Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): 1, 2 and 3. "Direction Ontario" was organized by the Canadian Conference of the Arts (CCA), which is a non-profit organization serving working members of the artistic and cultural community in a variety of ways. The CCA received a sustaining grant of $150,000 from the Arts and Culture Branch of the Department of the Secretary of State in 1972-73 to aid it in carrying out its program, including "Direction Ontario"; but the CCA was free to prepare its budget so as to meet its objectives in the most efficient and effective way possible and also to supplement the federal grant with funds from other sources. Further information can be obtained directly from Mr. John Hobday, National Director, Canadian Conference of the Arts, 49 Wellington Street East, Toronto, Ontario, M5E 1C9.

VISUAL EDUCATION CENTRE

Question No. 651—Mr. Schumacher:

1. Is the Visual Education Centre (a) a private corporation (b) a public corporation?

2. Who are its senior management personnel?

3. To whom is the Centre responsible for its operation?

4. Has the Visual Education Centre been given exclusive post-broadcast distribution rights in Canada of any and/or all CBC program material including educational television rights and, if so, for what reason?

5. Are taxpayers funds used in any way to finance the operation of the Visual Education Centre and, if so, in what amounts?

6. Does the Visual Education Centre charge for programs distributed to education bodies or authorities and, if so, in what amounts?

7. Are individual schools or educational bodies allowed to videotape and rebroadcast educational programs within their own school systems and, if not (a) for what reason (b) what is the penalty for so doing?

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): 1. The Visual Education Centre is a private company.

2, 3 and 6. Enquiries concerning the Visual Education Centre should be addressed directly to the Visual Education Centre, 115 Berkeley Street, Toronto.

5. No.

In so far as the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is concerned, I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows:

4. The Visual Education Centre has exclusive non theatrical distribution rights in Canada for those CBC owned programs that CBC is able to clear and wishes to put into distribution. The contract does not cover those programs in which another party has an interest, and therefore national and local school broadcasts are not covered. VEC has the right to licence telecasts of those CBC programs released to it on the educational television in Edmonton and Toronto. No theatrical distribution has been undertaken under the contract. CBC has selected a private company to carry out its distribution because the audio-visual market is highly specialized and outside its sphere of major activity. The use of a successful private company ensures the most effective educational distribution.

7. In so far as CBC is concerned, individual schools or educational authorities cannot be authorized to videotape and re-use CBC programs within their own schools or school areas. There are several reasons for this, but they are usually based on ownership of copyright and on collective agreements with performers and writers. In the great majority of cases CBC has only acquired broadcast rights and the non-broadcast rights are either not available or are already under contract to other organizations. Those infringing rights held by others are liable to the penalties provided by law should action be taken by the holders of the rights.

Clark of Cobourg was retained to handle four actions where arrears on loans had developed. These actions were settled prior to trial and the costs were paid by the borrowers, the Corporation therefore not having a record of the amount paid to this lawyer.

POST OFFICE—POLICY OF SELLING PRE-STAMPED COLOURED SCENIC POSTCARDS

Question No. 682—Mr. Dinsdale:

1. Has the Post Office Department commenced a policy of selling prestamped coloured scenic postcards and, if so (a) on what date was this policy begun (b) for what reason?

2. Has the government received any protests over this invasion of private business?

3. (a) What has the program cost to date (b) what have been the revenues to date?

Hon. André Ouellet (Postmaster General): 1. Yes. (a) Prestamped picture postcards were introduced for sale in most regular post office locations beginning July 24, 1972. (b) Prestamped scenic postcards are offered as a convenience to post office customers and as an extension of the sale of prestamped stationery which the Canada Post Office has been engaged in for more than 100 years. A series of prestamped monochrome scenic postcards was offered for sale in 1930. Prestamped stationery displaces separate transactions for postage stamps and eliminates the need by the customer to handle, moisten and affix postage stamps.

2. Yes, but we do not believe the sale of special prestamped postcards through post office outlets represents an invasion of the commercial market for postcards. The scenes illustrated on the prestamped postcards were selected in cooperation with Provincial officials who were enthusiastic about the opportunity to promote areas of their provinces not normally featured on commercial postcards. Commercial cards tend to depict popular tourist areas or specific points of interest, whereas the scenes on the prestamped postcards are representative of the provinces generally. The cards are sold through postal outlets only, and in packages containing five cards. Most post offices therefore are carrying only one package of five cards for sale; that is to say, the five cards relating to the province in which the post office is located. The selling price is $1 per package. Excluding the stamp value, the price of an individual card would be 12c/, which is two cents higher than the prevailing price for commercially retailed postcards. The prestamped postcards are of special interest to the stamp collecting community and a representative group of stamp collectors has endorsed the philatelic aspects of the sale of these cards. Since there is a significant number of collectors of Canadian stamps and postal stationery located outside Canada, the prestamped cards help to advertise the beauty of Canada to collectors in other countries. The primary objective of the sale of the prestamped scenic postcards is customer convenience and reduced stamp sales transactions and with this in mind the Canada Post Office is prepared to discuss the possibility of private postcard manufacturers producing prestamped picture postcards for distribution and sale through commercial retail channels.

3. (a) $228,643. (b) $258,624. A major part of the costs stated in (a) was made up of initial manufacturing and advertising costs which will not be repeated to the same extent. Revenue shown in (b) is revenue as at September 30, 1972. Since revenue is continuing to be derived, the spread between cost and revenue is greater than that indicated.

(c) Premier Maurice Duplessis attended all of the above conferences during the period from August 1945 to November1957. From July, 1960 to November, 1963 the First Ministers' conferences referred to were attended by Premier Jean Lesage. Premier Daniel Johnson represented Quebec at the October, 1966 conference. Premier Robert Bourassa represented Quebec at the November, 1971 conference.

RESTRICTIONS ON IMPORTATION INTO CANADA OF SKINS OF ENDANGERED WILDLIFE

Question No. 824—Mr. Arrol:

Will the government give consideration to imposing restrictions similar to those existing in Great Britain, the United States and Australia forbidding the importation of such exotic furs as tiger and snow leopard skins in the interests of the preservation of endangered wildlife?

Mr. William Rompkey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): There is at present a plenipotentiary conference in session in Washington, at which all states that are members of the United Nations are represented. The purpose of the conference is to prepare and adopt a convention on the export, import and transit of certain animals and plants.

SHARE OF REVENUE FROM PERSONAL INCOME TAX TO MUNICIPALITIES

Question No. 831—Mr. Stackhouse:

Is it the intention of the government to give city councils a share of the revenue from personal income tax?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Under the British North America Act, each provincial government has exclusive jurisdiction over the municipal institutions in its province. It is the responsibility of the provincial government to determine the allocation of responsibilities between itself and its municipalities, and to decide how much taxing authority should be delegated to the municipal institutions. Thus the federal government cannot give city councils a share of the revenue from personal income taxes. Through a variety of measures over the past 20 years, the federal government has reduced its share of the total personal income tax and provinces have increased their share. Increased provincial revenues from personal income taxes, as well as other taxes and revenues, have been accompanied by increased provincial transfers to their municipalities.

COMMUTATION OF DEATH SENTENCES

Question No. 847—Mr. Fortin:

1. For each year 1966 to 1972, how many individuals were sentenced to be hanged in Canada?

2. In how many cases, each year, were these sentences commuted to life imprisonment?

3. Among individuals sentenced to life imprisonment during these years (a) how many were paroled (b) on what dates were they paroled (c) how many years had they spent in prison (d) how many became repeat offenders?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): 1 and 2. During the past seven calendar years, the number of individuals sentenced to be hanged in Canada and the number of commutations to life imprisonment were as follows:

	Disposition of capital cases		Capital cases considered by Governor in Council
Year	Sentenced to death	Commuted*	Cases	Commuted
1966	10	10	4	4
1968	1	1	18	18

*These figures are given according to the year of trial, not by the date of commutation.

[Mr. Rompkey.]

3. (a) Three, whose nature of offence, sentence and age on the date of conviction were as follows: Case 1: Age 77, non-capital murder, life imprisonment; Case 2: Age 59, non-capital murder, life imprisonment; Case 3: Age 18, capital murder, death commuted to life imprisonment. (b) Case 1: Paroled on 22 August 1969, by exception, at the age of 80; Case 2: Paroled on 30 March 1970, by exception, at the age of 61; Case 3: Paroled on 21 April 1970, by exception, at the age of 22. (c) Case 1: Two years nine months and four days; Case 2: three years and twenty days; Case 3: four years one month and twenty-five days. (d) Case 1: No repeat offence, died on parole in 1970; Case 2: No repeat offence, died on parole in 1972; Case 3: No repeat offence to date, still on parole.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS—PRODUCTION COST OF REPORT FOR FISCAL YEAR ENDED MARCH 31, 1971

Question No. 935—Mr. Andre:

1. What was the cost of production, printing and distribution of the Report for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1971, for the Department of Public Works?

2. How many copies of the report were distributed?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): 1. $1,218.

2. 2,500.

CANADA LABOUR RELATIONS BOARD

Question No. 981—Mr. Reynolds:

Has a Western Canadian been appointed to the new Canada Labour Relations Board and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): No. A Western Canadian was approached to accept appointment but declined for personal reasons. As vacancies occur on the Board, Western Canadians will be considered for appointment, along with Canadians from all other regions.

WHEAT BOARD—DEMURRAGE

Question No. 1169—Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. In addition to the amount paid for demurrage by the Wheat Board as set out in the reply to Question No. 55, how much was paid by (a) ship owners (b) consignees and purchasers of wheat from the Wheat Board in 1972 for demurrage on ships which were held up in Vancouver or other Pacific Ports because of a lack of wheat cargoes?

2. Were the several amounts so paid by wheat purchasers or consignees claimed as a credit or deducted by them when making settlement to the Wheat Board or its representatives for the wheat shipment severally purchased by them?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): 1. Following verification, the Wheat Board pays demurrage claims submitted to it by buyers but has no way of knowing what additional demurrage charges if any may have been paid by ship owners, consignees and purchasers of wheat from the Wheat Board.

2. If any such additional demurrage charges are paid they do not in any way involve settlement with the Board which is only concerned with those demurrage claims which are submitted directly to it.

FINANCE

BUDGET FORECAST OF STATE OF ACCOUNTS—SUGGESTED AMENDMENT IN LIGHT OF PRESENT SURPLUS—PROPOSED TEMPORARY TAX HOLIDAY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, now that the figures show a budgetary surplus of about $1,100 million for the first ten months of the year, some $800 million more than for the first ten months in the previous fiscal year, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether he is now prepared to amend his forecast at the time of his budgetary speech that the accounts would in fact break even on a budgetary basis this year and agree that he is going to have a substantial budgetary surplus?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): No, Sir, not at this stage. The enlargement of the surplus in January was not unexpected. Indeed, it corresponded very closely with the forecast we put forward and it is quite in line with what I understand to be normal seasonal trends. The hon. gentleman knows that the large drawdown of expenses is done within the last months or few weeks of the fiscal year. In this case the revenues this year are particularly buoyant, I suppose due to the vibrancy of the Canadian economy.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: Keep a straight face; don't laugh.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): It is also partially due to a rise in prices and to some uncertainty among Canadian businesses, large and small, concerning the status of the corporate tax measures already proposed to parliament.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to understand how the minister could be pleasantly surprised by buoyancy in the economy when the gross national product is growing substantially less than he anticipated. In view of the great buoyancy in revenues which he welcomes as running away ahead, some 27 per cent, of January, 1972, I should like to ask the minister whether in these circumstances and under these conditions he will give favourable consideration to the request of the Canadian Labour Congress that there should be a temporary tax holiday for personal income taxpayers earning under $10,000 a year?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I made my response to the CLC this morning.

Mr. Stanfield: I do not want to be insistent, but since the minister has been gracious enough to speak to the CLC outside the House, perhaps he might give a brief response inside the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I suppose the Leader of the Opposition is technically right, although the meeting was held in the railway committee room of the House. What I said this morning was that if the proposals of the Canadian Labour Congress were added to the proposals already before the House in the form of budget measures this would add another $2,300 million to the deficit, and I thought that was inappropriate in the current state of the economy.

BUDGETARY DEFINITION OF FULL EMPLOYMENT—
POSSIBLE INDEXING OF FEDERAL MINIMUM WAGE LAW

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, in view of the concern expressed by the Canadian Labour Congress in its brief this morning over the inability of the minister's budget to achieve anything near full employment, I should like to ask the minister to tell the House, in the interest of the community interests that exists between his government and the NDP, whether he is able now to indicate just exactly what his budgetary definition of full employment is?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): As I have said on several occasions to the House, Mr. Speaker, so far as I am concerned full employment is a state in which every man and woman of this country who is actively and legitimately seeking work can find a job. That is full employment in my view.

Mr. McGrath: On a different tack, Mr. Speaker, in the interest of those who are fortunate enough to have jobs in Canada may I ask whether the minister is now prepared to undertake to provide means whereby the federal minimum wage law will be indexed in a similar way to income tax in the budget so as to protect those who are working under these laws from erosion created by inflation which this government does not seem to be able to control?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, that is a representation that the government will consider, but it is probably more appropriately directed to my colleague, the Minister of Labour.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, may I redirect my question to the Minister of Labour and ask him whether he intends to provide means, through amendments to the federal minimum wage law, whereby the minimum wage will be indexed or tied to the cost of living, in a similar way to the income tax provisions in the budget of the Minister of Finance?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated this morning when I talked to the CLC, the department is giving study now to this whole matter. We are compiling data and comparisons of minimum wage rates across the country, and I will hopefully be in a position to make some recommendation to my colleagues shortly.

Mr. Speaker: I recognize the hon. member for York South on a supplementary.

Mr. Lewis: No, Mr. Speaker, my question is on another subject.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate there are a number of supplementaries members wish to ask to the question asked by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition. Perhaps before recognizing the hon. member we might hear the question of the hon. member for Central Nova and then return to this matter later.

[Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton).]

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

POSSIBLE ADOPTION OF STRATEGIES PROPOSED BY ATLANTIC DEVELOPMENT COUNCIL

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a short question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Can the minister tell the House whether he plans to adopt any of the strategies put forward by the Atlantic Development Council or to develop similar strategies for other regions of the country as suggested by the Canadian Labour Congress in its annual brief to the government? If so, when will he be making an announcement to this effect?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I will do my best to answer what appears to be a somewhat oblique supplementary question. I am examining all aspects of the Canadian Labour Congress presentation and have met with the president of the Atlantic Development Council. As I told my hon. friend a few weeks ago, I hope to be able to be more specific when the estimates of my department are under consideration.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that we are getting away slightly from the original question. The hon. member's supplementary was perhaps more related than supplementary, but I will return to him and other members in a moment.

The hon. member for York South.

Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. MacKay: Yes, Mr. Speaker. It may well be that my question was slightly oblique, as the minister suggested, but since he is a master of obliqueness I thought it was appropriate.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON METHOD OF INVESTIGATING ABUSES AND CRITERIA APPLIED

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, may I direct one or two questions to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration relating to the activities of the Unemployment Insurance Commission and its method of trying to get rid of those who are abusing the unemployment insurance program. In view of the fact there is a great deal of disturbance about the way things are being done in various areas where this investigation is now being conducted, may I ask the minister whether he will undertake not later than tomorrow or the day after to make a statement to the House indicating precisely how this investigation is being carried on?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly entertain the hon. member's suggestion. In the interim I should like to say, however, that I have been checking into this matter fairly thoroughly with officials of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. I think they have a difficult job to do at times in terms of ensuring the validity of claimants in their receipt of unemployment insurance benefits. I have not had the direct evidence that has been suggested by several members that their activities represent abuse on their part, and I have full confidence in the commission. Nevertheless, by virtue of the fact that so many people are expressing concern, and in the interests of the individuals who would be affected if in fact there has been any abuse, I have decided to ask the Unemployment Insurance Advisory Committee to convene as quickly as possible and to take this under examination. Although I am quite sure there is a fair implementation of the program, it also must be seen to be fair, and I want this neutral committee to examine the whole situation and advise us all exactly where it stands.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I heard the minister say that this morning. I am sure everyone is pleased that the advisory committee is being called in. However, in view of the fact that the investigation of claimants apparently is being made on the basis of certain computer printouts, and in view of the result that a good many innocent claimants are being harassed by questions from people representing the Unemployment Insurance Commission, would the minister undertake to discuss immediately with the commission that it not go scatter-gunning as it is now in looking for people who abuse the system and thereby harass a good many innocent claimants?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, the whole premise of the activities of the unemployment insurance benefit control operation in this area under discussion is a pre-selection in certain areas of claimants whose occupations fit job vacancies that have also been identified through manpower in those areas. Those claimants are then asked to indicate whether they are genuinely and actively seeking jobs and if they indicate that they are not actively seeking jobs that have been proven to exist they are then disqualified. This is the requirement under the act. I think the question is whether or not any of the benefit control officers or any of the activities of the Unemployment Insurance Commission represent over-zealousness. I am inclined to think not, but I want to check into that.

Mr. Lewis: In view of the fact that one can easily see with any application of logic that you could have a dozen of certain jobs available in an area and 30 people who might fill those jobs, and in view of the fact that asking people whether they are actively looking for work is a pretty general question—whether they were actively looking last week, two weeks ago or yesterday—and all of this places innocent claimants at a disadvantage, may I ask the minister to tell the House precisely what criteria are being applied for the disqualification of claimants?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to make a statement on motions on that matter at the earliest opportunity.

REQUEST FOR REFERENCE TO ADVISORY COMMITTEE OF EFFECT OF SECTION 145(9) OF ACT ON RURAL CLAIMANTS

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, when the minister is making this request to the advisory committee will he also refer to it section 145(9) affecting particularly predominantly rural areas and the effect this has had on legitimate claimants?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we do not want any legitimate claimants disqualified or disentitled, and I certainly would not restrict the terms of reference to the advisory committee to exclude that consideration.

[Translation]

STUDY OF PROBLEMS ARISING FROM BENEFIT APPLICATIONS FOR HEALTH REASONS

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question of the minister.

While he is asking the advisory committee to study the problems mentioned by the leader of the New Democratic Party, would he also request the committee to look into the problems arising out of applications for unemployment sick benefits, especially in rural regions where there is a severe shortage of doctors?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I can arrange for that.

RECIPIENT DISQUALIFICATION—IMPROVEMENT OF APPEAL PROCEDURE AND DEFINITION OF CERTAIN PHRASES—CRITERIA FOR SELECTION OF CITIES FOR INVESTIGATION OF ABUSES

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, in view of the new investigative procedures that have been implemented by the minister, resulting in some 20,000 persons, I understand, being disqualified or threatened with disqualification, this certainly will place some strain on the boards of referees and umpires. Has the minister at the same time improved the procedure in order to speed up appeals to these bodies, and in fact has he arrived at a definition of the phrases that have been accepted such as "capable of work", "available for work", and "suitability of employment"? Have these definitions been determined and given to the officers involved?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, for some years the Unemployment Insurance Commission has had to exercise judgment in all these matters as well as those other phrases included in the proposed amendments in Bill C-125, that is to say, the question of quitting without cause and the question of misconduct. There is no change in that. I readily admit that the penalties are probably stepped up a bit, but the basic fundamental definition is in existence now and is based on case histories of decisions from boards of referees and umpires over many years.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I note that the minister, perhaps unintentionally, did not answer the first part of my question concerning whether the appeal procedure would be strengthened and made more effective. What criteria did he use when he picked out the city of Hamilton, metropolitan Toronto and the city of Kingston for these investigative blitzes? Has he any criteria to explain why he picked out these three cities throughout the country rather than many more cities that could have been involved in this type of action?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I think I described the criteria for selection. There were known to be jobs in the categories that had been publicized and there were known to be many claimants who were skilled or who had had experience in those jobs. On the one hand, we had people who were capable of performing in those occupations and, on the other hand, we had jobs that were not being filled. We tried to match them first through manpower in co-operation with the Unemployment Insurance Commission. When they did not match or when there was an indication that the claimants did not want to take the jobs we suggested to them that perhaps they were not fulfilling their obligations under the terms of the act and they were thus disqualified. That is how these claimants were selected.

With regard to the appeal system I am informed, and I quite readily admit, that in spite of the startling volume of disqualifications as a result of that exercise in the Toronto-Hamilton area, which began about January 1, there has not been an increase in the number of appeals in relation to the number of claimants at the present time, although I also readily admit that we want to beef up the appeal system, and many more boards of referees are in the process of being appointed right now.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Hamilton West on a supplementary. Then we will try to complete the first round of questioning by allowing one of the hon. members to my extreme right to ask a question. I will then recognize the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands.

Mr. Alexander: I have one last supplementary. Would the minister stop pussyfooting around and bring forward Bill C-125 in order that the House can deal with this whole matter, whereby we can hear briefs from labour, management and others affected, rather than going about this matter in a piecemeal way?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Richmond.

Mr. Andras: I think we have been around this race course before—

Mr. Speaker: May we have order, please. The Chair has recognized the hon. member for Richmond.

[Mr. Andras.]

REQUIREMENT OF PROOF OF EFFORTS TO SECURE EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question.

Since unemployment insurance officers demand proof that the claimant has seen two or three employers and that the latter often refuse to furnish proofs of interviews, could the hon. minister tell the House whether the advisory committee will come up with something new in that respect.

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I must apologize. There were conversations going on, and I am really sorry I did not hear the hon. member's question in full.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: My question was the following, Mr. Speaker.

Since unemployment insurance officers demand two or three proofs that the claimant has seen two or three employers, would the hon. minister tell the House if the advisory committee he has called will come up with something new or give more freedom to the claimants on that matter?

[English]

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I think there is a misunderstanding. The claimant does not necessarily have to produce a document from an employer to the effect that he has sought a job and has been turned down. We are asking individual claimants to show that they are actively searching for work. Unless some other factor enters into it, we accept the word of claimants that they are doing that, particularly when they conform to the regulations and the principles of the act that this House endorsed a year and a half ago.

[Later:]

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the hon. Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

I do not think the hon. minister is aware of what is going on in some unemployment insurance offices because in Sherbrooke evidence is indeed demanded.

INVESTIGATION OF ABUSES—REPORT THAT MORE WOMEN THAN MEN AFFECTED

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration is predicated on the fact that this subject is of great interest to women throughout the country. In light of initial reports that these restrictive measures are affecting a larger number of women than men—

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and The Islands): —could the minister say what the criteria are that result in these measures being applied more vigorously and more particularly to women than to men?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, they are not being applied more vigorously to women than to men. It so happens that of the 20,000 reportedly disqualified in the Toronto-Hamilton area there were more women than men, but they were not pre-selected that way.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, in an effort to get this matter out of the House I would like to ask the minister this question. In light of the obvious problems the government is having in trying to deal with the legislation in question, would he discuss with the chairman of the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration the suggestion that the Unemployment Insurance Commission be called before that committee immediately, in connection with consideration of the estimates so that a thorough examination could be made and the government could have the benefit of some intelligent advice from hon. members on this side of the House?

Mr. Andras: I always welcome intelligent advice, Mr. Speaker. I often get it, but not always. I shall be glad once more to place the Unemployment Insurance Commission, its officials and myself at the disposal of the committee when our estimates are before that committee. I think we had four or five goes at this during the last four or five weeks when the miscellaneous estimates and Bill C-124 were being dealt with.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We still have not completed the supplementaries on the very first question raised this afternoon. I would like to return to them now, and I recognize the hon. member for Rocky Mountain.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ACTION TO ALLEVIATE UNEMPLOYMENT AMONG PERSONS UNDER AGE 24

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the male chauvinist Minister of Manpower and Immigration. What action has the government taken on the proposal made 19 months ago, in a report by the government's committee on youth, to establish a Canadian youth employment directorate as one means to focus action and attention on the youth unemployment crisis that was apparent even then, that was not changed one whit by the budget and was a highlight of the brief of the Canadian Labour Congress today? If no action has been taken, will the minister specify what steps the government has taken to meet the special, serious and recurring crisis of unemployment among Canadians under age 24?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the Secretary of State, a few weeks ago enunciated a policy for youth employment throughout the summer in which my department will be joining. The details were given to the House on that occasion. I can assure the hon. member that we will be just as interested in all the younger female participants in that youth program as we will be in the men, and I do not see where the male chauvinism comes in.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—METHOD OF DECIDING WHETHER CANADIAN ELEMENT IN SUPERVISORY COMMISSION TO BE WITHDRAWN

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I want to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, newly returned from the fields of Paris, where he went, saw but did not conquer.

An hon. Member: He should have taken you with him.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He would have been successful if he had.

Mr. Andras: What at?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Did I understand him correctly, as he read his statement, that the question of whether or not the supervisory force should be withdrawn from Viet Nam would be decided by the government and not submitted to the House of Commons? Why should the House of Commons be denied a privilege that has grown up in consequence of what happened not only during the second world war but following it? Why is this course not to be followed?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy that the right hon. gentleman has asked this question because it enables me to clear up a misunderstanding. It is my intention, as soon as the government makes a decision, to bring that decision before the House of Commons. What is being asked on the other side is that before I make the decision there should be a decision made by parliament. I really do not think it would be possible to negotiate with our friends and allies on such a basis, nor do I think it would be wise to deny the government the opportunity of withdrawing our men from Viet Nam if they were under attack rather than waiting for parliament to take action.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to have that answer. I now ask him, why is it, therefore, that the government of Canada has threatened to bring before the House a resolution to approve the mishandling of the Official Languages Act, an act passed as a result of a decision made by parliament? Why should there be this transparent and spurious trick on parliament?

Mr. Trudeau: To whom was the question addressed?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Ottawa East.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa East): Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL CAPITAL COMMISSION

DISCUSSION WITH PROVINCES RESPECTING RAPID TRANSIT SYSTEM

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

Can he tell us whether or not the federal government has started negotiations with regard to an urban transport policy for the national capital area and, if so, whether steps will be taken to meet the proposals with regard to setting up a medium-sized rapid transit system for the national capital?

[English]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there are discussions under way now with the public transit authorities on both sides of the river with regard to improved bus service, which I am anxious to conclude. There have also been discussions with the province of Ontario with regard to a rapid transit system. It is my view that any discussion of either heavy or intermediate rapid transit should include government agencies on both sides of the river and the National Capital Commission. I am seeking a meeting with the responsible ministers in the government of Ontario and the government of Quebec to have such discussions.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, supplementary to my earlier question—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for a supplementary, but we will have to try to get away from the very first question in order to cover more than three or four questions in the question period. The hon. member may ask his supplementary.

SOCIAL SECURITY

ASSISTANCE TO UNEMPLOYED YOUNG PERSONS—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCIAL AND MUNICIPAL AUTHORITIES

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Since the government appears to be undertaking no new programs, apart from Summer '73, to create jobs, I wonder if the minister has taken any account yet of the recommendation of the study entitled "A Right to Opportunity" funded in part by his department, urging a federal-provincial-municipal meeting to end the chaos in social assistance programs for unemployed young Canadians who are seeking social assistance? If the minister has taken no account of this, can he indicate to the House when such a conference will be called?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, it seems that the opposition has seen a lot of chaos over the weekend. This is about the fifth time the word has been used in the question period this afternoon. I think the answer to this question is very simply that we are embarked with the provinces on a general review of the social security system, including social assistance. We will have our first meeting in April, and I am already meeting with the ministers of the various provinces individually and with their officials. Obviously, the area mentioned by the hon. member is one that will be covered in the general review.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES AUTO PACT—REQUEST FOR CORRECT FIGURES ON 1972 CANADIAN DEFICIT OR SURPLUS POSITION—POSSIBLE POSITION PAPER

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the various statements regarding Canada's deficit and/or surplus position under the Canada-United States auto pact, namely, General Motors' statement of February 27, the minister's statement of February 28, Statistics Canada's releases and today's release by the United States Commerce Department, would the minister make a clearcut statement on the subject so we may know our position?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the position as I know it and understand it is the corrected position issued by Statistics Canada at the end of last week, which sets forth that during the calendar year 1972 Canada experienced a $6 million surplus rather than the first figure which came out.

Mr. Kempling: In light of the growing assertions by United States officials that the auto pact has worked against United States interests, for instance, the statement by Senator Hartke that it is a form of foreign aid for Canada and has cost Indiana 37,000 jobs, is the minister going to publish a position paper on the auto pact at least to point out that Canada has not even achieved production levels commensurate with our share of the North American automotive market?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, the position of the government is that the auto pact has worked well. We want and expect and intend to keep it that way. We are aware that there are certain interest groups in the United States that would like to alter the agreement. I should like to remind hon. members of the statement I made last week when I said we have made no changes in the safeguards, have taken no decision to alter the agreement in any way, and could only consider changes which in accordance with the agreed objectives of the pact would improve it and protect future Canadian jobs and job opportunities.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact the Conservative Party of Canada has now discovered the auto pact and has adopted the NDP program, would the minister assert on behalf of his party that they, too, now adopt the NDP program in regard to the automotive industry of Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

NATIONAL CAPITAL

PROPOSED OTTAWA-HULL RAPID TRANSIT—POSITION OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT RESPECTING CONTRIBUTION TO COST

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In view of the minister's answer to the question put by the hon. member for Ottawa East that he hopes to meet with the governments of Ontario and Quebec with respect to rapid transit for the national capital area, is it the position of the government that in the event one or other of those governments is not prepared to meet the terms and conditions for contributions by the federal government, and one or other of the governments is prepared, the government will proceed to grant funds or recommend the granting of funds to one or other of those governments to proceed with rapid transit on either side of the Ottawa River?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think that the hon. member's question is hypothetical but if in spite of this the minister wants to reply briefly he will be recognized for that purpose, after which I shall recognize the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not prepared to jump to the conclusion that the hon. member is. I am seeking to develop a co-operative arrangement within the whole of the national capital region.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

ALLEGED USE OF PLAINCLOTHESMEN IN DUVAL POTASH PLANT INDUSTRIAL DISPUTE

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct a question to the Solicitor General with regard to the industrial dispute now going on at the Duval potash plant in western Saskatchewan. In view of the fact there has been at least one incident where the RCMP used plainclothes personnel at the site of this dispute, and in view of the fact that the use of plainclothes policemen in unmarked cars could lead to provocation or conflict when such individuals attempt to cross picket lines, will the Solicitor General investigate the circumstances surrounding the use of such personnel in this dispute?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I was not aware of this incident but I shall investigate it as requested.

Mr. Gleave: At the same time will the minister inquire and inform the House if there has been a request for additional surveillance by the RCMP at the mine site and, if so, who made the request and for how many personnel? Specifically, has a request been made by the Duval corporation?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I shall investigate that as well. I might point out that an operation such as this would generally come under the jurisdiction of the Attorney General for the province, which in this case would be the NDP government in Saskatchewan.

AIR TRANSPORT

IMPROVEMENT OF NAVIGATIONAL AIDS IN NORTHERN CANADA AIR CORRIDORS FOLLOWING HARTWELL INQUEST RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport, Mr. Speaker. Without imposing unduly limiting and restricting air regulations applicable to general aviation operating in sparsely settled areas of Canada, what action does the minister intend to take with respect to the recommendations of the coroner's jury in the Hartwell inquest particularly with respect to requirements for higher standards of training and basic instrument training and an enlargement of radio aids to navigation throughout the whole of the north?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think I have already answered part of this question. As far as the pilot is concerned, he is in hospital. I regret that his licence has been suspended. We will see when he is recovered if he still can pilot a plane. For the rest, I have asked for about 15 days before I report to the House on the new regulations we want to impose in the north.

Oral Questions

HEALTH

UPGRADING OF HOSPITAL FACILITIES AND COMMUNICATION TO NURSING STATIONS FOLLOWING HARTWELL INQUEST RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare, Mr. Speaker, also arising out of the recommendations of the coroner's jury with respect to the establishment of a central hospital standard institution at Cambridge Bay—central to the Arctic region. Does the minister intend to take that recommendation to heart and to upgrade the facilities at Cambridge Bay to that extent? Second, with respect to the supply of emergency communication facilities to nursing stations throughout the Arctic, is the minister giving consideration to tying this in with the orbiting Anik?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, even before the report of the inquest was published, we had already taken steps to improve the services offered by the various stations in the north. I have also asked my department to study with particular care the recommendations resulting from this last inquest.

PENITENTIARIES

WILLIAM HEAD—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE USE LIMITED TO MINIMUM SECURITY PRISONERS

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. As there has been a report in Victoria that the minimum security prison at William Head is being used for more hardened criminals, would the minister assure the House that William Head will be used only for prisoners posing minimum security risks?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I will check into that, although I have not heard any story to that effect. The William Head penitentiary is a medium security institution and, consequently, it should only be used for medium security risk inmates. I will check into the hon. member's allegation.

GRAIN

INQUIRY RESPECTING METHOD OF PAYMENT FOR WHEAT EXPORTED IN FEBRUARY

Mr. Jean-Marie Boisvert (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board.

According to figures published by his department, some 35 million bushels of wheat were exported in February. Can the minister tell the House under what terms those 35 million bushels of wheat will be paid for?

[Mr. Marchand (Langelier).]

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, this was part of the regular shipment of all grains. We are very happy indeed that during this past February we were able to set a record not only for February but for any month for the shipment of grains from the west coast.

Mr. Diefenbaker: But the record was not for price.

Mr. Lang: These included all types of grains sold in Canada by the Canadian Wheat Board and by the private trade and would consist of a mixture of grain sold on credit, mostly grain sold for cash, and some grain for aid.

FINANCE

SHORT-TERM INTEREST RATES—CONSULTATION WITH GOVERNOR OF BANK OF CANADA ON MEASURES TO COUNTER POSSIBLE INCREASES

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the recent substantial increase in short-term bank interest rates in the United States and the many predictions that similar increases are pending in Canada and that these rates will perhaps reach record high levels in 1973, would the minister advise the House whether he and the new governor of the Bank of Canada have agreed on any measures to counter such high increases?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there has been no agreement. We have had several discussions about this. I am pleased at the moment that the differential between short-term interest rates in the United States and Canada is a point and a quarter in Canada's favour, in the sense that our interest rates are running that much below interest rates in the United States. Monetary policy in Canada will continue to be sufficiently expansive to condition the growth in the economy necessary to reduce unemployment.

INTEREST RATES—POSSIBLE MEASURES TO COUNTER INCREASING PRESSURE FROM UNITED STATES

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister indicate to the House, in these inflationary times, what the government considers to be satisfactory long and short-term interest rates, and at what point the government will consider it appropriate to introduce counter-measures to counter increasing pressures from the United States?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that depends, first of all, on there being a differential in interest rates so as to maintain a benevolent view of our own exchange rate problems. Actually, a good deal of our success—a combination of luck and a bit of good management—in managing to maintain a stable exchange rate has to do with the fact that our interest rates are lower in the short term than those of the United States. As to what the ultimate rate of interest in Canada will be next year, there is no way to predict that because that will depend on the demand for loans and also on many international factors. I might say to the hon. gentleman that if his views were to take effect in the House with respect to the amount of expansion we should need, they would have a very harmful effect on interest rates in this country and a detrimental effect on our exchange rate.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have just about reached the end of the question period. Perhaps we might permit a few quick questions, but not too many supplementaries, and a few short replies. With the co-operation of hon. members, perhaps in this way we might be able to recognize three or four or five more hon. members for questions before the end of the question period. I believe the hon. member for South Shore has a supplementary to a prior question.

AIR TRANSPORT

STEPS TO ENSURE THAT AIRCRAFT ARE EQUIPPED WITH PROPER NAVIGATIONAL AIDS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the one asked a moment ago by the hon. member for Yukon. It is addressed to the Minister of Transport. Before a certificate of airworthiness is issued to small carriers, would the minister tell us what steps are taken to make certain that these aircraft are equipped with proper navigational aids, including strobe lights, etc. as called for by his department, which are vitally necessary for these aircraft when carrying out flights anywhere in Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think that the hon. member has misunderstood the meaning of the question put to me by the hon. member for Yukon. This did not concern the quality of the aircraft or its compliance with standards, but the pilot who was qualified to fly by day only without using instruments. But he did fly using instruments even though he had no instrument rating.

ENERGY

PROPOSED WEST COAST OIL TANKER ROUTE—STATUS OF CANADA-UNITED STATES AD HOC COMMITTEE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister regarding the ad hoc committee which he and President Nixon agreed to set up to deal with the matter of the proposed oil tanker route from Valdez to Cherry Point. May I ask if this ad hoc committee has now been appointed? If so, who are the personnel? If it has not been appointed, are negotiations going on at present and which Canadian minister has responsibility for representing Canada in those negotiations?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I might inform the hon. member that I did not mention an ad hoc committee for that specific purpose but a committee which would look into the general question of shipping, as President Nixon put it himself, not only on the west coast but on the east coast. I have now been informed by the Minister of the Environment that there have been meetings at the ministerial level, that is, at his level, with his opposite number in the United States and that there have also already been meetings of a working committee of officials on the general matter of navigation on the west coast. This is the information I now have. If there are any further questions, I think they should be addressed to the Minister of the Environment.

Mr. Douglas: When does the Prime Minister anticipate that this ad hoc committee will be set up, and what does he envisage the terms of reference will be?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I did not say an ad hoc committee would be set up and I hoped my previous answer would clarify what committee I was referring to. It was a committee which had been suggested by President Nixon as a counter proposal to our request that this matter be sent to the IJC. I am informed by the Minister of the Environment that the follow-up on that decision by United States officials and by ourselves has been of the nature I just indicated.

FISHERIES

LOBSTER FISHERY—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON REVIEW OF EFFECT OF OFFSHORE ON INSHORE FISHING

Mr. Charles E. Haliburton (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that on July 31, 1971, at a meeting which the Prime Minister had with Western Nova Scotia lobster fishermen in Lunenburg, Nova Scotia, he called for a year's trial period to determine the effect that offshore lobster fishing would have on inshore lobster fishing and promised that an intensive review would be undertaken at the end of that one year trial period, could he now inform the House what are the results of that review, as some 18 or 20 months have now elapsed?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would obviously need to obtain a report from the Minister of the Environment and Minister of Fisheries. The question might be directed to him at some point.

DC-8 CRASH IN TORONTO—INQUIRY AS TO SETTLEMENT OF CLAIMS—QUALITY OF SERVICE

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport. He took it as notice last Wednesday. Can he now say if the insurance claims concerning the crash of the DC-8 Air Canada jet in July, 1971, I think, have been settled?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am still waiting for the answer from Air Canada. Unfortunately, I do not have the information now.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate may ask his supplementary question. The Chair will then recognize the hon. member for Hillsborough, and then call orders of the day.

Mr. Lundrigan: As these claims have not been settled, can the minister inform the House what the problem is? Also, would he be prepared to refer to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications the question of the quality of service of Air Canada, especially that being endured by the residents of Ottawa right now as a result of the relocation of the telephone reservation centre to Montreal?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I shall certainly inquire and make a fuller report on this whole matter.

OIL

WRECK OF THE "IRVING WHALE"—POSSIBLE SOURCE OF POLLUTION

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport about the Irving Whale, the oil barge which has been lying at the bottom of the Gulf of St. Lawrence since September, 1970. Noting his statement that the ship has not been raised because there was no guarantee against pollution arising from salvage operations, may I ask the minister if he can advise the House as to what guarantees he has against massive pollution taking place if the ship is left where it is?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the problem is that I have no guarantee one way or the other. We are still trying to study the matter to see what can be done and if it is worth while doing it. Personally, I would prefer to lift the ship and get rid of it, but I think I must rely on the advice of technical advisers in the department.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S. O. 58—INCOME TAX—SUGGESTED EXTENSION OF TIME FOR FILING FORMS AND LEGALIZATION OF 1972 STRUCTURE AND FORMS

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe) moved that:

This House, noting that the Government's income tax return forms are both confusing and illegal, calls upon the Government to give financial aid and an extension of time to harassed taxpayers, to expedite payment of tax refunds to more than six million taxpayers, and to take immediate steps to legalize both the 1972 tax structure and the forms.

He said: Mr. Speaker, first may I formally move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), the motion that Your Honour just read to the House. In so doing, I wish to point out to the House that there are six fundamental points that we are raising in this motion for consideration today.

First, we say that the income tax form is, in fact, confusing. Second, we say it is illegal in certain respects. Third, we suggest that the government should be giving financial aid to those individuals in our country who must now attempt to cope with the form. Fourth, because of the complexity of the form, we say that an extension of time should be offered to these harassed taxpayers to allow them to effectively deal with their own individual tax position. Fifth, we suggest that the government should expedite the payment of tax refunds, which may be some $1 billion in aggregate, to the six million taxpayers who will be receiving such refunds. Finally, we believe the time has long past when this government should have legalized the 1972 tax structure and the forms with respect to that tax structure.

Before dealing in detail with the points that I have enumerated, Mr. Speaker, I feel it may be of help to the House if I briefly touch on the background of individual payment of taxes in this country over the past 10 years. I do this because I feel a review of such figures reveals the absolutely staggering impact the Trudeau Liberal government has had upon individual taxpayers in the country. In many ways I feel that the income tax form we will be discussing today epitomizes the present government in office. It illustrates their glossing over of illegalities and, in some respects, their encouragement of dishonesty. It also illustrates their contempt for parliament and, in fact, the form, in its confused state, is the epitomy of the government, which itself is confused.

When Canadians finish paying the 1972 taxes which they will pay after filing the current form they, as individuals, will have paid in the aggregate in the five years since this government gained power some $38 billion. Under this government they will have paid an amount which is almost equal to the entire aggregate amount paid by all Canadian individuals in the previous 50 years. If you like, you can go back to Confederation, since the income tax legislation was introduced only in 1917. In short, this government has inflicted on Canadian individual taxpayers, in the aggregate, as much taxation as has been inflicted in the previous 50 to 100 years.

It is important to remember that for 1972 it is likely that Canadian taxpayers in the aggregate will pay some $10 billion. That is almost five times as much as the individual taxpayers in this country paid in 1962, and it is almost two and a half times as much as was paid by individual taxpayers in 1967, the year before this government under this Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) took office. This House should bear in mind that while Ministers of Finance such as Mr. Benson and the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton)) have repeatedly mentioned that they have taken a certain number of people off the tax rolls, many more have gone on the tax rolls than have come off during this government's five years of rule. In fact, there are two million more people on the individual tax paying rolls today than there were five years ago. There are four million more than there were 10 years ago.

What is most disappointing is that, when we review the individual taxes paid by the average taxpayer in Canada, we find that in 1962 he paid $427; in 1967, he paid $646 and in 1972, he paid $1,176. If we put a deflater on those figures, we see they are equally alarming. Expressed in 1962 dollars, the average taxpayer in that year paid $427. In 1967 he paid $560. Today, and I emphasize, this is in terms of constant dollars, he is paying $841 into the federal treasury. That is an increase of 50 per cent since this government took office. We must bear that in mind as the background of the situation that faces the 10 million Canadian taxpayers who must now cope with the income tax form that we are reviewing today.

As I mentioned, we say that the form is confusing. It has been said that no man should have to pay a tax which he cannot reasonably be expected to understand. In this respect, the Department of National Revenue appears to agree. If we review their booklet Inside Taxation 1972, we find this statement in the introduction, and I quote:

> —there is abundant evidence of a direct correlation between taxpayer understanding of the tax laws and procedures and the most efficient and economic administration of the tax-collecting function.

The introduction also makes the interesting comment that the word "taxation" is a Latin derivative which means to touch sharply. In many ways, there is a sharp touch on us today.

Mr. Stevens: On the subject of confusion, there are many ways in which one can attempt to portray the anxiety felt by literally millions of Canadians today as they try to cope with this form. I think we should bear in mind that in the last taxation year for which figures are available, 80 per cent of those filing tax returns in Canada used the T-1 short form. So, for approximately 80 per cent of our taxpayers in this current year the form distributed to them will be a completely new experience. When we compare it with the T-1 short form with which they are familiar we find that whereas they had 74 blanks to fill in on the old form there are more than 300 to cope with in the new form. About $1 million is being spent on advertizing and promotions, in an attempt to convince individual taxpayers that the form is not really as complicated as it looks. I would suggest, though, that the mere fact officials of the Department of National Revenue feel it necessary to spend this million dollars is proof that they know it is an extremely difficult form to cope with. I might mention that rate of tax schedules are appended to both the old and the new forms. But for reasons unknown to me in the one form the schedules show odd amounts whereas in the other, even amounts are shown. This tends to make it difficult for the average taxpayer to compare his current rate of taxation with rates in former years. Has this been done deliberately? I do not know.

I do know there has been tremendous pressure on regional offices of the Department of National Revenue as people seek to have their taxation position clarified. In my taxation area, Toronto, there are some 1,500,000 taxpayers whose forms will be processed through one office. I am told the department has increased its staff from 30 to 60 people who will deal at the front desk with inquiries from the 1,500,000 taxpayers. In other words, for every 25,000 taxpayers in my area there is one person to man the desk and iron out whatever difficulties might be experienced by taxpayers in coping with the new form.

Members of the public have been told, it is true, that they can telephone for assistance. Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that before entering this debate today I asked my secretary to telephone the Toronto office to ask about the number of inquiries they were currently processing and whether the staff had actually been increased for this purpose. I am sorry to report that I cannot give the House this information, because after trying 25 times to get through on the telephone she gave up. Suppose I had wished to discuss a tax problem with that office in Toronto. I would still be waiting to get through so that I might have a chance of finding out the answer. At least, that would have been the position as at two o'clock.

Mr. Speaker, James H. Boren, the self-proclaimed president of the National Association of Professional Bureaucrats, thinks Canada's new tax system is so complicated that Washington would do well to adopt the same method. In explanation of his reason for making such a statement, Mr. Boren says:

> I would say, almost without hesitation, that the tax forms epitomize our feelings about the maximum extension of retrogressive facilitation.

In other words, the new forms have achieved great success in complicating the already complicated. Later, Mr. Boren made the comment:

> The guidelines are these. When in charge, ponder; when in trouble, delegate; when in doubt, mumble.

We have referred in our motion to the fact that the form as it now exists is in certain respects illegal. Hon. friends of mine will expand on this later in the debate. For example, provision is made for an age exemption which has not been approved by parliament. Provision is made for a deduction in respect of disability which has not been approved by parliament. Then again, there is provision made for a deduction in connection with education and this, too, has not been approved by parliament. In effect, we are asking some 10 million people to deal with this form knowing that parliamentary approval is still required before it is legal in certain respects. It was unnecessary for this to have happened. We in the Progressive Conservative party asked repeatedly after the election that parliament be convened as early as possible so that matters such as those to which I have referred could have been dealt with and legalized.

I would also suggest that it is extremely unfair for the Minister of Finance to have adopted a philosophy which requires taxpayers to add to their income an amount they have never earned. I am referring to the fact that for the first time in connection with dividend income, taxpayers are expected to add to the amount they received in dividends an arbitrary one-third and count it as taxable income. It is unfair to ask any taxpayer to do this. In effect, he is being asked to report figures he knows are not true.

Granted, the public relations people, Fred Davis and others, have assured the public that the form is easier than it looks. But I suggest it is a very cruel thing to be telling ten million taxpayers in the country not to worry unless attention is drawn, at the same time, to a statement appearing just below the space left for signature, which reads: "It is a serious offence to make a false return".

I believe—and we have made this point in our motion, as well—that the government should extend financial assistance to help taxpayers cope with this form. Department of National Revenue officials admit that it costs approximately $10 to process each return. In short, it costs about $100 million to process the ten million forms with which they will be dealing. Surely it is not too much to expect that if the government feels it is necessary to spend $10 for their processing, it should assist the taxpayer who has to do the bulk of the work in preparing his return. Without such assistance I think it is fair to say that the government has imposed a further levy on the taxpayers of this country in the form of the amount the taxpayers will have to spend in completing their income tax returns. Assuming an amount of $10 per taxpayer, we are talking of a levy of $100 million, in addition to the taxation already levied upon them by the former Minister of Finance, Mr. Benson, and the present Minister of Finance.

In this context, I feel it is probably wise to remember that the individual taxpayers of this country are paying approximately one-half of the total revenue received by the federal treasury. In this connection, our proposal that there be an extension of time for taxpayers to complete their returns is only equitable in the circumstances. Bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, that the Department of National Revenue has only 28 offices across the country to service taxpayers. As I have mentioned, some one and a half million taxpayers go through the Toronto area office alone. To expect the average taxpayer to file his return by April 30, with the small amount of assistance given him by existing departmental officers is extremely unfair.

Tied in with this is the broad subject of tax refunds. In the fiscal year ending March 31, 1972 those refunds amounted to approximately $866 million. It is anticipated that the figure will be approximately $1 billion in the current year. The government should do all in its power to expedite early repayment of those funds to our taxpayers.

The income tax form is so complex, so confusing, that one must ask oneself what was in the mind of the government when it prepared the form. I am more alarmed about this than perhaps anything else, because I believe that the government is setting up 10 million Canadians for further taxation of a kind that we in this House have not even thought of yet. I am told by those who have had some experience with the growth of this type of bureaucratic taxation, that in other countries it has been quite usual to introduce a very complicated form, then in subsequent years new taxes are imposed, such as a possession tax or, as suggested at one time in this House, a capital appraisal tax. Surely, we should recognize the possibility that the present government, if left in power for much longer, will introduce some such tax in order to extract even more from the average taxpayer of this country.

Let me also mention that the form is not only confusing to read but it is an extremely bulky document. As has been pointed out, the length of the form is some 13 feet if attached lengthwise page by page. Many do not realize that if these forms were stretched end to end they would cover a distance of almost 50,000 miles. In short, the forms would stretch twice around the world along its equator. To put it in the Canadian context, the forms could stretch from sea unto sea eight times and from north to south eight times, leaving lots of room for bows.

Mr. Stanbury: You really are stretching it.

Mr. Stevens: This ribbon of paper symbolizes perhaps what the present government calls national unity. This ribbon of paper stretching from border to border, east to west and north to south, is what the government presumably feels is going to unite this country. It will unite it in utter frustration, confusion and indignation. I believe we should not tolerate this type of behaviour on the part of any government. A Progressive Conservative government would not have inflicted an income tax form like this upon the people of Canada. A Progressive Conservative government would indeed be expediting refunds at the present time to the taxpayers of Canada who rightfully can expect a refund. We believe it is high time that the government of Canada got the message that the taxpayers and voters of this country tried to give them in the last election. In short, Mr. Speaker, the government's time is up. The people of Canada want them no longer, and they want these tax forms no longer.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of speaking in this debate, but I am aware of the confusion that normally takes place at income tax time from my own point of view. A couple of items I received in my mail recently interested me. One was the Ontario property tax credit return, and I also received a farm tax return. I received several other things that I did not understand as well, so I decided to go down and get one of these kits from the post office. Even the first page of it is unintelligible, but it included the Ontario property tax form, and having read the first page of it I am sure I do not know how it will affect me as a farmer, which I am not. Neither am I sure how it will affect me as a property owner. As a result, I am not at all sure what I am going to do with the two little forms I received from the Ontario government; if they had kept them it would have made it far simpler for me. The more you read this sheaf of paper, the more confused you become and the less able you are to fill out your return.

The other day a man wrote me on behalf of his daughter complaining about the complexity of this form. After looking at the form I realized why he was confused. This woman has two children, one of pre-school age and one who goes to school. She works in the local hospital as a nurse, most of the time on day shift, although not always. She has to be at work at 7.30 in the morning. She hires one of the neighbour's children, a 16 year old girl, to come in and give the children their breakfast and get them ready for school. The one who stays at home is looked after by the lady next door. The young 16 year old girl takes the other child to school. That is the end of her part in the routine.

The one child comes home from school on her own and goes to the neighbour's house where the younger child is and has her lunch. The first child takes the second child to kindergarten and then she goes to school. This does not end the matter because the children both come home after school. Then, another 16 year old girl looks after them until the mother arrives home. Occasionally, this woman has to work overtime or has to work a swing shift. This does not happen often, but it does further complicate the matter.

The complaint is that the 16 year old girls involved do not make contributions to the Canada Pension Plan and do not work the minimum time which would require them to pay unemployment insurance. The minister may know where in this form you enter contributions to unemployment insurance as an employer, or Canada Pension contributions. I am not sure where it is and I do not intend to search for it now as that would lengthen my speech considerably. If you do not enter these items you cannot claim expenses for your housekeeper or your babysitters.

The woman to whom I referred could not possibly set up the bookkeeping system required to look after these things. The cost would not warrant keeping track of the unemployment insurance or Canada Pension Plan contributions for these girls who work two hours some days, an hour and a half some other days and perhaps not at all on other occasions. The woman might just as well go on welfare in the first place, and she might well be driven to that position as a result of a mental breakdown before she completes this tax form, and that is only the housekeeper section. I see no reason why this could not be simplified.

I now look at the second page, which apparently is for people who can legally cheat the government. There are all kinds of exemptions listed here including medical expenses and charitable donations. Anyone I know who has medical expenses also probably has a medical plan and, therefore, does not have any expenses as such. It is true that my doctor charges me more than the scheme will pay, but that is a small amount and I am not sure that you should list it here.

There are spaces here for capital dispositions which include personal use of property, listed personal property, other capital properties, real estate, bonds and other properties, and there is a place also for a summary of capital gains. Presumably these all apply to the rich. Perhaps if you looked through it you would find a place to deduct as an expense the cost of having an accountant look after this for you. Of course, this part will not have any interest for the average taxpayer who will be paying a comparatively small amount. I do not see included in this form a place for deducting that expense paid in respect of child care.

When we included child care expenses as a deduction for income tax purposes, we thought this would be a fairly simple thing for the mother who got herself a job and had to hire someone to look after her children. I find it is not simple. As is pointed out in this schedule, you must have the security number of those individuals for whom you are claiming an expense. It states here that you should not include payments made to a relative under the age of 21 at any time in 1972, or payments made to a person claimed as a dependent by you or by your spouse. It also states that if payments were made to a boarding school or camp, you cannot include any part of such payment in excess of $15 per week per child. Below that there are spaces for the names and addresses and individual social security numbers of those to whom payments were made. The woman to whom I referred has made great effort to provide for her children and now is not going to be able to claim these expenses.

I presume we are trying to cover all tax bases. It may be that the 16 year old girl who comes in in the morning and gives these children their breakfast, getting the one ready to go to school and the other to the neighbour's house, should be paying income tax, should have a social security number and be eligible for benefits. I presume that is the justification. If she did pay income tax it would be such a small amount it would not pay to operate the computer, and the money would obviously be returned. I am sure if she made a contribution to the Canada Pension Plan this whole thing would prove to be a nuisance and not feasible.

I do not agree with those people who are always complaining about changes in society, because I think changes are necessary and are usually good, but I am not sure that the changes in this tax form will work to the benefit of those people with whom I am used to dealing, the people earning $5,000 to $10,000 per year. They pay their income tax and they are allowed deductions for their wives and children. In addition, they get the $100 deduction for medical expenses and the other small deductions provided by the minister. They will be allowed those deductions and no more. Most people will not fill up those spaces provided for contributions. People who make contributions to the church usually do so on a regular cash basis rather than by cheque.

My father was a very meticulous person and had some knowledge of the income tax field, being in charge of a section of the Department of Agriculture during the war. This was the economic section of that department. I was always amazed when he made a contribution to the church that he made it by cheque. He knew exactly what to do with that contribution. As a miner, on the other hand, when I made a contribution to a charitable organization I just gave it the money. Probably I would have spent it for something else, so I can never remember being interested in getting a receipt. Charitable donations were never used for income tax purposes because I really did not have too much money to throw around anyway. In those days the form was fairly simple and I could fill it out myself.

I suggest the form could be much simpler for people whose earnings are through wages and whose deductions are made on a payroll basis. In such cases, the amount of the income tax payment is deducted and is entered on the T4 slip. It should be necessary merely to include the personal exemptions and that would be all there would be to it. I never understood why there was not a calculation which would vary from province to province. I do not understand why my Ontario provincial tax is not figured out for me. If the province of Manitoba, for example, should have a different tax structure, a different form could be used for that province. From my point of view this would solve a good part of the problem. It seems to me many people in this country do not have any unusual deductions or unusual sources of income. In their case it is a straight matter of showing the amount of wages, the exemptions, the charitable donations and so on. Such a person should be able to use a tax schedule and simply determine the amount he must pay or the amount of refund he might have. I do not understand why it should be made any more complicated.

I see no reason that people in the lower income groups who would have no right-offs should have to be involved with such a complicated form. All this does is show a person who is a wage earner employed in John Blow's plant that there are other people in this society who are entitled to many tax deductions to which he is not entitled. It shows him where the rip-off comes in so far as other people are concerned. These are not available to him, and yet he must become mixed up in the whole problem without receiving any of the benefits. When I became a Member of Parliament my income increased slightly, by about $1,000. In those days, I found that the amount of $1,000 placed me in a category that was not in the table. Therefore, I had to work out the calculation. I went to high school and learned how to make mathematical calculations. However, it had been a long time since I was at school and I found it very difficult to come up with an answer. I had considerable difficulty when my income increased from $5,000 to $6,000.

Mr. Alexander: What about now?

Mr. Peters: Now, I am not even sure what it is. From looking at this form it would seem that I may have income of which I am not aware. That small cheque I received as a rebate in respect of my farm must be income from somewhere. It is interesting to look at this mauve form for the province of Ontario. Perhaps if I study this form I might understand why I got this money back. Mr. Speaker, I believe there surely could be a much simpler system. My income is shown on my T4 slip. If I should be unemployed I would have to have a TU-1 slip. However, if I am fully employed, earning a salary and the deductions are taken off at source, my salary is shown on the T4 slip. In such a situation I should be able to do a simple calculation and determine my income tax. This form is very complicated. I cannot even understand the first page. Then, there is this Ontario property tax. I suppose that is in respect of my house.

An hon. Member: Send it back.

Mr. Alexander: Do not bother filling it out.

Mr. Peters: The amount I received in respect of the farm is a very small amount. I would gladly send it back, because no doubt it will just confuse matters. The other day I received a T4 slip indicating I had received a relatively small sum of money in the form of a dividend from an insurance policy. I always thought that would be included each year and totalled at the end. I never drew any money; it accumulated. I did not realize I would have to make a payment on something I was not receiving. I will never receive it. I would have to die in order to receive it.

I agree with the Conservative who moved this motion when he stated that this was a complicated form.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peters: The minister may say it is not. I do not know what his profession was, but I would be very happy to take these blank forms over to him and have him fill them out while he makes his speech. I would be very surprised if he could fill them out in time for you, Mr. Speaker, not to call him to order. I believe there should be two things. First, there should be a tax form which would include the provincial tax, so that each person would receive a form which would indicate the amount of his provincial tax rather than requiring that he make a separate calculation.

There is no question that this complicated form is necessary for anyone engaged in the business field. Probably there is another one relating to farmers which is probably four times as complicated. I suggest, however, that there should be a very simple, uncomplicated form on which the average person would need only show the deductions to which he is entitled and the information on his T4 slip.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He has not completed his income tax form yet.

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, as I can see, this motion gives an indication of the complexity of the tax forms to be filled by the Canadian taxpayers who must comply with the requirements of the tax system.

According to the wording of the motion, the government's income tax return forms will lead to confusion. It will not be the first time. Considering the double taxation system that too many people support, knowingly or not, we find that tax itself is being taxed. Indeed, the provincial tax taxes the federal tax; that is not very intelligent but that is the way it is.

The motion before us refers to illegality. It would be interesting indeed to witness a legal argument in order to establish the legality or illegality of the tax return forms. Such are the consequences of a crazy system according to which wealth is being appraised in the form of dollars instead of things, property and other real values.

We also note that the motion calls upon the government to give harassed taxpayers—it has been found that the taxpayers were harassed, and better late than never—financial aid and an extension of time and it adds "to expedite payment of tax refunds".

Considering the object of this motion was to prevent confusion, I believe the wording somewhat lacks clarity.

The idea naturally is to keep advocating an outmoded system while at the same time trying to convince most hon. members that the motion should be supported, without suggesting anything practical to lighten the burden of the so-called harassed taxpayers. It is obvious that tax return forms should be at least written in a more simple and clearer language to avoid high expenses for accounting services.

The government seems to like to create complications for taxpayers with complicated income tax return forms. We see that all year long, particularly at the end of the month of April or during the month of May. A lot of income tax problems are submitted to me each week and have to do with the difficulties the taxpayers face in trying to comply with government requirements.

It is not necessary to spend hours studying the legislation to discover how stupid are most of the laws governing the country. Everything is so oriented as to protect the money system instead of intelligently distributing the existing wealth.

We find that thousands of public servants paid from tax moneys are watching the taxpayers. Interesting indeed but this is what you find. If we keep on using this method we will find ourselves in the absurb situation where half the Canadians will be watching the other half.

I admit that we must have laws and regulations. However, I am under the impression that the complexity of existing laws has contributed to creating a stampede attitude within a disastrous economic situation. Our financial system supported by too many of our "colored" politicians has contributed to create a wolf mentality where everyone is running after the almighty dollar—the symbol of the wealth kept too rare by those controlling it—with the result that many laws are violated, many formalities are not fulfilled, many regulations are not enforced, and this is contributing to maintain a riot atmosphere which the government is often obliged to quell through emergency measures.

Those at the controls always find good reasons to justify the resulting tax increases and formalities. And yet it is easy to understand that the after-tax money left to the taxpayer may be spent as he pleases, whereas the tax money is spent as the state sees fit and not as the individual does.

The higher the income earmarked for taxes—whatever formality used—the more the we steer toward state socialism so that if the government took everything, individuals would pay nothing themselves and everything would be paid by the government. This would be absolute state socialism.

I would like to quote part of an editorial broadcast by CFCM-TV station on June 1, 1967. Speaking of popular democracies, the editorialist mentioned something thought-provoking, and I quote:

> In those countries personal incomes have been over-taxed to such an extent that the cost of living index has wildly spiraled, with no compensation whatever by way of an equivalent increase in incomes. The February 1967 report on international financial statistics indicates that in Yugoslavia the cost of living, increased by 167 per cent from 1958 to 1966, whereas the index of incomes is unchanged. According to the same report, in Sweden, a country governed by a socialist government and benefiting from a mixed economic system, the cost of living has gone up by 34 per cent during the past six years. This increase, to a large extent, is due to the burden of social measures and overtaxation.

It makes no difference what method they use.

> This should cause everyone to ponder, and specially those who want to drive us to socialism.

Yet, the individual is paramount and governments are merely institutions at his service.

Others complain specially about taxes, feeling that they are being deprived of the fruit of their toil. They are perfectly right. But what we want to stress is that the increase in taxes is a rapid progression towards state socialism. Moreover, when private enterprise, over-taxed, loses heart, it is necessarily replaced by an industrial or a state monopoly: the first means domination through money, the second means domination with the all-encompassing government. A system has to be very sick indeed when the only choice is between two ways of enslaving individuals.

There is another solution: control funds at the source, in keeping with the facts, the individual's rights and the country's potential. This would mean Social Credit.

But, there, people do hesitate. And our governments would rather control the individuals and leave alone the privileges of the people who create money.

We are living in a world where many seem to have lost a sense of balance, of duty and of responsibility, no matter what forms are being used.

In fact, nowadays, we find that millions of dollars are spent to support exploration trips to the moon, whereas millions of citizens, on our planet, lack the necessities of life, despite the means at our disposal to house, clothe and feed human beings properly. We are grappling with a situation of that kind.

Among the people responsible for this state of affairs, we can easily count many politicians who, in my opinion, do a poor job as far as the interests of the citizens are concerned. Instead of taking the time of the House to discuss red tape due to a silly system, we should rather try to find some means of altering the system which is responsible for all those insignificant and complicated formalities, legal or illegal. We are driven to such a situation by the very nature of the system. Therefore, let us instead try to find a means for changing the silly system that rules us.

Often more interested in showing off than pleasing people, many politicians today are playing the role of actors in offices that would rather command some comprehensive legislation to meet men's needs. I admit that there are good men in all parties—

Miss Bégin: And also women!

Mr. Dionne: Yes, a few. I admit, again, that there are good men in all political parties at the present time as there were in the past. However, they seem to be paralyzed by completely out of date procedures.

I cannot find a logical explanation for the fact that after so many years of administrative experience, application of plans, studies and suggestions of all kinds, the working and agricultural people of Canada are now at grips with problems of unemployment, insecurity and debts. And more serious still, this kind of unbearable and demoralizing situation for many people created a feeling of revolt which contributes to produce a climate of insecurity.

No one will deny the fact that the number of criminals increases seriously in a country upon which Providence has bestowed all kinds of wealth.

How come our learned politicians, or at least those who think they are, still prefer to keep procedures which lead to such results.

A group of politicians of a certain colour have come to believe that a country whose leaders succeed in paying interest on the public debt may be considered as being well administered. Imagine what would happen if all Canadians took this position. And yet we in Canada should give the example. These people have the gall to come and speak to us about a balanced budget, while they only succeeded in creating a financial and economic situation that is completely—

Mr. Trudel: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Montreal-Bourassa is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Trudel: I have no objection to the hon. member for Kamouraska speaking about all systems which now exist, but I wonder when he is going to come to the motion before us which deals with forms to be filled under the Income Tax Act, or suggest that such form be changed. In other words, I would like to know when he is going to speak about the subject matter.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair heard the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne) mention formalities and complexities a moment or so ago, and assumed that this was in reference to the matter of the income tax forms that we are debating. However, perhaps the hon. member should bear in mind the somewhat limited nature of the debate we are embarked upon today. The hon. member for Kamouraska.

[Translation]

Mr. Dionne: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have the opportunity to explain my views on that subject.

At the beginning of my remarks, I explained quite clearly the meaning of the motion, I think, and today I notice that an hon. member is blaming me for speaking a little too much about the system or about different systems. I shall point out to him, and this is very important, that the stupid formalities we are discussing derive from a foolish system that the hon. member is supporting. That is the reason!

I do not think I am straying from the subject matter because I think those formalities would not be necessary if we had a logical system. It is because we have a confusing system that we have confusing formalities and we try by all kinds of means to set things straight. Each year, reforms are made about these forms; it is such a complicated matter that taxpayers are forced to spend hundreds of dollars in accountant offices to have these famous forms filled, forms which are created by the foolish system the hon. member is supporting. This is the reality and I am glad to have the opportunity to say it in the House this afternoon.

An hon. Member: What is your system?

Mr. Dionne: What? Our system? We have a system of common sense. It recommends a distribution of goods based on an orderly financial system and not a financial system which has to admit—I said it earlier—that as long as the country can administer himself by paying the interest on its debt, it can consider itself as being well administered. Have you ever seen such a concept of administration? Would an industrial, a farmer or anybody else who would administer his budget in Canada simply by being satisfied with paying the interest on his debts be considered an able administrator? A foolish system brings the formalities we have. Then we try to bring about improvements in the formalities of application, not only in the area of income tax, but in lots of other areas. There are administrative procedures which are almost inapplicable. I could cite lots of examples that demonstrate it very clearly, but the Income Tax Act is probably the most eloquent.

So I continue my comments, for I think they are quite timely and yet some of them were not in my text.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): You had better stick to your text.

Mr. Dionne: I understand that in the system there can be major reasons to levy a tax. When it comes to providing a service requested by the community and there is no way to provide it without depriving some members of that community, this can be understood, but if there is a way to provide that service without depriving anyone, it is not fair to deprive citizens of what they own.

If I take my neighbour's money, this is a theft. When the government takes the taxpayers' money, what is it called? An individual is not allowed to take another individual's property. And the government could do it. Taxes can, besides, reach so high a level, so heavily burden farmers or manufacturers that they discourage personal initiative.

This is verified. Any legislation whose objective is to tax contains sections to tax capital gains and other gains. However, I have not found in all the tax laws, even in the heavy Bill C-259 which contains 740 pages, a single section providing for a compensation for those who would experience losses instead of profits. Everything is organized to protect the financial system and nothing is provided to compensate the victims.

I do not think that changing the forms would bring much relief; it is mainly the system that needs to be changed.

Taxes do not disturb only those they hit, they disturb the whole community because they sabotage production, just as the whole system does.

There is another way of getting money. It would be to simply take back the manufacturing power presently in the hands of chartered banks. But we really have to want it though.

Who must be in charge of creating money and distributing it where it is needed if not the sovereign government which should be the only one so authorized? A government not doing so deserves to be called "the servant of private interests", and you know where I read that expression.

Instead of adopting a tax method which produces provoking and complicated forms, if the government were to use its sovereign power to restore order in the monetary system, it would be possible to balance the incomes of people instead of taking away from them the gains they have made. And there would be no need for forms because the worker would keep the money he earned.

Those who always come up with the word "inflation" would already be anxious to know how long a government could do that. I would say without hesitation: as long as that brings good without evil. There is no doubt that it could follow that method for as long as certain means of production are unutilized.

Presently, production is far from being what it should be in Canada. There are a lot of unemployed—

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired. The hon. Minister of National Revenue.

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the lot of the tax collector is not a happy one. It never has been and is not likely to be. Paying taxes and completing the various forms required to do so are not the most enjoyable responsibilities of citizenship. Especially at this time of year, taxpayers are seldom moved to thoughts or words of fulsome praise and thanksgiving for the tax collector as he goes about his appointed task. Therefore, we were not surprised to hear that this subject was to be the basis of the opposition motion today, particularly in view of the time spent recently on this subject by opposition spokesmen—who have not always spoken with the greatest accuracy, I must say.

I enjoyed, as I always do, listening to my hon. friend from York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens). Knowing him as I do, I found many echoes in his speech of his career as a reporter, lawyer, farmer and financeer. He knows the value of publicity and how to get it. He knows the value of a picture like the one which appeared in the press not long ago showing him draped in forms, schedules and tables, all taped together. He knows full well that not even he, nor any one of his constituents, would have to use all of them. Actually, when I first saw the picture of the hon. member in the newspaper with these forms, I thought he was displaying a collection of old stock certificates.

He supported his motion with "lawyerly" logic, demonstrating that legal training has equipped him to make much of little. In what he has produced here today, he has rivalled the sheep that roam on and enrich the fields of his country estate. His sheep, however, would know better than to produce that in the House of Commons.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): It was a very woolly speech.

Mr. Stanbury: It was not a serious speech and this is not a serious motion, Mr. Speaker. This motion has been thrown in while the Tories play for time, trying their best to brew up a motion for tomorrow which will not veer too far from any principles they have left and will appeal at the same time sufficiently to socialists and those with Social Credit tastes. They are trying to devise the means, not to improve any law or any program, but simply to destroy this government and this parliament. They are doing this to satisfy their hunger for power. So, today they are taking up the valuable time of parliament playing with form, and with forms, instead of contributing to the constructive improvement of the substance of our laws and programs.

This is political gamesmanship of an old and stale style. It is being played at the expense of ordinary taxpayers, giving them a false impression that may inhibit their taking advantage of tax benefits available to them.

That is not just my opinion, Mr. Speaker. Ralph Errington, reporting on Radio Station CFRB and other stations a week or so ago, said:

> Conservative MP's, and to a lesser degree some New Democrats, have been waging a steady campaign to convince the public that the new tax forms are so complicated that it would take a team of chartered accountants to complete the returns. So it was with some misgivings that this reporter decided, as usual, to do my own accounting, and file my tax return without any outside help. Ninety minutes later, my calculations were completed and rechecked, the tax form typed out and stuffed in an envelope ready for mailing. Needless to say, this haste is due to the fact that I've got some money coming back. If anything, the new tax forms were easier to complete than previous ones, with assistance from an easy-to-follow instruction booklet. Granted, anyone with investment income, capital gains to report or working on a self-employed or commission basis no doubt would need the help of an accountant. But these people would seek professional help anyway. To those politicians who say the average salaried taxpayer can't complete his own tax return, I say: 'Rubbish!' As Fred Davis says in the Revenue Department ads: 'It's easier than it looks.'

That is the opinion of an independent and respected journalist of the parliamentary press gallery.

Giving me a hard time as the minister is "fair ball". I expected it when I took this job. However, I appeal to the members of the Official Opposition not to hurt the little people, the low and middle income earners, the average citizens. I say to those members through you, Mr. Speaker, restrain your ambitions; do not try to climb to power on the backs of our average citizens by stampeding them into fear of our tax forms, into fear of taking advantage of benefits and, perhaps, undermining the self-assessment approach on which our income tax system is based.

We should remind ourselves that our Canadian system of self-assessment is by far the most democratic, the most efficient and the most economical means of collecting taxes. If I had enough time at my disposal I could refer to the views of tax authorities in other jurisdictions to the effect that the administration of our system, as it has evolved over the years under several administrations, is a model of fairness and efficiency. As other ministers responsible for my portfolio before me have done, I conceive it as my responsibility to maintain and improve our self-assessment system. If we are to maintain and improve it, we must administer tax legislation fairly, uniformly and impartially as well as with efficiency and courtesy.

Self-assessment is the exercise of a fundamental relationship between the citizens and their government. The declaration of income, the claiming of deductions, the calculation of tax and the use of an accessible and objective appeal process are all acts of civil participation second only in importance, I suggest, to the exercise of the electoral franchise. But, Mr. Speaker, rights involve obligations. The fulfilment of obligations can be inconvenient. I do not derive any pleasure from assembling records and filling out an income tax form. The keeping of records, the calculation of deductions and, generally, the completion of returns are an inconvenience, and I will not disagree if anyone suggests that is an understatement.

For my part, I know that the taxation component of my department makes every effort to minimize the task it imposes on taxpayers through forms and procedural requirements. It is simply common sense that we do that. Apart from our concern for the taxpayer, the difficulties he or she encounters and the errors he or she makes in the return are time consuming and costly for the department. So, Mr. Speaker, it alarms me when certain interests and certain individuals, in pursuit of personal gain or for other selfish reasons, prey on the natural apprehension of taxpayers at a time of change, caring not for the interests of the individual taxpayer nor for the integrity of our self-assessment system. Also, it disturbs me that the Official Opposition would dignify some of these views and claims that are misleading and even false, certainly not motivated by concern for taxpayers at large or the maintenance of our system of taxation.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): They display political cynicism.

Mr. Stanbury: May I quote the words of another respected commentator, Mr. Speaker? Writing in the Calgary Herald, Ken Hull said of the current tax form: "smart money would bet that any puppy could lick it to death". He went on to say:

> Anyone who mastered last year's tax form will find it a pushover—assuming he or she hasn't had a 1,400 per cent salary increase; bought or sold half of Saskatchewan; become the major shareholder of Imperial Oil, or sold part of his Rolls Royce fleet.

Because of the many reckless statements about the complexity of the paper work that were voiced by certain persons even before they had actually seen the revised form, we suggested to taxpayers that they should not prejudge the forms and the new guide before they had an opportunity to read them. We tried to acquaint taxpayers with the expanded and improved services available to them in our 28 district taxation offices.

Some have attacked our efforts to inform and encourage citizens in this essential process of democracy, although I might express my appreciation for the fact the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) wants our information program extended. The cost of this program is approximately 4.5 cents per capita, but there is accumulating evidence that it is paying off for the taxpayers. Citizens who have been turned off, so to speak, by ill-informed and irresponsible criticism have been reassured and have found that it is no more difficult for most people to cope with the new return than with previous ones. That is all we have claimed, Mr. Speaker. Not that it is not complicated or difficult, as I suppose all tax forms are, but that it is easier than it looks. Joe McClelland wrote in the London Free Press, and I quote:

> For the past year we've been assailed from all quarters with dire and gloomy declarations that the umpteen pages of the new tax return are incontestably beyond the capacity of any ordinary mortal to fathom.

Later in his column he concluded:

> —this one is the easiest return I've grappled with in 15 years or more.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanbury: Why do those independent observers say this? This year we had one tax form for every taxpayer. It is a four-page tax form, not what some of the critics would like it to be. In the envelope also is a guide which gives simple step-by-step instructions for completing the return. Also included are tax tables to assist in calculation and a set of schedules, some of which some taxpayers require in support of their return.

The page size of this year's return is smaller. It is the equivalent of one page shorter than last year's T1 General form and one and one-half pages longer than last year's T1 Short. If those taxpayers who formerly filed on a T1 Short ignore those areas of the form devoted to self-employed earnings, as they are asked to do, their form this year is only slightly longer than last year, the difference being almost entirely due to the addition of unemployment insurance premiums as a deduction, and a more open layout in the identification and tax calculation areas on page one, which makes it easier for taxpayers to complete that page.

There has been so much misrepresentation that I want to go into some detail. The tax tables this year have been expanded to serve those with taxable incomes up to $12,000, the cut-off formerly being $8,000. This expansion greatly reduces the number of taxpayers having to complete the detailed tax calculation schedule, which is even more apparent when one takes into account the increase in taxable income due to larger exemptions.

There are eight schedules other than the detailed tax calculation schedule. Of these, four are virtually identical to those which accompanied last year's T1 General form and will be used by the same people who would have used them last year. Of the remaining four, one is simply a printed schedule for use by those who would have had to create their own in previous years. Another removes from the tax form a little-used section for additional personal exemption. The remaining two schedules concerning capital dispositions and child care expenses are new. In addition, for residents of Ontario and Manitoba, there are forms on which they may apply for a credit against their municipal property taxes. I sometimes agree with the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) that it might have been easier if we had not served as the mailman for these provincial governments.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanbury: We estimate that approximately five million taxpayers will not have to use any schedules at all. It is expected that for approximately 80 per cent of the taxpayers, the only major new forms requirement is the small section on unemployment insurance premiums.

Why does everyone receive the same tax form? The spokesman for the Progressive Conservative party said that his party would not have shown this kind of consideration to the Canadian people. We could have decided not to send anybody any schedules, but rather send them scurrying out to the post offices to try to find the ones they need. Taxpayers could have been spared the sight of all that paper, but a substantial number who required one or more schedules would have been put to the inconvenience of applying to a taxation office or a post office for those they needed. Why were the Short and General forms combined this year? The use of two forms presumed a considerable difference in the requirements of the groups receiving each form, and that it was possible to get the right form to the right people.

It was felt that neither of these presumptions were strongly enough indicated to warrant separate forms this year. Equity also entered the picture, since experience in other countries as well as in Canada suggested that abbreviated forms lead to taxpayers overlooking or ignoring possible exemptions and benefits to which they are entitled. We do not want them to miss any of those, Mr. Speaker. It may be of interest to hon. members that before making the decision to use one form we consulted our Tax Advisory Committee which is made up of knowledgeable tax experts from across the country who volunteer their services and meet periodically with my officials to discuss departmental policies and procedures. That committee fully approved the change.

There has been a major effort, quite unjustified, to condemn the forms and guide in a way that might cause some taxpayers to throw up their hands and spend money unnecessarily for professional assistance. I do not have anything against professional help. That is a decision for any taxpayer. However, I must protest the innuendoes that our forms and guides are forcing taxpayers to engage outside help when they were able to cope with the filing requirements the past few years.

Tax reform was the subject of public discussion for almost 10 years. There was a good deal of controversy up to and since the parliamentary passage of Bill C-259 in December 1971. We were well aware that many taxpayers would be apprehensive in approaching their first tax reform return. We understood that and were prepared for it.

However, there have been a number of other circumstances that have exacerbated the normal apprehension. There have been some who did not agree with certain tax reform changes who have been using the tax form as an object of a rearguard action. Of course, they have a right to disagree, but I deplore the fact that they have tried, unsuccessfully, I believe, to undermine our self-assessment system.

While the administration of the Income Tax Act is often construed to mean collecting every cent the law permits, my department is equally concerned with collecting not one cent more than the law requires. We try to protect the taxpayers' interest in this regard in two basic ways: by correcting any errors or omissions we can in the assessment of returns, and by informing the taxpayers of provisions of the law that can work to their advantage.

Hon. members will be interested to know, I am sure, that in routine assessing action on last year's returns, we decreased the tax payable for more than 1,400,000 taxpayers by a total amount of more than $75 million. These decreases were effected unilaterally as a result of painstaking scrutiny and computer calculation in the Department of National Revenue.

In addition to protecting taxpayers from their own errors, considerable effort has been made to inform people of the benefits the law holds for taxpayers, and to help them avoid time consuming errors. As you may be aware, following the passage of tax reform legislation my department issued a series of explanatory pamphlets on various aspects of the new laws. More than 25 million copies of these pamphlets are in the hands of Canadians. Also, a comprehensive series of videotaped training courses were made available to tax practitioners and professionals. Almost 10,000 have taken advantage of these courses since May, 1972.

To handle the complex questions which arose for individuals contemplating transactions under the new tax laws, my department instituted an informal consultation service last year as a complement to the advance ruling service which had been available previously. More than 45,000 queries were handled by this service, 3,000 of which involved situations sufficiently complex as to require clearance through head office on special direct lines installed for that very purpose.

To handle inquiries from taxpayers now completing the tax returns, we have taken several fundamental steps. The first of these was to submit our staff to special training courses to enable them to anticipate and solve quickly and courteously any taxpayer problems brought to their attention. Second, we drastically increased the number of staff and requisite facilities for dealing with taxpayer inquiries. Third, and perhaps most important of all, we have put the expertise of the tax department at the disposal of every Canadian, no matter where he lives, by virtue of the new ZENITH 0-4000 telephone number.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That's a constructive way to handle it.

Mr. Stanbury: To assist taxpayers who cannot call during normal working hours, we have extended telephone inquiry service Monday and Tuesday evenings until 8 p.m. In all these actions, we have anticipated, and are prepared to handle efficiently, almost a 100 per cent increase in the normal taxpayer inquiries we receive during the filing season.

I have already touched on our information program which includes, besides advertising, various projects involving the print, radio and television media, speeches, tax education materials, special programs for groups such as older people, and so forth. Not all the programs of taxpayer assistance have originated from my department. I am particularly pleased to see the amount and quality of support which is coming from outside groups—newspapers, accountants and other professionals, senior citizens associations, neighbourhood action committees, service clubs and a host of other organizations have pitched in to inform and offer free services to taxpayers during this transitional period. I want to compliment them and congratulate them on behalf of the government. They have demonstrated that there are many people in Canada who do not expect the government to do everything for them. I expect that applies to most people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanbury: Such has been the quality of this much-appreciated assistance, along with the efforts of my department, that I feel quite secure in asserting that never before has a legislative act of this House been the subject of such massive public study and public information.

All these efforts have been appreciated. I know, because I have heard from a large number of people to that effect.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Speaker, if taxpayers are as confused and so harassed, as the opposition claims today, one would expect a substantial increase in taxpayer errors in the filing of returns. While we have only just passed the deadline for employers to distribute T4 slips to their employees, and though the bulk of returns will be filed in future weeks, I can report to the House that errors in early returns up to last week were approximately 3 per cent less than at the comparable time last year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanbury: I can also tell the House that a check of our district offices last week indicated that the vast majority of questions by taxpayers were in no way related to the alleged complexity of the form. Some 90 per cent of the telephone calls in one Ontario city for five days last week concerned the province's property tax credit, and nearly 50 per cent of the calls in all our Ontario and Manitoba offices during that period were inquiries about the property tax credit programs of the provinces.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanbury: During last weekend, when I heard of the intention of the opposition to move this motion, I just happened to read the lead editorial in the current issue of the Financial Post, the "bible" so often quoted by the opposition.

Mr. Bell: What?

[Mr. Stanbury.]

Mr. Stanbury: I do not have time to quote it all, but I should at least quote the first paragraph because it is extremely relevant to the motion before us. It reads:

> Much emotional and irresponsible rhetoric has poured forth about the new income tax return. The fact is, the return is not all that complicated and the Department of National Revenue may be right that it's going to be easier than you think.

The newspaper went on to quote a prominent Toronto accountant as saying:

> The form is not complicated. Furthermore, the guide which accompanies it is a masterpiece. It's the best guide I've seen anywhere.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanbury: I do not want to go on at great length. I do, however, want to tell hon. members that this year, as in past years, I am sure, the prime aim of the Minister of National Revenue and his department is not simply to collect the revenues which are necessary to carry out the program of the government—or which would be necessary to carry out the program of any government under a democratic system. Our first and foremost aim is to see that the people of Canada are well served by their income tax system; that every taxpayer makes the most of tax reform and the benefits arising from Liberal budgets in the past few years. We want the people of Canada to take every advantage to which they are entitled under the law. Citizens of Canada can depend on us to see that the law is administered in the most sensitive way and that some 7,700,000 Canadians who will be entitled to refunds this year get them as rapidly as this House permits by the passage of legislation.

Mr. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): I was wondering whether the minister would allow me to ask a question and, if so, whether he could give me an answer. I have asked him a couple of questions during the question period and he has been unable or unwilling to answer.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): When he did not answer one of my questions he did send me a letter—

Mr. Cafik: Ask your question.

Mr. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): —asking me whether I had any further ideas on his crystal clear income tax guide and whether I would submit them to him.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): I am wondering whether it is the policy of the government to ask us for our ideas.

Mr. Stanbury: I am very glad the hon. member asked about this. There was another member who the other day, asked a question in a rather sarcastic way. He wanted to know why I should be asking hon. members in the opposition for suggestions. I think this reaction demonstrates better than anything how a Conservative government would operate. They are so arrogant they do not care anything about anyone else's ideas.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanbury: I have heard a great deal in this House over the last few months about how perfidious this form is, but I have not received one constructive suggestion from hon. members opposite. And I do not expect to get one.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I wonder whether, before he sits down, the minister would comment on the assertion in the motion before us today, an assertion which has been repeated by at least one speaker, that the 1972 income tax forms which Canadians are now filling in are illegal. I believe there were references to the fact that there were certain points on which the income tax form differed from the Income Tax Act, and that we would not want people to fill out the form feeling that there was going to be a comeback because the law does not yet conform with the income tax form. I believe there is something about the authority that the minister has to prescribe such forms, but would he comment on the matter so that the confusion on this point will be cleared up?

• (1700)

Mr. Stanbury: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The tax forms are prescribed by the minister under section 150(1) and section 248(1) of the Income Tax Act. There is no question of their legality.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does that mean, for example, that where the form says that persons over 65 can deduct $1,000 rather than the $650 provided by the act, that is perfectly legal?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I really do not think it is in order for an hon. member to ask for what seems to me to be a legal opinion of the ministry. Is the hon. member rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Stevens: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on a point of order.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, if it is not proper for the minister to comment on legal questions, is it proper for us to be debating a motion which indicates there is something before us that is illegal?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I was hoping that the minister would seize the nettle himself. Perhaps he could be permitted to reply, since there are several million Canadians no doubt waiting upon his answer.

Mr. Stanbury: I had better not attempt a legal opinion for the hon. member, Mr. Speaker, but may I say that persons are being asked to fill out forms that are authorized by law. There are certain aspects of the budget of last May that the Minister of Finance has indicated he would like the House to deal with at an early date. There is no difficulty about having people complete forms according to the form prescribed by the Minister of National Revenue, and they are proceeding to do this. I suppose about one million Canadians have already submitted their returns, and many of these have received a refund. Those who would qualify for a higher refund or a refund resulting from the budget measures of May 8 will, I hope, not have much longer to wait than the others.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Stevens: That is right, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of National Revenue has indicated that he had not had one single thought or idea to help him from the members on this side.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think that is a matter for debate, not a question of privilege.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

Marie (Mr. Symes)—Youth—Opportunities for Youth program—Request for statement on grant distribution among income classes—Consultation on weekly pay rate with provinces; the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin)—Agriculture—Feed grains—Measures to curb price increase.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—INCOME TAX—SUGGESTED EXTENSION OF TIME FOR FILING FORMS AND LEGALIZATION OF 1972 STRUCTURE AND FORMS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Stevens that:

This House, noting that the Government's income tax return forms are both confusing and illegal, calls upon the Government to give financial aid and an extension of time to harassed taxpayers, to expedite payment of tax refunds to more than six million taxpayers, and to take immediate steps to legalize both the 1972 tax structure and the forms.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Peel South): Mr. Speaker, I was most interested in the opening remarks of the minister concerning the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) and what he described as sheep. We are more concerned about the fleecing of the people of Canada by the minister than we are about sheep. Apparently the minister is full of wool, or has that in mind. We are not just playing with forms in this debate but talking about equity. We are talking about the people of Canada receiving equity in taxation, the equity that the so-called tax reform legislation was supposed to give them. Now, with this conglomeration of blue, white and in some cases mauve pieces of paper, the taxpayers are not being given equity but a monstrous headache. This headache, together with the accounting cost Canadians have to bear and the problems confronting Canadian business, wipe out any attempt the act makes to treat Canadians equitably, and indeed creates more problems than the equity the act is supposed to give.

Before I reach the main remarks I have to make, let me tell the minister that a great many constituents have telephoned me and talked about the problems they have had with the act and the forms they are required by the minister to complete. Finally, in desperation I have said many times to these people: "Well, if you cannot make it out, do not worry about it. Sign your name to it, put the stuff in an envelope and address it to the minister at the House of Commons—no postage required—because the minister tells me it is pretty simple. So let him look after it".

I am going to address my remarks today to the problems experienced by small businesses with regard to the Income Tax Act and the ancillary forms that must be completed in order to do business in this country in accordance with the act. Small business is pretty important to this country. In the yellow pages of my telephone book, which covers Port Credit, Clarkson and Mississauga, there are pages and pages filled with the addresses of small businesses. Ninety per cent of the ads in these yellow pages are placed by small businesses. Small business represents a tremendous portion of the business activity of the nation.

When the act was first introduced, Mr. Benson introduced what he claimed was the greatest tax system that the world had ever seen. When he announced the tax changes applying to small business, he prefaced them with the following remarks:

> This government supports the view that entrepreneurial initiative should be encouraged through the tax system. The Canadian economy depends upon the creative business activity of small, growing businesses.

Well, Mr. Speaker, what have we got? We had a system that was relatively simple: small businesses with earnings under $35,000 paid 20 per cent or 21 per cent corporate tax. We now have a system that is all enmeshed in corporate tax forms, and where at the lower level you pay 25 per cent corporate tax up to the first $50,000 of earnings, providing the cumulative effect of the $50,000 earnings does not exceed $400,000. That is simply to encourage entrepreneurial talent and make you run a small business.

At one time intercorporate dividends were non-taxable. In other words, a dividend paid by a syndicate or by a businessman to the prime company did not carry tax. Under the present system, if this businessman totally controls the subsidiary business, the dividend does not bear tax; but if he does not control it or has a minority interest in the business, say 49 per cent, that is just tough: the act forces him to take the dividend into the prime company, and it is then passed on either to himself as a shareholder in the prime company or to his family. The complications are totally unreal because companies do have year ends and the dividends must be passed on before the next year end. This is the kind of thing this minister authorizes and this is the kind of problem the businessman faces.

Then, of course, we have the problem of surpluses. We have pre-1972 surpluses, post-1972 surpluses and capital surpluses, and the poor guy in the small business has to figure out when he takes a remittance from his company in the form of a dividend whether he is taking it out of pre-1972 earnings, which he can take out on a flat 15 per cent tax rate, whether it is a regular dividend, or how he can get it out as capital surplus which is not even subject to tax at all. These are the problems to which we must address ourselves.

These are not the only problems. A small businessman is forced to look after a tremendous amount of bookkeeping for this government. These T4 forms are marvelous forms for the average wage earner, but they have to be filled out by every employer. Of course, there are multi-carbons; carbon after carbon. They have to go through the Canada Pension Plan and make sure they have deducted, filed and filled in correctly the Canada Pension Plan deductions for their employees. Then, go on in the income tax form to the unemployment insurance portion for their employees, the hospital insurance and other deductions. This does not just involve T4's; it involves T5's, T4A's, T2's and others. These multi-carbon forms have to be filed with the minister, the recipient of income tax, or whoever, before February 28 under penalty, and these forms go on ad nauseam. It is no wonder that businessman after businessman has said to me: Look, if I had to get into it again I would not bother. There is no question about it, businessman after businessman has said this to me and other members, and I bet to the minister himself. They have said they work one-third, one-quarter or half their time looking after the problems of the Minister of National Revenue for free.

Mr. Benson said they were encouraging entrepreneurial talents and initiative through the tax system, but what encouragement is there? Let me talk about the great lie, that situation where we have dividend income and the grossing-up theory. To start off, we have the kind of dividend from the limited company to the individual, and that is all right. However, at the end of the year the corporation which paid the dividend has to produce a T5 slip. On that slip they do not declare what was paid to the individual but one-third more than was paid. Immediately the office is besieged with telephone calls from the shareholders wanting to know what the corporation is trying to do to them. They say they did not receive the money but have received T5 slips indicating a higher dividend. This is the kind of tax problem and form problem this minister has authorized.

The minister said he wanted suggestions. I hope he will sit down, put on his earphone and listen to some suggestions.

Mr. Stanbury: I don't need an earphone; I can hear you.

Mr. Blenkarn: As long as you do not need an earphone I will give you more suggestions as I go along, but I want to confine this suggestion to business problems.

Mr. Stanbury: That is, unless you are going to break into French.

Mr. Blenkarn: Let me return to this whole question of dividends. Under the old system you declared to the recipient the dividend he in fact got. He entered it and took a 20 per cent tax credit. Now, when we have this idea of equity, we gross up and then we take a dividend tax credit. The result to the recipient of the dividend may be that the dividend is tax free in the sense that under the system he gets up to 22 per cent or 23 per cent tax credit, or he may get 17 per cent. The difference is not very much, but most recipients of dividends do not receive that much, yet this whole grossing up and grossing down system is so confusing that the present system is not equity at all. This system authorized by the minister does not represent equity at all, but rather confusion, complexity and ridiculous expense.

Let us now turn to the question of the 25 per cent tax on small business corporations. It used to be about 21 per cent under the old act. The concept of this particular dividend credit system was that a dividend coming from a small business would not be doubly taxed. The effect of the system is to increase that tax to nearly 10 per cent over and above the corporate tax when dividends are taken into account. The complications are even greater when it comes to the situation where a small business, a small company or a proprietor is involved with two or three syndicates or businesses in which he has an interest.

I spoke earlier about passing dividends from one company to another. Small businessmen in particular are forced, because of the nature of the small amount of capital, to go into syndicates or partnerships with other businessmen. Part of the problem created in the act was solved, the Minister of Finance suggested, by his budget. He said that the provisions involving the use of surplus for investment would be allowed, but the minister has not solved this problem of passing on dividends from one company to another. What we must have from the minister is an amendment to the act to allow these changes.

I want now to refer to questions of capital gains as these apply to business in respect of real property, particularly manufacturing, office-oriented or store businesses. Large businesses are usually able to expand because they have the ability to go to the capital market and can work out something in respect of the sale or disposition of property, or the re-use of property for another feature of their activity. The small businessman is not in that fortunate position. If he expands and has to sell his office building, his store or his small factory, he must have the total proceeds of that sale in order to buy his next business, finance his next activity or to complete his expansion. Unfortunately, here the capital gains tax legislation comes into effect because the moment he sells his existing plant and uses the money from that sale to buy another plant he is required to pay a capital gains tax on the first sale.

The problem was apparent in respect of houses of ordinary individuals when the bill was passed and that was taken into account. However, in respect of small businesses the problem remains. The act must be changed so that small business will be allowed to expand by selling one property and using the proceeds to immediately purchase another property without a capital gains tax being imposed on the purchase. No one has a capital gain if he must replace the capital asset instantly for the expansion or continuation of his purposes. No capital gain is made until death do us part. In this respect, small business is seriously penalized in this act and in this form where it is forced to declare the asset, the holdings, the sale of that asset and the tax payable on that asset. The effect on the small business is that its expansion activities are seriously limited.

One of the main problems in connection with this act is the additional accounting costs. My activities prior to coming here were in advising small business firms concerning their taxes and corporate and business problems. I can say that from my personal experience since this act was passed almost every small businessman has faced nearly a 100 per cent increase in his accounting costs. The matter was brought to the attention of small businessmen by A. J. Little, President of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants when he spoke last December in Dartmouth. He said that it would take about two or three times longer for the small businessman to prepare his 1972 income tax return. He said the tax return for small businesses would be vastly more complicated than for the large corporation. He also stated:

"In this respect, we have an upside-down system where the burden of compliance will fall more heavily on individuals and corporations with lower incomes and lower capacity to pay."

I wish now to speak for a moment about a matter which does not appear in the forms except in the corporate sense. This is in connection with the write-off or the depletion or depreciation allowances to be granted to manufacturing companies for equipment bought during 1972, and the confusion that these fast write-off provisions are causing small business. A great number of small businessmen get up in the morning and go out to sell. In the afternoon they are supervising their plant. Many of their employees are both salesmen and machine operators. Some of their employees may be involved in manufacturing today and assembling tomorrow. Many of them are involved in shipping part-time or in delivering something another part of the time. A great deal of their activities involve manufacturing one or two components and importing or buying two or three other components and putting them together. When we come to a separate rate of corporate tax for manufacturing companies, these small corporations who operate in this fashion receive little if any benefit. Indeed, the whole system becomes a tax jungle and an accounting nightmare.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Ross Whicher (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, one really appreciates how concerned the members of the Conservative party are in respect of the motion presented this afternoon when one sees the attendance in the House. One might think that this motion was put forward today so that the big guns of the party could hold a little caucus this afternoon to see what kind of a serious motion they might come up with tomorrow in order to attempt to seize that power they desire so greatly.

I listened very attentively to what the last speaker had to say. I appreciate his seriousness. The only problem is that it is too bad he was not here in the 28th parliament because that was the time his speech should have been given. For a long time this afternoon he spoke about the illegality of the new tax form, the fact that the grossing up of dividends, for example, is illegal and that it is very difficult for the person making out the form to do so. I should like to tell him in all seriousness this afternoon that perhaps he was right in his speech, but in the last parliament there was not one single Conservative member who spoke about the grossing up of dividends. Therefore, in his speech this afternoon the hon. member really is not merely condemning the government, which it is his duty to do in a constructive manner, but is condemning his own party which did not once, either in the Senate or in the House of Commons, condemn the grossing up of dividends.

Mr. Blenkarn: I believe you passed this act with closure, did you not?

Mr. Whicher: I will tell you about that. When the bill finally passed parliament in 1972 there had been a total of 50 sitting days or about one third the normal time of the session provided for all the legislative steps in respect of this particular bill, so if my friend suggests there was an act of closure I suggest to him he does not know what he is talking about. That is the only really weak remark I have heard him make this afternoon.

I had the privilege to be a member of the opposition in the Ontario legislature for many years. I realize how difficult it is to be a member of an opposition party. I know that sometimes the bottom of the barrel is scraped in order to find criticisms in respect of government policy. This afternoon, however, I really think the great Progressive Conservative party made a very serious error in introducing this matter, because up until now members of that party had the whole country terrified about these tax forms. This afternoon we have found they are really not that bad and that the new tax forms contain some redeeming qualities which are acceptable to my friends in the opposition party.

Perhaps I might read from a little pamphlet which, many years ago, was written by a member of this House. Indeed it was written so long ago that perhaps he has forgotten about it. It is entitled "The Role of the Opposition." I remember being handed the pamphlet when I was in Toronto. It says that the opposition of course has a duty to oppose, but it is a duty to oppose constructively, to bring in sound advice for the government. Whether the government accepts that advice is another matter. Probably it will not accept advice from the opposition, but at least the opposition would have done its duty by bringing to the attention of parliament, the government and the people of Canada what it thinks should be done under certain circumstances.

The income tax forms had to be changed because new tax law was passed by parliament last session. I might remind hon. members that that was not done on the spur of the moment. There are many people in Canada who say tax reform should have taken place years ago, instead of ten years being spent discussing change. Even after the government issued its tax reform paper there was further extensive study for two years. During that time every Canadian had an opportunity to make a contribution to tax reform. Indeed, my hon. friends in the Conservative party who were members of the House of Commons finance committee participated in its deliberations every day and gave their criticism, most of it constructive I thought. To say that they did not have sufficient time and that closure took place is absolutely farcical. Never in our history has more time been devoted, inside or outside parliament, to any legislative matter.

In 1970 the Department of National Revenue taxation branch established its own tax reform task force to engage in basic research so that it would be prepared, as well as possible, to administer the new law. The work of this task force involved development of new systems, technique and procedures, retraining of staff and the creation of a program of assistance to taxpayers. All possible steps were taken to achieve as smooth a transition as possible from the old to the new taxation system. There was neither undue haste in constructing the law nor in its administration. In any jurisdiction where there are such comprehensive changes in the tax law, two or three years are required to iron out all wrinkles, to build up sufficient jurisprudence, etc. There is every indication that the advance planning of the department is resulting in an orderly transition to the new system.

For days, Mr. Speaker, we heard questions put by the hon. member who initiated this debate, complaining that the new tax form is complicated. Quite frankly, just from listening to the Official Opposition, I thought the new tax form was a terrible thing until I studied it over the weekend. The fact is that there are many responsible people in Canada who say it is a very fine form. One can give quotation after quotation from responsible financial people, from television and radio stations and from newspaper people, all to this effect. I give one example. In an editorial on this subject in the Financial Post of March 3, the following appeared:

> Speaking at Financial Post's tax strategy conference for the owner/manager, Lyman MacInnis, a Toronto partner of McDonald, Currie and Co. said:
> "The form is not complicated. Furthermore the guide that accompanies it is a masterpiece. It's the best guide I've seen anywhere."

I note, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member who moved the motion initiating this debate has left the chamber. This demonstrates his interest in the debate. I say to him and to my hon. friends in the Conservative party that surely they should be able to bring forward a more serious motion, rather than trying to get the people of Canada all worked up and worried about the new tax form. This shows lack of responsibility on their part. They are trying to instil in the people of Canada a lack of confidence in their ability to make out their own tax forms.

The 1972 tax guide consists basically of two parts. The first part is in the colour of the Progressive Conservative party, blue. Maybe that is a mistake. It is the only thing the Conservatives have not criticized. That part is a step by step instruction in completing the form.

Mr. Fairweather: It is like the speech they prepared for you.

Mr. Whicher: My hon. friend, I don't have to have my speeches prepared. If I have any talent at all, it is that I can talk for the next ten or 15 minutes without any notes; but I prefer to be accurate. And I suggest to my hon. friend that when he makes his speech on this topic he should be more accurate than some hon. members on that side of the House.

This blue part is the only section that most taxpayers have to use. The second part contains more detailed information. There has been criticism that too often the guide does not explain fully but refers the taxpayer to his nearest district office. That is done only when a full explanation would require knowledge of the taxpayer's personal situation or when it would be lengthy and complex and of interest to comparatively few people.

I have used these tax offices myself on numerous occasions over the years and I urge people to take advantage of them. The officials are there to help the ordinary taxpayers of Canada. I have had nothing but the greatest courtesy from them; they will bend over backwards to help. The hon. member who moved the motion said that the number of people in the Toronto office had been increased only by 30 to 60. He suggested this meant that one official would have to look after 25,000 inquiries. He should know perfectly well that he was grossly exaggerating beyond even parliamentary bounds. Not all taxpayers go to tax offices. The 60 people in Toronto and the officials in Ottawa, Hamilton and elsewhere do help the taxpayers.

The 1972 guide is new both in design and in substance. Any information required by the majority of taxpayers is in it. The Department of National Revenue taxation branch has been commended by tax authorities in other countries, as well as in Canada, for the simplicity of the guide and its easy to follow instructions. You do not have to take my word for this, Mr. Speaker; just read the newspapers and the editorials. People are beginning to catch on to the fact that even though the form is new, and even though they do not like paying taxes, the Department of National Revenue has done a remarkable job in its first year of dealing with the new form.

When some critics talk about the complexity of the 1972 tax return they are seldom specific about what they mean. Presumably they refer to the guide as well as to the form. I doubt they can offer any evidence that the guide is anything but the best one we have ever had. Most taxpayers will experience no more difficulty in completing the form than they have in recent years.

It would be very nice if the tax form could be as simple as A, B, C. An across the board percentage of all income for tax purposes would require only a few simple forms, but such a system would be inequitable. Forms are a reflection of the law and of the efforts of the lawmakers to provide an equitable system of taxation. Let us be fair, Mr. Speaker; the tax form is not as complex as many of the critics make it out to be.

This afternoon the mover of the motion gave six reasons why he was introducing his motion. First he said the form was confusing and he gave his opinion on that. This afternoon the minister quoted from speeches and editorials of various people across Canada to show that it is not confusing. It may be confusing in the mind of the hon. member and he is attempting to spread that confusion, for political purposes, all across the country. That is not fair to the people of Canada. Secondly, Mr. Speaker, he said that the grossing up of dividends was illegal and if people had to sign the bottom of these forms it would make them crooks. This suggestion came from the other side of the House even before today.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, not one Progressive Conservative spoke in the last parliament against the grossing up of dividends. Let us suppose for a moment that there might be some substance to the suggestion that the grossing up of dividends is illegal and that the taxpayer did not get the amount that he put down as gross income. Surely it would be equally unbiased to suggest that a person should put in only his net pay instead of his gross pay; in other words, only his take-home pay. Some things have been taken off, such as Canada Pension Plan contributions, income tax deductions, unemployment insurance and hospitalization. In the instance we are discussing, something was taken off as well—the dividend. If the company concerned had not paid corporation taxes there would obviously have been a bigger dividend. For this reason I suggest that if it is right and honest to put down the gross pay, it is also right and honest to put down what the gross dividends would have been had the company concerned not been paying taxes.

There are other provisions in the tax form which my hon. friend suggests are illegal. Three provisions which are reflected in the 1972 tax return but which have not been passed by parliament are the increase from $650 to $1,000 in the old age exemption, the increase from $650 to $1,000 in the disability exemption which is still in existence, and the introduction of the education deduction of $50 a month for full-time attendance at qualifying post-secondary institutions.

Ordinarily, and this was done by the Department of National Revenue, the tax department immediately begins to prepare for tax changes announced in budgets pending parliamentary enactment of legislation; otherwise there would be lengthy delays in their implementation. Enabling legislation is ordinarily passed relatively soon after the budget. In this instance, the government introduced legislation, Bill C-222, to implement the budget provisions but a general election intervened before full consideration and passage of the bill and it died on the order paper in 1972. The Minister of Finance has clearly indicated that he will introduce legislation as soon as possible in the current session to achieve the same purpose as Bill C-222.

Because of time required for design and printing of tax forms, the department was faced with the decision last autumn to include or exclude the aforementioned three items. The decision was taken to include them. Not to include them would have meant that when and if they become law many taxpayers would be forced to file a second return for reassessment. Returns now being filed which are claiming under any of the three provisions are processed to the stage immediately prior to assessment; then they are set aside pending passage of the legislation. When parliament passes the legislation, completion of the assessment can be done quickly and refunds, where they apply, will be mailed with a minimum of delay. Relatively few such returns have been identified so far. Few, if any, taxpayers will suffer any inconvenience if the House deals in the relatively early future with the enabling legislation.

Mr. Speaker, it was with some regret that I saw this motion put before us this afternoon. I must say that I regard it as a strictly political motion. It has done nothing but cause some consternation in the minds of the public. It has not always been my practice to congratulate ministers, but in this instance I think the minister has done an outstanding job.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whicher: Let us not forget that this is a new form.

An hon. Member: It is a real mess, isn't it?

Mr. Whicher: It is not a real mess at all. I could take the next five minutes to quote endorsements by responsible financial people in Canada who say that this is the best form we have ever had—and not only in Canada but it is the best guide in the whole world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whicher: I say, Mr. Speaker, that the once great Progressive Conservative party is doing nothing but causing some consternation in the ordinary taxpayer's mind in bringing such a motion before us this afternoon. I would remind my hon. friend who introduced the motion, but unfortunately he is not here, that there is nothing in the rules of parliament that would prevent his withdrawing it. Surely that would be the sensible thing to do.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, of course, if there had not been the resolution we would not have been treated to the speech by the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher). I am glad he likes the blue forms. If they are so simple, I wonder why the government has seen fit to spend such an inordinate amount of money on the Fred Davis advertisements. One of my constituents was so upset by the "world's best income tax forms" that she bundled them all up and sent them to Fred Davis because she was sure he would fix them up for her. I am informed that Fred Davis himself gave up attempts to deal with his income tax returns and sent the forms to his accountant.

I want to take the few minutes that are allocated to me, Mr. Speaker, to discuss one aspect of income tax, that is, the right of our citizens to privacy. I think perhaps this aspect has been overlooked by all but a couple of editorialists. I do not purport to have a series of endorsations of my position that will take up the rest of my time, but I do seriously think that matters of privacy and mutual trust are questions that this parliament should be concerned about.

The whole structure of income tax collection in Canada has been based on mutual trust. The Department of National Revenue relies on the taxpayer to make an honest statement of his income, and the taxpayer relies on the department to keep secret the information about his affairs except in tax evasion proceedings. To the question, "Will the tax man tell?" the answer seems to be that he will, depending on who asks and for what purpose. There is a frighteningly long list of officials, authorized persons and others who have some claim to the production of income tax data. I think this is an area that should be of general concern to parliament and to the taxpayers of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fairweather: Although officials or authorized persons may not intentionally communicate income tax information to anybody except those persons specified by law in prescribed circumstances, the list of persons to whom communication of some kind is permitted turns out to be fairly long. For instance, there are "other officials and authorized persons", there are "provincial governments", there are "persons otherwise legally entitled", which I suggest might include the chief statistician of Canada, certain foreign governments, the trustee in bankruptcy, the liquidator, the courts in certain circumstances, royal commissions investigating tax matters, the attorney general, the taxpayer who provided the information in the first place and his legal agent or representative.

An official or authorized person can be compelled to reveal income tax information in criminal proceedings under any federal law, not only in tax fraud cases. I think this is a matter of some surprise to people. We usually think of income tax forms as being sacrosanct. The law uses the expression "may", but I suggest that anybody who can show that he is entitled to income tax information under the loose wording of the act can probably compel disclosure.

The definition of "official" is particularly broad. The Income Tax Act provides that an official is any person employed in, or occupying a position of responsibility in the service of Her Majesty, or any person formerly so employed or formerly occupying a position therein. That definition seems to include all ministers, deputy ministers and senior civil servants and does not even exclude former ministers or former civil servants.

An official in the course of his duties investigating the affairs of a taxpayer would not be contravening section 241(1), the basic secrecy section, if he communicated information to a former high civil servant currently in the business world. It may be that I am drawing a wide bow here; I am doing this to emphasize the dangers. According to the present act, it is possible for a former official to be in possession of information regarding a taxpayer under investigation.

When an income tax return is produced in open court, there is nothing in the act to prevent the judge quoting from the form in full, not only facts about income but all the details of dependents, medical expenses and charitable donations. There is nothing to prevent the party to the legal dispute who has obtained the income tax return from communicating its contents in full to anybody he chooses. There is not even anything to prevent persons who happen to wander into the courtroom that day from finding out every detail contained in the tax return and communicating that information to others; yet the person whose income tax return is so disclosed might very well be acquitted.

Canadians, I think, have been led to believe that their income tax returns are as secret as their census returns or their ballots. Yet I suggest very seriously that recent events cast doubt on this assumption. A recent case has shaken that sssumption and revealed that legal protection for the confidentiality of tax returns is far from complete.

Richard Green, LL.M., of Queen's University, who now is a research associate at the Canadian Tax Foundation in Toronto, published a study in the January issue of the Canadian Tax Journal in which he concludes that the present legal position of income tax returns is "illogical and can lead to injustice." Mr. Green points specifically to the wording of the Income Tax Act which according to him shows a bias in favour of the taxpayer's privacy, but once legal proceedings begin, the returns and the documents from which they are compiled can be introduced in evidence. The balance swings from the privacy of the individual to the administration of justice. Mr. Green's summary of the present legal position regarding income tax confidentiality indicates that the effect of wording which sounds as if it is providing broad protection of privacy is considerably whittled away by the exceptions contained in section 241(8) (9) and (10) and by court proceedings.

As it is nearly six o'clock, I should like to make one or two suggestions. One of them would interest the hon. member for Bruce, that hon. member who is so upset about attendance but who has left the chamber. The first suggestion comes from Mr. I. H. Asper, a Winnipeg lawyer and leader of the Manitoba Liberal party. Understandably, he finds the form not to his liking. Mr. Asper feels that the commitment of the government to protect the secrecy of taxpayers should be maintained. He wants to make sure that that principle will not be breached. Mr. Asper feels that an assurance to this effect ought to be repeated. I am sure he hopes that the assurance will come from the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Stanbury).

The former minister of national revenue has said only that the policy of the Department of National Revenue is to do only what is permitted under section 241 of the Income Tax Act. Regrettably, that section in its wording is almost as vague as the minister was, enough so to make one wonder if Canada's entire system of income tax is indeed in peril. If Canada's system of self-reporting income tax is to be regarded as a mutual trust, it should be publicly declared as such by the government.

Second, I do not think there is room for a nebulous category of persons "otherwise legally entitled". The taxpayer should know precisely who has access to his income tax return and in what situations. Third, only the relevant part of an income tax return, if produced in court, should become part of the public record. One of the reasons for the present legal situation is the breakdown of Crown privilege in relation to income tax returns as a class of documents. If I may interpolate, the doctrine of Crown privilege is a legal doctrine which gives a minister of the Crown the right to withhold documents on the ground that their publication would be contrary to the public interest. The courts have generally refused to accept the idea that all income tax returns are in a class of documents of this kind. Judges have asserted their right to examine the individual tax returns involved to see whether the revenue minister is right in claiming that the public interest would be damaged by their publication.

Lastly, the assistant deputy attorney general said that the justice department is entitled to use information given to the income tax department in cases in which the good of public administration and the administration of justice are concerned. I suggest, with respect, that as matters stand, the information provided on our income tax forms could wind up being widely discussed. I conclude by reading an excerpt from an editorial that appeared in the Financial Times on January 15 of this year. It reads in part:

> What is needed is a simple prohibition preventing the use of income tax information for anything but the collection of the tax itself and the prosecution of the taxpayer for having falsified his return.

I suggest that what the public expects is a statement to the effect that that is the law. I would be obliged if, during the course of this debate, someone speaking on behalf of the Minister of National Revenue would clarify the record and make that assertion in parliament.

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. J.-Roland Comtois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words on the motion before the House to try to explain as simply as I can the method of determining the amount of deduction from tax in respect of dividends, referred to as the dividend tax credit. This method for 1972 requires that an individual include in income an amount that is in addition to the amount of dividends he actually receives, but it should be noted that the individual may then deduct from his federal tax, not from his income, an amount equal to 20 per cent of the total amount he has added to his income on account of the dividends. Thus, the fact that an amount in addition to the dividend must be included in income increases the amount that may be deducted from an individual's tax.

Income Tax

The effect of the dividend tax credit is to substantially lower the amount of tax payable on a dividend. For example, if an individual had $7,000 of taxable income before counting his dividend, and he received a dividend of $300, the federal tax on the dividend, if there were no dividend tax credit, would be 25 per cent of $300 which is $75. Under the tax credit arrangement in effect for 1972 he would include $400 in income on account of the dividend. The tax on this would be 25 per cent, which is $100, but his dividend tax credit deductible from tax would be 20 per cent of $400, which is $80, and this would wipe out a large part of the tax payable in respect of his dividend.

Some taxpayers express concern that the additional amount that must be included in income in respect of a dividend will place them in a higher tax bracket. This is a misunderstanding. A progressive income tax system, such as that in Canada, uses a graduated rate schedule which imposes an increased rate of tax upon each additional bracket of income. As a result of this system, the additional amount included in income in respect of a dividend may, in some cases, fall into a higher bracket and be subject to a higher marginal or top rate than the dollars received before including this income, but additional income does not affect the rate of tax on all the income of a taxpayer. To illustrate, if a taxpayer had exactly $2,000 of taxable income, which means income after all exemptions and deductions, the rate schedule for 1972 would impose a federal tax of $365 on that amount. This is about 18 per cent of $2,000. Each additional dollar of income over the $2,000, up to $3,000, would be taxed at 20 per cent. This is a higher rate than the tax on the first $2,000, but these additional dollars of taxable income would not affect the amount of tax on the $2,000. As explained before, the additional amount added to income in respect of the dividend increases the amount of the dividend tax credit which is a deduction from tax.

Most Canadians agree that it is desirable that Canadians be encouraged to invest in shares of Canadian companies. This is one of the main reasons why the tax law provides a credit against tax in respect of dividends from Canadian corporations. The change in the method of computing this credit introduced for 1972 made the credit more valuable to those with low incomes than to those with high incomes.

Some taxpayers have asked why a change was made from the previous method of computing the dividend tax credit and why it should be necessary to increase the actual dividend by one-third to arrive at the figure shown in box B on the T-5 slips, called "Taxable amount". This procedure, sometimes called grossing up, has two effects. First, by increasing the amount of the dividend, thereby increasing the shareholder's income and the size of his credit, the situation that would have existed had not the corporate profits been taxed in the hands of the corporations is more closely approximated. Second, the grossing-up of the dividend is equivalent to providing a larger credit and making the amount of the credit taxable. As a result, the dividend tax credit tends to be more beneficial to the lower income taxpayers than to those with higher incomes.

This may be a brief explanation, Mr. Speaker, but it shows that this method of calculating the credit is fair and, I think, practical in this situation.

Mr. Charles E. Haliburton (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure to rise in this House to discuss such a troublesome matter to the people of Canada as the new tax forms with which a great many Canadians will have to cope this year. They are confusing. No amount of public relations or speech-making in this House will resolve that confusion. I can sympathize with the people who prepared the forms, the schedules and the brochure because obviously one of the basic reasons the form is confusing is that the law which was established in this House is indeed complicated. It makes it very difficult to prepare a form which is easy to follow when the law is obtuse and pretty well concealed from even the bulk of the tax authorities in this country.

The form is mammoth compared with last year's form. This was demonstrated by one of my friends on this side of the House in the photograph referred to earlier by the minister. The guide, perhaps somewhat more psychedelic than it was before, does not have the appearance of any confusion. In fact, it appears quite orderly on the surface. Indeed, some aspects of it are very easy to understand. I wish to read into the record one or two excerpts which I think are meritorious on the part of the people who drafted the guide. One of the most striking is the first paragraph in this booklet:

> Stripped of all its mystery, a tax form is simply a piece of paper on which you do four basic things:
> (1) identify yourself.
> (2) lsit your income.
> (3) reduce your income by subtracting allowable deductions.
> (4) calculate your tax.

That is a masterful touch on the part of the draftsman. Indeed, if that were all there were to preparing the income tax return which this year the government has placed before the people of Canada, there would be no trouble at all in preparing it. What else do we find in the little book? The answer is the blue pages. These are prepared, it says, for almost all taxpayers. But if we follow the blue pages carefully, we find there is no mention anywhere of listed property. It would seem that the great mass of the taxpayers who are expected to fill out these forms do not possess any property which falls into this category. The taxpayer who this year will be able to follow these blue pages is the taxpayer who last year used the simple T-1 form, the taxpayer who has no income other than his earnings from employment, the taxpayer who has no savings, the taxpayer who owns no chattels worth any significant amount of money—or, if he does, he is not dealing in them because certainly values do not need to be very extraordinary before the blue pages no longer apply.

• (2010)

I have now found the quotation I was looking for in this section. It reads:

> While this section will probably not be needed by most people—

The reference is to income from other sources. Mr. Speaker, there are few people who do not derive income from some other sources. This, it seems to me, portrays the attitude of the government, one which will come to fruition in the future when most people will not even be able to invest in a Canada savings bond by way of saving for their old age. Obviously, if they have such an investment they will not be able to fill out the form on the basis of this section. This form is designed for the Canadian taxpayer of the future. It is designed for the poor taxpayer of the future, perhaps even in 1973 when the citizen cannot save sufficient money from which to make investments, buy a cottage for which he might incur a tax liability or acquire a work of art worth more than $1,000.

Then we turn to the aspect of the guide dealing with capital gains. A capital gains tax is one which the great majority of Canadians consider to be applicable only to the wealthy, to those born with a silver spoon in their mouth. But one need not read for very long in the guide before determining that there are not many Canadians who will escape the penalties contained in these provisions affecting capital gains. I want to read one excerpt from that section in the guide which has gone to the other extreme. The compiler of this guide started out in good faith, but by page 27 he is bogging down a bit. It reads:

To compute a capital gain or loss on an asset acquired before 1972, three figures are required:

—the actual cost
—the valuation day value
—the proceeds of disposition as described above.
(Note that adjustments to the cost base may change the proceeds of disposition for this purpose.)

The median of these three figures—

I always understood that the median was half way between two points, and thus one could not have a median somewhere between three figures. It may be I am lacking in appreciation of the niceties of the language and do not understand what it means, but I suggest there are a great many taxpayers who will not be able to understand this, either. It continues:

—that is, the figure which is neither the highest nor the lowest, is the base upon which the capital gain or loss is computed, subject to the election explained below. Where two or more of these three figures are in the same amount, that amount will be the median. This median figure is deemed to be the adjusted cost of the asset and is the amount to be entered in column 2 of schedule 2, provided that there are no adjustments as outlined in item 58. If there are adjustments, contact your district taxation office.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Haliburton: At about the time I got to that line I had already decided I would rush to my accountant as soon as I had dug up all the information necessary to determine exactly what had to be done.

Item 68 in the guide talks about valuation day. Valuation day is a concept which will soon come home to Canadian taxpayers. I suggest that the item in the guide constitutes a trap, especially for the taxpayer who does not take the precaution to consult someone who is knowledgeable about the provisions of the new act.

Today we have heard members on the other side encouraging taxpayers to file tax returns this year without consulting anyone with special knowledge of the tax situation. This might be because there are so few people who thoroughly understand the legislation: witness the statement by Mr. Thorson, as I understand it, that there were only half a dozen such people in the world, of whom he was one and the other five were in his department. How is a person to get fair treatment when it comes to the disposal of his assets if he starts off without receiving proper advice from a tax expert on whether to make an election to use valuation day values or values on acquisition?

Many taxpayers will make a mistake; they will do the wrong thing, and in years to come they will incur a severe penalty. It may be said that the tax law applies to everyone else in the same way it applies to them, but the initial error might have been made simply because they were not accustomed to receiving expert advice when preparing their tax forms. This in itself is a good reason for allowing an extension of time during which taxpayers would have an opportunity to receive professional advice.

Another curious thing about this tax form is that there is no provision for deducting losses in most cases of change in capital value. The only thing the government seems to be concerned with are capital gains. Those who lose go pretty much unrewarded or without much of a deduction.

The detailed information that is required to complete the income tax return is, I suggest to the House, a most serious invasion of privacy. The information that is required in terms of filing valuation day reports calls for the most soul searching determination of every asset that a family owns that might possibly have some value, particularly those that might have a value of over $1,000 in terms of 1972 dollars, which will be worth heaven knows what in ten years' time.

Eventually this will surely mean the declaration of every piece of jewellery and every jewel that is an heirloom in the family, every jewel of value that is passed from mother to daughter. Antique furniture that may have acquired value over the years is another item. It is easy to cite examples of furnishings that will be worth over $1,000 and which have been passed down from generation to generation. Perhaps paintings are an even better example. I suggest this constitutes a very substantial tax by virtue of the continuing inflation that this country has experienced during the past few years. At the current rate, I suggest that when we are compiling an inventory of our personal assets we might be very wise to keep the receipts for underwear that we have bought; with inflation going the way it is, that might end up worth over $1,000 too.

I want to consider for a moment the impact that these forms, and perhaps the forms that will be incorporating the provisions of the 1972 budget resolutions, will have on manufacturing industries. Again the taxpayer, particularly the small businessman, is going to be faced with a substantial tax, not just because of the inflationary aspect of capital gains that I mentioned a moment ago but because small businesses will be required to retain tax consultants to an extent they never have before. In a lot of cases, instead of a business having a part-time accountant or accounts kept by the proprietor himself, a full-time accountant will be needed to keep track of all capital transactions, as well as revenue and expenditure incurred in the normal course of business. This will mean an additional tax in the form of money expended on appraisal fees to defend the company against any tax levy that the department may seek to impose upon them in the future.

Furthermore, there is the uncertainty of never knowing whether a valuation day report will be acceptable to the department. If it is overruled, a businessman may then require legal advice, again involving him in further expense which could be considered akin to a legal fees tax. Legal experts would need to be employed to argue a case before the Tax Appeal Board. Then, again, any attempt to pass on a business that is not a family farm to members of one's family faces another tax.

All these things result from the effect of this legislation upon small business. By "small business" I speak of the businessman who does business in my constituency of South Western Nova where there are many fish plants, fishermen who own their own boats, and lumber mills. These people do a volume of business of perhaps $250,000 a year and employ 15 to 20 persons. What will be the impact upon those persons when they attempt to determine the income they derive from manufacturing and processing and other facets of their business? For example, take the case of the owner of a fish plant who may also be a boat owner, a fish buyer who may be in the business of filleting fresh fish and shipping them to market as they are, a man who is in the business of freezing and packaging, or a person who is in the business of fish sales and brokerage. Freezing and packaging apparently come under the manufacturing or processing provisions of the legislation. This kind of businessman will not reap any of the benefits of the legislation; rather, it will be a liability to him.

As I say, I represent a rural riding, one with many small businesses and old people. My riding has perhaps a higher percentage of older people than other ridings in Canada, and some aspects of these new forms are particularly troublesome to the elderly. The advertising program that was instituted by the government to familiarize Canadians with the forms and to convince them that it was easy to fill them out did not really cover local areas where the great proportion of the population do not take the large dailies but read the weeklies. The government did not see fit, at least initially, to advertise in the weeklies; as a result, people in the rural areas were not made aware of how "easy to understand" these forms are. As a result, they were a month or two behind, psychologically speaking, in preparing themselves for the insurmountable task of filing their 1972 income tax return.

Most federal and private tax consulting offices, as I understand it, have been forced to extend their office hours in order to cope with the increased demands that are being made upon them. I understand a great many of them are keeping their offices open until nine o'clock and that the government has experienced a similar phenomenon as far as their own information facilities for taxpayers are concerned. At the same time, tax consultants and accountants have naturally found it necessary to increase their fees since the time consumed in preparing these returns has increased. Thus, the cost of retaining an accountant has increased this year.

As I mentioned earlier, when the associate deputy minister of justice was asked about this Income Tax Act while speaking to the Tax Foundation, he stated that only six people fully understood the act; they were himself and five of his employees.

Mr. Stanbury: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Stanbury) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Stanbury: Since the former associate deputy minister of justice is not in the House and able to answer for himself, I think the hon. gentleman would want to check the authority for that reference. The last member who used those words in this House received a correction from the associate deputy minister of justice to the effect that he had said no such thing.

Mr. Haliburton: Mr. Speaker, I hope I have not misled the House, and I am grateful for any rectification. I was relying on the report in Hansard.

Mr. Stanbury: You were quoting another Conservative member.

Mr. Haliburton: The mathematical calculations required to complete a return are complex and confusing.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

• (2030)

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I just want to bring a few things to the attention of the minister and the House. I wrote to the minister some time ago because of a problem which had been brought to my attention by an accountant in my area. The minister was good enough to reply. In addition, he sent me a short note on February 26 in which he said that during the tax return filing period, if I had developed some ideas or had received opinions from constituents about tax forms, and so on, I might be kind enough to bring them forward. This evening I should like to bring to the attention of the minister and the House several matters that have been brought to my attention. He may agree that some of them require correction or he may say that there really is not a problem. All I can do is bring these problems to the attention of the minister.

I have an accountant friend who does what I need to be done in filing a return. He said to me as far back as last fall that accountants were going to have difficulty with the new provisions. Some of the things which have come to my attention indicate that these difficulties have occurred. I would refer to a letter I received from an accountant. I sent this to the minister and asked for a reply and he was good enough to provide one. This accountant pointed out that there was real confusion in regard to capital gains tax as it applied to farmers claiming under part 11 as against part 17. Under part 11, the recovery provisions provided prior to 1972 would work out all right but under part 17 they would not. The accountant who wrote to me detailed this at some length.

The minister replied that this would be corrected to some extent, or perhaps altogether, by the ways and means motions that might come in February, 1973. This may be so, and probably is. But what puzzles me is why on earth the taxation proposal for the farm business did not simply leave things on a straight cash reporting basis in simple and easy terms, so returns could be filed by farmers and the people who often do filing in rural communities and prepare estimates of farmers' income returns. If this is a provision in respect of which a chartered accountant finds it necessary to point out the difficulties which exist, and asks me to do what I can to have them clarified, then those who drafted these provisions in the first place did not do their job. Indeed, there are a number of areas in which these gentlemen did not do their job.

Let me point out one area in respect of cattle herds and the farmer and rancher who make their living, or part of it, from raising cattle. When this legislation was going through the House we on this side pleaded with the government to leave the basic herd concept alone, but they would not do that. They wiped out the basic herd concept and had to come back with another proposal in this budget which I understand, and I can be corrected, means that the farmer can take a build-up into inventory at some point of time and spread it over a period of years. Why adopt this involved method of doing things as against a simple concept which existed and worked? I do not know the answer.

Anyone who has anything to do with income tax knows that if you are going to dispose of a cattle herd, take it into inventory and spread it over a number of years, thereby saving yourself income tax in one particular year, you must plan to do that some time ahead. If a farmer has not received the advice of an income tax consultant that he is able to do this and save himself money, he will not know this provision is available to him and will not take advantage of it. He will end up paying more taxes than he should.

There were two courses open to the government, either to retain the basic herd concept or adopt another simple method to allow a farmer or a rancher to set up his cattle herd as a depreciable asset, just as you might with machine tools in a factory or, indeed, machinery on the farm.

An hon. Member: Why not give him a write-off?

Mr. Gleave: Someone suggests we should give the farmer a write-off. I suggest if this government stays in power long enough and fiddles with taxes, it will have to give everybody a write-off and perhaps write the farmer right out of the picture. I am pleading with the people across the way for some ordinary common sense in tackling these problems. This is one situation which could make a great difference to the farmers of this country.

Let me deal briefly with the capital gains proposal, that is, to set aside the tax in the case where a farm stays in the family on the death of the father. Why was this provision restricted to the time of death? Most people are aware that many farms are transferred during the lifetime of the farmer. Why not make this applicable during his lifetime, particularly if the objective is to facilitate the transfer without hardship to the family and to maintain a farm within the family? In this way you could maintain a viable structure. If this was the objective, then why not include transfers during a farmer's lifetime? Indeed, it is the concern of government to maintain land for farming, and maintain it within the family farm structure. That is the objective of the land bank program in Saskatchewan; that is the concern of British Columbia in its approach to land.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): What about estate taxes? Do they help the farmer?

Mr. Gleave: Don't worry about Alberta, because you haven't got a plan there. When you people to my right have a program of any kind, then you can start to work. But you don't have one yet. This is a matter which concerns a number of provincial governments. Therefore I ask, why wasn't this provision designed to cover the whole area? Why was it not thought through so that it would cover the family farm corporation? I do not know whether anyone called it to the attention of the minister or his assistants. However, so far as I know it does not apply to the family farm corporation. If, as I say, the stated objective is to keep the farm operation intact, then this situation should be corrected very quickly so that these transfers can be made easier. I wonder whether those people who did the planning thoroughly thought it through or whether this was just a hastily thought up idea that was thrown in. We are very concerned about this.

We have some problems. A farmer wrote to me concerning his situation. The Department of National Revenue had decided that the expenses he had incurred in renovating his farm were not expenses for the current year, could not be classified as repairs and therefore they represented an addition to his capital investment. They decided to capitalize his invertment on that particular building. Since this farmer had written to me, I wrote to the department to see what could be done about the situation. I am not an income tax consultant by any means. The answers I received were the soul of brevity. The first answer was that they had decided to do it in that way. When I wrote back and asked why they did not notify the person and why they did not do this or that, they replied that they had notified him and he had three weeks in which to answer. Acting on this man's behalf, I do not know any more now than I did before I took the trouble to write two letters to the department concerned.

Mr. Stanbury: You should have written to me.

Mr. Gleave: I appreciate the minister saying that, because he is courteous and has replied to me on occasion. I will do so. Thank you.

Mr. Stanbury: Everybody else does.

Mr. Gleave: I do not expect the people in the department to really break their necks for a Member of Parliament, but if I take the trouble to write on behalf of someone, surely they would know we are concerned and would try to give us some of the facts to work with. I think what is needed here as much as anything is real contact with the man who is paying the taxes, who is carrying the load and who is trying to meet the circumstances under which he operates.

In my experience, most people are quite prepared to pay the tax that is due whether they be salaried, wage earners or businessmen. I think under the circumstances every effort ought to be made to co-operate in making these provisions as clear and as uncomplicated as possible. I think this is the essence of the matter. That is why I say in relation to the basic herd that it was a good concept and if that method is not to be used, then the cattle herd should be made an appreciable asset subject to depreciation. I hope these few thoughts that I am throwing out are of some help and that we might soon be able to simplify the forms and procedures for the benefit of the ordinary taxpayer.

I do not particularly wish again this evening to go into the provisions of the budget and what they do or do not do for the taxpayer about whom we are talking. This matter has been gone through and I suppose it will be raised again. My main concern is to put forward some ideas which might be of help in these circumstances. I believe some of these problems apply to small business as well as farms because the farmer and the small businessmen operate very similar concerns. I hope those in the department will attempt to simplify the procedure because if they do, time and money will be saved for all concerned.

Mr. Fernand-E. Leblanc (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, having examined the first motion which the opposition had the opportunity to introduce, I am surprised to see that they had nothing to find fault with, except the income tax forms which apparently are complex and illegal. Evidently, I cannot discuss whether they are illegal or not because I do not think that I have the necessary qualifications to do so since I am not a lawyer. However, I am quite surprised that they lay no other blame upon the government.

We are told that the income tax forms are confusing and that we must speed up the payment of income tax refunds to over 6 million taxpayers. Therefore, I am pleased to note that the opposition has nothing else to hold against us.

As for this year's income tax returns, I think they can be explained easily. People with lesser education than the hon. member for York Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) or others can complete the form themselves without being helped by an accountant or a lawyer. I was able to experience it myself for people asked me how was the form as compared with last year's and they realized that it is much simpler because in 1971 and before, income tax returns varied with income. There were then the T-1 Short, and the T-1 General for those in business or whose income was over a specified maximum.

And if my memory serves me right, the maximum was then $8,000. As for the 1971 guide, I suggest that it was much more complicated than that for the present year, all the more so since it only applied to those who had to fill a T1 short form.

Moreover, it has to be said that the tax table for 1971 and the previous years was made for incomes up to $8,000, which means that many taxpayers whose income was over $8,000 necessarily had to make what was called a detailed tax calculation on a form which was attached to the T-1 General Form. As far as the T-1 short from is concerned, this calculation could not be done because this form only applied to people whose income was $8,000 or less.

This year, the 1972 tax table enables those who have an income of $12,000 to know what amount of tax they have to pay without making a detailed calculation, and I suggest that this is a definite improvement.

I would like to refer as well to an article published in Le Soleil of February 3, 1973, and written by Monique Payeur. I quote:

In order to have a more equitable tax system,—

And I believe that our tax system is more equitable than it has ever been, after ten years of study.

—the federal government has made a complete review of its top legislation and introduces for 1972 a standard tax form for everybody—

In 1972, for instance, the federal government published eleven small booklets in the series "Tax Reform", dealing with specific points of the new tax policy, like child care expenses, travel expenses, capital gains, basic herds, etc.

Therefore, the people who must pay taxes have already received from the Department of National Revenue booklets explaining how to make this calculation, since this is a new act developped as a result of studies carried out by the House. We received the Carter report and, later on, we studied the white paper on the tax reform for a year and a half to two years. This was followed by the introduction of a bill which represented a rather drastic tax reform, needless to say, to help more those who earned less because they are overtaxed compared with other taxpayers.

When the tax reform was studied by this House, several arguments were invoked, for an against, of course, but it was passed and later on, as I have already mentioned, the Department of National Revenue sent out brochures to the people explaining the new deductions to which they were entitled and also the whys and wherefores of those deductions.

I fail to see any problem, all the more so considering the fact that an income tax act, in as complex a business world as ours, cannot be simple. To my mind, the department managed to produce a fairly simple form, in view of course of the complexity of the act.

This act was not necessarily prepared by the Liberal party; it was prepared while the Liberal party was in power, as it has been for many years, and will be for many years to come. The Liberal party called on specialists. Indeed, within the Department of National Revenue, there is an advisory committee made up of legal advisers, specialists in the field of taxation and accountants. These people got together and assisted department officials in preparing the simplest form possible.

And the one that we are considering and for whose defects we are condemned by its opponents is not merely a product of members of the Liberal party or officials of the Income tax Division, but also that of people from the private sector, specialists in this field, who have worked hard trying to draft a personal income tax form which would make it easier for the individual to complete his income tax return and which would at the same time comply with the provisions of the new Income Tax Act which, obviously, is rather complex because in a modern and complex world it is very hard to draft a very simple law.

However, they did achieve something quite simple to prepare, covering a maximum of four pages. First of all, identification of the individual involved, which poses no problems. For those who have incomes other than remuneration for their employment, something very useful has been prepared, the appendixes.

Formerly, there were no schedules. What happened was that people had to prepare their own for submission to the tax bureau. Now, these schedules are supplied.

Schedule 1 includes detailed calculation of taxes applying only to those having incomes of $12,000 and over, thus probably eliminating at least half of taxpayers who do not have to do anything about schedule I.

Schedule 2 concerns statement of capital dispositions. Of course, formerly when sales of capital goods had been carried out, an accountant had to be hired to make out such a document for the civil servant checking this formula, with details of the sale compared with the cost, and so on.

What has been added is the provision concerning capital gains and losses. Now, one of those who spoke before me suggested that the guide contained nothing about capital losses. Well I found out that it does contain something. The government cannot collect from Canadian taxpayers more than they must pay, but really what all Canadians must pay according to the law.

And I am surprised that the hon. member for York-Simcoe, who submitted that motion, has not shown more interest in it; because after he had presented it this afternoon, he disappeared and has not been seen since.

This simply proves the weakness of the Progressive Conservatives' motion. In my opinion, that motion does not make any sense.

Furthermore, schedule 3 deals with medical expenses and charitable donations. But it's not everyone who has to report any for deduction purposes, and the government has added a schedule for them to give the details of the receipts they have in their possession, so that they can claim that deduction.

The income tax return contains a section to make a statement of investment income. Now, in the 1971 form, the reporting of investment income was mentioned, but very briefly, so that many people complained that there was not enough space to report that income properly. Of course for those who make investments, a schedule has been added this year. Once again, I fail to see the difficulty in referring to this annex.

Schedule 5 deals with child care expenses. Of course we had to include child care expenses in the 1972 returns, because they are something new. They were brought in by the Liberal party and the taxpayers have welcomed them. If they were to profit from their deductions, we obviously had to include an annex for people to note the details of their expenditure in this field.

Schedule 6 deals with additional personal exemptions. Those who have difficulties with their married persons' exemptions and wish to be taxed otherwise than as persons married to a legitimate spouse, will require a special form for additional information so that they can qualify for married status.

Schedule 7 deals with real estate rentals. A good many Canadians are now property owners, we are pleased to see, and receive a small income from this. Rather than force them to consult an accountant and spend money to have a statement of their real estate income and expenditure drawn up, we printed an annex, which will obviously be of help to them.

For those who receive other income, such as sales commission, we added another annex, 9, which is a statement of income and expenses. Here again, this spares the taxpayers the expense of professional advice in making out his return.

A look at the guide, about which a member was making such a fuss just now, shows that it is very clear. It sets up six steps in making out one's return. The first is explained under the heading of "Getting ready", and is obviously that of getting together the papers needed to make out the return. I do think that there are no special difficulties on that.

Step two under the heading "Identifying yourself" is to say who you are. There is no problem on that either, I believe.

Step three, under the heading "Listing your income" is to indicate the income and then some information is given on taxable and non taxable income. A little further, the guide lists especially the income that does not necessarily need to be declared.

Step four, under the heading "Claiming your deductions", deals with allowable deductions. It is quite clear: there are the "Canada Pension Plan contributions." There is no problem on that either. As for contributions to a "Registered Pension Plan", people were previously entitled to only $1,500; the Liberal party, in its tax reform, has granted them an exemption of $2,500. In my opinion, all Canadians are very pleased about it.

Mr. Corbin: The Progressive Conservatives are not.

Mr. Leblanc (Laurier): Of course the Progressive Conservatives do not like that because they did not introduce it. Besides, they will never do it because they never will take over the government. We have seen it since the beginning of January because they have tried very hard to take over the government. Unfortunately for them, they have been frustrated and helpless. We are convinced that when election time comes in the near future, we will have a much higher majority because the Progressive Conservatives are only politicking in the House instead of legislating and this is often the case in committees.

However, this does not apply to the committee I have the honour to chair because the Progressive Conservative members of this committee are most kind toward their chairman and they behave very well. I wish to take this opportunity to thank them for their co-operation even though we sometimes have misunderstandings and lack of co-operation.

Then, Mr. Speaker, the income tax return—

[English]

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would allow me one short question. I know that in his charitable manner he might, because he is referring to members of the miscellaneous estimates committee and the co-operation he encounters there in an effort to do things of benefit to Canada and Canadians. I wonder if the hon. member was amongst those fortunate people who received a letter from the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Stanbury) requesting their help because of the complexity of the forms, to try to make them more acceptable. Apparently we were expected to send it to lawyers and accountants in our constituencies. In view of the fact that the hon. member makes it sound so simple, and he knows that the hon. Minister of National Revenue sent such a letter—

Mr. Stanbury: He did not want to, but he did. He would like to have your ideas, if you have any.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member, of course, can ask a question if the hon. member who has the floor agrees. However, I think I should warn the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Leblanc) that he is fast coming to the end of the time allotted to him under Standing Orders.

Mr. Leblanc (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I thank very much my hon. friend from Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) for giving me the opportunity to discuss the letter the hon. Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Stanbury) has sent to hon. members.

I also received this letter but I do not think there is any difficulty. What he is asking the hon. members—unfortunately I have not the letter before me—is this: Would you have any suggestions to make in an effort to improve the form? Thus there is no problem. It is democratic participation—as the Liberal party has always advocated—of all the hon. members in order to produce the best possible form, for the good of the people and I think the request of the hon. Minister of National Revenue is quite justified. I think that it is quite appreciable, because the minister could have sent that letter to the Liberal members only, but he sent it to all hon. members, in order to obtain their co-operation.

If instead of saying that the income tax return is confusing, constructive solutions were suggested to the Minister of National Revenue, the government would take such requests in consideration. Now, the only thing deemed useful is a motion to the effect that the form is confusing. Indeed, many things can be confusing, but if they really want to co-operate to improve the lot of the Canadian people, they should suggest solutions, which, I am sure, would be heartily welcomed and taken into consideration by the Minister of National Revenue.

Now, in the motion—

Mr. Olivier: It is the Progressive Conservatives who are confused.

• (2110)

[English]

Mr. Alexander: My point is that there is something wrong with it.

[Translation]

Mr. Leblanc (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I shall always be pleased to meet my hon. friend and discuss this with him. If he has questions to put, he can always do so. If he has trouble completing his income tax return, he may consult me any time and I shall be pleased to help him. This is the co-operation—

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is with deep regret that I must advise the hon. member for Laurier that the time allotted to him has expired. He may only continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous agreement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Apparently, there is not.

[English]

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased this evening to have the opportunity to speak on this matter. I come from an area in the province of Saskatchewan which is either agricultural or dependent upon agriculture. Over the past 20 years I have had occasion to gain considerable experience in the preparation of income tax returns, both the T-1 short form for the wage earner and the T-1 general for the farmer.

In the early fifties the preparation of these tax returns was a relatively simple matter; however, as years went by it became more and more complicated. Ministerial decisions, regulations and amendments to the act—

An hon. Member: And Liberal red tape.

Mr. Neil: That's right. These tended to confuse and alarm the taxpayer to the extent that he was concerned about making an error in the calculations and incurring the wrath of the departmental inspectors and officials. The result was that more and more taxpayers became dependent upon professional help to prepare their returns. The Hon. Edgar Benson then arrived on the scene to hold a dialogue with the people and develop a completely new concept of taxation.

An hon. Member: He got a good job out of it.

Mr. Neil: The public, the accountants and the tax lawyers were flattered. At long last, here was a man who was going to make sense out of our tax system. We all waited with anticipation. Here was a man who was going to give us a new Income Tax Act, one that could be understood and one that would replace the antiquated patchwork act passed, I believe, in 1918 or 1919. Hon. Edgar Benson listened in two official languages but he answered us in a language more incomprehensible than that which might have been used by a visitor from outer space.

I had occasion in November, 1971, to attend the Canadian Tax Foundation seminar in Vancouver. In attendance at that meeting were leading tax experts from all over Canada, men who specialize in income tax, men who had spent upwards of nine months studying the then proposed tax act which was subsequently passed, of course, in December of that year. These men were united in stating that a great many of the sections of the act were completely unintelligible to most experts unless they could understand the operation of a computer and calculate algebraic formulas backwards. This is the act upon which our income tax return is now based, Mr. Speaker, an act that has required the department to spend, I do not know how many hundreds of thousands of dollars on explanatory booklets and interpretation bulletins some of which themselves require interpretation.

The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Stanbury) indicated that the new income tax form is not complicated. He even hired a well known television personality to advertise the fact that the return, close up, is easier than it looks. Obviously, hon. members on the other side of the House who have spoken, including the hon. member who spoke prior to me, should themselves appear on television instead of spending money on a television personality. We should put those tax experts on the air and save hundreds of thousands of dollars. I think the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Leblanc) hit the nail on the head when he said that the tax form is simple in relation to the complexity of the legislation. I think that is absolutely correct. The legislation is complicated, and the tax return must be complicated.

It may be that the physical act of completing the return is not difficult once the information has been gathered together, but it is essential that the taxpayer compile the necessary information. In order to do so, he must have knowledge of the act and of the law. It must not just be cursory, otherwise he will find himself in difficulties with the assessor and the department and subject to penalties which in some cases are much more severe than penalties imposed under the Criminal Code. But at least under the Criminal Code one can get a conditional discharge.

Should a taxpayer be required to spend hours, or even days studying interpretation bulletins and tax guides in order to complete a tax return or, alternatively, should he have to spend money to retain the services of a tax expert or accountant in order to complete a return? The majority of taxpayers just cannot afford the luxury. They require those dollars to help them cope with the spiralling cost of living which continues to plague us. It may be suggested by the government that if a taxpayer reads and studies "Your Guide to the 1972 Income Tax Return" and/or the "1972 Farmers' and Fishermen's Tax Guide", the taxpayer can complete his own return. That may be so if the taxpayer is a scholarly type, has a basic understanding of the law and has spent weeks or even months studying it: under those conditions, perhaps he can fill out the return. However, I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that unless a farmer taxpayer who is preparing his own T1 general form has a good understanding of capital cost allowances and has read the "1972 Farmers' and Fishermen's Tax Guide" with a good deal of care, he could easily come to the conclusion that he must depreciate all assets under part II of the regulations rather than under part 17, regardless of when he acquired them. Once he converted, the decision would be irreversible.

What about capital gains? The hon. member for Laurier looked over the income tax return and made light of the difficulties. He suggested that there is no problem in filling it out. The income tax return, if the taxpayer disposes of some capital assets, requires an election to be made. I ask, how can an individual taxpayer make an election under section 26(7) of the Income Tax Application Rules, 1971, unless he knows what the ramifications are? Once he makes that election which is set out at the bottom of the second page of the return, he is bound by it for the rest of his life, and his estate after him is bound by that election.

There is a very important principle which says that no man should have to pay a tax which he cannot reasonably be expected to understand. The government seems to have forgotten that principle, Mr. Speaker. There are new complications to do with partnerships. Professional people who are on a cash basis, or were on a cash basis previously, will encounter many problems. The matter of professional partnerships is especially complicated.

As there are a large number of uncertainties regarding the law of partnership and as much complexity is involved in the calculations, much additional time will be required to be spent by accountants in preparing returns. I am advised by chartered accountants and by tax consultants in my constituency that all returns this year will require a much longer time for completion than previous returns did, partly because of the queries raised by taxpayers and partly because the election I mentioned must be considered and studied where capital gains are involved. I do not envy the chartered accountant who is called on for advice with respect to an election to do with capital gains. In many cases he might be just as well off if he were to make his decision after gazing into a crystal ball.

I am also advised that many accountants feel that because of the additional time required to complete returns they will encounter difficulty in meeting the April 30 deadline. For that reason they are accepting very few new clients. An extension of one month in the filing date is essential if taxpayers are to be given the opportunity of obtaining professional advice and services. I believe, Mr. Speaker, although I have been unable to substantiate my assertion, that an extension of time was granted to farmers in 1950 for the filing of 1949 returns. I would urge the minister to give serious consideration to an extension this year.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, let me say that a tax system which is so complicated that it cannot be understood by the individual taxpayer without professional advice, and which requires a taxpayer to pay a government department a fee in order that he may obtain a decision regarding the interpretation of the act, is totally unacceptable.

• (2120)

Mr. Jim Fleming (York West): Mr. Speaker, the comments I have to make will not take a great deal of time and will allow time for other hon. members to speak.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fleming: It pleases me to hear that appreciation from the opposition, because in rising to speak on this issue I want to make the point that I appreciate their respect for the House and their attention to what I have to say, or at least some quietness so I may continue.

I hope that the members of the press who attended this afternoon's session and the night guard tonight will register the fact that when we discuss this particular issue today, the first opportunity for that party which says it should in fact be governing the country—almost has the right to govern, and at one point said it had the right to govern—the major issue it brings before this nation, the major point of confrontation, the public should realize, that is most important in their minds is the income tax form.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fleming: Having decided that, with the overwhelming unanimity we know their caucus has, they managed through the afternoon to have about 10 per cent of their caucus here on the first day to discuss this, their most important issue. It is not much better tonight, with 15 per cent to 20 per cent. I hope that when the day comes when this House will go back to the people, we on this side and in other parts of the House will remember what they did. This is their first day to register a most important concern—and how many of them are here to discuss it?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fleming: I wish to refer to a couple of points made this afternoon by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens). As an example of the obvious concern the government had, the hon. member for York-Simcoe said that this new form was increasingly difficult and therefore the government must take measures to accommodate that problem. He made the point that the clerical staff in the Toronto area had been increased from 30 to 60. That is one for each group of 25,000 people. I am sure the complaint would have been greater if it had been one in 50,000. That was his point: we must be concerned because the staff has been doubled.

His next point in introducing this motion on behalf of the official opposition was that his secretary had called 25 times over this wonderful phone service and could not get an answer. Two facts were pointed out: one, it is income tax time and the phones are busy; also, it is frustrating. Why do you think the staff was increased? It is easy to twist one fact, be blind to the next one and present the reverse argument. That is typical of what that party is doing. They have been carrying on in this way ever since this session began two months ago.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Neil.]

Mr. Fleming: The hon. member for York-Simcoe is an economist of sorts. He certainly has banking in mind from time to time. He is a lawyer of great skill. This afternoon he made much of the fact that in the past five years income tax for the average Canadian taxpayer had increased some 50 per cent. He started out by saying the actual amount had increased for the so-called average taxpayer. To be entirely frank and honest, he then broke it down into constant dollars and it came to 50 per cent. It is that statistical game that has the public bewildered as to what politics is and who is trying to help the country.

What the hon. member for York-Simcoe did not mention is how much the net income and gross income of the average taxpayer has increased. Over the past five years it has increased by at least 50 per cent. He has a great deal more money to spend, and a great deal more government services are available to those who need them, as a result of the actions of this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fleming: Time is taken up during the question period with the politics of the question rather than honestly trying to get some answers and being a strong, firm and honest opposition. It is great politics to say how nonsensical these new forms are: that makes a great picture. The fact of the matter remains that many of the criticisms are from people who have not looked at the form. A great number of people in the media, economists and tax experts—I think the minister quoted an editorial from the Financial Post—say this form is extremely good; that it is one of the best forms we have had in years.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fleming: This has been going on for the past two months, Mr. Speaker. With all due respect, whenever anyone on this side rises to speak, we hear only catcalls and interruptions. You do not see the same kind of nonsense when someone on that side rises to speak. That is the kind of government they want to carry on, government by catcall.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fleming: If I can get on with my speech, you can take together all these forms and make easy political hay and a little picture. The exercise of paying taxes and being a participant in democracy is not a pleasant experience. It goes on year after year. This has been mentioned before today. It is very important. Anyone would have to be terribly naïve or misleading to suggest that our government, our system of economics and our country is not becoming more complex every year. People are bewildered about who is responsible for what. They have to put up with these kinds of "inspiring" tactics from the opposition when, in fact, responsible citizens in the media and economists are repeatedly saying that these are improved forms, they are good forms; stop and look at them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would allow me to ask a question on behalf of the senior citizens of this country.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I will do my best to entertain questions from the hon. member at the completion of my speech. It is terribly important in this House for the government to present a policy. If the opposition does not like it, they should criticize; they should make suggestions as to how improvements can be made. I agree with that. However, all this criticism during question periods, and bringing in this matter as their most important issue on their first opposition day, makes one wonder. They have not suggested what they would do to improve it. How would they do it? They have researchers who give them papers which are fanned out at their caucus to be used every day during the question period. Where are the researchers on this, their first opposition day?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fleming: From the party that a few months ago was defeated by a hair's breadth and which claims that it is on the brink of taking power, all we are getting are spitballs and half-baked dreams. That is all they have been involved in for the past few months. If that party has any suggestions on how to improve the forms, let's hear about them. We have not heard anything yet. Surely we are here to talk positively about what we think is best, whether it is our idea or theirs. I did not hear too many suggestions laid down, only "last minutism." They finally got the guts to come out with a suggestion with regard to wage and price controls. That is easy when you are in opposition. They make deficit spending proposals which their backbenchers would not agree to if they were in power and, I understand, almost did not agree to when they were not. The only thing they talk about is stretching and shaving our policy. They have a hard time formulating policies of their own.

In referring to this motion, may I say that a summary of what has happened as far as the role of the official opposition in presenting legislative proposals and alternatives to our policy in the past two months is concerned is that there has been day-dreaming game-playing, hallucinations and misleading facts. There has been the cheap politics of putting fear into the public. May I complete my remarks by saying that if nothing else has happened, two things have happened today. The motion which has been presented today gives us a chance to explain and prove that there has been a real improvement in the current tax form. It has been set out in this form to help the Canadian public.

The second point is this. They have given us the chance to show the public, via the media, that the most important thing the opposition can talk about on its first opposition day is a subject such as the one before us. And then they demonstrate the overwhelming interest taken in their own ranks by attending in numbers fewer than we find on the government side, the subject of the attack. We are here in greater numbers than the opposition—and it is an opposition day!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. Does the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) rise to ask a question?

Mr. Alexander: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member has given me that opportunity. I was very impressed by his oratorical brilliance which comes about from his having been a member of the news media.

Mr. Lundrigan: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I do not think my hon. friend from Hamilton West has the right to attack an unarmed man, and on this basis I suggest that perhaps he should not be heard at all.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I am usually prepared to listen to advice from my hon. friend from Gander-Twillingate, but I listened to the hon. member saying how simple the form was and how easy it was to complete and I recalled another letter which was sent out by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Stanbury).

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Alexander: I recall another letter which was directed to members of this House by the Minister of National Revenue.

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. Hon. members should give the hon. member for Hamilton West a chance to put his question.

Mr. Alexander: I know the question is going to be embarrassing, because this concerns our senior citizens.

An hon. Member: We adjourn in half an hour.

Mr. Alexander: Perhaps the hon. member can tell us whether he knew why the Minister of National Revenue had to send us a second letter in connection with this form with the object of alleviating the hardship our senior citizens would undergo as a result of this new, "easy" form. He indicated in this letter that it was possible for us—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Alexander: —to give some direction to senior citizens groups, that we who are in a position to assist senior citizens in completing this form having regard to its complexity. I ask the hon. member why this action was necessary if the form is as easy as he says it is. This is the letter which has gone out in the past week.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the procedure—and as a member of the government party I have great pride in the efforts they make to improve income tax forms—would ever be easy, but the fact is that any government which is willing to say, "We are doing our best, and if we can improve and it will help a certain sector, we are going to do that," is a government I am proud of; and surely that is what they are attempting.

Mr. Lundrigan: I told you he was unarmed, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stanbury: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) referred to a letter of mine. I know he would not wish to leave a false impression.

Mr. Alexander: Never.

Mr. Stanbury: I did not communicate with hon. members to tell them how much difficulty senior citizens were having with federal tax forms. I communicated with them to let them know that senior citizens in large numbers, in Ontario particularly, were finding difficulty in understanding why they were receiving tax forms from the province of Ontario along with their federal tax forms.

I am happy we are co-operating with the province of Ontario in sending these out, but I suggested that hon. members might wish to help voluntary organizations or senior citizens who have not been obliged to fill out federal tax forms in the past and would not, in fact, have to do so this year were it not for the system adopted by the Ontario government which requires them to complete forms for the purpose of getting a property tax credit from Ontario.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, as I listened a few moments ago to the hon. member for York West (Mr. Fleming) and heard him say how short his speech was to be, I thought I would be able to compliment him on his part in the debate. I find now that I cannot compliment anyone who professed such blind loyalty to a dying government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker: The hon. member for York West spoke about the two letters which had been sent out. After the explanation by the minister with respect to those letters, soothsaying at its best, I expect we shall be receiving a third letter, this one designated primarily for chartered accountants asking them for suggestions about a system which they are finding it difficult to understand, let alone the ordinary people.

Mr. Stanbury: Who do you think wrote it?

Mr. Baker: The hon. member for York West asked why this motion was chosen by the official opposition on the first of two opposition days. I will tell him why. The reason is that the one thing people meet day after day and year after year is the obligation to pay income tax, associated with the form which they must make out. This is sometimes their only contact with government. There is a duty incumbent upon the government to make that form and that income tax law understandable. Any government which fails to do so for the benefit of the ordinary people is failing the ordinary people. And this government has failed the ordinary taxpayer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker: I listened with great interest to the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil). He said he would rather see the minister on the air and in the newspapers than Fred Davis and Pierre Paquette explaining the tax laws to the people of Canada. I would like to see him there, too. I don't like to see the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Stanbury) hiding behind those radio and television personalities because this monstrosity which, albeit, he inherited, he adopts now like a child; he holds it to his bosom and defends it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, the government spent half a million dollars on this advertising program. Now I know why the minister did not go on television and I know why his words did not appear in the newspaper columns. It is because it is not possible to sell commercial time, with the minister—and the newspapers would not risk it—appearing in the ad. I, for one, would like to find out whether Pierre Paquette and Fred Davis found out enough about this income tax return system to make out their own income tax returns, or whether they, too, had to go to a confused accountant like so many of us have had to do.

Mr. Alexander: Or H. & R. Block.

Mr. Baker: Yes, or H. & R. Block, as the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) says. We talk about chartered accountants in this House. Chartered accountants are the servants of lawyers, the servants of industrialists and the servants of businessmen. They are the servants of people who are privileged. But, Mr. Speaker, the fact of the matter is that many people who are confused in this country cannot afford this kind of service and they must go to the kind of tax services mentioned by the hon. member for Hamilton West, and similar services. These charges are bound to go up because the tax service people also find the forms complicated. I think it is incumbent upon the government to recognize the folly of this system in a small, tangible way. In other words, to adopt a suggestion that came from this side of the House and make a certain percentage of the fee paid to a chartered accountant or a tax consultant deductible as an expense against income.

It has been suggested in the House that the time for filing ought to be set back one month, and I ask, why not? The public is confused. This is why the government owes it to the people of Canada to give them sufficient time to work themselves out of the confused state in which this government, with this greatest of all tax bills, has placed them, this greatest of all tax bills that is supported by the most confusing of all confusing tax forms!

The record of the government has shown that if there is a complicated way of doing something and an uncomplicated way to do the same thing, the government will invariably choose the complicated way. If there is a way of fostering a lack of understanding in Canada as opposed to fostering understanding, the government chooses the former as opposed to the latter.

The fact of the matter is that this government is without imagination. As I have said, they have taken unto their bosom a tax system. Last year they implemented a capital gains tax, and this year they broke it down, and I think broke it down quite properly, in the case of farms. They talked about the corporate rip-off, and this year in his budget speech the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) has backed down in deferring to the party to my left. The government has now clasped this tax system to its bosom, and it is now beginning to disown the child. But it is not disowning it honestly. The government should level with the Canadian people and admit there is a confusing mess of taxation laws in this country. The government should admit that the average person cannot understand them and should employ an accountant. That being the case, the taxpayer should be compensated. As I say, it is the duty of the government to go that one extra mile.

I have known the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Stanbury) for a good many years, Mr. Speaker. He and I attended law school together, though he was one year ahead of me. He has always been approachable and I hope he will exhibit that same approachability this evening and announce that he is putting back the date for filing income tax returns, at least for those who must file this most confusing form that has been the subject of the debate today.

There are no two ways about it, Mr. Speaker—the income tax laws of this country as well as the income tax form itself are much like the magistrate in the judicial system. It is the one place where almost every citizen in the community comes in contact with the government. Similarly, this is the one area where I think it is the compelling duty of the government to make sure a person understands the relationship that exists between the citizen and his government.

The hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Leblanc) told us that he had not received any complaints about this form. I do not know whether the hon. member gets any mail, and if he does perhaps he does not read it, but I have had a lot of complaints from my constituents who have asked me very intelligent questions. However, they are very confused by this form and its complexities.

I think others would like to speak in this debate, so I shall not take up any further time of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I am always appreciative when I receive a bit of desk thumping from the seals on the other side of the House. I want to close by making this plea to the Minister of National Revenue. I would ask the minister to consider this suggestion seriously and in a compassionate way. I ask him—indeed, I challenge him and the government with whom he sits—to put back the date for filing the returns by one month. I ask the government to promulgate a regulation between now and the end of that month permitting taxpayers to deduct a reasonable amount for the cost of filing a personal income tax return if a person feels it is incumbent upon him to hire an accountant or engage the service of a tax consultant.

If the minister does that, he will have done a service to the citizens of this country, especially the citizens in my constituency whom I have the honour to represent and who write to me every day and cause me to write to the minister. I have decided that I will not write to anybody but the minister. I have known him a long time and he is reasonably prompt in returning letters, though his answers are confusing. When he deals with the matter of the tax credit, I hope he will not do what he did when I made representations on behalf of a dear lady on Beaver Ridge Avenue, namely, send me some remarks attributed to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Comtois). That only compounded the confusion that already existed.

Seriously, Mr. Speaker, I ask the minister to take into account the position of individual taxpayers and to announce, if not tonight then within the next few days, that he is prepared to move the date back one month for filing income tax returns this year, as well as allow as a deductible business expense the cost of seeking professional help in preparing the income tax return.

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member be prepared to answer a simple, sincere question?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member who had the floor can answer a question if he will allow the minister to ask one.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton is exhausted from his efforts.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, if the question is to ask me whether or not I approve of a month's delay or the deduction of fees, I will be prepared to answer. Short of that, I would not concern myself with any questions from the minister.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think this might become a little complicated. Perhaps we should go to the next question. Is the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Cafik) seeking the floor on a question of privilege?

Mr. Cafik: No, Mr. Speaker. I realize the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton did not permit a question from the minister, but would he permit one from myself which I think is quite relevant to a point he made?

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is suggested that although the hon. member would not accept a question from the minister, he would accept one from the parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Cafik: I appreciate that the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton—I mean Grenville-Carleton—has been courteous enough—

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, my constituency is Grenville-Carleton, not Ottawa-Carleton.

Mr. Cafik: Yes, Mr. Speaker, and I corrected myself. I made the slip because the hon. member has not been here for that long and I am not really familiar with him. My question is related to the comment that he made, that if there was a complex or complicated way in which to do something, this government would choose it as opposed to a simple way. My question is this. During the last election campaign, if I understand it correctly, the Conservative party put forward a very complicated formula for what they called a constant dollar policy in regard to adjusting the amount of tax to be paid according to the increase in the cost of living. This government has come forward with what I believe to be a very simple formula whereby an adjustment is made in the amount of—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, we have adopted a much simpler formula which is comprehensible. I wonder whether he would care to comment on that, because it appears that the Conservatives adopted a complex way of achieving the very simple objective we achieved in the recent budget.

• (2150)

Mr. Baker: Would the hon. member, if he can, repeat the question?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are running short of time as it is just a few minutes before ten.

Mr. Cafik: I would like to repeat the question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The suggestion has been made to me that the hon. member should place the question on the order paper.

Mr. Baker: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would put the question on the order paper I would be prepared to answer it in due course.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, others in this debate have dealt with confusion, the risk to privacy, with the non-value added dividend notion and other aspects of the income tax form. Some have even offered apologia for these forms. I propose in my remarks to deal with some of the illegalities of the budget, income tax duality and the disrespect that this implies for parliament.

Before doing so, however, and since we have been talking about how simple are these forms which are seven feet long, I thought the House would like to see the form adopted by our friends to the south. If your income, aside from salary and wages, is less than $200 and you are a citizen of that country to the south, you have a form which you have to fill in that has two sides to it. It is not as simple as one side would suggest, but it is 5½ inches by 8 inches, with two sides. That is what I consider to be a simple form.

Mr. Stanbury: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Bell: He just got started.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): When I finish my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I will accept the question, if I may. There are a few remarks I wish to make. To set my remarks in perspective, may I be permitted to outline the chronology which led to our present incredible situation. We taxpayers are being required to sign income tax returns which are to include particulars of income and exemptions that as yet have no basis in law. There is a dilemma for you.

As to the chronology, the budget address of May, 1972, contained tax cuts and other exemptions for many classes of Canadian taxpayers. However, before these provisions could be considered by parliament, the government adjourned the House on July 7. Then the House next sat in special session on August 31 and September 1 to deal with the B.C. longshoremen's strike. After that the House was dissolved for the general election of October 30, with the budget proposals still not discussed.

The House did not meet again until January 4. As a result, due to the government's inaction, millions of taxpayers have been placed in a state of confusion and uncertainty, not to mention—as matters stand at this moment—if they are filling in their income tax forms, in illegality. To backtrack a bit, following the presentation of May, 1972, the Liberals refrained from introducing their budget bills for 34 sitting days after the budget address. It was not until June 26, 1972, in fact that the finance minister tabled bills to amend the Income Tax Act, the Excise Tax Act and the Customs Tariff. The Canadian public, therefore, had some cause to wonder why that delay was necessary in tabling these bills. Whatever the reasons, and these we can only suspect, the upshot was that there was not time to debate these bills before parliament was adjourned, eight sitting days later. With no move made to debate these bills during the emergency session, the bills lapsed.

The government could have remedied the situation by calling parliament shortly after the election, but for reasons of its own it did not. The fact that no action was taken on these bills meant that measures of assistance to both individual and corporate taxpayers were not acted upon. There is no excuse that I can see for the government having deferred implementation of these budget proposals in this manner. The necessary bills could have been introduced, as is normally the case, immediately after the budget speech. Parliament need not have been dissolved before they were acted upon or, at the very least, the government could have called the session before the new year to deal with them.

Instead, the government chose to ignore the bills and to introduce another budget in which some of the more controversial measures of the May 8 budget were omitted, for overt reasons of political expediency. The only part of the budget to be enacted were non-budgetary items referring to old age security pensions, exemptions and veterans benefits—what can be called the vote catching items: the nitty-gritty's and the difficult bits were put aside.

Are we going to be faced with deadlines as we so often have in the past, hours of time requiring measures to be passed so that the government can get these returns in on April 30 as required? Would it not have been possible to begin the first session of the twenty-ninth parliament in December, breaking for the Christmas recess, rather than waiting until January? This obviously reveals the government's set of priorities, where political concerns rate higher than do human considerations.

What is the outcome of these tactics? As of now we are faced with a series of illegalities. The government's handling of the whole income tax issue does not conform with law, nor even with the words of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Stanbury). The Income Tax Act provides, in section 220, that the Minister of National Revenue shall administer and enforce this act. Section 150 provides that a return of the income for each taxation year in the case of a corporation, or for each taxation year for which taxes are payable in the case of an individual, shall be filed without notice or demand with the minister in the prescribed form, containing the prescribed information. Certain legal requirements follow from these provisions.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): It being ten o'clock, it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 58(11), proceedings on the motion are now completed.

[English]

In accordance with Standing Order 40, a motion to adjourn the House is deemed to have been made at this time. Therefore, the question is that this House do now adjourn.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

AIRPORTS—INTENTION RESPECTING EXTENSION OF RUNWAYS AT MALTON

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Peel South): Mr. Speaker, on June 30 last the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) made an announcement in connection with airports in the Toronto region. We have received a lot of gobbledygook from the government in connection with airports in the Toronto region and it was for that reason I tried to get from the minister a specific answer in connection with the extension of runway facilities at the Toronto international airport at Malton.

• (2200)

The minister's answer was to the effect that the government at that time was not prepared to give any answers. That is the reason I have raised this matter in the adjournment debate tonight. Early in January of this year the Swackhamer report in connection with the Pickering airport hearings which were held last fall was tabled in this House. The evidence in the Swackhamer report in connection with the Pickering airport is that facilities at Malton could easily be extended to look after the anticipated air traffic growth in the Toronto area until the year 2000. Shortly after that report was filed, the Minister of Transport was good enough to entertain some members from this side of the House with members from the ministry who were involved in the Pickering matter and, indeed, in air transport throughout that portion of Ontario served by the Toronto international airport, the Hamilton airport and other places.

At that time members of the minister's staff indicated to myself and to others that in their opinion the expansion of Malton was virtually an impossibility. In 1968 the whole question of expansion of Malton airport was brought to public meetings in the town of Mississagua, and at that time it was clearly demonstrated that if further north-south runways were created, at least 100,000 people would be severely affected. At that time the decision seemed to have been made by the minister that there would be no expansion at Malton.

Further, we hear after the notice in respect of the Pickering site that the minister now intends to conduct an inquiry, not an inquiry after the expropriation but none the less an inquiry as to the need for an airport at Pickering and, indeed, an inquiry into the whole airport need at Toronto. So the people who live in the town of Mississagua are confused in not knowing, on the one hand, the extent to which Malton can be expanded and whether Pickering is absolutely necessary and no expansion can take place at all. On the other hand, they know that there is to be an inquiry to see whether Pickering is necessary.

The whole situation leaves everyone in a flux. People who own houses do not know, people who have businesses do not know, people who are taxpayers do not know, and the municipality which is required to service the area does not know. The simple question is a question of the runway. Can this ministry or the government assure this town that a runway or further runways, particularly north-south runways at the Malton site are needed, or whether they will be installed? The ministry has told me and others that a further runway built, say, 1,000 feet west of the existing north-south runway would be only 20 per cent effective. The ministry has said that runways need to be at least 5,000 feet apart. If this is so, and if there is no more land for such a runway, it should be no problem for the minister to flatly declare it is not the intention of the government to increase runway facilities at the Malton airport. But the answer given is that it is not the intention of the government to do so. This is the reason for this debate. This is the reason why I again ask the government to come clean and to say what it intends to do with respect to Malton.

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) has already answered this question very clearly. However, I will repeat that it is not the intention of the government to extend runway facilities at Malton airport.

YOUTH—OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON GRANT DISTRIBUTION AMONG INCOME CLASSES—CONSULTATION ON WEEKLY PAY RATE WITH PROVINCES

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight to pursue a question which I raised in the House back in January on the Opportunities for Youth program. I had hoped that this issue might be debated earlier than this since the deadline for Opportunities for Youth applications was March 1. Nevertheless, I would like to pursue the point on the questions I raised because I do not believe the minister gave a full and adequate reply. The concern that I raised earlier was: What guarantee is there that an equitable proportion of OFY grants go to the youth of various income classes, especially to young people of low income families?

The problem, as I see it, is that we have a government designed and implemented program which is called Opportunities for Youth, but in reality it has become a program of opportunities for students and mostly students in the middle and upper income groups. If we look at some figures for 1971—I am sorry that I do not have the more recent, 1972 figures, if indeed they have been tabulated—we see that the percentage of young people unemployed ran at 15 per cent for post-secondary students and at 20 per cent for non-students.

In the same year we find that 62 per cent of the applicants for Opportunities for Youth grants were post-secondary students and only 26 per cent were non-student applicants. Of the post-secondary applicants, 68 per cent were successful in their applications, but of the non-students only 17 per cent were successful in receiving grants. Therefore we see that students have a greater acceptance rate than non-students. This is readily understandable. The students are more articulate; they can formulate their briefs much better than the non-students and hence enhance their chances of being selected.

We have a problem of goals. A program that began as Opportunities for Youth, in practice has become opportunities for students. I want to know, is this official government thinking? We have hints that it may be. In the 1971 task force report at page 29 we read:

> The first objective of the program was to provide employment for students . . . the priorities among this target group were post-secondary school students—

If this is what Opportunities for Youth has become, let the government admit it openly, but then let it be fair enough to design another program for the non-student young people, thousands of whom are unemployed, frustrated and angry. The second question I raised earlier asked, did the government consult the provincial ministries of education to determine whether the funds needed for the average student to see him through the year in university were comparable to what OFY was providing? The answer of the minister was no. This soon becomes evident. We see that the average earnings of post-secondary OFY participants in 1972 was $1,000 or $1,200 with an average saving of somewhere between $400 and $600. Mr. Speaker, such earnings cannot possibly cover tuition and living costs for today's university students. The government has set a maximum earning of $90 a week for OFY applicants, so even the OFY—or should I say the opportunities for students program—is not meeting the needs of the students.

• (2210)

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to know, first, if the Opportunities for Youth program is now providing primarily opportunities for students. If it is not, what guarantees for equitable distribution of grants to youth of all income and occupational groups is there in the program? I want to know, secondly, if the minister will raise the pay allotted for the applicant so that what he earns can realistically meet the cost of a university education today. Likewise for the non-student, will the government consider giving him an adequate wage so that he can live decently in today's society?

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the first question as to whether the Opportunities for Youth program has been successful among under-privileged youth with low incomes, I might say that the Opportunities for Youth program has been very successful over the last two years. The funds that were granted to under-privileged youth show the government's concern for this particular group of people. The Opportunities for Youth Program came to grips with the problem of regional, ethnic, economic and social disparities, by granting the major part of the available funds to the young people who were having a hard time finding a summer job and who urgently needed financial assistance.

In 1972, most of the participants, that is 57 per cent, came from rural areas, which somewhat offsets the non-availability of summer employment in those areas. The male representation that was dominant on projects in 1971 was reduced in 1972, and we managed to establish a ratio of 55 to 44 per cent. Although 65 per cent of Canadian students at the post-secondary level came from families with a gross income under $11,000, over 70 per cent of the participants at the post-secondary level came from families in that income bracket. Over 50 per cent of the students at the secondary level participating in the Opportunities for Youth program came from families with a gross income under $8,000.

As regards the second question, in respect of salaries, we admit that there were no formal consultations between the federal government and the provincial government. However, I should like to remind my honourable friend that the Opportunities for Youth program is not meant to settle all the employment problems of young people. However, the amount of $90 is a sizeable amount, nevertheless, and we think it was preferable, with a $40 million budget, $6 million more than last year, to try to reach a larger number of young people by paying them a weekly salary that is not the perfect solution but which can partly meet their needs.

And my honourable friend should not forget that only 15 per cent of the summer jobs were filled under the Opportunities for Youth program. Most of them, that is 85 per cent, happened to be filled by the private sector.

In closing, I would say to my hon. friend that young people must not consider the Opportunity for Youth program simply in terms of income but avail themselves of the opportunity to fulfil their personal ideas, to get involved positively in social achievement and to get ready for the tasks of tomorrow.

AGRICULTURE—FEED GRAINS—MEASURES TO STOP PRICE INCREASE

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, on January 31 last, I directed a question to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) concerning the excessive price increases of feed grains and proteins in eastern Canada.

My question was the following:

Can the minister tell us, after having met with the representatives of the Canadian Feed Manufacturers Association and the persons directly concerned with the matter in eastern Canada, what he intends to do to improve conditions concerning the price of feed grains?

The minister answered as follows:

—as I said before, the main cost is the high cost of proteins. There is a world shortage. I think the latest figures given to me show an increase of 140 per cent to farmers for these protein supplements. We will be making a decision next week as to how we will aid farmers caught in this cost-price squeeze.

Mr. Speaker, the present situation of farmers in eastern Canada, and particularly in the riding of Richmond which I represent, is very difficult. Many factors have caused this price increase in feed grains in the last few years, an increase which I consider as very difficult for producers, particularly milk producers. Canadian farmers have suffered a lot from the administration of the Liberal majority government between 1968 and 1972. Farmers, perhaps more than any other class of Canadians, have suffered during those four long years from the incoherence of the federal government in the field of agriculture.

During the years 1969-1970, the government paid the farmers of western Canada not to produce. They paid western grain producers to keep a large part of their prairies unploughed because according to them there were enormous surpluses of grains in the west and exports were in difficulty while the price of milk remained stationary.

Mr. Speaker, farmers from eastern Canada then had pay more for feed grain than what the Canadian government was getting for it in other countries.

Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture told me that such a situation was due to a world shortage of proteins. I can understand that if other countries, just as Canada, have paid grain producers not to produce which, as I said a while ago, has caused scarcity of grain on markets and has contributed to raise its price spectacularly. At home, for instance, in supermarkets around Sherbrooke and the Richmond constituency oats was selling at $2.23 per 100 lbs. in January 1971 and $4.10 in January 1973.

What did the Liberal government do to help farmers face this increase of close to 100 per cent?

The price of barley, of wheat, in short of all feed grains has more than doubled.

Soya, for instance, was the most affected. It was selling at $127 a ton in April 1972 whereas today it is selling at $260 per ton. And executives of the farmers co-operative in Sherbrooke told me today that they were expecting it to reach $300 a ton in June.

The UPA says that raising a hog in eastern Canada costs $4.36 more than in western Canada. I believe new measures involving feed grains should strive for parity between prices in the east and in the west of Canada. The UPA submitted to us a brief suggesting among other things that the Wheat Board should be the marketing body for feed grains on the domestic market outside the designated zone, that the grants for feed grains transportation should be an integral part of the marketing system of feed grains in Canada, that the initial prices—state-guaranteed maximum prices—for wheat, barley and oats should reflect production costs, that any policy aimed at improving grain prices in a reasonable way in the Prairie provinces should be accepted by Quebec provided milk producers always get equal treatment, that the right to deliver feed grains import licenses should be taken from the Wheat Board and given to the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

In the last Speech from the Throne, the government committed itself to introducing a bill to establish price parity for feed grains throughout Canada. So, in my opinion, the government is aware of this problem and particularly of the fact that it was mistaken during the years 1969-70-71. Mr. Speaker, we are impatiently awaiting this new bill.

Mr. Léopold Corriveau (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, on February 13 last the hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nolan) proposed a debate on the same question.

I answered that, in my opinion, his question was essentially the same as the one asked by the hon. member sitting to my right. I also said that my answer would be the same in both cases.

Instead of referring the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin) to my previous answer, I am going to repeat it to him.

It can be found at page 6 of Hansard of January 4, in connection with the government's undertaking in the Speech from the Throne. I quote:

The Government supports the principle of an equitable relationship of prices of feed grain to livestock feeders in various areas of Canada.

Before the next crop year, the government intends to take steps to ensure maximum progress in the production of feed grains and stock breeding in Canada; I am convinced it will respect that commitment. We are now having important discussions with various groups of producers, to make sure they will be heard and their opinions will be taken into consideration in finding a solution. I know hon. members would not want decisions to be taken without consultation.

Mr. Speaker, the increase in farm production costs worries me and the fact that this increase stems from a world shortage of feed grains and proteins is of little comfort.

However, I am happy that this time, at least, the price feed grain consumers are getting for their production has also gone up. Let us hope that the rise in stock breeding production costs will also be reflected in better prices for the producer of feed grains and proteins, which will help him to stabilize his income while ensuring that he can produce even more feed grains next year.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I will say that everyone is aware of the seriousness of the situation, and I know a practical solution will soon be found.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.24 p.m.

Statement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs,
The Honourable Mitchell Sharp, to the Opening Session of the International Conference on Viet Nam,
Paris, February 26, 1973

Mr. Chairman,

The first words of any representative of Canada to an international conference on the subject of Viet Nam must be to congratulate the authors of the Agreement signed in this same building a month ago. All the parties deserve the gratitude not only of their own peoples but of all those states which have come to regard the war in Viet Nam as affecting their own national aspirations and interests. My government is firmly of the opinion that the Agreement signed here last month represents a magnificent and hard-earned opportunity which must not be lost. This agreement, indeed, doesn't solve all the problems, neither does it meet all of our hopes; but it's very existence is far more desirable than the absurdity of the armed conflict itself.

Although Canada's agreement to participate in the International Commission of Control and Supervision was conditional, the Canadian Delegation in Saigon has taken a leading part in getting not only the International Commission of Control and Supervision teams in place as required by the agreement, but also in facilitating the other organizations established under it to begin to exercise their functions. The Canadian Delegation from the beginning has been motivated by a desire to make the agreement work if this was at all possible. This will continue to be our attitude in Viet Nam for as long as we are there. It will also be the attitude of the Canadian Delagation here in Paris. I am sure that all other delegations at this conference are equally conscious of the importance of the part this conference has to play in transforming the present precarious ceasefire into a lasting peace in which the South Vietnamese people and only the South Vietnamese people will determine their future. Even though the Lao and Khmer peoples are not represented at this conference, their futures too are bound up in peace in Viet Nam. They too are entitled to the right to determine their own futures for themselves without any foreign intervention.

The fact that there is yet another international conference being held on Viet Nam is in some respects sad inasmuch as it reflects on the rights of the Indochinese peoples to determine their own futures for themselves. But the fact remains that the struggle in Indochina has become an international struggle involving not only the nations of that peninsula but countries far removed from it. From the point of view of my government, the object of the Paris Agreement is not to perpetuate an international presence in Viet Nam but to eliminate it and on conditions that will ensure again a fresh internationalization. This conference should be able to provide for some of those conditions.

Canada has had the educative experience of having served 19 years on the international commissions in Indochina and from that experience we have come to a number of conclusions. If these conclusions seem to imply criticism of the existing agreement of Viet Nam, I hasten to assure you that this is not my intention. My primary purpose is to prevent my country from being once more involved in an intractable situation and an open-ended commitment. At the same time we are deeply conscious that Canada has a history of concern for and participation in international peacekeeping and is very jealous of its reputation in this area.

Canada sees itself, in its membership in the International Commission of Control and Supervision, not as the spokesman of any one point of view and certainly not as serving any direct national policy of its own, but as a representative of the International Community and invited by all the parties concerned to act as such. We therefore feel that we have an obligation not only to the parties to the agreement and indeed to this conference if it should decide to maintain an active interest in this agreement, but to the International Community as a whole.

We would obviously prefer to see all peace supervisory operations conducted under the auspices of the United Nations in accordance with the charter. The fact that this has not been possible in the case of Indo-China reinforces, in our view, the obligation of the International Commission of Control and Supervision to act as if it were representing the world community. If this were not so it would be merely a quadripartite group with no claim to the description international in its title. Canada would have preferred greater Asian participation not only in the International Commission but also in this International Conference which is to discuss matters of vital concern to the future peace and stability of the Asian region. It is in the attempt to engage the International Community to the greatest extent possible that we have adopted the policy of giving full information on our International Commission of Control and Supervision participation. Apart from details of negotiations while they are still under way, we feel that the International Community has a right to know what is being done in its name in Viet Nam. For our part we propose to report regularly and publicly on this at least until other more satisfactory means are found for transmitting information and points of view to all concerned in the International Community.

As I have already mentioned, our primary concern is to do what we can to make Canadian participation in the International Commission of Control and Supervision effective. We wish to continue to serve and we ask this conference to make it possible for us to do so. In this connection we have come here to seek your support in establishing an independent mechanism more representative of the International Community than the existing mechanism, through which the International Commission of Control and Supervision or any of its members could report and which would provide for some possibility of appropriate reaction to such reports.

But we also have another concern. I have no authority to speak for other member countries of the International Commission of Control and Supervision but my government, as the government of a responsible country, could not accept the onus of passing to the former belligerents in Indo-China reports that could conceivably result in a re-escalation of the war in Indo-China. At the same time, we are not prepared to suppress information once we are satisfied that it is soundly based. For this reason Canada has consistently stated a fundamental condition to its participation: that it would serve on the International Commission in Viet Nam only if among other things this conference produced some more broadly-based international authority which would accept the responsibility for evaluating and, if necessary, acting upon reports from the International Commission, or its members, dealing with the manner in which the agreement was being carried out. Ideally, as I have said before, the Security Council of the United Nations should be the body responsible for receiving reports from the International Commission of Control and Supervision or its members and determining what, if any, action is required. Reluctantly, we are prepared to acknowledge that this solution is not practicable in the present situation but we must have some acceptable substitute. In any event, Canada considers that the Secretary General of the United Nations who has been invited to this conference by the United States and the Democratic Republic of Viet Nam on behalf of the parties to the agreement would provide the most appropriate and effective channel for receiving and transmitting the views of the International Commission. He is present here not only as the principal public servant of the world, but as representative of the world's concern at the decades of warfare in Viet Nam. His obviously disinterested position fits him uniquely for this task. I should make it clear that I do not propose that the Secretary-General assume any responsibility either in this capacity or on behalf of the United Nations for action consequent upon his transmission of information received from the International Commission during the interim period of its involvement in Viet Nam. If however it is agreed that the membership of this conference constitutes the continuing political authority to which the International Commission of Control and Supervision should report, the Secretary-General should in our view also be vested with the task of reconvening the conference when requested to do so on whatever basis we may here decide. I would like to circulate and table a resolution which could cover the kind of arrangement I have in mind.

My government is well aware of the problems that a vacancy in the International Commission of Control and Supervision could create and would, in practice, do whatever it could to avoid that situation arising. But we should not be asked to watch in silence a resumption of hostilities nor to accept direct responsibility for all the consequences that could ensue if we felt duty-bound to report to the world that the agreement has been seriously breached.

We will work to find a solution that would meet our reasonable requirements. We are willing to examine any proposal that offers any chance of meeting our point. This is one of the reasons why, at the very beginning of the conference, I am putting forward a resolution that would best meet our requirements and we hope it will be given the most serious consideration. Although this is only one of a number of factors in our decision-making, we shall examine the results of this conference with the greatest care and in the light of the information we have received from our delegation in Viet Nam. Should we decide as a result of our study of the outcome of this conference and of our experience up to now, that we must terminate our membership on the International Commission of Control and Supervision, we would so inform all the interested parties that at the end of the 60 days for which we undertook to serve, that is, on March 30, Canada would cease to be a member of the International Commission of Control and Supervision. At the same time, however, we would declare our willingness, if all the parties signatory to the agreement so desired, to reamin in place and act as a member until April 30, 1973, or such earlier date as a new member could be agreed upon by the signatories and take our place.

Such a decision would be a very sad one for my government to have to make. All Canadians have taken justifiable pride in the manner in which the armed forces of Canada in particular have contributed to peacekeeping operations through out the world. It would be a bitter disappointment to them and to us to have to terminate our participation unilaterally. But I am satisfied that no Canadian would wish to see our representatives placed in the position of having to choose between suppressing relevant information or accepting full and direct national responsibility for the possible consequences of transmitting it under the existing arrangements. Even less would the Canadian people wish to see our delegation stand idly by, as Canadian delegations in Indo-China have had to do in the past, while agreements they are supposed to supervise are disregarded.

I am hopeful that the new agreement will succeed if there is a desire on the part of those present to help make it succeed and to involve themselves in the process. If I am wrong we shall have to arrange for the orderly transfer of our International Commission of Control and Supervision responsibilities to some other government. In doing so we would not be suggesting that our partners in the International Commission or a potential successor would be less sensitive or less alert to the problems that could arise than we were. We reached our own conclusions on peace-keeping in Viet Nam some years ago and we have no reason to doubt their validity. On the other hand, we can readily understand that other countries differently situated from Canada could come to quite different conclusions. We respect their points of view and hope that they will understand ours.

Canada was invited to this conference as a member of the International Commission of Control and Supervision and its participation now and in any final act or declaration is linked to our continued participation in the International Commission of Control and Supervision. It follows, therefore, that a cessation of Canadian participation in the International Commission of Control and Supervision would also mean a termination of any other Canadian responsibilities that might arise out of either the agreement and protocols or any acts or declarations emanating from this conference.

I have asked the head of our delegation in Saigon, who happens like myself, to be chairman at the present time, to give me an interim report on the work of the International Commission of Control and Supervision and the state of affairs in respect to the implementation of the agreement and protocols.

The report that I received late last week from the head of the Canadian delegation made two points very clearly: first, the ceasefire has not been effective throughout South Viet Nam, and, second, the four-party joint military commission has not operated effectively. Both these factors have seriously impaired the Commission's ability to meet its obligations.

With respect to the ceasefire, it is evident from this report that the Vietnamese parties are still engaged in hostile activities related to efforts by one side or the other to enlarge its areas of control. The Commission has received numerous complaints from the four parties alleging violations of the ceasefire. In a number of cases investigations have been ordered but, at this early stage, we have been obliged to settle for investigations of a more limited scope than that envisaged in the agreement, debate within the commission over what the commission is empowered to investigate and at whose request, delays on the part of the four-party joint military commission in establishing itself in the field, and the conditions of insecurity prevailing in the countryside as a result of continued hostilities—all these have militated against the commission's ability to take decisive action in investigating most ceasefire violations. After receiving a series of general complaints alleging ceasefire violations, the commission issued a strong appeal to the parties to respect the ceasefire. This appeal on February 16 predated by one day an appeal by the four-party joint military commission to the same effect.

The delay in the four-party joint military commission in becoming fully effective has presented the International Commission with serious problems in meeting its obligations with respect to the deployment of teams in the field. The Commission's regional headquarters teams were deployed on February 5, several days after the deadline imposed upon us. On February 20, the commission decided to deploy its teams at the subregional level. In addition, the commission has decided to deploy its teams to points of entry into South Viet Nam to control the import of armaments and other military material, as well as four teams to observe the withdrawal of United States forces and other forces allied with the Republic of Viet Nam, from South Viet Nam. Every effort is being made by the Canadian delegation to ensure that teams in the regions and at points of entry are deployed within the deadline established by the agreement, that is to say, by February 27. Whether we succeed in meeting this deadline will depend, as everything will depend on the ability of the four parties to afford the necessary co-operation. We have however taken the position that the inability of the four party joint military commission to function smoothly should not necessarily be permitted to bring a halt to the attempts of the International Commission to meet its obligations.

We have been pleased to note the progress of the exchange of prisoners-of-war and foreign civilian personnel. This has been an operation in which the four parties, despite some initial difficulties, have exhibited an ability to cooperate and coordinate their activities. We can only hope that the cooperative spirit that has characterized this operation will be extended to the implementation of all other provisions of the agreement.

Simultaneously with its attempts to deal with substantive issues and to deploy its field machinery, the commission has been engaged in setting up its headquarters in Saigon, establishing its procedures, securing support facilities, and organizing a secretariat. This has been a complex and lengthy process which has not yet been completed, despite concentrated effort. Among the difficulties the commission has encountered in this area of its work is the fact that neither the agreement nor its protocols made provision for a secretariat, even though the necessity of establishing one was obvious. Personnel additional to the ceilings established in the protocol will be required if delegates are to be in a position to staff the secretariat adequately.

Fellow delegates, this, then, is the Canadian view of the status of the International Commission of Control and Supervision as of the last day or so. There are continuing problems of implementation and there remains the matter of a reporting authority for the Commission and its members. Implementation is the responsibility of the parties to the agreement assisted as best it can by the International Commission of Control and Supervision. However, the matter of providing an adequate international political authority as a basis for the operation and reporting of the International Commission of Control and Supervision and its members is clearly the main responsibility of this conference. My delegation will spare no effort in helping to achieve this objective on which we think so much depends. Thank you.

Statement by the Secretary of state for External Affairs of Canada,
The Honourable Mitchell Sharp,
to The International Conference in Paris,
Plenary Session, March 1, 1973

Canada supports the spirit of the act of this Conference. We also wish to associate ourselves with the expressions of goodwill and co-operation reflected throughout this conference and underlined in the document before us. For these reasons, we are prepared to sign it. I wish to make it clear, however, that we will have to assess the provisions of Articles 6 and 7 in particular, as to whether they are sufficient to meet one of the major requirements we have consistently stated as being essential to the ultimate effectiveness of the International Commission of Control and Supervision, on the basis of our quarter century experience in international supervision in Viet Nam and elswhere throughout the world. In very general terms Articles 6 and 7 represent one approach; an effort has undoubtedly been made to meet our requirement but does it go far enough and will it work? Our concept of an independent continuing political authority is contained in the proposal tabled by me in my statement of February 26. The arrangements provided in Articles 6 and 7 will be reviewed carefully by the Canadian Government as it carries out its consideration of the extent to which the various conditions we have stated to be essential to our continued participation in the commission beyond the initial period of sixty days have been, or, are likely to be fulfilled.

I must add that in signing the act of this conference, I am not accepting any responsibilities on behalf of Canada that are not determined by our initial participation in the commission, nor by previously announced Canadian policy. Finally, Canada considers itself bound by the arrangements provided for in the Act only so long as it remains on the Commission and should Canada find it necessary to terminate its participation in the International Commission of Control and Supervision, it would no longer consider itself formally bound by the terms of the act of the conference. I can, nevertheless, assure this distinguished company that Canadians would, as a matter of policy and as a matter of principle, remain committed to the promotion of the achievement by the peoples of Indochina of a stable and peaceful situation, and our acts would reflect this commitment.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The House met at 2 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B), 1972-73

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting Supplementary Estimates (B) for the financial year ending March 31, 1973, was presented by Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board) and read by Mr. Speaker to the House.

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, by leave, I should like to table a copy of Supplementary Estimates (B) for the financial year ending March 31, 1973.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move the following motion pursuant to Standing Order 59:

That Supplementary Estimates (B), 1972-1973, tabled this day, be referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, we have not objected to this procedure. Although we cannot debate the matter, I would suggest that in future, before we are required to give our assent and accept this procedure, that at least the supplementary estimates should be shown to members of the opposition parties.

HOUSING

RENT INCREASES AFFECTING OLD AGE PENSIONERS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask the consent of the House to present a motion which I believe expresses a view held by every member of the House. I hope the House will see fit to agree to its being presented and passed, preferably without debate. Without further word, therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Knight):

That this House deplores the action of certain landlords and nursing homes in increasing rents and other charges against old age pensioners immediately following and since the announcement of pension increases made in the budget of February 19, 1973.

Mr. Speaker: This motion is submitted to the House under the terms of Standing Order 43. It requires the unanimous consent of the House before it can be put. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: There appears to be unanimous consent. The motion will therefore be put. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

REQUIREMENT OF PROOF OF EFFORTS TO SECURE EMPLOYMENT—REQUESTS FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I should like to propose a motion in a case of urgent and pressing necessity involving thousands of Canadians now unemployed.

Since many Unemployment Insurance Commission officials demand that applicants for benefits supply proof that they have effectively looked for a job, and since such a procedure is detrimental to the dignity of the individual and contrary to the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard):

That this House consider action to prevent abuse of prerogatives by civil servants and to make them discontinue demanding conditions not provided under the present act in order to obtain unemployment insurance benefits.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion brought forward by the hon. member for Richmond under Standing Order 43. It requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is no unanimity. The hon. member's motion therefore cannot be put.

Name Change, Waterloo Riding

FINANCE

MEASURES TO INCREASE BIRTH RATE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, under section 43 of Standing Orders, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House in order to move a motion relating to a matter requesting urgent attention.

The birth rate in Canada, and more particularly in the province of Quebec, is now at its lowest level. We live in one of the largest countries in the world that barely numbers 20 million inhabitants. If we want to ensure our country's future development, we must consider developing out human resources, that is increasing our population in order to populate our vast territories. The present government policy regarding the family has a negative effect and will discourage parents from raising children. The economic policy now in force will put a heavy load—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must interrupt the hon. member for Rimouski, to remind him that it is out of order to make a speech in support of a motion put under Standing Order 43. The hon. member may not present arguments to support the motion that he wishes the House to consider. I therefore suggest that he state the motion he wishes to put to the House.

Mr. Allard: Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Tétrault):

That this House study the various financial means that might be employed to lighten the burden of fathers of families and to enable them to bring up as many children as they wish, with a view not to removing financial limitations but to promoting the full development of the family and of the couple.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member for Rimouski. Under Standing Order 43, the motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: As there does not seem to be unanimous consent, the hon. member's motion cannot be put.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

CHANGE IN NAME OF CONSTITUENCY FROM WATERLOO TO WATERLOO-CAMBRIDGE

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-156, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to draw attention to the recent amalgamation and change of name of the historic Waterloo County city and towns of Galt, Preston and Hespeler. They have now become the new city of Cambridge.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

TRADE

REPORTED UNITED STATES INTENTION TO INCREASE RESTRICTIONS ON IMPORTS—REPRESENTATIONS BY CANADIAN GOVERNMENT

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the numerous reports from Washington that the United States is seriously considering increasing trade restrictions against foreign imports, has the minister been in personal contact with the Secretary of Commerce of the United States to point out very strongly that Canada has not in any way been responsible for the United States imbalance and that there is no justification whatsoever for increasing restrictions against Canada?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, as I have said on previous occasions, the government's views with respect to restrictions on trade liberalization have been made known to the United States authorities.

Mr. Hellyer: While the minister is contemplating the desirability of personal diplomacy, would he advise the House, in light of the statements by a senior U.S. official that the intent of its trade legislation is to help the United States achieve a significant trade surplus in manufactured goods in order to offset increasing energy imports, whether the government is going to advise the United States that Canada is not prepared to accommodate growing United States energy problems by accepting further constraints on the potential of Canada to export manufactured goods?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, on a number of occasions I have made it quite clear that the Canadian government has stated that we are not contributing to the United States deficit on balance of payments. Indeed, because we are in a deficit position with the United States on a current account basis we are helping them solve their problem, not contributing to it.

GOVERNMENT INTENTION RESPECTING ASSOCIATION WITH EUROPEAN ECONOMIC COMMUNITY TO COUNTERACT UNITED STATES POLICIES

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I have one further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since United States administration officials have indicated that their new trade legislation is designed to remove all impediments to natural "market forces", for instance, the duty on U.S. cars sold in Canada, DREE and the screening legislation, is the government now going to join with the European Economic Community to protest DISC and to work with the EEC to find multilateral responses to the present trend of the trade policies of the United States administration?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I think there are many questions rather than one question in the hon. member's representations. Let me make it quite clear that reports coming out of Washington that would attack DREE, Canadian manufacturing industries and our ability to compete internationally are not positions that we are prepared to accept. Indeed, we have taken measures and are committed to a strong manufacturing industry in Canada, for example, such measures as the corporate tax reduction. Further, I think the hon. member mentioned the foreign investment review legislation which is of concern to certain quarters in Washington. This government believes it is important to ensure that foreign investment provides significant benefit to Canada through the proposed screening process.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby.

Mr. Hellyer: A further supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair has recognized the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby on a supplementary.

RESPONSE BY UNITED STATES TO PROTEST AGAINST COUNTERVAILING DUTY ON MICHELIN TIRES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, in view of the strong opposition expressed by the minister to the delegates from the Canadian Labour Congress yesterday concerning any discriminatory trade measures that are taken by other countries against Canada, would the minister inform the House whether or not he has yet heard from the United States concerning our government's protest regarding their countervailing duty against Michelin tires?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Broadbent: In view of the minister's equally strong assertion yesterday that our government would not sit back passively but would take some kind of retaliatory action against discriminatory measures, would the minister inform the House what the government plans to do if, as seems likely, the United States is not going to change its position on the duty levied against Michelin?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, if we are not able to settle the Michelin protest in a satisfactory manner we shall have recourse to the courts and take the issue to the courts in the United States.

HOUSING

REPORTED RENT INCREASES AFFECTING OLD AGE PENSIONERS FOLLOWING PENSION INCREASE ANNOUNCEMENT—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Is the minister aware of the increasing number of reports that pensioners are having their rents and fees increased by landlords and nursing homes following the announced increase in old age pensions, and has he asked Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to set up some kind of mechanism to monitor the situation across the country and ascertain whether injustice is being done to our pensioners?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of reports in the press and from other sources that some landlords have taken this action. I am not aware of any large number of complaints having been made to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. CMHC has set its rent policy for 1973, but as for trying to monitor privately-held property over which we have no mortgage or other control, any influence the corporation might have would be extremely limited.

Mr. Lewis: As every member of the House knows, there are bound to be some homes providing private accommodation to pensioners that are financed by mortgages under the National Housing Act. It is in this context that I ask the minister whether he will create some mechanism to examine what is happening, at least in the case of those properties that have been built through the assistance of CMHC?

Mr. Basford: Where the property is owned by CMHC, as is often the case, I have ordered that there be—

Mr. Lewis: If the minister would answer—

Mr. Basford: If the leader of the New Democratic Party would listen—

Some hon. Members: Watch it!

Mr. Basford: —he would find out what the government has done. I have ordered CMHC not to increase rents for this year where the corporation owns the property.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Basford: In the case of limited dividend projects where we are bound by contract to take into account increases in the owner's operating expenses, I have ordered CMHC to be extremely strict before allowing such increases. In cases in which we only hold a mortgage we only have the rights of a mortgagee, which are very limited indeed. I will review the terms of the mortgage documents, or of our practice, to ascertain whether there is anything we can do in these cases, but I think the hon. member is as aware of the terms of a mortgage as I am.

Mr. Lewis: Has the minister initiated discussions with his provincial counterparts and, if not, is he prepared to do so, to urge them to impose rent controls as far as accommodation for pensioners is concerned, and only in this area? I would ask him to take some initiative there.

Mr. Basford: One province has already taken action in this regard. Others, as I understand the position, are contemplating the establishment of rent review boards. I think this is a matter purely within the jurisdiction of provincial ministers. I would be happy to see that the remarks of the hon. gentleman are brought to the attention of provincial governments, but he will recognize as well as I do that this is a matter within their sphere of jurisdiction.

REQUEST FOR MORATORIUM ON RENT INCREASES AND FORECLOSURES ON CERTAIN PROPERTIES

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister a supplementary along the same lines. In light of the fact that the Canadian Labour Congress in its brief recommended that a moratorium should be placed not only on rents of properties under the jurisdiction or direct control of the CMHC, whether limited dividend projects or not, would the minister order a moratorium against (a) rent increases, and (b) foreclosures? I ask this question in light of the fact that in connection with limited dividend projects rents recently went up by 20 per cent, in spite of the hon. gentleman's words.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I have already answered the question with respect to limited dividend projects. With regard to foreclosure action, I believe each case should be decided on its own merits. It is our policy when there is default on a mortgage to make every possible effort not to foreclose and to reach some financial arrangement with the owner of the property.

Mr. Woolliams: The minister said he has ordered CMHC to look into the circumstances strictly before allowing rent increases. Does he consider an increase in the rent charged to tenants of limited dividend projects amounting to 20 per cent as late as January, 1973, as evidence of any strictness in the policy he is setting out today?

Mr. Basford: It is a very large increase, obviously. It is, however, provided for in the contract governing the property. What I have said is that the corporation has been instructed to follow these agreements strictly in so far as any applications for increases are concerned.

ALLEGED INDICATION BY LANDLORDS THAT RENT INCREASES AUTHORIZED BY CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. May I ask the minister whether he is aware of the fact that in some cases landlords in giving rental increase notices to their tenants are saying in writing that the increases are with the authorization of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and will he ask the corporation to review its policy in this matter?

[Mr. Lewis.]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wish the hon. gentleman would give me the letter to which he is referring. I presume he is probably referring to the case of a limited dividend project, and I think it is a misnomer to say in such cases that a rent increase is authorized by the corporation. I think the letter is wrong in that sense and I wish the hon. member would give it to me.

ATOMIC ENERGY

RESEARCH TO INCREASE HEAVY WATER PRODUCTION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Since the Gentilly nuclear plant which cost several million dollars is experiencing difficulties due to a scarcity of heavy water, could the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce inform the House if, during the past two years, the government has sponsored research for a larger production of heavy water in Canada in order to meet our needs?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, we have discussed with the Ontario and Quebec provincial governments the heavy water problem and the possibility of building another heavy water plant in one of those provinces. No decision has been reached yet on that matter but it is obvious that the success of the Canadian nuclear program will increase heavy water needs.

INFORMATION

STEPS TO IMPLEMENT RECOMMENDATIONS OF TASK FORCE ON PRIVACY AND COMPUTERS IN LIGHT OF INFRINGEMENT ON RIGHT TO PRIVACY

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. In view of the concern expressed by the Canadian Labour Congress in its brief yesterday, and by the Consumers Association of Canada, regarding the increased use of data banks in Canada and the fact that these data banks violate and infringe upon the right of Canadians to privacy, I should like to ask what steps he proposes to take to implement the recommendations of the task force on privacy and computers, particularly in light of the fact that the legislation of last session was allowed to die on the order paper?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the two parts of this question are very different. We certainly intend to come back to the House with legislation dealing with electronic and other forms of surveillance, making that an offence. As far as the task force report is concerned, hon. members will have noted that the task force did not suggest we were in a crisis situation at the moment but what is required is action to avoid that happening. We did begin work immediately within the government on the question of what we ought to do regarding our own informational data banks in order to ensure the individual's right to privacy.

The other matter in respect of data banks outside the government is rather more complicated, involving quite frequently areas within provincial jurisdiction as well, but we anticipate discussions with the provinces on that matter in the near future.

POSSIBILITY OF USE OF RETAIL CREDIT CORPORATION BY DEPARTMENTS TO OBTAIN INFORMATION

Mr. Ron Atkey (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. Will the minister advise whether any department of the federal government is a client of the Retail Credit Corporation or company, or of any other commercial reporting agency and, if so, does it use the information received for purposes other than as an employer?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I was not paying attention and I did not hear the question.

Mr. Atkey: I will repeat my question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister advise whether any department of the federal government is a client of the Retail Credit Corporation or company, or of any other commercial reporting agency and, if so, does it use the information received for purposes other than as an employer?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would respectfully suggest to the hon. member that this question should be placed on the order paper. If there is any urgency, it can be considered at the time of adjournment.

Mr. James McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the fact this has been declared Consumer Week, and in view of the concern across the country about these data banks, will the minister make a statement in the House outlining the government's position on the right to privacy and what precisely the government intends to do about it to protect Canadians?

• (1430)

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter about which I am very disturbed as Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I think, however, this is something that falls more directly within the jurisdiction of the Minister of Justice with regard to developing policy proposals for presentation to the House.

TRADE

IMPOSITION BY UNITED STATES OF COUNTERVAILING DUTY ON MICHELIN TIRES—POSSIBLE CANADIAN ACTION THROUGH U.S. COURTS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, this question is supplementary to the first questions which were asked earlier of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. He advanced a novel suggestion toward the end of his last answer that unless the United States did what Canada hoped and desisted from anything in the nature of discriminatory action the matter could be taken to the United States courts. That is a most novel suggestion. I would ask him to what courts the administration of the United States would be taken if it failed to do that which Canada desires?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, there is a provision under the Tariff Act of 1930, I believe, whereby aggrieved parties can take action in the United States customs courts. Those are the courts I was referring to.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see the minister going back to 1930, but we are now in 1973. I ask the minister what courts Canada can go to in order to punish, admonish or secure an injunction against the United States of America? That is the question.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I believe it is the United States federal court system, and I do not think it is a question of securing an injunction so much as it is a question of securing a judgment.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, does the minister suggest that in order for Canada to get justice it would have to go to a United States court in any proceeding? That is one of the most nonsensical answers ever given.

AGRICULTURE

COMMUNITY PASTURES IN WESTERN CANADA—REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION OF FEE INCREASE FOR PATRONS

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion in his capacity as minister in charge of the prairie farm rehabilitation administration. In view of the fact that the fees for patrons of PFRA community pastures across the west have been increased by some 30 per cent at the same time that the main estimates show that the operating costs have not gone up in terms of what the government is putting in, can the minister inform the House why there has been this increase?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, the reason for the increase, as I believe was stated in the public announcement, is that there has been a substantial increase in the operating cost of these pastures and the two will just about even out under the new arrangement. I call the hon. member's attention to the representations he made to me earlier which were also acted on in that we have substantially increased the amount of the benefit to the users of these and other pasture lands in terms of deep water wells, dams for cattle and so on.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the increase of expenditures in this area does not necessarily mean an expansion of community services to producers in terms of grazing land, can the minister outline any program under PFRA to increase community pastures in the west where those possibilities arise?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, in a very general way I might say that I have had consultations with one of the ministers of the government of Saskatchewan, and my officials have also discussed the same subject with officials of the government of Saskatchewan with a view to getting certain changes made in the ARDA agreement, but at the moment this has not been completed.

POSSIBLE SHUTDOWN OF PRINCESS COLLIERY FOR THREE MONTHS—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION AND REPORT

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion who is in charge of the Cape Breton Development Corporation. In view of the concern that has been expressed to me by the supervisory staff of the Cape Breton Development Corporation employed at Princess Colliery that there may be a shutdown of operations for a three-month period as a result of lack of proper development work underground and an apparent shortage of necessary equipment for a long time in the future at this coal mine, would the minister investigate the situation as soon as possible and provide a report?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I would be very pleased to do so.

SPORTS

SUGGESTION THAT FEDERAL GRANTS BE PAID DIRECTLY TO QUEBEC ATHLETES

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Secretary of State.

In view of the fact that, to safeguard its autonomy, the province of Quebec is refusing federal grants to amateur sports, would the minister tell the House whether he is studying the possibility of direct financial assistance to qualified athletes?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am going to answer this question as it is rather a matter under my department's jurisdiction. I am not aware of the facts mentioned by the hon. member. I am going to inquire about this and inform the House at a later date, if necessary. If the hon. member will call specific facts to my attention, I will gladly look into them.

FLOODS

HIGH WATER LEVEL IN LAKE ERIE—REQUEST THAT ARDA FUNDS BE PROVIDED IN CERTAIN AREAS SUFFERING EROSION

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. In view of the fact that $2.7 million remains available for flood control at the western end of Lake Erie under the ARDA program, will he indicate that the same assistance can be provided for other areas along Lake Erie which are suffering from erosion damage?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, this money was made available under the ARDA agreement which is for the protection of agricultural land and was made on the advice of the Ontario government. The federal government agreed to share 50-50 in that plan.

Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact the minister and some of his colleagues are meeting with their counterparts from the provincial government of Ontario in the near future, will he put forward the suggestion that the federal government would be willing to use the ARDA program to compensate farmers for farmlands lost through erosion?

Mr. Davis: Yes, Mr. Speaker. That matter was discussed with ministers from Ontario who were here in Ottawa this morning, and that compensation was agreed upon.

POST OFFICE

SERVICE TO CANADIAN PERSONNEL ON VIET NAM SUPERVISORY COMMISSION

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General. In view of the growing complaints of failure by the government to establish a reliable postal service to and from Canadians serving in Viet Nam, will the hon. gentleman indicate what steps he is taking to remedy this situation?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, we are certainly doing what is needed to insure better service to Canadians in this country, and we are also taking all the necessary steps so that Canadians in Viet Nam will receive their mail regularly.

[English]

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, do I take it from the hon. gentleman's reply that in addition to the other problems facing Canadians serving in Viet Nam they are to be assured only of the same poor quality of service as Canadians everywhere receive?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question would appear to be argumentative.

FISHERIES

REASON FOR BAN ON WHALING OFF ATLANTIC COAST IN LIGHT OF LEGAL CATCHING IN HUDSON BAY—POSSIBLE INTERNATIONAL MORATORIUM

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Fisheries. Now that the federal government has legalized as well as subsidized the catching of whales in Hudson Bay as an attraction for tourists, will he inform the House why he placed a ban on commercial whaling on the Atlantic coast and refused to take the scientists' recommendation of sustained yield quotas of sei and fin whales at Blandford, Nova Scotia?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the taking of Beluga whales in Hudson Bay this coming summer is under review.

Mr. Crouse: In view of the fact that the world's whaling nations are planning to catch 38,000 whales this year while Canada's quota is only 265 whales, has the minister received any indication from the International Whaling Commission that it is prepared to accept a ten year moratorium on the catching of whales?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, the world's whaling nations met in London last July and looked critically at the Canadian take of whales. It was partly because of criticism from other whaling nations that we stopped taking of whales off our coast.

INQUIRY AS TO STUDY ON CATCHING OF WHALES IN HUDSON BAY

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries. Did the Department of the Environment prepare an impact study on the effect of the program of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to help finance tourist interest in whale hunting in Hudson Bay and, if not, is such a study now being undertaken and when will it be made public?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): The answer basically is no. As I said before, we are reviewing the matter of whether or not we will grant licences this summer.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—ANNOUNCEMENT BY DEFEATED LIBERAL CANDIDATE OF ACCEPTANCE OF PROJECTS—DEPARTMENTAL POLICY

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Last Thursday in the House in answer to a question of mine he said that the officials of his department were not acting upon his instructions when former Liberal candidates notified local initiatives program applicants that their applications had been approved before they were notified by the department. If that is not the case, I should like to ask the minister upon whose instructions officials of his department are acting if not upon his?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am not even sure how the defeated candidate got the information, but I presume that the sponsor of the LIP project would be in communication with him and perhaps should have shared it with my hon. friend.

Mr. Nystrom: Since this has happened in many ridings and there are many such cases, would the minister undertake to investigate the matter and report to the House?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Nystrom: I understand the minister wishes to answer my question. If he did not hear it, perhaps I could repeat it. Since this has happened in several ridings across the country and there are many cases, will the minister undertake to investigate the matter and report to the House?

Mr. Andras: It is an interesting suggestion and I will give it consideration.

FINANCE

BUDGET PROVISION FOR PASSING ON OF FARMS TO OTHER FAMILY MEMBERS WITHOUT CAPITAL GAINS TAX

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance arising from the recent budget. In light of the confusion that appears to exist with regard to the postponement of the capital gains tax on family farms, would the minister inform the House whether the policy of the government would allow a farmer upon his death to pass the farm on to more than one member of his family? For example, could a farmer upon his death leave the farmhouse to one member of the family and the land to another?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is asking the minister to give his interpretation of a statute. In that respect the question is not in order.

RESERVE FUND HOLDINGS OF UNITED STATES DOLLARS—POSSIBILITY OF GUARANTEED EXCHANGE RATE

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Finance. In view of the renewed monetary crisis, has the government contacted the United States authorities with a view to obtaining exchange guarantees for our large and increasing holdings of U.S. dollars?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have gone over this road before. I will be seeing the Secretary of the Treasury in Paris later this week and we will be talking about a number of things relating to reserves.

Mr. Nowlan: I have a short supplementary question for the minister, Mr. Speaker. When the minister goes to Paris will he take with him a very firm policy on what the position with regard to the value of the Canadian dollar will be in terms of other world currencies?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I will take a very firm policy on the floating dollar, Mr. Speaker.

FLOODS

HIGH WATER LEVEL IN LAKE ONTARIO—RESULT OF MEETING WITH PROVINCIAL OFFICIALS

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of the Environment. In view of the meeting today between the minister and the provincial minister responsible for resource development policy, would the minister indicate whether the provincial minister indicated what steps he would take, if any, respecting the high water levels in Lake Ontario?

Some hon. Members: Order!

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the officials from Ontario did not come for the purpose of advancing any proposals. They did ask us what programs we had at the federal level either for building protective works or for providing funds for the compensation of those who suffered flood damage. We described those programs to them and they may take advantage of one or the other of those programs.

Mr. Cafik: Did the provincial minister indicate that they would be making any studies on an urgent basis to find out—

Mr. Nielsen: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is rising on a point of order.

[Mr. Beatty.]

Mr. Nielsen: I rise on the same point I have raised on two recent occasions. This is a flagrant abuse of the ordinary procedures in the House. These gentlemen get $4,000 a year extra for answering questions, not asking them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: He does not do either very well.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Cafik: I rise in defence of the fact that I put a question. It has been a longstanding tradition, at least during my membership in the House of Commons of over five years, that parliamentary secretaries have been recognized and I expect will continue to be recognized. In addition, the constituents whom I represent are entitled to have answers to these questions which seriously affect them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Resign!

An hon. Member: Go to your caucus!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We had a debate on this very interesting issue some time ago. I indicated that I was not prepared to make a distinction between backbenchers on the government side and members of other parties. I think there can be no question that they have the right at any time to ask questions the same as the frontbenchers or backbenchers of any other party do. I said at the time that I had some reservations—they were related perhaps more to propriety than to the procedural aspect of the problem—about parliamentary secretaries being placed in the position of both answering and asking questions to the extent where we might have a parliamentary secretary asking a question of another parliamentary secretary.

The difficulty, of course, is whether parliamentary secretaries are allowed at all to reply to questions on behalf of ministers. If we recognize that parliamentary secretaries have a right to reply to questions on behalf of ministers, I have wondered whether it was proper to allow them at the same time to ask questions. I felt that the problem was worthy of consideration.

The hon. member for Peace River suggested in order to be helpful, I believe, which he was, that this matter might be looked into along with many others that have been referred to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. That committee will be meeting within the next few days and perhaps it could look into this situation.

I know the committee will want to look with interest into a problem of such burning actuality and examine the arguments which could be brought forth in support of the right or privilege of parliamentary secretaries to ask questions and answer those which could be raised by other members.

[English]

I think that the suggestion that the matter might be looked into by the committee is good. In the meantime, I felt that perhaps these hon. members should be allowed to ask questions. I must say in all objectivity that until now the right has not been abused by parliamentary secretaries.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, if I may continue with the supplementary question that I was in the process of putting to the Minister of the Environment, would the minister indicate if the provincial minister in question indicated to him whether he would conduct urgent studies into the nature of the problem in order to come forward with recommendations?

Mr. Davis: Yes, they will conduct those studies, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

PORT HOPE, ONT.—ASSISTANCE TO THOSE WHO SUFFERED DAMAGE

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. Was the very serious flooding and damage at Port Hope, Ontario, last weekend brought to the minister's attention and, if so, is there any federal government program to assist those people who suffered damage?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The prospective damage there has also been brought to our attention. As I said, we did describe the federal program which is in support of provincial programs to take care of damage of that kind.

REQUEST FOR BREAKDOWN OF ESTIMATED CASH REQUIREMENTS FOR FISCAL YEAR 1973-74

Hon. Robert L. Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will take that under consideration.

GRAIN

WHEAT—DISPARITY BETWEEN COST OF HOPPER CARS PURCHASED BY GOVERNMENT AND THOSE BOUGHT BY UNITED STATES RAILWAY

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board and concerns the hopper cars recently purchased by the federal government. In view of the fact an American railroad has purchased 1,000 hopper cars of the same size, 100 tons, and the same capacity, 3,300 bushels, for $18 million or $6,000 per car cheaper than the Canadian government paid, can the minister explain the discrepancy between the American and the Canadian prices for what appears to be the same kind of cars designed to carry the same product and the same load?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I noticed a reference to this matter on an earlier occasion and I have asked for a report on the exact nature of the cars involved in the order referred to. There is a good deal of room for difference in the engineering and make-up of cars, even though they are superficially the same size, with regard to braking systems and the existence or non-existence of bearings in the wheel system, and so on.

Mr. Murta: Twelve million dollars worth? Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

AIR TRANSPORT

CHARTER REGULATIONS—ALLEGED DISCRIMINATION AGAINST PEOPLE LIVING IN AREAS REMOTE FROM MAJOR AIRPORTS

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In light of the fact the Canadian government has entered into an international agreement that regulates charter travel, is the minister aware that people living in areas remote from major international airports are being discriminated against by the air charter regulation amendments which allow only one point of origin on booked charter flights and which is obviously a misinterpretation of the international agreement on air charters?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I believe that chartered aircraft in Canada, particularly those from abroad, are subject to the same restrictions as those which apply to our own aircraft in foreign countries.

[English]

Mr. Oberle: The minister replies that we have special regulations for our own charters, but this is an international agreement and in the United States the airlines are not restricted by this kind of regulation.

Oral Questions

HOUSING

REASONS FOR INCREASE IN LUMBER PRICES

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In view of the fact that lumber prices have risen very dramatically over the last year, in some cases as much as 100 per cent, and in view of the fact this is causing a rapid escalation in the price of new housing in Canada, can the minister indicate whether officials of his department are investigating this matter and can he inform the House what factors are causing it?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that is really a question for the Minister of Finance, not for me. I understand that demand in the United States is reflected in large measure in the increased price in Canada. I would be happy to give the hon. member a fuller explanation later.

Mr. Andre: In view of the rapid escalation in the cost of housing, which I am informed is to a large degree attributable to the rapid use in the cost of lumber, can the minister indicate what steps he is contemplating or will recommend that the government initiate to keep the price of housing within reach of thousands and millions of Canadians who so far have been unable to afford a house of their own?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would suggest that such information should be conveyed to the House by way of a statement on motions.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON ACTION RESPECTING MEDICAL ADVISERS

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the severe criticisms directed at the minister's department with regard to the Canada Pension Plan by the hon. member for Simcoe North and myself during the recent study of the department's supplementary estimates, is the minister in a position to tell the House now or at the first opportunity on motions whether he has conducted a review of his medical advisers under the Canada Pension Plan or any other action he has taken?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, about the issue raised by the hon. member and others on this side of the House, I can say that I am reviewing this question with the officers of my department; I hope to be able to announce certain developments concerning this within a few days, at most within a few weeks.

[Mr. Oberle.]

UNITED STATES BAN ON IMPORTATION OF WHALE MEAT—EFFECT ON INDUSTRY AT CHURCHILL—REQUEST FOR REPRESENTATIONS

Mr. Keith Taylor (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of the apparent change of policy by the United States government in imposing restrictions on the importation of whale meat into that country, would the minister investigate the effect of this regulation upon the whaling industry at the port of Churchill, and would he also make representations to that government in order to obtain exemption from such restrictions?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to see that the hon. member for Churchill approves the project we have undertaken for the Indians in the area and that he hopes the American government will not impose restrictions on whales caught by the Indians in that area. Consequently, I shall see whether or not representations to the American government are indicated in this regard.

CANADIAN CULTURE

MULTICULTURALISM—REQUEST FOR GRANT TO SASKATCHEWAN PROVINCIAL LIBRARY TO BUY BOOKS IN VARIOUS LANGUAGES

Mr. Elias Nesdoly (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for multiculturalism. In view of the fact that for a number of years now the Saskatchewan provincial library has been buying books in the languages of the major ethnic groups in Saskatchewan, in view of the fact their budget is limited, and in view of the fact that last year when they attempted to get a grant from the Department of the Secretary of State they were refused because they were a provincial government agency, is the minister considering revising official government policy of last year in order to make it possible for the provincial library to extend its collection of books in French, German, Ukrainian, Polish, Hungarian, Dutch, Slovak—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should ask the question as promptly as possible. I hope he does not propose to run through all languages, known and unknown.

Mr. Nesdoly: —and library books in other languages as well?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, in view of the scope of the question I should like to take it as notice.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

ABORIGINAL RIGHTS—REQUEST THAT YUKON RESIDENTS BE INCLUDED IN FEDERAL REPRESENTATION ON NEGOTIATING COMMITTEE

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. When he sets up the negotiating committee that the Prime Minister approved when the Yukon Native Brotherhood presented its brief, will he ensure that there are members on the federal side of the negotiating team selected from residents of the Yukon Territory, preferably through the Commissioner in Council?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, we have already considered that possibility. We have received requests to that effect from various people and organizations in the Yukon, and we intend to start consultations in concert with some Yukon residents.

AGRICULTURE

TAXATION OF MARKETING QUOTAS—POSSIBLE REVISION IN LIGHT OF REPRESENTATIONS BY FARM GROUPS

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. In light of the fact that the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and many other farm groups regard the budget provisions for taxation of farm marketing quotas as, to use their words, "thoroughly inequitable and hopelessly complex", what steps does the minister intend to take to correct this situation and, specifically, will he undertake that such quotas will have valuation day values as do all other capital assets?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, though not accepting the premise of the question, may I say I met with the Canadian Federation of Agriculture executive last week and we will be meeting and discussing these matters further. I am not of the opinion that they are that dissatisfied.

CONSULTATION WITH MINISTER ON TARIFF REDUCTIONS ON HORTICULTURAL PRODUCTS AND BEEF PRIOR TO BUDGET

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Agriculture. Was the minister consulted about the changes that were to be made by the budget involving the reduction of tariffs on horticultural products and beef, and if he was consulted did he agree with them?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member knows that this is a very consultative group on this side of the House and that we discuss many things. I think he understands also how the budget is prepared and that he has to wait as I do until it is presented to the House.

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this is a poor way for any government to do business. I ask the minister, what reciprocal benefits will come to Canadian farmers by way of other countries lowering their tariffs?

Mr. Whelan: Again, Mr. Speaker, many of these matters are under discussion. As late as yesterday they were under discussion in Washington by myself and the Secretary of Agriculture of that country.

• (1500)

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Speaker, that is just another way of saying none.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before calling orders of the day I will recognize the hon. member for St. Catharines.

FLOODS

HIGH WATER LEVELS IN GREAT LAKES—POSSIBILITY OF LOWERING BY DIVERSION INTO MISSISSIPPI RIVER SYSTEM

Mr. Trevor Morgan (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of the Environment concerning water levels in the Great Lakes system. As the city of Chicago needs lots of water because of its pollution problems, have negotiations been carried on with the state of Illinois to lower the level of the water in the Great Lakes system by emptying it through Lake Michigan into the Mississippi Valley system, which is what Illinois and Chicago have wanted for a number of years?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the position of the Canadian government over many years has been to resist any diversion through the Chicago drainage canal into the Mississippi River system. If an attempt were made in the next few weeks, for example, to remove water through the present canal, only a very small amount could be discharged into the Mississippi. This would have a marginal effect on Lake Michigan and none at all on Lake Erie and Lake Ontario.

Mr. Morgan: I agree with the minister that it would not help the condition this year. Does the minister not agree that an adequate treaty could be made between the government of Canada and the state of Illinois to regulate water levels properly so that an adequate system of controls could be effective throughout the Great Lakes system?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, we have a basic policy, that we are opposed to the export of water from the Great Lakes and from Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Harney: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order relating to the answer given by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. The minister suggested that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has no direct involvement in authorizing rent increases in limited dividend housing projects. I believe the minister has been misinformed or has never received information to the effect that most standard forms of lease used by owners of such limited dividend projects contain a clause which provides in part as follows:

The tenant agrees that should Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation approve a rental increase for the rented premises then, and in that event, the rental hereinbefore set forth shall be increased to the amount approved by the said Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is hardly a point of order. It is, rather, a point of debate between the minister and the hon. member. Perhaps the matter might be pursued tomorrow during the question period. Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

On the order:

Consideration of the Business of Supply—The President of the Privy Council.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure if it would be proper for me to raise a point of order at this time on the proposed motion. I should like to do so at the earliest appropriate moment.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the Chair, without putting the motion formally, might at least read it so that it is on the record and so that hon. members who may have arguments to submit in respect of the motion might be given an opportunity to do so.

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—NON-CONFIDENCE MOTION—ALLEGED INADEQUACY OF 1972 BUDGET PROVISIONS FOR CORPORATIONS AND 1973 PROPOSALS TO MEET COUNTRY'S NEEDS

Mr. Speaker: The motion is as follows. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) would move:

That this House expresses its lack of confidence that the combination of the corporate tax reductions and accelerated depreciation write-offs contained in the Budget of May, 1972 and proposals contained in the Budget of February, 1973 constitutes an adequate and equitable response to the needs of the country.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I regret the necessity of raising a point of order on this proposed motion. However, it seems to be so seriously deficient that one would be lacking in respect for the usages of parliament and the House of Commons if the opportunity were lost of pointing out the deficiencies in this particular motion, as proposed.

May I begin by referring Your Honour and hon. members of the House to Votes and Proceedings for Wednesday, February 22, 1973. On page 155 of Votes and Proceedings the following is recorded:

[Mr. Harney.]

The House resumed debate on the motion of Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton), seconded by Mr. MacEachen,— That this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the Government.

The record goes on to state that at 5.45 o'clock p.m. Mr. Speaker interrupted the proceedings pursuant to Standing Order 60(8), and the question being put on the said motion, it was agreed to on the following division, 143 members supporting the motion approving the budgetary policy of the government and 102 members opposing the budgetary policy of the government. That is the basis upon which I have founded my point of order, as today the notice of motion that has been put before the House deals with that very question which has already been dealt with and decided upon in this House. The notice of motion reads:

That this House expresses its lack of confidence that the combination of the corporate tax reductions and accelerated depreciation write-offs contained in the Budget of May, 1972 and proposals contained in the Budget of February, 1973 constitutes an adequate and equitable response to the needs of the country.

The House has already declared itself upon the budgetary policy of the government, as contained in the budget of February, 1973. The House of Commons debated the matter for six days. When the budget was before the House there was an opportunity, as provided under the rules, for members to move an amendment and subamendment and, on the final day, for a vote to be taken disposing of the budgetary policy of the government, or disposing of the motion which read:

That this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the Government.

The motion presently proposed tries to revive the same subject. It tries to revive the matter of the budgetary policy of the government, a matter that has already been adopted, and it now asks the House to regard as inequitable and inadequate the budgetary policy which the House just last week approved in general.

My first submission is this: Standing Order 60 provides a method by which the House can come to grips with the budgetary policy which has been presented. The House can come to grips with this policy through a certain procedure, and having failed to win support on previous amendments, it is not now open for the leader of the official opposition to bring forward a third amendment to the budget.

In addition to that point, may I draw Your Honour's attention to Standing Order 35 which reads:

No member shall speak disrespectfully of Her Majesty, nor of any of the Royal Family, nor of His Excellency or the person administering the Government of Canada;—

I am not suggesting that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) has done that. I shall continue reading:

—nor use offensive words against either House, or against any member thereof. No member may reflect upon any vote of the House, except for the purpose of moving that such vote be rescinded.

It seems to me crystal clear, if I may use a phrase frequently used by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that the House in a formal vote has already approved the budgetary policy of the government. Today the House is asked to declare these policies as inequitable and inadequate. If that is not a reflection upon the vote of the House of Commons made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) in the words put before the House in the motion, nothing is. I suggest that if this motion is put before the House it will certainly constitute a very direct reflection upon a vote already made by the House of Commons.

I will come to the final point of my argument. If the preceding two points have not been convincing to my hon. friends, perhaps the paragraph that I shall read from Beauchesne's Fourth Edition, citation 200(1), will have the desired effect. The citation reads as follows:

An old rule of Parliament reads: "That a question being once made and carried in the affirmative or negative, cannot be questioned again but must stand as the judgment of the House." Unless such a rule were in existence, the time of the House might be used in the discussion of motions of the same nature and contradictory decisions would be sometimes arrived at in the course of the same session.

The old rule of parliament is a very sound rule. In this session, just a week ago, the House of Commons approved the budgetary policies of the government. This motion asks the House this week to condemn as inequitable and inadequate the budgetary policies of the government. I suggest that one of the functions of the rules of parliament is to prevent the House from reaching contradictory conclusions, and one of the purposes of the rules of the House of Commons is to prevent members of the House from making fools of themselves to the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Presumably the hon. member who is proposing to move the motion is hoping desperately that the motion will carry. What would the situation be if it did carry, at least from a logical point of view aside from other consequences that my hon. friends may wish? The logical situation may be that last week the House of Commons approved the budget and this week it disapproves it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, before I commence, I wonder if the minister will file the power of attorney he exercised in this connection from his hon. friends to the left.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: I looked at my friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I was hoping he might intervene because I have here a list of the various statements made by his leader, passionate purpose prose in which the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) disclosed his views about the issue of this subject matter. I expected the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to spring to the defence of his leader in an effort to have this matter ventilated and made the subject of discussion, but I see this is not to be the case.

Never have I heard such an effort made by a government to circumscribe opportunities for fair debate in this House—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: —which have been slowly diminishing over the years. Since the 1968 election, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his friends have surely and inexorably attempted, and in many cases have succeeded, to take from this House opportunities to debate matters of consequence. My party and the people of this country take a serious view of this attempt to interfere with the traditional and historical rights of this House to challenge governments on the issue of supply.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: In any discussion of this matter, Mr. Speaker, that is a principle which dare not be forgotten. I ask Your Honour to examine the terms of the motion which stands in the name of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) as follows:

That this House expresses its lack of confidence that the combination of the corporate tax reductions and accelerated depreciation write-offs contained in the Budget of May, 1972 and proposals contained in the Budget of February, 1973 constitutes an adequate and equitable response to the needs of the country.

What is it that this House decided when the vote was taken last Wednesday with regard to the question raised by the government House leader? "That this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government." What budgetary policy? I will not take the time, and I suppose I would be out of order if I did, to outline what I thought of the budgetary policy. That has been done most effectively. However, the budgetary policy is contained in the budgetary proposals introduced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) on February 19, and which are the subject of Ways and Means resolutions. There is no question at all that an examination of the minister's speech on that day refers to a number of items. The minister started off by addressing some preliminary remarks on this issue and then we find the heading "May, 1972, Budget Measures". Referring to the budget of February 19, 1973, the Minister of Finance said and I quote:

This budget reinforces and builds upon the budget which I put before the House last May.

Obviously, the Minister of Finance, this House and the people of this country made the clearest possible distinction between the budgetary proposals contained in the budget which the Minister of Finance placed before the House in 1972 and the measures which the Minister of Finance placed before the House on February 19, 1973. Here is the Budget Speech which was circulated in the country and to all members of the House. It differentiates in every way between the budgetary proposals of May, 1972 and February, 1973. At page nine, the minister recapitulates what was attempted in the budget of 1972 which was not passed. He is peering into the future, dealing with unemployment and inflation. Then he says: "I now turn to the budget measures themselves." What measures? The measures he is intending to bring forward, measures expressed in the ways and means resolutions which attach to the budget and which are restricted exclusively to the budget proposals of February, 1973.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest to you that what the Leader of the Opposition has placed before the House amounts quite simply to a combination of two issues, the effect of the reductions to corporations and accelerated depreciation allowance write-offs contained in the budget of 1972, and the proposals contained in the budget of February, 1973. How could any reasonable person suggest that these could be compared in any way with the subject of the vote which was taken in this House last Wednesday?

I do not intend to stop at this point. I believe there is an issue here so fundamental and so important that the House should consider what is involved. The procedure under which we presently examine budgetary measures and supply measures was introduced following proposals which were considered in 1968 and 1969 after discussion by the Committee on Procedure and Organization. What has been the situation, traditionally? It has always been fundamental to the parliamentary system of government that supply cannot and should not be granted until there has been every opportunity to seek redress of grievances. This is a right which goes back to Cromwell and Charles I, and it has been embodied in our system of supply, in the way in which parliament deals with the voting of money to the government.

In the course of the debate which took place at the time the present rules were considered, some interesting comments were made. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in one of his rare contributions to our debates, had this to say on December 10, 1968, as reported in Hansard at page 3784 of Volume IV, 1968-69:

> For purposes of supply business the Committee proposes that the annual session be divided into three periods. On five days between the opening of the session and December 10, the opposition would select the business of the House with complete freedom.

I underline the words "with complete freedom". A similar thought was expressed by Mr. Gordon Blair, then a Member of Parliament and chairman of the select committee:

> In connection with allotted opposition days I would emphasize that it is the recommendation of the Committee that the opposition would have complete freedom to choose whatever topic for debate it desires.

These are words which the Chair should bear in mind in reaching a decision on this particular proposal.

Then again, the report of the Committee on Procedure and Organization dated March 13, 1968 contains the following words with reference to a proposal to alter the manner of dealing with supply—there had been some discussion about British practice:

> The British practice, while it avoids discussion of the estimates items, has the great value that it permits the Opposition to explore whatever shortcomings, either small or great, it detects in the policies and conduct of the ministry before supply is voted.

These are very wide words and must be read in conjunction with the rule which is not being considered. The report continues:

> If our sessions were normally to begin in October it should be possible to complete the business of supply before the end of June. If the Opposition had entirely at its disposal a certain number of allotted days to be taken between the day on which the Address in Reply is adopted and the end of June, the Opposition would then have an adequate opportunity to publicize the shortcomings it sees in the ministry.

Following the debate on the tabling of this report and the adoption of the new rules, the new rules came into being. They replaced the practice of permitting the widest possible discussion on the motion to go into supply, at which time any matter, any issue, could be debated. This had been the practice for many years. It is the substitution for this practice which we are now considering.

I recognize that Your Honour's attention has been drawn to a precedent which appears in Beauchesne, paragraph 201, but it is surely incumbent upon the Chair to exercise the utmost vigilance in circumstances such as these. Even if this motion were closer to the line than it is, there would be a heavy responsibility upon the Chair to look very sharply indeed at any argument which sought to limit the opportunities available to the opposition to discuss shortcomings in the policies of the government before granting supply. This is the fundamental issue before us. Your Honour is, in effect, being urged to restrict the limited rights which this House presently enjoys to call attention to shortcoming, to bring forward grievances and to seek redress. This would be the result if the Chair were to give effect to what the government House leader is urging.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: Througnout the session, questions addressed to the Minister of Finance have had the effect of making a clear distinction between the budget proposals in May, 1972 and the budget proposals of February 19, 1973. For example, as recorded at page 22 of Hansard of January 5, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) asked the Minister of Finance the following question:

> In view of the indication that the bills left over from his old budget relating to income tax, corporation income tax and so on will be reintroduced, is it the intention of the minister that the House consider these bills immediately or that they should be considered at the time he presents his new budget in 1973?

The minister's answer made it quite plain that he recognized this distinction.

On February 6, as reported at pages 993 and 994, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) put this question to the Minister of Finance:

> May I ask the Minister of Finance one or two questions on the general subject which has been raised? May I ask whether, in view of the fact that the reduction in corporate taxes and the accelerated write-off in respect of certain machinery and equipment which he proposed last May were justified by him on the basis of the need to protect Canadian manufacturing against the Disc program in the United States, and in view of the fact that all information so far has shown that the effect of the Disc program has been minimal on Canadian manufacturing, he is now reconsidering the corporation rip-off which he proposed last May?

The Minister of Finance made it quite clear in his answer that he recognized this distinction clearly existed between what he intended to do in the budget to be brought in, and the budgetary proposals of May, 1972.

Again as reported in Hansard for February 13 at page 1225, the hon. member for York South, persisting in his interest in this matter, said:

Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance on another topic. It arises out of the report of a survey of corporate profits for 1972. In view of the fact that this survey shows an increase in corporate profits of 20 per cent in 1972 over 1971 . . . is the minister reconsidering the additional concessions to what I have called the corporate welfare bums that he suggested last May?

On three other occasions this clear distinction was made, and it was repeated in the 1973 budget. I submit to the Chair it cannot be suggested that distinction is not to be made between the budgetary proposals of May 1972 and the budget of 1973. What we did in challenging the budgetary policy of 1972—not the policies but the budgetary policy—was to vote against the policy contained in that budget. If what the minister contends is given effect to, this would be the result. Once the motion has been passed there is a complete taboo. No hon. member would be able to discuss any of the areas relating to the budgetary proposals which are the subject of the motion. However, I will make this admission. If we had brought into this House a motion couched in identical terms as the motion with which we sought to amend the budget, then a very good case might well be made out for saying that citation 200 read by the government House leader, and by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would apply. But that is not the case.

If you take the situation that would result from the application of the budgetary proposals of May 1972, and add to it the proposals contained in this 1973 budget, then by putting them together we can say that the combination is such that, in the terms of this motion, it does not constitute "an adequate and equitable response to the needs of the country". I submit to Your Honour that it would take a great stretching, a great torturing of those words to permit you to say to the Leader of the Opposition, in a matter as important as the granting of supply, an issue that traditionally and historically goes back so far it has become woven into the tapestry of our parliamentary structure, that because of the terms of this motion we are prohibited from continuing debate.

I could take more time, Mr. Speaker, but my point is that the government is inhibiting the opposition's opportunities to place before the House the substance of this motion. I conclude by pointing out that there are many instances of motions having been moved by members of the New Democratic Party, and by members of the Creditistes party, dealing with matters that constituted part of a preceding budget, In no way and at no time was it suggested on those occasions that it was not competent for a member to proceed with the motion, have it discussed, the question put and the views of the House recorded.

I leave the matter with Your Honour, but I repeat that I take the most serious view of the attempt to further restrict the very limited opportunities that exist for members of this House to have the right to challenge the government in respect of supply. If we are prohibited from proceeding with a motion of this kind, then as far as I can see the whole business of supply and the rights of the opposition might just as well go out of the window.

Effect of Budgetary Proposals

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) I take a very serious view of the procedural point that we are debating this afternoon. I feel very strongly that Your Honour should find this motion out of order.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): No doubt.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But before there are any catcalls, may I make it perfectly clear—I suppose I should say crystal clear—that we of the New Democratic Party are not in the least embarrassed by this motion. We regard it as somewhat silly, as an attempt to go both ways, but we will be quite happy to have it debated. We want to see the issue ventilated, and if Your Honour sees fit to allow this motion procedurally, we shall be quite happy to vote against it when it is called at 9.45 tonight.

May I point out that among the points of confusion and contradiction contained in the motion is the very clear suggestion that the corporate tax reductions proposed in 1972 are not adequate. What the sponsors of this motion want, Mr. Speaker, is an even greater reduction in corporate tax than that proposed by the Minister of Finance. We do not take that position. Therefore, if this motion comes to a vote, there is no question where we stand: we are opposed to it.

Speaking of the motion, may I point out that there is an interesting citation in Beauchesne, which I admit relates to amendments but I think should also apply to motions. It is to be found in Beauchesne's Fourth Edition at page 171, citation 203(1), and I should like to read the relevant sentence:

Every amendment—

As I say, this deals with amendments but I think it should also apply to motions.

—proposed to be made either to a question or to a proposed amendment should be so framed that if agreed to by the House the question or amendment as amended would be intelligible and consistent with itself.

I submit that this motion does not meet that criterion. On the one hand, it seeks to convey the impression that it is a vote against the corporate tax reduction, and therefore it is supposed to trap us. On the other hand, it leaves the way open for the Progressive Conservatives to say that when the vote does come on the corporate tax reduction they can vote against it because they want a greater reduction. I suggest that kind of playing fast and loose with the procedures of this House does not become a group of men and women who are known as the Official Opposition in this House of Commons. Apart from my procedural objection to this motion, I think it is stupid. I think it would be a waste of time to have a debate on this motion today, but as I say my main concern is that I think it is procedurally wrong.

Although I had intended to leave this part of my argument to the end, I am switching my thoughts and I shall deal with it now. I want to deal with the main argument advanced by the hon. member for Peace River. His contention is that there is an ancient and sacred right that permits the House of Commons to have a redress of grievances before supply is granted. When any hon. member of this House stands up and talks about ancient rules, I am with him.

• (1540)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: You and Cromwell.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member says there must be no curtailment by the government House leader or by Your Honour of the rights of private members in the House of Commons to seek redress before supply is granted. I remind the hon. member for Peace River, the rest of the House and Your Honour, that there is a citation on this point of very particular significance.

Mr. Paproski: 32 B.C.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is to be found on pages 198 and 199 of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition, and this is the main citation regarding the ancient doctrine about the redress of grievances. The preliminary sentence reads:

The ancient doctrine that the redress of grievance should be considered before the grant of supplies is maintained in the House of Commons of Canada—

We all say "hear, hear" to that, but I ask the hon. member to go on and read the next paragraph, and this is in reference to the rule under which a supply motion is presented. Our structure is a little different since the rules were changed in 1968, but basically we are still under the rules, under the traditions and the regime of supply. I ask the House, and Your Honour in particular, to listen to this:

When such motion is proposed, it shall be permissible to discuss any public matter within the powers of the Federal Parliament or to ask for the redress of any grievance; provided that the discussion shall not relate to any decision of the House during the current session, nor to any item of the estimates, nor to any resolution to be proposed to the Committee of Ways and Means—

Sir, one almost needs to read no other citation. The fact of the matter is that there has been a decision of the House of Commons during the current session on the general budgetary policy of the government. It is also a fact that resolutions are to be proposed to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): They have not been proposed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): They are to be proposed. Do not interrupt unless you have read the citation. It says: "nor to any resolution to be proposed". The resolutions are to be proposed. They flow from the fact that the motion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) was carried. He has given us these resolutions and we have them in Votes and Proceedings. Resolutions are to be proposed to the Committee of Ways and Means regarding tax changes, and the motion that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) attempts to move today relates to the subject matter of those resolutions.

Later on the next page of the same book, or over here somewhere, there is a provision that a motion of this kind cannot deal with a bill to be presented to the House. I think the hon. member for Peace River gets his case a bit mixed up when he switches back and forth between 1972 and 1973. At times he talks about the 1973 budget as though it stands on its own feet, and then he talks about the 1972 budget being part of this one because he uses the work "combination". I suggest this is part of the poor draftsmanship at which the official opposition seems to be so competent. Sometimes I wonder how they could ever draft bills as the government of this country when they cannot even draft proper motions as the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) as the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) seeks the floor on a question of privilege.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege has to do with the NDP write-off. For the last 11 minutes we have been listening to the House leader of the—I do not know which party it is—NDP, yet a good deal of what he has been saying has nothing to do with the point of order before us. I ask Your Honour, in making a ruling, to consider the fact that 45 minutes, and whatever length of time the hon. member continues with this kind of argument, should not be taken off the time of the debate which will ensue after the point has been decided. Most of what the hon. member is saying has no relevancy to the point of order. It is a debate and it accuses people of not having the ability to draft proper motions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lundrigan: The hon. member seems to be trying to escape from the box in which that party presently finds itself. I respectfully submit that a good deal of his time-consuming argument is not in order and should not be deducted from the debating time we are allowed after this point has been decided.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, if anything I said was offensive to the hon. member, at least I shall not repeat it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): However, if the difficulty he is complaining about concerns the fact that time is being taken on the procedural point rather than on the substance of the motion, members of that party have only themselves to blame for putting forward this kind of motion.

I think I have demonstrated that the traditions and the rules about the right of grievances before voting of supply are very clear. Our rights are wide but we do not have the right to violate the rule of anticipation. As a matter of fact, perhaps I should read one more significant sentence:

The debate in such a case is limited by the rules respecting past decisions, anticipation, sedition—

The right to raise grievances on supply does not include the right to anticipate something that is coming in the normal course, or the right to reopen something which has been decided in the past.

The point which I am sure must concern Your Honour as you wrestle with this issue is the fact that on many a day when we have had an opposition motion, particularly on days when there has been no vote, Your Honour has taken the view that you had to show leniency and had to extend latitude. I suspect you have even done it for us, but that has always been done on the understanding that the matter was not coming to a vote.

Your Honour may feel that today you should exercise some of that latitude, but I submit that to do that on a day when theoretically it would be possible for the House to make a decision which would be the very opposite of a decision it made a week ago makes this procedural point a very serious one, and I urge that you should not allow this for these procedural reasons.

I still get these interjections from here and there, but this is not embarassing to us as we are happy to have the issue ventilated, and happy to get up and be counted as to where we stand on this motion. I do not want to offend the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate, but perhaps I can go on.

I think we should note again some of the citations, even though the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) did draw attention to them. On page 164 of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition we find the basic rule set out in Citation 194(1) which reads:

> A motion or amendment cannot be brought forward which is the same in substance as a question which has already been decided, because a proposition being once submitted and carried in the affirmative or negative cannot be questioned again but must stand as the judgment of the House.

I point out, Sir, that not only do we have the fact that this House voted on the general budgetary motion moved by the Minister of Finance, we also have the amendment which was moved by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) in these words:

> While acknowledging certain beneficial provisions in the budget proposals—

They always like to have it both ways, don't they? Let me continue:

> —this House regrets that they do not contain measures that will substantially reduce continuing high unemployment, effectively contain the spiralling cost of living or provide any incentives to Canadians to increase their participation in Canadian business enterprise and development.

• (1550)

Now they ask us to pass an opinion on the budget because it does not constitute an adequate and equitable response to the needs of the country. I ask, what is the difference between talking about the needs of the country in general terms and spelling out such things as unemployment, inflation and so on. On all counts we are being asked to debate again, and take a decision on, the same subject matter and points on which we took decisions when we were on the budget debate.

An hon. Member: What about old age pensions?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If my hon. friend wants to get into the matter of old age pensions, of course, if this motion should be ruled out of order I suppose we shall be back on government business and back on the subject of old age pensions today. Perhaps that is what my hon. friend wants. At pages 167 and 168 there are found citations about reviving debate. Citation 200 (1), which is the one to which the minister referred, reads:

> An old rule of Parliament reads: "That a question being once made and carried in the affirmative or negative, cannot be questioned again but must stand as the judgment of the House." Unless such a rule were in existence, the time of the House might be used in the discussion of motions of the same nature and contradictory decisions would be sometimes arrived at in the course of the same session.

I also point out, Sir, that our standing orders include Standing Order 61 which is very clear. It reads:

> Only one amendment and one subamendment may be made to a motion proposed in the Budget Debate or to a motion proposed under an Order of the Day for the consideration of the business of supply on an allotted day.

We have had the one motion, the one amendment and the one subamendment to the budget debate and for the Leader of the Opposition to try to drag in another one, no matter what he proposes to call it, is a violation of the sacred rules, traditions and rights of this House. If we are to be in this position where we can give a decision one week and have it opened again the next week, I submit that something has gone wrong with the procedures of this House.

Although I repeat what I have said, that we find no problem in so far as this debate is concerned, the Conservatives are trying to embarrass us and, failing in that, are trying to prepare the ground so that when the corporate tax reductions come up they can vote against them because they will say they are not big enough. We will not fall into the trap. Neither are we going along with their proposition for even greater corporate tax cuts. In any case, Sir, we leave the decision in your hands.

Some hon. Members: Hurrah!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I hear some of my friends saying "Hurrah". I could add something, but I shall not. The plain fact of the matter, of which Your Honour is well aware, is that this is a very serious procedural point. I do not think since our new rules came into effect that there has been a procedural point of this kind in respect of an opposition motion on a non-confidence day. There have been procedural points on other than non-confidence days, but this may well be the first of this kind and I submit the seriousness of violating the rules against reviving an issue on which a decision of parliament has been taken is a very important matter. Therefore, Sir, I hope you will find that this motion goes beyond the rights accorded by the rules to members of this House and that you will rule accordingly.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, after the comments of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and of the hon. member of Winnipeg-North-Centre (Mr. Knowles) about the acceptability of this motion, I am surprised to see that its subject matter has already caused some discussions.

To start my comments, I would like to remind my colleagues that we must make a distinction between the subject matter and the form of this motion, and even if the New Democratic Party finds that the form is ridiculous, being inconsistent or unjustifiable, as a member of the opposition, it is also true that I would agree with the views of the hon. member for Peace River.

However, we will vote against this motion. I will try to make comments which will be in order. Certainly we will vote against this motion of the Conservatives because its subject matter is ridiculous.

Mr. Speaker, the motion reads as follows:

That this House expresses its lack of confidence that the combination of the corporate tax reductions and accelerated depreciation write-offs contained in the Budget of May, 1972 and proposals contained in the Budget of February, 1973 constitutes an adequate and equitable response to the needs of the country.

We will vote against this motion because it is nonsense, at least as far as its subject matter is concerned, no matter what the reasons of the different parties are. If we are going to discuss, at your invitation, the acceptability of this motion, we have to talk about its subject matter and, in this respect, I am merely referring to Standing Order 58.

In the first place, Mr. Speaker, Standing Order 58(2) lists a series of items on the business of supply and I shall not read them before the House. Opposition motions are defined as follows in paragraph (3):

Opposition motions on allotted days may be moved only by members in opposition to the government and may relate to any matter within the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada—

I maintain that the motion now before the House, however ridiculous it may be, is within the jurisdiction of Parliament, anyway.

Paragraph (5) of the same Standing Order deals with the allotted time for the business of supply. I shall now put forward an argument which has apparently been overlooked by those who spoke before. It reads as follows:

For the period ending not later than December 10, five sitting days shall be allotted to the business of supply. Seven additional days shall be allotted to the business of supply in the period ending not later than March 26. Thirteen additional days shall be allotted to the business of supply in the period ending not later than June 30. These twenty-five days are to be designated as allotted days.

Under a general agreement between House leaders, that number of days is fairly divided in proportion to the number of members.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we cannot have opposition days whenever we choose; we have to present a motion at the time provided under Standing Orders.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre maintains that this is a question of anticipation but I think he is wrong and I believe he disavows the position he was holding at the time the government had a majority, namely that the object of an opposition day is to enable any opposition party to present a motion on supply or on the budget, in short, a substantive motion blaming the government for not having done such or such a thing and expressing doubts about the efficiency of this or that government policy.

Mr. Speaker, however ridiculous the subject matter of the motion presented by the Progressive Conservative party, which gives absolutely nothing and against which we shall vote, I nevertheless believe the hon. member for Peace River presented arguments to support the interests of the opposition parties and I hope that the Progressive Conservative party will carefully draft their motions from now on so as not to cast any doubt on the work and rights of the opposition parties in the House.

• (1600)

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I might say that I would be prepared to give a ruling now, but I certainly do not want to limit the right of hon. members to contribute to the procedural debate. I am not sure whether the right hon. gentleman wishes to rise on a point of order.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I had nothing to do with the drafting of this motion. For that reason I feel I can be perfectly objective. The rule is very clear that there cannot be repetitious motions or amendments in the same session. However, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) has carefully and meticulously distinguished this resolution or amendment from coming within the ambit of that general rule.

I must say that I have been tremendously moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) as he wrapped himself in the unctuous purity of parliamentary perfection. If I did not know him as well as I do, I would regard his views as sanctimonious declarations in order to exculpate his party from the difficult position in which they find themselves.

It has been an interesting afternoon. The President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) spoke with that eloquence that always characterizes him when he has a bad case. It was interesting that, from time to time as he spoke, he turned toward the right and looked at the left.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: It reminds me of the old song "Absolutely, Mr. Gallagher; Positively, Mr. Shean". He spoke of parliament and its greatness. Then came the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and he said: "I am not a bit frightened. We don't mind what decision Your Honour makes. We are fearless and we are going to go contrary to everything that we declared during the election campaign".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: If it had not been for that declaration, Your Honour, I would not have referred to this at all during the course of what I have to say. But I have never seen anything since Damon and Pythias that equals that fine relationship. Here was the President of the Privy Council. One good turn deserves another. Only a few weeks ago the NDP threw out a life line to save the government, and in doing so saved not only the government but itself.

Today there is a return performance. I know how the heart of the President of the Privy Council burns within him as he thinks of the desperate position in which the NDP finds itself. I say these things because throughout the argument up to the present moment there have been references to parliament and what parliament stands for.

You, Sir, are in the position of being the protector of parliament, the preserver of its great traditions.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The members of the Liberal party laugh. They do not regard you that way. There is no question whatever as to what the rule says. There is equally, as I see it, no question that the hon. member for Peace River has fully answered the suggestions that were made to the contrary by the President of the Privy Council. When the President of the Privy Council and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre spoke of parliament and what it meant, I looked over at the government benches. What they have done in the past few years to parliament is to degrade it to a degree that has never been equaled in all the history of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The President of the Privy Council says that we must maintain the rules. These rules are not the laws of the Medes and the Persians. These rules are designed to ensure that this institution shall be the protector of freedom and that we shall have the fullest opportunity to examine supply. We do not have it today. Is parliament then effective today? Somebody asked me a moment ago whether it was fluid like this on other days. The fluidity of parliament today reminds me of a dried up creek in the month of July. There is practically no right left with us.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, geese not eagles saved ancient Rome. I hear these hon. gentlemen acting the part of geese. I will remind them that they will not save their government by this kind of conduct. Today, have we any control over our expenditure in this country?

Some hon. Members: None.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As a result of closure, this institution has been emasculated—it is a eunuch. There is no examination of expenditures. The expenditures go to committees. When the committees sit, the press is not there; nobody speaks out, and the result is that the various departmental estimates come back here. Do we get any chance here to speak about them? There is not an opportunity. I think of that awful scene of a few months ago when we voted through $16 billion in four and a half hours because the rules imposed by closure had actually determined the denial of the right of parliament to examination. Every time there is any motion tabled, these people stand up and parade as the lovers of parliament.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the NDP have nothing to fear. They are going to leave the conscientious declarations that they made throughout the election at the door of parliament. They will vote in support of what they condemned with all their hearts and souls. I ask you, Sir, on the basis of the argument advanced by the hon. member for Peace River not to continue this degradation of parliament. That is what it is. Do we get a chance to raise anything under Standing Order 43 any more? Nothing of the kind. On every resolution that comes up we hear the "nos" from the Liberal party. Are we able to advance our efforts in regard to expenditures? The answer is no. The last opportunity we have is through the medium of amendments, because those amendments will embarrass the New Democratic Party.

Their joint allies, the government, decided to raise the question of the illegality of the amendment in question and at the same time the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) gets up and says "I don't care what you do, Mr. Speaker, we are going to vote against it".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if I remember the last words of the argument put forward by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), he stated the motion moved by the Progressive Conservative party today was identical to that moved during the budget debate, he was compelled to admit that the motion would surely be out of order.

He also said that just the same there were a few differences between the motion introduced today and that brought in during the budget debate. However, it seems obvious that both motions have something in common, namely that both specified that the budget presented by the government was unsatisfactory and that, consequently, the government had lost the confidence of the House. Now, to maintain today that the motion moved by his party is different from the one introduced last week is absolutely false and I will not make any other comment in that connection.

I will only quote four excerpts from Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, Fourth Edition; the first one appears at page 137 and reads as follows:

A mere alteration of the words of a question without any substantial change in its object will not be sufficient to evade the rule that no question shall be offerred which is substantially the same as one which has already been expressed in the present session.

At page 164, citation 194 reads as follows, and I quote:

(1) A motion or amendment cannot be brought forward which is the same in substance as a question which has already been decided, because a proposition being once submitted and carried in the affirmative or negative cannot be questioned again but must stand as the judgment of the House. This rule applies to the decision taken on amendments to the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. A question once put cannot be altered by the member moving it, without the consent of the House. The reconsideration of a question already decided is not allowed under British parliamentary practice, but it prevails in many public bodies and societies.

Also, at page 164, citation 200 reads as follows:

(1) An old rule of Parliament reads: "That a question being once made and carried in the affirmative or negative, cannot be questioned again but must stand as the judgment of the House." Unless such a rule were in existence, the time of the House might be used in the discussion of motions of the same nature and contradictory decisions would be sometimes arrived at in the course of the same session.

Finally, at page 172, the Speaker's ruling is commented thus:

(7) Mr. Speaker Sproule on the 13th February, 1913, decided that a proposed amendment which was substantially the same motion as the member had moved on the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, was not in order because "a motion must not raise a question substantially identical with one on which the House has given a decision in the same session".

There is, Mr. Speaker, my modest contribution to the debate on this matter. As can be seen, I wanted to limit myself to a few appropriate quotes and not do as the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) has done, that is try and get a few laughs.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) seeks the floor. Again, I wish to indicate that I am quite prepared to give a decision, but if hon. members think we should discuss the point of order rather than other things I would hear them further. However, I have some doubts whether any valuable object can be achieved by continuing the discussions on the point of order.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. There is one point that I think has not been adequately made and I should like to make it as briefly as I can.

In my opinion, the situation before us today is totally without precedent. The motion before us ties together in a very fundamental way proposals which have been put forward in two budgets, not just in one budget. We are dealing with proposals that were put forward in the budget of May, 1972 and other proposals put forward in the budget of February, 1973. In both cases, Mr. Speaker, the resolutions consequent upon these budgets have yet to be presented to and approved by the House. Here we have a situation unprecedented, I believe, in the history of Canada.

The people of Canada are subject to two sets of laws simultaneously, neither of which have been approved in detail by this parliament. The motion before us is therefore a package, a package which purports to say that the two sets of proposals, those presented last year which have not yet been dealt with in detail and those presented this year which have not yet been dealt with in detail, are totally inadequate.

As for the spurious suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Lake Centre that the corporate ripoff is inadequate he must have had his tongue well extended in his cheek when he said that. It is the total effect of the package—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I do not mind being connected with the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) by way of being given his old riding in Lake Centre, but that is so far back in history perhaps I had better be called the member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Hellyer: If I made a slip, Mr. Speaker, it was only because the hon. member's principles have slipped so much recently that it is very difficult to keep him placed.

The point I was making, Mr. Speaker, is that the total package—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. De Bané.]

Mr. Hellyer: The total package presented in these two budgets is totally inadequate. It is inadequate to meet the real needs of the Canadian people—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member would not seriously suggest that he is now discussing the point of order. He is making a speech which he may want to make later if this debate is allowed to proceed. I really think that after much more than an hour on this point we should be able to limit ourselves to the strictly procedural aspect of the point which was raised originally by the hon. President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen). I invite hon. members to limit their observations at this time to the procedural aspects of this matter.

• (1620)

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I will abide by your ruling. I agree completely. I think the relevant point is that this motion is not the same as other motions which have already been dealt with during the present session but is one which goes far beyond any such motion in content and scope, since it relates to the actions of the government over a two-year period and longer. On that basis I submit the motion should be allowed. We think that a vote should be taken later tonight. We do not think the motion in any way makes a fool of the House of Commons, although we think it might do that with respect to some members of the House who are inconsistent in their voting patterns.

Mr. Speaker: I thank hon. members for their enlightening contributions to the procedural debate. I could not think, when debate started, that there would be so many different aspects to this question. I had given it very serious thought during the hours which preceded the opening of the House this afternoon. It was anguished consideration which I gave to the matter in looking for light.

The Chair appreciates the comments which have been made by hon. members. They have certainly assisted me in reaching a decision in this respect. A number of arguments were made, so many I should say that I doubt if I will be able to refer to all of them. I had begun to put them down and was hoping I could refer to them individually during the last hour or so; however, many of them, I am sure, I have forgotten. There was one point made, I believe, by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and perhaps by others. The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) took exception to the form of the motion proposed by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield). I think I must admit that, I, myself, have had serious doubts about the drafting of this motion.

The motion states, "That this House expresses its lack of confidence that the combination of the corporate tax—" etc. On reading this motion, I suspect what is meant is, "That this House doubts that the combination of the corporate tax reductions and accelerated depreciation" will achieve such and such a decision or result. That, indeed, is the text of the French version.

That this House expresses its lack of confidence that the combination of the corporate tax reductions and accelerated depreciation write-offs . . . constitutes an adequate and equitable response to the needs of the country.

[English]

I have serious doubts myself. I have to express my lack of confidence as to whether this is a motion of non-confidence, but I think that the matter would be much too technical for me to make a ruling on that basis, and I have no intention of doing so. At the same time, I have great sympathy for those who suggest that motions of this kind perhaps ought to be drafted more clearly.

Having said this, I shall now deal with what I consider to be the more important points which have been made in this respect. Obviously, the serious procedural objections which can be made and have been made during this debate, and the most serious defect, relate to the well established practice that the House cannot be asked to vote twice on the same subject during the course of the same session. There are many citations and precedents in support of this rule. Hon. members have referred to Citation 201 of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition. I think all hon. members will agree that it is a fundamental rule of parliamentary debate. Certainly, there could not be intelligent, logical and meaningful debate if the same motion were voted on by the House from time to time and repeatedly during the same session. There is no doubt that that rule is important and hon. members should try, both in their motions and amendments, to bear it in mind.

However, the rule so clear in principle is not always easy of application, and difficulty often arises as to whether a question put for determination by the House is really the same as that on which the House has already expressed itself. It could well be argued, in support of the procedural acceptability of this motion, that the motion proposed for decision today is not the same as that on which a vote was taken following the budget debate. That is the point made forcibly by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and supported by the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer). I put some value and importance on the point made by the hon. member for Trinity. I agree with him that he added an aspect of the situation that perhaps had not been made too clear before.

The House resolved in a previous vote that it agreed in general with the government's budgetary policy. The hon. member for Peace River suggested that the present proposed motion is a different motion in that it refers more specifically to a combination of certain aspects of the 1972 budget and proposals contained in the 1973 budget. In other words, the suggestion has been made that even if the House had approved, by its vote, the government's budgetary policy, that it may not agree to the combination of those recent proposals and those proposals contained in the 1972 budget. The argument, of course, is deserving of very serious consideration by the Chair.

I think the point made by the hon. member for Lotbiniere is also quite relevant. The Standing Order allows non-confidence motions to be moved on so-called opposition days. The Standing Order which allows non-confidence motions on opposition days is couched in very general terms. Standing Order 58(3) reads:

> Opposition motions . . . may relate to any matter within the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada . . .

That point was made by the hon. member for Lotbinière and I think it is quite relevant. The Standing Order, as the hon. member said, gives the opposition very wide scope in proposing motions. That is one of the reasons why, since the inception of this particular Standing Order in 1968, not a single opposition motion has ever been ruled out of order. On a number of occasions the Chair expressed doubts as to whether an opposition motion would not bring forward for the consideration of the House a matter on which a decision had already been taken in the course of the then current session. However, in all cases the mover was given the benefit of the doubt. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre indicated that this had happened from time to time, but suggested that perhaps this kind of argument had never been made by the Chair or that the point of order had never been raised in the case of a supply motion which was, at the same time, a non-confidence motion.

There is at least one instance on which this point was made by the Chair. It was made when a motion was moved on January 29, 1969 by the Leader of the Opposition. On that occasion I expressed some reservation as to whether that motion, then moved by the Leader of the Opposition under Standing Order 58, might not tend to revive a question which had already been decided; but, for certain reasons, because we were operating under this very wide Standing Order, and in order to provide an opportunity for debate, the Chair reached the decision that the hon. member should be given the benefit of the doubt.

I would be inclined to reach the same decision in this instance. This is an opposition day, when a non-confidence motion can be introduced on a subject to be chosen by the mover. In my view the Speaker should not intervene to prevent debate, or a vote, unless the motion is clearly and undoubtedly irregular. When the procedural aspect is open to reasonable argument, I suggest it is the duty of the Chair to accept the motion and allow the House to make the decision on the question of confidence.

I feel very strongly that when there may be debate on whether a question is in order or not and when a reasonable argument can be made to suggest that a motion is in order, it would be extremely difficult for the Chair to interfere in such circumstances and say that the motion is out of order, cannot be submitted, cannot be debated, and cannot be voted upon. I am not setting aside in any way the arguments put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen). I recognize how important it is to maintain the traditions and principles which indicate that the House should not be in the position of being asked to vote twice in the same session on the same subject.

Because there is some doubt in my mind, as evidenced by the arguments which were submitted and by the lengthy procedural debate through which we have just gone, as to whether this is a different question and as to whether hon. members are being asked to vote for a second time on the same point, I think it is the duty of the Chair to give the benefit of the doubt to the mover of the motion. On that basis, I feel that the motion has the right to be put and that the Leader of the Opposition should be heard.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I move the motion, as previously read by Mr. Speaker.

The motion before the House deals with the fiscal measures that the government proposes to introduce during the present session, either by order in council or as a result of the passage of bills in this House. It deals with the budgetary proposals of February, plus the proposals regarding corporate tax cuts and fast write-offs, as proposed during the budget of May last year by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) who indicated that he intends to deal with the provisions of the present budget separately and apart from those of the budget of May 8.

These are part of the combination of fiscal measures that the government proposes to introduce. I suggest the resolution places the whole package honestly before the House as opposed to the sleight of hand that we witnessed by which the Minister of Finance sought approval of the new measures contained in the February budget and made some predictions that the measures arising from May 8, 1972 had nothing to do with the case, but that these to be introduced this year were not part of the government's fiscal proposals for this session. This is another instance where this government finds it very difficult to put something forward in an honest, straightforward manner. Clearly, the budget proposals of February, 1973 and the 1972 proposals to be implemented in 1973 are in fact part of one package, although the government attempts to treat them differently.

This resolution gives the House an opportunity to consider both the 1972 measures and the February 1973 measures as one package. The resolution deals with this package which includes corporate tax reductions and fast write-offs. As to the fast write-offs, the Minister of Finance has expressed his belief that the governor in council has the power to adopt these without the approval of this House. If I understood him correctly, the Minister of Finance indicated that he is considering doing just that. In other words, he will not be introducing the fast write-offs into the House, but dealing with them by regulation or order in council. To do what the minister says he is considering, particularly while parliament is in session, would show the very depth of contempt for this House by the minister and his government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: There is only one possible reason the Minister of Finance would consider bringing in these fast write-offs by order in council or regulation rather than by approval of the House. He believes that parliament, the House of Commons in particular, would not approve of these measures if they were put before the House. That is the only possible reason the minister could have for adopting such an attitude of disrespect for the House. It is hard to imagine a more flagrant disregard for parliament than for the minister and the government to adopt, while the House is in session, a tax measure by regulation or order in council for the sole reason that the government is concerned that the House might not approve the measure.

[Mr. Speaker.]

What could be a more flagrant disregard for parliament than that?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: The minister intends to proceed with the fast write-offs in one way or another. They should be put before this House and the House should accept the responsibility of either accepting or rejecting the government's proposals. Clearly, this is a matter of principle. Surely, all opposition members will readily agree that these tax measures should be dealt with by the House and not by the governor in council or the minister. I hope that on reflection all members of the government will also agree that these tax proposals must be dealt with by parliament. This is a question of principle going far beyond the merits of the particular tax proposals.

In so far as the budget proposals of February 1973 concern employment, they rely principally upon increasing purchasing power through the lowering of personal income taxes and increased expenditures. In other words, the government to some extent has adopted the position we advocated through 1972, the election campaign and since that time. However, I wish to emphasize that if it had been our responsibility, we would have taken a two-pronged attack, that is, an expansionary budget to fight unemployment and a temporary freeze followed by subsequent methods to fight inflation. By expansionary, I mean tax cuts, eliminating the sales tax on building materials, eliminating the tax on all clothing, not just children's clothing, and a real program of incentives for small business.

I emphasize that by expansion we mean tax cuts rather than relying upon increased expenditures. If we have learned anything, it should be that if we want to create jobs and encourage enterprise in this country, the least effective way to do it can well be based on the assumption that this can be done by direct government expenditure. In other words, we believe in expansion through tax cuts not in any way adding to government waste.

Whatever emphasis the government put on the measures to increase employment in the budget presented in 1973 was directed toward increasing purchasing power. This is in marked contrast to the budget presented by the minister in May of last year. The attitude then, and this point of view was expressed by several ministers, was that there was no use increasing the purchasing power of the Canadian people. They said there was so much leakage, so much of it would go on imports, that increased purchasing power in Canada, as was expressed by the government in 1972, would not stimulate the Canadian economy. Their position in May 1972 was that it would simply go on imports.

It is strange to find that in his budget of 1973 the minister deliberately adopted measures designed to encourage not only an increase in spending power, which he said was a faulty way to go about this, but deliberately took measures to encourage expenditure by Canadians on imports. This is another in the series of very remarkable contradictions we have seen in the course of a year and sometimes in the course of a few months by this minister.

A few months ago, tax cuts were the worst thing that could happen. They would drive the country into bankruptcy. A year ago a proposal to index personal income tax was sheer folly. In May 1972, any measure designed to increase the purchasing power of the consumer was sheer folly and would only be spent on imports. In 1973, with unemployment at approximately the same rate, the minister has completely reversed himself. He is now increasing purchasing power and encouraging Canadians to spend money on imports.

The minister can hardly deny that his measures are, in fact, increasing competitive pressures on Canada's producers and manufacturers. There are many instances of this. I hope the minister is looking into them. I am sure they are being brought to his attention as they are to mine. In British Columbia, where the rate of unemployment is about 8 per cent, the plywood industry and the fish packing industry are now obliged to suffer from an added competitive advantage that the minister has bestowed upon imports. General Steel Wares, a manufacturing industry unique of its kind in Canada, is now confronted with increased competition from imported goods at a time when a more sensible policy would surely be to encourage expansion and sales at the domestic level.

I could go on to give other instances. I am merely pointing out that the minister has veered around in the course of the last year; whereas the whole thrust of the May 8 budget was to improve the competitive position of the Canadian manufacturing-processing industry, this has all been forgotten as far as the February budget is concerned. The effect of the February budget is to bring about a worsening of the competitive position of large sectors of the manufacturing and processing industries in our country. Last May we were told that measures to assist industry were the only effective way in which to create more jobs, though the minister admitted it would take some time for the measures he proposed last year to bring about the desired effect. But this year the emphasis has shifted completely.

I pointed out when I spoke on the budget in May, 1972 that the minister's proposal with respect to fast write-offs and with respect to the reduction in the corporate tax write-off in connection with operations of a manufacturing or processing nature contained a number of grave shortcomings. First of all, they were of no use to corporations which, although they might be highly efficient, were losing money because of competition. In other words, they would be of no help whatever to an industry which was earning no income upon which to pay taxation. Even more important, I said then, and I repeat, those proposals were of no use to new Canadian companies. New ventures do not look forward to making a net profit for a number of years. Consequently, the minister's proposals would provide no inducement at all to Canadians to undertake new manufacturing and processing operations. Obviously, if we are to succeed in bringing unemployment down to a satisfactory level we need many new manufacturing and processing industries in this country. The minister's measures constituted no inducement in that regard. Third, the minister's proposals did nothing, and do nothing, to encourage Canadians to invest more of their money in Canadian businesses and thus to play a bigger part in the ownership of our own economy. The benefit of the minister's proposals are, obviously, just as readily available and just as attractive to foreign capital as to Canadian capital; they are worth just as much to foreign subsidiaries as they are to Canadian-owned enterprises.

So, when we assess the value of the government's budgetary proposals, and say they are inadequate and inequitable in response to the needs of the country, we are pinpointing the lack of any co-ordinated approach, the lack of any real leadership. I think it is clear from what I have said today, and what I said in the debate on the budget, that the government has no strategy. There is no plan, there is no organized consistent thrust. The government just changes its proposals from year to year. Indeed, it changes them from month to month. There is no consistency in what it proposes to do. There is only the spectacle of a government fuddling through a grab bag of disconnected policies to cover up a crisis here or some need for expediency there, and this is surely a perverse luxury which cannot be afforded today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: As a nation, we must rely on support from a strong partnership between the public and the private sector. We are a nation which must believe in itself and which must invest in itself. We all know that these are fundamental truths. Knowing these truths, how did the government react to the fact that the over-all level of business failures in this country last year, particularly among small businesses, was the worst in any year since the depression? The answer to that question is, very simply, that the government did not react.

How has the government reacted to the fact that small business ownership in Canada is suffering severely from lack of adequate capital—I am speaking particularly of equity capital for expansion or for starting new enterprises? Again, the government has simply not reacted. Here is a vital segment of the economy, small business, which creates more goods and services and, possibly, more employment, than any other. And it is one which pays more taxes, perhaps, than any other segment of the economy. Does the government show leadership in promoting the development of small business? Is it disturbed sufficiently by the failure rate to be prompted to take quick action? Does the government offer partnership in risk-taking to make what is, really, the life blood of small business, that is to say, capital, available to this sector? The answer must be a very damning "no".

We have put forward a proposal. We sought to encourage the individual to invest in the expansion of his business or in any small Canadian business, to invest in any new enterprise on his own, or in partnership with others. We proposed a Canadian investment credit incentive, which would be available to any Canadian citizen making a direct investment in the equity of a Canadian-owned small business. The credit, which would amount to 50 per cent of qualified investments to a maximum of $5,000 each year, would either be offset against the individual's income tax for the year, or rebated directly to him. Before the credit could be granted, the business would be required to register with the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, since only investment in Canadian-owned small businesses would qualify. Small business would include corporations with net worth up to $1 million and annual revenue of up to $10 million. In the case of corporations approaching the upper size limitations, it would be necessary to establish that new capital requirements would provide substantial additional jobs and careers in Canada. No corporation would be able to qualify as a small business if its shares were listed on a stock exchange or if it were controlled by a corporation which did not qualify.

Certain kinds of business would not qualify for investment credit. For example, oil and gas exploration and development businesses, mining businesses and the like, would not qualify. Similarly, real estate ownership and development, leasing and financial business would not qualify. The advantage of the tax credit would remain with the investor as long as he continued to hold it, but would be repayable to the government if and when the investment were realized. If the investor did not recover his full investment, the amount of credit would be half of his recovery. No capital loss deduction would be allowed. If the investor realized a gain, the gain would be taxable in the ordinary way.

I have made no pretence that this is a perfect proposal or, in specific terms, the only proposal which could be effective. I think it is a good plan. I know that such a plan is urgently needed. And this plan, at least, would have been immediately put before parliament by a Progressive Conservative government.

Mr. Stanfield: We are all aware that there was a reference to some kind of plan for small business in the Speech from the Throne. We are all aware that the Minister of Finance has been talking about this as an area of concern. But what are we to expect from the minister when he finally gets around to producing something? All I have to go by is the reaction that he expressed to the plan that I put forward. He said: ". . . it would provide an opportunity for some individuals to reap a rich bonanza", and, even more significantly, he continued "without meeting any demonstrated need of small business for funds". In other words, the minister was not only attacking my plan but was questioning whether there was really any demonstrated need on the part of small business in Canada for this kind of equity capital.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That was not the meaning of that statement.

Mr. Stanfield: This minister says that that was not the meaning of that statement, but like the Speaker I have to make the best I can of words that are put before me and interpret them in a fair way. That is the way that I interpreted the statement of the minister at the time it was reported in the press, and it strikes me that that is the only possible interpretation I can give it.

I think that the minister's statement is rather insulting to individual Canadians and an affront to the small business community. We say that our proposal would encourage opportunity. The Minister of Finance says that it would encourage profiteering. We say that such a policy is needed by small businesses in Canada to allow them to get started at some time, and at other times to grow. It is needed by small business so as to encourage Canadians to grow in the Canadian economy. The minister says that the small businessman in Canada has not demonstrated the need. We say that the answers to our serious problems of unemployment and Canadian development must be found by encouraging individual initiative and enterprise. The Minister of Finance says that you cannot trust people, yet this is the same minister who was espousing such trust in his limited proposals contained in his 1972 budget which, in the nature of things, will be made available mainly to large enterprises.

We believe that the kind of incentive that we propose will do more in a single year to stimulate private initiative and provide more new opportunities for jobs, and to stimulate demand for goods and services, than any combination of direct government loans, concessions and subsidies presently in effect. Such a policy would give new initiatives to our young people, many of whom today are deprived and denied opportunities to participate in our economy. Such a policy would reinvolve the average Canadian in the achievement of national objectives, among them the urgent need for full employment and the need to encourage Canadian investment, participation and ownership in the development of our national economy.

On this matter of Canadian self-determination, I want to reassure all members of this House that the only viable alternative to the present government does accept its historic responsibility to give leadership in this issue. Leaders of this party who have preceded me have given their dedication and their loyalty, and not merely lip service, to the concept of an independent Canada. We believe that Canadians ought to be given the maximum opportunity to develop and apply their own entrepreneurial and managerial skills so as to ensure the increased participation of Canadians in the business and industry of their own land.

May I take a minute to remind you again, Sir, that it was the present government that made the decision with respect to the development of communications satellites—the $90 million Telesat program. It was also the decision of this government to ship 80 per cent of the investment in satellite technology and 80 per cent of the investment in development to the United States. In doing so, it rejected a bid which would have seen only 35 per cent of this investment go out of the country. And the excuse given was that there was a differential of $13 million in the final contract bids. I believe that Canadians understand—I am sure they do—that there may well be, in the struggle to develop Canadian competence, technology and expertise, a premium that has to be paid; but I also believe that Canadians are prepared to pay it.

The combination of a small business incentive such as we have proposed and a more effective government purchasing and procurement policy encourage Canadian technology and surely define the direction that is the right direction for this country at this time in its history. The lack of any direction that we see today is unacceptable. Responsibility for that lack of direction lies upon a government that will only stall, stutter and delay for as long as it remains in office. It is our duty to take every opportunity available to us to minimize that period of wasted time.

As was the case during the budget debate, one must keep asking oneself about the question of confidence. What do the members of government really believe? Do they believe, for example, that we have to improve the competitive position of Canadian industry, as they emphasized last May? Or do they believe that the competition facing Canadian industry should be increased, as they seem to believe in 1973? We have gone all through this in regard to tax cuts, income tax indexing and so on. I do not have the time, and there is no need for me today, to go over once again the inadequacy of the government's program with regard to employment or the inadequacy of the budget as a stimulus to the creation of employment. I do not need to go over the weakness of the budget with regard to inflation. I went over all of that during the budget debate and we put before the House clearly what we called a two-pronged attack on unemployment and on inflation. Really, it is a three-pronged attack because it ought to include the encouragement of new investment in small Canadian business, a point that I have put forward here this afternoon. We have an attack on unemployment, and perhaps the best method available to us for increasing ownership by Canadians of Canadian business.

Therefore, I say that in view of these considerations the government's package of proposals is neither adequate nor equitable among Canadians; and of that I think there can be no doubt.

• (1700)

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, ever since this parliament opened early in January the Conservative opposition has been huffing and puffing but has failed to bring the House down, and because it has failed to bring the House down its huffs and its puffs become more tiresome and less meaningful as the days go by. The opposition keeps trying ploy after ploy, and trick after trick, and thinks that we in the NDP will be intimidated by its huffing and puffing. Let me tell hon. members of that opposition that they are wasting their time and wasting the time of this House.

Let me tell the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert, and I am sorry he is not here, for, I am sure, very good reasons, that his thunder is always amusing. We listen to him with a great deal of respect and with a great deal of chortling as he speaks, but I ask him not to exaggerate his power. His thunder will not bring down the House either, Mr. Speaker.

We set a course for ourselves when this parliament opened, and we set that course before the people of Canada. It has been approved by the vast majority of the people of this country—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: My mail and the feedback of all my colleagues across this country indicate that the people of Canada want to see this parliament work and produce useful legislation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: No hokery-pokery or imaginative Conservative party is going to change that course, Mr. Speaker. In view of what has been said by some—not since the debate started on the motion, I must say, but during the procedural debate—I want to make one thing very clear. I have done this, I suppose, dozens of times since October. I want to make it clear that I believe, and my colleagues believe, that both aspects of the May 1972 budget in respect of concessions to corporations should be before parliament and decided by parliament, and we will insist on that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: When?

Mr. Lewis: When those resolutions and bills that come from the May 1972 budget in respect of corporate concessions come before this House, we will oppose them just as we have constantly opposed them ever since we heard them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: We do not intend to be caught by the kind of hokery-pokery the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) has indulged in and vote for a motion that is meaningless and purposeless because it makes some reference to the corporate situation in the May 1972 budget.

As I listened to the Leader of the Opposition I thought: What in heaven's name is this gentleman doing? I heard that speech just a week ago, almost word for word and thought for thought. He added some new material about small business, which he had enunciated, and I will come back to that in a moment, during the election campaign, but he repeated the same type of thing he said in two speeches during the budget debate. He is merely using the time of this House for games, and he is welcome to play them if he wants because he is doing it so often and with such obvious political maladroitness the people of Canada realize what is happening.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: The new thing in the speech of the Leader of the Opposition had reference to small business. What was he really saying to us and the people of Canada? He was saying: I am dissatisfied with the corporate concessions made by the Minister of Finance in his May 1972 budget. I want more. I do not want corporate concessions to go alone to businesses that exist, I want the corporate tax concessions to go to the corporations that start new businesses or that invest in new businesses. The Leader of the Opposition parades himself as wanting to defend the situation. I want every member of this House to understand, as I do and I am quite certain I understand it correctly, that what he is suggesting is that the tax concessions the Minister of Finance proposed in May, 1972 are inadequate and do not go far enough. He wants further tax concessions to investors in new business.

He thinks that by this kind of thing he can catch us and throw us over with his huffing and puffing. We do not go for that, Mr. Speaker. His statement on this matter reminded me of some things he said before when we had the Liberal tax bill before us, the so-called reform bill which made a very few minor changes in the corporate tax system. Let me read the statement of the Leader of the Opposition on October 14, 1971, as reported at page 8694 of Hansard:

> So far as corporations are concerned, there would have been a much more beneficial effect on investment and incentives—and this would not have cost the government a cent—if the minister had announced that he was going to defer implementation of those parts of his tax reform bill relating to corporations.

These small changes that were made to close some of the loopholes through which corporations climb did not satisfy the Leader of the Opposition. He wanted the Minister of Finance to throw them out the window. This is the gentleman who cries about the small businessman not having the necessary money. I cannot help but remember that when we had before us in this House the regional development incentives bill that hon. gentleman moved a motion and in his speech said, on June 6, 1969, recorded at page 9848 of Hansard:

> If someone happens to get his hands on a few thousand dollars or even on a million dollars he may not really need, I do not think we should worry too much. After all, the government can recover that money eventually through taxation.

He did not even take the trouble to note that incentive grants under DREE are not taxable.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: This is the thing with which we are presented, and when this motion contains reference to something being inequitable I must remind this House again of the statement made by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) on June 22, 1971, less than two years ago, when he was the financial critic for his party.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: Don't look for happiness in that direction, my pleasant and corpulent friend.

I remind the House again of what the hon. member for Edmonton West said on June 22, 1971, as reported at page 7222 of Hansard:

> —some people think that you can have equity between taxpayers. That is impossible in this country and anyone who suggests otherwise is not aware of our financial and economic requirements. It is absolute nonsense to talk about equity between taxpayers or within the income tax system.

This country can do without a government composed of gentlemen like that.

• (1710)

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, we do not intend to vote for the motion because it is a meaningless ploy. I want to say to this House—

An hon. Member: Say it in English.

Mr. Lewis: I could put it in English if I thought it was worthwhile, and if I thought members of the Conservative party would understand it.

I want to spend the few minutes I have left, because I believe I am limited to 20 minutes if I remember the rule correctly, dealing with some of the positive aspects of what is before us. On behalf of my colleagues and myself, I completely reject the kind of policy presented by the Leader of the Opposition. I think it succeeds—and this is really a remarkable accomplishment—in being even worse than that of the Liberal government and one really has to be an artist to accomplish that. The proposition is for more corporate tax concessions or greater corporate tax concessions and the implication in the speech of the Leader of the Opposition is that the resources which are now entirely in foreign hands will remain in foreign hands. He does not intend to do anything about this. Also there is the fact that our minerals are in foreign hands and 50 per cent of our manufacturing is in foreign hands, and he is not going to do anything about this.

When it was suggested that oil exports be controlled, his members from Alberta and the Premier of Alberta objected to any kind of limitation in respect of the export of oil or gas. The only thing the Leader of the Opposition would do would be to make some tax concessions to his wealthy friends who invest in little businesses. I understand he, himself, has had some excellent experience. I suggest that will not do the thing that needs to be done in our view. Let me in the very few minutes I have left indicate what that is. What this country has needed, and needs now more than it needed anything in its history, is an economic and social plan that will cover all areas of this country and that would give Canada some economic and social goals for the benefit of all the people of Canada and which would serve all the regions of this country. We need, starting from now if it were possible—and neither the Liberals nor the Conservatives will do that—to eliminate all the tax concessions which have been given to corporations in this country and which have resulted in a distortion of our economic development where all the resources of this land are being yanked out at breakneck speed and exported elsewhere across the world instead of being retained for future generations of Canadians.

I challenge the Conservatives to say that they are ready to remove the tax concessions and tax holidays which have been given to corporations through the tax statutes of this country. We need that which my friends to the right will have no part of, as they have often indicated. We cannot build small business in the disadvantaged areas of this country on the basis of private entrepreneurship or on the doctrinaire stuff which oozes out of the Conservative and Liberal spokesmen every time they talk about the economy.

An hon. Member: Doctrinaire!

Mr. Lewis: Doctrinaire. Free enterprisers are the only doctrinaires left in this country and it causes immense harm to the development of Canada, to its economy and to social objectives. We have said many times, and I repeat today, that the only way in which the small businessman can be helped, and the only way in which the disadvantaged areas of this country can be advanced economically, is by giving direct assistance through public investment to the small businessman who wants to open a business instead of sending him to private investors who will then receive a tax concession while somebody else behind them will receive another one. Then, you not only make a contribution but lose some more money out of the revenue of the treasury at the expense of the ordinary taxpayer. It is best to have a program for the small businessmen which consists of an anti-monopoly and anti-oligopoly law and, secondly, direct capital assistance to the small businessman at a reasonable rate of interest so that he is not forever the servant of some large private corporate investor who receives a tax concession.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest to you that our history over a period of 106 years has shown us that we cannot develop the disadvantaged areas of this country by relying on the ordinary profit motives of private enterprise because private enterprise has not found those areas profitable in the past and will not find them profitable in the future. The only way in which the disadvantaged areas of this country can be assisted and developed economically, in so far as the resources of the people, their traditions and culture are concerned, is by public investment and public help from the public treasury and wherever possible, from the provincial treasury. I remind members that the miners and steel workers of Cape Breton Island were assisted by the federal government taking over the mines and the provincial government of Nova Scotia taking over the steel industry and, incidentally, that was a Conservative government.

I say that what we require is the total reconstruction of the Canada Development Corporation to make it a public operation with large funds which are garnered through legislation which requires all corporations in Canada, public and private, financial and industrial, to invest a certain proportion of their investable capital in the Canadian Development Corporation. This corporation would be under public control and management for the precise purpose of buying back parts of the Canadian economy for the people of Canada or supplying the provinces with the revenue they need and the necessary capital to develop their economy. In this way the necessary capital could be made available to the small business entrepreneur at reasonable interest rates. These are the ways in which some real economic and social development in this country could take place. Exchanging those on my left for those on my right in government would not make the slightest difference. Canada would merely perhaps be a little duller place and perhaps members of that government a little less imaginative than sometimes the people opposite are, although I find it difficult to imagine that.

Some basic transformation is needed in the economy and the society of Canada. We will not get that from the Liberals and we will not get it from the Conservatives. So long as there are before parliament bills which would increase the old age pension, which would reduce the tax burden on the ordinary taxpayer, which promise increases to veterans in their allowances and pensions, which promise improvements in the housing legislation of this country and which promise improvements in the foreign investment situation in this country as well as other proposals, the new Democratic Party members of this House will not fall for any of the silly ploys of the Conservative party.

Mr. Barnett J. Danson (York North): Mr. Speaker, I was delighted with the interjection of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) in the procedural portion of this debate when he quickly dissociated himself from the drafting of the motion. I wish he were here now. I think another form of tax might be the entertainment tax which we would have to levy every time the right hon. member speaks. But I have to borrow from him because the other day he used the expression that the mountain laboured and brought forth a mouse. That is rather "corny" and a cliché now but there has been an air of expectation about this debate. There was the great question about the procedural validity of the motion. There was the waiting period of the first of the two allotted days to learn what this great motion was about which was to be brought forth. It could have been a great motion, and we really expected something constructive. However, all we got was a list of complaints which we have heard before and a question about the lack of a co-ordinated approach by this side of the House.

Then, we heard about the three-pronged attack from the hon. member from Action Canada. Instead of the two pronged A.C., we get the three pronged D.C., but the three pronged attack did not come. I was waiting and waiting. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) regurgitated his great proposals which he made during the election regarding incentives for small business which, incidentally, I think, have some merit in a small way. His ideas are not always wrong, but they are usually poorly thought out. One example is the question of the indexing provision to fight inflation which is not original; he dragged it out from somewhere else. However, our Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) made this proposal administratively possible. But to suggest that this great three-pronged attack and the co-ordinated policy of the opposition as represented by this 50 per cent write-off of the $5,000 invested in businesses which qualify is the solution to the problems of 50 per cent of our unemployed who are under 25, is to suggest something that is far from the truth. To talk of this as being an answer to the question of Canadian ownership, or a solution to all economic problems that face this country I think puts the hon. member in his own element, the element of small business, because I have never before seen quite so small-minded an approach to such a major problem in the House.

He did not directly attack the principle of the corporate tax cut or capital cost allowance, but he sniped away. These provisions are not for the benefit of the major corporations; they are for the benefit of the small businessmen who are the backbone of industry across the country, the tens of thousands of companies, of which I have founded one, which need the incentive and a fighting chance to compete and to expand. The Leader of the Opposition is a very nice guy, no matter what he says himself; he is good, sincere and genuine and even has good Liberal ideas. It is not a matter of the government being under attack but a matter of the economy being under attack. This is not a political game; we are at economic war.

There are important considerations here that go quite beyond who stays in power in the House. We are in a highly competitive international economy. We have the problems of DISC in the United States and the international monetary crisis. We have the question of foreign investment facing us and the problems of small business, in which I am particularly interested and which were mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. Legislation will be forthcoming to deal with these problems as the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) said in the debate on the Speech from the Throne. There is a wide area at which we can look. There is the broadening of GAAP, the General Adjustment Assistance Program, for which the machinery is in place. There are opportunities to provide working capital to companies in countries taking part in the Kennedy Round agreements. This machinery makes it possible to expand further, as the minister indicated.

There is, too, the greater role that the Industrial Development Bank can play. It has helped many thousands of small businessmen. We cannot go into ad hoc programs and I do not approve of the type of program we went into before. We have to be flexible and see our programs against new types of onslaught from abroad, particularly from the south. We have the employment support act of 1971, under which we allocated $80 million for companies adversely affected by the monetary crisis at that time and possibly by the DISC program. Of that $80 million I understand only $10 million was disbursed. It is difficult to prove who is being hurt or specifically how you are being hurt when you are in business, particularly if you are a small business and do not have the opportunity to have research assistants, such as we would like to have here. These businessmen know that something is going wrong; they know they have to be flexible and move to survive. I suggest that the corporate tax reduction is vital to keep us competitive in a highly dangerous economic situation in the world.

I do not think any program should be maintained forever, but we must maintain ourselves in a competitive position with our trading partners such as Great Britian, where the corporate tax rate is 40 per cent; Italy where it is 25 per cent; the United States where it is 48 per cent, and Belgium where it is 30 per cent. The rate varies between 23 per cent and 51 per cent in Germany. These are the countries with which we have to compete and it is only by being highly efficient that we will be able to compete. It is not only a matter of increasing employment; it is a matter of maintaining the employment we have now.

I was rather interested in the lead article in the Financial Post of March 3, its most recent issue, the reading of which I would commend to all hon. members. The article points out that to be competitive we have to give our smaller industries, our manufacturing and processing industries, a break. The closing paragraph reads:

> The strongest industries, and those with the highest quality jobs for a sophisticated work force, are, after all, capital intensive, not labour intensive. Manufacturing in Canada needs every break it can get to preserve and upgrade the jobs it now can offer.

This is an important point, and I would urge my friends from the NDP to read that article. This corporate tax reduction, however, is not going to all industry. It is not going to the service industries, but rather to the manufacturing and processing industries. It is not going to the extractive industries. They have all the breaks, as the minister pointed out in his speech on budget night. It is going to those people who need it to create jobs and to maintain the jobs, people who will keep the economy moving and create opportunities in the rapidly growing service sector. This is an area which we have to watch very carefully. Since 1966, the output in the manufacturing industry went up 28 per cent with an increase in jobs of only 6.5 per cent. This does not mean that it is a failure. It means that we have increased our output by 28 per cent and thus maintained our competitive position. The fact is that if we had not shown an increase of 6.5 per cent in employment we might have shown a substantially greater decrease.

In the same years since 1966 employment in the service sector has gone up by 27 per cent. In my view, the service sector is integrally tied with the productive sector; it moves along with it. This is the area in our economy which needs a lot more study. We should know a great deal more about it. We know that with a healthy manufacturing and processing sector the service sector is healthy and grows at an even more rapid rate as we achieve greater productivity, thus producing more jobs for people working fewer hours and taking longer vacations.

The service sector is going to be highly important and there are opportunities for many improvements there. We should be directing more attention to it. It is not merely a case of hotel bus boys, although that is a legitimate job; it is a matter of social workers, teachers, people in the recreational field, architects and lawyers so that there is ample opportunity, in a society which is becoming wealthier, for these people to find jobs.

The capital cost allowance, Mr. Speaker, is an area in which I have had some interest, because in private life I am a small businessman—the longer I am here, the smaller I become as a businessman—in the capital equipment field. Interestingly enough, I started that business in 1952 or 1953. At that time we had double depreciation and it was the period of the fastest growth in the manufacturing sector in the history of this country. The manufacturing sector was built up at that time to the point that has allowed us to take advantage of the automotive trade agreement and progressive trade policies because we have this basic manufacturing infrastructure.

We got away from that and we prospered. The allowance has continued to drop. It is not held at that rate for a temporary period, as it was in the 1950s. We tried a modest approach to it in the budget last year or the year before by increasing capitalization on new equipment by 15 per cent and allowing normal depreciation on the declining balance. That did not work. We needed something with a greater psychological jolt so that people involved in investing felt that it was worthwhile to invest during this period of the accelerating capital cost allowance or those who were dragging their feet would come to an investment decision within a limited period of time. That is why I am particularly happy to see a limitation put on this provision for review at the end of 1974. I would not mind seeing it for a shorter period so that those who are contemplating investment decisions will make them even sooner. This presents difficulties, however. The same issue of the Financial Post refers to the importance of examining the whole area of capital cost allowances and the fact that the minister has committed the government to that. Certainly the government will be able to look well beyond 1974, but it is vitally important that we meet this commitment.

The leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Lewis) raised the issue of corporate rip-off in the last election. I suspect that he was really referring to the resource rip-off. A lot of people who have not been in business do not understand the problems of cash flow and return on investment, so it became a very popular theme during the election. It was not an easy one to discuss in the heat of a campaign. The Conservatives did not strongly oppose us on it because I think many of them have some appreciation of the problems of business.

The article in the Financial Post continues:

Such raw expediency on the part of the Conservatives could make the Liberals look very attractive—

This is the raw expediency that we see today. Later the article reads:

So far he hasn't been terribly convincing that he has a better plan, certainly not sufficiently so to persuade many companies faced with the present state of indecision.

Mr. Stanfield: Who is responsible for the present state of indecision?

Mr. Danson: We are quite prepared to move along. I think we are victims of many of the problems of indecision. I do not say that we have done everything perfectly, but we are prepared to move along and overcome the indecision. I have the greatest respect for my hon. friend, but surely he knows that it is only his desperation and that of his colleagues to change places with us that is responsible for this delay and this sort of motion. I cannot believe that men who have had experience in business and who understand finance could oppose the reduction in corporate taxes at this time, or the accelerated capital cost allowance. This motion is a political tactic, although I think it is legitimate, and I think the country recognizes it for what it is. The only positive proposal in my hon. friend's speech that had any merit was the one concerning small businesses. We might even be able to find a way of making it work and putting it into practice one of these days.

The question of the review of corporation taxation is extremely important at this time, Mr. Speaker. The leader of the New Democratic Party has raised some serious doubts in the minds of all Canadians and I think the matter should be clarified. Although those of us who do not believe that a lot of it is a rip-off, even though there is a grain of truth that makes everyone wonder—

Mr. Hellyer: Maybe you should bring in tax reform.

Mr. Danson: The hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) says that maybe we should bring in tax reform. I am not sure that is the answer. We tried to do that a couple of years ago. We also tried to reduce taxes at that time, and it was impossible to do it gently: passions were roused by the whole question of tax reform and it was found quite impossible to be reasonable and look at the problems in a way that would bring proper answers. Of course, many other factors were involved such as gross-up in credit. I forget some of the terminology. We politicians sitting on the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs were subject to really tough political pressures—

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Danson: —yet we saw all the resources of one side of the corporation tax argument coming before the committee. These representatives were well prepared, well financed and submitted excellent briefs. I regret that we did not hear more of the opposing view. I do not think businessmen are looking for a rip-off; they are looking for a fair shake and the things necessary to keep the economy going. We in this party have different views from those of the New Democratic Party on what keeps the economy going. I am not dogmatically opposed to socialism; I just don't think it works. What we need is not an investigation by a parliamentary committee subject to the same pressures we went through in tax reform, but an independent body—I hate to say a royal commission or task force—people who are qualified and respected in this field to take a second look at corporate taxation.

The question has been raised, it has received a response but I think it needs to be clarified. As a businessman, I want to see it clarified. I am not interested in being part of any rip-off; I am interested in doing a job, building a business for my family and my country and, in the process, making some money. The money is not the motivating factor, however. It is the only measurement and it is not bad—I would rather have it than not have it—but it is not the primary factor which motivates people beyond a certain point.

Another question is monitoring the corporate tax allowance and the capital cost allowance. I think this is particularly important, though I do not like any connotation of looking over anybody's shoulder. But we should know, on a regular basis, what has happened. The Financial Post article suggested that perhaps two years was not enough time to get all the answers, but I think we can keep pretty close contact with the private sector and get their co-operation. There is no reason why any businessman who makes an investment which is eligible for accelerated depreciation should not report to the Department of Finance. That would give this government an opportunity to see how such decisions are made. Of course, I cannot guarantee that honest answers will be given by all businessmen. Nevertheless, by adopting the suggested process we shall obtain a better feeling about what is going on in this respect.

Certainly we must maintain the present number of jobs; increase employment and increase productivity or we shall be in difficulties. Probably the suggestion I am about to make is dangerous. I suggest that it is more important to maintain a high degree of productivity and competitiveness in the export and import markets than merely to create jobs. If the economy is healthy, we can build a rich society. We all know the direction in which we are going. People will be working a shorter work week; they will have more leisure time. They will need more training and retraining if they are to take advantage of the benefits available. If we lose our competitiveness in the world, we will lose everything and will not be able to survive.

Mr. Hellyer: Change the government and both those areas will be guaranteed.

Mr. Danson: They will be guaranteed under this government. So we must look to other ways for people to be absorbed into the labour market. I should like to explore, because it was mentioned by the leader of the NDP, the establishment of, say, a national youth service which could absorb many of our young people. Much of our unemployment affects those who are under 25. Young people could participate in the service. I am not talking about conscription; I am talking about non-military, non-compulsory national service. I have spoken about this suggestion to many young people in my riding and elsewhere and they are terribly interested. They want to help build better communities and parks and work on the ecology. For instance, in Toronto they could be employed in building a park of the same sort as the one in the Gatineau Hills where there are 30 miles of ski trails, woods and lakes. We are in the process, in Toronto, of expropriating 17,000 acres which can be used for that purpose. We must consider areas such as these if we are to provide new employment. As a supporter of the government, I urge the House to look more closely at such areas.

We must be careful, when debating economic affairs, not to get any distorted idea of profits. Profits in themselves are not evil. I have said many times that it is the lack of profits which is evil, since when profits are lacking the economy is not working properly. Certainly, excessive profits are not good, neither are excessive dividends. I am interested in the proportion of earnings retained and distributed in other countries. That is something we ought to consider when studying the question of our own corporate taxes.

Corporate tax cuts are not a corporate rip-off. Let me explain what happens to profits. First, of course, they are taxed. That part which is left after taxation is reinvested, and that money creates jobs and increases productivity. It leads to research and development and to various types of innovation. Without these activities our industry could not maintain its competitiveness, survive and provide the jobs that are needed, let alone provide new jobs. Some of the dividends are distributed and are taxed again. As I say, a substantial part of the money left is reinvested.

I do not think one can claim that the present system is completely equitable. I do not think any system is completely equitable. Nevertheless, the system works in a rough and ready way. We should see to it that it works more fairly, more equitably and with more compassion. We should care more for the underprivileged in our communities and for those who do not have enough drive to go out, build businesses and make work. Business is not the only thing that makes life worth living; it is only part of life. There are many other worth-while endeavours which are just as worthy as those involving business and making money. Nevertheless, I suggest that we cannot do very much in our society unless the private sector is successful and encouraged to be productive and competitive. The government is trying to make certain that the private sector is successful and is responding to the challenge.

I do not think it is possible for one to be specific and say what one will do in responding to the variety of crises which arise on the international scene, particularly those involving the United States. We have talked in this House about problems pertaining to the automotive trade agreement. Because of our actions in the fifties we established a basic manufacturing industry in this country that was able to expand and take advantage of the automotive trade agreement. It may be that the tax provisions of the previous budget will give our businesses a fighting chance; I do not know. Perhaps they will permit them to respond to changes which might be made in the automotive trade agreement, although I do not think any changes are anticipated.

We must maintain our flexibility and the health of the private sector. We must not pin down our businessmen; we must permit them to be flexible and give them a fighting chance. We must do much more, as well, for smaller businesses and provide working capital at reasonable interest rates, as the leader of the New Democratic Party suggested. This could be done by helping them under GAAP, by guaranteeing bank loans and by other measures. Although such businesses cannot borrow at prime interest rates, I think they ought to be able to borrow money at rates one point and a half below rates otherwise prevailing in the market. The Small Businesses Loans Act has failed, I submit, because interest rates have not been sufficiently attractive to encourage banks to lend. The amounts involved are much too small.

The Leader of the Opposition suggested, I believe, that a small business should be defined as one with $1 million net worth and $10 million turnover. I would try to avoid a rigid definition of small business. In speaking to Mr. Tom Kleppe, the head of the United States small business administration, I learned that they avoid definitions like the plague because what is a small business in one place may be a very significant business in another. The business doing several million dollars worth of trade in Toronto, Montreal or Vancouver may be considered small in those places but may be considered large in, say, Moncton, Halifax—I would not say Sherbrooke—or Bracebridge.

I suggest that there is no simple answer to our problems. The government is seeking to provide the answers necessary. It has responded well to the needs of our community both in the budget just debated and in the budget of May last year. Hon. members are playing games when they try to suggest that the government is not doing what it ought to do and that others could do better. So far I have not heard what those better things are. I listened, I heard the mountain in labour, I heard the mouse squeak, but I did not hear any answers. For that reason I suggest we should get on with the job of running parliament efficiently and helping industry, instead of waiting for so-called new answers. Let us help industry to produce. The government is doing its best to encourage industry.

The people of this country will not be given a fighting chance unless our industry is progressive and responds to needs. Our taxation system must be fair and equitable. When we talk of giving concessions to manufacturing industries, we are not talking about mining companies, we are not talking about trust companies, we are not talking about banks and we are not talking about doctors or lawyers. We are talking about encouragement being given to people in manufacturing and processing businesses.

That encouragement is vital and will lead to our economy being strong.

I think the accelerated capital cost allowances will induce people to begin businesses because they will know that certain capital assets can be written off quickly. At the same time, I hope this measure will not mean that the people who need money most will not be able to get it. I shall be watching what happens. I do not think that measure will answer all the problems of small businesses. It is an aid for small businesses. I look forward to more help being brought forward. I insist on it. I shall expect more measures to be announced by the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I will be waiting for the announcements. I am impatient for them. If enough is not done, I will not be satisfied and will complain.

Let us support good measures and put away our crying-towels. We expect measures to be introduced that are good, and in the future we shall expect better measures. Let us not play politics with an economy which is under attack even from its best friends. We must respond flexibly in this House and give a fighting chance to our businessmen. It is our responsibility to give them a break. If you want to raise taxes in the long run, that is great; but let them make enough money before we start taxing it. If they do not make it, we cannot tax it.

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I must say that the last speech was of a different tone than that of the leader of the New Democratic Party. However, being as respectful as I can, I do not think one added much more than the other to the central issue the House has to face on the motion before it.

There has been a great deal of talk about the government having won a vote of confidence. There has been a great deal of talk, especially from the government side, about the government having the confidence of the House. However, what everybody has missed is the real question: Has the government got the confidence of the country on these economic matters? There is a very substantial body of evidence to indicate that it has not. That is why this motion is before the House—not for reasons of narrow expediency, because one party is going to keep the other in power. This motion is before the House because there is grave doubt about whether the government has the confidence of the country. I wish to give some examples. The day after the budget was presented there was a reaction in the Vancouver newspapers. The president of the B.C. Federation of Labour said:

> Translating the budget into jobs still leaves—

I wish to emphasize this phrase.

> —a great credibility gap . . .
> The trade union movement and the public have a right to be sceptical about the forecast of job-producing. We have had a couple of budgets and all that has happened is a worsening of the unemployment situation when we were told there would be more jobs.

That is a great indication of confidence in the government! Senator Edward Lawson, the international vice-president of the Teamsters had this to say:

> —I can't imagine just how this budget will really create 300,000 new jobs—

He went on to say the inflation would still be there. He also said:

> So the unions will still have to continue negotiating wage increases to keep pace with the inflationary spiral—

That is another indication of confidence in the government. Jim Kinnaird, president of the B.C. and Yukon Building Trades Council, said:

> —I am sceptical about the job-producing ability of the budget—

Confidence in the government? It did not stop there. Mr. Michael Ryan had this to say:

> I see very little in the budget that is directly beneficial to the Canadian economy. Specifically, there is nothing in it that would spur on employment and we are encouraging purchases of foreign goods by reducing tariffs.

Mr. Ed Scholz, president of the B.C. and Yukon Chamber of Mines, said:

> —the budget does not contain "very much that will help to reduce unemployment."

When we ask the question, how much confidence has the country in the government, we have to look at the evidence. It does not matter what happens in this House on matters of short-term expediency or perhaps long-term expediency, depending on their wishes and desires. The day after the budget was presented, an article appeared in the Toronto Star entitled "Less here than meets the eye". Some potent comments were made. This is the way one of the largest newspapers in the country looked at the situation. This paper had always been a great supporter of the government party. It saw that the problems of the country were more important than its traditional allegiance to a political party. My hon. friends did not want to make any reference to it. I quote from the article:

> There are two key questions about the budget. What does it do to reduce unemployment? What does it do to curb inflation? The short answer to both is: Not enough.
> The first problem is that given Canada's severe unemployment problem there is not enough real stimulation of the economy.

Later it states:

> —the real level of economic stimulation remains unchanged.

That is a considered comment which represents a great number of people in the constituency. In the past week some hon. members of two parties in particular forgot that when they talked about having the confidence of the House. The Toronto Star article said that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) is complacent about inflation. It went on to say something which members opposite and members of the New Democratic Party do not want to hear but which the people of Canada are obviously interested in hearing. I quote:

> Only mandatory controls could now bring costs and prices under control—

One could say, "We do not want to listen to a newspaper that after 50 of 60 years decided not to support us," and that that paper could not possibly represent the views and thinking of the Canadian public. If you do not believe it, that is fine with us. You will find out, no doubt at your peril, that some of the comments being made are very similar to those that were made during the election campaign, which members on the government side did not listen to either.

I see it is six o'clock, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps we should adjourn.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, before the dinner recess I was directing some remarks to members of the government and other hon. members. The point of my remarks was that there has been continual discussion among hon. members on the government side, and among some who are not on the government side, about the significance of votes of confidence in this House. What members of the government should bear in mind, however, is that votes of confidence in this House should not be substituted in the mind of any honest man for the idea that the country as a whole has confidence in the government.

Before dinner I went to some pains to read evidence from the press and elsewhere to indicate that the country has no confidence in this government as far as economic and fiscal matters are concerned, and despite what has taken place in this House in connection with votes of confidence based on a short-term, or perhaps even a long-term hope of survival by other parties, we should not forget there is substantial evidence that the country does not possess confidence in the economic policies of the government. The final item to which I referred appeared in the Toronto Star. Only mandatory controls, the writer told us, could now bring costs and prices under control. The Toronto Star may not be a paper the government wants to hear from. It changed its politics during the election.

Mr. Hellyer: It was utterly disillusioned.

Mr. Fraser: My hon. friend says it was utterly disillusioned. This paper put the interests of the country ahead of its political loyalty. During the last two months there has been considerable evidence that a number of members of this House are not prepared to put the interests of the country ahead of their own political survival. Sadly, this applies to members on both sides of the House—and I exclude my own party when I say this.

To continue in the same vein, on February 26 the Financial Times had something to say about the government's understanding of economic matters. The article reads:

> Finance department officials admit it is almost impossible to say what the labour force growth will be during the coming year.
> Officials say that assuming there is no increase in the participation rate and assuming that economic growth actually produces the number of jobs Mr. Turner says it will, then unemployment could be reduced to an average of 5.2 per cent for 1973. It seems to be a big "if".

Is this evidence of confidence in the government? On February 20, 1973, the Montreal Star carried an article under the heading "Sleight-of-mouth proposals". Then our own party had a chance to say what the Progressive Conservatives would do if we had introduced the budget. There was a lot of hooting and hollering, but let me give an example of the kind of support forthcoming in the country for the propositions we advanced. Basically, our submission was this: we need an expansionary economy kept in check by wage and price controls, preceded by a temporary freeze. The Toronto Star of February 24 had this to say:

> Progressive Conservative finance critic James Gillies has finally got hold of the real formula for reducing the current unacceptable level of unemployment in this country: expand the economy and impose controls to deal with the consequent threat of inflation.

In Vancouver, the third biggest city in this country, the Vancouver Sun, which supported the government in the election, said in an editorial which appeared on February 24, 1973:

> The public will now hold the minority Liberal government totally responsible for continuing inflation in Canada.
> The official opposition very cleverly put the government on the spot yesterday by calling for a wage-price freeze of 60 to 90 days, followed by temporary controls.

In the first and largest city in Canada, the Gazette said on February 26:

> The Progressive Conservatives have the makings of an effective and positive attack on government economic policy in James Gillies' first speech as financial critic for his party.

The article goes on to refer to the "widely-heard criticism that Turner's expansionary policy was not strong enough in view of the level of unemployment." I must say I was interested to see that the Minister of Finance was reported in this morning's Gazette as saying:

> I don't think there is the necessary consensus to bring in controls now. We would need such a consensus before we could bring in controls which would work.

I suggest hon. members on the other side should ask themselves one common sense question. They said they had a contingency plan. Did they expect to bring in that plan when there was a consensus, or to bring it in when they had decided in their own minds that there was a need for it? I say to the Minister of Finance that it is up to him to tell the Canadian people, without any more equivocation, whether he is in favour of a system of wage and price controls or not. Or is he, as seems to be the case from this statement, just sitting around and waiting until people come to him as delegations or through some sort of cosmic association and say there is now a consensus in the country? This party believes that there is a need for this in an expansionary budget and we will not wait to find out whether there is a consensus. This party is prepared to put leadership into the government of Canada, which is exactly what this country has needed and is what the people want.

• (2010)

Let me tell hon. friends to my extreme left, and I do so gently but with sincerity, what the president of the Canadian Labour Congress, Donald MacDonald, said when he met with the government yesterday. As reported in this morning's Globe and Mail, after discussing the government's economic policies Mr. MacDonald said:

> We have not heard one thing that in any way suggests there is going to be any effective measures or policies introduced to cope with Canada's No. 1 problem—that of unemployment.

Having a long Scottish ancestry, Mr. Speaker, I have as great an instinct for survival as anyone in this House. But even an instinct for survival has to stop at a certain point of principle. I say to my friends on the left that there is a very large body of evidence to indicate that the country does not stand behind the financial, fiscal and economic programs of this government, and that the duty of every member in this House today is not to think of his own survival or his own short-term benefit, but to think about what the great constituency outside this House really thinks and feels. I think that the constituency outside this House is more important than any short-term interests within it, and I ask all hon. members to remember that when they vote tonight. Confidence votes in this House, on the basis of short-term or long-term expediency, depending on how it turns out, are not the same as saying that the country has confidence in the economic polices of this government.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Verdun): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to take up too much time of the House in discussing the notice of motion before us, which quite astutely joins the provisions of the present budget with those of the May, 1972, budget in an attempt, as someone has said, to unify the opposition when the vote comes later this evening and defeat the government.

I think it is fairly obvious that there is no economist in the world today with all the answers to the economic problems of any particular country. Like everyone in this House, we all have our favoured economists, our favoured economic magazines, books or theories. But I think deep down all of us know that the role of a minister of finance is, under the best of circumstances, an extremely difficult one. Whether or not this budget is expansionary enough, only time can tell. There are so many factors that are beyond the control of the government or minister of finance of any particular country.

For example, one has only to look at some of the events that were outside our control over the last 18 months and which affected, I think, the recovery of this country. There was the prolongation of the war in Viet Nam, the monetary crisis in the United States and the rate of inflation that existed there two years ago. We had a form of price and wage controls without a consensus, which means that we limited our public servants to a 6 per cent salary increase whereas the provinces granted increases to many of their public servants of 12 to 13 per cent. I suspect this is why the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) has emphasized the need for a consensus before we move ahead with many of the contingency plans that exist. The minister also pointed out that one point of aggravation to this country today is the cost of food, which even in the United States, with their wage and price controls, was left free because in theory the cost of food varies more than any other commodity in accordance with supply and demand.

I think we have to realize, perhaps for the first time, that the constant booms and busts of any nation, particularly our own, do not react as swiftly as was once the case to fiscal and monetary policies. I think, for instance, multinational corporations to a great degree are immune to the fiscal and monetary policies of a country. Their own cash flows which must be determined five years ahead often result in the price of automobiles being increased at a time when you would imagine the cost would decrease in order to stimulate competition which may or may not be present.

Having said that, I think any government that in future uses fiscal and monetary policies in order to check inflation is running a grave risk when it reverses its policies to restimulate the economy, because it might find that the economy does not react in the usual, traditional manner. That was true between 1958 and 1962, and it is true today for a rash of reasons which have been beyond the control of the government, though probably there were a few which were within the scope of the government to manipulate.

The problems that confront this country are unique. Indeed, the problems confronting any country are unique in that country's particular context. First of all, we are a country that is very dependent upon the export trade. Although we may look at our trade figures and think we are doing wonderfully well, if we removed from those figures exports of raw materials, exports of grain and transactions under the auto pact, I think we would find that our contribution to exports of manufactured goods in the world is a rather lowly, nominal one compared with some of our competitors that are growing in increasing numbers around the world.

When you add to that Great Britain's entry into the Common Market with other countries like Denmark and Ireland, traditional customers, and when you realize there is a growth in protectionism in the United States, which has suddenly realized that their currency, like any other, can create problems. It is apparent that as an exporting nation Canada must overcome our shortcoming of a small domestic market. Compared with our territorial size we are badly underpopulated, with a potential market one-tenth that of some of our competitors.

With the tremendous cost of transportation in this country, it becomes apparent that we start with a certain disadvantage. Our advantage, of course, is our proximity to raw materials, and the processing of raw materials into manufactured goods is something we have not exploited, perhaps, as fully as we should. But I think that is obvious to all of us.

I should like to concentrate a little more on the items brought in by the minister in his May, 1972, budget—accelerated depreciation and the reduction in corporate tax. As the former minister of labour, I had to look into these areas in the past more than I normally might have. Certainly labour unrest was one of the problems with which I was faced. Certainly the cost of settlements was something that made any politician, including the minister of labour, vulnerable, especially when they tended to be on the high side.

I think it was only three or four years ago that this country participated in the Kennedy Round with other trading nations. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) may have had the responsibility at the time, but I do know that tariffs were reduced in some 30 or 35 areas concerning imports to Canada in return for a reduction in tariffs of other countries. The end result of the reduction of those tariffs was to make certain industries in this country more vulnerable than they had been. I speak now of the shoe industry, the textile industry, the pulp and paper industry, the chemical industry, the furniture industry and others that hid behind high tariffs and thus prolonged inefficiency, putting off the day when some of the profits could be devoted to new machinery and more sophisticated methods. They had the hope, perhaps, that high tariffs would provide a rich market and profits to satisfy shareholders.

With the reduction of tariffs after the Kennedy Round, which was a government decision, not a decision of industry, these industries became very vulnerable. Some of them were prepared to adjust rapidly, but unfortunately others were not. Because it was government action that made these industries so vulnerable it was logical that the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce should develop programs to stimulate the industries affected by that government decision. Hence the fact there are so many programs within the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce placed at the disposal of business both large and small in an effort to offset their vulnerability caused by lower tariffs, and to help them take advantage of the potential exports to countries whose tariffs, in return, had been reduced.

So from this particular vantage point I do not think this or any other government has any reason to apologize for providing, through the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce or any other department, any type of assistance it felt necessary to extend to small or large industries. I think this is where I differ primarily with the NDP. We all share their concern for people, but they seem to have a blind spot when it comes to helping industry which in turn must provide the jobs for the people of this country.

I remember the passing of a Liberal bill not too long ago which spelled out for the first time the undeniable right of industry to introduce technological change whenever it felt like it. Prior to this it had always been an area of no man's land, so to speak, particularly since Judge Freedman's report was published some years ago. Coupled with that right of management was the moral and legal obligation to negotiate the effects of technological change on its employees.

What, really, is accelerated depreciation? Accelerated depreciation is no more than a thrust, shove or push by the government through tax incentives in respect of industries no longer protected by high tariffs to take advantage of sophisticated methods and new machinery in order, in some cases simply to survive and in the case of other companies to expand. I know of one company in the Montreal area, not a large company, true, that had 20 or 25 workers. It was able directly, with the help of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, to buy a piece of machinery it needed for stamping out panel boards for the electrical industry. Its exports alone to Schenectady, as a result of co-operation with the trucking industry—Smith and some of the others—made it feasible for that company in Montreal to compete successfully with companies in the United States and to deliver more rapidly. Consequently, it is staffed now by about 100 people, rather than 25. It has repaid the cost of the equipment and it is eternally grateful for the help the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce extended.

I know these types of programs such as accelerated depreciation are sometimes abused. But so is unemployment insurance, as we pointed out a few weeks ago. So are all our social policies abused. We have the obligation and responsibility to make sure that the companies taking advantage of these types of programs do not abuse them. It would seem to me that the question of accelerated depreciation and reduction of corporate taxes should not pose the same problem or dilemma to the NDP today as it did a year or so ago. I say this because it certainly does not bother me. In May, 1972, our budget was obviously directed to stimulating the secondary manufacturing sector of the Canadian economy rather than oriented toward people, so a very valid case could be made at the time that the budget, taken by itself, was in fact top heavy or was thrust to meet problems in one direction and one direction only, the concept being that if we could stimulate the manufacturing industry in a hurry, this would create the jobs needed.

As I said, the Phillips curve has shifted and events beyond our control will make things more difficult now and in the future. Therefore, we have to think a little more clearly and go a little more surely before we direct the economy. It may be that the methods are the ones suggested by the hon. gentleman who just sat down, but anything would be better than a fiscal or monetary policy that ends up putting half a million people out of work without curbing inflation.

Having said that, I doubt if there is anybody in the House of Commons who could really define what is the source of inflation. Is it demand-pull, or cost-push inflation? Is it the increased cost of wages, the effect that property taxes have on inflation, or the effect of sales taxes? Nobody knows these things. Certainly none of the papers I have looked for in the House or the library would indicate that anybody has studied these areas in any great depth or with any precision.

Let me refer to what this motion attempts to do. It deals with the two main points of the May, 1972, budget coupled with the present budget. Taking the two together, I think the attitude of the NDP in respect of accelerated depreciation and corporate taxation is unrealistic. While I would be the first pragmatist to say there is evidence that some companies have perhaps taken flagrant advantage of some programs, that does not mean to say the programs are not good. Perhaps the policing, the conditions or the criteria of the programs need reviewing.

Certainly depreciation for small business has provided incentives for them to buy bigger machines which they may not have done under normal circumstances. On the other hand, there still could be conditions under our taxation laws in respect of which it is more logical to extend depreciation over five years rather than over two. In light of that, I fail to understand the concern of the NDP over the particular situation of accelerated depreciation.

Turning to the corporate tax reduction or the eventual reduction from 49 per cent to 40 per cent, as I have said, when you look at this in the budget of 1972 and compare it with what was being done in that budget for people, a very good case could be made that the budget was top heavy in its thrust and other features toward industry and perhaps not oriented enough toward those who are the victims of inflation.

That is not the case when you couple it with the present budget. When you look at what we have done for senior citizens and veterans and what has been done in the way of reducing personal income taxes, then it is very difficult to say the corporate tax coming down to 40 per cent is an abnormal feature. This is particularly true when you consider the fact that in other countries, including Sweden, the United States and most of the other large manufacturing countries, revenue from corporations is much less than it is in Canada.

I am not saying the budget is perfect or is in totality imperfect. I think much more could have been done in the budget for senior citizens, not in the way of money but in the way of providing homes. I think one of the saddest things in this country is the fact that our senior citizens have nowhere to go when they are 65 years of age. People who are chronically ill are in a difficult situation. I know that in a community such as mine there is only one decent senior citizens' home built with any kind of government assistance.

An hon. Member: Your party has formed the government for ten years.

Mr. Mackasey: Yes, and it has done more in ten years than your party ever did. If you want me to drop discussion of the budget and become partisan, I will. Your party had no decent unemployment insurance plan, Canada Assistance Plan or any of the present features in respect of the unemployed. So if I were in your position, the last thing I would want to do is become involved in an argument which would get someone like me on to this subject. However, I am quite prepared to do so.

I am interested in speaking to the motion on which we expect a vote in a short time. The point I want to make to the New Democratic Party is that the issues of accelerated depreciation and corporate tax reduction are of insignificance in light of the events which have transpired since May, 1972. By the time we reach those two resolutions a year will have transpired, a very eventful year.

Our revenue is higher than was anticipated, I must admit, but it is difficult to anticipate with any certainty the result of the capital gains tax, and so on. I think the New Democratic Party has selected the wrong issue to dig into. I certainly would not regard a defeat in the House of Commons on these two issues as a vote of non-confidence. I think the government should bring forward these measures shortly, and if we are defeated on them then the opposition could decide to bring in a vote of non-confidence. However, the effort of the opposition today to reintroduce these measures and the budget as separate but indivisible, which is really what the motion is all about, makes accelerated depreciation and corporate taxes very insignificant in light of the total package of budgetary changes which were introduced less than a month ago.

There is a great deal to be accomplished in this country. I believe we all realize this. I think our manufacturing industry needs all the stimulation this government or subsequent governments can provide. For instance, I believe accelerated depreciation should have been, or must be linked with some moral obligation on the part of the person taking advantage of it to at least consult with the people affected. Under the federal legislation, when one brings in a piece of machinery, if the result of the accelerated depreciation affects the lives of people to the extent of reducing the work force, then one should be obliged to negotiate what the effect will be. It seems to me that that type of obligation could have been linked with accelerated depreciation so that companies which wished to take advantage of these provisions, if this should have a disruptive short-term effect even if it meant additional business in the future, should have a moral obligation to make certain that the men effected are looked after, in respect of attrition, by pensions or in some other manner.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully and with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser). He said something which I think is perhaps the key to this debate. As a new member I suppose he was trying to see things resolved from his own particular viewpoint. However, he should reflect on what he said. He said the government may have the confidence of this House in a way, but that it does not have the confidence of the country. I want to add to those remarks that none of us has the confidence of this country, and what is going on in this country is not designed to correct that. I do not think we should kid ourselves in this regard. It is true that the last election did not give the Liberals a mandate. However, it did not give the Tories a mandate and it did not give the NDP a mandate. All of us are here to try to make parliament work under those particular circumstances. When we have to face an election, whenever that comes, the people of the country will be looking at what went on in this fun house.

An hon. Member: Shame on you.

Mr. Saltsman: I put it that way because there are a lot of games being played here. I am not naïve enough to think like one member, who said we are turning parliament into a political arena. Our parliament is a political arena but it is also a lot of other things. Many of us who have been here a long time understand that politics play a legitimate role, but we also know there are periods when people of all political parties must co-operate in order to continue the function of parliament and must think in terms of the good of the country and the continuation of certain policies. Any one of us who wants to take the trouble to consult his constituents will get a reading of uncertainty on the part of people who are looking at this parliament to see what is going to happen. They know how difficult the situation is. They know there is a minority government and that there is a reinforced Conservative opposition which wants another election. They know we are in a difficult position. I am being very frank about this. Our position in this House is very difficult.

Mr. Alexander: You are being less than honest. Shame on you.

Mr. Saltsman: I do not know that the hon. member who made that statement is really in a position to do so. We as a party hope to find some way to make parliament work and make our influence felt in the deliberations which go on here. Admittedly there are times when supporting the Liberals gives me a twinge of conscience.

An hon. Member: Oh, come on.

Mr. Saltsman: I have to admit that. I will tell you that twinge continues up until the point that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) rises and puts forth some of his crackpot economic policies. Then I feel somewhat better about what I am doing, because after listening to the nostrums advanced by the Conservative party to cure this country's ills, I am not at all sure I wish to replace one government of Neanderthals with another group. At least the Liberals know they are vulnerable and are in a minority position. They want to accommodate themselves to the situation. They have been willing to listen to various ideas advanced by the opposition. They have taken ideas from the opposition and have incorporated them in their budget. That at least is something to say for a government, rather than the attitude of hon. members to my right that they have the answers and will not listen to anyone.

I wish to make some comments on the ideas advanced by the Leader of the Opposition in his intervention today. He said this government has done nothing to encourage investment in Canadian business. The truth of the matter is that this government has done a great deal to encourage investment in Canadian business, but everything it has done in that direction has been a disaster. The kind of policies the Conservative party would bring in would be even more disastrous. This government over the years has bonused business in Canada to an unbelievable extent, and the more business has been bonused, the more it has been sold out to foreigners.

The effect of being the only country in the western world without a capital gains tax—incidentally, a proposal was put forward attempting to bring it in but the Conservative party was violently opposed to a capital gains tax—has been to make it worth while for Canadian businessmen to sell out rather than to put a brake on their businesses. They could make a fast buck by selling out, and there was no taxation on capital gains. That is the kind of policy which the Conservative party has been supporting.

We have had a 20 per cent dividend tax credit in one form or another, and now we have a 33 per cent tax credit. It seems that the more we give away to business, the more incentive we provide for the investor in Canada, the faster they sell out to the United States. There is no way of effecting control of business in Canada or leaving the control of business in Canadian hands except to do it by legislation. You cannot outbid the American buyers.

[Mr. Saltsman.]

We have been trying that for years and it does not work. There is some hope that the legislation which is on the order paper dealing with foreign takeovers will be far more effective than the billions of dollars we have handed out in bribes to Canadian investors, which did little to stop the sell-out of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member for Waterloo, but the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) seeks the floor on a point of order.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has been making many comments about the terrible things that this party is doing and the great solutions that he would propose. I wonder why he does not put in an amendment to that effect, particularly with regard to foreign ownership.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members should remember the established rules. When a member has the floor, he should not be interrupted except for the purpose of asking a question if the hon. member who has the floor will allow it. That is not a point of order.

Mr. Saltsman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Frankly, I do not know how one can amend anything as atrocious as the Conservative amendment.

An hon. Member: It's silly.

Mr. Saltsman: It is not silly; it is just bad English. I also want to say something about small business. Every once in a while there is a new "motherhood" item. Now the current Conservative "motherhood" item is small business. I do not want to talk about small business in a disparaging way. I myself was involved in small business at one time and I know that people in small businesses work very hard and are making a very useful contribution to this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Saltsman: I really wonder whether the problem of small business today is that there are too many small businessmen. If you spoke to small businessmen you would find out why so many of them are going bankrupt. The reason is that too many people have been enticed into small business. Offering incentives to small businessmen will not improve the situation.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Saltsman: Some hon. members are saying "Shame" because it is one of those things that we must not discuss. Small businesses should be stimulated without limit. But that is a thoughtless, mindless approach, and anyone who is in business knows that there is a limit to the stimulation you should give to any kind of enterprise. The Leader of the Opposition stands up in mock surprise—perhaps I should not say it is mock surprise; perhaps he is genuinely surprised but only looks that way—and says, "Look at the business failures. Why are those businesses failing?"

Mr. Paproski: Because of the government.

Mr. Saltsman: That is the way the system works. What are the Leader of the Opposition and his mighty stalwarts going to do? Are they going to do the sort of thing that the premier of Saskatchewan did at one time when he tried to save a box factory and a shoe factory? If any kind of business is in danger of going under, will they rush in, take it over and give it large injections of money? What will they do?

If they want to leave the impression that they are friends of small business, that when the Tory millennium arrives there will not be a single bankruptcy in Canada because the Tory party will take care of it, this is nonsense. This does a terrible disservice to small business generally. Small business needs assistance. My leader pointed out one important area in which we can provide assistance to small business, that is, by providing low interest rates. There are other things we can do. But to start talking about making money grants in order to induce people into small business creates chaos and does a terrible disservice to small businessmen. The effect of that will be to destroy small business, not to help it.

There are examples where a certain kind of endeavour was offered subsidies. Do you think we are short of dress shops and barber shops in this country? I notice that the Leader of the Opposition did not exclude the retail trade, where the bulk of small business is, so I presume he will hand out all kinds of largesse to anyone who wants to open up. That will be a great thing. If we suffer from anything, we suffer from a surfeit of shopping centres, a surfeit of stores, which makes it difficult for the legitimate businessman to survive and to continue making some kind of profit from his energies and efforts.

The kind of solution that is being offered by the Conservative party is a pack of nonsense. If they took the time to talk to a small businessman, the kind of man they say they are concerned about, they would find he has problems and he deserves to be assisted, but the kind of proposals that are coming from the Conservatives are not what he wants. I do not want to be unkind, but there is one remark that I think deserves comment. It was made by the Leader of the Opposition. He said something to the effect that we have to encourage individual initiative. I am all for individual initiative, but we are not living in the age of Marie Chapdelaine any more, that great Hungarian hero.

Some hon. Members: Oh, Oh!

Mr. Saltsman: We really have to look at this sort of assumption, that you pull yourself up by your bootstraps in a modern society. Again I say I am not saying this in an unkind way, and I hope it is not taken so. I am sure that when the Leader of the Opposition was premier of Nova Scotia he did everything he could to encourage initiative in the Nova Scotian people. I am sure the people of Nova Scotia are not without initiative. But what point is there to the encouragement of initiative when there are so many things going against that province?

I am not holding the former premier of the province to blame and I am not saying he did not try, but when he says that individual initiative must be encouraged, surely his own experience belies that statement. Did he, as premier of that province, refuse federal grants whenever they came along? Did he say, "No. That might do something to our initiative. I will have none of that"? Did we hear him say that we should get rid of all the DREE programs because they destroy the initiative of the people on the Prairies? On the contrary, he says that we are callous and that we are unfaithful to the people in the Maritimes when we oppose these programs.

I am dealing with the motion before us, Mr. Speaker, and if some of my remarks are sharp—

An hon. Member: They are not too pointed.

Mr. Saltsman: —and some unkindness creeps through them, is not as much as this motion deserves but—

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, I would be very pleased to receive the question at the end of my allotted time. I felt that there was one great omission in the speech of the Leader of the Opposition this afternoon. He did not dwell on wage and price controls, although they seem to have been the most important item to him up to this point. I do not know if it is because his friends in Alberta have pointed out to him that if he were to bring in such a program, he would have to go to the premier of Alberta and tell him that he could not double the price of gas to the people of Ontario.

I am not sure what happened. I do not know whether some of the farmers, who for the first time in many years are getting some sensible prices after all their work, have asked him if he thinks it is the time to bring in wage and price controls when they are trying to make a living. All mention of price controls was conspicuous by its absence. I hope that was not inadvertent; I hope he is going to drop it altogether, because it will not work unless he wants to be grossly unfair to many people in this country.

Some of my hon. friends have suggested that perhaps I should conclude on a more positive note—

An hon. Member: You should not have started.

Mr. Saltsman: What should be done in fact, Mr. Speaker? One of the things that has to be done, and I wonder whether my friends of the Conservative party would agree with this—

An hon. Member: You have no friends here.

Mr. Saltsman: —is to curtail the export of all raw material and energy supplies from Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Saltsman: There was a time when it was thought that a budget deficit in itself would create employment and prosperity. I do not think that is the case any longer. There are many other factors involved in creating employment now, but as long as this country continues to export raw materials and energy supplies it is not going to provide employment, regardless of the size of the budget deficit. All we are really doing is trading off irreplaceable raw materials that we may very well need in the future for manufactured goods. It is a bad trade, Mr. Speaker. Nor is the answer to more employment what the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey) suggested, more business incentives. Neither is it what the Conservatives are saying. The answer is that there has to be direction and management and planning of the way we are going to conduct our economic future. My leader pointed this out earlier today. Unless we have a government that is prepared to do these things, we are not going to solve the unemployment problem.

I cannot be totally hopeful that the present government is going to see it that way—although they are beginning to see some things—but I hope there is the possibility, if positive proposals are advanced and discussed, for a measure of success. I see no chance of success in following the Conservative line of "Throw them out and throw us in". I do not see anything positive in that proposal. Canadians are not likely to forget the arrogance displayed by the Conservatives when they were the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Same old gang.

Mr. Baldwin: Move an amendment.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, I hope the government comes to the conclusion that the corporate rip-off measures, rapid depreciation and lower corporation rates are not the answer to Canada's dilemma. The hon. member for Verdun made some interesting remarks and pointed out how rapidly things are changing—that the situation has changed very much since the minister first introduced these measures. He is right, things have changed enormously. These are no longer the solutions to Canada's problems, if they ever were, and I doubt that. We are in a real bind. We will have to take extensive measures to save this country. We should not respond by trying to outbribe the Americans when they offer DISC to their people, but we—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret that I must interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

An hon. Member: That is too bad.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. If the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) is rising for the purpose of asking a question, he will have to seek the unanimous consent of the House because the hon. member's time has expired. Is there such unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): There does not seem to be consent. I recognize the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner).

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate on a point of order.

[Mr. Saltsman.]

Mr. Lundrigan: I was going to make a suggestion to Your Honour to perhaps facilitate the business of the House and accommodate the hon. member who suggested that we talk about the inadequacy of the program and not of incentives. I think the House would entertain an amendment from him, if he had the courage to move it. And if he did, I wonder if he would vote for it.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): That is hardly a point of order. The Minister of Finance.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, during the course of the budget debate and earlier today the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) said the fundamental issue is credibility. I fully agree with him. I very much welcome this debate on the motion because its transparent indulgence in political gamesmanship further exposes the crumbling credibility of the Conservatives in their desperation for power at any price.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I think the Leader of the Opposition, on behalf of his party collectively, betrayed a shameless political lust that would not be excused in any civilized party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I have a good deal of sympathy for the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). His motions are usually drafted well, but this one was just a procedural sham and he was not able to disguise it. As recently as Sunday, February 18, just one day before I introduced my budget, the Leader of the Opposition was contending in a speech before the Quebec Progressive Conservative Association—

Mr. Lefebvre: All two of them.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): There was a large crowd there and I have to assume that the entire political association of the Conservative party was present in one room at the same time.

Mr. Paproski: There were 2,500, at $75 a plate.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The Leader of the Opposition was contending that three basic steps had to be taken to deal with the twin problems of inflation and unemployment. In the previous budget debate, the Leader of the Opposition said that there should be substantial cuts in personal income taxes to provide a stimulus for the economy and to break inflation by containing what he termed the expectation spiral.

• (2100)

While the Conservative leader has repeatedly proposed a cut in personal income taxes of up to 7 per cent, the reduction proposed in the budget is equivalent to almost twice that amount, between 12 and 13 per cent, and the cost in terms of reduced taxes represents $1.3 billion. In addition, commodity taxes, tariff duties and sales and excise taxes were reduced by a further $200 million. Yet he says that these budgetary provisions are inadequate, and those are the terms of his motion.

The second action that the Conservative leader said was essential as a further means of containing inflation was adopting the proposal he borrowed from Europe for offsetting the impact of inflation on the progressive personal income tax system. As hon. members know, I proposed a system of indexing the personal income tax that will accomplish the objective advocated by the Conservative leader in a way that is workable and practical.

Mr. Baldwin: But our leader made the suggestion before the budget was introduced.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) accused me of stealing his leader's underwear. I did not steal his underwear; I took off the buttons and put on a zipper.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: And our leader speaks very highly of you, too, John.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The third thing that the Leader of the Opposition wanted was for the government to cut the fat from government spending. The Leader of the Opposition said it was necessary, if we were to deal with the problem of inflation, that the government cut the fat from the spending program. Those were his words in Montreal at that remarkable meeting. Apparently, Mr. Speaker, we have cut too much fat for the liking of the Conservative party, to judge from the remarks of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), one of the three members who make up that party's financial troika. Every time I enter the House I am prompted to ask, will the real financial critic of the Conservative party please stand up? At any rate, the hon. member for Edmonton Centre bitterly complained that we had failed to provide for a sufficient increase in our spending estimates for next year and he tried to lift the book of estimates, and despite the help of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) and my help he could not quite throw it across the floor.

Mr. Paproski: You did not give it to me.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I did not give it to the hon. member. But the hon. member for Edmonton Centre used a cleaver first before he tore up the book.

Mr. Paproski: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the minister is not being accurate. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) suggests that I did not rip the blue book of estimates, that I used a cleaver first. I want to say that I did not use a cleaver before I ripped it.

Mr. Alexander: Withdraw.

Mr. Paproski: I should like the Minister of Finance to withdraw that statement.

Mr. Trudeau: Here is another book. Do it again.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly withdraw that statement. I do not want to meet the hon. member in other circumstances after this debate is over.

In these three areas alone the budget has far more than matched what the Conservative leader was contending were the three essential steps to deal with the problems of inflation and unemployment. Given this position which the Leader of the Conservative party expressed on the night before the budget, surely it could have been expected that he and his party would have been left with no alternative but to welcome what I proposed in my budget speech. Introducing a sham motion and attempting to deny that position is nothing but a political travesty.

The fact is that on the night of Monday, February 19, the Conservative party was saying that the measures in the budget would do absolutely nothing to relieve the problems of unemployment and inflation. Yet these were measures which, on Sunday, they contended were the answers to these various problems. I leave it, Mr. Speaker, to members of this House and to Canadians generally to judge for themselves just how credible is the position now being taken by the Conservative party, a position of condemning as absolutely useless today what they argued to be absolutely essential on the day before the budget.

The position of the Conservative party has further been called into question by its entire position on the matter of price and income controls. In his speech, the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) said that if a Conservative government had been bringing down a budget—what a hope, what wishful thinking—it would have announced a 90-day freeze on all wages, prices, dividends and other incomes. Only a few days before, the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Edmonton West, the seatmate of the hon. member for Don Valley, had said that the Conservatives would not hesitate to introduce controls if necessary to curb the development of inflationary expectations.

On the CBC program "Encounter" of February 8, the hon. member for Don Valley said—this was only three or four weeks before his subsequent statement—that a move toward controls could only be made on the basis of a "national emergency". Let me read from the transcript of that interview. The questioner asked:

Do you think that five per cent inflation would justify a national emergency?

The hon. member for Don Valley answered:

No, I'm not suggesting that.

In the next question, the hon. member was asked if he was really criticizing the Minister of Finance for not introducing an emergency measure to deal with 5 per cent inflation. "Was there any need for controls at the moment?" The hon. member for Don Valley replied "No, no" before a national television audience.

Mr. Baldwin: That was before the budget.

Mr. Paproski: The minister was merely quoting Ron Collister.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I submit to Your Honour that nothing so demonstrates the erosion of Conservative credibility as the almost total reversal of that party's position on the corporate measures I proposed in the budget last May to bolster the competitive position of Canada's hard pressed manufacturing and processing industries. While Conservative spokesmen now tend to find nothing good to say about these measures, last May they were expressing their approval, even grudgingly. Speaking on the budget debate on May 15, 1972, the Leader of the Opposition said specifically and repeatedly, as recorded at page 2265 of Hansard, that he was not criticizing these corporate measures. I will repeat the words he used as recorded at page 2265 of Hansard:

I am not objecting to this sort of encouragement being given to manufacturing and processing concerns, because I believe it will help them to be more competitive in the world as it actually exists.

Mr. Lewis: That is exactly what he said.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): He went on to say:

I have been for some time emphasizing the importance of Canadian corporations being able to compete in the world as it is.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): But he said something else, too.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Those were the words spoken by the Conservative leader, and any member with time on his hands can compare the words I have cited with the words reported originally in Hansard.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): But he said something different afterwards, just as important.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): In his speech to the Empire Club in Toronto on October 19, 1972, the Leader of the Opposition reiterated his general philosophy when he said:

I am not opposed to the established practices of providing incentives to corporations through the various devices of accelerated depreciation write-offs, deferred profits and the like. My experience in government persuades me that these are not only acceptable, but are, in many instances, essential.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Come back to earth, John. The measures could be combined with others.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The Leader of the Opposition spoke today as if he had a monopoly on the interests of small business in this country. I remind him that the measures he is criticizing in this motion reduce taxes for manufacturers and processors from 25 per cent to 20 per cent. The budget of February eliminates restrictions on the sources of income for any small business; that is, any small business with an income of less than $50,000 a year, or earned surplus of less than $400,000, can qualify. The Speech from the Throne, I remind hon. members, recommends that measures be brought forward to facilitate access to financing and to facilitate management counselling, and that the government expand and broaden the terms of reference of the Industrial Development Bank.

In his capacity as chairman of the Ontario Economic Council, the hon. member for Don Valley appeared before the Ontario Select Committee on Economic and Cultural Nationalism on February 17, 1972. It seems that in Ontario every committee is a select committee. He appeared to urge the adoption of a provincial tax incentive scheme to encourage exports by Ontario firms. This is his testimony before that committee; it appears on the records of the committee:

Surely, if DISC goes in the United States it would put our Canadian manufacturers at a terrible disadvantage in all markets unless we have something comparable to it. In other words, we are arguing that Canadian manufacturers ought to be in as competitive a position as any manufacturers in the world.

In other words, Canadian manufacturers ought to be in as competitive a position. DISC has gone into effect in the United States. Let no one be lulled into believing that because its immediate consequences have not been disastrous it would not leave Canadian manufacturers at a "terrible disadvantage", in the words of the hon. member for Don Valley, over the longer term unless we take positive steps to protect Canadian manufacturers and the jobs they provide.

As I have emphasized many times before, DISC is by no means the only threat to this vital sector of our economy. Our manufacturers and processors are jeopardized as well by the increasing competitiveness of the newly emerging giants on the international stage, Japan and the enlarged European Economic Community. They are threatened by the strong protectionist forces rampant in the United States, not the least of which are the member unions of the AFL-CIO that are strenuously pushing for passage of the severe trade restrictions proposed in the Burke-Hartke bill. Because they are the most exposed and the most vulnerable, Canadian manufacturers and processors are the most endangered by the renewed international monetary crisis, a crisis that of course also poses a threat to the future stability of world trade.

I say to Your Honour and hon. members there should be no misunderstanding about the fact that we in Canada are faced with an international situation that is difficult and dangerous. Until now we have weathered remarkably well the storms that are blowing all about us, which is evident from the fact that our currency has remained one of the most stable.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I would attribute that to a good portion of luck and some good management. In terms of good management, I would say the decision to float the dollar was a wise one at the time, in terms of maintaining a competitive exchange rate. The decision of the Canadian banks authorized under the Bank Act by myself to limit the top rate on short-term deposits to 5.5 per cent for 100 days, or 6 per cent for a year, has turned out to be the right decision for stopping the inflow of short-term money into Canada. I think the co-operation that we are eventually receiving from the provinces to use the Canadian capital markets where at all possible is beginning to bear fruit. As I said, we have had a remarkably stable position up till now, but if this international situation deteriorates, this government may have to propose even further measures beyond the ones we have already contemplated.

I am leaving the day after tomorrow to attend a conference of the major industrial nations in Paris on Friday, which hopefully can come to grips with the problems that underlie the current crisis. No one, however, can yet be confident about the outcome. These developments only serve to underline the urgency of implementing the measures proposed to help reinforce the competitive position of Canadian manufacturers in a very uncertain world.

While the motion before the House expresses non-confidence in the government, what it really does is to demonstrate beyond any doubt why the Canadian people should have no confidence in the Conservative party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh'!

An hon. Member: Go to the people now.

Some hon. Members: Resign.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. I am not sure which side of the House is making the most noise, but the Chair is having a difficult time following the speech of the minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): This motion also demonstrates that the Conservative party, and I think this was admirably pointed out by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis)—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: It's O.K., John.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): —has not the slightest intention, will or desire to make this parliament work to serve the best interests of the nation as a whole.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): This sham motion demonstrates that the Conservative party is prepared to play any game at all with the Canadian economy, the Canadian working man and woman, that might serve its own narrow, partisan interests.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): This motion demonstrates that the Conservative party is prepared to seek power whatever the price may be to the Canadian people. In short, this motion demonstrates that in its desperation the Conservative party has totally abandoned any sense of responsibility to Canadians that it might once have possessed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, it was, as Your Honour suggested, difficult to follow the minister's speech both because of its content and the repartee in the House. It may be a hard act to follow, but I hope that the one I have to offer will be more constructive, not partisan and not in the nature of mere political bantering such as we just heard from the minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Effect of Budgetary Proposals

Mr. Hellyer: This afternoon I was very disappointed in the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis). As one who for many years held the New Democratic Party in some respect, believing that they were often true at least to principles that were comprehensible, I admit to particular disillusionment at this time.

• (2120)

The hon. member for York South seemed to be criticizing the Conservative party for huffing and puffing but not blowing down the house. But he should be reminded that just one small puff from him tonight, the big, bad wolf in sheep's clothing, and the house would fall. The hon. member insists upon being apologetically grateful for a few bones thrown by the government which enables him to rationalize his desire for self-preservation. He has given the House some examples of these bones, including reductions in personal income tax and increases in old age pensions. Let us examine these two briefly to see whether the Canadian people should be as grateful as the hon. member appears to be. First, the modest income tax cuts. The typical taxpayer, we are told, will add $1.97 a week to his take-home pay.

An hon. Member: Big deal.

Mr. Hellyer: That calculation is based on figures for a married man earning $150 a week, with two children under 16. But here is the rub. The same man will lose $445 a year through inflation. That amounts to $8.55 a week. Imagine it. The typical taxpayer loses $8.55 a week through inflation and gains $1.97 through the benevolence of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) who spoke so eloquently earlier. This leaves the taxpayer, notwithstanding the eloquence of the Minister of Finance, with a net amount of $6.58 a week less than he might otherwise have had.

Is this the kind of situation which deserves the applause of the New Democratic Party? Is this the treatment they feel the average Canadian taxpayer deserves? Do they feel the average Canadian taxpayer is deserving of this $6.58 cut in take-home pay due to the maladministration of an imcompetent and inept Liberal government? Of course, the average "poor sucker" taxpayer would need a pay increase well in excess of $6.58 a week in order to break even, because any increase would be subject to both tax and to erosion due to inflation. Consequently, the average taxpayer earning $150 a week, with two children under 16, would need a wage increase well in excess of $6.58 a week in order to wind up the year where he started under the benevolence of this great Liberal party!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hellyer: It is a sad story, and it applies to old age pensions as well. The increase in the old age pension is welcome. Our senior citizens have suffered too long at the hands of this unfeeling and unsympathetic government. Now the government is increasing the old age pension by an extra $13.39 in one year. It would have been increased automatically from $82.88 to $86.61 in April in any event, but now this benevolent government is going all out to add the extra $13.39 to bring the total to $100 a month. My hon. friend from Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) pointed out in the House the other day that the $100 a month does not even restore the purchasing power of the pension to the equivalent of what it was when the present government took office.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hellyer: So the old age pensioners, too, are worse off as a result of inflation. Moreover, they have not shared in the increases in productivity which have taken place. They have not shared in the increases in national output. It is difficult to comprehend the political and moral bankruptcy of the New Democratic Party when it applauds tax cuts which are less by far than inflation losses and endorses, however reluctantly, increases in old age pensions which similarly fail to compensate for inflation losses, apart from failing to provide senior citizens with a share of productivity increases.

I must admit I find it unfair that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) should be criticized for moving the traditional want of confidence motion. He is doing nothing different from what leaders of the opposition have done traditionally. He is following the prescribed course. He is doing what is expected of a leader of the Official Opposition. He is doing what every leader of the Official Opposition has done in every parliament since parliamentary democracy began. The only thing that is different tonight is that if the NDP vote with the official opposition, as they have often done in the past when they followed their consciences, the government would fall.

The Leader of the Opposition has been totally responsible. He is consistent, too. During the election campaign, members of this party and members of the NDP said we thought this government was a disaster for Canada. We still think so, and at least on this side we still act on the basis of our conviction. Do we have a duty to keep in office a government which allows the highest unemployment levels in more than a decade?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Hellyer: Do we have a duty to keep in office a government which allows the highest inflation rate in more than 20 years?

Some hon. Members: No.

An hon. Member: Yes.

Mr. Hellyer: I believe we do not. I believe we have a solemn duty to defeat this mediocre government of proven incompetence and to replace it with one which is truly contemporary.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: And one that tells the truth.

An hon. Member: Little David is getting cross.

Mr. Hellyer: You know the song.

Little David was small,

But oh my!

I think that is a little thing they used to play in the pops. One thing is obvious. The present government is not contemporary. Contemptuous, but not contemporary. The high rate of unemployment in Canada was government-induced. We all remember the television commercials, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) standing in front of the cameras and saying, "People say we do not have the guts to let unemployment rise to 6 per cent, but I say to them they are wrong." That is what the Prime Minister told the Canadian people. They are trying to forget it now.

The government induced high levels of unemployment by its tight money policy of 1969-70. As a matter of fact, the principal secretary to the Prime Minister admitted this during the election campaign until the campaign committee called him and told him to shut up and reverse his position. The hon. member for Verdun (Mr. MacKasey) believes it, too. I can see him smiling. He practically said as much tonight. That is where the unemployment came from—from the government's tight money policy of 1969 and 1970.

Mr. Lewis: And you were a member of the government.

Mr. Hellyer: No, I was not. I resigned before that, believe me.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hellyer: I could see what was coming.

Mr. Paproski: David is getting hot.

• (2130)

Mr. Hellyer: If the combined annual rate of growth in employment from 1960 to 1966 of 3.1 per cent had been maintained, there would have been over one quarter of a million more employed people in Canada today. That rate compounded at 3.1 per cent during those years dropped to 2.5 per cent in the period 1966 to 1972. Therein lies the difference between a totally unacceptable, a totally immoral rate of unemployment and what might under other circumstances have been a reasonably acceptable rate of about half the present level.

The government's attempt to control inflation by monetary policy was not contemporary. The inflation, as has been stated by my colleagues in this House, is cost-push. It is something entirely different from classical inflation and requires entirely different treatment. The government's failure to come to the realization that only mandatory guidelines of some kind can cope with this situation is responsible for the fact that throughout all these years they have been trading off unemployment and inflation instead of pursuing the twin goals of low unemployment and stable prices. The government has stubbornly refused to face reality and so has the NDP, its bedmate in this situation. The results are unacceptable inflation and unacceptable unemployment, unemployment which is a national shame and a blot on the national conscience.

In face of this impossible situation, the Progressive Conservative party has grasped the nettle. It has put forward a three-pronged attack. First of all, we have proposed a much more expansionary budget than that brought down by the Minister of Finance. He has scoffed at the suggestion that we would increase the deficit beyond that forecast by him. He has stated that an additional cut in taxes of something of the order of $2 billion would be highly inflationary. This, Mr. Speaker, is nonsense when one looks at the additional capital investment that is required to put 100,000 people to work. When one realizes that at least $25,000, and perhaps as much as $50,000, is required in capital investment for each person who is added to the labour force, one is given some idea of the magnitude of the problem we are facing and the capital expenditures that have to be made. So that additional expenditures and tax cuts of this kind are absolutely essential in order to reduce the unemployment rate by even as much as 1 per cent within a reasonable period of time.

The Progressive Conservative party has therefore proposed a further substantial reduction in taxes and a more expansionary budget that would not just maintain the status quo but would at the same time start at once to reduce the high level of unemployment to a more acceptable level. At the same time, the Progressive Conservative party has proposed, in conjunction with that expansionary budget, a temporary freeze on wages, prices and profits. Then after consultation with labour and management and the provinces, we would introduce mandatory guidelines which would do the job.

In addition, the Leader of the Official Opposition talked this afternoon about special incentives for small business to enable Canadians to invest in their own country. He referred to means by which Canadians could participate in business, means by which Canadian entrepreneurs could be more directly and rewardingly involved in the development of their own resources and industries. Surely this is a legitimate and basically essential part of any three-pronged attack.

I suggest that the only way to meet the problems of unemployment and the working poor is to have a three-pronged attack along these lines. We have to provide more jobs in order to get people off the unemployment insurance rolls, a matter which upset the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey) so very much. We have to give them a meaningful opportunity to participate in the development of a greater Canada. At the same time, by the imposition of mandatory guidelines it would be possible to accelerate wages at the bottom end of the scale so the working poor can breathe and have enough take-home pay to look after their own requirements for food, clothing and shelter, without handouts by a benevolent administration.

If any real progress is going to be made toward the twin goals of full employment, in the definition given to us by the minister of jobs available for all those who would like to be gainfully employed, and at the same time stable prices, only a policy such as that brought down by the Progressive Conservative party can hope ever to achieve those goals.

It has been suggested that the policies put forward by the Progressive Conservative party were adopted as a matter of political expediency. I should like to set that rumour at rest. As one who sat in on the deliberations, I should like to say that this represents the soul-searching acceptance of reality in the second half of the twentieth century. The Progressive Conservative party is the first party to admit that we do not have a pure market economy. It is the first party to admit that big business and big unions can set inflationary expectations beyond realizable levels for the whole economy. It is the first party to admit that we have monopolistic power on the business side and monopolistic power on the union side which has to have some kind of mandatory control so that its actions meet the test of the public interest. To my hon. friends on the other side of the House may I say that this is what people at college used to call an old Liberal principle. I hope that they will reread it.

In taking this fundamental change in policy, the Progressive Conservative party has become the cutting edge of reform in Canada. As a Toronto Sun columnist, Douglas Fisher, says, it puts the Progressive Conservative party economically well to the left of the Liberals and the NDP. Without arguing the validity of the old labels of left and right, I should like to say that it is obvious that the Progressive Conservative party has been put at least ten years ahead of both the Liberals and NDP. As a matter of fact—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, listening to members across the way and to the left this evening reminds me of a quotation that I saw recently to the effect that the only thing that ever consoles a man for the stupid things he has done is the praise that he always gives himself for having done them. The style of this government could best be categorized as a government by trial and error. Every time there is a trial there is another error. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, the succession of errors by this government is taking a tragic toll in human terms. This is so much more tragic when it is recognized that, notwithstanding the important principles borrowed from the Progressive Conservative party, neither the May, 1972 budget not the February, 1973 budget, nor the two of them put together will produce the solutions to Canada's unemployment or inflation problems.

• (2140)

On this fact, Mr. Speaker, many labour leaders and labour organizations wholeheartedly agree. Confidence by all Canadians in this government is at a low point in our history. Confidence by business is at an all-time low. This arises in large part from the unfinished business of government in such critical areas as taxation, competition and ownership. No corporation and no individual can act decisively or, at times, make any decisions at all when the rules of the game are constantly in the process of revision.

This condition is no less disturbing to business than it is to labour. The prosperity of labour and business go hand in hand. A golden opportunity exists today for strong leadership in Canada to bring together into a close working relationship labour, government and business. This government has steadfastly refused to play this role, thus contributing further to a serious reduction in confidence. This is what the government of this country must correct. Only a Conservative government can restore confidence to this nation at this time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bawden: The decade of the seventies presents the greatest challenges and, at the same time, some of the greatest problems Canada has yet had to face in its history. Over a number of years I have had the opportunity to participate in the development of many other countries. I have seen their strengths and their weaknesses, both in their natural and their human resources. I have no hesitation in saying that Canada, its opportunities and its future potential are second to none. I am dismayed, indeed I despair when I see the terrible record of under-achievement written into our history during the Trudeau years.

The leader of the NDP, speaking in this debate, spoke of the failure of this government's policies to date, concluding therefore that a much bolder step should have been taken. In his words, "the government did not have sufficient guts and imagination to pour at least another $1 billion into the economy as it could and should have done". If he supports this government, where are his guts?

An hon. Member: He hasn't any.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bawden: In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I turn to the NDP and remind them of what their leader has said over and over again: we are not going to change our position whatever the consequences may be.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It being nine forty-five o'clock, it is my duty, pursuant to section (9) of Standing Order 58 to interrupt these proceedings and forthwith put every question necessary to dispose of the motion now before the House.

[English]

Accordingly, the question is on the motion of Mr. Stanfield. All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Stanfield) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

At 10.15 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, March 7, 1973

The House met at 2 p.m.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION—TOTAL EMPLOYMENT

Question No. 27—Mr. Coates:

1. What was the total employment of the Unemployment Insurance Commission prior to the implementation of the new Unemployment Insurance Act and what was the cost in salaries and wages for the operations of the Unemployment Insurance Commission as of that date?

2. What was the total employment of the Unemployment Insurance Commission as of December 31, 1972, what was the total cost of operation of the Commission for 1972, and of that amount, what was the cost in salaries and wages of the employees?

3. How many persons were employed by the Unemployment Insurance Commission during 1972 either as part-time employees or full-time non-permanent employees of the Commission and what will be the estimated cost for such employees during the fiscal year 1972-73?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. 1970/71 was the last complete fiscal year subject to the old UI Act. Number of man years utilized in 1970/71, 5,895; Salary cost in 1970/71, $42,469,000.

2. Total employment at December 31, 1972, 12,594; Total man years utilized in 1972, 10,516; Total cost of operating U.I.C. in 1972 approximately, $119,587,000[1][2]; Of this amount $86,785,100 was for salaries and wages[3].

3. Number of casual man years utilized in 1972, 5,684; Salary cost of these employees approximately, $29,581,000[1]; Estimated cost of these employees for the fiscal year 1972/73, $31,282,720.

[1] The Commission's accounts for 1972 are not finalized until the end of February.

[2] The increase in the total administration costs reflects the first year of operation in which the Commission was financed by a self-funded account. Included in the increased costs are the additional costs for services from other government departments and agencies which were previously provided without charge.

[3] Includes payments by the employer with respect to Superannuation, other Pension Plans and Unemployment Insurance premiums.

IRDIA—CASH GRANTS

Question No. 159—Mr. Broadbent:

1. What were the names of the corporations which received cash grants under the Industrial Research and Development Incentives Program (IRDIA), in each of the fiscal years 1968-69, 1969-70, 1970-71, 1971-72, 1972-73 to date and, in each case, what were the amounts of money committed and paid?

2. What are the objectives of the program?

3. Has the department conducted any evaluative study of the program and, if so, what was the date of the latest report?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): 1. Section 13 of the Industrial Research and Development Incentives Act prevents the disclosure of this information.

2. (a) To encourage an increased growth rate in industrial research and development by: (i) Inducing Canadian corporations to undertake new and expand existing scientific research and development programs the result of which, if successful, will be exploited by the corporations; (ii) Inducing Canadian corporations to provide well equipped facilities for such work. (b) To encourage the establishment of independent research laboratories, research associations and technical consulting service whose purpose is to provide specialized support services for industrial research and development. (c) To encourage greater co-operation between industry and universities on research related to industrial problems.

3. The program is under continuous evaluation and review.

AUTOMOTIVE ADJUSTMENT ASSISTANCE PROGRAM—FEDERAL GRANTS

Question No. 176—Mr. Rodriguez:

1. What were the names of the corporations which received federal loans under the Automotive Adjustment Assistance Program (AAA) in each of the fiscal years 1968-69, 1969-70, 1970-71, 1971-72, 1972-73 to date, and what were the amounts in each case?

2. What are the objectives of the above program?

3. Has the department conducted any evaluative study of the program and, if so, what was the date of the latest report?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): 1. The General Adjustment Assistance Board, which administers the Regulations, adheres to the policy of private term lenders of preserving the confidential nature of loan transactions and does not, without the borrower's consent, publish or otherwise reveal details of individual loans. From the inception of the program in August, 1965 however, 114 loans have been authorized for $100,315,010.

2. The main purpose of this program is to financially assist Canadian manufacturers of original equipment automotive parts, tooling, specified commercial vehicles and suppliers of material to adjust to the new market environment created by the Canada-United States Agreement on Automotive Products.

3. This program is under constant evaluation and review.

1972 INCOME TAX FORMS

Question No. 440—Mr. Hueglin:

1. What was the cost of (a) printing (b) distributing 1972 income tax forms that were printed and then unused due to changes in the forms?

2. What was the cost of the media campaign to have people fill in their tax forms correctly for the 1972 returns?

3. Was there an increase in the staff of the Department of National Revenue during the period the 1972 forms were changed and, if so, by how much?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): In so far as the Department of National Revenue, Taxation, is concerned: 1. No 1972 income tax forms were printed and then unused due to changes in the forms, therefore the cost of printing and distribution was nil.

2. Estimated Cost: $1,200,000.

3. Since the 1972 income tax forms were not changed, there was no increase in the staff of the Department of National Revenue, for that purpose.

COST OF LOCAL EMPLOYMENT ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Question No. 521—Mr. Reynolds:

OPENING OF PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA CONSULATES IN CANADA

Question No. 565—Mr. Godin:

Has a request been received by the government from the Chinese Benevolent Association objecting to the opening in Canada of a consulate of the People's Republic of China and, if so, what are the intentions of the government in this regard?

Hon. CANADIAN OBSERVERS IN VIET NAM

Question No. 702—Mr. Stackhouse:

Will the Canadian observers on duty in Viet Nam have the right to inspect prisons in South Viet Nam and to report on the living conditions of political prisoners?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The answer to this question cannot be given in categorical terms. While there is no direct supervisory role to be undertaken by the International Commission in respect of the treatment given to civilian internees, the International Commission of Control and Supervision may become involved in visiting prisons and other places of detention in South Viet Nam. Primary responsibility for carrying out Articles 8 and 9 of the Protocol on Prisoners of the Paris Agreement rests with the two South Vietnamese parties, the Republic of Viet Nam and the Viet Cong. These two parties have agreed to resolve the question of civilian internees between themselves. The basis of this agreement is the 1954 Viet Nam Ceasefire Agreement which formulated a definition of "civilian internees." In the Protocol on Prisoners, the two South Vietnamese parties agree to do their utmost to resolve this question within 90 days of the ceasefire. The observer teams of the International Commission of Control and Supervision are responsible for observing the return of detained civilians in South Viet Nam. This involves sending observer teams to the "last detention places from which these persons will be taken to the places of return" and to "each place in Viet Nam where these persons are being returned." However, the ability to carry out this supervisory function depends on the prior agreement of the two South Vietnamese parties regarding the location and operation of the ICCS teams, and other necessary arrangements to facilitate the operation of the teams. At present, the International Commission of Control and Supervision has made preliminary arrangements to form teams to carry out this supervisory function and is awaiting the required decisions by the South Vietnamese parties. Therefore, the ability of the International Commission of Control and Supervision to discharge its responsibilities concerning prisoners cannot be separated from the matter of the responsibilities of the South Vietnamese parties on this question and their co-operation in laying the groundwork for the release and return of prisoners.

2. Problems developed in the interpretation of the questionnaires used for the small firm monthly employment sample survey as well as with the newly developed computer systems and programs used in the tabulation of this series. 1. By year, what were the total expenses of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation since 1968?

2. By year, what were the total expenses (a) of the French network (b) of the English network, since 1968?

[Mr. Goyer.]

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. The corporation's total operating expenditures since 1968 were as follows: 1967-68, $190 million; 1968-69, $196 million; 1969-70, $207 million; 1970-71, $218 million; 1971-72, $237 million.

2. It has not been customary to require the CBC to disclose detailed figures showing that portion of the above total CBC expenditures allocated to French and English radio and television networks. *APPRAISAL REVIEW BOARD—LOTS ON BLOCK 37

Question No. 1,032—Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain):

1. Does the final report of the Appraisal Review Board for Banff released February 13 make any reference to the Lot or Lots on Block 37 in Banff and, if not, for what reason?

2. Who are the leaseholders for the Lot or Lots on Block 37 in Banff?

3. How much rent will be paid by each leaseholder for each Lot on Block 37 in Banff?

4. What is the appraised value of each Lot on Block 37 in Banff?

5. What was the appraised value of any property exchanged for a Lot or Lots on Block 37?

6. What was paid as an upset price for each Lot on Block 37?

Mr. Len Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, the answer to part 1 is the report of the Appraisal Review Board for Banff does not refer to any lots in block 37. Lots one to seven are leased on the basis of the Crown receiving a percentage of the lessee's gross receipts and there is no rental review involved.

2. The leaseholder of the lots under lease in Block 37 is Big Horn Inn Ltd.

3. The specific terms and conditions of any lease is privileged information which we cannot divulge without the consent of the lessee. If a lessee so directs, we will release any information requested.

4. Because the land is not subject to rental review as explained in No. 1, there was no formal appraisal made of the value of the lots in Block 37.

5. The lots exchanged were appraised for rental purposes at a total value of $76,155.

6. No upset price was paid. The exchange of leasehold lands and the percentage of gross return to the Crown were negotiated as a "package" for the lease on lots 1 to 7, Block 37.

*ASSESSMENT OF DRUG QUALITY

Question No. 1,197—Mr. Rynard:

In response to the recent press reports concerning drug products on the Canadian market, and my previous question, is the Minister of National Health and Welfare now in a position to assure the House that the Health Protection Branch adequately fulfils its responsibility in assessing the quality of drugs on the Canadian market?

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, under the Food and Drugs Act and regulations, all drug manufacturing and distributing facilities, large or small, are inspected by staff of the Health Protection Branch. Detailed and exhaustive examinations are made of the manufacturing process, the facilities and quality control procedures including storage and record-keeping systems and the source of raw materials. This testing may be done by the firm itself or by a competent analytical laboratory.

Newspaper articles alleged that four small Montreal companies were marketing drugs after only minimal testing. Recent inspections which took place before these articles appeared showed that the products sold by these four companies were subjected to a satisfactory level of testing, including appropriate methods for the identity, purity and potency of the product, disintegration of the tablet and, where applicable, expiry date and stability.

The four firms mentioned are only distributors and neither manufacture, label nor package drugs. Their operations involve storage of packaged drugs and distribution only. They maintain the records required by law. Their products are manufactured, packaged and labelled for them by pharmaceutical manufacturers who comply with the requirements of the Food and Drugs Act regulations. Firms such as the forementioned are expected to ensure that their storage and distribution facilities are acceptable, and these four companies have been so inspected and found satisfactory. It was alleged that the Health Protection Branch did not know of the existence of some of the products of these four companies. This is untrue. These companies and all their products are well known to the Health Protection Branch. The newspapers' claim that Laboratoires Anger Ltée produces ten products is not substantiated either by company records or our own, which list seven.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, it will take another three minutes to finish the answer, but if it is the will of the House we could take it as having been read.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think it is a well established practice that with the consent of the House an oral answer to a starred question can be tabled or made an order for return. When a parliamentary secretary has an answer which appears to be rather long, perhaps the suggestion might be made at the beginning that it be made an order for return or that it be tabled. Is that agreed in this instance?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Cafik: It had been my original intention to ask for such permission but since the hon. member who had raised the starred question was not present in the House at that time I decided it would be inappropriate to do so.

Mr. Rynard: I was held up, Mr. Speaker. When I came in, the hon. member was in the middle of reading the answer. Yesterday he promised he would give me a copy so that I would know what was on that paper.

This was verified after the newspaper article appeared.

Health protection branch has complete information on the number of drugs sold by each of these firms, and on the name, composition, manufacture and testing of each one. This information was obtained by actual inspections of each firm within the last 12 months, and by the filing with the branch of information on each product as required of every firm by the food and drug regulations.

Branch records are based on the drug notification forms which by law must be submitted by each manufacturer for every one of his products within 30 days of his commencing sale of that products within 30 days of his commencing sale of that product. We are giving consideration to the possibility of reducing this time period.

Health protection branch monitors the pharmaceutical industry to ensure that essential tests are carried out. These tests, which usually number more than four, are those considered essential to ensure that drugs will be safe and effective when used as directed, and can by no means be considered minimal.

Appropriate tests must also be carried out to ensure that a particular product meets necessary manufacturing and testing specifications unique to it. Bioavailability tests are not at present mandatory. This whole field is very much in the developmental stage, with the clinical significance of bioavailability data still not fully understood. To put this in perspective we have commissioned an advisory committee of non-governmental medical experts to consider all aspects of it and report within the next few months.

I trust that this information will reassure hon. members that the activities of the health protection branch do provide the needed assurance that drugs on the Canadian market are safe and effective.

Motion No. 142—Mr. Broadbent:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the evaluation reports prepared in the past two years by the Treasury Board of Building Equipment, Accessories and Materials Program (BEAM), administered by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, there is no known Treasury Board evaluation report of Building Equipment, Accessories and Materials Program. I would therefore ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion as these evaluation reports are continuing and not specific.

Mr. Broadbent: Agreed.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Motion dropped.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

EVALUATION REPORT BY TREASURY BOARD FOR PROGRAM FOR SHIP CONSTRUCTION SUBSIDY

Motion No. 143—Mr. Broadbent:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the evaluation reports prepared in the past two years by the Treasury Board of the Ship Construction Subsidy Program (SCSP), administered by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, there is no known Treasury Board evaluation report of the Ship Construction Subsidy Program. I would therefore ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to take up any more of the time of the House for these totally useless answers. If it is agreed by the parliamentary secretary that his answer is going to be the same, I would let it be known now that they could all be transferred for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that motion Nos. 143 to 151 be transferred for debate?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Transferred for debate.

EVALUATION REPORT BY TREASURY BOARD FOR PROGRAM TO ENHANCE PRODUCTIVITY

Transferred for debate.

EVALUATION REPORT BY TREASURY BOARD FOR PROGRAM FOR MOTOR VEHICLE MANUFACTURERS' REMISSION

EVALUATION REPORT BY TREASURY BOARD FOR PROGRAM FOR MACHINERY REMISSION

Motion No. 147—Mr. Broadbent:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the evaluation reports prepared in the past two years by the Treasury Board of the Machinery Remission Program (MACH), administered by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

EVALUATION REPORT BY TREASURY BOARD FOR PROGRAM FOR GENERAL ADJUSTMENT ASSISTANCE

Motion No. 150—Mr. Broadbent:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the evaluation reports prepared in the past two years by the Treasury Board of the General Adjustment Assistance Program (GAAP), administered by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Transferred for debate.

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the evaluation reports prepared in the past two years by the Treasury Board of the Employment Support Program (ESP), administered by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Transferred for debate.

Mr. Speaker: No. 155.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I would ask that the motion stand as well as the remaining motions for papers.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Before today's proceedings 61 notices of motions for the production of papers had been transferred for debate, to which we must add those that have been transferred today. The great bulk of those motions were transferred for debate at the insistence or the request of the government on the stated ground that the information or papers sought to be produced were confidential, or some such similar designation. A number of instances have arisen in the past when the government refused to produce documents on the basis that they were confidential and subsequently they became public, thereby proving they were not in fact confidential.

I submit what is happening here is that the government is misusing its authority to transfer items for debate. There are 61 on the order paper now, so many of them will never come up for debate, let alone a vote. I think it is an abuse of the rules of the House to permit the government to hide behind this kind of sham answer of confidentiality.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might comment on the very important point of order raised by the hon. member with regard to the question of notices of motions for the production of papers. I have been very conscious of the very large number of such motions that have appeared on the order paper both in the last and the present parliaments. I have also examined as well as I could the grounds upon which the government has been obligated from time to time to refuse the production of various papers. It places the parliamentary secretary in an unenviable position to have the job each Wednesday of refusing what to hon. members appear to be legitimate requests for information.

The government has reviewed the grounds very carefully, based upon parliamentary practice and based on its willingness to make available as much information as possible to hon. members. I hope that at an early date, when we are debating one of these motions that have been transferred for debate, it will be possible for me to discuss in some detail the grounds upon which we are reaching these decisions and also to table for the benefit of hon. members the guidelines that are being used. It seems to me that if these guidelines, which we think are based upon good practice, are fully understood by hon. members, maybe there will be a better understanding of this question on the part of private members and the government. I would like to have it debated on an appropriate occasion when we are dealing with one of these motions and put before the House, the guidelines that we have brought up to date and are following and are asking departments to follow. The fundamental principle we have adopted is to make as much information as possible available. Only where the refusal can be founded on solid grounds is the request refused.

I make these comments because I believe it is important to indicate that we have considered the matter and are willing at a later date to debate the whole question of notices of motions for papers.

Mr. Fairweather: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think the House is entitled to see the guidelines the minister speaks about. I am of the view that it is the security of the government and not the security of the state that motivates the government in making so much of this material confidential.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fairweather: I hope the minister will fulfil his undertaking and bring this matter forward at the earliest opportunity. There is much too much restricted information at the present time.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on the same point of order?

Mr. Howard: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The revelation by the government that it at least recognizes that a problem exists is welcome, but I suggest that a course might be followed in respect of this matter that might afford parliament an opportunity to make a determination. That would be for the minister, not just in a debate on one of these notices of motions for the production of papers because that would be inconclusive and leave the government's position intact, to agree now to table the guidelines that have been developed so that we could examine them. Following that, representatives of the parties could discuss the guidelines with the minister and come to some conclusion in a co-operative way on whether or not they are proper. Otherwise, the government will still be in the position of making these decisions, and we know from experience that their decisions have been wrong and absurd and have been made for the purpose of preventing the government from being embarrassed rather than to provide information to the public.

• (1430)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member for St. Catharines seeking the floor on the same point of order?

Mr. Morgan: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask that the guidelines be tabled now so that, as the hon. member for Skeena said, some parliamentary group can discuss them or so that the debate will at least have some meaning when it occurs. We will then be able to debate the guidelines with some degree of knowledge.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I was hoping that next Thursday when we would be debating this question I would make a statement and make the guidelines available to the House at that time. It would certainly be agreeable to me that when the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization meets it consider these guidelines because, in so far as we have been able to ascertain, they are based on solid grounds and upon good practice that has been followed in other jurisdictions. It is a matter that should be considered in order to bring about a better common understanding of what is involved in producing some of these papers.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise on the same point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A number of hon. members are seeking the floor on the same point of order. There is, of course, no objection to pursuing the debate for a while, but I am wondering whether some hon. members may not feel that we are anticipating the debate that I gather is to take place later today, particularly in regard to the terms of reference that will be considered by the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. It was the opinion of the Chair that this was the very purpose of the debate called for this afternoon. It might be better to continue with our normal routine proceedings and eventually come to orders of the day when an opportunity will be afforded to hon. members to discuss this very point.

Mr. Hees: I rise on the point of order, Mr. Speaker, and I will be very brief.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member may be very brief and I will recognize him, but other hon. members also want to take part and I will recognize them also.

Mr. Hees: Would it not facilitate things greatly if the government House leader simply disclosed the fact that the government's guidelines are that it refuses to disclose anything that could be in any way embarrassing to the government?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member may have been brief but he was also out of order.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the point of order to make one suggestion. My suggestion is that, when we come to the debate on Thursday afternoon on one of these motions for the production of papers, the government having indicated its guidelines, arrangements be made for that motion to stay at the top of the list until the next appropriate Thursday so that there can be a vote on that particular motion. This will give the House the opportunity to say whether or not it agrees with the guidelines.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I was going to make the same point and I put it directly to the minister. Will he give his undertaking to the House that once the guidelines have been revealed the House will have a chance, in one form or another, to express its views about their correctness and any possible amendments to the guidelines by a recorded division?

Mr. MacEachen: I believe it would be much better for the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization to examine the guidelines. If it felt, after consideration, that changes should be made, it would be agreeable to the government to have the changes considered. I believe it would be a bit hasty to have a vote on this matter without the Committee on Procedure and Organization having had an opportunity to consider it. If I may say so to the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings, I purposely precipitated this discussion because I am concerned about this question. I am concerned about making the greatest amount of information possible available and that when information is denied a clearly stated ground will be available for hon. members to consider. I hope that out of that debate we will have that conclusion.

JAMES BAY HYDROELECTRIC PROJECT—MINISTER RESPONSIBLE FOR CO-ORDINATING FEDERAL GOVERNMENT'S INTERESTS AND RESPONSIBILITIES—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON POLICY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Are he and his department acting as co-ordinator of the federal government's over-all interests and responsibilities regarding the James Bay project and, if so, when was he given that responsibility.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have been assigned, within cabinet, the responsibility of co-ordinating my colleagues' efforts in this regard. I cannot recall the exact timing of it. I would have to go back and check the record.

Mr. Stanfield: Would the minister, at his very early convenience, make a statement on motions as to what the over-all policy of the government of Canada is with respect to this project, because the government's over-all policy seems to be very murky and obscure?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Perhaps I might remind the hon. gentleman that we had a very full debate on this question on an opposition day in the last session, and I suggest that as a starting point he might do a little research there.

Mr. Stanfield: I should like to direct my next supplementary question to the right hon. Prime Minister and ask him whether the appointment of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to this co-ordinating role, in view of his reputation for liking to push people around, indicates—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the Leader of the Opposition will appreciate that a question in those terms is hardly in order.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I apologize for exciting my hon. friends so much. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the appointment of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to this co-ordinating role indicates that the government of Canada attaches more importance to the energy aspects of this project than it does to the human values involved in it?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. I am sure the hon. member would be able to ask that kind of question no matter who was co-ordinating. There are always some aspects that must prevail in certain circumstances, but a co-ordinator is just that, a person who takes into account all aspects.

JAMES BAY HYDROELECTRIC PROJECT—PLANS TO DEFEND RIGHTS OF NATIVE PEOPLE

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In light of the Prime Minister's statement regarding the human aspects of the matter, and as the government knows that the James Bay project will be irreversible as of July 1, 1973, can the minister tell the House what contingency plans are being made to actively defend the way of life and the constitutional rights of some 8,000 native people in the James Bay area, or is the government prepared to abandon these people to cultural genocide?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, yesterday morning I had the opportunity of answering the hon. member's questions on this subject for two hours; I think the committee was satisfied with government initiatives to protect the Indians in this case. The latter have now submitted their case to the courts, and we have helped them as much as was in our power. I can assure hon. members that we are continuing to take an interest in all aspects of the problem and that although the matter is now before the courts, we are in continuous contact with the government of Quebec and the Indians to try to find an agreement that would suit all those involved.

• (1440)

[English]

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and The Islands): Mr. Speaker, in light of the—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands. The hon. member for Skeena seeks the floor on a point of order.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, my point of order is that the minister has just said, as I understood the translation, that the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development was satisfied with the responses he gave yesterday. That is not correct. The minister, in response to a series of questions about this matter yesterday, was evasive and indirect and indicated that the government was not concerned about doing anything in a real way to protect the interests of the James Bay Indians.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would hope the hon. member would appreciate that this is debate rather than a point of order. If the minister claims or suggests that the answers he gave were satisfactory and the hon. member says they were not, I wonder whether that is not debate rather than a point of order.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, the only members of that committee to whom the attitude of the minister was satisfactory were his own colleagues in the Liberal party, and nobody else.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think that right at the beginning of the question period I should remind hon. members that if we spend half the question period on the very first question a number of hon. members will be disappointed. The hon. member for Kingston and The Islands has a supplementary.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and The Islands): Mr. Speaker, since the minister seems to be well satisfied with what he said yesterday, can he now tell the House if the government is prepared to present a formal brief outlining the government's views either to the interlocutory injunction hearings or to the government of the province of Quebec?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: In connection with the current legal proceedings, Mr. Speaker, I have explained several times that we have given the Indians every possible assistance in bringing their views before the courts. I should not like to be paternalistic or to take over what the Indians have started; I just want to help them.

With regard to our getting in touch with the government of Quebec, I must say that we have made many representations; I have myself met the premier of Quebec several times, and it was even my pleasure to speak with him on the matter this morning.

JAMES BAY HYDROELECTRIC PROJECT—INDEMNIFYING OF NATIVE PEOPLE

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

Can the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development say whether the federal government and the Quebec government are now considering the possibility of compensating the natives of the James Bay area for the land that they are going to lose to the hydroelectric development in that area?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, about two years ago I began asking the Quebec authorities and the James Bay Development Corporation to offer a fair and reasonable compensation to the Indians for the development of that area.

[English]

JAMES BAY HYDROELECTRIC PROJECT—FEDERAL APPROVAL OF BRIDGE OR OTHER WORKS—POSSIBLE WITHHOLDING UNTIL INTERLOCUTORY INJUNCTION PROCEEDING DECIDED

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport. Since the federal government has clear jurisdiction in the James Bay area under the Navigable Waters Protection Act, has the minister issued any approval under that act that would allow the corporation to proceed with bridge building or any other developments, which will be irreversible even if the native people do succeed in obtaining an interlocutory injunction?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I know of no such authorization, but I will inquire in the department to see if there was some discussion before I became Minister of Transport.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether it is the intention of the government to withhold any approvals that he would be required to give under that act until the decision on the interlocutory injunction hearings is finally made in the James Bay case?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will not get from me, either directly or indirectly, any legal opinion on what the province may do. However, I shall inquire about negotiations that may have taken place between the department and the Quebec government.

[Later:]

[English]

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am afraid both the Minister of Transport and I had difficulties with the translation device. My question to him, which I think was misunderstood, did not have to do with the legal powers of the province of Quebec but rather with the intention of the government of Canada regarding use of its powers under the Navigable Waters Protection Act in a way that would prohibit any further development of the James Bay area until the conclusion of the interlocutory injunction hearings. That was my question, and I am sure the minister would want to reply.

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member assumes that the legal question has been clarified and that our rights in that area are well established. There are still some unclarified points. I have been informed by the Minister of Justice that certain matters which should have been clarified were not and that is why I cannot give a definite answer, since the Minister of Justice himself has not been able to take a definite stand in the matter.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

FOOD PRICE INCREASES—ESTABLISHMENT OF PROGRAM UNDER ACT TO PROMOTE CONSUMERS' INTERESTS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs arising out of a reported statement by him that he has no power to do anything about food prices. I want to ask him whether he or his department has set up any machinery under section 6(1) of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs Act giving him authority, among other things, to "initiate, recommend or undertake programs designed to promote the interests of the Canadian consumer"—other powers are set out which you would not want me to read now, Mr. Speaker—in relation to food prices or any other prices?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the hon. member's question, in the statement to which he referred I did say that there were powers given to me under the terms of the Combines Investigation Act where the prices in question were affected by unlawful restraint of trade. With respect to his reference to the section in the departmental legislation, any action under it would obviously have to be taken not by me in isolation but as part of my work as a member of the cabinet and as part of government policies. Certainly I am always in consultation with my colleagues as to appropriate methods of expanding the terms of reference of the department.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the same section, in another subsection, gives the department authority to do certain things, for example, to provide inspection services as the Governor in Council may direct, may I ask the minister whether he has made any recommendation to the Governor in Council with regard to inspection of prices across the country, particularly food prices, or has he taken any other step under that section of the act under which he functions?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, the department does in fact maintain inspection services with respect to such matters as quality of food at the retail level, adequate weight of food, and so on. But with respect to the hon. member's more specific inquiry, to answer it would in effect call upon me to discuss confidential matters within the purview of cabinet. Therefore I am not able to give a more complete response at this time.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, the minister cannot just fob this off with that kind of answer. I am asking him, as the minister responsible for the department which was set up by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs Act, to inform the House whether he has set up any machinery or initiated any program, which under various parts of section 6 he has authority to do, with respect to prices or anything related to prices—a research program, a monitoring program, an inspection program or any other kind of program in that area which he has authority to undertake?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I think we have already informed the House about the contingency planning work in the field of prices and incomes control. This work has been carried on under the jurisdiction of my department. With respect to the creation of other programs, this obviously would be a matter of over-all government policy and would be announced in the House in the usual manner.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. Before he made his decision that there was no national consensus that there was in fact an emergency situation with respect to rising food prices, did the minister hold discussions with his provincial counterparts and did he discuss the government's contingency plan with them? Since there is no reply—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A number of hon. members wish to ask supplementaries. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Villeneuve and return to this matter later.

• (1450)

Mr. McGrath: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, my question is very important. I submit to you, Sir, that perhaps it escaped the minister's attention. If the minister did not hear the question, I will be glad to repeat it.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Villeneuve.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could repeat the question. It is very important.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the Chair might recognize the hon. member for Villeneuve. We have not finished the first round of questioning. In fairness I think we should, before the end of the question period, allow one representative of the hon. member's party to ask a question, and then I will give all the time hon. members require in order to pursue this matter further.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ASSASSINATION OF DIPLOMATS—MEASURES TO PROTECT CANADIAN REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. Oza Tétrault (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Following the foul murder of three American and Belgian diplomats over the weekend by Palestinian terrorists, can the minister tell the House whether he intends to implement special security measures in order to protect Canadian diplomats against the murderous and undiscriminating madness of Palestinian commandos?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the safety of diplomats in foreign countries is, of course, the responsibility of the government of the country to which they are accredited, just as we have responsibility for ambassadors who are accredited to Canada. We do, whenever it seems appropriate, apply special security precautions to diplomats from other countries who might be threatened with attack. I hope other countries do the same for our diplomats.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

FOOD PRICE INCREASES—NUMBER OF INQUIRIES UNDER COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

Mr. Ron Atkey (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It is supplementary to that asked by the hon. member for York South. Will the minister tell us how many inquiries, since he became minister, he has directed under section 8(c) of the Combines Investigation Act, which permits him to initiate investigations on his own? If the answer is none, would he indicate why?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have been following the same practice in this regard as has been followed by previous governments, including that of the hon. member's own party.

Mr. Hees: When we were in office there was no Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

FOOD PRICE INCREASES—FEDERAL JURISDICTION OVER PRICING AT WHOLESALE LEVEL AND TRANSPORTATION COSTS

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a further supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. May I ask the minister if it is his contention that in the area of food prices he has no jurisdiction over pricing at the manufacturer's or wholesale level or over the transportation component of prices of goods that move imterprovincially or are exported from Canada?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member may be asking me for a legal opinion, but as far as I am aware I have only that jurisdiction over prices given to me by parliament. Parliament has not yet given me or my department any general authority to regulate prices. The only authority is that contained in the Combines Investigation Act.

ALLEGED DIFFICULTIES IN MONTREAL OFFICE—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION AND STATEMENT AND ADDITIONAL OFFICES

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, the urgency of my question, directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, is based on charges involving corruption, incompetence and a reign of terror in the Montreal Unemployment Commission offices and that officials are not helping the unemployed but are merely meeting quotas and arbitrarily throwing eligible claimants off lists of claimants eligible for benefits. In view of these charges, will the minister make a statement relating to the eviction of UIC workers in the Montreal area, and does he intend to investigate this whole matter and report to the House.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, my preliminary investigation would indicate that the premise of the hon. member's statement is really quite incorrect.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is based on the nearly complete breakdown of the administration of unemployment insurance claims in the Montreal area. Will the minister now open and reopen offices in rural and small town areas outside Montreal, where once there were UIC offices, and put an end to the callous, cruel and inhuman administration?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will appreciate, I am sure, that a question asked in those terms is an assertion or declaration rather than a question.

[Mr. Gray.]

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: May we have order, please. The hon. member should be given an opportunity to ask his supplementary question.

Mr. Grafftey: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The urgency of my supplementary question is based on the fact that eligible claimants, often because of the lengthy waiting periods encountered under the present administration, are thrown on to the welfare rolls of the province of Quebec. In view of this incredible situation, will the minister now open and reopen offices in small towns and rural areas? It is a simple question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, as I have said countless times in the House, I am not satisfied with the administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act and I suspect that anybody else holding my portfolio would not be satisfied until we achieve absolute perfection, which I doubt will ever come about. Having said that, I am sympathetic to the concerns of all members about delays in processing claims for benefits. I think the commission is doing all in its power to improve the service and overcome the difficulties that it faced during the past year, which are well known. I would appeal to all hon. members to give the commission a fighting chance, a fair chance, and not to make the job of the commission that much more difficult through accusations and innuendoes unsupported by facts.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the days of wine and roses in the Unemployment Insurance Commission offices in Montreal, will the minister agree to make a statement on motions as soon as possible so as to clarify and clear up a situation which is detrimental to the efficiency of the organization on which hundreds of thousands of workers have to rely for prompt and fair treatment?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have the impression that the hon. member's question is the same as the one asked originally by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi.

Mr. Rodriguez: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister inform the House how the Commission plans to deal effectively with the hundreds of thousands of unemployment insurance claims when it cannot even properly handle its own unemployed staff?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question, of course, is out of order.

STUDY ON DECENTRALIZATION OF OFFICES—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Can he tell the House whether he intends to publish the recommendations of the study now being made by his department on the timeliness and urgency of decentralizing Unemployment Insurance Commission offices? If so, does he intend to make those recommendations available to hon. members?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there is an examination of the idea of decentralizing the services of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. This was made well known when I appeared before the committee at the time miscellaneous estimates were being examined. When I have had a full opportunity to join with the chairman of the commission in making a decision on implementation and to assess all the implications of so doing, I will be glad to make that decision known to the House. I might say that some of the delays to which my hon. friends opposite are referring and screaming about came about as the result of their deliberate hold-up of funds—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

In view of the reply he just gave us—Mr. Speaker, if our Progressive Conservative friends could be as polite to us as we are to them—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fortin: I thank you, Mr. Speaker.

As the minister has just told us that he was considering the possibility of hastening the issuance of these cheques, could he tell us when exactly he will come to a decision about decentralizing this inhuman, provocative and unfair system as far as claimants are concerned?

[English]

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, again I take exception to the use of the term "inhuman system". In reply to the question, may I say that I will be doing it just as quickly as is humanly possible.

• (1500)

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration related to the general policy of centralization and computerization which was instituted a couple of years ago. Can the minister say whether this particular program, which we were assured would save administrative costs, has resulted in the administrative costs tripling in the past three years despite the other problems to which reference has been made?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville.

PROVISION OF APPEAL PROCEDURE FOR CLAIMANTS WHERE OVERPAYMENT IS ALLEGED

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the complaint that I believe a number of members have received that a claimant cannot appeal an overpayment made to him or her by the Unemployment Insurance Commission, is it the intention of the minister to introduce an amendment to the act so that the claimant will have the right of appeal in a situation where he is overpaid by the commission?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, whether I have to do it by regulation or amendment to the act, that matter bothers me too. I want to look into it to see if we can alleviate any injustice that may have been inadvertently perpetrated.

GRAIN

WHEAT—POSSIBILITY OF PURCHASE FROM UNITED STATES TO MEET CANADA'S EXPORT COMMITMENTS

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice who is in charge of the Wheat Board. Will he inform the House and the country how many million bushels of wheat Canada is prepared to buy from the United States in order to meet our export commitments?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to assure the hon. member, as I have about 55 times previously, that we have several hundred million bushels of unsold wheat on hand at this time and we are not intending to buy any wheat from anywhere else.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Is the minister aware that in the state of Montana Canadian buyers are prepared to pay 50 cents a bushel more to American farmers than they ordinarily receive for wheat to be moved into Canada to meet our export commitments?

Mr. Lang: No, Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of that. I am aware that a certain amount of publicity is being put out in the state of Montana about the fact that Canadian prices are about 40 cents higher than American prices and urging that American prices be brought into line.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Oral Questions

ACTION TO AVOID POSSIBLE LAKEHEAD GRAIN HANDLERS STRIKE—REQUEST FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF TRANSPORT CONTROLLER

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. In light of the warning that negotiations at the Lakehead with grain elevator workers are at an impasse at the present time and that the situation could lead to a strike next month when the shipping season opens, can the minister inform the House whether he personally has been in touch with both parties to the dispute to encourage productive negotiations and assess what initiatives the government should take to avoid any possibility of a strike next month?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, depending, of course, on the seriousness of the situation, everyone in this House is aware of the ultimate action that government and parliament can take. In the meantime, officials of my department have been available to the parties involved and are doing their very best to assist in arriving at a settlement.

Mr. Murta: A supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I again bring to the attention of hon. members that we will be running short of time. We do get into difficulty from day to day when there are too many supplementaries to every question asked. I seek the co-operation of hon. members in this respect. The hon. member for Lisgar will be recognized for one last supplementary.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a short supplementary to the Minister of Agriculture. In order to improve the credibility of Canada as a wheat exporter, is the government giving serious consideration at the present time to introducing legislation to establish a grain transportation controller with adequate powers to ensure that grain transportation will not be disrupted in the future?

LOCAL EMPLOYMENT ASSISTANCE PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PROGRESS AND RECEIPT OF APPLICATIONS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Will the minister advise the House if there is any progress in the planning of the local employment assistance program and if his department is now receiving applications? Also, is it a fact that the staff are now in the field, ready to go into operation on April 1?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I expect to be making a statement on this matter very shortly. I will be glad to furnish that information to the hon. member just as quickly as I can.

[Mr. Lang.]

PRACTICE OF DISCOUNTING TAX REBATE CHEQUES—REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT REGULATION

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue in connection with the current deplorable practice conducted by some small businesses, especially in the west, of discounting income tax rebate cheques. Is the minister considering implementing regulations similar to those implemented by the Unemployment Insurance Commission last year to prevent the assignment of rebate cheques to such businesses?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I have been giving consideration to this problem which other members as well as the hon. member for Selkirk have drawn to my attention. It would probably require an amendment to the Income Tax Act to correct this. We want to be cautious so that we do not create any hardship for people who might have quite substantial refunds coming to them and would like to deal with reputable financial institutions. However, if there are cases, even under the present law, where this kind of usury is being practised, I think charges could be laid without an amendment to the Income Tax Act. I might say, Mr. Speaker, that I believe the practice in my department is not to make cheques payable to anyone but the taxpayer, so that it would be necessary for the taxpayer to sign some kind of legal assignment or power of attorney in order for anyone else to get the benefit of the refund.

Mr. Rowland: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Justice. It is my understanding that the Department of Justice did take legal action in respect of discounting of unemployment insurance cheques last year in Alberta. Can the minister indicate to the House the status of that case at the moment?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to gather this information and report directly to the hon. member.

HARBOURS

LADNER, B.C.—REQUEST FOR DREDGING TO ASSIST FISHERMEN

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Public Works. It relates to an answer to an order paper question last week regarding Ladner harbour. The minister's answer was that dredging of this harbour would start in April. As I toured the area over the weekend, as the report I received from his department is that they cannot start until July, and as the mouth of the harbour is almost closed and the fishing season starts on March 15, can the minister assure the House that he will ensure that the department dredges the harbour so the fishermen can enter and leave it in order to earn their living?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I have heard the representation made by the hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps we might allow the hon. member one supplementary and then recognize the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain.

Mr. Reynolds: Mr. Speaker, this is a very serious issue in my constituency. Just to have heard the representation is not good enough. Will the minister look into this matter and give us an answer, because it involves the livelihood of a number of fishermen in Ladner? I toured the area by boat last weekend with the fishermen and the boat became stuck in the silt.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON WAGE AND PRICE CONTROLS

Mr. Duncan M. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question was for the Prime Minister, but he must have been able to read my mind because he has bolted. It refers to a statement made by the Minister of Finance on Monday. Was the minister enunciating government policy when he stated to the Canadian Labour Congress that he was certain there was no nationwide demand or interest in wage and price controls?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that was on my mind, which I can read a little better than the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): The minister also stated at that meeting that there was no consensus among the provinces relating to wage and price controls. Can the minister inform the House when the provinces were consulted?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): At the last meeting I had with the provincial ministers of finance, Mr. Speaker.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Jean-Marie Boisvert (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Can he tell us whether the new program to send messages of public interest in the envelopes containing the old age pension and family allowances cheques is supposed to make up for the lack of efficiency of that white elephant Information Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order. A question put in those terms is hardly in order.

ENERGY

SECURITY OF OIL SUPPLIES FOR EASTERN CANADA—NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Bearing in mind the continuing concern with regard to the security of oil supplies for Montreal and the eastern part of Canada, did the minister make any progress in his negotiations yesterday with United States officials?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I can confirm that Canadian and United States officials did meet yesterday to discuss the question of the insecurity of overseas supplies. No agreements were arrived at, but the officials are to meet again within the next several weeks to continue the discussions.

LABOUR RELATIONS

ELEVATOR CONSTRUCTORS' STRIKE—REQUEST THAT MINISTER OF LABOUR CONVENE MEETING WITH PROVINCIAL MINISTERS TO ACHIEVE SETTLEMENT

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Labour a question. On February 26 I asked the Prime Minister a question with reference to the continuing strike of members of the International Union of Elevator Constructors. This strike is going on in ten provinces, or at least in nine with a slowdown in the province of Quebec. In light of the fact that this work stoppage is affecting apartment blocks and 748 projects across Canada, and the minister having taken the position that under the constitution this is a provincial matter, inasmuch as the Prime Minister said he would look into my suggestion, would the minister call together the ten provincial ministers of labour in order to come to grips with the problem and bring this terrible strike to an end?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): What is the question?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I heard the statement of the hon. member. I am not sure whether he put a question. The hon. member may be referring to an editorial which appeared in the Globe and Mail. The fact is, though, that this is a provincial matter. On several occasions we have indicated our concern over the serious economic implications of a continued strike of this kind and its adverse effect on the country and the hardship caused to employees. If the province of Ontario, where the major problem resides, wishes to call upon us for assistance, we shall be pleased to respond positively. We have received no such request. It is their responsibility to find a settlement and I would hope, as I am sure all members would hope, that they would go about getting it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: I do not wish to take up too much time on this matter. I will put my question very briefly. This strike is affecting houses, apartment blocks and new construction. When I asked the Prime Minister the same question, he said: "Mr. Speaker, I will certainly consider the request." Even hiding behind the constitutional question the minister is trying to hide behind—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Woolliams: —will the minister bring together the ten provincial ministers of labour in an effort to put an end to this strike which is affecting ten provinces, not one?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Again, I would say to the hon. member that, as anyone knows who is familiar with this strike, the major impact of this continued dispute is in the province of Ontario. It seems apparent that if the strike is settled there, it will be settled elsewhere throughout the country. That is where the initiative has to be taken. If the hon. member would agree with that conclusion, it seems to me he must also agree that the primary obligation rests there, and that to bring the ministers of labour together would not provide a satisfactory solution—

Mr. Woolliams: The Minister of Labour is misrepresenting the facts. It is true that the strike is going on in Ontario, but it is also going on in British Columbia; it is going on in Alberta; it is going on in Saskatchewan; it is going on in nine provinces.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is rising on a question of privilege, after which the Chair will have to call orders of the day.

Mr. Woolliams: I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the minister resume his seat?

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Woolliams: If the minister wishes to misrepresent the facts—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member for Calgary North will agree with me that a dispute as to facts, which is the basis of this question of privilege, cannot found a question of privilege. There may be a point of dispute or debate with the minister, but I would not think it could be considered by the House as a question of privilege.

Mr. Woolliams: With the greatest respect, Mr. Speaker, surely the minister is not permitted to come here and deliberately misrepresent the facts. This strike is going on in ten provinces, not one. He is trying to leave the impression that it is going on in only one province where there happens to be a Conservative government. I want him to accept his national responsibility and stop hiding behind the constitution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Munro (Hamilton East).]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order. As I pointed out a few moments ago, no question of privilege arises. The hon. member claims he is not satisfied with the response given by the minister. It is well established that such a situation cannot found a question of privilege. The hon. member may have a protest or feel there is a question of debate. Further, it is unparliamentary to accuse another hon. member—the rule does not refer to a minister but to any hon. member—of deliberately misrepresenting the facts. I am sure that these words went beyond the intention of the hon. member for Calgary North. It is well agreed that in debate hon. members can suggest that other members misrepresent the situation, misrepresent the facts or give incorrect facts, but it is not in accordance with the well established traditions and practices of the House respected by all members that we should accuse one another of wilful misrepresentation. I would hope the hon. member for Calgary North would agree with me on that point.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw!

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, for you, who are so gracious, I will withdraw the word "deliberate", but either through illiteracy or negligence he is still misrepresenting the facts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: I do not know how else to put it.

Mr. Oberle: On a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before calling orders of the day I will recognize the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River. May I say that I am sure all hon. members will agree that I hear complaints from time to time about the question period. I have complaints, too, about the question period.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure that this is the occasion on which to indicate what my complaints are, but certainly I suggest that too much time is taken during the question period on points of order and questions of privilege, that there are too many supplementaries, and that too many questions are asked day after day by the same members. I think this is unfair.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: This is not really a difficulty for the Chair because it is as easy for the Chair to recognize a frontbencher as a backbencher. But I feel it is not entirely fair to some of our colleagues who do not have the honour to be Privy Councillors or to sit in the front row that day after day they are given a secondary role during the question period. I am always anxious, from day to day, to give them a chance but it seems that when we spend 20 or 25 minutes on the first two or three questions asked it becomes an impossible task to give a fair break to hon. members who do not happen to sit in the front rows.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I would seek the co-operation of hon. members.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): On a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to apologize to the hon. member who has risen on a point of order, but he has lost his precedence because we now have a question of privilege.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, a lot of statements and charges were made by the hon. member for Calgary North, in connection with which I could take offence. There was, I think, a deliberate misinterpretation of my answer. But I find it so difficult to take the hon. member seriously at any time that I am prepared to let the matter drop.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Prince George-Peace River rises on a point of order.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to agree with you today and disagree with my hon. friend from Calgary North.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Oberle: The point is the same. I interpret it to be a point of order. I concur with my hon. friend that the minister is misleading the House when he says there is an elevator strike in Ontario only.

An hon. Member: He did not say that.

Mr. Oberle: The problem is quite as grave in British Columbia; it is as much a problem there as elsewhere. These people do not know what is going on in British Columbia or they would not make these statements.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: We shall have another 40 minutes tomorrow to pursue the debate. Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

HOUSE OF COMMONS

COMMITTEE REVIEW OF AND REPORT ON STANDING ORDERS AND PROCEDURE—AUTHORIZATION TO TRAVEL OUTSIDE OF CANADA DURING STUDY

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council) moved:

Standing Orders and Procedure

That the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization be authorized to consider the standing orders of the House and procedure in both the House and its committees with special regard to all the matters that Mr. Speaker suggested during the twenty-eighth and twenty-ninth parliaments that may require the consideration of the said committee, and to report to the House its views on any facets thereof that may require reform and to recommend what manner of reform may be required;

And that the committee be authorized to travel outside of Canada during consideration of the aforementioned subject.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the events of the last hour and a half have provided an excellent backdrop to the discussion that we hope will continue for the rest of the afternoon and culminate in the acceptance of this motion and an early beginning by the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization of its deliberations.

There are many problems and issues that can be raised in commencing discussion of this motion, particularly the list of items which Your Honour has put together from time to time as subject matter for study by the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. I should like to confine my remarks to brief comments about the process of parliamentary reform in Canada; second, to general comments about the operation of the House of Commons; third, the question period; fourth, Standing Order 43; fifth, the supply procedures; sixth, the committee system; and finally, any other matters that may be of interest to the House.

The process of parliamentary reform in Canada has in recent years become a continuing one. What was once a very sporadic effort has become a continuing process. Hon. members will know that the original rules adopted in 1867 were first revised in 1876. It was then 30 years before further revisions were made in the rules of the House of Commons. The 1906 reforms were followed by further amendments in 1910 and 1913. There were further revisions at approximately 15-year intervals—in 1927, 1940 and 1955.

The present process of continuing reform that is proposed in this motion began about ten years ago. Provisional reforms were adopted in 1964, and work by special committees culminated in the adoption of very major revisions to the rules in 1968. At that time the notion of a permanent Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization was embedded in the Standing Orders. Since 1968, only two amendments have been made to the Standing Orders, the 75A, 75B and 75C rules which are well know to hon. members, and the statutory instruments committee rule.

We, like the British House of Commons, have been constantly aware of the need to reassess and re-examine whatever changes we have made in the recent past, and also to reassess and re-examine old rules that may not have been revised in recent years. It stands as an axiom that the operation of parliament and the operation of the House of Commons requires the constructive co-operation of the members of all parties in the House of Commons. Each one of us may on one day or another behave improperly but we are sustained by the common, constructive balance that is usually maintained by the other members of the House of Commons. Because of that the House is able to operate effectively and to conduct its business.

There is great controversy at times in the House. Yesterday was a raw day so far as debate was concerned, but it was a good day for the House of Commons. The strong tempers that were displayed were healthy, but a daily diet of that explosive and tense atmosphere could hardly make for a continuing operation in the House of Commons.

The House is maintained by the Standing Orders, the rules and the Speaker. But as was pointed out in the report of the special committee that travelled to Westminster in 1968, it is also maintained by a subtle understanding of the spirit of parliament that is deeper than the rules and institutions. It is the deepening of that subtle understanding of the spirit of parliament that probably will engage the attention of the members of the standing committee.

The House of Commons is always working against time. The standing committees are always working against time. Time is the most precious commodity; it is precious not only to human beings generally but it seems to be more important to Members of Parliament and to the institution itself. When the members of the special committee visited Westminster in 1968, two observations were heard most frequently from members of the British House of Commons. One was, "We have decided that there are only 365 days in the year". The second was, "We have decided that in debate there comes a time when enough is enough". That was the sentiment that was expressed, not by members of the government but by members of the opposition.

Because of the more frequent changeover in government in the United Kingdom, the people we discussed problems with had experience both in government and in opposition. Their most frequent refrain was, "Time is precious; time is of the essence. There are only 365 days in the year, and if Members of Parliament are going to discharge their responsibilities to their constituents, there must be a predictable, regular way of dealing with parliamentary business".

It was in the light of examining that experience in the United Kingdom as well as our own experience that the special committee made its report to the House, as found in Journals for March 13, 1968. I had the honour of chairing that committee and other hon. members, including the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), were distinguished members. That report, in essence, was the foundation for the general revision of the rules that was undertaken in 1968. It was the foundation and contained the philosophy upon which the subsequent committee built its conclusions.

Referring to the comments heard in Westminster, that there are only 365 days in a year and that time is of the essence, the question has been asked as we look at the calendar on March 7, particularly by the media, "What has been accomplished in this twenty-ninth parliament of Canada?" We have now spent two months in the House of Commons and we have operated under the rules. It is interesting to observe how strongly bound is the operation of this House by the rules which we ourselves adopted.

[Mr. MacEachen.]

We spent eight days on the throne speech debate. In view of the fact that almost 100 new members have seats in this House, it would be unrealistic to expect that less than eight days should be spent allowing them and other members to express their views in the House of Commons. As I say, that debate took eight days. Then we spent four days on establishing the prices committee. Was that too long? Surely it was a good debate and brought to the attention of the country a most important question. We spent four days on the controversial unemployment insurance bill removing the so-called ceiling. This provided to members of the House a wide-ranging debate on the whole question of unemployment insurance.

Then the government had to come to the House of Commons looking for $1,300 million in supply. That took nine days. Perhaps that was too long, but certainly it was an opportunity for members to examine the additional spending program of the government in the standing committee. Then, without any time allocation and with the freedom given to hon. members both on second reading and in committee on the clauses and schedules, we used up nine days. Then we had six days on the budget debate.

An hon. Member: Seven days.

Mr. MacEachen: It was six days if you do not count yesterday. We had two opposition days, two days on old age security, and four days on the important question of capital punishment. So that is what has taken up the time of the House.

If hon. members want the House to move faster, then they have to strike out days from the budget debate and the address in reply. If they want the House to move even faster, then they have to adopt even more stringent supply provisions than we have at the present time. But that is what the House has done. Those in the media who ask what we have been doing obviously have less than a full understanding of the nature of the House of Commons and the purpose of Members of Parliament. In the words of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), "It is not a sausage factory." It is not a sausage factory in any sense. That is how we have spent our time since we returned here on January 4.

The immediate cause of accelerating this reference is the operation of the oral question period. Hon. members and Mr. Speaker have on this very day expressed their frustration with the operation of the oral question period. We are not exactly flying blind when we discuss the oral question period in the House of Commons, because on previous occasions the House, through its standing or special committee and in debate in the House, has focused on the operation of the question period. Certainly the 40-minute question period is a result of a recommendation of the standing committee which was unanimously adopted by the House of Commons.

I am sure if hon. members re-examine in the committee the matter of the time of the question period, they will find inexorably that there is no final solution to the operation of the question period by extending it by 10 minutes or 20 minutes. In fact, Mr. Speaker has been more than generous in not seeing the clock during the question period. As I listened to the question period today, I had in front of me the report of a special committee of the House on procedure and organization in April, 1964. That committee was chaired by the then Speaker. That report, which was later concurred in by the House as a whole, had a number of important points to make about the operation of the question period. It reads in part:

Your committee believes that the so-called orders of the day question period should be tightened up.

It continues:

Your committee believes that the implementation of Standing Orders 39(5) and 39-A, as noted above, will provide a basis for more effective use of the right of members to ask questions—

That was a reference to what is now embodied in our practice as the "late show." It goes on to say:

Your committee recommends that the House accept and support the following guidelines. (1) Questions asked prior to orders of the day should be governed by the provisions of Standing Order 39(1).

That is our present Standing Order 39(5) which makes this very clear when it provides:

—questions on matters of urgency may be addressed orally to ministers of the Crown, provided however that, if in the opinion of Mr. Speaker a question is not urgent, he may direct that it be placed on the order paper—

That is the Standing Order and it relates to the question of urgency. The guidelines went on to state:

(2) Such questions should

(a) be asked only in respect of matters of sufficient urgency and importance as to require an immediate answer;

(b) not inquire whether statements made in a newspaper are correct;

(c) not require an answer involving a legal opinion;

(d) not be asked in respect of a matter that is sub judice;

(e) not be of a nature requiring a lengthy and detailed answer;

(f) not raise a matter of policy too large to be dealt with as an answer to a question.

Then recommendation No. 3 reads:

Answers to questions should be as brief as possible, should deal with the matter raised, and should not provoke debate.

We know perfectly well as we observe the question period that these guidelines, especially the one in respect of provoking debate, are observed more in the breach: answers contain debating material and questions contain debating material. It is as certain as the fact that night follows day that any member who adduces an argument or controversy in his question will receive an argument and a debate in the reply if the person replying is at all sensitive to the kind of political forum in which we operate. So it works both ways.

I have every sympathy with the idea of undertaking a further study of the question period, but why do we not go back and look at what we have done already, what we have concurred in already and what we have asked Mr. Speaker to place before us as the rules of the House? I have great sympathy for Mr. Speaker during the daily question period, who with patience attempts to be reconciliatory and solve the impossible task of recognizing every hon. member who rises in his place to ask a question.

Perhaps I may conclude this reference by referring to observations that were made in the report of the special committee of 1968, at page 765. These have not yet been adopted by the House of Commons. In its report the committee stated as follows:

Another topic that engaged our attention was the question period. At Westminster no questions are asked without notice.

Then it goes on to say:

The effect of a notice requirement in discouraging trivial questions and trivial answers is valued highly by your committee.

We did not recommend the full adoption of the British question period system because I believe our question period is more lively, more entertaining and has many more of the characteristics of the theatre than the British question period. I do believe, however, that we probably could improve the operation of the question period if we relied more on notice, because once a minister has been given notice of a question he is bound, certainly by a sense of duty, to give a much more detailed and much more helpful answer to a question.

I commend the work already done by the committee in respect of the question period, the views of the other committees which examined the matter, and also the possibility that we might take a slight step forward if we adopted the practice of notice, on a trial basis or on a voluntary basis if it is not embedded in the rules.

The suggestion has been made that questions are asked during the oral question period because they are not answered quickly enough by the government when they are placed on the order paper. There may be some validity to that claim, although questions in the oral question period are not entirely for the purpose of seeking information; they are for the constructive purpose of embarrassing the ministry or showing weaknesses, if any exist, in the ministry and scoring political points. However, in my humble opinion the number of questions which appear on the order paper has really gone quite out of sight. If hon. members wish prompt answers to questions which appear on the order paper, it would seem to me that they should be selected in such a manner that pressure could be put on the department to get the answers out as quickly as possible.

In 1968-69 there were 189 sittings which produced 2,723 questions. So far this session we have had 1,420 questions asked in 44 sittings, 329 of which have been answered. This is a very large increase, and the response in 329 cases is not a bad response. Certainly I and other ministers are pushing the departments to get answers out. Sometimes it is like pulling teeth to get information out of departments on time. It is not entirely a matter of ill-will. It seems to me that much has to be done to improve the servicing of parliament by departments. During the last few weeks I have devoted a good deal of time to examining this whole question. It is not an easy one. I believe there is something which can be done to accelerate the process.

Standing Order 43 is a relatively new phenomenon. Why was it brought in? It is a strange thing, but there is a sort of balance which occurs in the House of Commons. When we had Standing Order 26 in respect of questions of urgency, mini-debates developed under the guise of points of order. This was obviously irritating to the Chair and to members of the government, because into the so-called point of order there was bootlegged a whole baggage of political material. This was most unsatisfactory, but that was the way it worked and everybody realized it.

The change was not imposed upon hon. members unwillingly. They accepted it. We introduced the "late show" and introduced Standing Order 26 in a new form in order to make it more efficient. Since it does not provide the opportunity for political debate, it is hardly used at all. The technique now has shifted to the use of Standing Order 43. The use of Standing Order 43 has increased very remarkably. In this session, 107 such motions have been presented. Five of these have been accepted for one reason or another. There were 107 matters of "national emergency", or 2.2 "national emergencies" presented every sitting day of the House of Commons. This is the point we have reached. Of these motions, 41 sought to send matters for study, investigation or examination to standing committees of the House, committees that are already sagging from overwork.

Mr. McGrath: Two-thirds of them have not yet started meeting.

Mr. MacEachen: The burden will be there. The estimates are ready for the consideration of the committees. I shall say a little more about the committee system later. What do we do about Standing Order 43 every day. I say "No". I become embarrassed saying "No". Why do I say "No".? It is not because I am unsympathetic to the efforts of hon. members to have investigations, but it seems to me that if the House of Commons is to pass a motion it should do so after some deliberation and thought. I instinctively recoil against that as a matter of policy and of inappropriateness for the House of Commons. That is one reason which is perhaps a matter of taste. The other reason is that our operation could become bogged down, because if these motions are to be debated they would supersede government business. They could go on all day, and the next day and the next day—and when would we be able to complete our legislative program and give expression to the needs of the nation as contained in the government's program?

• (1550)

If hon. members continue to put up motions, if that provides an outlet, fine. But we on this side, because of the reasons stated and unless the matter is of universal interest, will continue to use that unhappy expression, "No". It is really not the way to run anything, let alone parliament. I may say that I hope the standing committee will find a way of providing some kind of mini-debate that could capture the interest of the House—occasionally—on the orders of the day or thereabouts, that would give expression to opinions and in which there could be a good interchange. The present system is most unsatisfactory for members as a whole, in my opinion, and if something could be done and the committee could come up with another system, I think it would be most useful.

The supply procedures that were adopted by the House in 1968 were unanimously adopted.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): You mean "clubbed".

Mr. MacEachen: No, unanimously adopted. My friend, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) was one of the hon. members on the other side of the House who took, not so much exception to the general pattern of supply, not so much to the predictability and the certainty that was introduced into the supply system, but basically to the abolition of the committee of supply and to the fact that estimates were totally withdrawn from the committee of supply.

Mr. McGrath: Good for him.

Mr. MacEachen: Yesterday the right hon. member for Prince Albert, in the remarkable intervention which he made on a point of order, said as recorded at page 1943 of Hansard:

> I think of that awful scene of a few months ago when we voted through $16 billion in four and a half hours because the rules imposed by closure had actually determined the denial of the right of parliament to examination.

That requires a certain amount of clarification, because the rules under which we are operating were generally approved by the House.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): No.

Mr. MacEachen: The rules of supply. I am afraid my hon. friend is mistaken on that point. However, I will not get into an argument on it except to say that under the present supply procedures, patterned basically upon the British system, we send the estimates to the standing committees, rightly or wrongly, and there they are examined, witnesses and ministers are called and individuals present briefs. Many hours are spent on the examination of the estimates. Then they are reported to the House.

It is true that when the guillotine falls it seems appalling that billions of dollars must go through when the Chairman of the committee of the whole House calls the clauses and schedules without debate, but behind that scene—which the right hon. gentleman described as awful—is the enormous amount of study and investigation that took place before. Is it good, or is it bad? I think that is the subject that must be studied.

The hon. member for Peace River mentioned the other day the possibility of bringing some estimates into a committee of the whole. I think that could be examined by the standing committee, because I believe it was beneficial to have had the supply bill for $1.3 billion before the House and before the committee of the whole. I think it provided an excellent debate. It provided hand-to-hand fighting between the opposition and the government, and that is very healthy.

I have not discussed this with anybody else, and I speak only for myself, but I believe that is an aspect that should be considered, namely, whether we should not, with the proper safeguards and maintaining the predictability and the certainty that supply will be granted at certain intervals and the vote will be taken, be given some opportunity under carefully worked out safeguards to debate the estimates in a committee of the whole.

That was one of the issues raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) in December, 1968. The most dedicated advocate of the new supply procedures in that debate was the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre who concluded, based upon his experience and the studies in the United Kingdom, as did the government, that this was an improvement. It was a real improvement, in my opinion. But it could be further refined to meet the requirement of examination of estimates in a committee of the whole.

I would like to say a few words about the operation of the committee system. It could be said, with regard to the operation of the committee system, that more changes have been made in the format and the role of House of Commons committees in the past decade than in all the preceding years combined. Beginning in 1962 and culminating in the extensive reorganization of 1968, the committees have taken over more and more of the responsibilities which previously belonged to the House of Commons as a whole.

The rationale of our committee system is fairly straightforward. The committee system allows us to break down the membership of a large group for the sake of efficiency. It allows us to sort our parliamentary workload into more manageable parcels of detail, and it allows members to develop a greater degree of specialization in particular areas of interest. That is the theory, at least.

Hon. members who have been here for the past several years will be aware of the evolution, or perhaps revolution, of our committee system since the early 1960s, but perhaps for new members—there are quite a number of them in the House—I might be able to say a word or two about the major changes that have taken place. The main one, of course, is the requirement that all estimates and all bills, except for budgetary items, be referred to an appropriate committee for detailed study unless the House orders otherwise.

For example, in the last parliament we ordered that a number of bills—I believe the public order bill, and certainly the government reorganization bill—be examined in committee of the whole. Prior to that it was up to the government of the day to decide whether, and when, estimates should go to standing committees. At the same time, the number of standing committees was increased from 14 to 21, and the twenty-second was added in the last session. The average membership was cut in half, from 40 members per committee to about 20.

Another major change was the procedure in changing the membership of committees. Prior to 1968 that was a relatively rigid procedure. Today it happens quickly. You notify the whip and the clerk of the committee, and suddenly you could have a brand new committee.

• (1600)

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The taxi squads.

Mr. MacEachen: I would suggest that the procedure committee may want to look at our substitution system to see whether we have exchanged an overdose of rigidity by an overdose of flexibility.

I think it is fair to say that in practice the amount of material referred to standing committees, apart from estimates and legislation, has increased substantially. There seems to be no end to the appetite to send more things to the standing committees. Whether it be members or ministers, it seems that a standing committee is the outlet, forgetting all the while that the time of Members of Parliament is at a premium and that at present the committee system is overloaded.

Virtually all standing committees, in the course of the previous and current parliaments, have had subject matters of substantial significance and public interest referred to them. We have had committees studying such things as the televising of House proceedings, the question of aboriginal rights, our northern waters' icebreaking services, veterans' pensions and services, tax reform, external affairs and defence policies, regional transportation services, the role and responsibilities of the Auditor General and his department, the question of bilingualism in the public service, election expenses, plus literally dozens of others, major and minor.

Mr. Baldwin: You missed the Happy Hooker.

Mr. MacEachen: I do not think that anyone, particularly any member who was here prior to the 1965-68 changes, will question the motives behind those changes. Parliament acted with the best intentions and in the sincere belief that what we were doing would strengthen our system and add to the ability of members to do a more effective job.

Mr. Woolliams: Would the minister permit a question? He has given an intelligent summary of what happened previously, but would he not agree that when the changes were made in 1968 there was some political motivation behind them, particularly because at that time there was a majority government, just as we in this party had at one time? Would he not agree that some of the weaknesses in the rules may be showing up in the new atmosphere of a minority government? I think he should weigh that point.

Mr. MacEachen: The point is a valid one. The problem is a different one in a minority government. Some of the points I will put on the record. Some of the information I have here was collected long before this debate, because this was a matter of concern to me before the end of the twenty-eighth parliament. I believe that some of the things I will mention will indicate how dramatically we have changed the committee procedures. It may be that experience will have shown that we have gone a bit too far, and that perhaps we have not gone far enough in other directions. Certainly the increase in the number of committees, as well as the growth in business transacted by committees, places a very heavy burden on Members of Parliament.

It might be of interest to note that in the second session of the twenty-eighth parliament, committees held 759 regular meetings at which legislation, estimates and other matters referred to them by parliament were examined. Contrast this with the second session of the preceding parliament, the twenty-seventh parliament, when the figure was 218. The increase in the number of meetings is in the neighbourhood of 300 per cent.

If we calculate these statistics in hours and relate them to the number of days on which the House sat, the result is even more dramatic. In the two sessions of the twenty-seventh parliament the House sat for 405 days and committees sat for a total of 1,450 hours, approximately—an average of 3½ hours of committee meetings for every day that the House sat. In the first two sessions of the twenty-eighth parliament the House sat for 353 days and committees sat for approximately 3,000 hours. This works out to an average of 8½ hours of committee meetings for every day that the House sat. As a matter of interest, I might note that in the last two sessions of the previous parliament the House sat for 335 days and our committees logged 2,175 hours, for an average of 6½ hours for every day the House sat.

So far this session committees are sitting an average of two hours for every day the House sits, which is a pretty high ratio for the beginning of a session when only a few committees are operating. A similar pattern is shown for committee attendances. In the second session of the twenty-seventh parliament there were 3,105 committee attendances by hon. members, and by the second session of the twenty-eighth parliament this had increased to 9,909.

I said earlier that the new committee system places a particularly heavy onus on members. It places an even heavier onus on government members, more so than on non-government members and for understandable reasons. If committee attendance is down and business cannot get under way, that deficiency reflects more upon the government than it does upon the opposition. Regardless of which government has been in office, this has been the case. This government has been in office during the new committee regime and the heavier onus is upon government members, particularly government backbenchers who, with opposition members, are the real workhorses of the committee system.

I will not complain about the present situation. We are facing it as well as we can in manning committees with government members. When ministers, because of other meetings, are not able to sit on standing committees, government members have to carry an extra burden. I will not go into the statistics, but if one examines the attendance record of the last parliament you will see there is no question about it; government members had a very high attendance record, higher than any other group. That is because of the nature of the opposition, the nature of the House, the nature of the political process and for other reasons that I have mentioned.

Committee activity has increased. The volume of work has increased. We have to ask ourselves whether this increased activity on the part of the committee system has detracted from the image and impact of parliament itself. If the answer is yes, then do we want it that way? If it is no, then what do we do to remove some of the difficulties in the present committee system? I have the impression that not all of the changes have lightened the parliamentary load. In some cases they have duplicated the parliamentary load. I have one table here at least, Mr. Speaker, giving a summary comparison of committee activities in the second session of the twenty-seventh parliament and the second session of the twenty-eighth parliament. The figures I have already given show that the workload of committees has increased tremendously, as has the burden on private members.

There is no doubt, in my opinion, that that is one of the reasons why private members in the last parliament and in the present one have asked for greater assistance in their constituencies and in this House. It is because of the demands made upon their time in committees and in the House of Commons.

The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) has asked why I, as government House leader, allow committees to meet while the House is meeting, especially in committee of the whole. There is no way in which we can operate this system unless we permit committees to meet when the House is sitting. In the last session, seven or eight committees met while the House was sitting. I made it a rule that unless there was a desperate emergency, no more than four committees should sit while the House was sitting. This matter must be considered if we are to clear the estimates away and clear away our legislative program. Members not in the House are in committee, or in their offices working, or in their constituencies. That applies to most of them. There are faithful servants of parliament in this House, members who go to committees, who attend in the House and who really make this place live. I will come back to my point. We cannot avoid committees sitting when the House sits.

In the previous parliament we established, with the co-operation of other parties, a scheduling system that attempted to reduce, I think successfully, the number of conflicts that might arise, so that members could be given the opportunity of attending three or four committees without obvious conflict. We are proposing to re-establish that system during the present session. I have many ideas about how the committee system might be changed and improved and I hope at some point to be given the opportunity to make my view known to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization.

I have mentioned some of the problems that have arisen in the operation of our parliamentary system. There are many others. I believe that the work of the procedure and organization committee is of great importance. The work done by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the hon. member for Edmonton West and by others in renovating the rules was prodigious. They sat on subcommittees and brought together all the material and information that resulted in the system we have today. The system is not perfect but it is an improvement.

I hope the committee will take on the big job of doing justice to the items that Mr. Speaker has drawn to our attention. If it has more time, and an appetite for difficulties, it might take on the question of supply procedures and of the committee system. These, however, are very big problems indeed. I apologize to the House for the time I have taken and thank hon. members for paying such close attention to what I have said.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the government House leader with respect to one item that was extensively studied by the committee last year and referred to in this year's Speech from the Throne? I am talking about the whole matter of broadcasting the proceedings of the House and of committees. As the minister did not mention this item when cataloguing those things that the committee might deal with—perhaps his omission was wise—could he indicate, since this was such an important concern of the committee, particularly in its last year of activity in the previous parliament, when, how or in what way one might expect to see some action on this, bearing in mind the fragility of this parliament and the need for progress to be made on this important matter?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to answer that question. I was as disappointed as other members that we did not have an opportunity to deal with the report of the committee. I am proposing at some time to put on the order paper a motion to the effect that the House of Commons either agrees or disagrees with the televising of its proceedings. Once a decision is reached in principle, if it is favourable the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization can come to grips very quickly with the technical requirements. I hope that the standing committee will not deal again with the question of television unless a decision either pro or con has been reached by the House of Commons.

As soon as possible I should like to put this matter before the House and let the House decide whether it wants television in this chamber. If we decide that we do, I think it will be relatively easy for the committee to put the matter in a form that can be implemented readily. It is a complex issue. I realize that there are strong views on the question of television and not everybody behind me, I am sure, or in front of me agrees that it is a good idea to televise our proceedings.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a question? After referring the matter to the House, as he suggested, does the minister not think that we should allow a free vote on the question?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I have not discussed that with my colleagues, but I hope we would not make the matter of television in the House a matter of party discipline. The British House has dealt with the question a couple of times. I feel that every member should decide this for himself and then we will know where we stand on the matter.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The last time the question arose there the answer was a resounding no.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I thank the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) for his useful and interesting contribution. Speaking as a House leader, I may say that our relations have always been cordial and reasonable, unlike those I experienced before his elevation to this office. While I may say some unpleasant things about the government, I want to except the minister from those statements because in the very difficult hot-house sort of atmosphere in which the various House leaders live he has been very accommodating and reasonable. I extend the same remarks to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), limiting them, of course, to his capacity as House leader. I also extend them to the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) in the same context.

I will not deal with all the questions raised by the minister. Some of my colleagues will deal with certain aspects of the problem to which he referred, and other issues will be mentioned. Before continuing, I wish to refer briefly to the question period. The real problem with the question period stems from the obvious difficulties which the government has constructed for itself. I agree with the President of the Privy Council that during the question period we are not necessarily seeking factual information. During that period the adversary system under which this House operates comes to the fore. Those who suggest that the adversary system is passé should take a hard look at the structure of our society. For that reason, and for other reasons which the minister mentioned, the question period is the crowning jewel in the diadem of our parliamentary life. I admit that problems have been created during the question period and that members of opposition parties do not always ask questions which are consistent with the rules. However, the real difficulty—I say this genuinely—comes from the application by the government of the three "D's" in government answers: there is too much deception, deviousness and delay.

Your Honour may recall that back in 1958-59 the ministers of the day came to this House well prepared to answer questions. The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees), who was responsible for several important portfolios in the cabinet of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), always came to this House well briefed. There was hardly a question to which he did not have the answer. The answer did not necessarily satisfy the questioner, but at least he was aware of the subject and had part of the answer. The same cannot be said for members of this government. I suggest, as other hon. members have suggested, that ministers of the Crown in the present government enter the House unprepared to answer a question which must have been obvious, and incapable of giving an answer. The answer may not contain all the facts which may be asked for, but at least it should be adequate.

Time after time we hear the statement, "We will wait until we are able to find the information and the hon. member will be informed in due course." These are the characteristics of those on the treasury benches which drive members of the opposition to frustration, anger and cause them to perpetrate, sometimes unconsciously and certainly unwillingly, infractions of the rules with regard to the question period. That is all I am going to say about it. I think the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) will deal with this later. It is a very important part of our parliamentary life. It is the time when the government, under the full glare of the spotlight of publicity, must meet the challenge, scrutiny and questioning of hon. members from all sides of the House who have been sent here to deal with government problems, government delays and government prejudices.

I am sometimes taken aback by the calm assumption of so many people, including many Members of Parliament, as to the sacrosanct quality and irreversible nature of the democratic process and rule of law as if having once achieved these things, sometimes by force, they will never be lost or even diminished, that the present eclipse of parliament and its function is merely temporary. These are dangerous assumptions to make. Those who believe in them are living in a fool's paradise. The human race has taken over half a million years to achieve the present position, and democratic institutions are 100 or 200 years old. This is certainly not a very long time in the context of the history of mankind, certainly not long enough to have become part of the bloodstream and nerve centre of social evolution.

This very delicate and fragile institution is under continuous attack from executive government. The ever-hungry, monolithic monster of bureaucracy keeps chewing away at the few rights which remain to parliament, and on these they are receiving the very loyal and enthusiastic support of the elected branch of the executive, the cabinet. Certainly this is the case in Canada.

I could not do better than chronicle some of the highlights of this session's activities as a litany of the incidents of use or abuse of the executive power, uses that have caught the attention of this House over the past two months. There is the Vietnamese situation wherein the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) calmly asserted that parliament may be given some very brief and innocuous right of discussion long after the event. He refused to bring back for discussion and decision the motion launched under his name.

There is also the matter of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. There is the question of not only the deprivation of the right of scrutiny of this House by taking away certain changes in this legislation, but what we see going on day after day and what has been the subject of a very searching and intelligent cross-examination today as to the kind of rules and changes which are being made at the whim of the minister.

There are serious problems regarding unemployment insurance. I know that the government faces some of those. Why in heaven's name does the government not seize the nettle, bring the question into this House and let the House decide? We are the people who have been elected by our constituents all over Canada. We know what will be the impact of programs of this kind and of changes that are envisaged. Let this House look at the situation and decide.

The department of immigration has given away hundreds of millions of dollars to LIP and OFY programs which are sanctioned and spent without one bit of approval by this House until long after the event. With regard to the auto pact, all we are able to do is contained in the question period with the not-so-artful dodging of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie). Hundreds of millions of dollars are being spent, and if we include the provincial contribution it is probably billions of dollars, on the construction of airports for which this parliament is not asked for one bit of advice. There is the James Bay project, which engaged the attention of the House today, and other matters.

These indicate beyond any doubt what is happening. They demonstrate the means employed by this government to downgrade, bypass, ignore or overrun the legislature. In each instance it is an example of the mishandling of arbitrary executive authority to create or intensify problems. This is not only happening in Canada. In the United States today, the President is locked in a conflict with Congress as to appropriations. There were the problems with regard to the Viet Nam war, the resolution following the Bay of Tonkin incident and the powers given to the President at that time. We are not isolated in these instances, although we have a government composed of people who have become very skilful in their adoption of these executive powers.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

It would be bad enough to surrender more and more power to the government even where the exercise of these powers results in greater efficiency and brings benefits to the people who are ruled, but such is not the case, certainly not in Canada where we see misrule, inefficiency and incompetence grow in direct proportion to the increase in authoritarianism. This debate is an opportunity for members of the House to dig in their heels and say, "Enough!"

This minority government seemed to give us one last chance to regain some of the rights which had been wrenched away, but in light of the conduct of my friends in the New Democratic Party, I am beginning to wonder. I say as rationally as I can and quite objectively, it is becoming quite clear that we do not have a minority government in this House. We have an actual, practising coalition, so much so that I sincerely wonder about the right that may well be asserted by the New Democratic Party to move a motion on an allotted opposition day. I point out to members of this House that under the Standing Orders, this right is reserved to those who are, and I quote, "in opposition to the government". There is a strong reason to suspect, and certainly Your Honour can take judicial notice of this, that the members of the New Democratic Party are anything but in opposition to the government.

I have heard it said by both the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and by the leader of the New Democratic Party that they are going to try to make parliament work. I welcome this statement. I try to believe it. I work hard at believing it. However, having observed these distinguished gentlemen in action, I have my doubts. Making parliament work for them seems to have a very different meaning than it has for me and most members of this House. For the Prime Minister it means making it work in such a way that he can look in the mirror every day and ask, "Mirror, mirror on the wall, am I still the biggest of them all?" then come here and take his place in the Prime Minister's seat. For the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) it is not quite as satisfactory. For him, making parliament work means his ability to come into the House every day, look at the Prime Minister sitting in his seat and say to himself, "There, by the grace of David Lewis, sits Pierre Elliott Trudeau." The more I watch these two distinguished members of this House—I say this with due apology to both of them—the more I notice how much they resemble each other.

The fact of the matter is, there has developed a sort of collusive understanding to deny to the Progressive Conservative party, Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, all real opportunity to have any point of view accepted by the House. The events of the last few weeks have demonstrated this to be the case beyond any shadow of doubt. So much so, indeed, that if our party were to put forward a motion proposing a revision of the prayer with which the proceedings of this House open, I anticipate that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) and the leader of the New Democratic Party would rise in their places and scream that this, too, indicated a lust for power in our ranks.

Despite these misgivings, I have the duty to put before the House for the consideration of the committee on procedure some views with respect to what might be examined by the committee, on what should be done and on what course might be taken with regard to this motion. Certainly I agree with the President of the Privy Council that the whole question of supply and of opposition days as related to the consideration of departmental estimates ought to be closely examined in light of the experience of the last four or five years. This experience demonstrates beyond any reasonable doubt that committees can never be a substitute or an alternative for the House of Commons. They must be ancilliary to rather than in substitution for this chamber.

I do not say that committees cannot be used as an excellent means of providing an occasion for the examination of witnesses, of hearing evidence from ministers and from senior officials, of allowing the presentation of briefs by interested citizens throughout the country, because they are valuable means of obtaining the views of representatives of sectors of the public affected by issues which demand parliamentary attention. These things simply cannot be done in the House itself. Committees, used in the way I have described, are extremely effective in conjunction with the operation of the Commons.

I have already suggested, however, that the right should be reserved to this House, either in committee of the whole or through the revival, in a limited way, of the committee of supply, to deal with several departments of government, those departments to be selected by the opposition. The leader of the House has been good enough to indicate some acceptance of this view, subject, I agree, to certain safeguards as to the time to be taken and the manner of the proceedings. I should like to make a firm suggestion to the President of the Privy Council right now. We would not be unwilling to agree, as an experiment, during this session, even while the standing committee on procedure is considering the matter, to allocate some of the opposition days during which the estimates of several departments might be examined. Hon. members to my left, as well as members of the Créditiste party, might agree to co-operate, and maybe one or two government days could be made available for this purpose.

The committee on procedure would then have an opportunity to examine the experiment actually in progress and be in a better position to bring proposals back to the House. The government has nothing to lose by accepting a proposition of this kind. It might be a useful way of coming to grips with this question. I agree with the minister that there has been a good deal of misunderstanding shown in the media and elsewhere as to the manner in which the present rules apply. Among the most important functions of this House is the granting of supplies of money to government to enable it to carry out its programs and operations. It is at this point that the right of the opposition to voice grievances and seek redress is available to hon. members. But these opposition days upon which such grievances can be raised are not chosen by us. They are granted by the government. The government has every right to say to us: You will take this day, or that day. It is true that the minister has done his best to be accommodating, but the government has the right to say to the opposition: These are the days on which you will bring forward your motions.

The problem too often arises that on those particular days reports are not yet forthcoming from committees examining the estimates. For example, the estimates are just going before the committees, now. It might well be that intelligent and hard working opposition members will ascertain, having followed the evidence and cross-examination of witnesses in those committees, that there are certain aspects of the estimates which might well be the subject of an opposition day. But this is not an opportunity which is presented to us at the present time. One of the steps which might be taken is this: the days might be fixed by the government in consultation with the opposition so that at least we should be able, from time to time, to indicate much more strongly than at present that we have certain views of our own as to what days should be selected.

We moved a motion last Monday and we moved a motion yesterday, not necessarily because we wanted those particular days but because those days had been chosen by the government. The choice of subject matter was ours, of course. When the Minister of Finance was dealing with the motion yesterday he was, in my opinion, guilty of the most nauseating and juvenile hypocrisy when he suggested we were taking up the time of the House improperly by dealing with the motion and, in effect, preventing the House from attending to other matters.

Mr. Speaker, we were debating that motion yesterday because the government had directed that yesterday was a day upon which we would be able to bring down a motion on an opposition day. The reason is plain. Two or three days ago the government introduced supplementary estimates. Those estimates must be passed by the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates and reported to the House. Only after this has been done can there be an appropriation bill voting supply to the government. Considering the course on which we are now launched, this cannot be done until the last of the seven opposition days has gone by. So the government must ensure that those seven days are taken before the end of March, perhaps even earlier than March 26, if my recollection is correct, bearing in mind that the appropriation bill must go to the Senate, and one never knows how long the other place will take to consider a bill dealing with estimates.

I will go further. Let us admit it, on many of the opposition days when motions have been put down which do not involve the question of confidence, no matter how entertaining the subject matter, no matter how effective the debate, no matter what status is enjoyed by the hon. members who participate, by the time three speeches have been made all interest peters out. There have been one or two exceptions, but that is our experience. Interest falls off, not only among those whose duty it is, or should be, to report these proceedings, but among many hon. members as well.

I should like to suggest to the committee on procedure that consideration is given to making it possible for there to be a vote at the end of each of the opposition days. I do not suggest that each one of these will be a non-confidence motion. I am in definite agreement that there must be some limitation in that regard. But I do suggest that if there were to be a vote with respect to each of these opposition days, it would permit all members—that is, all members genuinely in opposition to the government—to bring down motions and compel the House to divide on the issue.

As I have pointed out, this need not involve the question of confidence. It may well be that some of them will be passed. However, I think it would present an opportunity that does not exist now and would raise these opposition days' discussions to a level they do not possess at the present time. I realize there are some practical difficulties, but it would do a lot to improve interest. I hope the committee will look at that issue.

Another issue is one we have discussed in the House but which has never erupted openly. I refer to what we in this party assert is the sole prerogative of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, namely, to introduce motions of non-confidence. This results from the procedure which was adopted on supply days. If there is to be a motion of non-confidence, I submit with respect it is the prerogative of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition to so move. This leaves the other opposition parties quite free to move amendments. This was the procedure adopted when we had supply motions and it worked very effectively and was satisfactory to all parties. I hope that the committee on procedure will take a look at this matter as well.

The matter of supply relates directly to problems that have been experienced in the operation of the committees. The minister recognized this during the course of his speech and some of my colleagues will have more to say on the matter. There is no doubt at all that our experiences over the last few years have not been happy ones. For example, there are questions such as the size of committees, the number of members and committees, the chairmanship of committees, areas of responsibility, the right to make reports, the right of debating and dealing with reports, and the opportunity to come to a firm decision in the House on such reports rather than have them expire on the order paper as is now the case.

Once a motion to adopt a report has been debated for one day, it becomes a government order and it is only at the option of the government that it can be revived. This is a highly unsatisfactory system, one that is most frustrating to members who have a keen interest in the subject matter. I think it should not be possible for the government to frustrate and to deprive the members of the House who have served on the committee in question of the chance to have the House debate the committee report to a conclusion so a decision may be arrived at.

I should like to make a strong suggestion regarding a new facet of the committee system. I would suggest that the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization collaborate with the Joint Standing Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments with a view to building up a jurisprudence for the operation of that committee. In my opinion, this joint committee could well become, depending upon the wisdom of the members who compose the committee from both places, the chairmanship of the committee and the tolerance of and assistance given by members of this House and the other place, the most important committee in this parliament.

However, some rules will have to be laid down, and probably introduced into the Standing Orders of this House and of the other place, permitting the joint committee once it gets underway to bring into the House for debate from time to time some of its reports, views and recommendations regarding its review of government by order in council and decree. There will have to be some way by which parliament, and certainly this House, can under certain circumstances have a power of review, with even a power of amendment if necessary and of disallowance where it has been established that there have been abuses by government when it proceeds to govern by way of decree, order in council and regulation.

I should now like to make a few proposals regarding the rights of private members. I do not think there is any doubt that there is a great deal of frustration and unhappiness on the part of private members, particularly the new members, with regard to the limited extent that they are able to debate to the point of decision in the House measures and proposals that they put forward in the form of private members' public bills or notices of motions. I say this recognizing, of course, that there must always rest with the government in the main the right to initiate legislative and spending proposals.

Under the constitution and in accordance with the practice that has been built up in this House, we have the safeguard that no member of the House other than a minister of the Crown can introduce measures which have any monetary consequences. In order to comply with the constitution and the practice of the House, there must be a recommendation by the Crown in this regard. So I suggest there would be no harm done if private members' public bills were allowed to come to a decision. The difficulty is, of course, as the minister said, finding the time. I suggest we can find means to permit, at least in some number, private members' public bills being debated to the point of decision. I think we should get away from the involuntary hypocrisy, the frustration and fraud that exists in the House today—through no one's fault—because of the practices that have been built up.

I think this can be done in such a way as not to deprive the government of the time it requires to transact government business. My view has been, at least over the last two years, that taking the hour between 5 and 6 p.m. for private members' business often results in a loss of time. I can think of innumerable occasions when the House was debating a government measure, every opportunity for debate had about been exhausted, and where I am convinced that had the debate continued until six o'clock it would have been concluded and the question put or the bill passed without question.

I suggest that the committee give some consideration to retaining the hour between five and six o'clock for government business and that private members' hour be taken either from 7.30 to nine o'clock or from 9.30 to 11 p.m., giving an hour and a half instead of the hour as at present. I must say at this point that I think there has to be some kind of limitation on the number of private members' public bills that are in fact introduced. I am not going to deal with this arbitrarily or lay down any specific number, but I do think that this business of one member putting down 30, 40 or 50 bills in the hope that he may—

Mr. Lefebvre: There is already an agreement on that matter.

Mr. Baldwin: I recognize that, but I should also like to see in the rules some limit placed on the number of bills. Then I propose that there be a ballot for, say, 20 bills. Or better still, we could follow the British and, I think, the Australian practice and have a ballot for 20 members. Those who were successful in the draw would receive a certain priority on the clear understanding, through a change in the Standing Orders, that the bills that they see fit to introduce would, within the one and a half hour period devoted to private members' public business, be brought to a clear decision. All questions would have to be put within that hour and a half so that second reading would be completed.

I now go beyond that, Mr. Speaker. I would assume that these bills would go to a committee where some would fall by the wayside. I would not expect that those 20 bills would pass the acid test of committee approval. A fair guess would be that ten might emerge from the committee. Then ten days should be provided for another draw when the private members' public bills which were completed in the committee would be brought into the House for report stage and third reading.

This would mean that over the course of the average parliament of four sessions, we might well see anywhere from 20 to 35 private members' public bills pass this House at all stages. I do not know what would happen to them in the other place. I have every reason to believe this would be of great inspiration and would do a great deal, not only for private members but for the people in the country who delegate their members to bring forward certain issues in an attempt to obtain remedial legislation. No one would suffer and the government would lose no time, as I have worked this out. Some hon. members would be compelled to sit additional hours from time to time. I do not suggest this should be every day, but I put it forward in the hope that the committee will look at my suggestion.

I am going to direct my attention now to one more question before I sit down. In doing so, I am not in any sense underrating the other issues which have been referred to in the terms of reference. Other hon. members will deal with them. I would point out that there is available, through the courtesy of the Chair, a direction in the terms of reference, if one goes behind it, to the time and place in Hansard where these issues were discussed. That is a starting point when the committee considers these other issues.

I want to deal with the question of reasoned amendments. I am particularly concerned about this, because of the nature and the type of legislation which is now brought forward by governments. In the earlier days, when the precedents in respect of reasoned amendments were laid down, an examination of the kind of bill then brought forward would show a rather simple measure with a clearly defined principle, in this country and elsewhere, and it was easy to say that this was the principle involved, have a debate on second reading and when the legislature passed or rejected the measure it was dealing with a clearcut and discernible principle. That is not the case today. Today, virtually all legislative bills are composite and deal with a number of subject matters which are complex and frequently highly technical in nature. Virtually all include very large regulation-granting sections. It is just impossible to say in respect of most of these bills that there is only one principle involved.

I do not wish to take up the time of the House, because one need only go down the index of statutes to see the kind of legislation that is deemed necessary today to introduce to this House. For that reason I have sought, together with some of my colleagues in all opposition parties, over the last few years to move the type of reasoned amendment which would permit a division in the House on second reading beyond the simple yea or nay limitation which is now being inflicted upon us, the motion for six months' hoist or the other motion which can be moved in referring the subject matter to a committee.

I am sure it will not have escaped the attention of the Chair, as it has not escaped my attention and the attention of my colleagues in all opposition parties, that this has been done and that the Chair has so far both determinedly and successfully been able to resist our efforts to put forward reasoned amendments of the type frequently accepted in the United Kingdom. Yet the anomaly, Mr. Speaker, is that the precedents in Erskine May's which have been preserved and brought forward into Beauchesne's are precisely the same precedents which today exist in England.

I have put on the record here on a number of occasions a dozen or more illustrations of amendments of the type which have been moved and accepted in the United Kingdom, yet attempts to move similar motions here have been rejected. Frequently the government has resorted to what I call the nit-picking rule. I say with regret that such arguments have been too often accepted by the Chair in rejecting these amendments.

The plain fact is that many bills introduced in this House deal with a number of subjects and in many instances we accept particular parts as being proposals that are necessary, essential and good for the country, our constituencies and the economy; but the bills often contain other measures which are repugnant, do nothing for the country and to which we object. What is the House to do on second reading, in that event? If we are limited to the simple procedures I have detailed to the House, we must accept or reject the entire bill. If we reject it, then we reject some proposals we find quite acceptable. If we accept it, we include in it certain proposals which we do not like and feel should not be included.

The reasoned amendments which are put in the United Kingdom so often—I have placed these on the record of this House—usually say that while accepting the principle, or the need to do certain things, the House rejects other aspects, philosophies or principles of the bill. These amendments are very simply worded and permit the House to have an interesting and informative debate on a particular issue, and they permit the opposition party or a member of the government to compel the House to divide on the issue.

I would therefore ask the standing committee which will look into this matter very seriously to consider the question of reasoned amendments. There is just no way in which the House, asked to deal with the kind of detailed and complex legislative proposals which come before us, can cope with these on second reading. In fact, I should like to go further: I see no reason why we should not consider the proposition that second reading be limited only to reference to a committee. Why should there be a question of principle involved at all? Why not say second reading is merely the examination of a piece of legislation and an opportunity to debate it at first blush, with the only result being the passage of the motion and reference to the committee?

Under the procedures on the basis of which we operate today, it is only after a bill has gone to a standing committee, perhaps been amended, and comes back to the House for the report stage and third reading that this House sees the final form completely before it and completely exposed. At that time, of course, there is no escape and hon. members must divide on the issue if they see fit. I would suggest that the committee might very seriously consider recommending that second reading be relegated to a much less important phase of the legislative process than is the case today.

Before I leave that matter there is a related aspect which I should like to raise. It is probably not squarely within the terms of reference, but because we have had this dispute in a good humoured way between the Chair and hon. members it seems to me there should be some way in which the House might, where there is a continuing division of opinion between the Chair and hon. members, be provided an opportunity, without going through the process of recommendations from the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization, to obtain the views of members of the House. By this I mean that the last substantive rule changes of any consequence were made in 1968, and we are now in the year 1973.

I would like to think that even if an election should intervene, the deliberations of this committee would be forwarded on to the committee which will be established in the next parliament. It may well be a year and a half from now before any rule changes have been recommended by the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization and have become part of the operative conduct of this House. There is a very simple procedure which I would hope might be used. I want to make abundantly clear that I am not suggesting that we revert to the old practice of appeals to rulings of the Speaker. However, I believe there is a very simple way to make use of the device of a stated case. If we do not do this, I think there is a danger from the procedural aspect because the House might become locked in positions of absolute inflexibility, which is not a good thing.

If an issue should arise it might be that the Chair itself might direct a stated case. It may be that a minimum number of members would be required to give a reply, but the process of a stated case would be that the Chair would state the facts, the statutes and the precedents which prompted the Chair to give a decision, and there would be limited debate. On that basis I think there would be a freshness and vitality in our proceedings which seem to be lacking at the present time. In this way there would be guidance to the Chair in respect of making decisions and giving rulings on this aspect.

This has been a limited contribution, although I am afraid it has been long as to time. This is one of the difficulties in this House. As the President of the Privy Council pointed out, there is so much to do and so little time in which to do it. The government might give consideration to the idea of a new calendar which would provide 15 months and 36 hours in each day.

I come now to a proposition I have previously put forward in this House. I agree with those who say that this is not a House of perfection. I would like to add that I hope it never will be. We are here to serve as a mirror for the hopes, aspirations, fears and anxieties of the people we represent. We are these people, warts and all, with their defects as well as their genius. Despite that, there is far more hope to be found in the House of Commons, with all its imperfections, comprised as it is of men and women who are in continuous and daily contact with the people in their constituencies in all parts of Canada, than in all the ivory palaces of the bureaucracy filled with the theoreticians, the bureaucrats, the schemers and the fixers.

The problem we face, as always, in so arranging our rules of conduct in this House with due regard to the adversary system is that our debates and our decisions will truly reflect the demands of the aggregate of all our constituents in Canada, for within them lies the true, ultimate political wisdom.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Baldwin: Yes.

Mr. Jerome: Allowing that the considerations the hon. member has put forward in his brief intervention in this debate are valid considerations on behalf of opposition members, and allowing his suggestions in respect of expanding the privileges of opposition members when asking questions and in tabling amendments, as well as generally involving themselves in the proceedings of the House, and allowing for the fact that this would require an expansion of what already represents about 60 per cent of the time of the House being allowed to opposition members, would he feel that the committee might consider measures which would provide a counter-balancing reduction in other time and suggest the introduction of a new system of control over the time of debate on government measures?

Mr. Baldwin: I would not agree to such a program. The hon. member is incorrect in the assumption he made. I think he did so deliberately. My proposal in respect of private members' hour would be such that in fact no time would be lost to the government. If the hon. member would examine what I said, he would see that it is simply a question of moving the time and perhaps providing a little extra time after ten o'clock. It did not involve a reduction of the time the government presently has for government business.

Mr. Watson: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member accept another question?

Mr. Baldwin: Yes.

Mr. Watson: The hon. member during his speech this afternoon said that this House should look at programs in depth, such as the UIC, LIP and problems like the James Bay development. Presumably when he was talking about the House he was also talking about the committees of this House. The other day I made a suggestion in the House that we adopt the automatic referral to committee of all annual reports of the various departments and of the Crown corporations as a practice. I should like to ask the hon. member through you, Sir, what his reaction to that kind of suggestion would be.

Mr. Baldwin: I think it might well be a very good suggestion. I believe, in fact, that with certain safeguards it would probably be very useful. Certain matters could be presented before a committee at a much earlier stage than might otherwise be the case. I wish to correct the hon. member in respect of one statement he made concerning what I said about such things as the UIC, and so on.

My fear is that the government, by taking control of issues of this kind, could deprive parliament of the chance to deal with them and that therefore the democratic process would be pushed to a very dangerous stage. The great difficulty today in respect of the legislative process is that if one examines the statute books of this country, one will find that 60 per cent or 70 per cent of the statutes are amendments. The trouble—I think this applies to all provincial governments as well—is that there is incompetence, inability in respect of drafting amendments and an unwillingness to take into account legislative programs and spending proposals. This is what besets us today. Governments which are unable to contemplate these things and take unto themselves this power really place the democratic process in a very difficult position. That is the point I was trying to make.

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I rise with some trepidation this afternoon following such distinguished hon. members as the two House leaders who preceded me. I cannot rival them in experience and I certainly cannot rival them in eloquence. In addition, according to the rules of this House I cannot even rival them in length of time. I do not wish to detract from the contribution they made by mentioning the length of time they spoke, because I believe the information presented to us by the government House leader and the suggestions presented to us by the House leader of the Official Opposition will be of considerable use to the committee when it examines the procedures and organization of the House.

My party welcomes this opportunity to discuss procedure and organization. It is entirely appropriate that at least once in a parliament this House should take the time to examine its method of operation with a view to ensuring that we are capable of so ordering our business and our time that we are able to discharge our duty to the Canadian electorate with the greatest possible efficiency and effectiveness.

I use the word "efficiency" with some reluctance because all too often critics of parliament tend to base their assessment of its efficiency upon criteria which are better suited to time, speed and motion studies in industry than to a legislative body. Parliament should not be viewed as some kind of legislative assembly line producing bill after bill and the only judgment made upon its efficiency being the time it takes to complete the process. Rather, parliament's efficiency in terms of legislation should be judged upon the degree to which opportunity is given for the various views within the country to be expressed and considered, the degree to which items before the House relate to the needs and desires of the people of the country, needs and desires both real and imagined, and the degree to which the resulting legislation satisfies those needs and desires.

I would hope that in its re-examination of our rules and procedures, the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization will take considerable pains to ensure that its work is based upon a realistic assessment of the current role of individual members and a realistic appraisal of what we can legitimately expect the legislative assembly to accomplish in today's positive state, rather than upon theoretical expressions of the role of the legislature and its members or upon a nostalgic desire to return to the good old days or to some golden age of parliamentary democracy which probably has never existed in any case.

Traditionally, the role of the legislature has been to devise laws for the governing of the country, to decide upon means of raising the revenue necessary to implement those laws, and to supervise expenditure in order to ensure that money is spent in a way desired by the legislature. Traditionally, also, the legislature was to provide a means of redress of grievance for citizens adversely affected by the state.

In a modern state, because of the multiplicity of its interests and the highly technical considerations involved in meeting those interests, initiative in three of the four areas mentioned above—legislation, taxation and supervision of expenditures—has gravitated almost naturally into the hands of the executive, the cabinet and the bureaucracy which serves it. I doubt very much that we could operate effectively as government were the situation otherwise. Thus, a realistic assessment of the potentiality of the legislature would seem to be that it be able to offer advice to the executive in each of these three areas—legislation, taxation and supervision of expenditures—advice which would, hopefully, be listened to by the government, and that in addition the legislature be able to effectively hold the government accountable for governmental action.

It is in this sense of accountability that I believe parliament should exert its control of the executive. Bernard Crick in his book "The Reform of Parliament" had this to say about parliamentary control:

> The only meanings of parliamentary control worth considering, and worth the House spending much of its time on are those which do not threaten the parliamentary defeat of a government, but which help to keep it responsive to the underlying currents and the more important drifts of public opinion. All others are purely antiquarian shufflings. It is wholly legitimate for any modern government to do what it needs to guard against parliamentary defeat; but it is not legitimate for it to hinder parliament, particularly the opposition, from reaching the public ears effectively as it can. Governments must govern in the expectation that they can serve out their statutory period of office, that they can plan—if they choose—at least that far ahead, but that everything they do may be exposed to the light of day and that everything they say may be challenged in circumstances designed to make criticism as authoritative, informed and as public as possible.

Thus, I would like to assert that in looking over rules and procedures in the House the standing committee should dedicate its efforts to ensuring that parliamentary control of the sort mentioned by Bernard Crick in that passage is possible. Similar considerations apply to the individual member. His traditional role was to devise policy for the government of the country, to decide upon means of raising revenue and to supervise expenditures. Those were considered to be his major duties and they were expected to occupy the bulk of his time in this institution.

Therefore, the procedures and the organization and the services provided to members were designed to assist them in fulfilling those specific roles. Moreover, the services, organization and procedures were to a large extent determined in a period when the House dealt with matters lacking the complexity of the issues with which the House is obliged to deal today. The role of the member has changed. More and more of the member's time is devoted to assisting individual constituents with their problems, and this fact must be acknowledged when changes in services and rules of procedure and organization are contemplated by the standing committee.

With that sort of general approach as background to my remarks, I would like to offer some fairly precisely defined suggestions for the consideration of the standing committee, suggestions which I believe would greatly assist this chamber and its individual members effectively to discharge their duties as currently defined by practice rather than theory.

First, following the line taken by the two previous speakers, I should like to take some time to look at the question period which is one of the greatest causes of frustration to all members of the House, I might add, especially to backbench members. This situation is extremely unfortunate because the question period is potentially one of the most effective means of exercising control over executive actions in the sense of bringing them to the light of day; it is also one of the most effective potential methods of securing redress of grievances.

It is my impression that over the past number of years the question period has developed into an occasion for a mini-debate which is invariably dominated by the front-bench members of all parties. It is no longer an occasion for eliciting information from the government or drawing to the attention of the government the adverse effects of their policies and the shortcomings in their administration of those policies on a broad range of issues.

Beyond that, the question period should be a much more effective vehicle than it is now for drawing to the attention of the government matters of national policy and the results of national policy which are of concern to individual members and their constituents. It is in this regard, with a view to increasing the number of potential participants in each question period and to increasing the variety of issues which might be raised in the House in any question period, that I would strongly urge the standing committee to give serious consideration to discovering a means of permitting Mr. Speaker to limit the number of supplementary questions permitted an individual member and the number of supplementary questions permitted on any given topic on any given day.

Another current cause of frustration for backbench members arising out of the current method of organizing our question period is that many questions are taken as notice by ministers. This is an entirely acceptable procedure, but its difficulty is that in order to ultimately obtain an answer to the question put, the member must utilize another occasion on which he must be successful in catching Mr. Speaker's eye to again pose the same question. In circumstances where the member cannot legitimately expect to catch Mr. Speaker's eye more than once or twice a week, if that, and where he may be interested in a good many more subjects than the one involved in his original question, he must forgo the opportunity to demonstrate his interest in additional areas of concern if he is to obtain an answer to the question asked in the first instance.

I would strongly urge that the practice be adopted of placing on the order paper any question taken as notice by a minister. It should be placed on the order paper as a starred question, and such starred questions should be considered as additional to the three starred questions which currently each hon. member, at any given time, is permitted to place on the order paper. Such a practice would ensure that members would obtain an answer without having to ask the same question repeatedly, and at the same time it would avoid the kind of problem which Mr. Speaker encounters when a minister, after answering a question, launches into a reply to another question asked several days previously, using the preface, "While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker—". I will not go further into the question period at this stage.

In the final analysis, the success of the question period depends on the wisdom and forebearance of the members of the House. It also depends upon their courtesy. One of the greatest handicaps to the question period being effective is the practice that is employed by a considerable number of members in all parties, raising spurious points of order and spurious points of privilege as vehicles for asking more supplementaries, or of raising another matter, all to the disadvantage of other members of the House. We need to be self-regulating in that regard. I would strongly urge the standing committee to study seriously the two specific suggestions which I have made.

Is is only slightly overdrawing the case to say that within the last 125 years we have gone full circle from legislatures being relatively weak advisers to and opposition for government to full legislative control and responsibility, and back again to the situation where a legislature is in fact of only peripheral importance in the governing of the nation.

Parliament stands in danger of becoming, as has the monarchy, a largely honorific element in the constitution. I make these remarks in no partisan sense. What has happened in Canada is happening throughout the world. The decline of the power of parliament in relation to the cabinet and to the first minister has been allowed to proceed as far as it has, in part because the process was neither the result of stated policy nor, for the most part, of conscious effort. The change is, rather, the result of innumerable individual decisions made on a pragmatic basis over a long period of time and as a consequence of two major developments—the growth in the scope of responsibility of the modern state and the marked strengthening of party discipline which has taken place since confederation.

Whatever the reasons for the change, whatever the reasons for the phenomenon of the decline in power of the legislative arm of government in relation to the executive arm, it is absolutely necessary for us to use every means at our disposal to attempt to halt the trend, if not reverse it. I make this assertion, not because of some antiquarian concern for the dignity of the House but, rather, because the more power becomes concentrated, the less responsive is the government to the felt needs of the people. I have no doubt that this very concentration of power is producing the current, entirely legitimate demands for "people power" in democratic states and is producing, as well, some of the less savoury aspects of that movement.

It is within this context that I wish to discuss some suggestions for change in our current committee system, which I hope will be considered by the standing committee, because I see the committee system as having the greatest immediate potential for beginning the process of re-establishing, in fact, the control of the executive by the legislature or, to put it another way, of ensuring the responsibility and accountability of the cabinet to parliament. Our present committee system was set up in 1965 on a trial basis and was given formal approval by the House in December, 1968. The committee system, I think I can assert without fear of contradiction, has not worked quite as we had hoped it would. I think I can also assert without fear of contradiction that the time has come to give it a thorough re-examination. In establishing the committee system, parliament gave up a number of its more effective controls over executive powers, such as the study of estimates in committee of the whole, at which time grievances could be raised with the government with some effect. We have lost that control and the committee system has not replaced it with another equally effective method of control.

Parliament's power to supervise has declined because of the increasing demands being made on its time, and because its members are representative men and women best equipped to deal with general principles, broad objectives and fundamental issues. It is not a technical body. When it comes to dealing with technical legislation there exists a substantial information gap between the private member and the cabinet minister. Cabinet ministers can draw upon the talents and resources of the legions of public service experts, which the cabinet controls, for necessary information in any field. With rare exceptions, such as the audit office, parliament can call upon no such able assistance. The result is that debates in the House tend to be rather unequal and the ability of parliament to assess adequately and scrutinize every government action is severely reduced.

Committees would have the potential to remedy this situation if their memberships were more stable. I believe this is something to which the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) referred. In other words, if Members of Parliament remained on a given committee for a longer period of time, were not shuffled about so frequently, and if there were periodic adjournments of the House for the purpose of enabling committees to do their work, they could help remedy this situation. With respect to periodic adjournments of the House in order to allocate time to committee work, a number of different systems have been suggested. I will not go into them now, Mr. Speaker. They are known to the members of the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. I simply content myself with saying the committee would be well advised to seek the most satisfactory means of providing committees with the time they need to do their work properly without the interference of other duties, such as attendance in this chamber.

It is with the same end in view, that of enhancing the ability of committees to reduce the information gap between parliament and government, that I would recommend that committees be provided with adequate staff support. I refer especially to research staff who would possess the expert knowledge necessary to assist Members of Parliament in preparing themselves for their various committee duties. The value of such staff has been made manifestly obvious in the case of external affairs and national defence by the work of Mr. Peter Dobel and the parliamentary research centre. I would strongly urge the standing committee to examine the relationship of Mr. Dobel to that particular committee with a view to seeing if similar principles could be applied to other committees of the House.

There is a problem in deciding whether such staff should be permanent of rotating, assigned to a single committee or moved from committee to committee as required, whether the research staff should be the creature of the House or whether it should be of a semi-autonomous nature as is the case with the parliamentary research centre. I tend to opt for a permanent staff with some degree of autonomy, but the point is that able research staff is urgently required by committees. That is the point I wish to establish at this time, and I hope the standing committee will examine it during its deliberations.

A related suggestion is that a standing committee be permitted, as a matter of course, to act as a committee of inquiry. For example, I see no reason why the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, in the situation now confronting the nation, should not find it to be a normal part of its duties to inquire into the relationship between inflation and unemployment, or into the possible effects of the American DISC program upon our economy and, accordingly, make appropriate policy recommendations in these fields. Such a development would have two major beneficial effects, the first of better equipping parliament to assess government policy decisions in these areas by having committees engage in fundamental research work and, secondly, of providing government with the advice of Members of Parliament who, while they might not possess in all cases, in fact usually never possess, the same technical competence as the government's expert advisers, can present their advice from the point of view of persons representing constituents, persons who must be responsible to the electorate.

There would be no necessity, in keeping with the traditions of the parliamentary system, for a government to implement policy recommendations presented by a committee. But at least the committee should have the power to make suggestions to the government, and the government should present some response to the committee. That does not happen at the moment.

We must also seek ways and means to make it impossible for a government to ignore the recommendations of a committee. To this end, the standing committee should give consideration to the proposition that it should be made mandatory for a motion of concurrence to be moved in connection with all committee reports and that such a motion shall be deemed to be debatable. This would provide two salutory effects: first, the recommendations of the committee would be aired in public; second, if concurrence were granted, the government would be forced to explain its reasons for failing to act upon a recommendation of the committee. It would have to pay more attention to what the committee did.

Obviously, this suggestion poses problems with regard to the time of the House. Some means would have to be discovered for limiting debate. Perhaps a Standing Order could provide that only a certain number of reports could be debated in a session or, more likely, an over-all time limit for such debates could be established and the opposition given the choice of which reports to debate within that time. Perhaps more allotted days could be granted, with the express purpose of such debates in mind. Once again, Mr. Speaker, the actual technique decided upon does not concern me at this stage so much as the principle. I am willing to trust the wisdom of the standing committee and let it go into the details as to how such a device might be established. However, I think it is necessary.

I also wish to suggest that in order to strengthen the impact of committee reports, committees be required to prepare at the end of each session a running record, covering previous sessions as well, of the recommendations it has made to the government and the action the government has taken on those recommendations. Such a record could be a powerful weapon in the hands of individual Members of Parliament determined to make the government take some account of the work done in committees. If, for example, over a period a committee made 27 recommendations and the government did not do anything about them, the government's failure to act could be devastating ammunition in the hands of opposition members.

The idea is not original. It is derived from the practice of the British public accounts committee which each year prepares an epitome of proposals. It is also the practice in Westminster that after a committee makes a recommendation the ministry, not long after, provides that committee with a response to that recommendation. In addition, the committee is informed of any action that the minister might take on the recommendation, if it has merit. If it has no merit, the committee is told why it has not. I think that sort of requirement in our committee system might be of considerable value.

I also suggest, in speaking of the committee system, that minority reports should be permitted to be tabled along with majority reports from committees. It seems to me that democracy not only means majority rule but also respect for minority opinions. It is simply not good enough to say that a member can always issue a press release or express his opinion in the House if he does not agree with a report which he has assisted in drawing up. Such ventures do not have equal weight with a formal, written document and tend to be transitory rather than part of the permanent record. If the education is a major role, or is of major importance, in the work of committees it would be valuable both to this House and to our population if minority opinions and reports were published in Votes and Proceedings along with majority opinions of committees.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): That is done now with reports of royal commissions.

Mr. Rowland: I suggest that committees be granted a greater degree of independence from government control and that they be allowed an initiative in matters referred to them by the House. I have in mind that committees be allowed to present a resolution to the House suggesting a subject matter for committees to examine, rather than being forced to wait upon the government for action to be taken as is frequently the case. I think this procedure would overcome the argument that such initiatives on the part of committees would tend to obscure the fact that they are and should be subordinate to the House, because the House would determine the fate of the committee requests. The House can always turn down the request of a committee for a matter to be investigated.

May I make a few further very brief submissions about the organization of the committee system. I believe that the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization should look into the manner in which committee chairmen are selected and assigned. I think we should examine the possibility of adopting the British system in which committee chairmen are appointed either from the opposition or from the government. Also, I think we should examine the possibility of our having a panel of chairmen who might move from committee to committee. They would be members who are schooled in the rules. Committees might operate more effectively and efficiently under trained chairmen. Let us look at these ideas when examining our organization and procedure.

Leaving committees, I wish to say just a few words about the form in which legislation is presented to this House. In order to save time may I say, with respect to reasoned amendments, that I support the remarks by the hon. member for Peace River. More specifically, I wish to draw the attention of the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization to what seemed for a time to have become standard practice on the part of the government, that of introducing omnibus bills, a practice about which Mr. Speaker has expressed great reservations on several occasions.

In order to illustrate my point and to show that this practice should be halted, may I refer to a bill introduced in the previous parliament, the government organization bill. When that bill was presented to the House we were asked, in considering it, to pass judgment on no less than nine different subject matters and on at least five, perhaps more, matters of principle with only one vote. The hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave), speaking in the second reading debate on that bill, summarized the situation as follows, as reported at page 2760 of Hansard for January 26, 1971:

> To recapitulate in a slightly different way, we are being asked to create a new department; we are being asked to vary administrative duties of some existing departments; we are being asked to create ministers of the Crown who will formulate and develop government policy and, as well as providing for these salaried ministers, we are being asked to provide for additional salaried parliamentary secretaries. Distinct from those matters, we are also asked to vote yea or nay, without hearing witnesses, on behalf of those affected on the question of the retirement rights and obligations of public servants.

Steven Leacock once described this as a place where "men come together merely to hear the latest legislation and indulge in cheers, sighs, groans, votes and other expressions of vitality." I expect parliament often fits that description. But despite that, it serves the useful function of helping to focus public attention on matters of concern and of defining and delineating the considerations involved. In so doing, parliament aids the public in coming to intelligent conclusions about the actions of government and helps individual members of the public to decide their own position on questions of importance. This whole process, so key to the effective functioning of a democratic state, is injured and perhaps even dies when the issues before parliament become unfocused and blurred about the edges, as happens when the manner in which they are presented lacks clarity and precision. Nothing could obscure issues more than bringing before this House omnibus bills.

Under a majority government—I am not speaking of minority governments—with the well established pattern of voting solidly by party, votes in parliament are virtually meaningless and useless as a means of effecting parliamentary control. What is important in the functioning of parliament is that there be opportunity for discussions. What is important in the functioning of parliament is the quality of the discussion conducted. What is important in the functioning of parliament is that discussion be focused. How, in heaven's name, can discussion be focused when a bill includes as many as five different matters of principle? How are the gentlemen in the press gallery to follow the theme of a debate which may bounce from pollution, in the case of the government organization bill, to ministers' salaries, pensions, parliamentary secretaries, to the Post Office and back again? How, as a consequence, is the public supposed to form any opinion except that this House is in a hopeless mess.

These are some of the suggestions which I wish to present for the consideration of the House and, more specifically, to the members of the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. I hope that they will be looked at closely. I have not said anything about supply procedures since I think most of the relevant considerations were mentioned by the two previous speakers. I shall finish now as I want to leave time for the representative of the Social Credit party to speak.

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I was eagerly waiting for the opportunity to take part in this debate on procedure and organization regarding the business of the House, in view of the fact that we are a third party but nevertheless belong here. Now, in most cases, Standing Orders which, as we know, were made several years ago, provide for only two parties, not four.

That is why consultations between House leaders have expanded in the last few years ago in order to make more flexible the two-party system, to enable the New Democratic Party, ours or any other to participate in the proceedings to a greater extent and to have their say in regulating the business of the House.

I am honoured to do this job which gives me the opportunity of finding a lot of small details in the Standing Orders—and sometimes important problems—which are such that our business is not always as efficient as you and we would wish.

Since this House represents the people of Canada, it must reflect in the course of its business what Canadians are expecting from us. They expect that the House business will have efficient results and enable hon. members to take a real part in the proceedings. The present provisions of the Standing Orders and the procedure being so complex, an hon. member who would like to represent his constituents adequately cannot always do so.

Given our minority government, one can see that the procedure has been more flexible and has let to better results. One can see as well that there has been at least twice as much consultation between parties as before. Therefore, I wonder why under a majority government and with the same Standing Orders we do not get the same results, there is less consultation and democracy in this House.

Does that mean that the procedure is here to serve the interests of one specific political party? Should the procedure not serve rather the interests of each hon. member at any time, regardless of the number of members in such or such party, and enable him to express himself, whether the government has a majority or not?

I will get the answer that because of the interests of the people there is obviously a need because of the minority government for further discussions, further consultations, further consideration of the views of all hon. members. I would say to that that it is abnormal for a minority government to serve the interest of the people better than a majority government. I think that both should serve the people equally since it is the express wish of the people to elect either a majority or minority government. This is why in both cases the people should have a right to expect efficiency on the part of hon. members.

Mr. Speaker, my general remarks address themselves to the motion introduced today by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) to refer to the Committee on Procedure and Organization the 60 or 80 recommendations that you yourself suggested very cleverly during the two last Parliaments and to also have a study made of the various criticisms that hon. members had to make on the subject of procedure so as to make it more contemporary and efficient. That is why I support this motion which will enable us to improve procedure.

I think that the motion currently before the House provides the Committee on Procedure and Organization with broad enough terms of reference so that there is enough reason to hope for a thorough reform of our Standing Orders as well as the procedure of the House and its committees; at more or less regular intervals the House of Commons usually revises its rules and procedures to make them more efficient and accelerate its proceedings and debates.

Several hon. members complain—rightly I am sure—about several aspects of parliamentary business. The major problem is undoubtedly the question period which has become a real cause of frustration for most hon. members as well as the Chair.

When I say it is frustrating for most hon. members, I am not referring to front benchers, but to the very great majority of back benchers, if not all, whose only hope lies in the notorious supplementary question. If hon. members could not fall back on supplementary questions and if they were ruled out on a trial basis, let's say for a week, keeping to the same system, it would be seen that front benchers, willing or unwilling, would then have to give back benchers a chance to put questions.

In my opinion, the Chair's problem, and ours, stems from abusive recourse to supplementary questions, and I shall return to that later.

The second problem I should like to bring to the attention to my colleagues is conflicting schedules. When standing committees and the House are in session simultaneously, an hon. member should be in the House, where he is in duty bound to be, and also in a parliamentary committee to which he has been duly convened. Since he is not gifted with ubiquity, this leads to vast problems for hon. members. I understand that discussions are under way between various parties in the House to establish a fair schedule allowing efficient functioning of both the House and the committees. However, Mr. Speaker, I doubt whether anything can be achieved by juggling schedules. I rather believe our schedules should indicate periods for committee work and periods for the proceedings of the House of Commons.

There is a third problem that I should like to bring to the attention of the House: it is the ridiculousness of setting aside an hour for private members to introduce bills or motions for papers when there is little or no chance of their proposals' receiving serious consideration.

As all hon. members know, at the beginning of the session, as long as the first 40 hours have not been taken up, an hour is set aside on Mondays, Tuesdays, Thursdays and Fridays for private members' business, while if the 40 hours have been used up, only two hours are set aside for that purpose.

On the other hand, it is clear from the items on the Order Paper that the volume of private members' business is increasing all the time; a way out of this situation will have to be found, not only so as to encourage private members to introduce bills or motions, but also so as to afford them some hope of getting them heard.

For my part, I have been proposing the same motion for five years, since I came to the House. The motion was finally debated in the fifth year, which is perfectly ridiculous, and shows once again that some members are justly frustrated by the excuse that they do not sit on the government benches. This is a blatant contradiction of the professions of democracy that are broadcast during election campaigns so as to win votes.

My fourth point is that when specific motions are introduced under Standing Order 43, requiring the unanimous consent of the House, they can be rejected by any member, without his identity having to be revealed.

According to Standing Order 26, if an hon. member raises a question of national emergency after giving notice to the Speaker, what happens? The Speaker then decides for himself whether the motion is of national urgency or not. In fact, the Speaker alone is responsible for deciding whether the motion is in order under Standing Order 26.

Therefore, I cannot see how it would be fair to allow hon. members to say "no" in an anonymous way, without anybody knowing who they are. Frankly, I think that, if the Speaker is called upon to decide whether a motion proposed under Standing Order 26 is in order, a member opposing a motion under Standing Order 43 should identify himself. I am sure nobody is going to agree with my proposal.

Mr. Speaker, this shows how ridiculous Standing Order 43 is. This rule has become for most members the only possibility to speak on a particular and important problem by way of a motion. Anyway, a solution will have to be found to the problem arising from Standing Order 43 because I am convinced that it will continue to bother the Chair, to delay the question period and yet to satisfy hon. members resorting to it since, otherwise, they would not be able to participate in the oral question period. And all this is due to Standing Orders 43 being abused.

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to deal with the problem of committee business which has taken ever more significance, specially since 1970. In fact, since then the number of questions referred to the committees for study has been increasing. Consequently, the committee business has been slowing down, the agenda is so overloaded that sometimes we are completely confused. It has become extremely hard work and it should not be forgotten that the committees' working hours are in conflict with the House sittings. The committees' workload has grown heavier for the last few years. This was not bad as an experience but I also think that any procedure reform is somewhat experimental. Consequently, I wonder whether it would not be desirable that the committees seriously study the possibility of increasing the workload of the committee of the whole House instead of handling more work themselves. I do not mean that all questions should be referred to the committee of the whole House but surely it would be desirable that, when introducing its bills, the government should decide which legislation will be studied in committee of the whole House. We should also study the possibility of using more the committee of the whole House which enables hon. members to work all the more meaningfully as they work publicly. In fact, they can discuss with ministers and with quite a few hon. members and this permits them to get information on questions with which they are not so familiar. Therefore, this is surely a thing which, to my mind, should be considered.

I would like now to talk briefly about the problem of written questions. I shall make but one remark on this, to say that the time it takes the government to answer questions on the order paper makes us wonder whether this has not become a practice or policy.

The questions on the Order Paper deal with extremely serious matters, Mr. Speaker. Under Standing Order 39—if I remember correctly—a practice has been strongly established thanks to the ability of the Chair, namely that when a member puts a question orally and that, in the opinion of Mr. Speaker, it is not obviously urgent, he may suggest to the member that the question be put on the Order Paper. Three months later, the member is still waiting for an answer. This is why, Mr. Speaker, delays in answering questions on the order paper are annoying the member and put him in a difficult position.

On the one hand, we do not want to challenge the Speaker's ruling—and I think that this is a good thing—and on the other hand, we must agree, at his request, to put the question on the Order Paper. Furthermore, there is no way we can demand a written answer to our question from the government. Consequently, I think that this is a serious shortcoming of Standing Orders and constitutes an interference with the member's right and privilege to obtain information as he is entitled to.

I will make the same remark about motions for papers. That matter has been raised today on a point of order. I refrained from making any comment in that connection, because I felt it would delay the proceedings and that the matter was being raised at the wrong time. Since it is now the right time, I will merely say, as far as motions for papers are concerned, that some 20 per cent are acceptable to the government and that at least 80 per cent are rejected. The very clever Standing Orders governing our proceedings—if you will allow me to say so, Mr. Speaker—then provides that such a matter may be transferred for debate. Now, when will the matter be discussed? Never! When two Sundays come in one week! Thus the member is frustrated and denied the right and privilege of obtaining some papers or specific statistics. The hon. member has no other choice but to write to the minister but even then, what with bureaucracy, he never sees the end of it.

That is why, I am anxious for the President of the Privy Council to reveal on the basis of what criteria motions for papers are accepted or rejected, that we might be able to judge whether they are truly honest, fair and equitable, and whether they, in fact, respect the rights and privileges of hon. members.

Mr. Speaker, I will come back to oral questions and to Standing Order 39(5). Since 1964, hon. members have had the privilege of being asked to put their questions on the Order Paper when their urgency is not obvious or when they call for statistical data. That, to my mind, is an excellent rule, because it allows some control of the quality of the questions. In fact, if a question is not a matter of urgent public interest, it surely does not belong in the oral question period. I think this is an excellent practice.

However, I wonder why there should not be some kind of control or co-ordination on the subject of supplementary questions. I have discussed the matter of the oral question period with my Créditiste colleagues. This is one aspect we are surely going to delve into from beginning to end and we are not going to quit because this has become a highly ridiculous situation. To realize this, one only has to sit in the gallery and ask the people what they think of the oral question period.

When people leave this place, Mr. Speaker—and hon. members will forgive the expression because we are in a place where we faithfully express the views of our constituents—they think very often that it is a circus.

Mr. Speaker, I think that our fellow citizens who watch the question period are right. We suggest that we now have enough time, but that we make bad use of it. We make bad use of the 40 minutes. If we extend it to 80 minutes without changing the rules, we will not improve the situation.

It seems to me that the 40 minute period is long enough. However, there should be a fair division of time between opposition parties during the oral question period. There should be a first round with a maximum of two supplementary questions and then we could come back to allow more hon. members to participate in the question period.

There is nothing preventing us from coming back on the subject a second time.

We also discussed other subjects in this House—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but as it is six o'clock we should adjourn now and resume this discussion on another day.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, with regard to the business of the House. In view of the fact that the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) has not yet completed his speech and there seemed to be one or two other contributions forthcoming, and since it is important to get this committee's work started as soon as possible, would the government House leader indicate if we could complete this matter within a brief period either tomorrow or no later than Friday?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, in reply to the suggestion of my hon. friend, I should like to call as the first order of business tomorrow the Old Age Security Act amendment. If that were completed early, we could deal with this particular motion until five or six o'clock. If we needed to go into private members' hour, that might be agreeable. I would be happy to call it tomorrow night, but unfortunately I do not expect to be in the House from eight to ten o'clock and I should not like the motion to be completed without my being here.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, perhaps this matter can be settled by negotiation through the usual channels. We should like to see the motion concluded with as little more debate as possible, but we do not want our dealing with it to interfere with getting the old age security bill past second reading.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, on the old age security matter, I think it has already been indicated that in view of the importance of the matter we would be happy to have it go with dispatch to the committee, and perhaps both matters could be expedited in that way tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker: It being after six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until two o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

At 6.03 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

LADNER, B.C.—DREDGING—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, in view of the accumulation of silt at the mouth of Ladner Harbour, making it virtually impossible for fishing boats to enter or leave at low tide, I ask leave of the House under the terms of Standing Order 43 to move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke):

That this House instruct the Minister of Public Works to immediately instruct his department to begin dredging the Ladner Harbour so the fishermen's livelihood can not be adversely affected by the poor condition of the harbour.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta under the terms of Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. The motion cannot be put.

SOCIAL SECURITY

IMPLEMENTATION OF GUARANTEED ANNUAL INCOME—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion concerning a matter or urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the confusion which exists in the administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act as well as in social welfare, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise):

That a special committee of the House be instructed to consider the possibility of progressively replacing the existing social measures with a guaranteed minimum annual income scheme which would incite people to look for work.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion moved by the hon. member for Bellechasse. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such unanimity?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not, and the motion cannot therefore be put.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

SUGGESTED ADOPTION OF CONSERVATIVE PARTY POLICIES BY GOVERNMENT—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 and arising out of a question asked several times last night by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) at a Liberal Party dinner in the city of Toronto, the question being: "Do you know the Conservative Party policy?" I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick):

That this House requests the Leader of the Opposition to furnish as soon as possible to the Prime Minister a complete copy of the Conservative Party platform—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cossitt: Do not laugh. Some hon. members will not like what is coming:

—and that this House instructs the government to steal therefrom policies beneficial to the Canadian people in addition to those policies already stolen since October 30, 1972.

Mr. Speaker: I suspect that the motion is being proposed by the hon. member in jest. I would not think the motion is of the type which the House would want the Chair to put. I would hope the hon. member would allow the Chair not to put the motion, at least at this time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GIFT OF BOOKS TO CANADIAN SECONDARY SCHOOLS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask for the unanimous consent of the House, pursuant to Standing Order 43, to propose a very important motion.

Motions

Mr. Speaker, this is in connection with grants by the Department of External Affairs for Canadian book presentations to American high schools.

Therefore, I propose, seconded by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte):

That this House refuse the application of a book presentation program to American high schools by the Department of External Affairs and that steps be taken to have funds granted by the Department of External Affairs transferred to the Secretary of State who shall be ordered by this House to apply a similar program for Canadian high schools which are often short of material.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion brought forward by the hon. member. Under Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The wish of the House is not clear. Is it the wish of the House that I put the hon. member's motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If some hon. members are opposed to a motion and do not want to give unanimous consent, they should indicate so clearly, so that the Chair will be able to announce the result of the poll. In this case there is not unanimous consent.

BILINGUALISM

IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS OF OFFICIAL LANGUAGES COMMISSIONER—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I solicit the unanimous consent of the House to deal with a case of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of ambiguities in the implementation of the government's bilingualism policy, of the substance of the report of the Commissioner of Official Languages, and of the views expressed publicly by him, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Tétrault):

That a special House committee be set up to study ways and means of implementing the recommendations of Mr. Keith Spicer.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion brought forward by the hon. member. Under Standing Order 43, it requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is no unanimity; the motion therefore cannot be put before the House.

INCLUSION OF MESSAGES WITH OLD AGE PENSION AND FAMILY ALLOWANCE CHEQUES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to discussion of a serious matter.

Since the Department of National Health and Welfare has decided to enclose messages of public interest with family allowance and old age pension cheques, and since it is likely that other departments will want to use the same tactic, we have a right to question the trend of these messages.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin):

That this House require all so-called messages of public interest to be sent out to Canadians by the Department of National Health and Welfare under the same cover as family allowance and old age pension cheques, or by any other federal department to accompany routine correspondence, to be first examined by the appropriate standing committee for approval, amendment or rejection, in order that the messages may in no instance be employed to any end other than the objective information of Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Under the terms of Standing Order 43, the motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent, and so the motion may not be put to the House.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

PROVISION THAT MOVEMENT OF GOODS AND PEOPLE FROM ONE CANADIAN PORT TO ANOTHER BE IN CANADIAN SHIPS

Mr. Paddy Neale (Vancouver East) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-157, to amend the Canada Shipping Act (coasting trade).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Neale (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to amend the Canada Shipping Act to ensure that all movement of goods and people from one Canadian port to another Canadian port be carried out in Canadian ships. The members of the New Democratic Party feel that Canadian bottoms are preferable to foreign bottoms.

ESTABLISHMENT OF SPECIAL WEEK TO PROMOTE HIRING OF HANDICAPPED PERSONS

Mr. Ron Atkey (St. Paul's) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-158, respecting national hire the handicapped week.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to set aside the first week in May as national hire the handicapped week. The intention of the bill is to give recognition to the advantages of hiring handicapped persons, to encourage employers to hire handicapped persons, and to encourage the news media to recognize the accomplishments and merits of handicapped persons. This would be done through an extensive advertising campaign and through the design and issuance of a special stamp to publicize the important role of the handicapped in the working force in Canada.

PROVISION OF SPECIALIZED PLACEMENT SERVICE FOR HANDICAPPED PERSONS

Mr. Ron Atkey (St. Paul's) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-159, to amend the Department of Manpower and Immigration Act (handicapped persons).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Speaker, this is a companion bill to amend the Department of Manpower and Immigration Act by providing that the minister's duties relating to the development and utilization of manpower resources in Canada would include a specialized placement service for handicapped persons. In this way, it is hoped that the minister would establish a separate handicapped placement and research branch to work with employers to identify, develop, list and advertise meaningful and productive jobs which can be performed by handicapped people, to explore ways of educating employers as to the possibilities and benefits of hiring handicapped persons, and to explore the job capabilities and occupational opportunities of handicapped persons.

PROPOSED WEST COAST OIL TANKER ROUTE—INQUIRY AS TO CANADA-UNITED STATES COMMITTEE TO DISCUSS ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION—CANADIAN PROPOSALS

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of the Environment. In view of the minister's statement to James MacKenzie of the Globe and Mail on Friday last that Canada and the United States have agreed to set up a joint working committee for both east and west coasts to discuss aids to shipping and environmental protection, can he tell the House whether in fact a joint committee has been established, whether that committee has in fact ever met and, if so, has it submitted any report to the respective governments?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will allow the minister to reply, but perhaps I should indicate to the hon. member that it is not regular or in order to ask a question based on a statement made by a minister outside the House. The rule is clear that such statements made outside the House can be brought into the discussion only to the extent that a member may want to ask the Prime Minister whether such a statement represents government policy. We might assume that the question has been asked without reference to the statement made outside the House and the minister can reply on that basis.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The word "committee" is inappropriate. However, there have been meetings and there will continue to be meetings between myself and Mr. Russell Train, who is the presidential adviser in Washington on environmental matters. We did meet last April, we met again in July and we are scheduled to meet again early next month on matters of the nature of pollution on both our coasts. I might add that officials from Canada and the U.S. are meeting and studying problems on both coasts, but there is no ministerial committee.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for clarifying the situation. Can he tell the House whether the government of Canada has obtained from the United States agreement that Canada has a direct and legitimate interest in decision-making related to the environmental dangers associated with the TAPS tanker route?

Mr. Davis: No, Mr. Speaker. The best we have been able to do is to get the United States to vote for a Canadian resolution at Stockholm which admitted that they were responsible for effects outside their country of the nature of pollution.

• (1420)

Mr. Fraser: In reference to the minister's answer with regard to the discussion he is having on behalf of the government of Canada with the government of the United States, can he tell the House whether he on behalf of the government of Canada has put any specific proposals before his counterpart in the United States and, if so, what they are and whether they have been accepted by the United States?

Mr. Davis: We have made proposals to the United States, relating to the west coast. The United States has replied that it would like to discuss east coast matters as well and we agreed with that. We have had a number of meetings at the official level, as I mentioned earlier. I could report in detail at some other time.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a supplementary question. It arises out of the answers the Prime Minister gave me on Monday last, March 5, as recorded at page 1885 of Hansard, in which he said, speaking of the committee we have been discussing:

> It was a committee which had been suggested by President Nixon as a counter-proposal to our request that this matter be sent to the IJC.

I want to ask the Minister of the Environment whether or not the committee which was suggested by President Nixon is to be set up or whether in fact there is to be no committee and the government has no intention of pressing to have a committee set up to deal with the very serious problem of tankers coming down the British Columbia coast from Valdez to Cherry Point?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, the sequence as I recall it is this: About a year ago Canada was pressing for a Canada-U.S. reference to the International Joint Commission concerning the matter of tankers on the west coast and the possibility of oil pollution in Puget Sound and the Gulf of Georgia area. The response of the United States was negative. President Nixon, as I recall it, however, suggested as an alternative that a committee be established at the ministerial level. Our response was that we might better proceed in the manner I have reported, namely, the Minister of the Environment for Canada working with Mr. Train of the United States.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether the House is correct in assuming that while the President of the United States suggested the setting up of a committee it was the Canadian government that refused to proceed with that proposal and that no such committee will be set up? Would the minister be prepared to tell the House why the government did not accede to the suggestion that there be a joint committee to look into this problem?

Mr. Davis: The suggestion of the President was really limited to Mr. Train and Mr. Ruckelshaus who administers the environmental protection act in the United States. It was not a number of ministers on both sides that the President had in mind.

POLLUTION

MERCURY IN INDIANS IN DRYDEN AREA—DEADLINE FOR PULP AND PAPER MILLS TO REMOVE POLLUTANTS FROM EFFLUENT—ALTERNATIVE FOOD SUPPLY

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of the Environment. In view of reports by the Ontario Department of Health that mercury levels found in Indians living in the Dryden area stand at 20 to 30 times what is considered as the safe level for human beings, can the minister indicate if he is considering establishing deadlines for existing pulp and paper companies by which time they would be required to remove dangerous pollutants such as mercury from their effluents?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, all discharges of mercury of any significance ceased several years ago because of our standards. The continuing problem results from mercury in the sediments downstream from the plant.

Mr. Orlikow: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. In the absence of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development I direct it to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is his department or his department together with the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development discussing with the Ontario government the possibility of supplying alternative sources of food to the Indians in areas such as this so they will not be required to eat as a major staple in their diet fish which are so heavily contaminated?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have received no representations on this matter from the provincial authorities. My colleague the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, would probably be the person in the best position to answer the hon. member's question.

INCOME TAX

PROCEDURES AGAINST CERTAIN QUEBEC TRUCK DRIVERS—RESULTS OF DEPARTMENTAL INVESTIGATION

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a question to the Minister of National Revenue concerning honest taxpayers and courageous workers.

Considering the fact that truck drivers who are on the road more than 10 hours per day are eligible to tax deductions for their meal expenses, can the minister say if he has ordered the Quebec regional office to stop all procedures instituted in respect to the files that I submitted to him, until the investigation which he has announced to me in a letter has been completed and a decision reached? If so, can he say why those persons have just received from the Quebec regional office summons ordering them to pay in 10 days?

[English]

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure I got the full weight of the hon. member's question. There have been no special instructions given to the director of taxation at Quebec. There is provision in the Income Tax Act for a particular procedure in such cases, and each case is considered individually on its own strength. However, I do not think there is any special investigation called for.

Mr. Godin: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a supplementary question.

Due to the fact that the officers of the Quebec local office seem to be working with a document relating to the tax reform applied to the year 1972, and that the cases I have submitted to the minister are related to the years 1970 and 1971, could he say if he intends to put an end to the procedures, and when? Can he assure me that he will personally inform the persons whose cases I have submitted to him not to make any payment as required by the Quebec office until he informs them personally about the decision reached following the investigation?

[English]

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Speaker, I have no word that there are any assessments which are not fully founded, but if the hon. member wishes to speak to me personally I will be glad to discuss individual cases and see whether any further consideration can be given to them.

PROVINCIAL AFFAIRS

BRITISH COLUMBIA LAND COMMISSION BILL—EXAMINATION BY DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE OF POWER TO ENACT—REQUEST FOR RESERVATION OF ROYAL ASSENT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice and Attorney General as the keeper of the Queen's conscience. It has to do with a bill of the British Columbia legislature entitled the Land Commission Act, which may become law tomorrow. I ask the minister whether or not the law officers of his department have examined this bill, and in particular certain provisions, to the end that a determination has been made whether or not these unusual provisions come within the legislative ambit of the legislature of British Columbia under its exclusive authority over property and civil rights?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I will have to check to see how far any examination of this question has gone at this stage of the proceedings.

• (1430)

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, time is of the essence. That is the reason I ask. I ask the minister this question in the absence of the Prime Minister. Having regard to the widespread aroused public opinion concerning the dangerous implications of this incredible legislation, does the government intend to request the Lieutenant Governor of British Columbia to reserve Royal Assent so that consideration can be given thereto by the Governor General in council?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, it is fairly obvious, from the way the question was put, that it is hypothetical in its nature. But I could say to the right hon. gentleman that the ordinary procedure, if there is doubt about the constitutional validity of provincial legislation, is to allow that legislation to be tested in the ordinary way in the courts, and if there is doubt about the political nature of such legislation it is tested in the provincial political arena.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I asked the question because once the bill is passed and action is taken thereon it will be impossible for the rights of individuals to be protected. It is often said that once eggs are scrambled they cannot be unscrambled, and I wish the minister would look into this, though I realize of course, his total aversity to anything of a political nature.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Justice. If the Lieutenant Governor of British Columbia is presumptious enough to make any determination other than the one he is required to make, will he see that he is removed from office?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice if in fact the government has started an investigation of Bill 42 introduced in the legislature of British Columbia?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I really answered that question at the beginning in dealing with the question of the right hon. member for Prince Albert.

Mr. Reynolds: Mr. Speaker, I did not get that answer. I think the minister said it would be. Has the department started an investigation—just yes or no?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated to the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert I will be checking to see the extent to which investigation has gone on. When these matters come to the attention of the department it is unusual to undertake a thorough examination of them at this stage, but I will see how far it has gone.

TRANSPORT

ALLEGED DETERIORATION IN WESTERN CANADA RAILWAY PASSENGER SERVICE—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the deteriorating train service in western Canada, as evidenced by the fact that recently some 30 passengers from Edmonton to Red Deer were obliged to stand in the baggage compartment, and on a recent Sunday night a passenger was unable to board the dayliner at Innisfail because of lack of seating accommodation, will the minister investigate the current situation and specifically try to find ways to improve rail service between Edmonton and Calgary?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I shall investigate it, and I would like to have the names of those people.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Roche: Would the minister make a statement on motions about the government's plans to save railways as a vital means of passenger transportation in an age dominated by jets and big airports?

HOUSING

REQUEST THAT CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION NOT AUTHORIZE RENT INCREASES ON OLD AGE PENSIONERS' ACCOMMODATION IN LIMITED DIVIDEND PROJECTS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In view of the fact that certain owners of limited dividend projects are taking advantage of proposed increases in the old age pension and raising the rents of tenants who are pensioners, and are citing CMHC authorization for the raising of such rents while a lease is in effect, will the minister take this matter up with the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and instruct that body not to authorize any increases in rents covered by leases that have been in effect since January 1, 1973?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I tried to explain to the House the other day, both the owners of the limited dividend projects and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation are bound by the terms of the agreement, copies of which I will be happy to give to the hon. member. That agreement provides that actual increases in costs of operation are passed on through rent increases. I have asked the corporation to watch any such applications for rent increases and to treat them very rigorously. In a number of these buildings we have had a number of meetings between tenants and owners, organized by CMHC, and in each case CMHC has tried to reduce the increases to the maximum amount permitted under the agreement. If the hon. member has specific tenants and specific buildings in mind, I wish he would bring them to my attention, particularly—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his offer to send me certain documents. Would he like me to send him certain documents showing that landlords are citing CMHC authorization for the increases they are making?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Calgary North.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I would be delighted to receive such documents—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has recognized the hon. member for Calgary North.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Here are two of them.

[Mr. Marchand (Langelier).]

REQUEST FOR MORATORIUM ON RENT INCREASES AFFECTING OLD AGE PENSIONERS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In light of the fact that the rents have been increased by 20 per cent in many cases as a result of the agreements the minister has mentioned, will he undertake not only to ask for strictness in this regard but to veto and put a moratorium on all increases so that the old age pensioners can enjoy their pensions without having them taken away from them by landlords and CMHC?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I made clear the other day, where CMHC owns the buildings we have already implemented a freeze for 1973 on all rent increases as they apply to senior citizens.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Basford: However, where we are just the mortgage holder or are bound by the terms of a limited dividend agreement, we have got to observe that agreement and, as a lawyer, the hon. member knows that that is the case.

DRUGS

AVAILABILITY OF QUAD PROGRAM DATA TO BULK PURCHASERS, PHYSICIANS AND OTHER HEALTH PROFESSIONALS

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that the minister in an open letter to the editor on March 1, 1973, in the Ottawa Citizen, indicated that data generated by the QUAD program would be provided to bulk purchasers of drugs, physicians and other health professionals, and in view of the fact there appears to be disagreement between the minister and top officials in the department concerning the therapeutic equivalence of drugs, could the minister indicate if this data is now available, and has it been provided to the above groups on their request so that a meaningful assessment of the QUAD program can be determined by those responsible for prescribing drugs?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I have had the opportunity of outlining to the House the attitude of my department: it does not differ from mine on this subject.

In addition, with regard to the availability of information, I can say that it is available upon request to any province or bulk purchaser.

Finally, with regard to the general question of the QUAD program, I shall be in a position to make another statement on the matter tomorrow.

[English]

Mr. Holmes: In light of correspondence I received from the executive assistant to the minister on March 6 indicating that my correspondence dated March 2 requesting the above data is presently under study and that a definitive reply would be going forward shortly, could the minister indicate at this time what that reply will be and, if it is in the affirmative, when can I expect to obtain that data?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I may have misunderstood the question of the hon. member. Does he want this information for himself or does he want it transmitted to the provincial governments?

[English]

Mr. Holmes: Mr. Speaker, I think my question was quite straightforward. I indicated that I had written to the Minister of National Health and Welfare requesting that information, and that I received a letter from his executive assistant indicating that further action would be taken at a later date. I would simply ask the minister to indicate at this time whether an affirmative response will be given to my personal request for such information and, if so, when will I obtain that data?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I understand that the hon. member feels that he belongs to the group of provincial governments of that of bulk purchasers. I do not see why such information should not be passed on to him. As to convey the information to the people on an individual basis, I am now considering the matter. As a rule, I would authorize such a procedure. However, there are some difficulties, I am told, from a legal point of view, and this is why the hon. member has been kept waiting for an answer.

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the outstanding results announced in the use of fish paste from Krill in the medical treatment of ulcers and arteriosclerosis. I should like to ask the minister if this has been investigated by the Food and Drug Directorate?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have asked my department for information in this regard and I shall be pleased to pass it on to the hon. member as soon as I have it.

OPPOSITION TO CERTAIN PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO ACT BY MONTREAL ORGANIZATIONS—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Can he advise the House whether he has seen the memorandum from the Local populaire of Montreal and supported by many Montreal organizations objecting to Bill C-125 and suggesting instead the establishment of a minimum guaranteed income plan? If so, what answer is the minister planning to give to that memorandum?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have had representations from the Greater Montreal Anti-Poverty Committee and they have been supported by other organizations made known to me. I met with the leaders of the delegation from that group some three or four weeks ago and arranged for a subsequent meeting with the Unemployment Insurance Commission, which has since taken place. They are constructive meetings and the recommendations are being seriously considered. We will make known our decision in due course.

AIR CANADA

DECISION TO DISCONTINUE CUSTOMS PRE-CLEARANCE AT TORONTO AIRPORT FOR PASSENGERS TRAVELLING TO UNITED STATES—REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport arising from the decision of Air Canada to discontinue the practice of customs pre-clearance for Canadian businessmen bound for the United States, utilizing the facilities of Toronto International Airport. In view of the hardships that this decision imposes upon businessmen travelling to the United States, can the minister indicate to the House whether he has had any discussions with Air Canada with a view to reinstating the policy of customs pre-clearance and, if not, is it his intention to do so and will he make a statement to the House to that effect?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is undoubtedly better informed than I am. I do not think that the decision has been taken yet. So, if I am right, he is the one who is misinformed. The matter is still under study.

The matter of pre-clearance is an extremely complex one which could facilitate travelling for Canadians in certain cases but which could also be the cause of severe prejudice for Canadian companies.

Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that I cannot give a complete answer within a few minutes. No decision has been arrived at and I think it is still under discussion with the Department of External Affairs and air carriers.

[English]

Mr. Mazankowski: Would the minister undertake to inform the House whether it is his intention to pursue the matter of the provision of customs pre-clearance facilities at the second international terminal at which I understand facilities have not been made available for pre-customs clearance?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, as soon as there has been a decision, I shall so inform the hon. member. As a matter of fact, a delegation from the United States Congress was here a few weeks ago to make an inquiry into the matter of customs pre-clearance. The U.S. government itself is not sure whether the policy is to be continued.

At any rate, as soon as we shall have a somewhat more specific reply, I shall be pleased to discuss it, but I feel the hon. member should not announce decisions which have not yet been made.

PROVISION OF FACILITIES WITHIN CITIES FOR PURCHASING OF TICKETS AND CUSTOMS CLEARANCE

Mr. Jacques-L. Trudel (Montreal-Bourassa): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a supplementary to the Minister of Transport.

In order to facilitate the employees' work in international airports, does the minister intend to install centres in cities where passengers could purchase their tickets and have their luggage checked by customs? Passengers could then board aircraft directly thus reducing the existing confusion in international airports?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): I am willing to consider this suggestion which seems most interesting, Mr. Speaker.

AIR CANADA

QUALITY OF RESERVATION SERVICE FOR OTTAWA RESIDENTS—SETTLEMENT OF CLAIMS ARISING FROM DC-8 CRASH IN TORONTO

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact the minister indicated in the House on Monday that he would inquire into the matter of the Telepac system in Montreal which forces Ottawa residents to contact Montreal for Air Canada reservations, can he now indicate whether he has made that inquiry and whether Air Canada is willing to revert to the 1972 system or to the 1970 system whereby it had a sophisticated set-up here that was still running and that Air Canada is still paying for but not using?

[Mr. Marchand (Langelier).]

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I regret but the information I have now from Air Canada—I intend to go on discussing it with the responsible authorities—does not at all confirm the complaints made by the hon. member. Should I have the opportunity to meet him. I would like him to clarify some of the claims regarding the reservation system.

[English]

Mr. Lundrigan: I will give the minister the information I have and I think he will want to see a few heads roll. Has he had an opportunity to receive a report from Air Canada on the insurance settlements regarding those people who have been waiting since the unfortunate crash in 1971?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure that is a supplementary but the minister might reply and the Chair will then recognize the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I received the report; some claims have been settled and others have not.

LEASE OF LOCKHEED 1011 AIRCRAFT—REASON FOR BORROWING FUNDS IN NEW YORK

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a further supplementary to the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact Air Canada is borrowing some $26,600,000 to lease Lockheed 1011 aircraft, would the minister advise why it was necessary for the funds to be borrowed in New York and why the sale of these certificates is not being made available to the public?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think this question should be put to the Minister of Finance or the President of the Treasury Board. I am not a specialist in these matters.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, in view of the request of the Minister of Finance in his budget that the provinces do most, if not all, of their borrowing within Canada, would the President of the Treasury Board tell the House why Air Canada is being allowed to borrow $26,633,000 on the bond market in the United States and why the issue is being limited to institutional investors and four American insurance companies which have taken up almost half of this loan at the present time?

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the circumstances but I will take the question as notice.

CRIMINAL CODE

INQUIRY AS TO REINTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION ON OFF-TRACK BETTING

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. In view of the fact that both the budget and throne speech debates are now over and we should be moving into a legislative program, is the minister going to reintroduce the same legislation as last session on off-track betting or will there be new legislation more in line with the requests of those provinces that have studied the matter?

An hon. Member: Have you got a piece of the action?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, if we tried to please all of the provinces that have studied the matter we would not be able to do anything because there are fundamental differences of view. We are looking, with the provinces, at possible changes, particularly the strengthening of provisions against the existing messenger service type operations. I would hope to be able to introduce the bill in a somewhat modified form at some stage during this session, but the exact timing depends upon further discussion with the House leader and other members.

Mr. Lawrence: Will the minister indicate whether he is aware of the very real concern of most of the law enforcement agencies, in the central part of the country in any event, that the present bookie system and the whole set-up in respect of racing is still feeding international syndicated crime in this country?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I am very aware of the concern involved. As a result of that concern, when we introduced a bill in the last session there was some hope that hon. members might have passed it quickly in order to put an end to present types of messenger service until the hon. member shot from the hip from Queen's Park.

What position is his department going to take in regard to compensation for the fishermen?

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON MARKET PROSPECTS FOR HIGH ERUCIC ACID RAPESEED

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. Will the minister make a statement on the probable market possibilities for high erucic acid rapeseed this coming fall? I ask this question because of the very poor performance of the low erucic varieties this past year and the consequent reluctance of producers to seed. Many producers are asking for such a statement.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly consider whether anything further can be said. I will let the hon. member have a copy of the newsletter that has gone to all producers with the so-called March 1 planting information and which has some reference to the high erucic, low erucic situation.

POSSIBILITY OF PLEBISCITE ON BRINGING RYE, FLAX AND RAPESEED UNDER CONTROL OF WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. Is the government at the present time contemplating introducing a producer plebiscite on whether rye, flax and rapeseed should be brought under the control of the Canadian Wheat Board? If so, is it going to be done before the end of this crop year?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have indicated that I believe the time has come when a plebiscite or some other form of formal consultation should now take place. In other words, the period of attempting to put the appropriate amount of information in the hands of producers has pretty well come to an end and not much further progress will be made unless an actual plebiscite or consultation period is set. Therefore, I contemplate doing that as soon as the final form of consultation is decided upon. However, I would not envisage any effect on the marketing system for the crop year beginning August 1, 1973. Under ordinary good business practice, I think far longer notice than that is required before any change is implemented.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as far as I know there are no negotiations going on at the present time for the establishment of regular service between Canada and Cuba.

Mr. Cossitt: I wish to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if there is a delegation from his department in Cuba today and, if so, what is the purpose of it being there?

In view of the minister's recent visit to Washington, can he now inform the House as to the decisions regarding the use of DES implants as they relate to the existing imbalance in the regulations between Canada and the United States?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we did discuss this matter when I was in Washington. I have been told that the studies will be finalized some time this month. We will be told what the United States government intends to do at that time.

Mr. Hargrave: Is the minister giving some consideration to a Canadian embargo on United States fat cattle and dressed beef in view of the DES regulations in our two countries?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, the action the government will take will depend upon the finalization of the study in the United States. We are prepared to take whatever action is necessary in order that our beef producers will not be put at a disadvantage.

CHURCHILL RIVER DIVERSION—REQUEST FOR STOPPAGE OF WORK UNTIL LICENCE ISSUED UNDER NAVIGABLE WATERS PROTECTION ACT AND INVESTIGATION OF ENVIRONMENTAL EFFECTS

Mr. Keith Taylor (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that Manitoba Hydro has awarded contracts for work on the Churchill River diversion at South Indian Lake in Manitoba, and in view of the fact that no licence has been obtained under the Navigable Waters Protection Act, would the minister advise the House whether he has taken any action to stop the work until a licence is obtained and, if not, why not?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will inquire into the case and make a report.

Mr. Taylor: Would the minister assure the House that a complete investigation into the effects of the diversion upon the environment and the livelihood of the residents of the areas will be made and that public hearings will be held in the area before making a final decision on the application for a licence?

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of the Environment. Arising from the decision of the province of Manitoba to allow Manitoba Hydro to proceed with the diversion of the Churchill River and in view of the provisions of the Canada-Manitoba study agreement relating to environmental studies, would the minister advise the House whether representations have been made to the government of Manitoba with a view to discontinuing work until the studies are completed?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the Canada-Manitoba agreement relates to environmental effects of works which are being studied. One of the clauses in the agreement requires that these effects be taken into consideration when designing the particular work. There are a number of them in respect of this particular development for water power purposes.

[Later:]

Mr. Dinsdale: Can the Minister of the Environment inform the House whether he has received the interim reports provided for by the agreement? If not, when does he expect to receive such reports and, if he receives them, will he act upon them?

Mr. Davis: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I expect to receive the first interim report within the next few weeks. There will be a series of reports over the next three years.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

OCEAN FALLS, B.C.—INQUIRY AS TO REQUEST BY PROVINCE FOR DEVELOPMENT ASSISTANCE—RELOCATION OF RESIDENTS

Mr. Harry Olaussen (Coast Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. On April 20, 1973, the town of Ocean Falls will cease to exist. Can the minister inform the House whether he or any other minister has been approached by the provincial government of British Columbia as to some possible development in the area?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, my memory is that no such submission has been made, but it could be that it has been received at the official level. I will be glad to make inquiries and inform the hon. member.

Mr. Olaussen: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Can the minister inform the House if his department has experienced any problems in the relocation of the people living there?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will have to take notice of the question.

COMMUNICATIONS

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF LETTERS BETWEEN MINISTER AND QUEBEC COUNTERPART ON GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct a question to the Minister of Communications. I should like to know if the minister has received a reply from the Minister of Communications of Quebec in regard to the letter that the federal Minister of Communications tabled in the House on February 23. Regardless of the reply when he answers the first part of the question, can he tell the House if there has been any change at all in the position of the Quebec government, and of other provinces but particularly of the Quebec government, and that of the federal government since February, 1972?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Minister of Communications): The answer to the first part of the question is affirmative, Mr. Speaker. As a matter of fact, the letter of my colleague the Quebec Minister of Communications was tabled in the Quebec Assembly and published in the papers.

As to the second part of the question, I find it rather difficult to answer since it is so broad. The hon. member is asking if there has been any change during the past year in the attitude of the Quebec government or any other province. I must answer yes since we are in constant discussion with at least five of the ten Canadian provinces and, of course, in each case minor changes come up in the discussion but I have to say that we have not reached any final settlement of the questions which will be raised in the green book. If it were the opposite it would be useless to publish that book.

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I thank the minister for part of his answer. Since the Quebec minister has had the courtesy to table in Quebec his letters to the Minister of Communications in this House, would the minister table his letters to the minister in Quebec so that we may know the full story through the exchange of letters regarding this entire problem of communications and cablevision and the fact that for over three years there has been an absolute vacuum in policy and an absence of leadership? Would the minister table these letters and consider doing so post-haste?

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will forgive me for not applauding his speech.

As to his question, the answer is yes, and with pleasure.

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I did have some extensive remarks to amplify my question, in an attempt to fill in the Minister of Communications who needs filling in quite a bit, Mr. Speaker, in regard to this question of communications.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should ask his question because we are running short of time. The hon. member has been recognized for a supplementary and he should ask it.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, hon. members across the way who called me to order should have directed their call to the Minister of Communications to bring some order to this whole question of communications, because in one of the letters tabled in the National Assembly in Quebec the Minister of Communications of Quebec—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Nowlan: Then I will rise on a point of order and not on a supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member rises on a point of order.

Mr. Nowlan: My point of order is that this is a complete farce and travesty. We are trying to breathe some life and sense into a policy on communications, because we have a minister who is the most uncommunicative minister this House has ever seen. My point of order is that as a member of this House I feel, even though I have some bilingual capacity, that it is just a little too much to expect members of this House to go to the National Assembly in Quebec and get letters that have been tabled there showing one side of the conversation carried on with the Minister of Communications here. I suggest that the whole matter ought to be expedited so that when the green paper finally comes forward from the federal minister we will have available the correspondence that he sent to that minister in Quebec.

Mr. Nystrom: On a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville rises on a question of privilege.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. This, clearly, is debate. The hon. member is abusing the question period—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: —something that no member should do. We are all affected, no matter to which party we belong, when an hon. member abuses the rules of the House, as the hon. member is doing now.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, on the same question of privilege, I do not hesitate to stand in my place and say there has been a perversion of the rules and an abuse of the rules by the members to my left in carrying on a completely incestuous coalition with the members of the government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: If you want to talk about abusing the rules, we could go back a few days when other hon. members abused the rules. I did not pay any attention to that abuse and I will not pay any more attention today to the hon. member because, quite frankly, I do not think we should waste the time of the House any more in listening to what the hon. member has to say. My supplementary question to the Minister of Communications is, will he table his correspondence?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has asked as a supplementary whether the minister will table some correspondence. I thought the minister had answered affirmatively. That is my understanding. Before calling orders of the day the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Joliette.

PROPOSED JAMES BAY HYDROELECTRIC PROJECT— INDEMNIFYING OF NATIVE PEOPLE

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker in the absence of the right hon. Prime Minister and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Transport.

Since the James Bay project is still very important for the future of the province of Quebec, is the minister in a position to say if this government will limit itself to meeting the demands of Indians or is it prepared to co-operate in carrying out this project within the limits of its jurisdiction while at the same time encouraging the payment of adequate compensation to residents?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member was right about being concerned about the absence of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I will transmit the question of the hon. member to the minister who will surely give him an answer.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I would ask the government House leader about the business of the House for the rest of this week and next week.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, today we will continue with debate on the old age security bill, followed by the bill on war veterans allowances. Then, we will take the Export Development Act and the National Housing Act amendments. Monday and Tuesday of next week will be opposition days, and we will continue with this legislative program following Tuesday of next week.

Mr. Baldwin: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In light of the discussion which took place yesterday about the motion to refer certain matters to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization, is the minister considering the suggestion advanced by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald), namely, that the time between two c'clock and four o'clock tomorrow might be dedicated to that proposition? When the minister is answering, can he tell the House at this time when the budget bills will be introduced? I am sure that will be of interest to many members.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I am aware that the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin), who was speaking when debate ended last night, is not present today. If he is present tomorrow we will consider working out some arrangement to deal with the motion that is so important. As to the budget bills, I am not in a position to indicate on what particular day they may be brought forward.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE BASIC PENSION AND TO CLARIFY BASE YEAR IN ESCALATION FORMULA

The House resumed, from Friday, March 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that Bill C-147, to amend the Old Age Security Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Peter Reilly (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take a few minutes to conclude my remarks on the government's proposal to increase old age assistance. On Friday last I said the sum was grossly inadequate. You may remember, Mr. Speaker, that at that time the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) rose to correct a passage in Hansard, in which he was reported as saying that the government had effectively banished poverty for the aged in this country. He said he did not say that, and I believe him when he says he did not say that. Yet, obviously, somebody in the government thought it, Mr. Speaker, because that text did not appear in Hansard by accident. Obviously, somebody deep in the mushroom cellars under the headquarters of the Department of National Health and Welfare wrote those words. There is a cabal that believes that this government has effectively banished poverty for people over the age of 65. They committed those thoughts to paper, but fortunately the minister was embarrassed enough by their ever-eagerness to do us the honour of correcting his remarks, substituting a somewhat less offensive piece of governmental braggadocio. Nevertheless, he doubtless believes that the government has done a good job for our old people.

So, obviously, do my hon. friends to the south of us in this chamber. I should like to dwell for a few moments on some of the remarks that the members of that party have made. Their leader, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), said during the debate on the budget that he thought that my leader had "lost his marbles"; I think that was the phrase he used. I want to quote to you, Mr. Speaker, something that the leader of the New Democratic Party—or should I say the not so new and not so democratic party—said. I hear hon. members to my far left crying "Oh!". The leader of the New Democratic Party said during the budget debate that he suspected my party were so hungry for power that they would vote for the communist manifesto. I suggest to them that if they had to, in order to keep this government in power, they would almost vote for the Regina manifesto. They have turfed out of their party everyone who laid claim to believing in the philosophy of socialism which they are supposed to espouse. Anybody who is young and a socialist has no place in the councils of the NDP; that is a matter of record so we do not have to debate it here.

In any case, Mr. Speaker, let me tell you about the statement that the hon. member for York South made during the election campaign, just one week before election day last October. He was in Victoria at the time and was talking about pensions. He said that his party, if it were elected, would immediately institute a pension plan raising the basic pension to $150 a month. He then said this: "You send a large number of NDP members to parliament and we'll make life hell for the Trudeau government". During my education I studied under Jesuits, among others, and sometimes they were at pains to describe to us the tortures of hell. They frightened me, since I was a young boy at the time; in fact, they scared the hell out of me. But I can say that I have not seen any members of this woefully inadequate government across the way suffering torment of any kind at the hands of the New Democratic Party, least of all the torment of hell.

The fact is that the leader of the New Democratic Party, who accused my leader of losing his marbles, may be in need of a little geriatric assistance. I am not going to accuse him of having lost his marbles or of having his mental faculties in any way diminished by his great age, but I would suggest to him that sometimes one's sight begins to play tricks with one when one reaches a certain age, and that the Trudeau government is over on that side, not on this side where most of his invective has been directed.

If he and his party really want to see a pension that is better than the one now being put up by the Liberal government, I suggest that they defeat the government and let another election take place. We do not want the help of that rag, tag and bobtail minority down there. We do not want to form a government that depends daily for its existence on a little blowhard minority with no mandate. What we want is an end to a situation in which this parliament can be frustrated in its attempt to get on with things because of the fact that this little group of 31 members, fully one-third of whom are here by virtue of victories consisting of less than 2,000 votes plurality, has the misplaced and I submit misused power to impose its will on the crippled giant across the way.

These members tell us that daily they are shoring up the government because they want to see programs passed that are good for the people. I am not at all surprised to hear them say this, but I did go back over my files today and I found that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has long held the view that co-operation with the Liberals is a defensible philosophy for a New Democratic Party politician to profess. In fact, back in 1965 there was a scandal within the NDP caucus in this House of the most serious proportions. It seems that the caucus at that time became very cross with the hon. member and wanted to remove him as House leader. There was a special caucus meeting held to discuss this proposition, and the reason they gave for this meeting was that the hon. member was too helpful to Liberals.

The hon. member has been quoted on many occasions—the most recent I have been able to find was in January last, but he is on record as long ago as 1965—as saying that he thinks minority government is the best kind of government. He believes that under that system more will be done for the Canadian people than if there is a majority government, though he makes one very important reservation, of course, which is unless a majority government be formed by him and his colleagues. So in that principle as in all others we find there are two sides to the question and that it depends very much upon whose ox has been gored. All of us who are in politics have compromised from time to time. But the amusing and sometimes bemusing thing about the NDP is that while they are in the process of making their tortuous and painful circumlocutions to arrive at B when they left A, they will never admit that they have done so and become very cross indeed when anyone accuses them of that. Thus it was that the leader of that party, having committed his party members to vote for the budget, said he was doing so because the budget contained no concessions to industry. How he arrived at that conclusion, of course, I shall leave the House to decide; I cannot imagine how he could possibly arrive at such a conclusion.

I am sure hon. members will be pleased to hear that I have just about reached the end of my speech. May I merely conclude by saying that we do not believe that a $100 pension is enough. I hold that view to the extent that I cannot vote for this proposal. It is my intention—and I hope I will be joined by members of the House from all parties—to continue to work as hard as I can, in common with members like the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie), who has worked all his parliamentary career to this end, to better the lot of the pensioners. Those who snigger at this, Mr. Speaker, merely betray their total ignorance of what has been happening here over the past few years. I intend to join forces with that hon. member and other members who have concern for the old people of this country in order to try to make sure they receive, before too many months go by, an amount of money that will enable them to live in the peace, dignity and harmony that they deserve, having worked hard and carried this country on their backs for all their working lives.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, after hearing the last speaker, I realize how fortunate we are to have a Liberal government in power today compared to a Conservative government. The last speaker is a man of many parties. I think when he was younger he was a member of the Liberal party. When he went into the trade union movement he was a member of the NDP, and now that he has become disenchanted he is a member of the Conservative party. I do not doubt that time will see him go over to the Creditiste party.

Mr. Reilly: I would go over there before I came to you, Jack.

[Mr. Reilly.]

Mr. Gilbert: I would remind the hon. member of the statement issued during the election campaign by his party as set out in a Conservative publication entitled "Policies and Commitments" dated September, 1972.

Mr. Reilly: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member for Ottawa-West (Mr. Reilly) is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Reilly: Mr. Speaker, if I understood the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) correctly, he said that at one time I had been a member of his party. I deny that totally. It is not true.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Speaker, after the hon. member's performance this afternoon I am rather happy that he has never been a member of this party. I think he had sympathy for our party at one time, but now we have a real, deep sympathy for him of a different nature.

I would remind the hon. member of the Conservative party publication entitled "Policies and Commitments" dated September, 1972, which did not even contain a chapter with regard to pensions. At page 52 under the heading of "Poverty" there is the statement that the Tories would maintain the present plans and remove the 2 per cent ceiling on the cost of living adjustment. At that time the old age pension was $82.88, and the Conservative party did not even know that the Liberal government had taken off the 2 per cent ceiling in respect of the cost of living adjustment. This is the program the Conservative party presented to the people during the election. The leader of the party has attempted since to say it could be inferred from his speeches that the old age pension under the Tories would have been between $90 and $95. We then heard the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie), the main spokesman for that party on pensions, say many things, but not one word regarding that the Conservative party would do concerning pensions. He said not one word as to the amount.

An hon. Member: You didn't say you were going to support the Liberals either.

Mr. Gilbert: The hon. member said that the 1973 pension should be $107, but there was not one word in respect of what the Conservative party would do concerning the amount of the pension. I think it would be fair to say that 1,800,000 senior citizens are delighted with the changes contained in the legislation, and I want to commend the minister for bringing it forward. I recall that before he was a member or a minister he was the grey eminence behind the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). He had a keen, analytical mind and a bureaucratic approach to political problems. After listening to his speech introducing the changes I now realize he is intellectually strong, decidedly competent, deeply sensitive, compassionate and strongly determined to take care of senior citizens.

Much the same can be said about the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). He has been a crusader, a man of convictions, a man of concern and a man of compassion. When he spoke as the spokesman for our party he set forth the historical and philosophical development of pensions. Many of us, after hearing his speech, felt that he was a man Canadians have grown to respect and admire for his fine contributions to social legislation for pensioners. I just noticed one of the members leave. I imagine he is most embarrassed at the position and policy of his party concerning pensions.

This legislation indicates that the Prime Minister and his party got the message of October 30, 1972. I feel that the people of Canada are the main beneficiaries of minority governments, and that it is fair to say many Canadians applaud the decision of the New Democratic Party, announced shortly after the election, that we would support the government in power, be it Liberal or Tory, provided progressive legislation was brought forth to the benefit of all people in Canada.

On January 4 the Liberals did bring forth a Speech from the Throne which contained many promises concerning pensions, housing and foreign ownership. We in the NDP supported the government on the basis that an opportunity should be given the government to translate its promises into legislation. Then, on February 19, the Liberals brought forth a budget which contained certain goodies relating to tax cuts, an improvement in the pensions of senior citizens and veterans and cuts in respect of sales tax. That is why we in the NDP supported the government on the budget, even though we had certain reservations about expansionary measures in respect of unemployment.

What is the position of the Progressive Conservative party? Had we voted with them against the budget we would have deprived the people of Canada of all those benefits derived from it. I said in my opening remarks that the Conservatives never stated that they would give an increase. In fact, not one word has been forthcoming from any of their speakers in respect of the amount of the increase to pensioners.

Mr. Yewchuk: How much would you give, John?

Mr. Gilbert: I will get to that in one moment, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Yewchuk: Tell us now.

Mr. Gilbert: It is shocking to realize they did not even know that the 2 per cent ceiling in respect of the cost of living had been removed back in May. It is quite obvious that the Liberals cannot fault the Tories because back in 1957, as a result of their legislation, they became known as the "six buck boys". We recall in 1970 at Christmastime they gave the magnanimous increase of 42 cents to senior citizens.

Again we must appreciate that the best effort of the Tories was $65 at 70 years of age, and I think the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher) had the right to mention that during the debate. The very best effort of the Conservative party was $65 per month at age 70. The payment of $100 basic old age pension and the combined OAS and GIS of $170 with a payment of $325 to a married couple represent a step in the right direction.

Somebody asked what we in the NDP would do. We stated clearly that our position was related to an amount of $150 on the principle of universality. We have stated many times that this would do away with divisiveness and administrative complexity—and I refer to the combined OAS and GIS—being brought about concerning pensions. I would remind hon. members that the NDP government in British Columbia has ensured that every pensioner will get a minimum of $200 a month. This indicates that even though we are tied to $150 in respect of basic old age security pensions, we are prepared to move to take care of Canadians who are finding it difficult to meet expenses today. We feel, and I am sure the last speaker will bring this to the attention of the province of Ontario, that the government of Ontario should ensure that every pensioner in this province gets a minimum of $200. I had thought my good friend would make this type of remark concerning pensions, rather than attack his friends to the left.

The minister, when he spoke, set forth the figures which showed that 500,000 pensioners were in receipt of the full old age pension and guaranteed income supplement, and that another 550,000 were in receipt of partial OAS and GIS while 750,000 were in receipt of OAS alone, the basic pension. This indicates the three different groups of pensioners we have in this country today. He also pointed out that the provinces have established priorities with regard to other groups in the community such as the disabled, single family parents, unemployable unemployed, and low income people. He quite rightly pointed out that the Canada Assistance Plan provides a measure of relief to the provinces which are participating in it because of the 50 per cent contribution by the federal government. This type of comment is justified and constructive, but I think there is a necessity for the federal government to establish priorities concerning the unemployed, inflation and social security measures.

In respect of senior citizens, I think the priority at the moment, after the passage of this legislation, should be, first, in relation to housing. There should be more senior citizens' housing so that the senior citizens can rent housing at reasonable rates. This would mean that any increases that they are now receiving would not be swallowed up through increases in rent. Also if we were to increase the amount of housing available for senior citizens we would probably have a practical demonstration of what the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) called the trickled-down theory in housing, whereby senior citizens who now occupy large homes might move to more comfortable accommodation and avoid the necessity of looking after repairs, painting and so on. If they so wished, such persons could move into senior citizens accommodation and thus provide more homes for younger families. I believe it is very important that more senior citizens housing be constructed.

Another priority for our senior citizens would be the provision of drugs at reasonable prices. I recall that when the government eliminated the 11 per cent sales tax on drugs many people thought we would have a substantial reduction in the price of drugs. This did not happen. In fact, studies indicate that some drug firms absorbed that 11 per cent and put it into their pockets. I would remind you, Mr. Speaker, that the province of Manitoba, under a New Democratic Party government, brought forward its budget a short time ago in which provision was made for free drugs for all senior citizens. This is a measure which I think should be promoted by the federal government in an attempt to spur on the other provinces to take action concerning drugs for our senior citizens.

The next item of priority in respect of senior citizens should involve food costs. Some protection should be given to the Price of basic foods enjoyed by senior citizens. An article in the Toronto Star of February 26 by Anne Wanstall indicates how the sudden hikes in prices have affected many people. She said:

> Supermarkets are first in line as consumers fire pot shots that could grow into cannon balls. If last week's mail is anything to go by, the executives who make the policies which determine the prices we're asked to pay, had better come up with some answers.

Then, she gave an example:

> Wanda Pratt of Weston has a gripe about the rising price of prune juice. "About six weeks ago I paid 39 cents. Then it went up to 42 cents; two weeks later up to 49 cents and last week to 52 cents. They can't tell me that this was all due to a poor crop of plums."

She points out that this purchase poker that the chain stores play with regard to food prices must stop because it directly affects different groups within the community. One group which is substantially affected is the senior citizens.

Another priority in respect of the senior citizens I think should involve the situation where one spouse is under 65 years of age. In his speech the minister indicated that the cost of granting a pension to a person who is between age 60 and age 64 while the other person is over age 65 would be $150 million. I suggest this would be an expense well worth incurring, since there are many cases in which one pensioner is over age 65 while the other is under age 65. These people suffer severe hardships today. When we think that we are contemplating giving an amount of $500 million to corporations through tax benefits, surely we can give an amount of $150 million to the senior citizens in order to cover that situation.

I believe the government should also consider as a priority the lowering of the age in respect of pensions to 60 years. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said that the test may have to be that of employment. There is a great deal of unemployment at the moment and many people feel that the lowering of the pensionable age to 60 on a voluntary rather than a compulsory basis would draw out many workers who are now 60 years of age and over.

I recall the experience I had in Toronto. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was kind enough to send me as a representative of our party to a pension conference. At that conference I put forward the suggestion that we should lower the age limit to 60 years. I received an interesting answer from one of the senior citizens. She asked me if I agreed that Senators and Members of Parliament should quit work at age 60. She wanted to know why I was asking them to quit when Senators and Members of Parliament continue for many years beyond age 60. I am inclined to agree with her point. It underlines the necessity of retirement at that age being voluntary rather than compulsory. The adoption of this proposal would involve the lowering of the eligible age in respect of the Canada Pension Plan, and some of the other pension funds, because it would not do to have a person retire at age 60 and receive merely the basic old age pension, plus perhaps the guaranteed income supplement, and then have to wait until age 65 before receiving benefit under the Canada Pension Plan. That is one problem. The other problem is that we would have to include an acceleration clause in the Canada Pension Plan in the same way it is incorporated in the old age security plan. This should be a requirement. Otherwise, the amount of pension received by people when they retire will be reduced substantially as a result of the increase in the cost of living.

These are the three areas to which the government should give first priority for study, research and development of policy. We in the NDP welcome the changes in the legislation, but we look forward to further improvements in the near future.

[Translation]

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I should like to seize this opportunity to say a few words about Bill C-147.

I do not rise to fight this bill, but to approve it. We do not have the chance to approve stronger measures, so we shall at least give our approval to the minimum and we hope the bill will have third reading as soon as possible. That is why we do not wish unduly to delay the committee stage of the bill.

In this connection, I wonder why it should be referred to committee; we might just as well complete the second and third readings right away, and say: That's that, the bill is passed, for I cannot see what major amendments the committee could make. Some amendments will be proposed, but since amendments increasing government expenditure cannot be made in committee, I see no compelling reason why the bill should go to committee. Still, procedure must be followed, even if it does take time. We must reply to those who ask when the bill will go through, saying: Wait for the procedure to take its course.

It has always struck me in the House that, when any government introduces some social reform, they always make it seem to the people like some wonderful bargain that they had not been expecting. When you get down to studying it, there is really very little to it.

The process is reversed when it comes to proposed taxation. They speak quite bashfully to the public, and say: Well, it isn't much really. Just a little tax that you will hardly feel at all; whereas in fact it is a monstrosity. This is the sleight of hand that they try out on the public. What I dislike is the dishonesty of it.

Why not call on the population and simply say: This is what we have to offer. The government should stop playing cat and mouse with the people. After all, they are not at all more stupid than we are. Everybody can see through the government's game and this is why today they hate only some methods of the government. In fact, those methods have always been used.

The bill before us will increase the pension to $100 a month. First of all, they say that the pension is being raised from $82 to $100, which is not true since by the end of March the pension will automatically fall to $86.61. The increase coming into force on April 1 amounts to only $13.39 a month. Once more, let us speak the truth. I like things to be clear and I do support truth. This is why I wish to quote the appropriate figures very clearly.

Many politicians deliberately tell people in their faces: the pension will amount to $170. This is another story that proves false. The pension does not amount to $170 but to $100 a month, and to this sum can be added a $70 supplement—I call that public assistance—subject to all kinds of inquiries whose purpose is to try to avoid granting it. Mr. Speaker, while adding a $70 supplement, they do not intend to do justice to the older citizens because the purpose of all these inquiries is to try to avoid granting it. Therefore, let us not call that a pension.

When referring to the pension in the House, I always have said: The pension, to be fair and equitable, must first of all be universal. If we allege that the pension amounts to $170, let us grant it to everybody indiscriminately. We should not make the senior citizens believe that they will receive monthly pensions of $170 because if they have another income their pensions are decreased. Therefore, what they are told is not true. Personally I simply tell them: Your pension is now $82 and it will be raised to $100. The rest of the pension can vary since what you get will depend on your income.

Those who have worked hard during their lifetime to save some money—it was the practice of our fathers and grandfathers for their old days—made a mistake. Because they have saved a few hundred dollars they will not get the $70 supplement. They are penalized by the government for their foresight. Today wealth means getting into debt and you must be old and in debt to receive the odd favour from the government. This seems to be the kind of education that we are trying to give today to our youth and I think it is very, very bad.

We simply ask for a pension. If we have again an opportunity to discuss that question in committee, we shall again ask for a true pension of $170 and 100 per cent universal for all senior citizens. When I say "all senior citizens" I mean the spouse younger than her pensionned husband. I always understood that when a pension is paid to the husband it is a family pension and if his wife is younger she is entitled to this pension.

We cannot expect an elderly couple to live five years on the salary of a single person. And I am very surprised that the government has not understood this fact because before the budget was introduced I was really sure that the pensioner's spouse was going to be eligible for the new pension. But it is not so, we still remain in the same old rut, we keep the same old principles and we leave the spouse aside and without any income.

The spouse may have some income in some provinces but not in Quebec. As soon as the husband gets $170, the Quebec Department of Health will tell him: that is enough. In Quebec, two persons must be satisfied with $170 to make a living. What a bright reasoning. These couples will have to fight again, beg and implore small politically bred inspectors to see if they have not inherited a few hundred dollars. We are against such ways of proceeding and this is why I say and repeat that only when the pension is universal will elder people begin to be treated as they deserve.

Secondly, like the New Democratic Party we often advocated in this House lowering the eligibility for pensions to age 60. I suggest this would be a very interesting matter of debate in committee, because bringing the age down to 60 does not require any effort on the part of the government and we offer them a means to really fight unemployment. As a matter of fact, according to some research I did at Statistics Canada, if we allowed people aged 60 to 65 to retire, we would provide 400,000 new jobs, which would enable 400,000 heads of families who now depend on the public treasury, who have 5, 6, 7 or 8 children and who cost the two levels of government $400, $500 or more a month, to go and earn a living in industry and take the place of the people who could retire if they were given $325 a month.

Mr. Speaker, the two levels of government would thus save money, in addition to which there would be 400,000 fewer unemployed. That is why we have suggested that pensionable age be reduced to 60; it would help the government solve the unemployment problem. Frankly, I am surprised again today that the government has not even mentioned it.

I do not know whether it is being discussed at the ministerial level but I feel this would be the best thing; let us stop applying bandaids to reduce unemployment, bandaids such as LIP projects, municipal projects, to create employment. A small political bonus is given industry; then we are told that 200 jobs have been created. That is not true; often, 200 jobs were wiped out. There is a bit of political play and we are told that will solve the problem of unemployment; that is not true.

Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that the problem of unemployment will only be solved through a massive movement of workers. As for senior citizens between 60 and 65, they should be given real instead of sham pensions. Thus, 400,000 unemployed heads of families could earn a living in industry and there would be only 300,000 unemployed left.

In addition, a salary should be paid to mothers. In that case, according to a survey 200,000 mothers would reintegrate their home, and there would be 200,000 fewer unemployed.

These are all suggestions, Mr. Speaker, that we make to the government so that it try and solve this famous unemployment problem. Once again, it is not by trying all kinds of little political tricks that a solution will be found to this unemployment problem. Everything that is done is unfair. Cases of injustice are multiplied by political patronage.

Mr. Speaker, once again, I greatly appreciate the little we are getting today; we shall give our full support to the bill but we truly hope that the government will propose within a few months a more concrete, more realistic bill that will enable it to deal with the unemployment problem.

We also would have liked the bill to provide for an agreement on drugs with the provinces. Today, the big problem of senior citizens aged 65 and over is that of drugs. They require so much care and so many drugs that when they have to pay, life is not a bed of roses in many homes.

In my riding, I had the opportunity to visit most of the homes for the aged and I think that their problem is one of drugs.

If, one day, we could give them such things as drugs, as we do for welfare recipients, this would lessen a great deal the worries of senior citizens. We would thus find a solution to another problem facing these people.

I do not know what the situation is outside the province of Quebec, but I am telling the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) to be on the lookout, because Quebecers are often being tricked. Every time an increase was granted, Quebec hurried to get it back right away and this is expected to happen again. It has already started in the case of rents and it is going to happen in nursing homes, Mr. Speaker. In such cases, older people suddenly realize that they are poorer than before, after a bill is passed, because the moment the government is giving people more money to improve their lot, the Quebec government sends out two or three inspectors to recover this money for the benefit of the provincial treasury.

It is too bad it's happening in my own province, but I must say it and I have to warn the minister about this.

We are in favour of this bill and we do not want to delay it being referred to the committee.

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I would like to express a few comments on this very important bill. At the time of the budget debate, I had, like many others, the opportunity to voice a few opinions about old age security.

As this bill provides for a substantial increase in the income of older people, I am sorry that consideration was not given to granting the old age security pension to people under 65.

I would have believed it possible to give the old age security pension to the persons of 64 at least, for the present year. I think that many hon. members have already addressed this request to the minister in this House. I presume that the minister responsible and his officials have looked into the matter of reducing the eligibility age for old age pensions.

In view of the present social situation and the technical changes which have occurred in industry, there is an urgent need to give to people of 60 years of age and over a well deserved retirement. I am not the first one to draw the Minister's attention to the unemployment situation in the country. Personally, I feel that it would be a great help toward alleviating this problem which has been with us for several years and that it could allow people of 60 and over to receive the pension even though we may extend the process over a five-year period as we did before when the eligibility age for the old age security pension was lowered from 70 to 65.

I believe that this would have been possible and I worry a little about the attitude of parties in general which could not get together and force the government to take such a step. I am thinking particularly of NDP members who, since I came here at least, have many times expressed their interest in our senior citizens and underprivileged people. And I was very surprised that the NDP Party did not dare bring forward an amendment to that effect when the budget was tabled. I will not look for the reasons, because many members know them. However, I must remind the members of the New Democratic Party that they must respect the principles which they have always bravely upheld in this House and I wonder to what extent the public is aware not only of some kind of hesitation, but also of a certain amount of dishonesty in connection with the principles they have always extolled.

I think that the parties and members opposite would have surely been pleased to support an amendment brought in by the New Democratic Party and aimed at granting old age security pensions at least to people 64 years of age going down gradually to those 60 years of age. I take the liberty of reminding members of that party the position which they have always held in this House and may they also be reminded that the Canadian people are somewhat concerned about their inaction with respect to those principles.

Mr. Speaker, I would therefore like to take this opportunity, while admitting that the increases are most acceptable and interesting for our senior citizens, to remind the Minister of the importance of reconsidering—if this has not already been done—the possibility of enabling more people aged 60 or over to "go on leave". I would not go so far as saying that all those who could go on leave to-morrow morning, because of old age security pensions being granted at the early age of 60, should be replaced in industry. No, sir. For various reasons, I think that some industries would not hire other people to replace them. Still, I think that thousands of people could go into retirement and that jobs could be found for thousands of unemployed. Thus our present social context would be improved by allowing people aged 60 to go on leave and by having employment made available to 20-year-olds for whom the State often spends as much as $100 a week.

I feel that this should be considered by this House and also that it is important to remember all the efforts that this government has made during the past five years injecting money into various parts of this country, in order to fight unemployment; we find that in spite of all these efforts, the unemployment rate has increased two-fold if not threefold. I therefore feel this measure would promote a healthy social atmosphere and once more I invite hon. members of this House to give serious thought to this possibility and to urge the government to take early action. In the present situation, this possibility exists. All opposition members can certainly join forces and impose such action on the government, should they hesitate too long.

I venture to believe that the minister will take these remarks into consideration, as well as those of previous speakers and will give a positive reply to those who anxiously look to this legislation. Furthermore, recently, in my riding, the Central Council of the CNTU, during its Convention, adopted a resolution which I communicated this week to the minister. On the basis of my prior representations concerning this legislation, I urge the minister to grant sixty year olds the old age security pension.

Furthermore, I do hope that if unions like the CNTU with a membership of thousands of workers are favourable to that legislation, it would be proper to give this old age security pension to all those who are 65.

I shall limit myself to these few remarks. I did not want to let this opportunity go by without asking again for the passing of a law which would provide the old age security pension to those who are 60.

And I would also invite the minister to consider the possibility of giving this pension to the spouse who has not yet reached the age of 65. It is absolutely unfair for a couple when both are over age 65 to get $325 while a senior citizen whose spouse is younger has to live on $170.

Since it is unfair, I feel it is imperative for the government to study seriously the possibility of giving more assistance to the couple who is inconvenienced and antagonized by an act that grants $325 to one couple and $170 to another.

I know that by proving to the department of National Health and Welfare that the couple's income is not sufficient, some compensation may be obtained. But I also know very well that several persons have a hard time proving their entitlement to those supplementary benefits, that are often necessary, and that it often takes months of inquiry for the department to recognize their right to them.

So I think that such injustice should be corrected and that these people should be reassured by enacting a legislation whch would be fairer and more flexible and which would allow us to solve a great number of problems.

I will conclude my remarks, in expressing the hope that the minister will take them into account and that the political parties which have the opportunity to bring the government to enact that solution will unite and that the New Democratic Party will not hesitate in following the principles they have always defended in this House.

As far as I am and many others are concerned, we entertain certain reservations about the honesty they have always displayed towards senior citizens. It is never too late to take action. I would hope that, the various parties in this House will combine their efforts, either in committee or through another way, to make it possible for the senior citizens to obtain that pension as soon as possible, or at least to get it on a five years trial basis as it has already been done in other circumstances.

That would really show that we want to do something that an effort is being made to solve the problems; I believe that it would be a very good step for the minister, the Government and the Parliament to take.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. Before recognizing the minister, I must point out to the members that if he now speaks he will close the debate, according to the Standing Order No. 37. I now give the floor to the member for Champlain.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. minister of National Health and Welfare on a point of order.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I understood that it had been agreed by the parties that there would only be one speaker for each party this afternoon, and that I would close the debate. I would gladly do so, and as far as we are concerned we will have no other speaker.

Now, it is my understanding that the member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) wants to make a speech. I am afraid that this would upset the debate; if the Honourable Member for Champlain makes a speech, I fear that members from other opposition parties will also want to speak, as well as members of my own party who have agreed not to take part in the debate this afternoon.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I am sure the hon. minister will understand that the Chair is never involved in such agreements between parties. Therefore, if an hon. member rises, he must be allowed to speak, and so I call upon the hon. member for Champlain.

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I understand the minister's point of view very well. I was not here when that agreement was made. In any case, since we are only at the second reading and committee stage, I expect to make representations to the committee, and also at the report stage. For now, I should like to hear what the honourable minister has to say.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. As I just mentioned I will recognize the minister. According to Standing Order 37, I must remind hon. members that if the minister speaks at this time he will close the debate. The hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde).

An hon. Member: So be it.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I should like first to thank the hon. member for Champlain for his co-operation. If I have understood correctly, he had not been informed of the agreement between the parties, and I am sorry that this information did not reach him. I indeed hope that at the committee stage and at all other stages he will have the chance to make his position clear to the rest of the House.

I do not intend to speak at length; I believe members of all parties have had the opportunity to express their views. The fate of our senior citizens is a matter of the deepest concern for all members, whichever party they belong to. I have, for example, noticed several members on both sides of the House raising the matter of a possible lowering of the eligibility age. Others have talked about granting a certain amount to spouses of pensioners when the spouse is not of pensionable age.

Obviously, those are questions we are all concerned about and would like to see implemented as soon as possible. I must say that that question has been submitted to me very frequently by my Liberal colleagues since I have had the honour of assuming the responsibilities of Minister of National Health and Welfare.

I would like to reassure hon. members that I am not opposed to it in principle, far from it. I hope I have shown in the speech I made at the beginning of the debate on second reading that I consider it my duty to look into that problem with my provincial colleagues in the light of an over-all reform of social security in Canada. As I indicated in that speech, we have over 150,000 abandoned mothers who must look after 350,000 children and who at the present time receive benefits which are a shame to this country and unworthy of the condition in which they find themselves.

There are also 200,000 disabled people in Canada, between ages 18 and 65, who are now getting much lower benefits than those paid to older people. There are also 575,000 persons under social security who are also getting much lower benefits than those paid to older people.

While considering the question of reducing the age of eligibility for pension benefits, we should look into the whole question of benefits that are paid to the needy in this country. It is not only a question of trying to solve the problem of people from 60 to 65 but of tackling the poverty issue in all its aspects. I believe this would be the best way for us to meet the expectations of all Canadian citizens and the best way for this parliament, I think, to overcome poverty problem which unfortunately is still too acute everywhere in Canada despite the wealth of this country.

I am pleased to note that the oppositions parties generally agree with the government and will support this bill.

[English]

However, I am a bit confused about the stand of the official opposition on this whole issue. I listened with great interest to the various speakers from the Conservative party on this proposal. I am still hard put to come to a clear understanding as to exactly where they stand on this whole question.

When the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) spoke at the opening of the debate, he said that his party would support the bill. I was very happy to hear this. However, the last speaker from that party said that he would not support it. I would like to know how many members of that party agree with the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Reilly) and how many agree with the hon. member for Hillsborough, whose word I accept that his party will support the bill. However, this kind of position does not help to understand the fundamental attitude of the Conservative party with regard to assisting the aged people of this country.

An hon. Member: It is not enough.

Mr. Lalonde: I am coming to the amount. Even after this debate, I am still not able to assess where that party stands. I first understood that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) referred to his own proposals of $92 or $95 at the most. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon), in a kind of supreme effort, raised it to the level of $97.88.

When the hon. member for Ste. Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) was speaking the other day, he developed an instant policy. In spite of all the pontifications and exhortations in his speech, I have not been able to find a particular figure. All that I heard was that he would like a civilized basic old age pension. That is a beautiful objective, but it is not very helpful in determining that particular level.

I was worried, concerned and even flabbergasted by the approach of the Conservative party to the question of attitude vis-à-vis the aged people. With all due respect to the hon. member for Hillsborough, I heard some members supporting programs like New Horizons in order to provide our aged citizens with activities and a more meaningful life rather than merely providing them with money. The following day I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche) clearly state that, while not opposed to the aged people, he was opposed to the New Horizons program. This is clearly in the record. He is a member of the party which, in the previous debate, wanted to cut to $1 the amount allocated to New Horizons. There again, I would be pleased to accept the word of the hon. member for Hillsborough. I assume that he was speaking for his party, although voices in the background and certain previous actions during the course of this session seemed to indicate that that party would like to be on both sides of the fence all the time.

Mr. Gilbert: Right on.

Mr. Lalonde: There is another aspect of this question that also surprises me about the attitude of the Conservative party in this matter. This arises from the exhortations of the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe when he was talking about the necessity of acting immediately to either cover the spouse or reduce the age for the payment of benefits. The hon. member asked the government for immediate action on this, even though he knew very well that I had stated quite clearly in this House that I have discussed this matter with my provincial counterparts. We were unanimously of the view that, at this particular time, we should not touch the structure of the system of old age security in this country, but that this question should be part of the general review that will take place of the social security system. They were not opposed in principle to reducing the age for benefits, but they said, "Before you go ahead and do that on your own, let us have a meeting; let us see what are the priorities in this country for the payment of social benefits, and let us see, together, whether the first priority should be lowering the age for the payment of pensions or whether the first priority should not be in other areas of welfare in this country." That is what the provinces said, all of them, including those in which the Conservative party happens to be in power.

• (1620)

The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) now says, "We want all this now." He is the same member who, during the campaign, went around accusing the government of rigidity, of not listening to the provinces, of acting on its own, of arrogance—you name it. That same hon. member and that same party to which he belongs, after having talked about co-operation with provinces, satisfying the provinces and what not, now come before the House and say, "Go ahead; act now; forget about the provinces; do not care about them." You know, I would have hoped for more consistency in that respect.

An hon. Member: But he is a former Liberal.

Mr. Lalonde: Some people also suggested that I was taking a somewhat too partisan approach on this question, and arrogating too much credit to Liberal governments in the area of old age pension benefits. I should like to give more credit to opposition parties, more credit to the Conservative party. I would love to do that, if that party had a better record on this legislation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: Previously in the debate I said that we do not know whether that party is for or against the New Horizons program, whether it is for co-operation with the provinces or not and whether it will vote for this bill or not. If one looks back over history one will see, Mr. Speaker, that of the basic amount of $100 in basic pension benefits that we have finally reached after 30 years or more, the Conservative party has contributed $19. Worse than that, its contribution represents $19 out of $170, or $38 out of $325. That is the record of the Conservative Party on this whole question. So, I think members of this House and the people of this country have every reason to be a bit suspicious about the boastings of the Conservative party in this respect.

An hon. Member: How much has the NDP contributed?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The NDP is responsible for all of it.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, would the minister permit a short question relating to the 42 cents that the government gave our senior citizens for a Christmas present?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could answer questions when we consider the bill in committee, probably in the first few days of next week. I am stating facts. They are all there, for all to see.

Mr. Alexander: Tell us about the 42 cents.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I do not see how there can be room for argument. I am sorry if my words seem to hurt the feelings of some hon. members. I would not want to hurt hon. members.

Mr. Yewchuk: The minister is not hurting us.

Mr. Lalonde: Let me point out that the $19 increase for which the Conservative party is responsible took the form of two increases, both of which happened to be introduced just before an election.

Mr. Alexander: But it looks pretty good compared with 42 cents.

Mr. Lalonde: That party has a consistent record in that respect. My party increased old age pension benefits in 1968, 1969, 1970, 1971, 1972 and 1973. So, I do not think anybody, especially those on the opposition side, can accuse us of cynicism or opportunism in this respect. If any party can be accused, it is another party which shall remain unnamed for the time being.

Mr. Alexander: I wish the minister would tell us about the 42 cents.

Mr. Lalonde: I should like to conclude by touching on two points, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: If hon. members wish, I can talk for much longer on this particular subject. Much more could be said. However, I think we will let the opposition, particularly the Conservative party, go scott-free today on this subject. We may have to come back to that party later on.

I was particularly pleased that the House passed unanimously a motion objecting to the increase in rents that will take place in many cases across this country following the increase in benefits. I hope private citizens will take note of the views of this House in this respect and I hope, in particular, that provincial governments will take note of the view of this House in this respect.

An hon. Member: Why does this government not take note?

Mr. Lalonde: An hon. member asked, why does this government not do that? The minister responsible for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has taken a clear stand on this question and said that this government has frozen the rents of old people, especially those occupying housing owned by the federal government. I should like to be able to say the same about provincial governments presently being run by the Conservative party. I should like them to give us a similar assurance.

Mr. Yewchuk: They are the "have" provinces.

Mr. Lalonde: For several years, after increases have been given, several provincial governments have increased rents and absorbed most if not all of those increases provided by the federal parliament to old age pensioners.

[Translation]

And on that account, the point raised by the hon. member who spoke on behalf of the Social Credit Party of Canada surely deserves notice.

[English]

I note that provinces are paying old age pensioners living in provincial institutions what they call comfort allowances, which vary between $15 and $26, according to provincial policy. What happens is this: it seems that the provinces collect the old age pension cheques and hand over to these old people amounts which vary, as I said, between $15 and $26, for their day-to-day expenses. The proposed increase in the case of a person who will receive both the basic pension and the guaranteed income supplement will be over $20. I hope that the provinces will not keep all that increase, and still pay to old age pensioners only the so-called comfort allowance of between $15 and $26. If we examine previous experiences, we will see, I am sorry to say, that several provincial governments have acted in that way. I hope that the increase the federal parliament will grant to old age pensioners will not find its way into provincial coffers. I hope that the views of this parliament on that question will be noted by all provincial governments.

[Translation]

As to the question raised earlier by the Social Credit spokesman concerning drugs, there is no doubt that it is a problem which comes first under the responsibility of the province. I would like to draw his attention to the fact that if some elderly people are in need and if they receive, in addition to the pension paid by the federal government, allowances from a provincial welfare department, the government pays first 50 per cent of the additional amounts and the drugs will be paid in the case of these people, in the same way as in the case of people who depend on welfare allowances.

I must also mention that some other provinces have already set up or intend to set up a system under which drugs will be available to people who are 65 or more.

Here again, these are questions that will certainly be discussed during the meetings I shall hold both with the provincial ministers of health and ministers of welfare.

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to keep this debate going much longer. I want simply to thank the hon. members who had the opportunity to express themselves on this subject during the last two days of debate and I would like to apologize particularly to the government members who wanted to express their views on this subject and who accepted not to take the floor in order to speed up the debate and to expedite passage of this bill.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Hamilton West rising for the purpose of asking a question?

Mr. Alexander: One short question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member can ask a question only if the hon. member who has the floor is willing to answer a question.

Mr. Lalonde: I will accept a question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Alexander: I will not be long, Mr. Speaker. I was impressed with the historical recitation given by the minister of the plight of our senior citizens. However, he conveniently forgot, I hope through inadvertence rather than through purpose, the fact that at one time there was a figure of 42 cents mentioned by him. I am wondering whether the minister can advise the House how that figure came about, and how he can take such pride in the policies of a government that had the cheek and the nerve to offer the senior citizens a 42-cent increase. I know the minister was not here at that time but was in the bureaucracy. Perhaps he could answer that question for me.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member said, I was not in the House at that particular time and I do not recollect all the facts. But if I remember correctly, this was at the time when this government introduced a very progressive step in the form of the Guaranteed Income Supplement. A $25 additional payment was made to every elderly person in the country who, because of their income situation, were unable to make both ends meet. This particular adjustment was made at that time so as to round out the figures of $80, while at the same time we increased the GIS from $31.83 to $55. My hon. friend should look at all of the facts. I did not inadvertently miss that point. The government rounded out the basic old age pension to $80, but also increased payments to senior citizens in need by almost $25, which I think is a pretty good record.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the minister agree to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) asking him a question?

Mr. Lalonde: With pleasure, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister would accept another question. Even though he seems to have said no at this point to the payment of the pension under the Old Age Security Act to those between the ages of 60 and 65 on the basis of any one of several plans, is the minister still willing to have this matter thoroughly discussed in the committee to which this bill is being referred, and is he prepared to keep an open mind on the possibility of something still being done in this respect during this session?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, as far as the first question is concerned, I shall certainly be very pleased, if allowed to do so under the rules of the committee, to have a full discussion with hon. members on the question of lowering the age and all other aspects. Second, I want to assure hon. members that I do not have a closed mind on this question; I have a very open mind. I would love to be able to do this, but as I have mentioned we must look at the matter in terms of general priorities in the field of social security at the present time, taking into account the resources that may reasonably be made available in the short term.

With regard to action being taken in the present session, there will be further meetings with the provinces. I do not know whether the meeting being held in April will be sufficient to enable us to arrive at some agreement, or at some consensus, or whatever is the term we use for what we do with the provincial governments. If a consensus develops with the provinces that this is an area which should receive priority, then I would be happy to raise the matter with my colleagues and see whether we can take some action.

At the present time my view is that before committing ourselves to making any such move in the immediate future we should take a very careful and thorough look, not only at whether there should be a lowering of the age for pension entitlement but also at all of the calls that people in this country who are in need make upon the public purse, whether it be the federal purse or the provincial purse. As the hon. member knows, many demands are made on the provinces in the field of welfare for people below 65 years of age.

I am not in a position to commit the government or myself to taking action on this subject in this particular session of parliament. I have said that I feel that the next step to take in this session—and I do not know how many sessions there will be in this parliament—is to substantially improve the family allowance scheme. Can we then take a third step, which would be to decrease the age for pension entitlement during the course of this session? Personally, I would doubt it, but I have an open mind on the subject and will keep an open mind.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE AMOUNT OF PAYMENT

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that Bill C-148, to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act, be read a second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be speaking at this time on a bill designed to improve the War Veterans Allowance Act and the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act. I should like first to recall briefly to the House some of the significant improvements which have been effected in the legislation governing war veterans allowances and civilian war allowances since January 1972.

On March 21, 1972, the regulations were amended so that exempt casual earnings were not restricted to a four month period.

On May 15, 1972, legislation was approved which exempted cost of living increases in the OAS and GIS payments in the amount of $15 for single war allowance recipients and $30 for married recipients.

On May 19, 1972, the War Veterans Allowance Act was amended to provide for escalation of the rates and ceilings effective January 1, 1972 and on January 1 of each succeeding year, in accordance with increases in the consumer price index.

On November 9, 1972, the regulation was removed which assessed as income for war veterans allowance and civilian war allowances purposes, a percentage of the value of a home in excess of $10,000.

On January 13, 1973, the amount of casual earnings permitted in any year was increased from $800 to $1000 for single recipients and from $1200 to $1500 for married recipients.

Finally, the war veterans allowance and civilian war allowances rates and ceilings which were in effect on December 31, 1971 have since been improved by $10 per month for single and $16.61 per month for married recipients.

The bill now before you will further increase these rates and ceilings by an additional $20.14 single and $39.60 married. This provides a total increase of $30.14 or 24.8 per cent, single, and $56.21 or 27.8 per cent, married, since December 31, 1971. The orphan rates have similarly been increased by more than 24 per cent during this 15-month period.

Another major feature of this bill is the removal of personal property limitations which now stand at $1250 single and $2500 married. This means that it will no longer be necessary for an applicant to liquidate his assets in order to qualify for an allowance.

I am especially pleased and proud to speak to this bill because, although rates and ceilings, casual earnings and permissible property values have changed many times since the War Veterans Allowance Act was passed in 1930, this is the first time a bill has been introduced in this House which proposes the complete removal of the limits on personal property. This will mean that war veterans allowances and civilian war allowances will, as of April 1, 1973, change from a means tested program to a modified income tested program.

I am sure all members will agree that those who are eligible to receive payments under these acts merit our special concern. Their eligibility is based on service to Canada during a time of war. These people, both servicemen and civilians, risked their lives for their country. We should not forget that they are entitled, not to favours, but to what they have so valiantly earned and justly deserved. The adoption of this bill will simply assure these people a better standard of living.

Many of these men left home and enlisted at an early age and, because of the years they spent in the service of their country, were not always able on their return to improve their education or training to attain a degree of skill which would have been within their reach had they not enlisted. The result is that in later years when they suffer some disability, which may not be directly caused by their war service, they have difficulty in providing for themselves and their families. These men are, to a large degree, casualties of war, although they may not have been wounded. Their widows and orphans also deserve our special consideration.

I believe, Sir, that the measures proposed in this bill will be welcomed by every member of this House as concrete evidence of our awareness of the special contribution this group of Canadian citizens has made to their country and as a clear indication of our commitment to treat them in a fair and just manner.

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, after the past two months of tension in this House of Commons I think that during the debate on Bill C-148 you will see a change of tempo. There will be no banter back and forth across the floor. I can assure you that the Veterans Affairs Committee is a committee, the members of which have comradeship, esprit de corps and understanding. We are dealing with a topic that is diminishing in importance in the country. It is a topic which nobody can argue is anything but significant in our society, since it relates to the war veterans of Canada who deserve everything we can give them.

I am pleased to follow the new Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald), who is presenting his first bill in the House of Commons, and I congratulate him. While I did congratulate him at the committee hearings when we were discussing the supplementary estimates, I hope members will allow me to repeat what I said as I feel it should be placed in the Hansard record. I repeat my congratulations because, as I said, the minister should be an example for all Canada, certainly to those of us here, of what a Canadian can accomplish against all odds and adversities suffered while defending his country. The minister came back to Canada and, as a double amputee, gained the highest achievement to which a veteran in this country of ours could aspire, becoming the Minister of Veterans Affairs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marshall: I know, Mr. Speaker, that this is not the time to be handing out bouquets to members opposite or ministers, but perhaps it does not hurt once in a while to have the opportunity to exhibit a little human understanding and compassion.

I am pleased also that the introduction of this bill gives us an opportunity to discuss a topic which, as I said before, is unfortunately diminishing in importance in Canada. That topic is veterans affairs. It is diminishing in importance because people are preoccupied with beating each other's brains apart over the material things that seem to be so important. Even with all the expertise at our disposal, we cannot seem to solve the important problems. I am sure the minister knows what I mean, and I am sure he will agree that with all the unrest in the country, Canadian governments could look to the veterans organizations to get an example of comradeship, neighbourliness and humanity. In our continuous struggle to prevent a breakdown in national unity we try to legislate, set up studies and commissions or sit at conferences. I say, Mr. Speaker, that national unity cannot be legislated by governments, by sitting around a conference table, by studies and commissions or by presenting bills in parliament. National unity is created in the hearts of people and is passed on over the years because our ancestors suffered hardship in discovering and building Canada and in making it the great nation it is today.

• (1650)

The veterans of Canada protected the unity of our country in the First and Second World Wars, and in Korea, when they pledged their loyalty to Queen and country and defended Canada against tyranny. They went to foreign countries to do so as well as to protect other nations of the world because our country asked them to do so. They did not ask for any special favours. The contracts they signed were all one-sided. There were no fringe benefits, no automatic increases in pay and allowances, no hospital benefits. What is most important is that they fought together, not as citizens of different origins, not as English or French or any particular race, creed or colour. They fought together against a common enemy as Canadians.

Today, with all the expertise we have we are trying to find out why the youth of Canada are reacting against the establishment. We also hear frequently about their abhorrence of anything military and their attitude against war. I have no quarrel with their attitude. Nobody wants war. I apologize for saying that I have a son who also hates mention of the word "war". I do not want him or any of my children to ever experience war. But let me remind the youth of our country that there are thousands of graves over in Europe of young lads who were 18 and 19, yes, and even younger, who did not like the word "war" in World Wars I and II. Some of them even lied about their ages so that they could come to the defence of their country, their parents or loved ones. They should be here now enjoying our prosperity and taking advantage of the supposed opportunities that exist; but they cannot because they lie in the war graves of Europe.

May I respectfully suggest to the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) that in his youth exchange programs he might show a little patriotism by arranging some trips to the war graves of Europe if he wants to do something worthwhile for our youth and for the benefit of this country. We cannot blame our youth for the failure of our governments to live up to their commitments to our veterans for the past 50 years. Yes, we forget too easily, and perhaps I should put on the record these words which appear on one of the war graves in Europe:

> Here we lie because we did not choose to live and shame the land from which we sprung. Life to be sure is nothing much to lose, but young men think it is . . . And we were young.

Those were the youths of past world wars; those were the youths who had the right to live, to react and to demonstrate. Perhaps some of them might even be sitting here as members of parliament today, but I am not sure how much they would appreciate what is happening. But we forget so easily. Nobody in his right mind wants a war. But we have to go to war because of the stupidity and selfishness of those who govern, and because of the greed, hate and ambition that lies in the twisted minds of those who gain power through deviousness and the quest for power.

We have seen examples in recent weeks of the results of the war in Viet Nam in which thousands of young Americans also lost their opportunity to enjoy the great future that they had hoped their country would provide. And what did our governments do during the past 54 years for those Canadians who went to three wars for the same reason? I cannot use more forceful words than the veterans organizations did which presented a brief to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs during the joint study on the basic rate of pension. They state:

> The dollar value of war disability pensions for 100 per cent disability pensioners, has because of erosion and neglect fallen to a critical level.
> This has happened because of the failure of successive governments in the last 50 years to maintain the basic rate of pension at approximately the same level as that paid to unskilled workers in the public service.

It is not 50 years but more like 54 years. There are almost one million war veterans in Canada today who served our country. Many thousands of them made their sacrifice but returned to Canada, took up their lives and occupations and became successful. They caught up to society because of their initiative, drive and knowledge. But they are still veterans. They maintain their interest in their fellow comrades and belong to veterans organizations with the sole purpose of helping their comrades. Some of the successful ones even sit here today as Members of Parliament trying to do their best for their country and for their comrades. But many came back maimed and disabled. They do not want to beg from government, but they are forced to do so because they lost the best years of their lives fighting for their country. The veterans we are talking about are either too disabled to take their place in society or are those who fall into the category of the burnt-out pensioner.

This brings me to the subject of the bill before us, Bill C-148 to amend the War Veterans Allowances Act. I cannot personally, or on behalf of my party, quarrel with the amendments before us because they are good amendments. The bill provides for allowances to $151.14 for the single veteran and $257.21 for the married veteran with an allowable income of $40 and $70. There are supplementary benefits which one in the opposition should not mention, but I feel a most important amendment is the repeal of section 8 which removes the limitation in respect of payment of an allowance to a person who owns personal property. It also removes certain powers in relation to transfer of property in determining the amount of an allowance and provides for the future escalation of allowances under the act to commence on January 1, 1974. May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It is my duty pursuant to Standing Order 40 to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski)—Air Transport—Advance booking charter regulations—Assurance that travellers will be protected against price fixing; the hon. member for Meadow Lake (Mr. Nesdoly)—Canadian Culture—Multiculturalism—Request for grant to Saskatchewan provincial library to buy books in various languages; the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser)—Airports—Vancouver International—Proposed new runway—Request for information on environmental impact.

It being five o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper. I understand that an agreement has been reached concerning the business with which the House will proceed. Perhaps this could be spelled out by someone and presented to the House to see whether it meets the wishes of the House.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, we should be taking up the item Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers, but there have been discussions about this and I believe it would be acceptable to proceed to Private Members' Public Bills. If that should be agreeable, I should like to call Bill C-31. If we proceed to completion of that through all stages, then I would want to call Bill C-156. For the edification of hon. members, may I say that these bills would change the names of two constituencies, and it is normal practice in the House that when they are presented we take them through all the stages. I would suggest to the House that we use private members' time in this way.

• (1700)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Then I gather that we have several decisions to make, but first of all, is it the wish of hon. members that the two bills respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act be our preoccupation during the private members' hour?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If this is agreed, it has been suggested that these bills proceed through all stages here rather than be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. Do I gather that the wish of the House is that this indeed be the step that we take and the reference be to the Committee of the Whole rather than to the Committee on Privileges and Elections?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May the Chair make a suggestion that those bills receive their second reading in turn and that we then proceed to the committee study on both of them, then report back for third reading on both of them? This would have to be agreed to, I suppose, by the sponsor of the first bill primarily because if anything goes wrong it is his bill that suffers.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING CHANGE IN NAME OF CONSTITUENCY

Mr. Rod Blaker (Lachine) moved that Bill C-31, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, be read the second time and referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

He said: I promise to be brief as requested, Mr. Speaker. The bill proposes a change in the name of the riding of Lachine. I would simply explain to the House the two reasons for so doing. The first is that the riding itself consists of three cities, that of Lachine, Dorval, and Pointe Claire and there is a subsequent confusion between the name of one of the cities and the name of the riding from the federal point of view. The second reason is that, as hon. members are aware, the Federal Election Boundaries Commission has been making its recommendations and should some of the proposed changes take place the new boundaries of this riding, as recommended in the submission of that commission, will be more accurately reflected by the name Lachine-Lakeshore, as it is generally known in the area, and in French Lachine-Bord-du-Lac.

I think there is nothing further to add. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and members of the House for the privilege of presenting the bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING CHANGE IN NAME OF CONSTITUENCY

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo) moved that Bill C-156, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, be read the second time and referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few brief words on the reasons for the change in name. Recently an amalgamation took place of Galt, Preston and Hespeler. There is a considerable sense of loss of identity. These are historic communities which have been combined into a new city called Cambridge. It is my hope, with the approval of the House, to get the constituency name changed so that the transition from the old names that were so well loved in our area to the new name will be made more acceptable.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

Mr. Bell: That is the first thing the government has done this session.

Mr. Haidasz: No, the second.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, the House is in such a good humour that I am tempted to ask leave of the House to bring forward my own private members bill, but of course that would be an abuse of the House.

Since we have concluded the business that was set aside for private members hour, and since in the private members hour we have now passed more legislation than has the House of Commons, perhaps on that basis we might rise until eight o'clock this evening.

An hon. Member: Call it six o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that the hour now be seen as six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being near six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At 5.10 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE AMOUNT OF PAYMENT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan) that Bill C-148, to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs.

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, when I was interrupted at five o'clock I was giving kudos to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald). I wanted to mention the changes introduced by order in council rather than as amendments to the act. Some of these were as follows: First, the removal of the penalty imposed on recipients who own and occupy their own home valued in excess of $10,000; second, the removal of the penalties imposed on the sale of the home of the veteran; third, the increase by 25 per cent of the casual earnings of a veteran; fourth, the exemption of $15 and $30 for the veteran, either single or married, who qualifies for OAS/GIS.

I would like to say, with the utmost respect and sincerity, that this and past governments cannot be too proud of the fact that finally in 1973, some 54 years after the First World War, the war veterans allowance has reached a satisfactory figure. Some people may attack me for saying this because the war veterans allowance only came into effect in 1930, but we can take it all under the umbrella of the Pension Act. I can only repeat once more the words in the brief submitted by the war veterans' associations to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs dealing with the joint study report on the basic rate of pension:

> This has happened because of the failure of successive governments in the last 50 years to maintain the basic rate of pension at approximately the same level as that paid to unskilled workers in the public service.

The same can be said about war veterans allowances. Veterans are now in the twilight stages of their lives. The First World War veteran is in his late seventies and cannot take advantage of the increase permitted in casual earnings because he is long past the stage when he can work. The World War II veteran is now in his late fifties, and with our new thinking in society today he is long beyond the stage of consideration even for work on a LIP project. Probably the increase in casual earnings will help this veteran, the one whose children are grown up and educated, whose children have gone out on their own. He or his wife may earn a little more income to find a little extra comfort in their later years. Why couldn't the government give a little consideration to these people and increase the allowable earnings to something more meaningful, so that a veteran could enjoy some comfort and at the same time get back a feeling of contributing to society?

None of those who sat in government over the past 50 years can be proud. I do not blame the present minister; I blame all past governments. Here again we have an opportunity to correct all the inequities in the War Veterans Allowance Act, and we still leave some items uncorrected. For example, under the War Veterans Allowance Act a widow or widower responsible for the support of a child may draw the married rate. However, this ceases when the child reaches 21 years of age. This is a great imposition if the child desires to continue in school. Surely we can amend the act to raise the age to 25, to give the child a better opportunity to complete his or her education.

Under the eligibility clause of non-resident recipients, war veterans allowance may be paid to an eligible person who absents himself from Canada if, on the day that he leaves Canada, he is a recipient of the allowance and was resident in Canada for 12 months immediately preceding that day. There are many Canadian veterans who elected to stay in the United Kingdom, however, Mr. Speaker, which should be their right, and because they elected to stay there they are discriminated against. In order to qualify, they would have to move back to Canada for 365 days. Would it be too much to expect our government to finally show some recognition of the contribution they made during the conflicts? Can we have a clear conscience by denying these Canadians, the few hundred of them, the benefit of war veterans allowance just because they decided to stay in a foreign country?

Also, what about the veteran who is in the category where he qualifies, because of the size of his family, under the Canada Assistance Plan and each increase in the war veterans allowance by the federal government is charged against the amount he is receiving on social assistance? Is it not reasonable to give this veteran the same exemption that the veteran gets if he falls into the old age security category? Is he not in the same need? The criteria for war veterans allowance, and specifically the clause covering exempt income, state that certain specified benefits such as attendance allowance, additional pension paid on behalf of children and social assistance paid on behalf of children, are not assessed as income, but some provinces do charge these increases against social assistance payments. Here is another clause which must be corrected before it is too late:

> Under eligibility a veteran must have served at least 365 days in the United Kingdom during World War I and prior to November 12, 1918.

I have had cases come to me of veterans in this category having served 364 days, and the department will not allow some flexibility. Is it not long past the time when we should show some human consideration, which we preach to the rooftops at election time, so that he can enjoy the exemptions under old age security and have the right to treatment services?

I have no hesitation in congratulating the minister and the government for taking the steps necessary to introduce the amendments raising the war veterans allowance as indicated in the tables at the back of the bill. I give them full marks. But there is no reason whatsoever why we should not stop and think of our commitment to all the veterans of Canada expressed over 50 years ago. Unless we do it now, Mr. Speaker, while we have the opportunity under Bill C-148, it should ever remain on the conscience of the government that we have failed in this commitment.

For the benefit of the veterans of Canada, we accept without question the amendments offered but we commit ourselves to the following further amendments: First, to repeal the age limit of orphans and increase the age of eligibility to 25 years; second, that we would immediately consult the provinces and provide the funds necessary to eliminate the restriction charging increases in war veterans allowances against veterans' social assistance benefits; third, that we would repeal the clause restricting the eligibility of World War I veterans to those having served 365 days in the United Kingdom; fourth, that we would repeal the clause making it obligatory for war veterans who elected to stay in foreign countries to reside in Canada for 365 days in order to qualify for the war veterans allowance; fifth, that we would raise the allowable casual earnings of war veterans receiving war veterans allowances to $1,200 for the single veteran and $2,000 for the married veteran.

The married veteran cannot take advantage anyway, because he would be 79 years old and cannot work. But let us give the World War II veterans and the Korean veterans the benefit of trying to get a little extra income for the comforts they deserve.

Under the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act we must seek out those who, although civilians, served in theatres of war and contributed to the war effort, because they too risked their lives on behalf of their country. I refer, Mr. Speaker, to the firefighters, the Newfoundland foresters, the auxiliary service workers, the merchant seamen, the salt water fishermen and all those others who had a part to play in conflicts against the enemy.

If I may, Mr. Speaker, because this bill restricts reference to disability pensioners I should like to mention the joint study report on the basic rate of pension and emphasize the co-operation of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs. The joint study report, authorized by the former minister of veterans affairs and supported by the present minister, which came before the committee was accepted unanimously without even hearing all the witnesses who were supposed to appear. This study was carried out by a joint committee consisting of veterans' organizations and the Department of Veterans Affairs, and was chaired by the chairman of the Pension Commission.

The recommendations contained the following: that the basic rate of pension, after so many years of procrastination, for the single, 100 per cent pensioner be based on the average salary of the five lowest categories in the public service. This would increase the basic rate of pension from the present $3,793 to $4,529. Further, Mr. Speaker, in calculating increases in the wages of these public servants rather than on the cost of living index, so that finally we could establish an equitable consideration for the disabled war veteran. I was authorized, and stated on behalf of my party, that we would accept the recommendations without debate. This was authorized by my leader. The minister is in full agreement with this new formula, Mr. Speaker, and I only hope that the cabinet will produce legislation to support these recommendations of the standing committee.

I have tried to be responsible tonight in my remarks to the government on the bill before us. We all know that the minister wants to do what is best for the war veterans of Canada. However, I warn the government that if we do not get the legislation produced following the recommendations of the joint study report, all-out war will be declared by my party.

Finally, in the interest of the war veterans of Canada, which interest is shared by my friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), we are prepared to pass this stage of the bill, without further debate, at ten o'clock. If I may, Mr. Speaker, I should like to mention three people who assisted the veterans affairs committee: the chairman of the War Veterans Allowance Board, who has over the years displayed the keenest interest in the future of the veterans who fall within the criteria of the War Veterans Allowances Act; the chairman of the Pension Commission, who since the implementation of the Woods committee report has been devoted to the cause of the veteran; and Mr. C. Chatterton, who served on the Woods committee and who since the war has devoted his life to the betterment of conditions for war amputees and all other Canadian veterans.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, in spite of what goes on in this House, I should like to pay tribute to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre who has devoted himself to the cause of the pensioner in whatever category.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marshall: On behalf of my party I can say that we welcome the amendments under Bill C-148 and support them wholeheartedly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is for me a distinct honour to follow in this debate two such distinguished veterans as the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) and the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall). Like them, I wish to express my very real pleasure in serving as a member of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs. As the previous speaker indicated earlier, it is not a committee like all the others. Like him, I also want to say that we welcome Bill C-148, which seeks to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act and in the process will make certain consequential changes in the administration of the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act. We are quite happy that it has been possible to reach agreement for this bill to be given second reading not later than ten o'clock this evening so that it can be sent to the committee and put into legislation just as soon as possible.

Like the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe, I am aware of the other piece of legislation that we hope will be before the House before long, namely, a bill to amend the Pension Act implementing the recommendations made by the joint study group which considered the basic rate of the pension under that act. As I have already had occasion to say, I regard that report, which our committee endorsed unanimously and with expedition, as containing some very important recommendations. To begin with, it solves the problem of what the basic rate of the 100 per cent disability pension should be. On the other hand, it proposes a formula for escalating that pension in future years which is the best and most progressive escalation formula that has ever been put on the table of this House of Commons. I hope that when the minister takes this matter to cabinet he will make sure that he gets that escalation formula into the bill along with the formula for determining the basic rate of the pension.

Tonight we are not dealing with the Pension Act—that will come later—but with this bill to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act. I realize that both previous speakers made some reference to what it does. Perhaps I might be permitted, even at the risk of repetition, to indicate briefly the provisions of this amending bill as I see them. First, it raises the amount of the allowance that can be paid to a single veteran under the War Veterans Allowance Act from the present figure of $131 to $151.14. This increase combines two things, the cost of living escalation, in the allowance itself, that came into effect at the beginning of January, plus the amount by which the old age security is being increased, with the result that the total allowance paid to a single veteran is greater than it was previously by the addition of those two amounts.

In addition to raising the maximum allowance that can be paid from $131 to $151.14, and perhaps even more important, it raises the ceiling on the total income that is permissible to a single veteran from $171 to $191.14. Again, the amount of that difference, which is a total of $20.14, is a combination of the cost of living escalation in the war veterans allowance that took place in January, plus the $13.39 by which the old age security pension is being increased. Although it raises the ceiling from $171 to $191.14, I must point out that for single veterans over 65 it really raises the ceiling from $186 to $206.14, by virtue of the fact that the extra $15 that such veterans got in 1972 is not counted for purposes of the ceiling under the War Veterans Allowance Act.

In parallel terms, this bill raises the allowance that can be paid to a married veteran from $217.61, by a total of $39.60, arrived at in the same way, to a total of $257.21. Again, it raises the more important figure, namely, the ceiling on permissible income, from $287.61, again by $39.60, to $327.21. I must point out, however, that if that married veteran and his wife are both over 65, there is another $30 in the picture. The ceiling then goes up from what was a total of $317.61 to a new ceiling of $357.21.

There is something I want to say right away about this in complimentary terms. I am glad that on this occasion the government is not giving with one hand and taking away with the other. The veteran who is under the War Veterans Allowance Act gets the full benefit of the cost of living escalation that took place in January and the full benefit of the increase in old age security. It is not given here and taken off there. In a moment or two I shall be saying there are some things about which I am not satisfied, but I am glad that on at least that point we have not had to do any arguing at all. It is also good to get these higher allowances and ceilings, but I still think they are not high enough.

There are some anomalies that have crept into this picture which I think are unacceptable. I feel very strongly that we must straighten them out. Some have been referred to by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's St. Barbe. I think that he and I and all members of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs are agreed that the time has come for us to do a thorough overhaul of the War Veterans Allowance Act, just as in the past few years we did a thorough overhaul of the Pension Act.

One of the anomalies that is most unfortunate arises because the extra $15 to a single veteran, and the extra $30 to a married veteran, if he and his wife are over 65, that were allowed last year above the ceiling were allowed by virtue of an order in council that simply said those OAS-GIS increases did not count. The ceilings were not raised; they were left where they were, but there was a special provision that this extra OAS-GIS money granted in 1972 would not be counted under the ceiling. The result is that we have this strange picture. In the case of a single veteran over 65, his effective ceiling, the one that counts, is $206.14, but the single veteran under 65 has a ceiling on the total income he can have, if he is a war veterans allowance recipient, of $191.14. I think that is quite unfair.

Likewise, if you look at the case of married veteran you find this situation. If the married veteran is over 65 and his wife is also over 65, the effective ceiling for that veteran is $357.21. In the case of the married veteran where one is over 65 and the other is under 65, the effective ceiling is $342.21. To complete the picture, if a married veteran on the war veterans allowance and his wife are both under 65, the ceiling is $327.21.

Now, it did not start out in this way at all. The hon. member referred to the fact that this act came into being in 1930. Yes, it came in in the spring of 1930. I think I can say this, to demonstrate the non-partisan nature of our approach on the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs: it was introduced in the spring of 1930 when the government of Mackenzie King was in power, and first came into effect in the fall of 1930, when the government of R.B. Bennett was in power.

An hon. Member: Were you here then, Stan?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I was not here then, but I voted for the first time in the election of that year, and I voted for J.S. Woodsworth in Winnipeg North Centre.

I was speaking about the history of this act, which was first brought in in 1930. That was just three or four years after the old age pension of those days had come into effect. The first war veterans allowance was exactly like the first old age pension, except for the age at which benefits were available. The amount was exactly the same, $20 a month or $240 a year, with a ceiling on total income of $365 a year or about $30 per month. That ceiling applied to both pieces of legislation. The difference was that the veteran could get war veterans allowance at the age of 60, whereas the civilian could not get old age pension until he was 70. But there was no difference between those veterans who were over or under 65. There was no provision saying that if you were 65 you would get a higher ceiling than if you were under 65.

I am sure no one intended this, but that is the way it has developed because of the anomalies which have crept into the picture. I urge strongly that this be corrected. It could be corrected very simply, by writing into the act new ceilings the equal of the highest effective ceilings that we now have, instead of allowing it to be done by order in council. We should not continue this kind of discrimination.

The hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe referred to veterans who are on welfare programs and are getting money that comes eventually from the Canada Assistance Plan. This, of course, will involve people under 65. Although they get money from public funds in that way, there is a lower ceiling imposed on them when they are under 65 that does not apply to veterans who are over 65. I think this ought to be straightened out. Even though I am arguing that we should review the War Veterans Allowance Act in its entirety, I think this is something which we should try to correct at this time.

Another anomaly that has developed because of this legislation having been built up more or less as a piece of patchwork is this. As it now stands, a single veteran is entitled to a total of $206.14 if he is 65 years of age or over. But he already can get under the new old age security legislation, after it is passed, $170.14. This includes both OAS and GIS. That means that all the War Veterans Allowance Board will pay him is $36; yes, that is all. And if he has a small disability pension, it will cut that amount down. Mr. Speaker, $36 is the possible figure and there are many single veterans who will fit into that pattern. There are many single veterans over 65 who will get the old age security pension and guaranteed income supplement, amounting to $170.14, and they will get $36 in war veterans allowance, which will bring their total benefit to $206.14. On the other hand, if you look at the case of the married veteran where both he and his wife are over 65, you will find that the total they can get under the ceiling is $357.21. They will get $324.60 in OAS and GIS, which leaves the total that they can get as war veterans allowance of $32.61.

Let me compare the figures again, in case I have not made them clear. The single veteran over 65 will get $36 from the War Veterans Allowance Board, but the married veteran over 65 will get only $32.61. Not only does the married veteran not get twice as much as the single veteran gets; he gets $3.39 less than the single veteran. As I say, I know how this program has been built up and I know you must take the total picture into consideration, but I suggest that the practice that has developed is unfair. The more veterans find they are, as it were, taken away from special veterans legislation and handled under general pensions legislation or general welfare legislation, the more they feel that they are not being given the rights to which they are entitled as veterans. I urge very strongly that we try to correct that anomaly, preferably when we have the bill in committee but certainly by instituting a complete overhaul of the War Veterans Allowance Act.

I now move to the question of the removal of property qualifications which have been included in the act, up to now, ever since it was passed in 1930. I welcome it most warmly and I congratulate the minister for bringing in this very significant and progressive change. When I think of all the widows over the years who, on becoming widows, sold the house and other assets and had to wait until they had used up the proceeds of that sale until their assets had been reduced to a certain figure, I wish we could make this provision retroactive; but I fear that far too many of them have gone to a place were we cannot send them any money.

The property qualification under the War Veterans Allowance Act was a disgrace and I am delighted that it is being removed. I understand that property and money in the bank will still be considered, in the sense that the interest on that money will count as income for the purposes of the means test in the act. However, at least doing away with the requirement to bring the value of property owned down to a certain figure is a progressive, humane step and I congratulate the minister on bringing in this provision tonight.

Like the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe, I regret that nothing has yet been done about those Canadian veterans who could qualify under the War Veterans Allowance Act except for the fact that they reside in the United Kingdom or other countries in the world and, therefore, have not met all the requirements that are in this act. I was pleased to hear the deputy minister say in the committee the other day, when we were given a preview of this legislation, that overcoming this problem is not administratively difficult. We tried to put the pressure on the mandarins to solve the problem, and the mandarins suggested that this was a matter of policy and had to go to cabinet. At the moment the mandarins and members of cabinet are within reach of my voice. The chief mandarin of this department is up there in the gallery, listening, and the minister is in the House.

I hope this problem will not be passed back and forth much longer. It is administratively possible to correct this situation, said the deputy minister but he contended it was a matter of policy. I hope that this difficulty will be solved. I think it really is incredible that Canadian veterans who choose to remain in the United Kingdom are not able to get the benefit of this legislation.

One of the changes that was made a couple of years ago was the one that denies to the widow of a war veterans allowance recipient the full married rate for one year. This is something which ought to be looked at again. I think we ought to reinstate the original provision. I hope I have said enough to indicate that in my view, and in the view of the hon. member who spoke just before me, although there is nothing in this bill that is not good and although we welcome everything in it, what is wrong is that it is not good enough. We think that the anomalies to which I have referred should be straightened out and the act should be reviewed and greatly improved.

Both the previous speaker and I referred to this act as having come into being in 1930. I mentioned that it was first drafted just three or four years after the first old age pension bill was passed by parliament. I remind hon. members again of the similarities between the two pieces of legislation. They are almost identical except for the fact that the veteran could get his benefits at age 60 and the civilian had to wait until he was 70. The other difference was that the old age pension was administered by the Department of Finance, and that kept the amount low enough, whereas the war veterans allowance was administered by the then department of pensions and national health. Otherwise, these laws were the same.

We have moved a long way in the field of pensions, a long way from the concept of a means test as it was applied to the old age pension of the late 1920s and early 1930s. I think we should get away from that concept completely as far as the War Veterans Allowance Act is concerned. In a decade when we are talking of new methods of income maintenance, when we are talking of a guaranteed income, I think the time has come to consider the veterans who served this country as the group for whom the concept of a guaranteed annual income should begin. I should like to see the War Veterans Allowance Act, an act that has served its purpose well during the last 40 years or more, turned into a guaranteed annual income for all veterans who reach a certain age, or all veterans of any age who need it because of poor health or other reasons and who cannot qualify for a pension under the Pension Act.

The hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe referred to those veterans of the First World War of very advanced age now. When I hear of cases of veterans who are now 70 or 80 years of age still having difficulty trying to establish their claims—the new legislation permits veterans to reopen their cases now—it seems to me it would be much simpler to establish a category such that all veterans 75 years of age or over would receive a certain allowance on a guaranteed basis without any questions asked. But then let us bring that age down, yes to 50, for veterans of more recent wars, and guarantee to all of them the standard of living they deserve.

I have had a lot to say over the years that has been critical of the shortcomings in veterans legislation. I remember that when I first came here one of the things lacking in the War Veterans Allowance Act was any provision for widows. During World War II we finally got them covered, first of all by an item in the estimates, then after a while by order in council under the War Measures Act, and finally, some time after the end of World War II, we got the widows covered under the War Veterans Allowance Act itself.

It has been a good piece of legislation and we have made it better over the years. Many Canadian veterans have benefited under the War Veterans Allowance Act. But we are no longer in the 1920s or 1930s. We are no longer in the means test or welfare age; we are in an age where we talk of rights. If any persons in this country have a sacred right, it is the veterans who have served us, and their survivors. I think we should move as quickly as we can to transform the War Veterans Allowance Act into a guaranteed income act for all the veterans of this country.

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join the other speakers who took part in the debate on this bill concerning the condition of veterans.

Besides asking on their behalf for an increase in their pensions, we want to pay tribute today to those who fought for the greatest principles of civilization. It was to uphold all those great principles that our veterans fought. They are now fighting to obtain the right to live in a community whose wealth exceed the needs, even if those needs have not yet been fulfilled.

What we are asking is that this government increase the veterans pensions like the old age pension. Since we have raised pensions for a certain category of people, we must also raise those of veterans. Otherwise, it would be unfair, the administration would not be sound and we would ignore one class of citizens that should have priority because these people have dedicated themselves, suffered ill treatments and done some work that the others have not done.

But if we intend to increase these pensions, this country must be able to do so and we must analyze all sectors of society to find out whether it is truly possible.

We must also know what effect a pension increase can have on the population. Is it good to increase pensions? Is it good to increase this or that? Are we really in a position to do it? Will that restore the economic balance or make it worse?

Mr. Speaker, I would like to develop this subject because I think that all those increases are throwing the economy further out of kilter. I strongly believe that they are not the right solutions. I say right now that we are not against higher pensions for senior citizens or veterans because they have a right to those increases just as well as others. However I also say that those increases are not normal, because we only consider higher pensions without thinking about replenishing the source so that it does not run dry. We draw from that source as if it were endless, without caring about the necessary repairs to that source on which the population feeds itself.

So, if we want the population to go on living and progressing, the feeding sources must be abundant. We must work on them, dig through them and modify them until we find plenty of water to provide everything we need for the population. The only way we find at present is to increase pensions.

• (2050)

Industrialized countries have known a strong economic growth in 1972. As soon as confidence returned after the national economic crisis of August 1971, growth accelerated everywhere, in Europe, in Japan and in North America. In large industrialized countries, the rate of production almost doubled as compared with the previous year. In 1972, the gross national product went up from 10.5 to 11 per cent, per capita personal income increased by almost 10.5 per cent, while the standard of living of Canadians rose by only 5.5 per cent.

As shown in per capita consumer expenditures, national revenue increases, interest rates have gone up alarmingly and the income of financial institutions has reached unprecedented levels.

But middle businessmen's incomes have substantially decreased. The income of ordinary businessmen is reduced to almost nothing because the government must grant pensions since some people live in shameful and abject poverty.

Mr. Speaker, we are still facing two major issues: unemployment and rising prices. We must unhappily admit that the level of unemployment is too high and that we must take steps to solve these problems. We must give stronger momentum to the economic growth and reduce unemployment. To correct this situation, we suggest boosting pensions in order to decrease unemployment.

I am still wondering, Mr. Speaker, whether we are really going in the right direction to reach our objective, namely to lower the level of unemployment by increasing pensions, while at the same time coping with the rise in the cost of living and prices. That was the casue of the economic unrest in 1972.

The increase in consumer prices specially affected food prices, which have spiraled. I shall not go into a long description of the reasons for increases. The present economic system is the direct cause of loss of purchasing power. Therefore, higher veterans allowances and pensions of other citizens are being called for.

As a result of pressure from the opposition, the government has decided to give priority to increasing veterans allowances' and old age pensions. Veterans' allowances will be upped to $151 a month for single beneficiaries or persons living alone and $257 for married couples. These increases, according to the minister's statement, would cost $9 million in 1973-74.

As for the veterans, the committee will say in its report what it recommends as an increase for their disability pensions. The committee is working on that problem and it is on those objectives that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) based his remarks a while ago proposing adjustments to give justice to all and provide a better balance between the incomes of married and single people.

In fact, veterans suffer like all others from the disastrous increases in the cost of living. Therefore, they are as entitled to increases in their pensions as others.

We still think that all those increases further unbalance our economy. Those monies could help reduce the cost of living by way of a compensated discount. Instead of raising pensions of all types, it would have been wiser to reduce the cost of living. Then all taxpayers would have benefited from it. The economy would have been stimulated in a general way and that would have allowed us to boost the purchasing power of people, to create jobs, to neutralize the economy and to do away with inflation while at the same time providing more tax relief for taxpayers.

We then come to realize that the economic balance can be restored and stabilized only by raising those pensions of all types. So we are for any logical increase, but we would like to have the most logical and practical system so as to be in a position to allow Canadians to live decently in their country which is not lacking in resources or production.

Nobody in this country worries about where he will find goods he needs. But all Canadians are concerned about tomorrow, they wonder where they will find the scraps of paper that they need to meet their needs. They do not worry about the production because they know that it exists. They know that it is done automatically; they know where to find it and how to get it.

But there is only one way to have money: it is to borrow it and to pay interest. The governments are doing the same thing and it is impossible for them to further increase pensions because the cost of living goes up and the situation of all citizens, young and old, gets more and more difficult. They find themselves in a rather precarious position because the cost of living is rising. We must reduce the cost of living to allow the citizens to have a logical and reasonable life in their own country; but when the cost of living goes up because of increases in all kinds of pensions, the economy gets more and more unbalanced.

Mr. Speaker, all things must first go through the mind. One has to know that. If there is a table, it is because a man conceived that table and then made it according to his own idea, with the materials and tools available to him.

To do a thing well, Mr. Speaker, you must first think of it and I believe that all the increases that are granting now have not been given enough thought, have been planned to build a viable economy according to basic principles and real facts.

Mr. Speaker, to do something well you should first give some thought and then try to do it as well as you imagine it. A painter is seldom completely satisfied with his work. Why? Precisely because the painting does not give a true picture of what he sees in his mind. This is an example, but we also know, Mr. Speaker, that the clearer a picture in the mind, the easier it becomes to realize, to produce and to materialize.

It is not for nothing that it is said, Mr. Speaker, that ideas rule the world; nothing can become visible before it has been thought of first.

So, before existing in reality, man was first conceived in God's spirit as well as his way of living on earth, according to nature which comprises material, cultural and spiritual elements. If, in the devine spirit, man was created to live in society, this man, in order to live well in society must first of all have in his own mind the vision of a beautiful, well-ordered, dignified, efficient and progressive life in society if he wants to live for each individual and for mankind.

• (2100)

That is the meaning of a real mind; the clearer our conception of society and of mankind, the more beautiful and fruitful will be life in society for all whose life is within themselves, within the family and within society. Both the aged and veterans are a part of this society.

Such is the environment of man's life on earth, in any country, including Canada in 1973.

The past helps us to understand Canada's present situation, with its inflation, unemployment, and monetary, economic and political poverty. The political orientation of a government that has been elected by the people of a country is expressed in financial terms.

If one's mind is really well developed, it becomes an easy matter to foresee how to bring about an economic balance on a national scale between the family and business incomes that make up the economic life of Canada in 1973.

How, Mr. Speaker, are we to rid ourselves of poverty, unemployment and inflation, and enable every individual to lead a happy personal family and social life, when our monetary, political and economic machinery is such as it is?

The existing political and economic machinery is not in tune with the facts. Our political economic is leading us on a suicide course. The people is committing suicide because of a poor economy that fails to take account of its realities.

Mr. Speaker, instead of guiding Canada, the governments have become tax collectors, and the largest portion of those taxes, the most sacred portion, which should go to helping the citizens of Canada, the old people, but which escapes any discussion, is precisely that which goes for interest charges on the public debt. Because of that, the public lives in want and the governments in bondage, all that is needed to bring wellbeing to every country, every home exists. That is why finance does not reflect economic realities.

The financial system wreaks injustice upon the old, the veterans, children and families. Those who advocate it, those who accept it are party to injustice, to social disorder and anarchy; they are responsible for taxes and surtaxes, responsible for public debts and therefore responsible for unnecessary fears and deprivations. They are party to the injustice from which a large number of Canadians suffer.

The tax system is the consequence of a financial system based on injustice. Our financial system is based on our banking system. The banks control our financial system. They issue the money we call credit, basing themselves on the real wealth. In this case, the wealth of the country belongs to the country, to all its citizens. There is individual and collective wealth.

Bankers are people like any other people. They are making themselves the bookkeepers of the country's money and now they claim they own that money. They appropriate credit and cancel it when they so decide. They are the absolute owners of the flow of money as they take over the creating and the cancellation of money.

Mr. Speaker, we want the people and the veterans in particular to have as much money as possible. We want them all to be happy and I think we all agree on this. However, in our present economic situation we cannot afford this, because the higher the pensions for the benefit of the individual the more we are creating problems for the people as a whole.

Mr. Speaker, we are going to vote for this bill, but we have known for a long time there is no solution to these problems nor to politically inspired increases and social or economic increases. There are no practical solutions that would allow families, individuals, veterans to live according to their income or the national production increases. Every time production goes up a certain percentage, pensions are increased by a very small percentage. This means an accumulation of production leading to capitalization. In fact, there is too much capitalization in our present economy to bring about reasonable changes which are needed by the people.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The parliamentary secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Reid) rises on a point of order.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I believe there is some agreement to have this bill passed by ten o'clock. If there be such agreement, perhaps that may be made an order of the House. The second point is that I think there is also agreement to limit the length of speeches until ten o'clock to perhaps ten minutes each. That might also be made an order of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps the Chair might draw certain difficulties to the attention of hon. members. I have six names before me. If I indicated those names we might ascertain whether, indeed, these are the only prospective speakers in the debate. On the one hand I have the name of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Dupras), the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert), the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay), the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster), and on the other hand the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling), and the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). Those are the six names which I have. If these are to be the only speakers for the remainder of the debate, I think eight and a half minutes would be the proper time limit. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we are a party to this agreement. However, I raise just one point. If the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) should arrive, he might like three or four minutes. Perhaps the Chair would keep that in mind.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, when Your Honour sees the hon. member for Timiskaming you might also bear in mind that you do not see the clock.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, in view of the importance of this bill, we will agree to the suggestion that has just been made. Hon. members appear, from what we have heard this evening, to agree to referring this bill to committee as quickly as possible. I therefore give our agreement as requested.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think the House understands what has been agreed. There are six, possibly seven, speakers, and in view of the time available perhaps the Chair could give each one eight minutes. We will start with the hon. member for Labelle.

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I think that the agreement we just reached proves the unanimity of everyone here. This bill has the acceptance of everyone and we are all very anxious to vote on it. I am very pleased to have the opportunity to speak on this bill, for a few reasons, mainly for reasons of solidarity and to obtain justice for our former comrades who served in the armed forces with so many of us in the House during the dark days in Europe.

I would like, Mr. Speaker, to endorse the comments of my colleagues the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) when they recalled the participation of our fellow citizens to that conflict which lasted almost five years and in which such a great number of our fellow citizens bravely fought.

The hon. member for Humbert-St. George's-St. Barbe also recalled, the participation or contribution of the members of the armed forces to the national unity in Canada. I agree with him wholeheartedly when he recalls the strength of that feeling of solidarity, the polarization of a cause accepted by all young Canadians many of whom had left an interesting career, either as businessmen or as professionals, either higher studies or a wife and a family.

So, for all these former comrades in the armed forces, Mr. Speaker, I think that we are all anxious to see to it that that legislation is enacted as soon as possible.

[English]

I think that at this time it is appropriate that we should review briefly the origins of the War Veterans Allowance Act and restate the principles upon which it is based. I did some research on my own into this aspect of the legislation and I would like to share some of my findings with the House.

Many people are of the view that the War Veterans Allowance Act is the product of the depression years between World War I and World War II. This is not so, although the benefits proved to be of great assistance during those years. As a matter of fact, the problem of the burnt out veteran was under study in the early 1920s, several years before the depression. The problem had been recognized as early as 1922, and in 1928 and again in 1930 it was studied in detail by the special committee of parliament on pensions and returned soldiers' problems. When appearing before that committee on April 9, 1930, a spokesman for the minister of the then department of pensions and national health stated:

> There are certain individuals at the present time, under the present pension act, who come to the department for assistance and help. These men are what have been called burnt out men; men of low pensions, and men who are no longer employable. If they went up for pension examination, the things from which they are suffering are of an intangible character; they are simply unable to work, and that before their time . . .
> It is something similar to what we see in using machinery. I might take as an example the locomotive that is geared up to drag a train along at 50 miles an hour, ordinary time, and some day the train is late and has to go 60 miles an hour to make up its time. When the end of that trip is reached, the coalbox is empty and the engine blowing off in all directions, while the engineer and fireman are worn out. It is that extra ten miles that has caused it . . .
> We take the soldier who was overseas, and who was in the war front, he went under a driving that is much greater than probably most of us can conceive or realize—mental stress, and physical stress—and the mental stress was a considerable one . . .

We felt it was a pressure that others do not undergo. It was a wonder to us how the men in the front line stood what they did and for so long, so that this is advanced as a reason why consideration should be given to those men along this particular line . . .

We know that they have the greatest difficulty in finding employment.

It is also interesting to note that when the original War Veterans Allowance Act was introduced in 1930, Bill-19, its preamble expressed the problem in these words:

Whereas there are a great number of veterans in Canada who are not in receipt of pensions under the provisions of the Pension Act . . .

And it is found that many pensioners and non-pensioners are, in fact, unemployable by reason of intangible results of their war service, apart from any consideration of pensionable disability; and it is desirable to provide assistance, or additional assistance, for these veterans in recognition of their service.

That expresses, I believe, quite clearly the reason for war veterans allowance. It was to make provision for men who were prematurely aged because of their war service. Because these conditions also apply to the veterans of other conflicts in which Canada has been involved, the benefits of the act have been extended from time to time so that veterans of the Northwest Field Force, the South African war, World War II and the Korean operation are now eligible. Coverage has also been extended to include the widows and orphans of such veterans.

There has been definite progress in this legislation through the years and no less than 15 changes have taken place since its inception in 1930. The original rate was $20 for a single veteran and $40 for a married veteran. Bill C-148 will once again update this important piece of legislation. It will provide for monthly payments, to those who qualify, of $151.14 for single veterans and $257.21 for married veterans. It will also remove the restrictions on personal property which have existed at various levels since the act was first passed.

This bill not only provides for the largest single increase in war veterans allowances in recent years, but also changes the character of the legislation and makes it a modified income-tested program. The men and women who will benefit from this bill are deserving of these changes. Many times we have said that they were the finest. I am proud to have been associated with this bill.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I am proud to speak in support of Bill C-148, an act to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act. I am also proud to associate myself with those who have presented the bill and those who have worked so diligently and with such great compassion in preparing the studies and statistics required so that their thoughts could be translated into legislation. I believe we should also pay tribute to those persons who originated the study and to those who gave those conducting it the terms of reference necessary to prepare the supporting details for this bill.

Previous supporters of this bill have set down the changes and have commented on the increases in benefits that will accrue to the war veterans as the result of its passage. They have also pointed out some of the weaknesses that need looking into. I feel that they have been adequately covered and I do not intend to repeat those details. I just want to say a few words about veterans in general. War is a terrible act. The effects of war and the after effects of war are equally terrible. Some people involved in the world wars and in the Korean war were able to find their way back into the mainstream of life. Some took a long time to rehabilitate, and some can never be rehabilitated. It is for the latter group that we are passing this legislation.

I am a war veteran and I am proud of whatever contribution I may have made. I was one of the lucky ones who were able to pick up the threads of life and continue on. But I left many friends in Europe, in the Middle East and in the Far East, young people full of hope and purpose who gave of themselves that others might live a full life. Some of my comrades and friends came home broken of body or mind, or both, and some came home with clouds in their minds because of suffering they had endured in prison camps or from grievous field wounds. They had left home light of spirit and with a purpose. Many did not not understand the full implications of war, but they readily accepted their responsibility and gave unselfishly of themselves in a just cause. I wish that today we could recapture some of that purpose. I wish we could catch the spirit and comradeship of those years, because then we could move mountains and overcome any obstacle in our path.

Each year when we have our Remembrance Day ceremonies I catch a glimpse of that spirit. I see the veterans line up to parade to the cenotaph. For a few fleeting moments their backs straighten, their heads take on a more jaunty angle and their eyes have that clarity of purpose reserved only for those persons who have seen war and who have returned. They remember because they can never forget. To many of them the war was a beginning, and unfortunately to some it was an end. But it is for those persons who fall between those two points that we bring forth Bill C-148 to help them in the later years of their lives. I hope the minister will be able to convince the cabinet to present a bill that will put into motion a legislative function that will ensure that they keep pace with a reasonable standard of living. I think all the members on the veterans affairs committee hope that this will happen. For many veterans this bill will be a new lease on life. It will allow them again to have some dignity and purpose. It will show them that we remember.

From all walks of life and from all professions, veterans left their homes and families to accept a challenge to the principles they had grown to accept as commonplace. Men and women undertook challenges that under normal circumstances perhaps would have frightened them. But they had that spirit and purpose which are so elusive today and are so needed.

I can only say, Mr. Speaker, that I am proud to associate myself with Bill C-148, an act to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act. I am proud to associate myself with hon. members on all sides of the House who support this bill. I am proud to join hon. members who preceded me in lauding the efforts of those who drafted this bill and who did the preceding studies. I wish the bill God speed so that the recipients of war veterans allowance may receive the benefits contained in the bill at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. H. T. Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-148, an act to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act, is one which I am very pleased to see before the House today. As a member who was fortunate enough to train here in Ottawa early in the war, I had in those days as a confrere the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale). Those were in the days when we were on the same side.

When the War Veterans Allowance Act was first introduced, Canadian veterans, and British veterans domiciled in Canada at the date of their enlistment, with service in an actual theatre of war and disability pensioners were eligible for the allowance. Since then the act has been broadened to include widows of such veterans, orphans, dual service veterans and veterans who served during World War I in the United Kingdom for 365 days prior to the armistice. The act was also amended to include veterans of British Commonwealth and allied forces who were not domiciled in Canada at the date of their enlistment but had resided in Canada for ten years at the time of their application.

In order to receive the allowance outside of Canada, a person must have been a recipient at the time of his departure and must have resided in Canada for the 12 months immediately preceding the day he left Canada. The number of war veterans allowance recipients on March 31, 1972, was a little more than 75,000, of whom some 38,000 were from World War I and some 35,000 from World War II. The expenditure for the year amounted to some $73 million. It is interesting to note that five years ago there were over 86,000 recipients and the total expenditure was over $101 million. The administration of the War Veterans Allowance Act is the responsibility of the War Veterans Allowance Board. This board is a quasi-judicial body, independent as far as its decisions are concerned, and acts as a court of appeal for applicants and recipients who are aggrieved by any decision of a district authority.

I appreciate the great value to war veterans allowance and to civilian war allowance recipients of the increases in the rates by $20.14 for single persons and $39.60 for those who are married. I realize that this will give over 100,000 Canadians increased purchasing power and therefore a justly deserved improvement in their standard of living. However, I would like to dwell briefly on the other main aspect of Bill C-148, the abolition of the personal property restriction. I realize that on November 9, 1972, the regulation imposing an assessment as income when the value of the recipient's home exceeded $10,000 was rescinded. This was a welcome step. However, the problem of personal property still remained. I am sure that many members of the House have received letters from constituents who have lamented the fact that they had slightly more in the way of personal property than the $1,250 single, or $2,5C0 if married, permitted by the act.

Some of these people knew that they could never again increase their personal property holdings, yet they realized they could not qualify for the allowance until they had expended their small surplus. Bill C-148, I am glad to say, will remove that problem. When this bill is passed, the value of personal property will no longer be a bar to eligibility. The tests for eligibility will be service and income.

I firmly believe that the citizens of Canada expect us to recognize with justice the sacrifices made for our freedom by this particular group of Canadians for whom the war veterans allowance was designed. I further believe that they will welcome this action on the part of the government and of parliament as a clear indication that it is our intention to continue to improve the legislation that affects this important segment of the Canadian public.

The record of the government in the field of veterans legislation is one with which I am honoured to be associated. I am proud of the record of Canada's serving men and women in two world wars and the Korean conflict, and I am proud of the measures that this government has taken and is taking to provide just recognition of their service and contribution to the cause of freedom.

The minister has dealt in detail with the other changes which have been made in the War Veterans Allowance Act and regulations. This bill is in keeping with the government's policy of improving veterans legislation so as to provide greater benefits to those who qualify. Mr. Speaker, I would also like to stress that in my opinion the changes which have taken place in the act and regulations in recent months, and the changes proposed in this bill, are important not only because they will increase the number of dollars in the pockets of the recipients, but also because they show a definite trend toward an increased recognition of the right of privacy of the individual. We will no longer be asking an applicant or recipient, "How much is your home worth?" We will no longer be asking him, "How much money do you have in the bank?" We will only be asking him to declare his income, and that, in my opinion, is a very reasonable request when the object of the legislation is to ensure that his income does not fall below the amounts provided by the act.

I sincerely believe that many of the recipients and many of those who will apply in the future will be happy to know that this step has been taken in order to respect their dignity and personal privacy. Mr. Speaker, this bill contains sound proposals and I heartily endorse it.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-148 has certain application to veterans of World War I who are the beneficiaries of increases in the payments under the act, and also with regard to the value of their holdings. For many years we have felt uncomfortable about the limitations imposed upon them and their spouses in regard to whatever property they may have accumulated during their lifetime. On the other hand, the casual benefits will be of little help because they are now of an age when it is rare that they are earning an income or have additional income that would be caught by the act. With regard to World War II veterans, however, these features are more important to them than they are to the first group. The World War II group will benefit by an increase in the payment which is commensurate with the increase in the old age security and the adjustment in the cost of living formula.

There is one thing that I have been hammering at. I would not draw attention to any individuals in this House within the sound of my voice, but they will know what I mean and it will be seen by anyone who cares to read the proceedings of the veterans affairs committee in years past. It is what I consider the irrational, unrealistic and totally inequitable limitation on the payment of war veterans allowance to people who do not have the 365 days residence in Canada required for qualification.

At the committee meetings last June we had very serious discussions with the minister's officials and a study was promised. That was progress, because in the past the minister's predecessors had rejected my representations out of hand. Those conditions have not changed, Mr. Speaker. I would say to the minister that this is one area in which I thoroughly support my colleague, the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) namely, the war veterans allowance should be paid to Canadian veterans who now live in Great Britain and Europe and have not qualified, by reason of the requirement of residence in Canada, since the end of hostilities.

We are told that there are administrative difficulties to bar the payments. I commend to the minister the representations put forward by the veterans' association in the United Kingdom. Year by year they have bombarded the ministry with their pleas. I know the people who administer the war veterans act in the United Kingdom, and there is not one word of truth or fact in the claim that there are administrative difficulties with regard to the men who do not have 365 days residence in Canada. The administration would be the same, and the number is small.

Mr. Speaker, we have veterans of World War I and World War II living in the United Kingdom under the conditions which are a downright shame. They are Canadians, and we maintain them over there in a condition of proud but undeniable poverty because of the inflexible attitude of the government on this rule. I for one who was a member of the Canadian armed forces during World War II absolutely refuse to accept this as a continuing condition and I hope that hon. members of this House will join with me in that crusade. This is not something that we must accept, any more than we can accept the conditions of prisoners of war.

If the minister and the government have seen fit to increase the ceiling with regard to the value of property under the War Veterans Allowance Act, what logical or equitable reason is there for maintaining an unrealistic ceiling under the Veterans Land Act? The action on property evaluations, mortgage ceilings and all the other matters were steps in the right direction. The minister was a good soldier during the war, but I must tell him that when you put one foot forward, you follow it with another and you go forward and make progress.

Mr. Speaker, I commend the government for this step forward with Bill C-148 and I urge, with all the sincerity that I as one of the veterans in this House can possibly bring forward, that they listen to the pleas of my colleagues on this side and members on the other side for justice for our veterans. Let us do them justice in today's circumstances, and not within the limits of the late 1940s and the 1950s with artificial ceilings which are totally unrealistic and unjust.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

[Translation]

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am proud to support the bill to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, this bill continues the fine tradition of this House in recognizing that Canada owes a special debt to the men and women who served our cause in time of war. These are the men who, because of their belief in our way of life, for $1.10 a day withstood the murderous gas attack at Saint Julian when troops of other countries could not stand, who took Vimy Ridge after other nations soldiers had failed, who fought gallantly at Beaumont-Hamel, Passchendaele, Cambrai and many other places.

These are the men who, paid $1.30 a day, landed in Sicily, defeated the enemy at Ortona, broke the Hitler line, assaulted the beaches of Dieppe, advanced the farthest of any allied troops on D-Day in 1944, liberated Holland and fought their way into the enemy heartland. They are the men who rolled and tossed in the destroyers and frigates of the North Atlantic convoys, and who faced the rigours of the aid to Russia sea route; others held steady in the flak of the bomber runs and maintained air umbrellas over the fighting troops.

The recipients of civilian war allowances include many of the merchant seamen who braved the cold, bleak, dangerous seas of the Murmansk run to deliver supplies to the Russians, or travelled on the Atlantic convoys taking supplies to beleaguered Britain. Their pay was small, their living conditions rigorous, and many were torpedoed and suffered hours in the chill Atlantic waters.

Bill C-148 will provide for an improved standard of living by increasing the rates and ceilings by $20.14 for single persons and $39.60 for those who are married. This will mean that the new monthly rates will be $151.14 single, $257.21 married, and the new annual income ceilings will be $2,293.68 single and $3,926.52 married. In addition, those who are in receipt of old age security pension and guaranteed income supplement will continue to benefit by an additional $15 a month single, and $30 married, by way of the exemption of those amounts of old age security pension and guaranteed income supplement.

Clause 2, which removes the limitations on personal property, is also of great importance because it will relieve many recipients of the disappointment and frustration experienced when from some source a small amount of personal property is acquired and as a result their allowance has to be cancelled and often an overpayment established. This clause will add to the peace of mind of many of the more than 78,000 recipients, and will also pave the way for others who are just over the personal property limitation to apply and qualify for the war veterans allowance or civilian war allowance.

This legislation is definitely in keeping with the attitude demonstrated by this government in earlier measures introduced and referred to by the minister which have improved the lot of war veterans allowance and civilian war allowance recipients. This government's pride in the accomplishment of Canada's servicemen and women is reflected in the measures by which we have provided for them. I wish to congratulate the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) for his ability, efficiency and a job well done, benefiting our veterans.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to join in this debate on Bill C-148 and the amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act and the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act. I join the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) in congratulating the minister on presenting this bill. This is the first bill he has presented to the House, although he appeared before the standing committee with regard to the study of basic rates which was carried out last year by the veterans' association and officials of the department. I must say that the minister acquitted himself very well before the committee. I am happy to join other hon. members in congratulating the minister in presenting his first bill to the House.

This bill will increase benefits allowed under the War Veterans Allowance Act as well as the ceiling on earnings of recipients. One important aspect of the bill is that it removes the limit on personal assets which a recipient may have at the time of making application. I understand this is called a modified income-tested program.

Last week we debated the Old Age Security Act and guaranteed income supplement bill. It is fitting that this is being followed by amendments increasing allowances under the War Veterans Allowance Act. Perhaps it is a tribute to the minister that he assumed his responsibilities at the time amendments were being brought forward to the Old Age Security Act with compatible increases being brought in at the same time to the war veterans allowance legislation. This bill is important to some 76,000 Canadians who are recipients of the war veterans allowance.

I wish to speak for a moment about the committee's study of basic rates, because I feel sure that in the not too distant future there will be pressure for the principle that was adopted by the committee to apply this to the War Veterans Allowance Act and other old age pension legislation. The principle is that we not only increase pensions annually by the amount of the cost of living, but by the increase in the standard of living. When the committee adopted the recommendations of this basic study report and recommended them to the House for acceptance, it was a very significant, almost revolutionary step because it has important implications for our whole old age security system.

Last year we tied the old age pension and veterans benefits to the cost of living index and the increases that take place there. In the past several years these have been in the order of 3 per cent or 4 per cent. I believe in 1972 it was 3.6 per cent and in 1973 it will be 4.5 per cent. This is not nearly keeping pace with the average increase in earning of Canadians, which is often in the realm of 6, 7 or 8 per cent. When we tie the benefits of the old age pension to the standard of living rather than the cost of living, there is a significant difference. It means that every so many years we do not have to go back and increase the basic amount in order to catch up with what has been lost due to the difference between the cost of living increase and the standard of living increase.

Mr. Speaker, I support Bill C-148. Perhaps by some standards it is a modest increase, but to the recipients of these benefits it is very important and significant.

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I rise to say a few words in support of this bill. As usually happens when veterans affairs legislation is before the House, there is complete unanimity of opinion. I echo the sentiments expressed by other members of my party, indeed, by members of all parties, in support of the bill now before the House.

I wish to pay special tribute to the new Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) on this, his first bill. It may not be customary for members of the opposition to pay tributes to the government, but on this occasion they are justly earned. I know that veterans throughout this country respect the new minister, not only because he is a veteran but also he is a veteran who has suffered, being a double amputee. That is a handicap which better enables him to judge the condition in which many veterans across this land find themselves.

Although it is impossible to turn back progress, if one can call it that, or change certain aspects of veterans legislation, I wish to protest the fact that the war veterans allowance is now to be mixed up with the old age pension and guaranteed income supplement. Many veterans consider the war veterans allowance as a burned out pension, if one may call it that. They fell that this pension is given to them because of the service they rendered to their country.

Many members of the House have paid tribute to our veterans. It seems to me that we are doing them a dishonour, if one may call it that, by mixing up payments under the war veterans allowance with payments under other social programs. As I have said, veterans feel that the allowance is theirs as of right because they served their country in time of need. Also, the pension and supplement are subject to income tax, whereas the war veterans allowance is exempt from such tax.

The big thing we must remember is the pride which veterans feel for having served their country. They feel that that service was recognized by the payment of what they call the burned out pension and what we call the war veterans allowance. I suppose there is no way to change this part of the legislation, but I think the Department of Veterans Affairs ought to take cognizance of what I have said. If it is possible on a future occasion to again give the veteran his just dues in the form of veterans allowance rather than in the form of pension, I think we should do so.

Apart from the increased benefits under this legislation, which are important, one of the most important parts of it is that which removes the restriction regarding the amount of property that a veteran may own before he is eligible for the full war veterans allowance. This new provision will certainly remove some of the roadblocks which have prevented veterans from receiving the full allowance. It is high time that this change was made. Veterans have protested to me, and I am sure to other hon. members, about the restriction on the amount they can earn. Granted, the ceiling has been raised. That is good and I do not quarrel with it. I ask, would we lose too much if we removed the ceiling altogether on veterans' earnings? Surely a veteran is making a contribution to society by the work he does, and we are doing him a great disservice by placing any ceiling on the amount he may earn and reducing his war veterans allowance accordingly.

Those are just a few of my thoughts, Mr. Speaker. Let me return to the war veterans allowance, or to the burned out pension as the veteran calls it. He has a certain pride in having served his country. I submit the allowance should be paid to him without any strings attached and without any liability for income tax. I will certainly support this bill, as will members on all sides of the House. I think the haste with which the bill was dealt with by the study group is evidence of the interest in it. We are ready to pass it almost immediately.

When this bill goes to committee I am sure we shall witness the same speedy consideration that the report of the study group received. I look forward to seeing the bill in committee very shortly so that we may work on it, bring it back to the House for final approval and make available to veterans benefits which will accrue from April 1.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I remind the House that if the minister takes the floor at this time it will be to close the debate.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have listened carefully to all hon. members who have spoken on the bill and was extremely pleased to hear them support its measures. Regarding the suggestions made, especially by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), I look forward to exploring these matters further when the bill goes before the committee. I thank hon. members for their kind words and sincerely hope that this bill will be before the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs at the first opportunity.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Ten o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Does the House agree to call it ten o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

AIR TRANSPORT—ADVANCE BOOKING CHARTER REGULATIONS—ASSURANCE THAT TRAVELLERS WILL BE PROTECTED AGAINST PRICE FIXING

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes available to me this evening I hope the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Guay) will be in a position to clear up the confusion on questionable features surrounding the new regulations that were announced in January concerning advance booking charter regulations. For some time now a number of hon. members have been asking the minister questions in the House about the many areas of confusion and uncertainty surrounding the new regulations. I hope that after almost two months of concern, there will be some clarification of the regulations.

I know that the minister's powers are limited. The National Transportation Act limits the powers of the minister to alter decisions of the Canadian Transport Commission. However, the minister has responsibility for dealing with matters of transportation policy that affect our nation. Surely he is in a position to wield a great deal of influence in policy matters and in the bringing in of regulations that are prescribed by the Canadian Transport Commission within the ambit of the National Transportation Act. I say this in view of the many regulations which affect detrimentally many members of the travelling public. I believe it is fair to say that the regulations prescribed by the Canadian Transport Commission do not reflect the wishes of the travelling public nor the wishes of the retail travel trade.

In my opinion, without doubt the new regulations are making air charter travel more difficult. The new regulations are making air charter travel more confusing and more expensive. Above all, the new charter regulations do not provide the necessary protection against the so-called "bucket shop operator" or the undesirable operator who has plagued the charter industry in the past few years. Furthermore, it will place an increased burden on prospective charter passengers and also create undue hardship on the legitimate charter organizations who are dedicated to providing air charter travel to the many Canadians who are desirous of obtaining economic holiday travel.

I believe it is fair to say that these regulations are weighted very heavily in favour of the profitablity of the scheduled air services in this country at the expense of the travelling public. A look at the policy of price fixing, which in my opinion is monopolistic, reveals that foreign carriers are not allowed to file a tariff of fares that is below the fares filed by a Canadian carrier. As a result, undoubtedly air fares will be forced up to a much higher level.

The 90-day pre-booking requirement with a 25 per cent, non-refundable deposit places a very severe economic burden on those who are contemplating such holiday travel. In the event that a person has to change his holiday plans at the last minute, he has to surrender the 25 per cent deposit that he places on his trip. I seriously believe that this requirement should be altered and that there should be a 45 or 60-day pre-booking period. This has been the suggestion made by a pioneer of the air charter industry in Canada, namely, Max Ward. I also believe that a great deal more flexibility should be given to the substitution of passengers using, say, a 30-day or perhaps 15-day period.

The whole matter of marketing the new ABC's has created a great deal of confusion and uncertainty. There has been delay in publishing the regulations. There has been delay in interpretation, which has created mass chaos in the air charter industry. We now have subsidiaries of airlines that are retailing the air charter bookings. We have Intervac, which is associated with Ward-Air, and Econair, associated with Air Canada, and so on. There is no question in my mind that these firms are operating at arm's length with the air lines.

I reiterate that the rules contained in the new regulations do not prevent the illegitimate operator from taking advantage of the public. I submit that the regulations should be tightened up. I believe they can be tightened up through meaningful discussion and consultation with the retail travel trade and with those engaged in the travel business. I must say that the whole approach to the formulation of these regulations was conducted on a unilateral basis. I believe the Canadian Transport Commission, in its wisdom, should have consulted to a much greater degree those involved in the travel business. Above all, we must know who is authorized and who is not authorized to organize a charter.

As reported at page 1758 of Hansard for February 28, the minister indicated that under section 43:37 of the regulations, permission may be authorized to depart from any of the provisions of the regulations, and I believe that this is welcome. Surely there is ample justification for this. Following a number of representations by interested travel groups, and indeed by myself, the minister recognized that there were indeed some very severe shortcomings and failings in the regulations.

I would urge the parliamentary secretary to consult his minister and members of the Canadian Transport Commission, persuading them to take due consideration of some of the further shortcomings I have enunciated this evening and, if necessary, scrap the regulations now prescribed because I believe they are unworkable. I think consideration should also be given to the fact that it is about time we recognized that the Canadian Transport Commission should concern itself more with the welfare of the travelling public than with the airlines and the railways to the degree it has in the past.

We are all aware of the lessons of the rail passenger service as a result of the protective shield provided by the Canadian Transport Commission. I urge that we do not allow that commission to shield the operations of the Airlines in the way it has shielded the operations of rail passenger services.

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I should like to assure the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) that I will be pleased to bring his representations of this evening to the attention of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand). To my knowledge, no new regulations have yet been finalized. I should like to direct the hon. member's attention—no doubt he is aware of this—to an answer given by the minister to a question posed by the hon. member which is to be found in Hansard for January 25, at page 636. He said:

> Mr. Speaker, it is generally known that new regulations have been enacted regarding advance booking charters and published on January 8. I feel it is somewhat premature to draw conclusions on the implementation of the new policy because when preparing these regulations we consulted the Transport Commission and other authorities involved. As and when we become aware that the risks pointed out by the hon. member can really materialize, we shall certainly review the regulations.

I should also like to refer the hon. member to an answer by the minister in reply to a question posed by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Fleming) which appears at page 1758 of Hansard for February 28. The minister stated:

> Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the Canadian Transport Commission informs me that the relevant regulations authorize the commission to remove or waive some restrictions in certain individual cases.
> Now the Canadian Transport Commission has decided to waive certain delays for all travel towards eastern Europe, which means that no ethnic groups will meet with the problems they faced so far.

CANADIAN CULTURE—MULTICULTURALISM—REQUEST FOR GRANT TO SASKATCHEWAN PROVINCIAL LIBRARY TO BUY BOOKS IN VARIOUS LANGUAGES

Mr. Elias Nesdoly (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, March 6, I asked a question of the minister responsible for multiculturalism regarding library grants to the provincial library of Saskatchewan. The question was taken as notice by the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner). I was disappointed that the minister responsible did not answer. However, I should like to outline in a little more detail the problem we have in this regard.

This problem has been brought to my attention by a number of letters from my own province. The provincial library in Saskatchewan has been carrying the operations of the public library system in that province and has from time to time provided multicultural services. In Saskatchewan we have small libraries and a regional library system which are financed largely by provincial government grants and also by local taxation.

Originally the service was adequate for the limited use to which it was put by a few borrowers. Gradually over the years the borrowers from that library have demanded improved library service in the many languages of the Saskatchewan pioneers. With increased attention to the question of bilingualism and multiculturalism in Canada, this will become more important to the people of Saskatchewan as time goes on. I should like to remind you, Mr. Speaker, that the reports of the 1971 census regarding the mother tongue of the population of Saskatchewan showed that 208,000 people, from a total population of 926,000, spoke neither English nor French as their first language. A total of 31,000 people in Saskatchewan spoke French as their first language. The breakdown by ethnic origin is still available only from the 1961 census. At that time, 550,000 out of 925,000 people were of non-British origin, and of these 60,000 were French.

For several years the provincial library has been buying books in the languages of the major ethnic groups. The budget for this program has always been extremely limited, and since the French language is placed in this group the collection is still extremely small. The original method of circulation was by sending blocks of 15 books in a language to the public library in the small towns of Saskatchewan. As the regional library system has been rapidly developing, the number of libraries has also greatly increased. People in charge of the various libraries have tried to increase the number of selections of books for an individual by increasing the number of blocks in a branch library. There has been an increase in the budget but it is not great enough to serve the people properly. So far, in this library books are available in the following languages: French, German, Ukrainian, Russian, Polish, Hungarian, Dutch, Czech and Slovak. There are still some demands which have not even been attempted to be met, for example, in the Swedish, Icelandic, Chinese and Italian languages, and so on.

They have also a fairly adequate collection of all types of material concerning the native Indians and the dialects of Saskatchewan. Last year, when an amount of $1 million was available through the Department of the Secretary of State, an attempt was made to obtain a grant to purchase more books for this library. This attempt was met with a roundabout "No". Members of the public service attempted to explain the impossibility of the federal government making a grant to a provincial government agency.

I should like to remind you, Mr. Speaker, that the government of Saskatchewan co-operated wholeheartedly—and we agree with this—with the bilingual program. Many schools in my native province have started teaching French from grade one up. Of course, this program has been given an incentive through the grants obtained from the provincial government which originally come from the federal government. So there was no problem in obtaining grants for expanding bilingualism in the province of Saskatchewan. In the same way, the people of my province feel there should be no problem in obtaining a federal grant for a government agency in Saskatchewan to expand multiculturalism in that province, and indeed perhaps in any part of Canada.

Saskatchewan at present is also considering the use of the Cree and Chipewayen languages, in the northern areas of the province, in the school system. They are experimenting with many exciting ideas on multiculturalism. I feel that the answer I received on Tuesday was not adequate enough and I would like a more detailed statement from the minister or the parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, regarding the question raised by the hon. member I can say that no official request was made by the Saskatchewan public library. An oral inquiry was made by them, and it was replied to by the regional office of the Department of the Secretary of State. On March 5 last, the Minister of State (Mr. Faulkner) who is in charge of multiculturalism received a written inquiry about funding under the multicultural program, from the library consultant in the Saskatchewan provincial library. The matter is now under study by officers of the department. In addition, I can say that the national library has a special program to supply third language books to libraries. The Department of the Secretary of State will be looking further into the matter.

[Translation]

I would like to congratulate my hon. friend the member for Meadow Lake (Mr. Nesdoly) for the very interesting information he has given me on the progress of bilingualism and multiculturalism in Saskatchewan. As a member from Quebec, I am extremely happy about that; I encourage him to go on in that direction and I can assure him that, as a French-speaking Canadian, I will always gladly co-operate with him in order that the formula which we have adopted concerning bilingualism and multiculturalism be complied with in co-operation with all citizens, whatsoever their ethnic origin.

AIRPORTS—VANCOUVER INTERNATIONAL—PROPOSED NEW RUNWAY—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION ON ENVIRONMENTAL IMPACT

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, looking back over the last several months of debate which has taken place in the House concerning the proposed runway at Vancouver airport, I find we have a situation which I am certain has caused a great deal of anguish to members on this side of the House and also, I suspect, to some members on the government side.

Despite the fact that no adequate environmental studies have been made with respect to the possible or potential environmental damage caused by this new runway, the government has seen fit to proceed with the expropriation of the last of the homes in the affected area. As I said on another occasion in the House, in fact on several occasions, this is not the right way to make our decisions; this is not good environmental decision-making. If the truth were to be stated, I am probably supported by most members of the House when I say that the environmental impact must come at the front end of decision-making.

In answer to some questions raised in the House, the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis) said on February 15 this year, with respect to this new runway, as recorded at page 1335 of Hansard:

> When we come to the expansion of the airport which will begin, say, in 18 months' time, we will need prior to that date a published environmental impact statement. I hope it can be prepared within 12 months; that is the deadline the task force is working to. It must gather all the information available to date. After the publication of that information we must hold hearings.

But it is curious that when this matter was raised on January 31 of this year, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) said, as recorded at page 829 of Hansard:

> We have consulted all specialized government services on the consequences of noise and temperature on the environment. The Department of the Environment is supposed to collate all those reports. I shall be happy to send one to my hon. friend.

Mr. Speaker, the fact of the matter is that if the Minister of Transport was right on January 31, 1973, then the Minister of the Environment did not need to make the statement that he made on February 15, 1973. And if you look through Hansard at the confusing replies coming from the government side, the only conclusion you can come to is that no environmental study was done and the government at the present time does not know what the environmental impact will be. But the Minister of the Environment has committed us to a 12-month deadline by which this study will be completed. To corroborate this, Mr. Speaker, on March 2, 1973, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Dubé) made a statement in the House of Commons, in the course of which he said:

—the Minister of the Environment will conduct a thorough study during the next 12 months into the effects of a new runway on the environment.

I draw to the attention of all hon. members and excerpt from a brief from the Vancouver Citizens' Committee for Noise Control, dated February 27, 1973. I quote only one short part of it. This refers to the amount of land fill that will take place at the mouth of the Fraser River in order to build the runway. It reads:

Fisheries studies just being made public disclose that a significant number of young Chinook salmon fingerlings spend up to six months in the shallows of Sturgeon Bank after coming down the Fraser River and before journeying further in their life cycle; obviously, the salmon fishery would be seriously affected by the land fill on Sturgeon Bank proposed in the expansion.

That is just one matter which has to be studied before we really know whether we should go ahead with this runway. As a consequence of that and of other matters which have been raised and debated in this House, I ask these questions: Can these studies in fact be prepared in 12 months? We have found out recently in the Squamish area, in the province of British Columbia, that in fact salmon migrating downstream do spend time in the mouths of rivers. This seems to be something we did not know before. I do not know how many other things in connection with the fishery run in the Fraser River we should know before we build the runway.

What assurance do we have that if proper studies are not done, the airport expansion will not be undertaken until the studies are completed? Under what legislation will this study promised by the minister be done, if any legislation does exist, and will there be public hearings? Will there be an opportunity for the public to take part, are we going to be faced with the situation where we have an entirely ad hoc response by the government as a result of the political pressures brought to bear here in the House of Commons during the past month or two?

I know that I speak for many people in this House when I say that we want answers to these questions. We want these promised hearings and studies to take place under proper circumstances, with the maximum of public input, and not rushed to meet the construction deadline, so that we will have sufficient information to know whether the construction should proceed at all.

Mr. Joseph-Phillipe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) I should like to quote the three ministers who said that if, after reviewing the hearing officer's report, the federal government decided to proceed with a second new parallel runway for the Vancouver international airport, no construction would take place until a full 12-month environmental study had been completed and was made public. This release was made by the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis), the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand).

I should like to add that the Minister of Transport has stated that following a review of the hearing officer's report concerning the intended expropriation of land required for the expansion of Vancouver international airport, the federal government has decided that it will proceed to complete the acquisition of the necessary land on Sea Island.

The Minister of Transport stated that Vancouver international airport is the springboard for Canada and the Pacific rim countries, and as such is an essential facility in Canada's air transportation network. The Minister of Transport expressed his deep concern about the property owners involved and the feelings they expressed. The minister stated that the rights of property owners to full and fair compensation could best be provided under the terms of the expropriation act.

The hon. minister also stated that the government would ensure that the expansion of the airport facilities would not be undertaken without full consideration of the impact on the urban and natural environment, and the studies involved would be made public and freely discussed. Further, to ensure that federal plans are co-ordinated with the activities of other levels of government and that public concerns are taken fully into account, the minister announced that the topic of airport expansion, if other levels of government agree, would be placed on the agenda, on a continuing basis, of the greater Vancouver tri-level committee.

The proposed tri-level committee group for greater Vancouver will bring together political leaders and officials of the federal government, the province and the greater Vancouver regional district. Regular meetings would be held to discuss a wide range of urban issues involving consultation and co-ordination among the governments. In addition to airport expansion, other issues which could be placed on the tri-level agenda include urban growth patterns—which includes the question raised this evening—and the whole question of transportation patterns and facilities for the lower mainland and connections with Vancouver Island.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.29 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, March 9, 1973

The House met at 11 a.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN SPEAKER'S GALLERY OF ANGLICAN, LUTHERAN, PRESBYTERIAN, ROMAN CATHOLIC AND UNITED CHURCH LEADERS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I take this opportunity to indicate the presence in your gallery this morning of the national leaders of the Anglican, Lutheran, Presbyterian, Roman Catholic and United churches who have come here today to launch a national campaign of "Ten Days for World Development" in the belief that development both at home and abroad demands justice. Earlier this morning they met with the external affairs committee, and later they are going to meet a number of cabinet ministers. I am sure all hon. members of the House wish them well in this important undertaking.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

NATIONAL CAPITAL

GATINEAU PARK—ANNOUNCEMENT OF EXCHANGE OF LANDS WITH QUEBEC

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on this almost spring day I have an announcement of some interest. I wish to announce that the federal government and the government of Quebec have agreed to a mutually advantageous administrative exchange of lands contained within the national capital region, almost entirely within Gatineau Park. The province of Quebec will transfer to the federal government approximately 12,500 wilderness acres it still holds within the western confines of the park. This will enable the National Capital Commission, which manages the park, to plan, control and administer the park as an entity from the standpoints of both recreation and conservation. Generally speaking, the western end of the park is being maintained as a wilderness area.

In exchange, for the transfer of this large acreage by the province of Quebec to the federal government we are transferring to Quebec the administration of some land in the southern end of the park adjacent to Hull, and some non-park land for rights of way and road widening. Altogether, the lands being transferred by the federal government constitute some 255 acres of urban-related land.

The parcels of parkland being transferred to Quebec are to be used exclusively for educational, cultural, recreational and other purposes in the public interest. Quebec has agreed to declare Gatineau park a game reserve and to restrict mining exploration within the park.

I might add that this agreement I am announcing brings to a successful conclusion negotiations which I am informed have been proceeding on and off for a dozen years.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, on this spring day I want to echo the feeling of complete acceptance of this agreement and to say how pleased we are to hear the minister's announcement. We have always felt that Gatineau Park was really a national park in the fullest sense of the word, although it is an adornment particularly to the national capital area. It is pleasing to us to hear that arrangements are being made to develop the park as it has been slated to be developed, under one jurisdiction. To put our feelings correctly, may I say that we greet this announcement with the same joy that we would greet an announcement that there had been successful negotiations with the provinces of Ontario and Quebec with respect to the creation of a rapid transit system for the national capital area.

• (1110)

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, if I may comment very briefly on the minister's announcement I should like to say it is certainly very pleasant to hear some good news from the minister.

An hon. Member: For a change.

Mr. Mather: The completion of this agreement between the federal and the Quebec authorities will without doubt result in administrative benefits for the new land areas concerned. I have some personal knowledge of the situation because I spend a good deal of time in the Gatineau area, and in my opinion this agreement will benefit all Canadians in time to come. The pity is as the minister has said, that has taken 10 to 12 years to complete the agreement. Now that it has been brought about we hope and expect it will result in ecological and recreational benefits and, hopefully, political benefits to the federal and Quebec authorities.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, it is nice to hear a statement such as this and to see the federal government and the government of Quebec agree on something for once. Unfortunately, I notice that Quebec is rather too big-hearted in exchanging 12,500 acres for 255. However, from the point of view of the National Capital

Commission, I think it is a good cause, one to defend and to respect, since there will always be a need for places where we can hold on to natural surroundings, which are at present escaping us bit by bit.

Again we congratulate the governments on having reached an agreement, even though it took them a mere 12 years to do so. We hope that future discussions between the federal government and the province of Quebec will not last 12 years.

FISHERMEN'S BENEFITS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to move a motion under Standing Order 43 on a very imminent and urgent matter. Because of the injustice of the unemployment insurance regulations as they pertain to fishermen, resulting in many fishermen now being forced on welfare allowances two months before the start of the fishing season, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That an immediate change be made in the unemployment insurance regulations to bring fishermen's benefits more in line with regular benefits and that in lieu of a revised fishermen's plan an immediate amendment be made to the regulation so that the number of benefit weeks be equivalent to the number of qualifying weeks.

Mr. Speaker: This motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and the motion cannot be put.

HOUSING

RENT INCREASES FOR OLD AGE PENSIONERS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. John Harney (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to bring to the attention of the House a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Because many owners of limited dividend projects are taking advantage of the proposed old age pension increases in order to raise rents in these projects and are citing Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation authorization to raise rents in mid-lease, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House instructs the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) to order the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to cease authorizing rent increases within the terms of leases in force on January 1, 1973.

Mr. Speaker: This motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimity?

[Mr. Caouette (Charlevoix).]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The motion cannot be put.

MANPOWER

AVAILABILITY OF FUNDS FOR LOCAL INITIATIVES PROJECTS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, under the terms of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion on an urgent matter concerning municipalities in Canada that wish to benefit from the Local Initiatives Program. In view of the fact that a number of very important projects have been turned down because of poor co-ordination between the approval by provincial governments of municipal loan by-laws and the approval date for Local Initiatives projects, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin):

That this House study means of preventing very important projects, submitted as required by the Local Initiatives Program, from being turned down merely as a result of this technicality.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Portneuf. Under the terms of Standing Order 43, the motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent, and so the hon. member's motion may not be put.

EFFECT OF U.S. PROTECTIONIST TRADE MEASURES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion concerning a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, namely the American protectionist measures which threaten to worsen our economic situation. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin):

That this House instruct the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affair to analyze the impact on the Canadian economy of the American protectionist measures adopted in the last two years, and to suggest to this House possible means of counteracting those harmful consequences on the level of employment in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member for Bellechasse. Under Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. The motion therefore cannot be put.

PENITENTIARY ACT

PROVISION FOR CHAPLAINS NOT TO BE EMPLOYEES

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-160, to amend the Penitentiary Act (religious freedom).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, under section 10 of the Penitentiary Act at the moment people who are employed as prison chaplains are in fact peace officers or policemen and are under the statutory authority of the warden and the Commissioner of Penitentiaries. The purpose of this bill is to reflect the view that it is inappropriate for a chaplain also to be a policeman and, accordingly, to provide that chaplains, while retaining all rights of access to penitentiaries and communications with inmates, shall not be employees as such under the Penitentiary Act, and thus be in a better position to fulfil their important role within a penitentiary.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

POSSIBLE IMPLEMENTATION OF CONTIGENCY PLAN IN VIEW OF CONSUMER PRICE INDEX INCREASE—SUGGESTED MEETING WITH BUSINESS AND LABOUR TO OUTLINE RESTRAINT TARGETS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister a question. In light of the fact that the year to year increase, that is, from February, 1972, to February, 1973, in the consumer price index of 5.8 per cent is the highest in 22 years, is the government now prepared to announce and implement the contingency plan that the government says it has to deal with the serious problem of inflation?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I am sure hon. members would not wish their applause to be interpreted as meaning that they are in favour of an increase of that order in the consumer price index. I would like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the government is now prepared, in light of this very substantial increase in the consumer price index, to convene a meeting with representatives of business and labour with a view to outlining the restraint targets the government considers essential to be achieved in light of this problem?

• (1120)

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the government has the problem, of course, under very serious consideration. I think it is fortunate that the House decided to establish a committee to look in particular at the question of food because food accounts for a very large part of the increase in the cost of living. The government does not have plans at present to convene the sort of meeting that the Leader of the Opposition has suggested. I do hope, however, as does the Leader of the Opposition, that everyone in the country will show restraint and will reflect in particular the big tax reductions that were made in the last budget in the prices that they are charging.

INFLATION—CONSENSUS AS TO EMERGENCY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In light of the fact that the Food Prices Committee has been repeatedly told that food prices will continue to escalate, and in view of the fact that the minister or at least some of his cabinet colleagues have also repeatedly indicated that there is no national consensus that we are in an emergency situation in respect of the cost of living and general inflation in this country, may I ask the minister, first, how that decision respecting the so-called national consensus was arrived at, second, whether there is any change now in that national consensus and, third, if there is a change, would he agree that we are in an emergency situation in respect of inflation in this country?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the decision whether there is such a consensus is a matter of judgment. Second, this decision was one that was arrived at obviously in the course of the government's consideration of the matter and it is continuously under review. Therefore, in view of what I have just said, I do not think that an appropriate answer can be given to the hon. member's third question.

FOOD PRICE INCREASES—INVESTIGATION OF COST TO CONSUMER OF ADVERTISING BUDGETS OF PACKERS AND DISTRIBUTORS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have one or two supplementary questions for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, although I would have addressed them to the Minister of Finance if he were here. Is the minister looking into the question of the cost to the consumer of the immense advertising budgets of both the packers and distributors of food and into the necessary policies, particularly fiscal policies, that would reduce the amount that these corporations can deduct for income tax purposes, as an expense for advertising and promotion, which is a cost to the consumer?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): In my brief to the Food Prices Committee I said that the research branch of the combines section of the department had begun a study into the implications of advertising with respect to the concentration in various industries, including the food industry. This work has not yet been completed. Second, any comment on possible changes in fiscal policy would have to come from the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Lewis: Any research under the combines legislation would, of course, be limited to certain questions about agreed prices, mergers and stuff of that sort. I am asking the minister whether his department is making a study outside the limited area of combines into the question and is going to propose some policies with regard to it?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, there is no general study of the sort indicated by my hon. friend under way at the present time. However, I am constantly considering what further extension of the department's research work should be undertaken, and I am always happy to recommend to my colleagues in the cabinet what I consider to be appropriate changes in policy.

STUDY OF IMPACT OF INCREASED MEAT PRODUCT EXPORTS ON PRICES IN CANADA

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce arising out of information, particularly with respect to pork products, that there has been an increase in exports of those products to many countries, including Japan, and that the amount of exports of some other meat products has also increased. Is his department making a study, as I suggest it should, into the possible impact on prices in Canada of increased exports of products outside Canada?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, that is the kind of situation which we have under continuous review. However, I would be pleased to make specific inquiries for the hon. member and to give him any information I have.

FOOD PRICE INCREASES—SUGGESTED INDICATION OF CEILING FOR 1973 BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In light of the statement by the Grocery Distributors Institute that food prices will continue to increase and the fact that the association says, "We do know where it is going to end," will the minister tell the House and the Grocery Distributors Institute that the government has an idea of what reasonable price increases should be for 1973, that the government will take action to keep prices within some defined ceiling, and that the government will transmit this information to key sectors of the food industry?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in his budget statement the Minister of Finance indicated that one of the aims of the budget was to reduce inflationary pressures on the economy, and I think that the effects of some of the reductions announced in the budget have already been indicated in press reports that are known to hon. members. I might add that so far as I am aware many of the proposals with regard to controls on prices, put forward by people in the party of the hon. member, seem to exclude any coverage of food products, which are concerning us all at the present time.

Mr. McGrath: May I ask the minister where this leaves the people in the lower income group who cannot afford to eat bananas and grapefruit?

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is the hon. member for Drummond rising on a supplementary question?

Mr. Jean-Marie Boisvert (Drummond): No, Mr. Speaker, my question is about another subject.

Mr. Speaker: I will recognize the hon. member in a moment.

[English]

PRICE INCREASES—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON CONDITIONS THAT WOULD JUSTIFY IMPLEMENTATION OF GOVERNMENT CONTINGENCY PLAN

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Acting Prime Minister a question. In view of the government's frequent statements that the situation is not yet serious enough for it to consider implementing its contingency plan, would he indicate to the House now, or in a statement on motions, what conditions the government would recognize as being of sufficient seriousness to cause it to initiate its contingency plan?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would hope that this information would be given by way of a statement on motions rather than in reply to a question, but if the Acting Prime Minister wishes to reply briefly he will be recognized for that purpose.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it would not be the intention of the government to present such a statement to parliament. I am sure the hon. member would agree that it would be most unwise, if one were going to implement price and wage controls, to give any notice whatsoever of the government's intention.

SOCIAL SECURITY

SUGGESTED FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO LOW-INCOME FAMILIES TO PROVIDE PROPER NUTRITION—PROVISION OF GUARANTEED MINIMUM INCOME

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the findings of the National Council of Welfare that many povertystricken families have to bring up children who are undersized, sick, disabled and prone to disease because of lack of income for food, will the minister consider making moneys available under the Canada Assistance Plan, specifically to provide proper nutrition for low-income families?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member surely knows, funds under the Canada Assistance Plan are available for such purposes. The federal government pays half of the amounts which the provinces earmark for such a purpose and, in such a case, it belongs to the provincial governments to decide what kind of program they wish to implement to help needy children.

[English]

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I would now like to ask the minister a question about a program which is specifically federal. The National Council of Welfare has suggested that the best way of handling this problem is with a guaranteed minimum income for everybody across the country. Is the minister prepared to make such a recommendation to the House?

• (1130)

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I hope to be in a position before the end of April to introduce in the House proposals respecting a comprehensive review of the Canada Assistance Plan and I am sure that, on that occasion, I will be in a position to tell the House what the government's position is on the whole matter.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Drummond and then recognize the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi who I believe has a supplementary.

OLD AGE PENSIONS—REDUCTION BY QUEBEC DEPARTMENT OF SOCIAL AFFAIRS—AGREEMENT BETWEEN GOVERNMENTS

Mr. Jean-Marie Boisvert (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Can the minister tell this House if he is aware of the fact that new old age pensioners are compelled to give back large amounts of money to the Quebec Department of Social Affairs, from their old age pension cheque which was already reduced by a certain amount for this purpose?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I am not aware of this fact, Mr. Speaker, but as I said in the House yesterday, I hope that all provincial governments will respect the wishes of the House to increase benefits to older people and that provincial governments will not, at least for the current year, increase expenses they charge older people who fall under their jurisdiction at the present time.

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

May I ask the minister if a formal agreement has been reached between the Quebec government and the federal government as regards the claims of the Department of Social Affairs, which recovers certain amounts from these people by deducting them from their old age pension cheques? Is there any kind of formal agreement in this regard?

Mr. Lalonde: There is no agreement, formal or informal, Mr. Speaker. This is a matter which has never been raised during the discussions I had in this regard with officials of the Quebec government.

Mr. Fortin: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Now that this matter has been brought to the minister's attention, is he prepared to look into it?

Mr. Lalonde: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

SUGGESTED PROVISION OF SCHOOL MEAL PROGRAM

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In light of the finding of Nutrition Canada that one-fifth of the population, involving over two million of our young people, suffers from nutritional problems requiring medical attention, and in light of the escalation of food prices mentioned today, is the government going to launch a school meal program as recommended by the National Council of Welfare and, if so, are talks on this specific matter being entered into immediately?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): First of all, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi is certainly ahead of Nutrition Canada itself. Concerning the status of the study, publication of recommendations will start during the coming months. Actually, the study as a whole will be completed only in mid-October and I therefore feel that any factual statements should be delayed until findings have been compiled and made public.

As for the question put by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi, it evidently comes within the scope of both social security and provincial educational programs. That question might be raised in the course of the meetings we are to have with the provinces in April.

POSSIBLE DISTRIBUTION OF SURPLUS POWDERED MILK TO SCHOOLS—NEW FAMILY ALLOWANCE LEGISLATION

Mr. Howard Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Is the government at last going to finance the distribution of surplus powdered milk to schools where children are suffering inexcusable malnutrition, and is the government now prepared—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Grafftey: Oh, be quiet!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member ask his question.

Mr. Grafftey: Is the government now preparing new family allowance legislation and, if so, will it be introduced immediately to help low income families in particular?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: The first part of the question does not, of course, come under my jurisdiction, Mr. Speaker.

Concerning the second question, I have already stated repeatedly in this House that the government intends to introduce during the present session a bill on family allowances and I hope that the opposition party to which the hon. member belongs will then support the bill.

[English]

Mr. Grafftey: In all seriousness, Mr. Speaker, these questions are not asked with partisan overtones.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grafftey: It is my assumption, Mr. Speaker, after listening to the minister that nothing is going to be done.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Again I seek the co-operation of hon. members to limit, if possible, the number of supplementaries.

WELFARE PAYMENTS—SUGGESTED EMERGENCY MEETING WITH PROVINCIAL MINISTERS ON INCREASE

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact the minister indicated, as reported in the press, that the amount of money paid to people on welfare is a national disgrace, and in view of the fact that a couple aged 64 are only getting $149 a month, would the minister now take the lead in calling an emergency meeting of welfare ministers to discuss this problem so that an increase in the cost sharing-program can be instituted?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say first of all that the article mentioned by the hon. member is not a press release. It is a comment that was made at the meeting with the representatives of certain Canadian labour unions. Second, the problem of poverty raised by the hon. member does not exist only for people of 60, 64 or 65, it is also found at all levels of the population. Third, the funds spent on welfare are determined by the provinces but the federal government's share of the costs, whatever they are, is 50 per cent. Fourth, a very important meeting is actually scheduled for the end of April with the representatives of all provinces and I hope we can quickly reach an agreement so we can have a more adequate social security plan to meet the needs of the people of Canada.

TRADE

AUTOMOBILES—SUGGESTED PROVISION BY MINISTER OF CORRECT INFORMATION TO UNITED STATES OFFICIALS IN VIEW OF STATEMENTS BY SENATOR HARTKE

Mr. Barnett J. Danson (York North): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the allegations made by United States Senator Vance Hartke on the television program "Encounter" last night, in which some rather serious errors in fact were conveyed, would the minister convey to him and other American opinion leaders that United Automobile Workers wages in Canadian automobile plants are effectively at parity with those of workers in the United States, that vehicles made in the United States do in fact come into Canada duty free to Canadian automobile companies, and that foreign cars coming into Canada are subject to a duty rate of 15 per cent—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Danson: —compared with 3 per cent on those going into the United States?

Mr. Hees: Say "yes".

An hon. Member: Do you like to answer your own questions?

An hon. Member: After all, the hon. member read it and the minister wrote it so perhaps the minister can say yes.

Mr. Danson: On a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for York North rises on a point of order.

Mr. Danson: In spite of the allegations of the hon. gentlemen opposite we are quite capable of using our own minds on this side of the House and retaining our independence.

An hon. Member: Explain!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North on a point of order.

Mr. Coates: No, Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps we might allow the minister to reply first.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asked three questions alluding to the broadcast last night—

An hon. Member: Read them again.

Mr. Gillespie: On the last one, with respect to the question of tariff duties, he is accurate. On the second question he is accurate. I cannot, on the first point, confirm or deny the parity of wages between Canadian automobile workers and United States automobile workers. One reason for that is that there are a number of different plants in the United States and a number of different plants in Canada. It depends a great deal on where these judgments are made—

An hon. Member: What about the weather?

Mr. Gillespie: I should like to say that there was so much that the senator said that was based on ignorance.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please! The minister has the floor to reply to the question.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate on a question of privilege.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, we have a situation here where an hon. member from Toronto has raised three questions. In essence he was asking the minister to convey to the senator that the statements he made were not in order. Perhaps Your Honour was not listening or was reading notes, with the greatest respect, received from members. But if the questions are read when Hansard appears it will be seen that the hon. member, instead of asking a question, made a representation and also an argument. The minister is obviously aware of the answers that are supposed to be placed on the record, as he is prepared with all the data. He had been going on for four or five minutes and this is going to take up about a third of the question period. I contend that because of such actions—

• (1140)

Mr. Lundrigan: —members on this side of the House who wish to ask vital and important questions from day to day are not able to place them on the record. If members of the Liberal party are having trouble reaching the cabinet, I contend that is their problem and it should not be forced on us in the House.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. An hon. member rose a moment ago on a point of order. The hon. member rose on a question of privilege. We could go on like this for a long time and not much would be gained. The point is that questions should be asked briefly. The hon. member asked a number of questions because, obviously, from the way the minister replied he recognized three questions in what the hon. member had said.

Mr. Hees: He recognized them because he wrote them.

Mr. Speaker: The minister's reply should be as brief as possible. I think the matter would have ended some minutes ago if we had allowed the minister to reply briefly.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I wanted to say that there were so many statements made by the senator in his remarks last night that to answer them all would probably take more time than I have at my disposal. Nor can I, every time—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Gillespie: —an irresponsible statement is made, answer it in a way—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the minister please resume his seat? I suggest that it is certainly not competent for the minister to deny or confirm a statement made outside the House, and if this were the essence and purport of the hon. member's question I could hardly allow it. At the same time, if the Chair were to object to and not allow any question which is argumentative in tone, perhaps very few questions would be permitted during the question period.

DISPARITY IN CAR PRICES BETWEEN CANADA AND UNITED STATES

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the question asked by the hon. member for York North and the minister's reply, would he explain to the Canadian people rather than to American senator why, if all the things the hon. member for York North is saying are correct, Canadians are not able to purchase cars for the same price at which they are purchased in the United States? That is the important point.

Mr. Hees: There is no answer to that question.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—CONTINUED PARTICIPATION OF CANADIAN ELEMENT IN SUPERVISORY COMMISSION—SUBMISSION OF GOVERNMENT DECISION TO HOUSE BEFORE END OF MARCH

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. As the minister, with other members of the House, is going to Viet Nam and as the decision regarding continued participation of Canadian forces in the control commission must be made before the end of this month, will the minister tell the House if he intends to submit the government's decision as to the continuance of Canadian participation to parliament for approval or disapproval after his return and before the end of the month?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it has always been my intention to submit the decision that the government will make to continue or to withdraw, provided, of course, that the House is in session, for debate in parliament, at which time members of all parties can express their views on whether or not they wish to support the decision of the government.

VIET NAM—REQUEST FOR FURTHER DEBATE ON MOTION ON ORDER PAPER

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he is prepared to give the House the assurance that he will bring back before the House the motion he introduced, I think on February 1, to which there were certain amendments proposed? Will the minister give us an assurance within what compass of time this motion will be brought back before the House?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have not had the opportunity to talk to my colleague, the House leader, but I would not recommend that this particular motion and the proposed amendment be brought before the House again. It had been our intention, when introducing this resolution, to have a debate on the merits or otherwise of the decision the government made to go in for 60 days. That debate served its purpose. There was no one who took exception. Then an amendment was proposed which would have required the government to submit, before it had made its decision, its recommendation to parliament. That, I do not think, is in accordance with the principles of good government or the principles under which this House operates. Therefore I do not intend to proceed with that debate. However, I am prepared to bring before the House the decision that the government makes, which I think is the orderly way of doing it established by precedent and one that my hon. friend would support if he were prime minister of Canada today.

REPRESENTATIONS BY GOVERNMENT AGAINST BURKE-HARTKE BILL

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question related to the earlier questions asked by the hon. member for York North. I do not have the questions before me, as the minister had. Apparently his writing is no better than mine, but the minister will not need to try to decipher my writing. What is the government doing in connection with the Burke-Hartke bill in the United States? What complaints, observations or reservations have been made by the minister concerning that portion of the bill that would put quotas on all United States imports and place heavy penalties on foreign investment? I will not ask these questions by enumerating them as one, two and three, for if so mine would be four, five and six.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, to answer the right hon. gentleman, on previous occasions I have told the House that we have made, on a government to government basis, our views known on this particular piece of legislation. It is not a piece of legislation that we like in any way.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, in order that these views may be known, will the minister set before the House a summary of the views? After all, we cannot understand what the views were, and that is why I must ask these further questions. With the repeal of the foreign tax credit, or double taxation on foreign earnings, the result in Canada will be, as I understand it, a reduction of a large portion of the Canadian industrial labour force. What specific statement has the minister made in this connection to the United States government, when was the statement made, and what was the reaction of the American minister?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated in my first reply, it was not one statement. There have been a number of representations with respect to this issue. There will continue to be representations with respect to this bill. I stated that we do not like it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I do not seem to be able to get any answers. When did the minister himself make any objection? We should like to know what he is doing, except sit. When was the last objection that he raised, and what were the particulars of that objection? That is a simple question.

Mr. Hees: Answer!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the minister is silent because he has not done so.

BURKE-HARTKE BILL—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON POSITION TAKEN BY CANADIAN GOVERNMENT

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In order to place this matter properly before the House would the minister undertake, in view of the questions asked by the right hon. gentleman, at the next sitting of the House on motions and not during the question period to place before the House the formal position the government has taken and the variety of the views that the minister claims he has expressed on this particular bill?

• (1150)

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I believe this is going to be an ongoing series of discussions with the administration on a government to government basis, and I do not think any particular purpose would be served at the present time by following the hon. member's suggestion.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What are you trying to hide?

BANKRUPTCY ACT

INQUIRY RESPECTING WORK OF STUDY GROUP

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

In view of the alarming situation that exists regarding bankruptcies in Canada and the considerable losses that creditors and governments suffer and which have increased by $52 million as compared with 1970-71, would the minister say if the task force appointed to study the problem is fulfilling its role adequately because it seems that fraudulent bankruptcies are having more devastating effects than ever before and that manufacturers are becoming more and more the victims of that situation?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to take that very interesting question as notice and I will be giving the hon. member an answer at a later date.

AIR TRANSPORT

CANADA-CHINA—DESIGNATION OF CANADIAN PACIFIC AIRLINES AS CARRIER

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether flying rights from Canada to China have been given to any Canadian air carrier and, if so, to whom?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the cabinet ratified yesterday an air agreement with China. Canadian Pacific Airlines has been designated as the carrier.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Canadian Pacific will fly from any point in Canada to Peking and Shanghai, probably with a stopover in Alaska.

Mr. Hales: I should like to ask the minister why these rights were not given to Air Canada?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Well, this is not a new practice. Usually the Pacific region is served by Canadian Pacific and Europe, generally, is served by Air Canada. So the decision was made in accordance with the traditional pattern.

REQUEST THAT CANADIAN PACIFIC AIRLINES ROUTES TO EUROPE BE TRANSFERRED TO AIR CANADA

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): My supplementary arises from the minister's answer. In view of the fact that Canadian Pacific Airlines has been granted landing rights in Europe and in view of the decision to grant to Canadian Pacific the right to fly to China, will the minister undertake to terminate Canadian Pacific's landing rights in Europe and reserve all of Europe for Air Canada?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the assignment of international routes to the two large Canadian carriers, CP Air and Air Canada, is being considered by the department and undoubtedly within a month or two we will try to clarify what seems a bit confusing in the assignment of routes between these two companies.

[English]

GRANTING OF PERMISSION TO INTERNATIONAL CARRIERS TO FLY DIRECTLY TO AND FROM TORONTO AIRPORT

Mr. Jim Fleming (York West): A supplementary question to the Minister of Transport. Has there been any development in connection with allowing some international air carriers to fly directly to and from Toronto International Airport?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the ratification of the agreement between China and Canada took place yesterday as did that between Germany and Canada. The company which will serve two new centres in Germany will be Air Canada and in return Lufthansa will have the right to land directly in Toronto.

TRADE

BURKE-HARTKE BILL—REPRESENTATIONS TO UNITED STATES SECRETARY OF COMMERCE

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary to the question addressed earlier to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Would the hon. gentleman advise the House when he last spoke to the United States Secretary of Commerce on the subject of the Burke-Hartke bill.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is in the interest of international relations to be giving this kind of information. I have explained on a number of occasions that discussions with respect to this issue and others of concern are going forward on a continuing basis. I can say that this week I discussed this very important subject with a senior official of the White House.

Oral Questions

HOUSING

NEW PROGRAMS TO REDUCE COST

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In view of the alarming increase in the cost of housing in Canada, is the minister in a position to announce any specific new programs designed to reduce the cost of new and rental housing for Canadians?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I should like to proceed on an urgent basis with the passage of Bill C-133 and would hope to have the co-operation of the opposition in doing so. I shall have something to say on Monday in terms of dealing with the problems to which the hon. member has referred.

Mr. Hellyer: In view of the fact that, at the present rate of inflation, by the end of the century the cheapest new house in metropolitan Toronto will cost well in excess of a quarter of a million dollars—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hellyer: —does the minister now feel that the situation has reached a state of emergency sufficient to justify a recommendation to his colleague, the Minister of Finance, that some form of compulsory guidelines or controls be applied to costs?

Mr. Basford: The question of the cost of land in metropolitan Toronto is an extremely serious one. This is why I have proposed to parliament certain provisions related to land assembly. That is why I have obtained the support of Treasury Board and my colleagues in the government for substantial increases in money allotted to land assembly, and why I have called upon the provinces and municipalities to join with me in developing a national land development strategy.

Mr. Speaker: Order. There are three minutes left before the end of the question period. Hon. members will have noted that we have spent most of the question period on supplementaries, so we might as well finish on supplementaries.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST THAT PENDING RENT INCREASE ON MARRIED QUARTERS NOT BE IMPLEMENTED

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): May I direct a supplementary to the Minister of National Defence. I assume there is a probability that the rent of armed forces married quarters will be increased around April 1. Does the hon. gentleman not consider that this might be a good time to forgo any such increase in order to dampen general inflationary tendencies?

Hon. James A. Richardson (Minister of National Defence): I will take the hon. member's representation into consideration.

[Mr. Gillespie.]

REQUEST FOR MEASURE TO LOWER MORTGAGE INTEREST RATES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): In view of the fact that neither of the bills we shall be discussing in the House in the next week or so has any direct bearing on interest rates in the terms of reducing them significantly for the average Canadian, would the minister assure the House that before the end of the present session he will introduce a measure designed to bring interest rates on mortgages down to five or six per cent?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Any announcement with regard to the introduction of new policies and new legislation will, of course, be made at the appropriate time. The effort of the government in terms of subsidized interest rates and subsidized housing is directed to those who are most in need, on a rent to income basis.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—PURPOSE OF MINISTER'S INVITATION TO OPPOSITION MEMBERS TO ACCOMPANY HIM ON VISIT

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I have a supplementary for the Secretary of State for External Affairs in relation to a previous question. Since the minister has made it quite clear to the House that it is not the intention of the government to consult parliament before the final decision is made on Canada's presence in Viet Nam, can the hon. gentleman tell us what is the purpose of inviting members of the House of Commons to go to Viet Nam when the information they might acquire cannot be used?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Since I have announced that I do intend to bring the decision before parliament for debate, I think it would be very useful if there were present, from the Conservative party, a representative who could ascertain the facts and not be dependent entirely on what the government tells him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

AGRICULTURE

FERTILIZER—REPORTED WITHHOLDING BY COMPANIES OF SUPPLIES TO FARMERS IN ANTICIPATION OF HIGHER PRICES

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. Has the hon. gentleman inquired into reports that fertilizer companies are deliberately withholding supplies to farmers in anticipation of higher prices, and that their desire is to fill export orders rather than meet the needs of Canadian farmers?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): All I can say in answer to that question is that such a situation has not been brought to my attention. On the other hand, it has been brought to my attention that more deliveries of fertilizer have been made to farmers than for many years, at this time of year, and that the prices have not been exorbitant. If the hon. member has any evidence in support of his statement, I would be glad to have it.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

ALLEGED SLOWDOWN BY VANCOUVER YARD CREWS—EFFECT ON GRAIN MOVEMENT

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Several days ago I asked the minister a question regarding a work to rule situation in Vancouver involving Canadian National yardmen which had the potential of slowing down movement of commodities such as grain through that port. The minister said he would report to the House or answer the question at a future date as to what progress has been made in terms of an inquiry into this serious labour dispute.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as far as the labour dispute is concerned, I would ask my colleague the Minister of Labour to answer the question.

Mr. Knight: Then, may I direct the question to the Minister of Labour, if I can get his attention. In view of the work to rule situation in the port of Vancouver involving CNR yardmen, which could have a serious effect on the movement of commodities through that port, can the Minister of Labour give the House any progress report in terms of an inquiry into this situation?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I was under the impression that the situation had eased and this the practice was not going on at the present time. That was as of a few days ago, but I will doublecheck the situation.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REQUEST FOR INTERVENTION BY MINISTER TO PREVENT CANCELLATION OF PROGRAM "CHEZ HELENE"

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State and relates to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. In view of the fact that the CBC is cancelling a program that is par excellence for young children, and in view of the fact that we in the west consider the program to be very helpful in teaching young children the very fundamentals of and love for a second language, would the minister tell the House if he plans to intercede on behalf of the many Canadian families, especially mothers of young children, who appreciate the program "Chez Helene"?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very pleased to make that representation known to the CBC and get their reply.

Mr. Knight: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. A few moments ago, I felt as the sun would feel when it goes behind a mountain. I wonder whether I could ask the minister a supplementary question?

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Middlesex first and then try to have other supplementaries before the end of the question period. The hon. member for Middlesex.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Hastings.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. There are those of us in the back rows who are also getting a little fed up with supplementaries.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ellis: In light of yet another accident on the mainline CNR tracks between Belleville and Montreal, and being aware that slow orders and increased security have been ordered on this line, can the minister assure the House and the travelling public that all precautions have been taken to ensure the safety of citizens travelling by train in this area?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his question. Traveller safety is certainly an important issue. As we know, in Montreal, a locomotive has hit a grubbing machine. There was one dead and a few wounded. We are inquiring to see if there was negligence. We will surely try to correct any mistake.

ALLEGED SLOWDOWN BY VANCOUVER YARD CREWS—EFFECT ON GRAIN MOVEMENT

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): In putting my supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, since the two ministers are sitting in such close proximity to each other I hope they will be able to decide which one will answer. In view of the fact that the joint council representing the Vancouver area railway workers, numbering some 2,500, have sent telegrams to the Minister of Transport expressing serious concern about the fact that there has been no progress report on the inquiry into this situation, I wonder whether one or other of the ministers would answer the question?

EXPIRATION OF FISHERMEN'S BENEFITS—POSSIBLE EQUATING OF BENEFIT PERIOD WITH QUALIFYING PERIOD—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. I have already discussed it with him and have raised the issue under Standing Order 43. I now raise it during the question period because of the urgency. In view of the fact only two months are left in the season and the fishermen have run out of benefits under the regulations, would the minister give serious consideration to making a statement on motions early next week informing us whether he will accept equating the benefit period with the qualifying period in order to prevent them from having to go on the welfare lines in the next eight weeks?

Hon. Robert K. OCEAN FALLS, B.C.—INQUIRY AS TO REQUEST BY PROVINCE FOR DEVELOPMENT ASSISTANCE—RELOCATION OF RESIDENTS

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, while I am on my feet might I answer a question I took notice of yesterday, asked by the hon. member for Coast-Chilcotin who was concerned about the effect of the closing down of the plant at Ocean Falls.

With regard to the closure of the Crown Zellerback plant at Ocean Falls, which unfortunately affected some 325 workers and other persons in the community, we were successful in establishing a joint labour-management committee under the auspices of the manpower consultative service. As of March 8, 1973, there were 150 persons of the 325 still be be relocated. With the exception of only 33, most will be placed in other plants of the company and with other employers while some will accept retirement. A team of my officers, together with members of the consultative committee will be in Ocean Falls next week to arrange acceptable solutions for the remaining 33. We do not anticipate any real problems in relocating this group, although some time will be required to finish it.

TRANSPORT

SOUTHWESTERN ONTARIO RAILWAY PASSENGER SERVICE—REQUEST FOR ACTION ON COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Ross Whicher (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Last June the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications recommended that all rail passenger services which were discontinued on November 1, 1970, in southwestern Ontario be re-established immediately and, second, that a joint study group of federal, provincial and municipal officials and railway employees be established to determine a minimum rail passenger network at the lowest possible cost. This unanimous recommendation to parliament was signed by 20 members almost nine months ago. When is the minister going to take action on this matter?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am sure this matter is not one over which the federal government and the Department of Transport have exclusive jurisdiction. It also concerns the Ontario government and the city of Toronto. I know the hon. opposition members have a great deal of respect for provincial autonomy and they will understand these projects can only be undertaken with the interested parties. This is what I intend to do not only in the light of the committee report but also on the basis of the Soberman report and others which were made on transportation in greater Toronto and southern Ontario.

POWER

JAMES BAY HYDROELECTRIC PROJECT—POSITION OF GOVERNMENT ON FEDERAL APPROVAL OF WORKS CONSTRUCTED ON NAVIGABLE RIVERS

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport and arises from statements he made in the House on Wednesday of this week. I should like to know whether it is the position of the government that, according to the Navigable Waters Protection Act, section 5, construction of all bridges and dams on navigable rivers in the James Bay area requires the authorization of the federal government? If so, has this been communicated to the government of Quebec?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think the answer I gave on Wednesday would be the same if I had to answer again.

[English]

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): In view of the minister's stated uncertainty at that time about federal jurisdiction regarding the Navigable Waters Protection Act, particularly since the federal government approved an application by the government of Quebec for a bridge across the Bell River at Matagami on January 28, 1971, is the minister aware that the James Bay Development Corporation has awarded contracts for 12 bridges since that date, and can the minister say whether these projects have yet received similar federal approval?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, the question put to me was about the possibility for the federal government to stop the construction of certain bridges in the James Bay area.

As for the private companies and individuals who want to build bridges, there is no doubt about this being under federal jurisdiction, if they are to be erected over waterways. It is less obvious when a provincial government is concerned. In the case of the James Bay area, there has been no protest, and I will inquire if a report has really been submitted to the department on that question.

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I thank you for recognizing me. I feel like saying a few words on this because since the beginning of the question period I keep rising and sitting down. However, I should like to put a question to the Solicitor General.

Could he say whether he intends to take procedures in order to clear his colleague, the hon. member for Lachine, from charges of malversation between him, the United Nurses Association Inc., and his friends, Messrs. Taylor and Fisher?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Solicitor General, may I say first that this matter certainly does not come under the jurisdiction of the Solicitor General's department.

[English]

Mr. Reilly: Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the hon. member as I did not want to intrude upon the question period with this point of order, but I would really like to correct something said yesterday by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) during his speech. He said of me that when I was younger I was a member of the Liberal party, then I went into the NDP and he expected I would eventually wind up in the Creditiste party. I had the opportunity of saying I had never been a member of the NDP, and I would have remained quiet about the allegation or the prediction about the Social Credit party, but enough is enough. I hereby solemnly declare I have never been a member of the Liberal party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: That is very reassuring.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Speaker, I must apologize to the hon. member for making that allegation. It is obvious that members of the Liberal party are just as happy as members of the NDP that he has never been a member of either party.

Mr. Muir: It is all one party; a coalition.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

HOUSE OF COMMONS

COMMITTEE REVIEW OF AND REPORT ON STANDING ORDERS AND PROCEDURE—AUTHORIZATION TO TRAVEL OUTSIDE OF CANADA DURING STUDY

The House resumed, from Wednesday, March 7, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen:

That the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization be authorized to consider the Standing Orders of the House and procedure in both the House and its Committees with special regard to all the matters that Mr. Speaker suggested during the Twenty-eighth and Twenty-ninth Parliaments that may require the consideration of the said Committee, and to report to the House its views on any facets thereof that may require reform and to recommend what manner of reform may be required;

And that the Committee be authorized to travel outside of Canada during consideration of the aforementioned subject.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I would like today, as a result of a previous agreement, to continue and conclude the speech which I began on March 7 concerning the Standing Orders and the procedure governing us as well as the motion of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) aimed at enabling the Committee on Procedure and Organization to carry out its review of our Standing Orders.

Mr. Speaker, at the very beginning of my speech on Wednesday last, I explained rather briefly why we are dissatisfied with such and such a point and I raised, as you know, some special problems.

I would like, since I have that opportunity, to conclude my speech by making some specific proposals. As for the oral question period, Mr. Speaker, we are embittered and frustrated, not because we do not get the floor, even if on some days we get it more often than on others. Speaker, the matter is beyond your control, since you have to deal with the influx of supplementaries.

Mr. Speaker, some colleagues wanted the oral question period to be extended. We believe that a 40-minute period is sufficient, provided it is well used. Even if we had an 80-minute oral question period, it would still be 80 minutes of clowning of we do not change the procedure.

Mr. Speaker, if we stick to the same method during the oral question period, and extend it, it will be 80 minutes of torture for you and for us. I believe we should consider, in the Committee on Procedure and Organization, serious reforms as to the proceedure during the oral question period.

During the meetings held by the Committee on Procedure and Organization and during that trip to Westminster, it was often proposed to proceed from now as follows: any member wishing to ask an oral question would give notice of it to the minister concerned who could thus reply in a more serious way. On the one hand, it would improve answers and the political aspect of our question period would be removed, while on the other hand, it would inable the Chair to put aside questions that lead to clowning, waste time or have but one reason, namely to get the member's name in Handsard. At any event, we are ready to consider most seriously the proposal concerning notices during the oral question period.

But we shall be more watchful in connection with the famous supplementary questions. Mr. Speaker, after a serious examination of the result of the oral question period, we have come to the conclusion—and we have statistics in support of that—that more time is given during the 40-minute oral question period to supplementary questions than to first questions.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that hon. members should be responsible enough to recognize the need to abolish, and I repeat abolish, the practice of supplementary questions.

We propose that a member be allowed to ask a question and even a supplementary to his own question. Then, another member could be recognized, but not under the pretext of asking a supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker, that is our position. Of course we don't have your experience and knowledge although we would like to very much, but in spite of our shortcomings in that regard, we intend to fight in all sincerity to put a stop to supplementary questions.

What happens? It happened today, it happened yesterday, it happens every day; there is an oral questions period.

• (1220)

Mr. Speaker, that is why we hate that period. The Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) rises to ask a question and then 10, 15, 20, 30 or 40 backbenchers want to take the opportunity to ask supplementaries. If a serious examination is made, which I hope the committee will do, not only of the number but also of the content of these questions, one will note that very often their content has no relation to the initial question and as the question period progresses, the further the final supplementary is from the initial subject; as Speaker, you cannot refuse to recognize a member. The backbenchers who have a question on another subject cannot put it since the Chair must deal exhaustively with a matter before going on to another one.

Mr. Speaker, our suggestion comes to this: First, the question period is long enough as it is; second, an equal distribution of time between opposition parties must be made on the first round. We do not accept and we will not accept, Mr. Speaker, to go on putting up with the same ridiculous system under which the first question asked by the Speaker of our party practically comes at the end of the first half of the oral question period, and this because of the supplementaries.

This situation is injust and antiparliamentary in that it does not equally respect the rights of each party on the first round. As for the first round, we seriously consider that the party leader or his delegate should be allowed to ask a first question, and then that a maximum of two or three supplementaries be asked on the subject. Thus, members of our party would be more quickly recognized. Then, Mr. Speaker, no supplementaries should be allowed from anyone other than the member who asked the question initially and only one supplementary should be granted if the member deems it necessary.

Since any procedural reform is made on an experimental basis—we must admit it since the House rules are continuously revised—this formula should be voluntarily accepted and made part of the rules so that the Chair will no longer have to do the thankless task of exhausting a subject before going on to another.

If hon. members were not so respectful of the Chair surely all those who are in our situation, and there are many, would protest. Everyone knows that those critics are not aimed at the Chair but at the system which turned the question period into a joke for the public in the House at that time and into a shame for the Chair because it is caught in this situation. I am saying it because your politeness and dignity will keep you from saying so, Mr. Speaker; it is our duty to say so ourselves and for the hon. members it is a source of continued and daily frustrations.

I sincerely hope, in the name of my party, that the proposal to eliminate the supplementary questions will be seriously examined to give new value to the question period which fundamentally is an excellent initiative based on excellent principles in that sense that current questions are raised daily and thus the government has to take position every day on his actions as a government, and it enables the opposition to check on those actions and to get information.

I think that with the implementation of Standing Order 39(5), which permits the Speaker to order that non-urgent questions be put on the order paper, we can have again question periods worthy of the name.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, in connection again with Standing Order 43 I stated in my speech of last Wednesday that it was abnormal that the Chair be required to get involved to accept or reject a motion under section 26 because under this seciton it is incumbent on the Chair, which has been given notice, to decide as to the national importance or urgency of a question. I think that if Mr. Speaker is requested, under Standing Orders, to get involved and rule on the urgency of a question, I do not see why the other members, when they refuse their unanimous consent under Standing Order 43, should not have also to identify themselves and to get involved as the Chair does under Standing Order 26.

Then, Mr. Speaker, we would really move in the direction anticipated when we tried to amend Standing Order 26. Therefore, we are suggesting that each time fewer than five hon. members refuse unanimous consent, they be identified in order to clarify the official report of the House of Commons, and that those who hide behind anonymity to refuse leave to move a motion under Standing Order 43 from now on be compelled to take their responsibilities and to identifythemselves, as the Chair does with such dignity and ability when making a decision on a motion moved under Standing Order 26.

Mr. Speaker, in this debate I wanted to make another remark: since entering the House in 1968, I have been trying to take interest in the procedure of the House of Commons, to learn the Standing Orders as much as I can. However, the task is not easy. The reason is that the documentation concerning the procedure is published in English.

Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms available for our guidance is an outdated book. The only decent book on the subject is the last edition of May's Parliamentary Practice, published in 1971. Now, that edition is exclusively in English.

Mr. Speaker, the government having one day recognized the right of each hon. member to speak in the House in his mother tongue, the importance of providing simultaneous translation and of publishing the Standing Orders of the House of Commons as well as the Parliamentary Rules and Forms in French, I consider that it would be sensible for the House of Commons, even at the price of increasing its budget, which should be recommended by the Committee on Procedure and Organization, to have the last edition of Sir Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice translated into French, in order to prevent the French-speaking hon. members from being caught off guard when it is a matter of knowing about precedents. That would be a positive step which would allow all hon. members, whatever their language may be, to really understand those citations.

I would like to make another suggestion concerning the work of committees. In the speech he made the President of the Privy Council quoted very interesting figures—even surprising figures—to illistrate a comparison between the work of committees and the work of the House. It is found that the work of parliamentary committees increases from one session to the other to the point of becoming a nightmare for all parties and all members.

We have looked into the matter. We met, studied the problem and came up with certain findings. First, committee meetings should not be held when the House is sitting. That means that it would be suitable for the Committee on Procedure and Organization—since its terms of reference are rather broad—to consider the possibility of scheduling the week differently in order to allow the same subject matter to be examined in committee and in the House at two different times.

We would also like to make another suggestion to give the House more time and allow hon. members who wish to introduce a bill or a motion to really participate in the business of the House. We know that at the present time private members' hour comes up four times a week and after the total of 40 hours has been reached there are only two hours a week after that on Thursdays and Fridays. We would like to propose that private members hour be abolished during the week in order to allow the House to devote more time to its business; furthermore, we would like to have Fridays—except for the question period—devoted exclusively to private members' business.

So a good many hon. members could devote Fridays to their private affairs. On the other hand, hon. members who live far away could spend more time with constituents in their ridings, whereas they now have very little time to meet people, what with travelling back and forth between Ottawa and their residence. Hon. members who are not directly interested in private members' business could do what they what during that day as these motions are normally not put to the vote.

A third proposal concerning private members' business or committee work is that—especially when the government is in minority—the government could do much more work more quickly in the Committee of the Whole, even if the rules of the House must be changed, because it would be given more work. Let us change the rules of the House while giving the Committee of the Whole the opportunity to play a more efficient part in the House.

For some years we have tended increasingly to keep the parliamentary committees busy. The speech of the President of the Privy Council contains ample proof of this. I wonder why we could not, not necessarily put an end to committee work, but pick out certain very important bills from the government's list so that they can come before the House of Commons more quickly.

The advantage of a Committee of the Whole over a parliamentary committee is that all the latter can do is to approve a bill, hear evidence and then approve the decision of the House. It can amend a bill, but this happen very seldom. When a committee has reported and recommended that the bill be passed, the House of Commons has to study the bill all over again. A Committee of the Whole has the advantage of cutting out one whole stage. Clauses of a bill are studied and approved simultaneously, the report is made, and that is that.

I think that, in view of how important it is to speed up our proceedings, we should certainly look into the possibility of doing more as the Committee of the Whole.

Also, Mr. Speaker, in order to increase efficiency and improve individual members' contributions, the government should previously, as early on as possible, supply a list of the bills it intends to table at the opening of a session. The government should, in my opinion, give us a list of bills that they are ready to table, prior to each session; that would enable members to carry out research in their own time rather than in haste, and to prepare well-documented speeches rather than well-padded ones, and would thus improve the quality of debates. It seems to me only right that members should have copies of bills sooner in advance than at present, when a day or two is the rule.

These bills could then be put in order of priority and, under an agreement between House leaders, I believe that our proceedings could be speeded up, according to the experience we would have had.

Mr. Speaker, those are the remarks that I wished to make. My last point relates to a reform that has been made in the British Parliament. In the British House of Commons, it is understood that second reading of a bill should not last more than a day, unless the House decides otherwise. This is not laid down in the rules of the House, but in view of the pressure of parliamentary business today, the principle has the mutual agreement of the government and opposition parties. It is one of the conventions or "gentlemen's agreements" governing the schedule of parliamentary debates. I wonder whether it might not be appropriate to try or adopt a similar policy in this House, namely to shorten consideration on second reading since, at any rate, one can see that in view of increased parliamentary business in committees, second reading of a bill has become of minor importance and is almost a formal procedure.

As the work done in parliamentary committees has been increased and that it is also intended to increase the work of the Committee of the Whole—this is obvious since the beginning of the present session—I wonder whether it might not be appropriate to come to a mutual agreement in order to cut down the time devoted to consideration of a bill on second reading to one day, for instance, so that there will not be any duplication.

What disappoints me most, Mr. Speaker, in this House, is the fact that we are constantly doing the same work. First reading of a bill is a formal procedure, second reading is a waste of time; consideration in Committee of the Whole or in a parliamentary committee must still be done. Our approach is piecemeal. We hear witnesses and then we make a thorough study of the question. At the report stage the House of Commons does over again from the beginning the study of the bill made at the committee level. Hon. members who were on the committee again take the floor. Then, after the report stage, the third reading is the most important step because it is final. Therefore, I do not see why the other parties could not do as we do and agree to reduce to one day the time spent on second reading so as to save more time.

We should not forget, Mr. Speaker, that each member had been elected according to a democratic process, to work efficiently. Moreover, we should not forget that the rules and procedure are nothing more than tools and not an end in themselves and that a tool is useful only to the extent that we use it to our advantage. We are not here to serve the rules; indeed, the rules must be our servant.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, this party is prepared to co-operate at any time to facilitate the business of the House, to make it more efficient, more modern and more active; but we also expect the other opposition and government parties to be more serious when they study the procedures so that each member be entitled to give his own views and that the House not be crippled by protracted debates.

I know that we will reach that objective, Mr. Speaker, if we show some willingness. Then we will have some results if we make a special effort with respect to the oral question period, a matter which happens to be the central issue right now.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I say again that our fight will bear on the oral question period and that we will certainly urge very strongly that supplementary questions be abolished.

[Mr. Fortin.]

[English]

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that you must be delighted to be listening to a debate this Friday afternoon on a matter as dear to your heart as the rules and proceedings of this House. It will give you a great deal to ruminate about, I hope, in the course of what I hope will be a relaxing and pleasant weekend.

The comments that have been made so far on Wednesday, and again today, have contributed I think a great number of positive suggestions which, I am sure, will be seriously considered by the committee and, I trust, as well by all members of the House. I think is has become transparently obvious in a little more than the two months that parliament has been sitting that we have some particularly difficult problems to grapple with in terms of the effective procedures of this House.

The President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), when he was speaking in opening the debate on Wednesday made two comments that he had heard when visiting parliament at Westminster. He said that over and over again those who were commenting on the situation with regard to the procedures of the British House of Commons said that they had discovered two things: one is that there were only 365 days in the year, and second, that after a certain amount of discussion enough was enough. I think that that is something with which all members would agree, but how we resolve the many intricate questions that balance off the competing interests and necessary requirements for this parliament is a most difficult exercise.

As the President of the Privy Council remarked, we are getting into an increasing progression of examinations with respect to the procedures of the House. I think he said that in the first 30 years of this parliament back in the last century there was really no re-examination of the basic rules that had been established, but that with greater and greater frequency up until the past decade we have examined and re-examined the rules of the House.

I do not think that this should concern us, and certainly it does not concern me. In fact, I would be disturbed if it were otherwise. I am, after all, a Progressive Conservative and perhaps, if I may say this without any particular label being attached to it, I think the approach one must take in examining the rules is a progressive and a conservative one. I believe there are basic elements which quite obviously must be conserved in the functioning of the House and in the protection that it affords to individuals as well as to the total society of this country. I think we have to recognize increasingly that parliament is faced with a vastly changing and, might I say, an accelerating change of situation with respect to our responsibilities and with respect to the country which we seek to serve.

I will not spend long talking about how we should deal with estimates, but I think it is important to realize how difficult this can be. If I remember correctly, the strong feeling that came from many members of the House when we decided to make a major change in our rules was that the debates that had taken place, literally since the beginning in the House, on estimates were increasingly being frustrated by the fact that when we were dealing with the estimates of expenditures of a particular department the debates often tended to fly off in all directions. For one reason or another, because of either a member's particular constituency interests or some momentary distraction, essential questions and essential information with respect to a government department was not adequately dealt with. I say this regardless of which government happened to be in power at any particular time.

There was a sense of real frustration for Members of Parliament generally, and I think for the general public, that we were really not getting into the departments in a detailed way, that we were not probing to a sufficient extent so that the fullest possible amount of public stewardship could be exercised with respect to government expenditures. Therefore a majority decision was taken. The decision was taken to move the examination of the estimates from the Committee of the Whole into a growing number of standing committees. It was felt that there Members of Parliament would be free, not just for one or two hours, but literally for days and weeks, to examine not only the ministers—and ministers of course are fundamentally responsible—but all of the battery of officials who have such an important role to play in the administration of government business. From a theoretical standpoint I do not think anybody could seriously question that decision. But what has been the result in practice? It has been twofold.

In the first instance, there has been a tremendous number of committee meetings. There has been a tremendous increase at least in the amount of information put on the record. We might well ask whether or not the way in which that information has been presented, and the completeness of that information, would still be regarded as sufficient. I personally feel, from the time I have spent on a variety of standing committees, that there is still much room for improvement in the eliciting and the presentation of detailed information in committees. But further than that, we have found two structural problems. First since we have not yet arrived at a systematic arrangement for committees within the last few years we have found that the way in which committees have been examining estimates has been very erratic, to say the least.

For instance, Mr. Speaker, I think of the meeting that took place last year of the Committee on Health and Welfare, which is the committee also responsible for examining the estimates of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. How those two are connected is somewhat of a mystery to me, but I suppose it results from the fact that our standing committees still do not match the various departments of government.

As a result of our having gone in a thorough manner through previous estimates under the health and welfare umbrella, we were then faced with the necessity of processing the estimates of the whole Department of Corporate and Consumer Affairs within a matter of hours, with just the briefest and skimpiest kind of examination. As I recall it, the minister made an opening statement. There was little more than one hour left in which a few questions could be asked and then, as the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) himself suggested, the guillotine fell because under our rules, once we reach the end of May, all estimates are considered to have been passed by the committees. I think all hon. members will agree that that is a most unsatisfactory, in fact I would say most irresponsible, way for use to deal with a basic responsibility, namely, our stewardship of the public purse.

Further to that, the usefulness which parliament achieved over the years, going well back into the last century, of being able to exercise final control over the expenditure of public money by its granting of supply, has well nigh been lost under our present rules arrangement. I think it is clear to all members of the House that we will have to look very closely at, and deal much more effectively with, the whole question of the granting of supply and the final right of parliament to grant supply, because if there is anything we can seriously criticize in the most recent rules revision it is the fact that parliament was emasculated with respect to its control over the expenditure of public funds. I think all hon. members will have to ensure that, when rules and recommendations come from the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization, this serious fault in the present rules is corrected.

I have risen today, Mr. Speaker, not to speak principally about the difficulty with estimates but to put before you the problems that have arisen with respect to the growing pre-occupation with the effective functioning of the question period. I do this because I have long been a devotee of the question period, as you will recall, Sir. You, Sir, may be somewhat disappointed by the fact that I have not been nearly as active in seeking Your Honour's eye in this session as I have in previous sessions, although it may be that you are not so disappointed. In fact, I know that some of my colleagues to my left and even to my right are somewhat pleased that I have chosen to contribute one less body to the daily forest of figures attempting to engage Your Honour's attention. However, we have gotten into a very serious situation with the question period. I, for one, am extremely glad that we will shortly give the question period very effective scrutiny in this committee and, I presume, at a later date in a more general way in this House, when that committee makes its recommendations.

The President of the Privy Council, when he was speaking on Wednesday and dealing with this same problem, expressed concern about the way in which questions and answers had stopped being questions and answers, and had moved more towards being mini-debates or, to use my own phrase, had become more of a form of political posturing on one side of the chamber or the other. I think that his concern about this is valid. I think he would agree with me that all questions and answers, because of the very nature of this place, will carry a political edge with them. If they do not, then the individuals who are providing one or the other are really not effectively fulfilling their function. But I am more than a little concerned that the President of the Privy Council feels that a simple extension of the question period will not alone be a sufficient remedy. Putting it just in those terms there may be some validity to his concern, and I notice that the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) made somewhat the same comment. But I think we have to recognize a physical situation when it exists.

In the adjustment of our rules during the last ten years we have moved to restrict increasingly the time of the question period. Question periods, in a way, are the thermometer of parliament itself. Question periods get to be contentious, disputatious, active, vibrant simply because parliament, in any general political situation, is itself of that nature. It would be the strangest possible world indeed if we were to have, in the present particular situation, a question period where, after ten, 15 or 20 minutes, it was decided to go on to other business. The wonder may well be, given our present situation, that there are not more people either attempting to ask or answer questions during that period. It is a well known fact that in the last parliament, which had 50 less members on the opposition side, there was hardly a time, certainly within my memory during those three or four years, when we reached the end of the question period that Your Honour was still not trying to recognize about half a dozen members seeking to be recognized for the purpose of asking questions.

Now, we are in a situation where the opposition side has grown by 50 per cent. Indeed, I would argue in a de facto sense that it has grown by 100 per cent. It is not only that there are 50 more members to Your Honour's left in this parliament but it is also true that the attendance and concern for recognition, both combined, have grown by at least another 50 per cent to 100 per cent. We know, when it comes to the matter of voting, that we have achieved some unusually high voting figures during the first two months of this parliament. Perhaps we will not see soon again the 95 per cent batting average that we have recently displayed with respect to vote participation, but that same kind of participation has been and is a factor in the day to day question period.

We all know that this particular parliament is fragile and quite likely will be short lived. And members, whether they are new members, of whom we have roughly 100, or whether they are veterans of more than one parliament, realize there will be a very short space between the election of last fall and the next election in the close, foreseeable future. Therefore, no matter how long the question period is, it still will not be long enough. But that is not just the sole question. I think we will have to achieve an acceptable length of question period that can be adjusted somewhat depending on the realities of any particular parliament. Certainly, the reality of this parliament is that 40 minutes are not long enough, and I do not see that much of an argument can be made on either side of the House that 40 minutes should be long enough.

How should we do it? I think, quite frankly, that on an average basis the question period should last 60 minutes. I hope Your Honour will not shudder at the thought of having to put up with that. As a member of the opposition, I want to say to Your Honour that I appreciate the way that at times you have been able not to see the clock. Today, you were kind enough to extend that brief period at the sufferance of all members so that individual members could be recognized, but I do not want to put Your Honour in the difficult position of having to make that kind of subjective decision too frequently. I do not think, however, that we should lose the virtue, and I believe there was some element of virtue in it, of what was in existence in this parliament for almost the first 90 years when there was no time limit on question period.

Lest hon. members believe that I am now going to argue for a unlimited question period, I am not. We need an equitable time which I regard as one hour, but I think that parliament has to be able to adapt to the realities of its political situation and there should be an additional safety valve to allow for this. I propose that on occasion, perhaps a designated day of the week, when at the end of the question period an hon. member requests additional time, if ten members stand to concur with this request, then additional time should be granted. I do not know how radical this will seem to some of my more conservative friends or how conservative to some of my more progressive friends, but I suggest that more flexibility must be built into the question period.

Some members may argue that the question period is already too great a part of the parliamentary day. To them I would point out that at the present time it occupies something like 12 per cent of the day, and 75 per cent or 85 per cent is left for other things such as government business. If we are looking for some greater sense of discipline and stewardship in the use of time, we should consider seriously suggestions such as that made by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) about unlimited time for almost everything else. There is no coming to grips on such things as say, the time of debates to establish parliamentary committees, one of which took four days recently, or debate on second reading which goes on for a long period and other such matters. There are time limits on the budget debate and the Address in Reply debate. I think it is unrealistic to believe that parliament can function effectively without some effective discipline on our time. But there must be greater flexibility with regard to the probing that is part and parcel of the question period and it need not be unworkable.

The suggestion of the President of the Privy Council that we might make more use of notice in the question period has some merit. By tradition this has been an informal thing and has not been used to any great extent. I think there is a greater problem, however, in the use of the order paper. The President of the Privy Council referred to this briefly when he said that the written questions on the order paper had "gone out of sight". He has been around here longer than I, so perhaps one's vision depends on what one regards as the fundamental measure. He listed 1,420 questions of which 329 had been answered, but I would not think that was a great number of questions for the number of members we have. We need not be unduly alarmed about the need for expansion when we compare it to the expansion of government itself. We are dealing with close to $20 billion of public money and expending it through almost 30 departments and 300,000 employees, so the 264 members must try to do their job as extensively and resourcefully as possible. It would be a mistake to deny the possibility for vigilance.

The hon. President of the Privy Council would agree that there is a need to distinguish between parliament and government. Parliament is not the government; it is a forum, the nation's public forum where the rights of citizens are protected and government actions can be examined, ratified or rejected and where nationally accepted laws are put forward and passed. If this is to be done effectively, the number of questions will be increased. I was glad to hear the President of the Privy Council say that he was working to improve the machinery of government in order to facilitate responses. Members will not feel like resorting to written questions if they are going to lie dormant on the order paper for months, not just days or weeks. While the President of the Privy Council took some pride in the fact that 329 questions have been answered, I must point out that more than 1,000 have not. It could well be that some of these questions need to be put in a more responsible way so that they can be answered in a reasonably short time. If we are not going to provide better machinery to deal with them and the production of papers, then obviously the frustrations will not be restricted to the oral question period.

I was glad to hear the President of the Privy Council suggest that guidelines will be drawn up for requests for the production of papers with the possibility of debate and further examination by a committee. This is an area which needs to be upgraded. The rules should be agreed upon and made known to all members of the House with regard to the presentation of government reports. As the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) suggested the other day, I suspect that a good many of the ground rules, formal and informal, are concerned with the security of the government rather than the security of the state.

I have left open the assumption that there is a real necessity that all governments accept, that the public has a right and a need to know.

Mr. Speaker, perhaps this would be an appropriate time to call it one o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have just about exhausted the suggestions I wish to make about the question period, and I presume I have exhausted the listening capacity of hon. members of this House.

Mr. MacEachen: No. We have all had a good lunch.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Perhaps a good lunch has fortified us. I want to mention a couple of issues that are related to the question period. A moment or two before we rose at one o'clock I was referring to the need for written questions to be answered rapidly. I also concede that there is much wisdom in one of the suggestions made by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), namely that we should look at the form in which written questions are put so members will have the right to expect that, when written questions are submitted, they will be answered within a reasonable period of time. This will lead, I submit, to broadened and more relevant participation in the proceedings of the House on the part of hon. members.

With regard to starred questions, I think the committee should look at the usefulness of starred questions. I am not sure of the original reasons for the introduction of starred questions. To me, there is attached to starred questions a somewhat odd quality in that they do not perform any function more useful than that of ordinary, written questions. Certainly, in the last few weeks we have seen some examples of time consuming, extended answers to starred questions. Perhaps we ought to consider the suggestion brought forward by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) from time to time, a suggestion which, so far, has not been incorporated in the accepted practices of this House, namely, that some time limitation be imposed with regard to answers to starred questions. Starred questions, if they are to be useful at all, should occupy an intermediate position between questions asked during the oral question period, when answers are given immediately, and written questions, the answers to which may take a few days, or even one week, to be brought forward. I think the 48 hour limit suggested by the right hon. member is workable, and should be considered by the committee.

So far in this debate the question of adjournment proceedings being used for the purpose of answering questions has not been raised. However, I would point out to Your Honour that at the present time there is a list of some 70 questions awaiting to be dealt with on the adjournment debate. If one computes by very simple mathematics that we have, when all is working well, roughly nine opportunities a week to present these questions, and then divide 70 by nine, it would show that something like two months would pass before we reached the end of the present list.

Now, we know that special debates, opposition days and other things occasionally intervene, so that not often do we in fact get nine opportunities a week to put these questions. Therefore, the time frame for the answering of questions becomes even more extended. What has happened, then, is that these questions have already backed up to a considerable degree. These are the questions which Your Honour has suggested are more appropriate for the adjournment debate than for extensive discussion during the course of the regular question period.

If I may just refer to a few of the questions listed to date, it will give Your Honour an idea of the kind of unworkable situation we have. There is one question submitted by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) dated January 15 in which he seeks information about a meeting of federal and provincial finance ministers. Mr. Speaker, if that meeting is the one to which I think he refers, it took place at the end of January. My hon. friend will have to re-word his question, obviously, so that he can talk about future meetings of that sort. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) placed a question on January 19 concerning veterans' allowances. Well, Mr. Speaker, it is well known that this matter has been the subject of a bill since that time and is now before this House for consideration. Another hon. friend of mine, the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard), on January 25 put a question on the subject of cost of drugs to senior citizens, a subject which was to be raised at the Conference on Old Age Pensions. Well that conference was held a month or a month and a half ago.

The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) asked a question on January 30 seeking better information on the Local Initiatives Program. This program is rapidly approaching its expiration date. Finally, and perhaps the most bizarre example of the situation in which we now find ourselves on February 2 the hon. member for Peel South (Mr. Blenkarn), put down a question on the subject of the income tax forms and the difficulty some people are having in getting help with their forms through the use of the Zenith telephone number. Mr. Speaker, by the time the hon. member gets an answer the whole subject will likely be academic, for the present fiscal year, anyway. The present arrangements in connection with these adjournment proceedings are becoming increasingly unworkable.

I agree there is need for such a half hour period but I wonder whether there is need to provide as we do, for a seven minute question and a three minute answer. In most cases, half the time would be more than enough. I often feel that the questioner, or the responder, is trying to fill a much larger hole than the occasion calls for, simply to put in the time. We could process twice the number of questions and answers in the time now available and thus give these proceedings a reasonable chance of being timely.

Then, we have the old favourite, or new favourite, of Motion 43. The President of the Privy Council has already suggested we have covered a fair amount of territory with national emergencies which are raised on a daily basis. I certainly concur with one of his comments to the effect that there must be some better system for the carrying of these mini-debates, as he described them. I am not suggesting that this need be on a daily basis, but certainly an opportunity should be afforded to members from time to time to focus attention and response on issues which demand the attention of this institution.

I think I would agree with a comment which I believe the minister has made from time to time, but which was not part of his statement the other day. It is not quite fair for individual members to stand and present motions, sometimes at length, when there is no opportunity for a reply to be made. I think the President of the Privy Council has said that to be fair in this situation there must be some right of reply, limited as it should be, so that in dealing with the mini-debate a fair opportunity would be given to respond to the issue raised.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would now like to turn to one further area which I hope receives examination by the committee, that is, the whole area of standing committees. The President of the Privy Council made some remarks about the activities of the standing committees. There seems to be no doubt that the committee system will play an increasingly important role in the functions of this and future parliaments. But there are some very obvious shortcomings to our present committee system. I cannot possibly catalogue them all in the few minutes at my disposal here this afternoon, but let me briefly point to some of the more obvious aspects of the committee system which should be examined.

The size of the committees should be reviewed, to start with. We have, I understand, reduced the size of committees over the years as compared with the size of similar committees in the beginning. Only a few years ago, I understand, committees used to have memberships of up to 60. I do not know how they could ever have functioned in an effective manner and I rather doubt they did so. But I would argue that even committees made up of 25 or 20 members are still, in many instances, too large. My own experience in dealing with many committees, both of a political nature and of other kinds, is that once membership goes beyond 12, people are merely performing the function of being a body to be listed on the record. If these committees are to perform an active function, I think that something in the order of 12 members, and certainly not more than 15, is necessary to make up the permanent membership roll.

Another point I would make concerns membership itself. The President of the Privy Council rightly suggested that we have gone from one extreme with respect to membership to another. It used to be somewhat difficult, involving a time delay of one day, to change the membership on a committee as compared to the instant changes which can now be made. While I recognize there may be some necessity to retain an emergency procedure by which a full membership can be provided to a committee, the increasing frequency of changes which occurs in the membership of committees, a procedure which almost seems to be encouraged, is not good.

As anyone who has studied the committee system which exists in Washington will agree, there is a certain drawback in having a committee system which is so moribund that there can be no movement, as has happened under the well-known seniority system operating in the United States Congress. But I think we have gone to the other extreme, which is just as ridiculous, and has made the system almost meaningless. I believe that all members will wish to look very closely at the question of how we can upgrade the importance of the committees to the individual Member of Parliament, to the press and to the general public. We really cannot expect anybody else to take the committee system very seriously unless we do so ourselves. I do hope that this whole area will be given serious consideration.

There are, in my opinion, some straight physical problems we have not solved. It is ridiculous when you think, Mr. Speaker, that one of the problems we face when trying to arrange committee meetings is that of getting enough room. We do not have enough rooms available with translation and recording facilities to service the committees. In many instances we do not have enough staff. There is insufficient provision for the printing and distribution of reports. There is a whole host of just physical problems which should not be tolerated for one moment. If we are to operate in a contemporary and effective parliament we have to recognize that we need adequate committee rooms, committee staff and facilities to make the system work.

This ties in very closely with what was said by the President of the Privy Council about the scheduling of committees. We have made some improvements and experiments with regard to scheduling, but the cloak and dagger operation that we have now when scheduling committees is absolutely ludicrous. No modern parliament should put up with the kind of surprise and nonsense that goes on in regard to when committees are or are not going to meet. We must have some established method whereby times of committee meetings are well known by all and are adhered to as much as possible.

I also relate this to the whole business of whether or not committees should be established on a permanent basis. It was questioned earlier in this debate whether we should have departmental reports along with estimates referred to committees, and whether this might well be made some kind of permanent arrangement so that, in effect, committees have a life that is ongoing.

There is another fundamental problem that I want to raise, and it is one of the reasons that I think the committee system is often turned into a cynical exercise by many Members of Parliament. I refer to the final product that often comes from a committee—its report and/or its recommendations. In this parliament, after a committee has laboured long and hard on a specific subject matter and makes a report to this House, there is clear cut machinery for the disposition of this report or its body of recommendations. During a brief conversation I had with a visiting British parliamentarian the other day, I was told that when his committee submits its report to parliament, the members of that committee know there will be a departmental or ministerial answer given within a recognized period of time. If committees are to become a serious element in our parliamentary processes, there has to be some kind of response to a report either from this institution itself, or from the minister or department to which the committee report relates.

I have spoken much longer than I should, Mr. Speaker, but I feel that this committee is an extremely important one and I hope it will do its job with great effectiveness for all members of this House.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, in conclusion—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peters: I was amused by the theologian who spoke last who said "in conclusion" and then went on to make three or four additional points. I was expecting that we would soon hear him say: "Now let us pray", and then we would have known that he had finished.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): See me on the weekend.

Mr. Peters: It is my opinion that this discussion has been a poor one, which is almost an indication that this committee's work is doomed to failure before it starts. The President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) spoke at length. The House leader of the Conservative party spoke at length. My House leader—this was a rare exception in this particular case—did not speak at all; he was out making points in another place at the time. I think he made the right decision. The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) also spoke, but from a different point of view.

Those who have participated in this debate have discussed the subject academically. it is the backbenchers who are really the members who should have made some input into this discussion. They have been here for a while now and should have said what they think is wrong with this place. Let us not have the mandarins of parliament setting the rules and changing the rules. They have been shuffling the rules about for a long time now, and the last time they made changes to the rules the results were not satisfactory. What they did had the effect of eliminating the three back rows on both sides of this House. This is why I say the backbenchers should have made some input. They think they do not know anything about the rules, which is the only credible position to take in this House, and in my opinion it is the only credible input to the deliberations of the procedure committee.

Considerable reference has been made to the question period, but again I have the same criticism. The House leader, the opposition leader, the leader of my party and the leader of the Creditiste party set the question period. It is no longer a question period for members of parliament; let us not kid ourselves about that. We hire people to set the questions, and we are paying people to provide the answers to those questions. Again, the parties are making the decision as to who will ask the first question. We provide Mr. Speaker with a list of names of those who want to ask questions. John Blow from Dry Gulch wants to ask about a problem he has which is important to the people that he represents. Obviously, it is not a party matter or a matter of national importance, and he will not be able to ask his question unless he is provided with a totally different format for the question period.

I do not care if the question period is extended. The last speaker convinced me that it may be a good idea to have nothing in parliament except the question period. Perhaps this could be the microcosm for the representations that we make, and we would not handle any legislation at all. But I do not think that this is what the backbencher wants. He wants a way in which he can ask a stupid question, one that everybody else thinks is of no importance at all but which is of vital importance to the people whom he represents, and he sure ain't going to get into this question period that is now becoming as highly organized as any other segment of governmental operations.

I have been here for quite a while, Mr. Speaker, but I do not consider myself an expert on the procedures or on the rules of this House. I think the rules should remain as they are so I can use them, break them, or do with them whatever seems to suit my purpose at the time. If we keep changing the rules, it makes it more difficult for me. As I say, I think the new members of this House, particularly the young members, should have some input into this committee which they have not been allowed to have so far. We should not do what three or four previous speakers have said. We should not start with the idea that we must make this place function like a well-piled machine. We should start with the premise that every backbencher who has a problem in his area should be given the opportunity of doing something about it.

When I first came here the backbencher had that right if he had guts enough to exercise it. He was given that right in several ways, and one of the ways was to wait until the estimates came before the House. When we reached a certain item that related to the bridge that he wanted to see built over a particular river in his area, that was his chance. I can remember Mr. Van Horne, who represented Restigouche-Madawaska or some such riding, discussing such a matter over a period of time, and eventually a bridge was built. I am not saying the bridge was built solely because he took advantage of that opportunity, but he did have the right to ask the officials questions about it. That right has now been taken away.

I think all hon. members should consider whether we should allow the parties to arrange the question period. I think Mr. Speaker has an obligation to the backbencher not to honour the list that is sent to him by the parties every day. I suggest that most Members of Parliament asking questions of particular interest to their ridings will not want to ask more than one supplementary question. The party microcosmic debate that takes place during the first and second questions usually relates to party matters rather than matters of concern to members.

• (1430)

For these reasons, I am sorry that more members do not take two or three minutes to outline the subjects they feel should be discussed by the procedural committee. They should get up and say what they think is wrong with this place, because obviously there is a lot wrong with it. There are too many who follow precedent and refer to authorities such as May and others. Most of us have never even bothered to open these books. They refer to precedents that are long gone. If the procedural committee looks at the Standing Orders and makes changes, I hope we can dispose of all the other books such as Beauchesne's first edition, second edition, third edition, fourth edition as well as May's, Knowles and all the rest of them.

An hon. Member: Knowles! That's the 50th edition.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Order.

Mr. Peters: That was Knowles senior. I hope they dispose of these books and refrain from the idiotic practice of using precedents that apply to a totally different set of rules than those we are now trying to adopt.

An hon. Member: What about the "Peters' Principle"?

Mr. Peters: An hon. member refers to the "Peters' Principle", but I honestly believe that we should be trying to make this a workable place. I believe there is as much intelligence in the back rows as in the front. I discount to a great extent the idea that the length of time spent here will change that, or even make it necessary to make change. I hope there will be an opportunity provided members in the back benches to take part in the discussion about necessary changes. They may not do that now because there is some desire to rush this through, but I hope there will be some format for this kind of discussion.

This committee has already asked for permission to travel. It does not even want to be exposed to backbenchers dropping in from time to time. It wants to hold meetings at some place where that would not be possible. There are a number of changes that should and will take place.

Before I conclude, I would like to suggest that if we are going to be rid of Standing Order 26, and replace it with Standing Order 43 requiring unanimous consent, we should require a number of members to stand and indicate that they are opposed to a matter being discussed. I think it is unfair to the person who moves the motion when the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) turns to the Speaker and indicates his opposition or requests that a matter be transferred for debate as a matter of habit rather than listening to the subject matter and making a decision.

I make those very few comments with the hope that history and my idea of the success of this committee will prove that the new rules are more workable than many of those we have now.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It appears the House is ready for the question. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Motion agreed to.

EXPORT DEVELOPMENT ACT

INCREASES IN AUTHORIZED SHARE CAPITAL AND IN CEILING ON LOANS AND GUARANTEES BY CORPORATION

The House resumed, from Friday, February 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gillespie that Bill C-3, to amend the Export Development Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on Bill C-3 somewhat dismayed at its lack of scope. The bill, in effect, will increase the authorized capital of the Export Development Corporation from $7 million to $125 million and raise its allowable liability limit from $850 million to $1,500 million. What is lacking in my view is any mention of export assistance to small business. There is nothing whatever for our small, secondary industry in this piece of legislation.

The throne speech made mention of assistance to small business and here we have the first opportunity for the government to assist small business, yet nothing is forthcoming. I should have thought this bill would have made provision for a small businessmen's division. All over this country there are thousands of small industries making well designed products which could be exported, but they need help and guidance to enter this market. They should receive guidance, assistance and financial aid from the Export Development Corporation. We seem to spend considerable time in this House talking about wheat, fish, oil, Indians and even polar bears, and while I have every sympathy for these subjects and realize their importance, it seems to me far too little attention is paid to the labour intensive small business and secondary industry in Canada.

There is no shortage of talent or initiative in Canada. Only last evening I spoke by telephone with a member of my riding who started a new business in January manufacturing solid wooden toys. He asked me about a LIP grant of some $200,000 given to a motorcycle club in Montreal to assist it in manufacturing wooden toys. He asked me about the wisdom of the reduction in tariffs on toys featured in the budget speech of February 19. He asked me to inform this government that all he really wants is a chance to have funds available to him at a reasonable rate of interest, allowing him to develop the full potential of his business. He also asked about export assistance.

That man is typical of the intelligent and aggressive Canadian businessman who must somehow get the attention of all governments to make them realize how vital the contribution of these businessmen is to our economy, and what a great contribution they could make in lowering the level of unemployment on a permanent basis. We have such promise and so much potential it is frustrating to those of us who see the picture clearly. There is such an abundance of raw material, a talented and intelligent population with industrial skills, business and secondary educational facilities to feed these industrial skills, and we know we need only put them all together to make things work.

So long as we continue to introduce into this House bills such as C-3, which completely ignores the small businesses and secondary industries of Canada, we will continue to flounder and flop with the grievous level of unemployment we have today. I think it is time we looked at that very seriously. A few weeks ago the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis) introduced a private members' motion to raise the limit on loans under the Small Business Loans Act from $25,000 to $75,000. I spoke in support of that motion. The hon. member for York North (Mr. Danson), I am sure on instructions, talked out the motion. In reviewing that action, and on reading the contents of Bill C-3, I can only conclude that although this government gives lip service to the cause of small business it is in effect anti-small business.

I have travelled in approximately 35 different countries of the world. I have observed how other countries assist businesses. I have travelled over most of Europe and somewhat in Asia. In northern Sweden, I visited a town about 40 miles south of the Arctic Circle where there is an exhibition centre devoted exclusively to products manufactures in northern Sweden. Trade missions from all over the world visit this exhibition centre and orders are taken on the spot. All arrangements are made there. All export details are available at the exhibition centre. Their banks will advance funds to a manufacturer or processor against an export order. In other words, they are tuned to an export market as well as a domestic market.

In Great Britain, the merchant banking system is tuned to export business. A small businessman, whether a processor or manufacturer, has a relatively easy task compared to a Canadian small businessman. He prepares his export documents and has his money within 48 hours of presentation of shipping documents. The small businessman works closely with the merchant banking system in that country. I believe it is significant that our party leader has recommended this system or one similar to it for Canada. I hope we have the opportunity to introduce such a system in the not too distant future. German banks now deal directly on short-term paper with Canadian customers at pretty low rates of interest compared to what we have in this country at the present time.

There seems to be a reluctance on the part of the government to take a stand on secondary industry and the role of the small business in Canadian economic life. The Gibson Report of May 14, 1968 reads in part:

> Giving exports a high priority does not take away from other desirable national objectives such as better housing or regional development. On the contrary the well-based industrial growth to which export-oriented policies would contribute is the essential element of the higher production on which advances on welfare must be based. Giving exports a high priority is essential if reasonable progress is to be made in other directions.

"Reasonable progress in other directions" were the last words in that quotation. If we are to make reasonable progress in the reduction of unemployment in this country, the government must take a firm stand on the part secondary industry and small business will play in our national economy. A sound export directive must be part of that stand and a strong aggressive policy for secondary industry and small business must be the key ingredient of that policy.

In my view the government must stop the practice of playing off the production of our secondary industry against export sales of unfinished and semi-finished raw materials when settling our balance of payments accounts. We will never establish a strong secondary industry position while this policy persists. The government, I believe, must also stop the practice of bartering away the tariff protection of our secondary industry at GATT conferences. Mr. Benson's move to accelerate the Kennedy Round tariff cuts turned out to be a major setback for secondary industry in Canada. We might look at Japan and Germany where there is zero unemployment. Both these countries have tariffs protecting their industries. We seem to be the leader in promoting absolute free trade at the expense of our small business and secondary industry.

I would have thought that Bill C-3 would have announced the establishment of regional offices for the Export Development Corporation in the five major regions of Canada. Small business and secondary industry has always been the whipping boy of Liberal governments. Mr. Benson reduced tariffs at an accelerated rate to control inflation, he said. He meant: "Get back in line boys; we will bring in outside competition and if you don't want to bring down your own prices we will show you how to do it". Canada is the only signatory to the GATT agreement who slavishly abides by all the rules. I do not advocate wholesale breaking of the rules, but we do see other countries bend the rules to suit their national purpose while we hold fast to the agreement. Other countries with whom we trade impose surcharges, set up special legislation such as DISC, or raise tariffs against our manufactured goods while at the same time seeking duty-free status for their exports to Canada. I think that until we put all these pieces together we will not make very much progress. We have in this country, I believe, an abundance of talented people, creative, ingenious people crying out to express their talents as entrepreneurs. They are stalled at every turn of the road.

In my riding I have an aggressive, talented small manufacturer who has designed, and is marketing, a unique product. He exports almost all his production. He is frustrated by his inability to obtain adequate financing in Canada. He is considering moving his office to New York State. He was approached by a United States group and asked to move into a plant they will build for him. A new company would be formed and he would have 49 per cent of the stock. They suggested to him that they would set up a DISC operation and export back into Canada. I think this is a critical situation. We really must get together and talk to the small business people and the people in the secondary industries of this country in an effort to develop policies which would aid them in their efforts to move ahead.

Mr. Speaker, 90 per cent of the small businesses in this country are Canadian owned. We need strong policies to encourage growth in this area of our economy. An export policy tuned to small business and secondary industry is a cornerstone to the growth we must have in this area. Any thinking businessman will tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the only way we will beat unemployment in this country is by encouraging our small businesses and secondary industry. It is the responsibility of the government to create an economic climate in which business, particularly small business, can grow and prosper. The essential elements in that climate are: banking facilities that will supply the financial needs of business and encourage them to venture and expand their facilities; a tax act that they can understand and work within; a competition act based on reality and devoid of the hollow protected idealism of that infamous instrument introduced in the 28th Parliament; consumer legislation that is fair and just to the consumer and the producer or manufacturer. We need tariff legislation that is realistic in today's market and tuned to the needs of our secondary industry; we need an export policy that makes provision for the needs and requirements of small business and secondary industry and that would serve as well the large established manufacturers who, of course, must be part of the package that we put together for business.

These six essential elements must be the cornerstone of any national industrial strategy, if there is such a thing. We hear it talked about. I have not heard it defined very well, but these are the things we need to make business go and to allow it to grow in this country. I am a businessman myself and I have gone through all the frustrations of tight money, through the experience of planning an operation for a long period of time, of acquiring property and of hoping to build, only to have my plan turned down by the bank. We cannot continue to develop with policies such as these.

If this bill passes second reading, let me, through you, Mr. Speaker, serve notice on the minister that we will make strong representations at the committee level to have this legislation amended. There is a feeling among some people that there is some urgency in the passage of this bill. It has been suggested that perhaps the Export Development Corporation has exceeded its allowable limits, and of course by passing this legislation we can legalize an illegality. Be that as it may, I do not think that should cause us to rush through our consideration of the bill because, as I said at the beginning, this is the first opportunity the government has to do something for small and medium sized businesses. I say that, regardless of what else goes on, we should stop here, take a long look at this bill and do what we can.

Mr. Gillespie: Are you going to vote for it?

Mr. Kempling: The Export Development Corporation has within its ranks some excellent people who are well aware of the needs of small business and secondary industry. The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has many talented persons ready, I am sure, to assist in the development of a strong policy for this part of our economy. I would like to see all these talents put together. Let us take the first step to encourage the harassed small businessmen and owners of secondary industry by developing export legislation that has some meaning for them. Perhaps I have answered the minister's question.

Mr. Gillespie: No, you have not. Will you vote for it?

Mr. Kempling: You will see when the vote is called. In conclusion, let me say that if the government is not prepared to take this position, then they should move over and let others, who have a clear picture of what is required, get on with the job.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I enjoyed listening to the remarks of the hon. gentleman who just concluded his speech. I must say that some of the proposals put forward in general terms by some of the Conservative members for the reform of the Export Development Corporation in order to make it more helpful to small manufacturers and businesses in this country have a considerable amount of merit. I hope the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) will take a serious look at that aspect of the corporation's work. The Export Development Corporation plays an important role in a country such as ours which is so dependent upon export trade.

If I look at the table on page 20 of the report of the Export Development Corporation for 1971, I see an analysis of commodities insured in 1971 for export. I note that 32 per cent of the principal commodities insured were wood and other products related thereto and 23 per cent were agricultural products, which are of some significance to those of us in the west. Livestock, for example, was insured through the Export Development Corporation for a little over $2.5 million, and the shipment of wheat was insured for around $82 million. So, there is some merit in the activity of the Export Development Corporation. But a corporation which works in such close alliance with the large multinational corporations in our country is open to considerable criticism as well.

At page 6 of the annual report, you will see a breakdown of credit insurance policies as carried out by the corporation, and on looking at that breakdown you will see the types of goods that have been insured by the corporation. One area that interests me above all others is investment abroad. According to those who espouse the outdated free enterprise system, whether they come from my right or across the way, when you make an investment, either abroad or at home, you are supposed to be taking a risk—at least that is what I have always assumed. In fact, some of my good friends close to my right often say that I have never taken a risk in terms of going into business. But I think this is one part of the Export Development Corporation which needs very serious examination.

It is a fact that the corporation is now moving into the area of insuring Canadian investment abroad. What this means is that $14 million of investment by Canadians is being insured by our government for investment mainly in the area of the Caribbean and Central America. We in this nation have often looked with a great deal of hesitation at the foreign control of our economy through investment by the United States and Great Britain. Now, however, we have established an Export Development Corporation, which in principle is of merit in terms of assisting certain nations to buy our commodities and to increase our exports, but which now moves into the area of insuring investment in foreign countries. To my mind that is eliminating the risk from investments, and I think the corporation should cease to involve itself in foreign investments of this nature. I find that 39 per cent of the inquiries concerning foreign investment relate to investment in the area of the Caribbean and Central America.

We have operated in conjunction with what is called the Inter-American Development Bank and we have been involved in it to the tune of $100 million for development in Central America. I do not think we should involve ourselves in backing private investors who are seeking, in some sense of the word, to exploit the areas of Central America and the Caribbean. We do not have to involve ourselves through a public operation in backing those investors. I suggest that if they wish to invest in those areas they should take the risk of investment. I think this is important.

Then, there is another area within the annual report relating to what I would call invisible exports. These cover such things as the sale and licencing to foreign customers of any right in a Canadian patent, trademark or copyright.

• (1500)

In that regard I think there should be serious examination of whether it is in Canada's interest for a public corporation to be backing such things as the sale or licensing to a foreign customer of any patent or copyright. I believe it is potentially dangerous for a public corporation to promote any such open trade on behalf of the Canadian public.

On page 7 of the annual report of the corporation it is stated:

> EDC has, in co-operation with Statistics Canada, nearly completed a survey of the 'terms of credit' granted by some 1,100 major Canadian exporters. When the results of this survey have been studied, it is hoped that the information collected can be interpreted and translated by EDC to determine to what extent EDC is meeting the requirements of Canadian exporters.

Considering the fact that Statistics Canada has grown so much during recent years, it is good to see a reference in one annual report to the fact that it is doing some work. But we should not be dealing with this bill or giving serious consideration to amendments to improve it, such as suggested by the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling) in his excellent speech, until we see that report. I hope it will come before the committee when we are discussing this legislation there. I trust the minister is listening closely to this point.

The report details certain financing agreements with foreign countries. One is Australia, and the transaction involved railway hopper cars. As one who comes from the prairie region, this is a subject that interests me greatly. The amount of the financing was $10,355,916. It was for the purchase of railway hopper cars, the exporter being the National Steel Car Corporation Limited. It would be interesting to have a comparison of the price at which Australians bought these hopper cars with the price which our government paid for 2,000 hoppers cars for the railways in Canada, which was over $40 million. This is a matter we should seriously examine in committee.

There are many other items I could mention but I will not go into them all today. The Export Development Corporation shows us that to a certain extent a public corporation can be involved in promoting the export of Canadian goods and that the government can play a role. We can give our tacit approval to that. But there is a problem. That problem concerns whether the corporation is acting in the public interest when all it does primarily is promote exports by foreign-owned, multinational corporations.

The corporation is serving multinational corporations at the expense of smaller, independent businesses in Canada. It is giving multinational corporations an advantage in addition to those they already enjoy in terms of write-offs by the U.S. government, the DISC program and many other breaks that they receive. Now those corporations can play off the government of Canada against other governments, at the expense of smaller, independent operators in this country.

When I talk philosophically about the relationship between government and business, there immediately comes to mind the program called Interchange Canada. I wonder how far this is a sweetheart relationship between multinational corporations, large Canadian corporations and the government of Canada. Is it in the interest of the ordinary people of this country? For example, through Interchange Canada the president of Labatt's Ontario Breweries Limited takes a job with the Department of Industry and Commerce, and in exchange a senior civil servant will work for a large, multinational corporation in order to gain experience in the private business sector. This develops a sort of sweetheart relationship between the two groups.

The president of Labatt's will be running a foreign exchange, export program. He was recently quoted as comparing the role of the civil servant with the role of the businessman. He says the similarities are fairly easy to identify. The taxpayer would seem to occupy the same place in a public servant's mind as does the shareholder in the mind of the business executive. That was not good news to me, Mr. Speaker. It means that shareholders and taxpayers are both irrelevant so far as the upper echelons of the civil service and of the corporate elite are concerned. He also said that parliament, or more particularly the cabinet, can be compared to the board of directors of a private firm. That is not good news to me, either. This kind of sweetheart relationship evidenced in some aspects of the Export Development Corporation and the Interchange Canada program can be potentially detrimental to the public interest. It is not an open kind of relationship.

I am sure I could go back to my area and find a dozen producers who would like nothing better than to be able to operate the Department of Agriculture for a couple of weeks. They could probably straighten it out better than some of the economists who have been in it for 30 years. I tie these things together to underline my initial valid criticisms.

I believe that the government's moving in the area of insuring foreign investment and taking the element of risk right out proves there should be more involvement of public investment within this country simply because there is no real risk. By assisting investment in other countries the government is helping them to become imperialistic, a problem which we face in our own country.

• (1510)

Mr. Herb Breau (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak in this debate on second reading of Bill C-3. I hope the debate will conclude today so that we can send this important bill to committee and have a detailed examination of the activities of the Export Development Corporation, its approaches and philosophies. In his speech on second reading, the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) welcomed this opportunity.

Mr. Speaker, the Export Development Corporation is a successful part of this government. Its scope has been improved by us. We are proud of it and we welcome the opportunity to tell the public how good the EDC has been to the Canadian economy. It has provided jobs for Canadians by financing Canadian suppliers abroad and by making loans to foreign buyers of Canadian products.

Members of the opposition, especially in the Conservative party, have raised the question of the activities of the EDC, claiming that they are not oriented enough toward small business. Of course, this is a reflection of the narrow point of view that the Conservative party attaches to any discussion of this sort by trying to confuse the facts. They are attempting to say that because the EDC is involved in major loans to major suppliers, and because it looks after large projects, it does not do anything at all for small business.

Mr. Knight: I did not say anything about that.

Mr. Breau: The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Knight) does not have to be concerned about this, because I mentioned the Conservative party and not the whole opposition, although I know that sometimes his party does not make any more sense than the Conservative party. I am speaking of the Conservative criticism of EDC in claiming that it supports only large suppliers. This is not the case, Mr. Speaker. Anybody knows that, by nature, assistance to foreign buyers or suppliers will be given to large companies. But we must not forget the spin-off across the country. For instance, a loan of $10 million to a foreign buyer to enable him to place an order with Northern Electric would result in orders for a multiplicity of small businesses across the country and as many as 4,000 suppliers might be involved. Even if the loan is arranged so that Northern Electric is the supplier, it does not mean that it is the only company to benefit, because the components required to fill the order might be manufactured by various suppliers who are mainly small businessmen.

An assembly order placed with the Montreal locomotive works would result in only 20 per cent being spent with them; the remaining 80 per cent would be spread among small suppliers across the country. Because EDC is mainly involved with large transactions we should not conclude that they are not interested in small suppliers. Despite the positive effect that it has on small businesses through the larger transactions, there are other programs that affect small business directly, such as the export credits insurance program. This has about 1,000 policyholders, 700 of whom have less than $250,000 worth of exports per year: they can hardly be categorized as large companies. That is one program that helps many small businessmen across the country.

The Conservatives and members of the other opposition parties omitted to mention the re-lending program of the EDC which is available through Canadian banks in foreign countries and which, upon reference by EDC, arranges for assistance to be given to small suppliers.

Mr. Stevens: What volume?

Mr. Breau: Just a moment. Re-lending is available to foreign banks or foreign correspondents of Canadian banks, and they are authorized to lend as little as $50,000 to buyers of capital equipment or services in Canada from small Canadian manufacturers. When a state agency or buyer in another country is talking about a transaction with Canadian businessmen and it involves special financing, that automatically is a large order. Therefore it is normal that most transactions of the EDC are large.

In his speech the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) again attempted to confuse the public and members of the House by using the percentage of loans made to large corporations, saying that this government's program was helping large corporations only. He sinned again by saying that this is terrible because they are foreign-owned corporations: in other words, the Export Development Corporation should discriminate against foreign-owned corporations. If we are to follow his logic, we should come to that decision.

An hon. Member: Keep going; you are hanging your program.

Mr. Breau: That there might be a problem of foreign ownership in Canada, I agree. But I do not agree to the extent of some members of the NDP.

An hon. Member: All members of the NDP.

Mr. Breau: If there is a problem, then the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) has placed a very good bill on the order paper. If the opposition is interested in that bill, then let us wait and discuss it when the time comes.

Mr. Baldwin: Have you got NDP support on it yet?

Mr. Breau: I should like to remind hon. members that when the government started the evolution of foreign ownership policy last year—

An hon. Member: Evolution?

Mr. Breau: Yes. The former minister of industry, trade and commerce brought in a foreign takeovers bill. Who stopped it? This government attempted to do something about it.

Mr. Knight: We stopped it because it was useless until you changed it. Give us the credit.

Mr. Breau: I agree that it was the opposition, and maybe it was the NDP. The government attempted, but the bill did not go far enough so it has been changed substantially. It is to the credit of the government, Mr. Speaker, that my party is the first to come up with a positive step on foreign investment. It was not the Conservative party, who has never had any policy on foreign investment. The only policy they have had on foreign investment is: Give more incentive to Canadian businessmen.

• (1520)

Mr. Nowlan: What is wrong with that?

Mr. Breau: Be calm; don't be so sensitive. Does the Conservative party's non-policy take into account foreign investment across Canada?

An hon. Member: You are against Canadian business.

Mr. Breau: Again, the Conservatives on this issue are trying to throw a smokescreen before the public and leave the impression that they want to do something about the problem. They are trying to tell us that a satisfactory way of dealing with foreign ownership, which constitutes an important problem, is by giving incentives to Canadian businessmen. This government has given incentives to Canadian businessmen. It has done that for many years with many programs involving the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and all sorts of lending programs. Those programs are good for Canadian business. The opposition is trying to throw up a smokescreen on this issue by saying, we should deal with the foreign-ownership problem only by giving incentives to Canadian businessmen. Of course we want to give them incentives, but incentives alone will not deal with the question of foreign ownership. The best description of the Tory policy on foreign ownership was that given by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce when he called it a non-policy; it was superficial nonsense. That describes adequately Tory policy on foreign ownership.

What did the hon. member for York-Simcoe say about this bill? He said, "This is terrible, because the Export Development Corporation is lending money to foreign-controlled companies." If a miracle were to happen and his party were to come to power, I hope that that hon. member will not have influence with the EDC because his suggested policy would not resolve the question of foreign ownership. He would say, even though a great percentage of our foreign manufacturing industry is controlled by foreign-controlled companies, "Those foreign companies will not get loans from the EDC." That is what the hon. member would do, but that would not deal with the foreign ownership problem at all.

An hon. Member: Has the government dealt with it?

Mr. Breau: Well, we will deal with it. We brought forward a proposal last year and we will bring forward another bill this year. Ours is a clearcut, positive policy, something which the Conservative party has not yet suggested. In this regard we have done more than the Conservatives. There could be a problem regarding foreign ownership in this country, but we will discuss that at the appropriate time. Let us discuss it in the proper context and let us not, in the meantime, introduce all sorts of confusion and distort facts by saying that the Export Development Corporation is not doing its job, or that the job it is doing is terrible because it lends money to foreign corporations.

An hon. Member: When did we say that?

Mr. Breau: If our manufacturing industry is controlled too much by foreign interests, we will deal with that question when the time comes. Surely we cannot deal with this problem by discriminating against foreign companies. In other words, surely we should not try to hamper the export of Canadian products merely because the Conservatives have no policy on foreign investment.

The hon. member for York-Simcoe tried to confuse the issue by raising the question of domestic needs. He mentioned urban transportation. I had to re-read his speech because at first I could not believe it. He spoke about the Export Development Corporation lending so much money at such and such interest rates. That was the speech of a man who has experience with the financial institutions of this country. Apparently he does not understand that there is a world of difference between lending rates domestically and lending rates internationally.

An hon. Member: There sure is a difference.

Mr. Breau: Of course there is. This situation is not confined to Canada alone; it is an international condition. Canadian exporters, whether foreign or domestically owned, must compete, not only with lending institutions of other countries which offer services to potential buyers of our products all over the world, and sometimes offer better rates and concessional financing, but with the financial organizations and institutions of other governments which specialize in export financing. Examples of these are to be found in the United States, Europe and Japan.

The hon. member for York-Simcoe was upset because of the difference between the interest rates the EDC charges exporters and the rates that are available to Canadian businessmen. Canadian businessmen in the domestic market do not have to export and meet competitive rates on the international market.

An hon. Member: Why not change the Bank Act?

Mr. Breau: That is another question. I do not remember the hon. member's party suggesting lately that there should be changes in the Bank Act.

An hon. Member: Oh, yes, we have.

Mr. Breau: Well, I have not heard of it. I am saying that the Export Development Corporation must take into account international rates if that institution is to do any business at all. If hon. members opposite are against the EDC and against government intervention in the field of exports, they should say so.

Mr. Gillespie: They should vote against the bill.

Mr. Breau: Yes, they should vote against it if they do not want the Canadian government to help Canadian suppliers who sell abroad. If that is what the Conservatives want the Canadian government to help Canadian suppliers who sell abroad. If that is what the Conservatives

The hon. member is trying to make people believe that the government is subsidizing these low rates. Nothing is further from the truth. One must consider this question in the context of costs and benefits. In some cases, depending on the rates which the corporation has to pay for its money from the government, there could be a loss. As I say, it could happen that the corporation could lose money on some agreements in order to meet competition from other countries. When that happens, the loss is borne by the EDC and not by the government.

An hon. Member: And who owns the EDC?

Mr. Breau: One can look at the financial statements. The EDC accounts for its operations every year. If hon. members find that the EDC is operating at a loss, we could discuss in this House the question of whether we should pay that loss or not. Sometimes the corporation must lose money in order to meet competition. I emphasize this point: it must meet competition. It could be that a Canadian supplier who wants to sell his product in Turkey will compete with a Japanese supplier who has access to better rates of interest, or the Japanese supplier might offer the buyer better rates of interest. In that case it is up to the EDC to accommodate the Canadian supplier, because it is important for the Canadian firm to make the sale.

The cost of money from the treasury, as all hon. members know, can and does vary from time to time. It depends on the average cost of government borrowings. If it has cost the government 6 per cent to borrow money, the treasury's lending rate to the EDC would be 6-1/8 per cent. These rates vary every three months. From time to time EDC's borrowing costs are high because the government's borrowing costs are high, and losses occur when the EDC is forced to give guarantees at lower rates. It could be that the original arrangement was made when money from the government was available only at high rates. If there is loss, that loss must be borne by the EDC.

Currently, the average cost of money for the EDC to meet outstanding loans is 5-7/8 per cent, whereas the average yields on these loans is about 7-1/8 per cent. This means that there is a margin of about 1-¼ per cent. That is hardly operating at a loss, no matter how the accounting is done in the banks. Even if the EDC at times has to sustain a loss, it is totally contrary to the facts for hon. members to say that the low interest rates charged by the EDC are subsidized by the government. The hon. member for York-Simcoe tried to argue that the government should subsidize domestic interest rates, or in some way make available better rates for domestic needs. Priorities have to be decided in connection with spending on domestic needs. At this point discussions are going on between the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) and the provinces on the subject of urban transportation. To try to compare these two factors is not fair at all.

• (1530)

The hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) has expressed concern lately that the ceiling under which the EDC operates has been exceeded; that the loans outstanding amount to more than the ceiling allowed. I realize he is a new member of this House and that he may not be aware of the terms of the legislation, but I would invite him to read section 30 of the act. If after doing so he is still confused, I would be glad to spend five minutes showing him how it works.

Mr. Stevens: Did you read your own financial statement?

Mr. Breau: The hon. member who is interrupting is new to this House and I would hardly expect that he has read section 30 of the act. As I say, I would be happy to take five minutes explaining it to hon. members opposite. It might be, though, that they would still be confused.

Mr. Baldwin: You don't understand it yourself.

Mr. Breau: I do. Maybe the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) has not read section 30, either. It has been alleged that because the EDC has to date signed financing agreements totalling $865 million, it has already exceeded its existing statutory lending ceiling under section 30 of the act. This is not the position. The confusion arises because of a misunderstanding as to what is meant by the ceiling. Under section 30, the corporation may not have instruments outstanding at any time in excess of $850 million. As of January 31, 1973, the level of instruments outstanding totalled $500 million.

Instruments become outstanding only when disbursements are made under signed financing agreements. Disbursements take place over an extended period after the signing of financial agreements. Concurrently during this period instruments are being retired as repayments of principal are made on loans outstanding. The corporation may therefore sign financing agreements somewhat in excess of the ceiling applicable to instruments as long as this never obliges the EDC to purchase instruments exceeding the statutory ceiling. And it has not done so. Maybe the hon. member has not read the act carefully. Maybe he thought the ceiling applied to financial agreements.

Mr. Stevens: And I still do.

Mr. Breau: That is not the case.

Mr. Gillespie: He has tunnel vision.

Mr. Breau: Maybe the hon. gentleman cannot read.

Mr. Stevens: Check with your auditors.

Mr. Breau: I again invite the hon. member to read section 30.

Mr. Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): I should like to read an audited financial statement.

Mr. Breau: If the hon. member would read the Financial Administration Act, he would be aware that a Crown corporation such as the EDC is required to submit its audited official statement by March 31 of each year if its financial year ends December 31. Today is only March 9, so it is hardly fair to suggest the EDC is not complying with the law.

Mr. Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Wait for the statement.

Mr. Breau: The hon. member for Peace River should tell his hon. friends that we on this side respect the Auditor General.

Mr. Baldwin: That is why you are getting rid of him.

Mr. Breau: It is completely untrue to say that. The Auditor General was engaged for a definite term. It is totally untrue to suggest that the government is getting rid of the Auditor General.

Mr. Baldwin: Why don't you reappoint him, then?

Mr. Breau: That is a policy question which will be answered in due course by the proper authorities. The statement will be submitted to the Auditor General. The government respects this procedure and wishes to follow it, despite requests by the opposition to bypass the Auditor General in this case. I might say, though, that it will be possible to give copies of the financial statement to members of the committee even though the corporation is not required by law to submit its report before March 31.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Charles Thomas (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words on Bill C-3 and try to get a few answers from someone on the government side in explanation of its purpose. I thought the parliamentary secretary might have given us some answers. It is Friday afternoon. I want to leave early today and I do not want to go home with my stomach and mind all upset.

After listening to the ranting and raving of the parliamentary secretary, I am beginning to wonder why he got to his feet at all. He gave us no reason for asking for this increase in the ceiling. He did make a number of vague accusations against members on this side, alleging some of them had said the corporation ought to be wiped out, that it was no good. I defy the hon. member to show that anyone on this side has ever questioned the validity of the corporation's role. What we have said, and what I want to repeat, is this: while the corporation is worthy of support in principle, we question the way in which its funds have been administered.

We also question the tactics of the government of overspending and trying to do indirectly, by warrant, what it cannot do directly. We have seen examples of this before now. The latest concerned the Unemployment Insurance Commission. The funds were overspent and the government had to come back to parliament to get the ceiling removed. In that case there was some excuse because as a result of the government's policies and government bungling, unemployment insurance benefits cost a billion dollars more than was estimated; the money had to be spent and it had to be replaced.

Surely, though, there can be no excuse for bringing in this bill demanding another half a billion dollars to be made available to exporters. They will not tell us how much they have put out to date, or how much they are committed to advancing in the next few months. My hon. friend from York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) has been trying to get this information, and his words have been construed by the parliamentary secretary as a condemnation of the corporation. The parliamentary secretary had better read our speeches again.

Mr. Breau: Would the hon. member permit a question before he goes on to another point? He referred to special warrants. Is he implying that the Export Development Corporation has benefited in some way from Governor General's warrants?

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): The hon. member had better sit there and listen for a while. He cannot understand what people are saying.

Mr. Breau: Do you know what you are saying?

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): We are not denying the value of the principle here. I agree that exports are a vital part of the Canadian economy and it is essential we should develop exports in order to create jobs and keep the economy moving. I realize that over the past few years exports have shown a steady increase and that the prospects this year are excellent. But I question whether much of this development can be attributed directly to the activities of the Export Development Corporation.

• (1540)

To establish the basis for my remarks, which are an endeavour to get some answers and the reasons behind this request for an increase of half a billion dollars, let me say something about the rationale for the Export Development Corporation, about the reason that was given in 1969 for the formation of the corporation. At that time the minister who introduced the bill, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang), who at that time was speaking for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, said as recorded at page 7474 of Hansard:

> —exports are an essential key to our industrial development policies, providing as they do outlets beyond our limited domestic market.

I will not quote the minister verbatim, but in the next paragraph he goes on to say this:

> In the interest, then, of optimum growth of the economy and of employment opportunities, stimulation of exports, particularly of manufactured goods, should have high priority at this stage of our economic development.

The minister went on to say that the purpose of the act is to make it easier for exporters to finance their sales. That being the case, my interpretation of the primary purpose of the Export Development Corporation is the creation of jobs by increasing exports. Therefore, when the minister comes to this House asking for another half a billion dollars, I think we should ask him some questions about his request. Many questions have been put to him, but one question I should like him to answer, either here or in the committee, is what figures can he produce to indicate the number of jobs that have been created by loans granted to the EDC?

Before the minister rises to his feet, let me inform him I have looked through the annual report of the EDC and through other material in which I thought I might find these figures, but the only information I have obtained so far in this regard has been from the minister's speech of February 2 when he was talking about outstanding loans amounting to $700 million which had the equivalent value in jobs of roughly 100,000. I should like to know where he gets this figure. Is it a figure that he has just pulled out of the air? Does the minister mean that this $700 million has created 100,000 new jobs, or does he mean that if we had not financed these companies to the tune of $700 million, these 100,000 jobs would vanish? I have not been able to find the answer to that question, so I hope the minister will give us the basis for the figures when he replies.

The only explanation I have seen of this request to increase the ceiling by an extra half a billion dollars is the minister's statement that the corporation needs more money. The hon. member for York-Simcoe and others have tried time and again to get from the minister some accurate figures of the actual amount of money that has been expended or is left. The minister keeps telling us that the $850 million has not been used up. However, it is interesting to note that in reply to question No. 903 on February 28—a written reply to the question put down by the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer)—the minister said that the total dollar amount of signed contracts under section 29 of the Export Development Act, as of December 31, 1972, was $841 million.

That was as at the end of December, and since then the figures I have been able to find indicate roughly $60 million more has been committed. That information I derived from news releases, and so on, put out by the Export Development Corporation. Between $6 million and $9 million has come back in the form of interest. This indicates to me that the total amount outstanding by way of commitments must be about $900 million, if the minister's figures are correct.

The parliamentary secretary went into quite a tirade, accusing members on this side of not being able to read or able to understand the act. He referred to section 30 of the Export Development Act. As I understood what he said, he implied that the ceiling does not matter until the funds are actually disbursed: in other words, you can go ahead and commit $1 billion or even twice that; the actual ceiling applies only when the funds are disbursed.

Another question that I do not think will be answered by the parliamentary secretary, but which I should like to put to the minister, is this. On page 18 of the 1971 annual report published by the Export Development Corporation, under the heading "Notes to Financial Statements" there is a statement that does not agree with what the parliamentary secretary was trying to tell the House. I will read it:

> The authority to guarantee and lend on the security of instruments under sections 29 and 30 of the Export Development Act is limited to $850 million outstanding at any one time.

What does "outstanding" mean? The note goes on to say:

> As at December 31, 1971, the corporation had undertaken undisbursed authorizations aggregating $262,539,000. The uncommitted authority to guarantee and lend on the security of instruments as at December 31, 1971, amounted to $212,769,000. The aggregate of outstanding notes receivable as at December 31, 1971, under section 29 amounted to $374,692,000.

If you total those three amounts, Mr. Speaker, you have exactly $850 million, so my interpretation of that section is that not only disbursed amounts but also committed amounts are to be considered under the ceiling of $850 million. Perhaps the minister would explain that point in his remarks here or in the committee.

I go back to my initial point, that what we are concerned with here is not so much an analysis of the EDC and its functions. Of course the corporation has made mistakes, every corporation has. But I want to know whether Canadians have received full value for their money. When putting forward the rationale for setting up this corporation, the minister made it quite clear that the primary purpose of these funds was the creation of employment. My question to the minister is this: Is he satisfied that this $850 million or $1 billion that is being granted in foreign loans is doing the job it is intended to do? Could we not have created more jobs, or as many jobs by assisting industries in Canada to sell in Canada?

To emphasize what I am saying, let me refer once again to the remarks of the hon. member for Trinity when speaking to this matter in the House on February 2. At that time he pointed out very clearly that while it is fine to export, there is a quid pro quo; something has to come back. The old philosophy that a country can survive by exporting alone probably goes back to the days when England ruled the waves. But the fact is that a healthy economy today depends on the total aggregate of demand, not only for exports but for what is produced for domestic consumption.

I suggest that if this $1 billion was spent in Canada to assist Canadian manufacturing to meet domestic demands, it would create more than 100,000 jobs, the figure that the minister tossed around so cavalierly. This is our point; it is not a condemnation of the EDC as such.

• (1550)

These are some of the things the minister has to answer in committee. How much has he committed over the next two or three years? What value did he get for this money? How many jobs has he created? Does he think it is fair to send money to foreign customers when we have provinces, municipalities and other government bodies crying for more funds but receiving the stock answer that this government cannot provide more housing or money for transportation because the economy cannot stand it? These are the questions I want answered when this bill is considered by the committee. In conclusion I say that we are anxious to get the bill to the committee where we can perhaps get some straight answers from the minister. If the minister can satisfy us that we are getting full value for our dollars then, as far as I am concerned, we should let the bill pass third reading.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Charlevoix): My remarks will be somewhat brief, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Isabelle: Good.

Mr. Caouette (Charlevoix): That seems to please the hon. member for Hull, but to get to Bill C-3 which is before us, I observe that the aim is to increase the corporation's shares and at the same time enable it also to increase its loan possibilities.

Before introducing a bill such as Bill C-3, the government should perhaps review the use of funds invested in the corporation.

In the past, has the Export Development Corporation served the interests of Canadian manufacturers, or has it merely put its funds to use by large multinational corporations? These are questions that we should ask ourselves.

Under the terms of this bill, we would be accepting that the corporation be obliged to restrict its aid to basically Canadian companies. Since they are talking about industrial controls, I should have thought that this would be just the indirect way of favouring our Canadian industries and manufacturers.

Mr. Speaker, increasing share capital and raising the ceiling for loans seems quite appropriate to me, especially considering the spiraling costs in all areas. I therefore feel that the government's request is logical.

We cannot therefore criticize the increase as such, but we can be most sceptical about the allotment of funds. We feel that it is necessary to assist exportation, even to promote it, but this bill and some others in no way guarantee that the Canadian people will be served first, before our products are sold abroad.

What protection does the government give to the Canadian consumer? The party in power seems to believe that we can resort to any means to export our production. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Breau) said a while ago that the corporation even granted loans to other countries to purchase our production.

In my opinion, if the government is in position to increase the assets and shares of the corporation, it should in the first place increase the purchasing power of the Canadian people who in many cases are deprived of the products whose exportation is now promoted by the government.

As always, this government reshuffles the order of priority of his motions and again, we see it favouring foreigners to the detriment of Canadians or, to be more accurate, coming to the aid of foreigners before taking care of the basic needs of Canadians.

I may be repeating myself but why should we not introduce a bill to restrict exports until we have satisfied the essential needs of Canadians? Then the government could draft a bill designed to protect Canadian producers through preferential export loans, granted only to Canadian firms and only for export of our surpluses. Should need arise to stimulate the export of these surpluses, the government could introduce a bill such as the one before us today and thus favour export as such. But again, I repeat, only as a last resort.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the gist of my remarks. I am not criticising the government for its intention to increase the potential of the corporation, but I regret that it did not deem necessary to respect the needs of Canadians and then guarantee protection of essentially Canadian companies before merely promoting exports.

[English]

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): I should like to say a few words before four o'clock, Mr. Speaker, on one or two grave concerns which I have about Bill C-3. On the surface it looks rather innocent. It will increase the capital shares of the corporation to $125 million and increase loan guarantees from $800 million to $1,500 million. There are two areas of grave concern. The first is that the corporation tends to be big business or multinational corporation oriented. Perhaps the experience members of the Liberal party have had with multinational corporations tends to prejudice them in that direction. At any rate, this is one of my concerns.

All one has to do is pick up the annual report of the corporation and look at the first, second and third pages to see who is on the board of directors. We find there is an interrelationship between the government and big business or multinational corporations. It might be of interest to the House if I named some of the directors. First of all we have James Grandy, who is the deputy-minister of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. He is chairman of the board. We have other government mandarins, such as L. C. Audette, who is chairman of the Tariff Board, Paul Gérin-Lajoie, who is president of CIDA, and S. S. Reisman, deputy-minister of the Department of Finance. We also have Louis Rasminsky, the former governor of the Bank of Canada.

Let us look at the corporate side. Serving as the corporation's president we have Paul Leman, president of the Aluminum Company of Canada; we have A. F. Mayne, president of A. F. Mayne & Associates Limited, Montreal; we have R. D. Southern, president of Atco Industries Limited, Calgary; and we have P. R. Sandwell, who is chairman of the board of Sandwell & Company Limited, Vancouver. All these people are presidents of various corporations, so obviously there is a tremendous relationship between government mandarins and the presidents of corporations in respect of the activities of the Export Development Corporation.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it four o'clock and pursue some of these ideas further at a later date?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): It being four o'clock, we will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, notices of motions and private bills.

Alaska-Yukon Highway Authority

• (1600)

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH ALASKA-YUKON HIGHWAY AUTHORITY

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River) moved that Bill C-18, to provide for the establishment of the Alaska-Yukon Highway Authority (Alaska Highway), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the matter I have the pleasure to introduce to this House this afternoon is neither an ordinary bill nor an ordinary subject matter. It is a Canadian legend, a Canadian shrine—the matter of the Alaska Highway.

This year the Department of Public Works has a very ambitious maintenance and construction program in respect of the Alaska Highway. In addition to normal maintenance work, tenders have been called for two gravel resurfacing maintenance projects from mile 250 to mile 413, from mile 413 to mile 483 and reconstruction of another section. This work is scheduled for completion by the fall of 1973. There are other minor innovations to the highway plan for this year.

Hon. members probably assume that I will speak about the highway with the idea of having it completed, of having further work done and eventually having it built so that it will be a transportation link between the United States and that province of the north called Alaska. However, I would like to speak about some of the other aspects in connection with this Canadian dream, or legend.

The construction of the Alaska Highway had been proposed for many years before the outbreak of World War II. However, it was not until the Japanese occupied some of the Aleutian Islands and threatened the air ferry supply to Russia that a highway was actively considered. Construction of a pioneer road by engineer troops followed rapidly on the heels of the location crews. Speed was the first consideration and this road detoured around swamps, gullies, rock knolls and other obstructions, resulting in a very crooked road with many steep grades.

After August, 1942, efforts were directed to getting the pioneer trail converted to a passable road at the earliest possible moment. This road disregarded the public roads administration procedures, where design alignment and grade would delay completion, and followed the path of least resistance. In March, 1943, instructions were issued to complete the work at the minimum possible cost and standards were reduced still further. Road construction ceased in October, 1943, but bridge construction continued until 1944.

The resulting highway, while passable and providing a good gravel driving surface, had geometrics of a varying but generally poor standard. After the responsibility of the highway was transferred from the United States army to the Royal Canadian Engineers, the terms of reference under which they operated did not permit major road relocations. Temporary bridges were replaced by permanent structures at many locations and some exceptionally hazardous areas were reconstructed, but the alignment of the highway is essentially that of 1943. In 1959-1961, the highway was paved to RAU 50 standard from mile 0 to 84. This standard provided two 12-foot traffic lanes and 5-foot shoulders. The British Columbia department of highways has been responsible for the maintenance of the paved section since 1962.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel).]

After this brief outline of history of this great highway linking our northern regions to the more developed area of our country, I would like the members of this House, whose support I am asking, to recognize the important part played in the past by the Alaska Highway and the much more important part that it will play in the future development of our last frontier. Many tales are told of pioneers, past and present, travelling this road and many chapters of history have been written about the legends of this highway. I am more concerned about the implications of the highway and its benefits in recent times.

First we must consider the economic state of affairs in the Peace River country and in the northern part of British Columbia, where farming has suffered a severe setback. The farming situation is disastrous. The copper mines have closed. The economy of Fort Nelson is in a disastrous state. The government so far has disregarded the plight of that area in respect of all its programs such as DREE.

In 1966, the Stanford report was prepared for the government. It recommended that any further action in respect of the highway be shelved for at least ten years and that the government should not be concerned about the development of our northland and the development of our resources since the highway is an outdated mode of transportation for the movement of goods and people today, when we have jet airplanes and other more up to date modes of transportation. I am not in conflict, of course, with that statement in the report if one considers only the need to find, extract and exploit our natural resources and does not consider the human factor, the people who live there, our first citizens and early settlers, and does not consider that even in that region, with all the modern facilities of transportation, people would be required in order to develop and populate the area.

I am also concerned about the industries already located in northern British Columbia and the Yukon territory, as well as the plight of these industries through not having a proper means of transportation for the shipment of their products and for the maintenance of the work force in their plants. All the resources of the great region of the Yukon must be shipped, or are presently being shipped by an outmoded transportation system to a port linked to Alaska and end up in ports strange to our land. I am very excited about the plans announced for the northern part of British Columbia in respect of the transportation network, and I am hopeful that the government will seriously consider helping industries locate in northern British Columbia and the Yukon territory by the provision of proper transportation facilities.

I am encouraged by the plans of the British Columbia railways. The line has now been extended to Fort Nelson, 300 miles up the highway. An ambitious program to extend the line even further is being planned. The emphasis on northern development in that region must not be concentrated around the extraction of our resources. Any strategy in respect of the development of that region must be related to the establishment of secondary industries as well. First of all, it must be geared to the development of our renewable resources, our great timberlands, which so richly endow our region. The type of industry referred to will again require people.

It is not necessary to elaborate on the importance the development of these industries will have in helping alleviate the unemployment crisis in Canada. Furthermore, an immediate result would be a great increase in tourist traffic, an industry of prime importance to that area. A traffic survey carried out by the Department of Public Works underlines this statement. As members of this House well know, a great number of our neighbours to the south use this road link in travelling to the state of Alaska. The people visiting our country, who share with us its vastness and its beauty in that area, take nothing home with them but memories of a unique adventure and pictures which they might have taken en route. However, they are contributing to the western economy to an extent that the tourist industry ranks second only in importance in our area.

The bill proposes the establishment of an authority that could act on behalf of our government in discussions with the United States, which has indicated its great interest in this endeavour. I am referring in particular to discussions held with that country regarding the sharing of costs. The authority could also represent our government in discussions with officials from areas and regions bordering the highway, such as officials of the province of British Columbia, the Yukon and the Northwest Territories.

I have lived in that area and I have been involved in the service and tourist industry for the last 20 years, so I know a little about the highway in question. If we are concerned about northern development, it is essential that we develop a transportation policy and a road strategy, which does not exist in Canada today, and it would help if the proposed authority could develop this strategy and a general philosophy concerning northern highway travel. Many people who live in the north and many leaders up there have voiced a need for such a strategy. In fact, some of the people living up there will have to take a stand soon. They will have to tell us soon that there should be no more construction of roads, highways and road links in northern Canada until a philosophy is developed and we protect the way of life which they have valued for so many years. So far as our native people are concerned, the first wars in Canada against our natives were fought over roads and railroads, the iron horse that traverses our country.

When we go up to our last frontier, we find that we have built the Mackenzie Highway, the Dempster Highway and now we are completing the Alaska Highway without any over-all plan, strategy or philosophy. In this bill I am proposing that we establish such a plan. I can visualize the highway and the commission developing a highway system with proper campsites for tourists to enjoy. Every 75 or 80 miles there would be an airstrip which would contribute to the safety and comfort of the people travelling on the highway and which could be used in emergency cases, because highway accidents do occur. I live there, and I know.

The commission could develop rest areas where people could stay for a day or two, visit with the people who live in the area and share their dreams. They could go home with rich memories. We could establish parks along the highway and negotiate with provincial and territorial governments for those things that we hold so dear. I would like hon. members to share with me for a moment a picture of what it would be like 100 years from now—and I am only dreaming—if we could develop this area. Perhaps we could have on each side of the highway a park reaching out 1,000 miles, and we could compare the benefits of that park in perhaps 50 or 100 years with what we would have if industry and commerce, with no proper control, were to clutter up the highway.

The commission could take into account the provision of special facilities for the maintenance and establishment of new tourist facilities. It could ensure that the necessary amenities are provided to ensure the safety and comfort of tourists. In other words, the bill would ensure that those of us who have pioneered on the last frontier may have some input into plans which are normally worked out by people who are not familiar with the area and are certainly not familiar with the dreams and ambitions of the local citizens, nor the dangers involved in carrying out such ambitious plans—dangers to the environment and ecology as well as to the native people who have lived there for so many years. They will be speaking out, and if they do not remember to do so I will remind them that if we carry on with a northern development concept such as the one we are embarking upon right now, without giving further thought to it, then indeed we will have spoiled our last chance to do something different for once.

The urgency of the Alaska Highway construction has been recognized by all governments affected by the route and they have made submissions to the federal government expressing their concern. The Alaska, Yukon and British Columbia Chambers of Commerce have always considered the Alaska Highway to have top priority, and the Canadian Chamber of Commerce has included the reconstruction and paving of the highway in their policy paper and has brought it to the attention of the government. As I have said before, the government has indeed responded and some minor improvements have been carried out in the past.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, let me say that the highway from Dawson Creek to Whitehorse presents today as unique a challenge as it did in 1942. In fact, it represents an even greater challenge because we must surely have recognized over the last 100 years that we cannot just blindly pursue monetary and economic gains and that we must accept our responsibility, not just to ourselves but to the people living in the area.

We have a responsibility to the rest of the world to develop at least one region on this earth in such a way that we and our children can be proud of it. I am afraid that if we do not establish a commission to supervise this task, the highway will be just another road link and another mess such as we have in northern Canada and such as existed in the early days when the settlers traversed our land. The highway holds so many answers to so many pressing national problems that it is even more urgent now than it was in 1942 that we embark upon the development of that great Canadian dream.

I therefore strongly recommend that if this bill cannot be adopted today, that at least the subject matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development and that I be given the opportunity to bring to the committee the dream of so many northern Canadians to establish something of which we can all be proud as Canadians.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Would the hon. member entertain a question for clarification? I may preface it by saying that these kinds of private members' bills which are of substance are the ones I appreciate and that I hope will be dealt with. I think this is a good bill to consider. Could the hon. member explain to the House the necessity for the establishment of a non-Crown corporation to take over the development of this highway? What non-Crown corporation is he referring to?

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, the bill proposes that a commission be established which would incorporate members of this House and members of the territorial and provincial governments connected with the building of the highway. The bill also makes provision for officials from the United States and people in different walks of life to sit together and develop a strategy and a philosophy, regarding the development of the highway, with which we could live in the future.

Mr. Ian Watson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I know that I speak for most members in this chamber when I thank the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) for giving us an opportunity to discuss one of the most important highways in Canada, a highway about which for a number of years we have heard a great deal in the House.

The hon. member's predecessor spoke on this very subject whenever the matter arose in the House, and I remember him lobbying behind the scenes also on the subject of the Alaska Highway. In 1970, or possibly in 1971 in the last parliament the hon. member for Red Deer introduced a private member's bill dealing with the subject of the Alaska Highway. In my remarks at that time I advanced a proposition which at first glance may have appeared a bit far fetched, but I think on analysis hon. members would agree it is the key not only to getting the Alaska Highway problem solved but also to solving another major Canadian problem, namely, a better, faster link between central Canada and the Maritimes.

My proposition, which I consider sound and has a good chance of success if we can convince a few more people, involves encouraging the U.S. government to construct a four-lane, high speed highway across the top of the state of Maine, linking the eastern townships auto route with a point in New Brunswick, possibly involving some part of U. S. Interstate 95, in return for the Canadian federal government spending an equal amount of money on upgrading and paving the Alaska Highway. The arguments in favour of this proposition are obvious. It would promote Canadian unity; it would bring Canadians closer together by reducing travelling time between central Canada and the maritimes by a minimum of five hours. I am not talking from the eastern Canadian point of view.

In addition, it would reduce transportation costs between central Canada and the maritime provinces. It would make possible a large increase in tourist traffic between the maritime provinces, central Canada and the American mid-west. Residents of Montreal and of eastern Ontario would be able to drive to P.E.I. or Nova Scotia easily in one day. This would make a great difference for tens of thousands of Canadians who now normally vacation on the coasts of Maine and New Jersey simply because they can drive there in one day.

[Translation]

Considering that there would be two or three times more tourists visiting the maritime provinces and that the instability of the weather in the area might bring a premature end to many seaside vacations, it can be felt that more tourists could turn to other regions of the maritimes, and also to Forillon Park, in the Gaspé Peninsula, which could certainly attract many.

I also suggest that a national park be developed along the northeast coast of New Brunswick, which would increase the movement of tourists visiting all other regions of the maritimes.

[English]

Although Maritimers may feel more exposed to Upper Canada commerce as a result of such a highway, and I suppose this might worry some people, I am confident that competitive Maritimes business operators would benefit enormously.

There are growing protests in the state of Maine about speeding Canadian tourists on their present east-west roads. These complaints about fast-driving Canadians presumably would be eliminated or reduced. An additional argument is that such a route would open up for possible exploitation and development a new national park area in the eastern townships region of Quebec along the Maine-Quebec border. This is one of the most depressed areas of Quebec, the southern Beauce region. This would be an ideal location for a national park. This kind of highway, pushing the eastern townships auto route through to the Maine border, would be a main link to the park for the 2½ million people in Montreal. In effect, it would put them two hours away from another major national park. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, this project would do more in economic terms for the Maritimes and Quebec than scores of past projects and programs costing ten times as much.

[Translation]

It could well be that, in the Gaspé Peninsula, in Rimouski, in eastern Quebec as well as in northern New Brunswick, some people strongly oppose the construction of such a highway.

Indeed, they could fear that it would reduce the influx of tourists in their area. They claim that the tourists would head for the beaches of P.E.I. as quickly as possible, to return home by the quickest and shortest route. According to that argument, tourism, which is their best hope for a more prosperous future, would really take a beating.

I do not agree with that argument; I am convinced that we can reasonably hope to triple the number of tourists in the Maritimes, and that those tourists will affect the whole area, including northeastern New Brunswick and the eastern part of the Gaspé Peninsula.

[English]

Undoubtedly, some maritimers would feel that they might lose the protection against Upper Canada's commerce that is afforded them by geography. But, as I said earlier, I am confident that competitive Martimes enterprises would be in a much better position than they are now. Maritimers in general would benefit from this closer and faster road link. Presumably, some negative feelings would also exist in southern and central Maine. The argument would be that tourist traffic would be diverted away from the Maine roads which presently carry a substantial percentage of the Canadian tourists going to and returning from our maritime provinces, and Maine tourism would suffer in consequence.

Maine environmentalists are also anxious that northern Maine be preserved as a wilderness area. Here I am pinpointing the problems to be faced in implementing this kind of road project across the top of Maine. I feel that the Maine fears of losing tourism are as unjustified as northern New Brunswick and eastern Quebec fears. If you pour three times as many people into an area, by a direct route, as went there previously, they will filter back in all kinds of different ways and by different roads.

The weather down there is never certain for two weeks at a time. As I said earlier, vacations are cut short. People will come back in a variety of ways, and as a result benefit all the maritimes and Maine. The time difference that this route would make in travel between, let us say, Ottawa, Montreal or even Toronto, and P.E.I. would be anywhere from four to five hours. This is enough to make it very easy to drive from Montreal to P.E.I. in one day. It would even be possible to drive from Toronto to Prince Edward Island in one day if one did not mind driving for ten or twelve hours. The potential benefit to the Maritimes through tourism would be enormous—far greater than any program we have ever developed in that area. The question is, Mr. Speaker, how do we get this project implemented? There have been proposals regarding the Maine corridor for quite a while. In 1969, Governor Curtis of Maine approved a $30 million bond issue to build a road across the state. In 1970, this bond issue was rejected by the voters. That is where the matter stands now as far as Maine is concerned.

What I am arguing is that Canada should hold out to the American government the incentive that we would spend a lot more money on the Alaska Highway, as they want us to do, and consequently could get them to put up a substantial sum of money for the highway which I propose—in fact, get them to pay the total cost of the highway across the state of Maine. Residents of that state would be delighted to find that they did not have to pay for it.

I am convinced that the American authorities are responsive. Indeed, in the discussions I have had with Senator Gravel and Senator Stevens of Alaska, they were most enthusiastic. I have also had discussions with several other congressmen and senators and all are responsive to the idea who have indicated that they are prepared to support it and help get it through Congress. As you are aware, Mr. Speaker, congressmen and senators have the power to institute legislation, and I have a number of indications that senators and congressmen are prepared to sponsor such a bill. In their view it would have an excellent chance of success.

I have talked about the benefits to eastern Canada of such a project, and the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River has indicated the tremendous benefits that will accrue to the west. The Alaska Highway route has great tourist potential, of course, because nearly everybody wants to go to a place they have not visited before. When the Dempster Highway is finished, people will be able to go to the Arctic Ocean. With the facilities that the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River has suggested, there would be a fantastic additional tourist potential in the west.

We can accomplish something that is rather wonderful for both east and west at one time, without an enormous expenditure above what is already required for upgrading the Alaska Highway. As the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River pointed out, the complete paving of that highway is a long way off. Perhaps two or three hundred miles of it have to be rebuilt. The upgrading must come before the paving, so the completed highway is a long way off.

To get back to the project which I am proposing, I am indebted to the hon. member for having been fortunate enough to have his private member's bill drawn so early in the session. I have a motion on the order paper which reads as follows:

> That in the opinion of this House, the government should give consideration to entering into contractual arrangements with the United States of America providing that that country should expend an amount to build a highway of inter state highway system standards through the State of Maine, one of the United States of America, connecting the province of Quebec with the Atlantic provinces in return for Canada expending an equal amount on upgrading and paving on that portion of the Alaska Highway that lies within Canada.

That motion is so far down the list that it will not be discussed in this session, so I am glad to have the opportunity to talk about it this afternoon. To implement it, we would obviously have to obtain the green light from the provinces of Quebec and New Brunswick, the state of Maine and the governments of the United States and Canada. I think that if we can get the approval of Quebec, New Brunswick and Maine it should be possible to work things out with both federal governments. I certainly intend to do some additional lobbying to try to convince the provincial authorities that they will not lose by it. Some hon. members from northeastern New Brunswick and from Quebec seem to think that there will be a loss to their areas but, Mr. Speaker, every one would benefit from the Maine corridor.

Several options are available. One of the long-time promoters of the project, Mr. Douglas Fullerton, chairman of the National Capital Commission, has proposed that Canada should guarantee to Maine an immediate throughput on a toll road across that state, but I feel this approach might entail more difficulties than the project I am suggesting. Quebec may be hesitant because of pressure in the Rivière du Loup, Rimouski and Gaspé areas. I think this could be overcome by stressing the benefits which would accrue to the depressed Beauce area. If we threw in the sweetener of additional national parks for those areas of New Brunswick and Quebec, this would help convince any remaining doubters.

I believe there is no single project that this government could support which would provide as many side benefits, for as many people, and which would be as important for the Canadian balance of tourist payments as this. It would do great things for Canadians in the west and the east, and without question it would bring us closer together.

Mr. Oberle: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I was going to interrupt the hon. member. It was obviously getting quite painful for him to continue this discussion, so I was going to give him the opportunity for a little rest. Mr. Speaker, he has obviously completely missed the point. I did not read the morning papers, so I should like to ask him if the state of Maine has been annexed to our country? What the hon. member has said has nothing to do with the question at hand. He has missed the point; he was talking about capital expenditures. I said that that highway is being constructed, but I am not arguing that; I am arguing on behalf of the people living in the northland of Canada—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I must interrupt the hon. member because he is extending the speech he has given. He is not asking a question, but seems to be raising a point of order on the ground that the hon. member is not discussing the bill that is before us. This is a valid point.

• (1640)

Mr. Watson: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, may I point out to the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River that if he looks at the map of Canada he will find that Maine juts several hundred miles into Quebec. What I am proposing is a direct road link north of the forty-fifth parallel which of course runs east and west. The road, as I say, would be above the forty-fifty parallel, would run east and west and would connect the eastern townships auto route with New Brunswick. This, in my view, would allow us to do more for the Alaska Highway and for the people in the hon. member's riding than anything that has so far been suggested.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The Chair is faced with a difficulty in that the time allotted to the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River expired a short time ago. I see the hon. member is rising to ask a question. Unless he has unanimous consent he may not ask a question. Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to ask his question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, my question is this. I know a little geography. I think it is quite obvious that the suggestion I made earlier in my remarks, namely, that this matter be referred to committee, will not be consented to by hon. members opposite. I wonder if the hon. member would agree that I raise this subject when the main estimates are brought before the House, so that we may discuss this question again. Would the hon. parliamentary secretary agree?

Mr. Watson: Mr. Speaker, I certainly would agree. I am as enthusiastic about the suggestion as the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River. I simply feel that we should do a lot more than he is suggesting. We could kill two birds with one stone. I think we would have a better chance, on both counts, if we proceeded in the way I have suggested.

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak for only very few recorded paragraphs in the somewhat long hope that we can accede to the wish of the hon. member who has brought this timely and important proposition before us for establishment of an Alaska-Yukon Highway authority. In passing, may I say that we are living in a small world. The previous speaker, I was amazed to hear, managed to go from Alaska to Maine, back to Alaska and then back to Quebec in about 20 minutes. That is a wonderful achievement and shows the importance of our transportation links.

Our country is somewhat odd. Looking at the map, one will see that Canada is topless; the country goes on and on over the pole. On the other hand, some parts of Canada extend south of northern California. Proposed highways are easy to justify if one considers our geography. I think the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) has brought forward a good proposition and we favour sending his proposal to the appropriate committee. Without doubt, the north and the area for which he speaks generally is ripe for better highway links and construction. Continuing in the way we have for many years, by bits and pieces and patchwork policies, is not good enough. We need a definite planning agency in this area. In my view, that agency or authority should be set up as a Crown corporation. Of course, if this bill were referred to committee we could discuss it in greater detail.

It is wonderful how times change. I can remember how, 35 years ago, the people of Vancouver opposed the construction of a highway, and certainly of a railway link, up to the Peace River country because it was thought that building links to that area would enable the people there to leave the area and come down to Vancouver. Now the people of Vancouver and of the west are as keen as members representing central and northern parts of the country to see a responsible authority established that will help to plan, establish and promote highways such as the one the hon. member has in mind. Such a highway, I am sure, will prove the key to the development of industry and the planning of the entire area contiguous to the highway. Certainly it will lead to better relations between our country and the Americans and will be a boom for the tourist trade.

Those are my thoughts, Mr. Speaker. I hope the House will permit the bill to go to committee, as the hon. member wishes, where it can receive detailed examination.

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, without wishing to take anything from Your Honour's dignity, I think Your Honour cut short a rather pleasant occasion this afternoon when the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mrs. Morin) occupied the Speaker's chair. There is a lady speaker in the other place and I am wondering if this afternoon, for the first time in Canadian history, a lady acted as Speaker of this House. I congratulate her.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hopkins: I realize that the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) feels strongly about those matters outlined in his bill. I have had the pleasure and opportunity of visiting the west on several occasions, and I have visited the Yukon territory. I think Canadians cannot have any idea of the size and beauty of Canada unless they have made a trip such as I did.

The Alaska Highway was built to be an important road link, mainly in the war years. The hon. member referred to its history prior to that time. When one visits the Yukon territory and stands on the shores of the Yukon River, thinks of that river's past history and what it has meant to generations gone by, one cannot help being carried away by the beauty and magnitude of Canada.

The hon. member is to be congratulated for bringing forward a measure that would, if passed, affect his region to a large degree. He has done what other hon. members of the House have done. If we, as individual members of this House, do not stand up and speak on behalf of our various regions of Canada, we will hardly form a federal parliament.

I am greatly concerned about the hon. member's proposal to set up an authority which is to be a non-Crown authority. I do not quite know what he means by a non-Crown authority, even after reading the bill. I am concerned about the matter because I feel that the Department of Public Works has for many years been downgraded by various governments, and the money which the department is permitted to spend on projects in all Canada has been reduced. Rather than establishing a separate authority to handle any project in any particular area, it is my contention that we should use the Department of Public Works as a federal agency in order to establish the federal presence everywhere in Canada. For this reason, I feel it should have the capability of making a contribution to projects such as the hon. member has mentioned.

• (1650)

Let us look at the past. When the Department of Public Works, with the assistance of the military, constructed the Rideau Canal it had wide powers and almost complete authority over waterways such as the Ottawa River. Some of the department's achievements, such as the canal structures in Ontario, are an important part of Canada's history. Yet today, when minor items concerning tourist projects are brought forward, so many difficulties arise that one feels rather like an athlete trying to jump over a ten-foot wall.

The Department of Public Works should be a department making a considerable financial contribution in all regions. From talking to people who have been concerned about the Alaska Highway, I understand that a large section would need to be relocated before paving could be carried out. This involves a major construction project. I do not suppose it would be out of line with projects carried out in the past when the Department of Public Works was one of the major departments in government. That situation could return.

Not many days ago I was speaking about the Department of National Defence in the course of the debate on the budget. As we know, that department made an important contribution to the construction of the Alaska Highway in the early stages. I mentioned this in my speech. I also put forward a proposal with regard to a pioneer tourist train up the Ottawa Valley, a proposal which has received widespread support from my area, as I am sure the bill before us will be widely supported in the hon. member's region.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is not easy to get things done in connection with a suggestion of that kind. One feels like an athlete attempting to jump over a ten-foot wall. One is confronted with questions such as: Where shall we get a steam locomotive? Where are we going to find coaches? One is told, for example, that the roadbed is not firm enough. We are talking now about a fairly simple project intended to encourage the tourist industry by bringing back a semblance of the old pioneer days when the timber trade was flourishing. If a scheme like this seems difficult to realize, compare it with the relocation and paving of a large section of the Alaska Highway. Nevertheless, it is proposals such as these which all hon. members should encourage and promote with support from others.

Mr. Oberle: I am sure getting it!

Mr. Hopkins: The hon. member says he is sure getting it. I am quite prepared to back up any effort the Department of Public Works may make. I believe the department should be a major factor in carrying out many of these projects. But it has been downgraded financially for the past several decades. I believe it should be restored to the position it held at the turn of the century. I am not criticizing the hon. member's proposal; I am simply taking it by another route. I am saying it would be good for the unity of Canada if it were done from Ottawa by a federal department in close liaison with the local authorities.

I am concerned by the recommendation in the bill that three Members of Parliament be appointed to the corporation which is envisaged to carry out the hon. member's plan. I am even more concerned when I see that the three Members recommended in the bill are members of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition. A number of bills have been brought forward in the last few years seeking to have Members of Parliament appointed to the boards of Crown corporations or agencies. All of them were talked out, no matter which government was in power at the time. I would be somewhat afraid that the presence of three members of the opposition on such an important body might jeopardize the project, rather than assist it. That is why I should like to see the work sponsored by the Department of Public Works, since that department involves all members of this House.

Mr. Knight: You have a good sense of humour.

Alaska-Yukon Highway Authority

Mr. Hopkins: I have put forward my suggestions for the upgrading of the Department of Public Works. This can only be done if more funds are supplied to it. As chairman of the national resources and public works committee, I have in the past four years had occasion to get to know many of the officials of the Department of Public Works on a personal basis. They are dedicated people. Contrary to the impression held by some people, this is a department with imagination.

I have talked with people from the Yukon, and it seems to me they tend to downgrade the activities of the federal government and the Department of Public Works. This disturbs me, and to my mind it constitutes another reason for making extended use of the department rather than setting up a separate authority. By our entering into every region, a contribution could be made to the unity of Canada—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. The time appointed for the consideration of private members' business has now expired. It being five o'clock, this House, looking forward to an early spring weekend, stands adjourned until Monday next at 2 p.m.

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF PROGRAMS TO MAKE MORE SUBSIDIZED UNITS AVAILABLE

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, for some time we have been seeking alternatives to the large public housing projects we have been building in conjunction with the provinces and at the same time seeking ways to make more units available to those on lower income who need them.

The new amendments to the National Housing Act presently before this House will offer more desirable alternatives to public housing, but I am pleased today to announce three new program proposals under the existing legislation, the National Housing Act, whereby more units of subsidized housing will be made available, and whereby a desirable social mix of low-income families and middle-income families can be obtained by using ordinary apartment and townhouse complexes.

First, in certain privately owned and financed buildings, a federal-provincial partnership will lease 25 per cent of the units for low-income people. The tenants will pay the same rate as in public housing with the two governments sharing the deficit on a 50-50 basis.

Concurrently, a second alternative program we are suggesting is to lease space in projects financed by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation under the limited dividend and non-profit sections of the housing act. In future, loans by CMHC in certain municipalities will be conditional upon 25 per cent of the units being made available to the federal-provincial partnership for low-income tenants.

At the same time, a third alternative program is being established to improve the social mix in subsidized housing by allowing non-subsidized middle-income people to live in publicly-owned housing on an experimental basis.

I am hopeful that our efforts to encourage a better mix of families by housing low-income people in privately-owned buildings will be welcomed by the private sector. I am pleased to announce that arrangements have been concluded with the province of Ontario to experiment with these changes. The Hon. Allan Grossman, the minister responsible for the Ontario Housing Corporation, and myself are making a statement in more detail on this today. An invitation to all provinces is being issued by me to take advantage of these new techniques for providing housing for those that need it most.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in rising to respond to the minister's statement I should like to say first of all that we are generally quite pleased that the government has taken this step. We think it is a constructive move and one that we hope will be expanded upon if it turns out to be a successful venture.

I should like to mention, however, that we hope that the minister, by making this statement or in his reference to legislation that will be coming before the House probably this week, is in no way failing to look at the true problem that exists at the present time in many of our urban areas, that is, the high cost of serviced land. We believe that is the root cause for much of the housing problems in this country and that his department should direct its attention to solving that basic problem as it has become almost critical, certainly in areas such as metropolitan Toronto.

Dealing generally with this statement, we welcome it.

• (1410)

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, the members of the New Democratic Party welcome the statement made by the minister a few minutes ago. Like the minister, we believe there is a need to increase the mix of housing available to low-income Canadians. The proposals outlined in the minister's sketchy statement seem to move in a basically desirable direction. Having said that, I should like to raise three problems associated with the statement.

First, when the minister announced about a year ago his new scheme for assisted home ownership it was seen initially as the alternative, in the sense of replacement, for public housing in Canada. Very appropriately, there was almost wholesale rejection of that idea by those who have any degree of expertise and concern about housing for low income citizens. Since that time the minister, as I understand him, has either changed his position or corrected the impression that we are not to have a cutback in public housing as such but are going to add to it by broadening the range of choice. The crucial test, however, will be the amount of money provided by the government for low-income housing regardless of the type. That is the area we will be looking at with considerable interest. There is every justification for increasing the total amount of money spent on low-income housing in Canada, and as a party we certainly would not accept a policy that resulted in spending merely the same amount of money but shifting it from one category of low-income housing to another. We need a substantial increase in total outlay.

The second point I should like to make involves a matter of some concern. We must look at the details of implementation of the proposal to provide in privately owned and financed residences space for low-income people which in effect would be subsidized by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation or by the federal government. Our concern, if we are to move in the direction of providing accommodation for low-income people in privately financed buildings, is the degree of profit that will accrue to the people who own these private buildings. We do not want to see repeated any kind of financial rip-off on the part of developers on this area. What could happen is that they would take a certain limited percentage of low-income tenants but the level of financial support by the taxpayers of Canada could go well beyond the amount required merely to subsidize, if you like, in a socially necessary way the low-income people and simply provide very lucrative profit margins for private corporations.

The third point concerns the absence in this statement of any reference to moving in a significant way toward co-operative housing. The housing legislation that, hopefully, we will be discussing soon does contain some provisions in respect of co-op housing, but essentially as we read the legislation the provisions for co-operative housing projects to be supported in a significant financial way by the government are essentially of a charitable nature. We believe we must change and make owner-occupied co-op housing of the apartment type or single family separate unit type appealing to low-income Canadians. That is really what we see as a significant alternative to public housing of the kind we have had up to this point. This will require some changes in the bill that will come before us soon, and we will be pushing for them.

The final point I would like to make concerns land. There can be no doubt that the most significant aspect in housing today is the increasing cost of land for both public and private housing. The minister has made the right kind of signs that he is interested in dealing with that question, but we all know that nothing will be done about the matter of land unless the minister puts up millions of dollars for a significant land banking system. Therefore we support any move in this direction. But in the most serious way we enter the kind of caveats I have just mentioned in commenting on the minister's statement.

[Translation]

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, we welcome the announcement that the hon. minister has just made; however, we consider it to be but a very small step forward, since the minister did not mention the prices of land and utilities.

For each family to own its own home, I think one would have to see that utilities provided by municipalities were subsidized by the CMHC or by some other body, so that the cost of utilities would not have to be assumed by the owners of new houses. Utilities for a lot with 50 feet of frontage often cost as much as $40 or $45 a month for 20 years. If one adds to that the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials and the alarming rise of construction prices, which can be as high as $18,000 or $19,000 for a four-room one-family house, one can see that it is very difficult for small wage earners, getting between $4,000 and $5,000 a year, to buy a house. We do, however, note that the hon. minister intends the new legislation to benefit the category of those who earn from $4,000 to $5,000 a year, who did not benefit under the former act, and to help them to become homeowners some day.

HEALTH

COMPENSATION TO THALIDOMIDE VICTIMS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I rise, pursuant to Standing Order 43, to request the unanimous consent of the House on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the significant number of thalidomide children in Canada with permanent deformities who have not received compensation from the manufacturer of the drug, and in view of the fact that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) stated in the House on January 23 that officials had met with representatives of the firm responsible for the production of the drug, and in view of the fact that this problem as it applies to children in Britain has been debated in the British House of Commons, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie):

• (1420)

That the House request that at an early date the Minister of National Health and Welfare report to parliament on this serious problem and the extent of the government's efforts to assist the victims and families afflicted by the use of thalidomide.

Mr. Speaker: This motion is proposed under the terms of Standing Order 43. It also requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity. The motion cannot be put.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Charlevoix has the floor.

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, the motion I wanted to move has just been brought forward by the representative of the Progressive Conservative party. That is another proof of lack of co-operation.

DREE—LOANS TO AGENCIES IN RICHMOND CONSTITUENCY

Question No. 494—Mr. Beaudoin:

Since it was established, has the Department of Regional Economic Expansion paid or loaned money to agencies whose headquarters are located in the constituency of Richmond and, if so, what was the amount paid in each case?

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The following companies accepted offers of a development incentive under the Regional Development Incentives Act for a facility in the indicated locality of the constituency of Richmond:

Name	Location	Amount of Incentive	Disbursements to Date
Frank's Piping Co. Ltd.	Bromptonville, Que.	$ 15,900	$ 7,603
Abattoir Giroux Inc.	Bromptonville, Que.	13,000	9,412
Eastern Canada Packaging	Bromptonville, Que.	16,600	19,148
Fibres de Verre de l'Est Inc.	Garthby, Que.	102,125	47,485
Tingwick Métal Inc.	Tingwick, Que.	51,500	36,094
Confection Corriveau Inc.	Windsor, Que.	41,862	34,014

It should be noted that the actual moneys paid to Eastern Canada Packaging exceeded the amount of the authorized incentive. The reason for this is that under the terms of the regulations to the Regional Development Incentives Act, an increase of 15 per cent over the initially approved capital cost figure may be authorized provided that the concurrence of the Minister is sought. In this case, the applicant obtained the necessary approval for the upward revision.

[Translation]

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): (a) The "Compagnie des Cent Associés" having its business office at Trois-Rivières, voluntarily declared bankruptcy on May 9, 1969. (c) The majority of creditors totalling 286 are small investors for a total amount of $662,449.86. (d) Mr. Rosaire Drolet was appointed trustee of this bankruptcy on June 16, 1969. The creditors have already received a dividend of 65 per cent of their claims and the trustee anticipates that they will recover their total claims.

UNEMPLOYMENT AMONG INDIANS AND INUITS

Question No. 721—Miss MacDonald (Kingston and The Islands):

1. What was the average annual employment rate among Indians and Inuit in Canada in 1968, 1969, 1970, 1971 and 1972?

2. What was the average annual income of Canadian Indians and Inuit families excluding general assistance and family allowances in 1968, 1969, 1970, 1971 and 1972?

3. How many Indians and Inuits received welfare assistance in Canada in 1968, 1969, 1970, 1971 and 1972?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): In so far as the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is concerned the answer is: 1. Canada Manpower does not keep records by ethnic groups and as many Indians and Inuits do not live on reserves but in urban areas it is not possible to maintain this type of information.

2. In so far as the Indian population is concerned see answer to Question 1879 tabled in the House of Commons December 1, 1971. In so far as the Inuit population, the Northwest Territories does not keep records on an ethnic basis.

3. The reply given to part 1 applies also in the case of welfare payments.

DROP OUT RATE—INDIAN STUDENTS

Question No. 723—Miss MacDonald (Kingston and The Islands):

1. What was the drop out rate amongst Indian high school students before Grade 12 in 1968, 1969, 1970, 1971 and 1972?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): The Department does not maintain a drop out rate as this is extremely difficult to define and because students who move to off-reserve situations are lost to departmental records. The Department instead stresses the retention rate in school including those who take technical and vocational programs. We do know that from the period from 1959 to 1969 high school Indian enrolments increased by 250 per cent and university enrolment has increased by 200 per cent.

VETERANS' LAND ACT—CERTIFICATES OF ELIGIBILITY

Question No. 1,076—Mr. Darling:

1. Has the Department of Veterans Affairs received applications from veterans for assistance under the Veterans' Land Act who failed to file for certificates before the deadline had passed?

3. Does the Minister plan to initiate action to extend the deadline to accommodate veterans who would now like to acquire small holdings, but who failed to apply for certificates of eligibility before the deadline?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): 1 and 2. ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES—ALLEGED DESIRE OF UNITED STATES FOR SUBSTANTIAL ALTERATIONS IN CERTAIN SECTORS—CANADIAN POSITION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Has the government recently been advised again by United States government officials that the United States government still wants substantial alterations in the auto pact and defence production sharing, as well as modifications in our tourist allowances and other irritants? If so, what is the stance of the government? Is it about to begin discussions on these matters?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have had no recent communication from the government of the United States on the point raised by the hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Stanfield: Is it the minister's understanding that United States officials are insisting upon duty-free entrance of used cars into Canada from the United States as part of the modification of the auto pact?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, no representations to that effect have been made to me or to the government.

CANADA-UNITED STATES—INQUIRY AS TO SECRET TALKS ON POSSIBILITY OF FREE TRADE IN CERTAIN SECTORS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether officials of his department or of the government of Canada have held secret talks with officials of the United States government regarding initiatives toward free trade between the two countries in selected sectors of trade? If so, what, if any, mandate do the Canadian officials have from the Canadian government in this respect?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, on a number of occasions I have indicated to the House that there are continuing discussions between the government of Canada and the government of the United States, between officials of the two governments, with respect to a wide range of issues. I do not think they could properly be described as secret discussions; they are of a continuing nature and embrace a large number of matters of mutual concern.

Mr. Stanfield: Is the minister implying that in fact discussions are taking place between officials of the Canadian government and officials of the United States government with regard to free trade in selected areas of trade between the two countries?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to be drawn into debate about what is going on between our two countries. As I indicated, there is continuing discussion between officials on a wide range of matters. If the Leader of the Opposition is suggesting that we are about to enter into discussions with respect to free trade between our two countries, I can assure him that such is not our intention.

ENERGY

NATURAL GAS—STUDIES OF EXPORT PRICE TO UNITED STATES TO DETERMINE WHETHER TOO LOW—CONSIDERATION OF EXCISE TAX RATHER THAN PRICE INCREASE

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address some questions to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Has the minister or his department or the National Energy Board made studies of the question of whether the price of Canadian gas exported to the United States is too low relative to the price of other fuels, and if such studies have been made can the minister inform the House whether the conclusion is that the price is or has been too low?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, in 1970 the government passed regulation 11a under the National Energy Board Act conferring on the National Energy Board the responsibility for keeping gas prices for export under scrutiny. As I told the hon. gentleman's colleague, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, a detailed description of the board's efforts since regulation 11a was passed will be presented to the standing committee tomorrow morning.

Mr. Lewis: Precisely because of the existence of 11a in the regulations, can the minister tell the House now or is he informing the House that the committee will be informed tomorrow as to what the conclusion of that analysis was? Can he also say whether any action was taken under 11a of the National Energy Board regulations with respect to the export price of gas?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the board will be making a very full exposé tomorrow of its actions since 11a was established. I think it is a fair inference that since that legislative tool was there it has been of assistance to the board in its efforts with regard to gas prices.

Mr. Lewis: May I ask the minister whether the government has considered or is considering the imposition of an excise tax on gas sales in lieu of an increase in price in order that the benefits may accrue to the people of Alberta and the people of Canada rather than 83 per cent of the benefits of an increase in price going to the gas producers, most of them large and foreign-owned?

• (1430)

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, we have been considering in a very general way the returns to Canada from this and other energy sources. Specifically, I have to say we are not considering the prospect of instant implementation of an excise tax.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

FOOD PRICE INCREASES—IMPLEMENTATION OF COMPENSATED DISCOUNT SYSTEM

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

In view of the continual rise in the price of food, can the minister tell the House whether he will recommend the setting up of a compensated discount on food products in order to curb the alarming rise of prices which are still out of control in spite of investigations conducted in this connection?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry, but I have no intention of launching new policies this afternoon. They will be introduced in due course.

AUDITOR GENERAL

APPOINTMENT OF SUCCESSOR TO MAXWELL HENDERSON—SUGGESTED CONSULTATION WITH PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Acting Prime Minister, or possibly the Acting Minister of Finance might answer. In light of the imminent retirement of the Auditor General, Mr. Maxwell Henderson, is the Acting Prime Minister able to indicate the name of his successor? If not, is it the intention of the government to appoint the Assistant Auditor General as Acting Auditor General?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): An intensive search is being made to find a suitable replacement for Mr. Henderson whose services to the country have been acknowledged by the House. I hope we find one at least as worthy.

Mr. Baldwin: While this appointment lies, of course, within the prerogatives of the Governor in Council, in view of the fact that the Auditor General is a servant of parliament, will the government give some consideration to consulting with the Public Accounts Committee concerning a suitable appointment?

Mr. Sharp: I will take the hon. gentleman's representations under consideration. I am quite sure that the kind of person for whom the government is searching will be one fully agreeable to Members of Parliament as a whole.

Mr. Baldwin: Since the report of the Auditor General for the year ended March 31, 1972, has been delayed due to staff problems and by the retirement of the Auditor General, will the Acting Prime Minister undertake that as soon as this report is made available, whenever that may be and even if it is months from now, it will be made public even if there has been a dissolution of parliament in the interval?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is hypothetical. I will recognize the hon. member for Wellington on a supplementary. If the minister wishes to reply, he might do so to both questions at once.

Mr. A.D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Acting Prime Minister. Is it the intention of the government to call the Public Accounts Committee together for organization at an early date and, if so, would the hon. gentleman refer to that committee the report that has been provided by a special committee assigned to the Public Accounts Committee concerning the appointment of a new Auditor General?

Mr. Sharp: To answer that question first, let me say I shall be consulting with my colleague, the leader of the House, who has been delayed in getting here today. In reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Peace River, let me assure him that the report of the Auditor General will be presented to parliament in accordance with the law.

SOCIAL SECURITY

SUGGESTED INCREASE IN FAMILY ALLOWANCES AND GOVERNMENT CONTRIBUTION UNDER CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN BECAUSE OF WELFARE SITUATION

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It is prompted by his interesting address to the Canadian Railway Labour Association, a copy of which, unfortunately, he did not send me. Can the minister tell us whether, in light of what he called the disgraceful welfare situation in some of the provinces, he is prepared to assist by an early introduction of legislation to raise family allowances, hopefully before Easter, and by increasing beyond 50 per cent the government's contribution to the Canada Assistance Plan, at least with respect to those areas and provinces where there is acute need as noted in the hon. gentleman's address?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I did not send the hon. member a copy of my statement to the Canadian Railway Labour Association but there was a good reason for that: I was improvising. In the future, he will have to come and hear me in person.

With regard to the second question concerning the benfits now being paid under the Canada Assistance Plan, I was expressing an opinion which is also shared by most of my provincial colleagues. In fact, they do admit that the present benefits are not high enough. We will look into the whole matter at the conference to be held at the end of April, but I do not feel that I can or should suggest changes before we have discussed it with the provinces.

[English]

Mr. Macquarrie: I have a supplementary, prompted by an even more impressive part of those spontaneous expressions. I note that the minister indicated plans to present to the provinces in April a social security system including provision for unemployment insurance. Can he advise us whether this means that the government now regards unemployment insurance not as an insurance scheme but as welfare and if it also regards the jurisdiction as one that it will henceforth share with the provinces?

Mr. Speaker: Order. In regard to the first part of the supplementary, I would think the hon. member is asking for an expression of opinion on the part of the minister. However, if the minister wishes to reply to the second part of the question he will be recognized for that purpose.

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I have a hard time distinguishing between the first and the second part of the question.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON NATURE OF DISCUSSIONS AND CANADIAN POSITION

Mr. Terry O'Connor (Halton): I have a further supplementary, Mr. Speaker, to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, arising from the first series of questions. In view of the fact he said the word "secret" was not an appropriate word to apply to the talks taking place between the United States and Canada and that the talks which are of a continuing nature, would the hon. gentleman be prepared to make a statement outlining what is being discussed and the position being taken by Canada in these talks?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I do not think I have anything to add to the statements I have made in the House over a long period with respect to the ongoing and continuing nature of our discussions with the United States in connection with a number of trade matters.

Mr. O'Connor: The minister has on occasion indicated that he is not prepared, as he says, to bargain in public, that is, to make our bargaining position known. That is, perhaps wise. But would the hon. gentleman be prepared to make a full statement to the House setting out Canada's immediate and long-term objectives without revealing the exact nature of the bargaining points in order that some of the confusion surrounding, in particular, the auto pact in the last few weeks might be cleared up?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I think that some of the confusion which has surrounded the auto pact in the last few weeks has been cleared up.

POWER

JAMES BAY HYDROELECTRIC PROJECT—APPLICABILITY OF NAVIGABLE WATERS PROTECTION ACT TO PROVINCES—REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT TAKE OVER PRIVATE MEMBER'S BILL

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport with reference to the applicability of the Navigable Waters Protection Act to the proposed hydro development in the James Bay region. It arises in part from the reply the hon. gentleman gave on Friday last to the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands, recorded on page 2069 of Hansard, in which he said it is "less obvious when a provincial government is concerned" whether the act can be applied. In light of that answer, would the minister consider taking over as a government bill my Bill C-155 presently on the order paper, which would eliminate the ambiguity as to the applicability of the Navigable Waters Protection Act in situations of this kind?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): I am ready to look into that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport. Since the Minister of the Environment said on March 1, 1971, that British Columbia would require authority under the Navigable Waters Protection Act to build the Moran Dam, would the hon. gentleman tell the House in what way that situation is different from the situation at James Bay, and, if it is not different, whether the position of the government has changed and, if so, why?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I would like to have the text of that statement by the minister. After that, maybe I could comment.

SUGGESTED PROVISION OF INFORMATION ON NAVIGABLE WATERS PROTECTION ACT ADMINISTRATION TO COURT AND HOUSE

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): I have a supplementary for the Minister of Justice. In light of the recent decision by a Superior Court Justice in Quebec to postpone ruling on whether the La Grande and other rivers in the James Bay region fall under the Navigable Waters Protection Act, will the government, in the role of a friend of the court, provide the court with all necessary information relating to the administration of this act, and will the minister also provide this information to the House at the earliest possible opportunity?

• (1440)

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I would, of course, be very happy to provide to the hon. member or any other member of the House any information they seem to think we have that may be of help to them in reaching any conclusions with regard to this matter. I would not think that direct assistance to the court is required and, of course, I will not comment further on a matter before the courts.

GRAIN

PROPOSED INTERNATIONAL GRAIN BANK—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. What is the reaction of the Canadian government to the establishment of an international food bank?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): As I recall, Mr. Speaker, an international food bank was established a few years ago to which we made very substantial contributions. Perhaps the right hon. gentleman has some other plan in mind.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, not two years ago but about 10 years ago, during my administration, we in Canada endeavoured to establish one under NATO and made our contribution. I am now referring to the representation made by Dr. Boerma, head of the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization, who proposed about two weeks ago the establishment of a world grain bank whose reserves could be drawn upon in emergencies. Producing countries would set aside certain minimum quantities of grain to stock the bank. He pointed out that a grain bank would be of special benefit to developing countries. Is the minister not aware of the fact that the United Nations has canvassed the various countries in the United Nations to ascertain their reaction? Has Canada not been approached?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I personally was not aware of this. I am very happy to have the information put forward by the Director General of the FAO. As the right hon. member knows, Canada has responded very generously to similar requests in the past. We have probably done more to help the underprivileged people of the world than any other country of our size. I can assure the right hon. member that if it is a practical scheme and one in which we can play a part, we will do so.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that is a long way from answering the question. I did not expect anything beyond generalities.

AMOUNT OF WHEAT OR OTHER GRAINS HELD BY FARMERS AS REVEALED BY QUESTIONNAIRE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Justice. A few weeks ago a survey was made among western farmers to ascertain what available wheat and other grains they had on hand. Will the minister say whether as a result of that poll it was ascertained that about 90 per cent of western farmers have no wheat or other grains on hand as was expected they would have according to the estimates made earlier by the government of Canada?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): No, Mr. Speaker. I would like to put the record straight immediately. The Canadian Wheat Board undertook the questionnaire in a confidential way. It is not its intention to supply the exact figures to any member of the public or, indeed, even to me because of the confidential nature of the questions asked and, therefore, the trust between them and questioners. However, I know they would be prepared to confirm in a general way that the results of the questionnaire confirm very substantially the accuracy of the figures available on the amounts of grain in fact predicted to be on hand in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the right hon. member for a supplementary and then the hon. member for Charlevoix.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the minister seems diffident about telling the House of Commons. Did he speak in the province of Saskatchewan and give those exact figures? Did he say it was found that approximately 90 per cent of the farmers do not have wheat or other grains on hand that it was expected they would have? Did he make that statement?

Mr. Lang: No, Mr. Speaker. The right hon. member's problem is that he is saying I said something was expected when it was not expected. The fact of the matter is that a great number of farmers, with the tremendous delivery opportunities that have existed, have delivered all of the deliverable grain we want. That is to say, they have left on hand only such grain as they want for their own purposes. However, it was well known, expected and predicted that the grain which is said to be on hand is in fact in the hands of a small number of farmers and they—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

HEALTH

INDEMNIFICATION OF VICTIMS OF THALIDOMIDE—MEASURES TAKEN BY DEPARTMENT

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Justice.

Could he tell the House what action is being taken by his department to allow Canadians affected by thalidomide, or their tutors, to obtain reasonable compensation from the drug manufacturer, that is from Richardson-Merrell (Canada) Ltd., a multimillionaire and multinational corporation?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, we have already had meetings with representatives of that firm to make sure that the parents of the victims of that drug will receive just and equitable treatment and, for the time being, I am reviewing the situation in the light of the facts which can be brought to our attention. I hope to be able to announce shortly new developments on that matter.

TRADE

RESPONSE TO REPRESENTATIONS BY CHURCH LEADERS FOR TARIFF REDUCTIONS ON SUGAR AND OTHER PRIMARY PRODUCTS TO AID DEVELOPING COUNTRIES

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It is supplementary or at least related to the question of the right hon. member for Prince Albert. Did the minister receive representations last week from the representatives of five or six Canadian churches urging the reduction of duties and preferences on sugar and other primary products as a main means of aiding developing countries? What was his response, if any, to their representations?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and myself received a very distinguished group of churchmen. They put forward a number of representations, including the one mentioned by the hon. member for Greenwood. We pointed out to the churchmen that we were introducing a resolution here for a system of general preferences which I hope will receive the full support of all members. We expressed our support for commodity arrangements and generally took a very sympathetic view, which I hope all members share, toward the ten days of development that the churches have been promoting as support for further development in the less privileged parts of the world.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PURPOSE OF VISIT OF DEPARTMENTAL OFFICIALS TO CUBA—REPRESENTATION RESPECTING RONALD PATRICK LIPPERT

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It is further to my question of last week concerning whether a delegation from his department was in Cuba. His reply at that time was that he was unaware but would look into the matter. In view of the visit to Cuba last week of Mr. K. Goldschlag, Director of the Bureau of Western Hemisphere Affairs of the Department of External Affairs, and of Mr. M. N. Bow, Director of the Latin-American Division of the Department of External Affairs, will the minister advise the House as to the reasons why these men were in Cuba. Specifically, did they discuss with the Cuban government any one of the following matters: One, possible release of Ronald Patrick Lippert who has been in a Cuban jail for ten years; two, possible commercial air services between Canada and Cuba; three, anything pertaining to the FLQ exiles from Canada presently in Cuba?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the answer to one of the questions is yes. The delegation, which includes the people mentioned by the hon. member, made representations to the Cuban government about Mr. Lippert. They have not been negotiating an air agreement and they have not been discussing FLQ developments. They are there on a trip which is concerned with the development of mutual trade and other relations between our two countries.

Mr. Cossitt: Is the Secretary of State for External Affairs in a position to advise the House of the nature of the response received to the representations on behalf of Mr. Lippert?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker. I have not yet had a report of what our delegation learned. As the hon. gentleman knows, we have made representations every few months over a long period of years, and we are hoping they will bear fruit.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

POSSIBLE EXCLUSION OF OLD ORDER MENNONITES FROM COMPULSORY PAYMENTS

Mr. Keith Hymmen (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue. Has there been any progress in the matter involving the exemption of certain groups, including Old Order Amish Mennonites, on the basis of their religious belief from participation in the Canada Pension Plan? I ask this question because of a commitment made in December, 1971, by two ministers.

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to say that my officials have been working with those of the Department of National Health and Welfare on the drafting, if necessary, of an amendment to the Canada Pension Plan. I have been discussing with my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the possibility of not waiting for comprehensive amendments to that act but of seeing whether we can introduce sooner the necessary amendment to accomplish this exemption of certain religious groups from coverage. If there is found to be general approval of such an amendment, perhaps there might be discussions among the House leaders with a view to passing it without debate or expediting it through the House for the convenience of these groups.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

PROVISION OF NEW CRESTS AND SIGNS FOR BUILDINGS

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. Because of the fact that a new RCMP building was recently opened in Red Deer without display of a crest, and as many people in my constituency and across Canada are concerned about this matter, would the Solicitor General tell the House why the crest is being changed and when an announcement will be made as to what the new crest will be?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, we approved new signs for RCMP buildings last week. I think a press release will be put out soon describing these signs and they will be put up as soon as possible. They are in production right now.

LABOUR RELATIONS

ELEVATOR CONSTRUCTORS' STRIKE—PRESENT SITUATION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Labour a question. I realize the limitations placed upon him by the constitution in regard to the elevator constructors' dispute but it is a costly one to the country as a whole. I should like to ask the minister whether he is in a position to give the House any information regarding the elevator constructors' strike which has proven to be so costly in many of the provinces of this country?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I am advised that the parties met last Friday and I believe they met again yesterday. The Ontario Minister of Labour is quoted as having made the statement that he is hopeful there will be a breakthrough today in this dispute, whatever "breakthrough" means in this context.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

ALLEGED SLOWDOWN BY VANCOUVER YARD CREWS—ACTION TO SPEED UP FREIGHT MOVEMENT AND AMELIORATE GRIEVANCES

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour, of which I have given him notice. Has the minister yet had an opportunity to examine the work to rule situation in the greater Vancouver area by Canadian National yard crews with a view to speeding up freight movement and ameliorating the legitimate grievances of these men?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for giving me notice; I should also like to thank the previous member for the notice he gave me of his question. Over the week-end we had our mediators in Montreal call in the top union people to discuss the entire area of grievances to see what could be done, and we are working on this very strenuously at the present time. I believe that other causes of unhappiness, of which the hon. member is well aware, are also the subject matter of discussion. I am referring in particular to the outstanding lawsuit that is involved.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, the minister just about took the words out of my mouth. Is he aware that, in addition to deliberately cutting its work force, Canadian National is holding a two year old writ for damages over the heads of the men, as well as employing watchdogs to spy on the men and pursuing a policy of harassment by calling in selected individuals for cross-examination by management?

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated in my previous answer to the hon. member, we are aware of the outstanding lawsuit.

AGRICULTURE

SUGGESTED REINSTATEMENT OF TARIFFS ON BEEF FROM UNITED STATES

Mr. Ken Hurlburt (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the practical experience that you have had in the livestock industry, why have you not demanded that import tariffs—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member resume his seat. I think this is a good opportunity to remind hon. members that questions should be directed to the Chair. When we are running short of time I sometimes hesitate to interrupt hon. members, but by this time I think they should know that questions should be directed to the Chair, not to ministers. Would the hon. member kindly address himself to the Chair.

Mr. Hurlburt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. Why have you not demanded—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member take my suggestion into account.

Mr. Hurlburt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. Why has he not—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hurlburt: —demanded that import tariffs on beef from the United States be reinstated immediately until such time as the Americans reciprocate?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think we have made it fairly clear that our officials are still working with United States officials but their studies are not yet complete. I think you are talking about DES, though the hon. member did not say so in his question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the minister kindly address himself to the Chair.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I might say that during the last election campaign I promised that these subsidies—

POSSIBLE MOVEMENT OF ORE FROM BAFFIN ISLAND TO WEST GERMANY—INQUIRY AS TO ASSISTANCE TO WEST GERMANY TO BUILD SHIPS

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport, of which I have given him notice. In view of the fact that negotiations are under way between Canada and West Germany to ship ore from Baffin Island to the Ruhr Valley in Germany, and in view of the large number of unemployed people in Canada and our ability to build ships in Canada, I should like to ask the minister whether Canada is supplying money and expertise to West Germany to build these ore carriers?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, a few years ago there were consultations between Germany and Canada as well as common experiments in the building of icebreaker cargo ships. I think the Germany company, called Vesser if my memory is correct, paid about $3 million for this analysis and research, as did the West German department of education. At the moment we are proceeding on our own and there is no longer any joint research in this field.

Mr. Hales: Mr. Speaker, I have a short supplementary. Will Canadian shipbuilders be given an opportunity to tender on the building of these ore carriers?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): There is no doubt about that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member is referring to the advisory committee to the UIC. It will be meeting tomorrow and these matters will be placed before it.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Coast Chilcotin.

HOUSING

AMENDMENTS TO NATIONAL HOUSING ACT—GRANTING OF INTEREST-FREE LOANS TO MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the hon. Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

Since the minister said today he intends to amend the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act to grant loans to municipalities and individuals, so the latter may purchase houses more easily, could he tell the House whether the proposed amendments will include interest-free loans to municipalities for the installation of utilities on lands for the construction of houses?

[English]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the amendments before the House do not provide for that, but we have a task force working within the government which is presently consulting with the provinces as to how the provisions of the National Housing Act relating to the provision of forgiveness loans to municipalities for sewage works should be amended. I would hope to be in a position to make an announcement on that policy before the end of June.

SUGGESTED STUDY OF POSSIBILITY OF LOANS TO MUNICIPALITIES AT LOWER INTEREST RATE

Mr. Jean-Marie Boisvert (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question of the hon. minister.

Is it his intention to have his task force study the possibility of lending money to municipalities at lower interest rates than are available now?

[English]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, under the National Housing Act we do lend money to municipalities for sewage services work, for trunk sewers and sewage disposal plants, at a beneficial rate of interest, plus a forgiveness provision which amounts to about one-third of the loan. Because we already have a policy of special loans to municipalities for that purpose, obviously during our reconsideration of the program we are considering this.

GRAIN

BARLEY—PAYMENT OF COST OF TRUCKING TO INLAND TERMINALS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Justice in his capacity as minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. It arises from the resumption of the barley trucking program under which barley is being moved to the inland terminal at Saskatoon. In as much as this is an experimental project which will have the result of increasing handling costs by about 10 cents a bushel, will the minister indicate to the House whether this extra cost will be covered by funds from the federal treasury or will it be applied to the farm pool account?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the movement of barley into inland terminals is normally part of the operation of inland terminals and, therefore, costs are borne in the normal way. The difference really is only in respect of the decision by the Canadian Wheat Board to use trucks rather than rail equipment to move the grain. This results in large part from negotiations in respect of several aspects of rates which make trucking fully acceptable to the Canadian Wheat Board in place of rail.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are reaching the end of the question period and I hope there will be as few supplementary questions as possible, particularly if we are to recognize more members before orders of the day are called.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I have one supplementary question. Since the additional charges involved in the shipping of barley under this program last year, amounting to about 12 cents a bushel, were covered by federal funds rather than from the pool account, is the minister saying this is the normal way in which the extra charges will be covered?

Mr. Lang: Yes, Mr. Speaker, this is the normal way, that is to say, being borne as a regular part of the operation. The Wheat Board makes the decision when to use the inland terminals which, of course, are facilities placed there by the federal government, but how often the Board makes use of them is for the Board to decide. Last year there was a deficit in that particular barley pool so the question was academic. The only exceptional movement of grain with our full support was a year ago when we made a payment to help pay for the movement of more barley and wheat into export positions, and we bore that cost as part of our export development program.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

TELECOMMUNICATIONS SERVICES—FINGERPRINTING OF EMPLOYEES INVOLVED IN POLICE WORK—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. In view of the 300-word telegram received by his office on February 15 from the Canadian National Telecommunications Union asking for guidance regarding the fingerprinting practices of Canadian National with respect to certain employees involved in police work and police services, will the minister indicate why he has not responded to this costly and very important telegram?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have now authorized a reply. In fact, I did that in the middle of last week and it should be in the hands of the people concerned. I would, of course, have been glad to talk to them on the telephone as well at any time. I indicated to them that where any such security measures are required as part of the job, it is certainly a special matter outside my jurisdiction.

FINANCE

RESERVE FUND HOLDINGS OF UNITED STATES DOLLARS—POSSIBILITY OF GUARANTEED EXCHANGE RATE OR DIVERSIFICATION

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. Ordinarily I would have waited for the Minister of Finance to come back, but in view of the Acting Prime Minister's former finesse in finance I should like to ask a question concerning government policy. Did the Minister of Finance have specific discussions with the United States Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Shultz, when he met him in Paris over the weekend, with a view to obtaining exchange guarantees for Canadian holdings of U.S. dollars and, if not, is it now the government's intention to diversify Canadian international reserves?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance will be back tomorrow and I am quite sure will be happy to answer this and any other question that may be put to him.

Unemployment

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Acting Prime Minister could answer this part of the question. Does the government have a policy on exchange guarantees or diversification or our international reserves, or is this another policy lighted by hooded headlights, procrastination and prayer?

DRUGS

NON-MEDICAL USE—REASON FOR DELAY IN GRANT TO PROJECT

Mr. John Harney (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, my question has to do with a project called "Memo for Turner". It is not addressed to the Minister of Finance but to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Just for edification, this "Memo for Turner" has to do with a project in respect of the non-medical use of drugs. In view of the fact that the last claim for payment of the grant has been delayed for a very long time, can the minister advise the House whether the delay in respect of the claim is the result of a policy decision or as a result of normal administrative bungling?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, first, I will have to discover which Turner this has reference to. Second, I will certainly look into the matter to see whether there is any justification for the delay.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will now call orders of the day. I might say that I have noted in writing those hon. members who have not been recognized today and they will be given preference tomorrow over members who have been recognized today.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—NEGLIGENCE OF GOVERNMENT RESPECTING UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi) moved:

That this House deplores the continuous increase in unemployment, as well as the refusal or negligence of the Government to propose effective measures for providing more jobs of a remunerative character for Canadians, and condemns the existing authorities for imposing and tolerating quasi-repressive measures affecting citizens who merely want to see respected their fundamental right to a decent standard of living and their personal dignity and to live in a climate of freedom and security.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am proud to present this motion in the name of my colleagues of the Social Credit Party of Canada. Perhaps I will be criticized for harping on the same subject following the motions previously introduced, but I wanted this motion to be more precise and concrete so as to enable us to put before the government true proposals which, if accepted, will eliminate the present climate of fear which is prevalent not only among the unemployed but even among those who now have a job and who do not know whether they will not be unemployed tomorrow.

For many years our unemployment rate has been steadily increasing. This unemployment rate is much too high for a still young nation, where much is left to be developed and which has still to meet the needs of one third of its population in the field of consumer goods.

In view of our high production capability and of the high demand for goods from handicapped and disadvantaged people living below the poverty line or even at the poverty line, I wonder about our hesitation to implement true solutions to this situation.

For the last few years we have been told that poverty was being fought; we have been hearing from time to time the leaders of our successive governments say that they were fighting unemployment. They mentioned "unemployment" but finally it turned out that it was a fight against the unemployed because the remedies proposed were probably the same as those which had been unefficient in the past.

So we need not be surprised that the employment situation in Canada is going from bad to worse. In fact, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was saying as an excuse recently in a conference that if he had not succeeded in bringing down the unemployment rate, it was because too many new workers were coming on the labour market, too many young people offering to do some work to satisfy the requirements of the population, which in my view is a very poor excuse.

I think that the Prime Minister ought to have known last year, just as two or five years ago, that this situation would persist. Each year, a number of young people are coming on the labour market, and since it is impossible to satisfy them, a climate of fear has settled in this country, especially among the young people who are afraid that they will not be able to find a job upon completion of their studies.

Such fear also plagues adults, fear of losing one's job, or of being unable to find one, for lack of education.

There is also the fear of not being able to keep one's job because of automation, or of being displaced through automation and assigned to menial, less remunerated tasks.

The worker also fears inability to support his family, fears to start a family, with such a dismal outlook. It is a disturbing fear that healthy realism, a return to more rational notions of the purpose of the economy, and of work, could alleviate.

Mr. Speaker, what then is the purpose of economic activity and industrial work. Why do men gather in factories, in working communities, if not to achieve results unobtainable in isolation?

Now what results are sought after? The factory-owner might reply: profits. The worker's reply will be: earning a living, drawing a salary. But neither profit nor salary matter, unless they bring about the satisfaction of needs.

But how are those needs met? They are met when the industrialist and the workers find goods capable of satisfying those needs. The purpose then of economic activity is not profit, nor salaries, but the production of goods and services that will satisfy human needs.

In his Réponse à des problèmes d'aujourd'hui Jean Daujat explains simply: "The purpose of every economic activity, taken from the point of view of man's real well-being, can only be that of providing all the resources required by family life."

And so, the purpose of economic activity is the well-being of the family, the home, and therefore the consumer.

In his encyclical Quadragesimo Anno Pope Pius XI had already expressed in these terms the purpose of the economy, and I quote:

The economic and social structure will be soundly constituted only when it can give each and everyone of its members all the goods the resources of nature and industry, as well as the truly social organization of economic life can procure.

• (1520)

Mr. Speaker, so as to provide for those in need, for all families, for Canadian consumers, restricting laws such as we have today, the Unemployment Insurance Act for instance, must necessarily be replaced by a guaranteed annual income.

A British economist, now a consulting economist with the American government, Mr. Robert Theobald, has recommended some time ago the payment of a guaranteed annual income and a salary to students, at the 51st Annual Congress of the International Association of Personnel in Employment Security. This speech is summarized in the September 1964 issue of the Labour Gazette, a publication of the federal Department of Labour.

Mr. Speaker, the federal government has absolutely no excuse for being unaware of that suggestion since a publication of the federal Department of Labour has published it.

Mr. Theobald's theory is as follows, and I quote:

I believe we are entering a new era whose requirements are as different from those of the recent industrial age as those of the industrial age were different from those of the preceding agricultural age.

Today, the cybernated productive system is emerging—a new innovation in productive techniques and organization based on machine power and machine skill, i.e., on the combination of automated machinery and the computer. Two main aspects of the cybernation revolution are that it will force man's mind out of the productive system just as surely as the industrial revolution forced out man's muscle; and that the coming of cybernation means that there will be no effective limit to our productive abilities.

I believe that the effects of cybernation will in fact be so far-reaching and rapid that it will be impossible to achieve full employment: in other words, that the growing efficiency of machine systems will continue to increase so fast that employers—both government and private—will find it cheaper to own or hire machines rather than men.

Full employment can never be achieved, but even if it was, there are groups who should have a guaranteed income: those too old or too ill to hold a job; those with responsibilities that require that they should not be under the obligation to hold a job, e.g., a woman with children but no husband, and those being educated.

May I quote further from the Labour Gazette:

To bring about his proposed guaranteed income, Mr. Theobald advocated a change in the United States Employment Act of 1946 that would make it the policy of the Government to provide job opportunities or to guarantee an income for anyone who was seeking work. He suggested that the starting level of the guaranteed income should be $1,000 for each adult and $600 for each child. In discussing the payment of students, Mr. Theobald said, "We must recognize that the student is already 'working' at least as relevantly as the man in the factory. The time has come when we must introduce the concept of a student salary, starting possibly at 14, and increasing with age, payable to all students attending school or university."

Mr. Speaker, that thesis was submitted to the American government seven or eight years ago. What was true then is all the more so today because, in Canada as elsewhere, especially in industralized countries, we have dug ourselves even deeper trying to achieve full employment, which is precisely where the government has erred.

Others have spoken along the same lines. I have here the opinion of an industrialist, and I quote:

John I. Snyder is president of United States Industries, comprising companies with a turnover of more than $114 million a year.

In an interview to Dun's Review, published by Dun and Bradstreet Publications, for industrialists, businessmen and financiers, Snyder is explicit and goes straight to the point. He endorses Robert Theobald's proposals and believes that the separation of work and income concepts must be accepted, and measures taken to ensure to each person a guaranteed income, whether he is working or not.

Thirty-two economists are of the same opinion.

Thirty-two American economists, businessmen, union leaders have sent President Johnson, of the United States, a brief in which they ask the President of the U.S. to apply their suggestions, if the United States are to avoid "an economic and social chaos beyond description".

This was when Mr. Johnson was president of the United States. So, Americans are confronted with this economic chaos today, as much as Canadians are. Let me quote further:

As a first stage, it is essential to recognize that traditional relationships between employment and income are broken. An affluent economy can bring all citizens comfort and economic security, whether or not they are engaged in what is usually referred to as "work". We recommend therefore that society, through appropriate legal and government institutions, make the solemn commitment of providing every indidividual and family with an adequate income. The right to a guaranteed income for all will replace the patchwork of present social measures which range from unemployment to direct assistance.

This is a very specific proposition.

Now, here are a few opinions from labour leaders.

In "Positions syndicales face à l'automatisation", George Levard, the Secretary General of the Confédération française des Travailleurs chrétiens, says, and I quote:

"If we are to avoid congestion, automated industry will have to come to "secrete" purchasing power as well as its products. But it will not be possible, for the most part, to bestow this purchasing power on people proportionally to the role they have played in production. It will have to be a SOCIAL, or SOCIALIZED, purchasing power, by which I mean one that aims at promoting mass consumption".

And now we hear Canadian unions saying the same thing. For example, at the biennial CLC Congress that took place in Montreal from April 20 to 24, 1964, the CLC vice-president, Mr. William Dodge, told 2,000 delegates, and I quote:

"Let us suppose that in spite of work development programs and the best of training courses and placement systems, technological changes resulted in a continuous decrease in the demand for manpower. What would happen if technological changes threatened to destroy the labour market itself? We would then have to revise our codes of ethnics and state that everyone has a right to be fed, clothed, educated and cared for even if he produces nothing".

William Dodge foresaw in 1964 that the regional economic development measures aimed at job planning in Canada, adult training courses and other measures the government suggested, would all come to nothing. Indeed, it has left very little hope to Canadian workers.

So, Mr. Speaker, that is why the Liberal government has failed in its fight against unemployment. It wanted to attain full employment which has now been found to be impossible. So much time lost. So many sufferings needlessly experienced by rejected workers who are even blamed for promises made to them.

Why go on in that direction? Why persist in resorting to a remedy which is doomed to fail? Why not try instead to establish a guaranteed minimum income plan which would enable the entire population to take advantage of already available goods which the able-bodied workers are eager to produce? Why not get off the beaten track? Is the government afraid of making innovations, of satisfying the Canadian people? What is preventing it from acting?

It would be interesting, Mr. Speaker, to hear the answer this evening when the minister answering on behalf of the government will be in the House. I regret he is not here this afternoon. He has been delayed because of bad weather. He has not been as foreseeing as I. I got up at two o'clock this morning, I took my car and left for Ottawa. At any rate, I am told that the hon. minister will be there tonight, and I shall be pleased to hear the proposals he will put forward in an attempt to meet urgent requirements of Canadians.

We hear increasingly more about the guaranteed minimum income. Some people call it "a fair distribution of resources." This is how it is defined by the Canadian Welfare Council in an article published in Le Droit on January 29, 1969:

A program designed to secure a satisfactory guaranteed annual income, which the Canadian Welfare Council considers as a social right for all Canadians, should be introduced "as soon as possible".

If the just society is to be something more than a vain and fragile abstraction, it must be founded on some basic and intangible rights, including social rights, as well as civil and political ones. Among social rights, none is more important than the right to an adequate income. We must include right now this social economic objective in our system of values. The method to administer guaranteed income can be decided upon later on. If necessary, it can be introduced by stages.

[Mr. Laprise.]

Then, Mr. Speaker, this is another voice demanding that a guaranteed minimum income be established for everybody, to replace the annoying system we have at present.

In the motion I put forward, I speak of citizens who require that their basic right be respected in order to reach an adequate standard of living. Now, it is noticed that certain public servants almost compell them to beg to have their vested rights respected. As for unemployment insurance, I have some very eloquent testimonies which show that this legislation is far from being efficient and falls short of meeting the needs of Canadians.

It is undoubtedly because this is a bureaucratic law giving rise to a dreadful amount of red tape that government employees themselves find most difficult to handle.

At LaSarre, where I live, there is an unemployment insurance sub-office to answer the needs of the population. During the week, when I am in Ottawa, my wife receives each day scores of telephone calls from people asking for my help in having their rights respected in the field of unemployment insurance benefits. I want to record in Hansard a few very special and specific cases. I could talk until six o'clock, and possibly until eight to wait for the minister, but I will only quote a few examples.

Mr. Speaker, a lady from Saint-Gérard-de-Berry had difficulty in getting the unemployment insurance benefits that she was entitled to.

So I went into action when she told me about it and I received from the unemployment insurance service in Rouyn a copy of the following reply addressed to that lady on February, 13, 1973. I quote:

On October 19, 1972, you requested that your file be transferred to this office. You wrote to tell us that you had received no employment insurance benefit, since your transfer request. We got in touch with our main office which, on February 6, 1973 . . .

Note the interval between October 19, 1972 and February 6, 1973.

. . . sent you four money-orders as payment for the weeks from October 1, 1972 to November 18, 1972.

In the case of that claimant, there was a 14-week delay before she could get the benefits she was entitled to, on account of a file transfer from one unemployment insurance office to another. For that reason and of that reason alone, the Unemployment Insurance Commission officials were almost unable to do anything. They are at a loss. It is the same thing every time a file is transferred. A letter was addressed to me by the former minister responsible for the Unemployment Insurance Commission, the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey), and I quote:

Dear Mr. Laprise:

This is with reference to the June 5, 1972 letter from my special assistant concerning the unemployment insurance problem of Mr. Georges Audet, Val St-Gilles, Abitibi-Ouest, Quebec.

Revision of payments made to that recipient shows that it is the new procedure for issuing cheques which delayed payments for the period from March 19 to May 27, 1972.

While the cheque issuing procedure was being changed, the unemployed had to tighten their belt, run into debt with the stores in order to survive, pending the change within the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

An hon. Member: Ridiculous!

Mr. Laprise: I shall now cite a case involving another beneficiary. I myself contacted the Unemployment Insurance Office in Rouyn, and they informed me that his claim was valid from March 22, 1972, and that he received payments for 25 consecutive weeks. The problem of the beneficiary Mr. Alfred St-Pierre, of La Sarre, is that, after 25 weeks of unemployment, he found a job for himself. It was a temporary job.

• (1540)

Unfortunately, that job lasted too long: he worked for five weeks. When there was no more work, he wanted to receive unemployment insurance payments again, but because he had worked longer than four weeks—he had worked five—he had lost his right to claim. If he had not worked, he could have claimed for another 26 weeks, but because he had worked for five weeks, he lost everything; as the regulation eight weeks were not up, giving him the right to apply again, he lost all claim to unemployment insurance.

Mr. Speaker, when we find laws like this still in existence, we wonder where the government's advisers were and what they had in mind when the bill covering unemployment insurance was "patented". Unemployment Insurance Commission investigators travel the regions of Hamilton, Toronto, Montreal, Hull, etc., in search of beneficiaries who do not want to work. When they come across cases like the one I have just described, I should think they have their work cut out to get him back on their lists.

I have before me another case where the benefits were delayed for 20 weeks before the unemployed's rights were met.

In another case, an individual was entitled to 15 weeks of unemployment insurance benefits on account of illness, but due to an error of the Unemployment Insurance Commission, he got his benefits only five months later.

I shall mention another case involving not the local unemployment office of my area, but that of the Terrebonne area, and more precisely that of Saint-Jérôme; again, a citizen had his unemployment insurance benefits delayed by five months. There are dozens of such cases.

Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, there is an urgent need to clean up the Unemployment Insurance Commission, in order to bring about—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired. Of course, he can resume his remarks with unanimous consent from the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Laprise: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. T. Lefebvre (Pontiac): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Pontiac on a point of order.

Mr. Lefebvre: Mr. Speaker, I do not object to the hon. member resuming his remarks, but I should ask him to get back to the subject matter of the motion before us.

[English]

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, if I may interject for a moment I understood the Chair to indicate that the hon. member's time had expired. I do not know what occurred when you sought unanimous consent of the House, except that I heard the government whip indicate that the member should get back to his motion. I do not understand what is going on. Has his time expired?

Mr. Lefebvre: Mr. Speaker, I said I had no objection as long as he started talking about the motion that he has introduced.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): How about putting the motion?

Mr. Lefebvre: Put the motion.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think there is unanimous consent of the House for the hon. member to continue his remarks.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Agreed, but he should put his motion.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, this is what I have done. This is what I was talking about all along in my speech. It is not a matter of criticizing what is wrong with unemployment insurance, but of finding solutions.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): When are you going to put your motion?

Mr. Laprise: I do not know, Mr. Speaker, whether I am abiding by the rules. However, I thought you had read the motion yourself at the beginning of the debate and I was under the impression that was sufficient to let hon. members know what subject was to be discussed today. If such is not the case, I am going to read the motion again for the benefit of the two hon. members who spoke.

The motion reads as follows:

> That this House deplores the continuous increase in unemployment, as well as the refusal or negligence of the Government to propose effective measures for providing more jobs of a remunerative character for Canadians, and condemns the existing authorities of imposing or tolerating quasi-repressive measures affecting citizens who merely want to see respected their fundamental right to a decent standard of living and their personal dignity and to live in a climate of freedom and security.

Mr. Speaker, I think I have just shown quite clearly that there are measures which are not only quasi-repressive but repressive for many unemployment insurance claimants, whether they be claiming standard unemployment insurance benefits or claiming unemployment benefits for reasons of illness.

I have just submitted several cases of hardship wheree claimants were denied benefits for many weeks. If this is not enough, I can go back to my office and come back with many more. If those hon. members who raised the issue are interested, I think that my colleagues will be able to quote several cases in the course of the day.

Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier, it is not only a matter of criticizing the present situation, there must be solutions proposed. In order to avoid all the problems caused by social legislation taken here and there, we are calling for a guaranteed minimum income system which would affect everybody, regardless of their social situation and their age.

Instead of telling the Canadian consumer to be satisfied with the little he gets, to tighten his belt and to make do with $28 a week, this government should see to it that all Canadians have the necessary purchasing power to meet Canadian production, which would have the effect of stimulating demand, encouraging agricultural production and ensuring at the same time supplementary income for Canadian farmers.

During the last election campaign, Mr. Speaker, we offered the Canadian electorate a guaranteed minimum income plan which would have precisely given satisfaction to everybody and which would not have cost more than all the systems we have now.

When we make propositions, Mr. Speaker, we get the answer: Where are we going to take the money? Those same people never ask themselves: Where are we going to take the money to pay the interest on the public debt to big financiers. This year it stands at $2.5 billion.

When it is a matter of relieving misery, of reassuring those who are afraid of what is in store for them, those who fear unemployment and loss of income, they shout: Where shall we get the money? When it is a matter of meeting the requirements of high finance, the government is all eyes and ears and ready to give everything to satisfy them.

• (1550)

Mr. Speaker, even if the minister has not heard what I have just said, I hope his colleagues will inform him of the motion I have introduced so that he be able to give to the two thirds of Canadians who live in anxiety and misery at least a glimpse of hope by telling them that in a few weeks legislation will solve their problems and help them live well and draw from the abundant riches Canada possesses.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander).

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lotbinière rises on a point of order.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, during the surely interesting speech given by my colleague from Abitibi (Mr. Laprise), whom I want to congratulate, I have had to put up with the uncalled for remarks of my colleagues on the other side who were talking in rather loud voices during the whole speech, and when the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Lefebvre) rose on a point of order to tell you that my colleage was out of order and the member for Pontiac was doing the same thing, he was talking with the others and not listening. Mr. Speaker, I find this uncalled for and knowing your skill and in view of the respect that we owe you, I am sure that you could make them understand on the other side that they should listen to the extremely interesting remarks made in this House, with a minimum of courtesy.

Mr. Lefebvre: Concerning the point of order made by the member for Lotbinière I called his colleague to order because he had asked for more time. I did not object but I asked him to speak on his motion.

Mr. Fortin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lotbinière rises on a point of order.

Mr. Fortin: The member for Pontiac may be the whip for his party, but he is not the Speaker of the House.

[English]

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): I did not object in order to attribute any particular fault to the hon. member, or to take exception to what he had been saying in his interesting speech. But when the government whip interjected I became confused because I was under the impression Mr. Speaker had indicated that the hon. member's time had expired. At the same time, I saw him attempting to pursue his deliberations. I am sorry the deputy leader of the Social Credit party was so sensitive in those circumstances.

The motion as presented contains, it appears to me, three main propositions. First, it deplores the continuous increase in unemployment. This, of course, is what we on this side have been doing for the past four and a half years. It seems to me we have suffered an inexcusable level of unemployment, one which ought not to be tolerated in a country such as Canada. For years we have been protesting against the attitude of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in adopting fiscal and monetary policies which largely brought about the present unemployment situation. I cannot find words adequate to express the suffering which has resulted from this philosophy. I will admit that the government appears at this time to have learned its lesson. On the other hand, it has brought down a budget which many of us on this side feel is inadequate in the circumstances, and that to this extent the government has not learned its lesson.

The second point on which the motion places emphasis is the government's refusal to propose effective measures to provide more jobs of a remunerative character for Canadians. This is another aspect which we on this side have continuously stressed and it is one which must be brought home. Obviously, with the annual growth in the size of the labour force, we must take steps to stay ahead. The government has not yet come to grips with this situation. In the United States, at the last count, unemployment had declined to some 5 per cent. In Canada, on the other hand, the rate is something over 6 per cent, leaving us with some 600,000 people unemployed. Germany is all right. Japan is all right. I cannot understand why this question of unemployment was not given priority, and why more effort was not made to create jobs to take up the slack. We know the labour force has increased in numbers. In consequence, our goal should be to develop national economic growth to ensure unemployment will steadily decline. I shall deal with this aspect later in connection with what spokesmen for this party had to say about the budget.

The motion makes a third point—the problem which has arisen in connection with unemployment insurance. There has been talk about gestapo tactics and police state methods. Mr. Speaker, the vast majority of people in Canada do not want cheaters to take advantage of unemployment insurance. They want them to be ferreted out and removed from the safe haven they occupy at the expense of the taxpayers' pocket. After all, it is the taxpayers, including the man who is working day in and day out, whether for a low income or a high income, who are bearing the cost of this haven, and they are becoming very concerned about it as well as the situation in which the Unemployment Insurance Commission finds itself. We on this side believe there ought to be some method by which the cheats and abusers are ferreted out. Until such time as this is accepted as part of the Commission's function, a great deal of disillusionment is bound to arise among those who are paying the shot. At the same time, care should be taken to avoid ill-considered actions.

I have here a couple of press cuttings, one of them from the Evening Patriot which circulates in the Kitchener-Waterloo area. The headline over a leading article reads: "Let's be really sure the innocent don't suffer". I think we are all concerned about this aspect. That is why I am pleased the minister has indicated that the advisory committee on the UIC is looking into the investigatory procedures of the benefit control officers to determine whether they are approaching this work with a measure of compassionate understanding. The article reads:

> Undoubtedly many persons have cheated on the Unemployment Insurance Act. The average citizen who prefers to do things in an honest manner has surely become annoyed over these thefts and applauds those who have been trying to remedy this situation.

I certainly agree with that. The article goes on:

> However, in the attempt to rectify the affair there is always the danger that some innocent persons who deserve the benefits will suffer.

Here is another article, this one from the Toronto Star of March 6. I think the Star put its finger right on the problem, here. The headline over the editorial section reads: "Cheaters endanger unemployment pay". The article reads:

> The whole system will be in jeopardy unless the public can be assured that deliberate idlers and cheats are going to be cut off. For the great majority of Canadians in the labour force still must work regularly for their living, whether they like it or not, and they cannot be expected to go on supporting freeloaders with their taxes.

Mr. Pelletier (Sherbrooke): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Alexander: Certainly.

[Translation]

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Sherbrooke): The hon. member has just said that the unemployment rate is only 5 per cent in the United States, Mr. Speaker.

Does the hon. member take into account the fact that the United States were exporting a great part of their unemployment to Canada because of the draft dodgers who came to settle here because the United States were at war until recently?

[English]

Mr. Alexander: Well, I do not intend to be distracted in that direction. Notwithstanding the situation there, the United States seems to have realized that high unemployment cannot be tolerated in a society such as theirs. They have used all their expertise and all their wisdom to see that opportunities for work are available, and thus they have been able to reduce the unemployment level to 5 per cent. All I want to say is that we in Canada should show the same foresight and understanding so as to create a climate in the economy generally which will ensure that those who want to work will have the opportunity. Certain members opposite have cast doubt upon the validity of the work ethic. This is not a philosophy which this young country needs. The work ethic built this country. The work ethic is building it now. The appreciation of the work ethic will continue to build this country and lead us to our ultimate destiny, one of the leading industrial nations of the world. With regard to unemployment insurance, the article in the Star then reads:

• (1600)

> To save the system, then, the government must sternly detect and disqualify people who abuse unemployment insurance—even if this crackdown displeases the Liberals' temporary allies, the New Democrats.

I do not mention that to be partisan. I just want to let members know that the vast majority of Canadians are sick and tired of having the unemployment insurance fund abused. It is our function to try to devise with compassion a scheme whereby the innocent will not suffer. If members opposite want to get involved in this debate, all they have to do is go to their whip, put their names on the list and, if they have been good boys, they will have that opportunity.

I wish to return to my first point about unemployment. Bill C-124, the bill that removed the ceiling on the Unemployment Insurance Fund, was introduced and, because of the fact we were not able to get any forecasts with respect to what would be considered an unacceptable level of unemployment in the future, I respectfully suggest that we are in trouble again, no matter what the minister says about his budget.

As we pointed out, the budget is not expansionary enough. When Bill C-124 repealed the $800 million limit on the contribution that could be made to the fund, the Canadian people were left in the dark. Even if we talk about unemployment insurance, we have to be concerned because this government still does not realize that the way to cut the cost of unemployment is to increase the number of employed Canadians. That is the answer to this problem, not to create a bureaucratic nightmare. We must admit that a whole employment policy is desperately required and to this end all our attention should be directed. The cold, hard figures show that this government has plagued Canada with high unemployment for the past four and one half years. There were 688,000 Canadians out of work in January, the largest number recorded for the month in a decade. We cannot pooh-pooh that.

An hon. Member: You said that.

Mr. Alexander: I said it and I will continue repeating it. The hon. member must learn that we cannot accept 688,000 Canadians out of work. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) said that we cannot continually talk about numbers and statistics. He was right.

An hon. Member: Can I ask a question?

Mr. Alexander: No, you cannot. After all, we only have 20 minutes. You can make your speech and then we will understand what you are trying to say.

We must not forget the cost of unemployment. We are talking about billions of dollars. What figure can be put on the frustration of those who generally work and support their families but cannot, so have had their family life soured by unemployment? Real people are behind these figures, heads of families, some 180,000 men, women who must supplement their husband's incomes and our young people. Those between the ages of 15 and 25 make up a huge percentage of the unemployed. What are we doing for them? Are we giving them any hope for the future? The hon. member laughs. This is a very ticklish situation. I have watched the climate that has been created amongst our youth. They are not too happy with what is happening. The hon. member ought to know that. They are looking for opportunities and there are no opportunities. They want to work, but there is no work. We can sit back and play hide-and-seek with them. We can take a complacent attitude. We can appear as though we do not have any concern. This is what they think. This is all I am saying.

We must attempt to talk about economic growth and industrial strategy. You can use all those phrases. Once you acquire full employment, whether we are down to 4.5 per cent unemployment or not—whatever we may call that—we are then able to acquire the tax dollars which will allow us to give our senior citizens more money, reduce the eligible age for old age security to 60 and allow us the wherewithal for all the social programs that are required in this very frustrating life today. This is what we are talking about. Conditions should be created so that those who want to work can work. Lord knows, everybody wants to work. If the opportunity is not there, we are the losers. The Canadian taxpayer is the loser because he is paying twice. He is not only paying his income taxes but he is paying for an unemployment insurance scheme of which the vast majority of Canadians will never take advantage. That is why he is concerned.

Members opposite know what our party has indicated. If members opposite want me to read the list, I will do so. If we had been in office, we would have brought before parliament a budget which would have provided substantial stimulation to the economy and would have provided for a 90 day freeze on prices and incomes. Fresh food would be exempt from the freeze. Our program for cutting unemployment, in addition to the tax cuts and pension increases proposed by the Minister of Finance, would consist of eliminating the sales tax on building materials. How long have we been calling for that? I bet the Liberals will eventually steal that one, too. Eliminating the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials would enhance construction, give some impetus to construction, provide houses and employment. We would have removed the sales tax on all clothing rather than merely for children up to 14 years of age which will create a bureaucratic nightmare determining who is up to what age and what size.

We would have introduced an incentive program to encourage investment in small Canadian business. We have said on several occasions that $2,500 invested by a Canadian should give him a tax credit. It is in this area of manufacturers that we have to look for leadership with respect to employment. These are the people who need that incentive. As I understand it, the vast majority of employment comes from the little fellow who employs three, four or five people. We are the ones who say "buy Canadian" and encourage nationalistic instincts. Let us do something to encourage Canadians to invest. This is a point we would have introduced.

The 90 day freeze on prices and incomes would be used to consult with the provinces, businessmen, union leaders and consumer groups about the range of guidelines we would use after the freeze. The freeze would be part of a long-term plan to both cut unemployment and contain inflation. We in this party believe the Canadian people would accept the freeze because it would be part of a double- pronged assault on unemployment and inflation. The public has lost faith in a succession of Liberal finance ministers. They have no faith in their attempts to solve this problem. We came out with a bold and imaginative step, freezing wages and price controls. The government has discussed this. I hear they had a whale of a debate in their caucus. They did not even think we would submit that idea.

I notice there has been general acceptance of this two-pronged attack, a completely expansionary budget with a freeze in order that we could meet with labour and management to determine where we are going. Hon. members opposite do not think that we would do this, but they realize now it is not a bad idea. Yesterday we were told that inflation has gone up 5.8 per cent and it is now the highest it has been for 22 years. When we ask the government what their contingency plans are, the reply is that they have something around the corner. It takes courage and guts to do what we suggest, but with an expansionary budget one must be concerned about inflation. This is why we propose a two-pronged attack.

I am a little concerned about what is happening with the UIC. For some reason or other the government brought in Bill C-125 which, let us say, places a more than usual onus on the employee. The House reconvened on January 4, yet the government has not introduced a modified bill that would define such things as "being fired for misconduct", "availability for employment", "just cause" and "without good cause". These are burning questions that must be answered.

This bill was supposed to save the Canadian taxpayers $100 million. We are now into the middle of March and no bill has been introduced that would—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Paddy Neale (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, it saddens me somewhat to follow the previous speaker because, although he sounds so compassionate and sincere in his delivery, he reminds me of those right wingers in 1937, 1938 and 1939 when I was unemployed, a time when the premier of the province of British Columbia told us to root, hog or die. At that time the mayor of the city of Vancouver read the riot act and set the police on us because we were "lazy, no good bums". While the hon. member does not use those words, he is using a similar line of argument.

What bothers me about what the previous speaker said is that he professes to be speaking on behalf of the workers of Canada who object to having their money used to pay for those lazy, no good bums who are drawing unemployment insurance. Personally, I would rather see 2 per cent of the people who are unemployed cheating the Unemployment Insurance Act than adopt some of the recommendations made by members to my right to cut people off unemployment insurance. Less than 2 per cent of the workers who are drawing unemployment insurance cheat. I suggest to the hon. member that he take a look at other professions in the country and sees who cheats on income tax and just about everything else, such as lawyers, doctors and some of the most respected people in this country. The figure is higher than 2 per cent once you start to check into it.

The type of expression that has emanated from the party to my right must be looked at very seriously. The hon. member talks about a freeze, and I now notice a change in wording. No longer is it a wage and prices freeze; it is a prices and incomes freeze, if you please. But regardless of the expression hon. members use, it is still a freeze, and there is no possible way that a freeze can be fair to the working people. This has been proven in England and in the United States where they implemented a wage freeze. The only thing that works is the freeze itself, since the employers control the wages. But you cannot control prices. In the United States inflation is skyrocketing, even with wage and price controls.

Instead of sitting down with labour leaders and having discussions, let us sit down with the money lenders of this country, or the owners of apartment complexes and houses who are ripping-off the working people by charging high rents. Let us talk about true incomes, not the incomes of working people. Their incomes are already controlled. Members of unions—one-third of the workers of Canada—already have their wages controlled. They have to negotiate, under laws that are written by provincial and federal governments, for periods of three months, four months, six months and up to a year before they get a wage increase. The wages of the other two-thirds of the workers not members of unions are really controlled. They are subject to the whims of their employers, who pay them what they want to pay. So, I suggest to hon. members that when they start talking about a freeze, they should put a freeze on the money made by the rip-off artists in this country, not on the wages of the working people.

I have read the motion a number of times, but the only conclusion I can come to is that it is a motherhood motion. I do not see how anyone in their right mind could oppose it. Although the motion before us does not explicitly say so, I presume the latter part of it which deals with repressive measures, and so on, is some implied criticism of the present unemployment insurance administration, the act, and the tactics of the UIC benefit control officers. This is a matter to which I should like to refer.

I have represented the working people of Canada for 22 years and I know some of their problems. I have sat on boards of referees in the city of Vancouver for 12 years and I am aware of some of the problems created by the present act which confront the workers. It is very difficult to get on unemployment insurance rolls, and at times it is damned difficult to stay on them as a result of the attitude of those who administer the Unemployment Insurance Act. I speak for the working people, Mr. Speaker, and I truly believe that.

These people are the working men and women of Canada. In the main they comprise 85 per cent of the purchasing power of this country and account for nearly the same percentage of votes. They consider the present act to be a humane one and, quite frankly, one of the best unemployment insurance acts in the world. But they feel it needs some amendment, as do the regulations and some of the interpretations that have been placed on the act and the regulations by insurance officers, especially, I repeat, benefit control officers. It is my considered opinion that the basic criteria originally established for the Canadian unemployment insurance system in 1943 to provide a decent standard of living for the legitimately unemployed of this nation are being continuously eroded and undermined. Claimants today are finding the new Unemployment Insurance Act and regulations much more restrictive in their attempt to qualify for benefits and the retention of eligibility.

In light of this noticeable trend, I should like to make a few suggestions and recommendations. I want to deal first with benefit control officers. Many workers have already expressed their dissatisfaction with the interrogation that is conducted by officers under the provisions of section 107 of the act, and have made specific recommendations based on day to day experience as agents, officers, and members of boards of referees. They are familiar with the enunciated administrative policy of the Unemployment Insurance Commission in this matter, but I reiterate that the following amendments to this section would vastly improve the multitude of situations arising from the present interviewing process conducted by benefit control officers.

First one, by statute, a claimant should have the right at all times to a representative of his or her choice to be in attendance when interviews by benefit control officers are being conducted. Second, a claimant should be notified that he is not required to sign prepared statements, that such signatures to statements are purely voluntary, and should be signed only after complete agreement has been reached between the claimant and the interviewing officer as to the statements contained therein. Third, the claimant should be permitted to return signed statements, rather than having to sign them in the presence of the interviewing officer. Fourth, the claimant should be entitled to amend or reword the prepared statements to ensure that any signed statement clearly and specifically reflects his or her circumstances.

I should like to touch now on appeals to boards of referees and umpires. I have noted that the present Unemployment Insurance Commission forms notify the claimant of the right to appeal within 30 days of being disqualified or disentitled. I believe that such notice should be either in larger type or in a different colour to ensure the claimant's notice of the same. It is my opinion that many additional claimants would more readily utilize the board of referees if a statement on the notice of rejection by the Unemployment Insurance Commission to the claimant briefly explained the right of the claimant, the structure and jurisdiction of the board and, further, the general procedure the claimant is required to follow if he desires to initiate an appeal action to the umpire, if this becomes necessary. The insurance officers responsible for adjudication of claimants' cases should be thoroughly conversant with the appeal procedure. In my opinion, the claimant should be given this kind of additional information at this stage of processing to ensure that fairness and justice shall prevail for all.

In respect of notices of rejection, disqualification and disentitlement, I have noted that in many cases the Unemployment Insurance Commission did not include the specific and applicable section of the act or the regulations, and where this information was included to the claimant it did not clearly specify the specific reason or explanation of the provision in layman's language. I recommend that in cases of this nature, the unemployment insurance officers should be instructed to be more specific in the phraseology and terminology used to ensure that the specific reason in the individual claimant's case is not only clarified but readily understandable to the average claimant.

I should like to refer briefly to problems arising in respect of sections covering vacation and holiday payments. A multitude of problems have emanated directly from the present provisions contained under the regulatory parts of Sections 172 and 173. Let me enunciate them as follows: The adverse effects on claimants who are in receipt of earned vacation pay several months prior to the actual date mutually agreed upon as the vacation period by the claimant or his representative, through his union agreement; the detrimental effect to the claimant when such moneys are received within the period stipulated under Section 173(15), that is the six weeks' provision; in logging and construction industries, where employees work for numerous employers during the year and 6 per cent of gross earnings are automatically included by contractual provision, the sections have an unfair effect; the subsidizing effect to the Unemployment Insurance Commission fund of claimants who accept earned vacation pay at the time of layoff or separation and who, by mutual agreement, have already fixed a time period some six weeks to two months in the future when they shall be returning to the same employer.

In my opinion, all moneys earned during a period preceding the date of separation from employment rightfully belong to the employee, regardless of when they are received. Such moneys should in no way be manipulated by any legislation which would result in the claimant being compelled to lose or be forced to reduce his or her purchasing power and right to earned vacation. This, in effect, results in direct subsidization by the claimant of the unemployment insurance fund and in many cases disqualifies and disentitles claimants from maximum coverage. I would therefore recommend that all moneys obtained in the form of vacation or holiday pay, etc., should in no way be used to prevent claimants from entitlement to unemployment insurance benefits in contrast to a claimant receiving no such remuneration.

Let me now refer to separation certificates. Many claimants undergo a great deal of personal frustration and delay in claim processing because of the lack of the employer's fulfillment of obligatory requirements as contained in Section 111 of the act, which reads:

> Upon separation of an insured person from employment, the contributions payable for the current pay period and all other contributions then unpaid shall be paid by the employer immediately.

The terminology is clear and specific. Direction by the unemployment insurance office and others to claimants that it is the claimant's responsibility to provide an up-to-date separation certificate on separation, and to personally follow up any delay by his employer, is improper in my opinion. Employers should fulfil their obligations to the claimant, and where they do not I would urge that the Unemployment Insurance Commission or one of its officers take immediate remedial action on behalf of the affected claimant to prevent undue delays, time, effort and costs to all parties concerned.

I should like now to refer to the employer appeal section which has recently been put into the Unemployment Insurance Act. The employer's right to appeal has had disastrous results. A fine example is the action taken by employers in the forest products industry in British Columbia in the spring and summer of last year. In the fallers' dispute, one claimant appeal at the board of referees' level resulted in the rejection of approximately 4,000 claims already accepted and processed by the Unemployment Insurance Commission, Pacific region. This could have resulted in a possible 16,000 separate appeals before the board. Complications in that industry continued when approximately 5,000 additional claimants' rights to unemployment insurance were eventually challenged by the Unemployment Insurance Commission, Pacific region, and the specific large employers. This could have initiated an additional 25,000 separate appeals by those members. Fortunately for all concerned, sanity prevailed and an acceptable agreement for entitlements was eventually reached.

This and similar experiences have convinced me that this section has been and will continue to be abused by the employer, particularly during periods leading to major negotiation. I can readily understand the concern of some employers relative to the merit rating system. In fact, in the aforementioned cases, the unions' representatives assisted the employers, satisfactorily resolving this major problem. I would recommend that the provisions in this matter be similar in principle to those contained in previous legislation, and that the present act be amended to provide for the deletion of the words "or an employer" in the first line of Section 94(1).

Referring now to the general resumption of work provision as interpreted under this present act, the criteria of 85 per cent is antiquated and, in most cases, serves no useful purpose. Discontinuation of production immediately after a labour dispute has been shown to be directly attributable to other causes, such as mutually agreed upon vacation periods, maintenance and overhaul requirements, climatic conditions, employees on sickness and compensation and other legitimate leaves of absence. For this reason, serious consideration must be given to a logical and sensible basis of determining what constitutes general resumption of work. This present 85 per cent provision should be abolished and criteria substituted which would be based on individual plant or industry circumstances obtaining immediately after a labour dispute.

With regard to Regulation 148(1) covering interruption of earnings and waiting periods, it is my belief that the waiting period presently required constitutes an unwarranted penalty against the claimant who, through no fault of his own, has become unemployed. The seven consecutive day provision discourages those claimants who could work a day or two a week after termination, but are hesitant to do so because such action would nullify establishment of the waiting period. I would recommend that the waiting period as such be revised to provide for any seven days in a consecutive 52-week period.

There is another section which really disturbs me having to do with the 25-day period. It is my understanding that in certain exempted industries, for example lumbering, landscaping, agriculture, etc., there is provision that employers and employees do not have to make UIC or CPP contributions if the employee works less that a 25-day period for any such employer. This situation has resulted in abuse by employers, resulting in no credits applicable or available from the aforementioned funds when required. I believe this section to be discriminatory in its intent and application and therefore request that credits be recognized for those employees in exempted industries for each and every day of employment.

I should like to deal now, if I may, with sick benefits and maternity coverage. Major attachment claimants who have established eligibility in the initial benefit period and who have received any payments of one dollar or more in the form of benefits are disqualified from payment of unemployment insurance benefits if they become ill or incapacitated in a subsequent extended benefit period. This new legislation is a contradiction of the principle applicable in Canada from the inception of the unemployment insurance scheme and in force up to June 27, 1972, whereby eligible claimants on established claim received unemployment insurance payments for subsequent illnesses, injuries or incapacities as normally entitled claimants. I would urge, Mr. Speaker, that the restrictive provisions presently contained be deleted and the previous principle and criteria be reintroduced for coverage purposes under similar circumstances.

I want to deal briefly with disentitlement by age or pension. Many employees are ready, available and capable of performing satisfactorily in various types of employment where they are compelled to retire due to employer policy or other reasons. Many such employees have, in most cases, contributed to the UIC for decades without any previous need for claim. The provisions of present section Section 31(1) (a) (b) and the special severance benefit provision I believe are restrictive and discriminatory. I believe an injustice is done to those claimants who are required under the present provisions of the act and regulations to be compelled by law to reimburse the Unemployment Insurance Commission more monies than they have actually been in direct receipt of, in cases where overpayments become applicable.

The requirement for the Unemployment Insurance Commission to deduct income tax on behalf of the taxation department for the claimant causes additional financial burden and hardship when claimants need to find additional moneys during unemployed periods. They have to reimburse the amount received by cheque from the Unemployment Insurance Commission and a further additional amount equal to the total income tax deductions forwarded by the Unemployment Insurance Commission on behalf of the claimant. In my opinion the claimant under those circumstances should be compelled to pay only the actual amount received on Unemployment Insurance Commission cheque forms.

I want to deal now with advisory committees, section 108. The establishment and retention of a regional advisory committee for unemployment insurance purposes is a subject which I believe warrants attention at this time. In my opinion, there has been a lack of communication by employers and employee representatives in an area or regional basis for the last ten years or so. An effective vehicle is required to keep the National Advisory Committee informed on an up-to-date basis as to problems and recommendations for solution and improvement.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted him has expired.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, as a member of the government party I welcome this particular motion because I think this is a subject, of which the government must be aware, although I do not for a moment accept the suggestion that it needs reminding of it. I believe that, from time to time, the opposition parties are not aware of many of the things the government is doing to assist the unemployed to obtain employment or to be taken care of when they are among the ranks of the unemployed. We have appreciated this obligation. As I have said, I believe it is the responsibility of the opposition parties to impress on the government that it has a responsibility in this area. However, by the same token I believe opposition parties have an obligation to tell us what they would do were they, heaven forbid, the government. When I listened to the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise) present his views I thought we were here to talk about the Unemployment Insurance Commission because he did not seem to get down to the crux of his motion.

I think an opposition day motion should properly be wide in scope, but I would have thought the hon. member would have dealt more with the unemployment issue and less with the Unemployment Insurance Commission. I could read a series of letters from constituents of mine, as the hon. member did, who from time to time have been displeased, upset or angry with the administration of this particular plan. As a former member of the committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration, I might say that during the so-called recess in the month of September when other members were back in their constituencies doing a little politicking some of us came back to attend the Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration to put together this particular bill and give it clause by clause study. I believe this was a very good committee which operated in a co-operative manner. From time to time a little partisanship crept in, which is only natural, but I believe by and large the members of the committee were convinced this was, in fact, a good bill.

It disturbs me somewhat now to hear members of the official opposition knocking this particular measure, decrying the fact that they did not have more time or wishing that they had more information. But this is after the fact. This was not the position they took when the bill was being considered by the committee. I think when this bill came out of the committee we were all satisfied that we, in fact, had a good bill. When concern was expressed about the amount of money being put into the unemployment insurance fund by all the new people who had been brought into the plan and the increased benefits, there seemed to be a backing off from this bill by the official opposition. To their credit, the members of the New Democratic Party supported the bill which they had supported in the committee and would not have anything to do with discrediting that splendid piece of legislation.

Today, I heard the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Neale) say that the workers of Canada look upon this as the best unemployment insurance legislation in the world. It may be that he hashed an opportunity to talk to Harold Winch, the former member for Vancouver East who was a hard-working member of that committee and one who always looked after his responsibilities, particularly in respect of the working man. It seems to me that the new member for Vancouver East, although he may not be quite as eloquent as Mr. Winch because he has not had the same years of experience, certainly is putting forward the views of the working man. The working man in Canada today says that this is the best unemployment insurance scheme in the world. That is not to say that it is perfect. However, the government has recognized that it has a responsibility to the unemployed people to do what they can for them when they are in this particular predicament.

I listened to the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) when he indicated that the government did not seem to care about unemployment. It always seems that the members of the opposition ignore the fact we have the fastest growing labour force in the world. Also they seem to forget conveniently the number of jobs which have been created while this party has been in power. It is not a record of which we need be ashamed. I shall not quote all the statistics. Members of the opposition are very good at playing with figures in this field. I would just like to say that when they look at a glass of water they always seem to see it as 6 per cent empty rather than 94 per cent full. If you consider full employment to be at the level of 3 per cent unemployment, then 97 per cent of the people of Canada who want to work would be working.

So, the record is not as good as it should be, but it certainly is not as bad as members of the opposition would have us believe. That is why I support programs such as the LIP program which some people seem to knock as being against the work ethic. People, in effect, are doing their own thing. They are working at things they wish to work on or are working on something that is to the benefit of their community. This reminds me of the members of the Chippewa Indian reservation in my riding. They sought and obtained a LIP grant to do work on their own reservation. This gave them an opportunity to do things for their own benefit. It gave them a measure of dignity and enabled them to get away from employment which they did not particularly like in some areas. They were able in this way to work at home with their own people on the reservation. This gave dignity to the hard working Chippewa people on the reservation in my area of Sarnia. There is an obligation to protect the unemployed. That is why I think members of all parties today have spoken on behalf of the unemployment insurance plan.

Certainly there are improvements to be made and I think the hon. member for Vancouver East suggested some with which I could agree. I can think of other areas that should be looked at, quite frankly, in more depth. In the heat of the election battle a suggestion was being made by the Conservatives that the qualifying period should be increased from eight weeks to twelve weeks because the plan was being terribly abused. Before climbing on that bandwagon I thought I should check the facts. This was the irresponsible position taken by members of the Official Opposition until they came back here and found that there was little abuse in this area and that if we increased the qualifying period from eight to 12 weeks it would work to the detriment of the people in the Maritime region. I wonder whether the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) made that particular speech about increasing the qualifying period when he was speaking in his home base.

The other people to whom we have a responsibility are the students who are unemployed. Admittedly, they are unemployed only during a short period of time, but they do need money in order to finance their education. So, the government participates in student loan plans; it has put forward Opportunities for Youth programs, and the Department of National Defence offers a whole series of opportunities for young people to work. These programs do not put all young people to work, but they certainly create the right atmosphere and provide many jobs. It should be noted also that 50 per cent of the cost of post secondary education is taken care of by the federal government.

Then, there is the excellent on-the-job training plan. I was grieved to hear that all of the money in that particular program had not been utilized. I would like to suggest one amendment to the minister. I understand that students coming from school cannot qualify for this program unless they have been out of school at least a year. It seems to me that this is self-defeating. If a student can get on-the-job training, as many of them can, immediately upon leaving school, we should make this possible for him by spending some of the money available to make this a better plan.

Contrary to what the hon. member for Hamilton West said, nobody is playing with the work ethic. The situation is that this is a social question. A man works a good portion of his life to train for a particular job and then he is laid off from it. Should we then say to him: "you have to go back to being a labourer or to driving a truck" when he is training in a particular field? It is difficult for him to take that action. If there were no unemployment scheme or plan available to him, that is what he would do, he would take whatever job is available, but in this day and age, given the splendid buoyancy of our economy, I wonder if that is what we want to do to the working people who have achieved a certain measure of excellence in a particular field. Should they not have an opportunity to get back to their job and not have to take whatever is handed out at that time?

There is another complaint that comes from time to time, and that is that people in industries, such as the tobacco industry, cannot get people to work for them because of the temporary aspect of the job and the difficulty of the work. Also, this has an impact on the benefits people engaged in this type of employment received under the unemployment insurance scheme. It seems to me that we should take a look at this area because if an individual takes a job when he is drawing unemployment insurance, he takes it knowing at the outset that it will be temporary. Perhaps when he finishes that temporary job, the unemployment insurance benefits should be continued and he should be paid at the same rate he was paid before he took the job. Perhaps there is an amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act that could be made so that people will be encouraged to take temporary jobs, and so that such employment will not work to their detriment so far as benefits under unemployment insurance are concerned.

Almost daily now you can pick up newspapers and find that municipalities are indicating that their welfare costs have gone down. This is precisely what was predicted by the former minister of labour when he was in this portfolio and afterwards; in effect, through the unemployment insurance scheme, we are giving people dignity. It is an insurance plan for which they paid a premium and they have a right to collect insurance benefits. We are, thereby taking them off welfare rolls. Locally, the municipality of Ottawa-Carleton has indicated that it did not use up its full budget on welfare last year and in fact is reducing it this year even more. I suspect this is a direct result of the splendid unemployment insurance scheme which is giving dignity to people and taking them off the welfare rolls.

Industry and, probably more correctly, unions recognized long before government that when people are, in permanent employment—and I am thinking primarily of the auto industry—and it becomes necessary to change over to new models which entails some tooling up or some machinery to be put in place, that TAB and supplementary insurance benefits should be provided. As a result, individuals will come back to work when the industry is prepared to put them back into full time labour. Thus, they are not laid off by that industry and they are taken care of during the change over period.

One thing which is of concern to me in the unemployment insurance scheme is the cheaters who abuse the plan. I think that we are unanimous throughout the House in our view of them. We can get all party agreement on that, I think. Perhaps we cannot get all party agreement on how we should deal with this problem, but I think one of the messages that we have to put across to the Canadian public, and particularly to those who are paying into the unemployment insurance fund, is that they are the ones who are being cheated by those who abuse the plan. The people they should blame are the cheaters who abuse the plan, not the government which brought in the plan in the first place. Of course, we want to deal with people in a compassionate way, and we do not want to offend those who have paid into the plan and who are legitimately entitled to the unemployment insurance benefits. If some of these people suffer, it is unfortunate, but the blame should be placed more appropriately on the cheaters who abuse the plan and not on the government or on the officials who have the responsibility of administering the plan.

With regard to the unemployed, we have introduced legislation which makes provision, where significant layoffs take place as a result of technological change, for the collective bargaining agreement to be opened. There are all kinds of safeguards built in so that industry does not have to worry that technological change will have the effect of laying off a significant number of people. I do not think industry is bargaining in good faith with employees' representatives when it knows it will be bringing in technological change which will have the effect of laying off a significant number of people, yet it says, "yes, we will increase your wages by a certain percentage" knowing full well that not only will 400 or 500 people not collect that increase, they will not be collecting any salary or wages at all. I do not think that this is bargaining in good faith. If we have avoided that situation, then I think we have done a good job.

The hon. member for Hamilton West indicated that he deplored the unemployment situation, as his party has been doing for four and a half years. I would say amen to that; we all do. But what we have been waiting for in vain is for some measures that would be advocated by the official opposition to attack our number one problem. What we hear from the opposition is that the budget is not expansionary enough. The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) in on the record as indicating that the deficit should be in the neighbourhood of $4 billion. This moved the London Free Press to comment that probably he was put into external affairs to get him as far away as possible from the finance portfolio.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Cullen: I am quoting what the London Free Press says; I am not saying I agree or disagree with it. But I think that to make a recommendation of that nature is irresponsible, particularly when the hon. member is held in such high regard by his party that they have seen fit, and properly so, to put him on the front bench. But when he speaks, he speaks on behalf of the whole party, not just as the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe.

We have heard the hon. member for Hamilton West say: "we have the guts and the courage to say we would impose 90 day temporary wage and price controls". That is what they are saying this week. When I watched the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) on television I heard him say that the time was not ripe, that we were not in a position where we needed to do that. When they saw the possibility of forming the government they backed off a little. They said: "maybe we had better not advocate that because if we form the government our bluff will be called and we will have to put on these wage and price controls". Now, they feel power slipping from their grasp, the thought of forming the government is more remote, so they are becoming brave again and are proposing an arrogant way of dealing with the Canadian economy.

• (1650)

Mr. Mazankowski: Are you feeling a little safer now, Bud?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member across the way asks if I feel a little safer. The answer is no. Why should I? We recognize that we are the party that should govern the country because we govern it in a responsible fashion. One week members opposite are talking about wage and price controls, and the next week they are silent on controls. Another week they talk about temporary controls without covering food prices or touching unmanufactured products because controls then would affect primary producers, and they know that controls could not work in that area.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I listen with interest to the catcalls from across the floor. I felt I had an obligation to give the message of the government on the measures it has taken. We do not need an election campaign in order to stand up and defend the unemployment insurance scheme, which today has been described as one of the best in the world. It should be recalled that the House passed that bill in order to provide the workers with the full benefits to which they were entitled. Our Canadian workers deserved those benefits.

An hon. Member: What about the Canadian taxpayer?

Mr. Cullen: I am asked, "What about the Canadian taxpayer"? I suppose we could have waited for a year to fill in all the loopholes and make sure that the act would be well administered, but that would not have been fair to the Canadian worker. Then then minister of labour saw fit to give the Canadian worker the money to which he was entitled, and to let the chips fall where they might. Perhaps we brought that bill in sooner than we should have, but we brought it in so that Canadian workers could have the benefit of it. An hon. member opposite asks about the Canadian taxpayer. Perhaps the Canadian taxpayer is paying $1 million more than he should, but I think the hon. member should rise, when he speaks because, although he makes a lot of noise while remaining seated, he does not make much sense.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before I recognize the hon. member for Champlain, perhaps I should inform the House of the questions to be raised tonight.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale)—Post Office—Possible restoration of six day a week delivery; the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett)—Fisheries—Request for federal action to protect salmon spawning streams; the hon. member for Grey-Simcoe (Mr. Mitges)—External Affairs—Request for withdrawal of invitation to President Amin of Uganda to visit Canada.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—GOVERNMENT FAILURE RESPECTING NEGLIGENCE OF UNEMPLOYMENT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Laprise:

That this House deplores the continuous increase in unemployment, as well as the refusal or negligence of the Government to propose effective measures for providing more jobs of a remunerative character for Canadians, and condemns the existing authorities for imposing or tolerating quasi-repressive measures affecting citizens who merely want to see respected their fundamental right to a decent standard of living and their personal dignity and to live in a climate of freedom and security.

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise) introduced this motion, some other hon. members felt he was getting away from the subject of this motion.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to emphasize that, not only did the hon. member for Abitibi not stray from the subject of his motion, but, on the contrary, he dealt with an essential aspect of that motion. In fact, not only is it important to blame the government for not taking adequate measures to stop increasing unemployment but we must also find out in what way this goal could be achieved.

In order to find the most appropriate means to this end, we must have a thorough knowledge of the real causes of this major problem, unemployment. All governments have had to face this problem for years and we will recall the time when the Progressive Conservative party was in office—this is not so long ago—when unemployment reached an unprecedented rate. It is therefore obvious that this is a permanent problem, and that despite all efforts that are made, it will never be solved. One does not need to be extremely clever to realize that if we fail to find any solution, it is only because we do not study thoroughly enough the major causes of unemployment.

This is why my hon. colleague from Abitibi has insisted on these major causes. In a society such as ours, where progress has been so far reaching, we must admit that all inventions which facilitate production increase unemployment. This matter has been raised for many years, and the Social Credit party has been most concerned to take the lead in this field, in order to forecast what is happening today.

As a matter of fact, whether we want it or not, we will one day be compelled to apply the basic principles that were put forward by Major C. H. Douglas, in the third issue of "Warning Democracy", and I quote:

> Now, if you will consider the fact that the general output of goods of all descriptions per unit of mechanical labour employed, and that this energy has increased in the last 100 years by at least 3,000 to 4,000 per cent, you will see that one of three things must happen. Either everyone must consume thirty or forty times as much as he did before, and increase the amount as the amount of energy put into production increases, or (2) we must get rid, by exportation or otherwise, of an increasing amount of production, or (3) we must recognise that the so-called unemployment problem is something which arises out of the advancement of science applied to industry, and we must modify profoundly our system of distribution.

This is a denunciation of the main reason for unemployment. Once we have recognized the fact that income is one thing and salary another, since the development of society so requires, and when we have finally recognized that this distinction should be translated into adequate laws which would admit for instance that income does not exclusively mean salary, we shall have recognized at the same time that concessions should be made in a developed country such as ours where raw materials are plentyful and whose population is willing to produce.

In such a country each citizen who contributes to the material, spiritual and moral progress of our community should benefit from our wealth and enormous production.

• (1700)

To this end, the only means to obtain social justice is to guarantee to each Canadian a minimum income independently from his salary. At the same time we shall have made a reform which will encourage each individual to further improve his services to society and mainly his direct participation to production.

This is a basic principle and until it is understood no adequate solution will ever be found to unemployment. Under the current system in which we have to flounder to find remedies to the immediate consequences of unemployment, it is of course a problem involving all categories of our societies and which might cause still more troubles.

I should like to quote two paragraphs from an article published in the December 1972 edition of the publication Le Québec industriel, and entitled The Scandal of Fake Unemployment—The Underlying Causes". I think that article gives a fairly clear idea of the problem being dealt with today, and I quote:

> The campaign launched last November by LE QUÉBEC INDUSTRIEL against fake unemployment practices has caused many a reaction—extremely favourable for the most part—from all political and economic circles.
> It seems that the problem is a matter of concern to all classes of society, from the worker who has to pay with his deductions for the inadequacies of the system, to the businessmen who have to do without the required manpower and to the politicians who view with alarm the disastrous results of this government's generous, confusing and uncontrolled policy.

Mr. Speaker, such are in brief the conditions that evidently do prevail now and not merely because the Créditistes say so. Why? Because, as I have just said, this has not been provided for, and although it does favour a certain number of people who are consistenly trying to cheat the government in one way or another, I am convinced that there are only a few of them. Besides, as stated elsewhere in the article quoted agove, the number of people who manage to chisel certainly do not exceed 3 to 5 per cent.

Unfortunately a great number of honest workers are being frustrated because of the implementation of a legislation that had been heralded as being a lot more liberal than the former one—I say "liberal" not in the political sense of the word but in the true sense of the word itself—a legislation that would make unemployment insurance benefits more accessible to unemployed people.

Everybody seemed to be pleased, but looking at the effects of that legislation, we are compelled to say that it is almost a disaster, because our offices are swamped with unemployment insurance problems. Dozens of people come daily to ask us to intervene and help them obtain their benefits. Most of them, as I say, are honest workers who for one reason or another, are unemployed at a certain time. Since the legislation seems to be helpful to the workers under the circumstances, why are officials trying by all possible means to discourage if not to get rid of those benefit claimants? This is due to several reasons, especially because no distinction can be made between the swindler, the deceiver and the one who is caught in an unpleasant situation.

None the less, such a distinction can readily be made, Mr. Speaker. For instance, the man who has never collected unemployment insurance benefits is quite honest of course when he applies for benefits. Of course, being used to working every week, to getting his salary each weekend, when he has to wait for one, two or three months, and sometimes much longer, he suffers flagrant injustice. The trouble is, among other things, out and out centralization carried out inside the Unemployment Insurance Commission, and for the province of Quebec as a whole the operations are being performed in Montreal, which results not only in delays and errors, but also in injustice.

Therefore, it is most important that the government should consider this change; in other words, decentralization of the Unemployment Insurance Commission should be considered with a view to having the local offices of the Commission receive, study, and process the claims.

Mr. Speaker, the officials of the Trois-Rivières office being closer to the workers in that area, they no doubt are in a better position to study with more speed the problems involved in an unemployment insurance claim, and consequently, to have it processed in a sounder, more logical and more equitable fashion.

This matter is becoming sensitive on account of the unlimited problems involved. If a worker has to wait for weeks and months, he nevertheless has to keep alive. And for this, he must accept either to get into debt or to go begging for social welfare allowances.

• (1710)

As we know, Mr. Speaker, it is not pleasant to go and beg for benefits from the welfare people. Anyhow, the request must still be considered for one month, and then difficulties are made concerning the payment to be granted. In other words, we are considerably complicating the life of the worker and particularly when he is the head of a family.

Mr. Speaker, if unemployment is accepted, since nobody yet seems prepared to make a thorough review of this foolish system in which we are struggling, the law should be administered as it stands, and nothing should be done to needlessly frustrate workers with all sorts of more or less coercive procedures. This is what we are condemning in our motion, Mr. Speaker. We are condemning the authorities who impose or tolerate some almost repressive measures.

When an individual suddenly falls ill while working and must, lacking any other resources, fall back on unemployment insurance, it is a denial of his rights to require repeated submission of medical reports describing his illness and stipulating a date for his recovery.

Mr. Speaker, it seems quite normal to intensify control of possible fraud. Fraud might well exist in some cases. In the vast majority of cases, when a worker has to stop work and therefore consults a doctor who clearly indicates that the state of his health precludes working in the immediate or near future, why create all kinds of problems for him? Actually, in cases of illness, and I have in mind more specifically a nervous breakdown, it is very difficult to determine when the individual will be able to return to work. It is quite difficult to determine, even by a doctor. A date is then set arbitrarily. In my opinion, we should at least give the doctor the benefit of the doubt and accept the fact that his diagnosis constitutes sufficient proof of entitlement to unemployment insurance benefits.

Mr. Speaker, to be precise I must say that there are various ways of fighting unemployment. For a few years now the government, through local initiative projects or through the Opportunities for Youth Program has succeeded in creating new jobs. Of course, such projects may not have given the desired results and for this reason we should, as a matter of fact, think of improving them, of carrying out other kinds of projects.

Having noticed some deficiency in this regard, I wonder, for instance, if priority should not be given to local initiatives projects for which the names of unemployed willing to work have already been submitted. If 10 or 15 unemployed, thanks to their initiative or that of others in their community, give their names to work on a project, they should be given priority so that we might no longer see, as we have in the past, projects approved but not completed for lack of workers. That is just one incidental suggestion.

There are many other ways of fighting unemployment. The millions of dollars paid out in unemployment insurance benefits could instead be used to create jobs. Unemployment could be reduced, for instance, if municipalities were allowed new credits, interest free as much as possible, in order to get work done, not only to give people work, but also to meet essential needs.

In this way, one would not have to make it a condition that it be done in the winter months, for the problem for the potentially unemployed is knowing whether to continue out of work or to go and work just for a month or two for an income that is about the same as the unemployment benefit. Faced with this kind of a dilemma, despite their finer feelings, the unemployed prefer to keep warm near the stove than to go and freeze in sub-zero temperatures. There can be no doubt about that! Let us not confront the work with such an impossible choice.

For these reasons, we ought to provide municipalities, for example, with sufficient funds for them to have essential work done. What municipality does not have work that needs to be done? In this way they could wipe out unemployment and help us to make some progress until there is a complete reform of this system that incorporates permanent unemployment.

[English]

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I wish to indicate the portion of the resolution to which I intend to address my remarks. It is that part which—> —condemns the existing authorities for imposing or tolerating quasi-repressive measures affecting citizens who merely want to see respected their fundamental right to a decent standard of living and their personal dignity and to live in a climate of freedom and security.

I appreciate the opportunity to take part in this debate. The subject is most timely, bearing in mind the situation in which many of the unemployed in the rural areas which I represent find themselves at the present time. I am glad to participate for two reasons. First, it gives me an opportunity to speak out on behalf of seasonal agricultural workers in the Norfolk-Haldimand area. This is an intensive cash crop area. It is a highly labour-intensive area. Labour is used only at the peak season of the year—the harvest season. Perhaps in Norfolk-Haldimand there is a greater concentration of seasonal workers than exists anywhere else in Canada. Certainly, the concentration is as great.

These workers are being deliberately and systematically disentitled from receiving unemployment insurance benefits. This action is being taken on a wholesale basis. When I asked whether it was the policy of the Commission to disentitle these people, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) said, in response to my question the other day as reported in Hansard at page 1636:

"Absolutely no. Not as such." Then he went on to say that they could be disentitled in certain circumstances. I propose to deal with this answer later. I am speaking, now, about the large class of workers in my area who are being disentitled for entirely the wrong reason.

My second reason for rising to speak today on the motion before us is this: I want to explain more fully the terms "Gestapo tactics" which I used when I was speaking about the activities of benefit control officers in my area. What I said in the House on that occasion will be found reported in Hansard on the same page I mentioned earlier.

Several hundred additional control officers were hired by the Unemployment Insurance Commission recently to cut out the cheats and chisellers who wrongfully obtained benefits under the act. Such people have increased the cost of unemployment insurance—a cost which has already been brought home dramatically to the government by resolutions in this chamber and by debates in the House. All hon. members are aware that the Commission has overspent, that it has gone beyond the ceiling set in the original act. Bill C-124 was brought down not long ago to remove the ceiling. Thus, the government was doubly anxious to cut the cost of unemployment insurance. It appears to me, though, that in its effort to cut costs the Commission has approached the subject in the wrong way. It is right and proper that control officers should be appointed and that they should carry out proper investigative procedures to cut out cheats and chisellers. There is no quarrel with that proposition. However, in a rural area such as I represent, the timing was most unfortunate.

In spite of what the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen) said a few minutes ago, I feel, too, that the time required for the securing of benefits by these agricultural workers is far too short. I am referring to the eight week period. There are those in my area who worked during the tobacco harvest. They worked for eight weeks, enough to qualify them for unemployment insurance benefits, and then they refused to work longer. It is at this point benefit control officers should have intervened. As a result of the refusal of these people to continue employment, apples in the orchards of Norfolk County were left on trees as winter approached. These men and women could not be induced to leave their unemployment insurance benefits and go out into the fields and orchards to work. This is the time the control officers should have been on the job.

In my area at the present time there is obviously no farm help required. There are very few small industries in the towns and villages in the area. As far as help is concerned, these plants are all filled to capacity. They do not want any more help. As a matter of fact, some are laying off employees. The benefit control officers are coming in and cutting these people off unemployment insurance, saying they are not looking for a job.

I wish to go into some detail with regard to the procedures used to disentitle persons properly entitled to benefits. First, the individual who is receiving the claim is interviewed. He then receives a letter of disentitlement setting out the reasons he is being disentitled. I can recite these reasons because I have heard them hundreds of times from people who have complained to me about the actions of these men. First, they are told that they really do not want to work; second, there are no child care arrangements and, third, they do not have any visible means of transportation. This occurs over and over again. When a person telephones me, I know exactly what will be in the letter he is going to read to me. Included with the letter of disentitlement is a slip that states that person has 30 days in which to appeal the case. In order to appeal, the claimant must write a letter setting out the reason he is appealing, the reason he is refuting the grounds for disentitlement which are stated in the letter.

The case is heard by a board of referees. This board is to include a representative of labour, representative of management and a representative of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. In all the cases that have ever come to my attention, and this runs into many hundreds, not once has this board of referees reversed the original decision of the benefit control officer. It is a folly, a cruel joke on the people to say they have a right to appeal. To add insult to injury, these people are advised that they have a right to appeal to an umpire. The only way to do that is to obtain permission to appeal to the umpire. If the decision is unanimous, which it always is, there is no right to appeal to an umpire, a judge, one who truly would not have a vested interest in the decision. This is a cruel joke, deliberately being played on these people.

That is not the basic complaint of the people in my area. It is the tactics used by the interviewing officer when claimants are being interrogated. These officers first ask if the claimant is looking for work. The person replies that he has registered with Manpower. Manpower, if it is to mean anything at all, should be the agency which puts people in touch with jobs. If jobs are available, Manpower should advise the person. Surely, that is sufficient evidence that an individual is looking for work.

If a person decides to appeal, he telephones the farmers in the area, knowing full well that they have no employment at this time of the year. He calls them because this is where he worked. If he worked for an industry, he calls the plant, knowing full well that this plant does not need extra employees. As I said, some industries are even laying off employees. These people are sick and tired of being continually asked, for work when everyone in the community knows there is none.

There is another trick which these officers play on these people being interviewed. When they enter a person's home and see small children, they ask whether that individual has a babysitter. Obviously, there is no babysitter because that person is home looking after the children. The honest answer is no. When the signed statement comes back, it states that the claimant has no child care arrangements and, therefore, is unable to accept work if suitable work were offered. How dishonest can you get?

Another trick is with regard to transportation. The individual is asked whether he has a car. Perhaps the husband has a car but the wife has not. There is one car for the family. The officer does not say to the wife, if a job were offered in Simcoe, Delhi or on a nearby farm, could you get to work? The answer would be entirely different. These people are scared out of their wits when a government investigator comes to the door. They will sign almost anything to get rid of him. The signed statement is then used before the board of referees. It is about this that I complain most bitterly. I did not have time to elaborate on this in the House a few weeks back. These are the types of things that I refer to as gestapo tactics.

Many of the seasonal workers who are unemployed are new Canadians. They are of different ethnic origins. Many came to this country from central European countries. They are older people. They did not have the opportunity nor the ability to become conversant in English. They can speak it passably, but they cannot understand it very well. They certainly cannot read or write English. The officers take advantage of them by getting them to sign a document about which they know nothing.

I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Neale) that this type of tactic is wrong. Surely there are honest and correct ways of weeding out those who should be taken off the unemployment insurance payroll. This way is unworthy of a civilized government. The interrogator is a professional. He has been trained. He is pitting his wits and skill against people who are unskilled in English and have a marginal education. These people are scared to death when a government investigator comes to their door. These are some things that are wrong with the system being applied to seasonal agricultural workers. I wish to make a few general comments about the way this plan is being applied in my area. Many of the people who are being cut off from unemployment insurance benefits have no other means of subsistence. They must go to the local municipal welfare officer and ask to be placed on welfare. A few moments ago a member opposite said that unemployment insurance was a boon to the welfare system, that it would take people off welfare and lessen the bills of the municipality. In my area our welfare officers are hopping mad about the number of people being disqualified from legitimate unemployment insurance payments and being placed on welfare. This is wrong.

These people who are doing the investigating might well consult with the welfare officers in the area in which they are working. The welfare officers could tell them who the chiselers are and who is entitled to unemployment insurance benefits. These investigators are lacking in experience and do not have a knowledge of the community in which they are working. Why do they not contact someone who knows the situation and can guide them in a reasonable sort of way?

Another point I wish to emphasize is the unfortunate timing in the drive to cut people off benefits. Surely, the time to do this is when farmers and other employers are desperately seeking assistance for harvesting or whatever. This is the time we could determine who is unwilling to work. This is the time unemployment insurance control officers should be in the field doing their job.

Better still, these people should not have been placed on the rolls in the first place. Perhaps this is the most ironic part of it all. These people are casual workers who leave their homes and go to work harvesting farm crops, whether it be tobacco, orchard crops, asparagus or whatever it may be. They did not ask to be put on unemployment insurance in the first place. As a matter of fact, they objected strenuously and so did the farmers who employed them. They did not want any part of it. They were willing to take their chances and get employment in the summertime during the harvest, which would have provided them with some money. But having been put on unemployment insurance and having made their contributions, they cannot for the life of them see why they are not justly entitled to the benefits for which they have paid.

[Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand).]

Another matter that surprised me and caused a great deal of pain to some who have received unemployment insurance benefits, having had their claims allowed by the commission, is that suddenly, having received their cheques, they found they were disentitled to benefits. The Unemployment Insurance Commission then had the nerve to ask them to pay back the money they had received. Surely this tells us something about the system and the way it is being administered. Why in the world were these people paid benefits in the first place? These are some of the reasons I feel very upset, as do the people I represent—I am putting it mildly; they would use much stronger language—over the way unemployment insurance is being administered in my area.

In response to a question I asked the other day, the minister said that he would investigate cases in my area if I would give him specific instances. I have since flooded his office with these cases and I can send him many more. As a matter of fact, the people in my constituency are writing directly to the minister, so he need not worry about not having enough cases to investigate. Literally hundreds of workers have written, phoned or spoken to me about this matter. They cannot understand this system under which they have contributed and thus feel justly entitled to benefits. They have been honest and straightforward in answering questions put to them, but when they are tricked into disqualifying themselves they surely have the right to get mad.

Farmers are also deeply disturbed because this type of worker is being disentitled. They fear, and have good reason to fear, that next year no one will bother finding work at harvest time because they fear deductions will be made from their wages and they will get nothing in return. The farmers think that the farm labour situation next harvest season will be aggravated by this situation.

One positive note. I have been critical all the way through my remarks, but I feel that much of this would never have happened had the government not divorced Manpower from unemployment insurance. Surely if Manpower and unemployment were lumped together under the one administration, Manpower would know right on the spot who was available for work and entitled to receive an unemployment insurance cheque.

I suggest a return to the system where cheques are distributed at the Manpower centre, where the recipient will pick them up. If it is more efficient to have the cheque prepared by a cheque—writing machine in Belleville, or wherever it may be, then let that be done. But do not distribute the cheques through the mails; let the local Manpower centre distribute them. They are on the spot and they know the situation. If a person is entitled to a cheque, he will receive it. If there is a job available for him, he takes the job and does not get the cheque. That would soon clear up this whole mess.

Secondly, as I have already mentioned in my remarks, the investigating officers—the benefit control officers, as they are called—would be well advised to be a little more humane and understanding in the way they conduct their interrogations. Why not let claimants go to the welfare officer in the community, or a person such as a municipal councillor or clerk? They know the situation. They know the people who are in need of and are entitled to benefits. They also know the chisellers who would rather sit back and receive a hand-out from the government.

Those are the remarks I have to present for the consideration of the government. Hopefully, we will get some action to clear up this very serious and aggravating unemployment insurance situation in the area I represent.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) introduced his budget almost one month ago he began his address by saying, as reported at page 1428 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this budget is—first and foremost—to bring about a substantial reduction in unemployment. Unemployment is much more than an economic problem.

Then he said:

> This budget is aimed at the faster growth of our economy and the strengthening of its basic structure in order to achieve the greatest possible increase in the number of permanent, satisfying jobs for our rapidly growing labour force.

Those phrases had a familiar ring, Mr. Speaker. I turned to the first speech of the Minister of Finance following his appointment to that office almost one year ago. On February 24, 1972, he said:

> Our most urgent and pressing task is to bring about a substantial reduction in the level of unemployment. Our goal, our objective, must be the provision of a job to every Canadian who is seeking work.

They are very fine words, Mr. Speaker. However, if one looks not at the words but at the actions, one sees that the minister has been a complete failure; because when the minister took on the job of Minister of Finance in February, 1972, the rate of unemployment at that time, as it had been for more than two years prior to that date, was over 6 per cent on a seasonally adjusted basis. In January, 1973, the last month for which we have figures, the rate of unemployment on a seasonally adjusted basis was still 6.2 per cent.

According to the Toronto Globe and Mail for February 7, 1973, the unemployment rate dropped to 6.2 per cent in January, from 6.7 per cent in December of 1972. The Globe and Mail goes on to say:

> The actual proportion of the labour force without work last month was 7.7 per cent . . . It compares with 7.7 per cent a year earlier, 8 per cent in January, 1971, and 6.1 per cent in January, 1970 . . .
> The unadjusted number of unemployed was 688,000 in January, 1973, compared with 584,000 in December and 665,000 in January, 1972.

In other words, there were 23,000 more people unemployed in January of 1973 than there were in January, 1972. If you look at the regional breakdown, Mr. Speaker, you will find there were more people unemployed in the Atlantic provinces in January of 1973 than there were in January of 1972. That was also the case in Quebec, on the Prairies and in British Columbia. The only province in which there was a slight reduction in unemployment was Ontario.

Under those circumstances it is no wonder that the election of October, 1972, led to such a sharp reduction in the number of Liberal Members of Parliament. We had been telling the government, particularly the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Finance, that unemployment was an important matter to the people of Canada. We had been saying that for over two years. For almost three years we have been told that the real problem is not unemployment but the rapid increase in the cost of living.

No country in the western world, with the exception of the United States, has a higher percentage of unemployment than Canada. This Minister of Finance, like the previous minister, says all the right things. He says that his objective is to reduce the number of unemployed and to provide jobs for every person in Canada who wants to work. But to put it mildly, I have been dismayed by the talk in Ottawa among senior civil servants in both the Department of Finance and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. They believe that in fact we have virtually full employment. There may be full employment for all the economists working for the government, but there is certainly not full employment for people who want to work in factories; and there certainly is not full employment or the prospect of anything near full employment for the young people who will be graduating from universities across Canada this year or coming out of community colleges in the next couple of months.

The figures we were given for the month of January show that 11.2 per cent of all workers between the age of 14 and 24 were unemployed. That is the situation, and the people of Canada are again being sold a bill of goods. Let me say to the government that the people of Canada did not believe them in October, 1972, they believed them less in February, 1973, and they will believe them even less in months to come.

All the projections of independent economists indicate that the reduction in the percentage of unemployment will be very small in the next four or five months and indicate that in the fall of 1973 unemployment in total numbers and in terms of percentage will begin to rise again. These are the projections of independent economists, not of those who work in the Department of Finance who have been preconditioned by the deputy minister not to tell the minister what they really think or to give him their real estimates.

That is the record of this Liberal government which has been in power since 1968. The percentage of unemployment this country has suffered since the present Prime Minister has been in office is almost twice as large as the unemployment we had under the previous prime minister. It is almost as large, although not quite, as the percentage we had under a Conservative government from 1957 to 1962.

We said we would support the budget debate, and we did, because it moved forward in certain directions. It contained improvements to old age pensions which were fairly substantial although far short of what we wanted. We believed basic pensions should have been increased to $150 per month and we thought a beginning should have been made to lower the age at which individuals were eligible to receive the pension. We felt that if we gave people of age 60 and up an opportunity to retire on a voluntary basis, many of them would do so, leaving openings for young, unemployed people. In any event, we thought the increase to $100 a month was an improvement.

We felt that the income tax cut was not only an improvement but an expansionary measure. The $100 minimum reduction in income tax meant that many workers and farmers in low income brackets would in fact have a reduction of income tax up to 40 per cent, and we welcomed that. Let me say to the Minister of Finance and members of the government that in the opinion of economists of provincial and federal governments, as well as academic economists, this budget and the proposals of the government will fall far short of providing the kind of stimulus required to put the unemployed to work. It has been suggested by some of the best economists in the country that this budget is not nearly as expansionary as the budget presented by the minister in May, 1972, yet that budget did nothing at all to reduce unemployment.

The increase in the basic old age pension and the income tax cut, particularly for those in the lower income brackets, was a welcome step in the right direction. Both socially and in terms of justice, these changes go part way at least in meeting the criticisms of the budgets of the Liberals and Conservatives over the years. The latest budget will not do those expansionary things the Minister of Finance has suggested it will do. It will not reduce unemployment.

What should be done? We have said over the years that a number of things must be done. First of all, the secrecy about what this government thinks is likely to happen in terms of unemployment should come to an end. We cannot deal with the problems of unemployment when the people of Canada do not know what is likely to take place in the next year. The federal government cannot work out plans in co-operation with the provinces and the municipalities if it keeps secret the estimates of its own advisers economists and statisticians. The first thing this government ought to do is make public the projections made for it by its various departments and agencies as to the percentage of unemployment which is likely to exist in the coming year. This information should be made public on a quarterly basis. Once this has been done the federal government could work out, in co-operation with the provinces and municipalities, tri-level plans and projects to put people back to work. There are numerous projects that have not yet been attempted in this country.

One solution to unemployment was referred to earlier this afternoon by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford). He introduced proposed amendments to the National Housing Act. We need a massive acceleration in the provision of housing accommodation for people in low income and middle income brackets. People can no longer afford to buy homes in cities like Toronto, because of what has happened to housing costs. Not only low income people, but families in the middle income bracket can no longer afford to purchase homes. We need a massive attack in the field of housing to provide the required accommodation.

I note that the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mrs. Sauvé) is in the House. We must do something about pollution. I wish I could say that the city of Montreal had begun to do something about this problem, but one fact is that the vast majority, if not all of its raw sewage is still being dumped, untreated, into the St. Lawrence River. We can help the city of Montreal put on the Olympic games in 1976, but we cannot help it do something about the pollution situation in the St. Lawrence River which has existed for years. This is an indication of the stupidity of the Liberal government. I wish we could do something about meeting the educational and recreational needs of the people of this country. These facilities are deficient in many ways. These are some of the things in which governments could become involved.

Having said some good things about the budget, let me say that I believe that if we really want to put the people of Canada to work and reduce the number of unemployed, if we want by January 1, 1974, instead of 678,000 unemployed to have only 400,000 unemployed, the best way to do this would be to put money into the pockets of the people in the low income bracket. They would spend every penny of it. I suggest to the Minister of Finance and to the government that the $100 basic pension simply is not enough.

If we increased the basic pension to $125 a month, 99 per cent of the old age pensioners would spend every extra dollar given to them. In this way we could provide employment for thousands of unemployed people. Instead of the $100 minimum reduction in income tax, the reduction should have been a minimum of $135. Had all this been done we would really have an expansionary budget and a deficit of $1 billion more than the projected deficit the Minister of Finance has put forward which is not nearly expansionary enough.

Let me close by saying to the government that in recent years we have had something new in Canadian parliamentary life. We have had in recent years two budgets rather than one. I suggest to the Minister of Finance that the budget he has proposed is not expansionary enough and in the next three months the number of unemployed will not drop sharply as he suggested. In this event, we insist, on the basis of past experience and the estimates we have made, that the minister should do one of the things the former minister of finance did. There was at least one example of pioneering by the former minister. If the present Minister of Finance would follow that precedent, three or four months from now he would bring forward another budget which would be really expansionary and would bring the unemployed people of Canada back to work, which is where they really want to be.

Mr. Reid: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Our next speaker would be the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) who is on his way here having had some difficulty in travelling because of the weather. I wonder whether the House would agree to call it six o'clock so that he could be our next speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. Hon. members have heard the suggestion of the parliamentary secretary. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I begin by apologizing for my absence this afternoon and therefore my inability to have noted all the comments of previous speakers. The inclement weather today forced me to drive this afternoon. I ask hon. members to please forgive my comments if they do not deal with all the particular points previous speakers have raised. Certainly, in reading Hansard I digest any comment that has been made, take the advice offered and do what I can with it.

The subject matter of the resolution indicates the continuing concern for Canada's serious unemployment situation which is no less grave, of course, because it remains puzzling and frustrating in the context of our generally buoyant economic conditions. As has been stated and in fact should be restated, part of our problem is demographic. We are still trying to cope with the Canadian phenomenon which is the fastest growing labour force among the industrialized nations, for which there are two main reasons.

The first reason is the post-war birth rate, and the second the fact that women among our society are increasingly taking part in work opportunities and in fact their participation still remains lower, as a percentage of the total population, than in some other countries. So I think we can anticipate both these problems being with us for some years to come, which indeed makes it even more necessary that we cope with them.

Our job creation rate for these new workers has been good: it has been improving. But I know all members of the House on all sides would like to see this general problem solved. I note the resolution states that "this House deplores the continuous increase in unemployment." I think, in all fairness and to place the facts before hon. members, we must note that the unemployment rate has been declining since last September; employment has been climbing every month with the exception of December.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andras: This is in no small way due to the measures that have been taken for some time, beginning with our expansionary budgets back in 1970. Referring again to the budget of May 1972, I draw attention also to the early fall announcement of some $80 million for the Local Initiatives Program which was bolstered by a major announcement by my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), and myself on December 6 regarding $500 million for a direct employment program. This included an additional $80 million for the Local Initiatives Program to bring that to $165 million, and $10 million more for the on-the-job training program to increase that to $50 million. There was also a $350 million special municipal loan fund to be spread over the next three years, and other measures described in the announcement to which I have referred. These measures were topped on February 19 last by another expansionary budget of the Minister of Finance which contained massive tax cuts which will provide more income for spending, particularly oriented toward families in the lower income brackets.

Unemployment rates have been going down steadily since September. Very shortly we will have the February figures and I think we can expect to see further improvements in them. During the last several days the budget measures have been debated at length and I do not think I would be contributing to this debate were I to rehash the statements of the Minister of Finance and other colleagues. I would, therefore, like to take this opportunity to concentrate more on my responsibilities, namely, manpower and manpower programs.

This evening I would like to outline in particular our four-part program related to providing jobs and some of the special efforts we shall be making on behalf of the youth of this country, women, our native peoples and others who are disadvantaged. My comments may take me a little past the time allotted for my speech, in which case I would be most grateful if the House would permit me to complete my remarks so they would have continuity and totality.

Our jobs program will contain four elements: job finding, job creation, the elimination of artificial job barriers, and improved job satisfaction or job enrichment. First, we want much more comprehensive and efficient job-finding techniques and services which will aggressively search out jobs and match them with the people available for work. Where we cannot make such a match, it is our intention to focus more clearly and bring into play our training, our mobility and our immigration policies and programs. At the very heart of this job-finding service will be an open, self-service job information centre where people who are ready to take a job will be put in touch with job data with an absolute minimum of red tape and bureaucracy.

• (2010)

Two such pilot projects have been announced and started recently, one in the national capital, Ottawa, and the other in Hamilton. This type of open, self-service job information centre will be the key, also, to a new relationship between Manpower and Unemployment Insurance Commission offices which we hope will ensure maximum utilization of available jobs and minimum delay in filling them. A co-operative working relationship now exists between these two agencies, Manpower and Immigration and the UIC, and it is being further developed. I think this will greatly facilitate the work of both and improve services to the public.

When workers apply for unemployment insurance benefits they are now required to register for work with the Canada Manpower Centre if they are in need of CMC services. The only people excluded from this are those on short-term lay-offs, with definite knowledge that they will be recalled shortly, unless of course even for them there are vacancies known in the CMC offices that they could fill.

As it stands now, all Canada Manpower Centres supply the Unemployment Insurance Commission with lists of current vacancies for which they require workers, and persons applying for benefits who have the skills are required to report to the CMC within 24 hours. As an example of the effect of this, during the past three months in Quebec the UIC referred to the CMCs 3,228 workers, of whom 571 were immediately referred to employers. From the benefit control point of view, another 1,000 failed to report to the CMCs and the UIC was notified for investigation of possible disqualification, and the CMCs notified the UIC of another 472 cases requiring similar investigation.

Canada Manpower Centres thus have access to all claimants of unemployment insurance who are capable of working, and if a UIC claimant refuses offers of suitable employment the CMC notifies the commission. In fact, with that arrangement during the past nine months the CMCs have notified the commission of over 100,000 such cases. Further, CMCs provide a recall service to employers who are having difficulty locating former workers. This does happen from time to time. If these employees are not working and do not report for work, again the CMCs will notify the commission.

The co-operation between the Department of Manpower and Immigration and the Unemployment Insurance Commission is emphasized by these arrangements that have recently been made. In localities where there is no UIC office, the Canada Manpower Centres provide UIC services. They are staffed to assist claimants, either by providing space for UIC personnel or by having specially trained CMC personnel provide the UIC services.

Right now the UIC is represented in 144 Canada Manpower Centres. There is day to day contact between officials of the CMCs and the UIC concerning individuals, working out procedures and the exchange of information. At the regional level, both organizations have liaison officers and here in Ottawa there is an inter-agency committee of officials, co-chaired by assistant deputy ministers, to develop further operational relationships and co-ordination of activities that will ensure greater assistance to the unemployed.

But, Mr. Speaker, even after we have improved our utilization of existing job opportunities I am quite sure there will still, unfortunately, be gaps to fill and they probably can only be filled by direct job creation. The level of unemployment, due to the factor I outlined at the beginning of my comments, namely, the growth in the labour force, will continue to be a challenge to all of us. The economic measures announced by the Minister of Finance on several occasions no doubt will reduce unemployment. But even when unemployment rates return to more normal levels, our Canadian climate ensures that we will continue to have strong seasonal fluctuations in employment levels. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, regardless of the season of the year, in good years and in bad some parts of Canada and some groups of Canadians will face particular unemployment problems throughout the 1970s and beyond. These employment problems, in all likelihood, will be complicated by rapidly changing job expectations and other social factors.

I am convinced that in addition to the indirect measures of fiscal and monetary policy open to us, and the stimulation of the private sector where the bulk of jobs must be created, we shall need well planned programs of direct job creation for some time to come. We have learned a lot in the last two or three years about direct job creation under OFY and the Local Initiatives Program and, as I announced recently, we are experimenting with this year's LIP in a number of ways. I would like to give the House some examples of this experimentation.

Wells, in British Columbia, is situated near the historic Cariboo Trail, four miles from Barkerville, a lively centre in the 1858 gold rush. Using Local Initiatives Program funds to employ local jobless, the Wells Improvement District is completing projects that will ensure more employment opportunities for local residents throughout the year. Another experiment is a project being run by the Indians of Lac LaHache, northern Saskatchewan, who rely almost totally on an annual ice harvest for their livelihood. This board recently applied to the Local Initiatives Program for support to ensure the completion of the harvest, and that experiment is under way. There are literally thousands of such projects under way in Canada. On the whole, the 1972-73 Local Initiatives Program will have created approximately 350,000 man-months of employment and about 85,000 jobs. As I have mentioned in the House previously, more than 5,860 projects have been approved.

The training-on-the-job program is another tool that has been used by my department to find work and to provide valuable training experience for the unemployed. Approximately 200,000 man-months of employment are being created this year, representing 60,000 jobs. This compares favourably with last year's effort when about 42,000 unemployed were hired by employers under a similar program.

I am also satisfied that many local initiative projects can become continuing, self-sufficient enterprises, selling their products or services without unfair competition to existing enterprises. We shall be working with many project sponsors to examine such possibilities in the next several months. In addition, as part of our new services for the disadvantaged we are developing, with several provinces, a number of experimental LIP type projects aimed at specific groups of the hard core unemployed. Such projects will last two or three years, not just a few months, and are intended not only to create jobs but to enable the workers to become conditioned to the world of work and to gain the self-confidence and self-reliance which come from accomplishment. Like LIP, the projects will be dependent on the initiative of citizens' groups, but the projects, known as local employment assistance projects—which no doubt will be called LEAP—will involve provinces and municipalities in their planning and implementation.

But more important than these specific initiatives and experiments, we feel that we must begin to put machinery in place that will, in concert with other government departments, with the provinces and business continually test and plan job creation schemes which we should have on the shelf to use when unemployment rises.

I think it will be clear from what I have said that I, too, am far from satisfied with Canada's historic band-aid approach to direct job creation. What is needed now is a longer term and better planned approach. In the immediate future, as far as my department is concerned, I think we have to face the following tasks: What are we to do with the Local Initiatives Program and the Opportunities for Youth program? How do we build on the good features and eliminate the bad ones?

Second, we must move now to establish the planning machinery. Third, we have to set in place, after putting before the House our suggestions, the new programs which are necessary. I shall be making recommendations to my colleagues soon on these very important matters.

For some people, no increase in new jobs will really help in the ordinary course of events because of the structural barriers between them and the jobs that exist. Some of these barriers have been identified and dealt with by the introduction of our training and mobility programs; others remain because employers in this country still tend to discriminate against candidates for work, though often unthinkingly, on grounds of age, sex, experience, race, pattern of previous employment and education.

It is in that context that we plan a series of positive measures to try to break through these structural barriers. First of all, in the area of education and persuasion, employers, including public employers, will be encouraged to base their hiring standards on the real performance objectives of the jobs, rather than on some of the artificial standards designed primarily to limit the workload of the recruiting officers. This will be greatly aided by the new Canadian Classification and Dictionary of Occupation which became available for my department on January 1, 1973.

In the area of placement incentives, under the Canada Manpower training-on-the-job program two new elements have been announced which will greatly facilitate job matching. The first is training on the job for skill shortages. Where an employer's job order cannot be filled by CMC from the existing work force for a period of 30 days or more, we shall offer to enter into a contract with that employer to train unqualified or underqualified workers to fill the need. As far as training on the job for the disadvantaged is concerned, in the case of the hard core disadvantaged employers will be offered reimbursement of up to 100 per cent of wages for an initial period to hire and retain disadvantaged workers.

The fourth element of our four-part jobs program relates to the growing phenomenon in this country, and I think in the whole western world, of worker dissatisfaction with the jobs facing them. There is little evidence to suggest that this is opposition to work itself but, rather, it appears to be a rebellion against certain types of work which are distasteful, undignified or lacking in personal satisfaction. We know now that workers will sometimes accept relatively lower wages for satisfying work but will react against boring, repetitive work even at very high wages.

There is a need for extensive research and private and public sector co-operation in dealing with this problem. My department will offer co-operation to companies or industries encountering such labour problems identified in the main by high labour turnover. My department's capacity to provide this co-operation must surely be extended.

These are the main elements of our jobs program. However, I should also like to say a few words about several distinct groups of our Manpower clientele for whom special affirmative action is required and being developed—youth, women, native workers and disadvantaged workers generally. I should like to take this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to announce a number of adjustments to manpower programs to provide better service to Canadian workers who are encountering particular difficulty in getting and holding jobs and who would continue to face that difficulty even if unemployment decreases as we hope it will.

In this next fiscal year, Mr. Speaker, we shall be making a modest start at least, and with experience we hope to build a real response to the employment needs of many Canadians who heretofore have existed on the fringes of the labour force, chronically or intermittently unemployed. The nature of our new services are described in a letter which my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), and I recently sent to the provincial welfare ministers and which I shall be tabling in the House later this week.

The highlights of this approach include, first, hiring and placing 110 specially trained counsellors in CMCs across Canada to specialize in the problems of workers with severe employment problems and to advise our regular Manpower counsellors on how to deal with such cases, as well as to provide a point of contact with community agencies offering other specialized services. Second, our CMCs will be given new authority and funds to refer clients to professional practitioners and diagnostic services when they have problems which extend beyond our internal resources. Third, major changes are being made to our Manpower training programs. We shall purchase work adjustment training from sheltered workshops or private employers to teach people how to work. We shall introduce basic literacy training. We shall adjust the so-called 52-week rule to permit greater flexibility in training durations for those with particular problems. We shall be adding what we call "life skills" components to the regular training program.

I saw a marvellous pilot project on this very matter in Windsor last week when I was visiting that city—the St. Clair Community College and Holy Rosary Recreation Centre. I would advise hon. members who have the opportunity to visit that experimental project; I am sure it will thrill them as it did me.

We shall be tailoring training programs more carefully to the needs of individuals, and planning longer term packages of training and work experience to bring disadvantaged workers to full employability. Fourth, we are introducing a new training-on-the-job scheme in which disadvantaged workers will be placed in jobs, backed by counselling and supportive services. We expect this coming year to spend $10 million to $15 million on this element.

Fifth, we are expanding our outreach services to extend to workers with particular needs not easily met by normal CMC services. I will give an example of this. We have entered into a contract with the Métis Association of Alberta to hire Métis employment counsellors to work with our CMCs, to explain our services to the Metis, counsel them, place them in jobs and follow up this service. We intend to spend $2.6 million on similar projects next year in an experimental way.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, our local employment assistance program—LEAP—is at this stage a modest demonstration-type program designed to test longer term projects similar to LIP but aimed at specific groups of hard core unemployed. In addition to job creation and community betterment, these projects must involve the workers in a developmental process designed to lead them to full-time work and continuing self-sufficiency. It is our intention later, with the permission of the House, to spend about $9.5 million on these projects in 1973-74.

We have often referred to the ongoing problem in our society of employment for younger persons among us. Canada has one of the highest proportions of youth in its population and labour force of any industrial nation. The rate of growth of this age group will moderate in the last half of this decade, but over the next five years we must meet the challenge and integrate these young Canadians into our economy and society.

At present, all groups of youth experience rates of unemployment above the adult rate. Previous experience indicates that even as unemployment decreases, the unemployment rate among youth will remain unacceptably high, as it was throughout the 1960s. To meet this need we have taken or will be taking a number of steps. A youth employment division has been set up in the department, with youth consultants in each of our field regions. Manpower programs are being tilted to ensure access for these groups.

As an example of the situation we face, I would remind hon. members that young people under the age of 25 form 26 per cent of the labour force. They make up 40 per cent of our CMTP institutional trainees, 40 per cent of LIP workers and 63 per cent of training-on-the-job trainees. We shall be setting up various pilot projects to develop innovative solutions to the problems presented by youth unemployment. We are establishing special student CMCs for the summer months. Consideration is being given to the establishment of special youth units in our regular CMCs, staffed by younger workers. Mobile units will take our services to youth if they will not come to us. We are planning a co-operative approach with the provinces to improve career couselling data for youth and build better bridges between the worlds of school and work.

We have recently devised an experimental program in Toronto, called CRUNCH, to assist youth operated cooperatives and businesses. We shall be evaluating this experiment very carefully to see where it might take us.

Mr. Blenkarn: Now we have LIP and CRUNCH and WOW.

Mr. Andras: Having been accused by an hon. member opposite of being a male chauvinist, it gives me pleasure to announce that we are taking positive steps to ensure that women have equal opportunities for training and employment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. This might be an appropriate time for the Chair to ask whether the minister is given unanimous consent to extend his speech, the time allotted to him having expired.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Blenkarn: No.

Mr. Alexander: It is agreed, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Andras: I thank hon. members for their indulgence. I shall conclude my speech as soon as I can. As far as women are concerned, and to the extent that they have problems in obtaining meaningful employment, we are making steady progress in our training programs to open up to women a wider range of training leading to more diversified fields of employment. Elimination of the three-year rule is resulting in a substantial increase in female trainees. Again, we have established a specialized capability in our departmental headquarters to plan and develop the application of our services to female clients. I will be pleased to elaborate on these activities at the first opportunity.

I am sure many hon. members know that I have a particular interest in the problems of our native people. I am anxious to ensure that they have equal access to Manpower programs and services and that their special needs are understood and met. LIP has been particularly beneficial to native groups. We have been impressed by the quality of the projects and the responsible manner in which they were carried out. I expect our new special programs for workers with particular employment problems will also be of particular benefit to natives. We also intend to increase the number of native Manpower counsellors either on our staff or under contract to our CMCs to better administer and interpret our services to natives.

In the short time available to me I have been able to touch upon only a few aspects of our new approach. I look forward to a comprehensive examination and discussion of these matters when my department's estimates are before the committee. I appreciate the indulgence of the House in allowing me to continue past the time allotted to me. I have tried to condense my observations, in these circumstances. I look forward to the opportunity of dealing with these matters in more detail when my estimates are before the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration, at which time I hope to have the advice of members of the committee as to ways in which we can continue to improve our approach to job finding and job training, as well as other aspects of the work of my department.

I realize reference has been made in this debate to the UIC benefit control operation now under way in the country. As I promised hon. members the other day, I intend to make a statement on this subject tomorrow. I therefore seek the indulgence of hon. members to conclude my remarks without further reference to this matter tonight. As I say, I shall likely be bringing this motion before the House within the next 24 or 48 hours.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) on a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. If my fellow-members in the House should agree unanimously, I suggest that from now until the end of this debate speeches be limited to 15 minutes each, in order to allow more members to speak on this most interesting motion by the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise).

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair has six names before it—the hon. members for Parry Sound-Muskoka, Niagara Falls, Saint-Hyacinthe, Scarborough West, Roberval and Bellechasse. The time remaining is 81 minutes. If each hon. member agrees to speak for 13½ minutes, everyone can be accommodated before ten o'clock. Is this agreeable?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

Mr. Lefebvre: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, we have one other speaker on this side, the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance who has a speech of about ten minutes to make.

Mr. Alexander: I should like to speak to the point of order. I think we all wanted to hear what the Minister of Manpower and Immigration had to say; he exceeded his time with our consent. I think it is necessary that hon. members on this side and in the Social Credit Party should have an opportunity of stating their views. I would hope that the parliamentary secretary might speak on another occasion. I shall sit down now, and agree to the 13½ minutes so that the six members can have an opportunity to speak.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair has taken into account the fact that some members have been entitled to speak at greater length than others. If the parliamentary secretary were to speak for 11 minutes, we could accommodate everybody.

Mr. Blenkarn: No. The minister took extra time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair does not intend to negotiate. Perhaps someone could suggest a better way.

Mr. Alexander: If what Your Honour suggests does in fact happen, we will agree.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Do I take it, Mr. Speaker, that henceforth speeches are to be limited to 11 minutes?

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Yes, 11 minutes. Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed? Eleven minutes?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, despite the many plans to reduce unemployment outlined by the government in the various programs it has put forward, as well as in the budget, unemployment is still with us and rearing its ugly head as high as ever.

• (2040)

Many of us are aware that a small percentage have unlawfully milked the unemployment insurance fund. It is only right and just that they should be ferreted out and brought to task. However, in doing so many legitimate claims have either been delayed or stopped, causing severe hardship to families in dire need, especially at this time of year. The skyrocketing price of food has added to the misery of those in need.

I read recently the report of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) who stated that one-third of the families in rural Canada live in poverty. He quoted Statistics Canada as stating that 32 per cent of families in rural areas in 1971, the last year for which statistics are available, had incomes below the so-called low income line. The figure for 1969 was 36 per cent. While the situation has improved slightly for families, for unattached individuals it is even worse. Of such individuals, 56.1 per cent were below the low income line of $2,013 in 1971, while 50.4 per cent were below the 1969 line of $1,894. It is up to us to try to find jobs for these people so they may regain their self-respect.

We hear about pockets of poverty and disparity throughout this great country. Some planners have suggested that the people to whom I have referred be uprooted and moved to urban areas to find work. These people do not want to leave their homes and friends to live in concrete jungles. Furthermore, this is no solution as it would aggravate the urban housing problem, where land is at a premium, and any new housing would be beyond their means. Surely a more sensible and cheaper plan would be to provide jobs in rural Canada.

The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson) could come to the fore in this regard by giving us the suggestions which I understand will be forthcoming to provide new guidelines which I hope will bring in new areas of rural Canada which are no longer eligible. I can certainly speak with some authority on this matter because in my own region of Parry Sound-Muskoka the economic situation is very poor and we are no longer designated. Instead of hearing about the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, it is about time something was done to change this title or create a new minister of rural affairs. We always hear about the great cities. It is about time somebody spoke up for rural Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Darling: It is in this area that the economy needs to be bolstered. There is no problem of land banks being needed in these areas to try to assemble land: there is all sorts of land. What they need are regular banks which will provide funds for jobs, housing, small industry, and so on. This is a must. This would keep our people in familiar surroundings where they are much happier. More jobs would be provided by our many businessmen as increases in sales and services warranted.

This morning I heard His Worship Mayor Drapeau on television giving a patriotic pitch for the great city of Montreal. He stated at the top of his voice, "We are number one". However, it was pointed out to him that number two was breathing hotly down his back and that the great city of Toronto would probably be passing Montreal before very long. The mayor said everything indicates that the people are leaving rural Canada and are heading to the big cities. The federal and provincial governments must take steps to stop the steady migration to our larger cities.

The many land controls are hurting small municipalities the most, much more than the larger cities. Little or no building is allowed, because it does not conform to the master plan. As a result, many small contractors and carpenters are sitting around doing nothing. Their employees are drawing unemployment insurance. All this is because they cannot get their lots approved. The situation would be much easier if these lots were approved. They are satisfactory in all respects; however, they are held up by government red tape, planners and civil servants some of whom are neither civil nor servants.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Darling: This particular time of year, with what seems to be the spring breakup at hand, is the most serious for high unemployment in my constituency. I am quite sure the same situation prevails in a great many other rural constituencies. Lumbering in the bush is finished; tourist operators who cater to snowmobilers will not have any more visitors until the fishing season opens.

I checked with the Parry Sound office today. I was told that there are over 900 on the unemployment rolls. The total population of the area is quite small. There is a real problem there with girls—and I do not mean in the way some people might think. There is a problem of providing jobs for the female population. I am told that some did accept work outdoors, cutting and piling brush. They are to be commended for this; it shows the type of energetic people there are in my constituency. If the local Manpower authorities were given discretionary power to work out some plan with tourist operators and service industries whereby these girls could be paid part unemployment insurance benefits, and the employer part, they would be hired ahead of time to fix up tourist establishments, painting and for other things. Everyone would benefit. It could be said that we would be subsidizing an employer and he would be paying less than the minimum wage, but surely something could be done about this. The local Manpower office could have authority to investigate these cases and to ensure there were not any abuses.

I am aware that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) has a tough job. I listened to his remarks. He is to be commended for doing a pretty good job, but he has to sell more than himself. I remember seeing a movie many years ago; I think it was entitled "The Unholy Three". I suggest that the three who are holding up a great deal of the growth in rural Canada are the following: the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. If these three could be sold the idea of disgorging some of their untold millions to provide jobs and industry in rural Canada, it would greatly help the unemployment problem. It would also help the large cities, because they do not want more people looking for jobs.

I understand I have another two minutes, Mr. Speaker. I will let someone else use them. We all know the problem: we all see the headlines which state that the number one target is jobs. The real issue is jobs. The lists of jobless soar; that is the problem in a nutshell. We require more jobs, particularly in rural Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I would ask my colleagues not to applaud too long, because I am only allowed ten minutes.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out that there was earlier some kind of misunderstanding, I believe. I had been asked, as a special favour, not to take the floor before six o'clock, in order to enable the minister to make his speech, and I was supposed to speak after him. I suggest that you were not aware of this agreement, Mr. Speaker; at any rate, I am the second member to take the floor after the minister and I am satisfied with my lot.

I listened with great interest to the minister's statement about unemployment. I suggest that had he had more time, he might have talked about the other part of this motion which bears on the mismanagement of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. Nevertheless, the minister did say that unemployment is a disease that we must try to cure and, as a remedy, he suggested what the present government has always proposed, namely grants to industry, to local initiatives projects, to the Opportunities for Youth program, etc.

But this is not what will solve the problem of unemployment. Unemployment is not a disease by itself; it is only the result of over-production, of automation. Let us not forget it: unemployment is not a disease but a normal consequence. This problem must be solved through amendments to the act in order to enable the people to contribute to our country's wealth.

This is not a matter of full employment, Mr. Speaker. Full employment will never exist in the future. Today, just like before, we are told again and again: we must earn our living through our work. The minister, I suggest, still believes in it. Let us concern ourselves with the garanteed income, which will solve the unemployment problem, rather than with full employment. From what the minister said, you would think we are still in the 50's when work equalled production. Today, work is roughly 30 per cent manpower. It is that 70 per cent that needs to be redistributed and it will not be redistributed by taxing those who have the chance to work in order to try and give a little money to the others and doing everything for the big interests which are presently running the country. We are giving all possible protection to big capital which is stockpiling the incomes of the country by the billions and we let the people drift by shouting at them: We are going to create employment. Let us stop this nonsense and start thinking not in terms of stop gap measures but in terms of long term remedies.

I suggested recently as a long term remedy to bring about massive relocations to allow society and individuals to reach consumption. I suggested for example to grant the old age security pension at 60. This way we could put 400,000 workers on retirement, and 400,000 unemployed could draw their living from industry.

That is what we call long-term reforms which would really remove the unemployment plague. In fact, I think that by taking such logical steps in order to ensure a minimum guaranteed income for everybody, we would apply an efficient measure.

I shall not dwell on this because I would like to deal with another subject. But when the hon. minister says that the number of jobs is increasing, he should add that it is because automation has been discarded. We have now stopped progressing because the more a country progresses, the more unemployment increases if we keep the same system. That is why it is absolutely ncessary to find other horizons and not be afraid to replace old methods by new ones. It has been done at the level of production. Why should we not do it at the level of redistribution? The state is such at a loss when it comes to redistributing, that one would think we were back in the starvation years. No, we are in a period of overproduction. Surpluses everywhere. Let us find means of redistributing this overproduction.

Mr. Speaker if I go on talking on unemployment and all the unemployment insurance offices, I shall not have time to say a word on unemployment insurance itself which should be my main subject this evening. I have been wanting to talk on this subject in the House for a long time, since the beginning of the session. Concerning the unemployment insurance about which everybody complains we wonder who is responsible. I say the main responsibility first lies with super-centralization both in Quebec and in all the other provinces. I think we have caught the virus of technology. We want to mechanize everything, we want to "electronize" everything in the shortest time period possible without thinking of the consequences. They have also succeeded in dehumanizing everything. It is the greatest social disaster of our age.

The first result of all that is the astronomical cost of administration, in which personnel is increasing constantly. I heard the minister saying just now that the largest increase in employment has been in administration, although the government tried to have us believe that automation would probably reduce it. This can also be attributed to ignorance on the part of promoters and of the machine operators or so-called technicians in these administrative centres. I believe that it is in computer centres such as the one in Montreal that the biggest mistakes are made. When I heard that they were going to employ 133 new inspectors to seek out offences by the general population, I felt that they would have done better to send those 133 employees to work their infernal machines in Montreal, and look for the mistakes there.

That is where the real mistakes are, Mr. Speaker. Last winter, for instance, I have seen series of $500 and $600 cheques made in duplicate and sent in duplicate to the same unemployed worker. This was not done purposely by the recipient but by the Montreal centre which sent the cheques. When the worker was complaining too much the order was given to issue cheques and I have seen series of $500, $800, and $900 cheques issued in duplicate. And now we hear of overpayments. So as to cover up this affair, inspectors are dispatched to inquire from the unemployment workers and try to find out something.

We have reached the point where we no longer have time to do our job as members of Parliament. We have turned into employees of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. At home on weekends as early as ten o'clock on Saturday mornings I start working in unemployment insurance until midnight; on Sundays I start again as soon as I get up until six o'clock and then I board the 6:30 train to Ottawa.

In my opinion the current situation can be corrected. I think that the government has been had by the computer manufacturers and here is proof. I had question No. 1172 put on the order paper to know more about it. It is impossible to have further information elsewhere in connection with those computers. I have asked the following question:

1. Were the computers installed in five Unemployment Insurance Commission head offices (Moncton, Belleville, Montreal, Vancouver, Winnipeg) purchased or rented?

This is what I would like to know. What deals were made in connection with those machines? And I further quote:

2. (a) On what date were they purchased or rented (b) were they new or second-hand (c) at what price (d) if paid by instalments, under what terms and at what interest rate (e) how much was paid for maintenance from the date of purchase to December 31, 1972 (f) how many persons did these computers replace (g) how much was paid to American experts for the installation of these computers (h) how many people are assigned to maintenance?

Because we had not one single expert in Quebec able to operate those computers.

[English]

Mr. Joe Hueglin (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate you upon your election to office and the manner in which you and your deputies act as guides to those who are new to the customs and traditions of this House. It is indeed well to be led by men such as yourself in these ways.

I support strongly the statement made in this want of confidence motion. The government has not taken effective measures to provide more long-term jobs. This government has consistently refused to cut taxes sufficiently to stimulate the economy. It persists in taking millions of dollars, indeed hundreds of millions of dollars, from the private sector for its own use at a rate much higher than any industry would dare.

The short-term programs, at least in my riding of Niagara Falls, have been at best a mixed blessing and at worst failures. We had one Opportunities for Youth program that was carried over this past winter into a local initiatives program. What this program did—I spoke with the young people last Friday—was create a dependency among the senior citizens, a dependency which they did not feel before as deeply as they will when the program is phased out. The young people are discouraged and cynical, and the old people will be left with nothing.

For two years a patrol has existed on the Chippawa Creek. This program, too, is being phased out. It was an active life-saving venture. Tourists come from all over the world to visit Niagara Falls, but I am informed that this program will not be repeated. A local church commenced a local initiatives program last winter. The work was done and the church was completed but unfortunately, due to some administrative bungling, this group is involved in a big dispute with the LIP people. Certainly this is not very conducive to confidence in the government or the system.

During the election I had the opportunity to visit a factory in Fort Erie which at one time employed 3,000 men, yet for two years it has not been able to do very much because this administration cannot make up its mind about STOL aircraft. The men involved sought out an on the job training program but were informed that they could not carry it out in the proven way. This whole matter goes back to World War II, but this program must be worked into the inflexible patterns of the government and training is required before on-the-job training can be obtained. They cannot include such training through this program and bring employment to Fort Erie.

That is the pattern in the Niagara riding. It is a pattern of short-term job creation that does some good but also leaves tragedy in its wake for the old and the young. It seems that the patterns that have proved of use can no longer be followed. I am certain this pattern is duplicated in cities, towns and villages across the country.

There are 17,000 unemployed in the Niagara region, yet men speak to me on each side of the coin. They speak to me as unemployed and as employer. The unemployed and the employer alike never seem to indicate that they received a man through Manpower, or a job through Manpower, and many people have phoned and told me they had to phone Office Overload in order to get a job. Perhaps the free enterprise system could do somewhat better than this system appears to be doing.

It was rather interesting last week to note that one of the ministers made a foray into the last Liberal area of this peninsula, the whole of which was a Liberal stronghold before the last election. He said we were obstructionists and put forth no policies. We have put forth two practical policies. We have recommended massive tax cuts to stimulate production, not just to give a warm bath but to give great stimulus followed by the realization that you have to put this stimulation into productivity, not into inflation.

The Liberals ignored our other platforms, at least until the cold shock of October 30, and are now calling our policies billion dollar giveaways, or so their lord and master said last week. One of these days they will accept these policies just as they have accepted the constant dollar theory and others we have presented in the past.

What is needed is a workable job-employee matching service and the return of local decision-making to the Unemployment Insurance Commission so the officials can sign cheques for the people, rather than having to send them away to the computers be they at Belleville, Montreal or wherever. There has to be some discretion in the hands of our experienced and very excellent civil servants such as those we have in the Niagara Falls area. Short-term solutions are no solutions at all. They just draw the people out of the work force and phase down the statistics. And even then, unemployment has not dropped to the level of 6 per cent for any length of time.

The people of the Niagara Falls riding need a bold frontal attack on unemployment through job creation in the private sector. Successive Liberal budgets have promised, but have failed to do this. Successive Liberal ministers have stated that all will be well, but the land is still not strong. I would suggest that until we have a more dynamic program, the people of the Niagara Peninsula, of Ontario and of Canada will suffer what this motion refers to—lack of initiative and lack of any programs on the part of this government.

Mr. John Harney (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I spent a considerable amount of time today trying to condense into 20 minutes what would really take several hours to discuss. A few minutes ago I heard I would be limited to 15 minutes, then to 11 minutes, and I have since been scratching up my notes into iambic pentameters. This probably would produce some self-discipline, but I must report to you and hon. members that I have not succeeded and what you will have to face for a while is a very severe and rather rapid condensation of a great number of points.

An hon. Member: The normal NDP pattern.

[Translation]

Mr. Harney: I should like to tell my Créditiste friends that I hope they appreciate the fact that I put forward socialist points to their credit. Even though this is their motion, I hope they will allow me.

[English]

I was intrigued by the minister's statement, and that is another element which has thrown my notes into a jumble. I think his statement was indeed well meaning and, if anything, liberal with a capital "L" as well as a small "l". We were told by the minister that unemployment is a problem compounded of many factors—seasonal factors, regional factors, structural factors and factors which could be called generally social factors such as the matter of discrimination against certain types of people who are looking for employment. This is very very good, but not very new because we have been entertaining measures in this House for many years in this kind of categorization.

• (2110)

In the early 1960s we were able to look at the whole problem of unemployment and break it down into certain factors. Not only were we presented with these factors but were presented also with traditional solutions. There was a certain amount of talk about the effects of fiscal and monetary policies needed to stimulate the economy, some reference back to the budget and some mention of policies which the minister himself admitted were in effect band-aid policies. There was even an admission that we had in our society what could be called and what was indeed called hard-core unemployment. It is very good that we recognize the existence of hard-core unemployment just as in our society we have come to recognize the existence of hard-core pornography. If we can face up to a fact perhaps we will do something about it. I presume we do not want to carry that analogy too far, but at any rate I believe hon. members get my point.

For a moment I should like to dwell on the matter of expansionary policies, not only because it is mentioned on the other side of the House but also because it is a frequent topic used by my colleagues in this corner. It is getting to be a fact that many modern economists, if very few modern politicians, now realize that the effect of expansionist policies is on the price level or the exchange rate rather than on the real things such as output, employment or unemployment.

What I am suggesting is that we may be all kidding ourselves that we are making the world better by tinkering with the model we have in our minds about the economy. Surely after the all these years of tinkering in this fashion and involving ourselves in expansionist and countractionist policies, consumptionist policies and overconsumptionist policies, we should know that we still have not attacked the basic problem. For the past dozen years or more we have had a fairly steady and rather obscene level of unemployment in this country. All the good intentions of the government which we have witnessed, and indeed the criticisms of government policy, have not done very much to reduce this level of unemployment.

Almost all public and private effort is designed to increase production and productivity. Let us admit that, whether the government side of the House says we shall take these measures to increase productivity and production, or whether this side of the House says, "All right, fellows; move over and we will do it even better than you can", we must face up to the very simple conclusion that if we increase production and productivity we will also increase unemployment. It is as sure as night follows the day that if we put better and more capitalization into industry, industry of course will use this capital to buy machinery, which has the purpose of increasing productivity which means, in other terms, the purpose of decreasing the number of jobs. So perhaps we should now, at this time in our history, start asking ourselves whether the very language we use in speaking about this problem is fitting and proper language.

For example, here is some heresy. Unemployment as such is not bad: what is bad is not having any money or not being paid. There are many people in our society who are unemployed or underemployed, but who are paid. I need not go through a list, but you can imagine the categories I have in mind as well as I can. They manage to live in effective human dignity while being unemployed or underemployed but relatively well paid. What we have to look at, really, is not simply the matter of job creation but what we do with the leisure we are creating with all our new measures to increase capitalization and productivity. In other words if we can believe that our present unemployment is good for the rich, then it should also be very good for the poor.

One thing our advance is producing is the release of people from the necessity of working in the production of goods and services that we absolutely need in society. As people are being released from the need and the necessity to provide our standard of living and means of subsistence of course they are being displaced into another sector. Thank God that the system now provides for most of them and if their work is not needed in one sector they are taken up by another sector, the private sector in the main, and given jobs so that they can earn remuneration to buy the products of our society.

The problem with this kind of release and redirection of personnel is, first of all, that it is not very rational and, secondly, that it does not work toward increasing the quality of our lives. For example, if we reduce the number of people needed in basic production, they can go to the service industries and rather than working in essential and valuable areas we find them employed more and more in areas that, at best, do not enhance the quality of existence but increase the banality of existence. I can foresee many people being released from the drudgery of boring, productive activity working to build a society which is surfeited by an endless plethora of Kentucky-fried chicken stands.

Let us see if we can look at a few basic notions which might help us tackle this problem. First of all, let us try to spread the employment around. Why not have voluntary retirement at age 60? Why not have a sabbatical year for working people? As an academic, I always had the possibility in the future of having a sabbatical year. If it is good for me and for my colleagues, then it should be good for working people. Why should we not look at this way of spreading employment around? Why not begin to redefine what we mean by a regular job. Does a man have to work in the same factory 40 hours a week for 50 weeks of the year, or is there another way to approach what is meant by a regular job so that a young person, for example, could work less than that but work as part of a family unit, so that the young man and young woman could at least say they hold down regular jobs which give them the benefit of pensions, security, unemployment insurance, health premium payments, and so on? I would strongly suggest that such an approach would do much more to liberate women than the rather brief suggestions the minister made on that topic in his address.

If we spread employment around, we should think of spreading the pay around. It is strange that when talking about unemployment, employment and remuneration we hear nothing more these days about a good minimum wage. In my view, a good minimum wage is one which is so high that certain sectors of our economy scream. If it is not that high, it is not an effective minimum wage. I would like to talk about one point made by the author Paul Goodman. He said that the more a person's work is hard, the more a person's work is useful and necessary, the more a person's work is in the public realm, the less that person gets paid. Surely if this House really cares about helping out the people who are the working poor, and the poor, they would do something significant about spreading the pay around and increasing the minimum wage standard.

We hear of all kinds of band-aid philosophies and floss programs, the sort of unemployment, worklessness and paylessness we have should make us realize that people want a job they can do, at pay which will allow them to live decently. It is no more complicated than that. That should be our basic objective.

When it comes to jobs that people can do, you will ask: How do we create the jobs? The need for jobs is there. There is all kinds of work that can be done in our society and all kinds of new services that can be effectively provided, but the fact is that the effective demand is not there. Since we are in the habit of borrowing ideas from the south, we can borrow one idea that has been emerging there in the past few years, that is, the notion of the state as employer of last resort.

Mr. Speaker, if you will not rise from your chair for thirty seconds, I will complete what I am saying. The state, at the federal, municipal and provincial levels could direct, through itself, people who want to be involved in work into all kinds of projects organized, not necessarily by the state itself but by the various voluntary associations in our society, such as the churches, and so on, and effectively hire people at this minimum wage. I will end by giving you one figure, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I wish I could allow the hon. member to pursue his statement and give him one extra minute, but I want to be fair to other hon. members and we have accepted the rule of 11 minutes for each member.

[Translation]

Mr. J.-Roland Comtois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on last Tuesday, March 6, the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) introduced the following motion. I quote:

> That this House expresses its lack of confidence that the combination of the corporate tax reductions and accelerated depreciation write-offs contained in the Budget of May, 1972 and proposals contained in the Budget of February, 1973 constitutes an adequate and equitable response to the needs of the country.

Today, we have the following motion proposed by the hon. member for Abitibi:

> That this House deplores the continuous increase in unemployment, as well as the refusal or negligence of the Government to propose effective measures for providing more jobs of a remunerative character for Canadians, and condemns the existing authorities for imposing or tolerating quasirepressive measures affecting citizens who merely want to see respected their fundamental right to a decent standard of living and their personal dignity and to live in a climate of freedom and security.

Both motions are strangely similar and they are using up two debating days which are not producing much that is new or constructive on the part of the opposition parties.

I would like to refer to the budget speech of May 8, 1972 which said that the government's responsibility to Canadians was to protect already existing jobs, to look for means to increase them and consider the situation in other countries of the world.

Then it was easy to see that a new protectionist instinct prevailed in the United States which was and is still trying to protect its trade and dollar; that the European Common Market—of which Great Britain has now become a member—was in full expansion and that some of our most traditional trade relations were in danger; that Japan had come back to life and that we, whose survival depends on international trade, were right in the middle of it all.

In fact, on each dollar that we put in our pockets or purses, 25 cents come from our exports. So our economy is vulnerable and Canadian prosperity depends on our capacity to compete against Europe, the United States and Japan, not only on foreign but also on domestic markets because of our imports. And to compete with other countries our businesses must be in a strong position vis-à-vis those other countries.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, the budget introduced in May last provided incentives to industry and manufacturing fighting against world competition in the form of a 40 per cent reduction in their tax rate. It was not intended as a gift or social aid but to allow Canadians to survive, compete and expand so they can have competitive prices, create jobs, sell on foreign markets and earn this quarter of each dollar which allows us to live and prosper.

As far as the various industrial incentives go, whether they are found in our tax system or in the form of regional incentives intended to give equal job opportunities across Canada, some have called them "corporate welfare" and their recipients "corporate welfare bums". In any case I do not like those expressions, whether they are applied to corporations or people.

Moreover, the basic goal pursued by the federal system through taxation of business concerns and a wide range of government policies and programs to stimulate Canadian industry is not social assistance to companies, but the welfare of the people. The main objective of all such measures is to help Canadian industry achieve some specific goals.

As I said earlier, the first objective is to meet increasingly keen competition from foreign companies in both domestic and foreign markets.

In the second place, we want to assist Canadian firms in modernising their facilities, increasing their productivity and bringing down their costs in order that they may compete more successfully with other countries. We want to enable them to manufacture new and improved products and to develop peak techniques, living as we do in an era of technology.

Finally we want to help Canadian firms to offer better job opportunities throughout Canada.

For instance, Mr. Speaker, those steps are basically meant to enable Canadian industries to increase their production and their investments with a view to creating, immediately, productive, permanent and remunerative jobs for our ever increasing labour force. In Canada, it is the private sector and not the governments which constitutes the real element of growth in production, jobs and true income.

Some claim that government measures and programs have been a complete disaster in terms of creating new jobs. I say to them that Canada is doubtless facing one of the toughest economic challenges in the world: the number of men and women, and more specifically of young men and young women, entering the labour market is growing much more rapidly than in any other country in the world.

Let me quote a few figures that clearly illustrate the challenge we face. From 1965 to 1970, that is a period of six years, our labour force grew by 1,440,000 new workers, in other words by 20 per cent. That increase of 1,440,000 workers over a six-year period exceeded by 100,000 workers the total increase, not on a percentage basis but in absolute terms, of the 15 most important industrialized countries in Europe. I am speaking of countries like England, France, Germany, Italy and Sweden.

• (2130)

In other words, our labour force comprised 100,000 more job seekers than the total number of newcomers on the labour market in 15 European countries, whose total population is 13 times and a half larger than ours. Such is the economical problem caused by the arrival of newcomers on the labour market.

And how many jobs have we created during that same period? From 1965 to 1970, we created 1,300,000 new jobs in Canada. We have offered 400,000 more jobs than the 15 European countries taken together whose population is 13 times and half larger than ours.

What a tremendous challenge it was and still is; and the present government and the whole country have succeeded in taking up the most important economical challenge ever faced by the world. In relative figures, employment has increased 57 times faster in Canada than in the United States, twice as fast than in Japan, seven times faster than in Germany and 27 times faster than in the 15 European countries I have mentioned.

Mr. Speaker, in order to guarantee their jobs to hundreds of thousands of Canadians throughout the country, the federal government must at all cost implement the measures advocated in the budget of last May. Many of them are essential if industry is to compete with foreign companies enjoying the generous support of their own government. This is specially true in the areas of the country where economic growth and affluence depend essentially on the development of natural resources or in the areas where the federal government must grant special aid to ensure the development of secondary industries.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that this new plan has been designed to create a better balance between the need to preserve an atmosphere conducive to economic growth and the need to establish a more equitable tax system for all Canadian taxpayers. In last May's budget, there were also other social measures that have been increased in the budget of February 19. I would like to go quickly through the important points of this budget which has been called a budget for the Canadian family. For all taxpayers, there has been a 5 per cent tax reduction with a minimum of at least $100 and a maximum of $500. The basic exemption has gone up from $1,500 to $1,600 for single people and from $2,850 to $3,000 for married couples. So, Mr. Speaker, 750,000 Canadians will not have to pay federal income tax.

The basic old age security pension has been increased. From April 1, it will go from $82.88 to $100 a month and the guaranteed income supplement added to the basic pension will make a total of $170. The guaranteed income for old age couples will be $325. Our system of guaranteed income for old people is the best in the world.

Moreover, in last February's budget, it was proposed to increase veterans' allowances to at least $151 for single people and to $257 for married couples.

Also, Mr. Speaker, for the Canadian consumer in general, we have abolished the federal tax on children's clothing and shoes. We have also abolished the federal tax on consumer goods such as clocks, toilet articles, cosmetics; we also have abolished the federal tax on confectioneries, soft drinks and fruit drinks; we have reduced customs duties on meats, out-of-season fruits and vegetables; we have also reduced customs duties on consumer goods that are not made in Canada such as drug, china, furniture, etc. All this, Mr. Speaker, in order to give—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. I must interrupt the parliamentary secretary to remind him that his time is now expired.

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that in moving such a motion our Social Credit friends are giving us the opportunity to make known to the government our position and reactions with regard to the high unemployment rate in this country. I am also glad to see that the Quebeckers are rising to condemn the nonchalance and carelessness of the present government.

Naturally, it is not from the ranks of the opposite side that has come the censure of the government policy. This is obvious. Mr. Speaker, it seems evident that for our friends on the other side Quebec will never be anything but a producer of Parliament members.

As soon as the Speech from the Throne was presented and even recently when the budget was debated, we expressed the most severe criticisms against the government because of its inability, which is almost built-in, to put back on its feet the economy of Canada as a whole and of Quebec in particular.

The "just society" they talked to us about, the "just society" they take care not to mention today, has produced an unemployment rate which can rightly be described as having only increased regional disparities in Canada during the last five years.

In Quebec, unemployment rate was 6.5 per cent in 1968, 6.9 per cent in 1969, 7.9 per cent in 1970, 8.2 per cent in 1971, 8.6 per cent in 1972 and, as our colleagues opposite would say—"To keep is strong"—the rate reached the shocking level of 10.2 per cent in January 1973.

Mr. Speaker, it is not because the Quebec ministers of State, among others, will get shortly a salary increase that will place them above their federal colleagues that one must believe that Quebec has solved its economic problems. Far from it! That example only shows the Liberal congenital helplessness when it comes to identifying genuine priorities.

Unemployment

What picture can we now draw of the province of Quebec? Its industrial production grows at a much slower rate than elsewhere; there is a 10.2 per cent rate of unemployment in Quebec; areas like the Lower St. Lawrence and the Gaspé peninsula are being deserted by their inhabitants because cost-shared development programs produced more red tape troubles than realistic solutions. Its agriculture is deteriorating—whether in the Eastern Townships, in the lake Saint-Jean area or elsewhere—because of the lack of a three-or five-year milk policy plan and because of the government's delay in solving the vital problem of feed grains in the East. Therefore, young farmers are deserting the farms and will sooner or later increase the number of unemployed people in cities.

In another field, industries such as the shoe industry, are running to seed in Quebec for the benefit of an ill-disciplined impor policy; youg people by the thousands are coming out every year of the CEGEPs and specialized schools only to find themselves face to face with the spectre of unemployment for the white collar workers; a small private business staggering with great difficulty in St. Hyacinthe or elsewhere and which sees large multinational corporations receive substantial grants without creating, in many cases, any new jobs.

That is the economic picture in Quebec. And brother governments—brothers in the election fund as well as in the arrogance that power gives them—are content with slogans like 100,000 jobs in April 1970 and 300,000 jobs in February 1973 without giving any concrete specific plan on which to base their forecasts.

The past speaks for the future and the people of Canada, in Quebec as elsewhere, have no more reason to believe in the favorable results of the recent budget then they had in those of previous budgets. We know it now, the new budget is even less expansionary than that of May 1972 considering the present political and economic context.

On the short run in 1973—because it is in 1973 that thousands of families in Quebec as well as elsewhere in this country are affected in their cost of living as well as their human dignity by unemployment—this government is satisfied, as we have seen, with a shy winter works program, some capital injected in programs which are really more of a plaster than a valuable plan of action.

It was indeed rather later before this government launched its winter works program, so late that provincial government and municipalities, particularly in Quebec, could no longer plan seriously any efficient program for 1972-73. No planning with this government. And instead of laughing at the winter works programs advocated by the Official Opposition this government should have used its energies to plan them a year ahead as we advocated during the last election campaign

Mr. Speaker, we have already committed ourselves to providing small Canadian businesses with direct incentives to promote their expansion, to increase progress opportunities and create more jobs. We have proposed to allow Canadian citizens to deduct from their income taxes half of any amount up to $5,000 which would be invested in small Canadian businesses. And in this manner, personal income tax could be brought down to $2,500 for the full life of the investment. This investment credit program would aim to encourage investments in small businesses and stimulate their expansion.

Small business, in Canada, is a vital sector of our economy, consuming more goods and services, paying more taxes and creating more jobs than any other sector. This pattern would be both an incentive and an inspiration for the youth of our country which is asking only for new opportunities, new careers. And we should take into consideration, Mr. Speaker, that half of those who are seeking work in Canada are young people under 25.

That was an example of concrete remedial action in the framework of our program, and a demonstration of the urgent necessity for replacement of the present government team.

Mr. Speaker, unless we are prepared to see an increase in the number of those who are discontented, disillusioned and anarchists, and to risk recurrences of the events of October 1970—I say so earnestly and vigorously—the time has come for decisions of the kind I have just outlined.

Mr. Speaker, the people of Canada, and those of Quebec particularly, are weary of being bandied from one level of government to another, from one election to the next, from one slogan to another.

With regard to current unemployment, especially in Quebec, it is true that, to borrow the words of the fabulist, all do not die, but—for the time being—all are stricken.

The whole country, Mr. Speaker, is looking forward to the advent of a humane government, that is aware of the ills of the day and that is capable of daring.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, first of all I wish to congratulate my colleague from Abitibi (Mr. Laprise), mover of the motion, on his excellent speech. To my mind, his was most constructive criticism and he suggested sound solutions. Whatever one may think, on rereading his speech, one realizes that it is really chockfull of ideas, including new suggestions to solve the problem now under discussion.

I must say also that I endorse his suggestions. I urge the government to consider and implement them as soon as possible: time is running short. At this point, in conscience we all have the imperative duty to help resolutely to solve the economic problem which distresses us. The suffering experienced by a vast number of families makes it rank first amongst our priorities and endows it with a sacred character. One only has to live in an area where unemployment is high and incomes are very low to be convinced of it.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to deal with one specific issue in the little time available to me, that is the Local Initiatives Program as a means to curb unemployment by creating new jobs.

The former Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Mackasey) stated rightly, during the last Parliament, that the program was directly intended to create jobs and thus provide direct income to those who did not have enough.

As it happened, the government widely advertised the program, raising many hopes in every area by suggesting that the new policy would create many jobs by implementing various community works which can only be launched with grants offered under the program. The people believed in the sincerity of the government. Then serious projects were submitted from all areas, but too many were rejected without a valid reason being given to warrant this refusal. We Social Credit party members very well know that this refusal is basically due to a lack of money, the fact that credits have run out. And when the minister sees his funds have run out, he suffers from anaemia and he must turn down projects. This is what happens in many cases under the Local Initiatives Program.

Thus, discontent, division, jealousy sprang up among people when noticing that such or such project was approved rather than another. Mr. Speaker, as an example I would like to quote a letter I received today from the good reverend of a parish struggling with misery and poverty. I am speaking of Sainte-Apolline in my riding, a parish of 1,000 to 1,200 souls, a great number of whom are on welfare. So, faithful to my mandate, I make it a point of duty to be his spokesman because he says in his letter to me, and I quote:

I have just received from the Department of Manpower and Immigration a reply concerning the project which the Fabrique de Ste-Apolline has proposed under the Local Initiatives Program.

• (2150)

This year as last year, the department's reply was no.

Last year, the reply was negative, as it is this year.

The municipality of Sainte-Apolline has obtained the same reply as the Church Council, and this also for the second consecutive year.

I am extremely sorry about that.

Recently, on a recent TV program Politique Atout, Mr. Marchand spoke of distributive justice. These are fancy words, but the facts are altogether different. Last year, in our area, the parishes of Saint-Marcel, Saint-Just and Berthier obtained funds allowing them to achieve their respective projects. This year, the same parishes again get their funds for their projects. This is probably the new distributive justice, that is always giving to the same people, to the friends . . . ? Who knows?

The points of suspension are quite meaningful.

Still more surprising is the fact that the parish of Berthier obtained last year a second budget to complete its project whereas, previously, for us the reply had been that the program budget was exhausted. Do they think that we are crazy? They know that that we cannot voice our opinion and they take advantage of it.

When I received the department's reply, I received at the same time a poster from the Canadian Catholic Organization for Development and Peace (an organization devoted to the underprivileged countries). I am sending it to you. All that is written on it concerns our condition, except that we must get out of it by ourselves. We can rely on nobody else. We should like to develop our area also, but our government refuses to help us because we represent nor a political gain nor a future market. In fact, our position is worse than that of the underdeveloped countries. Unfortunately, we are Canadians.

As I said above, we have nobody to speak on our behalf. Unlike the underdeveloped countries we do not have organizations as Development and Peace to carry our message. We still have the hon. member for our riding. Will you care to give us a voice, to transmit our message to those hon. members of Parliament? You may even invite them to come and visit us. But who will? This is what is so sad about it: we are not recognized.

Thank you for reading this letter to the end.

Denis Lepage,
curé of Ste. Apolline,

Montmagny.

Your message has been conveyed, Father. And I shall go on fighting to get something for your area, as for all areas in my constituency, in my province and in my country.

What were these people asking for? The renovation of a hall for community meetings, for young people's recreation, for older people to meet in order to know and understand one another better and spend as much time as possible working for their salvation and achieving material things with the resources of the community.

What was needed for the municipality's project? Help in developing these surroundings, which are most suitable for the tourist industry. So there were two very sound projects.

Mr. Speaker, this Protestant minister is right in what he says about the third world. I have spoken about it several times, not only in the House but whereever I have had the opportunity of meeting the population, so as to arouse the sense of responsibility of those who have power over this third world that we rub shoulders with every day without really noticing. It is a third world within our national boundaries.

I saw the Local Initiative Programme as an invitation to youth, to those still capable of achieving something with financial assistance from the State, and as an encouragement to return to work, that work ethic which is alas disappearing, but which is a formidable God-given tool for making into "retail" what He put "wholesale" on earth. Whatever the nature of our activities, whatever the field in which we work, work has always been and will always be a tool to enable us to achieve something, and that is what these people want.

I therefore call on the government to make considerable extra funds available to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras), so that he and his officials may in turn approve more projects, and so that the selection of these projects will not be subject to political pressures. But some advice should be sought at the source of the projects, from the persons responsible within the organizations, the intermediate bodies and the municipal councils. They are the ones who are in a position to advise the selection committees and to tell the officials about the degree of priority to be given to the most urgent projects in the community and in short . . .

An hon. Member: This is exactly what is being done.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): I am told that it is exactly what is being done. Then, I would like to know who are the ones who do so. I have often asked with whom we were to deal, but it is always a matter of secrecy.

It happened once that a project was approved; I was quite pleased, because it was the continuation of a long-term program meant to clean up a certain area and to enable the population to carry on summer-time recreational activities, because there was no lake in the area. Then, this project was approved by the officials, the contract was forwarded and later, by telephone, there was a request to return the contract quickly because there had been a mistake. One can therefore imagine how carefully the projects are selected!

I was pleased to see that this project had been approved. Why? Because it was logical, sensible and it enabled 87 people to work and earn a living, instead of wondering every morning about what they were going to do, with the continuing rise in the cost of living and their income remaining the same.

And, for sure, if there is anyone who knows how to encourage young people to work very hard and try to get over the difficult period which we are going through, I think I am the one, because I have always assumed my responsibilities in this field, and I shall continue to do so. But, please, let us make sure that small distant communities get from the government the same amount of attention as do the larger centres, for we find in those small communities human beings who want to live. They want not only to exist, but also to live truly in their country. That is why it is imperative that the necessary means be taken to reach them.

I would like, in closing my remarks to ask once again that substantial credits be granted immediately, before the unrest grows, in order that a greater number of people be employed doing something constructive.

Mr. Speaker, I am not the one who will tell those working on LIP projects to take all their time because those are government programs. I am always aware of my responsibilities and we should all together try to make the people understand that even if those are government-financed programs, each and every worker must try to give the best performance possible for that is the way we will generate a responsible spirit in the workers, develop our country and make possible the distribution of that enormous wealth to the whole population. Thus the ugly image of misery within wealth which we are experiencing, when there are fewer and fewer rich and more and more poor will at last disappear. Some people do not like hearing those words but it is our duty to say them. We have been elected by our constituents to represent them, attack the problems, find solutions and as far as I am concerned, that is what I will do as long as I live.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. It being 10 o'clock, it is my duty to inform the House that under Standing Order 58(11) proceedings on the motion are now completed.

POST OFFICE—POSSIBLE RESTORATION OF SIX DAY A WEEK DELIVERY

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, six years have elapsed since the former postmaster general, Eric Kierans, began the destruction of the Post Office Department in the name of efficiency. In sheer self-defence during the intervening period, more and more businessmen began using Her Majesty's mails less and less, and the Post Office has become the best friend of Canada's burgeoning private delivery businesses. As an example, in Toronto, where five years ago there were scarcely any private agencies engaged in this business, the metro Toronto phone book lists today no fewer than 85 firms which are prepared to guarantee same-day delivery within the city of both parcels and individual mailed pieces. I state this to demonstrate that the Post Office Department is in deep trouble. Now that we have a new Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet), I hope he will take action to resolve some of the current difficulties. I have been asking a series of questions over the last few weeks since this parliament began. I have gained the impression that the Postmaster General feels that all is for the best in the best of all possible worlds. I look at the official communications bulletin of the Post Office Department for January and read:

Ouellet's tour is a big success.

• (2200)

In French it is even more emphatic in that respect: it reads:

[Translation]

The minister's tour was a complete success.

[English]

I suppose that means "an absolute success."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dinsdale: That is nice work, patting yourselves on the back, because it comes from the minister's own publication. This dedication to efficiency has committed the Post Office Department to the process of mechanization. The intricate part of this is the postal code, which is so complex that the people of Canada are having difficulty understanding it. This is demonstrated by the propaganda efforts which the Post Office Department has established to help Canadians to interpret the postal code.

The Post Office Department spent $289,000 on a calendar, a commercial gimmick that is usually restricted to private enterprise. It is distributing a credit card holder. I suppose that is to help the bankrupt Canadians who are paying excess taxation. It will hold all the credit cards that are necessary to keep afloat because of the irresponsible fiscal policies of this government. It is spending $500,000 on general advertising which features slogans such as "Keep two pairs of plus fours". The idea is to have some kind of simple formula which makes it possible to understand the postal code.

I have some suggestions in this regard. For the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) we might have a code such as 02B 4T8. For Senator Forsey, I2C 4C4, and for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie), as he negotiates the auto pact, it might be B4U 2R1. I think the Post Office advertising suggests that after having come to these formulas, they should award the booby prize to the most successful formula. I would say that the Post Office Department should award itself the booby prize.

Not only are there problems of mechanization but at the moment rural and small town postmasters are having difficulty in getting a new contract settled. I am sure all members agree the rural post offices are the backbone of the nation's postal system. Mr. Kierans started a system of phasing out rural post offices. His successor, Mr. Côté, cancelled this, realizing that it was destroying our postal system. Unless an immediate settlement is obtained for the 8,000 rural and small town postmasters who are looking for a better contract than the one they now have, we shall be in serious difficulty. At the moment they receive as low as $1,000 a year. On an hourly rate, it is as low as 46 cents an hour, which is well below the federal minimum of $1.90 an hour.

Early decisions are necessary in coming to the solution of these negotiations. We do not want long, protracted negotiations like those which caused such an impact on the morale of the postal employees in connection with the agreement which has just been reached. The Post Office Department is being sued for unfair treatment when it took over the mail transportation in larger centres from the private contractors. At the time we said this was a mistake. I think there are official reports in the Post Office Department that stated it was a mistake to substitute public enterprise for private enterprise in this field. Obviously, this is being demonstrated in the action of the former mail carriers who are now sueing the Post Office.

Morale is low. Public good will has been dissipated. I trust the Postmaster General will do something to rescue our badly demoralized postal service. I have one final word on this score. The deputy postmaster general, speaking to the Canadian Circulation Audit Bureau Incorporated last Friday, indicated that he now knows where the problem is. They have introduced a bugging device that traces mail through the system. This is what Mr. Mackay had to say:

> We knew our service wasn't what it should be, but we were perhaps inclined to blame it on weather conditions and inability of airlines to fly from point to point, thereby delaying our mail.
> What we found instead was that the weather was a very minimal factor . . . Failure within our own processing system made up by far the majority of our breakdowns.

I say to the Postmaster General, "Physician, heal thyself."

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member I would like to say first that I am quite disappointed that he did not use his time to make meaningful proposals. It is quite easy for him to enumerate series of problems but I wish he had put forward a few suggestions which I would have accepted with much sympathy and which I would have tried to implement.

I would tell the hon. member that for many years our mail problems have certainly increased. If they have increased it is because unfortunately over the last 15 or 20 years no attention was paid to the deep transformation of the country, namely the exodus of people from rural to urban areas. The fact that each day in Toronto and Montreal some 5 million pieces of mail have to be sorted out demonstrates how urgent it is to mechanize our operations. That is what we undertook to do, that is what we are doing and that is what we will do. The mechanization of our operations will enable us to provide a better postal service.

The postal code to which the hon. member made a brief reference is an essential step that a great number of other countries have taken, and instead of making fun of it, the hon. member should use it because it has been applied in his own province, Manitoba, for two years. I should be interested to know if the hon. member knows by heart his own postal code and if he uses it.

I should ask him to make a campaign in favour of the postal code because it is to the extent that people understand they must use it that we will be able to provide a better postal service.

The hon. member referred briefly to legal proceedings. I think he will understand that since this matter is now sub judice I cannot deal with it.

But finally, since he dealt with several points, I should like to remind him that we are negotiating with rural postmasters. We are fully aware of existing deficiencies but negotiations are proceeding well and I hope that we will arrive at a settlement in the near future.

What we have been able to achieve with 28,000 postal workers, who signed a collective agreement—this, as the hon. member knows, is the first time we have arrived at an agreement with postal workers without facing a nationwide strike—proves that it is possible to reach agreements not only with all our employees, but also with our postmasters.

Far from sharing the hon. member's views, I believe that things are going much better in the Post Office department than formerly and that the Canadian public is entitled to hope that very shortly our automation, our postal code and our new labour contract will bring about better service in Canada.

FISHERIES—REQUEST FOR FEDERAL ACTION TO PROTECT SALMON SPAWNING STREAMS

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, on January 25 last, as will be found at page 638 of Hansard, I asked the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis) a question which appears under the heading "Request for Federal Action to Protect Salmon Spawning Streams". I felt this topic was worthy of further exploration with the minister so I put it down for discussion during this adjournment debate. My question was:

> In view of the indicated interest in the preservation of salmon spawning streams on the part of the government of British Columbia as evidenced by the suspension of logging in at least one salmon stream, is he prepared to request the approval of parliament for a beefed-up appropriation in order to catch up with the longstanding backlog of neglected salmon spawning streams in the province of British Columbia?

The minister replied:

Mr. Speaker, we certainly welcome the newfound interest of the government of British Columbia in salmon streams on the west coast. We have included more money in the budget to clear these streams.

Naturally, it is the question of the amount of money in the budget about which I am curious, and it is the one which we may have to explore further. In fact, the minister did provide a somewhat expanded answer in the remarks he made to the annual convention of the United Fishermen and Allied Workers' Union in Vancouver on February 5, as indicated in the notes of his speech which were circulated by his department. He said in part:

But there are thousands of streams, some small and some not so small, which flow directly into the sea. They can also be highly productive in so far as species like salmon and trout are concerned. Their rehabilitation could add as much as 50 per cent to our catch of these fish in recent years.

He went on to describe how in his second year as Minister of Fisheries he launched an attack on the problem of debris in small streams and suggested that his approach was twofold. He said:

One, we spent several hundred thousand dollars a year tidying up the streams themselves; two, we stepped up our efforts to persuade the B.C. forest service that a total, environmental approach to river basins would pay off.

Later in his remarks he added to his view about the recent action of the government of British Columbia when he said:

—I was glad to see the action which B.C.'s lands and forests minister, Bob Williams, took the other day. He backed our Fisheries people up on the Indian River.

That river is in my constituency, I may say. The minister went on to say:

This is a welcome change from the back-of-the-hand treatment we got from Ray Williston and some of his senior staff.

Should any member of this House think the minister's remarks were a little strong in that connection, I think any hon. member who recalls the situation that developed over the driving of logs on the Stellako River a few years ago, when the government of British Columbia insisted, in spite of a report signed jointly by officers of the federal fisheries department and the recreation and conservation branch of the provincial government that some 10 per cent of spawning in that stream was being destroyed by each year's drive, will know that I join the minister in welcoming some change in attitude. That fact is self-evident.

What about the question of providing more money? I have taken a quick look at the estimates for the forthcoming year. At this point I shall refer only to the description of the estimates of manpower and the increase in requirements. It is suggested there is an 8 per cent increase in the Manpower estimates for the fisheries and marine program, but the footnote says:

The increase is due primarily to the provision of increased protection services on rivers closed to salmon fishing, hiring of summer students and studies related to the Mackenzie Valley pipeline.

I take it the reference to increased protection refers to Atlantic salmon rivers. I suggest to the minister that he has a long way to go and that some of us will want to explore this question very seriously with him when we get to the estimates. As I read them, there is certainly nothing which indicates any real beefed-up program, at least as far as the coming fiscal year is concerned. I say frankly to the minister and the government, in almost 20 years since I first came to this House, I have not known the morale of the field officers in his department to be so low and despairing as it is at the present time.

They say that walls have ears. Members of Parliament have ears, and certainly to my knowledge this is my assessment of the case. I have some pictures here which I shall be pleased to show to the minister in the committee. One is a picture of the Indian River taken one half mile from the beach. It shows a log jam which has been there for the last four years, and the results after four years of attempts by his department to do something about clearing that jam.

I suggest that unless there is a realistic approach to clearing these streams with proper equipment and a proper approach to the necessary manpower, our hope of increasing by 50 per cent the catch from the streams, to which the minister referred in his speech in Vancouver, is a long way into the future. So far as I am concerned, I intend to do everything in my power to see that the fullest co-operation is provided to the federal Department of Fisheries and the field service officers by the appropriate people within the government of British Columbia.

I hope the fact that the present minister of lands and forests is also minister of recreation and conservation is a real indication that the government of British Columbia is taking a serious look at this question in the hope that there is a genuine and complete ecological approach to our land use in respect of the rivers and streams of the province of British Columbia.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett), who is normally knowledgeable in fishery matters, knows that one thing he said tonight is wrong. He said that the morale of our fisheries officers on the west coast had never been so low. It's wrong for the following reasons. Never before have the fisheries officers on the west coast had as much leverage, so much influence over the practices of the logging companies and the foresters as they have today.

One of the reasons is the increasing co-operation they are receiving from the provincial authorities. The new government in British Columbia has put together two former departments. One dealt with forestry, in other words the handling out of forest management licences; the other dealt with fish and game and recreation. The two are now one in one department of the environment, although it is not yet called that.

It is now possible for the fisheries service on the west coast to deal with a single department so that they are able to reconcile the often conflicting claims of the wildlife and recreational people, on the one side, including fisheries, and forest management practices on the other.

There has been an increasing understanding of the problem on the part of the forest industry and the companies themselves. The foresters today are much more conscious of the fisheries resource, wildlife and the need to preserve the watershed for all purposes than they were before. We have had very good co-operation from the industry. There have been many cases, of course, of logging practices which have continued to destroy salmon streams. For this reason we have to continue to prosecute companies. There have been several dozen prosecutions in recent years. The increase in this kind of discipline has helped the morale of our forestry officers as well.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni asked about our budget on the west coast. The notes I have received from the department say that the budget and the Manpower commitment have been increased so as to improve our initiative in protecting salmon streams from bad logging practices. The professional staff located on the west coast, and incidentally assigned to deal exclusively with fisheries problems on logging streams, has been increased. An additional fishery officer has now been hired and he will concentrate solely on logging problems on the west coast of Vancouver Island which was an area about which the hon. member expressed concern.

The hon. member referred to an incident earlier this year involving the Staghorn and Indian Creek area of Vancouver Island. The departmental people arranged a meeting on January 3 bringing together the B.C. Forest Products Company officials, the B.C. forest service and a group of concerned private citizens. They discussed the problem of debris in the streams and the company agreed to cease certain logging practices and to set certain sections aside to remain in the natural state along tributaries of the streams where salmon spawn. After the B.C. forest service reported back, the minister of lands, forest and waters for British Columbia announced that it would require the company to do what it had agreed to do voluntarily at the meetings convened earlier by the fisheries service.

To sum up, the reasons why morale is high on the west coast have been enumerated. There is more co-operation from the provincial forest service, there is a great deal more co-operation with the logging companies, and with more prosecutions they are making considerably more headway than ever was the case in the past.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—REQUEST FOR WITHDRAWAL OF INVITATION TO PRESIDENT AMIN OF UGANDA TO VISIT CANADA

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, on February 13 I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) if he would consider this government's formal invitation to President Amin of Uganda to visit Canada in August of this year. To support my objections I cited the inhuman and inhumane policies of dictator Amin toward non-black persons in his country.

Needless to say, I was rather surprised when the right hon. gentleman answered that it was this government's view that it should not intervene in the affairs of other Commonwealth nations. Further, the Prime Minister said that there is no provision for expelling a member of the Commonwealth. I must reject the statement that this government has not intervened in the affairs of other Commonwealth nations. The record of this government's condemnation of Rhodesia, to name only one example, is all too clear.

As to the question of expelling Uganda from the Commonwealth, I did not say nor did I imply that we should seek the expulsion of Uganda from the Commonwealth. But since the Prime Minister has raised the question I will address myself to it in a moment.

I will deal first with my reasons for objecting to the Canadian government extending a formal invitation or any other type of invitation to such a person as General Amin. General Amin's psychopathic reign of terror since he became dictator of Uganda is well known to all of us here but I would like to refresh the memory of hon. members on a few specifics. All hon. members are aware of the expulsion from Uganda of some 40,000 Asians. Their only crime was their racial origin; and they were not only expelled, they were stripped of all their personal possessions. They were given 90 days to leave the country, and some of them were second and third generation Ugandan citizens.

Canada accepted a large number of the Asians, and it is to our credit that we did so. But I waited in vain for Canada to register its indignation and condemnation of the Uganda president's actions in the United Nations, or at least to the Commonwealth. Our silence throughout this degrading and inhuman experience indicates a certain degree of approval.

Reports from Uganda a few months ago described a most disturbing and revolting situation involving the Uganda dictator. It was reported that he ordered 20 or more prisoners who had been convicted of minor offences removed from a village jail and tied to tables in the village square. General Amin then moved among the tables and assisted a group of soldiers to beat the prisoners to death with clubs. The general said that this would teach the villagers respect for the law. In the same vein, highly respected reporters for Reuters, AP and other agencies say that Uganda's soldiers are empowered to go about the country selecting people at random to be tried by military courts for minor offences, or even on trumped up charges, and then shot to death in the village squares.

General Amin announced early this month that he would expel Kenyans living in Uganda and confiscate their property if Kenyan newspapers did not stop reporting on his policies and practices. He has served notice on other non-black people in Uganda that they are more or less living on borrowed time. Everything that President Amin does, everything he believes in runs counter to everything that we in Canada hold in reverence. We have laws to ensure that people are not discriminated against in any way because of their race, colour, religion or for any reason whatever. General Amin's personal conduct, his political policies and his official practices generate deep revulsion in the hearts of most Canadians, and I have never heard anyone suggest that this man is a civilized human being.

This brings me to the second part of the Prime Minister's answer, the fact that he would not direct the Commonwealth in any way that would involve the censure of one government by another. I cannot accept this. As I mentioned before, I cannot help but feel that many people today interpret our silence in this matter to indicate at least some measure of acceptance. In my view it is irresponsible of us not to register our condemnation of this revolting conduct on the part of a Commonwealth nation.

The Prime Minister said that there was no provision for the removal of a member from the Commonwealth, and while I did not suggest that it should be done I must say in retrospect that it is too bad that there is no provision to expel a nation from the Commonwealth. A nation such as Uganda and a dictator such as General Amin are out of step with the Commonwealth's aims and objectives. There is no way that he can contribute to the well-being of other citizens of Commonwealth countries. There is no way that he can contribute anything worthwhile to the Commonwealth as an organization. General Amin is detracting from the ideals and the objectives of the Commonwealth in everything he says and does, but as a member of our organization he is getting a free ride at the expense of the other members.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would urge the Prime Minister to advise the President of Uganda that our government's invitation was in no way a formal or official invitation to our country. I would go so far as to suggest that the general would not be welcome at the Commonwealth conference in Canada in August. Failing that positive approach, I would at least ensure that the general was not accorded an official welcome when he arrives here. For our government to extend an invitation to General Amin to visit Canada implies a double standard in the conduct of our external affairs that I find objectionable and unacceptable and I urge the Prime Minister to reconsider his position in this matter.

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think it is no great secret that, as I am taking my first steps in the seraglio of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, my answer to the hon. member has been excellently prepared by the minister. I should have preferred the answer to be drawn up in French, as I am more at home in that language, but since it has alas been written in English, I will have to give it to the hon. member in English, but I suppose that will be just as acceptable to him.

Mr. Pelletier (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. Is the hon. member rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Pelletier (Sherbrooke): Yes, Mr. Speaker, unless it is a point of order.

I would like to know why the parliamentary secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs has not received the answer, which he must give in his mother tongue, in French. In the committee on External Affairs and National Defence, this happened twice, and I would like to know the reasons for it.

[Mr. Mitges.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I wish to call the attention of the hon. member to the fact that we have now reached the time of adjournment, which involves a procedure quite different from that we usually follow and, automatically, questions of privilege cannot be accepted. If the hon. member wishes to raise a particular point regarding the administration of the government or the operation of the House, I believe he will have to wait until tomorrow. Anyway, hon. members have had the opportunity of listening to his remarks, and I suggest that we should let the parliamentary secretary give his answer.

• (2230)

Mr. De Bané: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, but I wish to say that I understand quite well the reaction of the hon. member for Sherbrooke.

At all events, I shall continue the reading, in English, of the answer that was prepared for me.

[English]

This invitation represented our government's firm commitment to the Commonwealth and to the ideals which it espouses. As an association of nations which are at every stage of economic development, of diverse wages, cultures and institutions, the Commonwealth has the unique capacity to foster informal and intimate consultations concerning matters of common interest to the leaders of its 31 members.

As such, it is capable of exerting a beneficial influence in the promotion of international understanding and world peace. Nevertheless, one must remember that it is a voluntary association of independent sovereign states which derives its strength to promote international peace and progress from fruitful consultation and co-operation among its members.

The Commonwealth declaration issued by the heads of government at Singapore in January, 1971, affirms the association's belief in the benefits of fostering understanding among nations and firmly rejects coercion as an instrument of policy. Accordingly, the Commonwealth does not seek to impose policy upon its member states, particularly in the realm of domestic affairs.

Among the principles set out in the Commonwealth declaration is the statement that members——recognize racial prejudice as a dangerous sickness threatening the healthy development of the human race and racial discrimination as an unmitigated evil of society. Each of us will vigorously combat this evil within our own nation.

Membership in the Commonwealth, though stemming from a common heritage and tradition, is no less determined by a subscription to principles contained in the declaration. Yet there are no provisions for expelling a Commonwealth member for actions one or more nations believe to be contrary to the ideals of the association. The Commonwealth nations, however, can collectively express their displeasure if they so desire.

Canada's reaction to the expulsion of non-citizen Asian residents of Uganda is well known. Based upon the belief of all Canadians in equality and justice and the national inability to ignore the plight of human beings in need, we welcomed several thousand Ugandan refugees to Canada. This action was warmly welcomed by many within the international community but especially so within the Commonwealth.

With regard to the forthcoming Ottawa meeting, it must nevertheless be borne in mind that each head of government of all the member countries is entitled to attend such meetings wherever they are held. The decision to hold a meeting is taken jointly by all heads of government, and it is always the hope and expectation that they will personally attend whatever potentially divisive problems there may be. The conference should not be expected to resolve such problems, but it would be a retrogressive step if they were allowed to prevent the meeting together of all heads of government for their traditional intimate exchange of views and their examination of the progress of a number of practical initiatives since the last meeting. Canada is now taking its turn as host to one of these meetings. Although this government strongly disagrees with the policy of expulsion undertaken by President Amin—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. The Chair does not want to prevent the parliamentary secretary from giving his answer. Complaints were made earlier about the prepared text. Perhaps the Chair itself has a complaint to make to those who write such texts. Perhaps they should make them shorter, so that we can stick to the three minutes allocated for reply. We try to limit this period to 30 minutes, so that hon. members have seven minutes to express their views on the question they raised in the previous days and I think we must also ask the government spokesmen, whether parliamentary secretaries or ministers, to try and reply as much as possible within the prescribed time.

I think at this stage, it would be difficult to allow the parliamentary secretary, who has already exceeded by two minutes the time that was allocated to him, to complete his answer. Perhaps he could take advantage of the rest of the night to give it directly to the hon. member who raised the matter.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.38 p.m.

FINANCE

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY CRISIS—STATEMENT BY MINISTER ON MEETING IN PARIS OF FINANCE MINISTERS

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on Friday, March 9, I attended in Paris a meeting of finance ministers of the Group of Ten countries and of all members of the European Economic Community. The question before us was how best to relieve the speculative pressures affecting currency values which had led to the withdrawal of European and Japanese authorities from their exchange markets on March 2.

The meeting on Friday last permitted a useful exchange of views but could not arrive at any definite conclusions until the European countries had decided themselves whether to define fixed rates of exchange or to float and, if the latter, whether to float in unison or separately.

The Europeans made their own decisions Sunday night and, as is now known, beginning next Monday six countries will float jointly against the U.S. dollar; three others, the United Kingdom, Ireland and Italy, will for the time being float separately. Until next Monday, the European and Japanese markets will remain closed as they have been since March 2.

At a further meeting on Friday next which I shall be attending, there will be discussion of certain possibilities of co-operation between the European countries and others and we will no doubt discuss plans for expediting work now in train on the over-all reform of the monetary system.

Although the decisions taken last weekend do not have any direct, immediate consequences for Canada, I believe they will be helpful in reducing the speculative pressures that have been affecting certain exchange rates. By permitting the exchange rate system to react more directly to fundamental market forces, the decisions will set the stage for the basic reforms that are required.

Given Canada's great stake in foreign trade, we feel it is urgent to re-establish a calm, orderly international monetary regime and we shall participate actively in the international discussions and decisions directed to this vital objective.

This is a difficult time with respect to international trade and payments and much work lies ahead. While contributing all we can to the international discussions, we must make every effort to maintain the strength of our industries so that they will be able to meet competition and provide jobs for Canadians.

I am tabling with your permission, Mr. Speaker, copies of the communiqué issued in Paris, Friday, March 9, by our Group of Ten meeting and of the communiqué issued by the meeting of finance ministers of the European Economic Community in Brussels, Sunday, March 11.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, we are glad to see the minister with us today, knowing that he is making an interim report to cabinet. I would have hoped he would prepare a rather more informative statement for the House because, with all due respect, in many ways this statement is about as empty of real information as a good deal of the budget speech the minister made to the House some nights ago. Be that as it may, this conference, this meeting will perhaps mean in days to come that after some 25 years the principles of the Bretton Woods Agreement will be not only obsolescent in its present form but probably obsolete in that we have so many currencies now floating subject no doubt, as in Canada's case, to massive central bank intervention. We know that some 15 months ago the Bank of Canada did intervene massively when there was the prior crisis with regard to the United States dollar. It would be interesting to know how much intervention there is at the present time.

In the minister's statement we find the following:

> By permitting the exchange rate system to react more directly to fundamental market forces, the decisions will set the stage for the basic reforms that are required.

I simply enter the following caveat in that regard: Subject to the degree of central bank intervention which may totally distort the operations of the true market forces. In the press release tabled by the minister there is one sentence in paragraph four which leaves me wondering a little whether the ministers who met during this past weekend have not tried to find some convenient excuse by saying that the crisis was due to the speculative movement of funds. That in itself is an oversimplification. It may well reflect an inability to resolve the massive trade imbalances that have existed in respect of the grouping of problems within the Common Market.

• (1410)

The minister has indicated that the ministers unanimously expressed a determination to ensure jointly an orderly exchange rate system. Surely to goodness this does not even set the stage for the opening of multilateral trade talks this fall when a good many of the problems that underlie the speculative shifts where there is a surplus of a certain kind of currency floating about will be dealt with. Hopefully, this coming weekend we will get better reasoning than that expressed in paragraph four of the minister's press release.

International Monetary Crisis

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to express my appreciation to the Minister of Finance for giving us an advance copy of his statement. I hope he enjoyed his trip to Paris because it does not seem that there was any other reason for it except enjoyment. There does not seem to be much of a contribution that Canada has either made or could have made. I do not see that much has been accomplished by the meeting. Six countries have agreed to tie their currencies together and to allow them to float together. This still does not eliminate the speculation that will take place against those currencies in the future unless those six countries think that their currencies are strong enough that they can keep this kind of a tie while at the same time keeping the speculators off.

I do not think there has been much improvement or that we can have much optimism about the future of currency movements in the world. It seems to me that the real problem of speculation is not being faced by the Group of Ten and the Common Market group, and certainly it does not seem to have been faced by the Canadian government. One of the very real problems that exists is the action of the multinational corporations and their role in international speculation. To that extent we would like to get some information about what the Canadian banks are doing in this speculative fever that exists in the world. We can talk about the gnomes of Zurich, but there are some very respectable gnomes running around with all kinds of hot money disrupting international markets.

I think it is important that at some point the Minister of Finance give us some indication on the matter of policing and monitoring Canadian-based multinational corporations such as Inco and Brascan. For instance, did he raise this question at the meeting, or was the question raised at all by the other countries? Is there any movement in the direction of doing something to control the multinational corporations throughout the world that seem to act as independent agents contrary to the interests of the governments of the countries themselves? Unless the minister tells us that he is dealing with these matters, we can only hope, as I said earlier, that he had a very nice time and a nice trip to Paris.

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, all the problems arising today in the western world's different monetary systems almost make us, of the Social Credit Party, smile, because for many years we have precisely been denouncing such a system.

All currency fluctuations and related problems prove the impossibility of maintaining sound monetary balance within the present financial system. Each country, and that is the cause of the problem, wants to have a favourable commercial balance, which is materially impossible and leads to speculation on various currencies.

Mr. Speaker, all this happens because it is overlooked that money has no value except what it represents in goods or services. Canada should give the whole world a concrete example by establishing a monetary system truly based on the balance which should exist between currency on the one hand and production on the other. We would thus return to sound commercial transactions, by way of exchanging goods rather than by meaningless currency fluctuations.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

STATEMENT BY MINISTER ON BENEFIT CONTROL PROGRAM

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, last week I undertook to make a statement to the House on the benefit control program being applied to prevent payments of unemployment insurance benefits to persons not entitled under the act to receive them, and on the methods used by the Unemployment Insurance Commission to establish such errors and identify individual claimants who have been receiving such benefits.

Let me start by saying categorically that I am firmly convinced that the vast majority of Canadians now drawing unemployment insurance benefits are fully entitled to receive them by right of legislation enacted by parliament and by its true intent. I am equally determined that this majority of rightful claimants not be badgered or humiliated as a result of the commission's efforts to weed out the minority who, knowingly or unknowingly, are abusing the program.

Before outlining the ground rules by which unemployed Canadians are entitled to draw benefits, under the program described by the Canadian Labour Congress in its recent brief to the cabinet as "one of the best in the world," and the procedures now applied to ensure that this program and its reputation are not damaged by abuse, I can first report to hon. members two or three immediate steps that have been taken to protect rightful claimants against harassment.

At my request the Unemployment Insurance Advisory Committee, a nine-member body composed of four representatives of organized labour, four representatives of business, and Chairman Anatole Lesyk, Q.C., of Montreal, met this morning to undertake its own thorough study of the current benefit control operation, and other matters related to proposed amendments to the current act.

I can further report that all benefit control officers have been instructed that the need for thoroughness in their work does not and must not justify an overzealous approach or underhanded methods.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andras: Those instructions recognize as a fundamental principle that the most acceptable way to remove a claimant from the active file is to see him placed in suitable employment. They also include this emphasis on three basic rules of good conduct:

1. The benefit control officer must use courtesy and tact in the conduct of his investigations.

2. The use of leading questions in an attempt to have a person disqualified is strongly condemned by the commission.

3. The benefit control officer must recognize the particular circumstances of a claimant, and be prepared to assist those in need of help by referring them to the claimant assistance program.

If any hon. member of the House, on either side, knows of any specific instance in which these guidelines have been abused by officials of the commission, I would be grateful to receive any information that would help rectify any injustice.

But in fairness to the Unemployment Insurance Commission officials who have been under long and heavy pressure, first in the effort to design and put into operation a sweeping transformation and improvement of the unemployment insurance system and, second, to iron out the kinks that were unavoidable when changes so radical were made at the pace at which the new program was implemented, I must emphasize that my own investigation in the week since I committed myself to make this report to the House has not turned up any volume of specific instances of overzealousness.

Another measure I would like to say will come into being is the distribution of a pamphlet to all people drawing unemployment insurance benefits clearly setting forth their rights and obligations under the act and under the appeal system.

The duty of the benefit control officers is to detect violation of the law, and the law is quite clear. Section 25 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, reads as follows:

A claimant is not entitled to be paid benefit for any working day in an initial benefit period for which he fails to prove that he was either

(a) capable of and available for work and unable to obtain suitable employment on that day, or

(b) incapable of work by reason of any prescribed illness, injury or quarantine on that day.

Further, under Regulation 145 passed in July, 1972, all unemployment insurance claimants are specifically notified in writing, when they receive their first benefit payment, that they may be required to prove that they are actively seeking work. Registration with their local Canada Manpower Centre, or with their union hiring hall if this is the custom in their occupation, is required of all claimants. But this is not in itself in all cases sufficient proof of active search for a job, particularly in localities where suitable jobs are available but are not being filled.

• (1420)

With your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, I will digress here to urge all Canadian employers, and particularly those who have complained that the present unemployment insurance system has hampered their efforts to fill jobs, to register their vacancies with the Canada Manpower Centre. I cannot overemphasize the importance of this step in helping ensure that unemployed persons and unfilled jobs are quickly brought together.

Guided by information on job vacancies listed at Canada Manpower Centres, by the "help wanted" columns of newspapers and other local labour market information, offices of the Unemployment Insurance Commission implement Regulation 145 by sending job search statement forms to claimants whose occupational skills are known to be in demand in the locality in which they live. These forms ask the claimant to list the dates and details of efforts made to find work since filing claim for benefits, the persons contacted, the location at which the application was made, the type of work sought, and the results of the effort.

I repeat, these forms are to be sent only to claimants whose skills are known to be in demand in the area in which they live. This more sophisticated method of sorting out, by region and occupation, those claimants whose job skills are in local demand went into full operation at the beginning of this year. Its development began in mid-1972.

It relies on two basic tools. The first is an exhaustive classification of occupations of claimants. Second, special computer programs based on this classification make it possible to check the number of unfilled job openings in any area against the number of unemployment insurance claimants in that area who could fill those specific vacancies.

This does not mean that unemployment insurance claimants are disqualified by a computer. The computer programming is only a tool that guides benefit control officers to individuals who are drawing unemployment insurance benefits while living in an area where their occupational skills are in high demand.

These individuals are then interviewed, as a rule at home, by a benefit control officer, to determine whether they have been actively seeking work and are genuinely available for work. A report of the interview is written, to be signed by the claimant. Most commonly the report is written by the benefit control officer but the claimant is free to make changes or additions before signing it, and is free to refuse to sign. The report is made in two copies, with one kept by the claimant.

In some cases the accuracy of the answers given by the claimant is checked out discreetly by the benefit control officer.

The statement of the benefit control officer, and his report of the results of any subsequent investigation, are turned over to an insurance officer who decides, according to the act and the regulations, whether the claimant is entitled to continue drawing benefits. If the decision is that disentitlement is warranted, the claimant has the right, and is so informed, to appeal to a board of referees. These boards are independent bodies. Each includes a representative of the labour movement, a representative of the employers, and a chairman appointed by the government. The claimant has the right to present new evidence, not given to the benefit control officer in the original interview, to the board. Proof of search for work since the interview may lead to re-entitlement.

The investigations undertaken under this system have been described as "blitzes". In fact, in the large urban centres they are part of a continuing process. Only in the smaller communities do teams of benefit control interviewers move in for short periods, each officer interviewing an average of six claimants a day.

The rate of disqualifications resulting from the benefit control process has been startling. In the first nine weeks of 1973, of 62,879 claimants whose investigation was completed, 40,846, or 65 per cent, were disqualified.

It must be borne in mind that the number of completed investigations is only slightly more than 10 per cent of the total number of Canadians drawing unemployment insurance. Those investigated were pre-selected by the computer and classification system I have described. In areas where there are no jobs available, there are no investigations.

I take no satisfaction from this high rate of disqualification.

Few hon. members would quarrel with the results of an investigation in which it was learned that 32 claimants, normally residents of Calgary and Edmonton, had asked the commission during the height of the skiing season to mail their unemployment insurance cheques to a post office box which proved to be the address of the Banff Springs Hotel. Twenty-nine of them were disqualified.

But in the more common cases this process of investigation and disqualification when it is warranted is an unpleasant necessity. The existing Unemployment Insurance Commission was established to help Canadians afflicted by unemployment, not to hound or harass them. The benefit of any doubt must still go to the individual.

The program cannot, however, fulfil its goal of helping the genuinely unemployed maintain a decent life unless it is both fair and seen to be fair. It must be fair to the unemployed who are sincere in wanting work, to the employees and employers who pay premiums, and to the Canadian taxpayers, who pay a substantial share of its cost in times of high unemployment.

It is to protect this essential condition of the program's survival, and guard its acceptability in the eyes of the majority of Canadians, who will support a generous program if they are assured that it is not being abused and exploited, that these new and more effective benefit control procedures have been developed and put into effect.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for giving me ample time to at least peruse the statement he has made in order for me to be able to make some comments. I certainly welcome the statement, subject to certain matters which I will bring to the minister's attention.

I am pleased to note the minister has indicated there will be no badgering or unnecessary harassment of those who are entitled to claims. I was pleased to hear the minister state that the program "must be fair to the unemployed who are sincere in wanting work, to the employees and employers who pay premiums, and to the Canadian taxpayers, who pay a substantial share of its cost in times of high unemployment." Another paragraph in the minister's statement is even more significant: "It is to protect this essential condition of the program's survival and guard its acceptability in the eyes of the majority of Canadians, who will support a generous program if they are assured that it is not being abused and exploited, that these new and more effective benefit control procedures have been developed and put into effect."

As I listened to the minister trying to justify the unjustifiable, it took me back to the days when this act was first brought before the House of Commons. At that time, we on this side indicated to the minister that there was something wrong with the act in view of the fact it amalgamated or integrated insurance and welfare. We stated that as a result there would be significant problems, the likes of which we did not know. Now we do know what it is all about.

I was not only surprised but flabbergasted when I read of the investigation that took place in the Hamilton-Toronto area where some 20,000 out of 28,000 investigated were either disqualified or threatened with disqualification. I am not a mathematician, but that seems to be approximately 70 per cent. That is a far cry from the 3 per cent or 4 per cent we have been told were cheating. I do not have any qualms about the type of language I use. Cheaters and chisellers must go. This is the cry of all members of the House and the Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: My friends to the left may say that is a right wing philosophy, but we are talking about tax dollars and trying to make a very difficult act work. When we were on the hustings during the election campaign, we stated we would like to bring in the Auditor General in order to ascertain how much the Unemployment Insurance Act is costing the people. We have since heard it is some $2 billion. We also indicated that abuses should be cut down. In this regard I am pleased to see we are moving in that direction. We also stated we would tighten up the administration. All these things are now coming into focus.

I do not want it left that, through overzealousness on the part of benefit control officers, those who are rightfully entitled will be cut off to their detriment. It seems to me that the way in which we are now approaching this matter is a proper way as long as we understand it should be done with compassion and understanding for those rightfully in need.

There is also the problem of the appeal board. I respectfully suggest that the minister must direct his attention to this area because I heard him say there has not been a significant number of appeals since the investigations began. However, I can vouch for the fact there will be appeals for the simple reason the act allows for appeals. There will be those who, through some quirk of fate, overzealousness or for some other reason are denied benefits and when they are denied they will take advantage of the appeal procedures under the act.

• (1430)

I note that the minister, as promised, has referred this question to the advisory committee. I understand, also, that he has referred other matters to that committee in connection with proposed amendments to the existing act. I hope that in due course the minister will enlighten the House as to these other matters, related to the Unemployment Insurance Act, which he has directed to the committee's attention in order that we may know just what is being studied.

Of equal concern to me is the fact that the minister, in order to show some awareness of the problem, did introduce Bill C-125 but has not referred it to the standing committee to provide Members of Parliament as well as representatives of labour, employers and other concerned people with an opportunity to become involved in discussion of this legislation. It now seems to me, from the announcements I have heard, that the minister is attempting to amend the act by way of administrative or ministerial directive rather than giving representatives of labour, management and other groups, as well as Members of Parliament, the opportunity to delve into the subject matter of this bill.

I notice, also, that a report is still awaited from the advisory committee. The minister did not tell us whether this report was needed before he would introduce a modified or amended Bill C-125. I wish he had cleared up this point, because I should like to see a bill of some kind introduced rather than action be taken by way of administrative direction. The former course would allow hon. members to give the minister the benefit of their expertise.

In giving direction to the benefit control officers the minister indicated that these officers must recognize the particular situation in which claimants find themselves and assist those in need of help. Many people in Canada fall into this latter category; because of difficulty in adjusting to language or culture they are left at some disadvantage. I hope the minister realizes that in certain areas, particularly in our larger urban areas, this can be a serious problem. A great many people really do not know what is going on, and because of harassment in the past they are often afraid of the type of person who is involved in carrying out these inquiries. I hope that in our major urban centres, to which most of our immigrants are attracted, this situation will be kept carefully in mind and that those concerned will be treated with understanding.

The minister talked about availability for work and suitability for employment. I hope he realizes that in many instances people go across this land looking for work in all sincerity, but because of gentlemen's agreements, shall we say, based on attitudes toward sex, race or colour, they are denied employment. I see the minister shaking his head. This is something else we have to be extremely careful about; I hope the benefit control officers are aware that such a situation does exist in Canada. Mr. Speaker, I see I am running out of time.

An hon. Member: You already have.

Mr. Alexander: I hear a smart-aleck on the other side saying I already have. I want to let you know, Mr. Speaker, that you are the only one in this House who can chastise me in the sense of putting me down. Until that happens, I shall continue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: I do not care what the Minister of Manpower and Immigration does with respect to this act until such time as the government realizes that the only solution to this dilemma is a full employment policy. If it so chooses, the government can even steal some of the policies we have outlined—

An hon. Member: You would not vote for them if we did.

Mr. Alexander: —in terms of an expansionary budget and measures to stimulate the economy from which employment would be derived. It is time the government took an attitude similar to that adopted by the United States where unemployment has now fallen to something like 5 per cent. In West Germany and Japan, unemployment is just about negligible. Until the government changes its course, we shall always experience problems in connection with the Unemployment Insurance Act.

In closing, I should like to say I welcome the minister's statement. I hope, though, that the advice which will be offered to him both by members of my party and by hon. members in the party to my left will be sympathetically received, because he has entered a very dangerous area. The cheats and chisellers should go. We should take action in this direction without hesitation. But in doing so we must take care that those who are entitled to benefits, and who are paying for the scheme, are not unduly harassed or cut off without good reason.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andras: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am sure the hon. member for Hamilton West would wish to join me in correcting any possible erroneous impression that might have been left inadvertently by one comment he made. I think it extremely important that the facts be put clearly before the people. He quoted a statistic to the effect that 28,000 claimants had been examined and 20,000 had been disqualified, or 70 per cent of those examined. The total number of claimants in that area was 120,000. That is bad enough, but the number disqualified did not amount to 70 per cent of the claimants.

Mr. Stanfield: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I did not object to the length of the minister's statement because this is an important subject, but I do not think that after making such a lengthy statement the minister should raise a phony point of order.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: The minister's intervention is, of course, highly unusual. I thought I said that of 28,000 claimants investigated 20,000 had either been disqualified or threatened with disqualification, out of a total number of some 100,000-odd claimants. But let me add this—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: The minister raised the point of order. I shall continue to speak on the point of order. I wish to repeat one sentence in the minister's statement. He said: "In the first nine weeks of 1973, of 62,879 claimants whose cases were investigated, 40,846, or 65 per cent, were disqualified." I now sit down.

Some hon. Members: Read the next paragraph.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If I were to make a ruling I would have to say, of course, that the point of order was not well taken in that it was a matter of debate. The minister sought to correct what he thought was a mis-Statement and the hon. member for Hamilton West did the same thing in respect of the minister. I think we should get on now and hear the hon. member for Nickel Belt.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, as a newcomer to this House I believe I bring some kind of unbiased view to this whole situation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

• (1440)

Mr. Rodriguez: It waxes strange that this government, which created high unemployment in order to fight inflation, which was responsible for this monster that it let loose among the Canadian people, had to do something about the large numbers who became unemployed and brought the new Unemployment Insurance Act into being. We in this party applauded that act because it took care of and looked after the interests of those who had become the victims of the massive war against inflation that created unemployment.

We in this party have never condoned the actions of those who cheat in any social or corporate program. We fully realize, as studies will verify, that about 2 per cent of the people affected cheat in any social program. The minister himself, in his statement, said he is firmly convinced that the vast majority of Canadians now drawing unemployment insurance benefits are fully entitled to receive those payments as of right according to law. Having said that, he went on to pick out one small example among the minority of claimants and referred to people in Calgary or Edmonton who went skiing and had their unemployment insurance cheques mailed to them. If he is so concerned about the rights of those who have an entitlement to unemployment insurance being criticized in the press, why has he lampooned a small number of those who are collecting unemployment insurance incorrectly? We suggest that this statement will only serve to reinforce the reactionary thinking of those who are against the vast numbers of people legally collecting unemployment insurance.

This party has never faulted the act and what it seeks to do, nor the broadening of the act which is necessary to cover those who are the victims in this war. Yet we do criticize the administration of the act. We feel that the act is administered in a very inhumane fashion.

May I speak briefly about the benefit control officers. Apparently the minister has instructed them to follow three particular aspects of a certain code of ethics. The minister may not be aware of some of the questions that are being asked. As recently as last week I learned of a fellow who had been a university lecturer and had earned $10,000 a year for two years. He became unemployed following a cutback in university spending. He was laid off and collected unemployment insurance. Then he was visited by a benefit control officer who asked him what salary he would accept. The man answered, "$10,000 a year", because that was the salary he had earned for the past two years. One week later he received notification from the commission saying that he was limiting his opportunities for employment by saying he would accept only $10,000 a year and his unemployment insurance benefits were cut off. That is only one example. I could list many such examples. I deal with 52 unemployment insurance cases a week involving my local office. I will gladly give the minister several examples showing that the administration of the act is at fault.

This party has always held that social programs such as unemployment insurance exist to help people. The Unemployment Insurance Act is supposed to help them over the rough stages until they can again obtain employment. Instead, we find, that they are being used to feed reactionary thinking across the country. What the government ought to do to solve this problem is expand the economy so that jobs will be created and there will be an opportunity for anyone wanting work to obtain a job.

The only thing we applaud in the statement of the minister is his intention to have the advisory committee of the UIC take a look at the whole matter of benefit control and the way in which it is implemented across the country. We support that aspect of the program. The rest of the statement, I repeat, concerns a small number of claimants and that part of it merely feeds the fires of reactionary thinking among members to my right.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, I cannot help mentioning first that we have received the statement in English. I accept the apologies of the minister, but I would point out to him that one way of reducing unemployment would be to hire more translators.

I also wish to say that temporary amendments such as those suggested will not solve the problem. The legislation is too complicated and is difficult to put into effect. The Canadian people do not understand legislation which is too complicated. Mistakes have increased last winter and it was worse this winter. Some workers waited three months before being paid; I met some during the weekend who filed claims at the end of November and who have not yet been paid.

I do not necessarily criticize the public servants, because I admit that some are good; they are not all good but several are conscious of their responsibilities. However they are administering an almost unworkable piece of legislation due to all kinds of administrative complexities which the workers cannot easily understand.

I have already mentioned this in committee but not too often, because I do not monopolize the time allotted to others. However, I would like legislation prepared for workers to be drawn up in terms clear enough to enable them to understand it.

I will not dwell on this matter now; I suppose that an amendment to the legislation will be introduced. I feel that another bill should be brought in to clear up the situation.

One important point that must be borne in mind is decentralization. Centralization of benefit payments in one regional office has resulted in the installation of computers which should hasten the solution to late payments. Thousands of unemployed go through an unfortunate experience in this field. They must wait for months, as I said earlier, before getting their first benefit cheque. This situation is inconceivable not to say revolting.

I suggest here that payments ought to be made in district offices and if the government really wants to improve the fate of thousands of unemployed, it must take some practical means, including decentralization. This is why I insist that they ought to introduce clearly written legislation and prepare regulations enabling understanding officials—and I know that some of them are—to truly assist the unemployed by administering in a humane way social legislation. Public servants would do well to remember that they are the servants of the people not despots, that a nation is made up of individuals not robots. The unemployed may be without work but not necessarily without sense. They see what is happening. Public servants and technocrats who draft legislation should also bear in mind that they are paid by the people who in return expect services and not troubles.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and I do so because of the unemployment figures released today. Some 87,000 Canadians cannot find employment in the Atlantic provinces. The rate of unemployment in my own province of Newfoundland is almost three times the national average. In light of the obvious failure of Department of Regional Economic Expansion programs to achieve any substantial or decent increase in employment opportunities in the Atlantic region—I suggest that this motion is similar to a motion I moved when the figures were issued last month, and I commend it to the government House leader who is a distinguished minister from the Atlantic provinces—I move, seconded by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan):

That in the opinion of this House the Prime Minister should immediately arrange a conference between the Atlantic provinces and the federal government on alternative economic opportunities for the region, and that the federal government outline its short and medium term targets to reduce unemployment and to ameliorate the present disastrous situation in the Atlantic provinces.

Mr. Speaker: The motion proposed by the hon. member for St. John's East under the terms of Standing Order 43 requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimity?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. The motion cannot be put at this time.

REQUIREMENT OF PROOF OF EFFORTS TO SECURE EMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to discuss a matter of the utmost importance for some Canadians.

My motion concerns employees of various federal and provincial government departments who are dismissed due to a lack of funds, and most road construction and maintenance workers. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin):

That this House require that any Canadian worker who is laid-off on a temporary basis for a period not exceeding six months be exempted from applying to other employers in order to prove that he is not working and thus eligible for unemployment insurance benefits; this would be a recognition that our economic system and our climate make such temporary lay-offs inevitable, affecting thousands of Canadians every year.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion introduced by the hon. member for Portneuf. Under Standing Order 43, the motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent, and the motion cannot be put.

AIR TRANSPORT

CHARTER FARES PAYABLE BY CANADIANS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Reg Stackhouse (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, namely, the fact that under the new advance booking charter regulations Canadians flying to the United Kingdom will pay higher fares than passengers on charter flights from the United Kingdom to Canada. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That the House advise the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) that he urge the Canadian Transport Commission to revise its A.B.C. regulations so that they will permit a more equitable air fare schedule commensurate with the fares being charged by carriers operating out of European points.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Scarborough East. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity. The motion cannot be put at this time.

MANPOWER

DIRECTIVE ESTABLISHING PRIORITY IN JOB REFERRALS—RELATIONSHIP TO SKILLS AND NEEDS OF EMPLOYERS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration arising from an alleged directive to manpower offices which seems to me to represent a significant change of policy. Has the minister instructed his department to give absolute priority in referrals for all jobs, including on the job training, to unemployment insurance claimants in the first instance, welfare recipients in the second instance, and other unemployed persons in the third instance? If so, does this mean that the policy of the department is now one of high selectivity, seemingly ignoring suitability of skills and the needs of employers as well as of other Canadians?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the deputy minister sent a dispatch to director generals of the department last Friday, I believe it was. I think the words quoted by the hon. member are accurate, but they should be taken in context with other regulations and other manuals of instruction. Unquestionably in every case suitability for work is the supreme criterion that is used and after that the priorities as indicated would follow.

Mr. Alexander: I take it, in light of the minister's answer, that this directive was sent with the consent and knowledge of the minister. In light of the fact that the decision taken by the minister seems to contradict flagrantly the Unemployment Insurance Act, as it would appear that amendments are being made by administrative procedure and regulation, can the minister advise whether he has abandoned the introduction of a modified or amended Bill C-125 in order to deal with the problems in the act, or does he intend to continue bringing about regulations without seeking the advice of parliament, labour and management?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, it is, of course, a legal opinion, but I would think that the hon. member's question is based on a wrong premise when he says that this in fact contradicts the terms of the Unemployment Insurance Act. As I said in my earlier answer, the question of suitability for work and capability of handling a job is paramount in referring people to employers to fill job vacancies.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister would answer the question and advise whether he is going to continue modifying the act by way of regulations and ministerial direction, or is he going to bring in a modified or amended Bill C-125 to deal with this situation?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I do not think we are attempting to modify the act by administrative change or by regulation. The answer is that Bill C-125 is on the order paper and will be brought forward in the House in due course.

[Mr. Speaker.]

DIRECTIVE ESTABLISHING PRIORITY IN JOB REFERRALS—POSITION OF HOUSEWIVES, DISABLED VETERANS AND STUDENTS

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. We feel that there is a change in policy here. In view of this shift in policy, would the minister advise the House what priority people such as housewives, disabled veterans and students who are seeking to enter the labour force will now have? Does the minister not believe that the manpower services should be for the benefit of all who desire those services on a first come, first served basis?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are procedural difficulties in the hon. member's question. The question was preceded by a statement or allegation, which is not in order, but I am willing to overlook this. The second part of the question appeared to be an argument more than a question. However, perhaps the minister might be allowed to reply briefly.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I do not think this is proposing any discrimination. I think it simply makes good sense to establish some order of priority. Veterans and students within the unemployment insurance claimant rolls, veterans and students within social welfare rolls, veterans, students and straight unemployed, will be given priority within those particular categories over others. We are simply saying that in that very broad general categorization there is a sequence of choices. I think that makes ordinary common sense.

DIRECTIVE ESTABLISHING PRIORITY IN JOB REFERRALS—PRIOR CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the second-class rating of welfare recipients in job placement and job retraining programs through the manpower offices, did the minister consult with the provinces before instituting such policy?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we are not going to permit any such thing as second-class citizens in this situation. I explained last night at some considerable length, though perhaps not very ably, that we are preparing and launching special programs for people of the sort described by the hon. member.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Peel South): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister tell the House whether the change in priority for those who receive retraining will improve the unemployment statistics?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I would hope that everything we do is bent that way.

Mr. Blenkarn: Would the minister advise the House whether this is just another method of cooking the books at the expense of those on welfare or chronically unemployed?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question, of course, is out of order.

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister aware of what this directive does to non-unionized labour in rural areas across the country?

Mr. Andras: Quite frankly, no, Mr. Speaker. I would be very interested in the hon. member's thinking on that one.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

ALLEGATION THAT BENEFIT CONTROL OFFICERS WORK ON QUOTA SYSTEM—REQUEST FOR CHANGE

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. I have been told on good authority that benefit control officers are being forced to work on a quota system. Would the minister responsible for the Unemployment Insurance Commission issue orders immediately to rescind these instructions?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I just cannot believe that is the case, but if there is any possibility of that taking place I will search for it and take action forthwith.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are supplementaries on this matter. Before pursuing the subject the Chair recognizes the hon. member for Lotbinière.

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—ANNOUNCEMENT BY MINISTER OF TRANSPORT OF APPROVED PROJECTS—DISCUSSION BETWEEN MINISTERS CONCERNED

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Manpower and Immigration who is at the same time accountable to the House for the Local Initiatives Program.

Is he aware that the Minister of Transport announces to the sponsors of the projects, to some of them at least, that their project has been accepted by the government and, if so, is it pursuant to a cabinet decision?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the final authority for rejection or acceptance of local initiative projects is, fortunately or unfortunately, totally mine.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Manpower and Immigration if he has had discussions with the hon. Minister of Transport asking him to announce to project sponsors the acceptance of some projects? Has such a discussion or agreement taken place between both ministers?

[English]

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I do not remember any precise discussion between the Minister of Transport and myself. I might say I think I have had discussions about local initiative projects with almost every member of the House at one stage or another.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I wish to put another supplementary.

Could the Minister of Manpower and Immigration tell us then how is it that the Minister of Transport sent the following letter to a citizen in Victoriaville and I quote:

I am pleased to advise you that the project you have submitted under the Program—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member should put his question. I do not think it is possible to quote letters or telegrams in support of questions. The hon. member should ask his question directly without reading the text of the letter to which he wants to refer.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

On answering my first question, the minister said there was no such undertaking. He then said he was fully responsible for the administration of his department. I think this is a question of privilege since he has misinformed the House. In fact, there was indeed a letter that was sent out into my constituency. I will indicate that there is indeed a matter of personal privilege and I quote this letter:

I am pleased to announce that the project you have presented under the Local Initiatives Program has been accepted—

—"has been accepted—"

—and the necessary funds for its completion will be granted.

Mr. Speaker, it is a very serious matter when the Minister of Transport says: Your project has been accepted and the necessary funds for its completion will be granted. That means that the Minister of Transport in that letter signed by himself was committing amounts of money from the Department of Manpower and Immigration.

One week later, an official of the Department of Manpower and Immigration sent a letter to the effect—

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I say to the hon. member that we are losing rather precious time. In the past I have suggested to hon. members—and I think I have had the support of the hon. member for Lotbinière in that regard—that we loose precious time during the question period by raising questions of privilege and points of order. I think the hon. member will co-operate with the Chair and other hon. members by indicating as quickly as possible what his question of privilege is and how his rights have been encroached upon.

Mr. Fortin: With pleasure, Mr. Speaker. I believe my rights have been encroached upon for the following reasons. First, according to the agreement announced by the minister hon. members were to be informed of those projects, and that was not done in that case; second, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration said a moment ago that there had been no agreement with any other minister to announce the project, and that is wrong according to the letter I have just read; third, the people in my riding who submitted this project were misled because one week after they received a letter from the Department of Manpower and Immigration to the effect that their project had been refused; fourth, I would like to say with respect that hon. members cannot get an honest, straight and clear answer from the Department of Manpower and Immigration in that regard while at the same time the Minister of Transport is playing politics in our ridings instead of dealing with the department for which he is responsible.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): I should like to say a word about the question of privilege. I happened by chance to visit the constituency of Lotbinière during the last election campaign, and heard the hon. member boasting that he had managed to get at least 15 projects approved by the department as part of the Local Initiative and Opportunities for Youth program. So I am congratulating him.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member kindly be seated. I do not see why the question period should be taken up with arguing out the matter raised by the hon. member for Lotbinière. He is obviously at disagreement with the Minister of Transport over what may or may not have been told to one or more voters in the constituency of Lotbinière. I seriously doubt if we should spend very much more time on this matter.

Mr. Fortin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The hon. Minister of Transport has just misled the House once again, and seriously so, since I never claimed to have obtained approval for a local initiative project for my constituency; I have never announced one. If I did announce or say during the election campaign that several projects had been adopted, it was to show how false was the Liberals' theory that one had to be in power in a constituency for it to be eligible. And I would like to point out that the minister's visit helped me a great deal, since I had a majority of 11,000.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member for Lotbinière will let us, we will now return to the oral question period. I trust that we shall now be able to hear some questions and answers rather than questions of privilege.

[Mr. Speaker.]

DIRECTIVE ESTABLISHING PRIORITY IN JOB REFERRALS—EFFECT ON YOUNG PEOPLE SEEKING FIRST EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the high level of unemployment among Canadians under age 25 I should like to ask the minister whether, in authorizing this directive with regard to beneficial treatment related to job vacancies in terms of length of time on unemployment insurance, the minister has considered the effect of the directive on the employment opportunities for young Canadians seeking employment for the first time? If so, has he made any calculation as to how much longer young Canadians will have to wait to get jobs in view of the directive he has issued?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I outlined again at some length last night, perhaps not clearly but it is on the record, many programs that we direct to people under age 24 or age 25. We are very concerned about this. It represents a high rate of unemployment because they form the largest single group of the unemployed among our labour force. We are taking a great many measures to alleviate their distress due to unemployment. I do not think this establishment of priorities, however, would inhibit their possibility of obtaining employment, but I am quite willing to review it. I will take advice from hon. members opposite and look over the situation.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT AMONG YOUTH—POSSIBLE ADDITIONAL PROGRAMS TO ALLEVIATE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary which I will address to the Prime Minister. I should like to ask him whether his government intends to announce, with the coming of spring and summer, programs in addition to those announced a while ago by the Secretary of State with regard to the creation of employment. I ask this in view of the fact that, comparing February of this year with February of last year, or January of this year with January of last year, the percentage of those under age 25 out of work seems to have remained constant although the actual number has increased.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the question relates to events which might happen later in the spring and summer, perhaps the Leader of the Opposition would like to put it on the order paper.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: There is sympathy for the unemployed.

An hon. Member: The same old arrogance.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I am quite prepared to let young Canadians assess that response themselves.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

UNEMPLOYMENT AMONG YOUTH—REQUEST FOR FORECAST AND PROJECTED TARGET FOR 1973

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance a question. In view of the projection made by the minister or his officials that the seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment is expected to drop to approximately 5.2 per cent, has he any forecast as to the drop, if any, in the rate of unemployment among those under the age of 25 and, therefore, what the projected target is for 1973 in light of the 5.2 per cent over-all figure.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the preamble to the hon. member's question, the forecast of the drop in the rate which may or may not have been made by my officials was based, as was indicated at that briefing session, on a number of inter-related assumptions. As to the current situation, although it is no comfort to those men and women still out of work, particularly young men and women, I think the House can take some satisfaction from the fact that the seasonally adjusted rate has dropped again this month.

Some hon. Members: Answer the question.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): As to a forecast regarding how many men and women under the age of 25 will be out of work, I cannot give that to the House. As to my target, the hon. member knows it; I have given it on several occasions.

An hon. Member: What is it?

UNEMPLOYMENT—POSSIBILITY OF CONTINUING DROP IN ACCORDANCE WITH GOVERNMENT FORECAST

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Given the fact that the unemployment rate in January and February of 1973 was precisely the same as that in 1972, has the Department of Finance found any indication in the structure of unemployment we now have to suggest that the unemployment rate will continue to drop in the way they have forecast?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): The hon. gentleman knows the basis of the inter-relationship between growth of the labour force and growth in jobs. I would refer him to the statement of Statistics Canada today that we registered an increase in the actual employment of 90,000 in February, which is the largest gain on record for this month in the history of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: Given the fact that the rate of unemployment is not reducing in the country, will the minister give further consideration to introducing supplementary budgetary proposals which would expand the economy further?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The fact that the hon. gentleman wants to give me is not a fact.

UNEMPLOYMENT IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT POLICIES TO ALLEVIATE

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

An hon. Member: Better be careful; he's touchy today.

Mr. Lundrigan: In view of the very disturbing news today, which is a matter of concern to all Canadians, about the further increase in the unemployment insurance rate in the Atlantic provinces, coinciding with the prediction of OECD, and specifically with New Brunswick rising from 19,000 to 31,000 and Newfoundland from 23,000 to 28,000, in other words, a 1.5 per cent increase in these provinces, would the right hon. Prime Minister tell the House now what he is going to do about it?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member was not referring to the unemployment insurance rate but to the unemployment rate. I will consider the question and if we have any announcements to make I will make them in due course.

Mr. Lundrigan: In view of the fact that we have had this situation now almost since the time this government was formed in 1968, despite the existence of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, and in view of the fact that a number of government policies are running completely counter to the efforts of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, can the Prime Minister say whether his government has the courage to take issue with the transportation policies? Is it willing to review the tariff policies? Is it willing to review the inflexibility of the incentive policies—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will appreciate that his question is certainly more a speech than a question. It sounds like four questions.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I am asking the Prime Minister a question regarding tariffs, transportation, cost-sharing and banking policies. Is the government willing to make a major review of the policies of the government that are running completely counter to the efforts and aims of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, which might be the biggest influence and be the most important reason why, despite the efforts of that department—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That, of course, is not a question.

Mr. Lundrigan: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, at least I have made some kind of representation to the Prime Minister which has to do with the fundamental policies of the government. I am asking the Prime Minister, as he keeps on writing away after having returned from his Caribbean holiday, whether he will give these matters the serious consideration they deserve?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Scarborough West.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I am not going to give up unless the Prime Minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should resume his seat. He has said himself that he was not asking a question but making a representation, which is his right. But I suggest to the hon. member that the way the question was put it was not really a question but a representation, as he himself has said. He has to assume that notice has been taken of his representation.

Mr. Lundrigan: May I say, with the greatest respect, Your Honour, that we have been waiting for five years to have this representation acknowledged.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Scarborough West.

Mr. Lundrigan: All I am saying to the right hon. Prime Minister, through you, Sir, is that we expect the Prime Minister to acknowledge the representation, and to indicate whether or not he is willing to look at these policies. It is no good for us in the Atlantic provinces to know only that we have made a representation. We want to know whether the Prime Minister is going to consider the matters that we have placed before him today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has recognized the hon. member for Scarborough West. If there are supplementary questions, I will return to hon. members who have them in a moment.

HOUSING

ALLEGED DECLINE IN PRIVATE INVESTMENT IN RESIDENTIAL CONSTRUCTION—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO STIMULATE

Mr. John Harney (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Considering that the fourth quarter figures for 1972 indicate a considerable drop in private investment in residential construction compared with the third quarter of 1972—the first drop, by the way, in more than two years—and that this drop in spending, in all likelihood, resulted in the decline in housing starts reported by Statistics Canada, is the minister prepared to take meaningful steps to increase investment in residential construction to bring about a much needed increase in the supply of that scarce commodity, housing?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have Bill C-135 in front of parliament which provides a new financial mechanisms bill, the purpose of which is to draw private capital into the residential mortgage business. To answer precisely the remarks of the hon. member, I point out that 1972 was a record year in this country in terms of construction and that the first two months of this year exceeded the first two months of 1972.

Mr. Harney: I have a supplementary question for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Considering that the proposals in Bill C-135 will in effect do nothing to change the present pattern of mortgage lending in this country in any significant way, is the minister willing to consider withdrawing this bill and its pollyanna proposals to bring in something significant which would draw or direct private lending money into the private residential construction sector?

Mr. Basford: I am not prepared to accept the premise of the question and I am not prepared to withdraw the legislation. I hope it will be passed at the earliest possible opportunity.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister to that of the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate. In view of the fact that 87,000 people are unemployed in a region which is continually plagued by high unemployment, high food costs, low incomes and rising transportation costs, will the Prime Minister undertake to meet the premiers of the four Atlantic provinces to discuss ways of improving the economic climate similar to the conference he has planned with the four western provinces?

Mr. Charles H. Thomas (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Since the Premiers of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia have recognized the importance of transportation costs to that area and have stated that the federal government must make changes, will the Prime Minister immediately convene a meeting with these premiers to discuss the impact of freight rates and other specific transportation problems on the economy of New Brunswick and the entire Maritimes, in line with the promise contained in the Speech from the Throne?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am informed by the Minister of Transport that he is indeed meeting with the premiers of those provinces on the ninth of next month.

MANPOWER

ALLEGED EMPLOYMENT OF UNITED STATES PIPE INSPECTORS WITHOUT WORK PERMITS RATHER THAN CANADIANS

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact that American pipe testers are coming across our border at Niagara Falls to work in Canada without having work permits, and in view of the fact that the Stelco mill in Welland is allowing these pipe inspectors to enter its plant and work in contradiction of the visa regulations, would the minister report to the House why Messrs. K. E. Karako, L. E. Shipley, G. Bruce, and D. J. Pinkerton, who work for Moody International out of Pittsburgh, a non-registered company in Ontario, are allowed to work in Canada while four Canadian inspectors of the same calibre must register with Canada Manpower as unemployed to be eligible for UIC benefits?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would think that a question in those terms should normally be placed on the order paper. If there is some urgency to the matter, perhaps it could be considered at the time of adjournment.

Mr. Paproski: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, there is urgency to the matter. We are allowing these people to cross our border without work permits, and the same regulations should be applied as apply to Canadians who visit the United States. What is good for the goose is good for the gander.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Railton: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. My constituency has been mentioned in this question. I was speaking to the head of the union there yesterday, and I did not hear anything about this. I will be calling him later this afternoon and I might be able to get the necessary information.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

PROVISION OF NEW CRESTS AND SIGNS FOR BUILDINGS AND VEHICLES

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Solicitor General. Having for a period of ten months pressed for the restoration of "RCMP" to the automobiles and other vehicles, as well as to the detachment buildings, I wish the minister would tell the House exactly what has been done in order to bring about this restoration, and in particular whether what has been done is the result of the experience of October 30 last and the tremendous pressure in the prairie provinces for the preservation of the words "Royal Canadian"?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as I stated yesterday, we approved new building signs and automobile decals last week. Today, we issued a press release with pictures of those new signs and new decals. As the House will recall, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister made a speech in Edson, Alberta, last year, in which he stated that this matter would be examined. It was examined and re-examined with the provinces, and we finally developed a new sign that met the conditions of the Official Languages Act and still retained the names "Royal Canadian Mounted Police" and "RCMP."

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have before me the picture that was issued to the press showing the coat of arms and "RCMP GRC." Does the minister think there is any danger that Canadians, seeing such a car passing by, might not realize that it was a police car?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, the RCMP cars have white doors, with the crest and with "RCMP" and "GRC" on them. They also have a red light on top—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Allmand: —and a siren. I doubt that anyone would mistake them for anything else but RCMP cars.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does the minister realize, having quoted the Prime Minister, that the Prime Minister said the reason the "RCM" was removed was that people would not know it was a police car, and he was afraid guilty criminals would get away? Does he recall that?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the drafting is proceeding on an urgent basis. WILLIAM HEAD—POSSIBLE CONVERSION TO MEDIUM SECURITY INSTITUTION—REQUEST FOR CONSULTATION

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. His written reply to my oral question of March 5 concerning William Head prison confirms that at present it is a minimum security institution but "it is proposed to convert William Head institution from a minimum to a medium security penitentiary." Will the Solicitor General assure the House that he will not convert William Head to a medium security penitentiary except with the concurrence of the people of that area?

ENERGY

PROPOSAL TO USE RAIL TRANSPORTATION FOR ALASKAN OIL—POSSIBLE CONSULTATION WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It is prompted by the brief that I understand was presented to him just recently, in fact possibly yesterday, by the government of British Columbia concerning its proposal that rail transportation be used for the shipment of Alaskan oil to the southern markets in the hope of avoiding both a west coast tanker route and a Mackenzie Valley pipeline. Is it now the minister's intention to meet with his United States counterpart, the Secretary of the Interior, with regard to this proposal?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think that the appropriate thing would be, first, to examine the proposal, which, as the hon. member said, was first made to me yesterday morning by a British Columbia minister, from the standpoint of engineering feasibility, the effect on the ecology, and also the route choice. It seems to me we should first find out whether the proposal makes any sense before we talk to anybody outside our country.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member on a supplementary and then try to see two or three other hon. members who have not yet been recognized before calling orders of the day. The hon. member may ask a supplementary but there will be no further supplementaries.

Mr. Leggatt: I will certainly keep that stricture in mind, Mr. Speaker. This proposal raises the question of rail transportation for oil, and the Queen's University study on rail transport out of the Mackenzie Valley has been in the minister's hands for a good part of 1972. I should like to ask the minister what specific assessment has been made by his department in regard to rail transportation in view of the length of time his department has had that study?

• (1530)

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I would point out to the hon. member that the Queen's University study was with regard to the Mackenzie Valley route, while the British Columbia government study is with regard to the Yukon route which is quite different terrain, as he knows.

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General and arises from the statement made yesterday by Paul Gascon, executive secretary in the Solicitor General's section of the Public Service Alliance. Has the minister ordered an investigation into the allegations made by this spokesman on behalf of penitentiary guards, including his description of present rehabilitation policies as a monumental farce and his charge that prison—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question should be asked directly and perhaps the minister could reply briefly. The hon. member knows that questions asked in relation to statements made outside the House should normally not be asked except when directed to the Prime Minister. For the moment, the minister might be allowed to reply quickly.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, these allegations have not yet been investigated. I only read them about an hour before I came into the House. However, I can promise the hon. member that they will be investigated and I will give him a report.

GRASSY NARROWS AND WHITE DOG RESERVES—HIGH LEVELS OF MERCURY IN BLOOD OF NATIVES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. What action has his department taken to deal with the revelation that Indians on the Grassy Narrows and White Dog Reserves apparently have levels of mercury in their blood higher than that which killed 35 fishermen in Japan in 1963?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the department has been made aware of this situation and doctors in the area working for the department have investigated the facts, together with doctors representing the provincial government. There is a task force from the department that will go into the reservations very shortly to investigate the matter further and see what additional measures, if any, have to be taken.

QUESTIONNAIRE TO FARMERS ON FORM OF PAYMENT PREFERRED FOR WHEAT USED DOMESTICALLY—USE OF PERMIT NUMBER TO IDENTIFY REPLIES

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice who is in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. Is the minister going to make public the results of the balloting that he is conducting among the prairie grain producers concerning the two-price wheat system? If he is, does he feel it necessary to have the voter's name and delivery permit number on the ballot?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated to the House about a week or ten days ago, and I am sure the hon. member can refer to Hansard, I do intend to inform the House of the results of the questionnaires after they are completed. The decision to include the request for the name and permit number on the questionnaire was made in the belief that farmers would generally not mind including that information, and to avoid any suggestion that might have come from hon. members that there was any danger of a number of questionnaires being returned by the same person or organization.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): This is a very important supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I would not abuse your instruction or the privileges of this House, but certainly we believe in democracy and in the principle of the secret ballot. This is not a secret ballot. There could be no duplication of it because each producer has his own specific delivery permit number. He could not have a duplicate and send in more than one ballot. This is very unnecessary and I urge all farmers not to participate in this type of balloting.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): This is simply going to be used for political purposes by the Liberal party.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre may ask a supplementary after which I shall definitely call orders of the day.

QUESTIONNAIRE TO FARMERS ON FORM OF PAYMENT PREFERRED FOR WHEAT USED DOMESTICALLY—REQUEST FOR REVISION

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. In view of the fact that this can in no way be called a ballot, in view of the fact that the president of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool has said the questionnaire is slanted, and in view of the fact that there is an alleged discrepancy in the figures used by the minister, will he advise the House if consideration will be given to a revised and more complete informational questionnaire being sent out, and will he advise the House who wrote this one? Was it anybody in the Wheat Board or was it a member of his staff?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to inform the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre and the hon. member for Crowfoot that the 50,000 farmers who so far have returned the questionnaire have not seemed to object to the nature of it or to the inclusion of the permit number. The president of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, who has a different view from some people about the manner in which the payments should be made, did take issue with a number of statements contained in the questionnaire but he did not say that they were wrong.

Canada-United States Auto Pact

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Annapolis Valley on a point of order.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I did not want to interfere with the question period but I wanted to draw Your Honour's attention to the fact that the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council, who also happens to be the House leader, did ask a question during the question period. I would hope, Mr. Speaker, that the President of the Privy Council, as House leader, would convene the Committee on Procedure and Organization even earlier than he had anticipated if his own parliamentary secretary is going to keep asking questions, so that we can clarify this matter along with a good many others.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not know whether there is any point in pursuing this point of order. It was made before and I indicated my feelings to hon. members on the objection which has been taken. It was agreed that the matter would be looked into by the Committee on Procedure and Organization. I assume that the committee will be convened very soon as suggested by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley. Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO DEVELOP AN IMPROVED CANADA-UNITED STATES AUTOMOTIVE AGREEMENT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby) moved:

That this House deplores the failure of the government to develop beyond the 1965 Canada-United States Automotive Agreement a policy which would benefit Canadians and which would contribute to resolving Canada-United States conflict in this area to the mutual benefit of both countries; and this House, therefore, urges the government to take certain immediate steps to lower the prices of automobiles to Canadian consumers and to protect the jobs of Canadian auto workers.

He said: Mr. Speaker, two weeks ago today the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) sparked a two day flurry of controversy on the meaning and importance of the Canada-U.S. Automotive Agreement.

At the heart of the controversy three related items are to be found, each of which emerged during the two day debate or discussion but which were unresolved. First, there was the interest of Canadian consumers who have paid, cumulatively, hundreds of millions of dollars more than they should for North American automobiles since 1965. Second, there was the concern of thousands of Canadian auto workers who for approximately three years have been left by a vacillating government in a state of uncertainty about the future of their jobs. Third, there was and is the crucial matter of United States government dissatisfaction with the results of the automotive agreement. This dissatisfaction was formally conveyed just a few days ago in a television interview by Senator Hartke of Indiana. Surrounding these three areas of concern, indeed, making them inextricably bound one to the other, is the nature, meaning and relevance of what are known as the safeguards in the Canada-U.S. Automotive Agreement.

There can be no doubt that the two Liberal governments elected in January, 1968 and again last October 30 must bear the major share of the blame for the apprehension which exists among many of our workers in this industry, for the gouging of Canadian consumers and, to a much lesser but real extent, for the dissatisfaction of the Americans.

For over three years now the government, for political reasons, has deliberately involved itself in a contradictory approach, as evidenced by statements, to the Canada-U.S. Automotive Agreement. On the one hand, it has not yielded to United States pressure to remove the safeguards from the Agreement; yet, at the same time, it has tacitly accepted the American view by implying in its public statements that the safeguards built into the pact were either transitional from the outset or, in any case, were no longer required. Neither Canadians nor Americans know the real policy of this government on this industry.

The former minister of industry, trade and commerce took great care never to say in public that he regarded the safeguards as being transitional, although in private he frankly said that his commitment to this view was somewhat less than 100 per cent. However, the present minister blew the whistle, I think, on what I consider to have been the real government policy for the past two years when he said in the House two weeks ago that the safeguards were transitional. During the subsequent two days of exchanges in this House, the minister was forced to correct his earlier assertion and admit on March 1 that he had been in error when he said that it was stated in the auto pact that the safeguards were transitional. It is good that the minister corrected the public record. It is even more important, however, for the government to tell the people of Canada what its automotive policy is. What are its plans for Canadian consumers and Canadian auto workers? What is it presenting in the ongoing negotiations to the Americans for discussion? Is it presenting anything, or is it simply, as I suspect, reacting to American initiatives?

The auto pact came into being in 1965 following years of deficits amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars annually on Canada's part in Canada-United States automotive trade. Prior to its signing, the Canadian government had decided to embark on an export subsidy plan, to correct this major trade balance problem. Understandably, at that time the American government did not favour this kind of unilateral action aimed in its direction. That program, incidentally, was exactly equivalent to the United States DISC program, which the United States has imposed on the rest of the world in the past year.

At that time, instead of accepting Canadian proposals to go ahead with this unilateral trade action, the United States agreed to hold talks with Canada. Those talks centred on the need to improve Canada's balance of trade position. That improvement would provide for the future growth of the North American automobile industry in this country and in the United States. The result of those discussions was the auto pact. The intent of the pact was to liberalize automotive trade between Canada and the United States by removing most tariff barriers and ensuring that the industry in both countries would be able "to participate on a fair and equitable basis in the expanding total market of the two countries", as provided in Article 1(b) of the Canada-U.S. Automotive Agreement.

In exchange for two basic commitments, the government of Canada agreed to permit automotive companies located in our country to import cars and parts from the United States. The commitments or, as they are now known, the safeguards, were: First, United States auto makers were obliged to continue, as a minimum, to produce the number of vehicles in Canada bearing the same ratio to their sales in Canada as in the base year 1964; second, in addition each company was required to provide an increasing amount of what is now known as Canadian value added. This consists of the dollar value of labour and parts produced on the Canadian side of the border. The amount of increase was to grow proportionately for each year in the future.

Both countries hoped to gain from this arrangement. The Americans would gain tariff free access to a very lucrative Canadian market. This would enable the car companies to rationalize their production runs on a continental basis and thus put them in a more competitive position in both countries vis-à-vis cars produced outside our continental North America. Canada gained by having in the second safeguard an assurance that our trade balance in automotive products with the United States would no longer be in permanent deficit, and we would be sure of our share of any growth in jobs in the industry in this country. The third beneficiary would have been the Canadian consumer, who was to get a substantial reduction in automotive prices as a result of the removal of tariffs to the companies. These tariff concessions were to be given on the condition the companies met certain conditions to which I just referred. The companies, however, made the individual consumer pay an extra duty.

What have been the results of the pact since 1965, Mr. Speaker? Canada's position in the North American automotive trade has certainly improved. We have moved from a chronic deficit position to one of having a slight surplus last year of $5.8 million. Cumulatively—I stress this—for the period 1965-1972, we experienced, nevertheless, a net deficit in North American automotive trade of about $2 billion. One can hardly say that the pact has brought miraculous benefits to Canada. If the present trend in the trade graph continues, next year will almost certainly show another deficit.

Employment in the industry has also grown. In 1964, there were about 70,000 employees in Canada. In this industry about 97,000 are now employed. Similar growth in employment has taken place in the United States. The Canadian consumer, however, has not obtained his fair share of the intended benefits of the pact. After allowing for differences in tax structures between the two countries, Canadians pay between $200 and $300 more for a car produced in Canada than do their American neighbours for the same car after it crosses the border and is purchased in Buffalo, Boston, San Francisco or any other American city.

According to a systematic study carried out recently, the four major automotive companies, General Motors, Ford, Chrysler and American Motors, charge their dealers in Canada about $250 more for a standard car produced in Canada than they charge their dealers for an identical car produced in the United States. This difference, understandably, is not absorbed by the dealers but is passed on to the Canadian consumer. After seven years of innovative restructuring of the Canadian side of the automotive industry, and I stress this, there is no excuse for this price difference.

The Canadian part of the industry is the most efficient on the North American continent. There is all kinds of evidence to show that Canadian productivity is higher than American productivity in this industry. Despite this real improvement that has occurred in our productive capacity, the Canadian consumer is not getting his due in terms of prices. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we are witnessing sheer profiteering on the part of the large companies, at the expense of the Canadian public.

I now want to talk about the safeguards and deal with them in terms of whether they are essential. The American government, a number of Canadian economists and, I suspect, even the government of Canada believe that the safeguards in the pact are no longer required. Those who take this position contend that the safeguards were merely transitional requirements needed only until parts and assembly plants in Canada could adjust to the new continental market situation. If maintained, it is said, they are simply unjust, protectionist devices which violate the intent of the pact.

The "free trade" interpreters of th e pact I suggest are simply and categorically wrong. Prior to the drafting of the pact Toronto economist, Professor V. Bladen, former head of the political economy department of the University of Toronto, had served as a one-man royal commission on the automotive industry. When so serving he cogently argued that it would be suicidal for Canada not to have safeguards in the automotive trade agreement with the United States. He said so for the obvious reason that if we give tariff free access to our market to an industry which is almost 100 per cent American owned, there would be no guarantee that Canada would get its share of future growth in the automotive industry or indeed that present Canadian production levels would be maintained. It is for this reason that the production safeguard principle was imbedded in the pact.

It is essential that we retain some such requirements in the pact, however they are formulated, which will ensure that Canada share, as the pact states, "on a fair and equitable basis in the expanding total market of the two countries", or that principle is contradictory to a free trade assumption. Given the protectionist policies currently being pursued in the United States, DISC, the Burke-Hartke bill, etc., due to their own high level of unemployment, there is every reason to assume that without job-protecting safeguards in the auto pact, we would see not only a restriction in our share of the growth of the total

North American market to which we are entitled, but also a diminution of our present levles of production. In short, thousands of Canadian jobs are at stake.

In their discussions with Canada, the Americans have been justifiably critical of our government's failure to get automotive companies to bring their prices in Canada into line with those in the United States. One of their chief reasons for agreeing to the pact was an anticipated growth rate of 8 per cent in the Canadian automotive market for North American cars and trucks. For this to have taken place, automotive companies would have had to lower their Canadian prices. If they had done so, Canadian consumers would not be purchasing at about twice the rate of their American counterparts foreign produced automobiles and trucks.

In 1965, non-North American sales accounted for 11 per cent of the Canadian market. After six years, instead of declining, this percentage increased to 25.9 per cent for 1971, the last year for which statistics are available. In British Columbia, about 50 per cent of the cars sold are made outside North America. The percentage of such vehicles sold in the United States in 1971 was 15.8 per cent, approximately three-fifths of the Canadian level. There can be no doubt that the major reason for the significant and growing market for non-North American cars in Canada compared with that which prevails in the United States is the unwarranted overpricing which takes place in Canada.

The price gap for identical cars, after allowance was made for taxes and differing dollar value, between Canada and the United States in 1964 was approximately 9 per cent. In 1971, although there had been progress up to then, the difference was still 9 per cent. In fact, for 1972, according to one study, the price differential between cars sold in Canada and the United States, after making allowances for taxes, had increased to 10 per cent, one per cent more than it was in 1964, the year the auto pact came into being.

The four major automotive companies in Canada reap excessive profits, excessive even for an oligopoly controlled industry. According to an article published in the Globe & Mail last April 26, the per unit profit of Ford of Canada was $222 higher than the per unit profit of its United States parent. The differences for the other companies are virtually certain to be identical. The per unit profit for Ford of Canada increased in each of the four most recent years for which statistics are available. I urge the minister to note these facts. In 1968, the per unit profit was $117. That is the profit after considering all factors when the car is released through the dealer. The per unit profit for 1969 was $164; 1970, $153, and 1971, $228. I am certain the per unit profit of Chrysler and General Motors was similar.

It is interesting to note that between 1966 and 1972, the duty remissions which the companies got from the Canadian taxpayer as a result of the pact were as follows: Ford, $176,614,083; American Motors, $3,135,075; Chrysler, $1,992,607 and General Motors, $1,388,150.

It is clear that in addition to making clear the future security of Canadian automotive workers, we also need an immediate policy which will stop the gouging of Canadian consumers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: There is, I believe, a course of action which will meet the needs of both consumers and autoworkers in Canada and, incidentally, might be appealing to American opponents of the pact, whether or not they are in congress. What we propose is to remove the prohibition which compels Canadians to pay a 15 per cent duty on new cars purchased in the United States. The effect of this will be to cause the North American automotive companies to reduce the price of their cars to Canadian dealers to the level which prevails in the United States. The prospect of dealer competition in the United States will cause this reduction to be passed on to the Canadian consumer by dealers in this country. My point is if we remove the 15 per cent duty for individual consumers crossing the border, the companies in Canada will not permit their dealer systems to go under. They will stop the gouging of their own dealers which has gone on up to this point and ensure that the duty saving is transmitted into price reductions to their dealers. To stop Canadians from crossing the border into the United States to purchase their cars, the dealers in Canada will reduce their prices and the Canadian consumer will get the benefit.

However, and this is important, to ensure the preservation and growth of Canadian employment in the auto industry, production level safeguards must be maintained. Instead of basing them on consumption levels in Canada, however, changes in the automotive agreement should be proposed and negotiated by the Canadian government which would make Canadian production and CVA requirements dependent upon Canadian purchases anywhere in continental North America. A new Canadian minimum production floor level needs to be introduced for negotiation, and it should be based on 1972 levels instead of 1964 levels of production as is now the case. This approach would provide a measure of justice, long overdue, to Canadian consumers. It would also create more jobs for Canadian workers precisely because an average price reduction of $250 per car would inevitably mean that Canadians would buy more vehicles manufactured in North America and fewer imports.

• (1600)

To conclude, this proposal, if adopted, would mean more jobs for Canadian workers. It would also mean lower prices for Canadians. It is, then, the kind of proposal which deserves, and, I hope, will receive, the support of the party to my right and of the government which sits opposite.

Mr. Terry O'Connor (Halton): I rise to speak on this motion with some degree of admiration for the drafter; he has managed succinctly to cover the two chief areas of concern now surrounding the Canada-United States automotive trade agreement. First, he mentioned the necessity for progress under the agreement leading to the tangible mutual benefit of both countries. The key word, here, is "mutual". Second, he spoke of the continuing and worsening problem of the widening price differential between the two countries. We have little confidence in the remedy proposed by the previous speaker as solutions of these trade problems. In particular, the events of the past two weeks have shaken our confidence—and certainly have shaken the confidence of the Canadian business community—in the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie).

Consider the confusing and, often, inconsistent positions and statements adopted by the government on this issue. The matter arose two weeks ago with the announcement in the United States that the Canadian automotive trade deficit with the United States was $100 million as opposed to a surplus of almost $200 million in 1971. The minister told us not to worry. Statistics Canada, he said, has set the deficit at $41 million. He said—and I am quoting: "I do not see that there is any emergency or any reason to push any panic buttons at this time." This statement is reported at page 1751 of Hansard. We agree. Nothing to panic about; there are bound to be fluctuations in our trade positions. We enjoyed surpluses in two preceding years. Now, we are faced with a relatively—and I stress the word "relatively"—small deficit by comparison with the total automobile and parts movement of nearly $7 billion annually.

Then, the minister dropped his bombshell. He referred to the paragraphs in the agreement which had traditionally been known as the Canadian safeguards as being of a transitional nature—the first time they had been described as such, to my knowledge, by a Canadian minister. Further, he said the agreement itself provided that these safeguards were transitional. The clear meaning of this statement was that the government, in a major policy shift, had adopted the United States contention that the provisions for Canadian protection in the agreement were of a short-term nature designed to get Canada over a temporary trade deficit. The implication was that they could be removed, since, as the minister further noted, they had been overfulfilled to the extent of $1 billion. We in the opposition urge that the safeguards should be maintained and, indeed, improved. If we can experience a reversal in our trading position from a surplus of $200 million to a deficit of $100 million, or whatever the correct figure is, perhaps the safeguards are inadequate.

The next day the government changed its position. The minister said he had been mistaken, that there was no mention in the agreement of the safeguards being transitional. The words were, in fact, only the words of the negotiators. That is fine. I am sure, however, that the negotiators said many things about many subjects—about free trade in used cars, about free trade at the consumer level, even about who would go out for coffee that morning. The fact remains that the agreement is a legal document with all its terms contained inside the four corners of the document itself. To accept the implications of the minister's suggestion that the words of the negotiators carry any force or effect would be totally ridiculous.

The hon. gentleman went on to assure the House that the safeguards would not be removed, but they would be improved. As reported at page 1784 of Hansard, he said, in this context:

> I am certainly interested in seeing them improved, and that will be the position of the government. If there is any change with respect to these provisions it will be to improve them so as to make them more workable.

Thus, he completed the transition, if I may use that term, from implying that the safeguards might be dropped, to the position urged on him by members of this party that they should be improved. Then, Mr. Speaker, he had the unmitigated gall to tell the House that there is confusion in the minds of opposition questioners over this point. This was after he had gone through the process of reversing his own position twice in two days.

Again, the minister is ill-informed as to the actual terms of the agreement. The production to sales in Canada ratio, one of the protections set out in the pact, is an annual target, one which must be met each year. It is simply not open to the interpretation that it has, at some time in the past, been far exceeded and is therefore no longer a protection. The minister, as I reminded hon. members, supported the position that the safeguards were transitional by telling us that they had been over-fulfilled to the extent of $1 billion. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as it hangs over the heads of automobile manufacturers annually to meet a certain production to sales ratio, this particular provision continues to provide protection for Canadien production and for the Canadian automobile worker.

Everyone agrees that the auto pact has been a great boon to the Canadian auto and parts manufacturing industry. We must ensure that it continues to be so. The government now admits we must attempt to improve the safeguards. Some may suggest there is little chance of our maintaining what is in the agreement now, let alone improving on it. There is no doubt the bargaining sessions are going to be tough, and it may well be that in order to gain trading concessions or improvements we shall have to give ground in other areas. It may well be that the auto pact requires some amendment.

Obviously, the Americans think the safeguards are an extremely important factor in the reversal of their trade fortunes in this area. They have been pressing strongly for changes during the last four or five years. This being the case, we have a strong bargaining lever at our disposal, one which could well be used to bring us better safeguards. Surely, though, it is a fundamental bargaining principle not to show one's hand or reveal what one is prepared to give up prior to the commencement of the bargaining sessions. In other words, one should not give away gratis in the House of Commons what is a significant bargaining lever which could be used to gain other concessions at the bargaining table. The stumbling and fumbling of the minister on the whole matter over the past few weeks inspires little confidence in us, and, more importantly, little confidence in the Canadian manufacturing sector of our economy.

As I said at the start, the words "mutual benefit of both countries" in this motion are the key. We feel that the future negotiations with the United States should be directed towards working out a set of mutual safeguards which will protect automobile production and jobs in both countries.

The point that perhaps most raises the hackles of the United States is the fact that the present safeguards are designed chiefly to ensure a fair share of auto production and jobs to Canada. I hold no brief for the United States. They are certainly able to take care of themselves at the bargaining table. But if the present protections continue to result in a widening balance in favour of Canada, we cannot complain too vociferously about some means of controlling such a situation. In this respect, let us keep in mind that this was not the case during this past year. Canada suffered a setback in her over-all trade balance of nearly $200 million, but the prior two years had resulted in automobile trade surpluses in our favour of a substantial amount in each case.

Measures of mutual benefit could include—and I say could—an agreement, for example, or a term in an amended auto pact agreement, to relate employment in the industry to the consumption of cars and parts in both countries. For instance, if Canada consumes 13 per cent of the North American market, we should reasonably expect to enjoy 13 per cent of the production facilities, capital expenditures and, of course, jobs.

Alternatively, as another example of the type of term that might well provide mutual protection for both Canada and the United States, the agreement could be amended to provide a floor and a ceiling for the Canadian value added requirements; or, upper and lower surplus and deficit limits which in both cases, if reached, would trigger penalty mechanisms and the imposition of duties to encourage companies to reverse the undesirable trend.

I am being deliberately vague, Mr. Speaker, because I subscribe to the view of the minister—I know we do not agree on too many things, but on this point I do agree—that bargaining in public is not a desirable or profitable practice. Perhaps the minister should have followed his own advice when he suggested two weeks ago that the safeguards were of a transitional nature. Suffice it to say that there are very positive steps that can be taken in the interests of both countries to overcome these irritants which have grown up and now exist between us with respect to this agreement.

The motion before the House urges the government to take certain steps to lower the prices of automobiles to Canadian consumers and to protect the jobs of Canadian auto workers. The agreement itself has adequately, even admirably, protected jobs in Canada over the course of its duration. The agreement, however, does not specifically dictate the price of cars or require any type of movement toward parity of prices between the two countries. Presumably it was thought that with a free market at the manufacturing level there would be a gradual movement toward price parity; and in fact this has been the case, or was the case for the first few years of the agreement. However, as the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) has pointed out, this is not the case at present. In fact, in the past year the situation has worsened and this is an area of major concern. The price gap in 1972 actually widened from what it was in 1971.

I would refer you, Mr. Speaker, to the sixth annual report of the President of the United States to Congress on the operation of the auto pact. This report, not yet available to the public, will be released shortly and contains some disturbing facts and figures. The document, albeit a United States-biased review of the situation, contains figures that show that both the wholesale and retail price differentials on selected, typical cars widened instead of narrowed in 1972. For instance, on a typical 4-door, 6-cylinder sedan with comparable equipment, the wholesale price was 10.8 per cent higher in Canada than in the U.S. in 1972. This is an icnrease from 10.6 per cent in 1971, but more significantly the 1971 figure was down from a 14.2 per cent difference in 1970, and an 18.5 per cent difference in 1965. As a second example, on a typical 4-door, 8-cylinder sedan with standard equipment, the wholesale price difference jumped in 1972 to 10.9 per cent, up from 9.9 per cent in 1971, but again down from the 1970 figure of 13.9 per cent and the 1965 figure of 18.5 per cent.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, the disturbing element of these figures is the fact that the trend from 1965, which continued through the end of 1971, reversed itself in 1972. The reversals and differences are marginal, but the interruption of the trend is significant and unfortunate to the Canadian position. On some more expensive models the trend has not been interrupted, but the facts very clearly show that on the lower and medium priced cars, the models which the average consumers in Canada purchase, there exists a continuing high difference in car prices between our two countries. And, more significantly, this differential is not narrowing. This in spite of the fact that it has been this government's stated aim over a number of years to narrow this difference.

Despite this policy and these pessimistic figures, this government failed to dissuade the automobile manufacturers from increasing prices in 1973. Again, the government knows the tools and persuasive devices available to it to put some muscle into its requests of the companies that they reduce or limit further increases in prices. However, it simply lacks the resolve or the ability to do other than pay lip service to the narrowing of the price gap.

A further significant, and again upsetting, feature of this report of this very concise analysis of the auto pact agreement is the number of references to the safeguards as being of a transitional nature. This may be a sidelight or tip-off, but it is interesting to note that the word "transitional" is used in this report prepared for the President of the United States—it is a very short report consisting of some 26 pages—a total of eight times, almost to the point of it being taken for granted, at least by United States officials, that the safeguards were in fact transitional.

However, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's motion is correct. The government has failed to develop a policy that would benefit Canadians and resolve the conflicts concerning the Canada-United States automotive agreement. It is also obvious that the government cannot be relied upon to come up with solutions, despite the proposals included in this motion. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) yesterday refused to review the government's long-term objectives under the auto pact, if indeed they have long-term or even short-term objectives at all. At least to date, they have failed to make any comments in this respect.

What is more important, however, is that this motion will permit the government to continue on this path. The government have proved that they will not or cannot solve the problem. For this reason we feel the motion should have been one of non-confidence. If the motion is an accurate expression of the NDP attitude toward the government's position on this matter I fail to see, and our party fails to see, how they could harbour any confidence in the government whatsoever in this respect. It is unfortunate that the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby and his NDP caucus did not make this a vote confidence.

• (1620)

An hon. Member: It is forbidden.

Mr. O'Connor: It is not forbidden. It is unfortunate that they have sacrificed one more issue for the survival of this government. It is unfortunate that they did not think to move to censure the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie), since that would have allowed them to remain true to their convictions rather than the government as a whole as they have been for the past three months.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I should like first to congratulate hon. members of the New Democratic Party on a motion that reads in part as follows:

. . . to lower the prices of automobiles to Canadian consumers and to protect the jobs of Canadian autoworkers.

All sorts of arguments are put forward on this subject, to prove that the auto pact is to the advantage of Canadians or to that of the Americans.

One hears discussion about profits, and unfortunately, each of the countries in turn seems to justify its position with regard to the pact by saying that it has made a profit and that the agreement has been to its advantage.

And so, if both countries have built up surpluses, one wonders what changes can be made, since that would seem to be the real solution to both countries' problems.

However, even if Canada declares a surplus of $5,800,000, and at the same time the United States declares a surplus of $38 million, there is no changing the fact that the auto pact is still no more than a way of promoting American products, whether or not some of them are made in Canada. It still remains that we are working to benefit American companies such as Chrysler, GM, Ford and American Motors, because their Canadian branches are still integral parts of the parent establishments, which are American companies.

I cannot find in the Canada-U.S.A. auto pact or in the current debate—whether it be the arguments put forward by the NDP, the Progressive Conservative party or the past achievements of the Liberal party—not one suggestion as to how to create an essentially Canadian car industry.

In Quebec we have had the experience of a corporation which tried to manufacture a Canadian car. We have had the example of the Manic corporation which went bankrupt for lack of assistance or interest from the provincial or federal governments. In the meantime, we are still trying to negotiate agreements between American and Canadians for manufacturing American cars.

Canadians should not be sold a bill of goods: Canadian cars and parts will be made by subsidiaries of American companies which in most cases market only one model of the American series. Let us take for instance the Biscayne of the General Motors of Canada which is the only American model manufactured in Canada. But what is done to manufacture a typically Canadian vehicle?

I will go even further than that. When it comes to the manufacturing standards of those companies serious problems arise. For instance, it can be seen that the Americans do not care about the Canadian market when they turn out windshield wipers designed to slip under the hood; this may be quite convenient in the United States but not at all in Canada because of our climate.

The United States control both manufacturing and standards so that we have little elbow room and accept that control and those standards, thereby creating problems for ourselves as we do not manufacture a typically Canadian product made expressly for the Canadian climate.

We have discussed and are still discussing those problems without ever really encouraging the creation of a typically Canadian industry. I suppose the Canada-United States auto pact was beneficial to Canada, but we notice that when American companies wished to start production in Canada, it was because they wanted to get cheap labour although Canadians realized every year that through pressure or union militancy we could get salaries comparable with those of the Americans.

But although we manage to achieve near wage partity and a balance in the exchange of automobile parts with the United States, we realize that it is always to the detriment of the creation of a typically Canadian industry.

For instance since 1965, it is true that we gained some advantage from that agreement. As a matter of fact, it is said that the pact created 100,000 new jobs. But if the government in 1965 had promoted the creation of a typically Canadian industry, those 100,000 jobs would have been created just the same, but the industry would have been under Canadian and not American control.

That is what should be done; it is not a matter of protectionist measures, of some anti-American attitude, but of a pro-Canadian attitude in the industrial field. The Canada-United States auto pact is but one example of it.

One realizes that snowmobiles are also involved. The Bombardier Company Limited has laid off 125 employees because 50,000 of its snowmobiles remained unsold. One realizes also that importing those snowmobiles, as the U.S. Trade Department puts it, causes some problem:

Snowmobile imports from Canada, according to the Department, rose from $22 million in 1971 to $33 million last year, whereas snowmobile imports from the U.S. fell from $124 million to $104 million.

There again, comparisons can be made concerning a really beneficial production for Canadians. Of course, the idea is to lessen the cost of automobiles for the Canadian people, but, then again, I do not believe that we may reach that goal through bargaining with the United States or through administrative measures laid down by the federal government.

Therefore, why not subsidize the purchase of those cars or provide assistance to consumers themselves in Canada? What is the purpose of the government trying to enter into agreements with the large corporations? Why not create a compensated discount system applying to products made in Canada. Such a compensated discount system would bring about a solution allowing reduction of the cost of cars, and the creation of a Canadian auto industry whose production would be protected.

This point is not brought forward in the Canada-United States auto pact as there is no intention of touching upon that point, though it would represent a valuable protectionist solution applying to the jobs and markets in Canada.

There again, it is noted that the United States speak out. In fact,the Washington Post states plainly that Canada, on account of those consultations or phony talks, if I may say so, between corporations and the government, we are increasingly importing unemployment from the United States to Canada because the United States want to protect their market, their production. Then, we get involved in their arguments and let ourselves be dragged hither and thither and—I always come back to that—without trying to set up our own automobile industry.

They say:

> . . . many Canadians are afraid that the United States government is determined to intensify the employment rate in American plants, even at the cost of corresponding unemployment in Canadian plants . . .

And that is what we are now facing because the industries involved in the automobile pact we are discussing, from which we are seeking to obtain some benefits are American industries and we have no control over them. The day it does not answer their purpose anymore, it is not paying anymore for them to produce in Canada, they will stop producing. The only way for them to go on producing will be through the direct granting of Canadian subsidies.

I come back again to the following suggestion: why should we not have a production which would be really Canadian in the automotive industry?

These are essentially the remarks I had to make on this problem.

I want to add that we do not seem to realize that a Canada-U.S. agreement on automotive production is not only discriminatory for Canadian production, but also does not seems to take into account European imports. Whereas in 1970, 25 per cent of imported cars come from Europe, today it is perhaps 28 and even 30 per cent. It is understood that we do not incur losses with Europe in this area but this is another valuable argument in favour of the creation of a typically Canadian automotive industry. We go on discussing, investigating and developing various methods which could justify government action. As to Canadians, the only justification they are waiting for is necessarily the establishment of preferential costs for the production made in Canada and the method liable to meet the needs of Canadians is the compensated discount system.

• (1630)

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I again say to the minister that any protectionist measure which is still attempted under the auto pact is in fact nothing but a mere palliative to the lack of leadership, of decision to create an industry really and typically Canadian as well as plain favoritism towards American companies.

[Mr. Caouette (Charlevoix).]

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAYS S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO DEVELOP AN IMPROVED CANADA-UNITED STATES AUTOMOTIVE AGREEMENT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Broadbent:

> That this House deplores the failure of the government to develop beyond the 1965 Canadian-United States Automotive Agreement a policy which would benefit Canadians and which would contribute to resolving Canada-United States conflict in this area to the mutual benefit of both countries; and this House, therefore, urges the government to take certain immediate steps to lower the prices of automobiles to Canadian consumers and to protect the jobs of Canadian auto workers.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to start off by saying that I listened very closely to the comments of the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Caouette) with respect to the automobile industry in Canada, as well as some of his suggestions with respect to how we might go about developing a distinctive Canadian automobile industry in Canada. I noted as well the fact that he spoke about the snowmobile as a peculiarly successful Canadian invention, something which, incidentally—and perhaps not all members are aware of it—enters into the United States duty free under the provisions of the automotive pact.

During the course of my remarks I hope to be able to comment on some of the criticisms and suggestions of the mover of the motion, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) and of the hon. member for Halton (Mr. O'Connor). But first, I think it might be profitable, because this is an important occasion when we are dealing with the auto pact, to review some of the circumstances which gave birth to the auto pact and to trace its history, and then move into the situation which we are at present considering.

I think it might be worthwhile to remember that in the early 1960's there was considerable concern in Canada about the substantial current account trade deficit with respect to automobiles and with respect to the efficiency of our Canadian automobile industry. Higher costs were associated with short-run assembly and manufacturing operations. There was duty payable on imported parts, and the costs of writing-off tooling and facilities was on a much smaller volume. All of this added to the higher unit cost in Canada. The proliferation of styles, because each automobile manufacturer was tending to produce the full stable of cars on both sides of the border, again added to the unit costs and to prices in Canada. Considering all these factors—the balance of payments factor, the unit cost factor, and the need to develop a new strategy for the automobile industry—the government put together a plan which it put to the United States government. This plan was based on rationalizing the North American market and was designed to provide for the mutual benefit of both countries in the sense of increasing the size of the market for the North American made vehicle, a plan which would provide for a more efficient Canadian manufacturing industry and lower costs to the Canadian consumer.

These particular objectives are reflected in the automotive agreement. I think one can say that without doubt the agreement is one of the most imaginative, and certainly one of the most important trading arrangements ever made between our two countries. The agreement recognized, and I quote:

> The important place that the automotive industry occupies in the industrial economy of the two countries and the interests of industry, labour and consumers in sustaining high levels of efficient production and continued growth in the automotive industry.

It is designed to achieve a substantial expansion in production and employment, and to promote improved competitive efficiency in the automotive industries in both countries. Three fundamental objectives are set out in Article I of the agreement. The first is the creation of a broader market for automotive products within which full benefits of specialization and large scale production can be achieved. The second is the liberalization of the U.S.A. and Canadian automotive trade in respect of trade barriers and other factors tending to impede it, with a view to enabling industries of both countries to participate on a fair and equitable basis in the expanding total markets in both countries. The third is the development of conditions in which market forces may operate effectively to obtain the most economic pattern of investment, production and trade.

The hon. member for Halton challenged me to say what are the long-term objectives of the auto pact. From the point of view of this government they are the same as they were when the agreement was first signed. They are those which I have put forward again just within the last few minutes. They are the expansion of the market for the North American made vehicle, the participation in that expanded market by Canadian producers and employees generally, and thirdly an efficient Canadian manufacturing industry because, and I think this is worth underlining, only through a highly efficient, highly competitive Canadian manufacturing industry in the automotive area are we going to obtain the real assurances that we seek of being able to share in the benefits of the automotive agreement.

May I now turn to the question of how do we stack up in meeting these objectives. What has the government done to meet these objectives? In recognition of the differences in size, financial strength, and the relative development of our industries, special provisions were established to ensure that Canada, in fact as well as in theory, would derive real and reciprocal benefits on a fair and equitable basis. Moreover, it was recognized that it is necessary to take into account the institutional barriers to trade, arising out of the corporate structure of the industry, as well as the formal governmental barriers, if Canadian industries are to be able to participate effectively in the United States market.

Another important feature, and here I quote from the then Minister of Industry's statement to the House on May 5, 1966, was "the acceptance of the principle that Canadian industry is entitled to a reasonable transitional period to facilitate its adaptation to production for the larger international market." Furthermore, the agreement placed the automotive program on an agreed basis, thereby giving companies in both countries reasonable assurance about its permanence and status.

To take advantage of the new market opportunities provided by the program, the government instituted financial assistance to companies to expand and modernize their facilities and to assist workers. I will deal with those particular programs in a moment, but first I would like to review in statistical terms the indication of success for the pact. Some of these figures have already been given by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby. He has referred to the quite striking development, the advance in direct employment.

I emphasize that total direct employment in Canada's automotive industry has risen by 41 per cent, from just under 70,000 employees employed directly in automotive plants and by component manufacturers, to just under 100,000 in 1972 which, as I say, is an increase of 41 per cent from 1964 to 1972. This does not include all the indirect employment that has been associated with that type of activity. You can choose your own multiplier, Mr. Speaker. That multiplier may go from one to three, but the fact is that some multiplier of that 28,000 to 30,000 direct employee increase has resulted from the success of the automotive agreement.

I think that we should also emphasize the basic parity, the income factor, in addition to the number of jobs that have resulted from the automotive agreement. I think it is worth underlining that during the period of the agreement from 1964 to 1972 there has been a very significant increase in the wage levels of Canadian employees in these factories, up to a point of basic parity. This does not mean that in every instance Canadian automobile workers are paid the same as United States automobile workers, but the wages are very close. I am told that in some Canadian plants the workers are now being paid more, so that the total income increase for employees has been very much larger than the 41 per cent I indicated a moment ago. On the production side, because of the rationalization of the industry, there has been a very marked increase, from something like 671,000 vehicles in this country in 1964 to 1.5 million vehicles this past year. And our increase in trade with the United States in automotive products, as a result of the agreement, has been tremendous.

The hon. member for Halton noted our balance of trade. I do not think that we should judge the success of the agreement in terms of the trade balance between our two countries. I think we should look at it in terms of the total increase in trade. When the automotive agreement was started in 1964 the total two-way trade was of the order of about $800 million, made up of something under $100 million of exports from Canada to the United States, and close to $700 million from the United States to Canada. What was it last year? Last year the total trade, two way trade between our two nations, was $9.2 billion an increase of over ten times in that period of eight years.

Mr. Speaker, with respect to the trade balance figures that I alluded to a moment ago, I think that the trade balance, in terms of surplus or deficit between our two nations, will fluctuate from time to time. The important point to underline is that we were in a significant deficit position in 1964, a $600 million deficit position. As a result of the automotive agreement, we have increased our sales and reduced that deficit so that we are now in a very small surplus position on trade account. If we include the invisible items, the non-merchandise items, you would find that Canada is still in deficit on a bilateral basis with the United States.

I think I should also point out that we are in deficit as a nation, in imports over exports, with the rest of the trading world in automobiles. This is one reason that I, for one, am anxious to see the agreement work in Canada so that we can expand the market for the North American made vehicle, which is something that I believe all hon. members would like to see.

Let me now touch on some of the measures to which reference has been made. I mentioned earlier production and employment which have substantially increased in Canada since the agreement was signed. Indeed, the value of production has increased by more than one billion dollars over the minimum production requirement in the agreement—the Canadian value added so-called safeguard. These requirements therefore, because they are one billion dollars over the level prescribed in the agreement, have no real or safeguarding relevance to present levels of production and employment in Canada. That was the point I was trying to make the other day, Mr. Speaker, when I was questioned on this in this House.

• (1650)

The growth in the industry in Canada has been assisted by three programs, as I have mentioned. The first, the adjustment assistance program, was designed to assist Canadian parts manufacturers through this transitional period that I have referred to earlier. To date, it has made 114 loans amounting to approximately $100 million and additional applications are being processed. Second, a transitional financial assistance program for workers was also established to assist in the adjustment process. Only a relatively small number of workers found it necessary to take part in this program because of the relative buoyancy of the automotive market. Third, the government introduced a special remission program on production machinery required by the industry to take full advantage of the expanding opportunities. This program was designed to ensure that vehicle and parts manufacturers obtained machinery and equipment on a competitive basis with the industry in the United States.

At the time of the agreement the then minister of industry, Mr. Drury, stated:

> In line with the attainment of lower costs of production, it is anticipated, as the program develops, that the forces of competition will gradually result in savings to the Canadian consumer in the form of a narrowing differential between the Canadian and United States prices for motor vehicles and components.

I should like now to touch on that important question of prices and I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if you could indicate to me how much time I have left.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. minister has 30 minutes under the Provisions of the Standing Order which govern him in replying to the hon. member who moved the motion. His time commenced at 21 minutes to five o'clock.

Mr. Gillespie: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have another ten minutes, so I shall talk about prices. There has been much discussion regarding car prices in Canada and the differential that exists between the factory price of a vehicle delivered to a Canadian dealer and the factory price of a vehicle delivered to a United States dealer. This, I believe, is the important level at which we should assess the price because this is the level where the differential can be controlled.

Hon. members are aware that there are other levels, particularly the dealer level at which the consumer buys the automobile. I think comparisons are difficult because in Canada we have a federal sales tax of 12 per cent and there is no such sales tax in the United States. Also, whenever the comparison is made the provincial sales tax must be added to the end price and compared with whatever sales tax there might be in the United States. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, the comparison should be made at the factory level and I believe hon. members would agree with that.

When the automotive agreement was signed, the differential between factory level prices in Canada and the United States was of the order of 17 per cent. Regardless of the fluctuations and the effect of the exchange rate between then and now the differential is of the order of 8.5 per cent to 9 per cent. In other words, the price differential during the course of the agreement has declined by one half between '64 and '72. You can also put it the other way around: Canadian car prices over this period have risen only half as fast as car prices in the United States. This price gap varies from company to company and model to model. What we are talking about here are weighted averages of the whole piece.

The hon. member for Halton read some information into the record which I gather he regards as private or confidential or not accessible to the general public. To me, it seemed to be based on a model to model comparison rather than a weighted average of all models in all parts of the country. But the comparison, for purposes of rating the differential, has to be on an average across the piece on a company by company basis. Hon. members from the west coast may know that some Canadian automobiles are priced so competitively that they are even less expensive than similar models across the border in the Pacific coast market. Most, however, are more expensive by varying amounts.

Mr. Broadbent: Which are they?

Mr. Gillespie: I would be pleased to give that information to the hon. member after I have finished my speech. I do not want to be accused of promoting a particular model.

The question is whether a differential of 8½ per cent or 9 per cent, on average at the wholesale level, is warranted under a continuation of virtually free trade in vehicles and parts with the United States. Clearly, there has been progress in narrowing this differential since the agreement was signed and to that extent the Canadian consumer has benefitted.

I am, however, not satisfied that the present differential can be justified, and in my discussions with the car manufacturers I have made this point abundantly clear. Following these discussions the major car companies agreed that there would be no increase in the wholesale prices for the 1973 model year above their current levels. It must be remembered, Mr. Speaker, that this has to be seen against the background of rising costs and rising wages in Canada. The hon. member knows that wages and material costs have been going up and prices must be seen against this background.

At the same time that the Canadian automobile companies agreed to this price freeze on the 1973 model year, they had an application before the prices commission of the United States for a 3 per cent increase. If that increase goes forward and is granted during the course of the 1973 model year, it will reduce the price differential by a further one-third. This, Mr. Speaker, would be the largest annual reduction in the price differential since the agreement was signed.

The second commitment that the automobile companies have given to me with respect to price is that in the pricing of their 1974 model year they will pursue the government's intention of further narrowing of the price differential. I expect that there will be a significant reduction in that price differential in the pricing of the 1974 model year, which prices should be announced according to regular practices early in September or the fall. Mr. Speaker, one of the reasons—

• (1700)

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might deal with the hon. member's question at the end of my remarks.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, then I wonder if the minister will consider my proposals in the context of his remarks.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I assure the hon. member that I have not overlooked his interesting suggestions. I will comment on them in my concluding remarks, soon to be made.

I emphasize that not only from the point of view of fairness to the consumer is the lowering of the price differential important; it is important, as well, from the point of view of the security and growth of the pact itself, because the lower the Canadian car price is relative to the price of the foreign imported or foreign made car, the greater will be the market for the North American made vehicle in North America and the greater will be the participation of Canadians in that market. That is why, within days of being appointed Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, I moved directly to deal with this question. I talked to the automobile manufacturers. Within a week of my appointment, I took action, and as I said the result of that action was that which I have already announced to the House, namely, the price freeze with respect to the 1973 model year. This will be imposed here regardless of any increase that may be imposed in the United States. There is a further undertaking on the part of the companies with respect to narrowing the price differential in the present and in the 1974 model year.

Some hon. members have alluded to various voices in the United States indicating that the agreement should be changed in some particular. I listened carefully to the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby and the hon. member for Charlevoix. I wanted to hear their suggestions and hear any guidance they might offer with respect to what changes, if any, might, in their view, be beneficial for this country. I have indicated in my remarks in the House during the question period that we have taken no decision to change the agreement. There has been no change in the agreement. I repeat, we have taken no decision to change it, for one good reason: in our view, the agreement is working to the mutual benefit of both countries and it is working very well.

It may be that we should consider changes in the agreement. It may be that we might be able to contemplate changes which would be to the mutual benefit of both parties to the agreement. I should like to reassure the House about the statement I made on March 1. If there is any change in the provisions of the automotive agreement, it should be to improve them so as to make them more workable. Although I do not foresee any imminent changes in the present agreement, I want to assure the House again that if changes are made, they will be made in accordance with the objectives of that agreement, and with the proviso that they are to the mutual benefit of both countries. That means that they could not be to the disadvantage of Canada and still be acceptable to this government.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to assure the House once more that the effort of this government will be to continue to provide for the future expansion of automobile production and to secure future job opportunities for Canadians in our automotive industry. While I can appreciate to some extent the concern that motivated the bringing of the motion now before us, I suggest that it should be readily apparent to members of all parties that no Canadian government, of whatever stripe, could consent to changes in this agreement that would prejudice the jobs of Canadian workers or the level of production in Canada.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, would the minister permit a question? Now that he has finished reading the script produced by succeeding ministers who preceded him in his portfolio, I wonder if he would be so kind as to deal with the suggestions I made and the specific proposals contained in this motion?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, in my remarks I alluded to the proposals of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby. I think they are to be considered as serious proposals. I think they are imaginative. At present, I do not think I can do more than say that I consider them an interesting contribution and a constructive one at this time.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, could I ask the minister a question? Could he explain to the members of the House and to the Canadian public why cars made in Canada, for example at St. Thomas, of which more than 50 per cent are exported to the United States, are sold more cheaply in the United States than in Canada where they are produced?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, the answer, as I suspect the hon. member may already know, is that the Canadian automobile manufacturer, who is selling them to dealers, has decided that that is what he is going to do.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. Would the minister tell us whether his department has looked into the question of whether (a) automobile manufacturers are selling their cars for less in the United States and (b) whether they are getting too large a profit on their sales in Canada?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I do not think they are selling their automobiles at a low enough price in Canada.

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, there was a certain Colonel Blimpism to a reply the minister made towards the end of his speech. I am glad my colleagues asked him certain questions, because for the first time we heard direct and explicit replies from the minister.

The logic of some parts of the minister's remarks however bothers me. I cannot understand how a price increase in the United States can be considered as being a great benefit to Canadian automobile purchasers. The minister waxed fairly long on that subject. However, the logic behind his reasoning escapes me completely. Except for the dealers, I doubt whether the majority of people in my province, British Columbia, know or care very much about the Canada-United States Auto Pact. Certainly, you never see any Member of Parliament from British Columbia asking questions—

Mr. Danson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker; not that it matters very much, but the public address system does not seem to be working and I cannot hear the hon. member.

[Mr. Gillespie.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The Chair is aware of the difficulty. We are trying to solve it.

An hon. Member: The older members cannot hear very well.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The older members were here before we had any public address system.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I can hear the hon. member.

An hon. Member: Speak up.

Mr. Rose: I hope all hon. members opposite are afraid they will miss something.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): That is right. We want to hear the hon. member.

Mr. Rose: As I was saying, you hardly ever see a member from British Columbia asking questions about the auto pact. On the other hand, you see members representing constituencies in central Canada jumping up and down during the question period if the word "safeguard" is so much as whispered in the House. What the people of my riding do know, however, is that they pay approximately $300 more for their cars and trucks than do the people living in Seattle, across the border from where I live. I suppose some of the people in my riding can dimly recall the signing of the auto pact in 1965 and remember vaguely that the Canada-U.S. Auto Pact was supposed to do something to make a car sold in Canada cost about the same as that same car sold in the United States, regardless of on which side of the border it was built.

I hope I am being heard by hon. members. Is my microphone working now?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): No, but I can hear the hon. member.

Mr. Gillespie: I can hear him.

• (1710)

Mr. Rose: I can hear the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) without the aid of a microphone.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I don't need one.

Mr. Rose: I can hear him directly from St. Boniface.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): At least you hear something when I talk.

Mr. Rose: I will not be deflected. I am having trouble enough. It is working now?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rose: What we need is an assurance that the minister has no influence over the public address system. I was talking about the possible lack of interest in British Columbia because the automobile manufacturing business is not part of our provincial scene. It should be part of the British Columbia scene.

If any British Columbian wonders why he is asked to pay $300 more for his car, the usual answer he gets is some kind of confused mumble-jumble in which the only recognizable word is taxes, Canadian taxes. I know there exists a 12 per cent excise tax on Canadian cars and similar American taxes have been removed, but I do not think we should deal with that today because it is not the central issue in this debate. The auto purchaser in my part of the country is seldom told that he is currently paying to the hilt for his car because our friendly American subsidiaries which build his Canadian automobile are pocketing over $150 million of his hard earned money each year. They are charging him 10 per cent extra because he is a Canadian and his government lets them get away with it. That is what I would like the people of British Columbia to know and the people in the rest of Canada as well.

When I mentioned to some of my B.C. friends that I intended to speak in this debate today, they just smiled and said for all the interest I would create in my riding, I might as well make a speech about wheat. I will leave that for the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Knight). It is assumed that most people do not really care about the end price of a car. All that really interests the average guy is whether he can scrape up the downpayment and hack the carrying charges of $95 a month or so. I am not persuaded, however, that this simplistic notion is accurate. If it were so, why would half the people in British Columbia be buying the offshore imports such as Datsun, Toyota, Volkswagens and Renaults? I think that B.C. people buy these cars because they are cheaper. It is as simple as that. They buy Datsuns, Toyotas, Volkswagens and Renaults in a greater proportion than they buy Gremlins, Vegas and Pintos because offshore imports are cheaper. However, these offshore car manufacturers do not employ a single Canadian worker while American subsidiaries operating in Canada, according to the minister's figures, employ nearly 100,000.

The debate today does not really have anything to do with the car culture of North America. We could say a great deal about the problems of disruption and changes over 50 years of North American automania. We are not going to discuss the land-gobbling freeways, carnage on the highways, the pollution befouled cities or the urban sprawl created by any combination of these things. However, all these in themselves are worthy of serious debate at another time.

We must remind ourselves today in dealing with the motion put forward by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), and the new suggestions that flow from it, that Canadians consume or are consumed by a certain number of cars per year. Despite the auto pact, these built-in-Canada cars are vastly overpriced. Because of the overpricing, foreign imports are stealing an ever-increasing share of the Canadian market, thus reducing or not expanding job opportunities proportionately for Canadian workers. These concerns are legitimate enough at any time, but in the current unemployment-inflation environment in which we now find ourselves today, to continue blindly along the same old paths is not only unacceptable but intolerable.

In case the proposals of my colleague have not been made clear to the minister, members opposite or any other member who might have tuned in late, let me repeat them. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby suggested first, the removal of the 15 per cent duty on North American cars purchased in the United States to, in effect, push the Canadian subsidiaries into lowering their prices to United States levels in order to protect their dealers in Canada. The second point was to maintain the principle of safeguards, but to change their content so that Canadian purchases of North American automobiles anywhere in North America would be counted in the production-consumption figures. The third point was to amend the floor level below which Canadian production could not fall from the base output in 1964 to a new base of 1972 production-consumption.

I shall not attempt to expand on the reasons for these proposals in any great detail because I think the hon. member has ably done that. What I intend to do in the time remaining to me is to examine the verbalized, if not sincere concern for the consumer in this day of consumerism and how the price differential of about $300 is a felony compounded by a spin-off of added costs far greater than the $300 differential.

As an example, I will use an intermediate sized car, the Chevelle Malibu 8, two door, with a 307-v8 engine aboard. The 1973 list price or windshield sticker for this car f.o.b. Oshawa, using rounded figures for clarity, with no attempt at obscurity or obfuscation, is $3,300. On a clean deal, with no trade in, this car would probably be sold to a customer for about $3,000. Again using the ball park figure, its price in Seattle would be roughly $2,700, the dealer mark up being about the same in percentage terms. The $300 price differential is punitive enough, but let us consider what the extra $300 over the American price does in car financing.

Assuming that a customer pays $1,000 down and proposes to finance the remaining $2,000 through GMAC at roughly 16 per cent, the finance charges are approximately $409. The same plan to finance a car $300 less expensive would provide a $150 saving on financing, a considerable saving to anyone. We all know that the poor seldom have $1,000 to put down on a car and, therefore, the financing is usually carried on a larger amount, say $2,500, and over a longer period of time, say 36 months. I have these figures, but I think the figures which are quoted in any speech will show similar dramatic differences. Of course, more affluent Canadians can usually avoid finance companies and seek much lower interest rates through banks or credit unions, but those with poor credit often have no alternative but to go for higher interest rates. The less affluent pay much more for their financing for cars or anything else.

Let us add the cost of insuring the automobile with the $300 larger price. I do not say larger value because value is not always reflected in the price charged. I was reliably informed this morning that the difference in the competitive Ontario insurance market, we anticipate public auto insurance in British Columbia, is $15 per year or $30 over the two year financing period I am using in my example. Auto parts, new fenders and auto glass are similarly going to be 10 per cent higher, but I cannot include these in the extra burden of the $300 overcharge because I have no way to estimate their influence. I do not know whether the car will run into difficulty or whether it will be involved in an accident. These extra costs nevertheless cannot help but be a burden on the consumer.

Let us add the 24 month package of extra costs associated with car purchasing in Canada under fairly common financing terms. The extra cost to the Canadian car purchaser is $300. The extra financing of the $300 is $150. The extra insurance cost is $30. This adds up to $480. This is the extra penalty against the Canadian car purchaser which I insist is unjust, unreasonable and unacceptable. Perhaps Mr. Speaker, I have made the point that the difference is not just $300, but the financing, the insurance and the cost of parts magnify and distort the real differences which perhaps are hidden. These costs are directed to the Canadian consumer, not to this benefit but for the sole purpose of giving a $150 million bonanza each year to our friendly American subsidiaries.

Before I sit down I should like to touch upon a couple of other points. First, I think in addition to the three proposals articulated earlier by my hon. friend, we should consider the implications of dutyless access to used cars as well as new ones. To avoid the shock which would occur to Canadian retailers who might suffer because western Canadians at least might seek year-old cars in the say, California market, perhaps we could phase in the used car policy gradually over, a five-year period. We should, I repeat, study access to used cars and do our best to mitigate any injury which Canadian dealers might face. I am asking hon. members to consider the implications. That is all I am going to do at the moment. But isn't the point here that lower prices would come to the consumer? If we are interested in the cost of living problem, that is one thing we should consider.

The second point I should like to mention is that, as a British Columbian, I see no reason why all Canadian car plants, except for the one in Halifax, are located in central Canada. Everyone knows that there is a sizeable automobile industry in California and there could be an auto assembly plant in B.C. as well.

Mr. Breau: There is one in the Maritimes.

Mr. Rose: I mentioned the distressed area, from which you emanate.

An hon. Member: "Emanate" is right.

Mr. Rose: In western Canada we are far too dependent on the primary industries, capital intensive ones, and we do not nearly approach a balance of the secondary, labour-intensive industries of which the auto industry is a part. It should be pointed out that White Trucks, for instance, through a DREE grant, I think, located an assembly plant in Kelowna, British Columbia, and similar auto assembly plants, regardless of country of origin would be welcome in British Columbia.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, in pre-auto pact days, a fairly large segment of the population which was interested in such things, looked at the little country of Sweden and said, how can the Swedes produce the Volvo and yet Canada has no truly Canadian car? Should we be manufacturing an all-Canadian car? There was a suggestion that this car should be called the Beaver, or something like that. A lot of people had some gnawing doubts about the Beaver, but I predict that if we do not resolve our present difficulties to the mutual benefit of the two countries involved in this auto pact there will be a hue and cry for reconsideration of the Beaver. An indigenous Canadian car is, perhaps, an unrealistic and presumably unnecessary concept provided we can negotiate in good faith, basing our negotiations—and I like the suggestion of the hon. member for Halton—on a policy in which we can have confidence. I suggest the three proposals of my hon. friend from Oshawa-Whitby might provide a very good basis from which to begin.

The purchase of an automobile is the most important and largest purchase the Canadian family makes. But people don't make it once or twice or three times in a lifetime, like their homes; they make these purchases every three or four years. So, I am urging the minister, and suggesting to him for the sake of nearly every Canadian family, for the sake of the cost of living, for the sake of the spin-off of the differential and the added financial burden because of this spin-off of the added cost he has to face, that the average Canadian consumer of automobiles would be most grateful to the minister if he used one of his great assets, his great persuasive ability. When next he goes, into the negotiations, the minister should go with determination to end this price differential, and the best way to do that in my opinion is get rid of the protective 15 percent tariff. If this were done, the Canadian consumer, not just the Canadian producer, could benefit by applying continentalism to the automobile market in North America.

Mr. Barnett J. Danson (York North): It is always a pleasure to follow the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose), even if his tale about the Beaver went flat. He always puts us in a somewhat relaxed mood but I would prefer he spoke about wheat. Being an old musician, he knows how to fill in time. That is part of the game.

It is interesting that the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) in his motion should have laid the blame for the auto pact on the Liberal government. Yet here is a pact which he is trying to preserve, and rightly so. I do not really understand why he suggests there should be blame. Of course, there should be a great deal of credit, and a great deal of credit goes to men like the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) who is with us here, now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Danson: There is nobody in this House who consistently, in or out of politics, has taken a firmer position for Canada. He has been a credit to Canada. He knows how to deal toughly, also fairly, and has always consistently sought to do those things which would be best for this country economically, culturally and even spiritually. I say this without being facetious. I remember one of his early speeches in the House of Commons when he came here as a new member. He spoke about maintaining and preserving the spirit of Canada, the culture of Canada, the whole flavour of our Canadian mosaic. So no one else could better bargain on our behalf. He will do it seriously, he will do it toughly, he will do it practically and he will do it fairly. Being fair is half the battle. He, like myself, came here from the private sector of business and there is nothing that works in the long run if it is not fair and to the advantage of both parties involved. Political posturing is unproductive. Showing how tough we can be may get us shorter term gains but over-toughness or unfairness or unreasonableness or stupidity is long remembered. We could win battles and we could lose wars.

What are our objectives under the automotive trade agreement? I look back on those years. I remember them well. In 1964, when this pact was negotiated, the Canadian car market accounted for 7.5 per cent of the North American market and we only produced some 4 per cent. We ran a $600 million deficit annually. There were two general objectives. One was to correct this imbalance and the other was to correct the price differential. The latter has yet to be achieved. The differential at that time was some 17 per cent, if I recall correctly and today it is something like 8.5 per cent; it is coming down. The minister has fought hard for this since the day he took over his present portfolio. I think we all stand firmly behind him.

• (1730)

The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby and the hon. member for Fraser Valley West, on the suggestion regarding allowing United States vehicles into Canada duty free, made a very helpful and interesting contribution, one that I looked at with interest and which I discussed with the Americans in the last Canada-U.S. interparliamentary group meeting. However, I hope it does not come to using blackmail against Canadian automobile manufacturers. I think that if Canadian manufacturers and parent companies are made aware that we are prepared to be tough and that any measures put through the House by the minister to make certain that prices are brought down to a more reasonable level will be backed not only by members on this side but, I am certain, by members on the other side of the House, I am sure we shall achieve our objective.

After all these years we now have roughly $9 billion worth of trade in automotive products. I believe the minister said this was split about 50-50 each way. How close it is to 50 is sometimes a difficult matter for us to determine since our statistics are different. We have the vice-president of General Motors in the States talking on February 28 about a surplus of $100 million; then on March 5 the Globe and Mail speaks of a $35 million surplus, both of these figures in favour of the United States; then the next day the Canadian Press reports a $38 million surplus.

As far as Statistics Canada is concerned, they have three sets of figures: firstly, a $100 million deficit in favour of the United States; then a $41 million deficit; and finally there is a $5.8 million surplus in Canada's favour. Surely there is something wrong here that needs to be corrected. When we are talking about a subject as massive and important as the auto pact we ought to have our arithmetic right.

I suggest that an important part of any renegotiation with the United States would be the development of a statistical centre so that we would be able to compare apples with apples. If we could devise some such system of reporting and maintaining statistics in a computerized fashion, where we would both have the same figures, then even if we differed at least we would know why we differed. Certainly that is not the case now.

What has happened during the period between 1964 and today? We produced 671,018 vehicles in Canada in 1964. By 1972, the latest figures I have, we were producing 1,472,547 vehicles, an increase of 120 per cent. The employment statistics are rather interesting. My figures only go to 1971, but in 1964 some 69,000 people were employed in the automotive industry. By 1971 this number had risen to 91,900, an increase of 32 per cent. I think the most recent figure is 97,000 for 1972, but I am a little behind in my research here. The point is that we are talking of an increase in employment in the 32 to 35 per cent range, and an increase in production of 120 per cent.

We would like to know what accounts for this. It may be greater Canadian productivity. I am sure part of it is that we have become more efficient. How much of it is due to economies of scale? In my personal dealings with the automotive industry I have seen plants which were on short runs bringing in automotive parts from the United States at high cost or from other Canadian plants at uneconomic cost. These plants were working below optimum efficiency. As hon. members know, optimum efficiency is one of the objectives of the automotive trade agreement. How much is lack of labour intensity? How much is due to sophisticated methods that require labour to be siphoned off, with an equivalent increase in the U.S. labour market?

These are the kind of matters we must look at, Mr. Speaker. I hope it is all a question of increased efficiency, economies of scale and better Canadian productivity. I think we should look at the mix of the figures of 120 per cent increased productivity and 32 to 35 per cent increased employment. In any event, it demonstrates through the great eloquence of statistics that the agreement is not stealing jobs from American workers, certainly not in proportion to the benefit that each country derives from the automotive agreement.

We talk of safegurards in the agreement and it has almost become a bad word to use. It is a sort of four-letter word in this context. The word "transitional" has also become a little distorted. Hon. members will recall that the initial safeguards were a dollar figure of $780 million in Canadian value added, a figure passed long ago and which is now up to $2 billion. The only safeguard here is the health of the industry and the achievement of our objectives. These safeguards were minimums, and minimums must still apply. But the word itself has become symbolic and we are hung up about it. It is highly sensitive, politically, in both countries. The real safeguard, however, must be that of balanced production, of equivalent production for equivalent markets in both countries.

When we come to negotiate with our friends to the south, we may get into difficulty because they will tell us that this year we have had a surplus. For the first six or seven years we had a deficit; then for two years we had a surplus, and we might have another this year. Surely to goodness they ought to realize that in a scheme of this magnitude fluctuations must take place which can distort very considerably the picture in a market as small as Canada's, even more than is the case in the United States.

For example, there was the market decision taken by Ford to produce a small, compact car called the Maverick, built at Talbotville, near St. Thomas, Ontario. Because of that market decision, a production decision followed. Due to the fact that the plant in Canada was on stream, producing well and accepted that market decision, we made tremendous sales through that plant and thus a distortion in that year was created. I remember speaking to our American counterparts about this matter when we were discussing this agreement in Ottawa in 1970.

Even in the sale of snowmobiles distortions arise. If you lumped the sales of snowmobiles together and made them a separate item, you would find that the exports of snowmobiles in 1971 amounted to the total surplus in Canada's favour. In 1971, exports of snowmobiles amounted to $138.9 million. But what happened this year? Sales are down to $116.1 million. What has happened is that the marketing pipeline for snowmobiles has been filled. People have a first and a second snowmobile now, so are not buying them so quickly.

In addition to this, due to the success of the Bombardier snowmobile, built at Valcourt in Quebec, which really gave these sales impetus, United States manufacturers followed suit and now have their own snowmobile industry which is creating competition for Canadian snowmobiles. They exported snowmobiles to Canada in 1971 to the tune of $33.9 million, and in 1972 to the amount of $52.2 million. So, again, distortions are appearing. I think it is terribly unfair of good trading partners to take a one or two year period out of context. That is extremely important.

There have been other benefits to United States industry, the United States economy and the U.S. government. I speak of the balance of payments picture, to which the minister referred. From my own private experience in the machinery business I know one plant in Richmond, Indiana, which Senator Hartke represents, from which we imported several million dollars worth of machinery for the production of automotive parts. A lot of these machines went to the General Motors plant in Oshawa which is in the constituency of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby.

There are also management fees which go back to the United States. Not all of them are subject to withholding tax, either. I know of one plant that paid management fees and head office administration expenses in excess of $50,000 a month, and this plant is not a huge one. These were administrative charges paid to head office. So there are also some great benefits our United States friends receive which are not all on the table.

• (1740)

Then we have a man like Senator Hartke from Indiana who made the statement he did on television last week. This is shocking. He must know that we have effective parity of wages with the UAW in equivalent operations in Canada and the United States, and that cars do in fact come into Canada today duty free from the United States. He also said that we are opening up doors and letting foreign imports flood us. We have a 12 per cent duty in comparison to their 3 per cent duty; this is hardly opening the door in comparison with what they are doing.

[Mr. Danson.]

I think it is important that we make these points, because Senator Hartke is a parliamentarian as are we. From April 4 to April 8 a number of us will be in Washington with the Canada-United States parliamentary group. I believe we must make these points very clearly and watch the little distortions in regional areas such as a plant in Anderson, Indiana, or Evansville, Indiana being closed down or because a huge facility is being built in Saline, Michigan, which creates immense employment there.

There are distortions. There was the sad situation in respect of Philips of Canada which was supplying, I believe, a third of all the automotive radios for Chrysler. Then Chrysler decided to consolidate with Motorola, and Philips immediately had an immense lay-off. Parliamentarians in both the United States and Canada will be terribly sensitive about such things happening in their constituencies. Therefore, I think we must sit down and look at this matter in total. I am suggesting that we have an independent committee to look at this situation, see what the distortions are and bring them to light. Perhaps the data centre could be associated with it.

We have the International Joint Commission which deals with waterways. Maybe we could have an AJC, an automotive joint committee to help monitor these situations so that they are not distorted and so we can maintain harmony in this agreement. Such a committee could be comprised of labour and management as well as government representatives. I would say it should have monitoring powers. I do not think it should have executive powers. However, this would be an important element so that we would all be comparing the same things and would see our problems in proper perspective.

I believe two hon. members referred to the idea of building our own type of car in Canada. This raises a very important point about the automotive trade agreement. I have always felt that our great weakness under this agreement is the fact that we did not have the leverage of one domestically-owned automotive company. If we did, we could say to the United States that if it did not make a fair deal we would make our own automobiles and put up tariff barriers. We do not have such a company and this is not the way we operate.

We made this agreement. We said we would give it a chance. We have done so and it has worked out well. However, just because it is working well for both sides now does not mean that we want them breaking it up. We have other options, but we need leverage. One option is to build our own cars. That is a possibility. It is not beyond our technical or productive capacity. I think it would be difficult and it would take a long time. I would hope Canadians would back us up, but they do not always do that: if the car was not as good as a competitive one, they would not buy it. However, this is an option we might think about.

The other option is perhaps a joint venture with one of the foreign automotive manufacturers. This is done in other countries. Fiat and Volvo have joint ventures in other parts of the world. This might be a possibility for Canada. A model might be designed in Canada for the Canadian and American market of the type, size and style which is acceptable here and for which there is a fair market. Another option to consider is that perhaps we could buy a position in one of the United States major companies.

When I heard last night that this debate was coming on, I did a little calculating. In our foreign exchange reserves we have $4 billion to $7 billion. I believe officially it is $4.5 billion, U.S. As I understand the balance of payments situation, we can get by with $1 billion to $1½ billion. Let us even say it is $2½ billion—we need to keep our float orderly—and that officially we have $4.5 billion. That still leaves $2 billion. These $2 billion could be invested in the United States. The Minister of Finance could direct the Canada Development Corporation or another body to invest this money. It would still be an asset so far as the balance of payments was concerned and a loan to the CDC. We could then purchase a leverage position in a United States company.

I have just received a report from my friendly broker. Let us see what $2 billion would buy in terms of an American automobile company. General Motors has 287,-604,280 shares outstanding with a price on today's market of $73 7/8 per share, for a total value of $21,245,328,163. An amount of $2 billion would buy almost 10 per cent of that. If we had a little more, we could buy 20 per cent. One could buy 25 per cent, at today's market price, for $5.34 billion.

Chrysler has 52,489,823 shares outstanding at $34½ on today's market, for a total value of $1,811,243,893. We could buy the whole thing. We could go out after recessing for dinner to-night and buy it. I am not sure about the figures in respect of Chrysler because I see their assets are almost $5 billion and the shareholders' equity is $2.268 billion. However, it does seem to me that this is one type of leverage. The Ford situation is quite different because it is only worth about $7 billion. Most of that is controlled by the Ford Foundation and the Ford family. I do not think they would be willing to give up control to those of us who are here tonight.

Before sitting down I should like to say I think the following points are important. There must be co-ordination of our monitoring of this situation, as well as articulation and re-articulation of the objectives of both countries. We must reach the achievement of mutual objectives, a consultative process, a constant review of statistics including balance of payments, an arbitration function on specific short-range distortions, monitoring of the program and a report to both governments. Only in a spirit of mutual consideration for self-interest on both sides can we maintain harmony and make progress in respect of a very worth-while agreement so that both countries may benefit from it in the years ahead.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I shall not take long. I may complete my remarks by six o'clock; at least, I shall try my best. I wondered, as did many hon. members, what would be the subject of debate to be put forth by the New Democratic Party on its allotted opposition day. They have agreed on so many points with the government and voted with them so many times that they were indeed hard pressed to find a theme for today's debate. With their well known stand on accelerated write-offs and corporate tax cuts, one would have thought they would have chosen that theme to retread the rip-off. After, I am sure, a very diligent search they have chosen to spend their day on the auto pack.

It is well known that the automotive agreement was whipped together in considerable haste in 1965 and was written in vague and ambiguous language. The temper of the times was different then: we had a serious trade deficit with the United States and the automotive deficit was the largest portion of our over-all trade deficit. No one can deny the auto pack has worked well and has produced an over-all trade surplus in the automotive section of our trading account with the United States.

It is eight years or so since the agreement was signed, and we have been reappraising its effects. We have considerable difficulty in securing information on the auto pact negotiations. I think it was rather facetious of the minister to look for suggestions from this side of the House, since we are not privy to the negotiations and the points on which they are negotiating. However, on a matter as delicate as this one, I must say that I agree with the minister that it would not be wise to negotiate in public. We have, I believe, a group of highly skilled negotiators in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce who we understand keep in close touch with their U.S. counterparts.

When all the formulas are digested, the ratios and percentages calculated, we come back to two main points. The first is jobs and job security, and the second is where the philosophy of the auto pact fits into our over-all trade objectives on a long-term basis. Certainly it is understood that until we have an amicable settlement of the auto pact we cannot explore in any detail our over-all trade relations with the United States. In the balance is the future of secondary industry in Canada.

While we would like to develop secondary markets in other parts of the world for our manufactured goods, one would have to be blind to not realize that in the immediate future our trade with the United States is the keystone in our industrial development. The markets are there and we must find a way to keep the door open to Canadian products. So in our view the auto pact is vital to our future development as an industrialized nation and it is also the key to the development of secondary industry in Canada.

We are concerned about jobs and job security. Any move to lessen the number of jobs in Canada at this time would, of course, be disastrous. I am sure our negotiators would have agreed upon an acceptable package if in fact the level of unemployment in Canada had been much lower than it is. I believe it would be fair to say that the single most important factor in the auto pact discussions has been the government's preoccupation with inflation since 1968 and their acceptance of a high level of unemployment. The problem is not really an arithmetical one of ratios, percentages or even balance of trade. The real problem is that some adjustments have to be made, and while we have a high level of unemployment we cannot tolerate any change in the terms of the auto pact which would aggravate that position.

It is significant, I believe, to note at this point that the policies put forth by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr.

Stanfield) would in effect allow us to adjust more readily to changes in unemployment levels due to auto pact negotiations than does the cautious and ad hoc economic patchwork approach of this government. Our party's policy of running the economy at full throttle to take a large bite out of the unemployment and simultaneously impose temporary price, wage and profit controls would allow us to negotiate with much more confidence than does the economic and fiscal policy of the present government.

The hon. member for Halton (Mr. O'Connor) has detailed the minister's lack of knowledge of the auto pact, as recorded in Hansard. Hon. members will also note the numerous references to government-to-government negotiations. They will note the number of times the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) has asked about minister-to-minister negotiations. It is evident the minister is not equipped to negotiate the auto pact agreement.

There is no one on the government side with enough political clout to negotiate with people of the calibre of John Connally. The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made his pilgrimage to Washington some months ago and announced a "fantastic breakthrough" in negotiations with the United States. We have not learned to this day the details of this breakthrough, but we do know that a short time later surcharges were imposed and a protectionist attitude was evident in the U.S.A. However, nowhere did we see any evidence of the fantastic breakthrough or of any special consideration for our trading position with the U.S.

There were suggestions in the Washington press recently that the U.S. position and attitude toward Canada is hardening due to the continuous critical attitude of the government toward the United States involvement in the Viet Nam war. The wisdom of the well orchestrated resolution on this grievous war during the throne speech may well haunt the trade negotiation tables for months to come.

At a time when the world is divided into rival trading blocs, the wisdom, or perhaps the lack of wisdom, on the part of the government must be questioned. At a time when we have a high level of unemployment and when the creation of new jobs and industries must be the main immediate thrust of the economic policy, we find ourselves in a serious trade negotiation with our largest customer—and we are not talking at the ministerial level. It shows how completely bankrupt this government is in the field of economic policy and planning.

We are not in a position at this time to tolerate the loss of jobs due to renegotiation of the auto pact's terms. The danger we face is twofold. The government lacks any long-term economic plan and therefore it is difficult to point to a time or period when we will be able to negotiate the auto pact so that adjustments in employment could be tolerated. We also must face up to the facts of life of secondary industry in Canada. The development of this sector of our economy must be pushed with all possible speed to aid in lowering high-level unemployment in Canada. While the trade irritants remain between our two nations, we will be hard pressed to find the additional markets we will require.

[Mr. Kempling.]

It is evident that we are facing very serious negotiations in the months ahead. I believe that our negotiators are knowledgeable persons who are capable of handling these matters, and are dedicated to their task of protecting Canada's position. It is unfortunate that our negotiators cannot bargain from the strength of an economic policy that is expansionist and designed to cope with the economic problems that face us. With such policies, they could feel reasonably assured that we could adjust to any disruption caused by changes in the terms of the auto pact and take up any unemployment slack elsewhere in our economy. In the long run, the big losers are our secondary industries, not only those presently operating who would expand but the new ones we so desperately need to employ our ever expanding labour force.

There is no doubt that we face hard times ahead in our trade negotiations with the United States. I am not concerned about the negotiations themselves; I am concerned about those at the cabinet level charged with responsibility to direct and carry out this delicate task. In my view, they are leading from weakness as a government lacking in sound economic programs, as they have so amply demonstrated over the past four years.

Let me say in closing that I can only wish the negotiators well. The government has indeed failed to develop a policy that would benefit Canadians and resolve the conflict concerning the Canada-U.S. automotive agreement, as stated in the motion of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent). This makes the task of the negotiators extremely difficult. If the government is not capable of preparing economic programs that will allow us to negotiate from strength, then they should move over and let those on this side of the House, who have a clear picture of what is required, get on with the job.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as a representative of an automotive community I am pleased to have the opportunity to participate in this debate on the Canada-U.S. auto pact. Windsor accounts for approximately 25 per cent of the total Canadian output of automotive products and has benefited more than any other Canadian centre from the auto pact. Production of motor vehicles increased in Windsor by 112 per cent from 1964 to 1971, as opposed to 105 per cent for the whole country, and in the same period employment in the "Big Three" in Windsor jumped by 41 per cent, as opposed to 33 per cent for the whole country including Windsor.

Since Windsor has much to lose from any unfavourable change in the auto pact, my colleagues the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) and I have been vigilant in our concern about the future of the pact. Were it not for their cabinet responsibilities I know that they, too, would be speaking in this debate.

Like every other bargain, the pact has its advantages and its disadvantages. To assess its value on an over-all basis we need some kind of balance sheet. Let us first look at it from the viewpoint of employment, Mr. Speaker. Employment in Canada in the automotive industry rose from 68,400 in November, 1964, through 81,400 in November, 1970, to 91,600 in November 1971, to 97,100 in November, 1972. This is an increase of 28,700, or close to 30,000 in the eight-year span from 1964 to 1972.

As the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) mentioned this afternoon, there is a multiplier effect for these figures. Whether you take the multiplier as one, two or three, as he pointed out the number of additional jobs created in our country by this great advance under the auto pact is considerable indeed. Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, employment under the pact, is about equally divided between those involved in the production of parts and accessories, on the one hand, and those involved in assembly on the other hand.

Looking at the same balance sheet from the point of view of trade, we find that in 1964 Canada had a deficit of $602 million with the United States. In 1971 there was a $197 million surplus in our favour; and in 1972, if this is the final figure, it was $5.8 million in our favour. So, Mr. Speaker, we can see that our annual trade under the auto pact with the United States is now roughly in balance. But this of course means that there has been a spectacular gain on Canada's part. We are about $1 billion ahead in vehicle assembly and about $1 billion behind in parts, so that together we come out roughly even across the whole spectrum.

Another way of looking at our progress under the auto pact is this. It used to be said that Canadians bought about 7.5 per cent of the total North American auto market but produced only about 4 per cent. Actually, these figures were totally misleading because the former included profits and the latter did not. For this reason these figures are not used any more. The accurate way of looking at it is by considering our trade balance. We now produce approximately what we consume in the auto market.

Looking at the situation from the point of view of the so-called safeguards, we are spectacularly ahead of where we were in 1964. With regard to the first safeguard concerning vehicle production, the ratio of vehicles produced in Canada to vehicles sold in Canada was in the area of 90 per cent to 100 per cent in 1964, and in 1972 it had climbed to the area of 130 per cent to 140 per cent. With respect to the Canadian value added safeguard, we are about $1 billion ahead of where we were in 1964.

Turning, in our balance sheet, to the question of prices we find a more marginal advantage. As the minister pointed out this afternoon, there has been progress in narrowing the price différential; it has decreased by about one half since 1964. This means that Canadian automotive prices have risen only about half as fast as those in the United States.

There are also certain disadvantages as there would be in any agreement. Among the disadvantages under the auto pact are the control of purchasing in the United States, except for General Motors in Oshawa, and the fact that there is very little design or engineering done in Canada. So that we have a gain in the assembly of automobiles rather than in parts, and we have gained many unskilled jobs but have lost some skilled employment.

• (2010)

In summary, I should like to see the marginal advance with respect to prices increased, and the disadvantages reversed, in any renegotiation, but in my view and that of my colleagues, we have on balance gained very substantially under the pact. The question with regard to the renegotiation of the pact is that of where our priorities are. Canada's original objectives with respect to the auto pact were an increase in production, efficiency and employment in the Canadian automotive industry and a better break for the Canadian consumer. My first priority is Canadian jobs, protection of our gains and the continuance of our advance with respect to jobs for Canadians in the automotive industry. I would put in a lower place the reducing of prices for Canadian consumers. Here I detect a certain waffling, if I may use that word, in the resolution as phrased. If I may draw the attention of the House to this, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) moved:

> That this House deplores the failure of the government to develop beyond the 1965 Canada-United States automotive agreement a policy which would benefit Canadians and which would contribute to resolving Canada-United States conflict in this area to the mutual benefit of both countries; and this House, therefore, urges the government to take certain immediate steps to lower the prices of automobiles to Canadian consumers and to protect the jobs of Canadian autoworkers.

This resolution apparently accords equal priority to lowering prices and to protecting the jobs of Canadians. I do not think that this is a tenable position, Mr. Speaker, and I think it is crucial that we have our priorities straight before we talk, as did the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby and his colleagues, about renegotiating the pact with the United States.

The problem with the position of the NDP is even more fundamental when we consider the proposals which the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby and the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose) made this afternoon. The auto pact is a free trade pact on the United States side, but it is not on the Canadian side. On our side it is, rather, a duty-remission plan. I should like to direct your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the words of the pact itself. Article I reads:

> The governments of Canada and the United States, pursuant to the above principles, shall seek the early achievement of the following objectives:
> (a) The creation of a broader market for automotive products within which the full benefits of specialization and large-scale production can be achieved;
> (b) The liberalization of Canadian and United States automotive trade in respect of tariff barriers and other factors tending to impede it, with a view to enabling the industries of both countries to participate on a fair and equitable basis in the expanding total market of the two countries;

(c) The development of conditions in which market forces may operate effectively to attain the most economic pattern of investment, production and trade.

I believe that the most relevant of these objectives for the present discussion is (b) which is stated to be, most particularly:

The liberalization of Canadian and United States automotive trade in respect of tariff barriers—

But we have to advert immediately to the qualification which follows the initial statement of the principle, which would otherwise suggest a free trade position. But the clause goes on to point out:

—with a view to enabling the industries of both countries to participate on a fair and equitable basis in the expanding total market of the two countries;

It is my contention, Mr. Speaker, that a fair and equitable basis for Canadian participation and for the participation of Canadian industry in the automotive market does not mean free trade. It may always be necessary—not just for a transitional period—if there is to be participation by Canadian industries on a fair and equitable basis, there should be limitation on the free trade principle on our side. In taking such a position, we should not be contravening the auto pact; we should rather be following it because we should be conforming to the objective of liberalization of trade on the conditions imposed by the agreement itself.

There are under the pact two so-called safeguards, but one of the other protections which exists on our side is a tariff according to which recognized Canadian manufacturers are allowed to import duty free into Canada provided certain conditions are observed. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby agrees that we should not attempt to reach complete free trade with the United States, but he proposes the abandonment of the duty-remission plan. On the one hand, he says let us retain the production safeguard and the Canadian added value safeguard although both are admittedly inoperative because our industry has done extremely well under the pact. On the other hand, he argues that we should abandon the one protection that is operative. But, if we remove the duty, we remove the duty-remission feature with it. We cannot very well retain the duty protection for ensuring Canadian objectives if there is no duty there.

I realize that in order to lower car prices in Canada the hon. member has proposed removing the 15 per cent Canadian duty only for individuals who wish to purchase cars in the United States and not necessarily, he might argue, for automotive companies. That would be as impossible in practice as it is simple in theory. Companies can hardly be denied what is legitimate for individuals—importing cars from the United States without duty and without limitation. If they were, they could retaliate by refraining from further investment in Canada. Worse still, we would be playing into the hands of the American government, whose principal policy objective this removal of duty has been.

This was quite plainly stated by Mr. Philip Tresize when he was in Canada in October. This gentleman was, until he resigned, one of the leading American officials of the United States concerned with the auto pact. Speaking on the pact in Toronto, he publicly advocated not only scrapping the two so-called safeguards, but also the removal of the tariff arrangement that is presently in effect.

An hon. Member: Just another sell-out.

Mr. MacGuigan: The sell-out is what I am talking about. It is what you are proposing. Although the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby did not say so clearly, what he probably had in mind was not unilateral Canadian action to cut out the tariff, but a new auto pact in which we would give up the tariff in return for new safeguards at the 1972 level of production rather than at the 1964 level. If this is his proposal it is a major policy proposal on behalf of the NDP calling for renegotiation of the auto pact. Such a proposal obviously needs to be thoroughly worked through by experts before a definitive answer can be given.

However, my initial reaction to it is twofold. First, if it were to have any further advantage for Canada it is unrealistic to think that the United States would agree. The United States' desire to renegotiate the pact now is based on the feeling that it is already too favourable to Canada. It has been described by one United States senator as foreign aid to Canada. Secondly, it would seem to me to have a short-term advantage for Canada, but long-term disadvantages. In the short run, the 1972 base would obviously be advantageous, given a slight recession in the immediately following years. In a few years, however, it would become inoperative, just as the 1964 figures have become inoperative, by reason of the progress of our industry. Then we would have nothing left to bargain with in future because we would have given up our main bargaining tool, the tariff, in 1973.

My feeling that the NDP proposal is working in the direction of free trade is strengthened by the remarks the hon. member for Fraser Valley West made subsequent to those of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby in which I believe he was supporting free trade in the used car market. I would not want to be unduly harsh on the proposal of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby. I appreciate the thought he has given to it and the fact that he has put it forward in good faith, but I wish he had put it forward more unambiguously and had faced the consequences more squarely. Still it is a proposal to which serious thought must be given by the government. However, I believe it is to some extent the product of a mentality which is trying at the same time to please everybody, in this case both workers and consumers, with more jobs and lower prices. In such an equation I know on which side I belong. I stand with the automotive workers and their jobs. I will continue to press the government for policies which will maintain and increase employment in the automotive industry in Canada. I hope other hon. members will be equally forthright in facing the choices that have to be made on this issue.

• (2020)

Mr. Joe Hueglin (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, it may seem strange that a member representing Niagara Falls should speak in this debate. However, although the peninsula is noted more for its tourism and agriculture than for its involvement in this particular industry, the workers in the auto industry form a large part of our total labour force. In Thorold there is the Hayes-Dana plant, in Niagara Falls there is the Ford Glass plant, and in St. Catharines there are GM subsidiaries known as MacKinnon's and Thompson Products.

Without doubt, all these industries have benefited from this pact. More recently, however, 120 jobs have been lost to the area following the transfer of production of the Maverick brake-drum to the United States. The labour force at MacKinnon's has been reduced to around the 6,400 mark, having been at 7,200 in 1966. I was speaking today to the head of the union at MacKinnon's, who is greatly concerned about these movements in production. What has happened will affect the rest of the workers who live in the peninsula, particularly those who use Niagara Falls, my riding, as a dormitory area.

One year ago last December, when Mr. Pepin went south and when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) also went south at about the time my party's annual meeting was being held in Ottawa, we heard that all was well with the auto pact. It now appears that all was not well. Despite what the minister has said, I suggest we have reached the point of stalemate. A new beginning must be made. New initiatives must be undertaken because, as the last speaker suggested, Senator Hartke has been saying that the automotive agreement was granted as a boon from the American government. He said that the pact is foreign aid.

Although I do not read as many newspapers as I should like to read, I have not heard statements advanced on this question by the minister. I suggest that we must review the whole situation and come to some commonly accepted agreement as to figures that ought to be used. The American government uses one set of figures and we use another. We must redefine what each is to obtain from this automotive pact now and in the future.

I submit that this pact ought to bring about stability in the area of automotive production. That is important. In addition, not only the governments are involved in this area. We must be certain for whom governments speak. If they speak for the companies, I submit they should also speak on behalf of the workers and for the consumers in our communities. It is in the interest of the governments on both sides of the border to argue on behalf of their respective citizens.

Certainly, in my estimation, the companies are placed in a most difficult position. The reason is that the automobile manufacturers are international companies and subject to pressures from both governments. The automobile manufacturing companies are probably more affected by pressure from the U.S. government than by pressure from the Canadian government. Therefore, one is led to wonder whether the drop in Canada's trade position has been the result of the play of "free market forces" or the result of company reaction to United States government pressures of both the stick and carrot variety, that is, of pressures to move successful production lines southward, as happened for example in the case of the Ste. Therese plant in which production of the successful Pontiac model was shipped south. The less successful Vega model was produced in place of that model, the result being that the work force of some 2,300 has been reduced to 1,100. One can imagine the impact of that reduction on the community. Or one can mention pressures being exerted under the DISC program which makes it more profitable for a company to produce cars in the United States than in Canada.

The companies are in a difficult position. It may well be that to guarantee long-range Canadian growth the Canadian government, in view of the experience we have obtained with this industry, must for the sake of the workers and consumers of this country give the companies what may be termed a positive arguing point; that is, those companies must be able to say to the United States government that they have entered into contractual relationships with the Canadian government which they must honour. They must be able to say this to the American government.

Certainly experience in free trade, especially in the farm machinery industry, has clearly shown that new production facilities do not develop in Canada but develop in the United States. This experience certainly goes back to 1949. For that reason it is my opinion that in no circumstances can we accept a completely uncontrolled situation. There must be guarantees somewhere along the line. Equality of production must be guaranteed for our workers and consumers. The Canadian subsidiaries of American automotive companies cannot be placed in the position of having to stand alone against United States government pressure.

The affected workers, their families and the communities in which they live and of which they form the economic base are very much affected by the pact. Although the automative workers, as workers in any industry, must accept the vagaries of the market it is unreasonable to expect them to be subjected to pressures which can quickly disrupt the life of an entire community. Once again I refer to the example of Ste. Therese. There a whole community was built around a certain automotive producing facility. There, after a certain number of jobs had been built up, the labour force was suddenly reduced. This could also happen in Talbotville or our own area.

Stability in the industry must be achieved so far as possible. Only new initiatives, only a review from the bottom up can achieve this. Canadian workers recognize, I believe, that although solidarity with their American brothers may be a desirable theme, certain of their American brothers put their own jobs first and cannot be relied on to protect Canadian workers' interests.

Mr. Alexander: I hope the minister is listening.

Mr. Hueglin: Here I am referring to the support given to the Hartke-Burke bill by certain elements in the American labour force. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, only the Canadian government can protect our workers, in conjunction with the workers themselves. It is on our government that our workers must rely. The auto pact has been instrumental in the building of new communities and has increased the prosperity of older ones. The interests of those communities must be protected. For that reason stability must be introduced.

Before leaving the subject of workers may I say that it is my understanding, on the basis of many sources of information, that the Canadian worker has certainly done his share in making this pact successful. In MacKinnon's plant in St. Catharines, and in other plants, the quality of production has been higher than in corresponding parent plants in the United States. There has been less loss of time for various causes. There has been less pilfering and less absenteeism due to alcohol or drug use. So our Canadian workers are every bit as good as American workers, if not better. Actually, our productivity has reached the point at which possible disparities due to our northern clime can be ignored. Market forces, along with increased productivity, have made our production facilities in Canada the equal of United States facilities.

If Canadian production is competitive with that in the United States the consumer may well ask, why are automobiles, both cars and trucks, more expensive in Canada and why has the differential in price, which had been dropping, risen recently? There must be three reasons for this differential: natural forces such as weather and the smaller number of units being serviced, government tax structures or company pricing policies. To my mind those are the only possibilities we ought to consider. I suggest that they must be clearly identified in the public mind so that people may either accept the need for the differential, if it is the result of natural forces, or bring pressure to bear on their government if it is not.

• (2030)

Canadians have always paid a price for being Canadian. We have accepted this in all generations to this point and I believe we will now. But that price must be fairly put before Canadians and these costs must be legitimate. The governments of the two countries must recognize that this auto pact has been of benefit to both countries. It has been somewhat less so than anticipated because of the high rate of imported cars being sold in Canada. Here, again, a clear and comprehensive study starting from square one must be undertaken to clearly point out how this hurts us, if it does, and what alternative actions exist.

In summation, it is in the interests of all concerned, governments, producers, workers, communities and consumers, to have a clear picture of what has been a mutually beneficial relationship. It is in the interests of all to redefine the aims and arrive at stable patterns in so far as this can be done.

That a thorough review is necessary can be proven, not only by the lack of any movement for a long period but by the inane ravings of Senator Hartke that this pact came about as a form of foreign aid, when in fact it came about as the result of pressures to build Canadian industry, initiated by the Conservative government in the early sixties—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hueglin: —pressures to which the Americans responded, finally, in a positive manner. The waters have been muddied so much now that a thorough review is necessary so that the positive interests of both countries can be identified and protected and, not least of all, so that stability in the many communities dependent on this industry can be strengthened.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Hueglin.]

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) spoke a few minutes ago he criticized the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) for bringing forward this proposal today. The hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville suggested that he was speaking for the auto workers and, by obvious implication, suggested that the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby was opposed to the interests of the auto workers. I listened to the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville: it was obvious that he was not speaking in the interest of the auto workers of Canada but in the interest of the "Big Three" auto makers who are making exorbitant profits at the expense of Canadian consumers.

I wish to say a word to the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Hueglin). When he talks about American labour not being interested in the welfare of the Canadian worker, he ought to look at the record. It is clear. The United Autoworkers Union, which represents automobile workers in both Canada and the United States, has spoken out as vigorously in the United States against the proposed Burke-Hartke bill as the Canadian section of that union.

When we were discussing the auto pact in 1966, a number of reasons were put forward by the government for proposing this pact. It was said that if we entered into this agreement with the United States it would increase employment. That, of course, has happened. We were told that it would cut down on the deficit in the trade balance between Canada and the United States. While that has happened, the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville was very careful how he quoted those figures. He skated over the record of the past year. The trade surplus in our favour which was apparent in the early seventies virtually disappeared last year. Instead of a trade surplus this year and next, we will probably again have a trade deficit with the United States.

There is a third important point which the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville does not understand. Until the hon. member and the government understand this point the Liberal party will not win seats outside the golden triangle in Ontario. We were told that the auto pact would result in a price reduction for Canadian consumers. I wish to quote from two editorials which appeared in 1965 in newspapers which support the Liberal government. They were discussing the auto pact. I do this to show the minister and the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville what the people outside of Windsor expect from the auto pact. I quote from the Vancouver Sun, which as far as I know has always supported the Liberal party, of April 14, 1965:

> Among other things, Mr. Walter Gordon's forthcoming budget will have to defend the Canadian-American free trade deal in automotive products.
> It can be easily defended if it means that automobile prices will soon fall. If they don't, the deal is quite indefensible.

The Winnipeg Free Press, a newspaper in my city—and there is no more partisan supporter of Liberal government in Canada—when discussing the auto pact wrote on April 17, 1965:

> A much larger question now faces the Canadian government as a result of the free trade deal. It is whether this ostensibly constructive agreement will do any good for the Canadian consumer or whether it will benefit only a few rich automobile manufacturers.

The Free Press asked the question. The answer is now very clear. We are in fact subsidizing and benefiting the large automobile manufacturers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Orlikow: To my knowledge, there is no department of government in Ottawa which has more high-priced, supposed expert civil servants than the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. To try to find out from that department whether it has made any studies with regard to the relative cost of producing cars in Canada compared to the cost of producing cars in the United States, or the relative profits of Canadian automobile companies compared to the profits of their United States parent corporations, is an impossibility. The minister will not tell Members of Parliament and the public whether such studies have been made. They certainly ought to have been made. If they have, their results are being hidden. If not, the minister and the government should be condemned, because that would be a dereliction of duty. If studies have been made, the results must be so bad that the government is afraid to let the Canadian people know the facts.

Fortunately, there are people in Canada who are not civil servants. There are some journalists. I suggest to the minister that in all likelihood their salaries are substantially less than the salaries of the officials in his department who should be making this kind of study.

• (2040)

I do not have time to put on record all the facts in the articles written by Mr. Thomas Claridge and Mr. John Rolfe in March and April of 1972, but let me summarize as briefly as I can some of the statements contained in these articles. I quote, for example, from the article of April 20, 1972, by Mr. Claridge:

> The typical Canadian new car buyer is paying an extra $300 for a North American built automobile because of a manufacturers' pricing policy now under investigation by the federal government.
> Under the policies being followed by all four Canadian car manufacturers, Canadian car dealers are being charged about 10 per cent more than U.S. dealers for cars built in Canada.

They made an investigation, and they sure as hell gave the results. The old excuses, the old rationalization given for higher prices in Canada disappears. The old rationalization was that the production runs in Canada were so much shorter that we could not turn out cars here as cheaply as in the United States.

As I have said, I do not have time to put forward all the facts that Mr. Claridge and Mr. Rolfe have embodied in these articles; but we find that cars built in Canadian plants in Ontario, cars built in St. Thomas, are being exported to the United States and sold for $250 to $300 less in Buffalo than in Toronto.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Orlikow: I repeat the question I put to the minister this afternoon. Does he believe that cars produced in Canada are being sold in the United States at a loss? If the manufacturers can sell a Torino, or a Chevelle or an American Motors car in Buffalo or in upstate New York for $300 less than they can in Hamilton or Toronto, and they are not losing money, there is only one conclusion you can draw. This is the conclusion the writers in the Globe and Mail have come to. It is that Canadian consumers are being overcharged between $250 and $300 per car.

The writers I have named analysed the profit per unit made by automobile companies in Canada compared with the profit per unit made by the same companies in the United States. What did they find? They found that for the last year for which figures are available the per unit profit in Canada was between $225 to $250 more than it was in the United States.

Who was making that possible? The Canadian consumer. He was paying in two ways. He was paying up to $300 more for the car, and he was also paying in another way. Before the auto pact was concluded, the Canadian government was getting, in the form of excise duties on cars and car parts imported into Canada from the United States, in the neighbourhood of $50 million. The Canadian taxpayer does not get the benefit of that $50 million any more. Thanks to the generosity of the Liberal government, it goes to increase the profits of General Motors, Chrysler, Ford and American Motors. This is the government which represent the ordinary taxpayers of this country.

The record as to what has happened is clear. We have not just criticized the government because the Canadian consumer is paying more; we have outlined a method by which the Canadian consumer would benefit from lower car prices. What my hon. friend from Oshawa-Whitby has proposed is that we give to the individual Canadian consumer the same right as we have given to the "Big Three" automobile companies. We permit them to manufacture cars in the United States and bring them into Canada without paying excise duty of 15 per cent.

The fact is that the Canadian subsidiaries of these multinational automobile corporations have been overcharging Canadian consumers. They have been making exorbitant profits. We are saying that if the Canadian consumer can go to the United States and purchase a car without paying the duty, the Canadian subsidiaries of the big automobile companies should be obliged to reduce the price they charge the Canadian consumer by the amount they overcharge, which is demonstrated to be between $250 and $300 per car.

The hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville has trotted out the bogey that if you do that, United States manufacturers will simply cut out production in Canada. I suggest that no corporation, having invested billions of dollars in plant and equipment in this country, will stop production. They want a return on their investment and they are entitled to a legitimate return. We are objecting to the exorbitant profits they are making.

There is, I realize, a problem. We have the nonsense of Senator Hartke to deal with, and the protectionist sentiment which is growing in the United States. So what my hon. friend suggests is that we protect the Canadian auto industry by renegotiating the automobile agreement in such a way that Canadian production and the Canadian value added requirement would be dependent, not upon production in Canada, not upon the consumption of cars built in Canada but on the consumption by Canadians of cars purchased anywhere in North America. If this were done and the minimum production floor were based on 1972 rather than 1965 levels, we could reduce the price of cars to Canadian consumers and protect the jobs of Canadian workers.

I do not believe the United States government would object too strenuously to this kind of negotiation, because it is not that government which would be hurt; it is, rather, the Canadian subsidiaries of the United States corporations—and I do not think that even President Nixon worries too much about them.

There is one more thing which this proposal would do. According to statistics given us by the minister's department, somewhere between 20 and 25 per cent of all new cars purchased in Canada are imported from countries such as Japan, Sweden, Germany and Italy. That is almost twice as high as the percentage of new cars this country imports from the United States. I suggest the reason for this disparity is the exorbitant and excessive price charged the Canadian consumer for these new cars. I suggest that if we forced these companies to cut back on the price, Canadian consumers would in increasing numbers buy Canadian-built cars. I suggest this would be good for the companies, good for the consumers and good for Canadian automotive workers.

The hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville said one correct thing when he suggested that this proposal was worthy of study. I suggest to the minister that he give it a great deal more study than the non-studies we have had from him up to now.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I want to make a few brief comments about the motion before the House. In listening to the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) it was interesting to note his support for the auto pact and his recognition of the benefits it has brought Canada and the United States as well. This was a pleasant contrast to the scepticism and doubt about the auto pact which characterized NDP remarks about it in this House in 1965, after the Liberal government had taken the initiative to negotiate the pact with the United States and announce it earlier that year. Now even the NDP has been forced to admit that on balance the pact has worked well for Canadians generally and for cities like my own city of Windsor particularly.

The hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville has put on the record some of the good results in terms of production and jobs the auto pact has brought to the Windsor area. We have had information provided by the distinguished predecessor to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. We learned that from 1964 to 1971 there were 20 new automotive parts manufacturing plants established in the Windsor area and almost 50 expansions of existing plants, which created some 5,000 new jobs.

An hon. Member: What about your constituency?

Mr. Gray: The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) seems unhappy about all these changes and improvements as a result of the auto pact, which he seems to question now as he did back in 1965. He spoke again about duties not collected, forgetting that new investments over the years since 1965 on the part of automobile companies and parts plants have far exceeded any possible amount of duties not collected.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

I might say, as one of the Members of Parliament for the Windsor area like my colleague the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville, and as a member of the government that it has been and continues to be my aim to work for the protection and advancement of the interests of the workers in my community and their families, and the workers and their families in similar communities across this country. This is the aim of the government as well.

As the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) has pointed out, it is also the aim of the government to work continuously to bring Canadian automobile prices closer to automobile prices in the United States. And as he has said, there has been progress in this area. I am encouraging and supporting the efforts of the minister to bring about further progress in getting prices of cars to Canadians much closer to those of the United States.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has confirmed the position of the government not to agree to changes in the pact adverse to the interests of Canadian workers and in fact to strive for improvements in it in the interests of auto workers and all Canadians. In connection with the auto industry, therefore, the government has been working continuously to protect and advance the interests of Canadians generally as workers and as consumers. I therefore ask this House to give the government its support in these efforts.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, before the minister sits down I wonder whether he would care to comment on the specific proposals before the House? Some hon. members of his party have expressed interest and agreement in them, and others have raised questions. I would be very interested to hear what the minister has to say.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I think the proposals the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby has brought forward are worthy of consideration. I am very glad to see his support, unlike some of the people in his party, for the efforts of Liberal governments working in the interest of auto workers and Canadians generally, whether they be workers or consumers, to improve the automobile industry in this country.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, we have heard a lot of speeches today about the auto pact agreement which goes back to 1965. We have heard those who spoke for it, those who spoke against it and those who are waffling in between. If we listened intently to speakers on the government side we would be under the impression that this was the greatest thing that ever happened to Canada. The important thing is that this is one of the most vital manufacturing industries in this country, which produces a tremendous number of jobs. If the safeguards are taken out of the agreement as far as production levels are concerned, this industry will suffer terribly and we will be forced to go back and hammer at the minister responsible for the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

Because we have heard a lot of speeches this afternoon and this evening, I do not intend to prolong this debate. I will not speak at length on this motion as many hon. members from all parties have done so already. I do wish to speak about one or two related issues which I feel are of prime importance to Canada as a whole and to consumers and auto workers in particular.

It seems to me that in general economic and industrial matters we in Canada are always taking a back seat to our United States neighbours, and perhaps I should say our United States entrepreneurs to the south. Whenever there is a crisis in trade or monetary matters, it is we who go cap in hand to Washington to come to some agreement in these areas. I certainly hope the Minister of Inudstry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) will not bow to United States pressure over the automotive agreement signed in 1965. If he does, Canadian consumers of automobiles, and auto workers in Canada will suffer. As I said earlier, if this does happen many more workers will be added to the unemployment insurance rolls.

It appears to me that if the so-called safeguards in the auto pact are abolished, Canadians will continue to pay from $200 to $300 more for a car purchased in Canada than our United States friends pay for the same type of car when it crosses the border and is sold in the United States. I find this situation deplorable. I do not know why this government in the past eight years could not have renegotiated the agreement and avoided that kind of travesty.

When one considers that an academic study carried out last year revealed that the four major automotive companies, Ford Motor Company, Chrysler, General Motors and American Motors charged their dealers in Canada about $250 more for a standard, identical car produced in Canada than is charged in the United States, one wonders what advantages accrue to the Canadian consumer or the Canadian car buyer even with the present safeguards. This is totally unfair and I suggest many people in Canada are becoming completely fed up with the unfair situation. I should like to ask a simple question: Why does the federal government allow this travesty to exist when involved are the same parts, the same materials and the same or even slightly lower wages in Canada? Even with this situation, we in Canada pay substantially more under this supposedly free trade agreement. I mentioned a short while ago the $100 tax credit. If a person purchases a small American car made in this country, the extra money he would pay would wipe out that $100 tax credit which is mentioned in the budget.

If I might refer to the remarks made earlier today made by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), he said there is no economic justification for this pricing policy. In point of fact it is sheer corporate profiteering at the expense of the Canadian public. Several years ago a one-man royal commission on the automotive industry said that it would be disastrous for Canada not to have safeguards in the automotive trade agreement with the United States. When we deal with such large job-creating industries as General Motors, Ford, Chrysler and American Motors which are almost 100 per cent American owned, there would be no guarantee that Canada would get her share of future growth in the automotive industry or that current production levels would be maintained; hence the production safeguard principle in the pact.

When looking at the excessive profits reaped by just one of these oligopoly-controlled industries, Ford, one finds that the unit profit of that industry in Canada was $222 higher than the per unit profit of the American parent. The other companies would be similar, in my opinion. The per unit profit for Ford of Canada increased in each of the four most recent years for which figures are available: in 1968 it was $117; in 1969 it was $164; in 1970 it was $153; in 1971 it was $228. The figures are obviously approximately the same for Chrysler and General Motors.

On the other hand, the duty remissions which the companies got from the Canadian taxpayer as a result of the pact were as follows: Ford, $176,614,083; American Motors, $3,135,075; Chrysler, $1,992,602; General Motors, $1,388,150. I am wondering whether any of these corporations are on the list of 95 corporations from which the Liberal Party receives its political slush funds, and the Tories too; let us not forget them.

Let us look at the situation in Talbotville where Ford of Canada has been manufacturing for some years a small compact car, I believe called the Pinto. The men who produce this automobile in Canada have to pay $200 to $300 more than the same car manufactured in Canada sells for in Detroit; and that car has to be transported some 125 miles from the production plant in Talbotville to the car lot in Detroit. Is this economic justice? The Liberals have allowed this situation to exist year after year. I have yet to find a reasonable explanation for this anomaly and for this travesty.

The budget gave taxpayers a $100 tax credit and all the people of Canada thought it was great. We thought it was good, too, considering the fact that we had finally convinced the Liberal government that tax credits were far superior to regressive basic tax reductions. But those who purchase a Pinto in Canada lose that tax credit and more because of the present ridiculous pricing of Canadian-built cars vis-à-vis the United States.

This may be the right time to begin producing an all-Canadian car, not just for nationalistic reasons—indeed, I hope not—but a family car designed and engineered in Canada and built by Canadian workers. When I refer to workers I am not referring merely to those who work on the assembly line; I am referring also to the designers of cars, the engineers and the technical people involved. Must we continue to be the child of our great United States "big daddy"? If Sweden, approximately one-third the size of Canada, can do it and become world renowned for so doing—not only for building cars but for building engines, including marine engines—what is the matter with us?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question? The hon. member is castigating Canadians for not being innovative in this area. I wonder whether he is familiar with the urban car developed by the engineers at the University of British Columbia, in Vancouver, a car which in terms of performance could set the pattern in North America in respect of what a modern urban vehicle should be? This is what we in British Columbia are doing, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Blackburn: I will reply to that, Mr. Speaker. I was not aware of the particular automobile. However, I do not see it on the streets of my city of Brampton, I do not see it on Bloor Street in Toronto and I do not see it in Winnipeg. Where is it? Is it in a museum? Why has it not been produced?

Mr. Basford: When the west takes over, you will see it.

Mr. Blackburn: We are still waiting. I would like to know when that car was first invented. Was it five years ago, ten years ago or two years ago? That is a great question. Mr. Speaker, the minister is asking us to accept nothing, because it is in a museum right now. Our own entrepreneurs and engineering people apparently cannot find the ingenuity and the money in order to go ahead and produce that car.

I would also like to comment on the extra cost that Canadians face when buying an automobile in the west. Why should westerners pay more—simply because they are Canadians living farther away from the automobile manufacturers in central Canada? Cannot we adjust freight rates to accommodate our fellow citizens who happen to live in the west or in the Maritimes? What is wrong with the proposal to set up different freight rates?

Another concern of mine relates to the farm implement industry. This concern is very close to me because my home town of Brantford is a major manufacturer of farm implements. If the safeguards in the auto pact go down the drain, will the U.S.-Canada agreement on the manufacturing of farm implements follow? It may not follow overnight but it may follow within five or ten years. If the auto pact safeguards are eliminated under U.S. pressure, will the old agreement regarding the farm implement manufacturing industry be next? I believe that this would have very grave implications for the employees of White-Cockshutt and Massey Ferguson industries in Brantford, the latter being a Canadian-owned corporation. In fact, it would turn Brantford into a ghost-town.

May I say in conclusion that I feel that at present we are ready to sell out to the United States certain safeguards in the auto pact, which will eventually have a detrimental effect both on our consumers and our auto workers. I sincerely hope that the government will keep Canada in mind as the negotiations continue. It seems to me that in all fields of manufacturing, particularly so far as natural resources are concerned, we are constantly selling out to the much more powerful nation to the south. A good time to stop this is right now when the auto pact safeguards are up for grabs—for American grabs!

Let us not become angry and irritated, or in fact irrational. Let us all begin to think in terms of economic and monetary justice in an objective, mature and realistic manner. We do not hate the Americans, but we will be damned if we will continue to live every day under this threat of American domination when I am convinced that we have the manpower, the ingenuity and the will in this country, and indeed we have the capital, to go ahead and make something for ourselves in this world, not in a chauvinistic way but in a creative and competitive way. This is what we need, and we have not been getting it from this government for the past ten years.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to be taking part in this debate on the supply motion introduced by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) and his party. However, I am at a loss to understand, in the knowledge that we could vote for such a motion, why the hon. member did not introduce it as a non-confidence motion. Let him not say that he could not do it because of the rules, because the rules do not prohibit his party from introducing a non-confidence motion if they wish. Their House leader had only to make arrangements with the other House leaders that they be granted one confidence vote; they would have had to give 24 hours written notice, after which they could have presented a non-confidence motion here today. However, they did not see fit to do that. They continue to talk and condemn the government but they do not speak in accordance with the way in which they vote.

However, we have had a good discussion here tonight on the Canada-U.S. auto pact. I think it is one of the best opportunities we have had to discuss this important subject matter. Everybody seems to be pretty well in accord regarding the Canada-U.S. auto pact, not necessarily so far as all its features are concerned, but in agreement with most of them. But if it is so good, may I remind the House that it was the late Mr. Nowlan, then minister of national revenue, who realized the seriousness of the situation in the car industry in Canada and the great imbalance of trade which we had at that time. Therefore he appointed a one-man commission composed of Professor Blake. Those were the days when we did not hear about white papers, task forces and all those things which we hear about so much today.

Professor Blake of the University of Toronto conceived a very interesting idea which he presented to the manufacturers of auto parts in Canada, that the duty on every car engine that was imported to Canada, assembled and then exported be remitted. This plan proved to be very successful. Then the Liberal party came to power and we had what we called the "Drury Mach I" version of the auto pact. This Mach I version was simply an extension of the Blake formula. It was very successful until one of the companies manufacturing radiators in the United States objected and took their case to the U.S. Supreme Court. Rather than lose the case, Canada withdrew and sat down to negotiate the Canada-U.S. auto pact. That is, in brief, the history of this pact.

When I say we have had a good discussion of this matter today, I must point out that we certainly did not have an opportunity to discuss the subject when the Canada-U.S. auto pact was first introduced by order in council. The late Mr. Pearson and some officials of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce flew to President Johnson's ranch, and after being wined and dined they signed the treaty. I suppose they were first told that it was a good thing for the "Big Three" car manufacturers. So the treaty was signed and brought back to Canada but we, the elected representatives of the Canadian people, never had an opportunity to debate the treaty.

It is interesting to refer to history once in a while when you speak of such things as treaties. I was interested to learn that Mr. Mackenzie King, in June of 1926, had the following to say:

—before His Majesty's Canadian ministers advise ratification of a treaty or convention affecting Canada, or signify acceptance of any treaty, convention or agreement involving military or economic sanctions, the approval of the parliament of Canada should be secured.

My, how things have changed since the present government has taken over! On April 12, 1928, in the course of a debate on the international sanitary convention, the same right hon. gentleman said this:

I submit that the day has passed when any government or executive should feel that they should take it upon themselves without the approval of parliament, to commit a country to obligations involving any considerable financial outlays or active undertakings. In all cases where obligations of such a character are being assumed internationally, parliament itself should be assured of having the full right of approving what is done before binding commitments are made. I would not confine parliamentary approval only to those matters which involve military sanctions and the like. I feel parliamentary approval should apply where there are involved matters of large expenditure or political considerations of a far-reaching character.

• (2120)

Those were the words the late Mackenzie King used. I hope you will pardon me if I wander a little off this subject, Mr. Speaker, but recently the government decided that a peace corps should go to Viet Nam. That was a treaty or arrangement—I don't know which—that was never discussed in this House. But after our troops were sent over there the government invited us to go along and see how things were making out. I repeat that we never had a chance to discuss it. My, how things have changed! Is that how the Canada-U.S. auto pact was brought about?

The auto pact has had a stormy passage. It has had its ups and downs, its arounds and abouts. It has had its good points and its bad points. It has been called a free trade treaty. I ask, free trade for whom? It is free trade for the car manufacturers, but not for Canadian citizens who subsidize the program. They are not getting the benefit of the free trade operations. It is certainly free trade when an American can come over to Canada, buy a car here and take it back duty free. But no American would be foolish enough to do that because he would have to pay more for his car here than he would pay in the United States. But if Canadians go to the United States and buy cars there, they have to pay 15 per cent duty when they bring those cars back to Canada.

The auto treaty will never be successful until there is at least parity of price between what the Canadian has to pay for a car manufactured in Canada and what the American has to pay for the same type of car when he buys it in Detroit. Why should we have to pay $300 or $400 more for a car made here in our own backyard when, after transporting it 300 miles across the border, Americans can buy it there for $300 less?

When this car treaty was introduced, Canadians agreed to cut tariffs by $50 million a year. Each and every year the car treaty has been in effect we have forgone that $50 million in tariffs. On top of that we give the car manufacturers a considerable remission in duties. I am not going to belabour the House with all the details, but $80 million was given to one car manufacturer. This was brought to the attention of the House by the Auditor General. When the public accounts committee looked into the matter it uncovered a lot of interesting information, part of which has not been reported back to the House even to this day. The Auditor General said on that occasion that he does not audit the books of Canada except according to the legislation laid down by parliament. He does not audit those books according to notes, memoranda or letters written by people in high places.

This was the method by which the car manufacturers obtained their remission of duty. A letter was written by one of the companies and it was responded to by the then minister of industry. The government should have amended the treaty in such a way that the Auditor General could look on the transaction as straightforward, but there was an oversight on the part of the government. The pact was not amended and those remissions of millions of dollars were still given to the car manufacturers.

Along with that little bonanza, plus the $50 million tariff cut, there is now the DISC program. On March 17, 1972, the then minister of industry, trade and commerce was asked if the American car manufacturers were using the DISC program and he advised this House that they were not. But a week later he advised the House that he had misinformed it and that the American car manufacturers were using the DISC program. No apology was forthcoming from either the car manufacturers or the minister. The DISC program gives American car manufacturers a tremendous advantage. I maintain that they have no right to use it when they still operate under the Canada-U.S. car pact. Now they are getting things both ways, using DISC and the auto pact. To the best of my knowledge, they are still using DISC. I would like the minister to correct me if that is not the case.

But despite the advantages and the subsidies which the car manufacturers are getting, Canadians still have to pay more for a car made in Canada than Americans pay for the same car in their country. You cannot blame the Canadian people for being annoyed at this. People talk about the great advantages of the car pact. I realize that we have corrected our imbalance in trade, in dollars and cents, but when we ask whether we have improved our trade balance so far as manpower is concerned, a big question mark remains.

Everybody realizes that the major components of cars, such as differentials, transmissions and carburetors—those parts which require a lot of man-hours to manufacture—are made in the United States, brought into Canada duty free and here assembled in cars. We are nothing more than a bunch of "puter-oners" of nuts and bolts. This is a disgraceful situation. We are entitled to a higher ranking in the technological field than that of "puter-oner" of nuts and bolts. We should be making these parts in Canada.

The latest figures I have show that from January to June, 1971, we imported $1,208,540,000 worth of automotive parts from the United States and we exported automotive part to the United States worth only $660,385,-000. In other words, we import about 200 times more value in parts than we export. That proves beyond a shadow of doubt that we are importing the major components of cars and that we are purely and simply assembly-line operators. I am sure this situation can be remedied.

• (2130)

I see that my time is almost up, Mr. Speaker. There are other matters I should have liked to have gone into, but I will simply say that I hope the minister will not weaken one bit on the stand he takes with his American counterparts when negotiating this treaty. Goodness knows, it is two years overdue now: it was a five-year pact, due to be renegotiated in 1970. The minister must be firm in these deliberations; he must not give an inch on the safety factors involved nor the Canadian content. I know we are well over the market now, but the time will come when we will not have the great surplus we have had in the past, and those safety features must be retained. When it comes to trade, I hope the minister remembers that we are the proud possessors of a great wealth of natural resources and that he has one of the best bargaining clubs held by any Canadian minister.

[Translation]

Mr. Herb Breau (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the government welcomes the motion before the House, for it gives us the opportunity to talk about the auto pact and to tell the House and the general public how this agreement, which was proposed by a Liberal government, has been to the advantage of Canadians and how we expect it to continue being so.

Although the motion itself is somewhat lacking in coherence, the subject is definitely welcome.

The hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Caouette) spoke this afternoon about the problem of the snowmobile industry. It is clear that the industry is experiencing growing pains at the moment, but I think that was to be expected because there is less consumer demand, for several reasons. The sport has spread tremendously, for one thing, and also people are now worried about the ecology and about the environment in general, which means that the industry is going to have difficulties, not too serious ones I hope, and will have to adapt to the change in consumer attitudes.

However I should like to remind the hon. member for Charlevoix that there is a considerable export surplus of Canadian snowmobiles, amounting to over $50 million in 1972.

It is true that, as some hon. members have said recently, snowmobile imports have risen, but exports have also risen. The main reason for the rise in imports is consumer preferences.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, as I said a while ago, it is nice to speak on this motion and to see that all parties in the House agree that it was a good agreement that Canada entered into in 1965. It is also nice to see that once again the Liberal party at that time fulfilled its role as the party of the sixties.

An hon. Member: That is what you are—the party of the sixties.

[Mr. Hales.]

Mr. Baker: The 1860s.

Mr. Breau: It is nice to remind hon. members that the Liberal Party brought this agreement about and is still very proud of it. I am glad that members on all sides of the House agree with the agreement.

Mr. Speaker, the Liberal party was the party of the sixties for the automobile industry and from the point of view of industrial policy for Canada and good social policies. All that we discuss in this House lately is reaction to what the Liberals have done in the past and what they are doing now. Once again, we have political parties not coming out with new programs but just responding or reacting to what the Liberals do. This is very significant in Canadian politics—in the sixties as in the seventies—because when we speak about social policy, industrial policy, all the other political parties have to do is react or respond to what we propose. We are very happy to be in that role because we believe it is the real role of the political party.

Some hon. members have tried to make the case that the auto pact was not a success or should have been more of a success because there is a price differential between cars bought in the United States and cars bought in Canada. Some members of the Conservative party have brought up that point, as have members of the NDP. The response to them would not be the same—

An hon. Member: After all, they are your friends.

Mr. Breau: No. the Conservative party, with the influence of the same people on the front bench, happened to be in power from 1958 to 1962 and they were kicked out in 1963. Mr. Speaker, when the Tories were in power the price differential was not of the order of $200; it was of the order of $500 or $600!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Breau: Now I come to the other response that the new members of the Conservative party also make because they come out with the price differential at the retail level. That is pretty smart, Mr. Speaker, but it is a distortion. The hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Hales) spoke about the retail level when he talked about a Canadian buying a car from a dealer. Then the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose) tried to make a case about consumers on the west coast. He did not speak about the factory level; he spoke about wholesalers.

He went even further in trying to distort the facts or confuse the issue and brought in the fact that Canadian consumers have to pay higher interest rates for financing. I suggest to him that he should have a little discussion with the premier of his province who is responsible for this. Interest rates and insurance costs in this country are provincial responsibilities and a lot of the provincial governments are of the same political colour as the parties opposite. Therefore I suggest he should make that argument to them.

Mr. Broadbent: A question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) has a question of privilege.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) would not willingly misinterpret the points made by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose), who was not talking about the general problem of interest rates but was saying that low-income Canadians who had to pay excessive amounts for cars because of this government's policy were forced to do so because of the high interest rates.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It seems that this occurs quite frequently; hon. members use alleged questions of privilege and alleged points of order to deal with what is substantially a question of debate. The hon. parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Breau).

Mr. Breau: If the hon. member had been patient, Mr. Speaker, I was going to come to that question. We admit that there is a price differential at the factory level.

An hon. Member: That is what he is talking about.

• (2140)

Mr. Breau: No. The hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose) and the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby should check the record. The hon. member for Fraser Valley West asked why the Canadian consumer had to pay so much at the dealer level—

Mr. Broadbent: He was referring to the price differential the consumer has to pay.

Mr. Breau: —for a Canadian-produced automobile. Then he said that over and above the price differential which the Canadian consumer must pay for the car, he must pay another differential in finance charges and insurance. That, I submit, was distorting this debate. He was confusing the issue since many of the areas he mentioned are matters of provincial and not federal responsibility. The dealer's price has nothing to do with the price at the factory level. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby suggested that if the federal government has responsibility for pricing, it is for pricing at the factory level—

An hon. Member: Why do you say that?

Mr. Breau: —because the price at the factory level is a matter of federal responsibility. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn) talked about the poor Canadian consumer having to pay so much for a car. Yet not one member of his party, so far as I can recall, even mentioned the 12 per cent federal sales tax.

Mr. Orlikow: We talked about that.

Mr. Breau: No, Mr. Speaker, I submit that not one member of the NDP mentioned that this afternoon; and not one member of the Conservative party mentioned it.

Mr. Blenkarn: I think they did.

An hon. Member: Why don't you check the record?

Mr. Breau: We will check the record.

An hon. Member: You were talking about the manufacturer's price.

Mr. Breau: Mr. Speaker, the price at the factory level does not include federal sales tax. I will speak about the price differential that existed between 1964 and 1972.

An hon. Member: Well, get on with it.

Mr. Breau: There was a big difference. We should not try to confuse and distort the facts—

Mr. Broadbent: That is what you are doing.

Mr. Breau: —by talking about the price of cars and—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I have heard what the parliamentary secretary has said so far, but I think I would be somewhat lucky if I had heard all his words spoken recently. I ask hon. members of the House not to respond to everything that the hon. gentleman says.

Mr. Breau: Mr. Speaker, I am happy that hon. members are listening. Sometimes it becomes monotonous when hon. members will not listen.

Mr. Orlikow: We are listening right now.

Mr. Breau: I am very glad.

Mr. Broadbent: Please stick to facts.

Mr. Breau: The fact is that there is a gap at the factory level—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Breau: There is a difference of 8.5 per cent. I emphasize, it is not at the retail level; it is at the factory level.

Mr. Orlikow: We said that.

Mr. Breau: All right; but the hon. member should make sure that the next time he speaks about the price of cars he mentions that this differential exists at the factory level.

Mr. Blenkarn: So what are you going to do about it?

Mr. Breau: In 1964, when the hon. member's friends were in power, the price differential at the factory level was 17 per cent. That is what it was just before 1964. The Liberal party came to power in 1963 and within a few months it said, "We must do something about this problem." We did something, Mr. Speaker, because now the price gap has shrunk from 17 per cent to 8.5 per cent.

Mr. Broadbent: That is fine, but remember the gap is still 8.5 per cent.

Mr. Breau: And the gap will shrink even more.

Mr. Orlikow: Not under this minister.

Mr. Breau: The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie), immediately after being sworn in said he would deal with this problem.

Mr. Orlikow: And what did he do?

Mr. Breau: Within weeks of his appointment he obtained a public commitment—

An hon. Member: Don't blush when you say that.

Mr. Breau: —from the automobile manufacturers that they would not increase the price, for economic reasons. That commitment did not include extra money that would be charged for emission controls, anti-pollution devices and safety devices. It covered economic reasons.

Mr. Orlikow: That is why you pay more than $200 more for a car in Canada.

Mr. Breau: The hon. member does not support emission controls and anti-pollution devices?

Mr. Orlikow: Yes.

Mr. Breau: Well, you people should make up your minds; either you agree with these devices or you do not. Even though they have asked in their testimony given before the United States prices commission for a 3 per cent increase, the automobile manufacturers gave a public commitment in this country not to increase the price of 1973 models in Canada. They gave this commitment even though they wanted to increase the price of 1973 models by 3 per cent.

An hon. Member: The companies have lied before and they may continue to lie.

Mr. Breau: One can assume that if they had wanted to increase the price by only 3 per cent the price differential would have shrunk. If they can increase the price on one side of the border by 3 per cent, it means that the price differential here has shrunk by 3 per cent.

The other commitment the automobile manufacturers gave to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce was that in subsequent years they would take into consideration the intention of this government to reduce the price differential. In other words, they have given a commitment that they will work toward shrinking the price differential between United States and Canadian cars. So, Mr. Speaker, that famous price gap has been reduced from 17 per cent to 8.5 per cent and because of the actions of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce the price spread will be reduced further. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce obtained those commitments immediately after his appointment. I think it is important to remember that.

Mr. Broadbent: Don't blush.

Mr. Breau: I notice that the members of the Conservative party did not have much to say in this debate.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Breau: The hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling) said that the government employs skilled negotiators but that the Tories should be in power. Let us remember that when they were in power before 1964 the gap was 17 per cent. All the Conservatives did in this debate was compliment the Liberal Party for the good auto pact and for having such skilled negotiators. I was happy to hear Conservative members say that. Some said that the pact is of vital importance to our secondary manufacturing industries. We agree, and we are happy that they agree with us.

I now come to the proposal made by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby. I find it interesting. If I understood him correctly, he is all for abandoning the safeguard provisions of 1964. As I understand it, he proposed other safeguards. Jean-Luc Pepin said for two or three years, as others have said, that they are not important and they were not a significant factor in the negotiations. It is clear that the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby retracted the comments he made in the last two or three years. He suggested that the safeguards are not good any more and that we need new safeguards.

Mr. Broadbent: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think I am on solid ground in saying that the hon. member is attributing words to me that I did not utter. The point I made was not that we should abandon the 1964 safeguards; it was, and I hope the hon. member was listening, that instead of abandoning them we should raise the level of safeguards from the 1964 level to one applicable in 1973. Even for a Liberal member that should be reasonably easy to grasp.

Mr. Breau: The hon. member should have made that clear in his speech, because that is not what I understood him to say. I contend that the hon. member is no longer saying what he has said for two years. He has changed. We are happy to see it because we hope that all parties will follow the Liberal party in its thinking. We are happy to see this development. The hon. member said that we should abandon the tariff protection affecting consumers—I am trying to remember what I heard the hon. member say. He said we should include those cars that are bought by Canadians in the United States as consumption from the point of view of calculating the production and consumption safeguards. The hon. member went on to another safeguard which would raise the value of the Canadian content from the 1964 level to the 1972 level. I listened to the hon. member.

• (2150)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Breau: The hon. member said that he was not in favour of abandoning any safeguards. He certainly abandoned his insistence that the 1964 safeguards be kept. He now wants to have another level of production for 1972. I just want to make sure that the hon. member is adopting a more realistic and practical policy on this question. What happens if we reduce or abandon the tariffs and do not get to the safeguards? Is this a packet? The hon. member said it was a packet.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the parliamentary secretary, but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Peel South): Mr. Speaker, my remarks this evening will be rather brief as my time is very limited. I wish to correct a few remarks made by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn). My understanding is that the cost of automobiles throughout Canada is the same and that delivery charges in Canada from the plant to the various outlets are prorated across the total production costs. There may be some differences with respect to the price that individual dealers pay for cars, but that is largely a question of volume. The difference really amounts to a question of competition and volume in the area; it has nothing to do with the price at the plant.

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Blackburn: No, Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. This is very important. I made a statement to the effect that car buyers in British Columbia and car buyers in Nova Scotia, generally speaking, have to pay more for automobiles. The hon. member for Peel South (Mr. Blenkarn) just said that this in fact is not true. I wish to have some facts and figures to back up his argument.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. That is more a question of debate than a question of privilege.

Mr. Blenkarn: One of the other matters that affects the price in Canada is the fact that distribution, in terms of advertising material, is required in both English and French. From the point of view of this party, that is a proper charge against the price of distribution of cars and should continue. It has something to do with the difference in cost.

These two matters, prorating the delivery cost throughout Canada and the cost of sales material in English and French, cannot in any way explain an 8.5 per cent difference in the cost of automobiles to Canadian consumers. We might talk about a point or a point and a half, but certainly not 8.5 per cent. There is no question, from the information given to us by dealers in Buffalo and other points in the United States who receive cars manufactured in Canada, that cars manufactured here are put together better and are wanted by their customers in greater number than cars manufactured in the United States. Our information is that cars produced in Canada are, in fact, better automobiles.

The minister should have interfered in this matter long ago. He should have got together with automobile companies, which are really a massive oligopoly, and clearly stated that Canadians are not going to be ripped-off any longer by this government or by them.

Mr. Broadbent: It is a corporate rip-off.

Mr. Blenkarn: In the long run, in terms of trade, the auto pact with the United States has been of great advantage to Canada. This afternoon and this evening the matter of trade in snowmobiles was mentioned. There is no question that that trade has produced advantages to Canada. However, when we deal with these automobile companies it disturbs me greatly to see the prices of the parts used to put a car together.

The last time I looked at the cost of putting an ordinary automobile together by buying parts from distributors of the three large automobile manufacturers, I found that it would cost between $50,000 and $60,000 to manufacture a car. If the minister and this government had any concern about the cost to the Canadian consumer, they would direct their attention to the rip-off that Canadians are receiving in terms of the activity of the three or perhaps four large automobile manufacturers.

When talking to the leader of one of the automobile companies he mentioned the cost that Canadian production must face with respect to imports from foreign countries. He pointed out that when companies in Japan deliver cars to Canada, the excise of tariff charges are determined on the manufacturing costs, whereas the sales cost or sales tax paid by the manufacturer in Canada not only includes the manufacturing cost but also the cost of the distribution system, advertising and transportation.

It is clear that this government should listen to the representations of the companies and organize excise charges so that Canadian manufacturers are not discriminated against compared with foreign manufacturers. When the minister is dealing with the automobile companies and forcing them to control their prices, I suggest that he look closely at the excise tax arrangements in connection with charges made on the importation of automobiles.

I note the time is ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

FISHERIES—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON POSITION TO BE TAKEN BY CANADA AT LAW OF THE SEA CONFERENCE

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, on January 15 I put a question to the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis) in connection with the Law of the Sea Conference to be held in Chile, I believe, in 1974. The question arose out of my conviction—I think it is one which is shared by most Canadians, certainly by those living in the eastern provinces—that this conference is likely to be the most important ever held from the point of view of the Atlantic region and, in particular, the province of Newfoundland.

The issue of conservation, which will certainly be one of the subjects under discussion, affects directly or indirectly the lives of almost all Canadians living on our east coast. The fishing industry affects, directly and indirectly, virtually every living soul in Newfoundland and Labrador. The fishing industry is the largest single employer in Newfoundland. Of a total work force numbering slightly over 150,000, 20,000 people are engaged in the fishing industry. With this in mind, Mr. Speaker, you will appreciate my concern as to the position to be taken by the government at the forthcoming conference.

I believe we must take a strong and definite position, because unless we can induce other fishing nations to agree to some form of management control and conservation the fishing industry off our east coast will be seriously endangered. If this were to happen, the livelihood of a large segment of our population would be affected and the economy of the region would suffer a serious decline.

As a Newfoundlander, I am especially concerned about this conference for another reason. As we all know, the continental shelf equals about 40 per cent of the land mass of Canada. This is a valuable piece of real estate. For Newfoundland it is particularly important since a large chunk of that continental shelf is on the doorstep, as it were, of my province. I refer to the Grand Banks. In Newfoundland—and I presume a similar situation exists in other eastern provinces—we have seen a very serious decline in total fish landings. The situation has grown progressively worse since 1968. In 1972, the catch showed a sharp decline amounting to approximately 26 per cent compared with 1971. In 1971, landings in Newfoundland were down by 12 per cent compared with 1970. In 1968, the total was 950 million pounds of fish compared with 650 million pounds in 1972. It is therefore not hard to understand why we are so uptight with respect to the forthcoming Law of the Sea Conference.

We want to be sure that Canada's case is well prepared, that our Minister of Fisheries and his officials develop a dialogue with people of the fishing industry. We want to be sure that he will draw upon the most qualified people in Canada in respect of fisheries, and that the expertise of fish merchants in eastern and western Canada is available in order to make sure we present the most solid case imaginable in dealing with foreign nations in an effort to bring about a sane approach to the fishing industry. In that way we could head off what we think, and what scientists tell us, will eventually be the depletion of our sea resources unless the wholesale raiding now taking place by foreign countries off our Grand Banks and continental shelf is stopped.

I realize that the minister has only three minutes in which to reply, but I hope he will give us some idea of what our position will be at the conference. I hope he will tell us whether an agenda has been agreed upon and whether Canada's representatives to the conference have been appointed. I hope he will indicate whether he has sought the advice of the fishing industry—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the next Law of the Sea Conference is going to be very important for Canada. The main reason is that we have the second longest coastline in the world and the world's largest continental shelf. Much of the world's shipping passes close to our shores. We have a very important fishing industry on both coasts which can also be affected by pollution. Canada's attitude at the next Law of the Sea Conference, therefore, must be that of a nation which is concerned about the protection of its long shoreline and its large and productive continental shelf area.

This concern can be listed under two headings. The first is protection from pollution, and the other is the wise management and conservation of its fishing resource. Canada co-sponsored the resolution in the United Nations last fall setting up the next Law of the Sea Conference, its organization meeting in New York in November, 1973, and its first substantial meeting dealing with policy to be held in Santiago, Chile, beginning in April, 1974. Canada's position is, and must be, that of a coastal state. This is being re-enforced in two preparatory meetings to be held during the course of this spring and summer, one dealing with marine pollution and the other with fisheries.

In respect of marine pollution, we will be pursuing the principles which Canada sponsored and which were successfully adopted at the United Nations' Conference on the Human Environment, in Stockholm. Essentially, Canada's position was that the interest of a coastal state must not only be protected, but the coastal nation must have certain powers to reach out and, if necessary, to apprehend vessels in trouble, like oil tankers, etc. This is a new power and one that would not have been tolerated by maritime nations a decade or so ago. In any event, that principle is gaining recognition. We hope it will become well established in international law as a result of the next Law of the Sea Conference.

In respect of fisheries, our basic approach is that coastal states should have jurisdiction out to the edge of their continental shelf, and indeed down the slope of those shelves, over all living resources of the sea as well as the mineral resources. That has been our approach and it is the approach we put forward at the FAO conference recently in Vancouver which was attended by all of the fishing nations of the world.

Certain trends are now apparent in preparatory discussions. I will mention only one. It favours the coastal state, and the concept is beginning to be that of an ecological zone about 200 miles seaward from—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE—KILLING OF POLICEMEN—INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION TO RESTRICT FURTHER SALE AND DISTRIBUTION OF FIREARMS

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, on January 17 this year I directed a question to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) which I felt was vital and important, particularly in view of the public concern about safety. This question dealt with the possibility of the regulation of firearms in this country. The question is as follows:

Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Justice. It is also prompted by the incident—

I was referring to the incident in Toronto of the most recent death of a police officer.

—in Toronto. In view of the increasing homicides occurring as a result of the use of rifles in this country, is the minister considering legislation to restrict further the sale and distribution of firearms?

The minister's answer at that time was:

Mr. Speaker, that question is one which is under constant consideration and review. The House had an opportunity to address itself to it not long ago, and the government will be addressing itself further to that question.

I was very pleased, after that question was asked, that on February 22 the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) asked a similar question of the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) whose answer at that time was that this is being considered; in other words, the further control of weapons is being considered. I say this is an important issue because of the volume of mail which I believe all members have been receiving about the concern of the public for the increasing crime rate and the murder rate, which has increased 53 per cent over a period of ten years.

I would particularly refer the minister to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics study for the period 1960 to 1969 which deals with the use of firearms and the number of murders which took place in that period. It is interesting to note that in that period 1,174 people were murdered, with firearms being the weapon. That represented 44 per cent of all murders in that period. Of those murders in which firearms were involved, some 72 per cent involved the use of rifles. The main point I want to bring home to the minister is, as the minister well knows, that the rifle is a completely unrestricted weapon at this time.

I remember having had occasion to defend a young man in British Columbia who attempted to murder his fiancée. He missed her by a very small margin. After investigation it was found that this man had attempted suicide on several occasions. In his home he had at least four rifles, and so far as I know, after having served his sentence he still has complete access to weapons. I believe this represents a serious defect in our laws.

When a person, for example, who has been committed voluntarily to a mental hospital and is released, there is nothing to restrict him from purchasing a weapon should any of his paranoic delusions overcome him and his mental disorder get the better of him from time to time. This happens. There is no law at present which restricts any man from purchasing a rifle. I shall not bore the minister too much longer with statistics.

Needless to say, there is overwhelming evidence that the United Kingdom, which has good, firm weapon control legislation, has a lower murder rate generally in connection with firearms. It is interesting, for example, to compare the cities in the United States. New york, which has a fairly respectable Sullivan law, has a 25 per cent murder rate by firearms, whereas Dallas, where unrestricted use of firearms is allowed, has a rate of 72 per cent of murders by firearms.

Those who oppose the further restriction of weapons usually use the argument that it is people who are responsible for the murders, not guns. This is a fallacious argument because what gun control legislation, in effect, does is to license people. It is almost a euphemism to say that one is licensing guns. The permit to carry a weapon goes to the person. I would think that in any sane, sensible and civilized society a person with a serious history of mental illness, a previous criminal record or a history of domestic instability should be denied access to weapons.

In the city that I represent, the coroner over the past three years investigated 24 homicides, 20 of which were caused by firearms. Some of them were accidental. Nevertheless, the problem is not insignificant—it is overwhelming. It is estimated that we have six million weapons in this country and about 600,000 registered handguns. Quite frankly, I am tired of the gun lobby.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the fact that the hon. member is raising this question again so that I can make our position quite clear in the House—which I certainly made quite clear outside the House and which did not appear in Hansard—that I would not support changes in the law which simply add a tremendous amount of red tape without doing anything to keep guns from people who are dangerous. The hon. member made an interesting case which, if read carefully, shows that murder by knife is a nicer game than murder by gun. I cannot quite see the point of that. The point I am making is that people who are unbalanced may well find another weapon than a gun, and the hon. member has to prove why it is important to go through the whole restriction process and what good it will do us.

There are honourable and honest uses of weapons for hunting, for target practice and in sport. If you want to begin to license everybody and to impose a licensing system, you have to ask what good you are going to do. Are you going to have a situation where people will inevitably, quite innocently, be in possession of guns contrary to the rules? The hon. member proposed Bill C-138, so he turned his mind to the question. In it I see, among other things, that he would make it an offence to even lend a gun to another person without a permit, so that if two of my friends are in the same duck blind together and want to exchange shotguns for one or two moments, they are contravening his rules. Obviously you have to examine and change that. Surely he would admit that thousands of people would be in contravention of this kind of law quite innocently and be good citizens at the same time.

The point I am making is that we are quite prepared to examine this law in order to see whether we could stiffen the penalty in relation to the misuse of weapons. That is the important point. Until it is proven to me that the rules and regulations will in fact do the job, I will not see them in place to hamper and harass innocent citizens. It is of course quite typical of the party which the hon. member represents—I see it in the province of British Columbia and in the province of Saskatchewan—to introduce laws which ban everything and then by permit or special dispensation to someone whom they like we get back a little bit of what has been banned. This kind of rule by decree, by some kind of divine ordinance of some expert, imposed upon the people by an NDP government is seen in B.C. in regard to land, in regard to every new venture. I am not surprised to see it in the hon. member's bill.

I say to him that if he can show me at any time a rule or a change which, without creating a lot of red tape, a lot of harassment, will produce a good result, I will support him on it. We will introduce changes which will improve the protection of our citizens, but not changes which will harass ordinary citizens and force them into a lot of red tape for any apparent purpose which will not be served thereby.

MANPOWER—LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—REQUEST THAT MEMBERS BE BETTER INFORMED CONCERNING PROJECTS

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, on January 13, 1973, I asked a question concerning the Local Initiatives Program, as can be read on page 771 of Hansard. I then asked that hon. members be better acquainted with the procedure relating to local initiative projects.

Mr. Speaker, in this regard, I will quote some precise facts. On February 16, I wrote to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras), responsible before the House for the LIP program, in order to ask him what stage some forty projects had reached. I did not get any answer.

On February 19, I put on the order paper questions Nos. 1010, 1011 and 1016 concerning the development of extremely important projects in my area. I did not get any answer either. However, there seems to be no more money available. According to the minister's statement, the approval period is over and he can give overall statistics to the House.

Moreover, while one hon. member does not know what happened to some projects within his own riding, the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand), who has nothing to do with it, is so much aware of what is going on that he can readily write to people and tell them, which is very serious, that the project has been accepted and that it will obtain the funds required for implementation. A few days later the project sponsors receive another letter from the co-ordinator of the Local Initiative Program to the effect that the projects are rejected.

I wish to draw the attention of the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. MacGuigan) to the fact that it is illogical to give wrong information on the development of a project to hon. members. Whoever we are we have to come up with answers for the project directors. We support the principle of local initiatives and I want this to be clear: We agree to this kind of program. Consequently, it would be normal for the department involved to inform us as to the progress of each project about which citizens inquire. Also we would like to know why certain projects have been rejected and others accepted because, after all, they involve the expenditure of tax money.

We would like to know whether it would be possible to review the local initiative projects. No satisfactory reply can be obtained from the department on this subject. Some say yes, some say no and finally we do not know where we stand. The Minister of Transport could probably obtain this information but hon. members are unable to get it.

I want to protest strongly against this situation. We are not here to play politics, to announce that projects have been accepted or for political gain; we leave this to the government and in particular to the Minister of Transport who is quite successful at it.

We have been elected to serve as a link between our constituents and the department and the government, and, along that line, I intend to act equitably and honestly to the end. This is the reason why I should like to dwell on that point tonight. I can anticipate already the reply of the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. He will tell me that a special service, a departmental section has been established in order to supply answers to hon. members, that such a service is very good, that the officials are writing hon. members to find out what they think. Mr. Speaker, I swear that we will let him know what we think, for we intend to get replies, not of a political character but of an administrative character, that is to say honest replies, allowing us as members to efficiently serve our people. In that respect, I again offer my co-operation to that department. On the other hand, I expect as much from it.

[English]

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there seems to be some confusion about the procedure which is followed in letting hon. members know about LIP applications. I regret that I perhaps contributed to this confusion by an answer I gave to the House in the minister's absence on January 30 in which I suggested that members were not being informed. What I had in mind was that they are not informed before the announcement is made, and I think perhaps this confused the issue.

Let me therefore review the procedure, which is as follows. All members of parliament were consulted at an early stage of consideration of LIP projects and then, after the official decision had been made by the department, the members were advised by the special information group of the department of projects approved for their constituencies.

Whenever a project was approved in the constituency of the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin), he received a letter from the special information group informing him of it. If an hon. member wished to know the status of a LIP application before a decision was made, he had the right to call the special information group. I think the telephone number and address of this group was made available to all members.

When a project was approved, I do not think there was any problem. The difficulty seemed to arise in those cases where the application was not approved as members were not notified of this fact. The extra personnel required to carry out this service would have doubled the staff of the special information group, but personally I believe that members should be so notified in any future program of this kind, even at extra cost. The onus to find out the reasons why projects were not approved was put on members. Within the limitations imposed by the budget for this year, the fact is that every attempt was made to keep members informed on an objective basis of programs which were approved, and in those cases where they were not, members had the right to inquire and be given the fullest information.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.29 p.m.

POWER

JAMES BAY HYDROELECTRIC PROJECT—ENVIRONMENTAL AGREEMENT—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise to seek the consent of the House for a motion of urgent and pressing necessity brought about by the revelation by Mr. André Langlois, director of planning and development of the James Bay Development Corporation, who testified the other day in the injunction proceedings in the Superior Court in Quebec that on November 24 an agreement was signed by the Minister of the Environment on behalf of the federal government with the James Bay Development Corporation with respect to environmental matters. In light of yesterday's decision by the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development to have tabled before that committee correspondence between the federal government and the government of Quebec about the proposed James Bay development, and also the invitation to Premier Bourassa to appear before that committee, I would like to move the following motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 in order to have everything in one place:

That the agreement between the government of Canada and the James Bay Development Corporation dated November, 1972, relating to the environment in the area of the proposed James Bay hydro electric project be tabled.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Skeena under the terms of Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and the motion cannot be put.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

SUBSIDIZATION BY GOVERNMENT FOR OPERATION OF FERRY "PRINCESS OF ACADIA"

Question No. 43—Mr. Haliburton:

1. Is the CP being subsidized by the government for the operation of the ferry "Princess of Acadia" and, if so (a) in what form (b) by how much?

2. How many days did the ferry operate in the past year without full engine and heating capacity?

3. When did the ferry last pass through steamship inspection?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): 1. No.

2. C.P.R. has replied as follows: "When a new vessel is put into service a period of from one to two years is required in order to eliminate minor difficulties which become evident during this period. For this reason there have been occasions when all four engines, or both heating boilers have not been in operation. However, it should be pointed out that the vessel is quite capable of maintaining the schedule under normal conditions with three engines in operation and heating can be provided by one steam boiler. As many of these repairs or maintenance are carried out during the course of a voyage, it is not possible to provide a specific reply."

3. December 18, 1972.

2. What were the names and addresses of firms or individuals who received these contracts, what amounts of money were spent in each case and what was the purpose of each contract?

3. What contracts for publicity and/or information were awarded in the current fiscal year, what are the names and addresses of contractees, what are the amounts of money involved in each case and what is the purpose of each contract?

PAROLEES WITH PREVIOUS PAROLE EXPERIENCE

Question No. 422—Mr. Stackhouse:

1. How many inmates of federal penal institutions were granted parole during 1972 and of these, how many had previously received parole (a) once (b) twice (c) three times (d) more than three times?

2. (a) How many inmates were granted parole in 1971 and of these, how many had previously received parole (i) once (ii) twice (iii) three times (iv) more than three times (b) of those who received parole in 1971, how many have been convicted of a criminal offence since?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): 1. In 1972, the National Parole Board made 2,150 decisions to grant parole to inmates of federal penal institutions. (a), (b), (c) and (d), not available. The compilation of this information would require laborious searching of 2,150 files.

2. (a) In 1971, the National Parole Board made 2,798 decisions to grant parole to inmates of federal penal institutions. The number of actual releases was 2,454*, out of which 825 have had previous parole experience. (i), (ii), (iii) and (iv)—not available. (b) Not available at this time.

*N.B.: The number of persons granted parole in a given year is not the same as the number of actual releases on parole. The decision to grant parole may be subsequently cancelled before actual release or, alternatively, the release may take place in a subsequent year.

CMHC—INSULATION MATERIALS AND EXPERIMENTAL HOUSING

Question No. 516—Mr. Blenkarn:

1. Has consideration been given to the feasibility of altering CMHC specifications for the construction of dwelling units to increase the amount of insulation materials required in these dwellings to offset the shortage of fossil fuels and the tendency of the cost of fossil fuels to rise?

2. What studies have been made by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation or the National Research Council in connection with house insulation specifications?

3. What is the nature of experimental homes being constructed under the Housing and Urban Development Agency and what are the evaluations of these experiments?

[Mr. Nystrom.]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): 1. A proposal to increase the amount of insulation required in the construction of dwelling units has been prepared by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for consideration by the Associate Committee on the National Building Code.

2. Studies on the requirements for insulation of housing have been carried out by the National Research Council, with the following reports having been published: (a) Determining Optimum Thickness of Insulation for Heated Buildings, NRC 8151. (b) Insulation Thickness for Houses, HN 21. (c) Insulation for Northern Buildings, NRC 5280. (d) Insulation of Houses, NRC 1386. (e) Thermal Insulation in Housing, CBD 16. (f) Insulation of the Home, BB2.

3. The experimental houses built under the sponsorship of the Housing and Urban Development Association of Canada, with financial support from C.M.H.C., are designed with the object of testing new materials and techniques in home construction in the field. The major items tested in nine experimental projects to date have been prefabricated concrete foundation, plastic piping, water recycling equipment, pressure tested wood foundation, steel construction, reduction in size and number of structural components, new types of roofing, and new heating system designs. The program has involved the Association's local chapters in research activities, as well as manufacturers of components. The performance of materials and techniques in these projects is monitored by the Association in order to identify possible areas for experiment to be followed into the future. Grants totalling $133,000 have been approved by C.M.H.C. under Part V of the National Housing Act to assist in financing the construction of these experimental houses, and in monitoring the results. In addition, the construction of a number of these houses has been financed by NHA loans which have totalled $139,600.

LANDING RIGHTS AT TORONTO INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Question No. 536—Mr. Wagner:

CNR—FREIGHT RATES

Question No. 601—Mr. Howard:

Since January 1, 1971, has the Canadian National Railways had any discussions with Eurocan Pulp and Paper Co. Ltd., of Kitimat, B.C., regarding freight rates which CNR is prepared to charge for wood chips transported to the Company's pulp mill at Kitimat and, if so, what freight rates have been (a) offered (b) established?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): The Management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: (a) The Canadian National is currently discussing with Eurocan Pulp and Paper Co. Ltd. a new basis of freight rates to apply on the movement of woodchips to that company's pulp mill at Kitimat. As these freight rate changes are still being discussed, along with many important terms and conditions, it is not possible at this point to specify what has been offered. (b) As the matter is still under discussion, nothing new has been established.

(b) As a consequence of the above, there has been no general change made to freight rates on woodchips transported to these mills.

TORONTO AND CALGARY INTERNATIONAL AIRPORTS

Question No. 704—Mr. Stackhouse:

1. Is it the intention of the government to consider expanding in 1973 the number of countries having landing rights at Toronto International Airport?

2. What countries will enjoy landing rights at the new Calgary International Airport?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): 1. Under a new air agreement with the Federal Republic of Germany, now before the government for approval, the German airline Lufthansa would be allowed to operate into Toronto. In addition, bilateral air negotiations are expected to occur with a number of countries in 1973, in which access to Toronto by the airlines of these countries are expected to be one of the subjects of discussion. Before granting any such rights careful consideration is given to the compensation another country offers in exchange for Toronto, and to the over-all balance of benefits to Canada.

2. Canada and the U.S.A.

3. The total accumulated expenditure to December 31, 1972 in fees for consultants and other professional services for the planning and development of the Toronto Area Airports System is $2,021,000. This amount includes consulting and other professional work to evaluate many alternate sites, develop traffic forecasts and prepare economic and ecological studies, etc. It would be impracticable to maintain separate accounting systems for each site. Expenditures for the Pickering site are therefare included in the total given.

2. What recommendations were made by the Treasury Board as a result of those evaluations?

3. What recommendations were accepted by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and to what extent have those recommendations been implemented?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): 1. There was a draft report prepared by the Treasury Board Secretariat that summarized the preliminary results of some econometric tests of one aspect of several industrial incentive programs, including the Defence Industry Productivity Program (DIP). This draft report did not seek to assess whether or not the benefits of these industrial incentive programs, in terms of their impact on the realization of the government objectives, warranted the costs incurred in carrying them out. The draft report was dated February 9, 1973. Responsibility for the evaluation of the effectiveness of programs is borne by individual departments. If such delegation did not take place there would be either massive duplication, because the Treasury Board Secretariat would require almost as much technical expertise as departments now have, or the ministers responsible for particular programs would not have the kind of advice they need if they are to propose program changes designed to realize the government's objectives more effectively. The Treasury Board Secretariat has three functions to perform in so far as program evaluation is concerned: i. it carries out particular program evaluations as case studies for the purpose of demonstrating what kinds of evaluations can be achieved; ii. it develops evaluative techniques that are applicable in assessing a whole range of programs; iii. it seeks to ensure that departmental evaluations of programs that affect the same objectives are carried out on a comparable basis so that interprogram comparisons can be made. Program evaluation is a continuous process within individual departments providing a flow of information to ministers and deputy heads on the extent to which government objectives are being affected by programs and of the changes overtime in the unit cost of producing particular program outputs. Therefore, it should not be inferred from the fact that a Treasury Board Secretariat evaluation report of a particular program does not exist that it is not being evaluated. Virtually every department in government now has the resources to carry out evaluations of the efficiency of its operations and the cost effectiveness of its programs.

2. The draft report referred to under 1 is classified as "confidential" on the grounds that it contains expressions of the opinions of officials, the release of which would prejudice the efficient and effective discharge of the government's responsibilities.

*ESCALATION OF RETIRED BANK EMPLOYEES' PENSIONS

Question No. 1,082—Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre):

With reference to the reply to Starred Question No. 811, as recorded on page 1505 of Hansard for February 21, 1973, will the Minister of Finance now say whether he has discussed with the chartered banks the need for the pensions paid to their employees to be escalated annually by an amount at least equal to the rise in the cost of living and, if so, what has been the response of each of the chartered banks with whom he has had such a discussion?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker as indicated in the reply to starred question No. 811, as recorded on page 1505 of Hansard of February 21, 1973, the Minister of Finance has not discussed the subject directly with the chartered banks since pensions paid to retired employees are normally a matter left entirely to the discretion of all private business corporations. However, the Inspector-General of Banks has spoken to the Canadian Bankers' Association to ascertain what are the practices of banks.

Responses from all the largest banks indicated that, while practices vary in some detail and payments are not specifically tied to the cost of living index, they all have for some time been making special payments each year out of revenues (not from pension funds) to all retired personnel or survivors, normally after they have been retired for five years. I have, however, drawn the hon. member's starred questions Nos. 811 and 1082 to the attention of the presidents of each of the chartered banks.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, 70 days ago I put question No. 52 on the order paper. It reads as follows:

What is the amount, since July 1971, by province, that has been expended by all departments of government, in grants or other assistance, to corporations, partnerships, etc. to provide for the establishment of new industries or the expansion of already existing industries?

There were two additional parts to the question. There can be no justification whatever on the part of the government for not answering this question. It may be a bit trying for the government to answer because it will show, so far as the western provinces are concerned, that they have been getting only crumbs from the rich man's table.

Motion No. 152—Mr. Nystrom:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the memorandum sent to the Cabinet on April 10, 1972, entitled "Report of the Inter-departmental Committee on Heroin Control".

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, this is a cabinet document and therefore cannot be tabled. Accordingly, I would ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, this is a very important document on the control of heroin and it should be made public. After all, most of us know the contents already.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

COPY OF MEMORANDUM ENTITLED "REPORT OF THE INTER-DEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE ON HEROIN CONTROL", MARCH 20, 1972

Motion No. 153—Mr. Nystrom:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the memorandum sent to the Cabinet on March 20, 1972, entitled "Report of the Inter-departmental Committee on Heroin Control".

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): The same motion, Mr. Speaker, and the same response.

Mr. Nystrom: The same response here, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

COPY OF CORRESPONDENCE RELATING TO "NATIONAL INSTITUTE ON ALCOHOLISM AND DRUG ADDICTION"

Motion No. 154—Mr. Nystrom:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the document or documents sent to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, dated November 15, 1971, recommending a "National Institute on Alcoholism and Drug Addiction".

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I regret to say that the government is unable to accept the hon. member's motion since no document recommending a national institute on alcoholism and drug addiction was sent to the Minister of National Health and Welfare on or around November 15, 1971. I would therefore suggest that the hon. member withdraw his motion.

Mr. Nystrom: In that case I will withdraw the motion, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is withdrawn.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

KAMLOOPS INDIAN BAND NO. 1—FINANCIAL STATEMENT AND INDIVIDUAL TRANSACTIONS

Motion No. 155—Mr. Oberle:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the financial statement of the operating and capital accounting of the Kamloops, B.C. Indian Band No. 1 and copies of individual transactions in respect to the purchase and sale of livestock and capital assets for the past 12 months.

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, an election for chief and councillors of the Kamloops Band Council was held on December 21, 1972. However, an appeal against the election has been submitted and until such time as the appeal has been disposed of the band is without a council and therefore consent to produce papers by the council is not possible. Under the circumstances I ask the hon. member to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Oberle: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is withdrawn.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

INCOME TAX

ALLEGED ISSUANCE OF INCORRECT TP4U SLIPS BY UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION—REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and arises from the reported discrepancy in some 2,000 out of 28,000 cases investigated in connection with the Delorimier unemployment office in Montreal in that the TP4U slips issued from the unemployment insurance office in Ottawa showed higher payments during 1972 in at least 2,000 cases than could be accounted for from the records of the Delorimier office. Can the minister give the House an explanation of this discrepancy and tell us why there are no records, no microfilm record in Ottawa to prove or disprove the accuracy of the TP4U forms issued from Ottawa?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the Leader of the Opposition's question but I regret that I cannot give the information today. I will take it as notice and endeavour to furnish a reply to the House at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. Stanfield: Can the minister tell the House whether verification checks have been made at other offices throughout the country and, if so, have similar discrepancies between the records of the local office and the TP4U slips issued from Ottawa shown up? Also, can the minister state whether microfilm and verification papers are missing in these cases?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I will take supplementary notice of the supplementary question.

Mr. Stanfield: Am I to understand from what the minister says that he has not launched any investigation into these matters yet?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman would be better taken to understand that I would prefer to get all the facts before replying.

MANPOWER

DIRECTIVE ESTABLISHING PRIORITY IN JOB REFERRALS—POSITION OF PERSONS WHOSE UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BENEFITS HAVE EXPIRED—REQUEST FOR WITHDRAWAL

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and relates to the directive given by the minister to manpower placement officers to give priority for job placement to those people drawing unemployment insurance benefits and those receiving welfare. I should like to ask the minister where this leaves those thousands of workers who have run out of benefits, are still looking for work and are not drawing welfare?

• (1420)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member might like to rephrase the question. The question asked in those terms, I suggest to the hon. member, at least sounds rhetorical and the rule is well known that rhetorical questions cannot be asked. Perhaps the hon. member might like to rephrase the question.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I will rephrase the question. Where does the directive given by the minister to local placement offices leave workers who are not drawing benefits and are not on welfare but are still looking for work?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's question, for it gives me the opportunity to make this comment. When the deputy minister and I discussed the question of priorities I distinctly had the understanding that we were talking totally about the local initiatives program. When I announced in December that the local initiatives program was being extended, I said that new criteria would be added to this effect: the first priority would be to draw from those on unemployment insurance, then from those on welfare rolls, and so on. I regret any misinterpretation or misunderstanding that may have come about from the deputy minister's dispatch to the field on Friday. He and I are going to discuss the matter this afternoon and clarify any misunderstanding that may have occurred.

Mr. Alexander: Withdraw!

Mr. Grafftey: In view of the incredible confusion that has been brought about by this directive, will the minister now withdraw it?

[Mr. Andras.]

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I can add to my comments. I will withdraw or otherwise based on my discussion this afternoon.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the Leader of the Opposition on a supplementary, after which I will recognize the hon. member for Skeena and try to complete one round of questioning. I will return to this matter later if hon. members have other supplementaries.

DIRECTIVE ESTABLISHING PRIORITY IN JOB REFERRALS—REQUEST THAT MINISTER EXPLAIN ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the minister. As I understood him a minute ago, the minister now says that this directive applied only to local initiatives grants. In that case can he explain to the House why he gave such an elaborate explanation yesterday as to how this directive operated in connection with unemployment insurance or in connection with the administration of that program.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am quite frankly saying to the House that my emphasis, as announced in December, along with that of the Minister of Finance when we announced the winter program—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: Withdraw!

Mr. Andras: —was to give priority to people on unemployment insurance and social welfare in so far as the local initiatives program was concerned. If confusion developed between the deputy minister and myself, I apologize to the House for that. These mistakes can happen. If there is confusion, we will remove it forthwith as soon as I have had an opportunity to discuss the matter with him.

Mr. Lundrigan: On a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member for Skeena. He will be recognized in a moment. The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate rises on a question of privilege.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Having had the opportunity last evening to study in detail the statement made by the minister yesterday and having read subsequent press reports, I now rise on a question of privilege, perhaps more in the interest of the hon. member for Verdun than in my own interest and that of my party. There has been a serious misrepresentation, unintentional I am sure, to the effect that the directive that was debated and referred to in the press was the original directive issued last October. My information is that there was a directive in October which had to do with LIP. My further information is that a subsequent directive was issued which was all-encompassing. Consequently the minister, inadvertently I am sure, has reflected seriously on the hon. member for Verdun. I would think the hon.

member for Verdun would not want to leave this matter unchallenged, and I should like him to have the opportunity of clarifying his position because his conduct and behaviour have been called into account not only with respect to the LIP aspect of the directive but also in terms of the witch hunt that is now being conducted. This has nothing to do with the original 1972 intention of the department to try to place people in jobs and not track them down.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member for Verdun thinks he has a question of privilege, of course he will be recognized for that purpose. I suggest at the same time that the point raised by the hon. member is the same kind of point on which there have been numerous rulings over many years from day to day that disputes as to facts or statements that have been made or as to the interpretation of statements made by members cannot be raised by way of a question of privilege. It is simply a dispute between individual members. I rule that the hon. member does not have a question of privilege, but if the hon. member for Verdun claims that he has a question of privilege I will listen to him, as I did to the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I might have two. One is that I do not want anyone to think I have lost my ability to defend myself in the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: The second and more important one is that an article in the Ottawa Journal, I believe, inadvertently stated that I was the originator of the document that appeared yesterday. I would like to clarify the matter and say, because it corroborates the statement of the present minister, that in October I did indeed give instructions that the unemployed be given priority with regard to LIP and on-the-job training in light of the fact that these programs are designed to alleviate unemployment, whereas in the previous year many employed people took advantage of LIP to the detriment of the unemployed.

POWER

JAMES BAY HYDROELECTRIC PROJECT—COST OF ENVIRONMENTAL STUDIES TO FEDERAL GOVERNMENT—PUBLICATION OF RESULTS

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of the Environment with regard to the agreement between his department and the James Bay Development Corporation of last November relating to environmental studies in the area of the James Bay hydroelectric project. Can the minister tell the House whether there is any cost to be borne by the federal government with respect to those studies?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Yes, Mr. Speaker. As I recall, the federal taxpayer will be putting up half the cost of the various environmental studies that are being carried out in co-operation with the James Bay Development Corporation.

Mr. Howard: May I also ask the minister who will be doing the studies? Who will be initiating them and doing the actual work? Also, will the results of the studies be made public?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, most, if not all, of the studies that are being paid for by the federal taxpayer will be done either by experts in the employ of Environment Canada or consultants retained by the federal government. The results of all of these studies will, of course, be made public.

Mr. Howard: Inasmuch as this agreement or document has been kept secret up until now, is the minister prepared to table it in the House?

Mr. Davis: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I am informed that it is a public document.

JAMES BAY HYDROELECTRIC PROJECT—ALLEGED REQUEST BY INDIAN AFFAIRS BRANCH FOR LEGAL OPINION ON FEDERAL GOVERNMENT RESPONSIBILITIES

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Justice. Will the minister confirm that his officials have now been requested by officials of the Department of Indian Affairs to present a legal opinion on the responsibilities of the federal government in the James Bay affair under the Quebec Boundaries Extension Act of 1912? Can he also indicate when that opinion will be forthcoming and whether it will be made available to the House?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the various departments involved are constantly consulting the Department of Justice for legal opinions about situations in which they are involved and these opinions are furnished from time to time.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION—INACCURACY OF T4 SLIPS AND DELAY IN SENDING TP4U SLIPS—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue.

Since some unemployed have been receiving T4 slips showing amounts that they have not yet received, and since some unemployed are still waiting for the Commission to send them their TP4U slips, could the minister say if he intends to penalize the Unemployment Insurance Commission on the same basis as Canadian employers who produce T4 slips later than February 28?

[English]

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, no widespread incidents of this kind have been reported to me. However, in the cases that have been reported I have had the matter discussed with the Unemployment Insurance Commission and I think it is cooperating fully. So far I have not had anyone suggest laying a charge against the commission.

MEASURES TO RECTIFY INACCURACY OF TP4U SLIPS SENT BY UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Could he tell the House what steps he means to take to ensure that beneficiaries who are affected by the mistakes on TP4U slips receive corrected slips showing the true amounts that they were paid, in order that they may be able to file their tax returns in time and state their income for 1972?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will try to give the hon. member an answer to that question when I reply to the Leader of the Opposition.

MANPOWER

DIRECTIVE ESTABLISHING PRIORITY IN JOB REFERRALS—EFFECT ON UNEMPLOYED YOUNG PEOPLE AND VETERANS

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact that all the LIP grant funds have now been allocated, does the statement the minister made yesterday not really mean that young people leaving schools and veterans not in receipt of unemployment insurance or welfare are the lowest priority categories in terms of referral to jobs and job training?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I do not think it means that at all. In the first place, there is the summer employment program for youth announced by my colleague, the Secretary of State, which includes substantial funds for OFY and other schemes for assisting students. As far as veterans are concerned, there will be no inhibition or prohibition affecting the placement of veterans where jobs are available and where they are capable of taking them, as far as the Department of Manpower is concerned.

ENERGY

PROPOSAL TO USE RAIL TRANSPORTATION FOR ALASKAN OIL—STATEMENT BY MINISTER—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. John Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. It relates to the announcement made recently by the Premier of British Columbia with respect to an alternative route to transport oil from the north. Was the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources expressing the policy of the government yesterday when he stated that British Columbia's proposed oil route was "inadequate", and that a Mackenzie Valley pipeline would best serve Canadian and United States interests?

[Mr. Stanbury.]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am not aware of that part of the minister's statement. I do know he made a statement to the effect that he had only received notice of the British Columbia proposal the day before and that he could not be expected to enunciate a policy with regard to it within one day. If that is his position, the other parts of the quotation should be interpreted in light of that statement.

Mr. Fraser: Is it the position of the government that Premier Barrett's proposal is inadequate and that the Mackenzie Valley pipeline route would in fact be the best route to serve Canadian and United States interests?

Mr. Trudeau: I repeat, we can hardly answer whether the proposal is inadequate or not until we have studied it, and we have only known of it for two days.

Mr. Fraser: Would the Prime Minister advise the House whether there is at present any committee, or any arrangement between the government of British Columbia and the government of Canada, to ensure a common and united Canadian position with respect to the problem related to the TAPS tanker route?

Mr. Trudeau: I know of no such committee, Mr. Speaker. I believe the present government of British Columbia has just come around to being interested in this issue. But of course we have been in communication with the leader of the Liberal opposition in British Columbia who is very well advanced in his consideration of this problem.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Drummond (Mr. Boisvert) wishes to ask a supplementary to the last question; I shall attempt to finish with the matter we are now debating, and shall then recognize the hon. member for Drummond so that he may put his supplementary.

[English]

For the moment the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain.

PROPOSAL TO USE RAIL TRANSPORTATION FOR ALASKAN OIL—SUGGESTED WIDENING OF STUDY

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): My question is a supplementary to the Prime Minister on the same subject. In the light of the answer given by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources yesterday to the hon. member for New Westminster, would the Prime Minister, in view of his interest in the alienation of the west, ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to add another dimension to his study, namely, the restrictive difficulties imposed by the Alaska panhandle on the development of that part of northwestern Canada? If this dimension were included it might add more body to the study and make it much more worthwhile.

Mr. Trudeau: That seems like an interesting representation, Mr. Speaker. I will see that the minister is made aware of it.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I ask the Prime Minister whether the government intends to have a study made of the British Columbia proposal regarding the transport of Prudhoe Bay oil to the United States, and will the Prime Minister tell the House which of the ministers, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources or the Minister of Northern Affairs, will be responsible for making the study and whether or not they will be in touch with the British Columbia government regarding their decision?

Mr. Trudeau: I understand that the British Columbia proposal was made known to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. He will, of course, wish to study it from his point of view and from the point of view of the Department of Northern Affairs. I cannot say at this point whether he will wish to undertake as deep a study as was made in connection with the Mackenzie Valley route which, as the hon. member knows, has been the subject of very costly environmental studies over the last two years. I do not know whether the minister, having taken a first look at the British Columbia proposal, will decide to have such deep studies made or whether, for other reasons, he will decide it is not worth a study of that type because, among other things, I understand the route would be more useful for the transport of United States oil and other resources than for Canadian needs.

DIRECTIVE ESTABLISHING PRIORITY IN JOB REFERRALS—APPROVAL BY GOVERNOR IN COUNCIL—CONSIDERATION BY STATUTORY REGULATIONS COMMITTEE

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): A supplementary to the minister. In view of the fact that the dispatch of the deputy minister referred to by the minister yesterday is clearly a regulation as defined by the Statutory Regulations Act under the Unemployment Insurance Act, was the approval of the Governor in Council obtained for this regulation and, in any event, will the minister confer with the two joint chairmen of the Statutory Regulations Committee to consider this regulation in order that we may get at the truth of this matter? This would be a very interesting first case for the committee to consider.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): When I have had a chance to examine all the pitfalls inherent in that question I shall give the hon. member a reply.

Mr. Baldwin: In breach of the law.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS FOR THE WEST

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. As the Prime Minister stated to the fund-raising dinner in Toronto last week, "as we had answers for Quebec and the Maritimes, we are now defining answers for the west", can he advise the House just what these answers are so we may have a preview of what the programs for the west will be?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question cannot be in order. The hon. member might wish to rephrase it. He will appreciate that the type of general information for which he is asking would normally be made available by way of a statement on motions.

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Hees: I will simply ask the Prime Minister this question, then. In view of the right hon. gentleman's belief that the government had the answers for Quebec and the Maritimes, can he advise us as to the basis of his program for the west?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): As regards the program for the west, the Speech from the Throne mentioned three main areas by way of suggestion, but we took the point of view that we would want not only the western governments but the various institutions in the west to make their opinions known to us so that we could discuss with them and look at the solutions they propose. As the hon. member may remember if he checks the Speech from the Throne, the areas we suggested were transportation, western based financial institutions and areas relating to northern development. As regards the Quebec and Maritimes part of the question, the policies we put forward for Quebec, for instance, included full participation in federalism rather than two nations as put forward by the Conservative party.

• (1440)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister may not be able to bring himself more up to date than five years ago, but will he now advise the House whether the government is willing to condemn the west to no more effective policies than it produced for Quebec and the Maritimes?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I really doubt that supplementaries to this question can be asked, but the Chair will recognize the hon. member for St. Catharines and then the hon. member for Winnipeg North.

Mr. Trevor Morgan (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the statement made by him, will he please tell the House the policy of the Liberal government in respect of that most important question, capital punishment?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question obviously is not in order.

Mr. Morgan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The right hon. Prime Minister in a recent statement derided members on this side of the House for not having a policy on capital punishment, thereby implying that the Liberal government did have such a policy. Otherwise, what he said was nothing more than a verbal diatribe or verbal diarrhoea.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would hope that the right hon. Prime Minister would not want to reply to that question. The hon. member for Winnipeg North.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wanted to ask a supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member would first indicate why he rises on a point of order. If he simply wishes to ask a supplementary question, that is not a point of order.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, I am not rising because I was denied the right to ask a supplementary question, and I think that you will agree I do not abuse the rules of the House. I rise to suggest that the Prime Minister's reply to the question of the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings is derogatory of the position of all western Members of Parliament in this House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Dinsdale: I say that because for many years we have been expressing the viewpoints of western Canada, and in this respect the Prime Minister does not have to consult anybody outside this chamber. The western members have conscientiously—

An hon. Member: You know it all.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Do you represent the NDP government of Manitoba?

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, the willingness of the—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Trudeau.]

An hon. Member: Do you represent the NDP government of British Columbia?

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, the willingness of hon. members in the Liberal party to listen to the views of the west is demonstrated by their unwillingness to listen to me.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair is willing to listen to the hon. member but perhaps he should indicate his point of order as quickly as possible. We have spent a great deal of time on points of order or questions of privilege since the beginning of the question period.

Mr. Dinsdale: I agree, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, I agree that you are always ready to listen and certainly do your best to control—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Oh, come on! Sit down!

Mr. Dinsdale: Certainly you do your best to control the noise from the government benches. My point of order is specifically this. Is not the Prime Minister's appeal to the west, stating that he will give the west a better deal, more accurately described as a better deal for the Liberal party in western Canada?

An hon. Member: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think the hon. member would want me to rule on whether that is a point of order. I feel that hon. members should attempt to make the question period somewhat more significant by giving other hon. members an opportunity to ask questions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PROSECUTION OF COMPANIES WHOSE PRODUCTS FAILED TO MEET QUAD PROGRAM TESTS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare arising from the statement he made yesterday in which he pointed out that 48 drugs tested under the QUAD program of his department failed to meet those tests, which means in fact they are illegal under the food and drug regulations. I should like to know why the companies that produce those drugs are not being prosecuted?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, we are looking at the importance or the significance of the failures in these various cases, but I can assure the hon. member that, where failures are significant, prosecutions will be instituted.

Mr. Orlikow: Will the minister favourably consider making a statement in the House listing the drugs that failed to meet these quality tests and the companies that produced them?

Mr. Lalonde: I will certainly look into this matter, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Now we hear from the leader.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: They are sorry they ever dropped you.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question that is of interest in all parts of Canada. It has to do with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I ask the minister who reports for that corporation why the CBC has introduced a new policy of reducing news and public affairs coverage out of Ottawa? What is the reason for the change? Why has the program, "Encounter", been cut in half so far as time is concerned? Will he find out the reason for this action? Is it, as suggested by the incomparable Sheila McCook in her column, the centralization by the CBC, in so far as English broadcasting of public affairs is concerned, in the city of Toronto rather than the city of Ottawa in which national news is made?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to find out the answer to that question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, would the minister also find out whether the purpose of this is to avoid focusing attention on the weaknesses of the present government?

PUBLIC WORKS

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN PROJECTS IN SOUTH SHORE RIDING TO IMPROVE FACILITIES FOR FISHERMEN AND PROVIDE EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Public Works. In view of the present high rate of unemployment in Nova Scotia, will the minister reactivate and review his deferred file on public works in my riding, some of which have been deferred since 1969, so that necessary repairs to wharves, skidways and breakwaters will provide useable facilities for our fishermen while providing much needed employment for our people?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member might be surprised to learn that I agree with him. We will have to do much more to bring these wharves up to acceptable standards. We are addressing ourselves to this at the present time, but we will need more funds to do the job well.

Mr. Hees: You are beginning to get the message.

AGRICULTURE

FARM MACHINERY—BARBER COMMISSION RECOMMENDATIONS—EFFECT ON PRICES OF THOSE IMPLEMENTED—POSSIBILITY OF REVERSE DUMPING DUTY

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact he has implemented six of the recommendations of the Barber commission on farm machinery prices, will he now inform the House what effect this has had on the prices of farm machinery to date?

• (1450)

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we are constantly studying the prices of farm machinery. I would be wrong if I said our studies are finished. We are still following up some of them and have met as late as a week ago with some of the people who have indicated a desire to export farm machinery to Canada.

Mr. Yewchuk: Since there has been no significant reduction in the price of farm machinery as a result of these measures, is the minister considering the implementation of the other recommendation which suggests the imposition of a reverse dumping duty?

Mr. Whelan: This has been discussed, Mr. Speaker, but the whole thing is that on most of this farm machinery, practically all of it, there are no duties or tariffs. It is a free market, and we hope it will be used as such.

FARM MACHINERY—STUDY OF PROPOSED SASKATCHEWAN LEGISLATION RESPECTING SPARE PARTS

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he has studied the legislation being proposed in the province of Saskatchewan to deal with the adequate supply of repair parts, and is he ready to give his full co-operation to that province in order to meet the needs of the farmers?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): I certainly have seen the legislation that is being prepared by the province of Saskatchewan, but to say I have analysed it completely at this stage would be wrong. We are hoping to go over it further to see whether it is worthy of our assistance.

Oral Questions

FLOODS

LAKES ONTARIO AND ERIE—PROGRAMS PROPOSED BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT TO PROVINCE FOR BUILDING PROTECTIVE WORKS OR COMPENSATION

Mr. Terry Grier (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. Will he indicate to the House specifically what programs were proposed by his department to the government of Ontario either for building protective works or for providing funds for the compensation of those people who suffer flood damage on the Lake Ontario and Lake Erie shorelines this year, to which he referred in reply to a question last week or the week before?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, very briefly, when the Ontario ministers were here in Ottawa about ten days ago I described two programs that are in effect in other provinces. One is long-term planning for protective works and the other involves compensation after the event of flooding. Both these programs are in the public area so far as informal information is concerned.

Mr. Grier: May I ask the minister whether it would be fair to infer from that reply that his department has no plans to deal with the short-run situation this winter and spring?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, property basically is a matter for the province and unless the province has plans it is very difficult for the federal government to help deal with that problem in respect of property.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES ACT

COMMISSIONER'S REPORT—REQUEST FOR DEBATE

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

Has he met with, or does he intend to meet with, the Commissioner of Official Languages, Mr. Keith Spicer, to discuss the recommendations made in his last report, and what does he intend to do about these recommendations?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, unless I am mistaken, the report is addressed to all Members of Parliament as such, and not just to the government. As the hon. member knows, Mr. Spicer is answerable to parliament and not to the government.

I attempt, Mr. Speaker, to meet all senior governmental and parliamentary officials, and I meet with them from time to time. I have not seen Mr. Spicer recently, but I met him several months ago.

Mr. Matte: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Can the Prime Minister say whether he will be introducing in this session a motion or bill that will give us the opportunity to discuss the bilingualism question?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows from the Speech from the Throne that the government intends to bring before the House the question of bilingualism in the civil service. We expect to be putting something on the order paper within two weeks at the latest, that will provide the House with information, and we hope that all members will wish to take part in the debate.

GRANTING OF FUNDS TO SCHOOL BOARDS IN OTTAWA AREA—INQUIRY AS TO ANNOUNCEMENT

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State. In view of the continuing interest in obtaining federal funding in the secondary and primary school systems in the national capital area, and in view of negotiations which we understand the Secretary of State has been carrying on with the province, would the minister inform the House whether he will be making an announcement tomorrow or within the next few days with regard to the granting of funds to the school boards within the national capital area?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I hope to be making an announcement along those lines fairly shortly.

INCOME TAX

INQUIRY WHETHER NATIONAL REVENUE DEPARTMENT BOUND BY ADVICE GIVEN TAXPAYERS THROUGH SPECIAL TELEPHONE SERVICE

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue. In view of the encouragement given Canadians by the expensive advertising program sponsored by his department to call a Zenith number at the department for free tax advice, can the minister confirm to the House that his department will be bound by the advice given to Canadian taxpayers who seek such advice?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have serious doubts whether the question is in order. Perhaps I might give the member the benefit of my doubts and allow the minister to reply, if he can do so, briefly.

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): I think Your Honour undoubtedly has in mind that I am not permitted to give a legal opinion in the House.

Mr. Bawden: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think this is a very important question to all Canadians because of the fact that it is tax time. Surely Canadians must be made aware of whether or not this advice can be taken as good advice and whether the department is bound by it. I think this is a very legitimate question which the minister should answer.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Every member who asks a question, of course, may feel he should receive one answer rather than another or that he is entitled to an answer, but according to the rules and practice the minister does not have to answer, as the hon. member knows.

Mr. Bawden: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will allow the supplementary after which he will call orders of the day. I apologize to other hon. members who have not been given an opportunity to ask questions. Perhaps the Chair might recognize the Leader of the Opposition after the supplementary and before calling orders of the day.

Mr. Bawden: Mr. Speaker, in that officials of the department are saying on the telephone that they will not be bound by the advice they are giving, will the minister inform himself and advise the House on the subject and also undertake to be honest with Canadians by making clear in the advertisements that the department will not stand behind the advice given?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member will appreciate that a question asked in those terms is not in order.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR BREAKDOWN OF ESTIMATED CASH REQUIREMENTS FOR FISCAL YEAR 1973-74

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. I should like to ask him once again a question which he took under advisement. Is he now prepared to give the House a breakdown of the figure of $2 billion in cash requirements that he has projected for the next fiscal year?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will see whether I can get that in the form asked for by the Leader of the Opposition. I apologize to him. I have been unable to assemble that in the last week.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I had a question on the order paper for nearly a month to which I have received an answer from the Secretary of State. My question was:

1. How many full-time employees were under salary in the Department of the Secretary of State on (a) January 1, 1963 (b) January 1, 1973?

2. How many people in each of these years were receiving salaries of (a) under $10,000 (b) between $10,000 and $20,000 (c) over $20,000?

I am surprised at the answer I received from the minister. He gave the number of employees he had during this period but he cannot supply the salaries. I think this is a very simple question and I would appreciate a full answer. He can give it for 1963 but he cannot give it for 1973.

PRIVILEGE

MR. KNOWLES (WINNIPEG NORTH CENTRE)—ALLEGED MISLEADING STATEMENT BY MINISTER ON DIRECTIVE ESTABLISHING PRIORITY IN JOB REFERRALS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege and I raise this point under Standing Order 17(1) which says that whenever any matter of privilege arises it shall be taken into consideration immediately. There is a second paragraph to Standing Order 17 which requires an hour's notice, unless the point of privilege relates to something that arose during the course of the sitting. The point on which I rise is something that did arise during the course of the sitting this afternoon. Indeed, it came up during the question period, but I felt that it was not proper to take time out of the question period by raising a point of privilege then, so I waited until the question period was over.

I realize that Your Honour has spent many hours pouring over the question of privilege, and we frequently have quoted to us the citation which says that members raise many points which really are not points of privilege. But I submit that in Beauchesne there is a clear statement that insults to members are to be regarded as a matter of privilege. I feel, Sir, that the House has been insulted today by statements made by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) in answer to questions that were put to him. Yesterday, in answer to questions, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration very clearly said that the directives that were under discussion had been dispatched to the directors general of the manpower offices, and that they were to be taken in context with other regulations and other manuals or instructions. He also said that those directives were to be related to the terms of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

This was not a chance, off-the-cuff, remark. It was clear yesterday, in the words of the minister, that the priorities that we had discussed related to manpower offices in giving priority to certain persons for available jobs. Today, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration says that some kind of a misunderstanding occurred last December, not between yesterday and today, but as of last December there was a misunderstanding and that all of this had to do with LIP grants.

I submit that it is pretty close to an insult to the House to ask us to believe today that he knew last December that these priorities related to LIP grants, whereas yesterday the minister clearly said that they related to the operations of the manpower offices. The minister made it clear yesterday that these directives had not been secret, and he said that they were to be taken into account after the normal operations required by the Unemployment Insurance Act.

I am not arguing whether the use of these directives was as bad as was made out in the House yesterday, but I do think it is an insult to the House to tell us one day that these matters related to the manpower offices and the next day that since last December the minister knew that they related to the granting of moneys under LIP. Therefore, I feel that the matter should be considered. I believe the minister, himself, should have a much better opportunity than he has in the question period to deal with it and that the place for him to deal with this matter so that it can be examined and so that he can give a full explanation, would be in the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration. I might point out also that he could and should bring with him before this committee his officers so that we can examine them as well and get the whole matter straightened out.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, I am well aware how seldom, since you have been in the chair, you have found a question of privilege to be a legitimate one. As you often say, a point or privilege is usually a matter of debate. This is not a matter of debate between us and the minister; it is a matter of debate between the minister yesterday and the minister today, if it is a matter of debate at all. At any rate, because I think it is an insult to the House that ought to be cleared up I would be prepared, if Your Honour feels I do have a question of privilege, to move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That the statements made today by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration to the effect that the priorities referred to yesterday related to LIP grants, which contradicts his statement of yesterday that these same priorities had been despatched to the directors general of the manpower offices to be taken in context with other regulations and also in relation to the terms of the Unemployment Insurance Act, be referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration for full examination.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair, of course, has no intention of allowing a debate on this matter, unless I rule there is a question of privilege. I will allow the minister to respond, if he wishes to do so, after which I will make a ruling because, in any event, that is a well established practice. In view of the fact that the minister has been referred to in the motion proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and in view of the fact that the minister's conduct has been impugned by the hon. member, I will allow the minister to speak briefly, after which I will make a ruling on whether, in my view, there is or there is not a question of privilege.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's comments cause me to rise and inform the House that what I was trying to convey today was simply this. Last December, when we announced the extension and augmentation of the funds for LIP we clearly enunciated the criteria that had been established before but which we repeated for emphasis, that particularly this year LIP employees would have to be drawn, as a condition of approval of the project, from manpower offices and that in fact the manpower officers would give priority first to those people who were on unemployment insurance rolls at that time, and second, to those who were on social welfare. Thereafter, the vacancies in LIP would be filled from other sources.

The other day, in discussion with the deputy minister—we were reviewing the progress of LIP now that nearly all projects approvals have been sent out—and we discussed whether this should be reconfirmed. I did not see the dispatch that went out on Friday at that time. I am telling the House that yesterday, rightly or wrongly, I was under the impression that we were mainly referring to LIP—

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Andras: I am telling the House that I had some doubts about that overnight, and I am saying that I am reviewing that with the deputy minister this afternoon. But there was no reference to December or a change in the program or a change in the regulations. The reference to the Unemployment Insurance Act came up because some hon. members opposite, I believe, suggested that this was in contravention of the Unemployment Insurance Act, on which perhaps I am not competent to give a legal opinion, but which I do not believe to be the case.

Certainly, the fact that we have given priority in LIP hirings to people from the unemployment insurance rolls has or should have been known for some time. I think my friend, the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey) will confirm that before he left this ministry he also, had indicated that for 1972-73 that priority would be established for LIP. Other matters have been brought into it, and this is what I wanted to check because that was the basis on which I thought we were talking yesterday. But when I look back I realize there was some error.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member cannot speak on the same question of privilege. He may have his own question of privilege. I think we should try to follow the long-established practice that there should not be a debate on an alleged, or a proposed, or suggested question of privilege because we will defeat the whole practice of privilege if there is a debate even before a finding is made that there is a prima facie case. I think I can say immediately that I cannot find that there is a prima facie case of privilege that ought to be referred to the committee, as suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and this for a number of reasons.

• (1510)

I think I still have to refer hon. members to citation 113 in Beauchesne's Fourth Edition which states that:

—a dispute arising between two members, as to allegations of facts, does not fulfil the conditions of parliamentary privilege.

I feel that on the basis of this citation, it would be very difficult to agree that there is a question of privilege.

With respect to the other matters, what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is doing, according to my understanding, is suggesting that a committee should investigate the veracity, or honesty, or integrity of another hon. member.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No; his consistency.

Mr. Speaker: That is the way I interpret the hon. member's motion; otherwise, I do not see why there should be a motion at all. It is a well known practice, confirmed by a number of rulings, including particularly an often quoted ruling of Mr. Speaker Michener, that the conduct of a member cannot be impugned without a charge being laid in the usual way, which charge being laid against a member is investigated by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, with consequences which are well known to members if the charges made are not substantiated following study by the committee.

I would think that if what the hon. member has in mind is to investigate a certain discrepancy, or to find out exactly what went on within a department, then it becomes simply an ordinary substantive motion which cannot be proposed to the House without the necessary 48 hours notice. On that basis, I would not think the motion could be put at this time. The hon. member may want to try to move it under Standing Order 43, and to get the unanimous consent of the House that it be put, but the hon. member's reaction to that suggestion indicates that he does not think he would get unanimous consent.

For these reasons, and perhaps others which could come to mind or be suggested by other hon. members, I would not think the Chair would be justified in finding that there is a prima facie case of privilege so that the statements made by the minister, or his conduct, be looked into by a committee, or so that they might be looked into by the particular committee to which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has referred. Therefore, I find that there is not a prima facie case of privilege.

Mr. Lundrigan: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I respect Your Honour's ruling on the question of privilege, and the detail that Your Honour has gone into in responding to the eminent member for Winnipeg North Centre, but I want to rise on a point of order dealing with Standing Order 41(2) which concerns the tabling of documents referred to in the House. Perhaps to facilitate the House and clarify the whole matter, it might be suggested that we could revert to motions—perhaps there is even a necessity that we do so—in order that the minister may table the document of October, which I understand deals with the previous situation, and the memorandum to which he has referred relating to the December decisions of the department.

Obviously, Your Honour, by the Prime Minister's own admission two sets of directives have been sent out. I think this should be brought to the attention of the House, and under Standing Order 41(2) we should move the documents tabled.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think it is clear that the minister was either wrong yesterday or wrong today, in what he said to the House. And I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the least he ought to do in order to clarify the situation in this House, and for the unemployed people as well as for his own officers, is to undertake to make a full statement on motions tomorrow. He could then present the document and a full explanation, so that members of other parties may be able to comment on it. If he has nothing to hide, that is obviously what he ought to do. He ought to tell parliament where he was wrong and what mistake was made.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, so far as my memory serves me now, I think I have laid bare my soul to the maximum degree that the facts would indicate. I will be quite prepared to examine the blues after this day's proceedings are printed to see if there is anything further I could add that would be useful. I have no objection to adhering to the hon. member's suggestion, but so far as I know right now there are no new facts to place before the House. I will examine the situation after I see Hansard.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan). He sought unanimous consent of the House to revert to motions so that the minister may have an opportunity, unless of course he has something to hide, to table the document in the House under Standing Order 41(2).

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will inquire is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: I have asked whether there is unanimous consent, and there is not. I just wonder whether there is any point in pursuing this at this juncture. The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) rises on a point of order.

Mr. Alexander: This will be a very short point of order, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the predicament of the minister arose from questions directed from this side of the House, including myself, and in view of the fact that what he said yesterday was certainly in direct contravention of what he had to say today with respect to the directive, I can see no reason, if the directive is wrong, why the minister in all good conscience cannot withdraw it now. He does not need any further discussion. He does not need to look at this matter further.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Alexander: This is my point of order. We are trying to clear up a very serious matter, Sir.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that this cannot be a point of order. He is asking the minister to table a document and to make a statement. That cannot be done at this time. We have gone beyond the question period. We should be calling orders of the day. The hon. member is rising on a point of order, and I respectfully suggest to him that it is not a point of order.

Mr. Alexander: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, it is very seldom a member's intention to abuse the Chair, but I think the whole country is left in a very precarious position. The minister appeared on television, and he made statements. He attempted to clarify his answer to my question yesterday. There is no doubt that nothing was mentioned about LIP. In order to show some sincerity, the least he can do right now is to say here and now that he withdraws that directive, and then we can start from scratch again.

[Translation]

Mr. Harney: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask you to enlighten me on the question that the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) concerning the recommendations in the report of the Commissioner of Official Languages.

The Prime Minister made it quite clear that he was not responsible for the report, but that it was submitted to the House.

I should therefore like to ask you, Mr. Speaker, when and where we will be able to discuss the report.

Mr. Speaker: I regret that I am unable to inform the hon. member. He cannot address questions to the Chair, even on the terms he suggested.

[English]

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, in view of my background, I certainly should not rise when it comes to procedural matters—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lundrigan: —and I acknowledge that. I do not have the background in procedure that members such as my House leader, the hon. gentleman from Cape Breton and other hon. gentlemen have, but I have been in this House when there were arguments about the tabling of documents to which reference had been made, and I have seen the rules. Your Honour can research this, although I am sure you do not need to, since you are quite aware of the rules. My understanding is that once documents are referred to in the House of Commons there is an obligation on the part of the minister or the concerned that they be tabled.

• (1520)

There has been a reference to October documents, December documents—we have had a general reference to all of the directives that have gone out of the manpower offices indicating the priorities for hiring. I contend, Your Honour, that under the rules of the House it is mandatory that the minister table these documents. This would help clear up the matter, and it would place the minister in a position where he could clear up the misunderstanding on the part of the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey) who opted to be the scapegoat today. I think it is obligatory and mandatory under the rules of the House that the minister table these documents.

Mr. Speaker: I cannot agree with the interpretation of the rules given by the hon. member. It is well known that if public documents are cited in debate, according to the usual rules of evidence known to members of the bar, the member citing them is required to table at least that part of the document used in debate. This is not a Standing Order but simply a practice. To that extent I would not agree with the hon. member's interpretation of the practice of the House.

Orders of the day.

[Mr. Harney.]

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

EXPORT DEVELOPMENT ACT

INCREASES IN AUTHORIZED SHARE CAPITAL AND IN CEILING ON LOANS AND GUARANTEES BY CORPORATION

The House resumed, from Friday, March 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gillespie that Bill C-3 to amend the Export Development Act be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, let me say at the outset that today I am experiencing some throat trouble, so if I speak in a very low key this afternoon I hope hon. members will understand.

Last Friday afternoon, in the three or four minutes before the adjournment, I had an opportunity to make a few remarks on the Export Development Act and the amendments which are before the House in the form of Bill C-3. I should like to take two or three minutes now to summarize what I said at that time. The purpose of the amendments is relatively simple, that is, to increase the share capital of the Export Development Corporation from $75 million to $125 million and to increase the ceiling on loans and guarantees from $800 million annually to $1.5 billion.

On the surface, these amendments seem rather straightforward but I raised a couple of issues last Friday and I want to talk about them further this afternoon. The main purpose of the Export Development Corporation, other than lending money to foreign companies or foreign countries to purchase equipment and supplies in Canada, is to insure Canadian firms against non-payment for exports by foreign buyers and to insure Canadian foreign investors when they invest in other countries. This type of insurance only takes effect when a private commercial company will not risk insuring a corporation.

I feel that the bill before us is oriented too much toward big business, the multinational corporation. If you look at the type of credits that have been extended by the Export Development Corporation over the last few years, you will find that most of the financial arrangements for insurance and so on have been with the huge multinational companies, many of which are controlled by Americans.

I pointed out the other day that there is a strange involvement between big government and big business, and this is borne out when you look at the board of directors. The chairman of the board of directors of the Export Development Corporation is Mr. J. F. Grandy, Deputy Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Also a member of the board is Mr. T. M. Burns, Senior Assistant Deputy Minister; Mr. G. K. Bouey, Governor of the Bank of Canada; Mr. P. Gerin-Lajoie, President of the Canadian International Development Agency and that progressive figure, Mr. S. S. Reisman, Deputy Minister of Finance; Mr. A. E. Ritchie, Under Secretary of State for External Affairs and so on. On the private sector side, we see four business representatives on the board of directors of the EDC—Mr. Paul Leman, President of the Aluminum Company of Canada; Mr. I. S. Ross, President, Swan Wooster Engineering Company, Limited of Vancouver; Mr. R. D. Southern, President of Atco Industries, Limited of Alberta and Mr. A. H. Zimmerman, Vice-President of Noranda Mines.

There seems to be a very interesting correlation here between big business and the government bureaucrats and mandarins, and some very interesting things have developed as a result of this strange, or perhaps not so strange, alliance. We find for example that Mr. Paul Leman, President of the Aluminum Company of Canada, was appointed to the board of directors in October, 1969. Perhaps there is a conflict of interest, Mr. Speaker, between his activities and one of the credits given by EDC. The minister might like to comment on that later. Mr. Leman is still on the board of directors of EDC and page 24 of the 1970 annual report of the Export Development Corporation shows that a credit was given to his company. The country concerned was Argentina and the contract was signed on December 11, 1970; the amount of financing was $7,500,000. I would be interested to know whether the President of Alcan was at the meeting where this particular credit was approved and whether he was involved in the decision. If he was, Mr. Speaker, this is an obvious conflict of interest and I think the minister owes the House an explanation when he speaks later in this debate.

When I look at the names of the directors and consider the financing that has been arranged and the firms to which the money is going, I wonder whether the government takes all the risk with the taxpayers' money and the multinational corporations take none. This is not what I understand as a free enterprise system; this is the type of system which we sometimes call the system of socialism for the wealthy, for the large corporations. When these corporations go into the other countries they are assured that there is absolutely no risk; they know that they will be insured by the Export Development Corporation, which is funded by the taxpayers of this country. I consider this an area of serious concern. I believe that the Export Development Corporation should be oriented more towards small businesses than towards large business, as is the case at present. At present, before a company may qualify for assistance, the size of transactions involved must be substantial. That, I believe, must be changed. The Export Development Corporation should help small businesses of this country.

My second area of concern—I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker, my voice has let me down and I cannot speak.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member would like to rest for a minute or two, or somebody else can make a contribution, after which he could complete his speech. I think we ought to accommodate ourselves to the unusual difficulties he is experiencing. I will call on the hon. member for Oxford. The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville may finish his speech later this afternoon.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, for a good many years we have heard successive ministers responsible for industry, trade and commerce in successive governments advocate in this House the expansion of our trading possibilities in South America. Also, a number of ministers responsible for trade, industry and commerce, including the previous minister, have taken trading missions to South America for that very purpose. This sort of thing went on during the tenure of the last two or three governments. Prior to that, this activity had been indulged in when the present hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) was minister of industry, trade and commerce. It is in that regard, and in that vein, that I wish to address my remarks.

Not only has it been our policy to expand trade in Latin America; it has also been, as it was in the days of the government formed by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and subsequently, the policy of our government to try and promote goodwill and perhaps political expectations of one variety or another in Latin America. The government, so far as I have been able to observe, has tried to promote this policy. However, it is clear that loans and extensions of credit are not granted from a purely economic motivation, otherwise why would it make loans to Pakistan, where the experience has not been entirely satisfactory, to say the least. Clearly loans and credit are extended on political, not economic, motivation. It is clear to me, as has been admitted by functionaries in the EDC, that the government of Chile in Latin America is being discriminated against in this regard. I will give precise details in a few moments.

I should like to point out that in days gone by, when Cuba was taken over by a new government by force of arms, the government of the day in this country did not discriminate against that government. I can well remember this because I happened to be parliamentary secretary to the then minister of industry, trade and commerce. It was made public recently by the late Mr. A. D. P. Heeney that great pressure was placed on the Canadian government at that time not to trade with Cuba. My colleague, the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings, has confirmed this to me. Nevertheless, Canada did not succumb to that pressure not to trade in strategic materials with the government of Cuba. Whenever the Cubans wished to buy anything, and whenever circumstances permitted credit being extended, they were accommodated. It is my understanding that the government of the United States had a great deal more respect for the government of Canada after it had stood up to pressure than was the case previously. This policy worked well.

It is well known that the present government of Chile is an extreme left-wing government, headed by Prime Minister Salvador Allende. He, at least, achieved his position after being democratically elected, which was not the case in the Cuban situation. It is equally well known that the government of the United States is a little unhappy about the government of Chile, and has exerted pressure in one way or another to try to do what it can to make the government of Chile somewhat less popular than it has been in the past. I would be surprised if the government of the United States has not attempted to put pressure on the government of this country, through the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie), and asked us to restrict credit to Chile. The reason is obvious. There are two industries in Chile which can provide foreign exchange. One is the copper industry, which is not in a healthy position, I gather; the other natural resource industry is the forest products industry. According to information at my disposal, some of those natural resources are now ready for harvesting and can provide foreign exchange for Chile.

It is equally clear that the government of Chile is in a difficult foreign exchange position and has difficulty paying loans. I think the record of the country's trading with Canada has always been very good in the past. However, apparently it is the desire of the Canadian government not to extend credit to Chile because of that country's currency difficulties and also, I suspect, as I have already mentioned, for other reasons. Apparently this government's motivation, at least in part may arise from wishing to embarrass the government of Chile because of its political leanings. Apparently this is government policy, and I hope the minister will make some reply in this regard. I cannot see how this policy would please those in this House who sit to my left, and who are the allies of this government. I would not think it would be to their liking at all.

The illustration I have in mind concerns a rather large firm in the city of Woodstock, Ontario, known as Timber Jack. This firms deals in logging equipment, that is, in log rolling equipment, and enjoys extensive sales all over the world. In the past many of these sales have been financed in one way or another by the EDC. Last year the government of Chile presented this firm, Timber Jack, which is the subsidiary of a multinational corporation, Eaton, Yale and Towne, with the opportunity to bid on a $4 million order for certain timber skidders and logging skidders. Conversations had gone on with the EDC concerning financing. This happened some months before tenders were invited on the order. When the people of Timber Jack talked with the people of EDC, it was apparent that EDC was agreeable to making the loan. As I say, this took place some months before the final decision was made with respect to tendering.

In any event, when the final chance came forward to make the tender, EDC turned the financing down. The terms, roughly, were 10 per cent cash down, which Chile was quite prepared to pay, and the rest was to be paid off over a relatively short period in equal monthly installments. In our previous experience in dealing with Chile, the financial obligations that Chile had incurred were always paid on the line. I was requested by the company concerned to find out what I could concerning this failure to help in the financing of this project. I discussed the matter with officials of EDC and was informed that they were acting in accordance with government policy not to extend loans to Chile at present. Apparently this has been not only the policy of this government, but of other governments as well. They did not specify which ones. Consequently, the order was turned down.

In addition to the fact that an industry in my city lost a $4 million contract because of this attitude and the subsequent loss of employment, all of which is important, there is the more important fact of our future trading relations with Latin America. In this particular instance, I understand that Brazil in fact financed a subsidiary company of Eaton, Yale and Towne which makes somewhat similar equipment. In any event, I do not think that Chile was done out of the equipment. It might just as well have come from Canada. For a long time companies in this country, multinational corporations or otherwise, have tried to provide good service to Latin American countries on commercial orders. It is my view that this may well affect Canada's image in the Andean pact countries of South America in general.

It is quite true that if we refused to finance Chile in this case while Brazil did so, it will make suspect our future negotiations concerning trade not only with Chile but perhaps other Latin American countries as well. Chile is a business risk. It is certainly an investment risk. However, Canada can well afford to look to the future by taking some commercial risk transactions. I am sure the minister knows that in the past the EDC has taken certain risks. While they have not worked out as successfully as hoped, I do not think that anyone objected because Canada's long range policy and political policy, or perhaps I should say foreign policy, were perhaps served by making these risk loans.

As I mentioned at the beginning of my remarks, Canada has been trying for a long time to break into the Latin American market. It has also been our policy to promote good relations with Latin America. This sort of activity is hardly calculated to do that. In fact, it has the opposite effect. Our good neighbour to the south does not particularly care for the government of Chile for its own good reasons and expects us to follow suit by taking discriminatory action against Chile. That is indeed unwise. I hope the minister will be persuaded to feel this way. It is often said there is a price on everything and certain risks are too costly. In other words, the game may not be worth the candle. This in no way affects making loans in southeast Asia where there are doubtful expectations.

In future, if governments of a left wing stripe are not popular with a certain government, such as that of the United States, Canada should not discriminate against those countries on that ground, even if risks are involved. The long-term objective of this country, certainly in the interest of trade and foreign policies, should be that we form good relations with Latin America, even if certain risks are involved. I suppose if there were some serious crisis in Chile, such as the earthquake they have had recently, we would be glad to provide assistance. I suppose that is a different case because that assistance would be freely provided. In this case, some repayment is involved.

The two policies seem thoroughly inconsistent. I hope the minister will encourage his colleagues in cabinet to reconsider their attitude with regard to trading with Chile, even though it may be against undoubted American pressures. I realize that our friends to the south are in a pretty strong bargaining position now, in view of the fact the auto pact is coming up for renegotiation. I hope the minister will give us a reply in this regard.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank you for the fine gesture of allowing me to continue my remarks. I really should not continue at this time. My voice gave out before, and it will probably do so again. However, I have one or two concluding sentences.

I was going to raise the issue of the concern about multinational foreign investment in the developing countries in the third world, and the fact that we encourage it in this country. Many of these countries are now interested in controlling their own economy. This is one question this House should seriously consider when discussing the bill before us today. For example, 86 per cent of the insured investment goes into developing nations according to the annual report that is before us at this time. With that, I wish to close my remarks and leave some comments about this aspect of the Export Development Corporation to the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Harney).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Laprairie.

Mr. Watson: I apologize, Mr. Speaker. I was just sitting down. I had not yet reached my seat.

Mr. Reg Stackhouse (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, when I look at the bill before us, I think the program, undertaken in the past several years by the Export Development Corporation, could make us wonder whether this bill should be under the aegis of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) because there are certain features of the EDC that suggest it is a "gravy train". It lends money to customers of Canadian corporations, but so often these are the big corporations. It insures Canadian corporations against non-payment by foreign producers, but so often these are the big corporations. It guarantees financial institutions against loss when they lend to corporations that may get into trouble overseas, but so often these are the big ones.

As of December 31, 1972, eight Canadian corporations shared 50 per cent of the benefits in EDC. If the outstanding offers that are before the corporations are accepted, the big eight share can go up to 64.8 per cent. This means that almost two-thirds of the money available for assistance to expand Canadian exports is being monopolized by eight major concerns. We ought not to jump to the conclusion that this, in itself, is bad. Bigness is not necessarily good, but it is not necessarily wrong either. None of us want to go as far as the former president of General Motors in the United States who said that he thought what was good for General Motors was good for the United States. I do not think we are inclined to go to that extreme and think that whatever is good for the "Big Eight" is also good for Canada. Neither do we want to draw the opposite conclusion that anything that is done to assist these corporations to develop and carry on business is necessarily bad for the people of Canada. We recognize that they employ Canadians and are putting something important into the economy for the development of this country. None the less, we should not jump to the other conclusion that we are giving the Canadian people the best assistance we can when we are giving this kind of encouragement to the major industrial corporations in Canada.

There are at least two points of criticism that can be offered under this heading. One fault with the way in which the finances of the EDC are being distributed is the way in which they involve an imbalance among the provinces of Canada. Five of the big eight are from one province and three are from another. We must give much more recognition to the need for a better distribution of financial resources of EDC across the country in order to encourage the development of exporting industries in other parts of Canada.

However, we must give consideration as well to the way small businesses in Canada are being affected by the actions of EDC and its regulations under which a project must normally involve a minimum of $1 million. This reduces the chances of a small business enterprise getting into the export market with the help of the EDC. I think that parliament ought to give more consideration to improvements to EDC programs that would give priority to small businesses in this country. We are not questioning the principle of the EDC and we are not calling into question the fact that the EDC should be free to assist major exporters in the country, but we would like to see a re-examination of the priorities of EDC so that greater advantage can be given to small businesses, enabling them to develop the export dimension of their programs they have not been able to undertake.

So, we would ask that the minister in charge of this corporation, and the government generally, give consideration to this kind of critical question: Is sufficient publicity provided to small businesses describing the services available from the Export Development Corporation? It has been my experience in dealing with small businesses that very often those in charge are not always aware of the programs the government makes available. Very often they are quite uninformed about projects and programs the government has undertaken because these have not been fully explained. It would be of interest to the country if the department responsible for the EDC undertook a more energetic effort to reach out to small businesses in Canada to enlighten these people in order that they might participate in the export markets of the world with assistance from the EDC.

Second, I would ask this critical question: Is it the policy of the Export Development Corporation to avoid transactions which would, by the very nature of small businesses, discourage the use of its services? I can appreciate that it is often more simple for the EDC and other government agencies to deal with well-staffed and highly sophisticated corporations which operate on the level of government departments. We hear and witness all around us big government, and we can appreciate that big government is very much in tune with big business. What we would like to see is a conscious and sincere effort by the EDC to take cognizance of the small business firm and employer, reaching out to encourage him to become active in the export market.

Third, we would ask whether it is a policy of the government or that of the EDC that the small business corporation should be forced to go to the private lending institutions? One of the major problems faced by small business today is the lack of adequate capital. Anyone who deals with small businessmen today knows they are constantly challenged by the problem of finding enough capital with which to equip themselves and expand their markets. Very often they have visions of new markets they can penetrate. They have the energy and initiative with which to do so, but they lack equipment and staff because they lack capital. What they need is a positive, creative and sincere effort by the government to assist them finding what they need most, and that is capital financing. If the EDC and the government of this country intend to help small business in Canada in the way required, they will have to do something such as this. They must consider establishing a branch of the EDC which will have as its prime concern and responsibility the provision and promotion of services to small businesses. If the government undertook this it would not only assist these businesses, but would go a long way toward meeting at least part of the unemployment problem in this country.

We are aware that one of the features of business life today is that small business tends to be labour intensive, to a much greater degree than big corporations which often can afford equipment that actually reduces the number of jobs provided in the past. If we want to increase jobs we have to increase the number of small businesses.

Even more important, we have to help small businesses to stay alive. It is often said that the greatest bankruptcy rate in business today occurs among the small entrepreneurs. This is because they lack adequate capital and other means of staying in business. That is why we want to put emphasis on the needs of some of the finest people in this country; people who are making a noteworthy contribution to their communities. They should receive much more in the way of incentives and support from the government than they have to date.

Such a small business branch of the EDC could assist and make efforts to improve the balance of payments position of Canada, because we would find small businesses participating in the export market, resulting in much greater diversification of products for overseas export. We are all conscious of the difficulties Canada has suffered for a long time because so much of our export trade has been directed to one country. The vast majority of our export products are going to the United States, and we must certainly diversify in terms of our customer countries. To do that we must look for new markets and develop new products available for export in a fashion that has not been followed in the past.

We plead with the government to think very seriously about the possibility of making a creative contribution to the economic expansion of this country by assisting that part of the economy which has for a long time lagged in export opportunities. Small business requires considerable assistance in this regard because a great deal of our difficulty in the export market relates to competition with other countries which have cheaper labour resources. We must assist small business to find ways to develop competitive programs rather than cheap labour resources. We must assist them to find better competitive methods in terms of improved efficiency of operation, improved products and greater quality in order that they will be more competitive. We cannot hope to accomplish this in terms of lower labour costs.

If small businesses are to make this kind of advance they will need the co-operation of the government, not the kind of handouts from Ottawa in the last few years which have gone to others as welfare help. We all believe that those who help themselves should be helped by others, and this is what we are asking for in this instance. We believe in assistance to the small businessman who, with a limited operation, must undertake most of the administration and management on his own. He cannot afford the research departments or the promotional efforts or the great sales forces available to big business. That kind of person needs the help of the government to give him a chance to stay alive in our economy. So, we urge the government to make this a priority.

We should recognize that intentionally or not our smaller operations in Canada have suffered from a lack of available financial resources. I have already referred to their difficulty in finding adequate capital. For example, in 1964 the Royal Commission on Banking and Finance reported that one-third of Canadian-controlled companies with assets of under a million dollars had inadequate supplies of long term capital. This is still the case and unless we resolve the problem in a positive way an increasing number of small businesses will be obliged to quit their operations. They will be forced to sell out to big corporations and, as hon. members know, those big corporations are often subsidiaries or agents of multinational corporations. When we speak about the future of Canada, we cannot be serious when we talk about repatriating the economy unless we are serious about helping Canadian-owned small business institutions.

I would like to turn, now, Mr. Speaker, to another dimension of this topic. I wish to refer to the way in which the EDC has, in my opinion, not only an economic responsibility but a social responsibility to help the have-not peoples of the world to help themselves. I think the minister, in his opening address to this debate, conveyed the impression that the EDC finds some of its justification in doing just that. I agree with what he says. I think we should be impressed by many of the things that the EDC has made possible. It has enabled Canadians to sell to have-not countries equipment which has enabled them to develop their resources. We certainly agree with the EDC carrying out that kind of program. But, at the same time, Mr. Speaker, I wonder why he omitted to mention that the EDC was involved in the erection of a luxury hotel in the Caribbean.

I do not quite see how this fits in with the social aims of the Export Development Corporation. The ordinary taxpayers in Canada certainly cannot afford to go to this luxury hotel; the ordinary citizen in the Caribbean certainly cannot afford to do anything but work in that kind of institution. We must therefore wonder whether this is the best way to utilize the money being made available by the taxpayers of Canada to meet the needs of the ordinary citizens in Caribbean countries or elsewhere in the world. With regard to the particular enterprise to which I have just referred, I should like to know just how much Canadian content was involved. We read in the regulations of the EDC that the projects financed by EDC must contain 80 per cent Canadian content. Well, perhaps 80 per cent of the materials used in that hotel came from Canada. But it would certainly be interesting to learn whether that was so.

Another question I feel I must ask is why this kind of aid should be provided to countries which do not appear to have an obvious need for such facilities. For instance, I look at countries such as France, Argentine, Brazil, to name just a few, and I wonder why there is a special need for Canadians to help finance their imports from this country. Perhaps there is a good answer to that, but it is not obvious and I think we should be concerned about not only the imbalance in the distribution of the funds of the corporation, chiefly among eight corporations and two provinces, but also to the assistance provided to countries where the need is not as great as could be found elsewhere.

A fundamental question of principle which I should like to raise before the House is this: is the program of the EDC really the best way to help advance the Canadian economy? Should we not recognize that many more jobs would be created if we were to help small business enter the export market and assist them to do so by granting them the kind of loans which the EDC has shared among the big eight? For example, if we compare the operations of the Industrial Development Bank, which does assist many small businesses in Canada, with the record of the EDC we find that the Industrial Development Bank is making money available at a much higher rate of interest than the EDC makes available to the much larger corporations. The average interest rate charged by the Industrial Development Bank in 1972 was 9.86 per cent. The rate charged by the Export Development Corporation was only 7 per cent. We might also wonder about the size of loans which the Industrial Development Bank makes available to some of our smaller companies in contrast to the size of loans available to our major corporations. The average size of loans made by the Industrial Development Bank in 1972 was in the order of $5,000. Those made by the EDC were $23.3 million.

Look at this from another standpoint, Mr. Speaker. Should we be doing more for the Canadian people if we concentrated on creating jobs in Canada and providing services in Canada with the funds that are available to the EDC? I think we have often leaped to conclusions when making judgments about exports and when making judgments about aiding industry. It has been thought that if we provide fast write-offs and other concessions we would be bound to create jobs. We have thought that if we expended exports we would be bound to create jobs. But so frequently this is not the case.

It has been remarked that generals are usually best at fighting old wars. This is not to be wondered at when one considers that so much of their time is spent in military colleges studying old wars. They are trained, very often, to consider how they might have won this battle or that campaign. They are taught to identify the mistakes made by generals in the past, and so on. Is this not equally true of economists? Often we look back some years, sometimes a generation, to this economic theory or to that economic theory. We become so wedded to the principles enunciated by one economist or another, principles which for a time had validity, that we forget that other changes in the lifestyle of the world have made those theories outdated. I would therefore suggest that some very critical questions be asked about the effectiveness of EDC in contributing to the expansion of the number of jobs in Canada as well as to enriching the life of the Canadian people.

The point at issue here is whether the money we make available to assist our export trade should be used just to permit our larger corporations to increase their record for any particular year. We ought to be dovetailing our export program in with our whole concern for solving unemployment, our whole concern for expanding the number of jobs available to the Canadian people, our whole concern for putting more purchasing power into the hands of the Canadian consumer. When we can provide a clear, firm and positive resolution of these concerns then there is full justification for the EDC program. Until this is the case, I think we must critically examine the whole proposition.

Very often the economic policies of the government remind me of a group of church women who went out selling tickets to a church supper. They were asked by a man to whom they tried to sell tickets: "Why do you want to sell tickets?" They told him they were putting on a church supper. "Why do you put on a church supper?" was his next question. "Well, we want to raise funds", they replied. To his inquiry as to why they wished to raise funds they said: "In order to pay for the hall we have built". "Why did you build the hall?" he asked. "In order to have a place in which to hold the supper".

There is a kind of circular uncritical assumption about many economic policies that are very much like that circular uncritical effort of those particular women. I think the time has come, not simply in respect of this one but many other major programs of the government, to ask to what extent these programs are making a major contribution to the achievement of Canada in reducing unemployment, giving people an opportunity to support themselves, and giving Canadian entrepreneurs and businessmen an opportunity to develop the resources of this country in conjunction with the working people of this country. If we were to ask that kind of question I think we might very well find that we would be doing more for the Canadian people were we to make some changes in the efforts of the EDC. We might very well find that if we put some federal money into the provision of better transit in some of the major population centres of the country we would do more to create jobs for Canadian people and provide services for the Canadian people than by shipping certain products across the sea.

We must ask ourselves what our priorities are. We must ask what the best way is to meet the human needs of the Canadian people. Then, we must ask whether the EDC is achieving this. Finally, I should like to call the attention of the House to the need for parliament, the government and this corporation, which is our under authority, to give greater help to Canadian-owned industries. One reason for helping small businesses is that very often they are Canadian-owned, certainly to a far greater degree than is the case among the major corporations. When we face the fact that EDC is giving priority to these major corporations many of which are foreign controlled and are subsidiaries then we must become increasingly critical because most of the capital of EDC is going in this direction. Of 43 firms which benefit from EDC, 21 are foreign-controlled. We are given the impression that this program is yet another way to really help this country be controlled and indeed owned by foreign interests, particularly United States interests.

Indeed, we must be increasingly concerned about the fact that EDC is another government agency that is feeding the expansion or dominance of the world by multinational corporations. In looking over the report of the EDC, one might wonder whether very often in its program it is financing one branch of a multionational corporation to buy from a Canadian branch of the same corporation. We must therefore have increasing concern about the way in which EDC, and along with it the private lending institutions of this country, should be required or at least encouraged to give greater priority to Canadian-owned companies.

When we talk about the repatriation of our country's economy we should be more concerned with that than we have been even about the repatriation of our constitution. We must recognize that very frequently government programs are contributing to the alienation of Canadian control. So, we ask again that the government re-examine the program of the Export Development Corporation with a view to giving priority in terms of financing and other aid to Canadian-owned institutions. It is not that we are suggesting they should not make assistance available to any firm that is operating within Canada and for the interest of Canada, but we would like a greater priority given to those companies which are 100 per cent Canadian.

For these reasons, we would call on the government to adjust its priorities. We would ask that it give greater priority to small businesses, to give greater priority to parts of the country which do not have sufficient industrial development, to give greater priority to labour intensive businesses which are seeking assistance and to give greater priority to Canadian-owned companies as well as to the social need abroad and the social need at home. When those priorities are taken seriously by the corporation and by the government then we certainly can be 100 per cent in support of the aims and objectives of the EDC. Until then, we must remain critical of it in the interest of the Canadian people.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to take part in this debate and to follow my distinguished and learned colleague, the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. Stackhouse), who I think has brought out a significant number of home truths when we consider this bill as being, as it is, part of the whole economic posture of the government and indeed the economic posture of our country. It is too bad, I suppose,—perhaps it is not really—that we are considering this bill only in the light of increasing the capital of the corporation because the problems which face us go far beyond the simplicity of the text of the statute. However, perhaps in some respects it is fortunate, if the present situation can be called fortunate, that we consider this matter on a day when we have had the release by Statistics Canada in respect of the actual rate of unemployment in our country which stands at the appalling level of 7.3 per cent of the work force, and when we realize that we are considering this bill at a time when there are 655,000 Canadians out of work.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) speaks of unemployment in human terms. I think the hearts of every member on both sides of the House go out to those 655,000 people many of whom, perhaps most of whom are still, for some reason or another, unable to find jobs. When we speak about this bill in the context of the discussion in this House, and witness the apparent confusion in the Department of Manpower and Immigration, it is evident that the government takes no joy from this situation or from the fact that the unemployment rate is down ever so slightly. It certainly is nothing to write home to mother about. I am sure they take no joy—nor do we because we go further and condemn them—in respect of the economic policies which place our country and our young people in a position where they are potentially one of the groups with the highest unemployment level in the world among young people. I think this is very serious, having regard to what this means to them and their view of what our country could do for them.

I believe we are hampered to a great extent in judging the economic impact which this simple amendment will have by the fact that the Minister of Finance of this country, let alone the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie), who has been stung by the mistakes of his 1972 budget and has repeated them again in his 1973 budget, still fails to tell us what projection he would make with regard to the generation of employment. It is difficult to consider this bill, which deals with the export affect on our economy, without knowing where the Minister of Finance stands.

This government chose to remain in office; it chose to cling to office or, as that sign says, to "hang in there, baby", or whatever you want to say. They had every constitutional right to do that, but in so doing—and I think there is a quid pro quo in this—there was to be an offering in return for the confidence of the House of some economic programs for the development and health of the economy of our country which would be of some real significance, but there have not been any. As we look at this bill today, one that is as important as this one with respect to the industrial development of our country, we find that there is still nothing significant in it.

Instead of this government coming to the House merely asking for an increase in the share capital of this corporation, I would rather have had the government come to the House to answer the questions that are on the lips of the army of unemployed in our country. I would like this government to give answers to those who have to support those unemployed. I would like the government to give real, substantial tax relief, and not be afraid to back it up by saying that this is where the tax relief will function in the economy and such will be the results. I would rather have had this government come before the House with policies of economic expansion, new policies on transportation, real help for pensioners, and perhaps the beginnings of justice for public servants. But instead, we are being asked to approve merely an increase in the share capital of an important corporation, and the minister has not given us any indication of how this fits into the whole economic package which the government wishes the Canadian people to believe it has. I think this is important.

The Export Development Corporation was formed in October of 1969 to help develop markets abroad for Canadian exporters. The concept was a good one and it is still a good one. I think it is essential for Canada to support the concept because Canada, for better or worse—and sometimes one wonders about that—is one of the world's great trading nations. I suggest to you, Sir, that much more is needed in this amendment than merely to increase the ceiling. I suggest to you that the whole concept of the bill must be looked at in depth. It may be that the ceiling which the government seeks to increase is not high enough and that a complete review of the operations of the corporation might be the answer. However, this debate will not supply that kind of review.

It may be that in the course of this review we would find out, not only that the amendment is deficient in terms of the amount of the increase requested, but that our whole approach to resource development must be reconsidered. It may very well be that our banking policy may also have to be reviewed. There is nothing here about that important aspect. It may be that our research and development policies should be reconsidered and I commend to members of the House the testimony of Dr. Schneider, chairman of the National Research Council, before the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates a few days ago, with respect to the importance of research and development and whether it is being neglected, negligently or deliberately.

Perhaps out of such a review—and I wish we could have this review—we would come forward with some new policies with respect to transportation so that the patchwork quilt of policies which have been ours for so many years may be reshaped. Perhaps we could rethink and redirect the whole work of the Industrial Development Bank and its role in the scheme of things. I think this is possible. Probably we should take a good honest look for once and hear some honest comments from the government on the significance of the DISC program in the United States to see how it really affects us. I think that, in the course of that review, we would be able to look at our tariffs and we could come to grips with the whole sorry mess of foreign ownership and foreign investment in this country. In short, rather than applying another economic bandaid—and this is all this bill is—this review would have been much more meaningful to the House, for the government, and the Canadian people.

Some of my colleagues have spoken about small business. Canada has become dependent on one market which takes up about two thirds of our export trade. The bulk of our sales is in such primary fields as forest products, mining, oil and gas. If you look at the statistics, you will find that there is comparatively little in the manufacturing field other than the trade resulting from the auto pact. There is no doubt that large corporations dominate the export field. In 1970, 87 corporations with sales of over $25 million accounted for almost 70 per cent of Canadian export sales, and 426 exporters executed 92 per cent of the exports reported.

I think it is important that we note that the EDC provides financing for initial terms of 12 to 15 years at average interest rates of 7 per cent, and eight countries have received 59 per cent of the money, Mexico being the largest with $130 million. In the past year, the EDC concluded long-term, five to 15 year financing agreements with foreign buyers totalling $283 million. At the end of the year they had over $1 billion in outstanding long term contracts. As a result of these statistics and this evidence, weaknesses in the EDC's approach are now becoming apparent. Their activity appears—and I say this with great respect—to be encouraging rather than discouraging the concentration of our trade, particularly with respect to individual exporters. This is a decided weakness.

A review of this $1 billion financing reveals that 50 per cent of it benefited only eight Canadian exporters, four of whom are subsidiaries of American concerns. On average, these companies have received or are receiving $64 million each in export finance benefits. The largest is the Montreal Engineering Company Limited which has some $101 million in benefits. I am not suggesting that those things, by themselves, are wrong, but I am suggesting that the efforts, the energy and the funds have become too centralized in too small an area and that many Canadian small businesses and the potential of small businesses have been ignored.

The Export Development Corporation is not fulfilling its role as we had anticipated, and we in this party believe that the EDC should assist small businesses to enter this field and should favour—in fact, I am prepared to use the word "prefer"—Canadian small business and Canadian-owned corporations as opposed to foreign subsidiaries. Last year, for example, of those identifiable only 13 Canadian exporters benefited from the $283 million in long-term financing provided by EDC. Out of those 13, nine were foreign subsidiaries. These are pretty important statistics.

Mr. Gillespie: And thousands of Canadian suppliers, small part suppliers.

Mr. Baker: I appreciate the interruption from the minister. I am not suggesting that thousands of suppliers did not benefit. I think this is a misinterpretation of what I said. All I am saying, and I think most members of the House will agree, including those who support the minister, is that at this time, in the context of our own economic situation in this country, an emphasis ought to be put upon the development of Canadian-owned small business.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker: And, Mr. Speaker, there ought to be a review of the operations of the EDC to see if a concentration has not, inadvertently or otherwise, taken place with respect to its operations that has resulted in the defeat of what I think is a generally acceptable Canadian objective.

My colleague from Scarborough East mentioned the work and undertakings of the Industrial Development Bank, and how it has, in fact, gone the other way. The Industrial Development Bank has been a fine example, in terms of concept in any event. I have some question about some of the terms and conditions under which it grants loans because its failure rate indicates either very astute investors or else the fact that the bank is not taking many risks. This Industrial Development Bank has assisted over 16,000 customers who borrow small amounts of money for the purposes set forth in that statute. It is doing a good job. I think the use of the Industrial Development Bank by Canadian businessmen is significant, compared with the rather centralized thrust of the Export Development Corporation. That is a statistical fact.

Mr. Gillespie: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Sharing as I do the concern of the hon. member for the development of small business, I wonder whether he is aware that the export credit insurance part of the Export Development Corporation has over 1,000 policies outstanding, 70 per cent of which cover exports of $250,000 or less? Surely, the support for these small—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The minister knows that he cannot make a second speech without closing the debate. If he wants to ask a question he has to seek permission from the hon. member who has the floor, rather than try to do it by way of a point of order.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I enjoyed listening to the minister's speech earlier, but I do not want to have to listen to a second speech now.

Mr. Gillespie: Are you aware of that fact?

Mr. Baker: Of course, I am aware of it. It is contained in the report of the corporation, but it is only one part of the potential operation of the corporation. My point, Mr. Speaker, is that the government is really looking only at a very small aspect of the problem when it comes to this House and asks the House to increase the share capital of the corporation.

Mr. Gillespie: We are doing more than that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Baker: Our concern with the Export Development Corporation is with its failure—it may be a failure in good faith, if there is such a thing—to harness its full potential. Our concern lies in the realization of what the Export Development Corporation can do as compared with what it has done.

As hon. members in all parties have said, there is no doubt that the chronic problem of Canadian business is the shortage of capital. My hon. friend from Scarborough East mentioned the advice given by the Royal Commission on Banking and Finance in 1964. A more recent picture is given by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce study called "Foreign Owned Subsidiaries in Canada, 1964-49." It examines the operations of all foreign held non-financial corporations in Canada with assets of more than $5 million.

In 1969, the last year of the study, these corporations reported net external funds of $353 million. Of this amount, $204 million came in the form of Canadian bank loans. What this means is that for the year 1969 nearly two-thirds of the money used in these transactions came from Canadian banks, and the total owed at the end of 1969 was $1.17 billion. I believe that the Export Development Corporation is guilty of the same bias. A large percentage of its funding and its energy has been given to foreign controlled firms.

In the past year, the EDC signed long-term financing agreements with foreign buyers totalling $283 million. At the end of the year it had over $1 billion in outstanding long-term contracts. A review of that $1 billion, as I said, reveals that 50 per cent of it benefited only eight Canadian exporters, four of which are subsidiaries of American concerns. In sum I think it is fair to say that the government has helped large American-owned corporations retain control of the export business in Canada. That may not be what it intended, but that is the net effect of what has happened.

I think that a better case than the government has made could be made for putting $1.5 million of public money into the EDC. If foreign firms, most of them American, continue to get first crack at the loans of the Export Development Corporation, Canadian firms are thereby denied. Canadian manufacturers would like to become more active in the export field, but in terms of quantum they really get little help from the EDC. This is a sad state of affairs. I want you to understand, Mr. Speaker, that we are not calling for discrimination against foreign controlled firms, but as the hon. member for Scarborough East said, we are calling for a re-evaluation of our priorities as Canadians. Canadians will never benefit from any position of narrow nationalism. But that is not to say that a Canadian government or a Canadian parliament ought not to hold that it is worthy of it to recognize the needs of the Canadian business community.

In recognizing the needs of the Canadian business community, it is my respectful submission that we will also keep our eye on those 665,000 unemployed, that we will not forget that there is 7.3 per cent of Canadian workers out of work, that the object of the government, whether we are dealing with the EDC or otherwise, ought to be to use its best efforts to promote the development of Canadian small business, which is the greatest employer in this country, and that we ought to create in this country an atmosphere where Canadian business can do its own thing, as opposed to the government entering the field and doing the same thing for business people. I believe that this ought to be the proper thrust of this legislation, and not just of this legislation but of everything that is considered by this parliament. Finally, Mr. Speaker, we ought to reconsider the allocation of additional funds unless a Canadian preference approach is adopted by this corporation.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Peel South): Mr. Speaker, we are dealing here with a bill to amend the capital structure of the Export Development Corporation by increasing the advances to that corporation from $850 million to $1.5 billion. I am sure most members of the House of Commons are desirous of giving every assistance to business in this country to export its products. If it were that simple, the House would have passed Bill C-3 some time ago but of course it is not. The bill gives the House an opportunity to re-examine the Export Development Corporation, to consider its annual report and financial statement and its performance.

It becomes apparent that the corporation is involved with 43 companies; eight of them are major companies which have half the money now and pretty soon will have 64 per cent or 65 per cent of it. The corporation also has a fancy list of directors and a beautiful prospectus with pictures in four or five colours. One begins to wonder why a company with only 43 customers, eight of them major, has to spend money on offices in Ottawa and branches in Toronto, Vancouver and Montreal, why it wants $1½ billion so that it can use 64 per cent of that amount to service eight companies! Mr. Speaker, four of these companies are owned by shareholders in another country.

The hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. Stackhouse) raised the question of priorities and I shall comment on that later. Some time ago when I was analysing the question of export development, I asked some businessmen in Mississauga what assistance they received from the federal government with regard to foreign trade. One of them, and I will be glad to give the minister the name of the company, told me, "We don't get any help from Ottawa. The only place you can get help for trade in this country is from the province of Ontario because the province at least is concerned about small business. We are not a big company, we only make wheel barrows and concrete buggies but the province of Ontario made it possible for us to get going and we are now selling to Peru and other places." What is wrong with this government, Mr. Speaker, that it even permits the provinces to get involved in foreign trade? The trouble is that this government, and this minister, are not doing an adequate job. In many cases, small business has to look to the provincial minister of trade for assistance. I ask the minister, Mr. Speaker, is this the way our export trade should be developed? Is this government only interested in the big, the powerful, the foreign-owned?

Some hon. members have said that we are really not concerned about the fact that some of the loans have been made to foreign corporations but, Mr. Speaker, we are concerned about the proportions and we are concerned that the interests of Canada and Canadian businessmen take second place in the deals that are organized. It seems that it is easier for the Export Development Corporation to deal with a few large companies than with small companies. It is one of the tragedies in Canada today that these few large companies are foreign-owned. It is easier to deal with them because they know what it is all about—they know the game. They can afford to send their lackeys to Ottawa; they can afford to stay in the fine hotels and entertain members of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce; they can afford to fight their way through the maze of government offices; they can afford to calculate how to qualify on a project and they know that this government is prepared to play ball with them and is spending great amounts of money. How many customers are serviced by these great amounts of money, Mr. Speaker; just 43?

A lot has been said about small business, Mr. Speaker, and I want to point out that through the Industrial Development Bank assistance is available to small business at an interest rate pretty close to ten per cent. I want to point out, too, that the Export Development Corporation is prepared to lend money to large companies at 7 per cent so that they can finance foreign trade. How can we justify treating the small businessman like this when he has contributed so much to the development of Canada? He cannot afford to lobby or entertain, but he pays 10 per cent and the big corporations pay 7 per cent. This is the kind of thing we are concerned about.

Mr. Gillespie: Is the hon. member aware that the loan is made to the buyer and not to the seller? There is no loan to the Canadian customer; it is made to the foreign buyer.

Mr. Blenkarn: That is very interesting. I am delighted that the minister has pointed out that he is prepared to lend to Canadian businessmen at 10 per cent and to foreign businessmen at 7 per cent. That is the kind of attitude we expect from this government.

Mr. Paproski: You hanged yourself there, Alastair. Any other gems?

Mr. Gillespie: Well. he hasn't got it straight yet.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, this corporation compares to some extent to a corporation in the United States called the Export-Import Bank. That corporation has a different method of operation to some extent because it does not put up all the money but only a portion of it, approximately 30 per cent, and approaches the private sector for the balance. We have pretty significant and large private banks in Canada. Indeed, the Royal Bank of Canada and the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, in terms of size and capital structure, rank high among the world's banks. It seems strange to me, and to other members on this side of the House, that only some $20 million has been supplied by Canadian banks and that the balance of the finances of this corporation come directly from this government. I think one can say this: this corporation is being lazy. It is not going onto the street and looking for the money with which to finance exports in the normal course. It finds it easier to take money from the taxpayer and make long-term loans with its own money. It does not operate as a bank or exchange department; it operates the easy way, by sitting back and using its own money. When it runs out of money, it comes crying to parliament for more. It could easily go to the various chartered banks of this country and work out some insured loan participation arrangement; but it is easier to operate as it now does.

• (1650)

Perhaps the reason for its actions is that it insists on lending money at rates lower than those used by the banks; perhaps that is why large foreign corporations and multinational corporations of reputation come to this government for financial assistance. The financial assistance available here is perhaps cheaper than credit assistance available anywhere else. I suggest that multinational corporations know how to look after imports and exports and sales from one branch to another. Perhaps the whole organization of this corporation needs overhauling, since it seems that the foreign business community and large corporations are treating this government and this development corporation as an easy mark.

In our examination of this bill we should be examining the entire principle behind the establishment of the Export Development Corporation. We should know exactly how it is operating on behalf of the Canadian people. If the Export Development Corporation and the government wish to demonstrate that they are not wedded to the idea of assisting only large corporations, I suggest they should consider establishing a department within the corporation whose primary function would be to go across the country, talk to small businessmen and organize exports for them. That kind of thing is done in the province of Ontario; perhaps the minister would not think of that. Nevertheless, that is how it ought to be done.

The activities of such a small business department could be instrumental in improving the balance of payments position of Canada. Such a department could assist Canada in establishing a more diversified pattern of trade. I am not pleased when I hear about one big sale to Yugoslavia or one big sale to Mexico. These are just one shot deals. What we need in export sales in continuing, repeat business. Earlier I talked about the sale of wheelbarrows. That is the sort of business we need, because we will sell some wheelbarrows this year, some next year and some the year after. Credit arrangements could be revolving and we could develop continuing business. As I said, what disturbs me most about some of these large sales is that they are one shot deals. This is not the kind of business that the corporation ought to go after. Sure, it looks good on the balance sheet and on the books. Sometimes the corporation lends $100 million. What we really ought to do, as I said, is develop continuing business, continuing roll-over trade. We could do that if we spent our time and effort looking after the interests of small business.

Finally, I want to repeat some of the things said by the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. Stackhouse), because I think they bear repeating. I think it is time for some rethinking. We must think again, not only about the government program we are presently considering, but about other government programs. It is time that we considered again the activities of this corporation. The Export Development Corporation very shortly, if this bill passes, as it may, will have $1.5 billion in circulating funds for a five-year period. The corporation is growing. Soon, a great deal of the money of Canada will be tied up in exports for five years. I suggest we must give serious consideration to a more rapid roll-over of funds. The government and the corporation must give serious consideration to borrowing money, or to allowing or encouraging private or international banks to assist in the financing of projects. Perhaps this corporation could give certain guarantees and take only a small piece of the action for itself.

We must examine our priorities whenever we examine any legislation. After all, one of the major reasons for encouraging exports is that we hope to create job opportunities for Canadians. When one looks at the fact only 43 corporations are involved, with eight corporations using 64 per cent of the money, I think it is fair to say, Mr. Speaker, that it is time we re-examined this program and reassessed its impact on jobs. Further, it is time we re-examined this program and considered it in terms of Canadian ownership. Also, it is time we re-examined the activities of this corporation in terms of the total development of Canada.

[Mr. Blenkarn.]

Often—I throw this thought out to the minister—credit helps in the sale of a commodity; yet, in many more cases, it is the price that counts. The foreign buyer is no different from any other buyer. He looks around to see where he can buy cheapest. It is time this government said to business in Canada, "What can we do to make business in Canada easier for businessmen; what can we do to remove the innumerable forms? How can we lower a corporate tax rate that is higher than that of any of our competitors?" Our bank rates and interest rates are higher, in many cases, than those of our competing countries.

Perhaps if we made business conditions easier for businessmen and used that $1.5 billion to cut the cost of doing business in Canada, which would reduce the total costs business must pay in Canada, we could reduce our prices on the export market. In that case perhaps we would not need to indulge in long-term credit to the extent that we now do, since our prices would be competitive. Japan, Mr. Speaker, does not rely on credit; it relies on sharp business and sharp pencils when the order books are opened. I suggest we can best develop our export trade by going out with our order books and using very, very sharp pencils. Perhaps that is the kind of approach the Export Development Corporation ought to adopt.

[Translation]

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to be able to say a few words about Bill C-3 and about the economic situation.

We have to concentrate on activity outside Canada in order to make business work inside Canada, and Canadian industries develop and progress; we have to create incentives abroad so that Canadian manufacturers can sell their products abroad.

I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if that really is the best solution. I believe that the prime solution is to do all in our power to give Canadian consumers exclusive rights or at least priority on Canadian products. Canadians certainly do not have such priority because they lack the means of exercising their right to priority on Canadian-made goods.

What we should be exporting, Mr. Speaker, is our surplus. What we are exporting is the main bulk of our production, and at the same time we supply safeguards to foreign companies that buy our goods, in the hope of making sure that we will sell our Canadian products.

Mr. Speaker, we are always talking about helping small industry in Canada to develop. If we are to help small and medium industries to develop, certain incentives must be found. Several incentives have been applied to help industry, and they may have helped one sector of industry, but small and medium industries have scarcely been able to take advantage of these incentives.

Mr. Speaker, small industry does not have the means of taking out loans at reasonable rates of interest.

The government was kind enough to pass legislation enabling small business to borrow $25,000 at a quite reasonable interest rate. This was appreciated by small business, but it did not contribute to assist them properly because $25,000 does not go very far. As a matter of fact, when a businessman needs machines costing $15,000 or $18,000 each, a loan of $25,000 is not enough because he cannot enlarge his business with such a small capital.

One could say that it is still possible to resort to the Industrial Development Bank, which can doubtless help small businesses. In fact, the IDB indirectly helped small industries which cannot affort to borrow from other banks. The IDB also finds that guarantees are not satisfactory and it almost always refuses loans to small businesses. Then, the latter find themselves in a sad plight.

I suggest, in order to really assist small businesses, that we enable them to borrow up to $100,000 instead of $25,000, and at a very reasonable interest rate, such as 5½, 6 or 6½ per cent. This would be reasonable and very much appreciated by small businesses.

Then, if we want our industries to be productive, we must enable them to do so and give them the necessary means. When they are given means to produce, they employ people who earn wages, and these industries are thus more likely to sell their products at home because the people who are working have the necessary purchasing power to buy some of the products manufactured by these small industries. There is a tax law which is detrimental to the small and medium industries. Small industry is enjoying some tax relief, but it is not sufficient to help its development in a normal way. The income tax legislation which was adopted by the 28th Parliament is greatly detrimental to small industry which is unable to hold on to its capital for development purposes.

The Industrial Development Bank is lending money at interest rates which are almost usurious, that is from 10½ to 12 per cent. The smaller the enterprise, the less credit it has and the less it is in a position to pay high interest rates. So, the Industrial Development Bank is doing like all the others: exploiting the small industry through interest rates.

Furthermore, the assistance granted to small industry through all kinds of technical means is far from being sufficient because the Industrial Development Bank charges 12 per cent interest on its loans, and the small businessman must get into debt for almost $100,000 to obtain $20,000.

• (1710)

And after that the Industrial Development Bank takes the interests and the reimbursements are almost totally taxable. The small businessman has heavy reimbursements to make and heavy taxes to pay which puts him in a difficult situation. Quite often he is unable to pay the interest and the taxes imposed on his reimbursements in addition to his own taxes.

There is also the 12 per cent sales tax on all materials produced in Canada. The government is helping industry by simply levying a kind of indirect tax. In fact, this is not assistance but indirect taxation because if the industrialist can operate his industry for at least 4 or 5 years he will have reimbursed his total debt to the government and the balance is a net profit for the latter.

This assistance, mainly as regards small business, is not truly realistic; we could improve the situation and provide more assistance to small industries through other means.

We should also adopt a tariff legislation which would better fit the reality of the current market and be tailored to our industries' needs. Until now several reviews have taken place but more remain to be done to enable Canadians to export their surplus. These factors are essential to stimulate the industries and their growth.

Mr. Speaker, 90 per cent of the grants have been paid to Canadian enterprises; in other words, 90 per cent of the small businesses still belong to Canadians. In order to maintain those small enterprises, we will have to fight still more, to make other incentives or other means available to the Canadian people to unable them to exist, because the small business owner is now going through an economic regression. As a matter of fact, there have never been so many bankruptcies. A great number of small enterprises are driven to bankruptcy, as they are unable to sell their products because those who buy them are insolvent and often go bankrupt. Those small industries have to bear the consequences of those bankruptcies.

If we are able to grant incentives so as to promote the sale of products to foreigners, we should also be able to establish some safeguards to protect Canadian industries against insolvent Canadian creditors, on account of whom astronomical sums of money are lost by small business owners and even by the government, in taxes of all kinds.

When governments have to be among creditors, when bankruptcies happen, they have to take their share of the loss as well as the others; that kind of loss is more easily assumed by governments than by small taxpayers. Now the latter would surely need appropriate measures that would give them some protection as to the sale of their products to the Canadian people; as a matter of fact, a great number of Canadians buy products for which they are unable to pay. The small business owner has to bear the burden and a chain reaction follows whereby a great number of small industries must close down.

A current regulation stipulates that the industrialist who buys $50,000 worth of machinery can obtain government loans; but if the machinery costs less than $50,000, the small industrialist cannot avail himself of the benefits offered by the government.

However, for the smaller industries, a $50,000 purchase is a lot. Many are unable to get into debt for $50,000 though they would need machinery. Many would buy $10,000, $12,000 or $15,000 worth of machinery a year, but they cannot afford it.

On the other hand, if government aid was more efficient and if the amount of assistance available to the small enterprise was lowered, to $5,000 from $50,000 for instance, this would mean an incentive not any costlier for the government. In fact, if it really intends to solve the unemployment problem, the government can certainly make more substantial loans available to solvent industries, a good number of which could produce valuable goods needed by Canadians or readily exportable but, on the other hand, many of them cannot develop on account of the conditions I have just mentioned.

And if we intend to maintain our economy afloat such small industries must operate at reasonable cost. If we want to sell abroad, we must come up with competitive prices, since prices govern the market. And if we fleece the small or medium industries through taxes, transportation tariffs, higher gasoline prices, municipal, school and other taxes, we keep on stifling them because it is rather difficult to produce cheaply what is necessary if we want to sell. And if we want to sell at low prices, the first thing to do is to establish reasonable interest rates for industrialists.

Secondly, we must grant these industries every possible incentive, allow them to benefit from grants for instance, and lower the $5,000 minimum which may be borrowed because this measure is of no great help to a small business. And if this amount is lowered to $5,000, many small businessmen will benefit.

Thus, small businesses could produce more cheaply and governments could perhaps lower the 12 per cent tax, abolish all the taxes which boost the cost of merchandise and thus decrease their cost. If the cost of merchandise was lower, we could export much more because our prices would also be lower. In return, we could manufacture in greater quantity, which would enable us to reduce the unemployment rate and stabilize our economy.

In order to do so, we must be realistic and not consider the small businessman as an executive with all the necessary capital who can be required to pay any tax. We should not then increase prices endlessly and think that the small businessman will be able to cope no matter what.

We have all kinds of programs to help industries but it seems that almost all industries are worse off after receiving such aid than before, which means something is wrong. Other solutions must certainly be sought, and of course they must be realistic.

Mr. Speaker, we should be concerned about all those things. We are not against the bill, we are not opposed to making capital available to foreigners for the purchase of Canadian products since we want Canadians to sell as much as possible. However, we also want Canadians to be able to produce at low cost. That is one of the first aspects hon. ministers should concentrate on to find solutions.

Markets are easily found, industry can easily operate when products can be sold at low prices.

However, in the present economy of constantly increasing prices and soaring costs, it becomes very hard for small industries to compete with the big ones.

If we really want to help small industries, if we really want them to exist, we must find some sort of a corrective; we really must amend regulations and acts concerning the help to the small industry to assist it efficiently so it can prosper.

The present type of help is somewhat contrary to the facts. We are actually offering help to some foreign countries so that they can buy Canadian products, but we must not forget that if we export, we must also import. If we must import and export, it does little to improve the Canadian economy, the gross national product.

If we produce for $114 billion, Mr. Speaker, but import for $80 billion and export for the same amount, nothing is changed in the Canadian economic system. This does not alter the situation. If we want to export, it is necessary to import. And this is not a real solution. The answer is to enable Canadians to make all possible purchases, to consume as much as possible in Canada to make our industries work. We should export surpluses in exchange for goods we are not producing. Exports should serve this purpose only. We are far from using our exports to this end.

We try to produce, to export but not to import, which becomes rather difficult because if we only sell our products without buying anything from other countries, we will not do it very long. Those countries will turn their backs on us and they will deal with other countries with which they will be able to trade.

As to foreign countries, we should trade with them to meet the essential needs of our economy and theirs.

Thus, to be logical, it is necessary to develop Canadian markets and to put the necessary purchasing power in the hands of Canadians to enable our industries to sell the biggest part of their production in Canada. It is necessary to further stimulate the production and consumption by increasing the purchasing power of taxpayers on par with the industrial and economic growth of our country.

[English]

Mr. John Harney (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) had to give up speaking sometime ago because, as he said, he was taken with a rather bad cold and his voice gave way. I would like to suggest that he was not being absolutely true to fact, because I suspect that he was moved to the point of choking by the admiration he had when it came to the prospect of the beautiful co-ordination that existed between the centres of high finance in this country and the directors of this corporation as indicated by a reading of the Export Development Corporation report. I am quite sure that is really what happened to him. He was choked with emotion when he looked at the startling involvement of this corporation. Following upon that was the information given to us by the hon. member for Peel South (Mr. Blenkarn), who was looking at the beautiful pictures contained in this report.

This is indeed a very handsome report, loaded with coloured pictures, not only of members of the board, but with those which give us some idea of projects reportedly supported by the Export Development Corporation. For example, on page 11 is a picture of a beautiful seaside resort, something which would tempt members of this House today. In the background we have palm trees, and girls walking beside the pool, and it has the following caption:

Interest in tourist facilities in the Caribbean is very high among Canadian investors. One third of the inquiries received for EDC Foreign Investment Insurance are for investments to be made in that part of the world.

This is very interesting when we consider the kind of concern presented a few days ago by church leaders in Canada asking for participation in the development of under-developed countries. It is surprising that this is the kind of project in respect of which the EDC is receiving inquiries.

However, let us remember that these inquiries received by the EDC are in respect of foreign investment insurance rather than loans. There is a clause in the act controlling the EDC which allows that corporation to provide insurance to Canadian investors who want to invest abroad in areas which may not be entirely stable. As a matter of fact, I think the act specifies areas in which there may be revolution, riot and war. If, rather than assisting underdeveloped countries in very great need of basic industry and other development, Canadian investors show interest in areas of the kind pictured at page 11, then we may expect war, riot and other civil disturbances.

Let me look at other pictures in this booklet that are very handsome, indeed. On page 26, we have a picture of a more serious nature. It is a picture of a pulp mill, specifically a kraft pulpmill in New Zealand. The caption reads:

EDC made a $10.3 million loan to cover the sale of Canadian services and equipment for expansion of a kraft pulpmill and newsprint project in New Zealand. The EDC financing covered 90 per cent of the export value of the sale.

It seems to me that one of the rationales of the EDC is the creation of jobs in Canada. I have travelled around this country and have seen some kraft pulp mills. It might occur to some of us, or indeed some of those in the EDC, that this is an industry in Canada in which jobs could be eliminated by designing these pulp mills in such a way they can produce the products overseas. We can eliminate jobs in Canada in these pulp mills. In this situation, may we not be allowed to ask ourselves if, by the practices adopted by the government of this country, we are not contributing to a state in Canada which in fact helps the foreign corporation?

Let me come back to the point of the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville. He was referring to the directors of the corporation. One is allowed to wonder, if not suspect, that there might be some kind of co-ordination. I do not say collusion, between directors of the Export Development Corporation and directors of large corporations in Canada. I was particularly interested in one picture, and I am looking at the picture of Mr. P. R. Sandwell, who is a director of the corporation and chairman of the board of Sandwell and Co. Limited, particularly when we connect him with others in the list of loans by the EDC.

Let me refer briefly to a publication called Canadian Pulp and Paper Industry which has linked Mr. Simons with Mr. Sandwell. You will see that he is associated there with H. A. Simons (International) Ltd. which was financed in respect of pulp mill equipment, and consulting and supervisory engineering services, for a project in Argentina to the extent of $12 million. Simons and Sandwell have been linked in the past as having been responsible for the engineering and design of about one-third of the paper mills built in the world since 1945. Let me quote from Canadian Pulp and Paper Industry:

• (1730)

"Worldwide, they know of Simons and Sandwell."

I suggest they also know of Simons and Sandwell in Ottawa. I do not want to dwell on this aspect because it may not be exactly surprising. The aspect of the Export Development Corporation on which I should like to dwell is the aspect concerning the kinds of loans and to what kinds of countries these loans are directed.

I wish I had before me the report of the Export Development Corporation for 1972. As you know, Mr. Speaker, reports come late, so we must go to other sources for more current information. In the Globe and Mail in December there was buried in the business pages a little item which I should like to read. It states:

The Canadian Export Development Corporation will lend Brazil . . .

Note it states will lend "Brazil".

. . . $26.5 million to help that country buy electrical equipment in Canada.

"The corporation said the money will be loaned to Light-serviços de electricidade SA. Rio de Janeiro, a private Brazilian utility company.

"The loan is guaranteed by the government of Brazil.

"Light-services must buy at least $23 million worth of transmission and distribution equipment from such companies as Canadian General Electric, Collins Radio, Westinghouse Canada, Canadian Marconi and others under the agreement."

You will notice that all of these companies are Canadian because they somehow have the name "Canada" or "Canadian" and we can therefore believe they are Canadian companies. But, let us note the first sentence which states:

The Canadian Export Development Corporation will lend Brazil $26.5 million to help that country buy electrical equipment in Canada.

However, if we look more closely at the transaction we do not find that the Export Development Corporation is lending Brazil, specifically, a sum of $26.5 million but is to lend it to Light-serviços of Brazil. What kind of a corporation or a company is Light-serviços which is known, by the way, in Brazil simply as Light. The Portugese name of this company covers a firm which is owned to the extent of 83 per cent by Brascan, a massive company controlled in Canada although the majority of its shares are held in the United States. We have an inkling now of what is really happening. What appears at first to be a loan to a country in need of development money that it may buy our Canadian products turns out to be a loan to a private company. Then, we discover that that private company in turn is owned by a rather large Canadian company, a rather well-known company, which has acted from time to time in the past as a farm club for putative Liberal cabinet ministers, or vice versa for Brazilian Traction directors.

So far we are beginning to receive some information which is of value to us. However, the thought of Canadian money going to Brazil still might strike some compassionate hearts as a good thing because Brazil is a country which is in need of development. Let us look at the social development there has been in Brazil over the past ten years. There is a certain gentleman named McNamara who could not be counted as one of the world's subversives, a friend of the late President Kennedy, who now, I think, is involved in an institution called the World Bank. He noted that in Brazil the richest 5 per cent of the population saw its share of the national income rise during the 1960's from 29 per cent to 38 per cent, while the poorest 40 per cent saw its share drop from 10 per cent to 8 per cent. I know that we cannot make a direct connection between Canadian activity in Brazil and what is going on internally in that country, but it should be obvious to us that our activities in lending money to a private company in Brazil, which in turn is owned by a Canadian company, are not necessarily helping out in respect of the problem of social equalization in Brazil.

I could mention a number of other countries to which the Export Development Corporation directs its largesse. I think if we added up all these countries we would not be able to put many of them in the list of the world's progressive, democratic nations. However, I can speak on that point at another time. There is another aspect of the Export Development Corporation with which I should like to deal, apart from its being a branch of our own Canadian imperialism. I refer to its function in carrying out our role as a nation in helping out the underdeveloped parts of the world. We have several entities in this country which appear to direct their interests to trade and to aid with the under-developed parts of the world. Several of these entities are government or government-controlled or government-owned entities.

Indeed, a few years ago there was a certain amount of concern in the cabinet of the time about co-ordinating the activities of these various entities because it appeared that some of them could be working at cross purposes. There was what I think was called an interdepartmental committee structured to bring all the external activities of the Canadian government together so that they could be co-ordinated. To give an idea of what was involved here, there was some consideration, for example, given to co-ordinating the activities of the Canadian International Development Agency with that of the Export Development Corporation because both agencies are involved in the matter of economic aid and economic assistance, as I believe it is called.

I shall give an example of the amount of involvement of CIDA. I have the report for 1970-71 of the Canadian International Development Agency before me. In a column at page 10 entitled "Appropriations and Authorizations" for 1971-72, we find these appropriations and authorizations broken into two major parts. First of all, we have appropriations and authorizations to multilateral agencies in such matters as international emergency relief and food aid. The total of these multilateral contributions is some $204 million, which is a respectable amount by world standards. Multilateral contributions are broken down fairly extensively later on in the publication in other columns. Below that, however, we have a second section which deals with bilateral assistance and there are two items: technical assistance in an amount of $43 million and economic assistance in an amount of $178.8 million. That is a large amount of money.

As a matter of fact the bilateral total, talking about economic assistance, amounting to $221.8 million exceeds the total of the non-bilateral contribution of $204.6 million. Even in terms of the amount we are talking about for the Export Development Corporation which has of course, a limitation on its lending capacity which is not what it will lend in any one year, we realize that this figure is indeed very large. The activities of CIDA in large measure are very much like the kind of activities in which the Export Development Corporation is supposed to be involved.

[Mr. Harney.]

• (1740)

If we hesitate to believe that this is the case, we have the recent word of the president of the Canadian Export Development Corporation, Mr. Paul Gerin-Lajoie. I quote from an article which recently appeared in one of the newspapers in Canada, the Globe and Mail. I see it is a CP article so every newspaper carried it. It reads:

> Paul Gerin-Lajoie, president of the Canadian International Development Agency, told the Montreal Board of Trade yesterday that "particular Canadian business enterprises would find it difficult if not impossible to remain economically viable without the purchases CIDA makes from them".

He goes on to point out exactly what CIDA has been able to do in order to help Canadian business. Indeed, he goes on to chide Canadian businessmen for not being as ready as they could be to trade with the third world, particularly the developing world. I will not go on to quote any more from Mr. Gerin-Lajoie because I think the point has been made that this CIDA function is very much like the function of the Export Development Corporation. If the EDC is designed to increase industrial expansion in Canada by increasing industrial expansion abroad, that is fine, I suppose, because it is working within its terms of reference, but we really should wonder whether CIDA is working within its terms of reference or indeed whether or not both corporations are working to those kinds of ends that are so often mentioned in speeches that come from cabinet ministers, especially when they are out of the House, ends that have to do with aid to developing countries.

I am sure that many heads in cabinet nodded with agreement, not with sleep, when they were addressed in these terms by the churchmen of Canada the other day. I quote from their brief as follows:

> Today, there is a growing resistance against the economic growth model for development in the third world. Several developing countries are increasingly resisting the pressures of modern industrialization, especially where the cost is another form of economic colonization and dependence.

I suggested a while ago that a lot of the effort of the Export Development Corporation is our own form of Canadian imperialism in the third world. The brief goes on to read:

> The realities of this resistance force all of us in the western industrial countries to critically re-examine our models for development. The third world resistance is telling us that the human cost of the economic growth model is too high. As an alternative, the third world is advocating development models based on the goal of balanced growth with an equitable distribution of income across the board.

So, if we are to co-ordinate our external economic activity, what we really should do is, first, bring the various entities, such as the EDC and CIDA, under one roof and preferably not under a Crown corporation roof, rather under the control of one minister so that we in the House can actively criticize the programs of these agencies. It is all very well to say that we are given reports with very pretty pictures indeed, but in most cases we have no idea from these reports exactly what the nature of these foreign involvements is and what these loans amount to.

For example, one of our agencies will tell us very religiously, as they do in the estimates for this year, exactly what kinds of grants and contributions to multilateral and international assistance programs they are making. We can read down the list and find, for example, that we propose this year to give to the Society for International Development $5,000. It is herewith listed so that all members of this parliament and indeed the citizens of Canada can know exactly where our international development aid is going. But if we look on the same page, we find under grants for economic and technical assistance, $144,340,000 with no specification whatsoever, no clue at all as to where this money is going.

So, when it comes to aid, we can go over the program with a magnifying glass and we can question every detail. We know exactly what little church in what country is getting whatever bit of money to buy food. But when it comes to economic assistance, all we are given are lump sums without detail. We are not given details, we are given flossy reports with multi-coloured pictures but no breakdown of what the purpose of the economic assistance is or exactly to what kind of venture it is going. I think in the near future we should seek to bring together under one roof, as I suggested, all our external programs, programs of aid and of economic assistance and programs involving loans to foreign countries or foreign corporations, which in turn perhaps are simply corporations in Canada whether they be foreign or Canadian owned. Second, what we need is much more detail so that we know what is going on.

I should like now to go back to the report for 1971 of the Export Development Corporation. On pages 23 and 24, there is a listing of the countries and of the borrowers within those countries who have been helped by the Export Development Corporation, a list of the products, finance, exporting in Canada, date of contract, repayment terms, amount of financing, and so on. Some sums amount to $12 million, others to $9 million, one to the Union des Transports Aériens in France for $2,700,000, and to the President of India $1,500,000. But then, at the end of page 24, under section 31 of the Export Development Act it says: "to the Imperial government of Iran, products to be financed". What are they? Various. What exporter? Various Canadian suppliers. What is the amount? $100 million. What other details? None. So what kind of scrutiny can we give this program in the House when we are only given such scanty information? One thing I can say now is that when this matter comes to committee we will expect to see just what kind of detail is available for members of the House.

There is another aspect of the export development program that we should consider. Where exactly in Canada are these exports produced? It is a very important question, because we have spent several hundreds of millions of dollars over the past few years to rid ourselves of the problem of economic disparity in Canada—I should say, "in order to rid ourselves" because we have not done it yet. The ministry in charge of that program is a little stunned right now because all the money it has spent over the past few years has not brought about the result that was expected; indeed, regional disparity is still with us. But this parliament went into the program in good faith because it believed that it was essential for reasons of natural and social justice, and essential for the principle of Canadian unity, that the wealth and productivity of this country should be directed equally to satisfy the needs of all sectors of the country.

We have here the Export Development Corporation. In the 1960's it dished out some $800 million—a fairly sizeable sum. Were these $800 million spent evenly across Canada with some respect for the needs of the less developed regions of our country? Not at all. Of the $800 million, $650 million went to Ontario and Quebec. I wish I had the breakdown for the two provinces because I suspect that the lion's share of the $650 million went to Ontario which is more in a position to take advantage of this kind of largesse than the province of Quebec. Here we have an aspect of our government in Canada acting at cross purposes with a ministerial program called DREE. We can call the Export Development Corporation our contra-DREE program or anti-DREE program. I tried to reverse or juggle the letters around a few days ago and I came up with EERD, and I only wish I could find some way of putting "W" in front, because then we would have something very telling and informative, for certainly something "WEERD" is going on here.

In this parliament we do not have a real understanding of what our economic ventures and economic activities add up to, and there are several accounts under which we could challenge the worth of the program of the Export Development Corporation. I know that some of my colleagues to my right dwelt at some length on the fact that multinational corporations were involved as recipients of the largesse of the Export Development Corporation. However, if you do not mind, Mr. Speaker, I will add just one more element. It is not even my own. It comes from the brief presented by the church leaders to the cabinet the other day, and I quote:

> It is becoming increasingly evident that multinational corporations are having a dominant impact on development planning and trade patterns. We are acutely aware of this problem since Canada is a country with a large percentage of foreign control. This trend must be counterbalanced by other measures. For example, could the Canadian government expand our public importing systems in order to encourage imports from those countries that lack the sophisticated marketing systems of the giant corporations?

Let us talk for a moment about imports as well as exports. It is useless to pretend that we can only be dealing with exports in this world where import from and export from must be a two-way street.

I come back again to that country to which I referred a while ago, to look at our activities in terms of import and export trade between Canada and Brazil. For example, in 1970 imports to Canada from Brazil amounted to $49.3 million. Exports from Canada to Brazil in 1970 amounted to $87.4 million. Certainly next year, by the time Brascan gets its assistance from the EDC, exports from Canada to Brazil will be in even larger imbalance than the imports we get from that country.

You see, what we are doing essentially with the EDC is dealing with the top tenth of the world's industrial activity. We are doing almost nothing with that nine-tenths of the world that is submerged out of reach of that industrial activity, and not only out of reach of that activity, but out of reach of the benefits that come from it. So how can we, when it comes to speech-making time here, the equivalent of convocation time in university, stand up and make all these beautiful speeches about how we are out to help develop the underdeveloped world, when all we are doing is simply shoring-up the kind of industrial enterprise which suits the industrial giants of this country. We do nothing effective, in real and lasting terms, to help the third world, and those parts of the third world that are sorely affected, to pull themselves up from the economic desperation in which they find themselves?

I will end fairly soon, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure some people will be glad to hear that. But there is one point I wish to make now. It is not a particularly new point, but it is a point worthwhile making over and over again. What we have here really in the efforts and activities of the EDC is a sample of that very old capitalist technique—there, I have used the word—of running to government to get cheap money, of running to government to insure the risks when it is rather difficult or rather expensive to get money for investment on the normal investment market, or when there are no insurance companies that will take the risks, simply because they are bad or chancy risks.

This has always worked very well for those who understand the nature of the capitalist system. As economist Frank Park put it some years ago:

> The ingenious idea was to finance on government advances and on the sale of government-guaranteed bonds while the promoting group kept all the common stock (absolute ownership and control) in return for 'services rendered.'

That is an ancient principle, and it has always worked very well for that sector of our economy which is in definite control of the economy as a whole. Here again we have the same procedures going on. Brazilian Traction—I am sorry, it is now called Brascan, that is its new avatar, but it is still the old Brazilian Traction—rather than going out on the market to borrow money at the going rates gets a loan, indirectly mind you, from the Export Development Corporation at very good rates indeed, at 6 per cent or 7 per cent. With this loan, it can develop the capitalization it needs in Brazil, and can carry on its form of imperialism, and bring back very good dividends to its Canadian as well as American shareholders. And we, the people of Canada, have taken the risk, but we have none of the control.

You know, Mr. Speaker, in most of the provinces in this country we do not let private interests control the development of hydroelectric power. Even Conservative Ontario many years ago adopted the principle that the development of hydroelectric power should be in public hands. As a matter of fact, private development of hydro-electric power cannot be undertaken very much more in Canada, although it was done in the case of Churchill Falls a few years ago. But we allow and encourage our Canadian companies to go and do it elsewhere, and we, the public, take on the capitalization and all the risks, while they make the profits.

Just recently there was an announcement to the effect that the British Columbia government would get into some kind of joint enterprise with Brascan to develop resources in northern British Columbia. But at least the British Columbia government had the wisdom to say, "For our part of the investment we want joint control. We want a piece of the action so that the people of British Columbia can get part of the return." Now, Mr. Speaker, if we are going to be involved in foreign enterprises could we not ask that the people of Canada get a piece of the action, get a piece of the control? Mr. Speaker, I notice that you are about to rise from your chair, and if you are going to call it six o'clock, may I do it for you?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. It being six o'clock this House stands adjourned until two o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

MANPOWER

ANNOUNCEMENT OF NEW DIRECTIVE ON JOB PLACEMENT PRIORITIES REPLACING THAT OF MARCH 9—STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, further to my statements yesterday and Tuesday I wish to tell the House the outcome of my review of the departmental directive on placement priorities, issued on March 9.

As pointed out on Tuesday, suitability for work is the overriding criterion for referral to jobs, and any directive issued must be read in the context of the Unemployment Insurance Act and regulations which govern the operation of the employment service of the Department of Manpower and Immigration.

Yesterday I indicated my understanding that the reason for issuing the directive had been related to the very specific policy announced some time ago for the local initiatives and training-on-the-job programs. In those cases unemployment insurance and welfare recipients were to be given priority in placement.

Further to the undertaking I gave to the House yesterday I have reviewed the March 9 directive with my senior officials of the department. Because its wording could be and has been misunderstood—

Mr. Stanfield: Let us have it.

Mr. Andras: —my officials have recommended to me that it be withdrawn and replaced by a new directive. dispatched today by the deputy minister to all directors general of the department, and which more accurately expresses my intent and that of the government.

Mr. Baldwin: Let us see the first one.

Mr. Stanfield: Let us see the Friday one.

Mr. Andras: I believe that the new directive is clear and straightforward, and I would like to quote it in full.

Mr. Hees: Just like the one last Friday.

Mr. Andras: It reads:

> This cancels and replaces my telex of March 9th.
>
> The purpose of that telex was to emphasize the importance of aggressive, affirmative action by CMCs to utilize emerging employment opportunities, especially those created by the local initiative and training-on-the job programs for those people who are definitely unemployed and in need.
> As you are aware, priority in referral to jobs is governed by Regulation 27 to the Unemployment Insurance Regulations. Consistent with Regulation 27, all job orders will be checked as soon as they are received against existing live files of registrations to ensure that preference in referral is given to qualified registrants as required by the regulation. The telex of March 9th was not intended to change this basic procedure.
> In the case of the LIP and training-on-the-job programs it has been publicly announced as government policy that priority in placement would be given to those who are unemployed. Within that priority emphasis must be given to those on unemployment insurance, welfare or otherwise unemployed and actively seeking work.
> A special effort must be made to complete recruitment for LIP and training-on-the-job, particularly the latter, as quickly as possible and in accordance with the foregoing policy.

Mr. Speaker, looking at Regulation 27 of the Unemployment Insurance Regulations which was written many years ago, I am advised that it could be construed so narrowly as to prohibit special action on behalf of almost any category of disadvantaged groups including youth, native workers, the handicapped, women returning to the labour force and those who have been chronically bypassed in the labour market. We are trying to do a better job for all Canadian workers, but in particular to ensure that the procedures do not inadvertently penalize certain groups. I am going to review Regulation 27 and, if necessary recommend updating it, in order to guarantee that we are permitted to help those who need help most.

In summary, while I regret the misunderstanding caused by the unfortunate wording of the earlier departmental directive, I want to indicate my strong support of the administrative objective, which was to generate a more positive and dynamic effort to put unemployed people in jobs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: Now tell us about the Friday directive, Bob. Let us go back to square one.

Manpower Placement Priorities

• (1410)

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the minister's statement. But let me tell him, through you, Sir, that there is something that stinks around here. I can only put it that bluntly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, what I think has happened is that the minister, in error, brought about a directive that was totally unacceptable and, having found out what had occurred, he is now trying to weasel out of that directive. The unfortunate part is that, although he mentioned the directive of last Friday by way of date, March 9, he at no time referred to it in his statement in total nor has he indicated that that directive would be laid on the table. I think this is an irresponsible attitude for him to take.

There is something else that bothers me with respect to the minister's statement. I quote from the third paragraph which begins with the words: "Yesterday I indicated my understanding". This leads us on this side of the House to think that the minister is not running his department. It appears to me, after having read certain quotes in last night's paper, that he is apologizing on behalf of the deputy minister. It is the minister himself, Mr. Speaker, who is responsible for the mess in which he has placed himself. I cannot understand how the minister can take that attitude when this matter was published in the Globe and Mail of Tuesday, March 13. That gave him ample time to understand what the problem was going to be in terms of questions in the House. He now says that he did not even see the directive. If he did not see it, I do not know why he answered the questions that were posed to him from this side of the House at such length.

I just want to refer to this matter, Mr. Speaker. On Tuesday I asked the minister the following question:

> Has the minister instructed his department to give absolute priority in referrals for all jobs, including on-the-job-training, to unemployment insurance claimants in the first instance, welfare recipients in the second instance, and other unemployed persons in the third instance? If so, does this mean that the policy of the department is now one of high selectivity, seemingly ignoring suitability of skills and the needs of employers as well as of other Canadians?

From that question on, Mr. Speaker, the minister led the House to believe that he knew what we were talking about, and I respectfully suggest that he did. He knew just what was happening but when he ran into flak then came the problem.

An hon. Member: He ran for cover.

Mr. Alexander: I do not understand the minister either when in this new telex he refers to the telex of last Friday in the following words:

> The purpose of that telex was to emphasize the importance of aggressive, affirmative action by CMCs to utilize emerging employment opportunities, especially those created by the local initiative and training-on-the-job programs—

Do you remember that yesterday, Mr. Speaker, the minister was emphatic in stating that this directive applied to the local initiatives program? He was emphatic in the House, and outside the House on radio, television and in the press he was emphatic again. But I notice he has now included the training-on-the-job program. I question the minister's credibility in this regard. I also question it because the telex states "especially". When you use the word "especially" it means that it was not referred to at all before, nor was it in the minister's mind to devote this directive to LIP. I am not even happy with the telex that he has now sent out because he questions whether he is doing it in the right way because regulation 27 leads him to believe that he cannot do what he is doing right now. The minister says in his statement:

> I am going to review Regulation 27 and, if necessary, recommend updating it, in order to guarantee that we are permitted to help those who need help most.

I recall that the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) asked yesterday whether the minister had the approval of the Governor General in Council with respect to this directive, but he has not indicated to date whether he had that approval. He probably did not sign it. He has also indicated, Mr. Speaker, that what he is doing is wrong because he is saying, by implication, that he does not know if he can do it when he has to review Regulation 27.

I still question the directive because it is my understanding that manpower services are for the need and use of all Canadians. I think that what the minister is doing is being done because of the embarrassment of high unemployment and the high unemployment insurance costs. It is being done for the benefit of the Liberal party to the exclusion and disadvantage of the people of Canada. Manpower services are to be used without selectivity to any great extent, if at all, nor are they to be discriminatory. This same directive excludes people undergoing on-the-job training, those who for some reason or other will not go on welfare or collect unemployment insurance benefits because of their pride, workers who are anxious to work and believe they can find jobs without the involvement of the commission, our young people who are being ignored, and housewives and veterans. What about the landed immigrant? In what position has he now been placed?

I have indicated by sufficient background material that I take great exception to what the minister is attempting to do. He is trying to weasle out, as it were. I hear the minister is a nice guy. We are all nice guys, but when you make a boo-boo, you must be chastised. There is no way that our feelings of friendship can affect the attitude that we on this side of the House must take.

I hope, after I sit down and other statements have been made, that the minister will say, all right, here is the directive that was issued on March 9, so that hon. members can look at it and see what it is all about.

I suggest that what the minister and the department were trying to do was wrong. They were attempting to make a very significant change in policy contrary to the UIC legislation and contrary to manpower policies. When they found that this was not acceptable the minister and the deputy minister had a tête-à-tête, and this unacceptable statement that the minister has made is the result.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the minister that it would have been better if he had not made the statement he made today. Yesterday he seemed simply foolish. Today he appears devious. I am not sure that the combination is a wise one to show the House.

His statement was not an exercise in clarification; it was an exercise in obfuscation. It was an exercise in total failure on his part to have the necessary guts and humility to say to the House that he and the deputy minister had made a serious error. His failure to put on the table the directive of March 9 leaves the House in exactly the same position as before. I suggest, Mr. Speaker—the matter is in your hands—that as the minister referred to the statement of March 9 and then said that the new telex replaces the earlier telex it is obligatory for him, under the rules, to place the telex of March 9 on the table for all hon. members to see.

He talked in his statement today about the earlier telex having been misunderstood. If the report in the newspaper was correct, and I have not heard the minister question it, there was no misunderstanding. It was perfectly clear that the deputy minister, presumably with the minister's authority, had issued a statement that he had no right to issue, that was contrary to the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act, contrary to the regulations of the Manpower Department and contrary to justice and decency to the unemployed people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: I suppose I have been guilty of the same thing at times in my political life.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: I note from the applause of many hon. members that they are never guilty of that.

Mr. Hees: The hon. member supports the government, and must share some of the guilt.

Mr. Lewis: I know from experience that that is a misunderstanding of the same kind as the minister was guilty of. The minister is obviously ashamed of the March 9 telex. So he ought to be, but he ought to have the courage to place it in our hands. We in the New Democratic Party are disturbed by the whole exercise of the Unemployment Insurance Commission, the minister and the department at the present time. This is merely one little part of that exercise.

• (1420)

I agree fully that it is important for the Unemployment Insurance Commission to weed out those claimants in receipt of benefits who are abusing the unemployment insurance program. I am entirely in agreement with that. Indeed, I have said many times in the past number of months that if the Unemployment Insurance Commission were not governed by confusion, mismanagement and arbitrariness it would have taken steps long ago, and the habit of abusing the unemployment insurance program would not have developed to the point it has developed. My colleagues and I agree fully that it is necessary for the Unemployment Insurance Commission to weed out the chiselers on unemployment insurance, but I condemn without qualification the way in which it is being done, hurting thousands of innocent Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: For example, the other day the minister seemed to indicate that after the computer print-outs were available people were interviewed before they were disqualified. I want to make this categorical statement in the presence of the minister and, if I am wrong, I invite him to contradict it. There is no interview of these poor, unemployed people. They merely shove information into the computer—this is based on information that I am sure is accurate—and when they find that they are people in receipt of unemployment insurance benefits in certain categories of work and there are vacancies for those categories, the required number are sent a letter stating that they are disqualified without any personal interview. The personal interview only takes place after the person who has been declared disqualified indicates an appeal to the board of referees. I can think of nothing more unfair and more dehumanizing than this kind of treatment of thousands of people across Canada.

I say to the minister that he is doing the program a very great disservice by listing the number of people who are disqualified and giving the impression that 65 per cent of claimants are getting benefits without right when it is 65 per cent of about 10 per cent, which is only about 6 per cent. That 6 per cent will not remain 6 per cent because there may well be results after the appeals which will show that a large proportion of them are indeed entitled under the law to the benefits which they have received. The kind of zeal now being exercised by the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the minister, much too belatedly, is being exercised at the expense of thousands of Canadians who are entitled to unemployment insurance benefits and who are unemployed because of the past policies of this government. They should not be treated in the way the are now being treated.

I say to the minister that he has a duty to place the telex of March 9 on the table. He should have the courage to say to this House of Commons that he and his department made an error and that from now on they will behave in accordance with the law and in accordance with the dictates of humane treatment of unemployed people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, according to the directive of March 9, which the minister, for reasons which we would like to know, is apparently refusing to table in this House, there would be in Canada some unemployed, young and old, educated and uneducated, males and females, who receive benefits and others who do not and finally some welfare recipients. A few unknown officials of the department decided on March 9, seemingly in collusion with the minister, to send a directive to Manpower centres asking to classify the unemployed in the order in which a job would be offered to them.

Mr. Speaker, the members of the Social Credit Party of Canada are vehemently protesting against the way the government is classifying the Canadian people as we say that all Canadians are entitled to work and the government has no right to classify them, granting to some the right to live and to others the right to die.

Manpower Placement Priorities

Mr. Speaker, today, the minister, in his statement—his telex—does not clear up the confusion which exists in the Unemployment Insurance Commission, or concerning Section 27 or the Canada Manpower Centres.

It can be seen today even more clearly that the government is embarrassed, that he does not know anymore what to do with the unemployed. And while it is playing at classifying them, interviewing them and numbering them, these people are not getting their benefits.

Mr. Speaker, the prime responsibility of the minister is not to classify the unemployed by order of priority, but rather to find work for Canadians so that each can live in freedom and security in his own country.

Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Section 27, officials may classify the unemployed according to age and distinguish between people who are entitled to a job and those who are not. The minister says that he is going to consider this section and see whether it should be amended.

First, we want him to table the directive that he issued on March, 9 and to undertake forthwith to change this Section 27.

Likewise we ask that he change Section 25 of the Unemployment Insurance Regulations prohibiting a recipient from receiving benefits on the ground that he has failed to give proof that he was seeking work. One might think, Mr. Speaker, that each Canadian should submit papers, loads of them, in order to prove that he was fit to work. He says so. This is quite ridiculous and is but a pretext to refuse payment of unemployment insurance benefits.

As for us, we consider that this act should be revised by Parliament so that Canadians should not only have the right to work but that those who are unfortunate enough to become unemployed may at least benefit from a true unemployment insurance plan.

Mr. Speaker, we are disappointed at the minister's explanation today, which explains nothing since he ignored the problem caused by the improvised tax slips that do not tally with Ottawa's figures, so that the unemployed are being asked to pay tax on unemployment insurance benefits that they have not had. It seems to me that this is a most important problem, and a statement this week by the minister to clarify the situation would be most welcome.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that unemployment is still a crucial matter. The workings of the Unemployment Insurance Commission are still obscure and inefficient, while the government, instead of coming to grips with the problem, continues issuing vague orders and making life difficult for working people.

We have heard talk of a just society for Canada, for the purpose of the elections, Mr. Speaker; to our way of thinking, a just society is one in which every Canadian, regardless of race, religion or age, and whether or not he is on welfare, has the right to live in his own country, the right to fulfill himself freely in his country, and to be treated as a human being and not as a number devised by some obscure civil servant.

That is how we see the just society, and as long as the government continues to classify Canadians it will be contributing to disagreement and discontent.

[Mr. Fortin.]

Mr. Speaker, the government will have to act sooner or later.

I should like to conclude by saying that equal opportunity for all Canadians means that, instead of continuing to create confusion with his directives the minister stand up and state that henceforth there will be no priority lists of any kind in connection with the treatment of the unemployed and those on welfare, and that all Canadians, whatever their situation in life, will get the same treatment as far as the Local Initiatives Program, the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the Manpower Centres are concerned.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre rising on a point of order?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I rise on a point of order which is based on citation 159(2) of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition. I shall read from Beauchesne, but it is word for word as it appears on page 421 of May's 18th edition:

> A Minister of the Crown is not at liberty to read or quote from a dispatch or other state paper not before the House, unless he be prepared to lay it upon the table. This restraint is similar to the rule of evidence in courts of law, which prevent counsel from citing documents which have not been produced in evidence. The principle is so reasonable that it has not been contested; and when the objection has been made in time, it has been generally acquiesced in.

I realize that on many an occasion members have asked for documents to be laid on the table because reference has been made to them. Your Honour, relying on the authorities, has replied that this requirement applies only when a document has been cited in the legal sense, or as would be the case in court.

I suggest that today the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) has cited the telex of March 9 in two or three ways. I might say, as one minor point, that we are supposed to believe that the new telex differs from the telex of March 9, but how can we tell unless we see the text of the telex of March 9? The minister also makes it clear in his statement that the reason for the new directive is that the original directive could be, and has been, misunderstood. Some of that misunderstanding has, of course, been here in the House itself.

Now that we have been told that there was something wrong with the original telex, with the result that it had to be replaced, I submit that we have every right to insist that the original directive be tabled so that we can make the necessary comparisons and ascertain whether this matter has been cleared up. After all, that was the purpose of the minister in making the statement he did today—to clear up the confusion that has arisen in the last couple of days. But we will not know whether the confusion has been cleared up unless we see both documents.

I submit that the requirement for the tabling of this document is based not just on the premise that the minister has referred to it or quoted from it—as a matter of fact, he did not quote—but that he has cited it in the sense of providing it as the basis for the action he has taken today. As I say, this is clearly covered by the words in citation 159(2):

This restraint is similar to the rule of evidence in courts of law, which prevent counsel from citing documents which have not been produced in evidence.

The minister has cited the telex of March 9 as the whole basis for what he has done today, and I suggest that his having cited the document means that the Chair should rule that he is called upon to table it in the House.

I made a brief reference to the fact that the citation in Beauchesne is taken from page 421 of May's 18th edition. In that citation May has a few extra words, some of which are to the effect that the tabling must take place provided it can be done "without injury to the public interest". I certainly cannot see any injury to the public interest or injury to the state as a result of tabling the former document. Therefore, on the basis of this citation I suggest that Your Honour should advise the minister that he should now table the document known as the telex of March 9.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate rising on the same point of order?

Mr. Andras: I rise on the point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I believe the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate is also rising on the same point of order. Perhaps it might be more orderly if the Chair were to hear the minister first.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I always tremble a bit when I take exception to what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre says on a point of order or on a point dealing with the rules, but I disagree with his views about the requirement under the rules to table the document of March 9 by virtue of my having referred to it in my statement today. Nevertheless, although not from the point of establishing a precedent, I am quite willing and really welcome the opportunity to table the telex that is going out today, to table the telex of last Friday, March 9, to table an interdepartmental memo of October 2 and the telex that accompanied that memo to the field, and also the press release of December 6 referring to these programs. I think that is the documentation I now have. I regret that at this stage I do not have sufficient copies, but I will ensure that all members get copies tomorrow, if they will give me that opportunity.

Mr. Fairweather: We want to make some comment on them.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member for Hamilton West rising on a point of order?

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I question the entire motives of the minister at this time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: It appears to me that the minister has used some very devious methods here, not only in order to confuse and frustrate the members of the House of Commons but also the people of Canada. The minister had every opportunity to refer to these matters in their entirety in the comments he made but he chose not to do so. Then, after we on this side of the House had prodded and harassed him, he suddenly realized the error of his ways and he now says: "Here is the telex". I question the minister's motives. I think he is using some very devious tactics to frustrate the members of this House.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair is in a difficult position. There was a suggestion that certain documents would be tabled. I was prepared to make a ruling, or to give some thought to making a ruling, one way or the other. Now the hon. member says he questions the motives of the minister. Certainly members are not entitled to question the motives of other members of the House. So far as the point of order raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is concerned, I do not think the Chair would be required to make a ruling. Is the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre rising on a point of order?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I merely rise at this time to suggest that the documents the minister says he is now prepared to table should be printed as an appendix to today's Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: For the documents above referred to, see appendix "A".]

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, as a result of the initiative shown yesterday by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate the minister has now tabled these documents. I want to say as strongly as I can that the statement made on motions by the minister and the responses can only be construed as a farce without there being some opportunity to include in those comments reference to the documents that have been tabled. I would urge upon the government House leader that the order, "Motions", be called again later today to permit hon. members to make comments dealing with the directive of last Friday. I suggest it is imperative, part of the res gestae and essential that this directive be before hon. members before they can make reasonable comments. If that is not done, what has been done here today is a complete farce so far as the proceedings of this House are concerned.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fairweather: "The land is strong".

Mr. Hees: And the Liberal government smells strong.

Mr. Lundrigan: The minister in three statements made in the House has referred to two items. I am completely satisfied that the first one has been dealt with as far as tabling of documents is concerned. We do have the directives in question. The minister in his statements this week referred to the directives and also to the policing of the unemployment insurance regulations. Hon. members raised questions about the fact that what was originally intended to be a job placement wing of the manpower offices was converted into what now has become a witch hunt in the policing of the regulations to the extent that the regulations and the act are not being carried out. I have received evidence today from my province that would indicate that a goon squad—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate has risen on a point of order. We have been considering a number of points of order and, although it seems to me we have made some progress, perhaps we might have an indication as soon as possible as to what the hon. member's point is. Perhaps he might refer to the citations for the guidance of the Chair on which he bases his point of order.

Mr. Lundrigan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will do that, but before doing so I wonder if I might draw Your Honour's attention to yesterday's record toward the end of the oral question period. We heard a statement by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) which filled two full columns of Hansard, had a lead-in, and was a four or five minute speech. At that point Your Honour did not see any relevancy in my argument, and I accepted that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lundrigan: I just want to remind Your Honour, and I will get to my point as fast as I can, that I am being guided by the expertise of the hon. member to whom Your Honour pays so much attention.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will hear the hon. member, but it seems from reading Hansard of yesterday that he received quite a bit of latitude.

Mr. Lundrigan: I thank you for that and appreciate it very much, realizing that experts on procedure need a fair amount of latitude. I have simply risen to say that I should like to know whether there were other memoranda sent to the unemployment insurance or manpower offices having to do with the policing of the unemployment insurance regulations, which has caused even more concern than the directive, and whether the minister would now co-operate with Your Honour and the House by tabling these memoranda so that hon. members on this side of the House will not be compelled to continue questioning on this matter at length in the weeks ahead, and it will continue.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As I suggested a moment ago, that might not be a point of order but rather a question. Perhaps the hon. member might be recognized during the question period to ask this question of the minister. In that way he might ascertain if the minister proposes to table or refer in one way or another to the documents mentioned by the hon. member.

PROPOSED RENT INCREASES FOR OLD AGE PENSIONERS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Terry Grier (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move, seconded by the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Harney):

That this House directs the Minister of State for Housing and Urban Affairs to meet personally with appropriate officials of the municipality of metropolitan Toronto and the government of the province of Ontario to ensure that proposed rent increases which will affect some 1,500 pensioners living in senior citizens' apartments in Toronto, and which are attributed solely and directly to the raise in the old age security pension, are not proceeded with.

PRESENTATION OF BILL GUARANTEEING LANGUAGE CHOICE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I ask the unanimous consent of the House to propose a motion in a case of urgent and pressing necessity, the text of which has already been received by hon. members.

In view of the right each Canadian citizen has to communicate with various federal departments and to be informed, instructed and administered in the official language of his choice, and of the unfavourable status of francophone Canadians compared to their anglophone fellow citizens, a situation which can jeopardize the very future of the country, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin):

That this government bring forward here within 60 days a motion of its intention to introduce a bill ensuring administration in both languages through setting up of parallel francophone and anglophone administrative departments in all areas, in direct ratio to requirements and needs.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion brought forward by the hon. member for Champlain under Standing Order 43. It requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is no unanimity. Therefore the motion cannot be put.

REVIEW OF ASSISTANCE PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I wish to introduce a motion under Standing Order 43, concerning a very urgent economic problem.

Since the federal assistance program for industry, which is expanding in the province of Quebec, is going to expire soon and since a new economic development program is to be established in Quebec, I propose, seconded by the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin):

That this House review the assistance program for businesses so that the development of large centres be not detrimental to smaller centres.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Compton under the terms of Standing Order 43. As this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House, is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There being no unanimous consent, the question cannot be put.

MANPOWER

PLACEMENT PRIORITIES—INQUIRY AS TO APPROVAL BY MINISTER OF MARCH 9 DIRECTIVE

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to clear up a couple of matters in respect of the statement by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration in which he referred to the directive of March 9. Was that directive released with the approval of the minister, or did his deputy issue it contrary to the instructions or directions of the minister?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I had a conversation with the deputy minister on Thursday last based on discussions regarding finalization of approvals of local initiatives program. We wanted to ensure that instructions issued earlier with regard to hiring of employees for local initiatives programs and on-the-job training were in fact going to be adhered to. I left instructions with him that this reminder was to go out. That was the basis on which I thought the telex was going out in the next few days. It did go out on Friday without my seeing it. In fact, I saw it just before I came into the House on Tuesday, I believe.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I have one simple supplementary question for the minister. I take it the minister did see the directive and that the answers he gave me in respect of my questions on Tuesday meant in fact that he was aware that the directive did not refer to LIP or on-the-job training programs. Is that true?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I have indicated that I was in error on Tuesday in my assumption which was based on a rather superficial examination of papers I had in my possession before coming into the House for the question period. I have tried to clear that up to the best of my ability before the House. I really have nothing further to add to my statement yesterday and my statement today on this matter.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

POSSIBILITY OF DISQUALIFICATION OF RECIPIENTS AS A RESULT OF COMPUTER PRINT-OUTS AND WITHOUT INTERVIEWS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the minister to inform the House, if he can, briefly, and if he cannot do it briefly to undertake to inform the House by way of a statement on motions, whether the inquiry or search regarding those who abuse the unemployment insurance program is being done in the manner I described earlier this afternoon, namely, that people are disqualified as a result of computer print-outs and only after disqualification has been sent to them by way of a letter are personal interviews undertaken?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I should like to check carefully into the precise sequence about which the hon. member is asking me before I reply, but I will inform myself of the sequence in absolute detail and give it to him at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to hear the minister say that he will look into it. May I ask the minister whether he would undertake that this method of disqualifying people before they have had a chance to be heard, thus making them guilty before they have had a chance to tell their side of the story, will be stopped if he finds that the information I have suggested to him is valid? I think the House is entitled to such a promise from the minister without any reservations.

Mr. Andras: The only reservation I would put on it, Mr. Speaker, would be that I would want to be assured that every reasonable opportunity had been given to the claimants dealt with to examine the evidence, or whatever you wish to call it, before discontinuation or disentitlement. If a claimant did not avail himself or herself of that opportunity, then I could not give an absolute commitment that disqualification would not follow, always allowing for the appeal system to take over from that point. I am saying that because some claimants are disqualified in absentia. There have been a couple of cases where they could not be found.

BENEFIT CONTROL—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF DIRECTIVES

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. May I ask the minister if the offices are acting on any directive or any over-all policy position of the government on this issue, and would he be prepared to table any documentation that relates thereto immediately?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I made a statement on motions on Tuesday, I believe it was, with regard to the benefit control operation. I think it was as elaborate and as complete as I was capable of making it, and I think I have to rest on that at the moment. We will be before a committee before very long with the main estimates, and detailed questions can be answered at that time.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I will not reword my question but I ask Your Honour to tolerate repetition of my question. I will put my question to the minister when he finishes his discussion with his leader.

Mr. Hees: No coaching now, Pierre.

Mr. Lundrigan: My question is whether the minister has sent any specific directions to UIC offices, because there has been a complete change of heart and change in procedure right along the lines indicated by the hon. member for York South and these people are being judged guilty before an opportunity is given to them to tell their side of the story. If there has been a directive, would he table it?

Mr. Andras: I have asked all hon. members to give me specific examples of where there has been abuse by benefit control officers. I have also referred this matter to the advisory committee of the Unemployment Insurance Commission which met Tuesday morning and is going to delve into the whole matter as an independent body and make a report. I will advise the hon. member of the details of that report when it is available.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are getting into difficulty. The hon. member for York South, I gather, has supplementaries to his previous question, and so has the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate. I will recognize the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate for his supplementary, then return to the hon. member for York South for his supplementary, and then go to the hon. member for Peace River.

Mr. Lundrigan: Your Honour, I am trying to co-operate with you and the House because this question is very important. He can clear it up and help the House considerably if he will agree that there was a directive, if there was, and table it? It is a simple question. Why can he not answer it?

Mr. Hees: If there was, will you?

Mr. Andras: The general rule, I believe, is that internal memoranda are not tabled.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andras: I made an exception to that today but very precisely. I said at the time that I was not intending to establish a precedent.

Mr. Lundrigan: This is not the last you will hear on that.

BENEFIT CONTROL—REQUEST THAT OFFICERS BE INSTRUCTED TO INTERVIEW RECIPIENTS BEFORE DISQUALIFICATION

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question to the minister arises out of his answer to my earlier supplementary. If I understood him correctly, he said that he cannot give me the assurance I asked for without reservation because some people might not be available for interviews and therefore nobody can be blamed for having failed to interview them. Of course I accept that. I want to put this question to the minister so that there can be no misunderstanding: will the minister undertake to investigate this situation to make certain that the officers make an effort to interview applicants before they are disqualified as a result of the computer exercise, and if in the past no such effort has been made will he see to it that this practice is terminated forthwith?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I will be glad to give that undertaking, Mr. Speaker.

MANPOWER

PLACEMENT PRIORITIES—APPROVAL OF GOVERNOR IN COUNCIL OF DIRECTIVE OF MARCH 9

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration this question. In light of the fact he has now admitted that the document of March 9 was in fact a directive changing the priority with regard to referrals to jobs and as such clearly a regulation, was the approval of the Governor in Council obtained for this as required by the Unemployment Insurance Act?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I am informed that it is not a directive of a nature that would require such approval.

Mr. Baldwin: If it was any other Minister of Justice, Mr. Speaker, I would ask him if he would consider the legality of this action, but I will ask instead the chairman of the Statutory Instruments Committee if he will consult with his co-chairman with a view to having this very serious situation considered by the committee so as to discover what was in these directives, the extent that they were in fact regulations, and whether they were regulations which interfered with the operations of the act, so that we can arrive at the truth and the facts in this whole situation.

Mr. Fairweather: I will be delighted to do so, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before pursuing the supplementary questions that a number of hon. members wish to ask, the Chair will call on the hon. member for Shefford.

ESTABLISHMENT OF FRANCOPHONE AND ANGLOPHONE ADMINISTRATIONS WITHIN PUBLIC SERVICE—FREE VOTE ON RESOLUTION

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

Can he tell the House whether the resolution on bilingualism that he intends to table in the next few days will guarantee parallel administrations in French and English in the federal public service, so that justice will be done to every Canadian?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that I did not understand the start of the question, but I shall attempt to reply, and the hon. member will ask a supplementary if I miss the point.

The legislation that we will put on the order paper two weeks from now, as I said yesterday, will concern the application of the Official Languages Act in the public service.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I thank the Prime Minister for his answer to one part of my question.

Will this item include a commitment to a francophone and anglophone administration in the public service, so that service may be given to all Canadians?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member and all his colleagues know the basic principle of the Official Languages Act, which is that any citizen be able to communicate with the government in either one of the official languages, and also that any citizen may work in the public service in the official language of his choice. These instructions are aimed at applying this principle on official languages and the government's policy.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary.

Could the Prime Minister be more specific and say whether a parallel administration, French and English, will be set up in the public service?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker, we do not intend to set up two parallel administrations. I repeat that we just want to make sure that the citizen can be served by and communicate with the government in the official language of his choosing, and also that he can work in the federal public service in the official language of his choosing.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I recognize the hon. member for Charlevoix who wants to ask a supplementary question, after which we will go back to the first question put this afternoon to allow for supplementaries on that matter. The hon. member for Charlevoix.

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, this is my question.

Will the Prime Minister authorize a free vote after introducing this measure?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I hardly think the House intends to obtain my permission to have each member vote according to his conscience. The members of our party, I am sure, will unanimously want to support the government's policy. As to the opposition parties—

INCOME TAX

ALLEGED ISSUANCE OF INCORRECT TP4U SLIPS BY UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION—REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION

Hon. Robert Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration arising out of the reported discrepancy in some 2,000 out of some 28,000 cases investigated in connection with the Delorimier unemployment insurance office in Montreal, in which TP4U slips issued by the unemployment insurance office in Ottawa showed higher payments during 1972 in some 2000 cases compared with the records of the Delorimier office. As I did yesterday, I ask the minister whether he can give the House any explanation of this discrepancy, and can he tell us why there are no records, no microfilm records in Ottawa either to prove or disprove the accuracy of the TP4U forms issued by Ottawa in these instances?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, my understanding with respect to the particular forms that are being discussed is that there was an error discovered in early January when they were being posted manually, and there were some 28,000 cases investigated in the Quebec area, although only a few thousand of them in the end actually had errors. The Delorimier office was set up to work on this job and the errors were all corrected before they went out. There are records kept and there is microfilm data available. The regional computer centres hold the microfilm records at Moncton, Montreal, Belleville, Winnipeg and Vancouver. They would not be kept in Ottawa, but they are in the appropriate computer centres.

Mr. Stanfield: Can the minister give the House any explanation of the discrepancies in these 2,000 cases in connection with the Delorimier office, in some cases amounting to tens of dollars per person and in other cases running into hundreds of dollars per person? Can the minister give an explanation of these discrepancies, and has he any information as to how this can be verified one way or another?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, the Unemployment Insurance Commission had to issue some 1,917,000, I believe—at least it was in excess of 1,900,000—T4 slips, in addition to which they had to process the special slips for the province of Quebec. The margin of error, based on the number of appeals made to the commission where claimants can go and verify every fact with respect to these TP4U slips, has been extraordinarily small. I think the 2,000 were caught before they went out. They were caused through some problem of transposing from a manual to some form of electronic record in Montreal. As I say, the sampling across the country uncovered these before any harm was done.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, the minister takes the position that no harm has been done, but is it not correct that some 2,000 workers in Montreal associated with this bureau, clients of this bureau, received forms from Ottawa showing that they had received amounts very substantially in excess of the amounts that the records in Montreal show? Is that not a fact, and can the minister gloss over such a fact simply by talking about the law of averages?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has no objection to the minister replying to this question, but I must say that the question as asked is not correct procedurally. It is obviously asked in terms whereby the question suggests its own answer, and is asked in the form of an argument. But again I say that the Chair has no objection to the minister replying to the hon. member's question.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I have sat here for several days watching this minister issue statements—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Stanfield: —issuing statements, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Stanfield: —and giving different explanations. I want to ask him, Sir, whether he has caused any inquiry to be made into what appears to be a very substantial discrepancy between the records of the Unemployment Insurance Commission in Ottawa, as to the amounts set out in forms sent to some 2,000 workers in the Montreal area, and the records of that bureau. Is the minister simply going to ask the House to accept the assurance that this is something that is bound to happen according to the law of accidents, or is he going to cause any inquiry to be made? If he is just going to sit there, then I am going to tell him, through you, Sir—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I have had a report. I have had an inquiry caused to be undertaken. I received the report just before the question period. I sent a message to the hon. gentleman's office begging his indulgence in that I would not be able to give him massive detail, but I did get the preliminary information I have now given him in the House. If there is any change in that, which I do not think will take place, I will most certainly advise him. But as it stands now, this is the preliminary information I have, and further information availability will be subject to the time it will take to digest the full report.

Mr. Speaker: I notice that a number of hon. members have supplementaries, but first the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore.

HOUSING

TORONTO—STEPS TO PREVENT RENT INCREASES FOR SENIOR CITIZENS

Mr. Terry Grier (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. I thank the minister for the communication he sent me just at two o'clock. Would he advise the House what steps he has taken to prevent the announced rent increases in senior citizens' housing in Toronto?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. He has referred to the fact that apparently because of our increase in the old age pension some pensioners will be moving up the rent to income scale, and some provincial housing agencies have consequently increased their rents. I refer particularly to the metropolitan Toronto agency which has sent its tenants a letter that I must say I find extremely bureaucratic—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Basford: —and one that is guaranteed, it would seem to me, to disturb the old age pensioners who are the recipients of it. Consequently, I have written to all of the provincial ministers today asking that they freeze the rental rates applying to senior citizens in public housing developments, and I have indicated that officials of CMHC will be going to the provinces to consult with officials about a review of the senior citizens rent to income scale. I would be happy to table that letter as soon as I have sufficient copies, and also a list of the people to whom it has been sent.

Mr. Speaker: We will now return to supplementaries to the first question.

PLACEMENT PRIORITIES—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE THAT INTENT AND SPIRIT OF MARCH 9 DIRECTIVE ALSO WITHDRAWN

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary to the first question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Now that he has finally withdrawn the directive of March 9 and has agreed to table the document, can the minister assure the House, and most importantly, the unemployed of this country that the intent and the spirit of that directive in fact have been withdrawn?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

MEASURES TO ASSURE BALANCE BETWEEN DIFFERENT ASSISTANCE PROGRAMS

Mrs. Albanie Morin (Louis-Hébert): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Since the minister is concerned with the welfare of all Canadians and since 150,000 needy mothers abandoned by their husbands receive less social assistance than older people, could the minister tell us what he plans to do in order to ensure an equitable relation between the various social assistance programs?

[English]

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, this whole question is under review by the department in conjunction with the provinces. Meetings are scheduled for the month of April—

An hon. Member: What year?

Mr. Cafik: —so that we can discuss this whole problem of social security, welfare and aid to people in need. When that is completed, of course, a complete report will be given to the House.

MANPOWER

PLACEMENT PRIORITIES—STATEMENT BY MINISTER THAT MARCH 9 DIRECTIVE TO BE READ IN CONTEXT WITH OTHER REGULATIONS AND INSTRUCTIONS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to a previous question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In response to a question on Tuesday by the hon. member for Hamilton West with respect to the Friday memorandum in which it was stated that absolute priority would be given in referral to all jobs, the minister said that this memorandum should be taken in context with other regulations and manuals of instruction. Can the minister indicate under what arrangement that information was conveyed to the various manpower offices?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think I have tabled some of the documents which will throw light on that subject when the hon. member has had an opportunity to examine them.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member on a supplementary but I would point out that to some extent we are still on the first question and I hope we can pass on to the second question eventually. The hon. member for Egmont can ask a supplementary.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): In view of the minister's tabling of this document of March 9, which says that as of now all CMCs will give absolute priority in referral for all jobs only when these sources have been thoroughly reviewed or exhausted and that it will be implemented without fault and every effort will be made to fill vacancies forthwith as per above order, can the minister indicate in the context of that memorandum where such a provision was in fact indicated to CMC offices?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, in the first place that memorandum of March 9 has now been withdrawn and the one I read today has been substituted. There are literally thousands of communications giving instructions to CMCs across the country. There is no dead silence between Ottawa and the field. There were instructions to recruit for LIP and to recruit for training-on-the-job through manpower offices. I have disclosed that and they were instructed to follow through. I may be missing what the hon. member is seeking, but I really do not see what the point is.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): A point of privilege. I think that once again, perhaps inadvertently or in some other manner, the minister has misled the House in his answer Tuesday by suggesting that other regulations and manuals of instruction would be considered when, in fact, there is no reference in this document to such a provision.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

OLD AGE SECURITY

DELAY IN TAX REBATES TO ONTARIO PENSIONERS—ALLEGED FAILURE TO PROVIDE PROVINCE WITH LIST OF THOSE RECEIVING GUARANTEED INCOME SUPPLEMENT

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare and I will ask his parliamentary secretary to take note of it. It deals with the delay in payment of the $50 tax rebate to old age pensioners in Ontario who receive the guaranteed income supplement. In view of the fact the delay is caused by the failure of the department to provide the province of Ontario with a list of pensioners receiving GIS, would the minister inform the House whether he is taking steps to correct this situation?

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I shall draw this matter to the attention of the department and a report will be given.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

ASSISTANCE PROGRAM FOR MONTREAL—ECONOMIC PRIORITIES FOR QUEBEC

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Since the minister has announced outside the House his ideas concerning an assistance program for Montreal, could he tell the House if he has received from the Quebec authorities what he has requested one month ago, that is a complete list of the economic priorities of Quebec, or if he has consulted with the Quebec authorities before announcing his views on the matter?

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I have been a journalist long enough myself not to fall back on the old argument that I was misquoted, but I can only say that the news story was to some degree incomplete—entirely inadvertently, I am sure, on the part of the reporter. The position with regard to the hon. member's question is that there has been considerable discussion at the official level with regard to an exchange of ideas and proposals which will in some cases be substitutions for those projects which will expire in the province of Quebec in the present year. There have also been discussions with regard to over-all plans for the future. My reference to the end of March was that before that date or around that date we would begin discussions government to government, and I believe that is the understanding of the government of Quebec as well.

[Translation]

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary.

Can the minister indicate to this House whether the program now made public takes into account the interdepartmental work done in Quebec and in Ottawa or if it is only based on a report prepared by economists from the University of Montreal?

[English]

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, it includes a great deal of information from a number of sources, including the studies from a Quebec university, but these were only one part of the series of consultations and studies that were under way. I would hope that within a matter of some weeks I would be able to make available in pretty comprehensive form to all members the results of this compilation of the various points of view and the various assessments that have been made. I think it is fair to say that we have tried to get as many inputs as possible, including most of the sources to which the hon. member has referred.

DESIGNATION OF SHERBROOKE AND EASTERN TOWNSHIPS AS SPECIAL AREA—STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

As the Eastern Townships have been neglected, as their industries have not benefited much from the department and as unemployment in this area reaches alarming proportions, is it the intention of the minister to make this a designated area, as he did with Montreal?

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, this is, of course, one of the matters to which I referred in reply to the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe. We will be discussing with the government of Quebec just which areas of the province may be entitled to or may be by mutual agreement assigned special area status or in some way or other assisted by DREE programs. I have also had representations from the hon. member for Sherbrooke on this point and these have been taken into account.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

POSSIBLE REINSTATEMENT OF THOSE CUT OFF BY COMPUTER PROCESS WITHOUT AN INTERVIEW

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, to return for a moment to the question of unemployment insurance, may I ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration if procedures will be established to reinstate the benefits of unemployment insurance recipients who have been cut off by the computer process without an interview?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will examine that matter. I do not know the volume of such cases that may exist, but I will examine it.

HARBOURS

ATLANTIC AREA—REQUEST FOR IMPROVED FACILITIES FOR FISHERMEN

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment and Fisheries. Has his department yet assumed responsibility for the provision and maintenance of harbour facilities in Canada? If so, in view of the high rate of unemployment in eastern Canada and the neglect of many of the public works facilities in eastern Canada, is it his intention to recommend that more money be put into that program to accommodate fishermen and others who need these facilities during the coming fishing season?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment and Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the present program is being managed co-operatively by the Department of Transport, the Department of Public Works and the Department of the Environment. There is a move under way to shift the administration more to the fisheries service.

• (1520)

Mr. Carter: As this program is being administered by the Department of Public Works, would the Minister of Public Works tell us if he plans to ask his colleague, the Minister of Finance, to supply funds to enable him to provide some of these badly needed facilities in the Atlantic area?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, we have been spending millions of dollars in the past few years on repairing wharves and constructing new wharves. I agree that much more could be done. We are continually trying to obtain more funds to repair more wharves and build more of these facilities. Of course, the resources of this country are not unlimited. We are trying to do the best we can with the resources available.

Mr. Carter: A further supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will be recognized for a last supplementary. There are only seven minutes left before the end of the question period.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Public Works referred to the lack of funds. I suggest that if he can afford to spend $26 million in the Ottawa area to provide cafeterias and air conditioning equipment, he should be able to provide money for the Atlantic area where these facilities are so badly needed.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

POSSIBLE USE OF LOCAL INITIATIVES AND OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAMS TO KEEP UNEMPLOYMENT FIGURES LOW

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the warning by the Economic Council of Canada about too much reliance being placed on make-work projects, and as unemployment in Canada would still be well above the 6 per cent level if it were not for the 93,000 jobs created by LIP at a cost of $165 million, will the minister state whether the government intends to institutionalize the LIP and OFY programs in order to keep the unemployment percentage as low as possible?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if we decide to do so we will make a statement in the House in due course.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

REASSESSMENT OF PROGRAM IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. I would ask the minister if a similar reassessment of the DREE program is taking place in the Atlantic provinces? Is the minister having consultations with the governments of the four Atlantic provinces similar to the kind of reassessment currently taking place in the province of Quebec?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Yes, Mr. Speaker. This is happening not only with the Atlantic provinces but with each of the provinces of Canada, and there are also sub-studies in the sense that they concern various regions within the provinces. It is a very comprehensive analysis and covers the whole country.

POWER

JAMES BAY HYDROELECTRIC PROJECT—OBLIGATIONS OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT UNDER NAVIGABLE WATERS PROTECTION ACT

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. In light of the statement to the House by the Minister of Transport on March 9 to the effect that he was not clear about federal obligations under the Navigable Waters Protection Act concerning provincial construction in the James Bay area, did the Minister of the Environment sign the document tabled in the House today without knowing what obligations the federal government has under that act?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the agreement to which the hon. member refers relates to services normally provided by the Department of the Environment, involving fishery experts, oceanographers, mineralogists and so on. It is a service we are providing and it does not rest on the division of powers between the province and the federal government.

TRADE

INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT POLICY FOR TEXTILE, LEATHER AND SHOE INDUSTRIES

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Would the minister inform the House if it is government policy that Canadian businessmen should not be active in the textile, leather or shoe industries and that those fields should be left to the emerging nations, as has been suggested by an official of his department?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that is the proper way to put a question of this kind.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: Why? Is it too embarrassing?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, it is government policy to support all elements of Canadian industry regardless of what industry it is and where it may be in Canada.

Mr. Stevens: Would the minister then indicate when he will do something for the tanning industry of this country to relieve it from the plight caused by the importation of foreign goods?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, on previous occasions in the House I have indicated, in answer to a similar question, that the tribunal is in the process of completing its report. I have heard that it has completed its report. This problem was assigned to the tribunal.

An hon. Member: When will you do something?

Mr. Gillespie: I am hoping to receive that report shortly. As soon as I receive the report I will study it and make a statement to the House.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question and a supplementary question to the Minister of National Revenue. Would the minister inform the House whether or not expenses for dinners held for the benefit of political parties are deductible for income tax purposes?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is out of order. The hon. member cannot ask for a legal opinion or a legal interpretation. Therefore he cannot have a supplementary to that question.

CANADIAN CULTURE

MULTICULTURALISM—PROVISION OF PROGRAMS BY CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for multiculturalism. A short time ago the minister was asked whether Canadian broadcasting rules were being adjusted in order to allow more time to be devoted to multiculturalism on the broadcasting media. The minister replied that he was awaiting a report from the CBC on its multicultural programs. Has the minister now received such a report and is he doing anything or is anything being done to allow multicultural programming on the CBC?

Hon. Stanley Haidasz (Minister of State): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to report to the hon. member that we are considering a program and a policy for multiculturalism and multilingualism in broadcasting. To date, I have not received a report from the chairman of the CRTC, who held a hearing in Montreal on February 19, I believe.

POSSIBLE AMENDMENT TO BROADCASTING ACT TO PERMIT CBC TO USE OTHER THAN OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. I hope he will be able to answer it. In view of the fact that sections 3(e) and 3(g) iii of the Broadcasting Act specify the use of English and French only on the CBC, does the minister intend to introduce amendments to the Broadcasting Act in order to clear the way for use of other than official languages by the CBC? If not, why not?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I have no amendments prepared at this point.

MULTICULTURALISM—CONFLICT BETWEEN OFFICIAL LANGUAGES ACT AND BROADCASTING ACT—POSSIBLE ACTION TO REMEDY

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the minister in charge of multiculturalism. In view of the fact that CRTC hearings regarding the CBC takeover of CKSB, St. Boniface, were held some weeks ago, can the minister tell the House what decisions have been made which would be in keeping with the intent of section 38 of the Officials Languages Act, which in this case is in conflict with the sections of the Broadcasting Act referred to by the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley? When this matter was referred to on February 22, the minister replied that it was a matter of government policy and would be announced in the House in the usual way. Is the minister now prepared to give his reply?

Hon. Stanley Haidasz (Minister of State): Mr. Speaker, before developing policy in this matter I should like to have the benefit of the report of the chairman of the CRTC.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

INCREASED PASSENGER FARES—REQUEST FOR REPRESENTATIONS TO TRANSPORT COMMISSION FOR DISALLOWANCE

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Since the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has applied for increased passenger fares and is to bring in fares along lines used presently by Canadian National, that is, bargain, economy and standard fares, and since it is the intention of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to have almost no bargain or economy fares during the summer months, will the minister make representations to the Canadian Transport Commission in order to disallow the increase proposed by the Canadian Pacific Railway?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the increases which will be reviewed by the Canadian Transport Commission are related to several factors. They are meant in part to put the Canadian Pacific on the same footing as the Canadian National, that is there will be from now on three ticket series corresponding to the weekly traffic volume and similar to those now designated as red, blue and white rates by the Canadian National. Tickets issued by the Canadian Pacific will be gray, black and probably blue.

At any rate, the only significant increase, Mr. Speaker, would apply to sleeping cars and not to ordinary cars which are designated as third class transportation.

[English]

Mr. Benjamin: Since passengers, if there are any left in June, will be black and blue from this increase, and since standard fares are to be increased, as perhaps the minister may be aware, between 14 and 21 per cent, in view of the fact Canadian Pacific Railway Company has already printed and distributed the new tariffs will the minister ask the Canadian Transport Commission, in the light of this discourtesy if for no other reason, to disallow the proposed fare increases of CPR?

• (1530)

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): This is not new, Mr. Speaker. Since the new Transport Act was passed, it is well known that all the company has to do is to submit its request for a tariff increase to the Canadian Transport Commission, and then apply it. Companies are under absolutely no obligation to inform either the government or the public of increases, and thus invite representations. That is the law as passed by this House.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

Could he tell us what attitude the government intends to take on the statement by the Prime Minister of Quebec, Mr. Bourassa, who implied yesterday that he would be interested in giving evidence before the Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development, provided that the committee have a sitting in Quebec City?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is clearly referring to committee procedure, and his question is therefore not in order.

ENERGY

OIL AND GAS—REQUEST THAT STUDY BY CANADIAN SOCIETY OF PETROLEUM GEOLOGISTS ON NEW TECHNOLOGY BE REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Has the minister received a copy of the 800 page study published by the Canadian Society of Petroleum Geologists in which they suggested that, in light of new technological know-how, it is possible to increase the recovery potential by seven times of oil and gas left in wells as well as that recovered from new wells? Has the minister received this? When he does receive it, will he make it known to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, my recollection is that the society was planning to deliver copies to all interested parties. I will have to check to see whether a copy has been delivered to my department. I, personally, have not received it. With regard to the second part of the question, I think that would be a useful addition to the committee's considerations. If individual members do not receive copies, I will make sure the committee does.

Mr. Speaker: Before calling orders of the day, I will recognize the hon. member for Pembina.

INCOME TAX

POSSIBLE ESTABLISHMENT OF REAL ESTATE DATA BANK IN CONNECTION WITH CAPITAL GAINS TAX

Mr. Dan Hollands (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the Minister of National Revenue for replying to the question I asked on February 28, 1973. My question today concerns that reply. In your letter of March 7, 1973, you mentioned that following the tax reform and the introduction of capital gains tax, it becomes administratively necessary to establish a real estate data bank. My question to you is, what is a real estate data bank and the purpose of it?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister may reply to the question briefly. I take this opportunity very kindly to remind all hon. members that an effort should be made to address questions to the Chair rather than to ministers. This having been said, perhaps the minister might be allowed to reply, if he can do so briefly, to the question asked by the hon. member for Pembina.

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will understand that it will be useful, both to the taxpayers and the Department of National Revenue, to have some accumulation of information about properties which may in future be disposed of and be subject to capital gains tax. Therefore, any information which is gathered at this time will contribute to a fair settlement of the capital gains assessments in the future.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege arising out of the suggestion of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration that I was either ignorant of or ignoring a message sent to my office by him during the noon period with regard to a question on the subject of TP4U slips. I wish to say, Sir, that the message received by my office from a member of the minister's staff was that his statement would not include any comment on the Montreal TP4U's because the minister had just received his briefing material. The minister, therefore, asked for indulgence in this regard, that this would not be included in the statement. The representative also said that the minister would answer questions. He did not in any way suggest that the answers might be limited.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Peace River rises on the traditional point of order.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, now that we have escaped from the question period, I wish to ask the government House leader what will be the business for this week and next. Also, can he possibly give us a list of the legislative proposals which he has in mind for the next 10 days or two weeks.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, today we will continue with the debate on the Export Development Act. This will be followed by the housing legislation and that, in turn, will be followed by the foreign investment review legislation. On Tuesday and Friday of next week, we will have opposition days. The final opposition day will be Monday, March 26. I wish to advise the House that if it appears possible to deal with the Old Age Security bill and the War Veterans Allowance bill quickly in the report stages tomorrow, I will be quite agreeable to having them called tomorrow. However, in the event that they would not pass relatively quickly, I would continue with the business I have outlined to the House.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, on that point, I can advise the government House leader that if this is of any concern, we in this party are prepared to indicate that we will see that these bills are facilitated. I notice there are some amendments which might have to be considered at the report stage, but apart from that, we are quite prepared to facilitate their passage.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I simply indicate that we, too, are prepared to expedite the final passing of the bill to amend the Old Age Security Act and the bill to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I also should like to state that our party is willing to co-operate in every way to speed up the passage of Bill C-147 on the old age security pension. We have proposed some most important amendments concerning the age of eligibility and the amount of the pension. We will propose them and defend them for the principle of the thing, but we will not oppose the passage of this legislation.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

EXPORT DEVELOPMENT ACT

INCREASES IN AUTHORIZED SHARE CAPITAL AND IN CEILING ON LOANS AND GUARANTEES BY CORPORATION

The House resumed, from Wednesday, March 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gillespie that Bill C-3 to amend the Export Development Act be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. John Harney (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I just have a few points remaining in my series of remarks on this bill. One of them relates to a matter which I raised yesterday, namely, the question of the economic and administrative co-ordination which does or does not exist in the Export Development Corporation and the internal development corporation which we have in this country, that part of the ministry which we call the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

Yesterday I said that it appears from the allocations of funds made by both these entities or agencies, if I may call them that, that they may be working at cross-purposes. I am glad to see from reports in the newspapers today that I am not the only one in this country who thinks that. I read in this morning's Gazette some remarks made by an official of the province of Quebec. He said and I quote:

"The only thing I can think of is that there is a rivalry between DREE and the industry, trade and commerce department in Ottawa about which one will have the key say in development plans for the country,"—

I simply repeat this point to underline what I think is an extremely important matter. It is this. We have a series of agencies in this country, whether they be ministerial, Crown corporations or what have you, that are not working together to obtain the greatest economic development of this country.

I wish to conclude my comments on this matter by referring to some remarks which were made on this topic generally by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie). I may have, not wittingly I will say, caused him to infer yesterday that I associated him rather directly with other and former Liberal cabinet ministers who had been involved very closely with Brazilian Traction, now Brascan. As far as we can tell, the minister's connection with that company is nil. At any rate, in the past he expressed views and attitudes which had been stated candidly and which should be repeated in this House. If we repeat them for the edification of this House, we are in a better position to understand what kind of presuppositions, premises and controlling principles he brings to his thinking on the matter of export development and multinational corporations. Last year he was quoted in the Financial Post as having said, and I quote:

"Multinationals are important and they produce results," ... "Do you know that in the U.S. the multinational corporations produce more jobs and more foreign earnings than the purely domestic companies? They do, and we can do the same here."

• (1540)

So, the minister's basic philosophy had been put on the line. It is clear. We shall know exactly what we must take into account when we deal with this legislation more specifically.

I think the minister should be reminded that when he was in charge of another ministry, the Science Council of Canada caused a report to be prepared by Mr. Arthur Cordell. The report stated very simply that Canadian-based multinational corporations were no more inclined to act in the Canadian interests than were foreign-based multinationals. This is something we would do well to keep in mind.

In closing, I should like to refer to one of the companies about which I spoke yesterday—Brascan. Brascan is informative. It tells us exactly where its interests lie. The company has produced advertisements telling us, for example, that in Canada it had assets in 1971 valued at $135 million and that in Brazil its assets were valued at $103,000,000. So, the activity of this corporation seems to be centred in Brazil. The important thing is this. We should not kid ourselves we are helping a developing country when we advance generous loans to multinational corporations, even to our own multinationals, such as the loan of $26.5 million to Brascan.

Mr. Douglas: Which they do not need.

Mr. Harney: We ought to remember that we are dealing, here, with a tight, closed circuit of corporate control. We could save ourselves an enormous amount of time and trouble in future if we were to send the cheques covering these loans not all the way to Brazil, as in the case of Brascan, but directly from Ottawa to 25 King Street West, Toronto.

Mr. Trevor Morgan (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take up much of the time of the House. Most of the points have been made, and well made, and there is no need for repetition.

It does strike, me, however, that what the government is attempting to do by way of this piece of legislation is an example of philosophy they tend to adopt throughout—to use another patch in the quilt. They do not bring out any forthright long-term policy suited to the development of this country either in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce or, particularly, in the EDC. It bothers me that they should come here to present legislation before we have even seen any kind of financial statement. There is no audited statement of what they have done last year so that we can properly assess the progress being made by EDC. In other words, the government presents another hodge-podge of legislation. They show no clear evidence of developing any long-term programs, any policies. Surely, the trials and tribulations of the economy of this country are such that a new minister, particularly, should settle down and assess where we are going in this respect.

Looking at the supplementary estimates, it is obvious what goes on in this department. Throughout, there are one dollar items, indicating there has been a change of policy, modification and alternation of legislation. It is well known that what they are attempting to do is get in through the back door what they cannot get through the front door. In other words, they are trying to pass legislation by way of supplementary estimates rather than do it in the parliamentary way by bringing in bills which say what they want to do. Oh no, this is so much easier. There is that little automatic cut-off applied in the case of supplementary estimates, and debate is generally limited when considering items the department has in mind. Throughout these supplementary estimates B, we find these one dollar items thrown in, which means they really do not have a plan in the department or in the EDC to cover what is required. They put in another patch. This I deplore. Surely, a government which has been in power since 1962, throughout the last 11 years, should do better than that. They come here and ask for a little money, not taking time to present a proper bill, but dealing with one item only.

Since we are dealing with EDC, I will ask this question: how would that Corporation consider an application from a company which came to them and said "We need some money, gentlemen, to finance this project." The banker would say "Let me see the financial statement and I will consider it." "Oh no, I don't have a financial statement, just take me as I am." This is exactly what the government is asking us to do, accept them in good faith at face value. Surely, there is some business code parliament should look at when dealing with things like this. The expert Export Development Corporation comes here and asks parliament to bail them out of a situation, having overspent, having made commitments. I am reminded of the minister in charge of the Wheat Board who came to parliament seeking for an out-of-court settlement in order to avoid being sued, if the term is not too lewd, for all the money he had spent. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that this is the real reason for this legislation. There is no program. There is no policy. We look at what goes on within that department.

We look at Michelin Tires, for instance. The minister responsible for EDC said the other day, of course, that their only recourse was to bring a law suit in the United States if they do not get what they consider to be justice from the United States Government. I want to ask the minister in what state would the law suit be brought? Would that law suit be brought in the name of the Government of Canada or in the name of Michelin Tire? And if in the name of Michelin Tire, as it obviously must be, who would pay the court costs? This is very interesting question, and I wonder whether the minister will ever find time to reply to it. These are the types of things, this woolly, cottony attitude which this government presents to parliament every day, day after day. Surely, the people of Canada can expect a good deal more than this. And they deserve much better than this.

What has been the situation with the auto pact? We have had changing attitudes and stances, the government not knowing where they are going, or why or how. I wonder whether this is the type of government to which we are entitled. I suggest it is not.

I was under the impression—obviously mistaken—that the EDC was designed for the benefit and for the growth of Canadian industry. But as pointed out by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), loans to certain countries which would have benefitted the interests of certain Canadian industries were turned down. I wonder whether this had anything to do with the politics of Chile and whether the United States of America has still got its thumb on what this government does. Is this government afraid to act in its own right and to stand on its own feet? Certainly, its actions do not bespeak of a government with courage and foresight, one that knows where it is going.

I have said that the EDC is supposedly designed to be of benefit to Canadian industry. I notice a very curious item—I think it is item L17b in supplementary estimates B—concerning a loan to Canadair for the sale of water bombers to Spain. On the surface that is fine. If I may digress for a moment, I suggest there are too many non-lapsing loans in supplementary estimates B for this particular department. This department, with one other exception, is the only one with these non-lapsing items, these items of $1, and I suggest this is because they have no concrete policy. They know not where they go. I wish they had a light to guide their path; but there is too much heat over there and insufficient light.

With regard to this loan to Canadair to which I have just referred, it looks fine. But what was the quid pro quo that the EDC agreed to? The importation from Spain, primarily into the province of Quebec, of about $6.5 million worth of Spanish wine. I am informed that in the year 1971 the total consumption of Spanish wine in the whole of Canada was less than $2 million worth, and that the grape growers in the province of Ontario actually shipped about $1.75 million worth of wine to Quebec. Therefore, the market for the Ontario grape grower is going to be vitally affected by this little deal.

I wonder whether there was consultation between the Export Development Corporation and the Canadian Wine Institute or the Ontario Wine and Grape Growers Association before this little deal was made, a deal supposedly for the benefit of Canada. This is what it has done for a local industry, one of the few wine producing areas of this nation. Some grandiose statements were made about saving local industry, yet with the stroke of a pen and the grant of a loan to another nation, the potential of this industry has been greatly reduced, to the point where they find it difficult to compete in Canada for a Canadian market.

Surely, it behooves this government, through this department, to formulate a plan so it knows where it is going. It should have consultations with local industry and business that might possibly be adversely affected by some of these so-called policies that the government chooses to adopt. I urge that some kind of action be taken to amend the legislation under which this particular department operates so that this non-lapsing funding is discontinued and the department does not do by supplementary estimate what it should do by legislation. Then, the people of the country will be given a clear picture of what the EDC is doing for their benefit.

Mr. Joe Hueglin (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, I am rising as the final Conservative speaker on Bill C-3, and I should like to sum up the arguments put forward by my party. Upon my summation, we are reluctantly willing to see this bill go to committee; but we do so on the strict understanding that we will require an intensive examination of the operations of the Export Development Corporation during this committee stage. Indeed, we may feel it necessary to suggest some amendments to the Export Development Act.

Let me sum up first. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) has been guilty of shameful misrepresentation to this House. On February 2, while presenting the bill, the minister stated that the Export Development Corporation had the capacity to sign agreements for over $200 million to provide for the requirement of over $500 million. At that point the minister clearly considered signed agreements to be part of the corporation's liability under section 30 of the act that restricted such liability to $850 million, which liability restriction the minister has asked to be raised through this bill to $1.5 billion. Subsequently, however, the minister's parliamentary secretary stated on March 9 that signed agreements were not to be taken into account, although he did point out that signed agreements amounted to $865 million as of January 31, 1973. The parliamentary secretary said that it was only instruments that were to be taken into account, and that on January 31 they amounted to only $500 million.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, who is right? The minister told us in February that he had only $200 million free; his parliamentary secretary in March indicated there was $350 million. The truth is that they know they are caught. There is a December 31, 1972 statement due from this corporation, and the minister is pressing to get this bill through the House because he does not want to be embarrassed by what that statement may show. To be more specific, the 1971 statement, in note 2, included an item as follows:

The uncommitted authority to guarantee and lend was $212 million.

If the forthcoming statement contains the same note, it would show that the uncommitted authority as at December 31 is only $9 million. Based on the parliamentary secretary's statement, therefore, they would have no uncommitted authority. Indeed, they would have exceeded it by $15 million by January 31, 1973 when the parliamentary secretary stated there were signed agreements totalling $865 million.

Let me make a prediction, Mr. Speaker. I predict that note 2, as it appeared in the 1971 statement, will not appear in the 1972 statement. They will duck the issue, and by doing so they will hope not only to duck but also to dupe this parliament. As a new member to the House, I believe it is disgraceful that the type of deception that is practised is tolerated by the House. At the very least the minister must apologize for the deception carried on by himself and his parliamentary secretary.

Let us look at how ridiculous their position is. Section 30 initially provided a ceiling of $600 million. In 1971, the ceiling was lifted to the present $850 million, because at that time it was represented that the amount committed would go over the ceiling if it was not so increased. Now, in 1973, the parliamentary secretary to the minister asks us to believe that only $500 million in notes is involved when you are determining the ceiling. If he were to be believed, why was it necessary to lift the ceiling, first of all from $600 million to $850 million back in 1971, when right now we are $100 million below what the ceiling was in the beginning, $350 million under the present ceiling and only one-third of what the government is asking for today has been committed? In other words, the corporation would be a full $1 billion under the limit they are presently asking for in order that the program can be continued. If I could effectively stop this charade I would do so, but unfortunately our right to amend this bill is limited.

Let me outline in point form the other matters affecting this bill which concern myself and my party greatly. This corporation has become the softest touch in the international financial world. It is serving in the main multinational corporations which are able to finance their operations out of the federal treasury. Out of the total capital of over $1 billion, only 43 Canadian companies benefited, and the majority are United States or foreign-controlled. In fact, over one-half a billion dollars of this financing has gone to only eight of these 43 companies.

Surely, it is ludicrous for a government to be bringing in a foreign takeover review act, while at the same time it is handing out money to the benefit of these same corporations at an interest rate of 71/8th per cent, on the average. The minister, in his rebuttal, stated that our members believe the Export Development Bank should discriminate against foreign-owned corporations, and that the job it is doing is terrible because it lends money to foreign corporations. While he admits that there could be a problem in respect of foreign ownership, he follows the usual tact of accusing our party of being anti-American or anti-foreign. This is an old pattern the former hon. member of my riding used to try to discredit me when I was working within the area to unseat him. It did not work then, and I do not believe it will work now.

The people of Canada know there is a difference between discriminating against foreigners and actively encouraging Canadians. I do not believe we should discriminate against foreigners, be they American, British, German or whatever, but I do believe that we should have a government which will favour in all its actions, and through its many vehicles, including the CDC, the IDB and the EDB, Canadian-owned and controlled companies that will make their decisions based upon Canadian concerns and priorities alone. This is not the policy of the present government. It has not been its policy, and we have as yet no clear indication that it will be in the future. Surely, the Michelin fiasco should have taught this government a lesson, but that is now unlikely. Surely, the sale of that formerly all-Canadian company, which still advertises as such, Supertest, the all-British company, BP or British Petroleum, owned 50 per cent by the British government, illustrates their lack of concern.

This government's lack of concern not only for Canadian company growth but for small business is shown by what we know of this corporation's operation, and we still do not have full knowledge yet, since the accounts have not been fully audited and reported. Once again the parliamentary secretary, because of our concern for small businesses, businesses which, if given incentive and assistance, can become large, accused us of saying the corporation does not do anything at all for small business. We are not saying that it does nothing. We do say that the Canadian companies getting assistance through the EDB pay 11 per cent, while the large foreign-owned corporations pay 7½ per cent. Surely, this is a policy out of balance with our needs.

This corporation has no guidelines in respect of the amount it can lend to any single country. Surely, it would be prudent to draw up requirements that may not be violated. As it now stands, one-quarter, one-half or even a whole $1 billion could be lent to one country alone. The fact is eight countries right now have over $600 million from this corporation.

Next, I would point out that much of this financing is being utilized by these foreign countries to build transportation systems. That, in itself, is good and a valuable thing, but up to the end of December, $360 million has been pledged to such transportation systems. If our urban centres approach the federal government for funds to improve their urban transportation systems, they are told there is no money. Our priorities are wrong under the present government when a Crown corporation that is virtually out of control is allowed to dole out hundreds of millions of dollars to others, while our own people are told there are no funds available.

This corporation has many facets yet the minister, with this narrow bill, is trying to slip through only one facet of the corporation's operation without giving parliament an opportunity to look at the entire operation. If all the facts were known concerning the operation of this corporation, including its insurance of foreign investment to the extent of 150 per cent of the actual investment, it would be a national disgrace. As far as possible, we intend to bring out these facts before the committee, and we give the minister notice that we will expect him to table audited financial statements for the corporation at the committee hearings.

The government has put the gun to our head, however, in that it has indicated the passage of this bill is a priority. It certainly has top priority, because the Liberal government realized it had been embarrassed by still another bungle, having still another ceiling illegally exceeded, and by still another minister having no clear understanding with his subordinates of what constitutes fact or fiction.

The government has said it will not bring on its housing legislation until this bill has passed second reading. We do not wish to hold up whatever good there may be in the housing legislation. That, and that alone, is the reason we are submitting. What it could not achieve by persuasion, it is achieving once more by using as blackmail our known and rightful concern about the wellbeing of Canadians. We therefore will agree to allow this bill to go to the committee, but our stand in opposition to it and the tactics used by the minister in respect of this corporation is far from ended. I sincerely hope this bill will not be allowed to return to this House without significant amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair recognizes the hon. Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie). If he speaks now he will close the debate on second reading.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity of winding up the debate on second reading. From my vantage point, this debate has taken a considerable period of time. We started second reading six weeks ago. I think it is worth reflecting on the length of time considering that we have before us a straightforward amendment to the Export Development Corporation Act. Normally, it might have been expected to be sent to the standing committee after a day's debate, where it would have been considered in some detail. I think we have lost six weeks of valuable time.

An hon. Member: Not so.

Mr. Gillespie: I have listened very carefully to the points raised by hon. members opposite, and have wondered whether they are aware, as most of us are, that any debate on second reading is a debate on the principle of the bill.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. With the greatest respect to the minister, I question his right to leave the impression that we have lingered over this bill for six weeks. He knows full well that the government has discretion as to what legislation will be introduced and with what legislation we will proceed. We are not suggesting the bill is not important, but I do not think it is proper for the minister to mislead the House in this way. As a matter of fact, I believe the record will show that we have considered the matter for little better than three days, which is not unacceptable.

• (1610)

I think the record should be clear that it has not been a six week debate. If they had chosen to proceed with the bill in the usual way, the debate could have been over in three days, three and a half days, or perhaps four days. But I think that, under the circumstances, it is improper for the minister to leave that impression on the record.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: This is not a point of order, it is really a point of debate. I think we have made this point from the Chair over and over again in this parliament, and Mr. Speaker had some extra words of advice to the House on this point the other day. I really think that hon. members should not use the rules and, under the guise of a point of order, bring in matters which can be dealt with in the ordinary debating process.

Mr. Gillespie: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was just trying to recall for the benefit of hon. members opposite that this Crown corporation was created by an act of parliament in 1969. At that time, the bill went through a very considerable consultative process and process of examination at second reading, but more particularly in committee. That is where the detailed examination of the bill took place and should take place. It was reported out and passed, I think, with the support of virtually all members of the House. Subsequently, there was an amendment with respect to the particular item with which we are dealing today, namely, to increase the ceiling on direct loans. Again, that went through very rapidly without nearly four days of debate as we have had on this occasion. That was the point which I thought was well worth recording, that if there had been a serious interest on the part of Conservative members to examine this bill, they would have sent it to committee six weeks ago.

An hon. Member: That is before you fouled it up.

Mr. Gillespie: I would ask hon. members opposite whether they are more interested in talking about policy, about problems, or doing something about them. This bill and these amendments are aimed at increasing the basic ceiling on direct loans to foreign purchasers of Canadian equipment, loans which will very directly increase the employment levels of this country in the capital goods producing industries.

An hon. Member: By how much?

Mr. Gillespie: I will get to that point, Mr. Speaker. If I am not able to answer all the bootlegged questions this afternoon, I am sure I will have an opportunity to do so in committee, and I look forward to that. But talk is one thing, action is another. I would hope that hon. members opposite will consider it their responsibility to deal with the export potential, with the health and viability of the Canadian manufacturing industry in a forthright way because that, in a very real sense, is what the bill is all about.

As the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) said in his remarks to which I listened very carefully, the Conservatives cannot have it both ways. Either they want to support the manufacturing industries or they do not, and if they cannot make up their minds—and that is the position they are in—

Mr. Baker: Sophistry.

Mr. Gillespie: —I hope they will be forthright enough to say so.

Mr. Stevens: Worry about your own position.

Mr. Gillespie: As I indicated, we will have plenty of opportunity in committee to examine the procedures provided in this bill and the lending practices of the corporation. The officials of the corporation are looking forward to the same process themselves. They feel that their success story is a success story which all hon. members should hear, that through the committee, the Canadian people can come to understand how the export industries of Canada have been supported.

Mr. Baker: That is not what they are saying internally.

Mr. Gillespie: I should like to deal with one or two criticisms that were raised in the course of debate on second reading. The first category is that of an unplanned bill or unplanned action, and the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) led off with a statement that he thought, in the circumstances existing at that time,—he was referring back to last summer—the full co-operation of all opposition parties would have been cheerfully given to the expediting of a bill such as this. In other words, his argument was that we should have introduced this measure last September. Well, I ask hon. members, can we really accept this as a serious question? I think the simple answer is, no. All political parties at that time were adopting an election posture and the hon. member for Trinity was in his own search for a new election posture.

An hon. Member: Is that your strongest point?

Mr. Gillespie: An allegation was made by the hon. member for St. Catharine's (Mr. Morgan) this afternoon who said something like this: they ask us to bail them out, they have overstepped the work. The last Conservative speaker said something about a shameful misrepresentation to the House and the hon. member accused me of this shameful misrepresentation.

An hon. Member: That is putting it mildly.

Mr. Gillespie: He was referring to the matter of the authority on the lending ceilings. I am sure that the hon. member will be generous enough in committee to withdraw that statement when he is confronted with the facts.

An hon. Member: No way.

Mr. Gillespie: He will not have an opportunity perhaps until that time to make such a withdrawal, but I think it might be useful at this point—

Mr. Stevens: We know what your legal authority says.

Mr. Gillespie: —to read to members of the House an answer to the allegation which has been made, the question of exceeding the authority under the act.

Export Development Act

Under section 30 of the act, which fixes the limit for section 29 loans and guarantees, the corporation may not have instruments outstanding at any time in excess of $850 million. At February 28, 1973 the level of instruments outstanding totalled $502 million.

Mr. Stevens: Under what definition?

Mr. Gillespie: I ask hon. members opposite to listen carefully.

Mr. Basford: They don't want to listen.

Mr. Gillespie: If they listen, they should learn something, but who can be sure of that? The answer goes on to read:

Instruments become outstanding only when disbursements are made under signed financing agreements.

Mr. Stevens: Who said that?

Mr. Gillespie: It goes on to read:

Disbursements take place over an extended period after the signing of financing agreements. Concurrently during this period instruments are being retired as repayments of principal are made on loans outstanding. The corporation may, therefore, sign financing agreements somewhat in excess of the ceiling applicable to instruments so long as this never obligates the EDC to purchase instruments exceeding the statutory ceiling.

Hon. members opposite, or some of them, may have their own legal interpretation, but they will have an opportunity of putting it forward at a later date.

• (1620)

Mr. Stevens: A point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Gillespie: But I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that those are the facts.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for York-Simcoe on a point of order.

Mr. Stevens: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The minister has referred to a legal opinion. I would like him to table that in this House since it relates to the point he has just made.

An hon. Member: Sit down. You are not in a boardroom now.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I do not think that is a point of order.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, the urgency of Bill C-3, to amend the Export Development Corporation Act, to raise the lending ceiling, is therefore not because the corporation has exceeded the ceiling but because its capacity to sign new agreements under the present ceiling falls considerably short of the anticipated requirements for new financing in 1973, estimated to be in the order of $500 million. Now, Mr. Speaker, that is new business for Canada, and it represents new Canadian jobs. That is the reason we have brought this bill forward at this time.

There were other references with respect to the operations of the Export Development Corporation. There was a suggestion that in some way this was a Canadian corporation which was subsidizing big business, or subsidizing the foreign-controlled multinational corporations in Canada, that in some way it was oriented to bigness and oriented to foreign control. The basic reason I think hon. members made a mistake and misjudged the situation is that they are unaware—or if they were aware they chose to overlook it, even though on occasion they were reminded by myself—that the direct loans are not made to the vendors, to the Canadian corporations. The direct loans are made to the buyers.

Let us just consider the situation for a moment. Here is a country. We will call it country X.

Mr. Stevens: No, call it Chile.

Mr. Gillespie: It is a country in a different part of the world. That country is concerned with capital goods, maybe locomotives. It may be building a railway and wants locomotives. When you are looking for locomotives there are perhaps a number of countries you would consider, and perhaps a number of companies within those countries that you might consider. The Export Corporation in the United Kingdom, the ECGD, and the Ex-IM Bank in the United States, and similar types of export financing corporations in various countries would support their own industries in such a case. They would say to this country X that is looking for a supplier of locomotives, "We build good locomotives in the United States." "We build good locomotives in the United Kingdom," or in France, or wherever it is. "We would like you to buy British locomotives."

For a long time Canada was not part of this game. For a long time we let the more sophisticated export industries of the world take the cream off without Canadian initiative. But with the passage of the 1969 act, an act that was passed by the last parliament of Canada without the kind of—I don't want to use the word filibuster but at times that comes to mind—

Some hon. Members: Come off it.

Mr. Gillespie: —by hon. members opposite, it dealt with a situation of real need. There is still a real need. Those loans are made to the buyer if he purchases Canadian locomotives. If the buyer purchases Canadian locomotives he gets a loan. If he purchases British locomotives he does not, but then he gets a loan from the British government agency to buy the locomotives. This is putting Canadian capital goods producers on a competitive basis with foreign capital goods exporters.

The EDC direct loans are oriented towards capital goods, and they are oriented to countries outside Canada. Further, they are oriented to all the businesses of Canada, because unless there is 80 per cent Canadian content there is no deal. The point which I think was often overlooked by the Conservative spokesmen is that there are literally thousands of small Canadian businesses which participate, each time one of these contracts is written.

Take the Northern Electric Company of Canada that has supplied capital equipment to countries like Turkey. It has 4,000 suppliers, and for the most part they are small suppliers. I mentioned locomotives a moment ago. Montreal Locomotive Works, I understand, adds about 20 per cent of its own content, and purchases 80 per cent from manufacturers all over Canada. In other words, these direct loans spread the benefit back, through the buyer and the major Canadian supplier, to all corners of Canada that are involved in the manufacturing industries.

Another aspect of the EDC, that is to say, the export credit insurance aspect, is worth noting.

Mr. Stevens: That isn't before us today.

Mr. Gillespie: I know that, but it was raised and referred to by hon. members, and that is why I am mentioning it in order to put the record straight. Thousands of policies have been issued under this provision. At the present time, I understand that roughly 1,000 are outstanding, and that 70 per cent of those are for amounts of less than $250,000, which is obviously an assistance to the smaller businesses in Canada. Further, they are not related just to capital goods or just to manufactured goods. They also involve consumer goods, so that this widens the application.

In committee we will have an opportunity to talk about relending loans, which is yet another aspect of the EDC's activities which brings in small business. But to suggest that through the EDC we are charging small business 10 per cent, and subsidizing big business with a 7 per cent loan, is a patent distortion of the facts.

Other questions were raised with respect to directors, the proportion of private sector directors and of public sector directors. There was a reference to the make up of the private sector directors, with the suggestion that in some way they represent only the big interests of Canada. I believe that the men who are serving from the private sector are distinguished Canadians who, in their position as directors of the EDC, are making an important contribution to the growth of Canada.

Lest there be any suggestion that there is conflict of interest, and this was raised by one of the hon. members opposite with reference to an aluminum contract, I have been informed that the President of the Aluminum Company of Canada, who is a director from the private sector, declared his interest and abstained from the vote. We can discuss whether the majority of directors should be from the private sector or from the public sector, but we are dealing with public funds and it seems to me this parliament would want to reserve unto itself the right to appoint not a majority of directors from the private sector but a majority from the servants of this parliament and this government.

Questions were raised with respect to the support of the attractive looking resort in the Caribbean. Reference was made to this as being the type of project which the EDC should not support. I am not sure it was realized that the support for this particular project was an insurance of a direct investment. There was no EDC capital used in the development of that particular resort. No resources were loaned to the developer at the other end. This was an insurance of a direct investment by a Canadian investor, and that particular part of the act is aimed at providing what might be described as political insurance, or insurance against political risk. I think it is important to note in this particular connection that that particular investment had the full support of the government concerned. In fact, the views of the government concerned were sought before the insurance was granted.

• (1630)

I think I have covered some of the main considerations, Mr. Speaker—the question of small business, the question of the allegations with respect to exceeding the ceiling and I have touched on the directors. There will be an opportunity in committee to examine these questions in more detail as there will be to examine the part that the particular firms have played and the important part that these capital goods purchasers have played in terms of development of their own countries according to their own priorities. A foreign country is not going to undertake an obligation to the Export Development Corporation to repay Canada in Canadian funds for the purchase of Canadian capital goods unless it feels that the particular investment will support the development of that country according to its priorities.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I look forward to the committee stage.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps before I put the question I could deal at length with the point raised by the hon. member for York Simcoe (Mr. Stevens). As I understand it, he was asking for the production of a legal opinion made available to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) with reference to this particular bill.

When I listened to the minister make his statement I did not understand that there was any quotation in his speech from that legal opinion. I think the general practice is that if a document is quoted, then it is the practice of the House to ask that the document be made available to the House. As I understand it, the minister, while using the words "legal opinion" in referring to this bill, was not quoting from this legal opinion. Therefore, I think under the circumstances, and considering the past practices of the House, it would not be proper to ask that the opinion be tabled.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to on division, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

PROVISIONS RESPECTING NEIGHBOURHOOD IMPROVEMENT, REHABILITATION, OWNERSHIP, NEW COMMUNITIES, ETC.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs) moved that Bill C-133, to amend the National Housing Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is a great honour for me to begin the debate on Bill C-133 today and to move that it be referred to the Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs. In our discussions today, and during the debate on second reading, I want to deal with the principles of Bill C-133, an Act to amend the National Housing Act. In my view, some fundamental principles are involved in this legislation.

When we talk, as we undoubtedly will, in this debate in a general way about the subject of housing we are talking about an elemental human need—the need for shelter, for physical and emotional comfort in that shelter. When we talk about people's basic needs—the requirements for survival—society and the government obviously have an obligation to assure that these basic needs of shelter are met.

I have already acknowledged this obligation in stating that good housing at reasonable cost is a social right of every citizen of this country. As legislators, as administrators, as a federal government working with the provinces and with the private sector, that must be our objective, our obligation and our goal. The legislation which I am proposing to the House today is an expression of the government's policy, part of a broad plan, to try to make this right and this objective a reality.

The measures presented in this bill are designed, first of all, to give Canadians the kind of help that they have a right to expect in providing themselves and their families with adequate shelter. More particularly, they are directed first at those people whose need is most urgent—the old, the poor and those people who for one reason or another do not have access to the resources which this country can provide.

In considering people's need for shelter, however, we cannot concern ourselves simply with a roof and four walls. Man is a social animal and we must look beyond his house to the community of which it is a part. The community, as well as the house, must be safe and healthy and must allow and encourage man and his family to achieve the fullest possible growth and development, physically, emotionally and spiritually.

The bill is not, however, the government's only response to this challenge; it concerns only those sections which require immediate changes in the National Housing Act and it should be seen in the context of other responses which I have already described in a previous speech to the House. These are such things as the agreement at the federal-provincial conference held in January, to the development of a comprehensive national and local assessment of housing conditions. This will ensure that federal, national and regional policies are sufficiently flexible to meet the needs that exist across the country—things which are very different in different parts of the country. Such things as other parts of a total program of planned intergovernmental intervention in residential land markets—which I will mention in a moment—to reduce land costs and assist in the orderly development of urban communities; such as the growth of new intergovernment relations to assure the fullest possible consultation and co-ordination among all levels of government in developing and planning housing and community policies and programs including important changes that have been agreed upon recently for a three year commitment of funds so that federal and provincial housing agencies can plan for more than one year. As a result of the January agreement, officials of Central Mortgage and Housing are meeting with the provinces to agree upon these forward planning commitments, a part of which will be the process of getting housing away from the counter-cyclical economic device that it has often been in the past.

In the process of these consultations on agreement for forward budgeting, we will provide for flexibility in the allocating of funds to provinces and their provincial housing agencies to account for regional and provincial priorities and flexibility in allocating resources between the various programs of the National Housing Act.

I might mention also the thorough review which I have already announced of the federal sewage treatment program through which the federal government lends money to provinces or municipalities, their water or sewage agencies or regional governments, for the development of trunk sewers and sewage disposal plants. That program is under intensive review by an intergovernmental committee of the federal government which is consulting presently with provincial governments on their needs. I hope to have an announcement this spring on how that program will continue and in what form. An important development will entail the support of the federal government with respect to sewage treatment services. This will improve the quality of the environment and the quality of our urban life and will, in addition, be instrumental in bringing land on to the open market.

I now want to mention a bill, also on the order paper, Bill C-135, which will bring in certain amendments necessary in this field. It is known as the financial mechanisms bill and will create the federal mortgage market corporation, commonly known as a residential mortgage bank. That will provide for a liquidity of mortgage investment, which does not now exist. The bill will provide for the establishment of mortgage investment companies. I know my friends in the NDP have indicated their resistance to this legislation. I think they ought to re-examine their position on that particular bill, which is designed to make mortgage investment more attractive.

Mr. Woolliams: They will never agree to that bill.

Mr. Basford: I hope all hon. members will examine that bill carefully and, no matter in what part of the House they sit or which party they support, that they will support it. Bill C-135, is complementary to the bill before the House.

May I mention that there is currently under way a reorganization within Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, as a result of intensive management studies within the corporation. This is being carried out to assure that the corporation, in its operations and management functions, is totally able to carry out and fulfil legislative programs that we have enacted and are enacting. So this bill before us represents only part of the total picture with respect to housing policy and with respect to meeting the housing goals of this country. In terms of legislation, this bill represents, in my view, a major attack on the housing problems that face Canadians in the 1970's. This attack will take place on a number of critical fronts. It might be well to enumerate, briefly, those ten aspects of the bill.

There is to be, first, assistance for the planning and creation of new communities where they are part of provincial plans for dealing with the problems of urban growth—an alternative to the uncontrolled sprawl of our great cities. Second, there are to be resources to plan and finance the public acquisition of residential land, as part of an intergovernmental attack on rising land prices and as an instrument to be used for the orderly development of Canadian cities and Canadian communities. Third, there is to be assistance to low-income families who, with some help, will be able to buy their own homes rather than occupy public housing or other forms of subsidized rental housing. Fourth, there is to be increased assistance to voluntary groups such as church groups and service clubs who are willing to take the initiative in creating housing for low-income people, and particularly the elderly. Fifth, there is to be assistance to co-operative housing corporations, to encourage personal initiative in the development of housing and to offer a wider range of choice, particularly to lower-income and middle-income people, in the kind of housing they will have and the way in which they will occupy it.

Sixth, there is to be a new and imaginative program designed to preserve and improve urban residential neighbourhoods which are a vital strand in the social fabric of Canada but which may be threatened with death and decay. Seventh, there is to be a program of assistance to rescue and restore old, deteriorating housing which, with some judicious investment, could have many more years of usable life. Eighth, there will be provisions to assist Indians living on reserves to acquire existing as well as new housing. Ninth, there is to be the first step towards a full program of protection for some buyers, similar to the warranties and guarantees offered to purchasers of other consumer products. Finally, Mr. Speaker, the last feature of Bill C-133 will be new measures to encourage research and development in housing and community planning.

In recommending this legislation to the House, Mr. Speaker, I do so with the knowledge that it has been the subject of very extensive and thorough federal-provincial consultation and public examination. As hon. members know, a counterpart bill was introduced to parliament last June which had been the subject of intensive consultation with provinces. I have had the opportunity of discussing the provisions of that forerunner bill, and of this bill, in general terms with provincial ministers concerned with housing and with many municipal representatives. The most recent discussions took place at the federal-provincial conference on housing which, as I mentioned, was held here in January, of this year. The official communique of the conference expressed, after the outcome of previous consultations which had gone on at the official level was known, the general support of the provinces for these proposals.

Many of the suggestions made by provincial ministers concerned the implementation of these programs, rather than the legislative provisions themselves, and matters which are covered by regulation rather than statute. This matter will continue to be the subject of continuing consultation at the official level. It concerns not only orders in council and the regulations that support the legislation but the administrative procedures that flow from them.

As well, there has been advice and comment from many public and private organizations, and I should like to acknowledge now my appreciation of the time and great energy which so many people have devoted to the study and analysis of these important public issues. I think all hon. members have been impressed so far with the briefs and submissions which have been tendered by interested groups of citizens who have concerned themselves with housing policy in this country. All of this advice that we have received has been carefully considered and many of their suggestions have been incorporated in the bill and will result in further changes in detail when we reach the committee stage.

I have been encouraged to find, so far as the principles of the legislation are concerned, that they have received widespread acceptance by those people and organizations who have given them careful consideration. The Canadian Council on Social Development, for example, has described the proposed programs as significant ones, which, if properly funded—and I think we should discuss funding of the programs in Committee—

Mr. Gilbert: If properly funded.

Mr. Basford: —promises to improve the accommodation of many Canadians. The Housing and Urban Development Association of Canada has written, expressing general agreement with the tenor of the amendments. The Co-operative Housing Foundation and the Ontario Habitat Foundation of Toronto joined, I understand—although not in any written form, by the B.C. central credit union which is heavily involved in housing—suggest that this bill, if passed, will represent an enormous advance over the present National Housing Act.

Mr. Gilbert: What about the proposed changes?

Mr. Basford: I will deal with them in a minute.

Having shown in general terms the general nature of the support for the bill, I should like to deal now with the particular aspects of the bill in terms of the principles involved and leave the discussion of the details of programs until we meet in committee, when I and my officials will discuss the bill in detail, go through it clause by clause and be examined on those clauses.

In its broadest sense, it seems to me this legislation is not only an attack on housing problems of the 1970's but is part of the government's response to the development of urban life in Canada during the rest of this century. Great cities are not and need not become disaster areas. We are all aware of the deeply satisfying aspects of life in the country and in country towns and villages. Rural areas of Canada have contributed and continue to foster some of the abiding values that have made Canada and her people great. But cities also have a contribution to make in their rich and exciting social and cultural diversity.

Our concern must be to see that Canadians continue to have a meaningful choice among places to live and work. Our irreplaceable farmland and our rural communities with their unique life styles must not be mindlessly gobbled up by sprawling suburbs. At the same time, those people who prefer an urban life must be accommodated in a way that preserves the advantages of the city while avoiding the congestion, pollution, crime and violence which have made many of the world's great urban centres almost uninhabitable.

In many parts of Canada, an alternative to the continued expansion of the city is the development of new communities, either within urban-centred regions or in remote areas associated with the development of natural resources.

• (1650)

The new communities program, which is new to the National Housing Act, with the co-operation and participation of provincial and local governments will assist in the development of new or expanded centres offering comprehensively planned urban functions, including housing, employment, commercial and community facilities. Measures will ensure that the public retains the benefit resulting from subsequent appreciation in value of land acquired for the communities. Hon. members will note that that is provided in the bill by leasing of the public land rather than by its sale which has invariably been the practice under land assembly schemes of the past.

Very simply, then, it is my expectation that through the new communities program, which is provided for in this legislation for the first time as a federal initiative, we can make a positive contribution by taking much of the pressure off rapidly growing existing cities by creating new and self sufficient communities with the co-ordinated and rational use of existing government programs. This would take pressure off prices, the need for further farmland for development, and the need for urban sprawl and at the same time, by way of the total planning of new communities, engage in a whole series of experiments and demonstration projects using these new techniques in housing, planning and development. One such community was announced for the national capital region, south-east of Ottawa. We will be assembling the land, meeting with the regional district and over many years developing the kinds of plans we need for that community.

Associated with a new community's program is the provision in the existing National Housing Act relating to land assembly which Bill C-133 vastly improves. Land assembly has been mentioned in this House many times during the question period. The price of land is one of the most critical factors in the cost of housing in most markets throughout Canada.

All governments must be prepared to act to increase the supply of serviced land if housing is to continue to be available and financially accessible to Canadians. An over-all land strategy is necessary, and to this end I propose to encourage provincial and municipal governments to become more active in public land acquisition and servicing.

As I announced in January, the federal government is committed to at least $100 million a year for the next five years for the public assembly of land, including assistance to new communities. This figure, of course, has no reference to the vast amounts of money that have been and will continue to be spent under the existing and to be reformed trunk sewer program. Many have argued, and I have noticed this comment in the press, that $100 million per year is not enough for a concerted attack on rising land prices. It happens to be five times more than the Conservative party enunciated as their housing platform.

I want to make it clear, Mr. Speaker, that this amount is substantially more than any government has put forward for this purpose in the past in this country and, indeed, is substantially more than the combined requests of all the provinces in any year to date for the purpose of land assembly. I hope that the opposition, rather than concentrating on some amount, will see that the program is good. Then, we can go out and encourage municipalities and provinces to take full advantage of it and show that in actual fact that that amount is not enough. If it is not enough, we will just have to go out and get some more.

The land assembly provision is only part of the answer to the price of land, the question of land development and bringing serviced land into the market. At the federal-provincial conference, we discussed the question of land in a proposal of mine which was accepted by the provinces, namely that in this country we need a comprehensive co-ordinated land strategy directed at the question of a land policy and a housing policy.

Between the federal-provincial and municipal governments, there are four topics which have to be addressed by them as priority items. This is what I proposed at the federal-provincial conference and which was accepted. The first item is the level and allocation of federal and provincial public investment in land and services. As three levels of government, we must agree as to the level of expenditure that is required to have a concerted attack on the question of land price and land development.

The second item is the objectives and guidelines for public land banking and development. There is no sense in us simply using the taxpayer's resources and support to engage in land speculation. Purchases of land must have a purpose, namely good community planning and an effective intervention on the land market to affect the price of land in that particular market.

The third item is ways and means of co-ordinating federal-provincial and municipal activities directed toward moderating land prices on an individual market basis. If we are going to have a concerted attack on the question of land, it is going to involve all three levels of government for obvious reasons. We have got to develop more effective ways of co-ordinating activities between these three levels of government.

The fourth item is the effects of federal, provincial and municipal taxes on the price and availability of land. This is indeed a very important subject and I invited the other levels of government to address themselves on that with me. I feel that the federal commitment in this legislation, the federal commitment in terms of this budget and the federal commitment we have made to the other levels of government in wanting to develop a co-ordinated plan are in fact important features at the root of this question of land costs.

I now want to deal with a third element of Bill C-133. It is my belief that home ownership is desirable, but obviously for low and moderate income families, this is often impossible. We have to address ourselves to this problem. With some help, however, many of these low income families will be able to buy their own homes. The present bill contains provisions for this kind of assistance.

The amount of help available to a family under the assisted home ownership program is related to the family income and can be given in three ways; by reducing the interest rate on the mortgage, by extending the time over which the mortgage is to be repaid, and by a grant from the federal government to help with the monthly payments. In drafting the regulations necessary to implement this program throughout Canada, local needs and market conditions will be taken into account so that insofar as it is humanly possible, all Canadians will benefit equitably.

The aim will be, within the program regulations, to provide low income families who qualify with the assistance required to bring their monthly payments within 22 per cent of their income. The payment that would be required of them for purchasing a home toward principal, interest and taxes would not exceed more than 22 per cent of their income. For example, a family with two children—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions (papers), private bills and public bills.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Basford: I hesitate to ask the indulgence of the House. I am half way through my statement. I should be happy to complete it now, or at eight o'clock.

An hon. Member: Have a good supper.

Mr. Woolliams: We would be glad to co-operate with the minister but if he is only half way through his statement, he would, were he to continue, be seriously cutting in to the private members' hour which is so precious.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): There is no unanimity, so the rest of the statement will have to be postponed until eight o'clock.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

PUBLIC SERVICE

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF BRYDEN REPORT

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved:

That an order of the House do issue for a copy of the so-called Bryden report concerning the revision of the Public Service Staff Relations Act, which was submitted to the then minister of manpower and immigration in June, 1971.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this debate is on a motion which some of us feel is important in itself, namely, that the so-called Bryden Report should be made public. However, the debate takes on an even wider significance today because there have been suggestions that there is less than complete satisfaction on this side of the House, at least, with the way in which the government responds to motions for papers, and also because earlier today the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) tabled a document which, he suggested, listed the guidelines used by the government in responding to these motions. In this instance we are not only debating the desirability of the Bryden Report being tabled, we are also examining the government's general practice with regard to motions of this kind.

I should like to make a suggestion. I do not know how sympathetic a response will be forthcoming from the other side, but I make it very strongly. It is that there could not be a better motion on which to test this whole question and determine whether or not the House is satisfied with the position the government takes—I refer not only to its position on this motion but also to the statement which I believe the President of the Privy Council proposes to make in the course of this debate. I suggest, therefore, that if this debate is not concluded by six o'clock this evening the item before us should remain at the top of the list so that in a subsequent private members' hour the balance of the 90 minutes could be taken up, following which there could be a vote. In this way we could determine what the House felt about the matter. Whether the minister wishes to interrupt me, and respond at this point, remains to be seen. But if there is no response, and if the debate does not end at six o'clock, we shall be asking this—and we shall be asking it not in a casual way, as is sometimes done during private members' hour, but very seriously, because we think this is an important issue.

The document I am asking the government to table is a report prepared on the whole question of revising the Public Service Staff Relations Act. It relates to a matter which is of considerable concern to all hon. members, and one which is of particular concern to members of the Public Service. We, and they, feel that this report which the government has obtained should be made public, and I believe the House should have a chance to vote on this issue.

As for the guidelines the President of the Privy Council tabled at two o'clock this afternoon, copies of which he has supplied to a number of us on this side, I do not quite know how to describe them in polite language. Somewhere in the books on procedure there is a story about a bill which was introduced into the House of Commons at Westminster, one which the House, generally, disliked. At one point an hon. member moved that it not only be thrown out but that it be kicked right out of the chamber. A couple of members, so the books say, did precisely that, physically. I do not know that these guidelines are even worth kicking around. I do not want to take the time to read them all. Maybe the minister will. I do not know how we ever get anything if this is the document the President of the Privy Council has distributed among cabinet ministers as a guide to dealing with members' requests for papers.

As I say, I do not know how we ever get anything. The document consists of two long pages, 8½ inches by 14, in typewritten form. Documents are to be tabled in certain circumstances, but there are exemptions—16 of them, 16 different exceptions to the general rule that documents requested in the House of Commons should be tabled. Then there are paragraphs about ministerial correspondence of a personal nature, or requests having to do with constituency or general political matters. That is an excuse which is probably acceptable. We do not want to go into the personal files of ministers. Then there is another section of four long paragraphs about studies made by consultants. I do not know how anything gets by these guidelines. As a matter of fact, very little does. These motions for papers appear on the order paper by the hundreds. The number to which a favourable response has been given can be measured in tens.

Much better than the document tabled by the President of the Privy Council earlier today is a statement which was made in the House of Commons on October 29, 1969 It is to be found at page 251 of Hansard of that date. The person speaking was a new member, and he had the privilege of taking part in the debate on the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. In fact, he moved or seconded the motion. This is what he said:

> It seems to me that we in this House must devise a better program to provide a more plentiful flow of information, and more meaningful information to the people. Over the years—and I am not attributing responsibility for this to any one government or party—a tremendous amount of unnecessary secrecy has developed in connection with the business of government. It seems to me we have done this: Somewhere, way back, we started from the assumption that everything was secret and that only the minimum information possible should be released. Surely a far better and more democratic approach would be to proceed on the assumption that everything is open, and only to withhold information from the general public when this is clearly necessary on the grounds of public interest or for security reasons.

The next line in Hansard reads:

> MR. KNOWLES (WINNIPEG NORTH CENTRE): Let us begin today.

The person who made that excellent pronouncement is today the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson). I think that is a much better guideline for this whole business than those tabled this afternoon by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen).

• (1710)

I also have in my hand a copy of a paper entitled "How Much Administrative Secrecy?", written by Donald C. Rowat of Carleton University and which appeared in the Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science in November, 1965. This is a very useful paper, in my view, and it deals with the question of how the tendency seems to have grown up that the first thing to do with government papers is to say that they are secret and can only be released under the most extreme circumstances.

The writer of this paper is attracted by the provision in Sweden that actually goes the other way around. Let me quote a paragraph from it:

> This provision is so unusual, perhaps unique in the world, that one immediately thinks of the many circumstances under which secrecy is desirable. How can such a provision work successfully in practice? Are there not serious limitations upon its application? The answer is that of course there are limitations, and these are provided for in the constitution itself. But the important point is that the principle has been reversed: whereas in most countries all documents are secret unless a specific authority is given for their release, in Sweden they are all public unless legal provision has been made for them to be withheld.

This paper goes on to say that the actual wording of that provision is in the constitution, and it is given here in the paper itself.

I do not want to take the time of the House unduly because I should like to hear what the minister has to say, but it seems to me, in the quiet of this private members' hour, that we are discussing something that is very important. I think it is important that the Bryden report be tabled. I think it is also important that we establish the principle that government documents should be open unless there is good reason for their being kept secret—in other words, that we should get away from the present practice which is the very reverse of this.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I present this motion in the hope that either before six o'clock this evening or at the next hour that is appointed for this category of motions the House will have a chance to vote on this motion, and in so doing to vote in a way that expresses an opinion on the guidelines tabled today by the President of the Privy Council.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comments made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I have been concerned, as have other hon. members, about the increasing use of notices of motions for the production of papers. A very large number of motions have been put down, and in recent years the number has been growing. I have examined the responses of the government to these motions which generally have been quite good. Motions have been turned down because in some cases the papers that were requested did not exist, or there were other good reasons for turning the motions down. However, I felt, and certainly the government felt, that it would be in the interests of the House of Commons to make public the guidelines that we have now circulated to government departments, with the view that a uniform practice with respect to the production of information in the House of Commons will be developed.

I do not believe that up to the present time there has been put before the House in any form the guidelines that the government will use and which hon. members can examine as they frame their notices of motions for the production of papers. My approach and the approach of the government is exactly the approach of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. Our objective is to make as much information available as possible. We believe that Members of Parliament require factual information about the operations of the government in order that they may carry out their parliamentary duties. That statement is included in the general principle. We are also aware that the desire to make available as much information as possible must be balanced against effective public administration, protection of the security of the state and rights to privacy. It is always a delicate matter of judgment to balance the desire to make information available with the effective administration of the government, security of the state and other considerations.

So on the first point, Mr. Speaker, there is no disagreement between the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and myself. I endorse fully the statement that was quoted, made at an earlier time by the present Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson). What we have attempted to do here is to declare a general principle and then to say that there are exceptions to that general principle. While the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre expressed his displeasure with the guidelines, he did not focus on any particular one of them, nor did he give any reason why any of these guidelines should not be invoked. I hope it will be possible to make these guidelines an appendix to Hansard, so hon. members will have them available and this debate can be related to the guidelines that have been laid on the table today. I want to make a number of points with respect to these guidelines. First of all, eight of them are soundly grounded on recognized parliamentary authorities. For example, No. 1 is "Legal opinions or advice provided for the use of the government". There is ample authority to support that, and likewise guidelines Nos. 2, 7, 10, 13, 14, 15, and 16. We have not acted capriciously; we have attempted to base our conclusions upon recognized practice, and we have succeeded on relying on parliamentary authorities, both in Canada and in the United Kingdom, in establishing these guidelines.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre referred to practices in Sweden. It is sometimes believed that Sweden has a totally open system of provision of information to the public, but the fact of the matter is that Sweden has a very wide-ranging system of exemptions regarding disclosure of public information. For example, seven of these guidelines that have been laid on the table today are in conformity with modern practices in Sweden. For example, No. 2, papers, the release of which would be detrimental to the security of the state; No. 3, papers dealing with international relations; No. 5, papers containing information, the release of which could allow or result in direct personal financial gain or loss by a person or group of persons; No. 6, papers reflecting on the personal competence or character of an individual; No. 10, papers relating to negotiations leading up to a contract, before the contract has been executed or the negotiations have been concluded; No. 11, papers that are excluded from disclosure by statute and No. 13, any proceedings before a court of justice or a judicial inquiry of any sort.

These guidelines and these exemptions are followed in Sweden which is put forward as having the recognized model, at least by some people, of the open information system. I believe when you examine the Swedish system you will find it has wide ranging grounds and reasons for refusing information, and in those areas where information is available what happens is that instead of putting this material on the record there is a much greater use of full discussion in private meetings so the information will not get on the record and, therefore, it is by that fact excluded from public disclosure. Whether we want that kind of a system in Canada is quite questionable in my judgment.

We have examined also the practice in the United States and found that nine of the guidelines which have been proposed here are in accordance with United States practice. I may refer to them just by number so that hon. members can have them available. They are Nos. 2, 3, 5, 6, 10, 11, 13, 15 and 16. The purpose of that particular line of argument is to establish that the government has not acted capriciously, but has made extensive research into practices in other countries and into other parliamentary authorities in order to bring forward a system that might be generally acceptable.

I suggest to hon. members that if they object to these guidelines they ought to object to particular items. Do they, for example, believe that legal opinions or advice provided for the use of the government should be made public? If that is their position, and we could go down through each of these guidelines, then it seems to me the opposition should take the responsibility for telling the government and the country that it believes papers reflecting on personal competence or the character of individuals in government should be made public, and that they believe government documents which include Privy Council confidences—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): How does that become involved?

Mr. MacEachen: This is a series of guidelines that have been adopted as a basis for public disclosure and use—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is a Cabinet document.

Mr. MacEachen: No, it is a Cabinet directive in respect of the approach the government will use in dealing with this important question of freedom of papers. I do not regard it as a Cabinet document at all.

Mr. Howard: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. MacEachen: I will at the end of my statement.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre referred to an article by Dr. Rowat of Carleton University. This is an interesting article which promoted the response from Professor Knight of the University of Queensland in 1966. In that interesting article there is strong defence for not disclosing internal departmental memoranda. That is one of the main areas of interest in notices of motions asking departments to produce internal memoranda.

I refer hon. members to that article and, if I may quote one or two paragraphs of some interest to this particular discussion, I will do so. I refer to the suggestion that internal departmental memoranda ought to be made public. Professor Knight said:

> The civil servant may feel, too, that he must avoid placing on record anything which is likely to offend or cut across the interests of any individual or group in the community. This could affect not only the generalist administrator having a policy advisory role, but also the large body of officials whose work is concerned essentially with matters of a technical or professional nature. An officer who prepared a report on, say, the relative merits of butter and margarine, might well find himself the centre of a political controversy long before any decision about subsidies or production restrictions had been reached at the political level. Even if he wished to defend himself and had the ability as a controversialist to do so, the means open to him to do so would hardly be adequate.
> In my view it is both unwise and unfair to expect civil servants to engage in public controversy; but under conditions of open access they may be forced to do so, especially since not all ministers accept the obligation to assume sole public responsibility for departmental policies and to defend permanent officials who cannot defend themselves.

Public Service

> Whenever a minister did not accept the advice of his departmental officials this would be known and it would be possible for political capital to be made of it. In these circumstances ministers would surely be tempted to fill senior posts with their political sympathizers or with officials prepared always to be acquiescent. The career civil servant would thus be jeopardized and there would be a stifling of frank criticism within departments.
> If officials know that what they write is to become available to the public immediately or in the near future, many will be inclined to produce public records with an eye to history. That is to say, they are likely to put into their documents only what they believe will reflect creditably on them personally or upon the administration with which they are associated.

It stands to reason that if an individual or a particular departmental official, assistant deputy minister or deputy minister was to provide confidential advice for the use of the government, then he would present that advice in a much more frank and open way than he would if he knew the advice was to be made public. That principle was stated many years ago, even though it was restated in 1966 by Professor Knight. It was stated many years ago by Disraeli who said:

> The system of laying upon the table of the House reports from officers addressed to particular departments of the executive government is most objectionable. And the House ought not to insist upon the production of papers and correspondence which concerned the preparation and preliminary consideration of measures; they would thereby put a stop to that freedom of criticism which was always invited on such occasions, and which contributed so much to the perfection of public measures." If the House were to insist upon the production of such documents, "instead of the government getting what we get now, confidential reports, containing the most minute details of the opinions of officers, given frankly and freely, for the heads of departments, we shall have a system of reports framed for laying upon the table of the House of Commons, and those will be accompanied by 'confidential reports for the head of the department alone'." There have been cases in which reports of a confidential character from officers of the government have been laid upon the table of the House, to prepare the public mind and also that of Parliament, to consent to some large measure, or perhaps some considerable vote of public money; but, generally, I think it is a course which the House ought not to sanction".

• (1730)

Perhaps the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) would say that that is 100 years old, but it was restated recently by Professor Knight.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): How old is he?

Mr. MacEachen: Recently we had the Royal Commission on Security. I refer hon. members to paragraph 223 of its report, which reads:

> We believe the process of policy-making implies a need for wide-ranging and tentative consideration of options, many of which it would be silly or undesirable to expose to the public gaze.

I could cite other examples, but that is the case for refusing to make public internal departmental documents. Any man who is writing for the public at large, who is writing for history, who is writing to have his views aired in public, is bound to couch this words in a different manner than if they are to be confidential and detailed. I doubt whether anybody can successfully contest that conclusion.

The argument for maintaining, so to speak, the protection of internal departmental memoranda has been stated and restated by this government and its predecessor. I believe it is a sound principle because it contributes to effective public administration. I believe that hon. members who take another view are entitled to do so, and certainly their views would be considered by the government. But I know that the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) put a private member's bill on the order paper during the last parliament and he, too, laid out a fairly complete list of exemptions, matters that in his view should not be made public. Hon. members can compare this list of exemptions with those contained in the guidelines and they will find considerable similarity in substance between the approach we have taken and the approach in the private member's bill of the hon. member for Peace River.

The hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Mather) has introduced for several years a private member's bill and he, too, has laid down certain exemptions, certain areas of information which in his view should not be made public. So it seems to me there certainly is general agreement that certain documents cannot be made public. Certainly there is no quarrel about refusing to release papers which would, if released, be detrimental to the security of the state.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Who decides that?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. I regret to inform the minister that his time has expired. Is it agreed that the minister should continue?

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Within reasonable limits.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I think it would be quite agreeable for the minister to proceed by unanimous consent. Of course, there are only 25 minutes left in private members' hour. I wonder whether as a companion to such unanimous consent we could agree to leave this item at the top of the order paper so that we could debate it further next time it comes up.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): We would be agreeable to giving the minister a reasonable extension of time as well as to leaving this bill on top of the list so that we could complete it, if not in this session, in the next.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): I have two points of order before me. First, I must obtain the unanimous consent of the House to allow the minister to continue his exposé; second, I need the unanimous consent of the House to give priority to this bill. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): But shall the minister continue his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the indulgence of the House in giving me a few additional minutes. This is a very extensive subject and I have not done justice to it. There is a great deal of information in connection with the studies made on this subject which I can possibly make available to the House.

What we have done in the interest of making available more information, not less, and to produce it more expeditiously and uniformly, is to present these guidelines. We expect hon. members to read them and to consider them individually. If good arguments can be brought forward why any particular guideline should not be in effect, then we would certainly consider the views of hon. members because I believe it is important to have some public paper that tells us why a particular minister rises and says, "I refuse to produce a document". We can do that now and hon. members will know the grounds.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the minister permit a question? Will he tell us the value of these guidelines, particularly the one that says a cabinet document is not to be tabled, when it is left to the minister to say that one document is a cabinet document and another is not? How do we know where we stand?

Mr. MacEachen: Every announcement made by a minister in the House on orders of the day, for example, or a statement on motions, issues from a cabinet decision and a cabinet document. There is no question that many of them do. But when a minister tables a statement or makes a statement, he is not producing a cabinet document. As the hon. member knows, when cabinet documents are presented by ministers to the cabinet, some of the proposals may be accepted, some rejected or the whole thing may be rejected.

What kind of a system would we have if cabinet documents were made public and a particular minister would have the world know that he was unsuccessful, for example, in having his policies accepted by his colleagues? In my opinion it would lead to the breakdown of our cabinet system. Who decides what is a cabinet document? It is not a difficult question, because cabinet documents are visible; we all know what cabinet documents are when we see them.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Who decided that this one was not?

Mr. MacEachen: As I have said, this is a statement of policy adopted by the government, and of course it issued from cabinet and cabinet committee discussions. But all the documents that were prepared and considered have not been produced. I do not think that, as such, this is really a statement of policy by the government. If the hon. member saw the original documents, he would see them in a somewhat different form. I presume that a government could decide to make public a cabinet document if it wished, but what we are doing here is trying to establish guidelines that are generally acceptable and are sound.

• (1740)

Then it comes to the question of administering the guidelines. Are they properly administered? There can be difference of opinion on that score. For example, what are "papers relating to negotiations leading up to a contract until the contract has been executed or the negotiations have been concluded?" One must presume that the minister or the government is playing fair with the House if he or it makes a refusal on the basis of guideline No. 10. One must assume that the truth is being told. If the government was not telling the truth, it would ultimately be found out. Whether it is the present government or any other government, in all these cases it would be found out.

The question really is: are these guidelines sound in principle? If we accept that they are sound in principle, the next question is: are they being administered properly? In the last few months I have taken considerable interest in this particular question because I wanted to make sure that when papers were refused they were refused on grounds that were solid in principle and that the principle was being properly applied. I have gone to various departments and ministers on occasion and asked, "Are you sure?" I think that is about the best we can do. I do not know of any other alternative.

I do not want to speak any longer, Mr. Speaker, except to suggest to hon. members that it would be useful to look at these guidelines, to consider them, to make argument about them and to determine whether they are sound in principle. If they are sound in principle, then we should attempt to administer them properly. If they are unsound in principle, then we should change them. That is why we have taken the effort to produce the guidelines and to make them available to the House. I hope this will result in a uniform practice and that hon. members will get more information rather than less. The purpose is to establish in general the principle that we give as much information as possible, with these exceptions. If this is sound in principle, it should be adhered to; if unsound, it should be abandoned. That is the gist of my argument.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. Before I recognize the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) I would remind hon. members that during his speech the minister suggested that a document tabled today should be printed as an appendix to Hansard. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): It is so ordered.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk)—Canadian Culture—Multiculturalism—Maintenance of rights of cultural groups following takeover of radio station CKSB by Canadian Broadcasting Corporation; the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens)—Export Development Corporation—Possible exceeding of ceiling on loans—Request for audit.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

PUBLIC SERVICE

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF BRYDEN REPORT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre):

That an order of the House do issue for a copy of the so-called Bryden report concerning the revision of the Public Service Staff Relations Act, which was submitted to the then minister of manpower and immigration in June, 1971.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, first let me say that I think the House is very grateful to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) for taking the initiative in producing these regulations or criteria with respect to the production of papers.

Ever since I have been a member of this House it has been a continuous frustration to me that it has never been quite possible to know the guidelines by which notices of motions for the production of papers were either accepted or rejected, and which qualifications on occasion were enforced. Due to the shortness of notice I have not had time to examine the record on this, but I do not think it would take much effort by any hon. member to go back over the record of the past few years, look at the reasons given for tabling and for not tabling documents and to realize the sheer inconsistency with which the guidelines were enforced. I can remember one or two instances with respect to papers that where the same documents involved two departments, a motion for their release would be accepted by one department and refused by the other. One department would say that on basis of the beliefs of its officials it was not in the interest of the department to have the papers put on the record, and the other would say that according to its officials it did not see anything to prevent publication of the documents.

The hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) has said the problem that arises far too often is not really the basic question concerning security of the state, but the basic question concerning security of the government, of individual members of it, of government departments or of departmental officials. As I say, I commend the minister for bringing this matter forward but I am a little amazed that he has gone only this far.

He has asked for comment. Considering the brief time we have had to look at this document, we can make only initial comments. If he is sincere in this matter, and I hope he is, it should not be left just for a few minutes' debate in this hour or in any subsequent private members' hour. It deserves exhaustive examination, and the place for that examination would be the appropriate committee of the House. I can think of few more important tasks that committees could undertake in this parliament than to examine the detailed nature of this document and to consider the qualifications necessary for the release of information in a public way. Following that, the document should be returned to this House, either in its present form or amended, for final approval.

In this way we would at least be dealing with criteria established as acceptable to hon. members of this House, and not with criteria put forward by the present government just for this period of time, to be altered without anyone's particular knowledge at a subsequent date. We have no knowledge of how long these particular criteria have been in effect. Presumably, this document is a compilation of previous regulations that have existed and it is the latest document of that type.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to interrupt the hon. member, but these criteria were formally approved and put into effect, I believe, in the month of February. We are trying to work our way forward from there, within these limits.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, let me again commend the minister for at least getting to this stage with this volume of criteria. As I say, the House appreciates receiving them, but this is just a first step. It is not really enough to say that these are adequate just because in other domains similar criteria are exercised with some merit.

The minister, perhaps inadvertently, gave the essential criteria that have existed for many years in terms of the tabling of papers under notices of motions for the production of papers when he said—I think I quote him correctly—that papers, in the final analysis, are not tabled either because the papers do not exist or for other good reasons. He has given us some reasons that now have been approved by cabinet and I am somewhat wondering, with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), just what papers could be tabled as a result of these criteria. As I have said, the President of the Privy Council has asked for comment. I do not want to speak at length because I do not think it would be appropriate at this time to comment on this document in detail. But let us look at the second guideline which refers to "papers, the release of which would be detrimental to the security of the state." That is an inadequate definition in terms of what might be described as security of the state. Volumes have been written on what is in fact detrimental or otherwise to the security of the state.

Guideline No. 3 suggests that "papers dealing with international relations, the release of which might be detrimental to the future conduct of Canada's foreign relations" should not be made public. I ask, detrimental according to whom? Obviously, this implies a very subjective judgment. One only has to realize the complexity and difficulty in achieving consensus on a whole variety of issues relating to foreign relations to realize that this is an impossible criterion. What the minister is really saying is that the government is free to pick and choose those documents that it feels would be harmless and not detrimental to its own security.

The same thing applies to guideline No. 4 dealing with "papers, the release of which might be detrimental to the future conduct of federal-provincial relations or the relations of provinces inter se." Again I ask, detrimental according to whom? The whole nature of federal-provincial relations has been, for over 100 years, and will continue to be as long as this country exists, a very complicated, argumentative, disputative area of governmental activity and of political activity. Again, who will make the decision as to whether papers would have a detrimental effect on the future conduct of federal-provincial relations?

• (1750)

Consider guideline No. 7 which reads:

> Papers of a voluminous character or which would require an inordinate cost or length of time to prepare.

Again, there is latitude there for a variety of positions to be taken as to length of time for preparation. Guideline No. 10 reads:

> Papers relating to negotiations leading up to a contract until the contract has been executed or the negotiations have been concluded.

My goodness! The degree to which government departments are involved in continued rounds of negotiations is well known. Negotiations and contracts are not defined and the percentage of documents or of material that might be excluded from public scrutiny under this guideline is mind-boggling. Then we have guideline No. 14:

> Papers that are private or confidential and not of a public or official character.

Again, we need a great deal more elaboration as to what constitutes private and confidential documents and not documents of a public or official character. Guideline No. 15 is a real whopper. If anyone has any doubt about a document being private or public, this guideline in effect provides carte blanche. It is an invitation for the government to make its own decision on each and every issue which arises, without regard to any criterion which could be enforced. It merely reads:

> Internal departmental memoranda.

I submit that guideline covers a multitude of material much of which it might be in the public interest to make public. Of course, any documents that are missed under other guidelines might come under No. 16, which reads:

> Papers requested, submitted or received in confidence by the government from sources outside the government.

Presumably, the person who drew up that guideline knew something about guideline No. 10 which talks about papers relating to negotiations leading up to contracts, and so on; in fact, covering all options. If the President of the Privy Council will examine these guidelines and relate them to requests for the examination of documents, I think he will find that they are unsatisfactory. It may be that he is justifying the present criteria on the basis of what some political scientists have said in recent years or what Disraeli said 100 years ago. Although I welcome the minister's adherence to the doctrines of Disraeli, I think it ought to be realized that government responsibilities are much greater now than they were in Disraeli's time. Even in the British House, responsibilities are different in the 1970s than they were 100 years ago. I was intrigued, when talking to British parliamentarians on this subject, to have my own experiences of the last few years confirmed. Indeed, when they want information or a variety of documents dealing with matters which transcend national activities or interests, my British colleagues have to rely on an outside source, the United States Senate.

The guidelines the minister has adopted are similar to those used in Westminster. When information is not available in the British parliament, the members there may more readily obtain it from United States congressional documents which often deal with questions similar to those asked in Great Britain. I know, from reading a document as recently as this morning on the matter of defence industries, about which there has been considerable interest in recent years, that information has been made available to political scientists and others, not from their own government but from another agency, in this case the government of the United States and its agencies.

Although what the minister put forward today is useful, he missed the essential point, that put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in the latter part of his remarks. The burden of proof for not producing documents surely should be on the government. Instead of issuing these 16 qualifications or exemptions, the procedure should have been reversed. There ought to be a clear statement on when it is in the public interest to put documents on record if and when the production of papers is called for.

It has been apparent to me from the very beginning that when papers have been requested the government has avoided making clear its reasons for refusing certain documents; these reasons have never been fully explained. I think the entire reason for this debate on the production of papers is that no criteria have been agreed upon in this field, not only by members of the House but by the general public to whom we are essentially responsible.

Two things need to be done. I have already suggested the first, which is fundamental: criteria must be established. We need to establish such criteria. That matter will involve the consideration of a committee of this House. Second, there needs to be a continuing review procedure. It is not good enough, as happens now, for the parliamentary secretary to say that such and such a document is not available for this or that reason. There needs to be an effective review or appeal procedure which hon. members might use. The debates which take place to not indicate whether in the final analysis it is in the public interest to disclose documents. Therefore, I feel we need to establish such criteria.

In addition, we need to establish a review procedure. That ought to function on a continuing basis. When any conflict arises, the public ought to know clearly the grounds for refusal. The public ought to know that the refusal is not based on some subjective whim or criterion which can be used, as at present, to cover a whole multitude of sins but, rather, on certain rights. It should be known that the government was well within its rights in refusing to produce certain documents. At present there is not an appeal procedure.

In the words of former Prime Minister Lester B. Pearson, it is not only important for governments to do right; they must appear to do right. That is not the case with respect to the tabling of government documents. I suggest that the motion before the House be amended in order to facilitate the procedures I have suggested. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand (Mr. Knowles):

That the subject matter presently before the House be referred to the Standing Committee on Privelege and Elections and, in particular, the guidelines for the production of papers tabled by the President of the Privy Council, these guidelines to be examined, with a view to accepting, rejecting or amending the same.

Mr. MacEachen: Why not send it to the statutory instruments committee?

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I am flexible; I do not mind which committee considers it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. The hon. member has raised something new in procedure. I do not think what the hon. member proposed ought to be considered as an amendment. It may be a request of some kind. Does the House unanimously agree to accept it?

An hon. Member: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Before presenting this matter to the House I must ask if there is unanimous consent.

An hon. Member: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. We are now in a somewhat unusual situation. We are dealing specifically with a motion for the production of papers moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and we are, in effect, dealing with the broad question of the criteria to be applied to the tabling of papers. Therefore, may I suggest, as I have moved an amendment asking for the subject matter of our discussion to be referred to a committee, that perhaps the committee on privileges and elections is not suitable: the committee on statutory instruments, or the committee on procedure and organization might be more appropriate. I would certainly be agreeable to any such suggestion. I think the intent of my amendment is clear. The exhaustive work necessary for producing a document or guidelines with which we can live can more properly be undertaken in a standing committee of this House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wonder, despite the negative response we had 20 minutes ago, whether we could not agree to let this item stand at the top of the list of this category of items on the order paper, on the understanding that between now and the next time it comes forward we will, through the usual channels, find a device for referring the subject of the tabling of documents to an appropriate committee. In other words, I am not trying to put the government on the spot but, rather, trying to find a way in which we can get the subject of the tabling of documents referred to a committee. All I am asking now is that it stay at the top of the list on that understanding.

• (1800)

Mr. MacEachen: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think we have already expressed the view that it would be useful to have an examination in a committee. I would be happy to discuss, through the usual channels, how and when that can be done. I would agree to having this motion stay at the top of the list on the understanding that it would provide for additional time to debate, but not necessarily a vote.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the point of order with one final point. I purposely drafted this motion so as not to embarrass the government with respect to the question of a vote either on this motion for the production of papers or on the approval or disapproval of the guidelines put forward. I merely wanted to give the House a further opportunity to do its work well on this matter. I am hopeful that we can accept this motion or one similar, because I think that is the intent of all hon. members.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members business having expired, I do now leave the chair.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, a request has been made for unanimous consent to do a certain thing. Your Honour has not put that proposition to the House. I would appreciate it if you would do that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): I must say that the Chair already put the question once and I heard a "no". It is now after six o'clock. I do not know if the Chair would even be in order to now ask for unanimous consent, because it is well past six o'clock.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, this is a different proposition. This is leaving it at the top of the list so that there can simply be negotiations, not a way of dealing with the Bryden report. It is finding a way to deal in committee with the subject matter of the tabling of documents. I think the government might be willing to do that.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): I see no objection to asking the House again for unanimous consent to give motion No. 86 the priority and have it rank first on the list of notices of motions for papers.

[English]

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to be difficult about this. I am ready to accept the notion of a discussion in the usual channels and have a further period for debate on this subject. However, if this motion stays at the top of the list I would like to hold in abeyance the question of coming to a decision on it. I agree, with that qualification.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): The minister is asking that it be under that condition, if it is agreed. The Chair has only to ask whether there is unanimous consent. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. MacEachen.]

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): The hour allotted for the consideration of private member's business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

PROVISIONS RESPECTING NEIGHBOURHOOD IMPROVEMENT, REHABILITATION, OWNERSHIP, NEW COMMUNITIES, ETC.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Basford that Bill C-133, to amend the National Housing Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, before the House turned to private members' business I was moving the second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Health and Welfare of Bill C-133, the government's proposed amendments to the National Housing Act. I had placed those proposals in the context of our national housing policy, our national housing strategy, and I had dealt with certain features of the legislation, namely, the new communities program, the land assembly provisions and the proposals for assisted home ownership which offer low income people a means of purchasing houses for themselves and their families rather than living as tenants in low-income housing developments.

I am not sure whether I gave an example of the way in which this would work. But as a result of federal assistance, the payments for principal, interest and taxes would be reduced to 22 per cent of the family's gross income. For example, a family four, including two children, with an income of $7,500 could receive help to purchase a modest home at a purchase price, shall we say, of $19,000. With the help available under this program, their monthly payments would be reduced to $137, compared with the $170 or more they would need to pay if they were buying their house on the open market without federal assistance.

As many hon. members are aware, most of the provinces now provide some form of assistance toward home ownership, either by way of down payment assistance, interest assistance or assistance by way of a monthly subsidy to people with low incomes who are purchasing their own homes. Federal assistance and the grants we propose making are not dependent upon the provincial programs to which I have made reference and there is no requirement that our programs be matched. The programs will, of course, work together to benefit those who are entitled to assistance under the provincial programs as well as under the federal program. To use the words of the pension people, they will be "stacked on" to it. The two programs can mesh together in this way.

I turn now to the provisions of Bill C-133 relating to non-profit housing assistance. I think you and all hon. member will agree, Mr. Speaker, that one important agency providing low-rental housing to people has been the hundreds of non-profit housing associations formed throughout the country of volunteers who in either service clubs, church groups, union groups or veterans groups have been providing housing to low income people, particularly to senior citizens. The work done in this area has made a very valuable contribution to providing housing for those who need it. The bill now before us takes assistance to those non-profit housing associations one step further than at present.

These non-profit organizations have over the years been encouraged and assisted by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation as part of the senior citizens' housing policy. I say this program is important because I am aware, as I am sure all hon. members are, of the very great debt this country owes to our senior citizens in all parts of the country who have worked so hard to build Canada and who are now, in their retirement years, entitled to decent housing within their income means. In so far as the non-profit housing program eases the burden on those who have grown old, it is an important repayment of the debt which the country has acknowledged it owes to them and which we, in this legislation, also acknowledge.

I think we have acknowledged this need to assist senior citizens in many ways, not only by what we are now proposing to do by way of assistance to the non-profit housing groups to provide senior citizens, housing, but also in the other measures which were proposed in the Speech from the Throne which opened this session, as well as in the budget speech, relating to increases in senior citizens pensions, increases in the guaranteed income supplement and increases in tax exemptions which my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), has talked about.

In our desire to provide low-cost housing to senior citizens, over the past five years more than 37,000 units of housing have been built under the National Housing Act for elderly people, more than two and a half times the number of such units built in the previous 20 years. I want to put that fact on the record. I repeat that during the last five years of the life of this government more senior citizens' housing has been built under the National Housing Act than in the previous 20 years.

The present bill, Bill C-133, makes it clear that the policy of the federal government is to assist and encourage this work to the greatest possible extent. We propose in the bill to make available to these non-profit organizations, low-cost loans to the full value of the housing they propose to build or acquire and, in addition, to make them a contribution of 10 per cent of the capital cost of the project. That is to say, if a church or ethnic group or union wishes to build a senior citizens' housing development or low-cost housing development, apart from any provincial assistance that is available we will provide a mortgage at a beneficial interest rate for the full cost; and if the organization concerned needs a grant of 10 per cent to get them going, we will provide that.

Furthermore, as many members who have become involved in this program are aware, many of these organizations need money just to get started. They require funds to develop their plans to the point where they can apply for a loan, for getting architects working on the project, worrying about where and how to acquire property, how to develop a strategy for the project, and so on. In such situations we are proposing by this amendment to give up to $10,000 in what are called "start up funds" for this purpose.

In addition, these non-profit housing groups can receive the loans and grants available under the residential rehabilitation program contained in Bill C-133 and which I shall mention in a moment. That is to say, rather than a non-profit group building a new senior citizens' housing project or a new low-rental housing project, a non-profit group can acquire older houses or older multiple unit buildings and repair them, get the repair grants that are provided under the legislation and in this way provide low-cost housing. I am going to maintain an active program of encouragement in this regard. There have been some small developments of this kind in Winnipeg, Edmonton and a few other cities, but this must be encouraged to every extent possible.

I am persuaded that giving money by way of mortgages, grants or loans to non-profit groups is not, however, the whole answer. I am very much aware of the tremendous amount of work, effort and worry that is involved for the volunteer workers in these organizations in planning and organizing low-rental housing projects, making them reality and managing them thereafter. I fully appreciate the magnitude of their contribution and I assure these groups that the skills and resources that they need will be made available within the capability of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The reorganization of CMHC which is now under way will make it much more able to respond to local needs of this kind by setting up a special group to assist them.

I should like to make one further proposal which I shall implement when the legislation is passed. There is within these public service organizations a great wealth of expertise and experience which has been dearly bought over the years in making these housing projects a reality and, among the membership, a great willingness to be helpful and to share their experience with others. I hope that when the legislation is passed and we are ready to get this program going, when the budget and the legislation have been set, we will be able to convene a national meeting of all volunteer groups involved in non-profit housing activity in order to intensify the efforts that these groups are making in providing housing, particularly, as I say, for senior citizens' groups. I think there is a need for pooling the experience and knowledge which they possess so that full advantage can be taken of these new provisions which I hope parliament will pass as expeditiously as it can.

Also related to the provisions concerning the non-profit housing association groups are the amendments relating to co-operative housing in this country. I mention that they are related because I look to the co-operative movement and to co-operative housing developments to involve themselves with the provision of housing for those of low and moderate income. Members from western Canada, where I come from, and from the Atlantic provinces who are represented in this House will be particularly aware of the part that co-operative organizations have played in the past in improving the economic condition of families both in the west and in the Atlantic provinces. In fact, in many areas of Canada co-operatives have been not just an economic instrument but part of the whole social and cultural development of the community. This is particularly true if one remembers what has come out of St. Francis Xavier University and from people who have worked there for many years. Housing co-operatives of one kind or another have a long, creditable and proud history in Canada, but for a number of reasons they have never realized, in my view, their full potential as a means of providing housing for people of low incomes.

I have sensed among co-operatives in Canada in recent years a growing awareness of the possibilities of this method of creating and owning housing, especially for the needs of people of low and moderate incomes. I feel that these organizations, which are capable of meeting the needs of many special groups of people, deserve all the encouragement that we can give them in this legislation, and the legislation is couched so as to give them that encouragement.

While assistance to co-operatives has been available in the past from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, they have not benefited from a single and concise section in the National Housing Act outlining the programs available to them. I now propose that a separate section of the act be created—as it is created by Bill C-133—in order to encourage to the maximum possible extent development of co-operative housing, to use their own words, as "a third force in the housing market". Under this section co-operatives, depending on their type of operation, will benefit from the provisions of the assisted home ownership program or the non-profit housing assistance program.

I might mention in passing that I have had an opportunity to discuss these proposals contained in Bill C-133 with representatives of co-operative organizations. As I think some hon. members are aware, they have expressed some concern about provisions regarding non-profit housing. They were concerned that references to corporations constituted—and I quote the bill—"exclusively for charitable purposes" might exclude co-operatives from assistance under this section. As a result, I will be proposing changes when the bill reaches committee stage so as to make it perfectly clear that bona fide non-profit co-operatives will in fact be eligible as charitable organizations, so they can take full advantage of these provisions.

While I am on the subject of co-operatives, I should also like to mention credit unions. In my view, they are playing an increasingly important part in the financing of housing and, as rapidly as they are able to qualify themselves—

Mr. Blenkarn: Why don't you join them, Ron?

[Mr. Basford.]

Mr. Basford: I can understand my hon. friend from Peel South (Mr. Blenkarn), being a land developer himself, not being much in favour of the co-operative movement. I take some credit for the passage of the first national co-operatives act this country had had for 97 years. It didn't take me that long; it took me only two years. I find some support in the fact that it only took me two years, and I take a great deal of hope from the fact that co-operatives and credit unions are playing an increasingly important part in the financing of housing in this country and should be used to the maximum extent possible to build houses for Canadians.

• (2020)

The credit union movement is amassing a great deal of savings through its members and is playing, as a result of these savings, an increasingly important part in financing of housing. As rapidly as they are able to qualify, we have been happy to designate them as approved lenders under the act and to extend to them benefits of the mortgage insurance fund. I strongly urge more credit unions, and particularly the central unions operating at the provincial level, to get on the bandwagon both in the interest of their membership and in the national interest to increase the flow of capital available for house building in Canada. If I may put in a plug here, the credit unions which may have some doubt as to how best to organize themselves should take advantage of the National Housing Act by getting involved in the provision of housing; they should go to my own city of Vancouver and talk to the central credit union which is one of the leaders in this regard.

My colleague, the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mrs. Sauvé), says that in her province of Quebec the caisses populaires are ackowledged as an important element in the collection of savings for the provision of housing. I am happy to tell my colleague that only yesterday we approved a central unit of the caisse populaire as an approved lender in that province.

I mentioned at the beginning of my speech that we were concerned not only with the building of houses and the provision of four walls; we were concerned, and must be concerned, with the nature of the communities we are building in this country. Therefore I turn now to the provisions of Bill C-133 which relate to the kind of neighbourhoods and communities we want in this country and how we as a parliament can assist in assuring that we have good neighbourhood and community planning.

I mention, first, the neighbourhood improvement program and the neighbourhood improvement provisions of Bill C-133. There are many neighbourhoods in Canada occupied by low and moderate income people where the housing is deteriorating, community facilities are lacking and the sense of community is in danger of being destroyed. The federal government believes that many of these neighbourhoods, with some financial help and some encouragement for the local residents, could be saved and could become healthy and satisfying places in which to live. At the same time, this program will have the effect of maintaining and improving existing housing—particularly for low-income people—improving the quality of the urban environment and relieving the growth pressure on the urban fringes.

Working with and through provincial governments, the federal government will provide grants and loans to improve and rebuild selected neighbourhoods, to assist in planning and acquisition of land and to create parks, recreational and community facilities such as day-care centres where they are needed. It is in the older neighbourhoods that these kind of community facilities are lacking to a very serious extent. The program will be subject to federal-provincial agreements which will spell out how the funds are to be paid out, how the residents of the neighbourhood will take part in the development and planning of the scheme and how new homes will be found for people who may be displaced because of activity arising from the program. This program is put forward in this bill as a replacement for the old urban renewal program under the National Housing Act which turned, in many cases, into a program under which bulldozers were brought in to bulldoze neighbourhoods and people out of the way. There are, surely, better ways of dealing with older areas in our cities and the neighbourhood improvement program is designed to meet that need.

Coupled with the neighbourhood improvement program is the residential rehabilitation program which is intended to be used in repairing and improving homes for people of low and moderate income. We are all aware of the unnecessary disruption and suffering that results when families are uprooted and forced to leave older homes in which they have lived for years, or perhaps generations, because these homes have deteriorated below the minimum standards of health and safety.

The moving of families and the destruction of older housing represents not only an emotional loss to the individuals involved but also an economic loss to society through the reduction of existing housing stock. I believe that considerable leverage can be gained, not to mention the avoidance of unnecessary dislocation, by allocating money to the repair of deteriorating houses and the upgrading of their plumbing, electrical and heating systems. Loans and grants are also available to landlords provided they enter an agreement to control their rents. Generally, this program will be used in conjunction with the new neighbourhood improvement program but it also can be used, as I have mentioned, for non-profit housing projects and co-operatives. Under special federal-provincial agreements it may apply outside neighbourhood improvement areas.

I mentioned that we were concerned with a program to improve the equity in our housing. The CMHC and the government of Canada over a period now close to 20 years has promoted research into housing and community planning. It has provided assistance to individuals and groups, fostered development and carried out some in-house research. There seems to be a need for the development of a program under the National Housing Act which will complement these purely research activities, motivated by active promotion and an improved program provided for under this amendment which will include experimental projects, administrative projects and pilot projects, all to improve the design of our housing and the quality of housing and neighbourhoods.

The proposed resolution, as hon. members will see upon reading it, will empower the CMHC to finance its own development activities and to enter jointly into such activities with others, as well as to accept risks associated with agreed innovative development projects undertaken by private and public groups. The corporation proposes to collaborate closely with industry and other levels of government in initiating and conducting experimental endeavours.

It is hoped that as soon as possible upon passage of the legislation, a structured series of experiments can be undertaken jointly with industry and other government agencies across the country. More specifically, because this is a new program several areas of activity are considered essential, in my view, within the scope of a development program. These would include physical projects to be initiated or undertaken either within or outside CMHC; technological developments by way of encouraging the development of new products, and efforts dedicated to improved productivity.

It is not only a physical type of thing that we need in developing new techniques. Money must be allocated and developmental projects must be initiated which concern themselves with the encouragement of the social and environmental aspects of housing by which to encourage the public to participate in the organization and the design of projects, in initiating demands upon the government and industry for new types of planning and new types of building.

To maintain and to improve the very high standard of housing in Canada there is a continuing need for a program of this type, a program of research and development. One unavoidable element of any experimental or innovative undertaking is the element of risk. Not everything you try is going to work. Experiments, no matter how well conceived and planned, which fall short of the mark, cost money and someone must be around to pick up the bills. While the private sector can be expected to shoulder a substantial part of the cost of research and development, in the public interest, should be prepared to underwrite its share of high risk innovative developments. The changes proposed through the present bill will encourage a systematic program of experimentation and will authorize Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to undertake developmental projects or share the risks of experiments undertaken by others.

There are two sections of the act with which I will deal in more detail in the committee. One relates to housing for Indians and is almost in the nature of a technical amendment. Its purpose is to assure that all the provisions of the National Housing Act are available to individuals or groups of individuals.

Mr. Speaker: I apologize to the minister, but the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Hollands) is seeking the floor to ask a question.

Mr. Hollands: Would the minister accept a question?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I will only be about five minutes more, I wonder if I may answer the question after completing my statement.

Mr. Speaker: The minister has the floor.

Mr. Basford: The purpose of the amendments relating to Indians is to ensure that all provisions of the NHA which give benefits to individuals or groups of individuals are available to native people whether they are living on or off a reserve; whether they are, to use the language of the Indian Act, status Indians or not. It is simply to make sure that whatever individuals receive by way of co-operative housing, low-rental housing or assisted home ownership programs, it can be obtained off the reserve as well as on the reserve.

The last feature of these amendments related to purchaser protection of homes. As hon. members know, for most families a home is the largest and most expensive single item that they will buy during the course of their working lives. Yet generally speaking home buyers do not enjoy the same kind of protection and warranties as do purchasers of less costly items such as cars or television sets. As I said in a speech a while ago, you buy a $5 or $10 steam iron and you get more warranties and guarantees than when you buy a house for the rest of your life.

You will realize, Mr. Speaker, that to me, a former minister of consumer and corporate affairs, this seems incongruous and it is a matter to which I am devoting my attention. I expect to be able to announce before many months a national system of warranties for house buyers. In the meantime, I propose amendments to the National Housing Act to deal with two aspects of this matter. Under the provisions, if accepted, if a builder goes bankrupt or becomes insolvent before completing a house which he has sold, the funds necessary for completion of the house will be advanced to the buyer through the mortgage insurance fund. The other provision is one to make sure that when the home protection development plan is announced we will have the authority of the NHA to ensure that it is implemented.

Mr. Baker: What was the name of that fund?

Mr. Basford: The mortgage insurance fund. The bill which we have before us and which I am moving for second reading is an indication of the concern which this government holds for the housing needs of all Canadians. I think the provisions which I have outlined demonstrate very clearly our particular concern for the needs of low income families and represent a substantial effort to solve many of the problems which these families face. They represent a substantial advance on the present provisions and programs under the NHA. As many groups have said, we can pass legislation but if there is no funding behind it the amendments will not be very useful.

With regard to funding, the point has been made that without the necessary resources the proposed legislation will not have the desired impact in solving Canada's housing and community problems. I would like to point out that during the past five years the federal government has been responsible for the provision of sufficient funds to construct more than 170,000 units of social housing—more than two and a half times as much as was produced in the previous 20 years.

We have allocated—I will obviously want to discuss this matter in the committee when we get there—for the first year of operation an amount which we think realistically can be spent under those provisions, considering that many of these programs will be in the start-up stage. If the provinces, municipalities and industry were able to use up the funds which I will be proposing for this fiscal year once the legislation is passed, further amounts could be transferred from other programs to meet the need. So far as I am concerned, the first job is to get the legislation passed and then to ensure that sufficient funds are available to carry out in an effective way the program which the legislation provides. I will be very happy when we reach the committee stage of this bill to discuss budget figures with members of the committee. I have tried, in accordance with the rules, to confine myself today to the principles of the bill but I will discuss in committee the budget matters.

As I mentioned at the outset of my remarks, this legislation is a key element in the government's over-all thrust to meet the legitimate expectations of all Canadians to be well housed in healthy and satisfying communities, whether they be in the country, villages, towns or the great metropolitan centres. This bill provides some of the legislative instruments to achieve this goal. They will be backed up by all the dollars that are needed to get the job done. I will close my remarks by repeating what hon. members have heard me say many times before, namely, that these measures deserve and require the support and participation of all governments in Canada and of people everywhere who have ideas, energy and enthusiasm to bring to the task of providing housing at reasonable cost to all Canadians.

In moving second reading, I hope we will have a constructive and useful debate on Bill C-133 and that it can be expeditiously moved to the committee where we can start to deal in detail with the provisions of the legislation, because CMHC, the government and those in the country who want to provide housing cannot deal with any of these proposals until they are passed by parliament and given royal assent.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Pembina may now ask his question, if the minister will accept it before he resumes his seat. The hon. member will be recognized for that purpose.

Mr. Hollands: Could the minister tell me why CMHC refuses to lend money to the many thousands of young families moving out of large cities onto acreages in the country?

• (2040)

Mr. Basford: I imagine the hon. member is referring to the fact that the acreages they want to move onto are not on sewer systems but have septic tanks. I think the hon. member is familiar with this policy which was initiated by a Conservative government the last time that party held office. In fact, it was one of the few things the Conservatives implemented that has worked well. However, as I announced in my speech and as I announced earlier, Mr. Speaker, we are reviewing the whole program of assistance to sewer systems and sewer works. Contained within that review would be the lending policy of CMHC so far as the present septic tank policy is concerned. There are cases, however, where we do lend money for the construction of septic tanks, and if the hon. member has particular cases in mind I would be happy to have the corporation review them.

Mr. Hollands: As a supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are not in committee and I am not sure how many questions we should have at this time. However, if the minister wishes to receive the question, the hon. member may be allowed to ask another question.

Mr. Hollands: Could the minister tell me where the legislation has been in effect under which CMHC has loaned money on acreages?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, CMHC has lent money on non-sewered lots, non-sewered houses in the country. It is not lending money in what are generally called rural subdivisions that are still on septic tanks.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the minister for an hour and 15 minutes paint such a beautiful picture of urban affairs and of the housing situation in Canada, I cannot help reminding him of a Latin expression, caveat emptor—let the buyer beware. In this case he was the salesman selling a package to the Canadian people, and the Canadian people should beware the package that was sold them. I am reminded that in one of the most famous stories by Dickens, "The Cricket on the Hearth", it was said that four walls and a ceiling never made a home. I suppose, Mr. Speaker, the most important thing today is to get four walls and a ceiling into such a position that the average Canadian can afford them.

The first problem, as I see Bill C-133 and the statement which the minister made on Monday, March 12, as recorded at page 2095 of Hansard, together with his contribution to the throne speech debate, is that all the changes made since the passage of the National Housing Act in the first instance have been made on an ad hoc basis. The minister admitted in his opening remarks that he had part of his plan in Bill C-133. He also had a plan when he spoke in the throne speech debate, and he had a plan last Monday as set out on page 2095 of Hansard. He is trying to remedy the housing situation and improve the quality of life for Canadians on an ad hoc basis.

When we come to grips with the general philosophy, the first questions we must ask ourselves is, what kind of housing policy do we really want in Canada? Where are we going with that policy? Will we get there on an ad hoc basis? What should be the objective of a housing program acceptable to our national urban development? In a nutshell, the objective of any national housing policy, within the terms of the constitution of Canada, should be an attempt of the government to plan, to adopt and to create a program whereby during their lifetime every Canadian family should be able to afford a house wherein they can gradually build up an equity, with an area of grass around the house and the kind of environment which provides a good quality of life, so that some day they can achieve either ownership or a substantial equity which would be an incentive to own a house. It may be that people will start out in apartments or town houses, as it were, and end up with such an equity ownership in a house, or vice versa.

Every Canadian is entitled to a home with a landscape. This should be the national thrust. This should be the national purpose of housing. This should be the urban jurisprudence of any housing project. I must say, as I read the bill, that on an ad hoc basis it falls far short of that kind of philosophy guaranteeing Canadians that during their lives they will have substantial equity in a home in which they can raise their families. I was hoping to hear that kind of philosophy from the minister.

Although the bill before the House has many good amendments to the National Housing Act and is great for propaganda purposes and for talking points, it falls short of achieving any real, long-term, long-time planned project for housing in order to improve the quality of life in our larger urban centres such as Montreal, Toronto, Vancouver, Calgary, Edmonton, Winnipeg and other cities. If we start now at this stage in our history, we can prevent the failures, the frustrations, the ghettos and the absolute poverty that have become part of the cities of the United States and of many European and Asian countries which I have seen, which you have seen, Mr. Speaker, and of which the members of this House are aware. Canada, a young country and a new country, full of resources, can do better.

Hence, first, the main objective is to put within the pocketbook of every Canadian the right to build up an equity in a house, where a family lives in a house with a little landscape, like a touch of wilderness, in peace, happiness and dignity, where the beauty of life is magnificent, rather than in an environment where the germs of crime breed on ignorance and illiteracy, without enlightenment to lead to the goal of a way of life to build a vigorous, strong and intelligent people and, therefore, a healthy nation.

A new national policy for housing cannot be brought about by a band-aid bill, and I call this a band-aid bill. The minister has admitted that it is a band-aid bill. He says, "Well, I have got some of my policy in this bill. I have some of my policy in the other bill. I have some of the policy that I set out in the Speech from the Throne debate, and some of my policy that I set out the other day on motions." It so happens, Mr. Speaker, that on that last day I was in Alberta at a political meeting, but when I read his announcement as reported at page 2095 of Hansard, I found it strange that the same kind of policy was announced in the province of Ontario. What he really did on that occasion was to promote a provincial program.

I say that this is a band-aid bill prepared on an ad hoc basis. The band-aid method will for a short time help to cure the wound; certainly it will help ease the housing crisis but in the final analysis the wound will become more infected for the crisis will remain within and will deepen until a sociological problem will develop, a revolutionary tendency will mature and violence and unrest will fester in our midst.

We will support this bill going to committee. But the facts of the bill must be laid naked in the hope that out of the committee's study there will be created, for the first time since World War II, a national housing development policy, an integral part of a national urban affairs policy which will solve the crisis, a crisis that I will deal with in a few moments, that of housing and all the problems facing people in urban centres.

• (2050)

What kind of crisis am I talking about, Mr. Speaker? It has become, and continues to be, the major tragedy everywhere. A new national development and urban affairs policy with emphasis on housing, rapid transportation and the quality of life is the only answer. I should like to read again from the Toronto Star which I quoted when I was questioning the minister in the House some time ago. To relieve the conscience of my friends across the way, I will also read from the Globe and Mail. As my friend says, it will even it up. The article in the Toronto Star reads in part:

Major social tragedy. Less than 4 per cent of Toronto wage earners can afford a new home says a study by the urban development institute——which calls the city's housing situation a major social tragedy.

Not any newspaper, not politicians, parliamentarians nor legislators, Mr. Speaker.

Listening to the Minister, I would not have thought him a lawyer from Vancouver but, rather, a house salesman trying to sell a few houses to a few Canadians. This is the whole tragedy, Mr. Speaker. Think of it—only 4 per cent of the wage earners of a major city like Toronto can afford a new house! That has been the policy—if it is a policy—of this decadent Trudeau government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: The article continues:

The study, released Wednesday, warns that "unless drastic action is taken immediately, this situation will become more desperate."

The institute's figures are based on a comparison of 1961 and 1971 incomes.

In 1961, a $5,284 annual wage was needed to buy a house, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation reported. In 1971, an income of $16,623 was needed to buy a house and only 4 per cent of the population could afford it.

Only that kind of income can afford a new house under the plan which the minister has outlined tonight. Then we find these words in the article:

The institute, which includes developers, builders and architects, blames a shortage of land for the skyrocketing prices.

"Lot prices around Toronto are now the highest on the continent," the report states.

Toronto is one of the fastest growing cities on the continent. The article goes on to say that average lot prices in Toronto are about $18,000 and the cheapest house today in the city of Toronto, one of the major centres of the country, is $35,000. That is under the housing plan outlined tonight on the ad hoc basis of the bill.

Mr. Caccia: Get your facts straight.

Mr. Woolliams: My friend says I should get the facts straight. I say to him, through you, Mr. Speaker, that he should write to the Urban Development Institute and not to me. This is a statement made by the institute. If my friend wants to listen, let him listen. If he does not, let him go back to his constituency and they will tell him about housing. The article goes on to say:

[Mr. Woolliams.]

To ease the situation, the study urged the provincial government to redirect funds for major sewer and water services.

The tragedy I am talking about is summed up in that manner. Time does not permit me to deal with the whole picture. The common ground for most of the grievances is contained in the report of the task force on housing, headed at one time by a minister of the Liberal government who now sits over here, the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer), except that the delay in the implementation of the recommendations contained in that report has deepened the crisis. They should be working for the good of all Canadians now, but instead the report has been gathering dust for the last three years.

Let us come to grips with the problem. Two problems must be solved immediately in the area of housing and urban affairs. The first problem is money and the second is the price of serviced land; to get enough money into projects and reduce the price of serviced land. Larger sums of money must be made available for an effective national housing policy to improve the standard of life and urban standards such as a rapid, non-polluting transit system, parks for leisure and rest, and sufficient and adequate playgrounds for our youth. These must be part of a national development program for urban affairs and for housing.

I suggest that the first problem is money, Mr. Speaker. If this government can afford, by its bumbling, a $2 billion program for unemployment insurance to assist the unemployed—it did not solve unemployment; the problem was aggravated by their policies—it must be prepared to share more money with the provinces and municipalities than $100 million for land bank costs. In a few moments I will read from the Globe and Mail to show that when the minister embraced his great land bank program under which he is pouring out $100 million a year, the immediate response from one large city was to apply for $93 million. Mr. Speaker, that would only leave $7 million for all the other cities in Canada. When dealing with land banks, the most important thing is to get serviced land ready for development, rather than raw land. The $100 million will not last long, considering the high cost of serviced land.

I have dealt with Toronto, but it doesn't matter which city you deal with: the minister's home city of Vancouver, the cities of Calgary, Edmonton or Winnipeg or Halifax—the facts are the same. Let us see how far this $100 million will go in the land bank. The Globe and Mail of January 29 wrote:

The province's land bank is the assembly it is now carrying out south of the proposed Pickering airport site. Coupled with the original federal government announcement of the airport were plans for provincial assembly of 25,000 acres. In December, Queen's Park applied to Ottawa for a CMHC loan of $93 million to cover 75 per cent of the estimated cost of the land assembly.

Toronto needs $93 million, and the minister says he has solved the problem of the nation. He says that by setting up $100 million for a land bank he has solved the problem. That is raw land, Mr. Speaker, not serviced land. If this amount were granted to Toronto it would leave only $7 million available to the other cities to solve their problems. We could afford $2 billion for unemployment insurance to help the unemployed. That unemployment was brought about by the policies of this government to cure inflation, and they still could not do it. Before the election the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was asked about this in Edmonton and he said if the Canadian people did not like it, they could lump it.

If we can afford that kind of luxury, $2 billion, surely the minister, with all his salesmanship and his public relations officers, could make a better deal than offering the Canadian people $100 million for a land bank to solve the problems of the cities. Toronto needs $93 million, and you have only to look at the map to see who owns the land around Toronto and what the situation is there. My friend says the Tories own it. One thing I would say, through you, Mr. Speaker—when it comes to getting into the hog trough, the Liberals have never been backward. A report in the Globe and Mail of January 9, 1973, reads:

• (2100)

Though news reports at the time made little of this announcement, $93 million is almost as much as the total amount the federal government has lent for public land assembly projects across Canada since the program was set up—

I received a letter the other day from a man who has knowledge of the housing situation. Speaking about Scarborough, he said that adjacent to Toronto vacant land sells for a price ranging from $40,000 per acre to $65,000 per acre. He mentioned parcels for a single family, detached dwelling units, services being available, although planning and interior services are not complete. When we talk about land, we mean land ready for development, that is, serviced land. It costs approximately $30,000 to service an acre of land today. If the land costs $65,000 and servicing it costs $30,000, the total cost is $95,000. If the regulations in the area concerned say that you may only subdivide at the rate of four lots per acre, the cheapest lot today, March 5, 1973, is $23,750. Yet the minister, who comes from Vancouver where there are grave difficulties, said today that this bill will solve the problems of people in Canada. That is why I say, let the buyer beware.

An hon. Member: Caveat emptor.

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, let the buyer beware. The cost of land is one thing; the cost of serviced land is another. Any land, whether held by a public land bank or by private developers, must be brought into use quickly if it is to be of benefit; that is, it must be serviced quickly. There is no sign in the bill that there is to be federal leadership given to provinces or municipalities in creating serviced land. The point is this. Although the minister may purchase $93 million worth of land in Toronto, that is not serviced land. On top of that cost there is $30,000 an acre to be considered for putting in services. Therein lies the problem. Nothing in this bill suggests that private enterprise or land banks owned by the government will meet the difficulty. No inducement is held out for development and for bringing land into service quickly. The first thing the federal government must do is to provide leadership in this field.

What is the purpose of a land bank? A land bank in itself may be good, of course. If a high quality of leadership is provided, land may be serviced and brought into use for housing. On the other hand, if you buy land today and wait only three or four years, the land will increase in price; consequently, the extra cost will be passed on to the house purchaser.

The minister talked about land banking and how fine it was, but those were merely high-sounding, beautiful phrases. What a salesman the minister is. He is superb. I have sat in the gallery watching Members of Parliament and I say the minister is a superb salesman. He talked about land banking and the $100 million that will provide big solutions. Those were beautiful, high-sounding phrases. I invite him, with the committee, to go to our cities.

Let me talk about my own city. It is always said that Calgary is affluent. Let us begin with my constituency, Calgary North, where in the last two or three years public housing has been built which can best be described as ghettos. Workmanship is poor and the materials have just been thrown together on the land. These projects were expensive. However, asking families to live in them is like asking them to live in ghettos that are worse than those of the United States or Europe.

An hon. Member: Has the hon. member complained to the carpenters?

Mr. Woolliams: The hon. member mentioned carpenters. If he does not wish to go to Calgary because Liberals are not too popular in the west these days, I advise him to go east. I could take him to Toronto and show him the same thing, or Montreal or Quebec City.

Mr. Hees: The Liberals are not too popular in Toronto right now.

Mr. Woolliams: I could show him the same kinds of conditions. The minister tried to outline a plan the feeling that only he is capable of expressing.

Mr. Hees: You hardly see the Liberals in some parts of the country.

Mr. Woolliams: Especially west of the Great Lakes.

Mr. Hees: And down east.

Mr. Woolliams: That is right. The Maritimes is another area where they seem to be experiencing some difficulty. The minister tried to talk about land banking. He tried to leave the impression that he would go after the big money makers so that the little fellow on the street would say, "Bully; the government has $100 million to spend in going after the big money makers". Do hon. members not realize that this money may solve part of the problem in one area only, Toronto? The speculators are there because circumstances allow them to be. The circumstances allow them to exist because for the last five years nothing has been done to ease the crisis. Circumstances permit their existence because there is not enough serviced land ready to be developed.

Some people say that it does not matter whether land is owned by the government or free enterprise because government policy will not make serviced land less expensive. Hon. members ought to read the statistics, Mr. Speaker. That is what the minister should do, rather than listening to his own verbosity. Nothing in the bill will encourage greater land supply. Supply will not exceed the demand for housing. I know that mortgage money is to be made available and houses can be built, but who can afford accommodation at today's price? All figures, of course, are relative. On the other hand, only 4 per cent of the wage earners in Toronto can afford a new house, despite all the verbiage we have heard today. What does that means to the average Canadian?

Mr. Hees: It is just a rich man's policy.

Mr. Woolliams: Quite. How do you prevent delays in servicing land?

Mr. Hees: Get a new government.

Mr. Woolliams: How do you devise a national housing policy that means something to average Canadians?

Mr. Hees: By electing a new government.

Mr. Woolliams: Yes.

An hon. Member: Don't interrupt your own man.

Mr. Hees: He and I work as a team.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I assure the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) that we like his help. It adds colour to the debate. I hope other hon. members over there see the light.

First, tri-level conferences should be set up on an agenda basis and not on an ad hoc basis. The federal government must bring the municipalities together and propose a tri-level conference which understands the needs of the people. The needs vary from area to area. From my reading of the bill, and I hope I read it accurately, the needs of various regions will not be considered. What is good in Newfoundland and would help the people there may not apply to the people in Toronto or Montreal, and what may be good in Montreal or Toronto may not meet the needs of people in western Canada. Therefore, we need a flexible policy. That kind of policy can only be created if we create the kind of national housing program that is flexible, that will meet the needs of Canadians in all areas. That would be fulfilling the spirit of confederation.

The minister mentioned the meeting involving the municipalities. After that meeting was over I received letters telling me that, certainly, the provinces met with the federal government and with the minister, but the mayors of municipalities were just decoration at that meeting. We on this side of the House asked if we could attend that conference to see what was going on. We learned that the representatives of municipalities performed about as much function at that meeting as window-drapes in an office building. Is it not wonderful how the minister spread his arms and said, "What a policy we evolved and what a meeting we had when we got together." I wish to quote what a Vancouver alderman said:

• (2110)

Last week, I was in Toronto for the first meeting of the three levels of government in the history of Canada. It was an important meeting for the municipalities because it gave them some recognition as a legitimate third level of government, but it was a disappointment in that there was no commitment to any long term tri-level consultation.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

The first thing the municipalities should do is get their tri-level conference on an agenda basis. The mayors of our cities should have some say. The city of Montreal has a larger population than most provinces. The city of Toronto is larger in population than any province except the one in which it is situated, and the province of Quebec. Surely the mayors, aldermen and experts of our large urban centres should be able to talk, irrespective of the constitution, on the same level as the minister because they represent thousands of people, and in some cases millions.

An hon. Member: That is why Phil Givens quit.

Mr. Woolliams: I believe that is why he quit. He could not stand it; it was awful. I will not describe his situation because I do not want to create any emotion in this debate.

Mr. Hees: Just keep it cool and factual.

Mr. Woolliams: That is right. Conditional grants programs of the federal government cannot do the job. Uniform programs have seriously distorted local priorities. They fail to meet the real needs of municipalities and, therefore, the people. We must have a flexible federal program to meet the needs of the people; therefore, regions must be taken into consideration. When the bill goes to committee, I hope the minister will take heed of this recommendation.

The next thing we need is revenue-sharing on a greater scale with the provinces, and hence with the municipalities. The time has arrived. When we had the great tax reform bill it was painted as a great reformer. Now the government has to have Fred Davis sell the public. Yesterday when the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Bawden) asked a question the minister said the government has advisers telling people how to fill out their income tax returns. Although Fred Davis tells Canadians how to fill out their tax returns, he cannot guarantee it in six months when the assessors come along. The big thing about the tax bill is that the provinces now realize that the federal government, under the guise of tax reform, came in and seized the greatest share of the revenue, starving the provinces and municipalities. That is what has happened.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: Therefore, there has to be a greater share of the revenues going from the federal government to the provinces. Even with the strong constitution of the United States, President Nixon signed a $30 billion revenue share to provide the states, counties and cities with revenue collected by the government for this very purpose. Maybe the time has arrived to take a good, hard look at the situation. In 1968, the Prime Minister rode the constitutional horse to death. That was his big issue. He was going to call great conferences, reform the British North America Act and do great things. We do not hear anything about that now; it has all died.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: You are like a grape that withers on the vine. You will wither with the Prime Minister. I wish the hon. member would get up and make a speech when I am finished, because I know he has a lot to add to this debate. The federal government can no longer use the constitution as an excuse for inaction in this field. Up to 1946 housing was always looked upon as a local concern. After the war it became a common concern to all Canadians. What is the difference, basically, between a provincial matter and a federal matter? Those matters that affect people locally are provincial matters, and those matters that are common to all Canadians are federal matters. Surely housing is common to every Canadian whether he lives in Quebec or Alberta. People are looking for homes within the grasp of their pocketbook. Surely that is common to all Canadians. I wish this government would now get off that horse and quit hiding under the constitution. It is a do-nothing, constitutional government.

An hon. Member: Constipated.

Mr. Woolliams: I might have something to say about that later. If I recall my notes, I cover that a little later in my speech. After the war it became a common concern to all Canadians, and the national government amended the National Housing Act, authorizing Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to make loans up to 80 per cent and, one year later, direct loans. The constitutional hard-core complained that the federal government was interfering. I recall what one great Liberal said. I speak with reverence when I speak about him because he has now passed on. I refer to the late Hon. Robert Winters. When the change was made just after the war, Mr. Winters talked about the common rights and common purpose of national housing. These people are 30 years behind Winters and that kind of government. Perhaps they married the wrong people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: All subsequent governments enlarged the federal field. I want to give an illustration. We spoke about the great progress under CMHC. In one part of the country 125 apartments are being held up; there are 750 projects across the country that have been held up for months and months because the International Elevator Constructors Union has been on strike. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) is not in his place tonight. I do not make anything of that. He was here earlier today. However, when I questioned him the other day about getting on with the job of building accommodation for people, he said this was a provincial matter and if Ontario has solved it, why can't Alberta?

An hon. Member: Louder.

Mr. Woolliams: My friend says "louder". He always has been deaf. I wish he would take out his earplugs. I have always said that only whispers have nothing to offer. The member who said that is not sitting so very pretty in his constituency. He had one of those close shaves like Jimmy Gardiner had in Melville many years ago. I am not going to digress again. The only reason the NDP continues to vote with the government is that they sold their souls for their jobs.

If there are 750 projects being held up across this country, surely the strike that is going on in nine provinces, with a slowdown in the other where something was done, is a national matter. We have reached a period when we are dealing with things like housing, building and employment. Housing development, commercial development and CMHC development is being held up in every province. Surely the government can apply the theory that was applied to the constitution during the war; that in time of war, peace, order and good government overrides all other concerns in the constitution. This is the time for the federal government to give leadership.

Even the Prime Minister in spite of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro), in spite of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford), said that to bring the ministers of labour together would probably be a good idea. But nothing developed. That strike is still on. The day it is solved in one province, it will be going on in the other provinces.

Mr. Lalonde: It is the law.

Mr. Woolliams: He says it is the law. There is that fine little brain working on the constitution. The Minister of Health cannot see, because he was so long an executive assistant at a high salary, that the matter is of common concern to all Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: That is why that minute brain places this within the realm of impossibility. Anything to get off the hook. Do you know what Liberal policy is when dealing with housing? It is to do as little as possible, and if you are ever asked to do anything which looks difficult, blame the constitution. Loans for services are good in themselves but direct grants should be considered. Federal loans to cities increase the over-all debt of those cities, preventing them from obtaining credit by way of debentures.

I just want to spend a few moments on that thought. In the program the minister announced tonight he spoke of loans with respect to sewage disposal plants because large cities were still pouring raw sewage into the rivers. The reason they will not come for the loans is very simple, and I wish the minister would get closer to local government. As soon as the federal government lends a province or a city money for that sort of thing, their liabilities are increased and when they go to get credit ratings to get debentures they are turned down. So I say that instead of making loans to the large urban centres today, let us make direct grants to these cities where the people are living, where they can have the kind of quality of life of which the minister spoke, without including it in the bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: I want to say a few words now about specific projects, although my colleagues on the committee will be dealing directly with many of these points. Public housing is a "must" today because there are so many people in Canada below the poverty line. Why has this system been brought about? I think if we could have a system which did not demand public housing we would be a greater and better nation. I referred a while ago to the jurisprudence of the national housing policy I should like to see for Canadians. Surely that is the kind of system under which every person could own a house or have an equity in a house. But today they have to get into public housing. I say its a "must" because the low income groups have tried for years, but cannot afford housing either by way of equity or rent. As I see it, the only way we can solve that problem is to bring up the income of those people and also ensure that the purchasing power of a dollar is there. This This will improve the financial capacity of people so they are able to afford something better than public housing.

I have received dozens of letters, since I was asked to take on this position, from people all over Canada complaining about public housing. Really, what they are saying to me is that public housing, the way it is being administered today, will become the ghettos of tomorrow. And that is my warning. Public housing is good in itself, but public housing not properly administered, with proper care, proper supervision, with pride of equity and pride of ownership, is only beginning the seeds of new ghettos for Canada. Yet people talk about public housing as if it is a newborn baby with all the qualities and a high IQ.

Co-operation housing is good if it creates a right of equity and the qualification to obtain mortgages. This will be discussed by other members of my party. One hundred per cent mortgages: I am for it provided they are not used by house developers or anyone else for the extra profit of 10 per cent. What do I mean by that? Over the years in this country we have had 8 per cent loans and 9 per cent loans. What really happens? They get the land together and the mix goes on. They put the property together and they finally come out with a profit of 80 per cent to 90 per cent. So a hundred per cent mortgage really means another 10 per cent going somewhere else. It is not going to help the ordinary person.

I have always felt that as Canadians we should differentiate ourselves. We are a new country; that is why people from Europe and Asia came here. Surely in a new country the ambition of every red-blooded Canadian is to walk into a house some day, lay down the payment on that house and say, "Some day I will own it". What inspiration is there when you give a man a 50 or a 60-year mortgage? He has to take good care of his health if he is ever going to have title to the house.

A lot has been said by the minister about rehabilitation. The days of the bulldozer, I am glad to say, are over. They were started by this government. Knock down everything that is in your way. Cost-sharing between the federal government and the provincial government is good, but as I read the act the federal government says: In our generous way we are going to give $2,000, and that $2,000 will be matched either by the municipality or by the provincial government. Four thousand dollars! There is an open end to the bill, to be fair to the minister. Governments other than the federal government can put in more dough. Assume they do not. Generally, it is dollar for dollar. Go into the cities where there are run-down houses. Start hiring the plumbers. Start hiring the carpenters. Start buying the materials. Four thousand dollars is not enough to renovate the average roof, let alone the house. It sounds beautiful when you put it in words, but when you explore it in practice it is just like a hungry elephant eating a peanut.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: Again, money is the number one solution. If we are to have a new national urban development program as outlined by me on behalf of my party, this cannot be achieved by a department of government which is directly independent of the government. I am not being critical of CMHC. Over the years they have done a great job. They have had some great presidents. But surely when we ask the government, from this side, to set up an urban affairs department and they finally concede and put the minister where he is today, one of the things they should have done was to make CMHC responsible to that department of the government. As I see the corporation, it is as independent as the CBC or the Bank of Canada. The minister could have the finest program in the world, but if that independent agency slowed it down to a crawl, the minister's program would be slowed down to a crawl.

So the recommendation I would make tonight is that in some way CMHC be made directly responsible to the minister so that the minister can give us direct answers to our questions when we ask about the actions of the corporation. I do not intend to go into the mechanics of how this could be arranged, but the draftsmen could certainly work something out. When we asked him about rent increases affecting old age pensioners, he said it was according to some contract. The next day he said it was according to some dividend program. He said he had issued a directive. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, what the agency can do? We heard a lot about directives today. They can throw it into the wastepaper basket. So why not adopt a more realistic approach? Let us make CMHC responsible to the minister so that it is really a part of his department like any other department of government.

• (2130)

Therefore, there needs to be a new amendment to the National Housing Act, or an act setting up a department of urban affairs and making the minister secretary of state for urban affairs and housing, so that, as with any other department of government, he set the tone of policies and the department carried them out. The minister would be responsible for the department's administration, its successes, its errors, its adversities and its achievements. The last, of course, would be somewhat difficult. If a deadlock or disagreement occurred between the present setup of CHMC and the minister, outside of the good will that they have today—and which I assume all ministers have—without any legal thrust or implications, the minister could not implement his policy.

Mr. Basford: That is not right.

Mr. Woolliams: The minister says that is not right. I am not going to say "I told you so" but I have heard the government say "That is not right" before. They think nothing is ever right. We warned them what would happen to the unemployment insurance fund; they said that that would never happen.

CMHC is more independent than the CBC and the Bank of Canada and many other crown corporations. The ad hoc basis of the policies on housing has been the result of this agency recommending amendments to the act. Let us make no mistake about it, Mr. Speaker. I am not suggesting this, but I would ask, through you, whether some of the people in CMHC helped put together the hour and a half speech that I listened to this evening.

Mr. Hees: No, they can do better than that. I have heard them and you cannot insult them like that. They will only take so much.

Mr. Woolliams: That is right, they will only take so much. The time is fast coming, if we are going to work with all levels of government so as to have that degree of control within the terms of the constitution, when the federal government will be able to give leadership not only in developing new communities but in improving old communities. They must work, as I said, under a new national urban development policy and a new national housing development policy, so that pollution control can be effective, so that money-wise, rapid transit systems can be implemented, not only in newly developing areas but in established areas, and so that the whole quality of life in the city can be improved and men and women and their families can live in proper accommodation with dignity and happiness. This policy could become the greatest tool in halting the increase in crime. For crime breeds in poverty and poverty exists in ghettos. The growth and development of youth in the nation is only a product of the environment from whence they spring.

I am almost finished, Mr. Speaker, but when dealing with differences between what happens in Newfoundland, what happens in Ontario, what happens in Alberta and what happens in British Columbia, perhaps a small poem written by Don Harron in satirical fashion might do a lot to show what I mean by differences between people. It is entitled, "Ode on You, O Canada" and it is from the book "Charlie Farquharson's Histry of Canada". My son gave me this to read, and when I read it last night I felt it added the right touch. I have not ended on a poetical note for some time, so if the House will forgive me I should like to put it on the record. I am sure I will get the ears of the House because I do not put this forward in a partisan way. I rather like it:

What is Canada to you?
This land so strong and true.

Have you ever before heard the words "This land so strong and true", Mr. Speaker?

What does it make you think of,
And why and where and how?
Whenever I think of my country,
It seems like a great big cow.
Yes, a Guernsey or a Holsteen,
Is that sich a foolish notion?
Lappin' its fill of the waters
Of our very own Pasifick Ocean.
Then chewin' its cud on the Prayerees,
Right over yer Kickin' Horse Pass
In the breadbasket of our nation,
As it regurgitates its grass.
And settles its mash in Ontaryo,
Then to the loins of our country,
Where somethin' surely is stirrin'!
Listen and you can hear
A rumblin' and grumblin' and whirrin'.
The wind of change is blowin'!
Can't you hear its howls?
As we wonder at all those movements
Deep in our nation's bowels.

And so we come to the end of my tail
And all its little rimes . . .
And doesn't this allus happen
To the dear old Marrytimes?

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member who just preceded me, from Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), had not been spokesman for the Conservative party, at times during his speech I would have been moved to tears as a reaction to his expression of profound concern for the plight of those in Canada who need housing. One would have thought that nowhere in this country were there to be found Conservative governments at the provincial level who have had some responsibility for housing. One would have thought that at the federal level the Conservative party from 1958 till 1962 had had no responsibility for housing. One would have thought, indeed, that all the faults of housing policy in Canada—there are many and I shall say something about them in a moment—were attributable solely to the party opposite, the Liberals.

I should like to remind the hon. member for Calgary North that when the New Democratic Party was elected in Manitoba it did more for housing in one year than was done in the preceding five by the Conservative government in that province. I should like to remind the hon. member who has just spoken that the Conservative party, not just the Liberal party, must bear their share of responsibility for the housing situation that has existed across the country ever since the Second World War when the National Housing Act was passed and CMHC came into being soon after.

However, I am not going to spend time on the hon. member's very interesting and rhetorical address. I want to move on to what the minister had to say, because it is the government of the day that must bear the responsibility for present housing policies. I was touched by the minister's phrases. He talked in his speech about the basic and elemental needs of people. He said it was not merely a question of housing and shelter but a question of community with which we must be concerned. He talked about housing being a basic right of all Canadians. Another phrase he used was that we must look beyond the home to the community in which a man and his family lives. He has only been minister for two years now, and I am not suggesting that he is not personally concerned about housing.

Mr. Basford: One year.

Mr. Broadbent: The minister corrects me and says one year. It is a year that seems like two years.

Mr. Basford: So much has been done.

Mr. Broadbent: I will come to that. It is interesting to read the catalogue of programs that the minister presented to us. What it really is is the best possible documentation one can find of a catalogue of neglect in Canada for some 25 to 30 years. Just let me repeat them. First of all, we had the neighbourhood improvement program. He told us what had not been done in that area in recent times. Then there was the assisted home ownership program. The minister pointed out that average and low income people cannot afford to buy housing and have been unable to buy it in Canada for decades. So, he says, at last something has to be done. Then he went on to land assembly and then programs of rehabilitation. He talked movingly about the needs of senior citizens in Canada. Although I missed a couple of other programs en route, finally at the end of his speech he got around to talking about the importance of housing warranties.

I say that this is simply a catalogue of neglect. It illustrates very well that in terms of providing for a basic human need, which is important for people in Canada or anywhere else—housing—the market system on which this government and its Conservative predecessor has relied has failed. This market system, under which we allow the forces of so-called free competition to allocate our capital resources has not done the housing job in Canada. It is time we moved well beyond that and categorically recognized that it will not do the job. We should begin to look—I will come to this later when we are discussing the financial instruments bill—at our financial institutions to make sure that we get the money we need for housing in Canada.

I listened to the minister outline these programs. On the one hand they reveal a shortage, but at the same time, almost in one sentence following upon another, there is the contradictory reference to what this government has done. The minister's constant reference is to housing starts which have taken place in each of the past few years under the Liberal government. One might have thought that the situation was not all that bad and that this bill is needed merely to patch up the deficiencies of the system; but let me remind hon. members of some basic facts which were revealed in the recent Dennis report suppressed by this government but which finally emerged in the fall of last year.

In our country in 1972 we had 750,000 units of housing which were not safe, not decent and not sanitary. By a conservative estimate, I think that means that about 3 million Canadians are living under those circumstances. I repeat, this report is not based on conditions in the 1930s but on conditions in 1972. The report also indicates that 500,000 units need heating, plumbing repairs of a significant sort, and major structural improvements. That means that well over another million Canadians are living under these deplorable circumstances.

Let us look at the distribution of funds under the National Housing Act which was originally set up to provide money for the average Canadian to achieve what the hon. member for Calgary North suggested was a good objective, that is, ownership of a home. What do we find the situation to be? We find that most of the funds provided under the National Housing Act have been provided to upper income Canadians. The figures for the past two years indicate that the median income of a Canadian family was approximately $2,000 less than the median family income of a recipient of an NHA loan. What that means, stated in different terms, is that the income of the average Canadian earner, who pays most of the taxes, is being used to finance the homes of upper income Canadians. When we combine that fact with the facts I have just mentioned, we see a picture for the year 1972 of which Canadians cannot be proud.

Mr. Basford: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Broadbent: If the minister would not mind, I would be glad to answer his question at the close of my remarks, following his own example. The point I am making is that our capital or disposable income in the main is left in the hands of bankers and insurance companies and is flowing to those in higher income brackets for the purposes of housing. We have to change the present system of providing homes or we will not do that job which needs to be done. We will not be able to provide homes for those Canadians who live under conditions that are not safe, decent or even sanitary.

This bill represents the first significant change in housing legislation since 1964. In that year there were changes which provided CMHC with the right to lend funds to provinces for construction of subsidized housing. That was an important step taken at that time. All we have seen since then, however, in terms of basic housing legislation is a bit of tinkering, for instance, authorization to lend funds to provinces and municipalities for land assembly. What the present government proposes is obviously inadequate. We need funding at more adequate levels.

Since 1964 we have seen additional provisions to aid private lending institutions, including the freeing of interest rates on NHA loans, and amendments under the National Housing Act to allow chartered banks to take part in NHA mortgages. We have put these private institutions on the CMHC gravy train. A good illustration of this is the rising curve indicating the rate of profits for the banks and trust company. This has led to the highest mortgage interest rates in the history of Canada. This is the real evidence of the effectiveness of these changes. I refer also to changes to section 15 of the act which made it possible for developers to build trash, and I use that word advisedly. These changes are the kind of which we cannot be proud.

Before I say something about the provisions of the present bill may I refer to the minister's description, to the effect that it represents a "major attack against our housing problems". Frankly, I do not think this is the case and I will illustrate why I feel that way. The present bill represents only a slight move to ease the burden of rising housing costs for a few Canadians. It does not deal with the basic problem of housing inflation. It will not reduce interest rates. It will not put a stop to spiralling land prices. It does not promise to provide the level of support needed to ease the burden of price increases in recent years, let alone solve the housing problem.

It is important to realize—this is especially true with respect to housing—that parliament has an important effect, but a limited one, on all its policies. The present bill, as well as ones in other areas, allows considerable discretion to authorities set up under the legislation and for us, in housing that means CMHC. The rate at which the housing problems of Canadians is ameliorated depends, of course, upon the actual commitments of the government in its budgetary appropriations as handled by CMHC.

The present legislation is not a significant innovation. I say this because most of the provisions of this bill, as the minister well knows, have already been implemented in some form, appropriately authorized or not, by CMHC. For instance, Canadian Housing Statistics contains references to the assisted home ownership program that has been in operation for three years how. We are told by our colleagues in British Columbia that a rehabilitation project similar to the one proposed in the present bill is in operation in the minister's own riding, although the NHA as it now stands contains no provisions for this kind of a project. It would be interesting to know under what authority this project was started.

Likewise, much that is proposed under the neighbourhood improvement program can now be done under the present urban renewal legislation, although we can understand the government's decision to discourage the continued use of a section so rightly identified with the destruction of many neighbourhoods in many of our large cities. This having been said, provision for these and other programs in the present bill are welcome, if only because adoption of the bill will make their availability more widely known and therefore more widely utilized by Canadians from coast to coast.

The bill in its present state, however, will not receive the unqualified support of the NDP. We have some questions which we want the minister and his officials to answer. We would like to know more precisely, for example, what is contained in some of the anticipated regulations. We would like to see amendments to the CMHC budget introduced in the House soon after the present bill is passed because, as the minister and as everyone who is seriously concerned with housing knows, it is the allocation of funds which will be so crucial in terms of implementing a number of the laudable objectives described in the different clauses of the bill.

A question related to that is that if we do not get adequate money we will simply be raising the expectations of countless Canadians across the land who will read in the bill some good provisions and expect that everything will be implemented within a reasonable period of time. If the government does not show a real desire to overcome the deplorable housing situation by providing money, then this bill will be appropriately seen as a piece of sham legislation.

Another question that concerns us is whether we are going to continue financing projects by large developers whose quality standards in terms of work in recent years has proven to be quite inadequate. I could document a number of cases but I will not take the time of the House to do it now. These were documented at length in the reports by Charney and Dennis.

Another question is whether the government will switch its emphasis, as we would prefer, to non-profit associations and co-operative societies. They have a potential for real social benefit over the long term in Canada, providing not only adequate accommodation but, from our point of view, good social relations for people. The minister indicated tonight—and I know this from conversations with co-operative societies which have met with him—that he is fully sympathetic to the development of co-operatives. I for one welcome that and hope that the budgetary arrangements which the minister makes within his department reflect the concern which he has expressed.

The other matter which concerns us, and it is a matter of apprehension that is perhaps more real to me than the others I have mentioned, apart from funding, is that some of the programs that the minister has announced recently are intended not simply as alternative choices to public housing but perhaps reveal an intention of the government to replace public housing. We feel that that would be a tragic mistake. We think that the AHOP which was announced last year and is now before us in the bill, and the added measures that the minister announced a few days ago which provide diversification in terms of types of low income housing, are fine.

We think that these are steps, with some qualifications which were noted at the time, which will provide a greater range of choice to people in the low income group in Canada. But we think it would be a disastrous mistake if these programs were to replace public housing. Every authority I know of in the field of low income housing would agree that improvements are needed and that there must be some alternative choices. But they all say that we must maintain a basic commitment to public housing for low income Canadians.

What is needed is not the removal of public housing but additional choices. What is needed is an absolute expansion in the amount of money that is allocated to low income housing. So if we bring in AHOP and the kind of program which the minister announced the other day, they should represent, in terms of his own budgetary proposals, a cause to increase the amount of money for low income housing and not represent, I hope, a decision to take some money out of public housing and put it into these other schemes.

There are a number of improvements that we would like to suggest to the bill, but I see it is almost ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker. May I call it ten o'clock?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Speaker, the acting government House leader may want to put on the record what is proposed for the House tomorrow so, that all members will be made aware of it.

Mr. Basford: I was not aware that I was the acting House leader, but I will take the job unto myself. I believe we are continuing with the housing bill, if that is agreeable to my colleague, the Secretary of State.

Mr. Faulkner: Mr. Speaker, I can announce that we will continue with the item that is now before the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Was there not some understanding that we might proceed with the report stage and third reading of the bills amending the Old Age Security Act and the War Veterans Allowance Act, subject to some discussion among the parties?

• (2200)

Mr. Faulkner: Mr. Speaker, I understand there has been no agreement among the parties on that point.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Did anyone try?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. For the moment we have to listen, with pleasure I am sure, to the hon. member for Athabasca.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

CANADIAN CULTURE—MULTICULTURALISM—MAINTENANCE OF RIGHTS OF CULTURAL GROUPS FOLLOWING TAKEOVER OF RADIO STATION CKSB BY CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I want to raise an issue which has been the cause of a great deal of concern in certain parts of the country, particularly in Manitoba. It concerns the fact that in spite of the government's stated policy of acceptance of the concept of multiculturalism, this concept is not being applied in Manitoba. In fact, established rights of ethnic groups that have been accustomed to programming via the use of radio station CKSB have been lost. I have a letter here which expresses the situation clearly. I would like to quote from it, to explain the problem to whomsoever will be responding to it. It reads:

> It is with great interest that we now note that radio station CKSB, St. Boniface, Manitoba, has been purchased by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Of course, notice of the intending purchase was given. However, the application for the approval of the purchase before the Canadian Radio and Television Commission was heard, not in Winnipeg, not in Manitoba, but in Montreal, Quebec. By holding the hearing in Montreal, interested parties in the Winnipeg area were almost entirely precluded from airing their opinions. In spite of this fact, six representations were made at the hearing by cultural groups opposed to the transfer in ownership.
> For your information, radio station CKSB, St. Boniface, Manitoba, has for approximately 20 years sold time on the station so that programs in languages other than French and English might be broadcast in the Winnipeg area. You must bear in mind that Winnipeg is an area composed largely of non-English and non-French speaking people. Indeed, next to the English speaking majority, Ukrainian speaking and German speaking peoples represent the largest cultural groups in this area.
>
> On Sunday, February 25th, 1973, the cultural groups who broadcast over radio station CKSB made their final broadcast over that station. Due to the transfer to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, non-French and non-English speaking groups are prohibited from using this station. For approximately 20 years the citizens of the Winnipeg area have been able to listen to radio broadcasts in Ukrainian, German, Hebrew, Italian, Polish, and Greek, to name but a few. The aforementioned groups are now forced to either discontinue programming, or to broadcast over rural radio stations, some distance from Winnipeg.
> The writer takes strong exception to the takeover of radio station CKSB by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Although the Prime Minister has expressed his belief in a multicultural Canada, the writer feels that he is doing no more than paying lip service to the principle of a multicultural Canada. It is for this reason that I write this letter to you, for it is my belief that if the letter was addressed to the Prime Minister's office, it would be ignored. The government, through the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, is in fact taking steps to hinder multiculturalism in Canada rather than to promote it. By arbitrarily purchasing radio station CKSB, at a purchase price that is greatly inflated over the actual value of the radio station, the rights and privileges which the cultural groups of the Winnipeg area have enjoyed for decades are being destroyed. This cannot, and should not be tolerated. I strongly urge you to take the government to task for this flagrant and blatant step against multiculturalism in Canada.

This issue has been raised in the House on several occasions. Questions have been asked of the minister as to what he proposes to do about it. Unfortunately, the answers have been such that they do not give me the impression that he is being very aggressive about protecting the established, customary rights. I want to give you some examples, Mr. Speaker. On February 8 when he was asked about this matter, he replied:

> Mr. Speaker, I have discussed this with my colleagues in the cabinet and everything possible is being done. . . I have made representations on this matter to the chairman of the CRTC.

He was asked again on February 15, and he replied:

> Mr. Speaker, I am awaiting the report of the officials of the CBC on their multicultural programs.

The question was again raised on February 22. This time it was directed to the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) who replied in part:

> —I think I would prefer to deal with that question when these various agencies are examined before the standing committee of the House.

Then the Minister of State (Mr. Haidasz), responsible for multiculturalism, said:

> Mr. Speaker, this is a matter of government policy and if anything is to be done it will be announced in the usual way.

Both ministers were questioned again today. The Minister of State gave his usual nothing answer and the Secretary of State followed suit. I want to read from section 38 of the Official Languages Act, Mr. Speaker, because this is what has been violated by the takeover of the station by the CBC. This section reads:

> Nothing in this act shall be construed as derogating from or diminishing in any way any legal or customary right or privilege acquired or enjoyed either before or after the seventh day of September 1969 with respect to any language that is not an official language.

The customary right referred to in section 38 has obviously been taken away from various cultural groups. The CBC has taken the position that the Broadcasting Act forbids them to use other languages on their stations. They refer to the Broadcasting Act, section 3(e) of which reads:

> (e) all Canadians are entitled to broadcasting service in English and in French—

Section 3(g)(iii) provides that the national broadcasting service should be in English and French, etc. It seems to me that in this particular case where the station is being taken over, there is a conflict between section 38 of the Official Languages Act and sections 3(e) and 3(g)(iii) of the Broadcasting Act. The question was raised today whether the Secretary of State would be willing to amend the Broadcasting Act in order to get around this obstacle which the CBC claims exists, but the minister said he was not proposing any kind of amendment to the act at this time. I see my time has almost expired, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Yes, it has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, may I be forgiven for answering the second part of this question first.

I am informed that the CBC has made arrangements for ethnic groups that have an interest in the future of station CKSB to be represented at the CRTC hearing in Montreal, at no cost to them, to give them a chance to put their points of view to the CRTC.

With regard to the CRTC regulations, these allow for a large number of multi-lingual and multi-cultural programs.

For one thing, any private radio station can devote 15 per cent of its broadcasting time, which makes 20 hours a week, to multi-lingual and multi-cultural programs, without requiring the commission's permission. And for another, with just written permission and no public hearing, any private station can devote about 20 per cent, or 28 hours, of its time on the air to multi-lingual programs. The commission also grants permits to stations that broadcast almost entirely in foreign languages. There are already such stations in Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver.

With regard to the situation in Winnipeg, I am told that some stations in that city and its surroundings broadcast programs in several languages, and that they would be interested in devoting more time to this type of program.

Station CKSB has existed since 1945 and is a private French-language station. Thanks to the money collected from the Francophone community in Saint-Boniface, that station, which is affiliated to the French network of the CBC, has survived since 1945 under the management of a non-profit organization, the Fondation Radio Saint-Boniface Incorporée.

It broadcasts 132 hours a week, of which 76 originate locally and 56 are provided by the French network of the CBC. That station sold various ethnic groups, Jewish, Italian, Ukrainian, Polish and Portuguese, local broadcasting time on Sunday afternoons from 12.30 to 6 o'clock.

The CBC recently signed an agreement with the Fondation Radio Saint-Boniface Incorporée, holder of the CKSB license, for the purchase of that broadcasting station. This agreement expires on March 31, 1973 and is subject to the approval of the Canadian Radio-Television Commission. The Commission has decided that the hearing would most appropriately be held in Montreal on February 19.

The hearings of the commission are planned months ahead to allow numerous hearings at regular intervals. For instance, the commission sat in Edmonton, Toronto, Montreal and Ottawa, to hear the comments of the public—

EXPORT DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION—POSSIBLE EXCEEDING OF CEILING ON LOANS—REQUEST FOR AUDIT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I am indeed sorry that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) is not in the House tonight and that he has sent his parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau), to answer this question. The fact is that the minister has misled the House. I feel he should have had the courage to come to this House and explain why he so deliberately misled this House by suggesting that the ceiling with respect to section 29 and section 30 financings, as set out in the Export Development Corporation Act, had not been exceeded as of February 28.

The parliamentary secretary inadvertently set the record straight. He showed that the minister misled this House. May I refer to Hansard for March 9 where, at page 2084, the parliamentary secretary is reported as having said:

> It has been alleged that because the EDC has to date signed financing agreements totalling $865 million, it has already exceeded its existing statutory lending ceiling under section 30 of the act.

The parliamentary secretary then went on to point out that this was a misunderstanding. He said that as of January 31, 1973, the same date as the $865 million was outstanding, instruments outstanding totalled $500 million, but that it was instruments that were solely taken into account when determining liability under section 30.

I will not repeat the definition of "instrument" which is found in the Consolidated Statutes of Canada, chapter E 18, because my time is short. I suggest that the parliamentary secretary ought to have read the minister's speech when he introduced the bill in question in the House on February 2. At page 909 of Hansard he said that financing agreements signed by the corporation with foreign buyers of Canadian goods and services rose dramatically. He then gave figures for each of the years 1970, 1971 and 1972. The he said, as recorded on pages 910 of Hansard that the capacity to sign agreements for over $200 million is all that is left. The words "all that is left" are my own.

That is what he intended to convey to the House, to indicate the urgency for passing the bill. The minister ignored, or perhaps was not informed by his subordinates, that there was another $250 million of signed agreements which had been taken over by this corporation from its predecessor. The fact is that as of December 31 the outstanding total of signed agreements of this corporation were $841 million. The minister now knows this, and the parliamentary secretary confirmed that on January 31 $865 million had been signed.

I would point out that in each of the annual reports for 1969, 1970 and 1971 with respect to this corporation, note 2 is identical in its terminology. It is at all times pointed out that there is an uncommitted authorized liability of a certain amount. For example, in 1969 it was $238 million; in 1970 it was $173 million; in 1971 the note pointed out it was $212 million. I wish to stress that at all times the outstanding notes of the corporation never at any time exceeded $375 million.

If the parliamentary secretary is to be believed, I ask the minister and this House why it was necessary in 1971 to ask the House to increase the then ceiling from $600 million to $850 million. If we are to believe the parliamentary secretary, in fact as of January 31 they were still not over the $600 million ceiling which they told this House in 1971 they had to have increased to $850 million to allow them to proceed.

I have been fortunate enough to see the internal projections for this corporation. I can tell the House that it is not until May, 1974, that they will exceed the ceiling of $850 million, if the ceiling alleged by the parliamentary secretary is a correct interpretation under this act. The fact is, it is wanton misleading of this House. They know they are caught and they do not want to admit it. Instead, they run to a solicitor and say, "Please give us a fresh definition of how we can interpret the liabilities under section 30." However, they forget that fortunately we have the internal records of the corporation, including the records referred to in their minutes. We know what has been said.

We only hope the officers of the corporation will be prepared to appear before the committee and not deny that in their own records, listed under liabilities pertaining to section 30, the liabilities as of December 31 were $841 million and that they had less than $9 million left under their authorization of $850 million. As of January 31, the parliamentary secretary is correct. The record then showed that they had in fact exceeded their ceiling. I feel this House deserves an apology.

Mr. Herb Breau (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) has been alleging for some time what he has again repeated this evening. I first wish to say that it is a recognized practice in this House, although it may not be a tradition, for the parliamentary secretary to in fact answer questions on what we call the "late show". There is no question of the minister not having the courage to be here. The minister was here this afternoon to answer in the debate, and he will appear before the committee when the Export Development Act amendments are before it, as the committee sees fit. Therefore, it is my duty as parliamentary secretary to answer questions on the "late show". I intend to continue doing so.

The hon. member, of course, is basing all of his argument on a legal judgment. I do not know if he is a lawyer. I am not.

Mr. Stevens: I am.

Mr. Breau: You are a lawyer?

Mr. Stevens: Yes.

Mr. Breau: Unfortunately, I am not a lawyer. I have to rely on legal opinions that I read or that are provided to me in some way or another.

Mr. Stevens: I have a different one.

Mr. Breau: If you have, I wish you would bring it forward because I have not heard it yet.

Mr. Stevens: I will at committee.

Mr. Breau: That is fine. This evening the hon. member again referred to two points. He referred, first, to a financial statement as if that was an adequate basis for a legal argument. Even though I am not a lawyer, I cannot understand that. In my view, a financial statement cannot be used to make a legal judgment.

Mr. Stevens: Get your corporation's financial statements for three years.

Mr. Breau: It does not matter what the financial statement is, although the hon. member must have seen a lot of them in his years in business. The hon. member says that he is a lawyer. If he had to have a legal opinion, there is no way that he would refer to a financial statement. He would refer to statements and things of that sort. Even in respect of that financial statement, the hon. member mentioned—and I have his words—uncommitted liability. That confirms, it seems to me, the fact that a liability does not exist before disbursements have been made. It has to be this way because the corporation, like any other lending authority, takes in cash receipts all the time. There is money flowing back in. This is why the act specifies "on the outstanding instruments". So even if the corporation exceeded the ceiling in financial agreements, it could very well be that because of the money coming in it would be within the permitted ceiling.

• (2220)

I could give the answer again. It has been given three times in the House. It is really a matter of legal opinion. If the hon. member thinks he has a better one, somebody will have to be the judge.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.22 p.m.

OFFICE OF THE MINISTER
MANPOWER AND IMMIGRATION

FOR RELEASE

December 6, 1972

"The $500 million Direct Employment Programs announced earlier this morning by the Minister of Finance and myself included a $90 million allocation for the LIP and Training on-the-Job Program which will not only greatly contribute to the reduction of winter unemployment, but will also help to develop, on a long-term basis, the new ideas and techniques these programs have generated."

This statement was made by Manpower and Immigration Minister Robert Andras when he announced to-day the expansion of those portions of the over-all Direct Employment Program administered by his department. This expansion adds $80 million to the Local Initiatives Program and $10 million to the Training on-the-Job Program.

The addition of this $90 million for LIP and TOJ represents a total allocation of $215 million for job creation this winter compared with $120 million for the corresponding period last year. It is estimated that more than 125,000 jobs or 510,000 man-months of employment will be created during the life of the programs.

"We have many applications on hand and I have directed my officials to process them and put these new funds into circulation as quickly as possible. In addition, I have directed that about $10 million be set aside for innovations currently under study, which, I hope, will give more flexibility and new dimensions to LIP. In this connection I am discussing with my officials several interesting variations for a concerted attack on the unemployment problem.

We will look at such ideas as marshalling the entrepreneurial skills and talents of the private sector toward community betterment, obviously on a non-profit basis. Another idea I would like to explore is assistance to unemployed persons in forming co-operative, non-profit organizations for the purpose of providing, on a fee basis, needed community services. I hope to have a more definitive statement concerning these innovations within a few weeks, but in the meantime the bulk of the funds will be used to finance the regular applications which are flowing into the department from private sponsors and municipal governments.

We know there is a lot of pressure on the government these days from certain groups for continued funding, and we will be studying ways and means of assisting them, either directly or by recommending alternate sources.

As the new Minister of Manpower and Immigration I intend to do everything in my power to develop, as quickly as possible, not only the additional measures necessary to bridge the severe winter months ahead, but also to come up with the answers to the middle-term questions, i.e., one-to two-year requirements, and then the longer term possibilities of job creation," Mr. Andras continued.

The Minister invited employers, large and small, to participate in the Canada Manpower Training-on-the-Job Program which last year produced more than 42,000 new jobs with more than two-thirds of the trainees gaining permanent employment.

"The CMTJP formula enables employers to hire trainees in preparation for projected expansion," the Minister said, "and provides trainees with an opportunity to develop valuable and transferable skills."

Complete details on both LIP and CMTJP can be obtained through all of the 390 Canada Manpower Centres of the Department of Manpower and Immigration.

Ottawa, December 6, 1972.

Added today	$ 10,000,000
Sub-total	$ 50,000,000

Estimated man-months of employment	160,000

Program Totals:

Allocations, from $125,000,000 to $215,000,000
New money allocated: $90 million
Estimated total jobs to be created—135,000
Estimated man-months of employment to be created—510,000

Objectives:

1. To create jobs.
2. To provide skills of continuing and transferable value.
3. To improve community services, quality of life, encourage imagination and initiative amongst Canadians.
4. To encourage projected employer expansions.

Canada Manpower Training-on-the-Job

New opportunity for the employer:

The new injection of funds into the CMTJP program will permit Canadian employers to increase their participation in a scheme which was labelled "the most successful part of the (1971-72) special federal plan to cut unemployment."

Canadian employers, taking advantage of the incentives of the program (partial reimbursement of wages of the trainees), will be able to hire trainees in preparation for projected expansion and will be in a position to channel more of their own funding in the planned expansion.

A skill and a future for the employee:

Several thousand additional Canadians will have the chance to develop valuable skills and talents leading to rewarding career opportunities. Last year, CMTJP produced more than 42,000 new jobs with more than two-thirds of the trainees gaining permanent employment.

Trainees under CMTJP are just like other employees and receive the same wage rates and fringe benefits.

Program dates:

The program began December 1, 1972 and all project applications must be received by December 31, 1972. Trainees must be on the job no later than March 31, 1973.

Reimbursement for employers:

Employers qualifying under the program will receive 75 per cent of the trainee wage costs during the first half of the training period and 50 per cent of the wage costs during the last half. Maximum reimbursement payable to employers under the program is $118 per trainee per week.

The role of the CMC:

CMTJP, as well as LIP, are administered by more than 390 Canada Manpower Centres of the Department of Manpower and Immigration throughout Canada where advice and assistance can be obtained on both programs.

Local Initiatives Program

New dimension:

The additional money will not only permit the launching of a larger number of regular LIP projects but will also give increased flexibility and a new dimension to the Local Initiatives Program through the possibility of adding some or all of the following elements:

A/ LIP for the private sector:

These projects would be non-profit making, in the public interest and unrelated to the normal production or service sold by the business. This idea results from the suggestions of businessmen who have expressed a desire to undertake community projects in the public interest using their plant, equipment and managerial time with assistance from LIP for wages (and overhead) of workers hired from the unemployed. Such projects could be of particular help to businesses that are faced with seasonal layoffs.

B/ LIP for potential self-sufficient entrepreneurs:

This fascinating concept has been requested by a number of regular individual LIP project sponsors.

The basic idea is that LIP would make contributions towards the capital cost of a project as well as financing the wage bill. These projects might also be permitted to retain earnings for future development.

Projects in this category would have to be non-competitive with local firms, and the sponsors should have demonstrated skills and a potentially viable idea.

A good example of this type of project would be a co-operative business organization, run on a non-profit basis, for the purpose of providing needed community services. Another example might be the construction and operation of a medical clinic in a remote area.

The underlying concept of this type of project would be that a price must be charged for the goods produced or services provided; projects would also be organized and managed by the unemployed themselves.

Progress report:

Applications are flowing in at an increasing rate; their value having risen from $64.7 million on November 8 to $250 million on December 4.

Announcements on approved LIP projects are currently being made locally and regionally across the country.

A preliminary analysis of the types of projects indicates the following percentage breakdown: social services (30 per cent), construction (25 per cent), sports and recreation (20 per cent), arts and culture (10 per cent), with the remainder being for research, education, information, health, etc.

Program dates:

The program officially began December 1, 1972, and all project applications must be received by December 31, 1972.

General:

New project applications are generally better prepared than last year, reflecting the experience gained from the 1971-72 program. This year the controls are tighter, the criteria are clearer, and the monitoring and auditing will be stepped-up and refined.

Last year's program had a minimal number of projects that did not meet their stated objectives satisfactorily. Of 5,700 approved projects, only five cases of fraud have been recorded and only four projects have been terminated by the Department owing to mismanagement by the project sponsor.

March 15, 1973

FROM:
J. M. DesRoches,
Deputy Minister, M & I
OTTAWA, Ont.

TO: All Regional Directors General
This cancels and replaces my telex of March 9th.

The purpose of that telex was to emphasize the importance of aggressive, affirmative action by CMCs to utilize emerging employment opportunities, especially those created by the local initiative and training on the job programs for those people who are definitely unemployed and in need.

As you are aware priority in referral to jobs is governed by regulation 27 to the unemployment insurance regulations. Consistent with regulation 27, all job orders will be checked as soon as they are received against existing live files of registrations to ensure that preference in referral is given to qualified registrants as required by the regulation. The telex of March 9th was not intended to change this basic procedure.

In the case of the LIP and training on the job programs it has been publicly announced as government policy that priority in placement would be given to those who are unemployed. Within that priority emphasis must be given to those on unemployment insurance, welfare or otherwise unemployed and actively seeking work.

A special effort must be made to complete recruitment for LIP and training on the job, particularly the latter, as quickly as possible and in accordance with the foregoing policy.

APPENDIX "B"

NOTICES OF MOTION FOR THE PRODUCTION OF PAPERS

General Principle

To enable Members of Parliament to secure factual information about the operations of government to carry out their parliamentary duties and to make public as much factual information as possible consistant with effective administration, the protection of the security of the state, rights to privacy and other such matters, government papers, documents and consultant reports should be produced on Notice of Motion for the Production of Papers unless falling within the categories outlined below in which case an exemption is to be claimed from production.

Exemptions

The following criteria are to be applied in determining if government papers or documents should be exempt from production:

1. Legal opinions or advice provided for the use of the government.

2. Papers, the release of which would be detrimental to the security of the State.

3. Papers dealing with international relations, the release of which might be detrimental to the future conduct of Canada's foreign relations; (the release of papers received from other countries to be subject to the consent of the originating country).

4. Papers, the release of which might be detrimental to the future conduct of federal-provincial relations or the relations of provinces inter se; (the release of papers received from provinces to be subject to the consent of the originating province).

5. Papers containing information, the release of which could allow or result in direct personal financial gain or loss by a person or a group of persons.

6. Papers reflecting on the personal competence or character of an individual.

7. Papers of a voluminous character or which would require an inordinate cost or length of time to prepare.

8. Papers relating to the business of the Senate.

9. Papers, the release of which would be personally embarrassing to Her Majesty or the Royal Family or official representatives of Her Majesty.

10. Papers relating to negotiations leading up to a contract until the contract has been executed or the negotiations have been concluded.

11. Papers that are excluded from disclosure by statute.

12. Cabinet documents and those documents which include a Privy Council confidence.

13. Any proceedings before a court of justice or a judicial inquiry of any sort.

14. Papers that are private or confidential and not of a public or official character.

15. Internal departmental memoranda.

16. Papers requested, submitted or received in confidence by the government from sources outside the government.

Ministers' Correspondence

Ministers' correspondence of a personal nature, or dealing with constituency or general political matters, should not be identified with government papers and therefore should not be subject to production in the House.

Consultant Studies

In the case of consultant studies, the following guidelines are to be applied:

1. Consultant studies, the nature of which is identifiable and comparable to work that would be done within the Public Service, should be treated as such (the reports and also the terms of reference) when consideration is being given to their release.

2. Consultant studies, the nature of which is identifiable and comparable to the kind of investigation of public policy for which the alternative would be a Royal Commission, should be treated as such and both the terms of reference for such studies and the resulting reports should be produced.

3. Prior to engaging the services of a consultant, Ministers are to decide in which category the study belongs, and in cases of doubt are to seek the advice of their colleagues.

4. Regardless of the decision as to which category (1. or 2. above) the consultant report will belong, the terms of reference and contract for the consultant study are to ensure that the resulting report comprises two or more volumes, one of which is to be the recommendations while the other volume(s) is (are) to be the facts and the analysis of the study. The purpose of this separation is to facilitate the release of the factual and analytical portions (providing that the material is not covered by the exemptions listed above) enabling the recommendations (which, in the case of studies under category 1., would be exempt from production) to be separated for consideration by Ministers.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

BILINGUALISM

TEACHING OF FRENCH AS SECOND LANGUAGE IN NATIONAL CAPITAL AREA—STATEMENT BY SECRETARY OF STATE

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to announce that I have reached agreement with the Hon. Thomas Wells, the Minister of Education of Ontario, regarding the provision of supplementary funds to Ontario school boards in the National Capital Region for a pilot project in increased teaching of French as a second language.

[English]

These additional funds are to be made available in the context of an experimental project. In the first year, approximately $2 million is to be provided through the Ontario Ministry of Education from the bilingualism programs budget administered by my department. The cost of research involved in the experiment, as well as its evaluation, will be borne by the Ontario government.

[Translation]

A decision on the exact amounts of money involved in the program will be made after proposals have been received from the four boards concerned on the Ontario side of the National Capital Region. I expect that the province will be receiving submissions from them shortly, after which we look forward to further consultations leading to implementation of the agreement at the beginning of the next school year.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I would like to emphasize how pleased I am personally that we have been able to reach agreement on this new arrangement, which we expect will go a long way toward strengthening bilingualism in the National Capital Region. This form of co-operation, in a carefully evaluated experimental program, could, we think, lead to important new advances in this field. We also expect it will provide substantial new data on techniques of second language teaching which will be of value across the country. I am also very gratified at the initiative which has been taken by the school boards concerned and I believe they should be complimented on their foresight and interest in a problem which is of concern to all Canadians.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the minister for sending a copy of his statement to me. I want to say to him, through you, Sir, that the statement is most welcome. Perhaps, indeed, it could be characterized as a landmark. First, it recognizes that the national capital is a particular area of need and that since the government of Canada is the major employer in the area the federal government has a major responsibility to ensure that the young people of this area, the majority of whom look forward to careers in the public service, will have a reasonable opportunity to compete and to advance. Second, it recognizes the very reasonable proposition that, over the long haul, second language training is better undertaken not when one has reached the age of maturity but when one is young and can be motivated to learn for the right reasons.

It is also vindication of the position I took during the campaign and in this House. We are, in effect, attempting to remake Canadian history in the national capital area, and we cannot effectively remake 105 years of that history in five years. It will not take 100 years either, but it must be recognized by everyone that the object of the whole exercise will never be achieved except in an atmosphere of acceptance and understanding. It is heartening to know that what was said and done in the latter part of 1972 has not been in vain. In that respect I welcome the statement.

I know that the four school boards in this area will be overjoyed with this announcement. I applaud their initiative. Their ratepayers have been pushing for action in second language training at a time when their expenditures are being curtailed. I am sure this will ease the burden for them. More important, it will ease the minds of parents who, with their children, have found themselves in the midst of a bilingual hurricane recently.

Most of all, Mr. Speaker, the young people of the national capital area will be the ultimate beneficiaries of this announcement. It is in their name that I welcome this announcement, for many of them will have doors opened for them in the private as well as public sectors that might otherwise have been only ajar and in some places closed. I congratulate the minister, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. John Harney (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I should like first to congratulate the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) on his success in negotiating this agreement.

For our part, we naturally welcome the establishment of a pilot project in the National Capital Region, especially as it is well-known that the school boards in question have often asked for help to go ahead with a program likely to promote bilingualism in this highly sensitive area of our country.

Having expressed our enthusiasm at the start, I should now like to make a couple of points that are perhaps a criticism of the government's bilingualism policy. First, it must be understood that, although there was a pretty clear need for a project in the National Capital Region, we must not delude ourselves into thinking that a pilot project in the National Capital Region is going to lead to conclusions that apply to situations in other parts of the country.

Second, I would like to point out to the minister that he is going astray, because it is obvious that in several areas of the country the teaching of a second language, be it French or English, is deteriorating instead of improving.

I would like to ask the minister if in the very near future and through the provinces he could get in touch with the authorities of English-speaking universities in Canada and ask them to reconsider as soon as possible the decision taken a few years ago not to require from students seeking admission to university a satisfactory knowledge of the second language.

In concluding my remarks, I would like to congratulate the minister for that achievement.

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, speaking after the previous speakers, I would like, on behalf of the Social Credit party, to congratulate the Minister for the initiative that he has taken in co-operation with the province of Ontario in order to launch a pilot project for a period of one year.

However, I see that foreigners are somewhat surprised when it is proclaimed throughout the country that there are two official languages in the National Capital. Reference is made to a second language when I go in Ontario; when I am in Quebec, the second language is English. It seems to me that in the National Capital, we should simply suggest a grant for the promotion of the French language in the National Capital.

A language, Mr. Speaker, as all are aware of it, cannot be forced upon anybody. Whether it is your first or your second language, the choice is up to you. I suggest that the hon. minister has taken the best course by giving all the English-speaking population in the National Capital area an opportunity to improve their knowledge of the French language and achieve thereby greater fulfillment and participation in Canadian life. Bilingualism cannot be forced upon Canada through legislation. I believe that projects like this one, attempting to involve the greatest possible number of English-speaking citizens, will achieve the best results. In Quebec, we are happy to involve the greatest possible number of French Canadians in learning English. Bilingualism broadens one's culture, whether it is English or French. It also is in keeping with the reality of a country like Canada.

Once more, I must congratulate the hon. minister as well as the Ontario School Boards for having concluded this agreement and I am sure there will be no regrets on any one's part and that both parliament and the province of Ontario will be commended for this move.

[Mr. Harney.]

INDUSTRY

U.S. PROTECTIONIST MEASURES AFFECTING MICHELIN TIRE COMPANY—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Tétrault):

That this House address a note of protest to the government of the United States for having applied a clearly discriminatory measure against the Michelin industry in Canada as a result of the compensation paid to it by the Canadian government, and that this note read as follows:

The members of the House of Commons of Canada unanimously protest against the decision of the government of the United States to apply a discriminatory protectionist measure against the Michelin tire industry in Canada, and regret that said government of the United States takes so little note of Canadian economic planning while our country offers the United States, more than any other country, possibilities for advantageous exchanges and transactions in Canada. The members of the House of Commons of Canada sincerely hope that the measures taken against the Michelin Company will soon be dropped by the government of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I therefore ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move this motion of urgent necessity to prevent the government of the United States—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member cannot present arguments in support of his motion. Hon. members have heard the motion moved by the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau). Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: As there is not unanimous consent, the motion may not be put.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

MANPOWER

PLACEMENT PRIORITIES—DIRECTIVE OF MARCH 9—MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I have a question for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker, arising out of the blame that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration yesterday placed upon his deputy minister for the contents of the departmental directive of March 9 regarding the priorities to be followed by manpower offices in filling jobs. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether this means that his government has abandoned the principle of ministerial responsibility for the conduct of the department.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): In no way, Mr. Speaker. I am sure the responses of the minister in the past few days have indicated that he intended to share any political blame—

Mr. Hees: You don't share it. You take it.

Mr. Trudeau: —that he intended to share any political blame with the government for any act or omission of ours. It is clear to me that the minister, yesterday, was answering a question of fact which was put to him. In no circumstances, to me or to anyone else to my knowledge, has he indicated that he found the conduct of the deputy minister one that he wanted to blame publicly.

Mr. Stanfield: I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether, as leader of the government, he approves of a minister, in this case the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, allowing a directive of this importance, affecting the welfare of so many Canadians, to go out without the personal examination, personal supervision and personal approval of the minister? Is this the standard of ministerial responsibility in matters of this importance that the Prime Minister expects of his ministers? Is this standard of responsibility satisfactory to the Prime Minister?

Mr. Trudeau: Obviously, Mr. Speaker, the results have not been satisfactory and the minister has said as much to the House. But in matters of administration of this kind there are bound to be some decisions taken at various levels in the department of which the minister is not aware all the time. I do not know whether, with regard to this kind of directive, it is a rule for the minister to have seen it in advance or not, but I do know that as a matter of practice in administration things are done all the time in ministers' names, and they should be done that way. The minister can only check the most important and those that traditionally or legally or by regulation come up to him.

Mr. Stanfield: Is it the view of the Prime Minister that a directive of this importance, potentially and actually affecting the lives of hundreds of thousands of Canadians, is a directive that can be delegated properly to the bureaucracy, to a deputy minister? Or is it a matter—I put it to the Prime Minister very clearly—that he expects his ministers to supervise and accept not only parliamentary responsibility but personal responsibility as well?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I think that under our system a minister must, and does in fact, accept responsibility for everything that is done under his administration. I repeat that as a matter of practice the minister of a department cannot possibly know every detail of every act done by every official within his department.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

BENEFIT CONTROL—OFFERING OF JOBS BY MANPOWER OFFICIALS BEFORE CLAIMANTS DISQUALIFIED—PROCEDURES FOLLOWED

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Does any co-ordination exist between the Canada Manpower Centres and the Unemployment Insurance Commission? In other words, does the Unemployment Insurance Commission cut off claimants by computer before manpower officials have had an opportunity to interview the claimants affected and offer them a job?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there is co-ordination between the Department of Manpower and Immigration and the Unemployment Insurance Commission, and it has been my impression since taking this portfolio that the desire of all hon. members is that there be greater co-ordination between the two agencies. With regard to the operation of disqualification procedures and benefit control, I elaborated on that in my statement the other day and I do not think I can add anything to it at this time.

Mr. Rose: With a great deal of respect, Mr. Speaker, I believe the minister has begged my question. I was asking him about the order in which these claimants are cut off by computer, and the interviewing techniques and methods used by manpower officials. If people have not had the opportunity of being offered a job, I think it is grossly unfair to cut them off by computer. I will come to my question, Mr. Speaker, because I see you are becoming a little anxious. In light of the minister's reply yesterday, and since it is virtually impossible for 40,000 people to be interviewed by 400 benefit control officers, what methods are used to declare people ineligible?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, UIC claimants are referred to manpower, and where jobs are identified as being available in the area the benefit control operation goes to work. With regard to the impossibility of conducting interviews, benefit control officers can interview, and are charged with the responsibility of interviewing, six people a day, or 30 a week, or 270 over nine weeks, which is the period under discussion regarding the disqualifications that I mentioned the other day. Since there are some 360 benefit control officers, simple multiplication would indicate the ability to conduct 97,000 interviews.

[Later:]

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order in respect of a reply given to the House a moment ago by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. I have had an opportunity to do some mathematics, and I would not want the minister to be accused again of misleading the House. I think that the figure he gave the House would certainly be possible provided all of the 350 benefit control officers were named to a particular area rather than spread across the country working every day where disqualifications—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would not think the hon. member would suggest that this is a point of order. It is a point of debate between members. If he has a further question he might be recognized in a moment, but I wonder whether it is really a point of order. It does not sound like one. In any event, he might like to indicate how it is a point of order.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, I thought I had stated the point of order a little earlier. Because of the need for clarification, and rather than having the minister accused of misleading the House, I should like to ask him whether or not all 350 of these benefit control officers were indeed working in the Toronto-Hamilton area where the disqualifications occurred, and did these benefit control officers actually interview 40,000 people before the claimants were disqualified?

Mr. Andras: In answer to the final portion of the question, I cannot guarantee that they were all interviewed. That was the subject matter of a question put to me yesterday which I said I would investigate. As to the figure I was quoting, I was talking about the potential in the same way as I think the comment about the absolute impossibility of doing it was raised yesterday. Both are conjectures, but one is certainly as sound as the other. Ninety-seven thousand potential interviews would, theoretically, certainly look after 40,000 disqualifications. As to the final part of the question, I will investigate that and let the hon. member know.

[Mr. Rose.]

PLACEMENT PRIORITIES—DESIGNATION OF DIRECTIVES AS REGULATIONS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Minister of Justice. I should like to ask the minister whether he would advise his colleagues that where there has been exercise by any person of a power to govern delegated by a statute, whether it be in the form of a directive or an order, it is a regulation and must be considered as such, and that this House expects the law to be observed.

METHOD OF OPERATION OF BENEFIT CONTROL OFFICERS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Is it the policy or practice of his department in carrying out the blitz operation that has been conducted across the country to assemble the BCO's from various centres in one area—that is not birth control officers but benefit control officers—to carry out a centralized operation in that area with the express aim of hitting people hard and in a hurry in order to get at the most people as quickly as possible?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, having regard to the implication in the question I would have to say no. Generally speaking, in the larger centres the benefit control operation goes on continuously. However, where there has been identified the existence of particular jobs in a smaller centre and the existence of people on claim who have skills in these jobs in that smaller centre, then benefit control officers might be sent from another area to conduct the interviews. That is the way the operation works and that is the way I tried to describe it the other day.

Mr. Lundrigan: Can the hon. gentleman indicate the approximate relationship between the number of people who were disqualified and the number who, having gone through the appeal procedure, were later reinstated, and whether in fact it is in the neighbourhood of 80 per cent reinstatement, thereby really calling into question the value of the blitz procedure the minister has instigated?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I question the figure of 80 per cent. I cannot give precise details, but I want to make this point which I made in a statement the other day. Sometimes disentitlement is made on the basis of failure to be able to produce proof of search for work where there is work in existence in a community and entitlement is restored by virtue of the fact that the interview leads that person to go and search for work. If that is the case, benefits are restored during the period between the interview and the finding of work. I think that is the proper way to do it.

Mr. Lundrigan: I have another supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are a number of supplementary questions, but perhaps the hon. member might be allowed to ask one more.

[Translation]

I think that the hon. member for Charlevoix would like to direct a supplementary. I shall recognize him after the last supplementary of the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate.

[English]

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the hon. gentleman. In view of the fact that people lose their benefits during the period of disqualification even though they are reinstated, and in view of the fact this process has been carried out right across the country—I could give evidence to this effect if I had the opportunity that the minister has on motions—and knowing that this has caused a great deal of hardship, will the minister make a statement on motions again outlining the extent to which he has been able to clean up this blitz process that has caused so much anguish, and also report to the House on the response he has received from the internal inquiry by the board that he said would be able to report yesterday? Would he make such a statement on motions on Monday?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I doubt that I will be in a position to make a statement on motions on Monday. I am consulting with the advisory committee on Monday evening, I believe, but I am not sure whether the time of that meeting has been set yet.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Charlevoix.

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Charlevoix): I apologize, Mr. Speaker, but my question is not a supplementary. May I ask it just the same?

Mr. Speaker: I shall recognize the hon. member in a moment.

MANPOWER

PLACEMENT PRIORITIES—DIRECTIVE OF MARCH 9—MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. In view of his answer to the Leader of the Opposition to the effect that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration shared responsibility for the mistake that was made with his deputy minister, does this government not accept the principle that has been accepted by all Canadian governments since the beginning of the parliamentary process that a minister accepts full responsibility for what goes on in his department and does not share it with any of his civil servants?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member and those who applaud him read the blues they will see that I said the minister shared the responsibility with the government, not with his deputy minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): He shared it with his deputy minister yesterday.

Mr. Hees: You said "deputy minister", and you know it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: You did.

I ask my question of that hon. gentleman in his capacity as chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Howard: That just occurred an hour ago, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: What time is the party?

Mr. Howard: Because of the importance of transportation questions in western Canada, to which the government is giving some priority, will the hon. member tell the House when the steering committee of that committee will meet?

Mr. Jack Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I might inform the House that the steering committee will meet as soon as the parties involved give me the names of the members they wish to act on the steering committee. Then we will sit down and try to plan our program.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Charlevoix.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I do not know if I have received such representations, Mr. Speaker, but I shall check on this.

BENEFIT CONTROL—POSSIBLE NUMBER OF DISQUALIFICATIONS—AMENDMENTS TO ACT

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Peel South): Mr. Speaker, this question is supplementary to those directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact that well over 40,000 people have been disqualified by the benefit control officers in the past few weeks, is the government of the opinion that with continued vigilance perhaps 100,000 might be disqualified?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, that is the last thing in the world about which I would want to make a forecast.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact there have been problems in connection with disqualification, has the government any further amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act to offer which would make it less attractive for people to be on unemployment insurance so that disqualification would not be necessary?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, my prime purpose is to protect the generosity of the best unemployment insurance scheme in the world. We are trying to ensure that the credibility of that scheme is maintained with the Canadian people so that people genuinely unemployed and genuinely in need of income during an interruption in their regular earnings are in fact going to get it.

[Mr. Speaker.]

MANPOWER

PLACEMENT PRIORITIES—DIRECTIVE OF MARCH 9—MINISTERAL RESPONSIBILITY

Mr. Peter Reilly (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, in attempting to assist the Prime Minister to preserve his rather shaky credibility—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: That's a good warm-up.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows as well as other hon. members that he cannot ask a question in those terms.

Mr. Baldwin: Have you got one of those ski sweaters?

An hon. Member: The minister will need one next year.

Mr. Reilly: In view of the fact that the minister has lost no opportunity to implicate his deputy minister in this affair since March 9, and in light of parliamentary tradition which requires him to accept full responsibility for the conduct of business in his department, will he now publicly accept that responsibility and clear the name of his deputy minister, or will he resign?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I think the involvement of the deputy minister came about mainly as the result of my answer to a question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Hamilton West, which appears on page 2241 of Hansard. He asked me this direct question:

> Was that directive released with the approval of the minister, or did his deputy issue it contrary to the instructions or directions of the minister?

My answer was as factual and as honest as it could be. The only alternative I would have had to put it differently would have been to lie.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

• (1140)

Mr. Reilly: I rise on a question of privilege, and I place myself in the hands of the Chair on this, Mr. Speaker. The minister's reference to the deputy minister was not confined to a simple honest answer to the hon. member for Hamilton West. The minister on several occasions, not only in this House but outside the House through the medium of television, implicated his deputy in this sorry affair. As a member of the House representing many thousands of civil servants whose interests, I suggest to Your Honour, are adversely affected by this kind of sorry conduct, I demand of the minister that he publicly clear the name of a loyal civil servant or resign from the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take this question as notice so that I may look at the recent United States decision in this respect and answer later.

FINANCE

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY CRISIS—POSSIBLE NEUTRALIZING OF EURODOLLAR HOLDINGS OF MULTINATIONAL CORPORATIONS

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that in light of the deepening international monetary situation the suggestion has been put forward that perhaps one way to arrive at a solution is to neutralize the holdings of Eurodollars by multinational corporations, I am wondering whether, when the President of the Treasury Board represented Canada an expression was made about this opinion at the meetings in Paris?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have no report on any statement that might have been made by the minister in Paris. He will report to me when he comes back.

Mr. Gillies: Has the government discussed the possibilities, the impact and the effect of neutralizing Eurodollar holdings of Canadian corporations and the impact that would have on the international monetary situation?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I did not discuss that matter with the minister, but I cannot speak on behalf of the Minister of Finance who is being represented by the President of the Treasury Board.

STUDY OF EFFECT OF REVALUED CURRENCIES ON CANADA IN ORDER TO TAKE STEPS TO CONTROL INFLATION

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the increased cost to Canadians of some 25 per cent to 30 per cent on goods imported from Germany and Japan as a result of the revalued mark and yen, will the Prime Minister indicate whether he plans to authorize a study by any department of the government in order to determine the over-all effect of the revalued currencies on Canada so that steps can be taken to control our run-away inflation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the effect of the moving of currencies up and down in various countries with which we trade is, of course, under constant study by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and by the Department of Finance. Its effect on inflation is one that we are also aware of. I know of no particular study that has been done as a result of the recent movement of the yen and mark, but I repeat that the question obviously is very much at the core in the international section of the Department of Finance.

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY CRISIS—AGREEMENT BY COUNTRIES TO TAKE MEASURES TO FIGHT INFLATION—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Prime Minister. I should like to be more specific than the last questioner. Now that Canada has joined in a 14-nation monetary agreement in Paris where all countries have agreed to take measures to strengthen the fight against inflation, would the Prime Minister inform the House what further measures his government intends to take in Canada to fight inflation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, any announcements that will be made in this respect will be made first in the House of Commons.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, my further question is also for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the United States and certain other countries agreed at the same Paris conference to take fiscal measures, including allowing higher domestic interest rates, to help relieve the world monetary crisis, would the Prime Minister inform the House what added fiscal measures the government plans to take and whether domestic interest rates will be allowed to rise?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would think the hon. member would expect this kind of information to be given to the House by way of a statement on motions. I doubt that it should be done by way of a reply to a question.

PILOT PROJECT TO TEACH FRENCH IN NATIONAL CAPITAL AREA—TEACHING OF ENGLISH TO FRANCOPHONES

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa East): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the announcement made by the Secretary of State concerning the encouragement extended to the teaching of the second language in the schools of the national capital area and I would like to ask him a few questions on this subject.

Could he tell the House whether the $2 million grant for the teaching of the second language will be used also for the teaching of English in French-speaking schools?

[English]

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure I got the full essence of the question. The funds are essentially directed to the pilot project to improve the learning of French in the national capital region among English students. The evaluation of the success of this project will be carried out by the province and the funds involved in that evaluation will be supplied by the province.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question.

It is a recognized fact that teaching English to French-speaking classes is done more efficiently than teaching French to English-speaking classes. I would therefore ask the hon. minister whether funds made available to the provinces, Ontario in particular, will be used to assess the success in teaching English in French-speaking schools as a second language?

• (1150)

[English]

Mr. Faulkner: Mr. Speaker, I do not think that is originally envisaged, but I think that the concern the hon. member expresses and that he expressed to me before privately is something that we could take up with the provinces. I am sure there would be no long-term objection to making an evaluation of both.

INQUIRY WHETHER CORPORATE TAX MEASURES CONSIDERED TO BE MATTERS INVOLVING CONFIDENCE

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In light of all the time the government has been giving to the question of confidence recently, would the Prime Minister advise the House whether the government holds that the corporate tax measures in the May, 1972, budget go "to the root of the government's policy" and involve fundamental and "basic principles" of the government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): It is a very interesting question, Mr. Speaker.

DAIRYING—INCREASE IN INDUSTRIAL MILK PRICE REQUESTED BY CANADIAN FEDERATION OF AGRICULTURE—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the hon. Minister of Agriculture.

In view of the fact that the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, in its memorandum to the cabinet, is urging that the price of industrial milk be increased immediately by 60 cents per cwt because of the ever increasing cost of production, could the minister tell the House whether a favourable answer will soon be given to this request?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we received the request and we are studying it. As the hon. member knows, the decision has to be made before April 1 and it will be.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

Since the amount of 60 cents per cwt quoted in the brief matches production costs for November 1972, could the minister tell the House if he will take into account the increase of production costs between November 1972 and March 1973?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member is talking about extra cost, especially protein cost. We are considering this also to see if there is some way or some measure by which we can offset this cost.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte on a supplementary.

MUSHROOMS—DEPARTMENT RESPONSIBLE FOR CHANGE IN IMPORT REGULATIONS

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. What department of government, if any, made recommendations or brought about changes in the regulations pertaining to the importation of mushrooms in Canada in any form?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure that there is a direct link between milk and mushrooms. Perhaps the suggestion is that it is cream of mushroom soup.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member having asked the question, the minister might reply. We will soon be running short of time, and I would hope that supplementaries will be related as closely as possible to the original questions asked. The minister might reply now to the mushroom question.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I did not really hear the hon. member's question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McCain: With all due respect, Mr. Speaker, sometimes one has to use whatever pretext one can in order to get in a question, and I guess mushroom soup would be as good as any. I ask the minister what department would be instrumental in bringing about a change in the importation requirements with respect to mushrooms in any form?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, the department that has control over regulations governing food and the ingredients in food is that administered by my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, I guess I did not make my question as clear as I should have. I would like to direct two minor questions to the Minister of Agriculture. Why did he not have an opportunity to comment on a change that affects agriculture? Further, if there has been a change, as I understand there has been, is it to be in tariff regulations pertaining to mushrooms coming into Canada, is it to be permanent or is it applicable to only one shipment of mushrooms?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member seems to know more than I do about this subject—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: —at least if one were to accept the premise to his question. I have been consulted, and the hon. member knows very well that I have been in close contact with the Canadian mushroom industry which I believe is an important industry. Further, I have been given assurance by my colleagues who have control over the proper standards that are to be maintained by our processors and other matters that this industry will be kept healthy in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hope this does not mushroom into a debate. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport has a supplementary.

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Bell: Speaking about mushrooms!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): In view of the concern of the mushroom growers of Canada, particularly those I know in western Canada, and also in view of the fact that there are 300,000 cases of Canadian mushrooms already processed and available for sale that have not been sold, will the minister reconsider his policy pertaining to importing mushrooms into Canada?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, my policy concerning the importing of mushrooms has not changed.

Mr. Hees: Whose has, then?

Mr. Whelan: These imported mushrooms will have to meet the standards that any processor in Canada has to meet. I have been given the assurance that they will not be allowed to be dumped into Canada. As I said, I am sure the mushroom producers are aware of what I have been doing. I have been in constant contact with them and I am sure they have—how do you say it—a great deal of confidence in the fact that I am not going to let them down.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: There are just about four minutes left before the end of the question period. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar also has a supplementary, which will be the last one on this subject, after which the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Central Nova.

SUGGESTED REVIEW OF REDUCTION OF TARIFFS ON VEGETABLES AND MEAT

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the one asked by the hon. member for Bellechasse. I would like to ask the minister whether, as a result of his meetings with the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and their request that the government review its decision unilaterally to cut tariffs on a wide range of vegetables and meat, he can assure the House that this action will be reviewed in light of its possible disastrous consequences on sections of Canadian agriculture?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in his question the hon. member is talking about the possible disastrous consequences on agriculture. The Minister of Finance has made it clear that if there are any disastrous consequences on agriculture we will take action. We are watching the situation very closely, and when any member can bring us evidence that there are disastrous consequences we will act.

INQUIRIES OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration supplementary to other questions asked earlier. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if there is a blitz on in his department against administrative inefficiency and excess expenditures to correspond with the blitz against UIC claimants?

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General.

At the beginning of the week, the inmates of St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary enjoyed a topless dancers show. Could the minister tell us if it is his intention to present such shows in other institutions and if that initiative is part of the new rehabilitation policy?

TRANSPORT

SOUTHWESTERN ONTARIO RAILWAY PASSENGER SERVICE—CONSULTATION WITH ONTARIO MINISTER ON COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In light of the urgency of restoring rail passenger service to southwestern Ontario, and in light of the minister's statement recently in the House that prior to accepting the report made last year by the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications he would have to consult with the Minister of Transport and Communications of the province of Ontario, could the minister inform the House now whether such a date has been set for that meeting? If so, what is the date and, if not, would he be willing to set such a date within the next week?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I hope to meet with the Ontario minister and even the Prime Minister, Mr. Davis, before the end of March.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. Now that the minister has undertaken to do this consulting would he agree to meet with the new chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, the hon. member for Crowfoot, so that for the benefit of the Committee the substantial knowledge of the hon. member can be maximized to its fullest?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, the very first thing I did in the House this morning was to send my congratulations to the new chairman.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have just about two minutes left before the end of the question period. Would hon. members resume their seats. It will not help hon. members to stand while the Speaker is on his feet. The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate will be recognized for a brief supplementary because we are coming to the end of the question period.

AIR TRANSPORT

TRAFFIC CONTROL SYSTEM—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE FACILITIES AT GANDER NOT TO BE RELOCATED

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is very urgent. In view of the fact that plans were contemplated within the minister's department which, if implemented, could result in the long run in the dislocation of certain air traffic facilities, can the minister say whether he has investigated this matter and can he now assure the House that any such plans will be terminated?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian air traffic control system is constantly under review to ensure that the highest degree of safety in our skies is maintained. In so far as the air traffic control facilities at Gander are concerned, I am sure the hon. member will be pleased to hear that we have no plans to relocate the facilities.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INCREASE IN BASIC PENSION RECOMMENDED BY COMMITTEE—POSSIBILITY OF LEGISLATION TO IMPLEMENT

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Now that three weeks have passed since the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs made a report to the House recommending an increase in the basic pension along the lines of the report of the joint study group, can the minister tell the House whether there is hope that such a bill will be introduced at an early date?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the report of the joint study group was examined and the Veterans Affairs Committee has reported to the House. It is now being studied by the government. We expect a report in the not too distant future.

LABOUR RELATIONS

ELEVATOR CONSTRUCTOR'S STRIKE—ACTION BY ONTARIO GOVERNMENT TO SETTLE

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. Now that the Ontario government has decided to recognize its responsibility in settling the elevator strike in the province, will the minister send a message of congratulations to Premier Davis for finally accepting his responsibility?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is more a representation than a question. Before calling orders of the day the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte. I apologize to him; he had a supplementary previously and I failed to see him in his corner of the Chamber.

FINANCE

EFFECT OF BUDGET PROPOSALS ON CERTAIN AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS—REQUEST FOR CHANGE

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, in view of the absence of the Minister of Finance, I will direct my question to the Prime Minister. In light of the presentation made by national agricultural organizations on behalf of agricultural commodities which have been detrimentally affected by proposals in the budget, would the Prime Minister assure the House that he will give consideration to changing these proposals before it is too late for some sectors of agriculture?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, at the meeting of cabinet with these organizations and, indeed, in the House, the Minister of Finance has repeatedly said that he had the power to make these changes if he found that they affected agriculture adversely. As the House knows from the budget, tariff cuts were brought in for a year but the government has power by order in council to make that period shorter.

Mr. McCain: That is too late.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

PROVISIONS RESPECTING NEIGHBOURHOOD IMPROVEMENT, REHABILITATION, OWNERSHIP, NEW COMMUNITIES, ETC.

The House resumed, from Thursday, March 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. Basford that Bill C-133 to amend the National Housing Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent).

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, last evening—

Mr. Speaker: May we have order, please. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby has the floor.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, as I was about to say, the central thrust of my comments last evening was that the program provided in the bill illustrates better than anything else the neglect of housing that this government and its Conservative predecessors have shown at the federal level since the second world war. The list of programs, the talk about the neighbourhood improvement program, new provisions for guaranty standards, the residential rehabilitation program, assisted home ownership and the co-op improvements clearly illustrate that we have had nothing since 1964 in terms of housing legislation and nothing of real significance since the National Housing Act was passed. When I tried to document at some length last night the extent and seriousness of the situation in Canada, I suggested that the reliance this government has shown in the past and the Conservative party before it, on the private financial institutions to meet the needs of housing in Canada has simply not been justified.

After all, the over-all objective is to provide homes for all Canadians, and particularly to meet the needs of average and low income Canadians. The kind of changes that have been introduced since the mid sixties by the government have not accomplished this. All they have done has been to stimulate the growth of homes in total numbers; they have not solved the distribution problem. They have not assured that the homes have gone to the people who need them most. In fact they have gone to those Canadians in the top 20 per cent income bracket. What we need is a significant change in our financial institutions in particular to bring down interest rates and to ensure that money goes where it is needed in significant quantities.

I should like to comment briefly on four of the programs included in this bill. First of all, there is the neighbourhood improvement program. The New Democratic Party welcomes the new emphasis that the government apparently intends to place upon improving our neighbourhoods that could deteriorate and decline. Instead of continuing with their old program, which really amounted to bulldozing such communities out of existence, destroying the sense of community and historical continuity when they tended to move people hither and yon and replace the old residences with rather dehumanizing monstrous structures that did not meet the needs of the people who once lived in those areas, they have made changes in this new bill. We rather like that. We like the new emphasis which the minister referred to of concern with rebuilding and maintaining a sense of community in existing neighbourhoods.

We have two reservations, however. We are concerned that the required standards might impose an unacceptable burden of cost on those who can least afford it, such as, for example, pensioners and non-unionized workers in the larger cities. To this end we will be proposing amendments to clause 12 at the committee stage, the effect of which will be to remove any such burden from our pensioners and low income people who live in such neighbourhoods.

The second objection concerns provisions which, in effect, are escape clauses. We suggest that these will permit the unacceptable kind of bulldozing away of neighbourhoods that this program is supposed to eliminate. We suggest that clause 10 is an escape clause, and we were surprised to find that the minister had allowed it to remain in the bill. If our interpretation is correct, this clause will permit the kind of bulldozing that has gone on in the past to continue. We object to that most strenuously.

I should like now to turn to the residential rehabilitation assistance program. This provides for financial assistance for repairing residences. There is to be assistance of up to $2,000 in forgivable loans per dwelling unit. Our first concern is that there should be no ceiling; there should not be a $2,000 or a $3,000 ceiling; there ought not to be any ceiling on the amount to be granted, in order to bring certain minimum standards into being in all affected areas across Canada. We believe that the cost of financing basic electrical systems, heating systems, plumbing and structural components of housing ought to be borne for those eligible under this program. Until these basic minimums are covered, there ought not to be a ceiling on the amount of money that is to be made available to people under this scheme. The amount that a borrower may borrow should be scaled to income. From our reading of the legislation, it is not clear that this is to be done. It has been suggested that it will be done, but we want to make sure that it is to these ends we will be introducing amendments to make sure that these goals are achieved.

Our next area of concern under this program is that to do with the needs of rural Canada which, according to the Dennis report and other studies, are most important. It is part of the conventional widsom of members representing urban ridings that the need for housing changes in Canada exists almost exclusively in the urban parts of the country. This is not the case, particularly with respect to the need for rehabilitation. We will be looking at the minister's budgetary proposals later, we hope soon in this session, to make sure that the needs of rural Canada with respect to rehabilitation will be met.

Next, I want to say something about the assisted home ownership program. When this program was introduced last year, the government suggested it would meet all the needs of low income Canadians. Appropriately, I think the minister has modified his enthusiasm on that point. The program will, through the reduction of mortgages, through extending the period of mortgage repayments up to 40 years, and the provision of annual grants, take real steps in assisting low income Canadians; however, by no means will it be the panacea that some government spokesmen have suggested it will be for meeting the housing needs of low income Canadians. Its virtues have been greatly exaggerated. It will benefit almost exclusively people in rural areas of Canada and small cities.

The reason for this is that, effectively, only dwellings below $25,000 in cost will meet the eligibility criteria. That means that the average person in Toronto, or in my community, Oshawa-Whitby or indeed in any big city, such as Vancouver, or other cities on the west coast, will simply be ineligible for aid under the program. You simply can't buy a house under $25,000. It is important that the minister does not raise false expectations in this regard. We will be studying the proposal and we will stress the importance of making the merits of the program clear. It must be seen by all that only those living in rural areas and small cities will benefit. This part of the program will do nothing to bring housing within reach of the average Canadian in the major cities, on the west coast, in Ontario, or in the province of Quebec.

What we need, and nothing in this bill moves in this direction, is the provision of housing for people in those areas to which I have just referred. They need homes that they can afford to purchase. To this end there must be a substantial reduction in interest rates. They must be brought down to between 5 per cent and 6 per cent. In addition, the government, under provisions in the financial mechanisms bill, must take steps, particularly concerning the banks and trust companies, to ensure that there will be an adequate flow of money for meeting such housing needs. Nothing in this bill, and nothing in the financial mechanisms bill that the minister introduced, will move us in this direction. There is a complete failure on the part of the government under this program to meet the needs, of people in Canada who earn between $8,000 and $12,000 per year and live in our larger cities. This is a major gap in the government's legislative program, and we will be proposing at the committee stage amendments that will be intended to meet those needs. In the debate on the financial mechanisms bill in particular, we shall make concrete proposals that will overcome that major disadvantage in Canada's housing programs.

I should like now to turn to the co-operative housing provisions. We see in this provision a great advance over anything that has previously existed in Canada. We, of the NDP, believe that co-operative housing is and should be seen by law to be part of the non-profit private sector in housing. We think major emphasis must be given to the encouragement of co-op housing as one of the most effective and socially desirable ways of dealing with the housing needs of average and low income Canadians. With this in mind, we shall propose two significant changes. First, we will propose an amendment to make it clear that low interest loans will not be made available only to what have been regarded as charitable co-ops, but that they will be made available to all housing co-ops in Canada. I welcome the minister's comments in his speech which suggest that he intends to take steps to amend the legislation along these lines.

The second point with respect to co-ops is this: we object to the provision which puts a 95 per cent ceiling on the financing of co-operative housing projects. Co-operative projects we believe should be put on exactly the same basis as non-profit housing corporations active in other sectors of the housing program, and thus be eligible for 100 per cent financing. We think the requirement by the government that people put up five per cent acts as a deterrent which should not be part of any government program, the object of which is to encourage the spread and development of co-op housing in Canada.

In conclusions, may I say that we shall support the bill. Most of its provisions might be simply considered as a catalogue of certain areas that have been neglected in the past. On the other hand, we reject the view that much of it is new. Most of the provisions are to be found in other, existing legislation. There have been loopholes in the CMHC legislation. By bringing all these provisions together in one legislative package, however, we shall make it known to all Canadians that this wide range of programs is available to them, and therefore more Canadians will be able to obtain benefits from such provisions than was the case hitherto.

May I stress this, however: although accepting this bill, we still reject the basic view held by the Liberal party and by the Official Opposition that the private, commercial, financial marketplace will meet the housing needs of Canadians. We categorically reject that. For decades, one government after the other at the federal level has suggested that by tinkering with the Bank Act and fooling around with mortgage regulations, somehow we were going to provide houses that were needed for average and low income Canadians. It has not worked.

To repeat a point that I made yesterday, three million Canadians still live in grotesquely inadequate housing. To continue to rely on the private market mechanism, even to the degree proposed by this government, will be to perpetuate serious social housing inequalities in Canada. Therefore, when we debate the financial measures which will be required to implement some of the laudable objectives of this bill we will, (a), be rejecting the bill that will be coming later from the minister and, (b), making a proposal of our own which will, if it is accepted by the government, see in Canada the allocation of funds during the next five to 10 years which will establish, from one coast to the other, housing as a social right for all of our citizens, just as now at long last we have medicare and education established as a universal right, available to all regardless of income. That is the kind of housing program we need. That is still not the kind being suggested by this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, it is always interesting to hear the various statements from the official opposition or the New Democratic Party, because we discover in them a divergence of principles. One tends to deny everything whatsoever, to be over-critical and to oppose everything; the other admits that everything must become state-controlled.

The spokesman for the New Democratic Party has just finished his speech by opposing, once again, the economic contribution of private enterprise, and wishing that the State alone deal with housing.

Mr. Speaker, I have been quite interested by the remarks of the minister when he introduced Bill C-133 and I think that if though some shortcomings can still be found surely the proposed amendments will widen the scope of the former law. I wish to commend the minister while warning him against the regulations most often prepared by the administration and which sometimes make good legislation less accessible to those they were intended for.

This act, as the previous one, is aimed at encouraging and facilitating private investments in the field of housing. In my opinion, one of the first objectives of Bill C-133 is to give a wider role to our banking institutions, insurance companies and trust companies which are authorized by the federal government to grant housing loans under certain conditions but with certain guarantees from the government.

We realize that the government wishes to grant housing loans only after the would-be owner has tried his luck with all the other private institutions. But this advantage of the law becomes a shortcoming on several occasions as regards its administration. Indeed, some public servants have a tendency to consider the letter of the law rather than its spirit and this gives rise to many groundless refusals.

It is because I have seen this kind of thing happen that I warned the minister at the outset of my remarks about these minor defects which might stand out at the administration level. But I am glad to see that it is at the direct loan level that this law will enable the corporation to fulfil its social function in the sectors where financial institutions do not dare venture or cannot invest often because of a lack of guarantees.

I would like to draw the attention of the House on a statement made by the minister on January 30, 1973, concerning new communities. The minister expressed himself thus concerning those new communities:

To help accommodate urban growth other than by urban sprawl and to promote the development of regional growth centres, it is proposed to introduce provisions in the National Housing Act explicitly for new community development (Section 45.1).

• (1230)

This proposed addition will make it possible to assist provinces by either a loan and forgiveness mechanism or by a partnership cost-sharing arrangement.

Loans will be available to public agencies for 90 per cent of the cost of site selection and acquisition of land, including linking corridors with other communities, for open space and for planning and servicing. The term of the loan will be up to 25 years but may be extended to 50 years where land is to be leased with title continuing to be held by the public agency. Fifty per cent of the loan would be forgiven for initial land planning costs and for land acquired for recreational and other social facilities.

As an alternative to borrowing, a province may enter into a federal-provincial partnership arrangement under which the federal government would share up to 75 per cent of the capital costs and profits or losses.

In parallel with the new facility, it is intended that the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs will promote the co-ordination and channeling of the appropriate programs and aids of other federal departments and agencies in the direction of new community development.

For both the loan and cost-sharing arrangements. additional grants will be available from the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs and through the research and development provisions of the National Housing Act. These will facilitate new community experiments in such fields as urban transportation and communications, mixed land use concepts in contrast to traditional zoning practices, endeavours to reduce urban pollution and new management models in community development.

Mr. Speaker, that innovation complements the municipal aid programs still covered by the old act. However, I wonder whether, before he wrote those lines, the minister consulted with the provinces seeking their approval, or whether he simply throws the program at them, without consultation, with the attitude: Here is what we have decided unilaterally! You still have a choice: that of turning it down or accepting it. That surely is not the best way of asking for the co-operation of the provinces. Nevertheless, that is what happened at all the federal-provincial conferences.

The minister now knows to what extent the provinces, and especially Quebec, want to keep their autonomy in the fields assigned to them by the Constitution. Municipal and urban affairs lie at the very heart of those fields of activity. I quite understand that the federal minister adopts a fatherly attitude towards assistance to the provinces, but that is precisely what the provincial governments resent today, since at every meeting, whenever they can, they show the federal government that they are determined to argue from a basis of equality.

I wonder whether the present government will ever understand that this feeling of superiority—not to say supremacy—over the provinces must come to an end. For example, the federal government seems unaware, at least in its statements, that there is in Quebec a housing corporation that fulfils the same functions as the CMHC does at the federal level, because the province of Quebec is aware of its responsibilities to towns, municipalities and country areas.

If the federal government really wants to collaborate with the provinces, let it do them justice by redistributing the money that it is authorized to collect for them. And if it is going to grant loans, may the interest at least not be more than the cost of servicing. The federal government must stop playing the millionaire before the provinces.

Finally, the government encourages, urges the provinces to take part in this by offering to lend them money which they have a right to get. The minister gives us another example of this through the creation of his land development program and this is what we find at page 2 of his report, where he says:

One of the most critical factors in the cost of housing is the price of land. All governments must be prepared to act to increase the supply of serviced land if housing is to continue to be available and financially accessible to Canadians. An overall land strategy is necessary and to this end provincial and municipal governments will be encouraged to become more active in public land acquisition and servicing. The federal government is committing at least $100 million a year for the next five years for the public assembly of land, including assistance to new communities.

It is proposed to amend the land assembly provisions of the National Housing Act to make them more useful and attractive to governments.

The lending arrangement for land assembly, (Section 42), which expired by statute on March 31, 1972, would be broadened and established as a continuing program with 90 per cent loans available for any purpose having to do with housing.

The new arrangement would provide for debentures, as well as mortgages, to be used as security for the federal loan. In addition, where the province or municipality intends to lease out the land and thereby keep it in public ownership, the term of the loan will be extended from the normal 25 years up to 50 years. Repayment will be possible during the term of the loan, or as the land is disposed of, according to agreed terms.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that I have sufficiently brought this matter of federal-provincial relations to the attention of the minister; I am sure the minister will think twice before creating new programs without beforehand discussing them with the province.

• (1240)

One thing I found very interesting was that CHMC will be able to make a direct payment to the buyer to allow him to finish his house when the builder failed to do so. That is of utmost interest to me because I dealt with a case like that as recently as yesterday. The Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) will certainly hear more about it from his office since I intend to call on his officials.

This case is about a mobile home bought with a loan from Central Mortgage and Housing, and the construction and repairs have been at a standstill for months. It is a loan of $14,000 for the purchase of a mobile home which was paid $8,000 by CHMC. For the foundations and all the rest, the owner has already paid $2,800 cash to the builder plus a promissory note of $2,500 because he did not have the money to have the work done.

The owner noted everything that was missing or faulty in the building and made a report to those in charge of that at Central Mortgage and Housing. Everything has come to a dead stop and the local director of CHMC says he cannot give the balance of the loan until the house is completed. The last suggestion made to the new owner was that he get a lawyer and bring his case to court to see if he can get anything from his builder.

Do you think, Mr. Speaker, that that owner can afford to spend from $500 to $1,000 to bring his builder to court?

[Mr. Gauthier (Roberval).]

It seems to me that CHMC should have the authority to order the completion of work using the balance of the loan.

I understand that once the act is amended, it will be much easier to intervene in such cases, and I believe that this was the purpose of the minister in this particular section.

The corporation should also provide for a further protection of small homeowners through a reduction of taxes and interest rates. The minister may go on telling us that these are low cost housing units, but one can hardly believe it when taking a closer look at it. Today the smallest house costs $20,000. We must not forget that on this amount, the homeowner will have to pay 8 per cent provincial tax, 11 per cent municipal tax, the federal tax on building materials, which means that this 10 per cent down-payment which is required today from the homeowner is just designed to cover taxes.

The interest rate will often range between 9 and 12 per cent, according to the financial situation of the borrower. The poorer he is, the more he will pay. If you add to this amount municipal taxes, school taxes, fire insurance plus the insurance on the loan itself, and if you spread instalments over forty years, you will find that this poor "low income" homeowner had to pay five times the price to get a forty year old house. And all that when the owner has succeeded in securing the services of a conscientious contractor and of judicious inspectors who were not in connivance with the contractor to gyp him and force him to make repairs on very short notice.

I think that my colleague, the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin) has mentioned such examples in his speech that everybody can read on pages 1478 and 1479 of Hansard for February 20, 1973 and in which he listed the numerous complaints filed in his riding.

It reads:

In view of complaints reaching us from Ville Bélair, Val Saint-Michel and even Ville Vanier and other locations in my constituency, I am led to wonder, Mr. Chairman, at what level the studies have been conducted, and to what end? Were these studies fruitful? Did they focus on improving the quality of houses or on downgrading it?

. . . the president of the Association des propriétaires de Place Pierre-Bertrand said: "How come the governments concerned accept the recurrence of the same problems?"

In fact, the residents of similar projects in Montreal and Châteauguay are faced with identical construction defects. How is it, added the chairman, that once the building completed contractors suddenly disappear pretending they are bankrupt? How is it that sometimes after that they reappear with somewhat changed names and sometimes with the same names?

Mr. Chairman, I know a contractor who changed his name five times in 15 years. As the saying goes:

How does that grab you? After 15 years, he is still in business with the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Some people are led to believe that contractors doing bad work are simply incompetent. I for one strongly believe the contrary. I am convinced that the contractor who has succeeded in "playing" with the millions of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is highly competent. In fact, those contractors, and there is more than one, are highly competent people.

Even the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation knows its business; in fact, since last spring, we have been asking for an enquiry to be conducted and for someone to inspect these slums. We said that it was cold and there was ice in there. So we requested that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation officials investigate. They agreed and visited those houses on a day when the temperature was 55 degrees in January.

Why did they select this day? This also took experts from the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation!

I think it abnormal that contractors of this kind are still in business and multiplying their victims, especially under the protection of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

We have in front of us a statement which, I believe, speaks for itself—

The CMHC has already achieved good results. It continues to prepare and revise projects which are still very good but, unfortunately, it allows too many which are not.

All I ask the hon. minister today, all I want to know is this: what can we expect from the department, what can the people who have been cheated expect and are there still honest individuals in the CMHC who can take their responsibilities?

Mr. Speaker, I believe that after so many explanations, illustrations and demonstrations, it can be concluded that things do not always go smoothly in the administration of the corporation. We will merely invite the committee to submit each new provision of the act to an in depth study and to make amendments.

In short, we want the committee to conduct a careful review and to have those responsible for implementation of the act appear before them first of all. Officials appointed by the government and responsible to parliament for implementation of the act should appear before the committee for questioning, as well as the contractors with whom the CMHC has dealt.

It would also be interesting to have some contractors appear who are worse than chameleons, one firm having changed names five times in 15 years. The minister has the right to meet those people.

It would also be advisable to have owners, perhaps represented by their associations, as witnesses before the committee. I feel that such evidence will make it possible to develop a more effective, more humane and more equitable legislation for all Canadians.

[English]

Mr. H. T. Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, it is with a feeling of real pride that I rise to speak in support of Bill C-133 presently before the House. This bill, taking into account as it does the real sociological implications and requirements of the present time, is doing something which I think has long been necessary in this country, namely, putting emphasis on those objectives which will result in the kind of communities for which I think we are all looking. I challenge any member of the opposition to take issue with the objectives and measures sought to be put into the act. Perhaps I could do no better in opening than refer to the Montreal Gazette of today which states that this bill includes measures to assist community planning, to attack land price increases, to give aid to co-operative and non-profit housing groups, to support attempts by low and medium income families to buy their own homes and to promote the restoration and preservation of old residential areas and cities.

Some few weeks ago our minister stated that the challenge before us is to preserve and improve our living spaces in neighbourhoods, villages, towns and our great cities in the face of the rapidly accelerating trend to urbanization. If we needed a stimulus in rising to this challenge, we have before us the depressing example of many urban areas of north America and the world that have become virtually uninhabitable because of congestion, pollution and decay, with all of the associated symptoms of crime, disease, poverty and the destruction of the human spirit. At the other end of the population shift, in the rural areas, is the threat of depopulation, abandonment and disappearance of a style of life and a scale of values that is uniquely Canadian. In Canada, we still have time to head off this kind of future by intelligent, rational planning and a concerted national effort involving all of the governments and people in all walks of life.

In attempting to face this challenge, it has been necessary to recognize the problems laid out so adequately by our minister in respect of the physical and social environment in which housing is being constructed. First of all there is the problem of availability, making sure there is enough housing in sufficient variety for the growing population. There is the problem of accessibility, making sure that housing is within the income reach of people who need it. We have the problem of housing quality, making sure that housing is not only sound but that it continually reflects advancement in design and technology.

There is also the problem of planning for the future, mounting research programs to increase our knowledge, re-examining and adapting our institutions and working out new styles of intergovernmental consultation and co-operation in the field of housing and community planning. We also must consider changes in the age structure of the Canadian population which is likely to present a challenge to us, especially in the last few years of the decade. Elderly people are going to represent a substantially greater proportion of the total population, and the demand for senior citizens' housing will be very much greater. Housing for elderly people already receives a significant volume of funds, but the prospect is that within the next few years those funds will have to be multiplied.

I was not born a rich Tory, so possibly I look at housing from a different point of view. I have spent the last 25 years in the construction industry. I can think back to my earlier formative years when I was living in a third storey tenament. We had three rooms to house my mother, my father, my sister and myself. We had to carry water in buckets up three flights of stairs for our normal household needs and we had to carry our dirty water back down. The only convenience was one common to all tenants in the backyard, and that was not a garden.

In those days, the thinking was that we should build huge low-cost housing units in order that we could move all these people and demolish these rat traps—and they were rat traps. When it rained the roof leaked in many places; at night we were always awakened by traps going off that were not filled with just mice, but rats as well. These were the conditions out of which we moved into low-cost housing intended to provide us a different environment.

Mr. Speaker, shall I stop now and continue after lunch?

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps we should call it one o'clock. It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Herbert: Mr. Speaker, before lunch I was talking about the conditions some of us experienced in the late twenties in moving to the massive housing developments that were constructed in the thirties in order that these terrible slum accommodations could be demolished. Row upon row of well constructed houses were being built to move these families into accommodations the like of which they had never before experienced. They had running water, a real luxury. They had electricity, another luxury. Each house had a little garden. Trees were planted and there were hedges. There were also parks and open spaces. In every way, the environment was very pleasant. Within a period of two years the trees had been broken; the hedges had been pulled up and the children played in the street because they must walk the distance of a block to the park. The locks of the houses were destroyed and the community as a whole was slowly being destroyed.

I mention this in connection with this bill because we all recognize that today changes are not made simply by moving people out of the accommodations in which they are presently living or attempting to change their standard of living. The change must be brought about by a mix involving the different levels of society and the example of other people, whether neighbours and so on. At the present time we are very fortunate in Canada in that in many areas we see this mix of different social levels which is so essential if we are to achieve our objective and give everybody the opportunity they seek.

Shortly after the war, the kind of low-cost housing I was speaking about was still being built in Montreal. I was involved in projects in Montreal in the St. Michel and Saint Laurent areas where, in those days, houses were being built at a price of between $8,000 and $9,000 with down payments of around $500. I mention these figures because many figures have been thrown at us by previous speakers in respect of the high cost of housing. I want to compare what happened immediately after the war with another side of the situation.

Let us see what is happening today. Within 20 miles of downtown Montreal, less than a 30 minute drive on fine expressways, one can find well constructed homes the down payment on which is $750 and the cost of which is $14,000. These houses are on beautiful lots and are within two blocks of the lake and the river. They are within walking distance of churches, schools and shopping centres. Those houses are being built in large numbers. So, Mr. Speaker, let us not generalize and use as a basis for that generalization the conditions we find at present in Toronto.

I want to refer specifically to conditions in Toronto because it is acknowledged to be one of the fastest growing cities in North America. It is also a city in which you can find houses going up in fantastic numbers. Costly they may be, but they are being built because they are being bought. They are being bought because people think they are a good buy, because they want them in that location and at those prices.

Because of my keen interest in this subject, I listened very attentively to the three lead-off speakers for the opposition parties. I was particularly keen to learn their proposals, and not just to hear their usual objections to everything that is introduced by the government party, because that is taken as normal these days. But what concrete suggestions did they come up with, Mr. Speaker? I noted the second speaker made some proposals which I found very interesting. I noted, too, that the third speaker made some proposals, which I did not find quite so interesting, but they were certainly specific. I will deal for a moment with the lead-off speaker for the Official Opposition, and I am very glad to see that he has entered the chamber so that I can address my remarks to him through you, Mr. Speaker.

The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) spoke for a long time. I tried very hard to find something in his speech that might be a specific proposal. I did not succeed. In fact, I might say that he must have been boring his chief supporter, the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees), because at one point I thought he was asleep, but then he yawned and I realized he was not. And he did waken up to applaud very loudly when the hon. member for Calgary North referred to an elephant eating a peanut. I could not discover the relevance of that, but this is the kind of thing we get when we listen to the Official Opposition trying to put forward something that should be worthy of them by way of valid comment, criticism, and suggestions for improvement.

One of the things the hon. member for Calgary North stressed, and that I want to deal with briefly, was the relationship that exists between the federal government and the provinces. He did this through many indirect references. He talked of revenue sharing with the provinces. He talked, for example, of the elevator strike, which certainly most of us consider to be a provincial responsibility. But what interests me is that at no time did he make any specific proposal whatever on what could be done to get at the root of the problem, which is the relationship between the provinces and the federal government. In fact, Mr. Speaker, if it is a constitutional problem why do we not have some specific proposals from the Official Opposition for amending the constitution, so that we can tackle this problem?

The hon. member also made us listen to a piece of poetry at the end of his speech, and I listened very carefully to see how my favourite province was going to fare in that poem. I found, as with most things with which the Official Opposition is concerned, that Quebec did not appear once in the poem. It just wasn't there, as with all their considerations. So far as they are concerned that province is not taken into account, and perhaps because of this the hon. member's speech was distorted. He obviously had not talked to the chief representative of the Conservative party from the province of Quebec.

Before the election I was in St. Hilaire, and I saw what was going on there. I was very proud of it. Excellent housing was being built in St. Hilaire at low cost, as was the case in Quebec City also. Instead of painting such a dark picture all the time, I would like to see members of the Official Opposition come up with some specific and positive suggestions, if they have any. However, I found this particular speech completely barren.

I want to make one other point. A couple of weeks ago I was invited to a social function of an association of home builders. My wife and I were taken by a very significant fact, namely, that almost all the participants were very young people, people in their late twenties and early thirties, who were home owners. I might say that they came from an area near Montreal, Pierrefonds, where quality homes are being built on a massive scale which these people can obviously afford, and in which they enjoy living.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I ask everybody interested in this subject to take the trouble to read the pamphlets and literature that are put out by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford). I find them easy to read. They clearly spell out what he is trying to achieve. I strongly recommend them to all people who have an interest in what the government is trying to do for the low income families in this country—assisted home ownership, non-profit housing corporations, residential rehabilitation, and neighbourhood improvement—all slanted to the low income level. Mr. Speaker, I am very proud of this legislation and I have no hesitation in giving it my 100 per cent support.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Peel South): Mr. Speaker, I was most pleased to hear the remarks of the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert), and was glad that he threw this side a challenge. I hope he will listen to this debate to learn the philosophy of this party, and to understand the debacle in the housing field that the minister and the government have pushed down the throats of Canadians, without any regard to how Canadians want to live and are entitled to live.

The philosophy of this party was set out by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams). It is that every family should be able to own a home, or at least have an equity in a home, where there is a backyard. And where possible that home should be a single family home, or a semi-detached home, or at the very least a townhouse. It is about time we looked after people properly, and not in the way that some socialistic democratic Liberal party would want them looked after. It is the inalienable right of a family with children to be able, if they desire, to own their own land and their own home. You will not find this party talking about leases forever, with the chance that you never can own anything in Canada. It is important for our children to have grass in the backyard, to be able to reach down and touch the earth as they grow up, to say "This land is ours—this Canada is ours". The philosophy of this minister has been such that this has been denied many people. To some extent, the philosophy of this minister, put forward to this House last Monday, was the concept that if you are poor that is it.

I am going to talk about how many people are going to be poor very soon as a result of the actions of this minister. The hon. member for Calgary North mentioned the fact that only 4 per cent of families in metropolitan Toronto could afford to buy a new house. I suppose the rest are poor. I have talked to young families with incomes up to $14,000 a year who are without a hope of ever getting a home of their own. What does the minister offer? "We will let you live with the landlord if he provides apartments and multi-units, and if 25 per cent of them are rented to poor families we will provide even larger subsidies". This government and my friends to the left are in favour of more high-rise buildings, more crowding, no backyards for kids and to some extent that is what this bill promises.

The approach in this bill has been described by others, and I am going to repeat it, as a band-aid approach from a band-aid minister from a band-aid government. In January, when that famous housing conference was held, that was the comment made by the ministers from Nova Scotia, from Alberta, Ontario, the member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) and the member for Vaudreville (Mr. Herbert), from the province of Quebec. We did not hear that before, either. It is the complete lack of policy, the lack of drive and purpose and the enormous lack of leadership that categorizes this government and condemns a greater number of people to live in high-rise apartments with smelly corridors and condemns a great many more children to learn to ride their trikes in high-rise apartments or to learn to play in those zoos they call playgrounds behind the Central Mortgage authorized apartment developments.

We have not heard anything about the enormous cost and problem of inter-urban transit. The hon. member for York Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) will be speaking on this subject later. In metropolitan Toronto, Mr. Speaker, ten railway lines ran out from the city but only one—possibly two if you can call the other a railway line—is being used for inter-urban transit. Even that is only possible because the province of Ontario is prepared to pay the CNR a profit so that the city can have some commuter service. They get little if any, help from this government.

It has been clear, Mr. Speaker, that in almost every situation the lack of serviced land is responsible for high costs. Because of a number of factors, the cost of serviced land in metropolitan Toronto has risen from about $4,000 in 1958 to $19,000 in 1972, and I am told that this year it will cost between $22,000 and $24,000. This price rise has effectively denied home ownership to all but about 4 per cent of wage earners, those who earn over $16,600 per annum. I say to the hon. member for Vaudreville that if he were unfortunate enough to have to move to Mississauga his emolument as a member of this House of Commons would hardly enable him to buy a home.

Some people, including the present minister have taken the position that speculative holdings by large corporations have created a monopoly in land ownership and that this is the problem. In my experience, Mr. Speaker, this argument is totally without reason. Any land holder in and around metropolitan Toronto, including every major developer, has plan after plan filed with the municipalities and the province which for one reason or other have been held up. After shaking out all the sociological causes for holding up plans for subdivisions, the basic problem is found to be the lack of capital in the hands of the province and municipalities which would allow development to proceed. It must be remembered that money is required to keep the municipalities going forward, to provide sewer, water, road, parks, recreation, transportation, social services and so on. These services are required not only for the new development but must be maintained for the existing development on the periphery or near the new development.

At present in the metropolitan Toronto area, large developers are required to provide pretty well all the internal costs of their plan of subdivision. There are external costs, however, which run throughout the municipal jurisdiction—for example, trunk roads, municipal bus services, extension of hydro, water and sewage services, as well as new arenas and community centres. These are necessary if a development is to proceed. In slow growth areas, perhaps some of the places that the hon. member for Vaudreville was talking about are still slow growth areas, new development can be financed from existing assessment. In fast growth areas—

Mr. Herbert: Mr. Speaker, a question of privilege.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) on a question of privilege.

Mr. Herbert: Mr. Speaker, I did not understand the first new references of the hon. member because I thought he was talking about some other location. It is apparent now that he is talking about my riding, and I should point out that it is Vaudreuil.

Mr. Blenkarn: I am most pleased to hear that, Mr. Speaker, as I never could manage the pronunciation. Mr. Speaker, in a slow growth area the problems of development can be financed from existing assessments; in a rapid growth area new assessment does not come along fast enough to finance the growth required and consequently problems arise. In my town of Mississauga, the Don Mills Development Corporation, through Erin Mills, has been very generous with the municipality in terms of subdivision agreements. However, right from the moment the new houses were occupied, people in the existing community found that the access roads were plugged with cars and they could not find a seat on the GO train from Clarkson, so had to stand all the way to Toronto. You can understand that to some extent the original residents resent and obstruct development when such facilities come under heavy pressure. It makes no difference whether the developer is a private or public developer. The ownership of land in no way affects the problem facing the existing community which is the dislocation caused by the influx of large numbers of new residents.

In 1968, the Hellyer Task Force was looking into the general question of development and it felt that if the government could control huge blocks of land it could make sure that the new land developer would bear the entire cost of development. Unfortunately, there are more costs than just the cost of new development. There are areas where government assistance is needed to assemble land. The major problem and the one that the minister does not want to bother looking at, is that we have the land developed and held by large private land banks already.

The problem is, how can we bring land on stream. We must break through red tape and make it possible for land to be serviced. Nothing has been suggested by the minister, when speaking on this bill, that would bring new lots on stream and make it possible for sufficient subdivision plans to be registered so that the shortage of serviced land will immediately be corrected. As a result of rapid growth, there is not sufficient land in and around metropolitan Toronto to even begin handling the requirements for serviced land. What happens, Mr. Speaker, is that those who hold the few remaining blocks of serviced land are able to demand higher and higher prices; because our system is such that rationing always takes place in those conditions.

I suggest that in the greater Toronto area, or even in the southern Ontario area, there is a demand right now for at least 100,000 single family lots. Enough lots must be placed on the market to drive the price down. At present hardly enough land for 12,000 shelter units is being put on the market annually. I understand from a major developer that he could sell almost everything he is allowed to develop, but that he has to ration his product to two, three or four builders; even then, he must continue to turn down applicant after applicant who wants to build houses, because not enough serviced land is available. An emergency has developed; the log jam must be broken. This bill will do nothing whatever to attack that problem.

The value of accommodation in our society is determined by supply and demand. Even in a socialist society, and my friends to the left know all about this, units theoretically are made available on a needs basis;

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What does the hon. member know about that?

Mr. Blenkarn: Yet I am told that money paid under the table determines the priority of applications. There is no need for the government to buy farms and gobble up good land. There is a need for land already set aside for development to be put on the market. We must make sure it is serviced, and make sure that land needs are planned.

Mr. Broadbent: God bless free enterprise.

Mr. Blenkarn: A few years ago there was a surplus of land on the market in some places, but developers knew that they could get good prices for it. Today there is less than one half, less than one third, in some cases I venture to suggest less than one tenth, of land needed available on the market. Consequently, prices have risen.

Existing communities see certain advantages in no further development taking place in their areas. After all, the arenas have been erected, the parks are open, and they do not want to see roads further congested as a result of development. Often, if one goes to a ratepayers' meeting, one will find the local residents opposed to further development, because they do not want their children to move to another portable school. What we must do is attack this problem.

At present the federal government collects approximately $400 million per year in sales taxes on building materials. This tax is charged at the manufacturers level. It is a tax collected on building, and a good part of it is a tax on shelter. From the point of view of the tax collector, then, the government has an interest in promoting construction. Eleven per cent of the cost of each brick used accrues to this government. Surely, part of this money, collected as a direct result of development, should go back to the communities that pay for the cost of development.

The responsibility of the federal government lies in the field of banking and finance. Therefore, the federal government ought to make block financing available to provinces and, if necessary, directly to municipalities, perhaps on some sort of bonus basis, in order to encourage more serviced land to be put on the market. Block financing would compensate municipalities and provinces and make development possible; also, it would make development less objectionable to local residents, because developers, municipalities and provinces could say that existing residents will be able to get social amenities in advance of new developments taking place. Block financing would encourage municipalities and provincial planners to allow development to take place, and ratepayers would recognize that new development in their particular area would improve their quality of life. Cash would be made available in advance for the erection of rinks, access roads and sidewalks; and rapid transit lines, schools and other amenities could be installed and operating in advance of development.

Existing populations in areas, instead of sensing that development would harm them or destroy certain activities in their communities, would welcome new development. If block financing were adopted, towns, cities and provinces would force development ahead, because they would not be penalized as a result of development activity. They would make sure, as well, that developers pay their own costs. They could put pressure on developers and on those who own blocks of available land and say, if you do not develop this land, we will tax you as if you had developed it; otherwise, there would be no control as to the amount of land that could be brought on to the market. The extra serviced land for development that might be brought on the market in the long run would drive the price of land down. No longer would owning a vacant apartment site be a good investment; no longer would the extra lot beside one's house be so attractive. In addition, as more serviced land would become available and as prices would fall, there would be less desire on the part of people to speculate in the land market. People would be discouraged from behaving like squirrels.

We need to get things back as they were. At one time there was a vacant lot down the street and another one across the street. You know, vacant lots in older communities added charm to those communities. We did not then develop the sterile types of communities that we now seem to develop. A few houses were built in one year, and a few more were built in another; a few vacant lots were filled in, and the community did not look as if it had all come off one drawing board, with three sets of plans, three different roof designs and front doors of three different colours. Our communities were worthwhile. That is the kind of thing to which we must return. We cannot continue building housing of such a kind that, when you walk into a subdivision, you can tell almost to the day when the houses were built and which monster building corporation built them all. This is not the kind of thing that ought to be encouraged, but that is the approach we have taken in the past; that is the way Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation operates and that is the way the present ministry, which adopts bandaid approaches, chooses to operate.

I now want to turn to the question of land banking. This particular program interests me, because it shows the velocity of this government in acting. Suppose the federal government were to utilize its money to buy land. In the first place, Mr. Speaker, the question arises, where? Around metropolitan Toronto and for some considerable distance outside Toronto, most of the land is owned by persons either using it for their personal recreation and enjoyment or by persons holding it and hoping to develop it. If the government were to buy land fairly close to metropolitan Toronto it would, in effect, be buying land from one proposed developer and, in reality, we should merely witness a transfer of title.

For example, suppose that the government were to buy land presently held by Don Mills Development Company Limited in the Erin Mills site, Mississauga. All that would happen in that instance would be that a corporate bum would get paid—I thought you would like that—for having done nothing to develop the land. It would in fact represent, again for my friends to my left, another corporate rip-off. Perhaps that is what the minister has in mind. The only alternative is for the minister to go out into the countryside where land is held by original farmers and create new towns there. That sounds very idealistic. However, new towns that were recently created in Ontario and everywhere else were not just created because someone decided to see them there. They were developed because of the economic interest of the people in the community.

• (1440)

A town develops because there is a railroad, a good harvest or a good mill site. It is certainly true to say that none of the towns in Ontario or, indeed, all of Canada, were started just because the land was cheap. If the federal government decides to buy land somewhere in the countryside, let us examine some of the first things that will follow from such a course. First, trunk road services would have to be built, to the site, as well as other transportation services, to connect the new development with the rest of the country. Having spent huge sums of money to make access possible, a reason for the town's existence would have to be created. The town must have business centres and industry in which people can work. Such development does not occur by merely wishing it. Each step along the path of development requires a huge loan, subsidy, grant or advance if it is to follow to a successful conclusion. Following this, construction must proceed. Roads must be put in, houses must be built, schools must be provided and all the services connected therewith.

Unless occupancy of the houses, factories and schools is held up until the whole new town is a cohesive unit, what do you get? You have a myth on your hands. If you are going to build a new town, you have to build the whole thing before you allow anybody to move into it. That is the whole problem of the new town concept presented by this minister.

Let us look at the question of servicing. Suppose, for example, the minister does buy a block of land. The first thing that is required is the provision of primary services. In order to provide those primary services, they must be brought to areas of existing development owned by existing owners. However, as soon as you bring a trunk sewer through undeveloped land or put a trunk road through private land held by private owners, those private owners immediately insist on their right to hook up to these services.

With this new town concept, what you really do is create string urban sprawl. It is politically impossible to say to someone that a new road, new trunk sewer and new hydroelectric service in front of his property cannot be used by him. It is politically impossible to do that. What you find all along the line between the proposed town site and the place where services can be obtained is a political requirement allowing all those persons to hook up and, therefore, you get urban sprawl. One of the things that is in fact being advocated by this minister in his new community concept is more urban sprawl.

Mr. Basford: Nonsense. It is straight Tory nonsense.

Mr. Blenkarn: The major problem with the new town concept is the huge time lag. It takes a couple of years to acquire land, probably five to eight years to complete the planning and arrange the financing and another eight to 10 years for construction. In the meantime, investment goes on without any return whatsoever. One must surely ask, after analysing the scheme, does it cost any less?

We have all seen government in action. We have all seen how government programs lead to waste. Many of us have analysed the government's attempt in the Malvern area in the east part of Toronto. This land was picked up over 20 years ago. Minimal taxes have been paid on this land throughout this period of time. People employed in government have been required to look after the land. I doubt whether their wage costs have ever been pro-rated against that land. Huge sums have been spent on planning. People employed in government have had to make representations to other governments. Finally, Mr. Speaker, that land may be brought on the market.

After analysing all of the costs, will there be cheaper house lots or not? I suggest that clear example indicates that the cost of land to the ordinary purchaser 20 years or longer after the original purchase is not cheaper. I suggest that it is actually a disaster.

Mr. Basford: Why are the provincial Conservatives bragging about it?

Mr. Blenkarn: As far as current demand for serviced lots is concerned, the delay in constructing a new town does not meet the demand of today. One is looking at a delay of 10 to 15 years, and in the meantime nothing is done to attack the pressing problem of today. Land banking and new towns are not the answer to housing requirements for today. Such propositions do nothing for young people getting married today and who wish to raise a family. They do nothing for children presently being raised in high-rise apartment buildings. They do nothing to combat present high labour costs.

It is much easier for a town to grow from an existing core. In an existing core, there are churches, stores, some form of public recreation and some form of transportation. Additions can be made to the present transportation and recreation facilities. If the central government is prepared to block fund the municipality and the province to make this development in small towns and areas possible, that block funding must cover the whole social cost of development. That is the kind of approach that must take place. That is not the approach we are receiving in this bill. We already have large private land banks around most of our major cities and towns. The only advantage of public land banking is that the profit in development accrues to the public, providing, of course, there is ever a profit.

Looking at some of the results of Crown corporations, I wonder where the dividends are to the public treasury. We have the CBC. Where are the dividends? We have Air Canada. Where are the dividends? We have "had" the CNR, and we know what dividends we get from that corporation. Private corporations, on the other hand, are subject to a corporate tax rate of 50 per cent. Half their profit goes to the government.

• (1450)

An hon. Member: That is the real rip-off—the government rip-off.

Mr. Blenkarn: So, from enterprises conducted in the private marketplace, governments benefit to the extent of 50 cents on the dollar though they have no share in equity or ownership. We already enjoy half the profits made by land developers. Why should our philosophy change now? Private development companies, many of them large corporations, are able to employ competent, top-rate staff. On the other hand, many of those presently employed in the planning departments of our cities and towns, as well as in government, just cannot compete in the private enterprise world. They show no evidence of being efficient, capable, driving or profit-oriented. In my opinion, the efficiency of production is destroyed when government gets into the act. We have seen this happen many times in various fields of activity and I see no reason to expect it to be different in the one now under discussion.

Many of the people in the new Liberal-New Democratic Party obviously think that to make a profit is terrible. To supporters of this party, making a profit is not a terrible thing.

Mr. Basford: Better support the tax cuts so that they can make more.

Mr. Gillies: Bring them in!

Mr. Basford: All talk and not much action.

Mr. Gillies: When are you going to bring them in?

Mr. Blenkarn: It has been suggested that speculation in land has driven prices up to unrealistic levels. What has happened, in fact, is that the cost of the only land which can be serviced, or is likely to be serviced in a relatively short period of time, has been driven up to unrealistic levels in the areas around our great metropolitan centres. If more land were rapidly placed on the market, the probability is that those who hold parcels close to the cities would no longer be able to ask what amount to extortionate prices for them. The prices offered would be less; the holders would be obliged to cut their prices in order to sell their land.

If it could be clearly demonstrated that land is capable of development, municipalities should encounter no problem, particularly in the Province of Ontario, under the Assessment Act, in making arrangements to tax the land at its market value thus forcing speculative holders either to sell or to develop it. No individual should be allowed to take advantage of the public by holding land off the market indefinitely without, at least, paying a penalty by way of tax charges. If, as a result of block funding to the municipalities in respect to part of the development cost land is put on the market, the general price of land will fall. The government should take seriously the representations made to it by the provinces at the housing conference last January to which the minister referred.

Finally, I want to say this. It is unconscionable that shelter should bear a tax, as it does. Food bears no tax. Even cocktail mix bears no tax. If shelter is to bear tax, the revenue from that tax should be rebated to those who bear the costs of development, that is to say, to the municipalities and provinces where development is taking place. Such a rebate, such a block funding to the municipalities and to the provinces, would drive down the cost of land, and that is the major problem. The federal government has declared it is making $100 million available for the purchase of land. Mr. Speaker, there is no shortage of land in Canada. We are the one country in the world which has an abundance of the commodity called land. The minister's whole approach to housing is, density, density, build the buildings higher, crowd the people closer together and make this country like Holland. The solution is not density, the solution is a really concrete attempt by the government to put forward a solid philosophy that says my children and your children should have a right to buy a home and raise a family.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): After hearing the speech of the hon. member for Peel South (Mr. Blenkarn), Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether I should laugh or cry. It is bad enough to see the Liberals in power, but I just shudder to think what would happen were the Tories in power.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gilbert: The hon. member said the Liberals have the problem of density, density, density. But the Tories have the problem of dense, dense, dense. He would have us believe that the people of Ontario enjoy the finest housing in all the world. Let me remind him, Mr. Speaker, that a great many people in Ontario would have no place to lay their heads if the federal government did not take a strong initiative in the provision of public housing. Even now, the waiting list for such housing in Toronto is approximately 18,000. Yet the hon. member says that everything is well in Ontario because the land is controlled by the private developers who have the private land banks. He says: please do not encroach on these boys because if you let them participate with the private land bank the prices of land will just drop and drop. Well, this is complete nonsense. I just wanted to tell the House that this is the way I feel after listening to the hon. member for Peel South.

Last night I heard the minister pontificate on the government's proposals regarding housing. He used a fiery rhetoric with an anglican solemnity which almost impressed me sufficiently to think he had just returned from Mount Sinai with a new set of tablets to create the new Jerusalem in housing for Canada. But after reading his remarks I realize that this just is not so. I now realize what he is really trying to do. First, he is guilty of housing hokery-pokery. Second, he is perpetuating a housing charade with regard to the housing needs of Canadians. Why do I say he is guilty of housing hokery-pokery? We talked in the past in terms of urban renewal. Now he talks in terms of NIP, standing for neighbourhood improvement program. In the past we talked about home improvement. Now, he talks about RRAP which stands for residential rehabilitation assistance purchase program. In the past we talked about home purchase assistance. Now, the minister talks about AHOP, the assistance for home ownership program. Of course, I guess it sounds very smooth, very sophisticated. But what it amounts to is a lot of housing hokery-pokery.

The minister is also guilty of performing a housing charade. One cannot criticize the philosophy set forth in the Hellyer task force report which said every Canadian is entitled to clean, warm shelter, or the statement of the Canadian Social Development Council that every person is entitled to housing as a basic human right whether he can pay for it or not.

• (1500)

These are the philosophies that have been developed across this country, and last night the minister added to them by saying that it is the aim of this government to provide good housing at reasonable cost as a social goal and government obligation. We cannot quarrel with that philosophy, but we can quarrel with the performance of the government. We recall that in 1968, when the Liberals swept back into power and set up the Hellyer task force, this was a time when we had the great "participatory democracy" theme. The hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer), the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies), Robert Campeau and two others travelled across the country to ascertain the needs of Canadians for housing accommodation. I should like to cite the four conclusions or recommendations that came forth from that group.

First of all, they said that the private market can serve the needs of Canadians for housing. That is absolutely wrong. If that were the case, we would not need bodies such as CMHC, the Ontario Housing Corporation and the many other housing corporations across the country to take care of our housing needs. Secondly, they said we should free interest rates. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that interest rates were frozen by the government. The hon. member for Trinity, a Liberal at the time, was a minister and was all for freeing the interest rate. As a result, we had the highest interest rates in the country.

Mr. Gillies: And the biggest construction year.

Mr. Gilbert: I will speak about the Conservative record in a moment, and I hope that the hon. member for Don Valley participates in the debate. The third conclusion come to by this task force was that the problem of public housing should be attacked. Public housing has not recovered from the assault made on it by members of the Hellyer task force since that date. They tried to "ghetto-ize" public housing and people instead of telling us what public housing required for improvement. There was a great deal of room for improvement in the form of recreational centres and other social requirements which fit within the public housing concept.

Lastly, the task force talked about direct funding by municipalities to take care of housing. It was on this issue that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), who is a constitutional purist, differed from the hon. member for Trinity, and they parted ways. The hon. member for Trinity sat as an independent Liberal, then played with Action Canada for a while, and finally joined the Conservative party. So we now have within the Conservative party the two great architects of the Hellyer task force report, the hon. member for Trinity and the hon. member for Don Valley.

From 1969 to the present day three things have resulted from the housing policies of this government. First, the cost of housing is the highest ever experienced in Canada, and this has added significantly to inflation in this country. Secondly, the cost of land is at its highest level. Thirdly, we have the highest interest rates. Last May and June the minister was reminded by me of these three facts, and he bristled with self-righteous indignation at the suggestion that these were the results of his policies.

What is the main criticism of housing policy in Canada today? First of all, the supply of houses in Canada has been dictated by the land developers, the builders and the financial institutions. This really is the major criticism of housing policy today. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation have responded to this situation with a fawning, suffering acquiescence not worthy of the original intentions of the legislation as set forth in 1946. It has played the part of the friendly banker. It has played the part of the economic regulator by turning the money tap on and off. Now at last it is putting forward a framework that can only be successful if we have an energetic participation and thrust with regard to funding of these programs.

The second criticism is that the government is not taking steps to counter high interest rates, which are a major part of the cost of housing today. The lengthening of the mortgage term is not the answer: all this does is increase the cost of a house. Surely we have a social responsibility in the matter of housing. The profits of banks and insurance companies are nothing short of "Shylockian" and unconscionable. Catering to financial institutions in the hope that they will put up money for mortgages is a ridiculous approach. Surely we should say to them that they have a social responsibility to build homes in Canada and that a certain percentage of their money should be allocated to housing with interest rates no higher than 5 per cent to 6 per cent. This is the money that most Canadians put into banks and insurance companies, and if left on deposit earns 3 or 4 per cent interest; but when these people want to buy a home they have to pay the bank anywhere from 9 to 9½ per cent interest. As I say, banks and financial institutions surely have a social responsibility to furnish funds for housing at a reasonable rate of interest.

Thirdly, the government has failed to provide housing at a cost that averages no more than 20 per cent of the personal income of Canadians. What is required is a massive land assembly program by the government, a large volume of public housing and the granting of higher priority to families living on incomes under $8,000. These are all measures that the government has failed to take.

Yesterday evening the minister, with joyful pride, attempted to give an example of the cost of a home to a purchaser under AHOP, the assisted home ownership program. He said that a married man with a wife and two children could buy a $19,000 home under AHOP for $137 a month principal, interest and taxes and would thereby be saving the difference between $137 and $170. The question immediately arises: where can homes at a price of $19,000 be bought? The minister also indicated that a person's income would have to be no higher than $7,500. Certainly one would be unable to buy such houses in the large cities of this country, so they must be available in smaller towns and cities. I suggest that some people, even in small towns and cities, have a difficult time making $7,500 a year. Therefore I suggest that the minister's AHOP program will be very limited and unfruitful.

When it comes to solving the problem of inadequate housing for people of low income, this program is what I would call tokenism. I am sure that when the minister goes home tonight and thinks through these things he will have a very uneasy feeling with regard to the success of the program.

Now let me deal with some of the programs that are set forth in the bill. Last night the minister said he had the support of the co-ops, the credit unions and the Social Development Council of Canada for the framework of these programs, but he was quick to underline the fact that that support was conditional upon funding being forthcoming. I hope the co-operatives, credit unions and social development councils will not be disappointed, but it will be at least one year before any visible results are obtained.

• (1510)

In respect of AHOP, I can imagine how many private builders would take advantage of its provisions. In respect of NIP, I feel that only a few cities will attempt in the near future to take advantage of the program. In respect of RRAP, I am sure there will be some exceptions and that is why the minister last night said, I am sure with great reluctance, that he would not indicate the amount CMHC will be prepared to allocate to these funds but will wait until the committee stage of this bill. He did not have that reluctance last June when the government announced several programs aimed at the same problem. In fact, at that time he gave the allocation of moneys and we well recall that one allocation was $155 million to AHOP. That $155 million, worked out on the basis of the average cost of a home being $25,000 , will produce roughly 7,500 homes. The production of only that number of homes to meet the needs of low-income Canadians is not satisfactory.

The purpose of AHOP is to provide the means whereby low and middle-income families may purchase homes. If we build these homes at so-called low rates of interest, 7½ per cent to 8 per cent, with mortgages extending over 40 years and the average work lifetime ending at age 60, this will mean that a man who buys a home when he is 30 years old will be 70 years old before he has paid off the mortgage. I do not say this to embarrass the minister, because he knows the necessity to extend the period of mortgages, but I remind hon. members of the House that similar programs have been attempted in the United States which have resulted in very high interest rates and default penalties. In fact, these default penalties have been around 8 per cent to 9 per cent in the United States, while the normal default rate in respect of mortgage payments is about 1 per cent.

In a press release of June 12, 1972, the minister described AHOP as an additional alternative to public housing for low-income families. I pointed out at that time that the proposed $155 million funded for this program would produce only 7,500 homes. The minister has now left us hand hanging in respect of how much will be allocated under the present program. Surely it is obvious that this program will be directed toward rural towns and small villages in Canada. On the basis of the June proposal, the task force calculated that a family would require an income of $7,500 to be able to purchase an apartment valued at $20,000. Apart from the problem of the unavailability of 20,000 units in Toronto, the task force noted that 25 per cent of families in that city have an income of less than $7,000 per year. If that is so, the percentage of persons with incomes of less than $7,000 in small towns and cities would be much higher than 25 per cent, thereby limiting the program drastically.

If AHOP is an alternative to public housing, it is a very poor approach and we should condemn it in the same way we condemned the attempt of the hon. member for Trinity to deal with public housing in the report of the task force of 1969.

An hon. Member: Slum housing.

Mr. Gilbert: As the hon. member suggests, this would be similar to slum housing. It would be slum housing built by private enterprise, with public funds. This is what the minister is so proud of. Apparently he would rather put money in the pockets of the developers than provide amenities in public housing units.

My second point relates to the new communities program, land assembly or land banking. The minister waxed quite eloquent on this subject last night. He said $500 million would be available over the next five years tc various governments participating in land banking. He cited Ottawa as an example of what he hopes to get under way in the near future. The hon. member for Peel South (Mr. Blenkarn) quite rightly reminded him of the Malvern project. Let me remind hon. members that even though that project is 20 years old, the land could be sold at a price far below the private market price provided it was not sold originally to private builders. If this land were to be sold to private developers at high prices, they would in turn add the increased cost to the price of the homes in the area.

The people of Canada know that most housing in this country in the next ten years will be constructed on land already owned by a few large builders and developers. Let me repeat that, Mr. Speaker. Most homes built in Canada within the next decade will be built on land now owned by private builders and developers.

An hon. Member: We got it that time.

Mr. Gilbert: The Dennis report set forth CMHC requirements in respect of estimates for the next ten years for housing in this country. If we read that report we will find requirements set out for the next ten years. Toronto requires 19,600 acres of land to satisfy housing requirements in the next ten years. The acreage required is now controlled by six developers in the Toronto area: they control 18,000 acres. Calgary—its leading spokesman for the Tories spoke last night—requires, according to CMHC, about 7,500 acres. Six of the leading developers in Calgary own 7,000 of those acres.

Mr. Blenkarn: We could solve the problem, but you want to stand in the way of progress.

Mr. Gilbert: CMHC estimates that in the next ten years the city of Vancouver, the minister's own city, will require 8,000 acres for the construction of new houses, yet six leading developers in Vancouver now own 6,900 of those acres.

Mr. Blenkarn: What would we do without you?

Mr. Gilbert: I am sure the hon. member for Peel South feels discouraged about the speech he made last night and is attempting to qualify it now.

Mr. Basford: He is trying to recover.

Mr. Gilbert: He is trying to recover and acquire a little knowledge along the way. I will forgive him for his enthusiasm. In view of these facts, where does this leave the government in respect of land banking? I suggest it leaves the government with very little room for manoeuvring.

I note that the hon. member for Don Valley is in the House and I hope he will not be embarrassed when I mention some of the companies which own this acreage. There are three firms which now own in excess of 5,000 acres. The companies are Bramalea Development Corporation—I am sure that means something to the hon. member for Peel South—the Canadian Equity and Development Company, which is controlled by the Cadillac Development Corporation, Bronfman (Seagrams) Interest, and George Wimpey Canada Ltd. These are three subsidiaries of Monarch Construction-Richmond Costain Ltd., or three subsidiaries of British building companies. If you add to that Marlborough Properties Limited, you have all the private land in Toronto within the control of these large companies. I did not mention the Fidinam Company. Probably the hon. member for Don Valley will be happy to rise and indicate the large interest that group has in Ontario. Is it any wonder that 36 per cent of the cost of NHA homes applies to land?

• (1520)

Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, who owns the property in Vancouver. It is owned by Western Realty and Marathon Realty Limited, a subsidiary of the CPR, Dawson Developments Limited, Imperial Construction Limited and Intercontinental Construction. All these land holding developments make full use of the deductions under the Income Tax Act: they apply all the interest charges, the municipal taxes and the capital cost depreciation. The result is that Cadillac Devélopment had net earnings for the period 1966-1971 of approximately $63 million. How much did they pay in taxes? They paid $20,506. These are the boys the Tories want to protect.

Let me tell you about Marlborough Properties. They had net earnings for the period 1966-1970 of $12.1 million and did not pay one cent in taxes. These are the boys who take advantage of the tax provisions of the Income Tax Act. These are the boys to whom the hon. member for Peel South referred who own all the raw land and want the government to provide the services. Does this not make one feel great with respect to the neighbourhood improvement program? Surely the neighbourhood improvement program is to be preferred over urban renewal, because at least the philosophy is to improve neighbourhoods rather than bulldoze them.

The Dennis report urges that a freeze be put on NHA funding of city centre redevelopment projects in excess of 50 units to at least discourage developers breaking up existing neighbourhoods. Mr. Speaker, if you have ever been in the city of Toronto you will know that the method used by the developers is to break up existing homes. It will be very interesting to see whether CMHC will implement that proposal of the Dennis report. The RRAP program, the non-profit program and the co-operative program have been dealt with and will be dealt with in more detail by my colleagues. So I now come to the last chapter of my speech.

I think we are deeply indebted to men such as Dennis and Charney who have brought forward reports telling us what the situation is in respect of housing in Canada. The minister spoke highly last night of the research program. I hope he retains men like Dennis and Charney, who have social vision and responsibility in respect of housing projects and needs in Canada and can tell him where terrible housing conditions prevail.

My colleague from Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) pointed out that there are 750,000 homes in desperate need of repair. This involves approximately three million people. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, the innovative program the government had which probably came about as a result of the work of the research department of CMHC. Under this program $200 million of the taxpayers' money was allocated to the private builders so they could do something innovative in Canada. What did they do? First, they bought the land from private developers and paid the highest possible price. Much of it was land which the private developers had difficulty using or selling. Second, CMHC relaxed the building standards. Therefore, we had under that innovative program smaller homes and higher density. I hope the research department will do a little more work in respect of housing and look to countries such as England, Sweden and Germany. It should pick out some of their best ideas and apply them to the housing needs of Canada.

I have one final comment in respect of warranties. Last evening the minister spoke about how generous the government would be when a private developer fails to finish a house because of lack of funds or bankruptcy. He would go to the lending institution, draw the money and give it to the poor purchaser. Then he said another problem is that many people buy homes in which they find many defects in materials and workmanship. He said, however, that that matter will be left for a while and brought forward later.

One of the crucial problems that has arisen in respect of public and private housing in Canada is the poor workmanship by private enterprise. Many people have wrung their hands and screamed in their efforts to get the builder to return and complete the home in a proper and workmanlike manner. As the minister said last night, when one purchases a steam iron he has more protection than when he purchases a home. Yet the minister wants to put this program forward. The federal housing authority in the United States has had in its legislation for some time a protection warranty covering defective workmanship and materials. Surely it is high time this government acted quickly in this regard. After listening to my speech, Mr. Speaker, you may think I will not support this bill. However, after a great deal of soul-searching I am prepared to support it, but I give it the same type of support as I gave the increase of 42 cents for the old age pensioners at Christmas, 1970.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa East): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have the opportunity of taking part in the debate on Bill C-133 because these amendments to the National Housing Act will certainly encourage the construction of homes in my riding. In addition, the changes suggested in this bill will allow for the continued application of the program already in operation, thus giving new hope to low income families, older citizens and others who hope to get decent housing.

In co-operation with the municipalities of Vanier and Ottawa, and the government of Ontario, the federal government helped with the construction, in my riding, of six building for low-income families and senior citizens. These represent 608 units and the federal contribution amounted to $7,410,000 over the last two years. Mr. Speaker, the electors of my riding of Ottawa East are extremely proud of the importance given by the federal government to the construction of such housing.

I represent a constituency divided in five clearly defined districts containing a municipality, Vanier, which is partly surrounded by the city of Ottawa. It also contains old historical neighbourhoods, judged by all to be worthy of being remembered. I will remind my colleagues that one of the greatest urban renewal projects in Canada was carried out in my constituency: the development of Lower Town in Ottawa which began seven or eight years ago and which will be completed I imagine in two or three years.

Mr. Speaker, I am discussing Lower Town because the experience has not always been a happy one. It is therefore a pleasure to realize that Bill C-133 contains very strict provisions concerning the planning, development and implementation of urban revewal projects.

There certainly will be in my constituency other improvement programs for residential neighbourhoods inhabited mostly by low income individuals and I have no doubt that the experience gained in the Lower Town project and other similar projects will contribute to humanize such programs.

There are areas in my constituency where housing development has the absolute priority; we still wish to keep these areas and I am convinced that the governments, in the light of the experience gained in Lower Town, will approach the problem in a more humane fashion and that the social and economic factors will have the importance that they deserve.

• (1530)

[English]

Mr. Speaker, if we are frank and honest I think we must admit that a good many things can be attributed to human error. In lower town the dispersing of the population, the breaking up of a community, in the name of urban renewal by what has been called bulldozer methods is now something in the past. I am glad to note that in Bill C-133 we find certain guarantees and a very real preoccupation with proper planning and the development of our older neighbourhoods. Speaking of older neighbourhoods, Mr. Speaker, we are proud in Ottawa East to have areas which are not only historically important but contain very architecturally valuable and interesting houses. They demand attention in order to preserve their aesthetic and cultural values.

Unfortunately, modern development and the high cost of land, coupled with sometimes absentee ownership and the prospect of speculative profits, have doomed many interesting old structures to high-rise developments. We must keep in mind the value of these dwellings and, if possible, encourage their purchase by interested citizens of moderate income who may want to repair and renovate these older homes and in so doing preserve the quality, the design features and the beauty of the old architecture. We must keep some of the past about us so that we may feel a sense of perspective of time as we look at our surroundings and cherish the best of our heritage.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I welcome the fact that Ontario was one of the first provinces to announce it would take advantage of the amendments to the National Housing Act and that it would assist financially privately owned enterprises in the field of housing, provided the latter supply a certain number of units, for a given period, to low-income families whose rent would be established according to their income.

However, I must mention the fact that, while establishing a regional office in Ottawa, our national capital, the Ontario Housing Corporation did not deem it necessary to obtain the services of bilingual personnel which could give to the Ottawa people, with a Francophone population of over 100,000, information and services about housing. In the case of Ontario, which has adopted institutional bilingualism a few years ago and which makes much of that fact, I find this an abnormal and unacceptable situation.

One of the amendments which pleases me most in Bill C-133 is the one that will allow average or low income families to acquire their own house. Many of those families living in rented houses could, with some assistance, become homeowners. For those who want and prefer to be owners rather than tenants and who can benefit from that program, this represents an interesting alternative. The amount of assistance which could be provided to the families will depend upon their income. That assistance will be provided in three ways: first, the reimbursement period for the mortgage loan can be extended up to 40 years. The rate of interest on the mortgage will be reduced, according to the family's income, starting with the regular market rate to the rate nearer that charged the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation when it borrows its funds. If the extension of the reimbursement period and the reduction of the mortgage interest rate is still not enough, the federal government could grant a loan to keep, within tolerable limits, the monthly payments the family must pay.

Another amendment which I find very interesting is one to enable many public-spirited organizations to build or purchase decent housing they could rent on a non-profit basis to low income Canadians. This sort of housing is usually intended for the aged, but could also be used for other special groups, such as those in the low income bracket in general.

These amendments to the National Housing Act will raise the amount of the loans available to non-profit organizations from 95 to 100 per cent of the loan value of the projects involved. The loans will be repayable over periods up to 50 years, and will carry a low rate of interest.

In addition to these special loans, the federal government will grant subsidies to these organizations, of up to 10 per cent of capital costs. Non-profit organizations very often need help in launching their housing programs, in planning them and developing them to the point at which they can apply for loans. The federal government will provide special funds for getting started, lending up to $10,000. Non-profit organizations will also be eligible for loans and subsidies under the new housing rehabilitation program.

I am happy to observe that special attention has been paid, not only to home improvements, but also to the quality of the neighbourhood and surroundings. There are in my constituency several areas inhabited by low or middle income Canadians, where community services are lacking and the community spirit is crumbling away. We have been trying for some years, with social activities programs, the creation of citizens' committees, training in citizenship and various other measures, to encourage citizens to become aware of their surroundings. With a degree of help and encouragement to their inhabitants, some of the old areas of our town could be preserved, and become pleasant, wholesome places to live in. Bill C-133 proposes help to municipalities in planning, buying land, building or improving community facilities, etc. Of course, municipalities are creatures of the provinces and under their jurisdictions; the success of the program is dependent to a large extent on the participation and co-operation of provincial governments.

• (1540)

This neighbourhood improvement program will be subject to federal-provincial agreements. These agreements will specify how the money will be spent, how the residents of these neighbourhoods will take part in these programs and how new housing will be found for people who may be displaced as a result of activities under this program.

As I said at the beginning of my remarks, Ottawa East is an old neighbourhood and I am happy to note that it will be possible under the amendments to be made to the act, for an owner in an urban section designated for this purpose through a federal-provincial agreement to borrow money in order to repair and improve his home. The objective will be to make housing meet minimum health and security standards. It will be possible therefore for low income people to improve the quality of the plumbing, heating and electricity systems in their homes.

The amount of help will depend on the amount of work to be done and the income of the owner. Loans will be available within the limits that will have to be set up by regulations and if the housing unit continues to be occupied and maintained, a portion of the loan up to $2,000 could be forgiven. This forgiveness of part of the federal loan will not be dependent on any contribution from the province or the municipality.

In general the program will be used in concert with the new neighbourhood improvement program but it will be available in the case of housing projects built by non-profit corporations, or cooperatives. Under special federal-provincial agreements the program will apply to sectors located outside the neighbourhood up for improvement.

One of the terms of the loans is that suitable standards of maintenance and occupancy be in effect in municipalities. The purpose of that requirement is to help ensure that once repairs are made the property will not deteriorate again.

In conclusion I would say that it has become more and more evident that people buying houses need as much protection as people who buy cars or television sets or make any other investment of this kind. The proposed amendments to Bill C-133 deal with the problem of bankruptcy or insolvency of the builder. The mortgage loan insurance factor under the act ensures substantial protection to lenders. The proposed amendment will allow the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to ensure that the purchaser of a new house receives a complete housing unit by lending him the required funds to complete the house through the mortgage loan insurance fund. I think that this measure is essential to the protection of the consumer.

In conclusion, I express the wish that municipal, provincial and federal governments will continue to design new, objective and viable programs and that through consultation with the population which must participate in the setting up of urban programs we can build cities where it is pleasant to live.

[Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa East).]

[English]

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, it seems rather a coincidence that I should rise for the second time this week and have the opportunity to speak this afternoon, when just this morning the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) mentioned that he was tabling the Darling report. Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I do not have any marine knowledge and so cannot take credit for this very informative report which I understand had something to do with shipping.

This afternoon I have the privilege of speaking on Bill C-133, the amendments to the National Housing Act. I have listened with a great interest to the many eloquent and well qualified speakers, most of whom come from metropolitan areas of tremendous growth. However, I think that even a voice in the wilderness should be allowed to speak for that great disadvantaged area, rural Canada. Many of our small towns and villages have ample land available at low or reasonable prices. When I hear these prices of $18,000 or $20,000 being bandied around, in my area they would refer to about 600 acres; then I learn that it is a city lot of 100 by 150 feet.

I am well aware of the great need for housing in mushrooming areas and I know that we cannot stop these great areas from growing. While we poison the whole area around us we shall continue to grow.

Mr. Woolliams: They are doing that fast.

Mr. Darling: I am told that the great problem is not the cost of land itself but the cost of serviced land and the many other costs such as sewage, water, schools and roads, to name a few. In our great province of Ontario many smaller municipalities are able to instal water and sewage systems on a rental basis. I give full marks to the minister and the provincial governments for a co-operative program such as this.

As the head of a small municipality for nearly a quarter of a century, I can speak with some authority. In Burks Falls we were continually inhibited through lack of a sewage system, but we finally committed ourselves to it. We asked the permission of the Ontario Municipal Board about 15 years ago. At that time the cost was $160,000. The chairman said that we reminded him of a horse that was on the street, dead, but would not lie down. He said we had no money and no possibility of getting it. Under the new system we did get it. But instead of $160,000 it was $1.5 million. That is a hell of a lot of money, in plain English, Mr. Speaker. For the ordinary householder in my village it means a minimum of $130 a year for 40 years for the sewage system. However, having it enables us to qualify for grants for municipal housing, Central Mortgage and Housing programs, senior citizens' housing and low-rental housing which are certainly needed.

I am hoping, despite the very substantial grants, that even more money can be found for the many smaller towns and villages across Canada so that they can instal sewage systems. I feel that the maximum amount payable by a householder in respect of a sewage system should be $100, and the provincial and federal governments should bear the excess costs. This would improve the economy of a great many small municipalities that at the present time are stagnating or are not progressing.

In 1910 there were about 1,500 people in my riding. Parry Sound, the largest town in the riding, has a population of 6,000. Mr. Speaker, I am talking about a beautiful riding which now has a population of approximately 61,000. Some of the illustrious members who spoke earlier today were speaking of ridings with populations of hundreds of thousands. They were wondering where to put the people. Mr. Speaker, they do not have to look too far north. I know a great many areas are decentralizing, but Toronto goes to Mississauga or West Hill—perhaps the pioneers go as far as Oshawa or Bowmanville. It is time they started looking farther north. I may be accused of being parochial, but the same thing applies to the rural areas around metropolitan Montreal, Winnipeg, Calgary, Vancouver and the Maritimes. It is time this House realized that we can do something other than encouraging the building of great, mushrooming, concrete jungles.

It is a well-known fact that it is the dream of every Canadian to own a piece of this country during his lifetime. Some will want it in their early years, while others wish to own a cottage for their retirement. It is up to us in government to meet these needs of Canadians as soon as possible. The problem in many small towns, is not land, but funds for financing housing projects. Interest rates should be comparable to those in the more buoyant economic areas of our country.

Another attraction would be the fact that the lots would be much bigger, enabling people to have gardens of their own. Houses would be spaced much farther apart, giving families more privacy. If funds are made available for individuals to build their own homes, with only small down payments being necessary, many more jobs would be available in those communities. That, too, would keep the populations at home in those communities. For example, Mr. Speaker, I was talking to a small contractor who endeavoured to bid on some low-rental housing which was to be erected in his town. The contract went to a contractor of this great city in which we sit, which is 300 miles away from that town. I suppose the local man was not able to provide a bond, or something like that. Perhaps the two contractors should have got together and done the job. At any rate, the large contractor built the homes, and they were not satisfactory.

An hon. member speaking previously in the debate criticized the high price of some of these homes and their poor workmanship. That was the case in the example I have given. On top of that, after this high-minded contractor left, he owed a great deal of money to subcontractors and they had a terrible job collecting it. Perhaps some are still trying to collect. I feel that when such contracts are let in the smaller areas, top priority should be given to local contractors. Local help would be hired and raw materials could be purchased locally.

Your have already heard, Mr. Speaker, members representing urban areas pointing out that housing is in big demand in those centres because of the tremendous growth in population. We concede that we are moving into a period when the great majority of our population will be living, or existing, in these great mountains of concrete and steel. Surely it is just plain, good business and common sense to try to save our small communities from becoming extinct by providing capital and incentives to maintain them and, if possible, to help them grow.

The Department of Regional Economic Expansion, therefore, should give serious consideration to locating industries in these have-not areas and providing even higher grants and other incentives in order that good industries may locate in them. I believe it is a proven fact that employers who have established plants in recent years in small communities have enjoyed much better relationships with their employees and there has been less turnover, fewer strikes and, I am sure, better productivity. I am wondering, Mr. Speaker, if housing units could be built to less rigid standards in small communities in order to reduce building costs. Houses there would not need to be as large. I know in many subdivisions a house must have a minimum number of square feet, which puts it beyond the price range of many citizens.

There is one other type of housing which I feel should be emphasized very strongly, that is, the senior citizens' housing unit. These should be erected and available in every small town across this country, even where there is no sewage system. A great many of our senior citizens in their declining years are living at present in great big homes which are costly to maintain and on which taxes are too high. If small, modern apartments were available, many of them would be only too pleased to dispose of their larger homes and move into those units. This would provide homes at reasonable cost to many young families who might not be in the position to afford a new house. I can speak with some knowledge on this matter, as in my own village we have senior citizens' units which are serving that much needed purpose. Our municipality has been fortunate enough to have another 24 units approved. They are to be built later this year.

The provincial and federal governments are to be commended for co-operating in providing low-rental housing accommodation, but these units must also be made available to a great many smaller towns and villages which at present are not able to qualify. Again, I feel that these could be built in areas where there would be no possibility of pollution, in towns that cannot afford sewage systems or even water systems.

I spoke earlier about the cost of installing a sewage system in our town. A great many municipalities would not even gamble to that extent, and they are lying dormant. My previous remarks apply also to senior citizens' homes. If they were made available, other homes would be released for the market. Certainly it would be more economical if governments were to combine their activities and build, say, five or six units at a time for senior citizens. Doing this would be cheaper than sending senior citizens to senior citizens' homes where they must be looked after at a much higher cost. I have just resigned from the board of management of a senior citizens' home in my riding on which I served for seven or eight years. Although we ran, I think, a very economical operation, I believe it cost us between $10 and $11 per day, per resident. Building the units I have talked about would be more economical. Further, such action would be a money-maker if the provincial and federal governments combined in taking action.

There is another type of housing that I hesitate to mention. When you talk about it, people treat it as a dirty word. I am referring to mobile homes. I am aware that a great many municipalities are strict and do not allow them, but I am quite sure that if a park were properly laid out and the right types of homes were erected, such homes could provide much needed housing for those who cannot afford permanent, brand new homes. Also, such units would provide young people and those who are retired with a roof over their heads and they could call the home their own. They can be purchased with little or no down payment. I am aware that in most cases they may be purchased this way provided that land for their erection is available. At present, interest rates are not satisfactory; lenders are charging as much as 12 per cent and even 14 per cent. Surely the government could step in, provide funds at much lower interest rates and make available the amenities and safeguards which are available to other homes.

What I am about to say I have said before and will keep on saying. I am reminded of the story of a young woman who was in a Salvation Army band. She was playing a drum and someone asked her what she did, how she did it, how she enjoyed it, and so on. She looked at the questioner and said, "Well, all I do is beat this damned drum". That is what I intend to do. I shall say again and again what I am about to say. The 11 per cent sales tax on building materials should be removed immediately. I am certain that this move would provide a much needed shot in the arm for the building of private homes especially as compared to large commercial buildings. The owners of commercial buildings just add the extra cost to rents and so pass it on. We have asked time and again on our side of the House for this tax to be removed. Builders have been requesting it. Still the government makes no move. I wonder if possibly the government might come forward with a compromise and perhaps reduce the tax or cut it in half.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps this is a good time to recognize that it is four o'clock. We will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed in today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills and private bills.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, I understand there is some agreement that we consider item No. 9 under private members' notices of motions, in the name of the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. O'Sullivan).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is this the understanding reached by the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Darling.]

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

AIRPORTS

MOUNT HOPE, ONT.—REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO PROPOSED AIRPORT EXPANSION

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should conduct a full and complete public inquiry into the proposed expansion of Mount Hope airport, and that immediate attention be given to possible alternate sites for such proposed expansion.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am grateful for this opportunity to place before the House a motion which I hope hon. members will consider in the same spirit as it is offered. This being the eve of St. Patrick's Day, I also hope that it will have some kind of Irish luck with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand).

The acceptance of this motion would result in two concurrent and related actions on the part of the government—the holding of public hearings into the expansion plans for Mount Hope airport and the consideration of possible alternate sites for such expansion. The latter is perhaps of great interest only to hon. members from the area involved. However, I believe that the question of public hearings on a matter of such a serious nature will be of genuine concern to all members of this House.

• (1600)

I favour an expanded airport facility to serve Hamilton and the surrounding region as do, I believe, the majority of the residents of the area. The southern part of Ontario, particularly the city of Hamilton, continues to grow in terms of population and in its importance as a centre for industry and business. Hamilton is one of two cities of its size in North America without adequate airport facilities needed to keep this momentum going and to continue to offer the opportunities and economic benefits now available to its citizens. However, we all recognize that the location of airport facilities involves consideration of many factors, including ones which have a direct effect upon the quality of life in a region and which therefore must take priority over factors based upon commercial expediency.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, the existing plans for airport expansion at Mount Hope as proposed by the Minister of Transport deserve, and indeed demand, the closest scrutiny. One of my chief concerns throughout the long history of this airport question has been the tendency on the part of some, including the Department of Transport, to view the proposals as strictly a matter of concern to the city of Hamilton or, even worse, just to the Hamilton city council. I would like to think that this attitude is an incorrect impression on my part and that references to the facility as the Hamilton civic airport stem solely from the fact that the city pays considerable sums of money as its part in maintaining the existing airport facilities.

Certainly, Mr. Speaker, as one who was born in Hamilton, who has already argued that it needs improved airport facilities and who has the honour of representing a constituency with approximately half its population within those city limits, I have no intention of downgrad-ing the city of Hamilton's legitimate efforts to obtain the best possible airport in the most convenient location. At the same time, this affection for my hometown and determination to assist its progress does not blind me to the needs and rights of the residents of municipalities surrounding Hamilton and the expanded airport. By its own admission, the Department of Transport wants to upgrade the facilities to create a regional airport. We know the department has had meetings, some of them closed even to Members of Parliament, with officials of the city of Hamilton. But what about the people of Ancaster and Binbrook, Stoney Creek and Saltfleet, Glanford and Mount Hope? They, too, have a right to be heard. They will not benefit as directly or as substantially from the improved airport, yet they are expected to bear a much greater share of the burden in terms of expropriated land, displaced homes, noise and air pollution.

I invite the Minister of Transport, his parliamentary secretary and officials of their department to visit these communities which contain some of the most beautiful and peaceful residential areas that this land can offer. I further invite them to consider the impact that the present expansion plans will have on these communities and the effects upon their residents. Then I make a simple request not to abandon plans for better airport facilities, not even to dismiss out of hand the existing plans, but simply to reconsider these plans and to give full and fair consideration to possible alternate sites for the airport facility. I ask the department to check out the possible alternatives for a location where land is less expansive and less densely populated, where there would be room for long-range planning and where flight paths could be devised to keep noise and air pollution away from the built-up areas. The means, I suggest, for such consideration is that of public hearings.

As a new member, Mr. Speaker, I have already experienced enough of the frustrations of daily parliamentary life to be wary of committees, commissions, inquiries or even hearings.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. O'Sullivan: I have also learned to be wary of parliamentary secretaries.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Especially some of them.

Mr. O'Sullivan: I only trust the ministers. According to the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner), we will know in a few weeks how many OFY grants he has approved for the constituency of Hamilton-Wentworth. I also recognize that the holding of public hearings may delay the construction of the airport facilities wherever they may be located. However, these airport plans for the future, Mr. Speaker, and I am convinced that a brief delay taken now in the cause of cautious study would pay dividends in the years, and perhaps decades ahead, when all residents of the Hamilton-Wentworth area will feel the effects of the decisions made today. Another reason I seek such hearings to be held in public and, I hope, convened by a respected and neutral third party, is that they would bring government and the people together or, should I say, bring government back to the people.

I shall not be too surprised, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. parliamentary secretary, in giving the response to this motion on behalf of the Department of Transport, protests that the department has indeed considered other sites and has most certainly engaged in ample public dialogue. That is what we have been told before. If that is the case, why does the department refuse to make public all its documents relating to studies of alternate sites? If the department continues to claim that enough public dialogue has been held, I can only conclude that it simply did not like what little it has listened to and does not want its plans, drawn up by civil servants in Ottawa and Toronto who will never have to live beside their own creation, disturbed by the feelings of local residents.

Ideally, this or any other airport expansion should be greeted by public understanding, good will and co-operation. But if it expects, or aims for, those feelings from citizens, government must first be willing to be truthful, straightforward and open about its intentions. Whatever the causes, the department has not fulfilled all these prerequisites and I am afraid this failure has bred mistrust, suspicion and hostility. In its own interests, but also for the sake of the residents involved and in the interests of democratic government, I urge the department to exhibit its good faith by a willingness to level with the people, to listen to them and to learn from them.

For all the foregoing reasons, Mr. Speaker, and for those that time does not permit me to express, I propose this motion and I appreciate the consideration extended by the House.

• (1610)

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, important as the airport is, there is another matter which is of far greater importance, as I am sure the hon. member whose motion is now before the House will agree. This matter of far greater importance involves the manner in which a committee of this House is functioning. It is appropriate that the hon. member who just moved a motion in this chamber is wary of committees, because that is closely related to what I am about to say.

There is a committee of this House which is attempting to bypass the concern expressed earlier in this chamber when it referred a certain subject matter, namely, the annual report of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The intention was that the committee should engage in a study in depth of the whole question of aboriginal rights. The committee has bypassed this subject matter and is, in fact, dealing with all manner of other subjects, as is its right since the estimates of the department are before it.

Much more germane is the motion in the name of my hon. friend from the Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth) seeking to set up a committee to deal solely with the question of aboriginal rights. This is of far greater importance than many other things we deal with in this House. Accordingly, I move, seconded by my hon. friend from Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent):

Division

That the House do now proceed to another order, namely, notice of motion No. 49 standing in the name of the hon. member for Northwest Territories which motion relates to the establishment of a special committee to investigate all aspects of the question of aboriginal rights.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed to the motion will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Howard) which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) if that was a vote of confidence?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. First of all, I am very disappointed that the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. O'Sullivan) voted against his own notice of motion.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Bell: You cannot reflect on a vote.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my point of order is that at four o'clock the whip of the loyal opposition rose and suggested, through Your Honour, that we proceed with notice of motion No. 9 earmarked for the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth. The Chair asked for the unanimous consent of the House to proceed with same.

An hon. Member: Why are you crying?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, may I humbly suggest that we agreed unanimously to do so, and because of that I feel the motion of the hon. member was out of order and that the vote should not have been considered this afternoon.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Motion No. 49—

Mr. Bell: On a point of order—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. A point of order cannot arise from a point of order.

Mr. Bell: Then I rise on a question of privilege. I did wish to rise on a point of order, but I will rise on a question of privilege since I have been taken to task. There was no agreement on this subject, by the whips or by anyone, that we continue for the full hour. May I say that the parliamentary secretary has no right to reflect on the way in which any hon. member votes. The hon. member had the opportunity to make his speech, and he finished in the proper way. I think the parliamentary secretary should withdraw any reflection which he implied.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Notice of motion No. 49, the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth).

INDIAN AFFAIRS

MOTION FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE ABORIGINAL RIGHTS

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, a special committee of the House of Commons, consisting of eleven members to be named, be established to investigate all aspects of the question of aboriginal rights of the native Indian and Eskimo people of Canada, with powers to report from time to time its observations, opinions and recommendations thereon; and

That the committee be empowered to send for persons, papers and records; to sit during sittings and adjournments of the House; to adjourn from place to place; to print from day to day such papers and evidence as may be ordered by the committee; to appoint from among its members such subcommittees as it may deem advisable or necessary, and to delegate thereto all or any of its powers, except the power to report directly to the House; and to employ such staff at it may deem advisable or necessary.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) rises on a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, in accordance with Standing Orders, you could not state that the debate on motion No. 49 had begun, if a member was rising on a point of order or raising a question of privilege. I rose before you called notice of motion No. 49. I therefore ask that we return to the point of order, before dealing with notice of motion No. 49.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret that I did not see the hon. member for Lotbinière before I called motion No. 49. I will now hear him.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I deplore the fact that while the whip of the Progressive Conservative party had the floor there was no simultaneous interpretation so that we were unable to understand what he was saying.

Furthermore, I feel that we have not yet reached the study of the notice of motion, but are dealing with a point of order. Are we dealing with notice of motion No. 49? It will be noted that several of my colleagues and myself definitely rose on a point of order.

• (1650)

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We are dealing with motion No. 49. The hon. member for Northwest Territories.

Mr. Firth: Mr. Speaker, I am very happy that we have reached this stage, but I am not really happy to see what appear to be stalling tactics on the part of some hon. members. I would very much like to have this motion come to a vote. I feel as strongly today as I did when I first came to the House that this is a very important matter, and while we still have time today I would like it to come to a vote.

Mr. Ian Watson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I intend to speak on this motion and I may speak right until five o'clock. I find it rather strange that two or three evenings ago in the standing committee on Indian affairs there was a clear intention expressed by members of the committee to proceed with the question of aboriginal rights during the next three sessions of the committee. In fact, we will have witnesses coming before that committee next week and for the following two weeks. It seems to me that what has happened here this afternoon is another example of what first occurred late on Tuesday evening, when that committee invited the Prime Minister of Quebec to appear before the committee in a way that was guaranteed—

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The amplification system was not working when the hon. member was speaking. However, it is working now.

Mr. Watson: The first clearcut example of playing around with a most serious problem for the sake of politics occurred the other evening in the Indian affairs committee when we invited the Prime Minister of Quebec to appear before that committee on the question of aboriginal rights in a way that was guaranteed to assure a rejection of the invitation. This afternoon we are again playing around with a serious problem that affects equally the Indian and Eskimo peoples of this country and we are doing it in a fashion that is not helping their cause in any way. We are simply playing politics.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Watson: This House is playing politics with a problem that will require a non-partisan approach if we are to solve it. The Indian and Eskimo peoples of Canada expect a non-partisan approach from us in solving the aboriginal rights problem, the housing problem, the educational problem, the employment problem—in fact, the whole wide band of problems which we all agree exist so far as the Indian and Eskimo peoples are concerned. I do not think any party in this House can claim to have a greater interest than any other in these extremely serious problems which affect our native peoples. I do not think that any party in the House can claim to offer the ideal solutions, because I do not think we have ideal solutions.

If we are to approach effectively this whole problem of aboriginal rights, we will have to act initially in the committee, hearing the representative Indian groups as well as hearing from other concerned groups. We will have to determine an effective approach in the Indian affairs committee. I certainly have not seen any example or indication that that committee itself has adopted a clearcut approach upon how it will tackle the problem of aboriginal rights.

Mr. Howard: It certainly did since you were chairman.

Mr. Watson: When I was chairman of that committee we approached the educational problem in a non-partisan way and we came up with suggestions that were non-partisan. In fact, they were quite critical of the government. I also suggest that we produced results because of that non-partisan approach. The whole idea at the time was that we stimulate public opinion and force the government in the right direction. If we are to use the committee system effectively, we will have to get away from this fooling around with politics in committee.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do so because the hon. gentleman raises questions with respect to proceedings in the committee. The other night in that committee the only person who raised matters in a partisan way was the hon. gentleman and his colleagues in the Liberal party.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is a point of debate; it is not a point of order.

Mr. Watson: Mr. Speaker, I want to deal with the particular point that the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) has raised. I submitted at that meeting that an invitation to a prime minister of a province—

Mr. Peters: Premier.

Mr. Watson: He calls himself prime minister. I submitted that any invitation sent to a prime minister of a province should at least be submitted in a way that would have assured success. What is the point of inviting somebody to a meeting if you know from the beginning that he is not going to be able to accept your invitation?

Mr. Peters: You may know that.

Mr. Watson: Every member of the committee should know that the Prime Minister of Quebec could not accept that invitation.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I was a member of the House present at that committee meeting. I assure you solemnly, Mr. Speaker, that to the best of my knowledge no other member, with the exception of the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson) could possibly have known that the premier of Quebec would refuse that invitation. I would suggest—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business has now expired. It being five o'clock p.m., this House stands adjourned until Monday next at two o'clock p.m.

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.
