the people I represent would want me to convey to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) our appreciation of and thanks for this worthy appointment.

New Westminster is an industrial city and includes the port of New Westminster, the fastest growing fresh water port in the Dominion of Canada today. It is an export and import point, and very little coastal shipping goes in and out of there. Within the bounds of the city there are many industries. We have some of the largest lumber mills in the British empire. There is salmon fishing on the Fraser river, and we have the great salmon canning industry employing about 20,000 of our people. Across the river we have three rural municipalities, Surrey, Delta and Langley, whose main pursuit is farming. They run approximately fifty miles inland along the south bank of the Fraser river, and are bounded on one side by the river and on the other by the international boundary. I mention these three municipalities together with my own city for the simple reason that there are very few things which come up in this house which do not affect them in one way or another. In that district I believe we also have the largest poultry farming area in British Columbia.

I come here, Mr. Speaker, not with experience with the senior government but having municipal experience and the municipal point of view. I served on the council for five years, and as mayor of New Westminster for six years, and for a term as president of the union of British Columbia municipalities. After having spent so much time in municipal life naturally my feelings today are for municipal governments. Therefore I should like to devote part of my time to some of the problems facing the municipalities today.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the previous speaker, who dealt with many of the things I had intended to mention. However, I shall try to elaborate on them from my personal experience. One of the first things I should like to deal with is the financial set-up in the municipalities. No doubt you are all well acquainted with the means by which the municipalities do their financing. Land taxation seems to be the main source of revenue, though certain large cities have a business tax, while others have public utilities from which they derive certain benefits. In the main, however, their revenue comes from the land; and when under provincial legislation education is left to the municipalities, it means that education must be paid for by taxes imposed on land.

During the recess I visited several municipalities in the west, and for a moment I should like to touch upon one point in regard to unemployment. Much work could be provided by the municipalities if they had ways and means of raising the money to pay for it. As the previous speaker mentioned, it is only too true that a municipality must approach this government through the provincial government, because the province is asked to be responsible for the finances of its municipalities. That prompts me to suggest that we should bring back the municipal aid act that was discontinued in 1937. There is no doubt that if this aid were given today it would go far toward helping the municipalities take care of their unemployed, and thus assist in alleviating the unemployment situation that exists today. This aid was given at a time when unemployment was at a low level. Such work as ditching, brushing and similar projects could be found in any municipality. I realize that this assistance must be applied for through the provincial government; I understand that the municipalities of British Columbia are requesting the government of that province to apply for that aid once more. I am making the same request now, so that if possible the municipalities may have that assistance now or in the immediate future.

I think we all agree that the strongest link in our chain of government is the municipal government. At the last dominion-provincial conference some of the municipalities were left out. I believe some of the provincial governments took their municipalities into their confidence before going to the conference, but that was not the case with all provinces. We in British Columbia were not allowed to submit any requests to our government to be brought forward at that time. I do not see how we can change the constitution of this country as it affects the general dominion-provincial set-up without in some way interfering with the provincial-municipal set-up as well. So I suggest that when the next dominion-provincial conference is held this government should see to it that a representative group from the mayors' association is given an opportunity to present their views, in the form of a brief or otherwise, before final agreements are reached.

As one instance of what I have in mind in this connection I might mention the amusement tax which this government took over during the war. When that tax was dropped most of the provincial governments imposed it for their own benefit. Personally I believe that when the dominion government dropped that tax it intended that it should go back to the municipalities. In a municipality, say the council is called upon to submit a bylaw to the people to find the money to put up a skating rink or other recreational centre, which may be of value in improving the health of our future citizens, but the ratepayers are still burdened with a 25 per cent amusement tax that was then imposed, merely because professional hockey or baseball is being played there. I am citing one instance to more or less substantiate what I was saying about dominion-provincial-municipal relations.

I should like to say a word about the housing act that was passed last year. In all sincerity, I congratulate the government upon the institution of an act which will do something towards supplying these badly needed homes. I believe that these houses can be of greater benefit in the large urban centres than they can in our fast-growing rural areas. During the recess I had an opportunity of speaking to the representatives of various municipalities. I learned that the big problem in opening up land for building purposes is not the question of repayment of the cost of the necessary utilities, but the question of schools. The building of new homes in communities that are already overcrowded only means increasing an already heavy school burden. I think perhaps this government should do something towards helping to finance these schools.

As one who has served on a municipal council, I should like to take this opportunity of thanking the government for recognizing crown lands and granting assistance in lieu of taxation. It may not be just what we wanted, but at the same time it is a step in the right direction. Action in this direction has been long overdue, and I feel that in starting with the thin edge of the wedge, the government may be induced to go further in helping the municipalities pay for the services that have been such a burden to municipal ratepayers.

I have listened, Mr. Speaker, with a great deal of interest to the many speakers in this house. Since I am a new member and do not know many of them, it is rather difficult to grasp their ideas, or the criticisms which they have aimed at the government. Listening to the speeches here reminded me of the years I spent as a trade unionist, listening to many interesting speeches about the law of supply and demand. Any man who could solve that problem would be held in the highest esteem. As one listens to this debate, one is reminded of the many occasions upon which we have seemed to be on the point of solving that problem, but apparently because something has been left out of the formula, we dropped back. It seems to me that if we could only solve that problem we would be able to go forward at much greater speed.

It is my intention today to try to offer some few suggestions, first of all, about unemployment. I believe we must look forward to a properly planned program. If we had such a program from one end of Canada to the other, it would go a long way towards solving the unemployment problem. We understand that most of the unemployment today is of a seasonal nature. Nevertheless, we do not know exactly when something more serious is going to happen, and if we have not a program we may be called upon to pay out millions of dollars in the dole. In connection with this planned program, I believe we could follow the lead of the many municipalities that have adopted town planning programs. That is on a small scale, but we could probably follow some such plan from one end of the dominion to the other.

I should like to mention some of the things which should fit into such a planned program, as I see it from looking at conditions in my own constituency. First of all, it will be necessary to have a certain amount of building construction throughout Canada, regardless of the area or whether it is done by private enterprise, the dominion government or the provincial government. The dominion and provincial programs should be lined up to fit in with the number of trades we have in Canada. If we knew the number of trades that would be involved in any depression, some kind of program could be worked out. I do not believe in this idea of putting advertisements in the paper every spring for tenders on public buildings. I believe that work should be spread over a period of time, and the places selected in which it is necessary to give employment.

I should like to say a few words about another problem that I believe faces us on the Pacific coast. It is something that should be planned for, and that is our export-import trade. What are we doing or what are we going to do for the necessary facilities to handle these cargoes? For instance, in the port of New Westminster we have nine docks. Before the war the largest number of deep-sea ships that ever came into that port was about 550. We are now faced with this problem of trade that we expect will arise with the Far East—that is, with Japan and China—from which most of the trade to that port came before the war. I am certain that the present dock facilities in the port of New Westminster will never be able to handle that trade, and I am quite certain that Vancouver today has not the facilities to handle it. I am only mentioning this matter because it is something else that no doubt should be planned, so that money could be loaned and we would know just where we were going.

I should like to mention another matter which I believe would be of some help to the growth of this country, and which I believe should be investigated; I refer to the matter of a free port or free zone or free warehousing in the various ports of Canada today. We have heard many speakers on this particular problem. We know that in Seattle there is a certain area for this purpose, but I do not believe that Canada has ever gone into the question and made a thorough investigation of a free port or free zone or free warehousing in order to build up our ports. It is not a new thing. It is over two hundred years old on the European continent, but I do not believe that we have ever gone into it, to find out whether it would be of benefit to us or not.

Another matter that I believe we should investigate thoroughly is that of railways, not only those nationally-owned but also the ones owned by the provinces. I am not speaking with regard to any other province than British Columbia. At the present time we have a railway starting from a certain point and going a certain distance. There is no doubt that it is the intention of the provincial government to finish the railway which will be of great benefit not only to British Columbia but also to the Dominion of Canada. As to planning the final stages of that railway, I believe it should be done in conjunction with the federal government here, with our Department of National Defence and perhaps with our friends across the border in the United States. It may not be necessary to call in all those bodies but it is my belief that in planning for the future that is something that certainly should be taken into consideration.

As to unemployment, I have just this one other suggestion to offer with regard to a planned program of work to be done, and that is a tunnel across the mouth of the Fraser river. Here is a project valued at around $6 million or $7 million. It may not have any direct bearing on the dominion government, but it has on the provincial government. In planning for the future, here is one project that should be given consideration at the present time. An organization of some 350 members and several of our municipalities request this tunnel. The only thing they ask for is $10,000 for a proper survey. The tunnel, which would be paid for by tolls, would give employment to thousands at the present time. It is a project that would cost in the neighbourhood of $5 million or $6 million. It is almost impossible to find out where the help would come from with regard to getting such a project started.

I am not going to say any more at this time, Mr. Speaker. I have a great deal of material before me, such as press clippings. It was my thought at the start that I would endeavour to speak for forty minutes, this being the first time that I have offered a word at all in this house. As time goes on, however, and as I become more acquainted with the proceedings, I am certain that you will hear further from me. I think I can say on behalf of my own constituency that we appreciate what the government have done and the good work they are doing at the present time. I am sure that the program enunciated during the last election will be fulfilled. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), in his very able speech on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, mentioned that the promises made during the election would no doubt be fulfilled; at the present time some of them have been fulfilled. I am not going to say anything more, except that I am glad to have this opportunity to address the house, and I hope that some of the suggestions I have made will be given serious attention by the government.

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): At the commencement of my remarks this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, I should like to extend congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I believe that all of us who heard the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Larson) and the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Dumas) will agree that they acquitted themselves in a commendable fashion.

The throne speech itself covers a wide range of subjects. I noted, among other things, reference to the conference with the representatives of the provinces, housing, the trans-Canada highway, international affairs, national defence, employment and unemployment, trade, rent control, veterans legislation, revision of the Indian Act, and so forth. A number of those subjects have already been debated rather extensively during this session. It is not my desire nor my intention to endeavour to cover them all. In fact, in the forepart of my remarks I intend to depart from them almost entirely. The reference to the Indian Act may have taken my mind back to something which I brought before the House of Commons on December 9 last. Hon. members who were here on that occasion may recall that we were considering the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare, Indian health services, and I brought before the house then a specific problem of great importance. It is true that the problem related specifically to my own constituency and affected approximately 350 persons, namely, the treaty Indians of the Sunchild Cree reservation and the non-treaty Chippewa Indians of that area. In the course of my observations in December I laid emphasis upon the extremely appalling health conditions which then prevailed among that group of people, and they still prevail. I attributed these conditions to a number of things, among which were inadequate housing and no plans for properly executed enterprise, but above all else, Mr. Speaker, no plans to conduct a comprehensive health survey among these people. Upon that occasion I had intended to deal in great detail with exactly what had taken place during recent months and recent years, and to present to this house a comprehensive analysis of the problem from every conceivable angle. But the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) rendered such a task on my part unnecessary—at least I thought it was unnecessary—when he interjected the following words which are recorded in Hansard for December 9, at page 3008. I would remind hon. members that he interjected after I had spoken for ten or fifteen minutes:

> I wonder if I might say a word, after which my hon. friend may not find it necessary to go a great deal further. He will recall bringing this matter to my attention earlier. As a result a survey was undertaken, and a nurse is to be appointed. We had hoped to get her out there quickly, but she has to leave another post to follow up on that survey. I want to thank my hon. friend for bringing the matter to my attention. I can say also that arrangements have been made with the doctors there which I believe are satisfactory. Following my hon. friend's suggestions I think he will find that we are taking corrective action.

I expressed my appreciation to the minister and to the government and I said that I would not go further upon that occasion. After all, what I was seeking was a solution, but I did conclude by saying this:

> I shall go among these Indians and talk to the doctors and the nurse.

The minister said:

> I hope you will keep me advised. If not, I shall go out there myself.

Last month I did spend a good deal of time out there and what I learned could cause me to be caustically critical today, but rather my speech will be delivered in an atmosphere of sorrow, sorrow for being taken in the way I was last December.

On January 9 and January 10 and again on January 28 and 29 I went into the Rocky Mountain House district. I conferred with the doctors, I conferred with hospital authorities, I conferred with many persons in town, I conferred with a number of the Cree and the Chippewa Indians, and I learned this: First, that no arrangements whatsoever had been made with the doctors. To this day they have not had the scratch of a pen from the Department of National Health and Welfare relative to that matter. Second, no arrangement has been made with the municipal hospital for the admission of Indian patients; in fact, they are being excluded in the absence of an agreement. Third, there was no evidence of any health survey being undertaken, unless it can be said that for a nurse to come into town one day, which is thirty miles from the reservation, and go out the next, is a health survey. Personally, such could not be considered by me as being an acceptable survey at all.

Obviously the Minister of National Health and Welfare has some explaining to do. I realize that he cannot have a personal knowledge of everything that goes on within every branch of his department. I will concede that point. He must depend upon the information which is conveyed to him by the authorities of the various branches within his department. Possibly he was taken in. In any event there is some explaining to do, or else he is going to experience some difficulty in getting out of doing what he said he might have to do, namely, go in there himself.

May I emphasize, Mr. Speaker, what I said upon that occasion, namely, the desperately bad situation among these people. It is not only these people who are affected. Some of them are in town every day, and they are circulating among the white people. Let me remind the house that it is estimated 50 per cent have tuberculosis, and it is conceded that an equally large number are inflicted with venereal disease.

It is conceivable that the Minister of National Health and Welfare, or the officials of his department, may have negotiated arrangements with doctors other than those in the town of Rocky Mountain House. That was not the implication in the statement that was made last fall, because I mentioned the doctors by name. It is conceivable that they may have made some type of arrangement for hospitalization elsewhere than in the vicinity; it is also conceivable that they may have a health survey in operation; but it is one of these things that certainly it is impossible for anyone to detect.

Let me emphasize, the logical place for these people to be treated is locally. The logical place for them to be hospitalized, except of course in advanced cases of tuberculosis and so on, would be there. I would say in cases of tuberculosis the patients should be taken to the Charles Camsell hospital. That would be the proper place for them to be treated. The effect of the failure to negotiate an agreement with the hospital and doctors in this area simply means that 98 per cent of the patients are beyond hope when they reach the Charles Camsell hospital in Edmonton.

Last fall I read case histories of people ranging in age from five years to thirty-six. Those reports would almost make one's blood run cold. I am not going to take further time upon that matter. I trust that the Minister of National Health and Welfare will be prepared to take action in this matter. If not I am going to press the matter upon every conceivable occasion that I can squeeze it in. I trust that at least before this session of parliament is over we shall be able to say that some concrete action has been taken to solve this problem.

On the same day, December 9, we were discussing the Indian affairs branch, which came under the Department of Mines and Resources at that time. I referred to this health situation and said to the Minister of Mines and Resources: "It will be extremely necessary for the officials of the Indian Affairs branch to give serious and thoughtful consideration to the responsibilities that rest upon them in this connection." At that time I referred to the question of the Chippewa Indians refusing, up to that date, to accept treaty. From what later took place, Mr. Speaker, I know that my remarks were misunderstood, at least in one quarter. I criticized the actions of someone, whom I did not desire to name, in the method of dealing with these Chippewa Indians. At that time I was referring to the former Indian agent, and I was not referring to anyone else. I stated at that time that I was not satisfied with the operation of the agency at that point, and I was not satisfied with the economic aspect of the problem as related to those Indians. I want to pay tribute to the former Minister of Mines and Resources, because he at least took the first and most essential step.

The new agent at Rocky Mountain House possesses, I believe, the experience and knowledge necessary to qualify him for his position. We feel, too, that his generally sympathetic attitude towards the problem will commend him for that post. We hope he will be able to meet and to solve the many acute problems which have existed for too long. But his success or failure will depend upon two things: To an appreciable extent it will depend, first, upon government policy and, secondly, upon the degree of co-operation he receives from his superiors.

I went right into the reservation, which is thirty miles from the town of Rocky Mountain House. It is a heavily timbered area. Upon that occasion I had what is sometimes called a powwow with the Indians themselves, and here are a few of the things I learned from personal observation and from discussion with them. I should hope my comments would be conveyed to the officials of the Indian affairs branch.

I learned, first, that the Indians in that area are asking for only one thing, and that is the opportunity to be self-supporting. May I add in passing that there is very little evidence of any encouragement being given to them, a feature which is most essential if they are to become self-supporting. There must be an appropriation for livestock. Some time I am going to inquire as to the exact amount of money spent in there. Lands must be cleared under supervision in order to provide feed for the livestock—and I use the word "cleared" because this is a wooded area. Nothing could be more appalling to the individual than to see what I saw there—livestock dying from lack of feed. Nothing could be more discouraging for the Indians than to clear land, as many of them did, on which feed could be grown, and then to have that ground stand for three or four years, and not have it inspected or approved for breaking until the end of the four years. Then it is broken in October. I am sure the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) will appreciate what happens to land when it is broken at a time when frost is setting in at night, in the month of October.

There must be supervision in the matter of home construction. It is ridiculous to make appropriations for home construction in that area, and then permit to happen that which has happened. Many of these homes have been spoiled because no one has told the Indians how to mix cement. It is mighty hard to stomach a situation where windows, doors, roofing materials and other building materials have been left out in the open for two years, and have deteriorated to a point where they are valueless. These are materials which, I presume, were purchased for the use of the Indians.

Here is one of the worst features of the whole thing. It is estimated that there are 25 million feet of merchantable timber on that reservation—and I have that figure from an expert lumberman. If that timber were farmed, as we say, those Indians would have a million feet of lumber per year for the next twenty-five years, or a half million for the next fifty years. But that timber is now being murdered—and I can think of no other suitable term. They have a saw mill just outside the reservation, operated by a white man—and incidentally he is one of the best, and is one hundred per cent interested in the Indians. However, he has no authority to set foot on the reservation.

Those Indians are in there cutting the timber, and it would look as though they are just shutting their eyes and swinging their axes. The result is that they are leaving some of the best timber, the large trees, to blow over, after they have taken the rest of it. They have been given no guidance in this matter, with the result that the cost of moving the logs out and making the lumber is almost prohibitive.

Surely it is not too much to ask the department to give the Indians the instruction and advice which is necessary if they are to make the best possible use of that timber. I suggested last fall, and I repeat it today, that assistance should be given to enable them to take one or more smaller, portable saw mills in on the reservation.

I understand some steps are being taken in the matter of education, but little progress is being made. The Indians have been instructed to cut logs about thirty feet long for a school but I doubt very much if they will ever be able to get them out to the proper place, because there is no supervision in their cutting.

As it is almost six o'clock, and I could not possibly finish before that time, I would move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion (Mr. Shaw) agreed to and debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull) moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: Tomorrow we will continue this debate.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 5.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, March 2, 1950

The house met at three o'clock.

DIPLOMATIC INSTRUMENTS

CANADA TREATY SERIES OF 1948 AND 1949

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I table herewith eleven documents, which are diplomatic instruments published in the Canada treaty series of 1948 and 1949. Perhaps the list might appear in Votes and Proceedings, unless hon. members would wish me to read it now.

MERCHANT MARINE

CANADIAN DEEP-SEA SHIPPING INDUSTRY—QUESTION AS TO GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Halifax): Is the Minister of Transport in a position to give the house a statement as to the steps that have been taken to implement the $3 million assistance program for the Canadian merchant marine?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Well, Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I am not in a position to answer that question fully. Speaking generally I can say that the maritime commission have already put in motion the usual procedure to deal with the situation following the statement made in the house by the Prime Minister last December. I believe that early in December last they invited all ship operators and ship owners to forward their applications, indicating whether they wanted their ships transferred to the United Kingdom flag or whether they wanted to take advantage of the $3 million subsidy which was announced. I do not know whether my hon. friend has anything particularly in mind, but that is the general position as I know it.

The Prime Minister calls to my attention the fact, in addition to what I have said, that there is an item in the estimates to cover the amount of the subsidy.

NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD

MONTREAL HARBOUR COMMISSION—REPORTED OFFER TO SELL RAILWAY LINES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Leon Balcer (Three Rivers): I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether it is within the knowledge of his department that the Montreal harbour commission has offered its railway lines for sale to the Canadian National Railways. If so, is the minister prepared to make a statement about this transaction?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me a question of such importance should require some notice. However, I am not aware of the position to which he refers. I am aware of the fact that the members of the national harbours board did go to Montreal, as they go to all other ports under their jurisdiction, to discuss routine matters affecting the affairs of the port. I presume that they did have a discussion on routine matters when they were in Montreal, but I am certainly not in a position to deal with the question the hon. member has put.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

RETURN OF MR. HOWE FROM EUROPEAN VISIT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I feel very safe today because my neighbour, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), is back, safe, from overseas.

RENT CONTROL

WARTIME LEASEHOLD REGULATIONS—QUESTION AS TO ASSUMPTION OF CONTROL BY PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I direct a question to the Minister of Finance? Following the supreme court decision of yesterday with respect to rent control, will the minister say whether the offer of the federal government to pay the cost of administration for one year to any province wishing to take over these controls still holds good?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Yes, Mr. Speaker, that offer still holds good.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Wednesday, March 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. F. H. Larson for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): Yesterday afternoon, Mr. Speaker, I devoted my entire time to the consideration of several problems relating to the Sunchild Cree and Chippewa Indians located within my constituency. On that occasion, I laid emphasis upon the fact that as yet there is no indication whatever that the Department of National Health and Welfare appreciates the seriousness of the problem of health among these Indians. Moreover, there is no indication that appropriate steps have been instituted to meet, or even partly solve, the problem which exists.

In my opinion this results from one of two things. Either it is believed by some that this problem affects only a limited number of people, possibly removed from the well-beaten paths of the white man, or else government policy itself is such that justice cannot be rendered to these unfortunate people. In referring to policy I should like to quote from a statement made by the minister. I understand that this was in the form of a directive which was sent to certain of his departmental officials. It reads as follows:

> While the dominion government has assumed specific obligations with respect to certain citizens, the only responsibility with respect to persons of native status is to organize a health program for those groups which are as yet unable to make such arrangements independently. The officers of the Indian health services are charged with the responsibility of judiciously administering funds appropriated for this health program. It is not the intention to operate a complete but non-contributory service. The service now provided is certainly far in excess of that ever promised by implication.

I should like also to quote from a statement made by the director of Indian health services. He is even more specific. He said:

> The federal government is under no obligation to supply free medical attention to any Indian.

This statement is in direct conflict with that of another departmental official, namely, Dr. Meltzer, medical director of the Charles Camsell Indian hospital in Edmonton. He said:

> The health of Indians is our direct responsibility.

I would suggest that, when the Indian affairs committee meets, some members of the committee take up these statements and endeavour to get a clear-cut assertion of government policy and responsibility in this field. That is all I am going to say, Mr. Speaker, about Indian health services.

Yesterday I referred to other aspects of the problem falling within the purview of the department of Indian affairs. In concluding these remarks I just want to say that I should like to see immediate action taken to block out the timber I mentioned. I feel it is essential, and probably it will be done. I want to see some supervision of the construction of those houses, and some expert advice provided for these Indians, in order that they may put under cultivation the land suitable for agricultural purposes. In this way food could be produced for the livestock which they now have, and must have in greater numbers if they are ever to become self-supporting.

I should like to emphasize that obviously some people who deal with the Indians do not know that you cannot break faith with these people and expect to obtain the results which government policy should be designed to obtain. For example, you cannot tell the Indians to meet at a certain point on December 21 to receive certain parcels which are provided for them at Christmas, have them wait two or three days with no one showing up, have many of the parcels still undelivered a month later, and still expect the Indians to have faith. I know that a new Indian Act is to be brought down. I know also that it will take more than an act, it will take more than words, to deal effectively with such a long-standing problem as Canada's Indian problem. It is essential, Mr. Speaker, that along with the act there must be the proper spirit; there must be the will to do the right thing for these people. Above all we must cease to look upon the native population as an inferior people; that has been one of our principal difficulties.

I wish the new minister who is handling the Indian affairs branch all the luck in the world. I believe he will approach this problem in the right spirit. I trust that his desire to meet and solve the problems connected with the new Indian Act will result in a solution.

There is one other thing, Mr. Speaker, to which I should like to refer this afternoon. There is a reference to it in paragraph 3 of the speech from the throne, which reads as follows:

> In the meantime negotiations are proceeding with the provincial governments for the implementation of the legislation adopted at your last session respecting housing, a transcontinental highway, and forest conservation.

It is to the trans-Canada highway that I wish to devote a few moments. This matter has always been an issue, but when it became a live issue it was very interesting to me to observe how quickly chambers of commerce, boards of trade, city and town councils, agricultural and other organizations got busy to plug for certain specific routes, especially in western Canada. New organizations came into being, and caravans began their weary trek across to the western coast in order to win support for specific routes, as well as to create on the part of the people who live in those areas an interest in the matter. Tons of literature were printed and distributed across the country. As a matter of fact the battle of the route was actually fought, partly at least, on the floor of this house.

My personal conviction with respect to this matter might be summarized in this way. First, defence and the economic welfare of Canada certainly demand that a trans-Canada highway be constructed without delay. Second, I was hopeful that this matter would never become a political football. Third, I was convinced in my own thinking that if the right thing were done, a fact-finding body made up of provincial and federal representatives would immediately come into being. Of course my fourth view is that eventually, at least as to that part of the country from Winnipeg west, we would have a series of routes; that is, you would probably have upwards of four transcontinental highways.

One thing that has struck me—and this applies particularly to the route within my own province, or what might become the route—is that newspaper and other references have always been to the Crowsnest pass route, the Kicking Horse pass route or the Yellowhead pass route. The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) and others have plugged hard and consistently for the Crowsnest pass route. The hon. members for Medicine Hat (Mr. Wylie), Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) and Calgary West (Mr. Smith), have plugged for the Calgary-Banff route, the Kicking Horse pass route. The hon. members for Battle River (Mr. Fair), Vegreville (Mr. Decore), Edmonton East (Mr. Macdonald), Edmonton West (Mr. Prudham), Peace River (Mr. Low), and Athabaska (Mr. Dechene), have all plugged for the Yellowhead pass route. While I do not want to start the battle here again, it is amazing to me that all of them, in their anxiety to have the route pass through their own communities, have completely overlooked the fourth and most practical route of all, namely, the one that goes through what is now referred to as the David Thompson route.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), and the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Larson), could both advance strong arguments, I am sure, to show this house and the country why the trans-Canada highway should not go through the semi-arid, semi-desert areas in southern Saskatchewan and southeastern Alberta. I am sure they could give ever so many reasons why it should go through their constituencies after proceeding westward from Winnipeg. I am sure that the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) could give ever so many reasons why that same route should pass through his constituency. If it does pass through these three, as it should, then it could not help reaching the city of Red Deer in the province of Alberta.

An hon. Member: Where is that?

Mr. Shaw: Someone says: Where is Red Deer? Possibly I could answer that question by quoting from a short editorial which recently appeared in the Edmonton Bulletin:

> Red Deer is one of the Alberta points to watch. The city with the interesting past has a very promising future.
>
> Strategically situated midway between Calgary and Edmonton, it is an ideal location to take advantage of the current trend to decentralize industry.
> On many occasions in recent months Red Deer has been cited as an up-and-coming industrial centre, and faith in its future has been expressed by the dominion itself in announcement from Ottawa that it is going ahead with a $361,000 federal building.

May I just digress at that point, Mr. Speaker, to convey to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) and to the government the appreciation of all of the citizens of the city of Red Deer, and my own, of the fact that finally that great problem which does exist in the city of Red Deer has been recognized and is now to be met. We are pleased that a building of that size is to be constructed in that city. I continue the quotation:

> Apart from its location and facilities, Red Deer is well able to take care of continued growth, for it is the centre of one of the most lush mixed farming areas in the province.

What a contrast that is to the constituency of the hon. member for Medicine Hat!

Mr. Wylie: That is one man's opinion.

Mr. Shaw: The editorial continues:

> Then too, it is the hub of a new highway into the Nordegg country of the foothills to the west.

Incidentally, Nordegg is one of the greatest steam coal producing areas in western Canada. I hope the Canadian National Railways and the government will soon begin to realize that fact. The editorial goes on:

> Completion of the highway will tap rich natural resources of timber and coal for Red Deer's benefit.
> It is expected the highway will continue west from Nordegg into the mountains to join the Banff-Jasper route, and, if that happens, Red Deer will find itself in a class with Edmonton and Calgary as a jumping-off place for the summer mountain tourist trade.

I still think it is ahead of them, but that is the opinion of the Edmonton Bulletin. Finally:

> All told, Red Deer is out front as another good place to live in a good province.

That is the end of the Bulletin editorial. If one goes on west of the city of Red Deer he passes over one of the finest mixed farming parts of Canada into the town of Rocky Mountain House. That name alone indicates to hon. members what lore must be associated with a town having such a name.

Mr. Blackmore: Especially "Rocky Mountain".

Mr. Shaw: From Rocky Mountain House one travels over an area in which the province of Alberta today is in the process of constructing one of the finest highways to be found in that part of Canada. As I said before, you reach Nordegg, where the great Brazeau collieries produce a tremendous amount of bituminous coal for use in Canada's industrial life. From there westward this route would pass over the Kootenay plains. You have heard of tropical valleys, Mr. Speaker; British Columbia has boasted about them from time to time. Here we have the best example of what might be called a tropical valley in our Rocky mountains. These Kootenay plains are as flat as the prairie district. The temperature there is always fifteen to twenty degrees above that registered at points outside the pass. There is no snow in there at times when there are two feet of snow on the prairies to the east; and this road passes through to meet the Banff-Jasper highway. For forty-five miles beyond the Banff-Jasper highway the road would extend through the Howse pass, which is the lowest pass in the Canadian rockies, with an elevation of 4,840 feet. This area would be one of the easiest to keep free from snow in the wintertime and one of the least costly to construct. There is less snow in that area than in any other section of the Rocky mountains on the North American continent.

That is quite a contrast, Mr. Speaker, to the thirty feet of snowfall that you often find around west of Banff and Lake Louise. We still think—and these remarks are addressed to the government of Alberta as well as to the government of Canada—that if they are interested in establishing the trans-Canada highway where it will cost least to construct, where it will cost least to maintain, where we have natural beauty unexcelled on this continent, and where wildlife abounds in untold numbers; if they realize the advantages afforded by this route, coupled with the low elevation, there will be no question as to where the trans-Canada highway will run in that part of Canada.

I would say to the government of Canada and also to the government of Alberta that if this highway goes through Calgary, then Lethbridge and Edmonton will be offended. If it goes through Lethbridge you are going to offend the other two. If it goes through Edmonton it will also offend the other two. We do not mind offending all these cities—not a bit. We feel that if the governments involved do not want to offend just two of them they will hasten to accept the route which I have mentioned as the logical one for the trans-Canada highway. We feel that one could give this government and the provincial government the best possible arguments and support for such a decision. My personal hope is that eventually all the four cities which I have mentioned will find themselves on trans-Canada routes, because beyond question eventually from Winnipeg west we must have at least the four routes to which I have referred.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I should like to begin by following the pleasant practice of congratulating the mover (Mr. Larson) and the seconder (Mr. Dumas) of the motion for an address to His Excellency the Governor General on their performance of the duties allotted to them. It is one of the pleasant things about democracy that, however much we may differ on principles, we are able to practise these amenities; and I might particularly say that this amenity can be practised today when we see the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) back in his seat. However much we may differ with him, we are glad to see him here. We can assure him that his name has not been wholly forgotten; that there have been frequent references to him, some of which have been highly eulogistic and some not so eulogistic.

This afternoon I wish to bring to the attention of the house the question of foreign exchange control as it exists in the western world, by which I mean the non-communist world. I believe, though it is a subject that we have treated in the past with a good deal of perfunctoriness, it will not be hard to convince this house today that it is a matter of great importance to us all.

Foreign exchange control first of all came to us as a war guest. It was hoped and expected that, like other war guests which were more welcome than foreign exchange control, it might leave us at the end of the war. But then it was continued. It really was introduced into what I might call the financial family with a kind of legal status, in spite of the fact that its parentage was deplorable, as I shall show later. It almost seems as if the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) now can hardly distinguish between this child, as I say of deplorable parentage, and the more respectable members of his family.

I hope that in the circumstances in which we find ourselves now we may be able to have this child sent off to the place where it originated, namely, the totalitarian countries, and that it may flourish there as best it can.

Of course it has developed a veneer of good manners, but that should not blind us as to its real quality.

I want to bring before the house this afternoon four considerations. First I wish to satisfy the house—and it should not be difficult—that we are suffering from exchange control now; that the fetters which tie the non-communist countries are dividing it into two areas, with the dollar-sterling curtain in between; that in a sense they are driving us back to barter; they are depriving us of the progress of centuries.

Second, I wish to deal particularly with the devaluation that took place last autumn, and seek to convince the house that devaluation is not enough; that devaluation without freedom will not alone do the job.

Third, I wish to convince the house that if every nation waits until everyone is ready we may wait until it is too late; and I hope we in Canada, who are often fond of talking about the value of our example, may be able to give some kind of example here.

Finally, I wish to argue that we are in a favourable position to do so.

This is not the first time that I have attempted to interest the government in this question, but in the past I have been unsuccessful. When people are prosperous, when everyone has his pockets full of money, when he believes that everything is for the best in the best of all possible worlds, it is very hard to get him to believe that any clouds can arise on the horizon at all; but I think the difficulties are now beginning to emerge. So far as I can understand, it is not very difficult to persuade the farmers that not everything is still good. Take just one other industry to which I shall refer later; I think the newsprint manufacturers may have something to say about the difficulties which exchange control is causing them.

I hope to be able to satisfy the house and the government that the villain in the piece in both these cases, and in others as well, is the foreign exchange control measures which are spread all over the so-called free world, and which are getting in the way of those who are trying to carry on business. I hope that now that the farmers and the industrial workers can accept that, even the government may accept it.

Crooning to the farmers has gone out of fashion since last spring, and we no longer live in that pleasant Never-Never land where Peter Pan lived and where he never had to grow up. I think we are growing up. I think the government is showing signs of learning things. The government learned between Monday and Wednesday of last week that there was unemployment in the land. On Monday we had the speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), which really made one wonder whether it was not almost indecent to suggest that there was any unemployment at all, so insinuatingly, so persuasively, so almost absent-mindedly he spoke of unemployment, as if it really was not here at all, or if it was it was just an accident of the climate, and that it would disappear with the spring when the birds come again. Well, on Wednesday, a few days later, apparently they had a change, because the debate on the address had to be invaded for the second or third time in order that the unemployment insurance measure could be carried through—and it was a very good thing it was carried through, though the surprising thing is that the Prime Minister did not know on Monday that it should be. Therefore, as I say, I have hopes for the government, and of course the hopes are accentuated by the return of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and by the foreword which appeared in the morning papers as to his arrival.

I am reading from the Montreal Gazette which carries a headline reading: "Howe predicts more exports." This headline rang a bell in my memory. I looked back and I found that on May 9, 1949, there was a similar headline in the Ottawa Citizen which read: "New deal disclosed by Howe." That was on May 9. That is what you might call an election sweetener. We read lower down that the Minister of Trade and Commerce said that he had negotiated contracts to the total value of $25 million. That is not a very large amount in the face of the whole of our trade; nevertheless there it was for what it was worth.

It is interesting to turn back to what the Minister of Trade and Commerce told them in New York yesterday. He explained that he was on a holiday during which time he "made efforts to encourage some countries to increase their exports to Canada." Then he says this:

> The over-all outlook for increased trade with Europe is improving all the time.

That is good. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), I know, will be very glad to hear that. In fact it is a pity he did not know it a little earlier. The minister goes on and says:

> Canada was encouraging private businessmen to arrange barter deals—

I suppose if we cannot have trade we can barter. If we cannot have real trade we have to barter. It seems a pity we have to go back to the past like that. Next the minister said:

> We are encouraging such deals because we want to make it as easy as possible for private trade to function.

Then at the end of the interview occurs this, which I find encouraging too. At the end of the interview the writer said:

> Mr. Howe is returning to Ottawa tomorrow where, he said, he faces "a few routine things to get back to."

Now, I think the minister may find when he finds out what has happened here that some of the things are not so routine as he might have thought. He will not find unemployment quite so routine. Nevertheless it is a good thing to have him back, because he is always so optimistic; of course he tries to make everyone feel that this government is an all-wise government. Certainly the Prime Minister has gone a long way toward suggesting that the Minister of Trade and Commerce at all events does have that qualification.

I said a moment ago that we were suffering from the shackles of foreign exchange control, and I should like to read one or two statements in support of that. I would like to read the familiar words of the Minister of Agriculture, from what he said in December last in Brantford. I shall read a short extract in advance of that, something he said on May 28 last. He told an audience in Winnipeg that what we needed was "more food products to sell".

That was on May 28. But by December 1 he was telling the farmers that they would have to buy where they could sell, and he went on to declare:

> The only place we can sell freely for the time being is Canada.

He suggested that we will have to sell in Canada; but it will be quite a task for Canadians to eat as much wheat as would take care of the Saskatchewan crop. Nevertheless that is what the minister suggested.

We all remember what the minister said in this House of Commons a short time ago, that there was a deliberate onslaught by the British government—and it will be noted it was the British government, not the British people—a deliberate onslaught on Canadian trade.

I should like to carry this one step further by saying what has happened to Canadian newsprint. As I recall, we had a contract for roughly 300,000 tons of Canadian newsprint. Canadian newsprint manufacturers had supplied Britain for years when it was inconvenient for them to do so, and at a price less than that at which the British could buy it elsewhere. The British importers were keen to continue the contracts, but in January, two months ago, the British government advised them that they could give no import permit for a period of six months, and that they were not able to give an assurance as to what would happen after that time.

I do not think anyone imagines that the British government are doing that out of malice or as a prank. The truth of the matter is that the British government, like other governments, are caught in this maze of controls which support overvalued currencies by rigid controls and rationing of foreign exchange.

It has been, so far, extraordinarily difficult to get people to buckle down to the task of taking this problem seriously, and if it was not for the fact that we are now finding ourselves in difficulties we would not get people to take it seriously even yet.

Controls are everywhere—import controls; export controls; controls of all kinds. It is in the air. Of course Great Britain in 1949 was the classic case. Every knowledgeable person except the Chancellor of the Exchequer knew that the pound was being dealt in at a figure far below the fixed rate, and eventually the Chancellor of the Exchequer had to come to devaluation; but there was no relaxation of the tightness of the controls. All that happened was that $2.80 was substituted for $4.03. In that connection I would like to read a sentence from the London Economist. Hon. members will realize that the London Economist is not only sympathetic but generous in its attitude toward the government. It sympathizes largely with the objectives of the British government. It says this about devaluation in its issue of October 15, 1949:

> It is now clear that the opportunity of devaluation has been missed. Abroad, there has been much disappointment, mixed with amazement, that so sharp a reduction in the exchange value of the pound sterling was not accompanied by the relaxation whatsoever of the restrictions that keep the pound so tightly inconvertible. "Devaluation," says one experienced continental commentator, "is usually the price paid for getting rid of exchange control. To pay so high a price and get none of the reward is a very bad business."

Now, as I have said, all the old powers have been maintained. There is, however, one hopeful sign; it is the fact that New Zealand and Australia have turned their faces away from controls. And in England last week the election returns could not be regarded as an enthusiastic endorsement of them.

Of course we must not overlook the great difficulties which England has. We must not overlook the three and a quarter billion pounds of indebtedness they have. We must not overlook the fact that they spent such vast proportions of their resources in the carrying on of the war. But in addition to that there is and has been a doctrinaire mentality at work there. While tentative attempts have been made to introduce freedom to facilitate foreign investment, all that has happened is the substitution of one labyrinth of red tape for another: In the meantime the life-giving stream of foreign investments has remained cut off.

What, in plain words, is foreign exchange control? It means this: that the government of a country fixes in terms of its own currency the value of other currencies; then it enforces that rate upon the public, upon its own citizens, backed by the police power of the state, so that the citizens of the state can deal only at this fixed rate.

Those police powers you may recall. I do not wish to take too much time, but I should like to read one or two of the more extreme powers. They state:

> The governor in council may make regulations prescribing that persons who would otherwise be residents shall be deemed to be non-residents or that persons who would otherwise be non-residents shall be deemed to be residents for any of the purposes of this act.

I have always understood that the British parliament had powers to do everything except to make a man a woman, or a woman a man. But this section seems almost to go beyond that. Then there is this one further subsection I should like to read. Regulations may be made:

> Notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained elsewhere in this act, exempting any person or any class of persons or any transaction or class of transactions from any provisions of this act.

In other words this body, the governor in council, is given the absolute power to deal in any way it pleases. Let me add quickly that I think those powers have been, on the whole, exercised with judgment and with moderation. The fetters, so to speak, have been softened. Nevertheless there is the power. And let us never forget this: that when all other controls are done away with but foreign exchange control is left, it is the control of all controls. So long as the government can control arbitrarily every transaction in which any foreign money is involved, it has virtually complete control—an astonishing amount of power.

When one couples that with the Emergency Exchange Conservation Act, there is virtually nothing that cannot be done. Tomatoes and lettuce are "off again, on again". We never know whether we can have them or not from day to day. Perhaps we should learn something more about the tastes of the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce—their own personal tastes in foods—so that we could try to forecast just how these things will be dealt with.

In plain words, every transaction, no matter how small, has to have a permit, and one's personal business becomes the business of the board. If you wish money to go to the United States, you must lay bare your affairs. If you wish to move to the United States, they have the right to ask why you are doing it—whether you are moving away from your mother-in-law, or what. They have the right to examine into your affairs and be satisfied in their judgment as to what should be done. If you wish to send a few pounds to Great Britain, you have to satisfy them that it is necessary, because they have this policing power. We tried hard to have some relaxation, but we were told four years ago that it was a case of whole hog or none. Is it any wonder that a distinguished citizen of this country described the measure as being a peacetime measure "which was unnecessary and one which interfered with the basic rights of Canadian citizens"? That was said by Senator Crerar in the Senate in 1946. Senator McGeer gave an amusing description of the permit power in the Senate when he said that you could not take a suitcase of personal effects across the line without a permit. Another senator said that if you wanted to abide strictly by the permit system you would have to cross the frontier in a state of nature.

What about the origin of this foreign exchange control? I said that it had a deplorable ancestry, and I shall try to substantiate that. Like the mule, it has no pride of ancestry, and I would hope it has no hope of posterity. We first heard of its being used by the bolsheviks in 1917; but the man who is the real inventor, the man who should be given the real honour, is Schacht, of Germany, who brought it in in the early thirties. I need not tell you that this was the key control, which, added to other controls, enabled Hitler, plus Schacht, plus the Gestapo to make all their preparations for war. If we may use the language of the racetrack, we may say that foreign exchange control was by Schacht out of Gestapo.

There have been other attempts to control international prices. Hon. members will recall the efforts in connection with rubber and coffee. I read a report in the press the other day which explained why the price of coffee had shot up. According to this report the reason was quite simple. The price was controlled, and then millions of coffee trees were taken out of production, with the result that there is not enough coffee to go round and the price has gone up. I say nothing of the hardship to the persons involved—mainly, no doubt, small producers.

What I do wish to say is that it is just too hard for a few individuals to foresee the consequences of these far-reaching actions. If human beings were robots; if we were all economic men who moved according to mechanical rules, possibly there might be more to be said for it. But when you take human beings, each with his own desires and his own feelings as to how he will regulate his life, then when other people try to regulate it, it is a failure.

How much more difficult is it to regulate the price of a thing like money, which affects every commodity in the community, which enters into every detail of our life. How much more difficult is it to do that. It is not too much to say that this arrogant assumption of supreme wisdom always ends in disaster. When I say "arrogant assumption" I am not referring to those officials who have been carrying out the terms of this act; I am referring only to the general principle which inspires foreign exchange control and which I hope we may have the wisdom at least to begin to get rid of.

Of course exchange control has its friends. First of all there are people who are convinced that controls are right; there are people who believe in them. These are people whom I respect, although I believe their views are wholly wrong. I respect them because they are honest about their views; they say: Yes, we are going to control you; look out! I always hope that the kindly light of reason may invade their minds and one day they will drop those views; nevertheless there they are, and they are entitled to them.

But there is another and very different class of people whom I do not admire nearly so much. These are the people who proclaim constantly their adherence to freedom but who as a matter of fact like controls in their own affairs very much indeed. I am not going to go further on that except to relate to the house a little incident that came to my attention through a wise banker friend. He was talking during the war with an importer who told him what a happy life he was having. He said to the banker: "My imports come in at a fixed price; I sell them at a fixed price, and there is a pleasant spread between. I have no reason to worry about foreign exchange, because it is sold at a fixed price. I am able to shut up my office door about midday and go off and play golf". My banker friend made a very wise reply to him. He said: "You know what has happened, you are no longer in business". I think that tells the whole story.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).]

I am fond of quoting the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) on this. He said something in this house with which I have always agreed and which I like to repeat: "I do not object to private enterprise, but if they are going to take the profits, they have to take the risks as well". I would not want it to be thought that I am quoting the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar as the embodiment of divine wisdom, but I think that one statement was sound, and I should like to quote it to those who in my opinion are the worst enemies of freedom that you can find, because they proclaim themselves as being its friend when their actions give them away.

I should like to try to relate this specifically to our special difficulty with the United Kingdom. Why is it that we are losing markets and fear the further loss of markets in the United Kingdom? Of course it would be difficult if the pound were fully convertible. Then the people in the United Kingdom would be able to spend their money as they liked and where they liked. They would be able to buy wheat or anything else they wanted in this country, provided that the price was right. I am not going to suggest that convertibility would produce a miracle overnight, but I am suggesting that it would begin the cure.

I am suggesting that we are in danger—from this maze of controls. I shall support this by quotations; that things are going badly and there is no reason to expect that they will go any better. Incidentally I noticed in the annual report of the Royal Bank of Canada, issued the other day, a very wise remark by the president. He said that the real excuse for controls had gone now, that European production was up to the pre-war level. I understand that it is practically up to the pre-war level in agricultural production, and fifteen per cent above it in manufacturing production. In the face of this, consider the situation in England today, six months after devaluation. Apparently there is little or no money available for agricultural products from North America. Apparently there is no money for newsprint. What is the money used for? It is used to buy exclusively North American products, such as Virginia tobacco and films. That is not said in criticism of Great Britain; that is said in criticism of this system which has us all shackled and which we must get rid of.

Of course even if the pound went free tomorrow it would not suddenly give them all kinds of United States dollars, but it would begin the cure. As I said before, it would begin to liberate the stream of investment which would begin to flow in and correct the present situation. At the present time competent economists will tell you that they wonder whether anything else will do the job; whether anything else can span the dollar gap.

The bitterest irony of this control which is supposed to be our salvation is that it cuts us off from the very thing which could begin to provide the cure—international investment. There have been, as I said a moment ago, attempts to bring about some kind of freedom of investment in England. I think they have changed the number of years after which you can take money out, or something of the kind. It is just one bit more of red tape which the businessman must cut when he wants to invest. A businessman does not want to have to deal with government officials; he wants to deal with other businessmen. Unless there is some great lure like western oil, they are not going to invest except where there is freedom.

Do not let us forget that this whole control system is only twenty years old, whereas we had scores or hundreds of years of the other system. During all that time, when the world was still civilized, we had none of this. Lest anyone say: Yes, while we may have had stability before the war, there was also from time to time great hardship on certain people, when adjustments had to be made. I will admit that there is some truth in that, but I say that with the new techniques we have, with our new attitude toward and belief in social welfare, those difficulties would be taken care of. Merely because those difficulties exist we should not resign ourselves to the evils of controls.

You have been listening to one who certainly does not set himself up as an expert, and I should like to call in one or two experts, as they said on the radio program "Information Please." I should like to read just a sentence or two from a report by a body which has been criticized in this house, the international monetary fund, but was eulogized the other day by a competent hard-headed banker, namely, the president of the Royal Bank. When a hard-headed banker eulogizes a body of this kind and at the same time indicates that he is an advocate of freedom, I think it is worthy of note. I should like to read from the report; it is short, and I would ask hon. members to listen very carefully.

The members of the fund—

This was in April, 1949.

—have the obligation to put into effect as soon as possible such measures as are likely at the same time to improve their payments position and make possible the gradual reduction and ultimate elimination of restrictions on payments and transfers for current international transactions.

Then it says this:

There are evident risks of various kinds in accepting the more competitive conditions that must follow such a policy; but unless these risks are accepted, the improvement in the world economic situation made thus far may be replaced by deterioration.

I suggest that is an understatement. We need not say it may be replaced by deterioration; we can say it is being replaced by deterioration. Then it goes on:

If the earliest reasonable opportunity is not seized to modify restrictive policies, the difficulty of resuming trade on an economic basis under more normal conditions will be greatly increased and world trade will tend more and more to be conducted with inconvertible currencies on the basis of bilateral bargains.

Again the report says:

The revival of the flow of private international capital, which is essential if the best use is to be made of the world's productive resources, is moreover scarcely to be expected if more elaborate exchange restrictions increasingly limit the uses to which earnings from foreign investments can be put.

It is of interest that yesterday, March 1, 1950, was the day which under the articles of agreement the fund was to report to its members on the restrictions in force at that time. In other words, after three years of operation, there was to be a sort of stock-taking or review of the situation.

I would call the attention of hon. members to four things from what I have read: first, the duty to get away from restrictions; second, the deterioration that will come about if we do not do so; third, acceptance of the fact that there is risk—but our whole system depends upon risk; only when there is risk is there incentive to call forth the maximum of effort on the part of people with energy and initiative. Fourth and last of all, they stress the importance of international investment.

If we need to underline the truth of these statements, let us carry our minds back three years, to 1947. What happened then? Two things happened. The British failed to make the pound convertible; and the Geneva treaty was negotiated, which has been almost ineffective except so far as Canada and the United States are concerned.

I have referred to the statement by the president of the Royal Bank. He has two things to say. He points to Britain's debt difficulty, and indeed suggests that the rest of the world should come to her assistance because the burden she bears was incurred in behalf of everyone. Then he calls for a period of freedom of exchange, for a certain fixed period when we should let the market determine rates of exchange as it did immediately after the first world war. Then he thinks we might work toward a period of stability, such as we had previously.

Now I should like to sum up in a word. A few moments ago I said that devaluation last autumn was of some value; but was not enough. I quoted what I regard as three competent authorities; the international monetary fund itself, the London Economist, and the president of the Royal Bank. If the prospect is disturbing now, Mr. Speaker, is it likely to be any better when we come to the end of the Marshall plan? In congratulating ourselves on what has been going on, we have often forgotten to mention the enormous extent to which the Marshall plan and its various ancillary bodies have helped the situation.

Is this exchange problem going to remain with us forever? Is the minister going to keep this doubtful child in his financial family in spite of its deplorable origin, or is he going to expel it?

What prevents a return to freedom? First of all there is pride. I have never been a member of the government, though there are always hopes; but I have no doubt a government develops pride. There is unwillingness to admit that anything done by the government can be wrong. One member of the government, however, does not seem to be clothed with pride in the matter. I refer to the Minister of Agriculture; and I want to quote something he said just over a year ago, speaking in London, because I think it so true:

> I am convinced that the world is not in any state of mind where it can be expected to agree that the manipulation of any system or systems of currency is going to be allowed to interfere with the will of those who have empty stomachs when it is preventing their purchasing surpluses of food and distributing them.

I suggest that is exactly what is happening now, that the manipulations of currency are preventing that very thing; and I suggest to the minister that he bring this situation to the attention of his colleagues. I think that was a wiser remark than the reference by the Prime Minister to chaos. Chaos is a word that covers a great deal of territory, one of those words we all use without perhaps intending very much. The Prime Minister used it on June 6 of this year in Quebec, when, speaking of devaluation, he said:

> That would bring chaos to the Canadian economy in twelve months or so.

It might be interjected by the Minister of Finance, so I shall do it myself, that when the Canadian devaluation was made last autumn it was done at a time when other currencies were devalued. However, as I was saying, there is pride in this connection; and no doubt the Prime Minister, remembering his use of the word "chaos", might find difficulty in changing his view.

But there is another and, I think, more real difficulty. Government officials have been administering all these controls; and I want to say quite candidly that I think they have made the best of a bad job. But those who have been administering controls really have an extraordinary intellectual job to do in order to conclude that the time has come to abandon them. It seems to me they almost have to jump out of their intellectual skins, and that presents a difficult problem. Meanwhile, the abnormal is becoming the normal. I am sure they feel what I quoted from Senator Crerar was like a voice from another world. It has become respectable now to have controls. The day before yesterday the minister himself referred to the orders issued this year as compared with those of last year; and very naturally, I suppose, made the reference in such a way that he did not give me the impression of having the slightest feeling that these were things that we should get away from.

I have pointed to the effect of devaluation alone, and have shown that it has been largely sterile so far as we are concerned. I have quoted the advice given our farmers by the Minister of Agriculture, to sell at home. I have shown that this rigid control is preventing the flow of investment, which I think is the best hope we have for the future. It may be said in reply that we have had quite a lot of investment in Canada; nevertheless, to me that is no proof that fixed rates do not militate against investment. After all, there were strong reasons for investing here; and if anyone presents the argument that investments have been made in Canada, in spite of controls, it is perfectly open to me or any other member to say that such investments would have been much greater if there had been no such controls. When you consider Britain, you do not have the same sort of magnet for investment; nevertheless you have a concentrated market of forty-five million people, and I am assured by business friends that they believe investment would be freely made in Britain if the world could get away from these shackles.

I said a while ago, Mr. Speaker, that if we wait we may wait too long; and that brings me to the suggestion I wish to make. Why can we not make a start here? After all, we have had a considerable amount of experience since last September. I believe the official rate is endorsed by the rate on the dollar in the free market, such as it is; the dollar is quoted within a fraction of the ninety cents which is the official rate. Thirty years ago we took the risks, such as they were. We have a tremendously stronger position now, both absolutely and relatively. We have the added strength of iron ore and oil, which have greatly improved our position. Actually in the last four months of the year we increased our exchange position by something like $130 million. As a matter of fact, as someone has said, at that time we were really supporting the United States dollar to that extent. We have no huge internal debt problem, as they have in England. I suggest that now is the strategic moment. We have evidence that in Australia, New Zealand and Great Britain, the control mind is not so firmly in the saddle. I am not suggesting that the freeing of the Canadian dollar is going to work any magic, any more than the freeing of the British pound at this moment would work any magic. After all, there is no mystery or magic involved. All I am asking is what Churchill suggested, that the government get out of the way, and let the millions of people who want to buy and sell to each other exercise their initiative, energy and ingenuity, without being forced to get permits for everything.

If, on the other hand, we do nothing, then the forest of controls becomes more and more deep-rooted. If the government, or the board, with its knowledge which the rest of us do not have concerning capital deposits, sees fit to begin with freedom on current account only, I would be disappointed; nevertheless I would say that was a beginning. Let us have a beginning. I would also say, let us not underestimate our own influence. In my opinion we are sometimes inclined to overestimate it, but I do not think we should underestimate it. I believe we have a place in the world. The fact that we are next door to the United States strengthens that place. Our action might give a lead which would prove fruitful.

As I was saying before the minister came in, yesterday served as a sort of stocktaking day, in which the present position of controls was to be investigated.

The minister made a speech last autumn somewhere in the United States, which I read with interest. He stated, with pardonable pride I thought, that two things have been characteristic of the policy of the Department of Finance—boldness and a sense of timing. The minister will forgive me if I say that we on this side of the house relate the timing rather to the election. We have done that before, so I need not stress that point. Last year we told the minister that we thought he was influenced by the political cycle rather than the economic cycle. But seriously I commend those two things to the minister—boldness and a sense of timing. I do suggest to him that now may be the moment when our action might have a real influence. I hope that we shall not have one day to make the devastating confession, "too little and too late."

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate this afternoon, realizing that it is the common practice of members to take advantage of this opportunity to tell something of their constituencies, I hope that my constituents, as well as hon. members, will not feel that it is a lack of interest or pride in my constituency that has deterred me from making an earlier address. I have waited until the second session of this twenty-first parliament primarily because, in common with the other members on this side of the house, I was genuinely interested in allowing sufficient time to consider the estimates and legislation that were before us last fall during a necessarily short session.

I wish to congratulate the mover (Mr. Larson) and seconder (Mr. Dumas) on their addresses, which precipitated this debate. They did an excellent job. They will probably get little satisfaction from any complimentary remarks that a new member extends, but I do wish to add my compliments to those already given. If I attempt to cover as many points as I wish in this debate, the house may be suspicious that I intend to leave again to join a convention. I should like to assure the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank), who so eloquently informed you of my absence last year, that I have a genuine interest in what is taking place.

The constituency I have the honour to represent, Kootenay East, comprises a large portion of the southeast corner of the province of British Columbia. There are three great valleys of the Kootenay and great Columbia rivers. These rivers drain almost the entire northerly portion of the Canadian Rockies. One might almost say there were three great Fraser valleys rolled into one, and bounded by mountains filled with coal and mineral wealth. The Columbia valley in the northern part of my riding is one that is particularly noted for its tourist attractions. There is also some mining and agriculture carried on there. In the Creston valley, we have a fruit industry—I was about to say thriving, but later on you will understand why I cannot say it is a thriving industry—as well as many tourist attractions.

The adjacent Kootenay lake is a mecca for sportsmen from all over the country. Cranbrook is in the centre of the riding, and is particularly noted for its tourist attractions, and as a logging and railway centre. It is situated on the celebrated Crowsnest pass railway, and is also on the north-south highway which extends to the tourist attractions I have already mentioned, as well as Banff and Lake Louise. The coal fields of the Crowsnest pass and the Fernie area contribute a great deal of wealth to the interior of the province. It is regrettable that because of the severe winter, which made it difficult to obtain coal cars, there has been a considerable amount of unemployment in that area. The people are struggling along however, and with the help of unemployment insurance payments I believe they are getting by. The mines will soon return to full-time operations.

I have purposely left until the last the city of Kimberley, which is my home. Although I am not going to describe the city itself, I wish to point out what industries are there, and then continue with some of the points I have in mind concerning social security. In Kimberley is located the largest lead-zinc mine in the world. Ten thousand tons of ore roll from its portals daily, and the resultant 800 to 1,000 tons of concentrates, which are shipped to the Trail smelter in Kootenay West, provide employment for approximately 6,000 people; about 2,000 people in Kimberley, and I believe in excess of 4,500 in the Trail area. It certainly contributes a great deal to the well-being of Kootenay West. I might say that, in effect, the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) and I would be virtually without a riding if it were not for the Sullivan mine.

As I am on my feet for the purpose of discussing the speech from the throne, I must spend a certain amount of time on it. I am no economist, however; but because of my work in the past few years, dealing specifically with wages, sales and so on, I have necessarily gained a certain amount of information with regard to economics and have necessarily put myself in a position in which I can at least form an opinion and be prepared to agree or disagree with whatever arguments may be advanced.

In their complaints with regard to the throne speech, the opposition have contended that nothing has been done to ensure markets for our farm produce and insist that there are no measures taken to obviate the unemployment. Many members from this side of the house, including the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard), have defended the throne speech successfully in the matter of farm products. I simply wish to make a few observations. I feel that up to the present time the marketers of the main farm produce such as wheat, beef, pork, poultry and dairy products have not suffered a great deal. The gross income in 1948 was $2,449 million; for 1949 it was $2,409 million. The higher figure was for 1948 and the lower figure was for 1949; that latter figure shows a $40 million decrease or one and one-third per cent, which is far from the sixteen per cent that I have been hearing mentioned in this house since the opening of this session.

[Mr. Byrne.]

Considerable discussion has taken place with regard to the fact that farm prices were pegged during the war and for some years following it. Certainly during the war wages were also pegged, and we had little quarrel with that policy of the federal government. The controls were necessary, and I think that we may be congratulated that we wound up by not going into the tailspin which has taken place in areas where prices have been allowed to inflate themselves.

I have figures from the bureau of statistics which prove that at the present time, taking the 1926 figure as 100 per cent, farm prices are still, as of the end of 1949, nine points above the prices of whole or partially-manufactured articles. Those who work in manufacturing industries are primarily interested in this matter. These figures would tend to prove that labour's rates are still eight or nine points below farm prices for the same year.

There is, however, one group of farmers who seem to have been entirely forgotten; I refer to the apple growers of central British Columbia. For the 1949 crop they have, up to the present time, received little if any returns. I have already mentioned Creston valley. In that locality a large number of farmers now face what I may describe as near disaster because of the fact that for the apple crop, although it was somewhat larger than normal, markets have dropped off. The apple growers are therefore facing disaster if something is not done to assist them.

To build up a producing orchard takes from six to seven years. The land on which these orchards are planted, and the surrounding land, we might say, costs in the neighbourhood of $1,000 to $2,000 per acre. It is impossible for the tree fruit rancher to have on his farm a subsidiary product on which he can rely if his tree fruits fail. The mixed farmer has something to fall back on if one of his products fails to bring in a return. I think we can confidently say that those who are raising wheat in the central plains have found that, with the improvements in methods, and with the introduction of larger and better machines, they have been able to lower their production costs. With the fruit farmer, however, the situation is different.

Fruit farming does not lend itself to mechanization. Everything must be done by hand. The wage rates that are being paid at the present time, which are correct and proper, necessarily cause an extra amount of expense. The improvement in marketing methods has brought about the necessity for more handling which entails more labour charges at every turn. In the orchard the work goes on for twelve months of the year. If the winter is open, or even in a severe winter, the fruit rancher is out pruning his orchard. In the spring he must begin spraying early, putting on a coat of spray. If it rains that day, he must return to the orchard and put on another coat. Perhaps throughout the summer almost innumerable sprayings will take place. There is also the matter of hand thinning. The apples must be thinned. Millions and millions of apples in one orchard must be handled by hand, taking them from the bud in order to allow large apples to mature. The picking must certainly be done by hand. So far there is no mechanization in the apple-picking industry. I have seen attempts made, but nothing has been accomplished; because the apple coming from the orchard must be without a blemish. If there is one spot on it, it is culled; and the consumer apparently does not want it. It will therefore be seen that the apple growers' costs are rising.

This year they are in this position; they have invested this money. The apples are in the packing houses, prepared for shipment, but no markets are available. The tree fruit board have attempted, somewhat generously I would say, to do something about a large portion of the surplus that the growers are going to have. We realize that if these apples are left, they will rot and must be dumped. It is different with wheat which may be stored and kept for even hundreds of years, if necessary, but certainly for a year or two until the market has levelled off and the producers are able to sell at prices which will at least pay the cost of production and give them some return. But they are facing this condition. As I understand it, the British Columbia tree fruit growers have offered to give a certain amount of their crop to Great Britain. The people of Canada who are doing fairly well economically should not allow this to be done without giving some support to these fruit growers. I would expect the hon. members who represent farming constituencies to lend all support to a plea to the federal government to do something to help these tree fruit growers who are in this precarious position at the present time.

With regard to the unemployment situation, it is regrettable that we have some 350,000 unemployed in Canada. There are many factors which contribute to this situation, probably not the least of which is the present coal shortage arising from the strikes in effect in the United States at the present time. Also the severe winter that we have experienced out west has had something to do with it. Even though the weather has been considerably milder in the east, it is not conducive at the present time to starting large-scale construction or building. The building of the trans-Canada highway and the national housing scheme should alleviate the situation. If it does not I am sure there is no hon. member on this side of the house who will go back to his constituency until he is assured that something has been done by the federal government authorities, if necessary, to support some project. If they do not start it themselves I am sure they will see to it that something is started in collaboration with the provincial authorities. We will not go home to our constituencies in the summer until we are sure that the situation has been controlled.

Mr. MacInnis: It will be dangerous to go home.

Mr. Fraser: He will go home when his leader tells him.

Mr. Byrne: Some hon. members have said earlier that there are other countries that have no unemployment. I shall quote the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge). I am not picking on the hon. member for Kootenay West, but his speech is one that I recall as having been made quite recently. He said, as reported at page 370 of Hansard:

> The latest figures for Great Britain show 329,000 unemployed, a labour force of 23 million and a percentage of 1·4 unemployed. Similar figures for the United States show 4,800,000 jobless, with a labour force of 60 million, and a percentage of unemployed of 7·5. On the basis of 323,000 jobless and a labour force of 5·1 million, Canada has a percentage of 6·3 unemployed.

Mr. Gibson: How cold was it in Britain?

An hon. Member: It was cold after the election.

Mr. Knowles: Getting a lot of cold comfort out of this, too.

Mr. Byrne: It is interesting to note that these countries which show the highest standard of living at the present time have the greatest number of unemployed. Certainly it is regrettable; but take the actual figures in Canada today. The payment of $18 a week to the unemployed is higher than the earnings of the average industrial worker in the United Kingdom today. I will grant you that the subsidies on food products and so on in Great Britain leave them in a much better position than those figures would indicate. However, in Great Britain the worker still pays an income tax on his earnings of $17 or $20 a week.

Then the hon. member for Kootenay West goes on to say:

> What about Australia and New Zealand? They are both in a position quite different from ours. There is full employment in New Zealand; and on the basis of information radioed from Australia today they have about 1,000 registered unemployed; but they have 107,000 jobs for which applicants cannot be found.

Certainly there is a good place for immigrants. However, I want hon. members to realize that while Canada does show at the present time a considerable amount of unemployment, for reasons which I have outlined, yet following the war Canada cancelled entirely the debt which Great Britain owed her. Australia, New Zealand, India, Egypt and some of the other countries in the commonwealth, South Africa included, did not take any such action, and Great Britain still owes them in the neighbourhood of £15 billion. This would naturally reflect a greater prosperity in Australia, and it is something that they should not particularly brag about at this time.

It is obvious that these countries with the lower standard of living do not have any unemployed at the present time.

Mr. Knowles: What about the United States?

Mr. Byrne: In India there is no unemployment; but in that country the scythe has not yet displaced the sickle. In Australia the motorcar is hardly known even amongst what you might call the middle class. The worker does not think of owning an automobile. In China, where the ox pulls the wooden plow which tills the field, there is no unemployment. In Egypt the treadmill lifts the water from the Nile. We could even take Great Britain, where they take the voters to the polls in stage coaches.

I know that some hon. member are becoming bored. They expected me to speak on the question of social security. I wish to say a word on the measures of social security that have been attained in Kimberley. In so doing I may attempt, and I hope hon. members will forgive me, to prove to the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) that while I was an unpaid elected representative of labour I had considerable success in that field. Incidentally the hon. member from time to time makes reference to me as one who claims to be a representative of labour. I wish to remind the hon. member that while sitting in this house I do not claim to represent any one particular group of people in my constituency. I represent the employees, the farmer, the smaller businessman in retail and service capacity, the employers of labour, the unemployed, the aged and infirm. Certainly it is my bounden duty to be assured that the money collected from these various groups is spent prudently and, above all, to guard against the necessity for any increase in the present heavy burden of taxation. Certainly I do not think we should use it now, as has been requested by certain members of the opposition, to accept sterling to counteract our unbalance of trade with the United Kingdom.

I do not think we should use anything like three or four hundred millions of dollars to prime an already dry socialist well. I shall not take the time to trace developments in the organization of the union at Kimberley, except to say that through tireless efforts the union has reached the stage where it commands the respect of the community and the company, and at present operates under the best collective bargaining agreement in Canada.

Prior to organization the work week was fifty-six hours, with no consideration for statutory holidays; and, in general, conditions were such as would be found in any unorganized camp—with the exception of the fact that living conditions had necessarily improved because of permanency in employment. I neglected to say earlier that the developed ore body, at the present rate of reduction, will last for another fifty years. That has been known for a long time, and with that in mind employees invested and built their own homes.

The Sullivan mine is the first and only hard-rock mine in Canada working on a forty-hour week basis. By adopting the forty-hour week twenty per cent more people were put on the payroll and given employment. Since that time production has gone up to the extent of 2,000 tons a day because of the new methods of extraction and haulage introduced by the company. Working on the forty-hour week they are producing 2,000 tons more than were being produced before the introduction of the union agreement.

I shall run through quickly some of the other features in this agreement. There is an excellent seniority system. This system gives seniority to veterans returning from the services, regardless of whether they have had previous service with the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, the operators of this mine. They may return after one to six years of service in the armed forces, enter the employ of the company, and, after ninety days, will be credited with six years' seniority rights.

We have a labour-management committee which works in an advisory capacity, a joint safety committee, which has done excellent work. I am happy to say that the Sullivan mine came very close to winning the award for its safety record in the last year. We have a contract committee, and the miners are working on a contract basis. The contract committee have been able to maintain contract prices at a rate sufficiently high that some miners last year had earnings which exceeded considerably the indemnity paid to members of parliament.

We have a good arbitration procedure for the settlement of disputes. We receive overtime pay for all work performed in excess of eight hours. We receive pay for statutory holidays when not worked, and double time if worked; two weeks vacation with pay; and we have the check-off of union dues. Last, but not least, we have wage rates ranging from $1.09 plus a shift differential of four and eight cents to $1.53 per hour for safety miners. In addition each employee customarily receives $75 as a Christmas bonus. Also a non-contributory pension plan which, at the present rate of pay for a miner with a lifetime of service, would amount to between $90 and $100 per month.

In connection with sick benefits the Kimberley employees have a sick benefit society. This was not brought into effect entirely by the union, but has been improved upon immensely. To this society we pay $1.50 a month, which amount is matched by the company under a recent bargaining agreement. In this way $1.50 is paid by the employee and $1.50 by the company. The directors have the right to change the figure that will be paid in benefits. But, at least for the present, I understand that for the first month a member if off sick will receive $4 a day for thirty days, increasing to $5, and for the last one hundred days of the year he will receive $6 a day or $180 a month.

We have a medical set-up. The fee is $3.50, and includes everything—doctor, hospital, specialists' fees, and travelling by railway, T.C.A. or C.P.A. We hire C.P.A. if it is necessary to take an employee to a specialist—and at no additional cost to the member. By agreement the company matches this payment. I have not the time to go into them in detail, but an employee need have no worry as regards medical expenses or hospitalization so long as he is a member of the society. He might be in hospital for some years, but through all that time he would be attended by a doctor and would be given full coverage so long as dues payments were met.

Mr. Gibson: Free enterprise, is it?

Mr. Byrne: Certainly. I have omitted many of the details and accomplishments of local 651 of the international union of mine, mill and smelter workers, because of the lack of time at my disposal. Through this entire period of accomplishment I have been closely associated with and a leading officer of that organization. Let me add that these gains have been made entirely as a union bargaining collectively without the blessing of any political party.

Recently in the debate the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) intimated that the union to which I belonged and of which I was an officer—since coming to this house I have resigned that office—has been thrown out of the Canadian Congress of Labour. This is quite true. If the hon. member meant what he said when he pointed out it was for ideological purposes, that was also quite true; the ideological reason being that my union steadfastly refused to become a part of or to join the political machine of the C.C.F. socialist party.

Mr. O. L. Jones (Yale): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the amendment to the amendment particularly because the first clause deals with agricultural markets and suggestions for their recapture. I am going to speak also about the fruit industry. I realize that a number of hon. members have already touched on this matter but I make no apology because I represent a riding in which are grown 75 per cent of all the apples grown in British Columbia. I feel also that I have some experience in this regard because at one time I was a fruit grower and have been in close contact with the fruit industry for thirty years. My home town of Kelowna is right in the centre of the fruit growing district.

I should like to deal briefly with the chaotic condition which existed in that industry thirty years ago. At that time there was no organization and the fruit was sold where it could be sold at any price at all. Various firms, unorganized in many cases, would get the fruit on consignment and then proceed to dump it on any market at any price that would give them any profit. Such was the condition in the early days that the fruit growers became so desperate that they organized one of the finest organizations in Canada, the tree fruit board.

At the present time all our fruit is properly handled, packed and graded for shipment all over the world. We are proud of the tree fruit board. We had difficulties to overcome because, taking just one item, we are 4,000 miles farther away from Great Britain than Nova Scotia. In order to overcome this handicap the quality of the product was improved, as well as the quality of the pack. The result is that today the tree fruit board handles roughly $25 million worth of fruit products grown in the interior of British Columbia.

It should be noted that a good deal of our fruit is sold to the United States, which brings United States dollars to Canada. A current review of agricultural conditions in Canada states that during 1947-48 and 1948-49 the United States purchased 1,500,000 bushels and 2,150,000 bushels respectively of Canadian apples, and in both years over 90 per cent came from British Columbia. In 1948 the apple crop in the United States was smaller than normal and there was a strong demand from that country. I merely point that out to indicate how the exportation of fruit to the United States has brought several millions of dollars to this dominion.

The people engaged in the growing of fruit are very cosmopolitan. Practically every race on earth is engaged in fruit growing. I often think that it would be beneficial if the United Nations could come into our valley to see how these people live so happily together. Even the odd Russian fruit grower gets along quite well with his Japanese and Anglo-Saxon friends. They all have something in common, the welfare of the industry in which they are engaged.

There are from 120,000 to 150,000 people living in our valley which is about 150 miles long and quite narrow in places. I am not going to dwell too much on our climate because I think the press has publicized it sufficiently for the present. While we have had some cold weather, they have also had similar weather in California, so I am offering no apology. However, damage may be quite considerable from frost. It is expected that many of the young trees will have been killed, and considerable damage is expected to have been done to our peach and apricot trees. It is a little early to know the exact damage, but definitely a good deal of damage will be done.

The difficulties faced by these people are numerous. One difficulty is the obtaining of a staple market when you have crop variations. As is known, a tree grows a good crop one year and a poor crop the next, and so on. Scientific efforts have been made to overcome this through controlled deblossoming. We have had to overcome practically every pest known to the orthodox fruit grower, but one of the worst, the coddling moth, has been practically eliminated by the use of D.D.T. and other sprays.

Hail has taken its toll of our crops because that is one thing that cannot be controlled. This year the growers have organized their own insurance company to take care of hail damage. Each grower will be assessed to build up a fund to take care of the odd orchard that is hailed out. Then we also have high winds which sometimes occur when the fruit has matured. If the fruit is not picked in a matter of days, it is lost. Another difficulty is that our crop seasons coincide with those of Washington and other states. I have tried to outline briefly some of the difficulties with which the fruit growing industry is faced.

In order to overcome some of these difficulties the industry was encouraged by the present government to try to capture the British market. In order to do that they had to grow a different type of apple from the one sold on the Canadian market. The trees had to be pruned in a different way in order to produce the type of apple wanted in the old country. The industry was geared up to produce roughly three to four million boxes of that type of apple. Now that that market has gone it is found that some of the apples being produced are not suitable for the Canadian or United States market.

The normal shipment of that type of apple to Great Britain was from 2,500,000 to 3,500,000 per year. This year all we have sold to Great Britain is 434,000 boxes. Those were purchased by the British food ministry, the Canadian government paying half the cost. We could not market our production this year and at least a million and a half boxes would be wasted. The growers took the bull by the horns and decided they were not going to have that waste. Without waiting for any arrangement to be made by the government or by any other body they decided hastily—the product is perishable and must be taken care of quickly—to send 1,150,000 boxes to Great Britain as a gift. The alternative was waste and, later on, dumping.

In addition we sell 500,000 boxes to the fruit juice processors at anything from $7 to $9 per ton, or an average of $8. Incidentally this price does not cover the cost of production.

The cost of production is made up quite simply. First there is the cost of packing. Most of those apples were already packed and had borne the packing costs. The cost of handling, packing and storing a box of apples runs from 90 cents to $1; and that charge is usually against the apples in storage. The cost of growing apples varies according to the size of the operation, the type of land, the location of land—whether it faces north, south, east or west—and the size and quality of the crop; but roughly speaking the cost varies from 75 cents to $1.25, or an average of $1. I am referring now to bare costs; I am not including any profit or anything else.

This year we had to handle over eight million boxes; and it has been a problem. Naturally the farmers are reluctant to seek assistance from the government. I feel that they are being a little modest, however, because during the war they accepted ceiling prices on apples, but for which they would have made much greater profits and been able to build up reserves to take care of a situation such as that with which they are faced this year. Then there is the high taxation on fruit land, especially for provincial purposes; irrigation is costly, and there are many other expenses. I realize that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is fully aware of these conditions; and though we have heard a good deal of criticism of his actions in other matters, I will say that he has given considerable assistance to the fruit growers of the Okanagan valley and British Columbia generally.

One of the greatest things to happen was the culmination of our fight, which extended over a period of thirteen years, for a marketing act. As hon. members know, last year that marketing act was passed and is now in operation. But these things in themselves are not sufficient to overcome the difficulties now facing the growers. We have conditions that are beyond their control, especially the dollar shortage and the loss of the United Kingdom market. I need not go into the history of that, because hon. members know it as well as I do. It is principally because of the loss of this market, and the fact that in order to avoid waste we had to send a gift of 1,150,000 boxes of apples overseas, that I appeal to the government to consider the emergency that has arisen this year.

The government have wisely set aside $200 million placed at the disposal of the board for the support of agricultural prices. That legislation states that it is intended to secure a fair relationship between the returns from agriculture and those from other occupations. I would point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that under no circumstances can the fruit growers, with the present market, having in mind the deficiencies I have mentioned, obtain enough revenue to give them a fair return; so now the time has come when they require this assistance. I know the difficulty, and I fully believe it is temporary. On that basis I am making my appeal.

Any assistance given should be at least to the extent of the cost of production and the cost of handling already incurred by the growers. I have given that figure roughly as $2. I should like also to see the grower given a reasonable profit, to enable him to maintain a decent standard of living. I am not asking this for a bunch of people who are doing nothing to help themselves. The fruit growers have done a great deal. They have increased production; they have improved their grading and packing; they have done everything possible through cold storage to extend their season. They have set aside a large sum of money for advertising, and are now working on the theory that the Canadian market itself can be improved. I believe it can. In 1948 the per capita consumption of apples in Canada was 33 pounds. In 1949 it fell to 27 pounds. I believe we can not only recapture lost ground abroad but also improve Canadian consumption, because after all 27 pounds of apples per person per year is not a large quantity. They have also tried to improve the quality of their apples by assistance from the dominion experimental farm at Summerland. This year they are making a grant of $5,000 to that farm for special work on pests and other problems with which they are still faced.

So I believe these producers have done everything possible to retain their export market; but, as I pointed out, matters of international trade and world conditions are definitely beyond their control. Fruit is unlike any other crop. As the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) pointed out, trees are at their prime for from twelve to thirty years. During that period of productivity many changes may take place; wars, depressions, loss of markets and so on. The fruit grower is stuck; he must carry on. His trees are there, whether he likes it or not, for that period of years; and he must take the ups and downs of our economic system in his stride. The grower must be assisted to carry on, because he becomes either a permanent asset or a permanent liability; and an asset is far better than a liability. In prosperous years he is a heavy taxpayer. He pays high taxes on his land, high income taxes, and high irrigation taxes. He is an employer of labour on a large scale; and he maintains himself and his family on a fairly high standard of living. During the odd year like this he needs help to tide him over until once more he has access to his old markets.

I refer once more to the legislation under which I am making this appeal. It states that the board is to endeavour to insure adequate and stable returns for agricultural products. That statement covers my request. Some $200 million has been set aside annually, and the unexpended portion goes back into the general revenue. They have the power; they have the money; but I believe any action must be taken before the end of this month. I appeal on behalf of the fruit growers because, being three thousand miles away, they may not have the opportunity to come before the house, at least not en masse. So I ask that assistance be given at least to the extent of the cost of production.

I should like to deal with one other matter in behalf of the municipalities of British Columbia. I do so because I was surprised and alarmed to hear the statement from the other side of the house within the last day or two that the municipalities will be expected to bear a greater share of the cost of unemployment relief. When you say a municipality must bear a greater share of the cost of relief it means that land taxes within that area must be made even higher in order to carry the additional burden. Any further tax on the land within the municipalities of this dominion, particularly in my province, would just about break them. If a depression came along, as it well might, we would see acres of land revert to the municipalities for non-payment of taxes. The growers, to whom I have just referred, would also find themselves in the same unfortunate situation they experienced in the thirties, when they could not raise enough money on their land to pay their taxes.

If this situation arose, there would be insufficient funds to keep any municipality functioning properly. When this situation arose before, it forced many municipalities into the hands of the receiver. I am going to suggest one or two logical methods by which the government could help. One of these methods concerns dominion properties located in municipalities. Last year a bill was passed granting token payments to certain municipalities, on the basis of the amount of dominion property located within that municipality. By and large, this method does not bring any revenue to the smaller towns of our province, because few of them qualify. I believe the government has a responsibility in this regard. Usually a government building, whether it is a post office or a customs building, occupies one of the choicest spots in the municipality, and one which would pay the highest taxes if it were taxable. I know the argument is that the post office renders a service and, therefore, should not be called upon to pay taxes. Liquor stores also render a service, but they are taxable. Revenue producing offices, such as the post office and customs offices, are in a position to at least pay the service charges to the city for road and sidewalk maintenance, police and fire protection; all the services rendered by a city to its inhabitants.

The other method by which the government could help would be by contributing towards the cost of education. In my province, and I assume the same is true of all provinces, the cost of education is increasing rapidly. In many municipalities it now represents 50 per cent of the levied taxes, not only in municipalities but in unorganized territories as well. Building costs and teachers' salaries are both up. I do not believe education should be curbed for lack of money, because through it we are building citizens for the future. I believe, therefore, that the dominion should enter the field, and the cost of education should be borne by other means than a tax on land. The method of the grant can be controversial, but I am not suggesting any particular method. I merely suggest that such a grant must be made to give some relief to the land taxpayers of our province. A good education naturally makes good Canadians. I believe that any grant the government cares to make should be earmarked for the use of the municipality, or for the reduction of taxes now levied on land.

I have had a great deal to do with this particular question because, like the member for New Westminster, I was in municipal politics before I entered this sphere of activity. I was the mayor of my town for four years, and an alderman for ten years. I was elected with the New Westminster hon. member to the executive of the union of B.C. municipalities, and I was president of that organization for a term. I happened to be chairman of the committee which prepared projects to take care of post-war unemployment. We did that work on the assumption that federal aid would be given to us to carry out those projects. Every municipality in our province co-operated, and we had a fine list of necessary public works ready on the shelf, in case this present situation in Vancouver arose. Without federal aid for our schemes, however, we are absolutely lost. We cannot carry them out. Many of those schemes have now become a must. Practically all of them were self-liquidating projects. For that reason, I am asking the government to again open access to cheap money under the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act, under which money was available at two per cent. I have several requests from municipalities desiring to borrow money under that act, notably Armstrong and Enderby, where the waterworks need renewing. These municipalities hesitate to borrow on the open market at a high rate of interest, but they could handle the low-interest loans available under that act, because they are extended over a reasonable period and are generally self-liquidating.

Another way by which the government could assist the municipalities would be to become realistic about the hospital grant. I realize that, according to the act, the hospital grant was given on the basis of one-third of the total cost, but was not to exceed $1,000 per bed. The cost of building hospitals, however, today is between $6,000 and $7,500 per bed. As a matter of fact a projected modern hospital in Vancouver, it is estimated, will cost $10,500 per bed. I am going to suggest to the minister that he should at least consider doubling this sum of money to make it more nearly comparable to the higher cost of building today. If one refers to the estimates of last year and the public accounts of this year, one finds that the province of British Columbia estimated it would use $13 million for hospital construction. Actually, only $2,223,000 was used. The reason the province used only 17 per cent of that money is fairly obvious. After the small grant from the dominion government, plus an equal amount from the provincial government, the balance was so great that the hospital boards and municipalities could not handle it. We need the extensions to our hospitals, because of the growth of our population. The institution of the health act in the province of British Columbia has also brought more customers, so to speak, to our hospitals. Every hospital in our province is filled to capacity, and many of them have patients in the corridors awaiting a room. Sometimes patients who are in the hospital for a serious illness are rushed out in order to make room for the next patient.

In conclusion, I might point out to the government that the health and education of our people is a national obligation. I say it is national because I do not believe small units give the best results. I do not believe health should be administered by a small town, in which a part-time doctor is responsible for the health and welfare of the people. It should be put on a broader basis than that. Education should not be carried on as it is today, with one teacher being responsible for four or five different grades. Generally, small units are not very efficient, and it is for that reason the dominion government should enter the field to bring order out of a certain amount of chaos. We need more hospitals; we need more clinics; we need more schools; and only the government can give them. Only this government can afford to be generous. I feel that this government can afford to be particularly generous with the province of British Columbia because a few years ago it made a splendid deal in connection with the tax agreement. In 1948-49, under these agreements, the dominion government collected $148,563,000 in our province, and in return paid $21,960,000.

The income tax is a fair tax. It is based on ability to pay. Evidently my province has the ability to pay approximately $150 million. But I do feel that, in order to keep that province supplied with schools, hospitals and clinics, a bigger proportion of that money should be returned, either by a new agreement or by a more generous grant to the municipalities, in order to meet the increased cost of hospitalization and education.

(Translation):

Mr. Bona Arsenault (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, I wish to avail myself of my privilege to speak in this debate in order to urge the government of my country to grant Count Jacques de Bernonville asylum and the right to remain permanently in Canada.

Convinced of his innocence and of his respectability, I believe it my duty, notwithstanding the difficulties which my attitude may bring upon me, to rise in this house in order to plead for a French citizen who is being persecuted by his political enemies, by French communist organizations and here, in this country, by notorious communist sympathizers.

A shameful campaign of lies and false accusations has been launched, without any proof whatsoever, against this man. I shall endeavour to remove, on the strength of the evidence which I shall produce, the prejudices of which he has been the victim, and to rehabilitate him in the mind of certain hon. members of this house and in the opinion of the public.

Who is this man who for almost four years has been hounded by French communists and Canadian communist sympathizers?

Since the age of 17 and during two world wars, Count Jacques Dugé de Bernonville has served his country and the allies.

During the war of 1914-1918 he fought in the French army and won promotions and decorations for gallantry and feats of arms.

He was promoted to officer of the Legion of Honour—the youngest soldier so decorated—he was awarded the Croix de Guerre in 1918 and 1940, mentioned eight times in dispatches, wounded five times; he bears the scars of thirty bullet or shrapnel wounds.

In the interval between both world wars, he held honourable and important posts in industry and business. At the outbreak of hostilities, in 1939, he was appointed commanding officer of a mountain rifle battalion. He fought in the French army and was mentioned once more in dispatches for gallantry. After the armistice, he remained in the French army until demobilization. Arrested by the Germans, he was freed by the advancing allies.

His record of service is such that no one can teach him anything when it comes to patriotism.

In June, 1944, Jacques de Bernonville was appointed, by order of the government of Marshal Pétain, commanding officer of the forces in charge of maintaining order in the military district of Lyons, France.

The following letters are forceful evidence of his record of service during the time he held that post, from June to August, 1944.

Dr. Pierre Bertrand, professor at the Faculty of Medicine, hospital surgeon and mayor of the city of Lyons in 1944, during Herriot's internment, certified as follows on the 22nd of August, 1944:

I met Major Jacques de Bernonville during his stay in Lyons from June, 1944, to the end of August, 1944. He was commanding officer of uniformed troops detailed to maintain order, that is the Mobile Guard, the police and the mobile reserve groups. He was never in charge of militia.

Major de Bernonville's reputation as a fearless and blameless officer preceded him in Lyons. It is with courage and unselfishness that he served, not political ends but his country. During those three months, he performed a difficult task and never issued an order that could have resulted in an attack upon the life of a compatriot or ally or upon the private property of anyone.

Major de Bernonville is entitled to my esteem and to my respect.

(Signed) Pierre Bertrand,
Former Mayor of the City of Lyons

(1944)

The following declaration was made at Cap d'Ail on August 27, 1949:

I, the undersigned, Abbé Victor Bouillon, do, on my honour, declare that Major Jacques de Bernonville, to my knowledge, has always behaved as a leader, a good Christian and a gentleman. Far from attacking French citizens or allied soldiers or from interfering with property, he has, during the troubled times from 1940 to 1944, by his courageous attitude towards the Germans and, with the help of the troops which he commanded, ensured the supply of food, protected the people and maintained order, and thus facilitated the task of the allies who, in their advance, found a maximum of order.

I certify that I have myself seen Major de Bernonville at work in 1940, at Cap d'Ail, where he was my faithful and unanimously respected parishioner, and in 1944, at Lyons, where he commanded the troops of the Ministry of Public Order and where I had the honour of being his guest on two occasions. The first time was the 31st of July, on the occasion of a sermon which he had asked me to give during a mass organized by him, with the consent of His Eminence Cardinal Gerlier, for all the forces detailed to maintain order and which took place the next day, July 22, in St. Bonaventure church. The second time was three weeks later, on the 14th of August, when, passing through Lyons I had supper and spent the night at his home.

On the 15th, he personally served my mass and together with several of his officers received Holy Communion. Everything I have known or heard about him at that time, the universal respect in which he was held—his officers and men worshipped him—even the atmosphere of his home, force me to state that I believe that he filled a difficult mission with a self-denial, a devotion to duty and a perfect honesty which would, in normal circumstances have brought him the gratitude of the nation instead of the persecution he now suffers.

In witness thereof, I freely certify the above and, in order to re-establish the truth, without any intention of interfering in a case which comes under the jurisdiction of the Canadian government, I declare, as a priest and as a Frenchman, that Canada would have everything to gain in allowing a man like Major de Bernonville, a great fighter, a true Christian and patriot, to settle among people who are known for their generosity and their chivalry.

Doctor in Theology,
Laureate of the French Academy,
Former parish priest at Cap d'Ail,
Missionary in the diocese of Nice.

Here is a further declaration, by an officer of the Legion of Honour:

I, the undersigned, Colonel Groussard, certify that I met Mr. Jacques de Bernonville during the year 1940. Monsieur de Bernonville struck me as being an absolutely straightforward and honest person, incapable of meanness, and I am sure that he never, in any way, went counter to his principles as a good Christian.

Still another:

I, the undersigned, Quivaux André, police major, 17 Saint Michel Blvd., Paris (13th), having been in command of the police company of the Department of Isère from January 15 to July 14, 1944, declare upon my honour that I was notified in June, 1944, by my superior military officers that Major de Bernonville had just been appointed to command the forces charged with the maintenance of order in the military district of Lyons under whose jurisdiction came the police in my department.

Having had business to do in the offices of Major de Bernonville in Lyons early in July, 1944, I met there many officers of the guard who were his assistants.

In 1944, as the French police were directly responsible to the president of the council and as the guard was responsible to the department of war, it is obvious that, to have been given authority over these two formations of our most ancient military tradition, Major de Bernonville could not have been appointed to those important duties except by the highest authorities of the French government sitting at Vichy.

During this short period, I had only one official contact with Major de Bernonville and it was for the purpose of asking him to intervene with respect to the unwarranted arrest of two of my mountain brigades (brigade of Pont-en-Royans, brigade of Villars-de-Lans) by formations of both the militia and the guard. He extended to me the most cordial and understanding welcome, as I had guaranteed the loyalty of my subordinates to their military duty, and he immediately ordered in my presence that those brigades be set free.

Dated at Paris, June 20, 1949.

And now, testimony by two Dominican fathers:

Abbaye Saint Pierre de Solesmes,
Par Sablé sur Sarthe-Sarthe

We the undersigned, Dom Renaud de Bentzmann, Dom Paul Barazer de Annurien, Benedictine monks and priests of the Abbey of S. Pierre de Solesmes (Sarthe), France, declare that we have known for some time Mr. Jacques Duge de Bernonville, former French officer, officer of the Legion of Honour, volunteer at the age of 17 and disabled during the war of 1914-1918, and certify to his fully honest character, sincere patriotic principles and very serious practice of the Catholic religion.

Dated at the Abbey of St.-Pierre de Solesmes, this 25th of October, 1948.

And, last but not least, the testimony of a man who was awarded the "Résistance" Medal, and whose citation I shall read in a moment:

1, rue Charles Dickens, Paris, XVI[e]

Paris, October 24, 1948

I, the undersigned, Gérard Landry de Lagatinerie, upon my honour, certify that:

Major Jacques de Bernonville is not only a war hero of 1914-1918, and 1939, but also a Frenchman worthy of everyone's admiration.

The undersigned, who holds the Médaille de la Résistance, the Croix de Guerre, 1939, and the attached citation, expresses the hope, along with the surviving members of his volunteer corps, that France may in the future count few men as marvellous as M. Jacques de Bernonville.

Mr. Speaker, before such eloquent testimony, we must necessarily come to the conclusion that Jacques de Bernonville's only "crime" was his loyalty to the legitimate and legal government of France, which the Canadian government had recognized and to whom Canada had sent its official representative. De Bernonville had no alternative but to obey; otherwise his country, France, would have fallen prey to anarchy, for the benefit of subversive elements.

He has at all times acted neither as a policeman nor as a self-seeking politician, but as an officer of the French army, that is to say, honourably and conscientiously.

It is true that here in Canada he has been defended by political opponents of the present government; but this must not be held against him.

When this campaign was initiated, Jacques de Bernonville was confined, with all the members of his family, to immigration detention quarters. Isolated from the rest of the world and unaware of what was taking place, he cannot be held responsible for this unfortunate controversy.

On the other hand, there has been a rumour circulating among the public to the effect that in the event he returned to France, there would be another trial, this time a "fair" trial. If the new trial is to be fair, then the former trial, on which the accusations levelled against him are based, was not fair. Yet it is upon this illegal trial that immigration department counsel based their latest order.

As a matter of fact, by what court was Jacques de Bernonville convicted in France? By a so-called court of justice, i.e. a special tribunal, essentially political and made up of jurors chosen from a panel of political foes.

This promised new trial will be heard not by a regular court, but again by a court of justice, that is to say, a politically biased special tribunal, whose membership will be exactly the same.

We know that the communists were in power in France at the time of the liberation, while true members of the Resistance were fighting with the troops. French tribunals dealing with cases of collaboration or "courts of justice" were made up of jurors chosen from the lists of members of the Resistance and therefore, mostly communists. It is such a tribunal that convicted de Bernonville at Toulouse, well-known communist centre and a city where he never set foot.

Those tribunals or courts of justice have since been abolished, except in cases of conviction in absentia, such as the de Bernonville case, where the person found guilty is re-apprehended.

De Bernonville, if sent back to France, would thus be judged by communists.

Mr. Speaker, as regards the nature of these purgation courts, I wish furthermore to refer to an article which just appeared in the January 13th, 1950 issue of France Catholique from which I quote the following paragraph:

> We all know nowadays that there is no justice but instead a reign of terror organized by one party.

The article, signed by J. de Fabrègues, adds:

> This travesty of justice has dealt harshly "with anything that might have stopped the communist party's tactics aimed at national disintegration".

I also wish to bring to the attention of hon. members of the house an article which appeared on January 7th last in the London, England, publication The Tablet. Signed by Frank MacMillan, it bears the title "After the French Purges". From it, I quote the following paragraph:

> Moreover, as many of the leading members of the (French) government which had authorized the trial of Marshal Petain had themselves voted him into power in the most strictly constitutional manner in 1940, the shuffling-off of responsibility was too blatant. If eminent statesmen like M. Lebrun, the former president of the republic, M. Vincent Auriol, M. Blum, M. Reynaud, M. Deladier, M. Herriot, and others, had voted Marshal Petain into power in 1940 and recognized the authority of his administration for four years, and had recommended it to the country, how could ordinary citizens be later tried for obeying the legal orders of the government?

In fact, eminent French jurists have fully shown that these so-called courts of "justice" were illegal and, consequently, that the sentences imposed by them were null and void.

Further, Jacques de Bernonville had never taken up residence and never filled any public office in Toulouse where he has, in any case, never set foot. It is nevertheless by a court sitting in Toulouse that he was judged and condemned in absentia.

These facts supply us, therefore, with formal evidence that Count Jacques de Bernonville is a political refugee. It is in this capacity of political refugee that he asks the favour of being definitely admitted to Canada and of living here in peace among people whose ideals and traditions are exactly like his own.

This favour has already been granted in many cases, both to political refugees and to foreigners who arrived in Canada without a visa. I now ask the same favour of the government of my country on behalf of a Frenchman, Count Jacques de Bernonville.

It has been alleged by some newspapers and even by high officials that de Bernonville is responsible for the death of Allied soldiers and "probably" of Canadian servicemen, this being an attempt to stir up against him a feeling of horror on the part of the relatives of the supposed victims and of disgust on the part of Canadian veterans.

This charge is outrageous. No one has yet ever published the names, places, dates and circumstances of these alleged crimes. Nor will anyone ever be able to do so since the accusation is sheer slander.

These vile charges began by the information laid against Count Jacques de Bernonville by a non-Christian individual and by the libellous innuendoes indulged in by a temporary ambassador, a former vice-president of the council of ministers in France, who was in office at the same time as another vice-president called Maurice Thorez.

On the other hand, in obeying Marshal Pétain who will be recognized by history—and I am proud to say so—as one of the greatest and noblest figures of France, Count Jacques de Bernonville helped the allied cause and saved not only many French lives but most certainly Canadian lives as well.

During the last war, Jacques de Bernonville had the opportunity of helping several Canadian army officers to escape from concentration camps where they were being held. That has been declared publicly and under oath before law courts by Captain Antoine Masson of Montreal. In addition, he asserted under oath that de Bernonville had never molested Canadian airmen, or had them imprisoned or shot, as has been alleged. In Canada, from a legal standpoint such evidence should be taken at its face value, as it refutes all charges to the contrary levelled against him by unknown persons.

I wish to quote the telegram sent to me on February 23, by this most brilliant Canadian officer, Captain Antoine Masson, Military Cross, who recently testified before the court of inquiry. He then declared under oath that orders given by Commandant Jacques de Bernonville enabled him to escape, thus saving his life.

Here is the telegram:

> February 23, 1950 11 PM 48
>
> Bona Arsenault MP
> Parliament Bldgs Ottawa
> Pursuant your request for further information re Comte Jacques Duge de Bernonville to be deported by authorities I wish to inform you that I have declared under oath that said French officer was personally responsible for my escape from Camp de Chambaran in Isere day preceding entire occupation of France by German forces November eight 1942 which enabled me to supply allies with most important and then necessary information stop all this can be found in my detailed report to London war office in February 1943 and can be confirmed by examination of said records.

Captain Antoine Masson MC

I am happy to greet Captain Masson, who is now listening to me from the gallery.

Finally, there is the decision brought down by Mr. Justice Cousineau, of the superior court, who, after a most careful examination of Count Jacques de Bernonville's record, warmly recommended to the Canadian government that he be admitted to Canada.

In his judgment brought down on February 21, 1949, which quashed the first deportation order, Mr. Justice Cousineau declared that absolutely nothing could be held against de Bernonville.

Here are a few excerpts from page 31:

We can state without hesitation that had the minister and the government had the opportunity to re-examine the record and taken full cognizance of the facts brought before this court they would have granted the right of sanctuary to the applicants. De Bernonville is worthy of every consideration. He has a noble line of ancestors; his military record is most glorious; at the age of 20 he was decorated with the Legion of Honour for his deeds of bravery; at the age of 23 he was promoted to the rank of Captain and made an officer of the Legion of Honour.

And further on:

It is evident that de Bernonville was a political refugee when he entered Canada.

The following is taken from page 32:

The deputy minister, Dr. Keenleyside, showed affidavits certifying that during the past two years the minister of mines had authorized the entry of 64 persons without any formal procedure; they could not be subjected to the requirements of the Immigration Act. Undoubtedly some of them had no passport or could not be subjected to the formalities of the investigation committee.

And again further:

The applicant should be granted in Canada the same right of sanctuary recognized by all countries in such cases. It would surely have been granted him in Great Britain where political refugees have found shelter for centuries . . .

The right of sanctuary has for centuries been considered as sacred by all civilized and Christian countries, and Anglo-Saxons have always made it a point of honour, as a nation, to retain the foremost place among the nations of the world when it came to giving sanctuary to political refugees . . .

Here are a few excerpts from the preamble:

. . . Whereas the evidence shows that the applicant, de Bernonville, has fulfilled his duty as a soldier and as a citizen and that he left his country only to avoid political persecution;

Whereas the applicant, de Bernonville, is a political refugee seeking haven in Canada;

Whereas the right of sanctuary is recognized in this country, it has on many occasions been exercised by public authorities, especially in recent times, and it would be contrary to public order and detrimental to the harmony which exists between the various groups of the population to extend such right in an arbitrary and discriminatory manner . . .

The court strongly urges the proper authorities of Canada to grant the applicants a permit of entry and residence, decides and orders that the plaintiff has not shown any valid evidence which would warrant the arrest and detention of the applicants or the deportation order issued against them and declares that, on the contrary, such arrest, detention and deportation order are irregular, illegal, null and void.

I wish to point out to the house that, on August 26, 1948 (A.F.F. of 27), the British under-secretary of state declared at Westminster:

The British government has decided to put an end to the extradition of war criminals requested by various countries.

Count Jacques de Bernonville is not a war criminal. All the more reason, it seems to me, why the Canadian government should deal with condemned political refugees who have taken sanctuary in this country, and more particularly with Count de Bernonville, in the same manner that Great Britain deals with war criminals.

A Canadian Press dispatch mentioned recently that if, during the uprisings of 1837, William Lyon Mackenzie had not found refuge in the United States, there would have been no Mackenzie King, of whom he was a forefather. And if Louis-Joseph Papineau had not found sanctuary in France during the same period, we would have been deprived of Henri Bourassa.

In the past and especially in the last ten or fifteen years, has not our country granted right of sanctuary to political figures against whom weighty charges had been laid? Have we not given shelter to the former president of Cuba, Mr. Gerardo Machado and to Mr. Escobar as well? At present, a former president of a West Indian republic who was deposed after a recent uprising has found refuge here. In fact, does he not live near Ottawa where he enjoys the right of sanctuary which the Canadian government has granted and continues to grant him?

It is a well-established international custom to grant sanctuary to people unjustly accused in their own country. If in taking a decision in cases of this kind, the Canadian government should ever err, I hope it would be on the side of mercy, as was so well expressed by the Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner: (Text):

If we made any mistakes, I hope we made them on the side of mercy.

(Translation):

Finally, I shall quote a few excerpts from an article recently published by Rev. Father Joseph Ledit, S.J., on the right of asylum in l'Actualité des Tracts, No. 53:

Everywhere, but especially in Rome, the convents opened their doors to the pursued (during the last war) without investigating their political beliefs or their past record.

Thus, many socialists owe their lives to the fact that clerics and nuns risked death for their sake.

Since then, clerics have been subject to annoyance for sheltering refugees of opposite political beliefs.

The beggar, in dire need, who asks for charity has no strict legal right to alms; yet he has a right to live, a right which has its source in natural law and is confirmed by Christ.

In refusing to recognize that right of the poor who beg alms from me I render myself guilty of an offence against the supreme commandment of charity.

Technically, a jurist who acts strictly according to written laws could have the poor arrested if a municipal by-law prohibits begging. Such justice would become an iniquity.

That is the irresistible force felt by Christian people, who are often nearer to God, eternal justice and divine charity than their leaders.

One last word. Let us hope that the Canadian government will follow the example set by the good Samaritan and will not miss this exceptional opportunity of granting a positive right of sanctuary to a Frenchman who is worthy of the name and is entitled to the gratefulness of the Canadian people.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne is of great value in one particular respect. Coming at the beginning of the session, it enables hon. members to explain the thoughts and hopes of the people they represent much better than can be done as the session runs on. While the period between the last session of this house and the present session was very short, we did have an opportunity to meet our constituents. That was so even in Vancouver, in spite of the deep snow about which I have heard so much from eastern members since my return. By way of standing up for my own city may I remind Your Honour and hon. members that today the people of Vancouver will be looking at their snowdrops and crocuses while back here it is fifteen below zero, with a north wind. So the west coast is still the banana belt of Canada.

During that intervening period there have been many far-reaching developments. For example, we have had the disclosure, with all it implies to the future of mankind, that hydrogen bombs can be made. We have seen the continuation of the spread of communism in Asia. Many disturbing things have happened, and I believe our people are deeply worried over the situation throughout the world. There has been a great deal of disillusionment in the minds of all thinking people; and that is easily understood. This is a time of great uncertainty for thinking Canadians; and that being so a strong lead from parliament would be most helpful.
