OFFICIAL REPORT

FIRST SESSION—TWENTIETH PARLIAMENT

The nineteenth parliament having been prorogued and dissolved by proclamation on Monday, April 16, 1945, and writs having been issued and returned, a new parliament was summoned to meet for the dispatch of business on Thursday, September 6, 1945, and did accordingly meet on that day.

Speaker: The Honourable GASPARD FAUTEUX

Thursday, September 6, 1945.

This being the day on which parliament is convoked by proclamation of His Excellency the Governor General for the dispatch of business, and the members of the house being assembled:

Arthur Beauchesne, Esquire, C.M.G., M.A., K.C., F.R.S.C., the Clerk of the House, read to the house a letter from the Assistant Secretary to the Governor General informing him that the Honourable Mr. Justice Thibaudeau Rinfret, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, would proceed to the Senate chamber on Thursday, the 6th of September, at 11 a.m., to open the session.

A message was delivered by Charles H. Larose, Esquire, Acting Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:—

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

His Honour, the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly the house went up to the Senate chamber, when the Speaker of the Senate said:

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:
Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I have it in command to let you know that His Excellency the Governor General does not see fit to declare the causes of his summoning the present parliament of Canada until the Speaker of the House of Commons shall have been chosen according to law; but this afternoon, at the hour of three o'clock in the afternoon, His Excellency will declare the causes of calling this parliament.

And the members being returned to the Commons chamber:

ELECTION OF SPEAKER

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Beauchesne, the first duty of the Commons at the beginning of a new parliament is to ascertain the reasons why His Excellency the Governor General, the king's representative, has summoned its members to meet with him in parliament. As hon. members have just been made aware, His Excellency is not prepared to impart those reasons until the Commons have elected a Speaker. As a matter of fact the house itself will not be duly constituted until a Speaker has been elected; therefore our first duty this morning is to choose a Speaker.

In matters of parliamentary procedure our parliament largely follows the procedure at Westminster; there are certain differences, however, that, in the past, have been observed in reference to the selection of a Speaker. The first difference is that at Westminster the Speaker of one parliament, if he proves to be acceptable, is frequently reelected from parliament to parliament. I recall quite well the occasion when Mr. Speaker Lowther of the House of Commons in London visited Canada some years ago and presented to this House the Speaker's chair which is in place here. It is a replica of the one at Westminster. Mr. Speaker Lowther informed our members that for sixteen years he had occupied that seat while the Commons was in session, and that, during that period of time, he had never left the precincts of parliament while either the Commons or the Lords were in session. Since Mr. Speaker Lowther's day three or four other speakers have been appointed. The latest selection was made a few days ago when Mr. Speaker Brown, who had been the Speaker in the last parliament in the United Kingdom, was again chosen Speaker. At that time this action was commented upon as being in accord with the best tradition of recognizing that where a Speaker has shown himself to be impartial, a change of government should not necessarily mean that there would be a change in the position of Speaker. The fact that Mr.

Brown had served under a Coalition government which was largely Conservative, and was now under a Labour administration, selected as Speaker was commented on very favourably on all sides.

For reasons of our own, however, we have for the most part found it desirable to have a Speaker chosen at the beginning of one parliament, and a new Speaker chosen at the beginning of the following parliament. That has not always been the case; there have been three exceptions. Mr. Speaker Cockburn, Mr. Speaker Rhodes, and Mr. Speaker Lemieux were, as I recall, elected for more than one parliament. However, they are the exceptions rather than the rule. We have thought that, at this time, we should follow the general practice of choosing a new Speaker at the beginning of a new parliament.

The reason why this difference prevails between the custom in our country and that in the United Kingdom, is that it is felt desirable in this as in many other respects to give recognition to the two races that laid the foundations of our country. That recognition is given, after a Speaker whose mother tongue is English has occupied the chair, by choosing at the next parliament a Speaker whose mother tongue is French. If the Commons is agreeable we propose to have that practice carried out at this time. The Commons itself is, of course, complete master of the situation.

May I point out a further difference in procedure. In the United Kingdom the Speaker is usually nominated by a private member and the nomination is seconded by a private member. That is done in order to make it perfectly clear that so far as the government is concerned, or any other authority, there is no authority greater than that of the members of the Commons themselves; and that, among the members, there is equality in the matter of their rights and privileges. In Canada it has been the custom to have the Speaker nominated by a member of the government, and, I believe, in each case the nomination has been by the Prime Minister.

I should like to make it clear that the Commons is not obliged in any way to accept the nomination of the Prime Minister. Any member is free to nominate and to support the candidature as Speaker of any other hon. member. I am hopeful, however, that the name I intend to propose to the house is one which will prove to be generally acceptable, and that the Speaker who is to occupy the chair throughout this parliament will be elected unanimously.

I have noticed from the press that there appears to be doubt in some quarters as to the correct procedure in the selection of the Speaker both in the Commons and in the Senate. I have made it abundantly clear, that so far as the Commons is concerned the government is not in any way seeking to impose a Speaker on the house. We are simply carrying out the custom that has prevailed in the past.

In regard to the Senate, I give the following to the members of the house for purposes of information. From section 34 of the British North America Act it will be seen that the Speaker is appointed by the government. He is not chosen in the same manner as in the Commons. Section 34 reads:

> The Governor General may from time to time, by instrument under the great seal of Canada, appoint a senator to be Speaker of the Senate, and may remove him and appoint another in his stead.

The section of the British North America Act which governs the selection of a Speaker in the Commons is section 44. It reads as follows:

> The House of Commons, on its first assembling after a general election, shall proceed with all practicable speed to elect one of its members to be Speaker.

That then is the position in which we are at the moment, namely, we are about to elect a Speaker with all practicable speed.

Perhaps I may be permitted, before placing before the house the name of the hon. member I intend to nominate, to say just a word about the position of Speaker and the qualities expected in the occupant of that position.

The position of Speaker is the highest office in the gift of the Commons, it is also the most honourable. The Speaker is the first commoner, he is also the presiding officer of this house and is the custodian of its honour, its rights, its privileges and its prerogatives. The Speaker must possess qualities of good judgment and a judicial temperament, also many other qualities that I would not say are too rare, but, found in combination, are often rare enough. He should in his occupancy of the chair be wholly impartial in his manner and in his preferences as between members of the house. Impartiality between the two sides of the house and towards all members in the house is a first requisite in the fulfilment of the office of Speaker. Hon. members who have been in previous parliaments will agree that a great deal of patience is required, a certain sense of humour, together with as much as possible of a conciliatory attitude. I noticed in reading some remarks made recently in the British house, it was said the Speaker must be possessed of a capacity to sit still for a long time. A Speaker, of course, should be a person of quick perceptions, firm, tactful and wholly familiar with the rules of the house and with the procedure of parliament.

As I have said, this is a remarkable combination to find in any one person, but I do believe the hon. member of this house whom I am about to nominate does possess all these qualities to an exceptional degree. The hon. gentleman whose name I wish to place in nomination is Mr. Gaspard Fauteux, the member for St. Mary, Montreal. Doctor Fauteux, I believe, has the character and ability which eminently fit him for this high position. He is a young man, which is all to the good, though he is not too young to be a veteran of the first world war, during which he served in the ranks, nor is he too young to have had considerable parliamentary experience. For some time he was a member of the Quebec legislature and, as hon. members are aware, he has been a member also of this parliament for some time past. Doctor Fauteux comes of a family that has contributed much to our public life. He is a grandson of Hon. Honore Mercier, a former very distinguished Premier of Quebec, and is a nephew of another premier. I refer to the Hon. Sir Lomer Gouin, who not only was also a distinguished Premier of Quebec but for some time Minister of Justice of Canada.

Those who know Doctor Fauteux will say that they recognize, in his abilities and public service an inherited strain that is all to the good both for him and for our country. And I may say that Docteur Fauteux possesses a good deal in the way of political prowess in his own right, as is evident from what we have seen on his part in political campaigns. However, now that he is being nominated for the Chair, if he is elected to that office, he will be expected to leave behind him the controversies of party and to be wholly impartial.

In nominating Doctor Fauteux, I have much in mind that he recognizes that the great problems of to-day relate themselves not merely to our own country, but to the countries of the world in general. During this period of transition from the terrors of a world war that has been unequalled in its frightfulness, unequalled in history, it is fortunate that we may have in this office of Speaker one who, for years past, has given very special study to international questions, has spoken upon many occasions in this and in other countries of the world situation, and has done much to educate others on the importance of a wide outlook in international affairs.

I may repeat that Doctor Fauteux has, I believe, the qualities of quick perception, keen discernment, patience and impartiality; and if elected by the hon. members of this house, he will, I believe, fill the high office of Speaker with dignity, with honour and distinction to himself and to parliament and with credit to the traditions established by his predecessors.

May I be permitted to add a single word. The ability of a Speaker to preside over the house in a manner which will commend itself generally is dependent even more upon the attitude of hon. members themselves than upon the one who may occupy the Chair. This is certain to be a difficult parliament. The questions which will have to be considered here will be much more difficult of solution than those which have had to be faced by any previous parliament. For this reason, if for no other we should recognize that the Speaker may have upon occasions an exceptionally difficult time. In some parliaments there has been I think a tendency to question far too often, the decisions of the Speaker. I am not in any way trying to lecture the house; I am seeking to emphasize what has been stressed very strongly at Westminster, namely, that the more the Speaker can be supported by the house, the better it will prove in the long run for the dispatch of business and also for the reputation of parliament itself in all parts of the world. I hope hon. members will not think I am unduly anticipating possibilities of that kind. I would only say that the more hon. members strengthen the hands of the Speaker, in his decisions, and in his maintenance of order and decorum in the house, the more rapidly and effectively will it be possible to proceed with the dispatch of the business of the house.

Mr. Beauchesne, I would move, seconded by Mr. St. Laurent:

That Gaspard Fauteux, Esquire, member for the electoral district of St. Mary, do take the chair of this house as Speaker.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Doctor Beauchesne, speaking for the members in this section of the house I am very glad to have the opportunity of supporting the motion made by the Prime Minister. The right hon. gentleman has outlined something of the circumstances leading up to the present situation and has given us something of the historical background of the choice of Speaker. With his motion I am in agreement. With his practice I am not fully in accord.

My remarks to-day will not be at all contentious and will be very brief. The position of Speaker in the House of Commons carries with it the highest honour in the gift of this assembly. For that high task the hon. member for St. Mary has been proposed. In expectation of his election I want, on behalf of my associates and myself, to extend our sincere congratulations and best wishes for his successful tenure of office.

In the choice of a presiding officer for the House of Commons there are three essentials we ought never to forget. One is that he is elected by us; another is that he is our officer, and the last is that in no degree is he an officer of the government. In democratic parliaments these facts ought never to be overlooked.

As the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) pointed out, in Westminster special care is taken to protect the independence of that position. As he has explained, private members make the motion appointing him and, we have found that speakers, once appointed have continued from one parliament to the next, even though in the meantime there may have been a change of government. The action of the Labour government in Great Britain within the last few days when they continued in office the Speaker of the previous administration is evidence of that fact.

I draw attention to these facts at this time, not in a spirit of censure of the procedure we are witnessing here to-day. Rather I do so for the purpose of pointing out that the government's action a few days ago—like some similar actions in the past—in designating in advance of the meeting of parliament who would be Speaker of the House of Commons, was not in accordance with the best parliamentary tradition. It was, in fact, and I say this in all deference to the Prime Minister and to such of his predecessors as followed the same procedure, an affront to that tradition; and, to that extent, was an invasion of the rights of the house.

I mention this matter to-day only because if it becomes a regular practice that the Speaker be chosen by the government, without, as in the present instance, any consultation whatsoever with the members of the house, it will tend to prejudice the independence of the office, and to that extent hamper its occupant in the sometimes delicate task of satisfying members of all parties that he is, in fact, completely impartial.

I need scarcely add that this protest is not in any sense directed against the hon. member who has been proposed as Speaker, and in no way detracts from the commendation and good wishes which I express to him personally.

It is one of the happy traditions of the House of Commons that a Speaker of one parliament who is of English descent shall be followed by a Speaker of French descent, and vice versa. The government's choice is in accordance with that worthy tradition. Furthermore, on grounds of personal merit, I feel it to be a wise one. I believe it will be generally accepted as fortunate that the government's choice has fallen upon the hon. member for St. Mary.

During his period of public service in the house and in the legislature of his native province, the hon. member has demonstrated that he possesses ability and tolerance of a high order. If it be true, as the Prime Minister has said, that the hon. member has in the past been a strong partisan and a doughty fighter for his party, that need not be held to his discredit in his new role.

We on this side of the house are hopeful that, in the tradition of his many distinguished predecessors, the hon. member will be able, as they did, to cast off the mantle of partisanship in the administration of the onerous duties of his new task. We are confident that he will consider himself the guardian of the rights of members wherever they may sit in the house; and we trust that he will be equally zealous in protecting the rights of those who sit in opposition as well as those who sit on the government side.

To the degree that he succeeds in doing this, his administration will be a success and he will be assured from all sides of the house of the respect and deference due his high position.

In assuming the speakership the hon. member for St. Mary will follow a long line of predecessors, whether of Anglo-Saxon or of French descent, who brought distinction to that position. It is our hope and expectation that his record will be no less distinguished than theirs.

For myself and associates I say to the hon. member so soon to be chosen Speaker that he will have our full cooperation in making his term of office a credit both to himself and to the twentieth parliament now about to open.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Doctor Beauchesne, on behalf of one of the numerically smaller parties in the house, I wish to support the nomination of the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Fauteux) as Speaker.

Doctor Fauteux came to this house some three years ago in a by-election, and since that time those of us who had come to know him paid respect to him for his views, and for that sense of humour which has been mentioned by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). I am rising to support the nomination of Doctor Fauteux because I believe he will bring honour to himself and, I hope, add to the dignity of this chamber in the years to come. I support him, not because he chose his ancestors carefully, but rather because I think he is eminently suitable for the office.

The high office to which he has now been nominated is one which concerns the whole membership of the house. Perhaps I have a rather strong sense of history, because I once taught it for a number of years. When we went to the senate chamber this morning my mind recalled that occasion when a Speaker of the English House of Commons, during the reign of Charles I, when the King violated the Commons chamber, informed him when he came to wreck his vengeance upon a small minority in that house that he had no knowledge of their whereabouts, and that he could not tell the King other than he was told by the House of Commons to tell.

It seems to me that the Speaker of the House is the guardian of the privileges of the house, and of those of individual members. I would hope that in this parliament, one which is quite different in its make-up from parliaments we have had since I have been here in the last ten years, Mr. Speaker will always remember that the fortunes of the government must not take precedence over the rights of individual members, or other parties in the house. I am sure that the nominee for this very high office, one who is to be the first Commoner of Canada, will remember this during his tenure of office; so that when the time comes for him to lay down his cares of office we may regard him with the same esteem and respect as we did the Speaker of the house who retired from that position at the end of the last parliament.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Doctor Beauchesne, speaking for the minority group in this section of the house, I wish to associate myself with other hon. members who have spoken in supporting the nomination of the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Fauteux) to this high and important office.

I have not had the pleasure of knowing Doctor Fauteux prior to this morning and therefore I am not able to speak with any authority or any knowledge about his background or his ancestry, but having had ten years' experience in the provincial legislature I have had impressed upon me the importance of his office and have gained some knowledge of the onerous duties which devolve upon him.

I sympathize with him in the duties that he will have to perform, and I hope that sympathy will be carried into action by myself and all who are with me in this organization to give him full support in seeing to it that the best traditions of this house are observed. I trust, Doctor Beauchesne, that the new Speaker—I am anticipating his election—will also keep in mind the best traditions of true democracy and watch over and observe and preserve the rights of the minorities in this chamber as well as those of the majority.

I wish to assure the Speaker-elect that we will at all times give him every support in the carrying out of the heavy duties that will devolve upon him and I assure him, and the other members of this house, that we will always stand ready to observe the rules and to do that which will assist in the carrying out of the business of this house with dispatch. I take great pleasure in supporting the nomination of the hon. member for St. Mary.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I had not anticipated that it would be either necessary or desirable to say any word in reply to the remarks that might be made by the different speakers at this time, but my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) has taken me to task for having intimated to the public in advance of this morning's sitting the name of the person it was intended to nominate as Speaker of the house. My hon. friend has said that that was not the correct practice to follow and he has taken exception to it. May I say to my hon. friend that if he will look through the records of this parliament from the days of confederation up to the present time he will find that the practice I have adopted has been the one that has been followed by all previous prime ministers. Far from limiting or restricting in any way the privileges of the members of the house in making their own choice, the action taken, which has permitted them to know in advance the name of the individual whose name is likely to be placed in nomination, gives to all hon. members an opportunity which otherwise they would not have until the last moment, namely, to decide in their own minds some time in advance whether the choice of the government is one they wish to approve or oppose. Hon. members would have resented it very strongly if I had changed that practice and had given to them and to others no intimation in advance as to the one whom the government had in mind to nominate for the position of Speaker. I wish to make it clear that, far from being censured for departing from the practice, I should be commended by my hon. friend for following established and most desirable precedent.

There is one other point to which my hon. friend has drawn attention, namely, the desirability of not permitting the selection of a Speaker to alternate between one whose mother tongue is English and one whose mother tongue is French. May I say to him that the longer he remains a member of this house and the more he desires to command its confidence, the more ready he will be to see that so far as the English speaking and French speaking members are concerned—

Mr. BRACKEN: I want to correct that.

M. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that, if I misunderstood him, I am prepared to withdraw.

Mr. BRACKEN: I commended that practice.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Did my hon. friend not say that the practice he would like to see followed was to have one Speaker continue?

Mr. BRACKEN: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understood that such was his first comment.

Mr. BRACKEN: I commended the practice of the house in alternating between an English speaking Speaker and a Speaker using the other language.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I must say that I thought my hon. friend's first comment was that the British practice of having one Speaker from parliament to parliament was the practice which should be followed.

Mr. BRACKEN: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If I misunderstood my hon. friend, I of course am only too ready and too happy to apologize to him. I do wish to make it abundantly clear that every hon. member in this house has the same privilege as has any member of the government in the making of nominations.

The Clerk of the House declared the motion carried in the affirmative, nemine contradicente, and Hon. Gaspard Fauteux, member for the electoral district of St. Mary, duly elected to the chair of the house.

Hon. Mr. Fauteux was conducted from his seat in the house to the Speaker's chair by Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King and Hon. L. S. St. Laurent.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. SPEAKER-ELECT said: Madam and gentlemen of the House of Commons, I must thank you from the bottom of my heart for the testimonial of good will that you have just conferred upon me so generously.

Being conscious of my unfitness for this high office, I find great comfort in your sympathy and generosity. I hope that with your co-operation as well as your enlightened advice and counsel I shall prove myself deserving of your trust in presiding over the proceedings of the House of Commons with justice and in upholding British parliamentary traditions.

Again, madam and fellow members of the House of Commons, thanks from the bottom of my heart.

SUSPENSION OF SITTING

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the sitting be suspended until three o'clock this afternoon.

At 12 noon the sitting was suspended until 3 p.m. this day.

SITTING RESUMED

The house resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER read a communication from the assistant secretary to the Governor General, announcing that His Excellency the Governor General would proceed to the Senate chamber at three p.m. on this day, for the purpose of formally opening the session of the dominion parliament.

A message was delivered by Charles H. Larose, Esquire, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly the house went up to the Senate chamber.

Then the Hon. Gaspard Fauteux, Speaker-elect, said:

May it please Your Excellency,

The House of Commons have elected me as their Speaker, though I am but little able to fulfil the important duties thus assigned to me. If in the performance of those duties I should at any time fall into error, I pray that the fault may be imputed to me, and not to the Commons whose servant I am.

The Honourable the Speaker of the Senate, addressing the Honourable the Speaker of the House, then said:

Mr. Speaker, I am commanded by His Excellency the Governor General to assure you that your words and actions will constantly receive from him the most favourable construction.

Then His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to open parliament by a speech from the throne.

And the house being returned to the Commons chamber:

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to state that the house having attended on His Excellency the Governor General in the Senate chamber, I informed His Excellency that the choice of Speaker had fallen upon me, and, in your names, and on your behalf, I made the usual claim for your privileges, which His Excellency was pleased to confirm to you.

OATHS OF OFFICE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 1, respecting the administration of oaths of office.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that when the house did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both houses of parliament. To prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy, which is as follows:

Honourable Members of the Senate:
Members of the House of Commons:

You will rejoice with me that the opening of the Twentieth Parliament of Canada comes at the moment of the victorious conclusion of the war.

It is just six years ago that Parliament met in special session in anticipation of a declaration of war. Since that time, war has been waged continuously, first against Germany, later also against Italy and Japan. From the very beginning, the resources of Canada and the utmost efforts of our people were committed to the fight for freedom and to the winning of victory.

One by one, the aggressor nations and their satellite states have suffered total defeat by the armed forces of the United Nations. All have been compelled to surrender unconditionally. The terms of surrender were signed by Italy on September 8, 1943; by Germany, on May 8 of the present year; and by Japan, on the eve of the present week. The month of August witnessed the devastating use of the atomic bomb against Japanese cities, and the entry of the U.S.S.R. into war against Japan. Thus the world-encircling conflict, the most terrible of wars in human history, was brought to its close. Not only has victory been complete, it has been won over strongly organized and sinister forces working in combination in an attempt at world conquest and domination.

As you assemble at the opening of a new Parliament, I join with you in giving humble and grateful thanks to Divine Providence for the deliverance which His mercy has vouchsafed to the peoples of our own and other lands. We of this day and generation have been the witnesses of a mighty manifestation of the workings of the moral law which inexorably connects wrongdoing with retribution. It is as applicable to nations as to men.

In this titanic conflict between the forces of good and evil, it has been ours to behold the triumph of right and justice. In this victory, we find the assurance of the ultimate triumph of righteousness as we seek to bring into being a new order founded upon world security and social justice.

The victory over nazi and fascist tyranny in Europe and over Japanese militarism in Asia has been bought at a great price. As the appalling extent of the power of the forces of aggression and tyranny was revealed, the free peoples of the world slowly began to realize what they owe to the allied nations who first opposed the aggressors. To their heroic resistance and to the armed might of all the united nations, humanity owes not only its freedom, but everything which free men value and cherish most.

Our thoughts at this time are especially of the members of Canada's forces who have given their lives that victory might be ours and not our enemies'. The whole nation reverently bows its head in tribute to their sacrifice. At this hour our hearts share in special measure the hopes and expectations of those who yearn for the return of their loved ones, now liberated after three and a half years in Japanese prison camps. The deep sympathy of Canada is with all who have been bereaved, and with those who have suffered impairment of body or mind, imprisonment, privation or want.

It will be for history to record the magnitude of Canada's contribution in this global conflict. We rejoice that our armed forces have achieved so much in helping to defend and liberate nations to whose past and present our own is so closely akin. Our country will ever remember with pride the heroic exploits of Canada's fighting men and merchant seamen.

We pay tribute as well to the men and women without whose loyal and steady work on the farms, in forests, mines and fisheries, in factories, workshops and offices, in hospitals and homes, and in transport and other services, victory could not have been achieved. Canada's great contribution to victory has been made possible by the unbroken partnership of her warriors and her workers.

To all who have contributed by service and sacrifice to victory, I would, in the name of parliament, express our country's gratitude.

So far as the future could be foreseen, my ministers had taken steps to see that Canada was prepared to meet the very difficult situations which would arise when victory had been won. Under the authority of Parliament, relief was provided to assist in feeding, clothing and housing destitute populations, and in rehabilitating areas devastated by enemy action in Europe. Additional measures to assist in meeting these and other imperative needs will be submitted for your consideration.

Preparations for the demobilization, rehabilitation and reestablishment in civil life of the men and women in the armed forces were well under way when Germany surrendered. The same is true of measures for the reconversion of the economic life of our country from a war-time to a peace-time basis, and for the maintenance of a high level of employment and national income. The plans thus developed to meet the requirements of the period of transition are now being put into full operation.

In the building of a new world order, my ministers are determined to seek above all else the promotion of peace, work and health in domestic and international relations. To further these great objectives, the government has received a definite mandate from the people of Canada.

The charter of the united nations which was signed by the representatives of the fifty nations who took part in the conference at San Francisco will be submitted for your approval. The charter expresses their determination to maintain peace in accordance with justice and respect for human rights, and to promote the welfare of all peoples by international cooperation.

To the promotion of national well-being, cooperation and goodwill between the dominion and provincial governments are as essential as these attitudes, between nations, are to the maintenance of world peace and international prosperity. You will be pleased to know that at the dominion-provincial conference held at Ottawa during August, a successful beginning was made in the consideration of proposals designed to contribute to the maintenance of a high level of employment and national income, and to the establishment of nation-wide social security. It is the earnest hope of my ministers that, when the conference resumes its deliberations, agreement may be speedily reached which will place the dominion and all the provinces in a financial position to discharge effectively their several responsibilities. Such agreements would make possible a reorganization of the dominion tax structure on a simpler, more equitable basis, conducive to the expansion of enterprise and employment.

Every effort is being put forth to ensure the return to Canada as rapidly as military commitments and transportation facilities will permit, of our armed forces serving abroad, and to accelerate the orderly release of men and women from the forces.

Through the joint efforts of the government, industry and labour, the conversion of war industries to civilian production is taking place with a minimum of delay and inconvenience.

It is the intention of the government to abolish war restrictions in progressive steps as rapidly as that can be accomplished without occasioning inflation or other economic disturbances. Such controls as are essential to the welfare of our people will be continued for as long as they are necessary.

You will be asked to approve a measure to extend certain specified emergency powers to meet emergency conditions in the period of reconstruction.

The maintenance of long-term markets for our primary industries is receiving close attention. The continuing need for foodstuffs both at home and abroad will ensure, for some time to come, a heavy demand for the products of our farms and fisheries.

The government is continuing its efforts to stimulate the restoration and expansion of external trade. Measures to this end will be submitted for your approval.

In furtherance of stable international exchanges and adequate provision for international credit, you will be asked to approve a measure to provide for Canadian participation in the international monetary fund and the bank for reconstruction and development.

The provision of houses is being pressed forward as rapidly as the supply of materials and labour will permit. Plans already in operation provide for the expansion of home construction to keep pace with increases in the output of building supplies. Priority is being given to houses for war veterans and their dependents.

Plans for the establishment of a national minimum of social security and human welfare are being advanced as rapidly as possible. Unemployment insurance, floors under farm and fish prices, and family allowances are now in force. The government's proposals for the promotion of health and welfare made to the dominion-provincial conference include plans for a nation-wide system of health insurance and preventive medicine, and for old age pensions on a more generous basis.

Other measures demanding your consideration will include a consolidation, as a veterans' charter, of the various orders in council relating to the care, rehabilitation and reestablishment of war veterans; a bill to repeal the act establishing the Department of National War Services; a bill to merge the Department of Munitions and Supply and the Department of Reconstruction into a single Department of Reconstruction and Supply. The army and the navy have already been placed under the jurisdiction of one Minister of National Defence. A further consolidation of all defence services under one minister of the crown will be made in due course.

You will be asked to make financial provision for all essential services, also to meet expenditures arising out of the war, and for the purposes of reconstruction. My ministers' proposals with respect to taxation measures will be disclosed in the budget.

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

My ministers believe that the position attained by our country among the nations of the world, makes it desirable that Canada, like the other nations of the British commonwealth, should possess a distinctive national flag. You will be asked to appoint a select committee of members of both houses of parliament to consider a suitable design for a Canadian flag.

The government has directed that, pending approval by parliament of a particular design, the Canadian red ensign which was the flag carried into battle by the Canadian army, and which was flown from the peace tower on V-E day and V-J day as a tribute to the valour of our armed forces and to Canada's achievements in war, may be displayed wherever place or occasion makes it desirable to fly a distinctive Canadian flag.

The government also considers that it is advisable to revise and clarify the definition of Canadian citizenship, and to bring the legislation respecting national status, naturalization and immigration into conformity with the definition of citizenship. You will be asked to approve the required measures.

The government has also been giving consideration to the most suitable manner in which to commemorate, in the capital of Canada, the service and sacrifice of Canadians in the war just ended. In the past, the sacrifice of human life in war has most frequently been commemorated in monuments of bronze and stone. Such a memorial our capital already has. My ministers are of the opinion that something more expressive of the vision of a new world order would, at this time, be most appropriate. They believe that this vision would best find expression in the planned development and beautification of the national capital and its surrounding area as a national memorial. Steps have already been taken to plan the development of the city and region of Ottawa on both sides of the Ottawa river. As plans are formulated, specific proposals will, from time to time, be submitted to parliament for consideration.

On the recommendation of the government of Canada, His Majesty the King has been pleased to select Field Marshal the Honourable Sir Harold Alexander as my successor as his representative in Canada. Field Marshal Alexander's duties will not permit of his assumption of office until early in the new year. Meanwhile Her Royal Highness Princess Alice and I will pay a short visit to the United Kingdom, returning to Canada for a brief stay before our official departure.

As you take up your heavy responsibilities in these difficult days of reconstruction, I pray that Almighty God may guide and bless your deliberations. May you be inspired by the vision of the better future for humanity which it is now within the power of the united nations to create.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the speech of His Excellency the Governor General to both houses of parliament be taken into consideration on Friday next, and that this order have precedence over all other business, except the introduction of bills, government notices of motions and government orders, until disposed of.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING COMMITTEES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That a special committee be appointed to prepare and report, with all convenient speed, lists of members to compose standing committees of this house under standing order 63, said committee to be composed of Messrs. Mackenzie, Chevrier, Casselman, Knowles and Weir.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMISSION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) presented the following message from His Excellency the Governor General:

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons a certified copy of an approved minute of council appointing the Honourable Ian A. Mackenzie, Minister of Veterans Affairs, the Honourable J. L. Ilsley, Minister of Finance, the Honourable J. A. MacKinnon, Minister of Trade and Commerce, and the Honourable L. S. St. Laurent, Minister of Justice, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons as commissioners for the purposes and under the provisions of chapter 145 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, intituled: An Act Respecting the House of Commons.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INTERIM SUPPLY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Members of the house who were present at the last session of the last parliament will recall that supply was voted only until the end of August. There is no supply at the present time to carry on the business of government during this month of September, and should a measure of interim supply not be voted meanwhile, if the debate on the address should continue for several days, running past the fifteenth of this month, it would not be possible for members of the civil service to receive their cheques at that time. It is customary now to set up the committees of supply and ways and means until after the address in reply to the speech of His Excellency has been agreed to. Having this in mind I conferred this morning with the leader of the opposition and with other leaders of groups opposite, and I believe I may say that, reserving all rights to members of the house with respect to such discussion as may arise on a motion for the purpose, they would be agreeable, if other hon. members are, to the house immediately setting up these two committees of the house. This procedure would enable the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) on Monday next to ask the house for interim supply, of an amount sufficient to enable us to carry on for a limited time. If that is agreeable to hon. members I would move:

That this house resolve itself at its next sitting into a committee to consider of supply to be granted to His Majesty, notwithstanding the provisions of standing order 57.

Standing order 57, the one to which I refer, reads:

The house will appoint the committees of supply and ways and means at the commencement of every session, so soon as an address has been agreed to, in answer to His Excellency's speech.

What I am now suggesting is that, notwithstanding this order, the house agree to constitute these two committees at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I also move:

That this house resolve itself at its next sitting into a committee to consider of the ways and means for raising the supply to be granted to His Majesty, notwithstanding the provisions of standing order 57.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

APPOINTMENTS OF CLERK ASSISTANTS AND SERGEANT-AT-ARMS

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that the governor in council has appointed Roy T. Graham, Esquire, K.C., as Clerk Assistant of the House of Commons, Charles W. Boyce, Esquire, Second Clerk Assistant of the House of Commons, and Lieutenant-Colonel W. J. Franklin, M.C., V.D., Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Commons.

ADJOURNMENT—COUNCIL OF FOREIGN MINISTERS

Righ Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I move that the house do now adjourn.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Before the motion is put, Mr. Speaker, might I, with the indulgence of the house, be permitted to ask the Prime Minister whether any arrangements have been made for Canadian representation at the meeting of the council of foreign ministers which will open in London on Monday next? It is reported in the press that the Australian Minister of External Affairs has arrived in London, and I am confident that Canadians would also wish to be represented at this meeting, which may play such a large part in determining the future course of world affairs.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I expected that my hon. friend would ask that question, and I had an answer prepared to give to him.

The Prime Minister of the United Kingdom did a few days ago invite the Prime Ministers of Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa either to come to London themselves, or if that were impracticable and if they so desired, to designate special representatives for consultation in London with United Kingdom ministers during the proceedings of the council of foreign ministers. It was suggested that these representatives would also be available to participate in the proceedings of the council if the council so decided.

I understand that none of the prime ministers of the commonwealth countries have found it possible to visit London at this time themselves.

In my reply to Mr. Attlee, I welcomed his desire for full consultation between commonwealth governments on questions of common concern and said I should be glad, if opportunity offered, to talk over with him questions of mutual interest to our governments. With parliament opening to-day, however, I found it quite impossible for me or one of my colleagues to go to London to attend commonwealth discussions to be held during the course of the meeting of the council of foreign ministers. As members of the house know, our channels for swift and direct intergovernmental communication between the countries of the commonwealth are excellent. I myself believe that the most effective means of consultation within the commonwealth are provided through the continuing conference of the cabinets of the commonwealth, which use of those channels makes possible.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 4.40 p.m.

Friday, September 7, 1945.

The house met at three o'clock.

MAIN ESTIMATES, 1945-46

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1946, was presented by Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the house, and referred to the committee of supply.

Mr. ILSLEY said: Mr. Speaker, these are the estimates that were laid on the table of the house and referred to the committee of supply in the last session of the last parliament. No change has been made in them. Five-twelfths of the estimates were voted at that session and the government will ask this house to vote the remaining seven-twelfths at a later date. May I add that on Tuesday next I shall ask the house to vote interim supply, that is, one-twelfth of the main estimates that have been placed on the table of the house to-day, and at the same time I shall ask the consent of the house to the introduction of a resolution, notice of which has already been placed on the order paper, for voting a portion of the appropriation that is required for war and demobilization purposes. That I propose to ask for on Tuesday as well. Both these interim votes are necessary if the expenditures which are falling due from day to day are to be met.

MUTUAL AID

MEANS OF ENSURING FLOW OF ESSENTIAL SUPPLIES TO ALLIES FOLLOWING END OF HOSTILITIES

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I believe it is desirable to take this first opportunity to inform the house of the action the government has taken in regard to Mutual Aid and to means of ensuring the continued flow of essential supplies to our allies following the end of hostilities.

It has been understood from the beginning that Mutual Aid was purely a war-time measure, intended to make possible the most effective prosecution of the war and to end when victory was achieved. The government has always endeavoured to make this clear to parliament and the Canadian public, as well as to the allied nations receiving Mutual Aid.

Immediately upon receiving word of the readiness of the Japanese government to surrender on the terms offered them, the Canadian government notified the governments of countries receiving Mutual Aid from Canada that transfers of supplies as Mutual Aid would cease at the end of hostilities. These recipient governments were asked if they wished to continue to receive foodstuffs and other civilian supplies which they had expected to receive as Mutual Aid, had hostilities continued, and we indicated our willingness to continue to ship such supplies on the understanding that any of those transferred after the end of hostilities would be paid for. In order to avoid useless and wasteful activity, the production and delivery of munitions and other military supplies were halted immediately it was evident that Japan was going to surrender, although the governments which were to receive such supplies were informed of our action and given an opportunity to say that they would like production to be continued for their account. Exceptions to the policy of immediate cancellation were made in a few instances where manufacture was nearly finished and it was considered more sensible and economical to complete production in the hope of being able to sell the finished article for some useful purpose. There was no interruption in the production, procurement and shipment of foodstuffs and other civilian supplies during the course of these rearrangements. I should also add that the provision of supplies to UNRRA for relief and rehabilitation has not been affected by the termination of hostilities.

The date of the end of hostilities for the purpose of terminating the transfer of supplies as Mutual Aid has been taken as September 2, the day of the actual surrender of Japan.

Under the provisions of our Mutual Aid agreements the Canadian government may decide whether supplies which have been transferred as Mutual Aid and which are still in Canada or in ocean transit at the cessation of hostilities shall be repossessed by Canada or allowed to go forward to the countries to which they were transferred. The government has decided it will retain title to such supplies as had not been loaded on ship board before September 2, but will not repossess supplies which were in ocean transit on that date.

The end of Mutual Aid transfers will not end or delay the flow of essential civilian supplies to our allies. The government has offered to continue to buy such supplies for allied governments if they request us to do so and undertake to reimburse us for the costs so incurred on their behalf. Already several governments have made such requests and purchases and shipments are continuing.

Most of the countries which have been receiving Mutual Aid from Canada will require credits if they are to continue to obtain what they need from this country. Negotiations are proceeding with several with a view to the provision of credits under the Export Credits Insurance Act, passed by parliament at the last session. It would be out of place for me to make public the nature of these negotiations until a later stage.

The United Kingdom and the sterling area generally constitute a special case, because of the magnitude and complexity of their trade and financial transactions with Canada. There will be a problem of some difficulty in working out satisfactory means of financing the deficit of the sterling area in its trade and other transactions with Canada during the period of the next few years when Britain is rebuilding and developing her export trade, which has been sacrificed almost entirely to war production in recent years. A similar problem, of course, will exist on a larger absolute scale between the United States and Britain and other parts of the sterling area. Lord Keynes, representing the British government, has been in Ottawa for several days, discussing with other ministers and myself the financial and trade problems arising from the sudden conclusion of hostilities. We have not endeavoured at this time to devise arrangements or negotiate terms for the financing of Britain's trade and that of the rest of the sterling area with Canada over the whole period of transition, which undoubtedly will last for several years. Full discussion of that problem must be deferred until later. Our conversations have so far been confined to the problem that will exist over the next few months until more definite agreements can be worked out. Fortunately it appears that, as a result of the settlements still to be made in respect of past transactions, as well as the continuing expenditures of the Canadian forces overseas, Britain and the sterling area will be receiving sufficient Canadian dollars during the next few months to finance all or nearly all of their requirements in Canada. Consequently we anticipate that the question of providing for a deficit will not arise during this interim period. If there should be a small deficit, it might be covered simply by postponing for a few months payment by the United Kingdom or other sterling area countries for supplies received during this period through Canadian government procurement agencies, or possibly by other purely temporary expedients. These would be simply interim arrangements made in anticipation of a definite agreement which has not yet been considered.

PRISONERS OF WAR

INQUIRY AS TO LIBERATION OF CANADIAN FORCES AT HONG KONG

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I have two or three questions I should like to ask the Prime Minister. One of them has already been very well answered by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). It had to do with Mutual Aid. If I may I should like to thank the minister for his very fine statement on that matter. I am sure it will be taken by the public as an assurance that no serious interruption of trade will be permitted.

My first question is: In view of the anxiety of Canadians generally regarding the liberation of the Canadian forces taken prisoner at Hong Kong, would the Prime Minister make a full statement to the house at the earliest opportunity, giving all information in the possession of the government?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I may say to the leader of the opposition that the government has made it a practice of giving out just as quickly as it is received any information with respect to those who have been prisoners of war in the far east. At the moment I have not a comprehensive statement that I could give to the house, but as soon as information has been received of a character which will permit of that, I will have the statement made.

EMPIRE PREFERENCE

PRESS REPORTS OF UNITED STATES DESIRE FOR ABANDONMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Press reports indicate that the government of the United States is seeking to induce the United Kingdom to abandon the empire preference system. Would the Prime Minister advise the house whether any representations to this effect have been received from the government of the United States or from the United Kingdom, and if so, what attitude the Canadian government has taken?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): No such representations have been received.

FORT McMURRAY OIL

DESTRUCTION OF BUILDINGS AT ABASAND PLANT—INQUIRY AS TO RECONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): May I inquire from the Minister of Mines and Resources or from the Minister of Reconstruction, whichever one is directly in control, whether in view of the destruction of the oil separation mill and adjacent buildings of the Abasand plant at Fort McMurray the government proposes to reconstruct the destroyed buildings or to return the property to private interests?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): I may say in reply to the hon. member's question that discussions leading to a decision are now taking place between the government and the Abasand company who wish to take over.

HALIFAX V-E DAY RIOTS

MR. JUSTICE KELLOCK'S REPORT—REMISSION OR REDUCTION OF PENITENTIARY SENTENCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice in connection with the report made by Mr. Justice Kellock on the V-E day riots in Halifax. Is it the intention of the government to file that report? Is consideration being given to the remission or reduction of the penitentiary sentences that were passed on the naval personnel as a result of the riots?

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): The report of Mr. Justice Kellock was submitted while parliament was not in session, and it was immediately turned over to the king's printer. The copies became available some two or three weeks ago. In view of the widespread public interest in the matter it was felt that it should be made public at that time, and it was made available to the Canadian press. If it is desired to have a copy tabled here I will arrange to have it done at one of the early sittings. Copies of the report are in the office of the king's printer and can be obtained by any hon. member of the house who wishes to have one.

As to the second part of the question, the remission branch of the Department of Justice has been making the usual investigation into the matter of the sentences passed upon not only naval personnel but others as well who were convicted of having participated in the disturbances of that day at Halifax. The hon. member knows that it is not the practice to announce in advance at what time a ticket-of-leave will be issued or at what time a recommendation will be made for a reduction of sentence. It is only when the moment has arrived to give effect to the recommendation that it is transmitted to His Excellency.

There are no reductions made in sentences until they become effective when announced; but a very careful and, I may add, sympathetic investigation into the situation has been under way for some considerable time. As soon as it is completed, and if it appears that it is possible at once to give effect to a recommendation for clemency, it will be submitted. I can assure the hon. member that the most sympathetic consideration will be given to the cases of the misguided young men who participated in that unfortunate disturbance.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO HOSPITALIZATION IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. CHESTER S. McLURE (Queens): I understand that a resolution has been sent to the Minister of Veterans Affairs by the government of Prince Edward Island, and in explanation of the question I am going to ask I should like to be permitted to read that short resolution.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. McLURE: This is a copy of a minute of his honour the lieutenant governor in council—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. That may not be read.

Mr. McLURE: Then I will just ask the question. Has the resolution been received by the Minister of Veterans Affairs, and what action has he taken with reference to it?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Only the question is permissible.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I have received several resolutions from Prince Edward Island in regard to the hospitalization situation there. Negotiations are still proceeding as a result of the recommendations of the wartime hospitalization committee, by whom all recommendations must be endorsed in reference to the hospitalization of veterans in Canada.

THE WAR

INQUIRY AS TO FORMAL ANNOUNCEMENT OF TERMINATION OF HOSTILITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister, based upon the announcement of the Minister of Finance with respect to Mutual Aid, in which evidently it was recognized that hostilities have ceased. At first blush my question may appear a bit foolish, but I have a reason for asking it. Is it expected that the government will make a formal announcement, so far as Canada is concerned, that the war is ended and, if so, when may we expect that announcement?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I would say to my hon. friend that I will take note of his question and answer it at another time.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY, MOVED BY MR. W. M. BENIDICKSON AND SECONDED BY MR. J. G. L. LANGLOIS

The house proceeded to the consideration of the speech delivered by His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of the session.

Mr. W. M. BENIDICKSON (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to move, seconded by the hon. member for Gaspe (Mr. Langlois), the following resolution:

That the following address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada:

To His Excellency Major General the Right Honourable the Earl of Athlone, Knight of the Most Noble Order of the Garter, a member of His Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, Knight Grand Cross of the Most Honourable Order of the Bath, Grand Master of the Most Distinguished Order of Saint Michael and Saint George, Knight Grand Cross of the Royal Victorian Order, Companion of the Distinguished Service Order, one of His Majesty's Personal Aides-de-Camp, Governor General and Commander-in-Chief of the Dominion of Canada.

May it Please Your Excellency:

We, His Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the House of Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both houses of parliament.

I understand it is the privilege of the mover of this resolution to make a few remarks to the house. First it is my pleasure to express to you, Mr. Speaker, my sincere congratulations upon your election to the high office of first commoner, which took place yesterday. I believe my sympathy should also be extended to you, sir, because you have before you a great number of members of parliament, I think something in the nature of one hundred, who are making their first appearance in this chamber. I feel, however, that the new members may expect from you consideration and courtesy, in that despite this high honour you yourself have not long been a member of this House of Commons, though we all realize that you have had much more experience in parliamentary procedure than we have had, by reason of your service in the legislature of your province, and also because of the family school in which you have been brought up, which has given so many distinguished members to the public life of the Dominion of Canada.

I am well aware, sir, that a signal honour has indeed been conferred upon me in the invitation to move the address to His Excellency in reply to the speech from the throne. It is, of course, the custom in this house to select for this high privilege one from among those who are taking their first faltering steps in national politics. In my own case, however, I recognize that another and far from personal reason is responsible for my selection and possibly that of my good friend the seconder of the motion. I believe we have been selected for this high honour particularly because we have been associated with the armed services during the war. It is true that in previous sessions during war time this honour has been conferred upon members of the services, but I understand that hitherto it has been performed by members of the major Canadian service, the army. Therefore I deeply appreciate the tactful courtesy that has been shown to-day in asking that the address be moved and seconded by members who have been associated with the other branches of the services of this country. It will be pleasing to them that in this great hour of final victory this additional accolade has been bestowed upon these two services whose achievements have been sometimes overlooked in recent days, when the course of the war focused public attention so completely upon the work, the distinguished work, of the Canadian Army.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

Mr. Speaker, if I may be forgiven I should like to interject a purely personal note of satisfaction. I had heard the name and rank of the hon. member for Gaspe (Mr. Langlois) as one elected to membership in the house; but until yesterday, when we met again, I had not realized that he was a former Halifax messmate who had been most helpful to a member of the Royal Canadian Air Force who, rather nervously, was feeling his way in his first contacts with the Royal Canadian Navy as their first air-liaison officer.

In expressing appreciation for the compliment that has been given to the service to which I was once attached, I decline to believe that there was not intended some measure of recognition of the constituency to the representation of which I have been elected. I wish to thank the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and his colleagues on behalf of all the electors and all the citizens of my riding for this honour.

The constituency of Kenora-Rainy River is a very large one. In fact, it is one of the few which can be said actually to span the country, for in the south the constituency of Kenora-Rainy River skirts the boundary of the United States, and moving northward through the rapidly developing mining district of Red Lake, encompasses the shore line of Hudson bay.

Therefore, I say that in the minds of Canadians it might very well occupy an equally strategic position, for it is the constituency in which it can be truly said that east and west meet and mingle.

Many of us, when we think of the city, have in mind the western city of Winnipeg. But always—and of late, unhappily—when we have referred to the fountain-head of our provincial government we have of course referred to the city of Toronto.

Since the creation of our riding some twenty years ago we have sent to the house, consistently, followers of the present Prime Minister. During that time we have sent two distinguished members who have placed upon a neophite the very heavy burden of upholding a high reputation. Our first member, the Hon. Peter Heenan, was a privy councillor. He had the great honour, one which the constituency still appreciates, of moving the introduction of a bill which made the old age pensions scheme part of the law of our country. All hon. members will appreciate those observations in the speech from the throne which indicates a very necessary extension—the dominion-provincial conference permitting —of the benefits flowing from that splendid piece of legislation.

The second hon. member to represent our constituency was Hugh McKinnon. I am sure a great number of members in this chamber, with me, regret his untimely passing during the last parliament. I have already had evidence of the great affection in which he was held by former members of the house, through the number of courtesies already extended to me by members of this house as his political heir, by reason of it being known that he and I were great personal friends.

Traditionally both these hon. members were Liberals who regarded the title as being as well spelled with a small as with a capital "L". It was they who pioneered the very natural association between Liberals and Labour which was so decisive a factor in the last election.

And, speaking of that election, may I say that I became convinced and tried to convince other people that the retention of the present government in power after the war was necessary in the best interests of the country. This opinion was based largely upon the government's splendid direction of the Canadian war effort, and naturally upon the conviction that a government with so much behind it in the way of war-time accomplishments could not fail to show equal wisdom and equal imagination in the handling of the equally difficult problems of peace. They, I felt, could not fail to understand that the world of 1938 had, in fact, dissolved before our eyes, and that a new world had stirred toward its birth six years ago this week.

From its programme it was evident that the government neither clasped the past too firmly, nor reached too eagerly toward the distant future. The record of the government and the outline of its programme during the election campaign were such, I believe, as immediately to satisfy the great majority of the people of Canada. According to the people's verdict, the government's programme approached most closely their requirements. I am pleased to note from what I read in the speech from the throne that performance is following closely upon the heels of promise.

The governor general's speech which we heard yesterday embodied at least the spirit of those reforms which the times demand. And if as members of the house we cannot ensure that the letter and the detail of those reforms are made effective, then I suggest, with all deference and respect, that we shall have failed in our task.

The raw material has been dropped into our laps by a government which, I believe, has appreciated what must go into the warp and woof of the new fabric. As I understand the matter, our task is to suggest into precisely what patterns it shall be woven. The materials given to us as outlined in the speech from the throne, are good materials. They conform with what we had been led to expect from past performance and practice.

For those materials, the spinning of which we gained some intimation during the 1944 session of parliament, and during the election campaign which followed, I should like personally to acknowledge the definite hand of the Prime Minister. We younger men who think we feel within ourselves and are led by the precepts of Liberalism—even left wing Liberalism—are told that this is a phase in our philosophy which young men rightly experience, but which they will forget as they grow older. I think the thirties are the time when we are supposed to abandon and to break away from some of those ideals.

Sometimes when, through private business success, we attain a degree of prosperity, we are inclined to abandon what I should like to call real liberalism. However, in the face of this allegedly natural transmutation, and in contradiction of all that we have been told is an inevitable and natural process, I would make so bold as to draw to the philosophers' attention the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King. The years have not changed his relative position to the right or to the left. He remains one of those fortunate ones, regarded by one party as radical and by the other as conservative. To-day, as always, he fulfils the ideals of those who are most eager to do what they can for social reform and for the advancement of their country, without entirely scrapping the whole system under which so much progress in Canada has already been made.

We may disagree on details, but I claim that in the speech from the throne which we heard yesterday were included the indications of all the major policies which we can count upon to carry Canada through the difficult years which lie ahead.

May I be forgiven if for a few minutes I give expression to what is possibly obvious to all hon. members. First, Canada has fought a great war. The magnitude of our achievement is, I think, not readily discernible as yet to Canadians as a whole. For example, we say that we had an army in the field, but I wonder if any one has yet been able to explain properly to Canadians what is meant by that very technical word "army"? We have had a navy. Possibly my hon. friend who is to second this motion may wish to have something to say as to what is involved in the way of men and ships when we say "navy".

We have had an air force, and in this connection I am on more familiar ground. The Royal Canadian Air Force has meant that there have been Canadian airmen from Iceland southeastward to Burma. For example, when we say that Canada had a bomber group in action I wonder how many Canadians were able to translate that innocent word "group" into the immense formation, among many other formations, made up of ten thousand men and millions of dollars worth of aircraft which was dispersed over hundreds of square miles of England and which was carrying as much as fifty per cent of the British bombs launched against the enemy.

These illustrations of the contributions of Canada to victory were obvious to the men overseas, but how well were they understood at home? On the other hand, how well was the achievement of Canada's home war effort appreciated by the men in the field? How well could those men, satisfied by what they saw of the deliveries of men and equipment, yet concentrated upon the evidence before them, appreciate and evaluate the excellence of the home war effort, the handling of the financial aspects of the war and the equally excellent handling of the defeat of inflation? How well could they evaluate what had been done in fulfilling the appalling demands for supply and equipment which must have staggered those responsible for meeting them as truly as did the instructions to wipe out Brest and Lorient which were given to our troops in the early days of the air war or which were given, I imagine, later on to the army at the time of Dieppe?

In passing, I suggest that we have within the government departments adequate facilities for writing what might be called the statistics of this war, the brave ones of the number of free enlistments and the tragic ones of those who have not returned. There will be the statistics of the food and munitions we produced and the hours of work that were put in in this country to assure victory. But there are no statistics, nor can there be, of the intangible things which went into the winning of the war. By "intangible things" I mean the sacrifices made by men and women who were parted in the doubtful early days of the war; and the sacrifice that was made by a man when he gave up a good job to enlist. At that time, in the eagerness with which men threw overboard their present happiness in order to serve a cause in which they believed, there appeared an example of the Canadian spirit which is all too readily overlooked to-day when men say, as if ambition instead of idealism had motivated that action, "Oh, he did well enough in the army or the war plant, but he will have to work for much less now that the war is over."

For a moment I have strayed from my theme. I had meant to argue that no one of us can yet grasp the extent of Canada's effort and I hope that none of us will deny the fact that as a result of this great conflict this country has become a great nation. I have heard expressed in private conversations our peculiar Canadian brand of isolationism, and I have no doubt that we shall hear of it hereafter in this house. It follows naturally upon the fact that we in Canada have not what might be called the normal ambitions of a nation. We do not want anyone's territory; we are content to keep the peace and leave other people alone. So far so good, but I think there is more to be said.

Whether we like it or not, as a result of our achievements through the war years, the achievements of our armed forces, of our economic administrators, of our diplomatic representatives, of our scientific forces, we have been lifted up far above the stature of a northern adjunct to the United States or a western dependency of Great Britain. Whether or not we like it we have been forced into the position of being respected as a great power in the world; we are the spokesman for a great deal of the best in the world that we hope will emerge from the holocaust. This fact has already been recognized by much more of the world at large than some of us at home are prepared to realize. I believe we confuse ourselves by thinking that the major figures in the world of to-day stop off in Ottawa only for reasons of courtesy or convenience.

As a great nation we have ever increasing obligations. With our immense resources of food, minerals, forest products and manufactures we must ensure that the rest of the world is supplied with its share of what it needs. Morally, we must exert every influence to ensure that whatever settlements or agreements are made to-day, twenty years from now they will not disturb the peace that Canada loves. Socially, we must use to the full, as we have always done before, the progressive spirit of our own people to introduce reforms which may in turn be a pattern for other parts of the world. Economically, we must prove that our existing freedom will work and seek to enlarge it rather than narkening to those who say that either it must be scrapped or so changed in one direction or the other that it is no longer freedom.

I believe that these suggestions of mine are implicit in the speech from the throne. Asking your patience, sir, and that of the house I should like to touch upon two points, one of which was not mentioned in the speech but both of which I regard as being of special importance. They both concern the man who has served in this latest war. On all sides of the house we are obviously determined that the best possible deal shall be given to him. I think that some confidence will be given to these men in the knowledge that in this house there are over thirty veterans of this war in addition to possibly many more who saw service in the great war that went before.

In the first, and lesser place, there are numbers of young men who after long service in our forces during this war have decided that their special aptitudes and special interests lie in continued membership in the armed forces. They were volunteers at the outset of the war. To-day they would like to be members of that relatively large permanent force which we expect Canada to maintain as a nation, if not to contribute to an international police force. To the best of my knowledge two at least of these services so far are not making it possible for the men so minded to remain in the service. I suspect that in consequence the cream of the crop, from the military point of view, is being lost.

In the second, and much greater place, I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the government give the utmost priority to provision for the housing of veterans. I am glad to see that subject mentioned in the speech from the throne. We know that constructive action is under way in cities, and we are hopeful that when the occasion comes a still broader programme will be announced. We are also hopeful that control over housing, the major emergency which Canada faces to-day, may be vested in one central agency. We would welcome an assurance that the benefits of the wartime housing policy will not be concentrated in the cities but will be dispersed among the smaller towns as well, where the problem of overcrowding is relatively equally severe.

In the meantime may I respectfully ask my colleagues in this house, including older and wiser members, to remember that the final victory is not much more than a week or so behind us and that while the transition from the old to the new is ahead of us, it cannot be accomplished overnight. At the same time we as members of this house must as legislators and public servants keep ever fresh in our minds a vision of our worthy calling. In this connection I should like to plagiarize a story that appeared recently in a popular magazine.

There were three stonemasons at work, and a passerby asked each of them what he was doing. The first replied, "I am cutting a stone." The second one said, "I am making a wall." The third replied, "I am helping to build a cathedral." And so I say, Mr. Speaker, that even those of us who are new here and back-benchers must keep in our minds the fact that we have the great privilege of being stonemasons in the building of a better social order.

Mr. J. G. LEOPOLD LANGLOIS (Gaspe) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I rise to second the motion which has been moved with so much eloquence by my honourable friend the member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson).

I thank the honourable member for his very kind remarks, and wish to assure him of my most sincere friendship.

May I first be permitted, Mr. Speaker, to congratulate you for having been selected to preside over the debates of this house. Your high qualities and your past parliamentary experience give us the assurance that you will discharge that important function with dignity and impartiality.

I must also compliment the great Canadian who is our prime minister, the Right Honourable William Lyon Mackenzie King, on the splendid victory which he and his party have recently won. It must be quite comforting to a patriot like him to see an entire population put its trust in him at the most tragic time in its history and I hasten to add that never was such a comfort so well deserved.

I have often heard it said,—of course by political opponents of the prime minister,—that his greatest quality was that he knew how to choose able associates. His opponents perhaps find in this fact an excuse whereby to account for his outstanding success at the head of the Canadian nation for nearly twenty years and perhaps they also find in it a reason for trying to minimize the great work he has accomplished for this country.

To my mind, Mr. Speaker, a man must be great in his own right to be able to secure the cooperation of outstanding associates. That is the secret weapon of our prime minister; his personal greatness which, with his inborn humility, he is forever trying to conceal.

In a recent article entitled "Canada's Mackenzie King" published in the September issue of The Readers' Digest, Mr. Stanley High confirmed this opinion when he said:

Mackenzie King that is to say is one of the world's important figures.

He is also one of the least known.

And in order to illustrate that statement, better, I should add: because Mackenzie King always places the interests of Canada before his personal interests.

As regards the prime minister's associates, there is one of whom I now wish to make a special mention; I refer to the Honourable the Minister of Justice, (Mr. St. Laurent). He is a worthy successor of Laurier and Lapointe and the province of Quebec is proud to number him among her most illustrious sons. The confidence that has recently been shown to him by that province and especially by the constituency of Quebec-East where he had an unprecedented majority, affords an ample proof of that fact.

Mr. Speaker, I also tender my sincere congratulations to our new Minister of Fisheries (Hon. H. F. G. Bridges) who last week had the well-deserved honour of being the first veteran of this war to enter the cabinet.

May I also refer to the presence in this house of another member of the Royal Canadian Navy, the honourable member for Churchill (Leading Stoker Ronald S. Moore). I congratulate him most sincerely on his election.

Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a great honour for me to have been requested to second the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I know that such an honour has been conferred on me on the one hand because I represent one of the finest constituencies in our Canadian confederation, and on the other hand because I am a member of the Royal Canadian Navy. On behalf of each one of the men and women electors of Gaspe, and in the name of our Canadian sailors, I offer the prime minister my heartfelt thanks.

Mr. Speaker, I represent in this house the beautiful constituency of Gaspe. The Gaspe peninsula is the oldest section in the country from an historial standpoint. Indeed, it was in my constituency that the first white man set foot on Canadian soil and took possession of it in the name of the king of France. Let me carry you back in thought to the year 1534 and to the great French explorer, Jacques Cartier. This land where Cartier set foot four hundred years ago is now an immense territory inhabited by honest and generous people. The population is mixed and the soft accents of the French language mingle with those of the language spoken by the majority of the citizens of Canada. Indeed, it is a miniature Canada except, of course, for the proportions represented by both racial groups.

It is devoid of industry, except lumbering, and the majority of our people are engaged in the toilsome occupation of fishermen and in the more peaceful chores of the farm. This lack of industry in the Gaspe country upon which nature seems to have lavished its richest resources, while endowing it with matchless scenery, is due to the almost total absence of communications. Except for the railway running between Matapedia and Gaspe and the highway which circles the peninsula, both of minor importance for that matter, waterways are the only commercial means of communications available to our people. And here again, our harbours are highly inadequate. Even our fishermen have few harbours where they can shelter their boats when, tired out, they finally return to their homes after having battled the sea in their attempts to wrest from it its savoury harvest.

Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding all those difficulties of an economic nature the people of Gaspe have responded most generously to the country's appeals in recent times. We have witnessed an endless procession of future heroes, brave fishermen and doughty farmers going towards remote recruiting centres of our Canadian navy, our army and our air force. In proportion to its population, our constituency has sent as many men to the armed forces as any other constituency in Canada; and we are proud of our record. Soldiers from Gaspe were at Hong Kong, at Dieppe, in Africa, in Sicily, in Italy, on the beaches of Normandy, in France, in Holland and finally in Germany, on those battlegrounds where the valorous Canadian army has written the finest pages of our history.

The Victory Loans, the appeals of the Red Cross and other auxiliary services afforded another opportunity to the people of Gaspe to show their patriotism, and here again their contribution was no less substantial. They have made those sacrifices in order to contribute to the great allied victory over the enemy of our civilization.

Mr. Speaker, the part played by our country in attaining victory has been as great as, if not greater than, that of any other nation and we may justly be proud of our achievements. Under the capable leadership of the prime minister, Canada has shown to the whole world that we are a nation that must hereafter be reckoned with. Our war effort, voluntarily agreed to in the early days of the conflict, has enabled England, this great democratic nation, to weather the storm at the outbreak of hostilities. At that time, the whole world, a large part of which was already trembling under the enemy's blows, was looking up to Canada, the chief ray of hope at the sides of brave Albion.

We have remained united and firm in this gigantic struggle. Mr. Speaker, our men of the Royal Canadian Navy and of the Canadian Merchant Marine were the first to take part in the battle. I wish to pay tribute here to the valour of those brave sailors, heroes of the first phase of the battle of the Atlantic, who did not hesitate to man their inadequately equipped ships in order to bring supplies to the last bulwark of democracy and of civilization. Their courage has never faltered and their contribution to final victory was of an inestimable value.

Mr. Speaker, I take the liberty to digress for a moment. I wish to emphasize the praiseworthy work done by our first minister of Naval Services, the Hon. Angus L. Macdonald, which was zealously continued by his worthy successor, the Hon. D. C. Abbott. From a few obsolete units at the outbreak of the war, our navy has developed, in less than six years, into a powerful fighting force. It is easy to visualize the ardruous work which this task must have imposed upon those two ministers.

Our brave soldiers and airmen followed closely our sailors in the struggle and they brought great credit to our country on the battlefields and in the skies of Europe. Nor must we overlook the patriotism of the Canadian women in the various auxiliary services who so ably supported our armed forces.

Mr. Speaker, in these opening days of a new era of peace, we must say a grateful prayer for all those brave sons of Canada who have made the supreme sacrifice in the service of their country.

It is the custom in all the countries of the world to erect monuments to the memory of those who have died on the battlefields. To that end, we attempt to carve in stone a symbol which will remind future generations of the ideals and greatness of those who have gone before.

I congratulate the government for wishing to commemorate in this manner the memory of our dead, for this memorial will express the nation's everlasting gratitude. To my mind, however, we will raise the most beautiful memorial to our gallant men by giving a practical expression to the ideal for which they fell. A more symbolic or lasting monument we can never build.

Mr. Speaker, when our sons fought with such courage and sacrificed so much, it was to give the world a lasting peace, peace among the various nations which people the universe and peace within each of these nations. How can our country participate in winning this peace? In the international sphere, it is our duty to promote understanding and co-operation among freedom-loving nations, since liberty is the basis of our democratic civilization. Our sons fought to restore to the world its lost freedom, and plain logic demands that we share in the protection of this privilege. Our country has already made great strides in that direction at the San Francisco peace conference, whose decisions will be submitted to the approval of the house. At this point, I wish to express the admiration Canada feels for her representatives at this memorable Conference and particularly for the head of our delegation who represented us with such distinction. From the aforementioned article, I quote Mr. Stanley High's opinion on the matter:

> Canada has heretofore been classed as one of the small nations. Under King's leadership, it has emerged from that category. Representing a people conscious of their increased unity and strength, Mackenzie King, at the San Francisco Conference, made Canada leader and spokesman for "The Middle Powers".

I express the wish that our country will pursue this path and make itself heard just as eloquently in future international meetings.

We must insist on being kept informed of all decisions of international import taken by major or minor powers. We must press for front rank recognition and specify this as a sine qua non condition of our fellowship with other nations. This right we have acquired by the loss of thousands of young Canadian lives and by our country's magnificent war effort.

Mr. Speaker, the principles of liberty which form the basis of a lasting world peace apply just as well in our own country. We must keep in mind that Providence has entrusted two great races with the mission of moulding the Canadian nation in this land of America, and every Canadian should deem it his duty to help bring about the success of this mission. Our present Prime Minister has, on various occasions, shown more skill and firmness than any other Canadian in effecting the unity of the two races. Among his numerous achievements, I feel convinced that history will consider this accomplishment the most outstanding and most characteristic of his long political career. Our national unity has just survived its most severe assault during the war years, and we must preserve it, for twice in a quarter of a century our sons have sealed it with their blood.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that this solemn unity will soon be symbolized by a Canadian flag and an official national anthem. The speech from the throne informs us that this house will be called upon to consider the first of those two projects. Let us hope that the second will follow very soon.

Mr. Speaker, in my humble opinion, in order to develop within the mind of every subject of this country, to whatever racial group he may belong, the legitimate and commendable pride of being an outright Canadian citizen, it is necessary that concrete symbols of his Canadian citizenship be given to him. A distinctive flag and a national anthem constitute the greatest of these symbols and they will serve as a stimulant to the external manifestations of the love we have for our country. Once those two great projects have been carried out, the people who are entrusted with education in the nine provinces of this country will perhaps agree, at least I hope so, to consider another no less important project, which would consist in making available for our students a uniform textbook of Canadian history. It should not be a history doctored so as not to offend certain touchy people, but an impartial and complete history. It would be to the benefit of every citizen of this country to study such a history dealing jointly with the two great races that form our nation. Our greatest educators have always attached considerable importance to training through the study of history. If this science is shorn of certain prominent facts, it loses its formative value. The truly Canadian soul is shaped through the knowledge of valourous deeds as well as of past errors.

Mr. Speaker, we must win the peace in the economic field as well. To this end, we must without delay reconvert our war economy to a peace footing. Let us thank God that the government have initiated their efforts in this field before the close of hostilities. That our country was not taken by surprise on the seemingly unexpected surrender of Japan at this early date and the complete suspension of hostilities which had kept our people on a war footing for the last six years, is due to this commendable forethought of the administration. Among the measures already enacted and in force, I shall mention the Unemployment Insurance Act. A crisis in the employment situation may easily be provoked in the transition period; in fact, I understand that it already exsits in certain districts. The conversion of our war plants to peace industries, following the cancellation of large war contracts, the accelerated demobilization of our armed forces, and other transition activities, cannot take place without a certain decrease in the demand for man-power.

The Family Allowance Act is another social measure which the last Parliament passed at the appropriate time. The advantages of this measure are many. It constitutes a new application of the principle of reducing war taxes in proportion to family responsibilities and it also has the merit of assisting the poorer classes, taking family obligations into account. It will offset a possible decrease in wages and raise educational standards, making it possible for a larger number to benefit from longer periods of schooling.

We must think first of rehabilitating and reestablishing our soldiers and, here again, the government have fulfilled their duty. On the return of our veterans, the Department of Veterans Affairs was already in full operation. I realize that temporarily uncontrollable circumstances, the lack of trained personnel among others, have delayed the normal operation of this important service. The task was far from easy, especially while the war was still being waged; however, I hope that peace will permit this department to operate with the greatest efficiency at a very early date.

Mr. Speaker, if one class of our citizens is more deserving than others of the greatest interest on the part of the government, it is that of the war veterans. We have the obligation, not only of reestablishing them after a fashion in civilian life but also of guiding them in their new callings. I hope it will be possible to increase the scope of our vocational training services, which I consider essential. Our young men leave the army without experience of normal life and are therefore easy targets for speculators; they are readily attracted to new experience which may be disastrous for them and society in general. On their leaving the forces not only should they be thoroughly informed of the advantages offered them, but they also should be advised by specialists in the choice of a career according to their respective skills. I shall make another digression here to praise the government and especially the Hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) for their practical recognition of the valorous services rendered by the members of our Merchant Marine in granting them a service allowance based on the length of service. They have well deserved of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, we have also witnessed the inauguration of the Department of Reconstruction. This service has done a considerable amount of work both in the field of planning for the future and in implementing certain measures for maintaining industrial employment at a high level. The creation of the War Assets Corporation, the rapid reconversion of our industry, the inauguration of the Industrial Development Bank and the National Housing Administration, the promoting of greater credit facilities and more extensive banking services are reconstruction steps full of promise. A third department, just as important as the others, has been created, that of National Health and Welfare. Its programme is essential to the social welfare of Canada and, in common with the other two, its efficient operation will require the close cooperation of the provinces. Let us hope that the Federal-Provincial Conference, which met, on the invitation of the government, on August 6 last, will have a happy ending for the future of the country. The progress and development of Canada demand that the various governments come to an agreement.

(Text): A great task has been achieved, Mr. Speaker, in connection with the winning of the peace and the smooth transition of the whole economy of our nation from war-time to peace-time needs.

The speech from the throne outlines what the government proposes to do to implement what has been done in previous sessions. The new sessional programme mentions, among other things, the intention of the government to speed the orderly release of men and women from the armed forces ,to maintain long-term markets, to restore external trade, and to promote a high level of employment.

We are endeavouring to ensure world security by promoting lasting prosperity. As this objective cannot be accomplished by any nation in isolation and requires international cooperation, we must therefore restore and expand world trade. Canada has the obligation to share in this cooperation by obtaining export markets and also by stimulating larger imports, which will respectively, and as direct advantages to this country, increase employment and raise our standard of living.

Apart from the aforesaid advantages, this increase in the volume of our exports and imports will soon necessitate the establishment of a Canadian fleet of modern ocean-going cargo ships. Such a fleet, in my opinion, would add to Canada's prosperity, because it will give employment to a greater number of Canadians both as crew members to man the ships and as workers in our shipyards which will build and repair them. It is to be noted that our country ranks second only to our neighbours to the south in the production of cargo ships. Furthermore, the creation and maintenance of a merchant fleet will require proper nautical schools to prepare deck and engine room qualified personnel. Naval architecture and marine engineering are among other fields of activities which will thus be opened to our Canadian youth.

Canada, Mr. Speaker, is a maritime country. It is bordered on the east and west by two oceans, and our inland waters form a waterway which goes to its very heart. We must therefore take advantage of this gift of nature and make more use of the cheap means of communication it affords.

I sincerely hope that in our post-war planning, our coastal and inland shipping will receive the attention of our government. This brings me to matters of particular interest to my county. There is a large number of these smaller ships in the gulf and river St. Lawrence. These ships provide an essential link by water between Montreal and Quebec and outports along both the south and the north shore. Better port facilities and an increase in the number of existing harbours along the coasts will be of benefit to those engaged in this trade and consequently to those parts of the country which depend entirely on these ships as their only means of communication with the industrial centres I have mentioned.

The government has shown its interest in our fisheries by the very appropriate floor placed under fish products. This measure is much appreciated by our fishermen and will be followed, I hope, by the consideration the government will give to markets for these products when new export markets are sought for our Canadian trade. The fishermen of my county, in addition to the building of other fishing harbours, would also welcome the establishment of a meteorological service. In my opinion, such a service could be provided at very little cost by using local radio stations to broadcast weather forecasts at regular and frequent intervals. This improvement should also prove of great assistance to our coastal shipping.

Furthermore, a plan of insurance to cover at low cost to their owners the fishing boats and their gear against marine perils could also prove feasible, with the cooperation of provincial governments, and would surely be beneficial to our fishing industry. I must add that for various reasons it is almost impossible to cover the smaller sized fishing boats through private marine insurance companies.

We are assembled here, Mr. Speaker, for the opening session of the twentieth parliament of Canada to fulfil the definite mandate we have individually received from the people of this country at the polls, which consists in the laying of sound foundations for a better and greater post-war Canada, whilst contributing our share toward international security. This task is great and far from being easy. I also wish to draw the special attention of this house to the many difficulties which will present themselves along the road which our country must travel to revert to its peace-time activities. We have united in our efforts to make Canada great in war, and we shall also unite to make it great in peace. This common objective cannot be attained without the full cooperation of every citizen of this country. I pray God, who has granted us victory and peace, to guide us in our endeavours to preserve that peace in both international and national fields.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is not expected of me that I should continue the debate at this time, but before moving its adjournment I should like the privilege of making two or three brief observations.

It is a very great pleasure in my first words to have the opportunity of complimenting the mover (Mr. Benidickson) and the seconder (Mr. Langlois) of the address to be presented to His Excellency. Each of these hon. gentlemen is to be commended upon the manner in which he has discharged his responsibility, and I am happy to be the first to offer my congratulations. It has been my privilege to know the mover of the motion since his early days at the university of my adopted province, and from his experience and training I feel sure he will prove to be a useful and valuable member of this house. It has not been my privilege to know the seconder of the motion, but judging from his performance to-day and from his experience while in uniform I feel that he too will be able to make a valuable and constructive contribution to our work.

With much of what these hon. gentlemen have had to say there will be general agreement. With some portions of their remarks it is perhaps scarcely to be expected that those who see the government from a different angle will be in entire agreement. If each of the speakers has shown unsual zeal in the task of discovering virtues in the government and in the art of keeping a blind eye turned towards its errors, I am sure I shall not wish to be the first to censure them for what they have done. It will be for those who follow to fill in the omissions and to shed any necessary light on the places they have not seen fit to enter.

Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege to extend to you my compliments, before you were elected to your present post. To-day on behalf of those sitting in this section of the house I wish to welcome you to your new work and to wish for you the same high measure of success which characterized the work of your predecessors.

With respect to the plans of the government as announced in the speech from the throne and its administrative record over recent years, and with respect to the state of the public welfare generally, I propose to reserve such comments as I wish to make until the next sitting of the house. Therefore I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 5.00 p.m.

Monday, September 10, 1945.

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE—MR. COLDWELL

REFUSAL OF ACCESS TO PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS BY CITIZENS SEEKING TO INTERVIEW MEMBERS

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise to refer to a matter affecting the privileges of parliament and of myself as a member of parliament. This morning, citizens who sought to interview members of parliament were stopped outside the entrances to this building—not within the precincts of the building, but on the outside near the doors. Among those who were stopped were the premier of Saskatchewan and a member of the legislative assembly, who were required to show some evidence that members of parliament wished to see them. I want to refer this to you, Mr. Speaker, as custodian of the rights of members of this house, because I believe that inquiry should be made and we should be informed under what authority and by whose direction this very extraordinary procedure was followed.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must inform the hon. member that this is the first time I have heard about the matter. I will confer with the Clerk of the House, and the Sergeant at Arms, whereupon I shall be pleased to give an answer to the hon. member.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I say a word as well in reply to my hon. friend? I am obliged to him for bringing up this matter. It is the first intimation I have had that anything of the kind had occurred, and I shall be happy to join with his Honour the Speaker in having the matter carefully looked into.

Mr. COLDWELL: Thank you.

DIVORCE

JURISDICTION OF COURTS IN PROVINCE OF MARRIED WOMAN'S DOMICILE

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 2, to amend the Divorce Jurisdiction Act, 1930.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

CLOSING OF ARMY CAMPS—SERVICE PERSONNEL ON MAINTENANCE WORK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): May I be permitted to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence (Army) arising out of a telegram I received this morning. I sent a copy of it to the minister and therefore I will not quote it. It has reference to the closing out of army camps across Canada. Service personnel doing maintenance work and living in camp or barracks with their families are now being evicted, and in the section to which the telegram refers there is no available living space. These people are not able to get quarters. Can the minister inform the house what the government's policy or attitude is in a matter of this kind?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): As my hon. friend has stated, he was good enough to send me a copy of the telegram. I do not know the particular area to which he refers or the particular camp he has in mind, but the general policy is that in the case of rented premises watchmen are retained until such time as the premises are returned to the lessor. In the case of premises owned by the government, or premises constructed on leased land, watchmen or maintenance people are retained until such time as the premises are turned over to another government department or declared surplus and turned over under the Surplus Crown Assets Act to be disposed of by the war assets corporation. It is clear, I think, that it would not be possible for the Department of National Defence to retain the services of watchmen or to continue to provide accommodation for them after the particular premises have ceased to be administered by the Department of National Defence. If my hon. friend will give me the particular case he has in mind I will look into the circumstances, but that is the general policy so far as army premises are concerned.

Mr. GILLIS: It is in Sydney, Nova Scotia, the Royal Avenue barracks. Four families are affected.

DISCHARGE OR RELEASE OF PERSONNEL DESIROUS OF ATTENDING EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. A. KIDD (Kingston City): May I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence? Will the minister kindly inform the house whether steps can be taken to speed up the discharge or release from the service of members of the armed forces whose applications for discharge have been made, in order that they may attend or reenter university or other educational institutions? The matter is urgent in view of the shortness of time within which they must register at the university.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): I do not know whether anything can be done to speed up the existing procedure. As my hon. friend the member for Kingston City knows, the policy was announced a week or ten days ago whereby university students can obtain discharge from the army upon producing evidence that they have been accepted for the university or other educational institution which they propose to attend, and upon making application and producing that evidence they will be discharged immediately, subject always to the general conditions that, if they are performing some work in which it is essential that they should be retained for a short time, the application might have to be refused. I know of no case in which discharge has been refused. That policy has been in force only a week or ten days, and I am advised that it is operating fairly satisfactorily.

Mr. KIDD: Does this apply in the same way to the forces of the Pacific command now in training at Fort Benning, Georgia?

Mr. ABBOTT: These instructions have gone out to all commands.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: By leave of the house, will the minister allow a supplementary question? Does this rule apply to service personnel who desire to enter collegiates, intermediate schools? The reason I ask the question is that a number have been refused discharge who desire to enter collegiate rather than university.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend refers to collegiates. We have not that expression in my own province. I may say that it does not apply to high schools. The ruling is university or equivalent educational institution, which would be a technical school. It contemplates higher education as distinct from secondary schools.

NATIONAL WAR SERVICES

INQUIRY AS TO ABOLITION OF DEPARTMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): I would ask the Prime Minister to clarify the situation respecting the Department of National War Services. Do we understand that this department is now obsolete? If so, I would point out that there were certain branches that came under that department—I refer to the national film board and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Under what department do they now come?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The department of war services remains under the Minister of National War Services until this parliament repeals the act establishing the department. The department will be abolished by a bill to be introduced into this house this session, and which, I presume, will be passed by both houses. Until that time the several agencies that are now under the war services department will remain there unless transferred under the transfer of duties act to some other department. If and when they are transferred the house will be advised, as I have advised it to-day with respect to some other transfers of governmental functions.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

EMPLOYEES INVOLVED IN 1919 STRIKE—REQUEST FOR ROYAL COMMISSION ON PENSION RIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I wish to direct to the Prime Minister a question, notice of which I sent him earlier to-day. What consideration has been given to the request from the heads of a number of railroad unions for the establishment of a royal commission to investigate the matter of the reinstatement of the pension rights of Canadian Pacific employees who were involved in the general strike at Winnipeg in 1919? The Prime Minister indicated at the close of the last session that consideration would be given to this request. Can he now state whether the commission is to be established?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend inquired about this matter in April last. I am informed by the Department of Labour that one of its senior officials has been appointed to explore the situation. The official has been seeing the organizations concerned and has made an interim report to the department. He has indicated that he wishes to proceed further with his investigation. That is all the information I can give at the moment.

[Mr. Abbott.]

LABOUR CONDITIONS

SALE OF CROWN PLANTS—HONOURING OF UNION AGREEMENTS OF REEMPLOYMENT OF WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ALISTAIR STEWART (Winnipeg North): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Reconstruction. Is it the policy of the government, as a condition of sale for crown plants, that union agreements at present in effect be honoured so that employees will be rehired on the basis of seniority?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): Such a policy is obviously impossible of general application. For example, a plant which to-day is engaged in the electrical industry may be sold for a totally different industry which would qualify it for a union covered by another trade. There is no general application of such a policy where a plant is sold for continuance in the same industry. Indication is given to the buyer that we should be glad to see him adopt the same union and follow the same seniority practice as was followed by the previous owner, but that is not made a condition of the sale.

HOGS

PRODUCTION IN WESTERN CANADA TO MEET SHORTAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): May I ask the Minister of Agriculture what steps are being taken to restore hog production in western Canada in order to meet the present shortage situation in Canada and in the devastated countries?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The question as submitted to me deals with all Canada. I presume the hon. member for Yorkton refers to all Canada, although he said western Canada—

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I so stated in the question.

Mr. GARDINER: He asks what steps are being taken to restore hog production in Canada to meet the present emergent shortage of meat in Canada and in the devastated countries. There is no shortage of meat in Canada. We have a very great surplus of meat in Canada. There is only one year in our history when we had a greater surplus than in 1945, and that was 1944, so that it is scarcely correct to say that there is an emergent shortage of meat in Canada, but there is of course a shortage of meat in the devastated countries, and the amount that Canada is asked to provide to supply that shortage is about six per cent of the requirements. We are making every possible effort to get a production in Canada which will meet that requirement. The main provision to that end is the making of agreements in advance under which we can state to farmers across Canada the price they will be able to obtain for their product, at least twelve months in advance, or, as has been the case recently, twenty-four months in advance. They know when they are breeding and putting in stock for feed exactly what they will secure for them.

CIVIL AVIATION

WRANGELL, ALASKA—TELEGRAPH CREEK, B.C., AIR SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. G. ARCHIBALD (Skeena): I addressed two questions to the Minister of Reconstruction this morning. I do not know whether I wrote the wrong department or not. Is the minister aware that air service from Wrangell, Alaska to Telegraph Creek, B.C., has been discontinued because the air service operator formerly operating from Wrangell has been unable to obtain permission to cross the Canadian border?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is not permitted to read a telegram or make a statement; he must just ask the question.

Mr. COLDWELL: The hon. member is reading a copy of the question he sent to the minister this morning, Mr. Speaker. It is not a telegram; the place is called Telegraph Creek.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: Residents of Telegraph Creek, an isolated community without any other means of transportation have petitioned the air transport board, but without result, even in grave emergencies affecting life and property. Will the minister give his immediate—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. HOWE: It is all right; I shall answer it.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. member that he has not the right to make any statement or to give any explanation, but just to put his question, and put it briefly. That is the rule of the house.

[Mr. Hansell.]

Mr. ARCHIBALD: Will the minister give his immediate attention to this situation? The matter is urgent.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): The question involves a service with headquarters in the United States. By agreement between Canada and the United States an application by a United States company to operate into Canada must be filed with the civil aeronautics authority of the United States. That authority approaches Canada, and Canada either permits the service to operate or not. Thus by mutual agreement each air line must deal with the country of which it is a national. If the company in question will apply to the civil aeronautics authority, and the civil aeronautics authority communicate with Canada, we shall be very glad to give serious consideration to the matter. In the meantime I may say that Telegraph Creek is served regularly by a Canadian company, and I feel that the situation is not as grave as has been represented to the hon. member.

RADIO RANGE STATIONS AT SMITHERS AND TERRACE, B.C.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. G. ARCHIBALD (Skeena): What department takes responsibility for operation of radio range stations at Smithers and Terrace, B.C., and is the government going to operate them now that the war is over?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): The department of which I am the minister has that responsibility. The radio ranges mentioned were operated as a war service when traffic was heavy. They are not warranted by ordinary bush service. They have been closed down and dismantled.

THE WAR

INQUIRY AS TO FORMAL ANNOUNCEMENT OF TERMINATION OF HOSTILITIES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) asked me a question on Friday and I said I would give him an answer a little later on. The question was:

It is expected that the government will make a formal announcement, so far as Canada is concerned, that the war is ended and, if so, when may we expect that announcement?

I would say to my hon. friend the question is one which in the opinion of the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) has many implications. It will be necessary to have those implications carefully examined before an answer is made. I am giving the hon. member the statement at once in case he may wonder why a reply may be delayed.

Mr. ROWE: It is not going to be too soon this time.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Friday, September 7, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. M. Benidickson for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, for the first time in six years we are meeting here to-day in the atmosphere of a world at peace. After six years of conflict we find ourselves freed from the attack of enemies who would have deprived our lives of meaning and made of our institutions of government a hollow mockery.

For that deliverance we are indebted to the people of many lands and to the sons and daughters of many homes in Canada—a great multitude to whom history will apportion due praise.

The mention of their contributions takes us back in thought to some of the major incidents of the early days of the war—to Great Britain, for a time standing alone against the might of German arms, "the prisoner of her own historic greatness"; to the embattled republic of China which had carried the fight since 1932; to our great neighbour to the south, technically at peace but marshalling her tremendous strength for the decisive battles ahead; to another great ally—the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics—biding her own time to thwart the enemies' attack before joining the forces of freedom; at home a generation of gallant young men, of the navy, the army, and the air force, offering itself a living sacrifice to save our civilization from collapse.

To all these we owe the sincere tribute of a grateful nation. As for our own sons and daughters in uniform, they have put us forever in their debt. They have made us all more proud to call ourselves Canadians.

Nor should we forget the devotion to duty of the workers in the less perilous but equally exacting tasks of the farms, the mines, the factories, the offices and the laboratories. Without them our victory would not have been achieved. To them also is due the thanks of a whole people for tasks faithfully performed.

The spontaneous rejoicing of the nation was a welcome release from the discipline of war. But beneath the surface of it all, there lies a sombre undertone of seriousness. Men and women are counting the price of victory, measuring the sorrow and personal loss that all too often visited their homes, and laying plans to try to make the new day a better one.

It is in that atmosphere we gather here to-day—to try as best we can to mend the wreckage of the war years; we assemble here to take up the tasks of peace; we come to accept the challenge of a new day.

What is to be the answer of this nation to those in Canada who saved it from catastrophe and to those who will live with them; and to all the others who will follow after? That question brings us to the realities of to-day.

The answer of this house to the men who fought and to the men and women who made the equipment with which to fight, as well as to all others, cannot be made in words and high-sounding phrases or in tablets and monuments of bronze and stone. Comprehensive measures to make possible opportunity, useful jobs, needed production and assured security, particularly for those who return from war, for the wounded, and for the dependents of the fallen, is the only answer this parliament can give to those but for whose sacrifice we would not be here. It is needless to add that the same general objective must be our ambition for all others.

And a second answer we must give if we are to be worthy of these days. We must build an economy in which our people will have faith; a democracy in which we can all have confidence and a programme for Canada in which, on its fundamentals, we can all be united.

On such a basis we can build a new spirit of unity in Canada, a new sense of responsibility for public affairs, and a new vision of positive destiny for the nation.

The ideal state does not fall ready-made from the heavens. We gain it only at a great price.

Upon the members of this house therefore has fallen a great responsibility. It is that of making a worth-while contribution toward a more generally acceptable state at home, and the best possible relationship abroad.

Needless to say, Mr. Speaker, I look forward with eager anticipation to my work during the coming session of this parliament, not only with those who have sat in this chamber in the past but, as well, with the new members who, like myself, are here for the first time.

To the members I see around me—the members of all political parties—I wish to say at once that I give to each of them credit for equal sincerity and honesty of purpose with my own. In the political parties and groups who occupy seats, both to your left and to your right, Mr. Speaker, I recognize one common objective, namely to promote what each conceives to be the best interests of our country and the well-being of our fellow citizens.

The function of His Majesty's Opposition in this house is one of great responsibility. If ever the function of an official opposition in parliament be reduced to a perfunctory role, the whole British common law structure, which secures to us so many of our individual liberties, will be in danger of falling into decay.

We have come here as individuals—we have come as individuals supporting the policies of one or other of the parties represented. I concede to each individual in every party credit for worthy motives. Where we differ is largely in the means to reach the desirable ends that most of us share in common. If we can but maintain a real democracy, what is best among us will in the long run come to the top.

As to the attitude of the official opposition to the government, I wish to say a word. We recognize that the government is carrying heavy responsibilities. That is inherent in the task it sought and was granted. It in no way excuses it from the consequences of its errors; it in no way justifies its wide departures from responsible government; it in no way warrants its excursions into dictatorial and bureaucratic methods.

It will be our purpose to assist the government to meet the problems it is facing. We are denied the right to assist in the formulation of government policy, denied also any share in the administration of that policy. But we are not denied the right to constructive criticism. That, in fact, is our duty.

We shall expect the government to present its programme and to take parliament fully into its confidence.

We shall look upon the members of the cabinet as a board of directors of a great national cooperative enterprise—a board of directors responsible for the economic health of the state. We look upon ourselves—and here I include all members of all groups—as representatives of the shareholders of that enterprise, the people of Canada.

In the interests of those whom we represent, we will want to know what is going on in the government. We will expect a discontinuance of dictatorial methods, a discontinuance of secrecy in matters of public concern, a discontinuance of government by order in council rather than by parliament, and a frank exposition of all matters affecting the people's interest.

The blanket denial of information on the flimsy excuse that it is not in the public interest will not be tolerated. The government does not own the assets it exacts from the people. It is but the trustee and custodian of them. How those assets are used must not longer be withheld from the people's knowledge.

Traditionally, the speech from the throne is supposed to give an outline of the government's policy. The speech before us to-day is longer, more vague, and has less substance than usual. I have seldom seen a government document which takes up so much space to say so little in so many words.

The first few paragraphs are good literature and good philosophy, chiefly on the subject of war. But they state no policy. Other paragraphs speak only of vague plans and pious hopes in the government's mind. As an example of this, we are told that the maintenance of long-term markets for our primary industries is receiving close attention. This is the same story the Prime Minister has been telling for the last twenty-five years.

Belated notice is taken of the acute problem of housing. But the fact is the government's housing programme is a flop. The words "too little and too late" fit the situation perfectly. There has been too much talk and propaganda and too little reality.

The veterans are to have a charter; all acts and administrative measures are to be put in one document instead of several. That is supposed to make a charter. The substance will be no different from at present but it will be handed to the returning veteran under the caption: "The Veterans' Charter." There is obviously no harm in doing this, but leaving the programme the same and calling it a charter in no way eliminates red tape or humanizes the administration of veterans' affairs, or makes rehabilitation measures more efficient.

The service and sacrifice of Canadians in the war are to be commemorated by the planned development and beautification, some time in the future, of the nation's capital. I agree wholly with the planned development and beautification of the national capital. I think the parliament of Canada ought to develop the national capital and its surrounding area so as to worthily represent Canada, without using the excuse of a national war memorial to do it. It will not help the veteran vainly seeking housing accommodation in Saskatchewan or Nova Scotia, or any other province, to read that his service and sacrifice in war have been suitably commemorated by the beautification of Ottawa. The right kind of memorial to commemorate the service and sacrifice of the men and women who fought is a Canada of to-morrow with jobs, security and opportunity for all. One of the first concerns of all members of this house at this particular time ought to be the care and rehabilitation of war veterans.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that the government's administration of its own plans has failed to meet the needs of returned service men and discharged war workers. Its policies, after the blueprint stage, have been fumbled in administration from beginning to to end.

One of the government's outstanding defaults, as far as veterans are concerned, is the general lack of accommodation for them on their return. The government spreads its propaganda to the four winds of heaven, telling about generous gratuities, while concealing the cruel fact that the gratuities of many veterans will be eaten up completely by the extra cost of building a home, due to increased building costs. From all indications, the situation is likely to be worse before it is better.

To produce prompt and adequate housing accommodation for all service men in need of it is the imperative and immediate duty of this government.

I want to say, with all the emphasis at my command, that this nation will not stand for any chiseling down of the promises and commitments made to service personnel while they were fighting our wars abroad.

I now come to another question—that of controls.

This nation has made it clear it does not want socialism. This nation has made it clear that the people are opposed to regimentation. They do not want to have bureaucratic controls in operation any longer than necessary. It is important, however, that the road from control to de-control be an orderly retreat and not a disorderly rout.

The scarcity of important basic materials rendered certain controls necessary, but, as someone has said, "coercion is insatiable." Controls seemed automatically to breed and multiply till they invaded practically every department of life and became almost intolerable, even in the patriotism of war time.

[Mr. Bracken.]

Moreover, the new controllers exercised powers quite unprecedented in our experience—powers which, in effect, were exercised free from the parliamentary control to which ministers of the crown are subject.

The public counts on these controls and controllers being removed as rapidly as possible. It seems clear that, as shortages were put forward as the justification for their imposition, controls should be removed as fast as shortages disappear.

While on the subject of controls, let me deal with one very controversial one. The government yesterday announced the introduction of meat rationing in Canada. I ask the government to make clear the answer to a simple question, which is being asked by both producers and consumers of meat all over this dominion: is meat rationing necessary? Does the government consider it is necessary? Many do, but many others question it. All will agree that food must be provided for the people of Britain and other countries whose populations have suffered so much in the war we fought together. In this respect we must see to it that Canada does her full share. Let us have no misunderstanding on that point. I know of no one who questions that policy, or who is opposed to seeing that Great Britain and our allies receive all that we can send them of our supplies.

If the government can show the necessity of meat rationing at this time when controls of this kind should normally be removed, then we must inquire why such a condition arose and who is responsible for it. If, to provide meat to Britain, there is need for rationing meat in Canada to-day, the blame can largely be laid at the door of the government itself for its failure to maintain hog production at higher levels. There is being produced in Canada this year much less bacon than a year ago. This is chiefly due to the government's policy of keeping hog prices so far out of line with feed prices as to discourage hog production.

Some two years ago, the government announced an export equalization bonus of fifteen cents per bushel for barley and ten cents for oats. Immediately farmers started to cut down hog production. They naturally took the higher price for grain, instead of feeding it to hogs. The government later gave a half-hearted recognition of the hog-raiser's position by announcing a $3 bonus on grade A hogs; but hog production continued to decline because the hog and coarse grain bonuses were out of balance. The final effects of this short-sighted policy started to show in the sharp decline in hog slaughterings in the fall of 1944. At the present time hog production is said to be down nearly a third—and the decline is continuing.

As I have said, many people think meat rationing is unnecessary. If meat rationing is not necessary, why put it on? If it is necessary, then the government is asking both the producer and the consumer of meat to submit to a rationing plan to cover up shortages in meat production brought on largely by a muddled and misguided government policy. If there is need for rationing, the government is, to a great extent, responsible for it.

There are two questions I want to ask the government in this connection. What is to be the effect of the rationing policies on small processors of meat? We are receiving complaints daily as to the inconvenience to which they and their customers are being put. And what is being done to avoid the bottlenecks at the larger slaughtering plants? Complaints are reaching us concerning the inconveniences to shippers and the losses through shrinkage resulting from delayed sales at some of the larger stock yards.

In parts of western Canada, there is a serious shortage of feed, and there will be a rush of cattle to the packers' plants in the fall. The smaller processors, both there and in the east, say they must buy within their quota, and the farmer and consumer both suffer.

In the August 15th issue of Maclean's magazine, I noticed a penetrating article on this subject. The writer of the article fears that rationing will be a stimulus to black market operations and that extensive policing measures may be necessary to prevent it. There are many who fear that the government's policy will result in such a black market condition as will be very difficult to control.

We must not let this immediate problem obscure entirely the long-range picture of live stock marketing. Cattlemen are fearful of the future of their market in the United States. What consideration has the government given to permitting at least token shipments to that country, for the purpose of helping to safeguard that market for the future? I am of opinion that we ought to seek freer access to that market for our future needs. As it is, I wonder if we are not in danger of losing that export market.

There is no matter on which there is greater unanimity in Canada than the feeling that there must be some reduction in the rates of income tax. With that view this party is in entire accord. Substantial tax relief is indicated from both Washington and Canberra.

We look upon the government as the custodian and trustee of the taxes it demands from the people. It can be prudent in spending them, or it can be wasteful. There are many who think the government has not always been prudent in its war expenditures. It is a common view that it has been wasteful of the hard-earned money it has taken from the taxpayer. In my judgment, it has been guilty of some extravagances unparalleled since confederation.

Everyone knows that modern wars come at a high cost. There will be no disposition to criticize the government for necessary war expenditures, but no one will excuse the government for waste or extravagance. There is a widespread feeling that the government has become so accustomed to huge expenditures that it cannot rid itself of the habit.

It is only necessary to point out what has happened in recent years to show the importance of this matter. Before the war, this government took from the people's pockets, in the form of taxes, in round figures some $440 million a year. Last year it took $2,440 million, or more than five times the pre-war amount. Before the war it taxed the incomes of only a quarter of a million people. Last year it taxed those of over two million people—or more than eight times as many. In the year 1938, this government spent some $530 million of the people's money. During the last fiscal year, 1944, it spent $5,300 million—or almost exactly ten times the pre-war expenditures.

Before the war, the government permitted the expenditures to be inquired into in the open. During the war, the government supporters denied the war expenditures committee the right to ask about war expenditures except behind closed doors. The consequence of all this is that the government has spent in the vicinity of $20,000 million in the last six years with but little public check upon it. That is more money than had previously been spent by all the governments of Canada since confederation. It is, in fact, nearly fifty per cent more in six years than in the whole seventy-two years of confederation which preceded them.

Last year the government taxed the people of Canada $2,400 millions, which is more than the total dominion taxes collected in the first fifty years of confederation. At the same time, during the past six years it has increased the annual debt from some $4,000 million to a figure in the neighbourhood of four times that amount. In the face of all this, the government is now setting out on a huge programme that will involve expenditures probably three times as high as before the war. It is no wonder its Minister of Finance is seeking a way to excuse the government from making cuts in taxation of a size that the termination of the war should bring.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I deny that I am seeking anything of the kind.

Mr. HOMUTH: You quibbled over it all the way.

Mr. ROWE: Don't deny the promises that were made before the election.

Mr. BRACKEN: The minister will have a chance to state what the reduction will be.

Mr. ILSLEY: Precisely.

Mr. BRACKEN: I gathered from the press of recent weeks that he is seeking an excuse to show why they will not be as great as the public were led to believe they would be from his own public utterances and the utterances of other hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. ILSLEY: On a question of privilege, I want to set this matter right at once.

Mr. HOMUTH: I rise to a point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. MACKENZIE: He is speaking on a question of privilege.

Mr. HOMUTH: The Minister of Finance has referred to—

Mr. ILSLEY: On a question of privilege.

Mr. HOMUTH: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is clearly a question of privilege.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It certainly is.

Mr. HOMUTH: What do you know about it?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Far more than you do.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand that the hon. member has given the minister permission to speak.

Mr. HOMUTH: I am not prepared to defer to the minister when I am right. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think I need to argue the question. It is clearly a question of privilege, because as Minister of Finance I am being accused by the leader of the opposition of seeking to excuse the government from carrying out promises which the government made with respect to taxation before the election. I must answer that.

Mr. BRACKEN: I did not say that you were seeking to excuse the government from promises made before the election. Nothing like that can be found in my statement. I will quote from my statement as soon as you are finished.

Mr. ILSLEY: Apparently the hon. member is referring to a report of the remarks I made to a delegation from the trades and labour congress of Canada when I used the word "disappointed." I used the word "disappointed" in referring to the probable reaction of some people to what could be done toward specific proposals which were made by that delegation and other similar proposals if it was expected that they could all be met in full. One of those specific proposals was to raise the exemptions from taxation.

Mr. HOMUTH: Order. You cannot make a speech.

Mr. ROWE: That is the best apology you have ever made.

Mr. ILSLEY: One of those proposals was to raise the exemption for single persons to $1,000 and for married persons to $2,400. It was—

Mr. HOMUTH: I rise to a point of order. The minister has no right to make a speech on a question of privilege.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the minister to be kind enough to be as brief as possible.

Mr. ILSLEY: I foresaw this situation. If I understand the rules at all I am strictly within my rights.

Mr. HOMUTH: You do not understand them, because you are certainly violating them.

Mr. ROWE: You have made four more excuses.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. ROWE: Yes, you have.

Mr. ILSLEY: This delegation had made explicit demands for the abolition and reduction of taxation at the same time that they were requesting increased expenditures. Speaking with reference to these specific requests and similar demands, I said that some persons would be disappointed, having in mind that they could not all be met in full. That is the sole basis for the statement made by the leader of the opposition.

Mr. HOMUTH: I rise to a point of order. The minister should not make a speech. He has not stated his question of privilege.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, I have.

Mr. SPEAKER: The minister asked the permission of the leader of the opposition to ask a question.

Mr. GRAYDON: No, he did not.

Mr. ROWE: He rose on a question of privilege.

Mr. ILSLEY: I rose on a question of privilege. I want to say with respect to the pre-election promises by the government on taxation that those promises were made by me. When the budget is introduced I shall be content to leave it to the judgment of the country as to whether they have been carried out.

Mr. BRACKEN: There was not in my remarks a single word about government promises with respect to taxes—not one.

An hon. MEMBER: Read it over again.

Mr. BRACKEN: Certainly I will read it over again; that is what I got up for. First I shall try to make clear just what statement my remarks were based upon. I am referring to the Ottawa Citizen of August 22 in which reference is made to a delegation which had visited the minister. The report states that the minister said these words, "Some would be disappointed when they see how much the government will be able to reduce taxation." I made no reference whatever to any political promises that my hon. friend made to the public of Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE: They did, and that is why they are over there.

Mr. BRACKEN: This is the statement which I just made and about which there has been so much wasted time: "In the face of all this, the government is now setting out on a huge programme that will involve expenditures probably three times as high as before the war. It is no wonder its Minister of Finance is seeking a way to excuse the government from making cuts in taxation of a size that the termination of the war should bring." That is what I said, and that is what I believe. I give the government fair warning that unless there is brought down in the budget substantial relief from the burden of war time taxation there will be widespread resentment and bitterness from one end of this country to the other.

I wish now to touch briefly on another subject, that of dominion-provincial relations. The major set-back in the economy of certain provinces forced this issue to public attention in the nineteen thirties. The dominion appointed the Rowell-Sirois commission to study it. The commission took some years at the task, spending a considerable sum of money in the process and eventually reported. A dominion-provincial conference was called in 1940 to consider the report. The conference blew up, for reasons which need not here be explored. The war and the War Measures Act and a dominion-provincial taxation agreement met the needs for the time being.

But the war is now over. The dominion-provincial agreement will soon come to an end, and the War Measures Act must soon terminate. It is thus imperative that the situation be met soon—indeed, it has remained unsolved far too long already. So much is this the case that the dilatoriness of the dominion government in bringing the matter to a head is to-day largely responsible for the fact that the provinces are not in a position to lay sound plans for meeting their post-war responsibilities.

In August last, the dominion advanced certain new proposals. The provincial governments are now considering them. A progress meeting is planned for November, and no doubt other meetings later on.

I do not intend to deal with this matter further at this time, but there is one item in the government's proposals that I think should be mentioned.

The dominion proposes to pay an old age pension of $30 a month, commencing at age seventy, without a means test. This will be welcome, as far as it goes. Those who have had experience in administering old age pensions have found that the means test led many people to divest themselves of their property before they reached the age of eligibility for pension. On the other hand, many worthy citizens in need of a pension would not suffer the humiliation of meeting a means test.

There are good arguments, therefore, for abolishing the means test altogether and substituting for it, as the dominion proposals suggest, payments out of general taxation or a contributory old age pension scheme.

But the dominion proposes to require the provinces to pay fifty per cent of the cost of pensions for needy residents of the ages of sixty-five to sixty-nine and to leave the administration of this part of the scheme in the provinces. The dominion in this respect is not facing the problem at all. It does nothing to correct the errors of the past. The pernicious elements of the old system are to be perpetuated and the dominion refuses to foot the pensions bill at sixty-five.

Its obvious dilemma is that it won't resist the pressure for pensions at sixty-five; and if it adopts pensions at sixty-five, it can't see its way clear to pay the whole bill, so it leaves the problem on the doorstep of the provinces to pay half the cost of pensioners from sixty-five to sixty-nine.

What must not be lost sight of in the discussion of dominion-provincial relations is that every person affected is a Canadian, no matter in what province he may live. What we must find is a way to see that no Canadian is denied a decent level of social services because of his geographic location or that he has to pay a confiscatory rate of taxation to secure it because geography finds him in a certain place.

The provinces have met the dominion. A constructive approach to the problem has been shown by all of the provinces. Let us hope that success will crown their deliberations and that sound progress in the way of repairing the weaknesses in our constitutional structure will not longer hamper the state in meeting the social and economic problems of the people.

The briefs submitted by the dominion government to the provinces on the occasion of that conference have dealt with a wide range of subjects of importance to the Dominion of Canada. One, however, is notably absent. There is no brief nor any reference book on international trade. It is true the provinces have no jurisdiction in that field, but it is equally true that the prosperity of every one of them is wrapped up in it.

Canada is the world's largest exporter of wheat, newsprint and non-ferrous metals, and one of the world's largest importers of coal, oil and steel products.

Under these conditions Canada is both a great exporting nation and an almost equally great importing nation. This means that both a high real national income and a high level of domestic employment will be most difficult, if not impossible, to achieve without maintaining a large volume of external trade. In this connection let me make it clear that we will support all reasonable measures put forward by the government to increase the general volume of international trade and Canada's share of it.

Admittedly, the problem ahead is not an easy one, and it is not a war problem. For a number of years prior to the outbreak of the war that has just ended, we had been losing our market in Britain for grain, milling and allied products. For years prior to the war, the lag in our exports of agricultural products was made up by an increase in our export of materials to make the instruments and tools of war. Now we have it on the authority of the Minister of Trade and Commerce that only 20 per cent of our war-time exports belong to the category of normal peace-time trade.

We must now face the fact that we have maintained an immense volume of export trade for years past largely by the simple expedient of giving our exports away; and this in some measure it is proposed that we continue to do, and with that I am in agreement.

Looking forward to the high levels of employment and national income upon which the validity of the dominion's proposals to the provinces are based, our present international trade position invites clarification.

What are the government's plans for restoring our normal export trade to Britain?

What are its proposals for increased trade with the United States and for meeting our obligations in New York, for which we can no longer count on the sterling balances we had before the war?

What are the government's plans for developing trade in the orient; in South America?

What is the government's plan for assisting in the development of economically undeveloped areas?

The present hope of civilization is that the resources of the world be put to use fully and effectively, and no country can have more to gain from this than Canada with its wide variety of natural resources.

We are to be asked to approve a measure to provide for Canadian participation in the international monetary fund and the bank of reconstruction and development, presumably the one agreed to at Bretton Woods. I do not anticipate that this parliament will refuse to give its assent to these proposals. The monetary proposals of Bretton Woods are predicated upon a world of order, peace and specialized production and trade. We must do our part to bring about such a world. There are many things to be done, however, and many measures of economic cooperation to be arrived at before that world will be achieved.

The use of atomic power for war and its prospective industrial use are sharp reminders that we face a new and different future. Science has made defence a collective problem. For their future safety, the nations of the earth must bind themselves to the principle of collective security.

As to how the measures to preserve peace which are embodied in the San Francisco charter are to be made effective, we will expect more information from the government than his excellency's speech discloses.

It is not enough just to change the form of world security. The seeds of potential war are ever present in the world. For the moment they lie dormant. To see that they are sterilized for all time to come is the task of our day.

Signatures, even of fifty nations, on a page will not guarantee peace, even though the plans be well conceived. It is admitted that the document to be presented to us is not perfect. Nevertheless, it is a step toward peace—probably the longest step ever taken in the history of human affairs. This party intends to support the charter; and we trust it will have the unanimous approval of parliament. It provides a way by which to achieve and maintain peace, but it does not provide the will to peace—the will by which alone the nations of the world will avoid a clash of arms. World peace, desirable as it is, cannot be gained and kept by signatures on a page. That task remains and will remain a challenge to every generation of mankind as long as national boundaries exist and national selfishness prevails.

The seeds of war, unfortunately, are not sterilized by the ink of diplomats sitting around a table. They have been made to lie dormant for a time. Without the sterilizing influence of the will to peace on the part of the mass minds of every generation, they may spring to life again. Let us be thankful those seeds are dormant now. It remains for this generation to preserve and pass on to the next, and so on for all time, the spirit by which nations as well as men will settle their differences by conciliation rather than by resort to war.

Upon the major powers of to-day rests the future peace of the world. As long as the big nations stand together, there will be peace. If they fall out with one another, it will be a danger signal on the way to war. No nation or group of nations can stand against the united strength of the major powers. In their unity lies our hope; in their possible dissension our fears.

To me, Canada's mission in the world is clear. We must throw our weight wherever it will serve the will to permanent peace. That means sharing our proportionate burden of policing the world. It means trading with the world, wherever it can be done to mutual advantage. And it means looking upon other peoples as human beings even as we are human beings.

We meet here at a time when forms of government the world over are being tested and weighed in the balance. In so far as Canada is concerned, parliamentary institutions will either face to-day's challenge or they will disappear. The people are looking to parliament for enlightened, safe and progressive leadership; and they expect the members of this house to see that such leadership is given to the nation. Under our system of government, it is for the administration in power to bring forward its policies. It remains for us, as members, to support what is wise and to criticize what is imprudent in the proposals advanced.

As leader of the opposition, I accept on behalf of the party I lead the responsibilities that fall to our lot. The government may, therefore, count upon us for both constructive cooperation and constructive criticism. It is in that spirit that this party approaches the tasks of the challenging days ahead.

Mr. Speaker, as I have said, there are a number of matters of policy and administration on which the government is subject to criticism. In closing these remarks, let me refer again to some of them.

One is the question of jobs. I say earnestly to the government that the one matter that must be made their concern above all others is to see to it that needed jobs are provided for those coming home from the war and for those who have been or may be dislocated because of the transition from war to peace. Whatever else the government may fail to do, failure in this respect will not be excused.

Another question is that of markets. The threat of the loss of markets—referring to exports—for farm and other products this government must take seriously. I am not suggesting that it does not. The farmers have borne their lot in this war with credit to themselves and to the country as a whole. They are fearful of what is going to happen to their markets. At the moment, live stock men particularly are concerned, recalling the history of the last war. Temporary transitional measures are not enough. The farmers will expect from their government policies that will give them confidence that markets at fair prices will be available in the future—not only immediately, but in the more distant future.

A third question is taxation. The people feel there should be considerable reductions, now that the burden of war is past. We shall expect, therefore, that substantial taxation relief will be included this session in the budget proposals.

A fourth is the matter of demobilization. The government's demobilization policy has been bedevilled by its own two-army system and by the lack of a rational man-power policy. The result is that there is criticism from one end of the nation to the other, by the armed forces, as well as by their relatives and friends, especially with respect to discharge priorities. In particular, the overseas forces feel that they are not being fairly dealt with. Generally speaking, there has been altogether too much delay, too much confusion, and too little coordination in the government's demobilization policy.

Another is the matter of reconversion from war to peace. The government has no adequate, comprehensive and effective reconversion plans. The government war equipment plants are being closed and the men are told there are jobs if they will take them at the rates of remuneration that employers are willing to pay. There seems to be no adequate, coordinated plan even for giving advice and direction to returned men and men dislocated from war industries, who are now seeking jobs.

A sixth matter, and the last I shall mention, is that of housing. I will merely repeat that in its attempts to solve the housing problem the government is in serious default. Its plans are inadequate, its objectives will not be met, and the situation promises to be worse before it is better.

In view of what I have said, Mr. Speaker, I propose now to move an amendment to the address to be presented to his excellency. I wish, therefore, to move, seconded by the hon. member for Peel, that the following words be added to the said address:—

"We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that Your Excellency's advisers have:

(a) failed to demobilize our armed forces on a fair basis and, in particular, have failed to prevent serious disadvantage to overseas service personnel;

(b) failed to provide a speedy and effective plan of reconversion from war to peace, and failed in particular to join in partnership with labour and industry in devising a workable scheme to provide jobs, with fair wages, for discharged service personnel and war workers;

(c) failed to take adequate and timely action to meet the ever-mounting housing crisis."

That Mr. Speaker, is my motion, and with it I conclude my remarks.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like my first words this afternoon to be words of cordial greeting to my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) upon having assumed the office of leader of the opposition in this House of Commons. I congratulate him upon the confidence which his party has in him. May I say that, perhaps better than anyone else in this house, I am able to appreciate the great responsibility which he has assumed. My words of welcome are all the more emphatic in that I have been hoping for about two and a half years past to have the pleasure of extending this greeting.

Mr. ROWE: You are lucky to be doing it to-day.

Mr. BRACKEN: I am very glad to welcome the Prime Minister himself as the junior member of this parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friends that the Winnipeg convention seems a long time ago. The leader of the opposition has just said to me that he welcomes me as the junior member. According to my recollection, it took only a few weeks for me to find my way back into parliament after I had met with defeat in my old constituency. It took him over two and a half years to gain admission to the House of Commons. However, I am quite sincere when I say, not only on my own behalf but on behalf of the party which I lead, that we are pleased to see the hon. gentleman in the seat which he occupies to-day.

With respect to what he has said as to the duties of the leader of the opposition, I have no exception whatever to take. The position of leader of the opposition is one that is recognized by statute. He holds an office in this house which is one of responsibility comparable in some respects with that of a minister of the crown; his is supposed to be a service to the House of Commons as a whole. In the obligation which is placed upon him of following closely the acts of the ministry, of constructive criticism as opportunity affords, that is a duty which we will expect him to perform, and will welcome his performance of it in full measure.

Before I comment on the speech of my hon. friend, may I join with him in the congratulations which he extended on Friday last to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I should like to congratulate very warmly the two hon. members who spoke for the first time in this house on the excellence of the addresses which they made on that occasion. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) moved the address, and it was seconded by the hon. member for Gaspe (Mr. Langlois). Both these gentlemen, in becoming modesty, credited the government with having desired to pay a compliment to their constituencies. That it was right and proper for them to believe. May I say, however, that the government had something more in mind in suggesting that they should open the debates in this particular session. What the government had in mind particularly was the feeling entertained I am sure in all parts of this house, namely what is owing, above all else, to those who are or have been members of the armed forces of our country and have seen active service. We were glad indeed to recognize that both these hon. members had served Canada overseas in the great war just ended. It must be a source of pride to all hon. members of this House of Commons to realize, that between those who served in the first great war and those who served in the present war, there is in this house a total numbering, I believe, roughly something like one-third of its membership. That is the splendid contribution that those who are now actively engaged in serving the state in parliament have made toward the defence of their country and the defence of freedom in the greatest of wars in the world's history. It was definitely a desire to give that word of recognition to the armed forces which was primarily in the minds of the government.

There was also the desire to recognize the younger men who have come into parliament for the first time. One of many commendable features of the new house is that there has been introduced into the membership of the Commons a large number of new members, many of whom, as I have already said, have actively participated in war. They will now have to do with finding a solution for the problems which have arisen out of war. Few, if any, hon. members will be more qualified to speak with authority on war and post-war problems than those who have been in actual combat. I could not but be impressed in what both hon. members said, with the world outlook which their utterances revealed.

But may I say of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River and the hon. member for Gaspe, that they were chosen to open the debates of this new parliament quite as much because of what of known ability and achievement they merited in their own right. I speak not only of the contribution each has made in the service he has rendered our country in war, but of the success which at an early age, each has attained in his particular profession. Both are gentlemen who have distinguished themselves in the academic world, and in their professions. I should like to congratulate each of them on having given so admirable an example to all of personal courage at a time of war and also of skill in debate in a first appearance in this House of Commons, as that which they gave to us on Friday last.

May I now come, Mr. Speaker, to the remarks of the leader of the opposition. Let me say, at once, that to a considerable portion of what my hon. friend has said this afternoon I not only take no exception but with it am in complete agreement. I was pleased to hear him, at the close of his address, speak as he did about the charter of the world security conference which will later be a matter for consideration by this parliament. I was glad to hear him say, speaking of the importance to the world of the success of that great new instrument for the maintenance of peace, that, if that new venture was to be of service to the world, we all must display the will to peace, and not trust too much to enactments of any kind. Sharing his views in that particular and realizing, as I know he does, how serious the situation is in the world to-day and will be for a long time to come, I do not think we can begin to exercise that will to peace too often, or too much among ourselves. It depends, in the last analysis, upon the attitude of individuals whether peace is to be maintained in this world. We have had six years of bitter strife which has left legacies of hatred and suspicion. Unless the world can be freed from this hatred and suspicion, all that legislators may attempt will be in vain. We shall have to make a beginning in this House of Commons in our controversies in relation to the problems that come before us. I confess that there is nothing that gives me more concern than to see, on the very morrow of the conclusion of this great war, the beginning of much that looks to me like an effort to intensify controversy in some of our domestic fields. The spirit of the approach to any question is going to be the test as to whether or not a solution of the problem can be found. I do appeal to hon. members on all sides of this house to realize that a war, such as this country and the worlld has gone through in the last six years, has left problems which will require, on the part of everyone having to do with public affairs, all of patience, of conciliation, of genuine friendship and of cooperation that it is possible for all to display.

My hon. friend in speaking of the speech from the throne mentioned its references to the war. He took exception to the length of the speech, and to its substance. He spoke of the first part of it, as I recollect his words, as being largely literature and philosophy. If my hon. friend will read again what appears in the first two pages of the speech, he will realize, I believe, that, far from its being mere literature or philosophy, it is the one tribute which above all is owing by parliament to the people of this country, a tribute which in words cannot be made too comprehensive or emphatic, having regard to what they signify. We have had six years of war. In all its history the world has known nothing like it. Future generations and parliaments are going to turn back to the pages of the speech from the throne to see what in 1945 the Canadian people through the lips of the representative of the crown had to say of Canada's services and sacrifices, her contribution to freedom—in those momentous times. I venture to say that, in years to come, no words in any speech from the throne in Canada will attract more attention and more approval than the words my hon. friend has passed over as being merely literature and philosophy, but which, in reality, are an expression of this nation's obligation to those who offered their lives in this war, to those whose lives were sacrificed, to the bereaved, to those who were crippled and maimed and wounded, to those who to-day are looking so eagerly to their return to their home country after years of imprisonment in Japanese concentration camps and prisons. That is something of what is expressed in the early part of the speech from the throne, of what we feel we owe especially to those who have given their all or were prepared to give their all, that we might enjoy the freedom we have to-day.

But the speech in the introductory portion goes further than that. It seeks also to recognize the services of those who have worked in less conspicuous, more humble, but nevertheless very necessary ways to help win the war. I refer to the hundreds of thousands of workers on the farms, in our primary industries, in the shops, and factories and offices, to those who have served in the homes and in hospitals, to those who have made their several contributions in order that the men at the front might not lack support, to all in fact who saw that such contributions as it was possible for those in civil life to make to the winning of the war, were made in as full measure as possible.

I had the responsibility, Mr. Speaker, for the speech from the throne and for advising His Excellency to pay a special tribute to our warriors and our workers; I am sure hon. members of both houses of this parliament will wish above everything else to have it noted that among the first words uttered by His Excellency were those which gave expression on behalf of parliament to the country's gratitude.

To all who have contributed by service and sacrifice to victory, I would, in the name of parliament, express our country's gratitude.

I know the speech is lengthy. There is more than one reason for that. I have given one reason already, but let me enlarge upon it. At Westminster, Britain took the earliest opportunity to express its appreciation of the services rendered by the armed forces and those who had performed other essential tasks, by presenting a special, formal address to the King in language not very much different from what appears in our speech from the throne. More than that, the House of Commons and House of Lords, as a first act, once victory had been won, attended a service in Westminster in which they gave, as my hon. friend this afternoon has recognized is also given in our speech from the throne, an expression of thanks to Almighty God for His mercy in having saved the world from the appalling menace with which it was faced.

In view of the differences between our practices and those at Westminster the government did not consider it necessary to duplicate that procedure, but we have felt it desirable, and I am sure the nation will be pleased that it is so, to place formally on record in the speech from the throne the thanksgiving of the people of Canada to Almighty God for the great deliverance vouchsafed our country, along with other lands, and our profound appreciation of the service rendered by the armed forces of our country, together with our tribute to the men and women of Canada who, in other ways, have done what they could toward the winning of the war.

Let me pass now to the next part of my hon. friend's remarks. I think I can answer him very briefly and very effectively. Most of his time was spent in criticism of the government's policies with respect first to one subject and then to another. I have a list of them before me, but they will be remembered by all who heard him. As my hon. friend spoke it seemed to me I heard very distinct echoes of what he and members of his party had been saying, ad nauseam, months before the general election; and before, the people, who after all are the masters of parliament, had an opportunity to express their views. The people have pronounced on these matters and I am prepared to accept their verdict.

My hon. friend spoke about controls. He said the people had made it perfectly clear that they did not want, I think he said, anything in the way of, first, national socialism. That was directed, I imagine, toward my hon. friends of the C.C.F. party.

Mr. COLDWELL: I don't know why.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The next shot evidently was intended for the government. He spoke of bureaucratic control and of other things which he thought were not wanted by the people. May I say to my hon. friend that of things not wanted there is one thing that I think the Canadian people made very clear.

It is, that they do not want the Tory party —and that, by whatever name it may wish to call itself.

My hon. friend also waxed eloquent upon what members of the armed forces feel about the administration. Before the general elections, we heard him and members of his party say a great deal about what the armed forces thought of the government, and on the other hand what they believe the armed forces thought of the party of which he is the head. Well, I suggest that the figures in the returns which came in after the election must have occasioned a good deal of a surprise to the leader of the opposition. When my hon. friend criticizes the government's actions in respect of what it has sought to do to safeguard and further the interests of members of the armed forces, may I remind him of something which is a source of profound pride to me, namely, that in the general election the vote of the armed forces of Canada was, in largest numbers, in support of the present administration. Moreover, before he repeats what he said this afternoon, I suggest he ought not to forget that his own party received the smallest proportion of that vote.

My hon. friend next spoke about the government's housing policy. He called it "a flop"—"too little and too late". I wonder if he realized that it is less than three months since the people pronounced on the government's policies. During the time of the election much was said about the government's housing policy, about the inadequacy of demobilization, and many other matters. But the people of Canada did not take the narrow partisan view my hon. friend has been expressing to-day. They took the intelligent, wise and, may I say, liberal view as to how situations of the kind should be viewed, namely in the light of all with which the government has had to contend.

I wonder if the new leader of the opposition realizes what these years of war—six years—have placed by way of burden and obligation upon the government. Yes, six years of war; and I am wondering if his criticism has been fair in the light of that fact and all that it signifies. I am not asking to be free of criticism, or to have this party free of it, but I do say that it is due, perhaps not to me or to the government, but due to the country that those who criticize the administration should, at all times, remember the nature of the government's obligations over those six years.

Let me go a step further. Does my hon. friend realize that it is not yet a fortnight since the end of the war? Even yet surrenders are only just being made in some parts of the orient. To come forward with an amendment which says that the government:—

> . . . failed to demobilize our armed forces on a fair basis and, in particular, have failed to prevent serious disadvantage to overseas service personnel;
> (b) failed to provide a speedy and effective plan of reconversion from war to peace, and failed in particular to join in partnership with labour and industry in devising a workable scheme to provide jobs, with fair wages, for discharged service personnel and war workers;
> (c) failed to take adequate and timely action to meet the ever-mounting housing crisis . . .

I say that to come forward with that amendment within a few hours after the cessation of war does not commend itself, in my judgment, as being in the nature of disinterested or constructive cricticism.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): We did not think it would.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is rather in the nature of impetuous partisan criticism. I suggest it was hardly a good way for my hon. friend to begin, in his first address to the House of Commons.

I trust, when the amendment comes before the house for decision, hon. members will see that it gets just what it should get by way of support. I expect the friends of my hon. friend will join with him in supporting it. I should hope, however, that other hon. members will realize that, in a moment of transition from war to peace, no government on earth can begin to hope to satisfy everyone. We are prepared to be shown wherein mistakes have been made; but I would ask that, when hon. members criticize, they deal fairly with facts, at least for this particular session.

The problems now facing our country are in some respects going to be even more difficult of solution than were the great problems connected with the winning of the war. During war time a wealth of patriotism, for which we cannot be too thankful, exhibited itself. But now that the war is over, and the world is labouring in a great sea of unrest, following the storm through which it has passed, it is to be expected that many questions will be very difficult of solution. May I say that those who lend their voices to unnecessary and unjustified agitations may help to create situations which will be much more difficult to meet than they may have reason to expect. I speak with some knowledge of the problems remaining to be solved, realizing that we are only at the beginning of their solution. For that reason I would hope that hon. members will keep in mind the world situation as it is to-day.

Since V-E day, 120,500 armed services personnel have already been brought back from overseas. I should have expected my hon. friend to mention a fact of that kind, to have commented upon it, to have wished the government well in its continued efforts. Had he done that, I believe the view the country would have taken of his first utterance would have been that at last we have in the leader of the opposition one who means what he says when he declares he intends to be constructively helpful to the administration. But, after his criticism of to-day, I doubt very much if that will be the view entertained.

In one respect I am going to follow an example set by my hon. friend to-day. His speech was brief, and I intend to make mine briefer still. I do that because I believe I have said in a word all that in answer to criticism it is necessary to say to-day, when I stated that the people themselves had very recently pronounced upon the government's action. And may I add that the electorate made its pronouncement after having at an earlier stage of the war also returned this administration to power. So far as I know there has not been anywhere else an administration which has contested two general elections during a war and which with a period of five years intervening has on both occasions been returned to power by the people. I prefer to let the people's verdict speak for itself rather than in any way to attempt to enlarge upon it.

My hon. friend has referred to taxation. Because he has been at the head of a government himself, I feel I ought to say something which he knows only too well. It is that taxation is dealt with not in the speech from the throne but in the budget. In order that my hon. friend and his party might not fall into the particular trap into which they have fallen to-day a clause was inserted in the speech from the throne which draws attention to that very fact.

I was surprised at the opinion which the leader of the opposition seemed to entertain of the intelligence of the members of the Commons when he began to tell them of the differences in amounts of expenditures and taxation between the last year preceding the war and the present time, between the last year of peace and what took place after six years of war. I could hardly believe that my hon. friend was speaking seriously, or that he had remembered that he had come into the House of Commons after leaving the provincial field where perhaps others would not be less critical of him, especially when he was at the head of a coalition government. But to-day he is speaking to members of many parties and from all parts of Canada. When he says that before the war so many millions were paid out and that, last year, so many billions were paid out; that present outlays are ten times the pre-war figure, I think I should say to him that he might well be thankful outlays are not a hundred times the pre-war figure. Instead of the administration having been extravagant, as he has implied, having regard to the magnitude of Canada's contribution I claim it has been exceedingly careful in its expenditures over the war period.

What about other countries? What will my hon. friend have to say with regard to the expenditures of other nations? What about the expenditures of the United States? What about the expenditures of the United Kingdom and of other nations involved in war? There have been vast expenditures everywhere. But I ask my hon. friend: what has been the result of these expenditures? What has been the effect of what this government has done with the public money of this country? It has been to make Canada's contribution to the war a contribution which has made Canada great in the eyes of the entire world. I say that the price which has been paid is a small price when one realizes that to-day we are enjoying liberty and freedom. I think we can honestly say that if the contribution which Canada has made—I am speaking of the people of Canada, the armed forces of Canada, not of the government—had not been made, if the sacrifices and services had not been given, it is exceedingly doubtful if to-day we would be rejoicing in the magnitude of the victory which the allied nations have won both in Europe and in Asia.

I shall leave to a more appropriate time any discussion of the dominion-provincial conference. That was another subject my hon. friend mentioned. I am happy to say that I believe a very promising start was made this year at the dominion-provincial conference. I do not think too much can be done on the part of provincial legislatures and by the dominion government to see that the excellent beginning which has been made is followed up in the spirit which was shown at that time in the endeavour to get together and to cooperate in solving these very difficult dominion-provincial questions.

My hon. friend said he noticed that in proposals placed before the conference the government policy made no reference to exports. That was surely an oversight on his part. I would direct the attention of my hon. friend to what is set forth on the very first page of the government proposals of Canada. There he will find it stated:

Opportunities for useful work and markets for agriculture and other primary industries are dependent upon remunerative outlets for the goods and services that are produced. At the height of the war effort almost one-half of the Canadian people obtained their incomes from the expenditures of the federal government. As war time government disbursements decline, opportunities and remunerative outlets must be found in the expansion of expenditures directly made by all the individuals and enterprises of the country for civilian needs and civilian purposes. The increased expenditures that replace war time outlays will have their source in the sales made into the export market, in a rising level of consumption, in private investment for the expansion of productive facilities, and in public investment for improving the productiveness of our natural resources and the construction of useful public works.

First of all, the government will continue to press actively for wide collaboration among countries for the reduction and removal of world trade barriers. Even if this purpose is accomplished it will not meet all the problems with which we shall be confronted. In the immediate future and for some time after final victory in the Pacific indispensable customers, particularly the United Kingdom and countries on the continent of Europe, will not be able to make full cash payment for goods they will wish to buy from us. In order to alleviate the sufferings of liberated peoples, to help in the rehabilitation of devastated economies, and to establish the flow of peace time trade upon which we are dependent, Canada should be prepared in cooperation with other countries to grant further assistance and loans. Also, Canadian participation in the international monetary agreements are likely to involve extensions of credit. These are national responsibilities which the federal government must necessarily assume. By doing so we shall fulfil our international obligations and at the same time ensure adequate and continued opportunities for employment at home. It is essential that the federal treasury be in a position to carry these burdens.

If I wished to I could give other quotations from the same source. I might also touch upon other matters to which my hon. friend has referred, but I intend to keep the promise I have made to be brief. I shall therefore bring my remarks to an immediate close expressing the hope that hon. members of the house will profit by the example of brevity set by the leader of the opposition and myself and hasten the conclusion of the debate that we may get down to the business of the session just as soon as possible.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether I shall be following the example of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) this afternoon. I do not wish to speak at any great length, but their speeches have been so commendably short that I doubt very much whether I shall be able to equal the record they have established.

May I first of all on behalf of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party congratulate the mover (Mr. Benidickson) and the seconder (Mr. Langlois) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I think it was fitting that two young men who have served this country during the war should have been selected for that honour. They performed their duty well, and may I say that it is no easy task but rather something of an ordeal to make a maiden speech in this house.

We join, too, with hon. members generally in expressing our thankfulness that since the last parliament was dissolved the war has been brought to a victorious conclusion. To those who have suffered bereavement, and to the men and women whose services have resulted in loss of life or impairment of limb, we express our grateful thanks, and to all who in many ways have served our common cause we wish to express our heartfelt appreciation.

But now the time has come for this nation to translate its sympathy, its gratitude, its thanks and its appreciation into concrete plans for the building of the bright new world which was promised during the war and which figured so largely in all pre-election speeches. The election of June 11 restored the Liberal party to power. It resulted, too, in some increase in the official opposition and quite a large increase, both in the popular vote and in membership in this house, of the party for which I have the honour to speak this afternoon. We more than doubled our popular vote in the country; and instead of electing only eight members, as we did in 1940, we elected twenty-eight. We were particularly pleased that the men and women who fought victoriously against fascism and nazism overseas gave our candidates a majority of their votes cast in the overseas regions over any other party. May I say that I think this was a fitting rebuke to those well-financed propagandists who did their best to vilify us and, by inference, those who share our views throughout the British commonwealth and the democratic world.

I think the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) this afternoon was incorrect when he stated that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) referred to "national" socialism. I think he left the word "national" out and he spoke of the people of Canada not wishing socialism and, as he put it, regimentation. Well, Mr. Speaker, all I can say is this, that throughout the British commonwealth of nations, a group of nations which have always stood for the ultimate in democracy, to-day there are labour and socialist governments in Australia, New Zealand, and now lately in Great Britain, whereas in the same commonwealth only one government remains in power which dares to admit that it is Conservative, and that government can be found in the province of Ontario.

During the election campaign we placed our ideas and proposals squarely before the people. They differed fundamentally from those of all other parties seeking the support of the country, and we are certain that time will demonstrate that our programme and policies are sound, offering the intelligent solution to the many grave problems which confront this country and, indeed, the world, problems which will have to be faced by all of us in the not far distant future.

I want to remind the government this afternoon that they have made specific and well understood promises regarding full employment, homes and social security. We do not believe that those promises can be realized without public enterprise and public national planning, and the nation will not forget those promises, even if the posters have disappeared from the billboards. On those billboards, let us remember, one word stood out above all others. You remember it? The word was j-o-b-s—jobs. But the government and all other parties except the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation proclaimed the view that capitalist free enterprise can and will provide the jobs. Well, it did not do so before the war, when hundreds of thousands of Canadians were unemployed and on relief. Then our hon. friend the new leader of the opposition was in power in Manitoba and his present friends were in power in Canada, to be followed by the right hon. gentleman who is again Prime Minister of Canada, under both of whom many thousands continued to be unemployed for months, even after the war began. Can the system they both support do any better now? I do not think so, nor indeed does the world generally. As I said a few moments ago, in our British commonwealth of nations only one admittedly Conservative government remains in power; that is in Ontario. The democratic movement that we represent in this house is one which world-wide reaction cannot stop. Reactionaries may, in some countries remote from the physical effects of war, continue their exploitation and their economic power for a time, but the handwriting is on the wall, and the day will come, and come soon, when it will be said of them that they have been "weighed in the balance and found wanting."

"Jobs and adequate incomes for all"—that was the government's pledge to the people. We will help them to fulfil that pledge in every way we can; yes, and we will continue day by day and week by week to demand that they do fulfil it. To achieve it, new jobs must be found for more than 2,000,000 people more than were employed in war-time civilian production.

I am not saying that a semblance of prosperity may not develop during the period when world reconstruction is in progress and the pent-up buying power and demand accumulated during the war are again factors in our domestic economy. But I believe that this will be followed by a slump which only large-scale public investment and expenditure under public ownership and control, carried out in conjunction with comprehensive national economic planning, will be able to mitigate.

Meantime, as the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition both pointed out and admitted this afternoon, we are facing immediate problems resulting from the sudden cessation of hostilities and, I believe, the unpreparedness of the government to meet them.

The Canadian people have been led to believe that the Liberal party promised full employment and well-paid jobs under decent conditions of work, and in addition, all the benefits of collective bargaining, a voice in the management of industry, plus the prospect of gradually increasing wages and gradually decreasing hours of work.

What is the present situation? True, in spite of the deepening unemployment and serious housing shortage, the gracious speech adopts a tone of official satisfaction. It says:

> . . . Canada was prepared to meet the very difficult situations which would arise when victory had been won.

Referring specifically to housing, it speaks with satisfaction of "plans already in operation."

There is, then, smug satisfaction with obviously wholly inadequate policies and, second, no indication that further action is planned. This surely adds up to peace-time unpreparedness.

Let us consider the employment situation. If families could be fed, clothed, housed and kept together by the official assurances of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) and the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) there would be no employment problem to-day. The latest of these reassurances which I have seen states that there were 124,000 jobs to be filled and only 53,000 persons looking to fill them; so then, no unemployment problem!

But what are these jobs? Many are seasonal jobs when packing, harvesting, processing demands are exceptionally heavy. But there are physical difficulties for the worker in taking such seasonal jobs. He has to get to the place where he is wanted whereas war workers are concentrated in the areas where they now live. If he accepts, it may mean, without government help, the uprooting and breaking up of both the home and the family. This will bring about grave social as well as economic problems.

Again, the types of work being offered often fail to fit the labour available. Unskilled factory workers cannot do skilled construction work. Sedentary workers and women cannot fill the demand for heavy labour.

Last and most important is the difference in pay between war work and the work now being offered. The main lay-offs have been in shipyards, where the average weekly wage was $40.48; aircraft, weekly wage, $37.50; chemicals, weekly wage, $34.37; automotive industry, weekly wage, $40.10. But the main permanent jobs being offered now are in textiles, weekly wage, $23.90 including overtime; hosiery and knit goods, weekly wage, $21.34; retail trades, weekly wage, $24.55; and so-called service industries, weekly wage, $19.61.

These figures are from the dominion bureau of statistics report on the employment situation for June, 1945; thus they may be taken as reliable.

Workers then can draw scant comfort from statements that there are more jobs available than persons to fill them. Families whose incomes have dropped by one-third and even by one-half cannot buy shelter and food at to-day's prices, and so we demand of the government that it make good its promises; and pending the adoption of a more comprehensive plan than we see placed before the country or foreshadowed in the house, we suggest the following:

First, that there be a lay-off or severance pay to provide $25 a week for all displaced workers until they are reemployed.

Second, that discharged veterans be paid full pay and allowances until reinstatement in civilian life, with the same minimum of $25 a week—and I shall deal with that more fully in a minute.

Third, that to maintain the purchasing power of Canadian farmers, floor prices for agriculture be extended and continued.

Fourth, that we have legislation to protect workers' and farmers' equities in their homes and to prevent evictions and foreclosures. I think that is most important because many war workers, owing to the housing situation, had to buy houses and make a down payment, and they did so thinking that their wages would enable them to continue their monthly, quarterly or yearly payments. To-day they find themselves out of work and are in danger of losing these homes unless adequate protection is given them.

Fifth, that immediate action be taken to raise wages in industries frozen at substandard levels.

Sixth, an extensive public low-rental housing programme which will provide both large-scale employment and urgently needed homes. The present policy of reliance on private enterprise will produce neither jobs nor homes in adequate numbers.

Other public projects which the government should undertake should be the construction of schools, hospitals, roads, rural electrification, irrigation and the like, and the reconversion of government-owned war plants under public ownership to open up new opportunities of employment.

This country requires a really planned programme of reconversion. At present the disposal of Canada's one billion dollar's worth of capital assets is on a completely unplanned basis. The white paper tabled last session was not a plan but merely a statement of objectives and not of methods. Any plan should provide for the welfare of workers affected by cutbacks and the cancellation of war orders and for the public and cooperative operation of valuable plants to meet peace-time needs. Instead of this, ministers simply repeat that there are plenty of jobs, which is cold comfort for those who, for various reasons, cannot find suitable work at wages sufficient to meet the obligations they have undertaken.

But equal to this failure to plan for suitable employment for war workers and returned veterans is the failure to make effective plans for housing. On this point the speech reveals no new plans for the future. On the contrary, it expresses satisfaction with the present plans, stating that the "plans already in operation provide for the expansion of home construction to keep pace with the increases in the output of building material."

The housing need, we are told, is five hundred thousand new homes—new homes now—and then building for a period of years at the rate of fifty thousand more each year. These are minimum figures. Now what has the government done to date? True, we have passed several acts of parliament, but acts of parliament will not provide houses. We expected that limited dividend corporations would be formed under the provisions of the National Housing Act, but so far, as far as I can learn, none have been organized. Wartime Housing, I believe, is building ten thousand inadequate houses, and the veterans' land administration only three thousand houses. Besides this, there has been a policy of going cap in hand to the insurance companies offering them a government-guaranteed return and permitting a delay of more than a year since the passing of the National Housing Act in setting up a single limited dividend corporation. The result is that no home will be completed by a limited dividend corporation for weeks, and when the homes are completed they will not have been built in accordance with community needs but on the basis of private profit.

There is no reason to believe that the insurance companies will build low-rental houses, and those are the houses we need—housing available to the masses of the people who need it. Under the National Housing Act, insurance companies can obtain government loans to build houses costing $5,000, and these will be available only to those who can pay a rental of, say, $50 a month, or the upper fifteen per cent in the income tax brackets. These houses being built under the National Housing Act, as distinct from the limited dividend corporation, are not within the reach of most people who need them. Today a modern five-roomed house will cost about $6,000, and that is low. I understand that the loan may be $5,400, but this means that the buyer must find and pay down as a cash payment $1,100 and assume a mortgage of $4,300.

Including taxes this would involve a monthly payment of at least $35. We are told authoritatively that shelter should not exceed one-fifth of the income after taxes, so that such a contract should not be undertaken by any person whose income is less than $2,100 a year after taxes. Not one out of five of those who pay income taxes can afford this type of housing accommodation on that basis. The government has apparently set its face against public housing enterprises, refusing to allow municipalities to come under the act, as we urged last year, thus refusing to profit by the experience both of Great Britain and of New Zealand.

I am told that out of hundreds of veterans who have considered building under the National Housing Act only seventy have attempted it. The rest found that they could not meet the down payments and the monthly obligations; yet the nation cries aloud for decent homes, and veterans are returning to find their families and themselves without shelter.

In view of this situation I am going to move an amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis):

That all the words of the amendment after the word "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

We respectively submit, however, that in the opinion of this house Your Excellency's advisers have failed to propose the fundamental social and economic changes which alone can meet the pressing needs of the peace-time era upon which we have entered, and we urge that immediate steps be taken to assure full employment, adequate purchasing power, and a large-scale building programme that will provide urgently needed homes for the Canadian people.

The intimation that the various acts and orders in council relating to veterans' problems are to be consolidated into a veterans' charter is, I think, to be welcomed generally in this house. We should as soon as possible see, too, that all social security measures are consolidated into a similar comprehensive national charter. I wish to say now that the out-of-work benefits to unemployed war workers must be extended to veterans. The present provisions for returning men and women are inadequate. This is particularly apparent in the case of veterans who have decided to go on with their educational courses; $60 a month for a single person and $80 a month for a married man. That is not enough. A married man will have to pay rent for himself and family, more if he has a child or children, of at least $30 a month for unfurnished accommodation.

Mr. MACKENZIE: There are allowances for the children, too; my hon. friend knows that.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, but I am taking the amount of rent likely to be paid by a childless couple. I know that accommodation for a man and his wife will amount to at least $30 a month; that is, nearly one-third of his income must go for rent. His gratuity will under present prices—and remember they are still war-time prices—be absorbed in buying furniture, pots and pans and other household equipment. You have only to price the pots and pans in the hardware stores to-day to see that they are at inflated prices. At prevailing prices the married veterans, like the unplaced war worker, requires a minimum of at least $25 a week.

It is all very well for the government to refer to the general generosity of its proposals, but let me remind them of their promises: "Jobs at decent wages and adequate standards of living." We are merely asking that these promises be fulfilled.

When mentioning some veterans' problems I should like to make a plea for the men who have suffered as prisoners of war under the Japanese. Provision was to be made, the house will remember, to make an additional allowance to service personnel who volunteered for the Pacific war. If my memory serves me correctly, that was to date from sometime in June or the first of July of this year. If this is the case, the Hong Kong veterans would be ineligible. I am asking the government, if this is the case, to reconsider the matter.

To my mind they deserve all that we can do for them, and the least we can do is to make them eligible for all special payments provided for service in the Pacific from the day they embarked on their ill-fated expedition. The dependents of any who perished should be entitled to the payments the soldier would have received had he survived. This seems to me to be simple justice.

If we are to maintain decent standards of living and enable the people to build homes and buy the goods which our factories and mines can produce, they must have purchasing power. The government made the specific promise that taxes would be reduced. That should be honoured this session by raising the tax exemptions on single persons' incomes to not less than $1,200 and on incomes of married men and persons with dependents to not less than $2,000. These are the people who must spend practically all their incomes on consumable goods and hence buy things the making of which keeps industry and agriculture running. In other words, these are the people who will buy more food, more clothes, more shelter as they have more money to spend.

At the moment and for some time to come there will be a ready market for everything the farmer can produce. Though the war has brought welcome and temporary alleviation to the farmer's position in some respect, notably through higher prices and an increased demand for his products, basically there has been no permanent change in agriculture's relation to the rest of the Canadian economy. But the future prosperity of Canada requires the fullest development of Canadian agriculture. During the war the shortage of farm help increased the trend toward power farming, and now that machinery will become more readily available this trend will, I believe, continue and perhaps become still more accelerated.

This means that provided the farmer is guaranteed a fair share of the national income and decent conditions of life, he can produce not only all that we require to improve our own nutritional standards in this country, but to produce the vast quantities of food for a starving world. We were told at San Francisco that before the war two-thirds of the world's population were permanently underfed. Under the charter of the united nations, which we believe will be approved this session, we have obligated ourselves with other nations to maintain full employment and to raise the living standards all over the world. If we are to contribute our share, we must guarantee prices for farm products that will enable the farmer to enjoy conditions of life as good as those which are enjoyed by those who live well in our cities. This means many things: rural electrification, soil conservation, educational opportunity, attractive community life and ever-widening fields of cooperative endeavour. Because we can produce in great abundance farm commodities as well as many other natural products, and manufactured goods too now, Canada is vitally interested in world trade.

During the war much of our overseas trade has been in the form of mutual aid. These gifts received the almost unanimous support of parliament and country, but they cannot be a permanent policy. If we are to dispose of our surplus food and products abroad in the future, we shall have to receive goods in payment for them. In an intelligent economy this should be welcomed, because the more goods we receive in exchange for the goods we produce the higher our standards of living should become; but it will be some time before those who eat our food will be able to send us goods in return. With them we have been engaged in a common war effort; and we must join in the world-wide task of reconstruction. No nation, I should like to say, can be allowed to sink because of the generosity of her war effort. Indeed, no nation and no people can be permitted to languish in poverty if the other nations are to remain prosperous. Thus, speaking for our party, we are prepared to support arrangements for immediate and substantial loans to Great Britain and others of our suffering allies. These loans might be made without interest and repayable in securities or goods to be arranged at later dates. Indeed, such agreements are merely an application of a policy of enlightened self-interest.

This parliament will be required, as the Prime Minister said, to deal with matters of international importance. I note that the charter of the united nations which was signed at San Francisco is to be submitted for approval. That, I am certain, will be accorded. We shall also be asked to approve a measure to provide for Canada's participation in the Bretton Woods agreement for the establishment of an international monetary fund and a bank for reconstruction and development. In view of its important and complicated proposals I suggest that this agreement be placed before parliament at the earliest possible date, and referred forthwith to the banking and commerce committee, where the expert advisers who were present at Bretton Woods may be thoroughly and properly examined. After making some study of the proposals I am inclined to think that, balancing the good features against those which appear to be less desirable, the agreement may assist international exchanges and make more adequate provision for international credit. But before we are asked to give it final approval careful inquiry should be made into its proposals and its implications. This can scarcely be done in a debate in this house or in committee of the whole, since the opinions of expert advisers would not be available here. The agreement should be studied by the banking and commerce committee, and I am not only suggesting but asking that this should be done.

Current proposals for the rehabilitation of the world economy, the united nations' charter, with its emphasis on the maintenance of peace and the necessity for raising living standards throughout the world, reflect the desire of mankind to avoid war and to eliminate its causes. Since the united nations conference at San Francisco thoughtful people have realized that much of what we determined there became obsolete when the first atomic bomb fell on Hiroshima. If emphasis were needed, the reports of the obliteration of Nagasaki in to-day's papers would be quite sufficient. The atomic bomb marks the end of many things. The power locked up in the atom has been released. All depends now on how we use it. It can become, when applied to peaceful needs, the great emancipator of mankind; but certainly marks the end of any attempt to keep the peace by balance of power methods. The threat of sudden attack in secrecy rules out such means entirely. Big national armies and mighty national navies would seem to be powerless against even a small air force or robot planes equipped with atomic bombs. Henceforth there seems to be no sane alternative except some body of government at the international level to remove the economic and social causes of war and to bring a rule of law to the whole wide world.

I spoke of the peace-time possibilities of atomic power. They depend upon the success of scientific research. Canada has reason to be proud of the contribution made by her scientists, many of them young men, during this war; but are we going to retain their services for the development of the great potential wealth of the country now? I am told that some of our talented young scientists are being lost to our public service and to Canada because the government has no definite plans for the national research council and continues to pay salaries that by any yardstick, before the war, during the war and now, are disgracefully low. Once they are lost it will be difficult to bring them back to do the public service many of them wish to do.

The speech from the throne foreshadows the beautification of this national capital, already beautiful in many respects, and its surroundings as a suitable war memorial. That is a noble idea, particularly if it begins with the substitution of decent homes for the fire traps that one can look out upon from these very buildings. Slum clearance, however, should be undertaken not as a memorial to the heroic dead but as justice to the living. In spite of these strictures, I think Canada deserves a beautiful national capital city. In addition, I should like to see here, and in each of our provincial capitals, a real centre of Canadian culture. We should have as part of our memorial a cultural centre to include a national theatre, a national library, a national art gallery and in time, subsidized from public funds, a national opera company, a national dramatic company, a national symphony orchestra and perhaps even a national ballet. If each province undertook a similar project Canada, with its diverse peoples, might become not only the centre of North America culture but the centre of a distinctive Canadian culture, marking its nationhood by more than a new Canadian flag.

It is time Canada, as an independent partner in the British commonwealth of nations, and recognized as a leader among the middle powers, assumed her rightful place among the nations. This war has shown that we can do big things in a big way when we try. I do not want to minimize what this country has done; I do not want to detract from any credit the government should get for what this country has done during the war. The speech from the throne says that steps already have been taken to plan and develop the region around the city of Ottawa on both sides of the river. In this connection let me add a note of disappointment in that the government has seen fit to go abroad for architectural assistance. There are Canadian architects and landspace artists, talented in town planning, able to reflect the spirit of their country, who have been active in study groups and associations in Toronto, Winnipeg, Vancouver, Montreal and, indeed, in this city of Ottawa. But whatever may be done here in the way of beautification, Mr. Speaker, as a memorial to those who have suffered throughout this war, I hope and pray that Canada's living sons and daughters may yet make this land itself a fitting memorial to those who died in what we believe to be a great and just cause.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, allow me first to offer you my sincere congratulations upon your election to the highest office it is within the competence of this house to bestow upon one of its members. Let me assure you, sir, of my earnest desire to make the onerous duties that go with your high office as much lighter as careful observance of the rules of order and considerate, forthright conduct will make them. I do hope that when you have served your term as Speaker of the House of Commons you will have accumulated a rich aggregate of pleasant memories and personal friendships. The start you have made assures me that you will serve with impartiality and distinction.

I wish also to congratulate the mover and seconder of the resolution now before us upon what I consider to be two able addresses. I listened with real interest to what they had to say, moved at times by the lofty sentiments they expressed and fully appreciating the smooth, easy and clear delivery of their messages. Almost they persuaded me to be a Liberal. Both hon. members demonstrated ably that the young men of this day are well prepared to make a valuable contribution to the enrichment of our national life. Of course one would not expect these young men to parade before the house the weaknesses of the government they were elected to support. That is expected from those on this side of the house, and doubtless hon. members here will take full advantage of their opportunities.

However, I should like to make it clear, in this my first real address in parliament, that in anything I shall say now or in the future by way of criticism I shall try to be eminently fair. I do not indulge in carping criticism, nor do I hurl poisoned personal harpoons. But that does not mean to say that I shall not be outspoken when I see in the government's actions, trends which in my humble judgment may militate against the welfare of the Canadian people. I do not believe in crying "peace" where there is no peace.

Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to come into the House of Commons representing the people of the constituency of Peace River, which is at once one of the largest ridings in Canada and the last great frontier in the dominion. The immense possibilities of that great inland empire are just beginning to dawn upon the Canadian people. The richness of its fertile farm lands is unsurpassed in all America, a fact attested by the records of crop yields and superior quality grains that have captured scores of top honours at the leading shows and exhibitions of the world. We all remember with pride and thanksgiving the successes of Herman Trelle and the outstanding contribution to Canadian agriculture made by him on his farms at Wembley. We now mourn his untimely passing as the result of a most regrettable accident in California just recently. My friend Trelle and the soil and climate of the country of the mighty Peace, made a combination that has lifted Canadian prestige to a high level in the agricultural world.

Nature endowed the Peace River country not only with unsurpassed soil, sunshine and rainfall resources, but also abundant timber, fur-bearing animals and, doubtless, minerals of many varieties. But her greatest pride is her people. True pioneers with a vision of empire in their souls settled the country, as a result of the policy of the federal government in the days when Ottawa alone controlled the natural resources of the prairie provinces. They carved out homes and farms, towns and villages, through application of sheer determination and stubborn courage. And in spite of their hardships, their isolation, and the fact that their country and their pressing needs have been consistently ignored by the federal government, which alone must bear the responsibility for their settlement in the north country, the people of Peace River have maintained the true spirit and hospitality and friendliness of the pioneers; their cabin doors are never locked.

I said their country and its development have been consistently ignored down the years by Ottawa. The present Liberal government has since 1935 done nothing to remove the heavy transportation handicaps they have suffered since the first settlement in that section. Their most urgent need now is a rail outlet to the west, perhaps through Pine Pass, to link up with Prince George, British Columbia. Such a rail link would obviate the necessity of the long back-haul of three hundred miles to Edmonton.

Almost as urgent is a new and equitable schedule of freight rates; for in common with other parts of Alberta, the Peace River has been placed at the very peak of a most unfair and discriminating freight rate structure that throttles its development. Added to the natural disadvantage of its geographical position, a series of discriminating practices have grown up in the Canadian railway system which have the effect of favouring both central Canada and the coast province of British Columbia at the expense of the Peace River and Alberta generally. To these two grave problems, the sympathetic support of the government can bring satisfactory solution.

The Peace River cannot fulfil her destiny as a producer of an abundance of much-needed foodstuffs for the early alleviation of short world supply unless these needs, among others, are met. For the proper development of this last great frontier where perhaps fifty thousand more people could settle in comfort and security, the rail outlet to the western seaboard and the revised freight structure are absolutely essential. Time will not permit me to enlarge on these matters now, but I have pledged myself to work unceasingly for them, and I am prepared to raise my voice on every possible occasion and to haunt the offices of those who have it in their power to do something about them, until the needs of my peeople are satisfied.

I wish here to thank the government for finally undertaking, jointly with the province of Alberta, to build the Grimshaw-Notikewin-Hay River road. This will play a big part in the development of the north as well as in making available to the rest of Canada the vast mineral wealth of the nothern territories. But the government need not have waited until they were facing an election to announce their participation in the project. Their sincerity would have been infinitely more impressive had they consented to join with Alberta on any one of the many occasions during the past eight years when that province attempted to interest Ottawa in undertaking to build the road.

I wish to identify myself with the expression of thanksgiving in the throne speech that tragic war has ceased and that final victory has come to the united nations. Surely it must be evident from the many miraculous events of the past six years that Almighty God has sustained our efforts, and that without His divine intervention civilization might have completely destroyed itself. It is no mere scientific accident in my opinion that the secret of the atomic bomb was discovered first by the Anglo-American people.

Mr. Speaker, my thanks go out also to the people of Canada whose magnificent war effort has aroused the admiration of the world. To the fighting men in all branches of the service, we owe a debt which I sincerely trust we shall acknowledge and pay, by adequate provision for their future happiness and security, no matter what that might cost us. My sincere sympathies go out to all those bereaved families whose sons, husbands, brothers or fathers will not return. So not to break faith with them who gave their lives that we might be free to choose our way of living, let us pledge ourselves not only to do our utmost to prevent a recurrence of tragic war, but also, what is more important and pressing, to get at and root out of our national life those things which are the real causes of war.

We whipped Germany completely in a military way. In fighting her we were fighting totalitarianism, which is centralization of power maintained by force. But though the combined military might of the united nations did vanquish Germany, yet there is still grave danger that nazism—what we fought Germany for—may win. For while we have been busy fighting centralization of power maintained by force abroad, more than a vestige of the evil has crept in at our back door here at home. Its cunning subversive propaganda has found ready response in the hearts of many unsuspecting Canadians, among whom I fear we must class the Liberal government. I do not believe it has been through malevolence on their part, nor do I like to think it is through stupidity, but the fact remains that the government has been drifting into totalitarian centralization, and we now even hear much about maintaining it "by force."

Considerable space is given in the throne speech to what the government has done. Claims are made there to great progress for Canada during the war years under the leadership of the Liberal government. But splendid as Canada's war effort has been, in many ways the general situation in Canada and in the world is infinitely worse than it was in 1939.

I find widespread among the people of Canada to-day a feeling that centralization within our country as well as on a world scale is inevitable. This "inevitability" psychology has resulted from the persistent and subtle propaganda of the enemies of true democracy over the years. It planted its roots deep in the frustration of the hungry thirties and it has fed on the bitterness engendered among Canadians by that sense of futility. It has made such great inroads among our people during the war years that I feel we face a dangerous situation as a result of it. What has this Liberal party and its government done about it? It has fought valiantly against the spreading fire by throwing gasoline on the flames. It has blundered into the position actually of a tool in the hands of the enemies of democracy by adopting a policy of centralization of power, and by its actions of helping to establish firmly among Canadians the feeling of the inevitability of centralization. Social Crediters in and out of the house have repeatedly warned the government about its dangerous drift.

In the first place the Liberal government itself was a victim of the psychology of futility during the period of 1935-39. This the Prime Minister admitted in his answers to the thirty-three questions in Maclean's magazine last spring. When the war broke out they began seriously to flirt with the centralization idea as a result of which they called the dominion-provincial conference in January, 1941, to consider the Rowell-Sirois report. When that conference failed, under the stress of wartime needs this government began a surreptitious attack on the provinces to force transfer of taxation powers from the provinces to the dominion. They called the attack "taxation transfer agreements", but actually the provinces were put into the position of having to accept the dominion's proposal, "or else". Many of us said at that time that we would bet our shirts there would be a serious effort made by Ottawa to render the so-called temporary arrangement a permanent one, for we recognized the centralization policy which the government was following. It was only too obvious that though the Prime Minister had given much evidence of favouring fundamental reform of the financial system he was not able to get into office a Minister of Finance to support him in his desires. Rather, each finance minister in his turn preferred to juggle taxation fields, as if that could possibly by itself make available more money with which the various governments could run their business. Surely it must have been obvious all these years that it is the same people who are taxed, whether by province or dominion alone or by both in their own spheres, and it must also have been obvious that there is a limit beyond which we cannot go in heaping tax burdens upon our people. However, in spite of all that has been said about it, we now behold another attempt by this government to arrogate to the dominion, taxation authorities which belong by right to the provinces. This is another step toward centralization of power, which if carried into effect, will topple and destroy the last remaining columns of true democracy. No wonder many people think centralization inevitable.

I need only mention such things as selective service, compulsory unemployment insurance, compulsory health insurance schemes, Dumbarton Oaks and Bretton Woods, to further impress upon the people of Canada additional evidences of the trend of this government's mental drift. And I say with all the gravity at my command that centralization is not inevitable. Centralization is the very antithesis of true democracy. There are better ways of solving our problems, ways that will preserve the individual freedom of Canadians. I come of English stock on my mother's side and of stubborn Scottish in my father's line. One of my direct ancestors was among those who dipped quills and signed with their own blood a document resisting the centralizing encroachments of King Charles I. Perhaps that explains why I am a reformer. And now every drop of the blood of my ancestors cries out in me to resist to the utmost extent of my strength the Liberal government's policy of centralization of powers. I call upon all Canadians who are determined to preserve and apply in Canada, the principles of Christian democracy to contend against this dangerous policy of totalitarian centralization and to root it out of our national life forever.

Mr. Speaker, if it is your pleasure that we should now call it six o'clock perhaps you might follow the example in reverse of Joshua.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. LOW: Mr. Speaker, when the recess was called I was dealing with the problem of centralization. I should like now to turn for just a few moments to another important matter which is closely allied with centralization and which is of grave concern to the people of this land; I refer to the matter of taxation. My search in the throne speech failed to disclose any intention of the government to set about a reduction of the tremendous tax burden under which Canadians have been staggering these past years.

Many of us had hopes that, with the cessation of hostilities and with the consequent relaxation of serious war necessities, we might expect at least a start this session in the scaling down of taxation. Our hopes were somewhat encouraged by reports from Australia of a 12½ per cent reduction in personal income taxes and in a lowering of sales tax over quite a wide range of materials. It seems evident now, however, that we cannot expect a similar move by this government, at least at an early date. I am not unmindful at all of the substantial commitments already made by the present administration to meet post-war needs. With many of these commitments I find myself in substantial agreement. But here again I fear that the government have become confirmed victims of an inevitability complex, as if there were no better and other ways of meeting their commitments than by continuing to heap intolerable burdens of taxation upon the people.

If one takes the trouble to study the history of taxation in this country as well as in all other countries operating under the same vicious system of debt financing, he will find that the tax burdens have increased consistently decade after decade, through good times and bad, and through peace times as well as war times. I would not be so much concerned about the matter of increasing rates and varieties of taxation if I did not know that an ever-increasing percentage of the national income is being taken by governments to carry on their business, and particularly to pay the growing tribute to the merchants of debt in the form of interest on our growing obligations.

I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that the only true way of ascertaining the burden of taxation is to measure it as a percentage of the national income. An examination of the figures for the years 1923, 1939 and 1944 will yield a good deal of food for thought. I chose 1923 because it is the earliest year for which figures representing the national income of Canada appear to be available. The year 1939 was chosen, of course, because it is the last pre-war year, and, of course, 1944 as the last fiscal year.

In 1923 the national income was, in round figures, $4,200,000,000. The tax revenues to the federal government for the same year were, in round figures, $154,020,000. Those taxes represented for that year 3-7/10th per cent of the national income. In 1939 what was the picture? The total national income was, in round figures, $4,553,602,000; the tax revenues were $436,000,000, and those figures represented 9-8/10ths per cent of the national income. In 1944, admittedly a war year, and a very heavy war year, the national income was estimated at approximately $9,000 millions; the total tax revenues were $2,283,000,000. Those taxes last year represented 25-3/10ths per cent of the national income. These tables show in twenty-one years an increase in the tax burden from 3-7/10ths per cent of the national income to 25-3/10ths per cent of the national income.

These figures, too, represent only what the federal government is exacting by way of tax toll. When we add to the schedules the aggregate of provincial and municipal taxes, the percentage of the national income taxed from the people in 1944 approaches close to fifty per cent of the national income; that is, fifty cents out of every dollar of income of the Canadian people.

I wonder just where we are heading. The taxation burdens of our Canadian people are intensified tremendously by debt financing; and I suggest that every hon. member acquaint himself with the debt history of Canada. From 1867 onward the total of all government debts in our country steadily mounted. For a number of years prior to the outbreak of world war II the aggregate of dominion, provincial and municipal debts increased each year by almost exactly the total amount of the interest on those debts, indicating the utter impossibility of paying even the interest on our obligations without resorting to taxation of confiscatory proportions. It is chiefly this ever-growing interest burden which causes the debt load, as measured in terms of a percentage of the national income, also to grow ever greater and more intolerable. Debt financing has failed.

In his last report to the United States congress, President Truman announced that an overwhelming portion of allied obligations of $42,000 millions worth of American lend-lease would be cancelled. President Truman further said that to add forty-two billions to the already enormous financial obligations of the allies would disrupt political stability. These debts had to be cancelled because they represent the utter failure of the debt finance system, which if pushed to its logical conclusion would destroy the economic as well as the political stability of the whole world. That debt finance system is basically unsound. Unless and until we make a new approach to public financing in Canada, an approach which relegates debt financing to the limbo of past nightmares, the Canadian people can have little hope for tax relief, especially if we are to keep up the services to anything like the level required for social justice to our people.

I am convinced that there is a better way than debt financing. My experiences of the last twelve years have intensified that conviction. If that better way is applied to our country an immediate downward revision of taxation will be possible. My colleagues and I will continue our fight for the application of that new principle of finance, which is simple, scientific, and easy to administer; for we are convinced that taxation of the punitive intensity we now suffer not only in the end-result makes men submissive and tolerant to the nefarious doctrine of the centralization of power, both national and international, but also enslaves mankind.

I turn for just one moment, Mr. Speaker, to another matter which was raised in the speech from the throne and about which I should like to speak briefly. I wish to commend the expressed intention of the government to take over the full cost of old age pensions and to abolish the means test. That is good so far as it goes, but it does not fill the need at all adequately. The Social Credit group in this house have always felt and do now feel that it will be necessary to lower the pensionable age to sixty years and to bring up the general pension to not less than $50 a month, and that, Mr. Speaker, without the means test.

The absolute necessity of a measure of this kind will become more apparent as the problem of unemployment develops to its full intensity under the discredited system of finance which this government persists in following. It may sound like a big undertaking to pay a pension of not less than $50 to every Canadian of sixty and over, but in the light of the colossal gifts which we made to our enemies during the war, and to our friends in the same period—and in the giving, Mr. Speaker, made ourselves prosperous—the aggregate sum required to carry out the undertaking which we recommend in connection with old age pensions becomes quite commonplace. Some of my colleagues doubtless will deal with this subject more in detail when they take part in this debate.

There are other matters arising out of the throne speech with which I should like to deal, but I shall follow the example, the good example by the way, of those who have preceded me in this debate and cut my remarks short. Just allow me to say in conclusion that I have faith in this great land of ours, a land which I believe to be choice, above all other lands. I have faith in Canada and I believe that she can take her rightful place in the world community of nations and can in that world community of nations become a great power for good. I still have faith that Canadians will awaken to the needs of this most fateful hour in world history and apply the accumulated wisdom of the ages to avert the disaster of threatened victory of totalitarianism in the peace.

Some wise man has said:

Earth might be fair and all men glad and wise
Age after age their tragic empires rise
Built while they dream; and in their dreaming weep,
Would men but wake from out their haunted sleep
Earth might be fair, and all men glad and wise.

I look forward with faith to that day when Canadians will awake.

Mr. W. A. McMASTER (High Park): Mr. Speaker, a great many people will be surprised that I should intervene at this early stage of the debate, but I can assure you that the most surprised person is myself. That would not have been the case if those who are better fitted and who perhaps should have had the honour of intervening so early had been available. It just so happens, however, that they are not available and therefore I have been given this opportunity of addressing you. I do not think I could have addressed this house were it not for the feeling of elation I have had during the few days that I have been attending these sessions. I am a new member and after meeting the other members of my own party, many members of the other parties, some members of the senate and some officials in this building, I have been so elated that I thought I could even make a speech to those assembled here to-night. Otherwise I might have assumed my ordinary attitude of indifference and indolence.

I must ask your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, because I have been a member for only a few days, having attended only two sittings, so that if I err in my manner of speaking or in anything I say while addressing hon. members, you will correct me. If you do I shall accept the correction with the best grace, hoping that as you learn the duties of your office from time to time I may take the easier course of learning mine by observing what you do in the Chair rather than by any hard work of my own.

I listened to the Prime Minister asking the indulgence of members and I recalled that this same indulgence was asked for during many years of the war. I believe that in nearly every case it was granted by those who perhaps did not entirely agree with the right hon. gentleman's method of conducting the war. During the war, however, they were willing to subordinate their own ideas in order that the war might be carried to a successful conclusion. Now that the war is over he is again asking our indulgence. May I say this to him. If at an earlier period of the war he had accepted the help of those who were just as earnest and anxious as he was to win the war, and who could give as much as he or I could, and the help of those who, in the way of actual participation in the war could have given more, his burden would not have been so great; I probably would not be here to-night, and the country as a whole, as well as history, would perhaps have placed him in a higher niche that it will because he did not seek the assistance of those who were willing to help him in the past.

The hon. member who preceded me has spoken about the Peace River district and has used, with reference to that district, words which at the beginning of the century were often spoken about Canada as a whole. In other words, he has spoken of the great material wealth and the fine population of the Peace River district. In the old days when we spoke about Canada we referred to the material wealth, the great resources, of this country, but we always emphasized more than anything else the fact that the people as a whole were the greatest asset of the dominion and that in the character of people they were, the future of Canada was wrapped up. I believe that is still so.

As I listened to the hon. member speaking of the Peace River district he referred in glowing terms to that part of the country, and although I had not originally intended to do so, I decided that I would speak of my own riding of High Park. After all, High Park is a fine constituency and it has a fine name. "Peace River" are words we would like to hear in time of war, but High Park is a good name all the time.

I represent a constituency which is a very fair cross-section of the people, as representative as any that can be found in any city constituency. I am sure that these people would not want me to deal unfairly with those engaged in other occupations. They would want me to give due consideration to those engaged in mining, lumbering, forestry work, fishing and all other activities which it is not possible to find in High Park. This I shall keep in mind and give my best assistance in any legislation dealing with matters affecting other constituencies.

Something has been said by the Prime Minister about the vote of the soldiers overseas and a considerable amount of gratification was taken because of that vote. There may be certain reasons why the vote went as it did. I have interviewed people from overseas and have found that a great deal of confusion existed. For instance, in one case a soldier said that in his particular unit on the continent half voted C.C.F. and half voted Liberal. Those who were in favour of forcing everyone to go overseas voted C.C.F. and those who were not in favour of doing so voted Liberal. So that the people overseas were not particularly well informed about what the issues were at home. In fact, I have received word from men occupying the positions of heads of units of considerable size, as well as from men in the ranks, and they all are agreed that not sufficient information was given them to decide what was best for the country. There was a certain amount of information given, however, by members of the party now in power, as I understand by one of those who have returned.

I am informed that shortly before the election of June 11, certain members of the personnel of the Canadian army were given special instructions on the operation of the Veterans' Land Act. Those instructions were sent out in a book which I hold in my hand, which is designated 50M-944, issued under the authority of T. A. Crerar, Minister of Mines and Resources. This book gives a rosy view of what returned men might expect when they get home. I should like to refer to page 5 which speaks about men coming home and going into their own business and being able to buy a house with a small holding surrounding it in the vicinity of not only cities but smaller places. The government would buy these holdings, put up the money, and in time they would throw off $2,350. The original price is set at $6,000. It goes on to say:

> These small holdings will provide a wide range of opportunities for the veteran and his family, according to their aptitude and preference, to augment outside earnings. It may be from poultry, fruit, flowers, garden truck, bees or a combination of two or more of them. Financial assistance will not be available to inexperienced veterans to undertake specialized operations on a commercial scale because of the risks to which they may be exposed, but by starting in a small way the veteran and his family can assist themselves materially in the production of wholesome foodstuffs and by experimentation decide which side-line best fits in with their particular tastes and needs. In some cases the veteran will gradually transform his holding to a point where he can safely engage in specialized production as a full-time occupation and relinquish his outside employment; in others the veteran will prefer to remain in his ordinary occupation and use his holding as a home but with room to follow some interesting hobby in a healthy atmosphere.

This booklet was passed out shortly before the election. Hon. members can see that a man would have great difficulty in deciding whether the Liberal party was offering more when he came home than another party that had been bombarding them with literature in the preceding years. Perhaps that is why in the minds of the overseas veterans there were only two parties that were offering something material. I should say it is a strange thing that our party obtained as large a vote as it did from men who were ignorant of what our party's position in regard to them was and who were being bombarded with promises from the other two parties.

I wish to call attention to what I think is one glaring defect in this land settlement act. It will be noticed that it applies only to certain people. It applies only to a man who has a business in a town or city and who is willing to live some distance away on this property which was originally to consist of two acres, but which in actual practice has been reduced to half an acre. If a veteran has an automobile or the means of getting around to find a property which answers certain specifications—a house and half an acre of land—the government will buy it and in due time throw off $2,350, giving him an interest rate of three and a half per cent in the meantime. I believe the same thing applies to fishermen and men engaged in farming. My experience has been this: I have found men who do not want to engage in either of those occupations, and they cannot take advantage of this act.

How about the man who, whose wife while he was away by dint of saving and working herself earned enough money to buy a home, so that when the husband came back he would have a home ready to live in. It would not be paid for by any means, but there would be a considerable equity in it. That wife and veteran do not receive one iota from this land settlement act. They will have only the gratuity and the other money that is payable under the Soldiers Rehabilitation Act. I think the first essential in any legislation of this kind is that it shall apply to all veterans. If any one man overseas is entitled to $2,350 and interest of three and a half per cent, then surely all the men overseas are entitled to it. I am afraid it will be found that the men who will take advantage of this are not the men who perhaps need it most, but men who can afford to live out in the country, men who have a car and can get into town to work; whereas the ordinary, hard-working, poor infantryman, or member of some branch of the service—and by the way they were told in the last war that they should have their heads read before they went into those services—will get little or no benefit from this act. I would respectfully submit that this act should be so amended that every soldier overseas should be able to take advantage of it, not from any consideration whether he is able to live near a city and get a job, but because by his work overseas he has earned it. If there is any difference between gifts to veterans I should say that the men who in the front line bore the heat and sweat of battle should be preferred rather than those who have the ability to take advantage of certain conditions that now apply. I would respectfully submit that the amendment moved by my leader to-day in regard to the treatment of veterans is justified by the manner in which this land act has been operated by the government to date.

The Prime Minister spoke of my leader as having rather rushed things by saying that demobilization had not been sufficiently gone on with and suggested that the cessation of hostilities was only a few days past, in fact only a few hours past. Yet in almost the next breath he stated that 120,500 men had been demobilized since V-E day. We all know that V-E day was, because of the action of the government, practically the end of hostilities. We all know that just before the last election a statement was made to the press and to the people that only thirty thousand men would be used in the Pacific theatre of war with proportionate number of men from other services. Therefore, so far as the people of Canada and the members of the forces were concerned the major operation of the war was ended on V-E day. If that is the case then my leader was justified in finding fault with what the government has done, not so much in what they perhaps have said they are going to do, but rather in what they have actually done.

I come from a riding which has equalled any other in so far as enlistment of men and contribution to the war effort are concerned; and I hear complaints all the time. The men who feel they are entitled to come back are kept there, on the ground that they are needed, that they are key-men. That can be said of any man. I suppose every man above the rank of private could be called a key-man. Even a private might have some qualifications that would enable them to keep him there against his desire. There is a great feeling of discontent on the part of these men over there and their families at home. A great deal of criticism is made of the demobilization scheme so far as it affects the man overseas.

I listened to the answer that was given by the Minister of Defence (Mr. Abbott) to the question as to university students. At that time I did not know I was going to speak to-night. I did not have enough nerve, or ability to get up and ask about one phase of the question which I believe will be rectified now when I bring it to the attention of the minister. When it was stated that university men could be discharged in order to go to the university there was a rider attached to it that they must have the consent of the university to accept them. Remember it was about August 27—it might be a day or two before—that this order was promulgated. Yet most universities demand that all applications be in by September 1. I was interested in a couple of boys who were able to get into university this fall. One father told me that it was only by accident that his boy got in. I believe he was in that famous city of Hamilton, where he happened to see the commanding officer and some other official whose consent was necessary. Because of this fortunate circumstance his son was able to get into university, but he told me that his boy had received some previous university training, and that if he had been given more time, instead of getting the boy in the first year he would have been able to get him in the second year.

This is not a political question. It is important to the youth of our country; it vitally affects those who wish to go to university, those who will become our leading citizens, become members of parliament and occupy other leading positions. Something should be done to see that every boy in the forces who desires a university education is given an opportunity to acquire it. There is also the question of the boys overseas who have had perhaps one year or two years in university. I happened to come in contact with one father while looking for another boy. I found that his son, who had a year or two in university, was still overseas. When I spoke to him about seeing what could be done in regard to getting the boy home he gave me this answer, which I think is important and probably represents the opinions of many others. He said, "My boy does not want any preferred treatment; he does not want to come back before his turn." That may be true. I do not know whether university education is more important to one of these boys than a job may be to someone else, but certainly I believe these boys should receive every consideration, and that boys desiring other special instruction in other walks of life should receive similar consideration. I have been told, and I believe it to be true, that there is in operation overseas what is called a khaki college; but how can such a college provide all the courses that will be required? One boy may desire to complete a course in political science; he may have been in his second year when he entered the service. I do not see how that boy could complete his course except by going to some institution other than the khaki college, which with all due respect, I do not think can operate with one hundred per cent efficiency, and which I am told covers only a course of the first year or two at college.

Then I do not understand why a boy should not be allowed to go on and complete his secondary school education. He has to be eighteen before he can enter the army, or seventeen if he enters with the consent of his parents. Surely secondary school education is essential in connection with a great many occupations and professions, and these boys are entitled to it. In Ontario the law demands that a boy go to school until he is sixteen, whether or not he is learning anything and whether or not be desires any further education. Surely when this matter is called to the attention of the government, as I am bringing it to their attention now, they will make a special effort to see that the boys who require secondary school education are given an opportunity to acquire it.

During the course of his remarks the Prime Minister said he believed in short speeches. I believe in them also, for a very personal reason, because I could not make a long speech if I tried. So I will follow his advice in at least one respect, but I should like to mention one other matter about which I feel quite strongly, for reasons I need not go into to-night; that is, the work of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). Something occurred in these parliament buildings to-day about which I am not particularly proud. I need not say more about that, except to say that I believe it was a direct result of the sort of thing I am now going to mention. Sometimes I go to picture shows. My wife likes to go, and so do I. Sometimes I see something instructive relating to current events. The only way I ever saw the late President Roosevelt was on the screen, and occasionally I have seen other celebrities in the same way. One thing I disliked was that while the pictures of celebrities were shown they were not shown for long enough. You saw them for a minute and they were gone, though you felt that you would like to see them for a little longer and perhaps visit with them for a while, even if only on the screen. On one occasion I attended one of the theatres in High Park, where they have good family theatres. There I saw something which rather disturbed me. It was just about at the time of the by-election in Welland. I did not agree with the stand of the government in that by-election; I thought they were going the wrong way in governing this country during those strenuous days and, as I mentioned earlier in my remarks, I thought there should be ways of getting better men into the government. On this particular evening we saw on the screen a gentleman making an eloquent speech; I wish I could make one like it. His audience was a number of men working in the war plants of Hamilton. This was not a picture which just ran across the screen and vanished; it must have lasted five or six minutes, and it showed the men in the audience all wrapped up in what was being said by the speaker, who was the Minister of Labour. He said to them, "You are doing great work in this country. Your work is just as important, yes and more important, than the work of the soldier in battle." I thought to myself that if in that audience there was a father with a son overseas he should write his son to come back, to give up the $1.10 a day and get a good job in Hamilton and be really patriotic. Perhaps, however, that father's idea of patriotism would differ from that of the Minister of Labour. I do not blame the minister for going over to Hamilton and trying to build up the morale of the workmen by telling them they were wonderful boys. It might help them and would not harm anybody else; but I could not understand why that particular picture should be shown on the screen before an audience in which there must have been the wives, fathers and children of soldiers. That was all wrong, and now we see the result of that sort of thing. "As ye sow, so shall ye also reap."

I said I intended to speak for only a short time. I am only one of some sixty-six members in this party, one of whom has already spoken. I think I have said about one-sixty-fifth of what could be said in this debate. I am not greedy; I believe in leaving something for the other fellow to say, so that I will resume my seat.

Mr. ELIE O. BERTRAND (Prescott) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, at the end of hostilities, after six years of war, it is my wish that my first words in this parliament should be uttered in thankfulness to Divine Providence for having protected the armies of the allied nations and given us victory over our enemies. It now behooves every citizen and every nation to contribute to the triumph of righteousness over the forces of evil. May that be accomplished and may Christian charity bestow to the world a truly enduring peace.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate you heartily on having been selected to preside over the debates of this house. The post which you occupy honours both yourself and your compatriots. We are pleased that it should have gone to one so competent to fill it.

(Text): Mr. Speaker, it was most pleasant on Friday last to hear the speeches of the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. In his maiden speech the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) acquitted himself well, and upon his effort I congratulate him most sincerely. When he stood in his place in the house one could recognize at once the firm hand of the wing commander.

Then, the hon. member for Gaspe (Mr. Langlois), spoke well in his sea-going fashion. We could picture the Canada he served and loved when serving as a lieutenant in the R.C.N.V.R., and also the Canada he envisages for the future. We are pleased to welcome this nation-builder to our midst.

Speaking of nation-builders may I point out that, as its leader, the Liberal party has the greatest nation-builder Canada has ever had. He has helped to make Canada autonomous, a fact we are proud to acknowledge today. Among the component parts of the British commonwealth of nations he has placed Canada on a parity in all aspects of its domestic and external affairs. Under his guidance not the party in power but parliament, of its own free will, was permitted in 1939 to declare a state of war against our enemies. This is a fact which will always stand to the credit of our nation. Who among Canadians to-day has not been proud of Canada's war effort since that fateful year?

Now Canada rates as an adult nation among the countries of the world. During all this time the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has been able to keep Canada united, a task which in this country is not easy of achievement. We know the problems we have to face in our country, with its immense expanse of land, and with the different schools of thought found within its borders. But unity has been maintained by this nation-builder, our present Prime Minister.

Perhaps I would make my point stronger if I were to state that in world war I conscription had brought this nation close to civil conflict because of Quebec's stubborn opposition to that policy. At that time the rest of Canada favoured conscription.

Then, when world war II came along, despite the measure of conscription sponsored by the King government, he retained the confidence of the Canadian people at the election on June 11. Quebec had changed its mind to the extent of sending, to stand behind this man, nearly sixty supporters.

In the speech from the throne one could find many points which might be developed at this stage. However, as I do not purpose speaking at length I shall touch upon only one or two of them. I would first direct the attention of hon. members to a subject which I believe engages the attention and interest of all hon. members, namely, that having to do with the civil service. My further remarks will be directed to the matter of taxation.

Since 1918 we have had on the statute books of Canada a chapter known as the Civil Service Act. This is a statute which has received the approval of the whole of Canada's population, including that of members of the House of Commons, despite their criticism of it. At intervals it has been under review by a special committee of the house. The last report was made by a committee having as its chairman the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Fournier), who at this time holds the portfolio of Minister of Public Works.

I believe all of us will find that the work done by the several committees has been useful, first because of the publicity the committee meetings have been given in the press and, second, because of the suggestions made in those several committees to improve the working and the administration of the Civil Service Act. The publicity given the committee meetings has had the effect of making the public better acquainted with the vast amount of work done by and the difficult problems confronting the civil service commission.

All hon. members hope, as they grow older, that other days will bring new and even better ways of understanding among all concerned. At this point may I commend the wonderful work accomplished by the civil service commission since its inception, in giving to the public that type of service expected by the vast body of taxpayers.

It is because these taxpayers are at times hard to please that I should like to bring two or three points to the attention of the house. A. What preference or what is the preference which should be given in the future to our men who were in the service of His Majesty either in world war I or world war II? To my mind their status could be made much clearer than it has been made.

Looking over the Civil Service Act one would readily find that, under the provisions of section 28, those who resigned their positions to join the service of His Majesty in either war must be taken back into the service in a position at least equivalent to the one they left upon resigning to join the military service. It will be found in another section that men who had served overseas are to receive preference in respect of positions given under the Civil Service Act.

Section 30 of the regulations in the act states:

> 30. The names of persons in the service of His Majesty placed upon eligible lists under the provisions of section 28 of the Civil Service Act, shall be placed in the order of merit above all successful candidates at the examinations—

That means above civilian candidates.

> —and above persons whose names are placed upon the eligible lists under the provisions of section 54 of the Civil Service Act.

Section 54 refers to the abolition of positions in certain sections of the civil service. Consequently it means that men who have served in the services of His Majesty will have to be given preference over them. I really think this situation should be clarified in order that there may be a better understanding of the act on the part of hon. members of the House of Commons and the public generally.

B. The amended sections 20 and 32 of the Civil Service Act provide that local positions shall be filled by those possessing a knowledge of the language of the majority. That provision is easy to understand and it has been put into practice with a great deal of satisfaction in the last few years. However, nothing is said about positions at headquarters or at important branch offices or in senior positions of the service.

C. Do we know that when a department makes a requisition for personnel to the civil service commission it stipulates that a knowledge of English or French or both is required? It would appear that the civil service commission has very little responsibility in connection with these cases.

For the reasons I have just given, and many others, and for the benefit of hon. members and of those who expect to obtain positions in the civil service, I would venture to suggest that at the earliest convenient time during this session, or during next session if this is to be a short one, a special committee should be appointed to study and review the Civil Service Act and its regulations. This is a time when many changes will have to occur in order to establish a new order in the world and there should be a clear exposition before this committee of all that is to be expected from the civil service commission under the operation of the Civil Service Act and its regulations. This would be conducive to a better understanding by all concerned.

The second question I wish to deal with is just as ticklish as the one upon which I have just touched. Probably it is more so because it affects a greater number of persons. I refer to taxation. Something of taxation was said this afternoon and I should like to deal with just one phase of this matter. As was mentioned this afternoon by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken), the speech from the throne contains a paragraph which reads as follows:

> You will be asked to make financial provision for all essential services, also to meet expenditures arising out of the war, and for the purposes of reconstruction. My ministers' proposals with respect to taxation measures will be disclosed in the budget.

I am sure that all members of the house will be ready to approve the provision of all essential services, especially those having to do with the repatriation of men who are in the services. I know they will be ready to approve all measures necessary to help in establishing these men in civil life as well as for the purpose of reconstruction. I know they will be ready to approve any measures that will help agriculture and other primary industries. No doubt at this stage the most imperative duty of the government of Canada is to preserve the reputation that this country gained during the last war. However, to do this the battle will have to be fought more at home than anywhere else.

We shall have to assure our population of the rational development of our national resources. We must make sure that the wheels of industry are kept humming. We must assure fair revenues to our primary industries and, above all, we must assure our people of jobs, as has been so well said this afternoon by the leader of the C.C.F. (Mr. Coldwell). Above all else, we must provide that high standard of living and the necessary social protection that will make for a satisfied population.

All of this will require expenditures and I think we all realize that this parliament is ready to approve such expenditures. I should like to repeat what the speech from the throne states with regard to taxation:

> My ministers' proposals with respect to taxation measures will be disclosed in the budget.

As we all know, when the budget is announced it immediately becomes law. It is then rather late to make suggestions. I listened this afternoon to the remark of the leader of the opposition in answer to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). I think we all must realize that with the contribution this country has made toward the winning of the war there will be a future need for taxation. It is of no use to leave the people under the impression that taxation will be greatly reduced because to do that we would be using our influence as members of parliament to mislead the people. Our problem in the future will be much more delicate than the problem we had to face during the war. After the war our problem will not be one that can be answered by expenditures; it will be a problem that must be solved through the ability of our citizens and the use of our natural resources.

Mr. ROWE: We told them that before the election.

Mr. BERTRAND (Prescott): We made an appeal to the country on that basis and were elected.

Mr. ROWE: No, you did not; you said you would reduce them.

Mr. BERTRAND (Prescott): It is true we said that we would reduce taxation, but as the Minister of Finance told the house to-day this reduction might not be just as much as the people expected.

Mr. ROWE: In other words, he changed it right after the election.

Mr. BERTRAND (Prescott): The Minister of Finance—and this will readily answer my hon. friend—told a labour delegation that tax reductions on incomes would probably be disappointing to some. Let us be very careful about the wording: "disappointing to some." It is going to be disappointing to whoever tries to scratch his own sores and does not look at the welfare of the country at large. But in spite of this, people believe, and correctly so, that there will be some tax reductions. Among these reductions there is one—

Mr. ROWE: Be careful!

Mr. BERTRAND (Prescott): That is wise advice, and I thank my hon. friend for it. I say there is one which I claim is of capital importance. It is not so much taxation; it is to a degree exemption from taxation.

In 1942, when the budget was announced and the savings portion of income tax brought into force in this country, that very savings portion—I should like my fellow members to keep this in mind—was considered as a tax, so that exemption of $150 given to a married man for his wife, and $80 exemption on the progressive tax in respect of each child, applied equally on the savings portion as well as on the fixed tax portion. In 1943 that policy was in effect for a full year, but in 1944 announcement was made of the cancellation of the savings portion of the income tax for six months of the year. This in effect has reduced the exemptions granted for wife or children in the same proportion as the cancellation of the savings portion of the tax, so that the exemption to the married man was considerably reduced, and that of the bachelor not materially affected. May I tell hon. members at once, so that they will not wonder where I stand, that I am a married man. As I said, the position of the bachelor was not materially affected. I really believe that that was not the intention of the budget of 1944, and correspondence exchanged at that time with the Minister of Finance would lead me to think so. I hope that this situation has been under review since, and will be corrected this year.

At the present time one persistent rumour would advocate the cancellation of the normal tax in the coming budget. Because of this persistent rumour I believe it should be brought to the attention of this house, because if this were done without other corrections, it would be found that the reduction in tax would again be less to the married man and to the father of a family than to the bachelor. Again, I think the Minister of Finance would not encourage a system whereby the father of a family would be compelled to limit the number of his children who would receive college or university education because of having to pay comparatively more than his share of taxation. If that were to become law, the 7 per cent normal tax for the married man would disappear. In the case of the bachelor, 7·8 to 9 per cent would be written off. The result would be a real benefit for persons without dependents but would be unfair to taxpayers with dependents, since they would actually suffer the loss of $28 per child; consequently they would be placed in a more difficult position as compared with this other class of our population.

Of course it is very difficult to make suggestions in the matter of taxation, because in a country like ours it has so many angles. Nevertheless I would venture to suggest that the following exemptions on income taxes should be not only considered but granted in the coming budget. I am not so much concerned with the criticism that we have not reduced the Income War Tax Act to the degree that people expect, because, after all, the people do not expect a real reduction of taxation on a large scale at this time. But I believe we should give a chance to the married man. The bachelor should be granted an exemption of $750 instead of the $660 he is receiving at the present time, and this should be doubled for the married man, which would give him a tax exemption of $1,500, and for each child below eighteen years of age or who is going to college or university there should be an exemption of $400, all of these to be reduced directly from the net income of the taxpayer. These, in my opinion, would be only fair, and would go a long way to help fathers of families and married people in this country, and I venture to add, would also make our worthy Minister of Finance a far more popular minister.

Many other problems could be dealt with at this stage, but the leader of the opposition gave us an example this afternoon which I think ought to be followed by back-benchers like myself. This example given by the leader of the opposition in making a short speech was followed by the Prime Minister; also the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation was not so long—I could have listened to him a little longer—and I suppose it behooves me to follow that example of brevity.

Yes, the problems we shall have to face in this parliament, and afterwards, are many. In my opinion the leader of the opposition, forgetting that we have been at war for six years, based his criticism more on political grounds than on any others. The leader of the C.C.F. tried to popularize his party by conveying the idea that people are suffering in this country, or at least that they have suffered and will suffer in the future. I do not believe that is the proper point of view which we should adopt in the interest of the future welfare of this country. The leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Low), although he made a good impression, at least upon me, is still a provincial. In my opinion a few years or perhaps a few months of experience in this house will broaden his outlook as compared with the views he expressed in his speech this afternoon.

In this time of transition immediately following the end of the war many problems will have to be faced, but one can well say that Canada is prepared for any eventuality. For our returned men we have on our statute books about the most advanced legislation to aid their return to civil life that can be found in any country in the world. We have a Department of Reconstruction and Rehabilitation with a minister at its head who has proven his valour during the war while leading the Department of Munitions and Supply. We have at the head of the Department of Agriculture a minister as active as any minister of that department has ever been, and if there has been any prosperity to that class of our population one can well say that Jimmy Gardiner has done his bit. We have a Minister of Finance who has held out successfully against inflation, and whether the meaning of my words at this time is rightly understood by all, I suggest that the same minister who so successfully contended against inflation during the war will place this country in a position in which it will compare favourably wth any other country in the world. That is no mean compliment to pay one man and it is due to the Minister of Finance to make that statement. I have no doubt we can trust him in making Canada a prosperous country to live in now that victory has been achieved. But, above all, we have a Prime Minister who has given the best part of his life, which is not a few years, as anyone knows who is acquainted with his past record, in an effort to raise the standard of living of our people generally and to establish better relations between labour and industry. And what is more—and these are my concluding remarks—he has made of Canada an important nation of the new world.

Mr. J. O. PROBE (Regina City): In spite of the glowing account of my hon. friend opposite, who has in his dramatic manner told us that all is well within the confines of our country, I wish to record, at this stage of the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, certain observations that I know my constituents of Regina look upon as dealing in paramount fashion with the well-being of our city itself and which, while carrying special weight there, are typical of urban problems right across the Dominion of Canada, my hon. friend to the contrary notwithstanding.

These topics, to which I wish to refer sketchily, are full employment and housing. As an overseas veteran recently discharged, and with some four months' activity in the Department of Veterans Affairs attempting to settle some of our comrades' problems, I feel I can speak for that large body of younger men and women who are now looking to us to reabsorb them happily and satisfactorily in the peace-time life of our country. Nor, while I am a new member of this house, am I so naive as to feel I am going to alter very greatly the crystallized ideologies or the prejudices of the more mature and expert members.

The present government has assumed office on the pledge of full employment coupled with a rising level of social security, all placed on a free-enterprise platform. In a broadcast to our Saskatchewan citizens on the eve of election the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King) as well as the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), as I remember, emphasized the fact that in the Liberal party were to be found business abilities which, by inference at least, were not to be found in the C.C.F. or in other parties asking for a mandate from the people, and which are so necessary in this imminent transition period from war to peace.

And so on June 11 the Canadian citizens gave the Liberal party its somewhat shaky and uncertain order to go ahead and finish the job of making Canada a place fit for heroes to live. The best planning efforts of the Liberal party in the transition period are, I think, in the matter of veterans affairs, with some rather important exceptions. I wish to congratulate the government on the gratuity principle, on the plan for continuance of interrupted vocational or university education of veterans, and on the idea at least embodied in the term "reestablishment credit".

One very great defect in the gratuity system implemented by the government is that with the changes from time to time in the clothing grant for example, varying from as little as $35 to a high of $100, certain inequalities have been caused to veterans, depending upon the date of discharge. I feel that this should be amended to bring every veteran, regardless of date of discharge, up to the maximum receivable, and I further suggest that this maximum of $100 is far too low at present prices for clothing to fulfil its purpose, that of decently outfitting a person as a civilian.

Then there is one special group, those who were called out under G.O. 139 and then discharged in the early years of the war. They have been entirely excluded from the application of the clothing benefit. They, too, have served and deserve as careful consideration as the veterans who by chance, were discharged more recently. The amount per month allotted to veterans attending university or taking vocational training, as pointed out by our leader this afternoon, is definitely inadequate for the purpose intended. I wish to repeat his proposal of this afternoon in this regard. He stated at that time that the pay and allowances of the service veterans should be used as the basis for continuance of education benefits, with a minimum of $25 a week, instead of having the present scale of $60 monthly for a single veteran, with $20 additional for a wife, $12 for a child, and so on. The reestablishment credit, which had as its purpose, I presume, from its name, the reestablishment of the veteran in his civilian business or other self-supporting capacity, does not make it possible for a man who wishes to go into private business to start off without great financial debts. If it is the government's desire to foster free enterprise so-called, it seems to me that returning veterans have been definitely discriminated against in the practice of the reestablishment credit benefits, which do not come even close to the cost of setting up in the simplest business.

Then the provision of $30 monthly pension for the dual service pensioner is another inadequacy if it is desired to keep together more than the body and soul of the veteran who has served in both wars. Why not provide this man with a pension adequate to maintain his self-respect and make him feel that his country did appreciate his sacrifices. Since election day, as indeed before, the rumblings in our part of the country, of this stormy, halting transition with unfulfilled and unfulfillable promises of the once mighty political party, legislating planlessly or with the limited plans of its planning bodies, were evident to Regina constituency. Rumours of impending lay-offs in our largest single employer, Regina Industries, were current as soon as Germany had surrendered. With an election in the offing the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) assured the premier of Saskatchewan on May 14 last, that there would be no large scale lay-offs at this plant until October. But by June 18, a week after the election, a weekly schedule of discharge notices was reaching the employees, and to-day this plant, which in January, 1943, had a peak staff of fifteen hundred employees, has a skeleton crew turning out obsolete Bren gun tripods for the Chinese government.

I have been informed by Mr. Wyatt, president of the Regina Industries plant union, that the record of Regina Industries production is as creditable as that of any war plant in Canada. When our plant went into the production of six-pounders it was predicted by competent experts that Regina workers could not do the job, and yet they did it on a more favourable unit cost than even the Peterborough, Ontario, plant which had at that time some sort of record for efficiency. To all intents the efficiency of our Regina workmen has no place in the Canadian industrial economy following the reconversion period. For I have now been assured that the building which produced our quota of war materials will be henceforth used as a military ordnance repair depot, and the expensive government-owned equipment scrapped or shipped east for private factory replenishment in this area.

Some of the hon. members may recently have seen a replica of the Arromanches installation on exhibition at the Chateau Laurier or elsewhere. I saw the original when I landed on the Normandy beaches last summer, and marvelled at the ingenuity of the scientists and the engineers who had conceived the daring plan and put it into effect in that great invasion. If our Liberal friends are sincere in their desire to build a greater Canada I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that they invoke the assistance of men and women like those who built "Mulberry" in the business of rebuilding Canada. The magnitude of their task for the invasion of France did not appal them. The fact that it had never been done before was no deterrent, and as they gave no thought to the dollar costs in a war emergency I feel that we have people of their ilk who can and will build and plan as wisely in the peace-time production of Canada that we now desire to employ our workers' talents to their full.

To make Ottawa a memorial, as suggested in the speech from the throne, is a worthwhile undertaking; to make every community of Canada a living memorial to the wisdom of our statesmen is still more desirable. In the city of Regina as elsewhere, families of servicemen, as of others, are in immediate danger of being with no shelter of any kind against our Saskatchewan blizzards this coming winter. One family that I know, with five children, and the father employed in a bakery at $120 a month, was evicted in June from a rented shelter, and last week this family were still living in a tent provided by the city for them at the time of their eviction. There are other cases like that in the city of Regina. Wartime Housing is rushing to completion at its best speed some two hundred houses of substandard construction. Our city council is putting up some sixty two-room pre-fabricated shacks with no plumbing or indoor water facilities. A hundred and thirty-five civilian families had no accommodation in Regina a few weeks ago; 141 service families were registered in the city as having no winter accommodation; 411 returned families had applications in for housing, and the stream of men returning from overseas is not lessening. In spite of every effort on the part of citizens' committees of our city the army and air force quarters in Regina could not be secured for temporary easement of this situation; yet to-day's press contains a statement to the effect that these buildings, or those of them which are on private land, are to be turned over to War Assets Corporation for sale, dismantlement and removal to private individuals. And this with a western winter just around the corner!

Housing in all of Canada is a national emergency. We are well over half a million houses short of meeting Canada's present housing needs under any standard one wishes to set up. The obsolescence of buildings, coupled with a marriage rate for Canada in the past six years of over a hundred thousand yearly, creating need for dwellings in which to start their newly-wed careers, with returned men and women needing homes for the first time, with sensational building costs, with no government planning apparently to meet the emergency, with no stockpiles of suitable materials, with only insurance companies to look to for funds at high interest rates, we have the most glaring example of the inadequacy of capitalist enterprise to meet national needs.

May I say that according to the reconstruction report of this government, even in old Tory Britain in the twenty years before the war public bodies there, in a country committed to private enterprise, were building dwellings in the ratio of two to one compared with private investment companies. May I suggest to the government that it meet this problem as it claims to have met the problems of the war. I ask that the government take over as a national measure all problems connected with building. Finance the entire cost by an issue by the Bank of Canada, on a revolving fund basis, for, say, $500,000,000 yearly to be used to provide housing materials and erect the houses, for the next five years. Lend this money directly to the families in need of homes on a sliding interest scale of, say, three per cent for five years, two per cent for five years and one per cent for the balance of the amortization period of twenty or twenty-five years. Waive the requirement for down payments, which is the biggest single obstacle to building at the present time; and use the interest that has been charged the owner as an unemployment insurance fund to meet the payments as they become due if and when the home owner finds himself out of work. Turn the productive activities of our craftsmen to the making of materials on a huge national emergency basis. Put a proper price ceiling on the materials created. Encourage architects and town planning engineers to lay out homes in congenial, livable communities. Build these on a modern basis for use and for enjoyment, and you will meet an immediate need; you will eliminate most of the juvenile and adult moral delinquency which has been on the increase for the last number of years, which is caused by the unspeakable conditions in which the vast majority of Canadians now live.

If the government were to do this, the Prime Minister would have a more permanent and worth-while memorial, in the well-being of all Canadians, than the beautification of Ottawa, splendid as that idea may come to be.

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I wish to join with those who have congratulated the mover and the seconder on their outstanding speeches, outstanding not only because they were delivered with great ability but because they represented a point of view which I think reflects the temper of present Canadian public opinion. These two hon. gentlemen, new members of this house, have made a contribution of which they may be very proud. It is a happy circumstance to know that not only do they come here as representatives of two important constituencies, those of Kenora-Rainy River and Gaspe, but they come also, together with other returned men in this parliament, as representatives of those Canadians on whom has vested the primary responsibility of making Canada's contribution to this war so successful and so memorable.

We begin a new parliament, sir, a parliament that will be faced, as indeed the world will be faced, with great and challenging problems which will deeply affect the welfare of our people and all the peoples of the world. I think one should not hesitate, however, to survey the past six years through which this country and the other free nations of the world have had to pass; fantastic years, in which in order to achieve victory governments and peoples were compelled to resort to measures which otherwise would not have been even contemplated. The change from a peace to a war economy which took place during 1939 and 1940 causes those years to stand out in bold relief, and must be remembered when we come to appraise the task that now lies before us. The united nations have won the war against great odds. They won largely because for the time being they were prepared to suspend their differences and overlook even conflicting ideologies in order to achieve a common purpose. The war was won largely because there was a determination on the part of the united nations to bring about a spirit of unity and cooperation. In this country and in this parliament, in spite of our political differences, in spite of the fact that some sit to your right, Mr. Speaker, and some to your left, as we look back over these six years of war I believe that as a people and as a parliament we may be proud of the contribution Canada has made. Canada can walk down the avenues of the world with her head high, and say to all who would look, "We are not ashamed of the contribution we have made." I think it only fair to the membership of this house that we say to those who sit opposite that the contribution of the opposition, the contribution of the government and the contribution of the people of Canada is something of which in the over-all picture, despite any differences that may have existed, we may all be proud.

There is a standard for the future. This government, faced with the tremendous responsibilities which it is assuming, can make its contribution more complete if it has the understanding and cooperation of all groups in the country and in this house. During the war that cooperation in its essentials was not lacking, and I would simply echo the hope expressed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) this afternoon that in the deliberations of the future we may look forward to the same understanding and the same cooperation from hon. gentlemen opposite, so that together we may give the country the lead which I know it is prepared to accept.

In that spirit, Mr. Speaker, I have risen to discuss some problems which are of more than ordinary interest to this nation at the present time. Before doing so, however, because I believe leadership in a country does mean something; because if there is not faith in the institutions of government and in the nation's public men there is bound to result a mischievous situation, might I say that it is a matter of no ordinary significance that for the fifth time in his career the present Prime Minister of Canada is charged with the responsibility of leading the government of this nation. In the history of our country few public men have been as richly endowed with the qualities of leadership which have enabled the Prime Minister to make his contribution to the progress of Canada.

In the speech from the throne an effort is made to give to Canadians generally the feeling that we belong to no mean nation. The problems that lie ahead are not going to be resolved if there is a lack of faith in ourselves or in our country. The fact is that at the end of the war we stand as one of the important nations of the world; fourth in the production of war minerals; well up as a naval and air power, and having contributed almost a million men and women to the armed services. We have a country of which we may be proud, and it is one of our responsibilities to see that Canada emerges along the lines which her greatness warrants.

It is for this reason that in the speech from the throne the government has sought to establish in the national life certain necessary symbols—symbols which will make every boy and girl and every adult in this country proud of the fact that they belong to Canada, that they belong to this nation now more than seventy-five years old, a nation which extends from sea to sea, and has not only a heritage but a future that is undoubted and unmistaken. To that end I do not think one should overlook the decision of the government to clarify and to regularize the status of Canadian citizenship.

We should not hesitate to acknowledge our responsibility as a member of the family of nations. But at the same time we should not hesitate to recognize the contribution this country has made throughout the war, a notable contribution which has won for this nation a true certificate of nationhood. The right to be able to call ourselves citizens of Canada is one which is in keeping with our dignity, in keeping with our achievements and in keeping with our aspirations.

During the war the government has been faced with the responsibility of directing the war effort of Canada. While the war was in progress it sought to anticipate some of the problems that would face us in the period of reconversion, and in the longer post-war period. We were in no different position from that of other countries. All one has to do is to read the newspapers and the reviews to see that the problems now facing us are the problems which are facing governments in other parts of the world. The problems facing us at this time are problems which are facing other governments with different social and economic ideologies. This seems the best proof that, no matter what one's basic political and social policy may be, one does not escape the mischief of the kind of problems with which, in this day, governments have to cope.

The government's plan of social security is one which is closely related to the present situation. It was this government which brought in the scheme of old age pensions, and it was this government which only recently made a proposal to make certain extensions in the old age pensions provision.

Our family allowances scheme, accepted in this house with only one dissentient, represents a forward measure which, in terms of public investment will result in an expenditure of $250 million a year, distributed among our people, particularly to the people who need assistance. This is indeed a form of public investment which one cannot look upon as only an idle gesture, but rather as one which has a definite relationship to some of the programmes upon which hon. members who have taken part thus far in the debate have suggested we must enter.

Unemployment insurance, introduced by the present government in 1941, at a time when the nations on our side were not certain of victory, when the problems of war were extremely difficult and hazardous, has resulted in the creation of a fund of a little less than $300 million. This was not offered as a means to cure, but as a means of relieving those who found themselves unemployed. Despite what one may think as to its adequacy, it is a measure which has gained an important function in our current situation.

The whole problem of reconversion, not without its difficulties, and not without creating its surpluses of man-power here and there—and I prefer to approach the problem squarely and factually—has had a real measure of success. In the language of the Economist of only two weeks ago our reconversion plans have been stamped by those associated with that responsible publication as being among the foremost and most responsible of those of any of the united nations.

While the war was on, in many plants we tapered off gradually to meet the problems which now face us. It should be remembered that difficulties attend other countries, as well as our own; and the fact that we have now in a number of localities a surplus of labour is perhaps not all that one might desire. But in the light of the transfer from a war-time to a peace-time economy, no man in his right senses, attributing to governments all the frailties of human nature could expect that the situation would be basically at the moment otherwise. The fact is that this situation is true of other countries in the world. One has but to read the figures respecting reconversion in the Soviet Union, in Great Britain and in the United States, to realize that fact. I mention this, not to criticize their government, but to indicate the immensity and universal seriousness of the problem.

The government has not proceeded planlessly. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), in his excellent contribution to the debate to-day, spoke about the desirability of planning. Well, planning in the sense of trying to be able to create a formula which will meet every situation, may be possible; but that kind of plan, in my judgment, would compromise something in which I know the hon. member is as much interested as I am, namely, man's most treasured right to human liberty.

The government to-day must, of course, plan. Planning, in the sense of preparation, planning in the sense of spending hours of study, hours of research, hours of blue-printing and all that sort of thing, are necessary to-day. That sort of thing, sir, is going on and has been going on in this country. One has only to examine the briefs submitted by this government at the preliminary conference held a short time ago between the dominion and the provincial governments to obtain evidence of the fact. I venture to suggest that the voluminous reports which are in the nature of briefs presented by this government to the provincial governments for their consideration, have, perhaps because of their voluminous character, not yet fully impressed themselves upon the membership of the house.

Those who have studied these briefs, those who have written about them—and I am not referring to anything of a partisan nature—have referred to them as perhaps the most important and significant proposals made by any country of the united nations since the end of the war.

Those proposals, in the provisions they make for social security, and in the provision they set up for adjustment of the relationships between the dominion and the provincial governments, along with the plans to meet the objective of high employment, are significant and represent the effort of this government to prepare and to plan for the challenging period that lies ahead. It does not help the situation very much to suggest that the government has no plan. The government has plans and a large part of those plans is embodied in the dominion-provincial proposals about which I would want to say something to-night in a general way.

The government states that when it confirmed by its signature the declaration of Philadelphia, when it gave expression to the Atlantic charter, when it went to San Francisco, when it joined with the other nations in urging a programme of high employment, the government meant to do that very thing. Its whole plans are designed for that very purpose. This government is determined that it be given a chance to implement these plans. This government is determined to implement these plans.

In the first instance the government affirms that its plans represent aims in the post-war period no less conclusive than in war. It is the aims of the government through these proposals to adapt the functions of the provincial and federal governments to the most practical considerations in order to achieve a high level of employment. One is constantly faced with the suggestion that while the government has waged a war diligently, while it has worked long hours and the like, it has brought no vigour to the kind of problem and to the situation now facing us in the world and at home.

At the civil service level, a civil service of which this country has every reason to be proud, there has been a painstaking effort along this very line. At the parliamentary level, through the reconstruction committees, many of the proposals of which are embodied in the government's programme, consideration has been given to the planning of this period of reconstruction and post-war. Then at the government level—as one member of this house who has recently joined the government I can say this—the head of this government is prepared to resort to those measures that will achieve the purpose. There is an abandoning of reaction. The administration is prepared to go boldly ahead. I was never more convinced of that than I have been since I have been a member of the government.

The government believes at the moment that the bulk of employment can be provided by giving private initiative an opportunity of providing that employment. In the period of the slack it is believed that the job can best be done through a system of public investment, to be implemented at the most opportune time to put the plan into effect with the best possible results.

There are certain circumstances and certain considerations that must be borne in mind. We must give to industry—by industry I do not mean only the factory; I mean agriculture as well—every opportunity to provide outlets for the goods and services produced. Every effort must be made to see that we recover our former markets among the nations of the world. This country, dependent as she is to the extent of thirty-five per cent of her national income on what she sells to other nations of the world, is dependent more than ever upon collaboration between nations, is dependent more than ever upon a satisfactory measure of commercial relations with other countries. During the war we had an expanded war production, and this places upon all of us the responsibility of seeing that there is afforded an opportunity of an increased output, for both domestic and export purposes, with a resulting increase in personal income for all Canadians.

Because of our dependence upon the export market the government is compelled, perhaps as it never has been compelled, to seek to have the most satisfactory relations with other countries of the world. To that end it is part of the policy of this government—perhaps no part of its endeavour is as important—to make sure that it does its bit in removing from commercial intercourse with other nations those needless trade barriers that have so often in the past proven to be provocative of friction and of trouble between nations. I think we cannot overlook the fact that this government has provided, along with only one other country of the world, Mutual Aid, as we call it, and has thereby created employment at home as well as provided assistance to our allies. This government will shortly embark on a programme of extensions of credit to other countries. This will have a two-fold objective. First, it will provide work at home and, at the same time, it will fulfil our humanitarian obligations to other nations.

When the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) —I hope I am not anticipating what he may say—brings down his programme of international credits there will be a more vivid realization of what this means in providing employment. We shall then realize the number of countries in the world that have often been extolled in this house as models, and who are now asking for credit to tide them over during the difficult period of the present and the immediate future. One will be amazed, first of all, at the extent of the requests made for financial help, and, second, that we have been expected and are able to meet these requests.

The relation of this to the securing of a high level of employment is that in providing these extensions of credit in amounts that are of very large proportions we are thereby furnishing an opportunity to our people to obtain a living for themselves and for their families through the work that will thus be created. As the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) has suggested to-day, and as the leader of the C.C.F. (Mr. Coldwell) has indicated, the government must be prepared to state in bold terms what it intends to do to meet this objective of a high level of employment. These objectives are to be found in the proposals of the government which were laid before the provinces.

This dominion-provincial conference, the preparatory stage of which has been set, at which the provinces were given an opportunity of learning what the federal government had in mind, will finally be resolved at a later date. It demonstrated a remarkable measure of understanding and cooperation between the ten governments of this country. This objective of a high level of employment the government proposed to meet, first, by facilitating private initiative in the production of employment; second, by promoting bold action by the state in those fields in which the public interest calls for public enterprise in national development; third, by providing through public investment employment for our human and physical resources when international and other conditions adversely affect employment and, fourth, by providing against age and uncertain individual risks, against such hazards and disabilities as unemployment, sickness and old age.

That statement which characterizes the government's programme is a statement which upon analysis will be found to be the kind of thing that has been suggested by several hon. members to-day. There is no effort to meet the problem by clinging to old labels or to old ideals. The government is determined, with its sense of responsibility in this situation, to resort to those measures, whether through public or private investment, which will provide our people with the kind of heritage and security which we all in this house, regardless of party, know they are entitled to and toward which we must aim. So it does not help to suggest that any one group has any exclusive panacea for many of these gigantic problems. Whether or not other parties in this house are prepared to resort to measures which are said to be unorthodox, to achieve these purposes, this government in its statement of policy laid before the dominion-provincial conference a course of action which, in the language of one of the commentators, is as bold as any government in the united nations since the war has been prepared to embark upon.

Many of these problems which we face will not be solved without understanding and cooperation. They will not be solved by pitting one group against another, by creating needless suspicion or hate. The government believes that labour, which properly is looking for opportunities of income, is an important group in the community and in the nation. No man need apologize for the attitude of the Prime Minister in the whole period of his public life as to his attitude toward labour. No prime minister of this country has had a more sympathetic understanding of the right of the workers to protect themselves and to do so by means of organization. And I believe that no government has done more than the government under his direction to extend to that great body of Canadian citizens those rights which the trade union organization of this country has persisted over the years in trying to obtain, and which in its broad essentials has now obtained.

During the war the government recognized the desirability of cooperation between labour and management—between labour, management and the government in the prosecution of the common endeavour. At the beginning of the war it said to employers, "We recognize the desirability of employers entering into collective bargaining arrangements with the workers." A few years after the war began, recognizing that there were sources of friction between management and labour, in the adoption of P.C. 1003 it did something which labour leaders, including the president of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, the heads of the Canadian Congress of Labour, and other groups, recognized as having provided labour at long last, on a national basis, with a charter in which there was adequate recognition of labour's rights as well as its responsibilities. With the extension of that principle through labour-management production committees, industrial councils and the like there was reflected the determination of the government during war and peace to give industry direction and leadership whereby it hoped that labour, management and capital would be able to work along lines of common endeavour instead of at cross-purposes.

Labour has made great gains during the war. The trades union membership of 300,000 in 1939 has risen to a little over 700,000 at the end of the war. These are gains which should not frighten anybody. A strong trade union movement is a good thing for Canada, and the government believes that it can achieve for labour and, indeed, for Canada gains which are legitimately theirs. In its plan of reconversion and other post-war measures the government proposes to encourage the same cooperation between labour and management which it has sought to achieve with the help of labour itself during the war. Without this understanding there will be no solution of the kind of problems which face us in this debate and during these days.

The Minister of Supply and Reconstruction (Mr. Howe), under whose direction Canada's war production attained tremendous proportions, has instituted the principle of industrial councils. To some, the progress resulting from this endeavour may not seem as great as was anticipated. A problem remains to be faced. Perhaps more can be accomplished through the agency of conciliation and persuasion than by any other method. The satisfactory relations between employers and workers in Great Britain and in other older countries have resulted from a policy of persuasion and conciliation. In the opinion of this government the problems which fifty years ago attended labour and management in Britain, and which now face our newer country, can be dealt with in the same measure and through the same agency. In meeting this problem, as a member of this government, I say to this house, as the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) will say when he comes to speak, this government is determined to exert its utmost power to see that the gains of labour are not lost, that labour shall not be compelled to forfeit its right to bargain, to protect itself through its own organization along designated lines, and if existing legislation does not seem always to be adequate to the occasion, upon the presentation of suggestions for improvement the fullest consideration is given to them by the departments concerned. This was revealed in the statement of the Minister of Labour as to proposals laid before the provinces in the recent conference, proposals embodying changes in labour legislation which will depend upon the attitude not only of this government and of labour, but of the provinces themselves, to whom under our constitution is reserved the important field of labour legislation.

So I say, Mr. Speaker, taking the cue from the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, that you cannot have a satisfactory solution of the problems of reconversion unless there is a proper relationship between the government and labour and between management and labour. I take the cue and say that this government is determined to do everything within its power to see that these relations are satisfactory and are maintained. It wishes to guarantee to labour the right to organize; it wishes to give labour an opportunity of sitting down with government and with industry, of being informed of its problems, its purposes and its intentions. It means to make labour a partner in the great effort which now faces this country.

I say these things because they are basic in a successful handling of the tremendous problems which face us at the moment and in the months that lie immediately ahead.

The Prime Minister, with representatives of the party led by the leader of the opposition and the party of which the C.C.F. leader is the head, went to San Francisco a few months ago to make a contribution, with the other free nations of the world, to a mechanism to maintain order among the nations of the world. In a debate like this, where the government's general policies are being outlined, is it amiss to rise in one's place and say that we have reason to be proud of the part which that delegation played at San Francisco? The contribution made by the Prime Minister, the contribution made by every other member of the delegation, including the former acting leader of the Progressive Conservative party, and the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation were notable. And if that organization, the united nations charter, does not emerge with success, none of these problems that we have discussed here will succeed. For never in the history of the world were we so dependent for security at home as we are to-day upon the measure of collaboration which must persist between ourselves and other countries of the world. That is why basically in the government's post-war plans, in the government's reconversion plans, is its policy of collaboration with the other nations of the world so integral.

I would call the attention of the house particularly to the contribution made by Canada to the framework of the social and economic council, a social and economic council designed by the nations to provide on an international level for those policies which will give opportunity to the various countries to furnish high levels of employment and to make provision for social security. In the language of Mr. Evatt, no country made a greater contribution to the important work of the social and economic council than did Canada. In fact, in the present provisions of the social and economic council dealing with measures for high employment, dealing with measures for better working hours, dealing with measures for better health, nutrition and so on, Canada was responsible practically for rewriting the whole Dumbarton Oaks proposals which were presented to the San Francisco conference and now form a part of that charter which was intended by article 5 of the Atlantic charter to be given to the masses of the world. Therefore, in considering this post-war policy, in considering this policy of reconversion, one should not hesitate to mention the contribution made by Canada to the social and economic council.

My final word is this—and it is where I began. The problems of the war were met in this country by a united people. Apart from our differences in this house, the contribution of parliament itself during the war was on a high level. Let each of us dedicate himself anew to the new task that lies ahead, in the same spirit of understanding, in the same spirit of cooperation. That guaranteed, we can go on to levels that will place us first among the nations of the world.

On motion of Mr. Lalonde the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 10.17 p.m.

Tuesday, September 11, 1945.

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE—MR. COLDWELL

REFUSAL OF ACCESS TO PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS BY CITIZENS SEEKING TO INTERVIEW MEMBERS

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) rose yesterday afternoon at three o'clock to refer to a matter affecting the privileges of parliament and of himself as a member of parliament. I informed the hon. member that I would confer with the Clerk of the house and the Sergeant-at-Arms and that I would give him an answer as soon as possible. I have received the following memorandum from the Clerk of the House of Commons:

With regard to the admission of labour delegates and other persons in the parliament building yesterday, I have inquired from the R.C.M.P. and the house's protective staff and I have the honour to report as follows:

As we expected a large crowd yesterday and only had four constables on duty, I asked Commissioner Wood to send in a few men to help our protective staff. It is well known that the R.C.M.P. is assigned to parliament hill but the interior of the building is under the control of the protective staffs of the Senate and House of Commons.

About eleven o'clock a.m. Messrs. Murdock and Morrow, representing the delegates, called at my office and asked if they could hold a meeting in the railway committee room. I explained to them that if a member of the house desired to meet them in any committee room I would instruct the Sergeant-at-Arms to make the necessary preparations for the meeting to be held. They said they desired to see certain members and I directed them to the main entrance where they would be helped to see these members. They did this and Constables Groulx and Gauthier, not acting as policemen but in the capacity of guides, went with them and four other delegates, including a lady, to Mr. Coldwell's room. The men left them in Mr. Coldwell's secretary's office and returned to the main entrance. Some of the other delegates who had remained downstairs insisted on seeing the leaders of the C.C.F. party but were told that the party was in caucus, and our staff never interfered with such meetings. Two delegates asked that their names be sent in to Mr. MacInnis, which was immediately granted, and the hon. member for Vancouver East came out and saw them.

Hon. Mr. Douglas, Prime Minister of Saskatchewan, told me last night that he was not prevented from coming inside the building. When he arrived at the entrance he was asked who he was and after he had given his name he was immediately allowed to go in.

I am informed by the Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police that, according to reports he has received, none of his men stopped anybody from going inside the building.

As to the protective staff of the House of Commons, it had not been given any order by me or the Sergeant-at-Arms to keep anybody out of the building. There was some confusion when the crowd pushed in and dispersed all over the main corridor. In order to slow up this rush, the outside doors were closed, but not locked, for about half an hour.

It has been said in the press that "parliamentary police bar delegates from the house until members of parliament guaranteed their conduct inside." No such practice has ever existed in the parliament building. The reason why members have to be asked if they wan to see visitors is that they cannot be importuned when attending to their correspondence or other parliamentary duties. If they cannot be seen, the visitor may withdraw or sit in the corridor and wait until there is a sufficient number of visitors to be taken through the building by a guide.

You will realize, Mr. Speaker, that some precaution has to be taken in the parliament building, but our practice in this regard is very broad. The best evidence that no severity was shown yesterday is that apart from the three hundred delegates, six hundred and twenty-two other persons visited the building in addition to the five hundred who followed the debates from the galleries.

Arthur Beauchesne,
Clerk of the House of Commons.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I say a word, Mr. Speaker? I was not particularly inquiring into what took place within the building. I thought I made that quite clear yesterday. But I want to know by whose authority and instructions people were stopped from entering this building to see members of parliament, or were questioned prior to their entry into this building. I have no complaint regarding the protection that is given hon. members against interruption and so forth; but what I requested yesterday was an explanation of why people were prevented from entering the building. I may say that even members of the press gallery who have been in and out of this building for a long time were stopped and questioned as to their business before they entered this building yesterday morning. That is what I am interested in.

Mr. HOMUTH: That might be an idea.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand from the report which I just read that nobody was prevented from coming in but some of the visitors who presented themselves at the door were asked for identification; therefore I consider the incident closed.

Mr. REID: Then Douglas was not prevented; the statement was not true.

PRIVILEGE—MR. HEON

ARTICLE PUBLISHED IN THE NEWSPAPER "LE CANADA"

Mr. GEORGES H. HEON (Argenteuil) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I desire, subject of course to your kindness, to raise a question of privilege in accordance with paragraphs 140, 170 and 183 of Beauchesne's "Parliamentary Rules and Forms".

It has been brought to my attention, this morning, that the newspaper Le Canada published on the first page of its issue of Friday, September 7, 1945, an article entitled "First changes noticed in the Commons". The article reads in part as follows:

> The only French-speaking members who sit on the opposition side are: Mr. Georges Héon, Conservative member for Argenteuil, who has been relegated by his party to the last seat of the last row occupied by the Conservatives, in the background of the house and next to the C.C.F. members.

I regret to say, Mr. Speaker, that such a statement is untrue and that if the writer of those lines wanted to attempt an insinuation, the latter is malevolent; if he wanted to play a joke, it is in bad taste. No one but myself bears any responsibility in connection with the particular place where I sit in this house. I say that I occupy my present seat because I did request the distinguished clerk of this house to let me have it.

The leader and all the hon. members of the Progressive Conservative party having shown me every courtesy and regard since my arrival in this house, I could, if I had so desired, use my right of seniority to occupy a seat farther in front.

However, no person of intelligence and good faith should attach importance to the row where the seat of a member of this house may be. All of us are here in the same capacity.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I ask the hon. member to resume his seat. I think I have been generous enough toward the hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Héon). A question must always be quite brief and to the point. I permitted him to give explanations; he did so and I believe that is sufficient.

Mr. HEON: Mr. Speaker, will you permit me to ask the writer of the aforesaid article —I have not the honour to know him—to be so kind as to correct the impression he gave regarding me, because it is unfair.

Mr. SPEAKER: I repeat that this does not concern the House of Commons.

Mr. HEON: Very well, I shall soon take up the matter again.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PROCEDURE IN QUESTIONS ON THE ORDERS OF THE DAY

Mr. SPEAKER: I would like to draw the attention of hon. members to paragraph 297, page 121 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition.

A certain number of oral questions are permitted in practice by members, without notice, before the orders of the day are called; but these are merely allowed by courtesy in connection with the business of the house or with very urgent and important matters of public concern. They are always brief, no debate being permitted, and the replies are as concise as possible. The minister interrogated may reply at once or may direct that the usual notice be given (B. 315). Such questions are governed by the same rules of order as questions of which notice has been given. (M. 245, n.4.)

Hon. members will notice that the rules say that questions are allowed by courtesy in connection with the business of the house, or with very urgent and important matters of public concern. I would like to call for the cooperation of every member and ask them not to put oral questions when they are not very urgent. It would be preferable for the dispatch of business that questions be placed on the order paper.

READING OF SPEECHES

Mr. SPEAKER: Before the orders of the day are called I wish to draw the attention of hon. members to a practice in debate which is contrary to the rules of the house. I refer to the reading of speeches. Standing order No. 41 provides for decorum in debate. I would refer hon. members to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, page 102, paragraphs 238 and 239, which states:

Besides the prohibition contained in this standing order, it has been sanctioned by usage both in England and in Canada, that a member, while speaking must not (a) read from a written previously prepared speech.

This rule was adopted in 1927, but as long ago as April 19, 1886, a resolution was adopted by the house which I should like to read. It was as follows:

That the growing practice in the Canadian House of Commons of delivering speeches of great length, having the character of carefully and elaborately prepared written essays, and indulging in voluminous and often irrelevant extracts, is destructive of legitimate and pertinent debate upon public questions, is a waste of valuable time, unreasonably lengthens the sessions of parliament, threatens by increased bulk and cost to lead to the abolition of the official report of the debates, encourages a discursive and diffuse, rather than an incisive and concise style of public speaking, is a marked contrast to the practice in regard to debate that prevails in the British House of Commons, and tends to repel the public from a careful and intelligent consideration of the proceedings of parliament.

No doubt it is very comforting that the written word should be before a speaker while he is addressing the house, more especially in the case of a new member, and there are many new members in the house. However, it is my duty to call the attention of hon. members of the house to the practice of reading speeches. I believe a reference to the rule in this formal and general manner will forestall any objections from the house or from the Chair in the coming debates.

WAR AND DEMOBILIZATION

PROVISION FOR INTERIM APPROPRIATION OF $400,000,000 FOR WAR PURPOSES, DEMOBILIZATION, PROMOTION OF TRADE AND INDUSTRY, ETC.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide that a sum not exceeding $400,000,000 be granted to His Majesty towards defraying any expenses or making any advances or loans that may be incurred or granted by or under the authority of the governor in council during the year ending the thirty-first day of March, 1946, for the purposes and subject to the terms, conditions and limitations set out in the resolution on the orders of the day to provide that sums not exceeding $1,365,000,000 be granted to His Majesty.

He said: The first item under government notices of motion relates to an interim vote for purposes of war and demobilization. Ordinarily at this stage I would move that the house go into committee of the whole on the resolution at the next sitting, but since it is necessary to have this money voted immediately, and since the subject matter has been discussed with the leaders of the other parties, with the consent of the house I am moving that the house go into committee of the whole to-day on the first resolution appearing on the order paper under government notices of motion.

I may say that His Excellency the Governor General has been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution and has been pleased to recommend it to the consideration of the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: Do I understand the minister desires that the house go into committee to-day?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, Mr. Speaker. This is money that will have to be voted. It is part of a larger amount which will be covered in due course by our war expenditure and demobilization bill which I propose to introduce within a day or two after the debate on the address is concluded. It is on that bill that the accounting will be given of the expenditures that have been made in the past, and the explanations of the intentions of the government with regard to expenditures during the remainder of the fiscal year will be gone into fully at that time. This is merely an interim vote designed to cover approximately two months of war expenditure, to give us some time in case there is a little delay in getting the war expenditure and demobilization measure enacted. I believe the procedure being adopted adequately protects the rights of the house in every way, together with the assurance now being given that there will be the fullest opportunity for discussion on the main bill which will be introduced following the passing of the next resolution, which I do not propose to move forward to-day.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): It seems to me that this procedure deals only with interim supply as it relates to the war expenditure and demobilization bill which the minister will move later. It does not appear to cover a proportion of the civil estimates. Is that correct?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct; it does not.

Mr. BRACKEN: What does the minister propose to do about those?

Mr. ILSLEY: After we finish with this measure, with the consent of the house I shall ask for one-twelfth of the main estimates by way of interim supply. That will come under item No. 2 on government orders; and with the consent of the house I must take up that matter before the orders of the day are called, before the special order and after we finish with this item.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Mayhew in the chair.

Mr. FRASER: This will not prevent us from debating these matters later on, will it?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BRACKEN: I wonder if the minister would not give us a more complete explanation than he has given so far. For instance, how does he arrive at this figure of $1,365,000,000? I think we should have a little information about that.

Mr. ILSLEY: The general picture is something like this. The amount covered by the war appropriation measure last year was $3,650,000,000, and the amount provided for Mutual Aid was $800,000,000, making a total of $4,450,000,000. Those are the amounts which were voted for the fiscal year 1944-45. Then for the fiscal year 1945-46 we have already voted two billion dollars. This was done at the last session.

It is estimated that an additional sum of $1,365 million will be required to meet the same class of expenditures as were covered by the votes totalling $4,450 million for the fiscal year 1944-45. There will be no Mutual Aid appropriation at this session of parliament. None will be proposed by the government. The two billions of dollars voted at the last session could be used either for ordinary war purposes or for Mutual Aid. Mutual Aid has ended, and it will not be necessary for us to have any further Mutual Aid appropriation. So that the amount of $1,365 million which is covered by the second resolution found on the order paper under government notices of motions will be for ordinary, war and demobilization purposes. I think it can be said that the expenditures are those necessarily made as a result of the war.

When the resolution and bill voting $1,365 million come before the house opportunities for debate will be given, as they have been in the past. To-day I am asking the house for only $400 million.

Mr. BRACKEN: I wish to thank the minister for the information he has given. As he has said, and as the Prime Minister explained the other day, leaders on this side of the house met him, and the procedure now being followed was generally approved. We approved the granting of interim supply on the civil estimates for one month.

Mr. ILSLEY: Correct.

Mr. BRACKEN: And the equivalent of about two months in respect of war expenditures and demobilization requirements.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BRACKEN: We did that on the understanding of the need for so doing at the present moment. We are now in the sixth month of the fiscal year. Five months' supply was granted last session, but within the next few days the government will be running out of money. Money will be required, and if we were to follow the ordinary procedure of the house we would not have it in time for immediate requirements.

Mr. ILSLEY: Correct.

Mr. BRACKEN: On those grounds I am sure all hon. members will approve the granting of an extra month's interim supply of the civil estimates. That is not before us now but I understand it will be later.

Then, with respect to the war expenditures and demobilization supply—

Mr. ILSLEY: It will be known as the War Expenditures and Demobilization Act.

Mr. BRACKEN: It is my understanding that it will replace what was known last year as the war appropriation bill.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, that is correct.

Mr. BRACKEN: The minister is asking that we grant him the right to spend what he anticipates will be required for two months.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BRACKEN: Without going through the ordinary procedure in the house.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BRACKEN: And without taking the time to examine the whole of the estimates in detail.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BRACKEN: That, too, was approved. I think, Mr. Chairman, that new members particularly should understand what we are doing. We are approving completely what has been requested by the government. In other words we are granting the government the money necessary to carry on one month's civil requirements and two month's war expenditures requirements, without our exercising our privileges of debate and discussion, because of the possibility that such debate and discussion might take too long to have the money voted soon enough. This procedure will make the money available in time.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. BRACKEN: And that was readily granted. However, all members understand clearly that there will be no limitation of debate later on, that there will be opportunity for discussion in detail, in respect of both the civil estimates and the war expenditures.

Mr. ILSLEY: Correct.

Mr. BRACKEN: That will be the position, following this procedure to-day.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; I give that assurance without equivocation.

Mr. BRACKEN: The only practical question is this: We are now in the sixth month of the fiscal year. I understand five months' requirements under these estimates were granted last session, without full examination by members of the house. Now we are granting further requirements, and six months of our fiscal year will pass without our having considered the details in respect of these expenditures. Not only has that money been voted and spent without our consideration, but some of the assets bought with it are now being sold. The practical result of this procedure is the only point with which we are immediately concerned.

We meet here late in the year. Before many more months the year will have expired and another session of parliament will be called. After granting interim supply we do not wish to be placed in the position of having to rush through the consideration of a supply bill in respect of either of these items. That is the practical position in which the official opposition finds itself. What I ask from the minister, or from the government, is a declaration that there will be no delay in the consideration of the estimates under both these measures, and in the bringing down of the budget. Under other circumstances, toward the end of the session we would be limited and cramped in our consideration of these matters. I hope the minister appreciates my point.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. First, with respect to the War Expenditures and Demobilization Act, I have already given an assurance that the bill will be introduced within a day or two, as I have put it, after the debate on the address in reply is completed. In the normal course of events it will be considered by the house over a period of weeks thereafter. Then the main estimates will be considered from time to time as occasion seems to warrant or make convenient. The house has the safeguard that the government is being granted only one month's supply. If hon. members are dissatisfied with the course the government takes in bringing forward its main estimates, it will have an opportunity of saying so at an early day, because we have to come back before that month is over for another month's supply under the main estimates. That is a safeguard which I think should be pointed out. When I make these statements I do not mean that there is any intention whatsoever of holding back the main estimates. However, it is something upon which one cannot give a definite commitment which would mean anything.

The third matter touched upon by the leader of the opposition was that of the budget. The date of its introduction will be announced as soon as it is finally decided upon; it will not be unduly delayed.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish for one moment to ask for a postponement of the proposed resolution. I have no doubt it has been considered by the Minister of Finance, with whom, because of the position in which he has been placed as a result of the election, I have great sympathy. Might I point out, however, that I believe it is the rule in British parliamentary practice for the chancellor of the exchequer to give a somewhat more detailed explanation on interim supply, now that the war is over, than was given last Friday on the introduction of the resolution. As you know, Mr. Chairman, there is an insistent demand all over the country that the government should make some declaration of policy regarding control bodies and bureaucratic expenditures which are being made over the head of parliament by certain bodies which have been set up. I will refer to this matter for only two or three minutes. For years past we have been told, by Mr. Churchill in the British House of Commons, and more or less by our own Prime Minister here, I believe, that once the war ceased these controls and other war expenditures would cease and we would regain what we, the high court of parliament, surrendered when the war broke out, namely control of expenditures. At the present time we have virtually no control. All kinds of bodies, over the head of parliament, are spending money like water. Every principle for which the British nation struggled in the old land since the seventeenth century has been surrendered to the political caucuses. Parliament itself, which came into being to ensure that taxes shall be voted only by those who have to pay them, has become the institution through which those who do not pay them impose them on others.

I want to emphasize to the committee that powers of legislation older even than the right of taxpayers to determine the national expenditure have been surrendered, and if we are to continue this sort of thing the power of parliament will be gone forever. Whole spheres of activity, involving the livelihood of every man, woman and child in this country, have been removed from the jurisdiction of the law and of parliament and reserved for the determination of tribunals, irresponsible, irremovable, governed by no control and subject to no appeal. I do object, now that the war is over, to the way that business is being conducted over the head of parliament. We are told that parliament is supreme. That is only a myth. If parliament is supreme, why has it not now control over these outside bodies and their expenditures and in the result we will only hold a post mortem as the money is spent.

I come from a very large taxpaying city. The working class have to pay a twelve per cent sales tax and the burden of taxation is very heavy upon them and upon business firms in the district. Some small business men have been put out of business altogether. As I go along the streets in the large city from which I come I get numerous complaints as to the way these war-time organizations have been carrying on. I protest against the continuation of these irksome controls. I wish to assert the supremacy of parliament over these outside bodies. A large number of them have not contributed a snap of the fingers to the winning of the war, yet they continue to spend hundreds of millions of dollars. As one goes around the country one sees how the money is being wasted. There is no retrenchment, no economy, no peace yet. We do not know even that the war is over yet. We did not know, thanks to our new status, that the war had started until ten days after it did, but the Canadians who were on board the Athenia on September 5, 1939, when it was sunk, found out that Canada was at war.

One might as well drop the theory that parliament is supreme. We are not supreme, or we would have control. What I should like to see is a reform of parliament whereby members of all groups would get together and decide what is best to be done for the taxpayers. We have put up with the present conditions in war time for long enough, dear knows.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ilsley thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 3, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for national defence and demobilization.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Mayhew in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. CHURCH: I would like to ask the Minister of Finance one question: If we pass this bill this afternoon, is the war over or is it not over? We as a people should know that. The war is over at Washington, it is over at London, it is over everywhere else, and how does it come about that we are asked to pass a bill like this? Would the minister be kind enough to answer?

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, the passing of this bill is in no way an assertion that the war is not over or that the war is over. The bill follows the precedent of the bill passed in 1919, called the Demobilization Appropriation Act, 1919. We thought it more proper to call this the War Expenditure and Demobilization Appropriation Act because many of the expenditures that have to be met out of the money to be provided under this bill—I am speaking not just of the interim bill now before the house but of the bill covering the larger sum of $1,365,000,000—will be in every sense of the word war expenditures; that is, they will be expenditures incident to the maintenance of troops overseas, occupation forces, forces in Great Britain and elsewhere, gratuities and expenditures necessarily incurred by various departments of government as a result of the war.

Mr. CHURCH: It was contended by the Canadian Bar Association that when Britain was at war Canada was at war and that when Britain was not at war Canada was not at war. Has the Minister of Finance consulted the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) on the question whether the war is over and the War Measures Act at an end and annulled? Would he consider a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada under the Supreme Court Act of the question whether this parliament has the right to pass this measure? Because we are part and parcel of the British empire, and when Britain is at war Canada is at war. I contend that we have no power to pass this legislation, and I should like to see a reference to the supreme court, which the minister can order by order in council under the Supreme Court Act on whether the War Measures Act is annulled.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is the opinion of the Minister of Justice that it is within the constitutional power of this parliament to pass this bill. Moreover, this bill, as I say, follows the precedent of the Demobilization Appropriation Act passed in June of 1919.

Mr. CHURCH: I asked the late Minister of Justice, the Hon. Mr. Lapointe, a very respected minister, before this war began whether the War Measures Act of 1914 was still in force if war came. He said, "I think it was not." I contended that it was. Will the present Minister of Justice, in view of what was said by the Canadian Bar Association, not consider submitting to the Supreme Court of Canada the question whether we have power to pass this act, as the war is over, and with it the War Measures Act; and when Britain is no longer at war Canada is no longer at war. When Britain is at war Canada is at war, but no longer.

Mr. BRACKEN: Would the Minister of Finance mind answering a few questions on details for purpose of clarification?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is all right.

Mr. BRACKEN: This bill replaces what in the last fiscal year was called the war appropriation bill?

Mr. ILSLEY: Is the leader of the opposition referring to this interim bill or to the main bill?

Mr. BRACKEN: The main bill.

Mr. ILSLEY: It does, yes.

Mr. BRACKEN: And the war appropriation bill of last year provided for a total expenditure of what amount?

Mr. ILSLEY: For the fiscal year 1944-45 it provided for an expenditure of $3,650,000,000.

Mr. BRACKEN: That was aside from Mutual Aid?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BRACKEN: Which amounted to?

Mr. ILSLEY: $800,000,000.

Mr. BRACKEN: And this bill, which you call the War Expenditure and Demobilization Appropriation Act, provides for an expenditure of $1,365,000,000, on top of the $2,000,000,000 appropriated at the last session of parliament?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. BRACKEN: That means a total for this fiscal year of $3,365,000,000?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. BRACKEN: As compared with what amount last year?

Mr. ILSLEY: $4,450,000,000. And the $3,365,000,000 includes a lot of Mutual Aid, which was provided for in the two bills.

Mr. BRACKEN: I am trying to get at a comparison of the expenditures of last year with those of this year.

Mr. ILSLEY: The estimates, the total estimates, last year were $4,450,000,000.

Mr. BRACKEN: And the total this year?

Mr. ILSLEY: $3,365,000,000. Those are estimates.

Mr. BRACKEN: And you are asking now for $400,000,000, to cover two months' requirements, and that is on top of the five months' appropriations already voted?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is roughly so. The $2,000,000,000 was not exactly for five months, but it was substantially that.

INTERIM SUPPLY BILL

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Motion agreed to and the the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Mayhew in the chair.

Mr. ILSLEY moved:

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $29,769,000.11, being one-twelfth of the amount of each of the several items to be voted, as set forth in the estimates for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1946, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, be granted to His Majesty, on account, for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1946.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

INTERIM SUPPLY

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Mayhew in the chair.

Mr. ILSLEY: I move:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1946, the sum of $29,769,000.11 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ilsley thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 4, for granting tc His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1946.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Mayhew in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. BRACKEN: What was the total of the estimates for this fiscal year?

Mr. ILSLEY: It was tabled at the beginning. It is about a billion or eleven hundred million; I cannot remember exactly.

Mr. BRACKEN: Will the minister explain how he arrives at this figure of $29,769,000.11? One twelfth of a billion would be more than that.

Mr. ILSLEY: In the billion figure are a number of statutory items which do not have to be voted. This figure of $29 million is one-twelfth of the items that have to be voted. If the leader of the opposition will look at the main estimates he will find that after many of the items there appears the letter "S", which means that they are statutory and do not have to be voted.

Mr. BRACKEN: You do not recall the total of the main estimates?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, but I can get it in a minute.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is it not $702,000,000?

Mr. GRAYDON: The total estimates this year are $1,022,000,000.

Mr. ILSLEY: I accept that. That is what I thought it was.

Mr. BRACKEN: More than half of the estimates are statutory and do not have to go through the ordinary process of being voted.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is the way it works out.

Mr. ADAMSON: Now that we are passing interim supply it would be advantageous to the house to know when we may expect the main estimates to come up for debate. When shall we have a full dress debate on the pressing question of taxation in this country. When does the minister expect to bring down the budget?

Mr. ILSLEY: Those are two entirely different matters. The main estimates are one thing and the budget is another. A few minutes ago I told the house that the estimates which are now before us will be brought forward for discussion as opportunity affords and convenience warrants. I pointed out to the leader of the opposition that the house has this safeguard against any undue delay, namely, that the government must come back before very long for more money. As regards the budget, I also covered that point. I said that the date of presentation would be announced as soon as possible and that it would not be unduly delayed.

Mr. SENN: Will further estimates be brought down in the form of supplementaries?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; there will be supplementary estimates.

Mr. SENN: Is there one-twelfth of those supplementaries in this appropriation?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; there is not.

Mr. COCKRAM: I suggest that the estimates produced last session be presented to us in this house so that we may know what we are talking about.

Mr. ILSLEY: They were laid on the table last Friday or Thursday.

WAR AND DEMOBILIZATION

PROVISION FOR APPROPRIATION OF $1,365,000,000 FOR WAR PURPOSES, DEMOBILIZATION, PROMOTION OF TRADE AND INDUSTRY, ETC.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide, inter alia,

1. That sums not exceeding $1,365,000,000 be granted to His Majesty towards defraying any expenses or making any advances or loans that may be incurred or granted by or under the authority of the governor in council during the year ending March 31, 1946, for—

(a) the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada;

(b) the conduct of naval, military and air operations in or beyond Canada;

(c) the expeditious demobilization of the Canadian armed forces;

(d) promoting the continuance of trade, industry and business communications, whether by means of insurance or indemnity against war risk or in any other manner whatsoever; and

(e) the carrying out of any measure deemed necessary or advisable by the governor in council in consequence of the war.

2. That the governor in council be empowered to raise by way of loan under the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, such sum or sums of money, not exceeding in the whole the sum of $1,365,000,000 as may be required for the purpose of defraying such expenses or making such advances or loans, the principal and interest of any such loan to be a charge upon and payable out of the consolidated revenue fund.

3. That the governor in council be empowered to reexpend, advance or loan moneys that may be received by way of refund or repayment of advances, loans or expenditure under the War Appropriation Acts of 1939 (second session), 1940, 1941, 1942, 1943, 1944 and 1945.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Mr. GRAYDON: If my understanding is correct, this motion should not be agreed to now. We should like to have the privilege, and to reserve the right, to debate if necessary, while the Speaker is in the chair, various matters relating to the war appropriation bill. If this motion were carried it would deprive us of that privilege.

Mr. ILSLEY: No; it is for consideration at the next sitting.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This just brings it to the orders of the day.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is only notice.

Motion agreed to.

PRISONERS OF WAR

ELIGIBILITY OF RELEASED HONG KONG PRISONERS FOR PACIFIC STAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence. An announcement reputed to be from National Defence headquarters as quoted in yesterday's papers states what seems to be a rather harsh decision, namely, that released Hong Kong prisoners of war are not eligible for the Pacific star. Would the minister tell the house why these released prisoners, who were the first Canadians to serve in the Pacific theatre and who have suffered so much in their service, should be denied this right?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence): I thank my hon. friend for bringing the matter up. When I saw the announcement it seemed to me unusual that our gallant lads who fought at Hong Kong should not be eligible for this particular star. On making inquiries I find that the regulations which govern the issue of this star, as well as a number of other stars, do not permit their being so included. On being advised of that I asked that the whole situation be reviewed.

As my hon. friend will realize, the regulations governing the award of this star, as well as the Burma star, the Africa star, and one or two others, are uniform for all countries of the commonwealth, and liberated prisoners of war at Hong Kong, British, Australian, and other commonwealth services, if there are any, are likewise not eligible under the regulations as they stand. But I think we can safely say that these regulations will be amended.

Mr. ADAMSON: May I ask a supplementary question? Would the minister consider having a special decoration struck for the Hong Kong expeditionary force?

Mr. ABBOTT: I will give it consideration. It seems to me as one who served in the last war that we only had two service ribbons, or possibly three. We are accumulating quite a few now. In any event I am glad to have the suggestion.

Mr. COLDWELL: Will the minister permit a supplementary question on something I mentioned yesterday? Will these men be eligible for additional pay and allowances that were to be granted to men who volunteered to fight in the Pacific war?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not in a position to answer that question now. I will take the matter up and give my hon. friend an answer to-morrow.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think that is more important than decorations.

Mr. BRACKEN: I want to thank the minister for his suggestion that the matter will be reconsidered.

Mr. ABBOTT: The leader of the opposition realizes that it is not a matter that lies solely within the discretion of the Canadian government. I think perhaps the Canadian government might take action if nothing is done by the others.

Mr. BRACKEN: I am led to understand the Canadian government is a very important government and probably would have quite an influence.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: It is now.

DAYLIGHT SAVING

REVERSION TO STANDARD TIME

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): In view of the wide objection to the continuance of daylight saving, I would like to ask the Secretary of State what consideration the government has given to the transfer from daylight saving to standard time, and what decision has been arrived at?

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Secretary of State): I thank the leader of the opposition for kindly giving me notice of his question, to which I would reply by saying that not only has the government given consideration to this matter but it is proposed to revert from daylight saving to standard time at a date shortly to be announced. The hon. leader of the opposition will understand that in the United States the matter is being considered. There is on our part a great desire to synchronize our railway time-tables with theirs to avoid unnecessary difficulty; but having in mind that situation and the convenience of our public generally I hope to be in a position within a very short time to make an announcement as to the date of the transfer.

CADET CORPS

REQUEST FOR TRANSFER OF TECHNICAL EQUIPMENT FOR TRAINING PURPOSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. E. LENNARD (Wentworth): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Munitions and Supply. Will the government consider turning over to the Sea Cadet corps, Army Cadet corps and Air Force Cadet corps of Canada such technical equipment as is necessary for their training before it is released to War Assets Corporation?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Wentworth was kind enough to give me notice of the question; however, I really think the question is directed to the wrong minister. The Sea Cadet corps is the ward of the Department of Naval Affairs; the Army Cadet corps of the Department of National Defence, and the Air Force Cadet corps of the Department of National Defence for Air. The equipment owned by these departments is at the disposal of the respective ministers unless they are declared surplus to the requirements of the department. The only case wherein this might arise is with regard to some equipment that does not originate within the department concerned. In that instance we shall be glad to make the arrangements suggested.

Mr. LENNARD: May I direct the question to the Minister of National Defence for his consideration?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): Yes. That matter has actually received consideration, I think. I do not know just what equipment the hon. member has in mind, but a good deal of the necessary equipment used by the Sea Cadet corps is made available by the Department of Naval Services.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Monday, September 10, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. M. Benidickson for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Bracken, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. MAURICE LALONDE (Labelle) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, following the example given by those who spoke in this debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I promise to confine myself to a few very brief remarks. First, Mr. Speaker, I wish to tender you my congratulations, which you deserve because we are all sure that, with your deep understanding of men and things, with your parliamentary experience, it will be easy for you to preserve the traditions of dignity and impartiality which the House of Commons has known under your predecessors. The honour which has been conferred on you, is reflected on your compatriots and on the province which you represent. I am sure that Canada as a whole, and more especially the province of Quebec, is grateful to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and to the house for having selected you as Speaker.

May I also compliment the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. While newcomers in this house, our two fellow-members have shown a self-assurance and a judgment which do them honour and bode well for their political career which I hope will be long and fruitful both for themselves and for the electors who have made such a happy choice in sending them to this house as the representatives of the fine constituencies of Kenora-Rainy River and Gaspe. Incidentally, I also congratulate our colleague from Gaspe on having won his election, thereby adding one more constituency to those held by the Liberal party.

On June 11 last, the Canadian people gave a clear, unequivocal and definite verdict whereby the hon. members of this house were given a clear-cut mandate. That victory of the Liberal party led by the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King, was won in this country through the prestige of its leader and also because of the quality of the policies he advocates. Congratulations must be directed to our political leader for the manner in which he conducted that election which put the Liberal party again in power. It is mainly because of his administration of the last ten years that the Right Hon. the Prime Minister was able to achieve that victory. His administration, especially since we entered war alongside the United Nations, has placed our country, from an international as well as a national standpoint in the rank it deserves. His attendance, and that of the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) at the San Francisco conference, the presence of Canadian delegates at the Bretton Woods conference, and other events in the international field, have put our country in a position such that we can to-day claim that it is one of the great powers of the world and that it can, because of the sacrifices of its children, claim the privileges of an autonomous and free nation among the free countries of the world.

The San Francisco conference, especially, has commanded the attention of the Canadian people because the delegates who represented us there accomplished splendid work. By way of digression, may I be permitted to thank, in behalf of myself and my electors, the Right Hon. the Prime Minister of Canada and his distinguished colleague from the province of Quebec, the honourable Minister of Justice, for having caused the French language to be recognized as official in the discussions of the San Francisco conference. One thing which must also be emphasized is the stand they took at that time when they defended vigorously and successfully the rights of minor nations. Small nations, Mr. Speaker, are not unlike small men. They are sometimes overwhelmed by the physical stature of those who surround them. Thanks to the intervention of Canada's representatives at the San Francisco conference, the preponderant voices of small nations have been recognized and today our country and others of equal rank are empowered to claim their rights in such conferences.

The administration of the Prime Minister, in sending ambassadors to certain countries of the world, has done something which had the direct consequence of making felt in the whole world the influence and the genius of Canada. On this account, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister and his government deserve commendation.

In some quarters the present government is charged with not giving our country all the attention it deserves in the field of international emancipation. Mr. Speaker, Canada is gradually being emancipated thanks to our government's policy, although, as far as I can see, the Quebec nationalist publications have refrained from congratulating those who are courageously bringing about the change; true, these men do not seek the limelight, but they work with an effectiveness which remains unparalleled by any government since the days of confederation.

Mr. Speaker, in the national sphere, as is indicated in the throne speech, our government has promoted peace and order, it has profoundly stimulated our national life, which achievement deserves recognition. Indeed, recent events may have surprised some people, and in order to be understood by my English-speaking colleagues, may I say this to them:

(Text): Certain sections of the Canadian electorate were quite surprised at the way the province of Quebec voted in the federal election on June 11 last. Many of our compatriots in the western provinces, and I may add in the central and maritime provinces as well, really felt that we would embrace extreme nationalism. This was the argument used against us on the hustings and in the newspapers of our opponents throughout the whole dominion. Such extremists as Reverend Mr. Shields even invoked the spectre of Roman domination by Quebec over the rest of Canada. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, the whole province of Quebec remained faithful to its traditions of order and peace. It voted for the Liberal party because this party, more than any other, offered what I might call the ideal of social and moral security, by applying merely the formula of common sense. In spite of what our good friends opposite may think, the province of Quebec has remained the fortress of political traditions because in those traditions, strengthened by the teachings of the past, are to be found the elements of political economy and social stability. We did not pay heed to calls of integral Toryism, which we believed inspired by doubtful political aims. We discarded the spectre of socialism of the C.C.F. party, whose theories cannot be adapted to the demands of our scholastic doctrines—and I say that in all sincerity to my hon. friends opposite. We remained firmly set in the Canadian federation. We understood the true and only vocation of the French-Canadian people who obeyed the act of Providence, understood and realized that the future of this country is always directly dependent upon the maintenance of the confederation link under the protection of a revived constitution. And all those who believed that we wanted political revolution in order to foster the shameful ambitions of separatism did not understand and have not understood the real and true mentality of my compatriots from Quebec.

We never asked for arbitrary privileges. We are convinced that no progress is possible for Canada without the sincere cooperation of all the racial elements which make up the Canadian nation. National salvation cannot be attained by imposing excessive and humiliating formulae or by taking arrogant and rigid attitudes. Brutal realism teaches us that our problems can always be solved if we tackle them with a broad understanding of the legitimate aspirations of the sections concerned.

Exclusivism and fanaticism have never produced progressive measures either for the oppressed minorities or for the majorities abusing their rights or their strength. A sincere mutual understanding is the source of all honourable agreements. The unjust demands of a majority, and the violent denunciations of a noisy minority, cannot create the right atmosphere necessary to the acceptance of the mutual agreements required for the progress of the nation. Peace is engendered by mutual sacrifices freely accepted. This is what my compatriots understood when once more they endorsed the King-St. Laurent government. I am convinced that they will not be deceived.

(Translation): Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago, an extremely important event took place in Ottawa. I refer to the federal-provincial conference attended by the premiers of all the provinces of the dominion. The foundations were set for a revision of the confederation pact and subjects of discussion were chosen for the next few months.

I do not intend to take up too much of your time, but I am convinced that a serious study of the preliminary discussions will convince us that the various parties are agreed on the necessity of amending the British North America Act. I am not a sponsor of centralization and I am ready to put up an energetic fight against any useless centralization; however, all constitutional measures, as well as all positive human legislation remain, to my mind, open to evolution and progress. Indeed, by stubbornly refusing to amend the British North America Act for reasons of petty politics would constitute a negation of all progress.

It has become imperative that our constitutional instrument be amended and revised to conform to present needs. It behooves us to open our eyes and forget for a moment, if I may be allowed to say so, those people who are concerned with their exclusive interests and inspired by petty political considerations alone, to apply our minds to promoting the welfare of the community. Such a progressive object will ever remain unobtainable in our country if we rely on a constitutional pact which is obsolete and has become inadequate to solve the problems which face us to-day.

Some of our opponents claim that the fact of amending the constitutional act would constitute an infringement of racial and religious rights. Members of the Bloc Populaire are present in this house and I would say to them that the real defenders of constitution in parliament were never the Quebec nationalists but rather the representatives of the government presently in power who have succeeded in safeguarding the rights of my race and religion in the province of Quebec.

Arguments to the effect that our province has been denied the constitutional privileges it enjoys have been too often expounded in this house and outside of it. I trust that, under the wise guidance of the present federal government, if an amendment to our constitution be enacted, the interests of minorities and dissident groups will be fully safeguarded.

Mr. Speaker, now that the war is ended, we must turn our attention to the economic and social reconstruction of our country. Tremendous sums have been spent to eradicate evil and to bring truth out of chaos. I do not regret the tragic lessons of history or the tragic teachings of the war which has just ended, but I am convinced that the events of recent years have opened widely the eyes of some of the extremists of my province and that they shall accept henceforth the brutal reality of the responsibilities which lie upon the shoulders of a self-respecting nation.

(Text): The awful nightmare of war has disappeared. We are entering an era of peaceful reconstruction. Our mandate strictly compels us to forget our political differences in order to think only of Canada's interests. I do not doubt that every hon. member shares my view in this matter. We therefore turn our eyes toward the horizon of peace. The task is immense and difficult. To direct Canada toward its final destiny in a world that is still labouring under wounds left by the war and to maintain it in its proper rank among the union of free nations will be the noble and magnificent work of this Canadian parliament, and all the members of the house.

We will set our whole heart and all our strength upon this task, Mr. Speaker, during the years to come. We will work without respite in order that all our compatriots, from the highest rank to the humblest labourer, can assert, when we appear before the tribunal of public opinion, "This man has deserved well of his country".

Mr. G. R. PEARKES (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I trust it will not be considered presumption on the part of one who has been in this house for so short a time to rise thus early in the debate on the speech from the throne; but I do so because of my intense interest in the welfare of those old comrades of mine who served in this war and in the first world war—an interest which I believe is shared by all hon. members.

I know that you will realize that a new member standing on his feet for the first time in the House of Commons is under considerable strain. I remember the great men who have sat in these seats before me for many years, and I hope that their wisdom, their courage and their ability will nerve me to do the task which I see before me, to-day and in the months to come.

I represent, sir, the most westerly of all constituencies, that of Nanaimo, on the southern portion of Vancouver island. It is a paradise, but I would not like anybody to feel that it is by any means an old man's home, because there are great industries in that constituency, and great natural resources to be developed which will give employment for our returning service men.

Amongst those industries I would like to refer for a moment to the logging industry. We have a climate which combines bright sunshine and a good deal of moisture; this enables trees to grow to immense height and great girth. That logging industry has been an essential industry during these war years, and will be during the years of reconstruction. It is on the very threshhold of great and new developments, such as the production of plywoods and plastics and the utilization of the various waste products of the forest. Conditions in the camps are infinitely better than they were a few years ago, and they offer to returning men a clean, wholesome and out-of-door life which I am sure will be attractive to a great many of our soldiers, sailors and airmen. New machinery has been introduced. The industry needs outside help, because the men connected with it have been struggling during these war years. The actual loggers, the employees, the members of the I.W.A., have adhered most rigidly during all these years to their non-strike pledge. The operational branches of the industry have not always been able to select the best timber from their point of view for cutting, but have answered nobly to the request of the government to turn out every foot of lumber that they possibly could. The companies and the loggers themselves have paid large amounts into the dominion treasury by virtue of their income taxes and excess profit returns. Might I suggest that, in order to sustain the yield, the government might see fit to encourage that industry and to help in some measure to remove or lessen the danger of the great bugbear of the logging industry, which is the forest fire. If we can have a sustained yield we can give employment to many returned men.

Another industry I should like to mention is that of our commercial and sporting fisheries. The harvest of our ocean consists of many varieties of fish—salmon, cod, halibut, tuna, pilchards; even the dogfish, for the sake of its liver; the oyster; also the seaweed—all opening up grand opportunities for returning men to follow that particular kind of work. Never before have the fishermen of British Columbia had such fine floating equipment as they have to-day. Science has come to the help of the fisherman by giving him means of locating shoals of fish, of improving the system of transporting to the markets the fish which have been caught, and of presenting them in better condition than ever before.

These fishermen do not congregate and live in the big cities; they prefer to have their families scattered among a number of small towns throughout Vancouver island. But while their floating equipment is better now than ever before, they need protection during the winter storms for that floating equipment. Before the war that industry was largely in the hands of the Japanese, and the Japanese drove many of our white fishermen off our Canadian waters. The money they made they sent back to a foreign land. To-day our white fishermen have captured that trade and are spending their money in Canada. Never again must Japanese be allowed to capture the fishing industry of British Columbia.

I have not time this afternoon to go into any great detail regarding the mining industry and the agriculture of British Columbia. I would like to say one word about the great number of people who cater to the visitors who come to our island. They are in all kinds of little private enterprises, such as the corner grocery store, the wayside garage, the hotel, the tourist camp. Those people have been struggling during this war because, due to restrictions on gasoline and difficulties of transportation, the number of visitors has not been as great as in pre-war days. The younger men from those families have in the main joined the armed services and gone overseas. Their parents have shown commendable courage in keeping homes together during these years and in struggling to earn their livelihood. Their great hopes are that their sons and daughters will soon return from the duties they have undertaken in the defence of their country, and that the burden of taxation will be relieved so as to enable them to establish gainful business for those sons and daughters when they return.

When V-E Day was declared in Europe it was announced that the Canadian army would be required to provide an occupational force for Germany, also a Far Eastern Force for war against Japan, and that surplus personnel would be returned to their homes as soon as they could be spared, it being recognized that some would have to remain on in essential positions. The men who volunteered for the Far Eastern Force and for the occupational army were in the main younger men who had not seen quite so much service, had not been subjected to the toils and brunt of battle quite so much as those who had gone overseas either with the 1st or 2nd Canadian division in 1939 and 1940.

It was announced that the surplus which very largely consisted of those men who had borne the brunt of battle for the longest time, would be returned upon a point system, and the points were announced as being two points for every month of service in Canada, three points for every month of service in a theatre of war, and a bonus if a man was married. It was generally believed that the policy of first-in, first-out, would be followed as closely as it was practical for the authorities to adhere to that policy. Everybody realized that it was not possible to adhere rigidly to the first-in, first-out policy but that exceptions would have to be made of some key personnel who would have to be retained overseas, as well as releasing some to industry and other walks of life, of men for higher education, special training and so forth. But the country believed, and the constituents of Nanaimo believed, that so far as possible, the policy would be adhered to of returning first those men who had served the longest so that they might have the first opportunity of becoming reestablished and fitting themselves into civilian life.

Gradually that policy has been whittled down, and I have prepared a list of exceptions which have been made which I should like to give to the house because I think it will show to hon. members that that policy has been departed from far more than the people of this country ever expected it would be.

This is the list of exceptions. First of all, all men who were on compassionate leave on V-E day, provided they were on compassionate leave on V-J day, would be granted their discharge. This and the following exceptions all apply to the army in Canada. So far as the army overseas was concerned we were told that the men were to be brought back on a point-score system, and as an example of how they would be brought back, the official pamphlet gave these figures:

If 20,000 were to be sent back during one of the early months of demobilization, 5,000 would have a point-score of between 225 and 250, 5,000 between 200 and 225, and 10,000 between 175 and 200. I want hon. members to notice the points which an overseas man was required to have in order to expect early demobilization.

To come back to the list, those men of the army in Canada who were on compassionate leave on V-E day, provided they were on compassionate leave on V-J day, may be discharged. The same thing applies to those who were on compassionate farm leave, and to men who desired to go to college or university provided they had a written acceptance from the university officials. They also may be discharged. Men on account of what may be considered their age or low pulhem profile, even though that pulhem profile is not so low as to render them physically unfit, and for whom no employment could be found in the army, may be discharged. Any man who on March 31 of this year had a point-score of 130 may be discharged if he is in Canada. Any man who is returned wounded, any repatriated prisoner of war; any man who served during the war of 1914-18; any man who has reached the age of forty-two; any man, no matter how short a time he has served in the army in Canada, provided he held a job at the time of his enlistment, no matter for how short a time, if only for one day, may be discharged if he has a score of 105 points. If he has not 105 points, he may receive long-term leave so that he may, I presume, get thoroughly reestablished in that job before a man with a higher point-score comes back from overseas. Any lad who had not reached his nineteenth birthday; young men, who I suggest might well benefit by a few months in the Canadian army where they could relieve a long-term service man; any man who is still retained at the district depot and has not been passed on to the training camp established at Vernon; any man who can claim to be going to employment of national importance—any man who is illiterate; any man who is unable to speak English or French sufficiently to receive training—all these may be discharged. This Mr. Speaker, is throwing the gates wide open. A soldier may go up to the sergeant-major, and if he cannot speak French, all he has to do is to shrug his shoulders and say, "Me no speak English" and he is out—out to go and seek a job before the long-service men come back from overseas.

[Mr. Pearkes.]

Mr. ABBOTT: I have never heard of any such regulation, but perhaps my hon. friend has better information.

Mr. PEARKES: Any man who is considered by his commanding officer as untrainable because he may be considered unreliable, and any man can pose as being unreliable; any man who is indifferent to service; in other words, any man who does not want to be a soldier, any man who will not respond to discipline—these are the men that you are letting out to go and seek jobs which the men who have been bearing the brunt of this war cannot come back and seek.

I realize that shipping is a difficulty and they cannot come back all at once. But why is any man who is serving in Canada now able to go out and take the jobs which are now available and which are growing fewer and fewer as the weeks and months go by?

It is for these reasons that I charge that the government is demobilizing our service forces to the detriment of the men who have fought the longest. Thirty or forty years ago Mr. Rudyard Kipling wrote a poem which I quote in part:

> A man o' four-an'-twenty that 'asn't learned of a trade—
> Beside "Reserve" agin' his name—'e'd better never been made.

These men who are overseas went over four or five years ago at the age of nineteen, twenty or twenty-one. They have reached their twenty-fourth birthday and they will find it increasingly difficult to find jobs in which they may learn a trade. Perhaps it is because of that that last week it was announced in the papers that there was to be a continuing army in Canada, a continuing army because of the uncertain condition in the world, because we could not foresee what dangers might arise. Nobody will take exception to that. Service in that continuing army was however restricted to those men who are in the active army or who have recently left the active army and would like to come back again. But there was one condition set, namely, that they must be prepared to serve wherever Canada required them to serve—a reasonable condition. At the same time we are continuing another or second continuing army, a continuing army of fine young men of good physique who have had months of training and who are not eligible for the first continuing army because they are not prepared to go and serve wherever Canada wants them to serve should an emergency arise.

I have not the up-to-date figures, but the last figures which were published showed that there were some 16,000 of these N.R.M.A. soldiers still in Canada who were fit for the infantry and some twelve or fourteen thousand who were fit for the other arms of the service. Some of these men will desire to get out of the army, but there are a great many of them who like the security of the Canadian army in Canada. They are provided with three meals a day. They have comfortable lodgings in hutments. They have hot and cold water laid on. They have officers who will endeavour to make their training as interesting as possible. They are provided with free picture shows and all types of recreation. Only two weeks ago a sports meeting was held in Victoria where men of this type were brought in at the country's expense from all over British Columbia in order that they might show their physical prowess.

These men like to serve in the Canadian army provided they are not ordered to go wherever Canada may require them. You may say that if an emergency comes they will then be ordered to go. If an emergency comes it may come quickly and we shall want trained men. But an army is not made up purely and solely of trained men. It is made up of trained units which have been welded together; and I tell you, speaking as an old soldier, that the veteran and the shirker will not work in harness together during that period of training in Canada. Therefore efficiency is lost, and all the time additional taxation is required in order to maintain this second continuing army.

The Secretary of State yesterday referred in glowing terms to the contributions Canada had made to this war. We were all proud to hear of that effort. But, sir, I claim that there is one blot on that escutcheon and it is now time to remove it. We should no longer have this bifocal army through which one class of men see it as their duty to go wherever their country calls them while the other class see their duty as lying only in so far as the shores of Canada restrict their activities.

I said that we have in Nanaimo opportunities for absorbing the men who come back from overseas in the reconstruction and in the development of our industries and national resources. I said that the people of my constituency urgently require their boys back from overseas. They desire relief from taxation. It is because, as I have shown to-day, the demobilization as now being carried out is working to the serious disadvantage of our men overseas that I support the amendment which has been put forward by our leader, and I believe that every returned man in this house, irrespective of the party to which he belongs, should support that amendment for that reason. Furthermore, I believe that the maintenance, the continuation of this futile two-army system should cease immediately.

Mr. F. S. ZAPLITNY (Dauphin): Several hon. members who have spoken to-day have taken this opportunity to refer to their constituencies. I hope, Mr. Speaker, you will not mind if I take some little time to refer to the constituency which I have the honour to represent here. The constituency of Dauphin has in tradition and in its geographical position certain distinctions. First of all I should like to bring to the attention of hon. members, as many of them will remember, the fact that a former Speaker of this house who occupied the chair that is now occupied by His hon. the Speaker was a member who represented the constituency of Dauphin. I refer, of course, to the Hon. J. L. Bowman, who has now retired from active politics.

I also wish to say that we have, geographically speaking, some distinguished neighbours. To the south of the constituency of Dauphin we have the constituency of Neepawa which is represented here by the leader of the opposition. Immediately to the west of that we have the constituency of Marquette, which is represented by a more recent Speaker of the house, the present Minister of Mines and Resources. Therefore, as I said, in both geographical position and in tradition the constituency that I represent has some distinction, and I hope that in the months to come I may be able to carry out my responsibilities in such a way that it will continue to have some distinction. Before leaving that I should like to say that on the western side of the constituency of Dauphin lies the province of Saskatchewan, which in more ways than one is pioneering the west.

I should also like to make some reference to the people who live in the constituency of Dauphin. I make no apology for speaking about a single constituency because to speak of Dauphin is to speak of Canada. In that constituency we have a pretty fair cross-section of the population of this country. It is made up of many different racial origins, people who have settled in this country and have adopted this Canada as theirs. They come from many different parts of the world; and I am proud to say, Mr. Speaker, that in my experience I have found that these people of different racial origins and religion get along very well together. They have cooperated in both their political and economic life, and during the course of the war that has just ended have worked together to make their contribution to the war effort. I think it is only fair to the people of my constituency to say here on my first opportunity that a great deal of credit is due and should be given to the people who have done their bit in the war effort, in the various Red Cross drives, in victory loan campaigns and all through the course of the war.

While I am on that subject I should like to commend the government for two things which appear in the speech from the throne, and the forecasts that are made there. I refer to the provision that is to be made for a distinct Canadian nationality and a Canadian flag. It is all the more a pleasure to commend the government with regard to these two items since hon. members will recollect that the members of the party with whom I have the pleasure to be associated have advocated these things for a number of years. I hope that when this legislation passes it will be a little more than just a statute on paper. I hope that when we have established a Canadian nationality, something with which I believe all hon. members agree, and when we have adopted a Canadian flag, we shall go farther and give a certain amount of spirit to the fact. I hope that in the future anyone who has adopted Canadian citizenship either by birth or naturalization will be regarded by his compatriots as a full-fledged Canadian with all the rights, privileges and responsibilities that are inherent in that position.

I hope that the government will take into consideration in the near future the question of an immigration policy. As I said a few moments ago, the people in the districts surrounding Dauphin—and I am sure this is general throughout western Canada—are of mixed racial origin. They have made their contribution to the war effort; they have done what Canadians have been expected to do; they are now to be given the status of full-fledged Canadians. I hope that in the setting of immigration quotas the government will take into consideration the fact that there are people in European countries of the same racial origin as these people to whom I refer who are desirous of entering Canada and who would like to take up Canadian citizenship. It is not that I want to plead the case of any special group, although I think hon. members will agree with me that one part of central Europe which has been devastated more than any other part is that area generally known as the Ukraine. It is not at the present time an independent country, but it is on the map and hon. members can find where it is. That part of Europe has been devastated far more than many other places because when the wars between the German armies and the Soviet armies were going on it was the battlefield of Europe for a period of several years. The war went on first towards the east, and then back to the west; it seesawed in that particular area. The people there have found themselves without homes, in many cases without any resources whatsoever; and many of them have found themselves in other parts of Europe, some by their own choice and some by force of circumstances. They are desirous of entering this country. I hope that the government will take that into consideration and will make it possible for these people to enter Canada and add their contribution to the future life of the country. I want to repeat that I am not pleading the case of any one particular class or nationality in this house; but as I said before, this is a case where hon. members will agree that a certain section of Europe has been devastated beyond all comparison with any other place, and some consideration should be given to that fact.

I hope, as I intimated earlier, that our Canadian nationality and our Canadian flag will be both in spirit as well as in fact a symbol of equal treatment of all.

I should like to refer now to the general picture in this country. In order to discuss it in an understandable way I think it will be necessary to divide it into three parts, namely, the years between 1930 and 1939; the years from 1940 to 1945, and then from 1945 into the future. From 1930 to 1939, as hon. members will remember, we had in this Dominion what was termed a depression; we had a time of economic stress in which there were thousands, perhaps hundreds of thousands of young men and women without employment, a time in which there was general distress and poverty, and yet no one was able to say that it was due to the fact that we had either a crop failure or some other misfortune which made it impossible to produce wealth. It is true that there were sporadic cases of drought here and there, but that was not the reason why the people in this country were poor. I think it will be generally recognized that the reason why the people were suffering during those ten years approximately was that there was something wrong with the economic system we were trying to operate. We found that out in 1940. Unfortunately, it took a war to introduce some new ideas into the economy of Canada. From 1940 to 1945 we discovered that there were many things that we could do which we thought previously could not be done in this Dominion. We found that it was possible to expand the economy of this country to a far greater extent than any one had ever dreamed before, and to do it through the funds of the public, in other words, through public enterprise. Up to the time of 1940 the governments which were then in power, first one and then the other, had been pretty well agreed upon the principle of private enterprise and had never attempted to try anything else. The economic and, I might say, the military necessity that faced us from 1940 on made the government move in the direction of public enterprise, to a certain extent, and we discovered over a period of years that in spite of the fact that we were sending food, ammunition and other commodities overseas in large quantities, much of it being destroyed, still what was left in this country was sufficient to clothe, feed and shelter the Canadian people better than ever before.

This gives us food for thought. Surely, people say, if at a time when you are exporting for destruction about half the total production of this country you can still keep the people in better physical condition than before, there must be something wrong with the way we were doing things from 1930 to 1939; and I would commend that idea to hon. members in all parts of this house. Regardless of what our immediate political views may be, I think we can agree that from now on we shall have to be prepared to accept a greater degree of public enterprise than ever before. Something of this I believe was intimated in the speech last evening by the Secretary of State (Mr. Martin), who admitted that it would be necessary to use a certain amount of public enterprise. Naturally we do not think the government are prepared to go far enough, but I think at least they should be prepared to agree to this: If private enterprise, which has been given a good opportunity over a long period of years, both in time of peace and in time of war, from now on fails to provide the food, clothing and shelter necessary for the people of this country, we must be prepared to throw aside our political prejudices, go into public enterprise and produce these things, so that it will not be necessary for labour delegations to come and lay their case before members of the house in times like these.

As a new member of this house I was impressed with the tremendous problem that was posed to us by hon. gentlemen opposite yesterday in connection with reconversion. I want to say quite frankly and sincerely that we realize the difficulties facing the government, and we do not take the position that these difficulties confront the government only. We as a group and as individual members are willing to do what we can to facilitate the solution of these problems. As I say, I was impressed with the magnitude of what someone called the gigantic problem of reconversion. It is a gigantic problem; but let us make sure when we attempt to solve it that we apply the proper principles, because if we are not careful we can waste a great deal of time and effort and probably get very poor results. The problem of reconversion must be solved by following a certain principle. It must be either the principle of production for use or the principle of production for profit. We in this group, and probably some hon. members who are not in this group, believe that production for profit is not enough, that in future the principle must be established of production for use. I make that statement because during the course of this war we have found it possible, by applying the labour, the skills and the equipment to be found in this country, to the natural resources of the country, to produce wealth beyond anything we ever dreamed of before. In other words, we have discovered the immense productive possibilities of this dominion. We have found that if we need something badly enough, such as materials for war, we can go to work and get them. Necessity has driven us to realize how rich we are, to put it plainly. In future we shall have to decide whether we are to continue the system we followed up to 1940, which was the private enterprise system of production for profit, or whether from now on we are to turn to the principle of production for use.

There is a tremendous difference between those principles, and I believe that if we adopted the principle of production for use we would have no difficulty whatever in the post-war years in providing homes, food and clothing for all the people of Canada. I do not think anyone will argue with that statement. We are able to do that. We have the man-power; we have the natural wealth, and we have the skills and equipment necessary. If, on the other hand, we capitulate to the propaganda now being loosed upon us to go back to private enterprise, then I am afraid we shall be up against the same difficulties that confronted us before. The government may think it strange for a new member to be giving them so much advice all at once, but in all sincerity I say that if the government capitulates to the pressure now being exerted upon it by private interests to go back to private enterprise in its entirety, we are going to reach a time when we shall be faced with other problems just as gigantic as that which has been posed to us in this house. I believe in future this government, and all governments, will have to decide whether they are to serve the needs of the people, having regard to the fact that we have so much wealth, so much skill and so much man-power that we can provide good living for all, or whether they are to cater to special interests because it may be good politics to do so. I am sure that on the benches opposite there must be men with sufficiently broad vision to realize that if we follow the course of capitulating to special privilege, some time in the future we are bound to be confronted with difficulties that are perhaps not unforeseeable.

During the course of this war men and women who have been working in war and other allied industries have been paid better and have enjoyed a material standard of living higher than ever before. They have had the knowledge that a very great effort was being made to produce goods for war. In other words, they are beginning to realize the wealth of this country, and no longer will they take no for an answer. We saw what happened here yesterday when the labour delegation arrived. That shows the attitude the working people are going to take. It will be a militant attitude. They will ask the government why we are not able to produce the goods we need in peace time when we were able to produce them in such large quantities and so easily during war time; and the government will have to be prepared to answer that question. So I think it would be far more reasonable for the government to take such steps as will make it unnecessary for labour to go on strike, to stage demonstrations or to send delegates to the capital. To me that would seem the reasonable thing to do.

I should like to refer now for a little time to the speech from the throne. Perhaps the thing that stands out more than anything else is that which is missing; that is, the fact that no fundamental change is being proposed. I am reminded of the boy in uniform who, having stood in line in front of the paymaster's office for some time, turned and said to his comrades, "Never have so many waited so long for so little." I think that is the case here. We expected a great deal from the government in its first pronouncement in peace time. During the years of the war, when things looked a great deal darker than they have looked in recent years, we were told that we were building a new social order. In fact, during the election campaign, if I may refer to it, we saw great placards prominently displayed on billboards carrying the slogan, "Building a new social order." That slogan was endorsed by candidates supporting the party opposite, and I am sure there must have been thousands and perhaps hundreds of thousands of people who voted for the Liberal party in the belief that they were building a new social order. After carefully reading the speech from the throne—and I have read it several times, as I am sure other hon. members have—I have failed to discover wherein they are proposing anything that even looks like a new social order. There are some commendable things in the speech from the throne, but all I am able to find in this connection is some nibbling attempt to try to do something to tide us over the time of reconversion, so that we can the more quickly go back to the good old private enterprise system and the right to be robbed. If we are to build a new social order there will have to be more imagination on the part of the government and more willingness to put into practice that which the people have been promised. The government has been elected on a programme of full employment and social security for all the people, and during the campaign government supporters also made a great many other very fine promises. With all due respect to hon. members opposite, I say now that unless they are able to produce the goods—and very soon—the people who voted for them are going to ask some most embarrassing questions.

I should like now to refer particularly to a few items which I believe to be of special interest to many hon. members. First of all, we know the government has made some pronouncement with respect to increasing old age pensions and an effort to provide for those who are not of pensionable age at the present time, namely those from sixty-five to sixty-nine years of age.

In proposing a pension of $30 a month with no means test for those seventy years of age, and over it is to be commended. But while making that proposal the government has at the same time proposed a means test for those in the age group from sixty-five to sixty-nine years because, as I remember it, it has been stated that payments will be made to these people only if they are in need. In other words, under the government's proposal there will be a means test for those from sixty-five to sixty-nine years.

I say that, having thrown away the wormy apple, there is no use in introducing a new worm to the other apple. If we are to have old age pensions without a means test, then let us have them without a means test, and let us have them between the ages of sixty and sixty-five years on a decent scale. Let us not go only half-way, because that would not fool anyone and would be only a sort of window-dressing people would easily see through. I see no reason at the present time why people cannot ask, and with justification, for a pension at the age of sixty years and on a decent scale. It is not only a matter of justice, but also one of good common sense.

We are going to find in the next few years, what is beginning to appear already on the horizon, a condition of unemployment. People who are very close to the age of seventy years are now engaged in work. Between the ages of sixty-five and seventy years there is a large group of people who are now doing active work. It would seem to me only fair and sensible to make provision that they receive pensions at the age of sixty years, so that they might retire on a decent pension, live during the rest of their lives in peace, and let young people who are more able step into their places to carry on in the work of the country. I suggest it would be wise for the government to reconsider its position in respect of old age pensions, and to make a real job of it while they are at it.

I should like also to draw the attention of the government to the situation in connection with hog production. Yesterday an hon. member to my left asked a question of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) respecting the production of hogs. In my view the answer he received was satisfactory neither to himself nor to anyone else interested in the matter, because it did not touch upon the policy concerning which we wanted information. Hon. members realize that it is not a question of a meat shortage in Canada, but rather one of hog production. As I understand it, we have at the present time a system of meat rationing, for which there must be some reason. If there were not a good reason for it we would not have it. Canada has made certain commitments, in that it has undertaken to make shipments overseas. If we are to live up to those commitments we must have hog production.

I have before me a letter from the Dauphin Co-operative Live Stock Producers, over the signature of Mr. W. T. Volkers, the president of that organization. In this communication he sets out information respecting hog shipments at that particular point, and what he has said I believe illustrates what is happening across Canada. At this shipping point in the months from January to June, 1944, a total of 4,295 hogs were shipped. During the same months in 1945 a total of only 2,494 hogs were shipped, or a drop of 1,801 hogs at one shipping point. When one sees such a drastic drop in shipments of hogs from one point, a condition which is quite general throughout western Canada, he is led to believe that there must be some reason for it. I suggest the Minister of Agriculture would do well to make some statement to the house in the near future, giving us some idea of what he proposes to do to keep hog production at the level it should be.

While on the subject of agriculture I would also draw the attention of the minister to something which I am sure, is in the minds of many hon. members in whose constituencies there has been hail damage. In certain sections of western Canada we have suffered serious damage from hail, and we have expected and hoped that these people who have suffered from hail loss would be included in some measure under the provisions of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. I understand, from a communication received some time ago from the minister that, in all probability, the government will declare this an emergency year, so that people suffereing hail damage will be eligible, if they meet the other requirements, for prairie farm assistance.

I should hope that the minister would be in a position in the near future to make an announcement in the house in respect of these questions, because many people are writing and asking questions. Naturally they are anxious to get all the assistance they can get.

I also make a suggestion to the government respecting industry in western Canada. We have found in Dauphin—and I am sure this is a condition found generally in other towns throughout western Canada—that the town to a great extent must depend upon the farming community around it. In other words, many of those towns in western Canada, some of which are large, have nothing but the support of the farming community for the maintenance of their business.

In the last four years, because of income greater than that received on the farms in former years business has increased considerably. But if it should happen that the farm incomes in those surrounding areas are drastically cut, many of those towns will find themselves in a bad position. Not only the business sections, but the labourers now employed in jobs in those towns would be seriously affected.

I should think it advisable for the government to take into consideration the establishment of industries in western Canada, in order to make some sort of back-log or cushion in the event of a depression, so that the labourers and small business men in those towns would have something in addition to the surrounding farming areas to lean upon. In that connection there are new discoveries in the field of chemurgy, in the making of synthetic substances, including plastics and the like, which might well be investigated by the government, and the possibilities of which could be thoroughly canvassed.

There is another reason why increased industry in the west would be desirable. We are finding that in the large cities of eastern Canada a great deal of congestion has taken place. Tremendous numbers of people have moved from western Canada to the east to take part in war jobs. In many instances those people are asked to make up their minds as to whether they will stay in the east permanently or return to the west. If there is nothing to which they can return, naturally they will stay here.

For the welfare of the remainder of the country I believe it would be well to extend industry in the west, so that we can keep a certain portion of our population who would normally drift to the east. I do not believe it is a good thing for the country to have all the labouring people concentrated in one particular area. On the contrary it would be much better to have the industrial area stretched fairly and evenly between east and west.

I should like also to make reference to another matter upon which I hope the government will take action. I refer to the disposal of the airports which have been established across Canada. In the neighbourhood of Dauphin we have two first-class airports which are now closed down. The people of that town and district are anxious to know what is going to happen to the buildings, and to the equipment and other materials left there. They would like to know if the government has any plans for the use of the buildings and equipment, and if they are to be put to some useful purpose. We are a little bit apprehensive, because of what we have read in the newspapers about the destruction of war material, that much of this equipment, which has been paid for by the people, and paid for very heavily, is to be destroyed or disposed of in some way which will bring no value to the people concerned. We therefore hope that the government will make some use of these airports in order that they shall be of some value to the community. As a suggestion I might say that, with establishments such as we have near Dauphin, it would be easy to provide an agricultural school, a convalescent hospital or a sanatorium. Instead of allowing these buildings to deteriorate and go to ruin it would be well to put them to some proper use.

I should like to touch on one more point, and then I shall live up to the example which has been given to us here of making speeches brief. The point which I think is so important that I shall not leave it out is that of federal aid to education. I believe hon. members from all the provinces will have experienced the fact that the education which has been handled so far by the provinces has had a pretty tough time financially for a long period of years. I know that in my own province of Manitoba, the schools, especially the rural schools, have been running on a deficit for years and years. We are finding that while the people are demanding, and rightly so, the extension of educational facilities, while the government itself is expecting and exacting higher standards from the young people in the way of education, no financial provision is being made to extend educational opportunities, especially in the rural areas. I suggest that there should be a federal grant to the provinces for the purposes of education, without interfering with administration, which could be left to the provinces, that would help to ease the financial condition in which many school districts find themselves. There is another reason for that which I would like to bring forward for your consideration. Many people are conscious that Canada has now reached what may be called the adult stage. We have definitely become a nation, but to become a nation in its full right there should be, I believe, a little more national responsibility for the education of the children of this country. I do not think money could be better spent than by providing for the children across Canada greater opportunities, especially vocational and technical schools, which to-day are badly needed.

I should also like to see federal grants made in order that students of ability who have not the financial resources would get the opportunity to go to the higher schools and universities. Let me interject a personal note: I have taught school for twelve years and therefore know this at first hand. I have seen a great many young men and women with a tremendous amount of talent and ability who, having reached a certain stage of their education, because they had not the financial resources with which to go ahead, stayed at home, and all that ability and talent were lost. I think that is the greatest loss which can be suffered, because the talents and abilities of our young people are among our greatest national resources. I suggest that a little more money spent on a national scale to assist these young people to go through the universities or to enter the vocations for which they are specially suited would pay big dividends in the future.

With that I conclude my remarks, except to say in closing that I hope it will be possible for us who are members of this house, regardless of what political group we happen to belong to at the present time, to cooperate in the future helping to solve the problems which are before us. I invite all hon. members to join with us in what I consider to be the greatest political objective of all, the building of a better Canada.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I believe that all parties and groups should aid recovery and all of us should be ready to act together as far as we can. I have no quarrel or complaint with any faction or party in the house.

I welcome to this chamber the leader of our party (Mr. Bracken), a gentleman who is very much respected all over Canada for his sincerity of purpose, charity and friendliness, and for his fine life of public effort for the benefit of the country.

I believe that the House of Commons should be as far as possible a gentlemen's club. We come from all parts of the country and unfortunately we cannot all have the same views; but I have found that the average member of the House of Commons is a sincere man, as he must be if he is to represent the people of such a great country as Canada.

We on this side of the house are fortunate in representing a party which has pursued a most consistent policy since the days of Sir John A Macdonald as to our policy regarding our relations with the mother country and other matters affecting the empire and the dominions.

I think it must be admitted that one of the mistakes made by the fathers of confederation was the creation of provincial legislatures. There should not have been any provincial legislatures at all; it may be said that they were created for political and not for economic purposes. Great Britain does not have them; New Zealand or Australia did not have them until recently. What has resulted from them, Mr. Speaker, is the system of over-government and over-taxation which we have in this country.

I have always contended in this house, on my several substantive motions debated here, that one of our main and unsolved problems is that of parliamentary, constitutional, cabinet and law reform. These matters came up in the mother of parliament fifteen or twenty years ago, and as a result many improvements were made for the benefit of the working classes of the country.

I need not apologize for being a Progressive Conservative. I have always had the support of labour in the city from which I come. I was born in that city; I was head of the city in taking over the street railway from private ownership and for single fares, for starting and finishing the harbour improvements, for giving a better deal to the average taxpayer, for the system of municipal buses, for the removal of all the light, power and transportation franchises in our city and three adjacent counties into a civic system at cost, and for other public municipal services.

I was glad that our leader referred yesterday to two or three matters in which I have been much interested. Coming from a soldier city, I am greatly concerned about bringing back home those boys who have been away for five or six years. All hon. members are just as sincere as I am, and I believe they are doing what they can, but I fear this will become one of our greatest scandals. We have not risen to the situation on land, sea and air as we should have done, and many of our soldiers who are overseas should have been brought back long ago. I made some suggestions to the government as long ago as July 17, and recommended that they should utilize the merchant marine—which was a forgotten agency in this house for two or three years—as well as grain carriers, aircraft and other means of transport. I referred to this on July 17, the day after the war closed, and made some suggestions, which were reported in the Toronto Globe. I am glad to see that some improvement has been made by use of aircraft and grain carriers.

I do not like to see ships of British registry carrying back far more United States than Canadian soldiers. I have never raised this question in the house before because I believe it is of the utmost importance that we should maintain the most friendly relations with the great country to the south, which has done so much for us and Great Britain in so many ways and which upholds the same principles of freedom. I believe it is the general opinion of the people of this country that the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) has worked very hard and done a very good job in many ways, but a few days after we declared war I called the attention of the government to the fact that they should be able to get some ships from Washington, and they did appoint an agency in Washington to get ships for Canada and Great Britain and charter parties. Why not some more to bring our troops home? They did get many old ships as well as some others. The United States presented fifty old destroyers to Great Britain, but in return Britain gave them a ninety-nine year lease of valuable naval bases all the way from Newfoundland to British Guiana. When the government in war time can do a thing like that, why cannot they do something similar in peace time—get these United States ships to bring the boys back home?

Only on Sunday last I was talking to a woman in Toronto who lost her husband in the last war. Her son had been killed and was buried in France in this war. The chaplain who conducted the service was Mr. Appleyard of the Royal Regiment of Canada. This woman lives in my constituency. She asks now for the return of her last son. She has a son-in-law in hospital over there yet. There is hardly a street in my constituency where people are not expecting their boys home from overseas. It is a workingman's district, peopled mainly by those who have come from the mother country, and it has always been a strong soldier district. Soldiers went forth from my district in the days of the Fenian raid, in the South African war, and in the two great wars in our generation. In almost every street in my constituency there is some home in mourning for a soldier who did not come back. This poor woman who lost her boy in France has a son-in-law over there, badly wounded in hospital. I know, of course, that similar cases might be cited all over the country, but I would urge the government and the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie), who, I know, is working very hard for the soldiers, to see if something further can not be done to speed the return of our boys from overseas, so that they will not have to spend a sixth Christmas over there. I believe and I hope that something further can be done. I referred to this matter on July 17, in a letter to the press, although I said that it was a most complex matter, urging that nothing be left undone to speed the return of our soldiers and sailors and airmen to Canada.

The first in, first out principle is a good one, but it is not working out too well. We should be using United States ships and the liners of our other allies to help bring our own boys back home. Why have these French ships been given back to the French? We could have used them for a short time to bring our boys back home, but I understand that three of them have been returned to France. Why not release them for demobilization purposes? You, Mr. Speaker, represent a large district, the constituency of St. Mary, and I am sure that you would have been glad to see many of these ships being used to bring our Canadian boys back home.

There is another matter. We have a large number of new members in this house. Many of them have served in the municipalities, which is the best school of public service to begin in, right in the district where you live and people know all about you. I believe that is a good principle, and I have found that many of those who have given municipal service have more knowledge of public affairs than some others.

There are certain reforms which we should have. I wish to say something about the Gallup poll, which seems in elections to be an agency of the government. I do not know whether the hon. member for Vancouver Centre has a vote in the Gallup poll. I doubt, Mr. Speaker, whether you have a vote in the Gallup poll, or the able and popular Clerk of the House, who has contributed so much to the efficiency of parliament since I was first elected twenty-four years ago. I do not know whether the Clerk of the House has a vote in the Gallup poll, or any member of the opposition or the C.C.F. It is all Gallup, and no poll, and most of the galloping is done for the government, which seems to have a great influence with the managers of the poll. I once asked for a list of the voters in the Gallup poll, and I was told I could not get one but that I could be introduced to Doctor Gallup the next time I was in New York. I replied that I had not been there recently, that the only people I knew there on the gallop were members of the Giants and the New York Americans, and people like that who do a lot of galloping of another kind. I do not know whether you have ever seen any voters in the Gallup poll, Mr. Speaker, in your riding of St. Mary?

The Gallup poll even quoted the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Mitchell) as wanting to dump national selective service down the sewers. It would not hurt a bit if it were dumped down the sewers. They also had a poll on daylight saving, a most irksome control—let there be light, and there was light. The light shineth in darkness but the darkness comprehendeth it not.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CHURCH: I shall continue for a few minutes this evening the remarks I was making when the house took recess at six o'clock, and first of all I wish to contgratulate certain members on this side of the house who do not happen to be in the chamber at the moment. The hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) I knew very well in the last war. I remember the day he came home to our city. I was at the head of the city at that time and we gave him quite a reception. I would refer also to his colleague the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Merritt), another Victoria Cross holder, who comes of an old family very much respected in our city.

May I also congratulate our leader on the speech he delivered yesterday and particularly on what he said with regard to housing and meat rationing. The Progressive Conservative party have had a sound doctrine about housing. I remember when I first brought the matter before the house in the session of 1935, when our then leader, now Lord Bennett, appointed a committee on housing and reconstruction on my resolution to study the state of affairs in connection with a building and reconstruction programme. We had a reconstruction and housing policy which provided for releasing labour materials and the necessary priorities in connection with the scheme and a committee was appointed to investigate all aspects of the problem, urban, suburban and rural. We went into the matter and made a report to the high court of parliament, but that report was not adopted because an election was brought on in the fall of 1935 and our party was defeated. The incoming government, I admit, did do something to adopt our report about the matter. I contended, as the mover of the resolution on the subject, that instead of having a large housing department assembled in Ottawa, with clerks and all sorts of employees, it would be better for the government to guarantee the banks up to twenty-five per cent.

As a result of the policy that was put into force $85 million was spent on housing and there was hardly a dollar lost. I do not believe that one-eighth of one per cent of the money was lost. I congratulate our leader in that connection because there is no doubt that tens of thousands of houses will be needed. I have travelled extensively, particularly in the county of York, and I have seen some of the hovels in which returned soldiers are living. We sat here for months during the war and simply abrogated all our rights and privileges, handing them over to outsiders, with the result that practically no housing was constructed.

I wish to pay my tribute to the Minister of Munitions for the work he did during the war. It is true that then the war was paramount, but housing was neglected. That is a situation which cannot exist forever. There are other matters that I would refer to here, such as the question of a national fuel supply. That is something I have brought to the attention of the house before in 1922, 1923 and 1924. We are going to have cold weather very shortly We have cold weather in Canada for eight or nine months of the year and we should have a national fuel policy to meet our conditions. I proposed in 1922 a national fuel policy, that all coal which we require be mined under the British flag, whether it comes from Wales or the maritime provinces or Alberta. The government across the way adopted that policy, though rather belatedly, five years later, and nearly a million tons have been moved from the maritimes to the head of the lakes. Not enough, however, has been moved. This is likely to be a serious problem in the coming winter. I do not know how the people will get through the winter and I can only hope that it will be a mild one.

I would ask the ministers in charge of the forces to hand back all exhibition grounds to the people who own them. The various fall fairs that are held and the Canadian national exhibition will do more than anything else I know of to build up the morale of the people, important among whom are the small business men of the country. In Toronto we have the Canadian national exhibition, in which, ground, buildings and permanent exhibits, the city has an investment of $25 million and also the Royal winter fair there. A deputation came to see the government in this regard, but the government did not see fit to hand back the buildings to these people. The air force left the exhibition grounds months ago, moving to Trenton, and the navy is building a large barracks behind Fleet street, while the army is using a lot of buildings as the demobilization depot. I contend that two-thirds of these buildings should be given right back to their owners, the city, at once for these two fairs. That would do more for the farmers and the city people as well as anything I can think of. In this connection I would mention Lansdowne park in this city. These exhibitions across Canada have done a great deal in the past for the morale of the people.

I am sorry the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) is not in his place to-night because I should like to discuss for a moment the question of prison reform; I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon; I see he is here. Now that the war is over I hope he will do something about prison reform and the royal commission's report. I find that the Toronto gaol has been housing returned soldiers. It was condemned years ago as being unfit for civilians, but it is housing soldiers who are convicted of breaches of military and other regulations. The Borstal system should be started at once. A committee should be appointed to visit these places. The time has come when the whole system should be reformed and overhauled.

I hope the minister will reply to the remarks of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) with regard to the riots in Halifax, and at the same time he should extend his attention to Aldershot and assure the house that the government will come across for any damage done there. There should also be a general review of these courts martial. I know something about courts martial and I suggest that there should have been publicity about them long ago. Some of the gentlemen filling the position of judge advocate have been to the front, but some have not and I believe the time has come for a general review of these whole court procedures. In our military districts the jobs of press and liaison officers should all be held by men back from overseas and not by former hockey and turf people who have never been out of the province, yet wear uniforms.

I wish to say a word by way of tribute to the transportation employees of Canada, whether they serve on land, at sea or in the air. I was talking the other day to a conductor on a train who told me he had been working 18 hours a day continuously. These employees have made a magnificent record in this war and should receive ample compensation and reward and all other allowances for a fine work well performed.

Another matter to which I would refer is that of controls. I referred to it this afternoon. I am sorry I had no time to prepare my speech, but the fact is that my remarks to-night are impromptu. We have heard a good deal about controls and what they are doing. Who are these controllers? They are mostly senior civil servants. There is no country in the world which is better served by its public servants than Canada was before and during the war. We have an admirable civil service; it is incorrupt, respected and able, and has done wonderful work for the country at very small pay. The large majority of civil servants are able men working for small salaries, but when you ask them to do something else for which they are not fitted, such as the bureaucratic control of war work and all that kind of thing, that is another matter. It puts me in mind of the game they used to play; I do not know whether they play it around the House of Commons. It was a sort of game known as "winding and unwinding". I do not know whether the ministers in the front benches ever had anything to do with that kind of game, winding and unwinding. Let me tell you about the game. It consists in making verbal lists of things and repeating them backwards. It calls for a good memory—I do not know whether I have a retentive memory—and close attention to the matter in hand.

I saw my young friend the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) come in here to-night. I welcome him over there to the midst of the elite again now that peace has come.

[Mr. Church.]

I see His Majesty's ministers over there, all pleasant looking gentlemen, each in his own department again. His Majesty's ministers have, each in his own department, to accomplish something of the kind if we are ever to be free to use our lives again as we desire, bound as we are by war regulations in an almost solid cocoon of red tape. And the ministers will have a harder task than the players of the old winding and unwinding game, for they have created armies of officials, all of whom are by now honestly persuaded that we cannot live without them, not even the C.C.F., and who are certain to make a hard fight to maintain their control over us.

These controllers or bureaucrats are sincerely convinced that they can order our lives better than the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). They can even tell the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) what he can wear and what he cannot wear. Some of these control fellows are sincerely convinced that they can order our lives and spend our money much better than we can. They think they know what is good for us and for the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) and for the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) in that brave new world from the cradle to the grave which lies ahead of us, which can only be created by hordes of officials, miles of restrictions, gallons of official ink, red and black, and armies of clerks and stenographers.

I commend this winding and unwinding game to the hon. members of this house. We now have sixty-five over here, forty-eight from Ontario. I commend this game to those who think we are sitting around here wasting our time, because that is what we have been doing very largely in six years of war. All our privileges have been handed over to Donald Gordon. It is stated in the British North America Act that parliament consists of the Goveror General, the Senate and the House of Commons. We now have an addition, the Governor General, the Senate, the House of Commons, and the House of Donald Gordon. They are going to tell you what you can do and what you cannot do. One day I saw sitting in front of one of the ministers opposite, I think the Minister of National Revenue or the Minister of Finance, when I asked who was to control beef and butter. 'Who are these gentlemen who are in charge of butter and beef? Have they ever had any training in the dairy industry or the live stock industry? Where did they start?" Well, we found that one of them was a graduate of a Canadian university who never was in any industrial calling. He should have been a police commissioner regulating theatres. I remember when Colonel Dennison, the late Judge Winchester and I were on a police commission that had something to do with the regulation and inspection of theatres. A committee of forty appeared, objecting to the scanty costumes in theatres, like the underwear which these controls allow in war time. I asked, "Who are these gentlemen in charge of butter and beef? Have they any training in competitive business like dairy or live stock?" The answer was, "No". I said to the minister, "All that they know about beef and butter is what they consume themselves."

Mr. MACKENZIE: You were elected on butter once.

Mr. CHURCH: Not me. What is the situation in private business to-day? I referred to this the other day. Business men are conscious of the heavy task that awaits them in reconversion so that Canada may recover quickly. Industry and labour in Canada have worked wonders in war, and can in peace also. Canada needs stability to speed the delivery of all classes of goods and meet market demands so as to aid peace-time economy in employment, supply civilian needs and restore as soon as possible living standards and defeat inflation and black markets. It should be, with the lessons industry learned in Canada in war, much easier to work out reconversion. All irksome controls must go and we must remove shackles from industry large and small.

Private enterprise must have a clear right of way unfettered by a small standing army of inspectors, examiners, supervisors, card-filing clerks of a worn, out-of-date system of control, most of whom contributed nothing to the winning of the war. Business must have freedom once again to succeed by free enterprise, and we should see an end of government controls by blue-prints and a horde of useless officials, many of whom have never had any training in any competitive business they seek to control. Demobilization should be speeded for these reasons.

We have recently embarked on a programme of employment. There is no such thing as full employment. There is no use in people promising things like that; it cannot be done. If you consult the health statistics of this country you will find a great many people not fit for work. The reconversion policy of the government has been a flat failure and has never been anything else since it started. I will give the government of Canada credit for one thing, namely, the establishment in the city of Ottawa of a great basic industry known as the "ambassador cure for unemployment." They started embassies all over the seven seas. We had one ambassador who went to Australia. He did not stay there very long. He then went to Newfoundland. Dear knows where he is now. He comes from Halifax. I read of his wanderings around the world. The Emperor Hadrian never travelled around the way he did. By these useless embassies we are making ourselves ridiculous as a unit in this empire. I believe the Minister of External Affairs for Australia is right. America is giving too much appeasement to Japan. The Emperor of Japan should be proceeded against as one of the worst war criminals in the world. He is responsible for all over there and the cannibalism. I remember making a speech in this house on the Pacific question in June, 1937. At that time I wanted rearmament because I felt and said and predicted the coming war between Japan and the United States. I wanted to know what we were going to do about the Pacific question. The result was that parliament reduced the estimates and nothing was done.

Now the ambassadors have been holding forth at a place called San Francisco. It was called the other day by a great man in the British House of Commons, "Sham Fiasco." That is exactly what it is. It was never intended to do anything at San Francisco. The future of the world was settled at Yalta by three men, Mr. Churchill, President Roosevelt and Mr. Stalin. Two of them were great leaders of the English speaking people. The result was that the whole situation of the world was settled there and then at Yalta. The establishing of another league will not amount to anything. Washington does not believe in it. Read the speech of President Truman; read the speeches made in congress. France was not admitted to the charmed circle of the three. Why? Because she had no military strength. I believe in the old policy that might plus right is right. It has always been so. We shall always have nations. The peace of the world depends on the United States, Britain and Russia working together in peace as they have done so admirably in this war. The more you examine the whole situation—it will be up again in the house—the more you will find that this so-called league of nations will fail. It has failed over the years.

As Lord Milner said in 1919, speaking at Oxford, it was a most strange anomaly to hear that the self-governing parts of the British empire should be joining a league, binding themselves by a formal tie to a number of foreign nations when they had heretofore been unwilling to enter similar obligations with one another. I appreciate what the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has done in connection with foreign affairs and many social matters. He has been a pioneer in connection with many of these social problems. I suggest, however, as Mr. Churchill has said, that the peace of the world in future depends on power politics and on sea power and a union with the United States, Russia and France. Power politics and Britain's command of the sea kept this world free from war from the battle of Waterloo to the outbreak of the first great war in Belgium in 1914; it gave us one hundred years of peace. Our great hope lies in the cooperation that we may achieve in peace as so well in war with our beloved allies. I named Russia and the United States, and I hope that France will be admitted to the big three as soon as her military strength is sufficient. The institution of parliament has not changed much since the day of Edmund Burke; our functions have not altered greatly.

There will be other opportunities to deal with the other matters which are before us for consideration, but let me say in closing that I hope we may some time have a union of all parties and groups in the house to work well together in order to do the best we can for the taxpayers back home in the constituencies.

Mrs. GLADYS STRUM (Qu'Appelle): At the outset, Mr. Speaker, I must express regret at your ruling this afternoon. I had prepared what has been referred to by the press as an essay, of which they said we had had several read yesterday. The result may be that I shall have three speeches, the one I had prepared, the one I am about to give and the one I shall wish to-morrow I had given.

In my first words I want to state that I appreciate more than I can say the responsibility that devolves upon me as the only representative of my sex in this house. Mine is a rural constituency which runs from the boundary of Manitoba to the city of Regina, including an urban section; and I shall keep in mind the electors of my constituency as well as the members of the armed forces, who gave me a larger total vote than they gave my combined opponents. I shall remember, too, that I am the only spokesman for my sex, but more than all this, I shall always keep in mind that I am a citizen of Canada.

Not only have we, the people of Canada, a common destiny; we have a common historical background. I refer now to chapter 2, page 66, of volume 1 of the Sirois report, which tells us clearly that following the birth of Canada as a nation, through the process of confederation—

> For twenty-five years the new nation had languished. . . . A vast and sudden transformation was wrought by the magic of wheat.

[Mr. Church.]

The wheat boom brought a flood of settlers into the west and created two new and flourishing provinces. It precipitated a new era of railway development and spurred on the industrialization of central Canada. Immense capital expenditures were necessary to equip the west and the growing urban and metropolitan areas of the east. Wheat worked a new integration of economic life and linked together the fortunes of the different regions.

On page 68 of the report the growth of population is dealt with. In a period of seventeen years—

> Between 1896 and 1913 one million people moved into the prairie provinces and the population increased from 7 to 20 per cent of the total population of the Dominion of Canada.

To quote the report, this resulted in Canada beginning to grow as a nation. As a result of the industry of her people and the ease with which the prairie soil could be brought under cultivation, vast quantities of wheat were produced and on this grain was built the great financial and industrial structure of central Canada. To quote the report briefly:

> The construction of the railways, the deepening of the canals, and the improvement of the harbours necessary to transport the increasing volume of western grain over Canadian routes stimulated economic activity in the east and gave it a large share in the moving of western products to the markets of the world. The building of towns and cities on the prairies, the equipment of the farms and the consumption demands of the population required a large quantity of manufactured goods. The protective tariff enabled Canadian manufacturers to capture the greater share of the new market, thus giving a tremendous impetus to industrialization in Ontario and Quebec, to the coal and steel industries of Nova Scotia and to the lumber industry of British Columbia.

So you see in our background Canada has been united in its economic and financial development. Our war effort, of which we are all so proud, has proved again that through the utilization of human skill, raw materials, processing plants, financial machinery and transportation Canada has almost unlimited production potentials. We have demonstrated, too, that raw materials plus the application of power and human resources add up to actual wealth. We in this house have seen proved the proposition advanced by the first elected members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, that Canada need not stagnate in a bog of unemployment, under-production and want when we have in our own country all these basic requirements for the production and distribution of goods and services in unlimited quantities. The factories of Canada need not close or slow down as long as there are in this country families still needing homes, electrical equipment, plumbing, house furnishings, food, clothing and transportation. In many areas Canada is still in the first primitive stages of development. Indeed, science and chemistry may very well remake our world if we shall but let them.

Before our farmers and workers can buy their share of goods and services, however, we must establish marketing boards, parity prices and crop insurance at reasonable levels for agriculture; and for workers, adequate labour and wage codes.

If our aged people are to establish their claim to our abundance they must have much more than $30 a month. Indeed, a floor under family income, below which no person would be allowed to fall, would be a just and reasonable national safeguard, because no modern industrial nation can afford the luxury of poverty.

It was fascinating, the day of the opening, for me as a new member to observe the pageantry and take part in the practices that have grown up around our tradition of government. I was interested to hear the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) remind us of the customs of Westminster. I submit that all of us in this house will watch with equal interest the actions of the new parliament recently elected there, as they write a new page of history, history in terms of social ownership and human advancement. We in the group I have the honour to represent look forward to the day, not far distant, when Canada will follow the example of the mother of parliaments and instal in office the Canadian counterpart of the British Labour party, the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation.

Mr. HOMUTH: That will never happen.

Mrs. STRUM: It is a good thing to make of our capital city a beautiful memorial, fitting to honour the memory of those who died that we might live. Books will be written and in song and story we shall record their valour. Deeds, not words, will be the measure of our gratitude. People yet unborn will, in some far off day, scan our old age pension schedules, our slum clearance plans, our widowed mothers' allowances, our infant mortality rates, and we shall answer at the bar of history.

We must here take full responsibility not only for our utterances in this house, but for the conditions of our homes, the level of family income in town, city and country, and the health, education and well-being of our communities.

"It is for us the living, rather, to be dedicated here" to the building of a new day in Canada and a new era of peace, brotherhood and abundance for all mankind.

Mr. DONALD M. FLEMING (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak in this chamber for the first time I join the company of former classmates. The class of 1928 at Osgoode Hall law school, Toronto, boasts two members in the government in the persons of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) and the Secretary of State (Mr. Martin). That class also boasts a colleague on this side of the house, the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Boucher), and in the press gallery, Mr. Francis Flaherty. I make the fifth and express my pleasure upon joining them in this chamber.

I come from a city which I am assured by all is, without doubt, the most popular in Canada. I can assure hon. members that the point of view I bring to the chamber and the attitude I hope to exhibit in all discussions in which I may take part is no narrow or sectional one. I come here as a coast-to-coast Canadian. While I have had occasion to criticize what seemed to be a sectional point of view in other parts of Canada, it is my promise to the house that it will be my endeavour and determination not to indicate any degree of sectionalism in any points of view to which I may give expression.

We meet, Mr. Speaker, following a great victory, a great deliverance. I say it becomes all of us, and in this I speak only as a new member, to acknowledge the debt which hon. members in this chamber, yes, and all people in Canada, owe to those who have stood between us and our enemies on the field of battle.

Democracy has come through. The benefits we enjoy we owe to others, and it is in a sense of consecration that I, for one, intend to approach my duties as a member of this chamber.

I believe it is fair to say that the hopes of the people of Canada concerning this new parliament are high hopes. As the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) reminded us, in one of his earliest utterances this session, the problems which will face parliament during the years immediately before us will perhaps be the most difficult which have confronted any parliament in the history of our land.

I believe it is correct to say that the judgment which will be applied to the actions of parliament and the policy of the government will be an exacting judgment. We have a great opportunity to make good for Canada, a great opportunity to build here in Canada a land worthy of the sacrifice of those who have stood in our place on the fighting line.

That does not mean that we have come here in any submissive attitude, or that the attitude we propose to adopt in respect of government measures is one of mere acquiescence. On the contrary, I think the attitude of all hon. members in this part of the house will be the one enunciated so clearly yesterday by our leader, namely, one of constructive criticism.

I am sorry that in what I have to say tonight I find more of criticism in respect of government policy that I had hoped would be the case in my first utterance in the House of Commons.

I think the first duty to which parliament must address itself is the recovery of the prerogatives and powers which have been yielded up to the government by the last two parliaments.

It may be that legally a state of war continues with both Germany and Japan. Hostilities actually have ceased, and with them any need for exercising the extraordinary powers the government has enjoyed during war time. There must be an end and an end at once, to government by order in council. There must be an end to bureaucracy.

It is disconcerting therefore, to say the least, to find that even on the eve of the convening of parliament the government continued to exercise its extraordinary powers. The use which has been made of the War Measures Act under these circumstances amounts, in my submission, to an abuse of those powers. In fact, what the government is doing to-day amounts to turning the War Measures Act of Canada into the political war measures act of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh. Oh!

Mr. HOMUTH: That is so and you know it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: What do you know about it?

Mr. FLEMING: On the very eve of the meeting of this parliament the government announced by order in council it had effected some amendments to the National Housing Act. With the text of those amendments I do not propose to deal this evening. They may be good or they may be bad; I do not make any comment in that respect. But I do say that the house is entitled to a clear explanation as to why amendments were so urgently required to a statute which had been in effect and on the statute books for fifteen months that they could not wait and be presented in parliament, and that they had to be dealt with at an earlier date.

Another example which surprised some of us was the government's action in connection with hauling down the union jack the day parliament met. We are told in the speech from the throne that we are to have a committee to go into the question of a design of a distinctive flag for this country. At the moment I am not discussing the question of a distinctive flag. I am saying that the action of the government in hauling down one flag and putting up another, while going through the form of saying that parliament will deal with the matter was high-handed. If they can pull down one flag and put up another, they can pull down the second flag and put up a third and so on. When is this to stop? I say it was a high-handed action, and coming as it did on the day parliament opened it amounted to a flouting of parliament.

There are some lessons which can well be drawn from experience of recent days—yes, from the election itself. Even though my leader is not Prime Minister of this country to-day as I had hoped and expected he would be, I am proud to be his follower. He fought a good fight for a worthy cause and there was nothing he said or did of which he has any cause to be ashamed. I am proud to follow him. I believe that the time will come when our good compatriots in the province of Quebec will come to know John Bracken and will appreciate his sincerity, his honesty of purpose, and will accord to him their support.

During the course of the debate we have heard some suggestions—perhaps they are more than suggestions—that the party which sits to your right, Mr. Speaker, has the unqualified support of organized labour throughout the Dominion of Canada. In the light of the facts such a suggestion creates a certain amount of amusement. In the first place we are told about the Prime Minister's profound sympathy for labour and about his profound knowledge of the problems of labour.

I suggest that it is worth remembering that when a dominion-provincial conference was called in the fall of 1943 to evolve a national labour code which would assure to labour in all parts of the country its right of collective bargaining, unfortunately that profound sympathy did not grasp the opportunity to put into effect a labour code which would apply to all industry throughout Canada. Eight provinces out of the nine asked the dominion to do it; but because one province said "no", the government, notwithstanding its alleged profound sympathy for labour, said, "We will just confine it to war industry". A great opportunity was lost. I hope a similar opportunity will present itself, but I repeat that a great opportunity was lost and an injustice done to labour. I think it is worth while recalling also what happened on parliament hill yesterday. If there are those on the other side of the house who feel secure in the support of organized labour, I suggest to them that in my humble opinion it is a good thing for them that the election is past and that they are not facing it again.

We have been told from the government side of the house about the partnership which the government entered into during war time with labour and industry. That may be the government's idea, but it certainly is not the idea of organized labour. Organized labour feels that its offer of cooperation with the government in meeting problems which could be met only by the united action of government, labour and industry in war time was not accepted by the government or used as it might have been.

There is one further observation I should like to make about something that we have read in the papers of recent date. I refer to the reported remarks of the leader of the C.C.F. group (Mr. Coldwell) in the newspapers of last week. He is reported to have intimated that the party which he leads will be the only real opposition to the government in this house. It must have been a very dull evening that required such an extraordinary pleasantry from the leader of that group in order to enliven the hours. If anyone has any doubt about the position of those of us who stand under the Progressive Conservative banner with respect to opposition to government policy and government action they will find an effective answer in the statesmanlike utterances delivered by our leader yesterday afternoon.

Political memory may be short but it is well to remember what happened in Ontario between June 4 and June 11. There are some hon. members opposite who well remember what happened between those dates. There was a shift of support by many thousands of C.C.F. voters to government candidates. In other words, there are at least a dozen members on the other side of this house who owe their seats in this chamber to C.C.F. support which swung the tide in their favour. When we are asked to consider some other group as being the real effective opposition to this government it is well to remember that those twelve seats are essential to the continuance of this government in office. We should not forget where that support came from on that occasion.

It is well also to remember some of the events of last November. It will not be forgotten that in the momentous days in this house in November last it remained for the C.C.F. group to agree sufficiently with the government in connection with meeting the needs of man-power to unite with them by passing an effective amendment which called forth an expression of appreciation on the part of the Prime Minister. I do not think there is any doubt as to where the real opposition is to be found. The answer is that the real opposition lies right here, and it will be a constructive opposition.

The decade of the thirties surely taught Canada some lessons. One lesson which we ought to have learned is that if we are to avoid great industrial and economic dislocations we must make ample preparation in advance. There is no use in waiting until these great dislocations are upon us to begin to plan measures to cope with them. I have sat in this chamber for only four days and I have followed the proceedings with no little interest. Perhaps the impressions of a newcomer to this chamber are fresh and vivid, but one impression that has been borne upon my mind is the amazing vagueness of the statements emanating from the government with reference to the whole problem of reconversion.

The leader of the opposition made some direct criticisms in his remarks yesterday, and I fully expected that we would have from the Prime Minister or other members of the government—at least one other member has spoken—some clear exposition in concrete form of the programme offered by the government to meet this great national emergency which is upon us. But instead of that we have had only vague and general statements; there has been nothing concrete.

Obviously the government has been taken unawares; obviously the government has been caught unprepared. The Secretary of State (Mr. Martin) is reported in the press as having said in Port Hope on September 3 that the government had not been in a position to foresee that the atomic bomb would have brought the war to such a speedy conclusion and that its plans for economic post-war stabilization would have been more effective had there been more time to put them into effect. Then we have the Premier of Manitoba speaking in the legislature of that province and being reported as saying on September 4:

> Premier Garson told the legislature, sitting as a committee of the whole on post-war plans, that all-important negotiations between the dominion government and the provinces were many months away from conclusion. "Instead of just now starting negotiations, we should be in a position to start work," he said.

The only suggestion I have heard from any member of the government that they have a programme for this period of reconversion was a reference to the dominion-provincial conference and the proposals there made to the governments of the provinces. That was a conference held in Ottawa in August last, and it will convene again in December. Apparently we are asked to infer that action on the part of the government must await decisions emanating from that conference. If in the view of the government action must await the conclusion of that conference, why on earth, Mr. Speaker, was that conference not called long ago? There was no reason given to the conference for the delay that has occurred in calling it together. The government of Ontario, from the time it came into office in August, 1943, begged and clamoured for a dominion-provincial conference with this very objective in mind, that the governments of all the provinces and the government of the dominion might sit down together and plan jointly so that this period of conversion might be bridged without loss of employment and without complete dislocation. That request went begging. For two years the provinces have waited, and when finally they were brought together it was on the eve of the conclusion of hostilities with Japan. If the government's plans are dependent on the conclusion of the negotiations with the provincial governments, then this government stands condemned for its long delay, a delay of at least two years, in summoning that essential conference. They should have had their plans complete long ago. They knew that the war was going to end some time and that it would be too late then to start planning. Why not at least get plans well under way beforehand, so that when the war did end, regardless of whether is was sooner or later, the plans would be ready and work could proceed?

There is no problem before this house that is more urgent than the problem of housing. It has two aspects which cannot be dissociated from one another—the emergency aspect, and the long-term approach to the problem.

In the first place it is admitted on all sides that an acute housing emergency exists, the worst of its kind in the history of the country. There never has been a time when Canada faced a housing problem nearly as acute as the present one. It is worth examining into the causes of the problem.

What are the causes? Sad to say, Mr. Speaker, some chickens are coming home to roost. The reason why this country is not better provided with skilled labour and building materials essential to the construction of homes is largely attributable to the failure of the government to apply a courageous and effective man-power policy during the war. The fact that tens of thousands of men were kept in enforced idleness or at least were removed from productive enterprise and were not being used where they were required in the country's service is directly the cause of the fact that we have this acute shortage of materials and this acute shortage of skilled labour. Lumber production was allowed to fall seriously below the figure at which it should have been maintained. Five billion feet was the production of four years ago, and that figure should and could have been maintained if an effective man-power policy had been applied by the government. Unless the discharges from active service are speeded up and men are available at once not only in the construction industry but in the primary production of the essentials of building materials it will be too late for this winter's production in the seasonal producing areas. Internal production restrictions should be removed at once, and serious consideration must be given by the government to the curtailment of our substantial export of lumber to the United States.

During all this period there has been a government agency called Wartime Housing Limited, which has been used by the government in certain ways. It was used by the government in wartime to build semi-permanent houses to house certain industrial workers and it is now being used in certain localities to build what are called permanent houses.

Of the operations of Wartime Housing Limited I say only this at the present time: If the government had given private builders the same opportunities to obtain materials and labour that Wartime Housing Limited enjoyed they could and would have done better work more quickly and at far less cost.

The methods of that government housing agency were on many occasions high-handed. We had some experience of that in Toronto. We asked them to come to the assistance of the city, where a critical problem has existed now for a long time, and when they finally consented to come in, it was on the basis of the city giving up to them its best sites. They were not satisfied with anything but the best. Their attitude was: Wartime Housing must not lose a cent. Their attitude was not: There has been a tremendous influx of workers into your city, some 75,000, and we will provide the housing that is required. No; the attitude of Wartime Housing was: We are not going to lose one cent on this proposition and we must have your best sites. Even the health by-laws of Toronto had to be suspended to enable Wartime Housing Limited to go ahead. That was their high-handed and dictatorial attitude.

With this same control-complex this government agency has prevented private builders from making their most effective contribution to meeting the need for housing.

We cannot separate the failure of the government to act courageously in this wartime housing problem from its failure to bring to the whole housing problem in Canada a sensible, comprehensive, courageous and long-term view.

This house has been told that the National Housing Act of 1944 was the government's answer to the housing problem. Let us remember in the first place that that measure is administered by the Department of Finance. Let us remember also that Wartime Housing Limited and the so-called emergency measures taken by the government in war time come under the administration of the Department of Munitions and Supply. And now we have the Department of Veterans Affairs coming into the picture and becoming involved in the housing problem. What is needed is not a few more departments involving themselves in this problem. What the situation requires is an active housing policy from this government. We can keep on adding to the departments becoming involved in the problem, but that does not give us a policy; it simply adds to the confusion already existing. It is time that the government grappled with the problem courageously and realized once and for all that more departments and further inter-departmental competition will not build more houses for the people of Canada.

I offer these observations, Mr. Speaker. First there has been a complete inadequacy of planning on the part of this government. Just outside Toronto at the present time Wartime Housing Limited is building, at the instance of the Department of Veterans Affairs, six hundred houses for returning veterans—six hundred houses in a city that sent overseas tens of thousands of men who are now coming back! That apparently is the answer of the government to the housing problem in that great city. My leader yesterday used the expression "too little and too late" as applied to the government's action in this respect. If I may use his language I would go a step further and say that the government's action is far too little and far too late.

In the next place, the government has been doing far too much talking about what it intended to do in the realm of housing, leading the people of Canada to expect great things. The fact of the matter is that, unless they have something which they have not yet shown this chamber, they cannot possibly hope to fulfil the promises they made to the people, and many thousands of people, disappointed Canadians, are going to be living under conditions of great hardship this winter because of the failure of the government to make good and fulfil its undertakings to the Canadian people.

Next, in regard to the government's approach to this problem, particularly as evidenced in the National Housing Act, I say that the approach has been financial rather than social. This housing problem is a social problem. The government has not approached it as such but has treated it simply as a financial problem, and we shall not have a sympathetic and effective approach to the housing problem in this country unless it is seen as a social and not merely as a financial problem.

Here is this National Housing Act of 1944. It is an enabling statute. Consider these terms as found, for example, in section 4: "The minister may enter into contracts"; section 6: "The minister may by agreement" do thus and so; section 7: The minister may make loans; section 8: The minister may make loans; section 9: The minister may make loans to certain institutions; section 10: The governor in council may do certain things. And so on all through the act. It is an enabling statute; and therefore the approach of the administration to that act, and the spirit in which it undertakes to carry out parliament's expectations in respect of that statute, are all-important, and I say that on the record of the government in the fifteen months that statute has been on the statute books of the country the government has shown itself unwilling to deal with or at least indifferent to the immensity of the problem. It has not taken this statute in hand and sought to give a sympathetic application to it or to make its provisions workable and available to all Canadians.

For example, the government has refused the request of certain municipalities for permission to set up low-dividend housing corporations. In some places, for instance in Ontario, the provincial government offered to share half of the public ten per cent contribution to low rental projects, sharing that cost with the city of Toronto. That seemed a reasonable proposition, where you get a provincial government coming forward hand in hand with a great city and offering to share half the public contribution of ten per cent to a low rental housing project.

What happened? The Department of Finance, administering the statute, simply turned them down, and there has not been a zealous, sympathetic application of the provisions of this statute to meet the housing needs of the country. Far more use could be made of the provisions of this statute than has been made.

The approach that those of us on this side of the house in the Progressive Conservative party make to this housing programme can best be summed up in this sentence. We regard it as a social problem which must be approached along with our approach to other social problems, and in working out for Canadians a sensible and comprehensive programme of social security we say that this must have its due place. We bring to this problem certain convictions. In the first place, we say that in any of these social security measures you must first of all avoid duplication of facilities, because that only breeds waste and competition, and I for one have not yet seen the necessity for the dominion going ahead and setting up machinery to administer social measures such as family allowances, while the governments of the provinces have trained staffs fitted to handle social and welfare problems, which staffs have been sidetracked in that matter.

We are all Canadians, whether as members of parliament or of legislatures, whether as members of the federal government or members of provincial governments, and surely to goodness it ought to be possible in these social measures to find some common ground and make a non-political and constructive approach having regard to the needs of the people of Canada, instead of setting up duplication by way of competitive methods of administration. This is wasteful and it breeds chaos in matters of administration.

In the second place, we say that in matters of social security there is never any excuse for hiding costs. In my experience of some years in the city council of Toronto, where we had many housing problems, and socialists and communists from time to time sat in the council, I always observed this with the socialists and communists in their approach to housing problems as in regard to any other social problems, that they preferred not to see the cost segregated and made known. Where it came to municipal assistance to any housing projects the idea always was to cover it up in terms of some low fixed assessment or some low fixed tax. Our obligation to the people to whom we are responsible is to see that they understand what these measures cost. The people wish to know these things, and it is our duty to give them this information. Let us know what the cost is. Do not let us endeavour at any time to hide these costs under cover. Hidden subsidies have no place in any approach to housing. In advocating subsidies in certain cases let us know what they are; let us make them known.

In the third place, we ought to make sure that the benefits of projects which are undertaken by parliament are assured to those for whom they are intended and not provide measures which admit at any time of these benefits not being passed on to those for whom they are meant. In matters of that kind as in all matters, but particularly in that respect, it is desirable that the local governments be used in connection with administration. We shall get the most efficient, the most effective, yes, and the most understanding administration of these measures if they are carried out by the local authorities who know the local situation and the local needs.

In the fourth place, all these social measures ought to be designed to help people to help themselves. That is the view of people who are experienced in social work and parliament ought to have due regard to that view. In whatever measures we undertake we ought to seek to avoid the discouragement of thrift and enterprise.

Having said that, what is our view in regard to the necessity for a comprehensive and long-range approach to the problem of housing? In the first place it must be comprehensive. There must be no piecemeal approach to the question of social security. We have suffered too long from competition between governments and between sections of the country in matters of social security. There must be a comprehensive plan rather than a piecemeal, political approach.

In the next place, having regard to the constitutional difficulties, whereas the great sources of taxation are placed within the power of parliament, the responsibility and jurisdiction with respect to social measures have been placed in the provinces. This inverted relationship must be corrected by constitutional action or agreement particularly in facing up to the problem of making a contribution or subsidy available to provide housing for those who otherwise are condemned to live in sub-standard dwellings.

We must not forget the constructive benefits on the credit side of the ledger. Bad housing is a source of delinquency, bad health, yes, and even crime. In eliminating bad housing, with the assistance of a dominion government subsidy, we are eliminating this costly source of social ills.

I do not need to take up the time of the house in arguing for recognition of the claims of those in the lowest income brackets who ought not to expend more than twenty per cent of their income on housing, because that class and their need have been recognized by the National Housing Act itself. Section 2, subsection 11, recognizes that class of people who ought not to be expending more than twenty per cent of their income on housing, because if they spend more than that amount they will be doing so at the expense of proper diet and proper clothing.

These citizens in the low income brackets must have more consideration from parliament than the 1944 act will ever give them. That act was largely brought about by the report of the Curtis committee, an eminent committee. Their recommendations were largely adopted by the government with one outstanding exception. That outstanding exception was the provision for subsidizing housing for those in the lowest income brackets. That committee stated:

> For the purpose of meeting the low-rental character of the project, i.e., the essential point that its costs cannot be solely met from rental revenues, an annual subsidy is considered the best and most practicable system. It has the merit of being flexible and subject to variation if circumstances or experience demand. It is straightforward in effect, and understandable as a rent reduction fund applied to a clear-cut social welfare purpose. It seems unquestionable that a substantial part of this subsidy should come from the dominion government.

I would conclude with this observation: In this country we have lagged far behind. There is need for an improvement in this legislation, and it must be made. We ought to follow the example of the United Kingdom. They have been subsidizing housing ever since the last war. We are years behind them. We ought to follow the example of the United States which has had a comprehensive measure of this kind since 1937. There are three hundred thousand substandard dwellings occupied in the Dominion of Canada to-day, as found by the Curtis committee. A hundred and twenty-five thousand of these units are in the larger cities, fifty thousand in the smaller cities and a hundred and twenty-five thousand on farms. If parliament and the government do not grapple immediately, courageously and effectively with this problem they will be called to account by the people of Canada. If we grapple with the problem effectively and with determination we shall earn the thanks of a grateful people.

Mr. L. E. BAKER (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): I am a new member in this house. I had not intended to speak so soon in this parliament as I am doing. However, I have heard a lot of remarks made regarding service men. I do not like to use the first person pronoun more often than necessary, but if I do so to-night I ask the house to excuse me. I was overseas and have been in the army for six years. I have fought in two different theatres of war. I was flown back to Canada to contest the election with a fellow member of parliament, the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Merritt) across the way, for whom I have the greatest admiration. Everything was very democratic about the whole thing. In the one plane there were four C.C.F., two Liberal and one Progressive Conservative supporter. Of these four C.C.Fs., three were candidates for the federal house and one was for the Ontario provincial house. As we flew over the Atlantic eventually we had to increase our altitude due to cumulus clouds and we reached a height of fifteen thousand feet. At that time, I thought that was the height of democracy.

I have no intention of being acrimonious or bitter in any of my remarks. I am not a politician; I am a soldier; therefore I do not want anybody to take any personal exception to anything that I may say. First of all, I represent the constituency of Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare, which is pretty much the extreme east end of Canada and on the Atlantic seaboard. Some of my problems are the same as those of the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes), particularly fishing. Therefore both ends of Canada have been represented in speeches in this house this afternoon and evening.

The reason I came back to contest the federal election when I was overseas, and it was after V-E day, was just this and simply this, that I had confidence that the government which had carried us victoriously through the European war would be the government which would carry us through to a successful peace.

May I say here, Mr. Speaker, that the British empire has won many wars. That is why we are all here to-night; but something that is even greater than winning wars is the winning of everlasting peace, which has never been done. I maintain that this Liberal government with its trained leaders is the government which can help to take us through to a satisfactory and lasting peace. Possibly some of the hon. members of the opposition are a little too impatient. We did not work up our magnificent navy, army and air force into the fine and efficient fighting machine that it eventually turned out to be in a matter of two weeks. The war has been over for slightly over two weeks. Perhaps we have not admitted that in the house, but that is so, and therefore we have not had very much time in which to convert ourselves from war-time efficiency to peace-time efficiency. But we have these plans made and I maintain that by being patient we worked out our fine fighting machine and that if we shall only have a bit of patience and not draw red herrings across the trail and turn small issues into main issues we shall have a successful peace and our men will eventually be properly rehabilitated, and that we shall sit at the peace table and make a satisfactory world peace, or at any rate share in it.

Regarding the war memorial in the form of beautifying a larger Ottawa, I am heartily in sympathy with it. There have been hon. members on the opposition side of the house who have been partly in sympathy with it; but they say: "How about wartime housing, and how about various other matters?"

With regard to people who are in distress, I am thoroughly in sympathy with them too, but I believe that both matters can be taken care of, and I believe that the memorial we should have should be a memorial in the capital of Canada, something in which each province of Canada and the territory may feel that they have an equal part and that we shall have a capital of which we shall be proud.

When I was a small boy I visited the city of Washington. As I walked around that beautiful city I thought to myself it must be wonderful to be an American and have a capital like that, because I feel that a beautiful capital impresses people from all parts of the country. In the city of Edinburgh, Scotland, there is a little bit of earth from Nova Scotia, the province from which I am pleased to say I come. So I maintain that each province in Canada might well send some of its earth to this city, and that certain parts of the city might be allotted as representing the various provinces.

I believe the principal thing we must realize is that we must get together from coast to coast; the hon. member for Nanaimo and I, as the member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare must get together and work for the general good of Canada. We must not confuse the vast main issues at stake by merely bringing up small, controversial programmes. There is no such thing as a utopia. Though we may try to bring about that condition, we shall probably never succeed. However, we will do our best and come as close to it as possible. One thing I would ask hon. members of the opposition is that they have patience. We have not had very long in which to work. This is not the day of the laws of the Medes and Persians. Laws can be changed if it is found that they do not work to the satisfaction of all concerned, and I believe the government which I support will be prepared to make any necessary changes at the proper time.

Mr. FERNAND VIAU (St. Boniface) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, it is the first time since its creation that the constituency of St. Boniface has elected a member able to address the House of Commons in your mother tongue. It is with a real pleasure that I congratulate you on your appointment as Speaker of the House of Commons.

I am still a young man and it is the first time that I take a seat in this assembly. However, for several years, and even while I attended college and the University of Manitoba, I studied politics not only of my country but of all the provinces and especially the province of Quebec. When the Right Hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) suggested your appointment as speaker of the House of Commons, I already knew the political background of your family and your forefathers, not only in the province of Quebec but throughout Canada. I had known for several years the names of Gouin, Mercier and Fauteux.

I am very happy to have been chosen to represent the historical constituency of St. Boniface which has been set up twenty-one years ago and which formerly was part of the constituency of Provencher.

I may assure you that I am proud to address you in my mother tongue, for not only does it enable me to express clearly and intelligently all my thoughts, but it permits me to pay tribute to the missionaries, to the pioneers and to the explorers of the confluent of the Red and Assiniboine rivers where the history of Western Canada was written over a century ago. In using this language I shall constantly honour the memory of those pioneers.

(Text): Many times yesterday and to-day, Mr. Speaker, we have heard the expression "I am a new member of this House of Commons." Yes, this new parliament has brought quite a number of new faces, including a great many young men, of whom I am proud to be one. I was elected in the constituency of St. Boniface as a supporter of a government which for many years gave the country peace and prosperity by its sound administration. Though I was still on active service when called upon to contest the convention to choose a Liberal candidate for my constituency, I thought I should comply with the requests of my friends and accept the honour of being chosen as a candidate in support of the present government, because I felt that the government which had administered the affairs of the country so well during the six years of war should be able to manage them equally well in the post-war period.

It so happened that the war with Japan ended abruptly, and we were all glad that our armed forces would be able to return home and enjoy the peace for which they fought so bravely. Various members of the opposition, however, have insisted that the government's peace-time programme is not adequate, and that it was not prepared for the period of transition from war to peace. As I stated a short time ago, the return of the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and his government in the last election was a token of appreciation on the part of the Canadian people for the good work done during the war. On June 11 last the Prime Minister was able to go back to the electorate of Canada and request another mandate for the next five years without having to set aside his faithful old lieutenants, and without having to change the name of his party. That was one reason I was happy when selected as the candidate for the Liberal party in the constituency of St. Boniface. For many years I had known and watched the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken); but I felt that a man should always remain true to his ideals.

In the speech from the throne the government has laid down its programme for this session. The first part of the speech, which contains a tribute to our armed forces, is of great importance. In that connection, however, I should like to pay a tribute to the nursing sisters in the Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps who have followed our troops to the battlefields. Many of them have given their lives; many have been wounded. Most of them will be returning to Canada wearing ribbons certifying to the service they have given in many theatres of war. This applies also to the women's divisions of the Canadian army, air force and navy who are still doing a great work to assure Canada peace and prosperity for the years to come. To these women we owe a great tribute.

During the period of peace time I feel that Canada should maintain a permanent force, right here in Canada. The training of young men, be it for one year or two years, will make of them better citizens. It was noticeable in the early days of the war, when in 1939 we had so much difficulty in obtaining volunteers to join the colours for the defence of Canada and the allied nations. One of the chief causes was that this country never had a complete and full military set-up for the army.

If the government will implement this programme and assure the house that one or two years of military training will be given, we shall have better citizens, and we shall not witness those incidents which took place in the House of Commons when some members from Quebec, those ultra-nationalists, were ready to betray their country when it was at war and the enemy almost at its shores, and insisted that we take no part whatsoever in a war which was then in progress. That attitude in the House of Commons will remain a blot on the history of our country. As a Canadian of French descent, who has lived in western Canada, I say that attitude was sorely felt and will never be forgotten.

In respect of that other part in the speech from the throne which dealt with the housing programme, I demand of the government to take immediate action to assure that our veterans immediately upon their return from overseas will be assured of good housing quarters. The programme is already in force, but more immediate action should be taken. That is one point upon which I would insist.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence and Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): Mr. Speaker, before the vote is taken on the motion, perhaps I should say a few words about the government's demobilization policy, particularly in view of the fact that it has been made the subject of criticism in the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) and in view of the remarks this afternoon of the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes).

I must confess that, after listening with attention both to the leader of the opposition and to the hon. member for Nanaimo I was unable to ascertain exactly on what grounds they criticized the government's policy. However, that is no doubt due to a defect in my own make-up, rather than to the powers of exposition those hon. members possess.

Perhaps, however, it might be well for me to review briefly the basis upon which we are proceeding with our policy of demobilizing our armed forces. I am sure hon. members will agree with me that that policy must be fair and that it should be as expeditious and as orderly as possible.

As announced some time ago, the basic principle upon which demobilization is based is that of first-in first-out, the principle that the man with the longest and hardest service should be the first discharged. The hon. member for Nanaimo stated very properly this afternoon that that principle must be subject to some variation, and that one cannot adopt a hard and fast first-in, first-out rule and expect that the thing will work properly or fairly. The hon. member then proceeded to enumerate —and pretty accurately, I think—those various instances in which we depart from that principle.

The first was on compassionate grounds. As an old professional soldier he knows that that has always been a ground for discharging men from the armed services. I take it, therefore, that he does not criticize the government's policy in that particular.

The second ground on which exception, apparently, is made to the basic principle is that where a man has been recommended for early release by the industrial release and selection boards which have been set up under the direction of the Department of Labour, with a view to allowing employers to make application for the early discharge of employees who, they submit, are so-called key men, and for whom it is asked that discharges be granted ahead of their turn. In the cases where recommendation is received from that board the military, naval and, I imagine, the air authorities, will either discharge a man or grant him extended leave. If he is granted extended leave the time during which he engages in civilian occupation prior to his final discharge does not count for gratuity or for rehabilitation grants. The hon. member for Nanaimo did not express his preference one way or the other, as to whether we should abandon that principle. I am sorry he did not say whether we should or not; but I can only assume that, since he did not object to it, he deems it is a proper procedure to follow. That is the second ground upon which a man may be repatriated and discharged, or put on extended leave ahead of his turn.

The third and last ground upon which a man may be returned from overseas other than upon the principle of first-in, first-out is, of course, the obvious one of medical grounds. That is one which has always existed, so far as I know, in all the armed services.

We now come to the men in Canada. As hon. members will appreciate, a week or ten days ago we announced certain extensions to the three points I have mentioned. The first is to allow those who can establish that they have been accepted for admission to a recognized university or educational institution to obtain their discharge ahead of their turn. Again the hon. member for Nanaimo did not indicate whether or not he objected to that procedure. However, I would say to him that, judging by the number of requests I have had from supporters of his party, the great majority of them are in favour of that exception.

The second ground is that a man may be discharged or put upon extended leave ahead of his turn if he is to go to agriculture. Again the hon. member did not object. I have not had a written objection from any hon. member to that procedure. If there is objection I hope hon. members will rise in their places and say that it is wrong. They have not done so yet, and no one has made objection to me as Minister of National Defence.

[Mr. Abbott.]

The third group is the one to which the hon. member referred—and here, may I say, not quite accurately. I do not for a moment suggest that he did so purposely. His reference was to the discharging or to the putting of men on extended leave to certain essential occupations.

The situation is this, that in certain occupations designated as essential by the Minister of Labour, including the building industry and the packing house industry, the army will discharge men in Canada, or will release them on extended leave in order to go into those industries. That is policed, if I may use that term, by the ministry of labour. We do not any longer detail any men for civilian work, with the exception of farm labour.

Then there was the final group he mentioned, comprised of men who are discharged as unsuitable for training. That has always been the case so far as I know in every army, and no one should know it better than my hon. friend. He made a plea for reduced taxation, but I do not know whether he feels we should continue at the taxpayers' expense to train unsuitable men in the army. However, if he does I wish he would say so.

Mr. HOMUTH: You have done it for five years.

Mr. ABBOTT: He did not say what he wanted done, but he suggested something should be done with the N.R.M.A. personnel other than what is now being done, that is to keep them in the army to perform essential military duties in Canada. He may have intended to say that they should be sent somewhere else, but so far as I know none of his party made that statement before the election.

Mr. PEARKES: I said distinctly that they should be welded into one army.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend says that they should be welded into one army, but I do not know what particular distinction he would make in the men. He did not suggest that they should be discharged and he did not suggest in specific terms that they should be sent over to Germany as an army of occupation. I think the house and the country can draw their own conclusions as to just how serious or constructive his suggestion is as to what we should do with the N.R.M.A. troops.

I do not recall any other points in connection with our releasing men from the services that he mentioned other than the principle which I have mentioned of first in, first out, and the longest and hardest service. Of course it is true, as he knows and as the house knows, that some time ago we began to try to return men from overseas by units and divisions rather than purely as individuals. The hon. member made some reference to the reduction in the point score from an original figure of 150 or 160 to 130. One reason for the reduction in the point score is that since V-E day we have repatriated from overseas over 120,000 of all three services. We returned approximately 108,000 up to the end of August and, as those who have read the newspapers will have seen, something like 18,000 came in last Sunday alone. Therefore there has been a fairly substantial number repatriated in September. I think it is fairly safe to say that by the end of September there will have been a very substantial additional number of troops repatriated from overseas, I am glad to say many more than we anticipated we would be able to repatriate at the time of V-E day.

I shall be glad to give more details as to our methods of repatriation and that sort of thing when my estimates are up, but I felt that I could not allow the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition and the speech made this afternoon by the hon. member for Nanaimo to pass when there had been no evidence offered in this debate that the demobilization policy is unsatisfactory. I should like to know from the hon. gentlemen who criticized it just what policy they would substitute in its place.

Mr. EUGENE MARQUIS (Kamouraska): As a newly elected member speaking in parliament for the first time I cannot help being impressed when addressing this honourable house. But I know every hon. member is inclined to generosity. I wish first to congratulate you, Mr. Speaker, upon your election to the high office you now occupy. I am sure you will fulfil your duties with the impartiality and with the dignity you have always shown in your private and public life.

I wish to congratulate the mover (Mr. Benidickson) and the seconder (Mr. Langlois) of the address in reply to the speech from the the throne. Both of these men are young; both of them are heroes; both of them are brilliant speakers. They have proved that war has brought to maturity a new and brilliant generation. Their attitude during the war was a symbol of strength and courage and their attitude before this house is a symbol of determination to win the peace and to assure prosperity for the future of Canada.

(Translation): Mr. Speaker, I did not expect to address this house to-day.

Speakers throughout the country, and especially the hon. member for Nova Scotia and the hon. member for Saskatchewan who preceded me, both of them members of the active army and heroes of this war, did not hesitate, in accordance with their outlook and the purposes they seek to achieve, to uphold the rights of Canadians and to outline the programme they intend to advocate for the welfare of their country.

As representative of a farming community, a constituency which during the war supplied our armed forces with essentials and which also contributed toil, courage and blood, I have deemed it my duty to express to the government of my country my admiration, my esteem and my devotion.

Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of my remarks I am deeply moved at the thought that I represent to-day the native constituency of a man who was my first counsellor, the idol of his province, who has symbolized the spirit of Canada in its purest and finest form, the late hon. Ernest Lapointe. He was among the first to add lustre to the name of Kamouraska and it was he who courageously and proudly wore the political mantle of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the great Canadian leader whose memory still endures.

I stated a moment ago that the constituency of Kamouraska is an essentially agricultural community. It is composed of parishes where farming is the chief industry and lumbering comes next in importance.

As several are aware, there is in my constituency a classical college of foremost importance, where great men have received their education, and I would be afraid to offend the modesty of several members of this house if I were to single out those who attended Ste. Anne college.

In addition there is a high school of agriculture and fishing.

Agriculture, especially during the period of reconstruction which is now beginning, must enlist the assistance of science and resort to the most modern practices.

We have experts, as well as distinguished and experienced agronomists, we have specialized courses through which numerous technicians have received their training, and who come not only from the district of Kamouraska but also from the region of Quebec city where they have assisted in the agricultural development through their talents, their culture and their scientific knowledge they have won recognition throughout the country.

May I add, Mr. Speaker, that there is also in my constituency a Dominion experimental station which enables us to engage in practical studies and scientific research in agriculture and constitutes a perfect organization for the prosperity not only of the locality but of the whole province of Quebec.

In the recent election, like most of those who sit here, I was privileged to have opponents. One of them had been a Conservative ever since his early childhood and perhaps since his birth. Probably on account of some political reactions which exist in certain quarters, he suddenly felt an urge of independence which led him to a crushing defeat. The other one was an advocate of Social Credit; he was quite modest and preached a theory which did not succeed in rallying enough believers to save his deposit.

The people of the constituency of Kamouraska, who are peaceful, honest and hard-working citizens, believed in their country, in their leader, and they gave their full confidence to the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King). It is a testimonial much greater than the one I could give myself. The preachings of extremists, the criticism of independents, the new theories of every kind could not sway the confidence of sincere and loyal people who remembered that in our country there is a man who, especially since 1935, when he fell heir to the sorry legacy of unemployment, set about his work, fought and carried out social policies in order to place this country on a basis of progress. At the time when the country was being stabilized, war broke out, a war that threatened not only Canada but the whole world.

We have heard this truth proclaimed in this house, on various tones, it is true, but all agreed that Canada was in danger, that our freedoms were jeopardized, that the survival of Christianity itself was at stake. The people of my constituency, together with most of Canada's citizens, understood that one man, in spite of the heavy burden he had carried in the past, managed to avoid all pitfalls, to overcome all obstacles and to lead us through the whole war to ultimate victory. This man is the Prime Minister of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I know I am expressing the views of my constituents when I say that we are grateful to the Prime Minister for the way he has warded off all dangers and we thank divine providence that he is still in our midst.

There are speakers in this house who, a few months ago, asked for total mobilization of our man-power and who now want the army demobilized even before the war is officially ended. Yet, the programme of the administration in this regard clearly provides for as prompt a return of our men as most of our service men themselves would wish. It is a wonder to me that those who purport to vindicate the rights of our soldiers who fought on the various battlefields, should preach a doctrine which is not adhered to by our military men. Never, in a speech from the throne, has there been outlined so comprehensive a programme providing every possible means of reorganization and reconstruction in Canada. Does any one claim that the speech from the throne should specify the exact amounts that should be appropriated for each particular measure? I do not think any member of this house would entertain such an idea. But this programme enables all persons of good will to cooperate in the development of the country, and to contribute to veterans' assistance. This policy promotes the agricultural production, to assist famished peoples. It is the government of our country who offer a helping hand to the poor, the famished and the unfortunate.

Who are those who oppose the government measures? Who are those who fight the adoption of this policy intended to help the peoples of the overseas countries to get sufficient clothing, food and fuel? They are the gentlemen of the opposition, sitting on your left, near you, Mr. Speaker.

At the close of a conflict which has jeopardized not only our freedom of speech and our wealth, but even what I would call our right to live, our right to leave an inheritance, however small, to posterity, we should all unite in close cooperation in order to attain to a spirit truly, fully and solely Canadian in character.

I have never concurred in the opinions of any extremist. They are sowers of disunity, whatever province they hail from. I am more convinced than ever that, in this house, we all aim, now more than ever, at unity and harmony.

Mr. Speaker, while reading magazines, periodicals, newspapers I have often noted with regret the tone adopted by some speechifiers and even the ideas they dared to express. May we now say that such incidents are but the exception and that in our beloved Canada, the representatives of the people, maintaining their personal identity, remaining faithful to their race and beliefs and respecting other creeds and races, may we now say, Mr. Speaker, that all of us shall rally as Canadians around a symbol, a national flag which will serve as guide to every one?

Mr. Speaker, I know of no one in this house or even in the country who does not wish for real unity in Canada. I express the solemn hope that before long, Canada will have a recognized national anthem which all her citizens to sing before a flag around which we will gather.

Some members of the house object to the government's policy. Do they oppose the San Francisco charter, a pact which represents the resultant of the discussions held by the United Nations? Does not the speech from the throne reflect the spirit not only of Canada but of the whole civilized world toward post-war reconstruction when it asks to approve the San Francisco charter? Do these honourable gentlemen oppose the adoption of the address in reply to the speech from the throne because the Canadian government intends to proceed as rapidly as possible with the conversion of war industries into peace-time industries? As some would say, Mr. Speaker, if those gentlemen were in the place of the government, would the reconversion of those industries come more rapidly or perhaps as quickly as some among them transformed themselves into independents in the province of Quebec. Those honourable gentlemen governed this country before 1935, and to my knowledge there were no miracles in political administration during this five-year plan. There were indeed, Mr. Speaker, timely suggestions from some members who sit to your left, and I know that all the members of the government are ready to consider suggestions that may be accepted and adapted to the political conditions as they new exist in this country. I listened with much attention to the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell), who, besides having remarkable parliamentary qualifications, certainly made, in his speech, a few suggestions which may, at a later time, affect this country's policies. I know that the Prime Minister has long since always carefully considered the opinions expressed by the various groups. Besides, those who are quite earnest in their criticism realize that the leaders in the administration cannot always adapt all the suggestions made to existing conditions. Evolution is inherent to politics just as it is to life; and, in the field of soldiers' reestablishment, or of reconversion of war industries to peace-time enterprises, those who urge, for the time being, a fixed and definite plan, and for years to come, a scaled plan, forget that the future is veiled to us, that we cannot know in advance what circumstance the country will face in a few months or perhaps a few weeks. That is what the government must keep in mind while carrying out its policy.

Mr. Speaker, I trust that the government which directed our war effort, maintained peace at home and rallied all Canadian forces to fight the enemy, once again, I trust that this government is qualified to effect civilian reestablishment, to help in the country's reconstruction and finally to grant our working classes the stability and safeguards they expect. The government which allayed the dangers of inflation will prevent deflation. The administration which, during the war, checked capitalistic abuses will not allow capitalism to stand in the way of a proper and just redistribution of the wealth of our country; that is why it has granted family allowances which will allow children to prepare for the future, to be properly clothed and fed, to receive a better education. In fact, the Liberal administration did not wait until the close of the war. At the most tragic periods, when Canadian lives were being lost in battle, our government turned its attention to our manpower and the protection of childhood; it decided to protect the working classes, the little people to ensure that, in our country, the middle class would be immune from capitalistic abuses. That is what the Liberal government has done for the good of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, in concluding my remarks I apologize to the hon. members of this house as it is the first time that I have had an opportunity to address them. I admit that I gained my inspiration in the study of Canadian politics, in my love of country, in my admiration and esteem for my leaders, in my faith in their sound policies. I admire their moderation and the efforts which they are making to ensure Canadian unity.

(Text): In conclusion, I thank God for having given Canada our Prime Minister, and for having given him the necessary health and strength to preside over the destinies of the nation during the war and during peacetime.

Mr. C. C. I. MERRITT (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, I wish to apologize to the house for intervening in this debate at such a late hour, but I find it necessary to do so for definite reasons. You will excuse a new member for having perhaps misunderstood the purpose of this debate, which is on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the amendment thereto and the sub-amendment offered by the group to my left. It does not seem to me that the purpose of this debate is fully served simply by rushing to a vote on the question without having canvassed it properly. And this is what I mean by canvassing it properly. It was my understanding that in this debate there would be an opportunity for the ministers of the crown to make to this country public statements which they have failed to make all summer on the great and important matters which have been exercising our people during the past few months, whether or not the members of the government know it. Before this debate terminates I hope we may hear not from private members on the government side, replying to the amendment offered by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken), but from the responsible ministers of the crown charged with the duty of seeing to it that we have jobs and housing, and that our men overseas get a proper deal when they return to this country. It is these hon. gentlemen whom I feel the country wishes to hear from in this debate.

I was very glad when Minister of National Defence (Mr. Abbott) rose to speak to the amendment in regard to the service personnel overseas and to answer the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes), who made such a telling speech this afternoon. Let me say to the minister at once that I know he was not responsible for the situation in which the government now finds itself in reference to the army. That situation sprang from the evil seed of the man-power policy which has been wrong from the beginning, and the minister has no responsibility for that. When he spoke to-night I thought I was going to hear what the country wants to hear; but all I heard from the minister was a deprecatory statement in reference to the speech of the hon. member for Nanaimo. The minister spoke of all the various ways in which men get out of the army now, as though the hon. member for Nanaimo was complaining, and as though this amendment complained, in regard to specific minor details. The hon. member for Nanaimo read out that list only to show the house the wide variety of methods by which people can get out of the army to-day, ranging from compassionate leave, which may be a perfectly good ground, down to "unlikely to become an efficient soldier," or "not amenable to discipline" which I say here is a perfectly bad ground.

Mr. ABBOTT: It has been a ground under army regulations for ten years.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. ABBOTT: Or at least since 1939.

Mr. MERRITT: The minister concluded his remarks by asking the hon. member for Nanaimo what policy he would suggest. Well, Mr. Speaker, it is not the duty of the hon. member for Nanaimo to suggest to the Minister of National Defence what policy would ensure fairness to Canadian soldiers overseas.

Mr. ABBOTT: If my hon. friend will permit a correction, I asked what different policy he would suggest.

Mr. MERRITT: Very well; I accept the correction, but what difference does it make? I say this, and I am going to leave the matter here, as I would not attempt to gild the lily by emulating the hon. member for Nanaimo. In this debate the country does not want questions of that kind; it wants to know from this government how Canadian soldiers still overseas are to be protected in regard to jobs when they get back to this country, after all the N.R.M.A. men and many others have been let out of the army ahead of them.

Mr. ABBOTT: The answer is that they are not being let out ahead of them.

Mr. CASSELMAN: Is this the courtesy extended to an hon. member in his first speech in the house?

Mr. MERRITT: I thank my hon. friend, but I need no such courtesies; I will answer any question that is asked. I will leave that question to the judgment of the house and the country, and speak now to the other two parts of the amendment. At least we can say that the Minister of National Defence rose in his place. What of the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe), who is responsible, I take it, for jobs and housing? Has he risen in his place during this debate? Not at all; we have not heard from him. The country wishes to hear from him during this debate. Lest he should be under any misapprehension as to the nature of this amendment, I say to this house that the amendment expresses exactly the feeling of this country against the government to-day. The country is both anxious and critical. The war is over, and the country is anxious about the ability of this government to show the way to full employment. The country is critical in regard to the lack of leadership exhibited by this government at the inception of the reconstruction period.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MERRITT: I hear hon. gentlemen opposite laugh. I say to them that for a long time they have claimed to be the leaders of this country. I say to them now that this country has been carrying the government on its back for a long time. Hon. members opposite may be thankful that this is a great country, and that as such it is capable of carrying even hon. members opposite on its back.

I should like to make another point about the amendment, lest it be thought that it should be allowed to go by default—like jobs and housing. The amendment is a criticism striking directly at the capacity of hon. members who form the government to lead the people of the country. I wish to say right now that, unlike my hon. friends to my left, who believe that we need a new social order, I have believed for many years—and there are a great number of people who agree with me, and who will always agree with me—that we need no new social order in order to have full employment in our country.

What we do need, and what we have not had in my adult life—and what I fear we can never have from this government—is "action" to give us full employment. The people of Canada are a reasonable people. I do not believe they expect very much, perhaps not as much as they have a right to expect, from the government of their country. I do not think that they call for utopia, or even that they mind being inconvenienced by lack of housing, or being laid off from jobs during a difficult period.

But what they do mind, what exasperates them and prompts them to talk among themselves, as they are talking across the country to-day, is complete inaction on the part of the government to face up to problems which, although they may not be of great concern to the government, concern the people deeply. If the government has no action to offer, as I suspect it has not, then the people might be satisfied if an explanation were offered to them, and I am suggesting that such explanation should be made in this debate, and that the matter ought not to go by default. The government should explain when people might expect to find those jobs, and when they might expect to see those houses.

When the amendment was offered by the leader of the opposition the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) sought to turn it off by expressing his satisfaction in the results of the general election held in June. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare (Mr. Baker), for whom I have very great respect indeed, and with whom I did not expect to take issue so early in the debate, talked about these matters of housing and jobs as if they were only small issues.

I wish to dispel any impression the Prime Minister may have sought to create to the effect that he is protected by the mandate he received from the people on June 11. I should like to recount a little history—even at this late hour—and it will not be ancient history. The history I shall offer will be very modern in the history of Canada, and although it is confined to the city of Vancouver, one of the constituencies of which I have the honour to represent, I am sure it is applicable throughout Canada.

Apparently some hon. members do not realize just what the situation is in Canada with respect to housing and jobs. So that they may do so, let me go on with my history. In May came V-E day, and in June the general election. I am not going to go at all into the history before the election; so that that excuse is not available to hon. members opposite. The people of Canada did not mind being badly housed before V-E day, because they had a war to fight. They did not even mind being badly housed after V-E day because there was still a war to fight. But they did expect—indeed, they have been promised by this government—that there would be action in respect of housing at once.

In the city of Vancouver there has been no action, and I shall recount to the house just what the situation is there. It now has in its population about 60,000 extra souls over its pre-war population. May I point out, in passing, that forty-eight per cent of the male population of service age in British Columbia volunteered for the armed forces. Those men are returning in ever-increasing numbers.

I have heard the over-all shortage of houses in Vancouver estimated as high as 20,000, but in my presentation this evening I shall settle for a very much smaller number than that. Let us, for the sake of this discussion, say that the number is only 5,000 or 10,000. On a certain day in August there were 1,400 veterans of this war who had served overseas, whose names were recorded on the books of the emergency shelter administration as having been placed in housing so unsuitable that even that harassed authority thought it should try again, if it could, to get better accommodation for them.

Let me place before the house two illustrations of how those men are living. In the first place, they are living in basements and attics. In the second place, they are living in that new and great Canadian national institution, the chicken-house duplex. And when I say that I am not attempting to crack a joke, but rather, have reference to veterans living in chicken-houses.

Let me give another illustration, from another point of view. There was one case of twenty-five men, women and children who were sharing one bathroom. If hon. members will reflect for a while on that situation they will readily realize the inconvenience entailed.

I ask the house this question: Of what use to the country and to the veterans is a veterans charter? Of what use to them is a welcome home and a civic reception if, when they reach their homes, they must live under conditions such as I have described? What we want from the government is not grandiose plans, white papers and legislation. By offering us those they perform only half their job. We must have executive action to translate those plans into benefits placed in the hands of the men, women and children of this country.

That is all that will satisfy the people of Canada, and it is not too much to ask from the ministers concerned. Let me deal in further detail with the subject of housing. I have said that people might not mind living in chicken-houses, or might not complain about it. But what has the government done? Despite the promises made, the only housing activity of which I know in Vancouver this past summer was an application, by advertisement, for the registration of construction workers, and the throwing of Wartime Housing Limited into the already too small market for supplies.

At the moment the difficulty with the housing situation is not that of low rental housing, or of any social aspect of the question. It is simply a question of shortage of supply. That is certainly the case in Vancouver. So far as I am aware there is no authority in this country which has the job of getting after the bottlenecks in supplies. I made a little pilgrimage in Vancouver just to find out what the situation might be in this respect. I visited the wartime prices and trade board; the controller of construction; the emergency shelter administration; the mayor of the city; the private contractors' association; and I visited other agencies around town. Every one was most helpful, particularly the civil servants. They were all working desperately to try to get around this shortage, but none of them had any power to do a thing, none of them had any full responsibility. I could not find a man in Vancouver who had authority, responsibility or full knowledge about the housing shortage. That is what is at the bottom of this shortage, and nothing else. There has been no action in getting after the bottlenecks and trying to get rid of them.

I go on with my history and I mention what happened in July. In July we had a large and important strike at the American Can Company in Vancouver which supplies all the cans for western Canada. The strike lasted for fourteen days, and by the end of that time almost all the primary producers who tinned their products were desperate because their goods were spoiling. They were losing money day after day. The strike was on that old familiar issue, the closed shop. Did the government take any action? Yes, after two weeks—just in the nick of time—and, after all the agony had been gone through by the people on the Pacific coast because of the fear that their merchandise would spoil; after all the loss they had suffered through having to shut off production—the government acted and called in someone to take over the plant and to arrange a compromise. Why could they not have acted first? Why could they not have taken over the plant as soon as the strike occurred and then adjudicated and thus saved from loss the consumers and producers of primary products who had no concern with the strike? How many times and in how many places are we to have strikes on this old familiar issue without government action?

I come now to August, to V-J day. They rang the air raid siren in Vancouver to signalize V-J day. I wondered why and I soon found out. There had been some small celebration, a natural blowing off of steam which did not last too long. We then noticed an ominous undercurrent of wonder and a little bit of fear on the part of some people that there were to be no jobs in the shipyards or in the aircraft factories. The workers in these factories in Vancouver have done a magnificent job in this war and they now amount to a considerable number.

I tell you what happened, and it came very soon too. Private notices were sent out by these companies laying off the workers. There was no word whatever from Ottawa as to what was to happen to the workers; they were simply laid off by means of a notice from the private companies. The government just ignored the fact that this was going to raise a serious situation immediately. I do not suggest that the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) should have provided each of these men with a job. Under our system these men will find new jobs, but I do suggest that the minister should have laid some plans so that, even if V-J day took him slightly by surprise, he would have been able to make a public statement and give reassurance to the workers in Vancouver and other parts of the country. Perhaps he could have told them that he had been taken slightly by surprise, but to "hold on" because in a certain length of time the plans he had made to bring these plants back into production under other circumstances would bear fruit and jobs would be available. He could have said that in the meantime his advice was such and so. But there was no action; there was not even a statement of reassurance. I may say to the house that out there on the Pacific coast we notice that lack of advice from the fountain of all authority in the country. We would be interested in having a little bit of attention paid to our problems.

The public is looking for reassurance. It is looking for leadership at once in this post-war reconstruction period. The record of this government since the general election in providing leadership for the people of this country is a sorry one indeed. I would not say that the people of Vancouver are down about it at all. I do not think they expected very much more. They have maintained their spirit, but they and the people of Canada are high-spirited. They are exasperated; that is the only word for it. They do not want anything too wonderful; they want action, that is all.

I should like to point out one way in which the inaction and lack of leadership from this government has affected things out in that part of the country from which I come. The housing crisis and the job crisis have caused many public statements to be made at many public meetings. The mayor of the city and the provincial government have been badgered by organization after organization to do work that this government ought to be doing. I say to hon. gentlemen opposite that it is not fair that provincial and municipal governments should be badgered, and perhaps lose the confidence of the people, when they have not the power to act before this government has given them a lead. The situation is quite serious and I am sure it will bring unwise political repercussions out there.

What I want and what I say the country wants is action and leadership. And for this reason. I say to the house that laissez-faire is dead. I know the house will agree with me, but let us consider for a moment just what that means. In short, it means this. When the people of Canada gave the present government of this country a mandate on June 11 to form a government, they did not elect them negatively to maintain free enterprise in being as the economic system of this country. They gave them a mandate positively to get in there and to make free enterprise work to produce satisfactory conditions for all Canadians. I want to say to the government that they have made a bad start because what is wanted in order to make free enterprise work is leadership. Leadership in reforming and controlling private enterprise when it does not serve the interests of the public, but, above all, what is wanted is leadership which promotes public confidence in our joint ability to perform the great task ahead. I say to hon. gentlemen opposite that if they have not that confidence or if they make the people of Canada doubt their joint ability for the tasks ahead, as has been done this summer, this government will not succeed in carrying out what the people of Canada want them to do. If we have not confidence in our ability to create full employment, then all fails.

The end of laissez-faire means another thing. It means that the government are no longer solely the administrators of the affairs of this country; that they can be content just to let things go. The government are ultimately responsible for every part of our national life, and there is no ill which befalls the people of this country which it is not the duty of the government to correct. If they are to correct all those ills, they must get a new outlook. They must give us that leadership and action which I have emphasized to-night. With that in mind I wish in the few minutes remaining to me to offer two concrete suggestions on leadership, and I ask all hon. members who have served in the armed forces to see if they do not go all the way with me.

First of all, I say that the time has passed when ministers of the crown can remain in Ottawa and properly conduct the affairs of this country from the capital. The ministers must get out and get around the country, and they can do it now by aeroplane, which is very fortunate, now that we have come to the end of laissez-faire. They must get around the country to find out what the people want and to see how their legislation is working and whether or not the benefits are getting to the people. I liken a minister of the crown and his deputy minister to a general and his chief staff officer. All hon. members who have served in either war will go with me when I say that a general is not a good general if he is not out seeing his troops. After a general has made his decision and given his orders to his chief staff officer, he gets out on the ground and sees how that order is working out, and by personal reconnaissance he gathers the information that enables him to make his next decision. Such a course must be followed by ministers of the crown if they are to lead the people of this country successfully.

An hon. MEMBER: Sounds like regimentation.

Mr. MERRITT: It is not; it is leadership, but the hon. member would not know the difference. My time is almost up.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. MERRITT: The next thing the government must do is to take the people into its confidence. You can never lead them, if I may say so to hon. gentlemen, without telling them what you are going to do and how you are going to do it.

Another thing that one can learn in the armed forces, and even when one is not in the armed forces—but very few people, including myself, do—is the vital importance of time. I say to the ministers of the crown that they must take the public into their confidence not only in routine press conferences which serve their purposes very well; but also by special press conferences and by specially timed appeals over the broadcasting system and by specially timed visits throughout the country, as these emergencies come up, instead of doing as they have done this summer, just letting things go by default. If you tell the people of this country what you want them to do, they will do it for you. They have proved that very well in the last six years. I never saw any troops, and I do not know of any people, who will do anything that you want them to do if you do not first tell them what it is that you want them to do.

If I had time I could make other suggestions as to how hon. gentlemen opposite could give leadership to this country. The suggestions I have made so far are not, of course, exhaustive, and if the ministers of the crown wish to give leadership to the people of this country they can easily find many additional ways of doing it. I would not have the temerity to tell them how to do their jobs. That would ill become a new member and a young man. I know they are able administrators.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MERRITT: Surely hon. gentlemen do not take too much pleasure in that remark. Surely they must be good administrators in order to sit in the high places they occupy; they must have something to their credit. I know they are good administrators, but I say that in this new era after the war they must be more than administrators—they have to be leaders. I want them to carry this message away with them, and I believe I speak for a very large part of the people of Canada when I say this. The government must have a new approach to present-day problems, and if I may say this without being offensive, but simply to make my point, I would say that what the government need is what we needed in the army, a sort of mental "battle drill" for cabinet ministers.

But to come back to the most important point, let the government make a start at giving this leadership that is needed. Let us have from the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply a statement on how Canadians may expect to get jobs in the immediate future. Let the government tell us what they are going to do about these questions such as severance pay that are vexing labour. Let the government tell us how soon we may expect a housing expediter and how soon action will be taken to loosen bottlenecks in supplies in order that houses may be built throughout Canada.

On motion of Mr. Ross (Souris) the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, September 12, 1945.

The house met at three o'clock.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following message from the Assistant Secretary to His Excellency the Governor General:

Ottawa, September 11, 1945.

Sir:—I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Thibaudeau Rinfret, Chief Justice of Canada, acting as deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber on Wednesday, September 12, at 5.45 p.m. for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
F. L. C. Pereira,
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

The Honourable,
The Speaker of the House of Commons,
Ottawa.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

COMMUNICATING INFORMATION

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre) moved the first reading of bill No. 5, to amend the Income War Tax Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Speaker, this bill would add to the appropriate section of the Income War Tax Act the following words:

Provided that nothing in this subsection shall operate to prevent a minister of the crown from communicating to the Senate or to the House of Commons any information obtained under the provisions of this act.

The purpose of this amendment would be to remove the restrictions as to secrecy now imposed by subsection 1 of section 81, which in my view have the effect of denying to the house information which at times ought to be readily available.

This amendment would also affect the Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940, since sections 40 to 87 of the Income War Tax Act are, by section 14 of the Excess Profits Tax Act, made to apply thereto.

Mr. CHURCH: Communicating information from the cradle to the grave.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

COMMISSIONS TO AGENTS IN CONNECTION WITH SALE OF WHEAT

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 6, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. FAIR: Mr. Speaker, paragraph (i) of section 8 of the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935, reads:

—in selling and disposing of wheat as by this act provided, to utilize and employ without discrimination such marketing agencies, including commission merchants, brokers, elevator men, exporters and other persons engaged in or operating facilities for the selling and handling of wheat, as the board in its discretion may determine.

In my opinion and in the opinion of many farmers of western Canada, the present elimination of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange from the business of handling wheat should be continued forever; and this amendment is introduced for the purpose of releasing the Canadian wheat board from the restrictions imposed under this legislation.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT

INMATES OF INSTITUTIONS FOR THE POOR

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 7, to amend the Dominion Elections Act, 1938.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. FAIR: I have introduced this amendment on other occasions, and I feel that this is the appropriate time to re-introduce it, in the hope that during this session it will be treated as it should be. Section 14 deals with the disqualification of electors, and subsection 2, paragraph (k), states:

—in any province, every person who is an inmate of an institution which is maintained by any government or municipality for the housing and maintenance of the poor, if such person is by the law of that province disqualified from voting at an election of a member of the legislative assembly of that province, and did not serve in the military, naval or air forces of Canada in the war of 1914-18.

In the near future, Mr. Speaker, we are going to deal with the question of citizenship. I believe that before our deliberations on that matter are completed, this paragraph should be deleted from the Dominion Elections Act. Let us have democracy throughout our country.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

STANDING COMMITTEES

LABOUR AND EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—SUGGESTED APPOINTMENT OF SEPARATE COMMITTEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to make a suggestion to the Prime Minister and the government with regard to the standing committees of the house. I would preface this by saying that in my opinion the present standing committee set-up of this house could be improved. If the suggestion I offer receives the approval of the government, consideration ought to be given to this point before the special committee now preparing the list of members to serve on these committees makes its report to the house.

Two of the most important subjects with which the house must deal are labour and external affairs. Under the existing arrangements both these subjects fall within the jurisdiction of one committee, the standing committee on industrial and international relations. At this and succeeding sessions these two subjects must receive far greater attention than has been the custom in the past, and I believe the work is too heavy and too important to be placed upon a single committee. In my opinion there should be two standing committees, one on labour and industrial relations and the other on commonwealth and international affairs. Thus we would be assured of the opportunity for more adequate study by duly constituted committees of both these vital subjects, which have now achieved an importance far greater than at the time the existing committee on industrial and international relations was first established.

Would the Prime Minister and the government give consideration to presenting to the house an amendment to standing order 63 to give effect to this proposal?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I may say to my hon. friend that the suggestion he has just made is one which, if my recollection serves me aright, has been made at previous sessions and I think is one deserving of very careful consideration. When industrial and international relations were referred to one committee, it was felt that most industrial problems had become more or less world problems, and equally, that the most perplexing of the world problems were related in one way or the other to industry. So it was thought that the committee which would be considering the one subject would naturally be interested in the other. I agree with my hon. friend that at the present time there are no questions more important than those which relate to industry and those which relate to international affairs. If there were two separate committees therefore it might and I believe would improve the opportunities of hon. members to give careful study to these questions. I shall be very happy to consult with my colleagues immediately as to the desirability of instituting two committees instead of one.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILLS

INCLUSION OF SCHEDULE OF EXPENDITURES IN PRINTED BILL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance with respect to item No. 5 on page 12 of the order paper. During war time the government in bringing down the war appropriation bills has, with a considerable measure of agreement by the house, departed from the usual parliamentary procedure in dealing with money bills. In presenting such bills in the past few years it has been the practice of the Minister of Finance to provide the members of the house with what one might call a "fluid schedule" which was debated at great length at the resolution stage before the bill was introduced. This schedule, as I understand it, was submitted only as a guide to the house, but was not made a part of the bill introduced. It did not, therefore, restrict the government in the use of the total appropriation. There were, no doubt, reasons for proceeding in that way during war time. Now that the war is over my question to the minister is this: Will he not now revert to the usual peace time practice with respect to money bills, and have the schedule of expenditures attached to and printed with the bill? If that procedure is reverted to, the members of the house will have the printed bill before them and the breakdown of expenditures in the form of a schedule to the bill.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, very full and extended consideration was given to the proposal which the hon. member has now put in words. On the earlier occasion it was not made by him, but rather by members within the government itself, and was given full consideration. Eventually we came to the conclusion that it was too early to revert to the practice of itemizing estimates, and that the situation now is scarcely less predictable, with accuracy and certainty, than it is in time of war. It was felt that there must be some power—and a very considerable power—in the changing of plans in respect of expenditures. That is to say, suppose we give the house an indication of our intention to spend, say, $150 million for a certain purpose. It may turn out between now and the end of the fiscal year that the amount required is only $75 million, but that a larger amount than we now intend to spend for some other purpose will be required.

May I add that the same question must have arisen at the end of the last war. The armistice was on November 11, 1918, and in June of 1919, a date within the fiscal year following the fiscal year in which the war ended, the government of that day decided it would have to continue the practice of providing for some fluidity in respect of intended expenditures. If the leader of the opposition will look at the 1919 statutes he will find there a demobilization appropriation act based upon the same principles as our war appropriation acts, and indeed using the same words as our acts.

I admit at once that just as soon as possible we should get back to a position where items are passed, and where the government is strictly limited in its expenditures to each item passed. As Minister of Finance I should like to see that position resumed at the earliest possible day. It is a protection to the treasury; it is good in principle and it is a right practice to follow. I am quite unable, however, to recommend that we follow it at this moment or at this stage. We are in the middle of the year in which hostilities have ceased, and at this time many of the items we are going to place before the house, while perhaps a little better than guesses, are not what one could call estimates in any true sense of the word. Nothing like the degree of certainty is possible in respect of these estimates that is possible concerning the estimates for civil purposes.

I hope the leader of the opposition will believe that this matter has been approached with a deep sense of responsibility. It has been canvassed with the senior officers of the various departments, and while there might possibly be a very human desire on their part for a certain freedom in respect of expenditures, yet they have been most sincere in the advice they have given unanimously that this year we should follow the same principle with which we started the fiscal year, namely, that we should have a lump sum appropriation which we can apply to this, that or the other purpose, provided that those purposes are connected with the war.

Mr. BRACKEN: I should like to thank the minister for giving the reasons for bringing the measure forward in this fashion. I can understand that there is considerable justification for it under present conditions. I would strongly urge, however, that this be the last time the government proceed with a measure of the kind in this way. When may we expect a break-down of the items to be presented to the house in connection with this matter?

Mr. ILSLEY: If the debate in reply is completed to-day, I would expect to introduce the resolution to-morrow.

Mr. BRACKEN: And the minister would have a break-down then?

Mr. ILSLEY: I can have a break-down then, which can be placed upon Hansard.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

CANCELLATION OF MEETING WITH REPRESENTATIVES OF MANAGEMENT AND WORKERS IN STEEL INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Reconstruction. I sent him notice of my question before eleven o'clock this morning. Has the minister cancelled a meeting which was to have been held this afternoon, Wednesday, of representatives of management and workers in the steel industry, to consider employment and related problems? If so, why?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): For the past several months I have had a number of meetings with representatives of labour from various industries. These meetings have been arranged by a committee composed of high officials of the several labour congresses and federations of the country. Some weeks ago I held such a meeting to discuss the problems of the steel industry. In the course of the meeting Mr. Millard asked me to arrange a meeting between a group from labour in the steel industry and a group from the industry itself. At some considerable inconvenience I arranged a meeting—and had to use a good deal of persuasion to do it.

Four or five days ago a number of clippings were put on my desk stating that Mr. Millard, in addressing a labour meeting at Toronto, had said that he would not attend the meeting I had arranged unless I apologized for something or other. It then appeared to me that the purpose of the proposed meeting was undoubtedly political, rather than constructive. For that reason I cancelled the meeting on the ground that I am too busy at this time to attend political meetings in my own office.

Mr. COLDWELL: When it was suggested to me that I make this inquiry I asked the question regarding the alleged statement by Mr. Millard, to which the minister has referred. I am informed that neither Mr. Millard nor the union nor any member of the union authorized any such statement. I am informed, further, that they intended to attend the meeting, if it was called, and that the press report is entirely incorrect.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think the minister should know that, though.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE

QUESTION AS TO DECLARATION OF EMERGENCY CROP YEAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture arising out of the report of a statement made by Mr. Sinclair, one of the officers in Regina administering the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. His statement was to the effect that he anticipated an emergency year would be declared this year, because of the drastic reduction in crops in Saskatchewan and other parts of western Canada. Is the minister in a position to give a report as to the probability of an emergency year being declared.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The act provides that a decision must be made by the government before November 1. The matter is considered each year prior to that time; and when it has been considered an announcement will be made.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Tuesday, September 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. M. Benidickson for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Bracken, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, may I first of all offer my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Benidickson) and the seconder (Mr. Langlois) of this motion for an address to His Excellency. I wish to compliment them on their able presentations on their first appearance as members of this house despite the fact that they failed to see any of the shortcomings of the government of the day. Like my colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Merritt), I was surprised to notice that last evening the government were ready, in fact seemed eager to have the vote on this motion proceed when there are so many perplexing or vexing questions before the people of this nation and when as yet responsible ministers had not made statements in connection therewith. It has been pointed out that while the address was quite lengthy it is rather vague and I had thought some of the ministers would have made statements on some of these vexing questions.

The first matter I should like to deal with or at least ask questions about is that of meat rationing which was introduced again in this country on September 10, while this parliament was in session and without any statement on the situation being made by any responsible minister of the government. Some reference was made, I think perhaps by accident, by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) when he was answering a question which had been asked on hog production. His remarks will be found on page 24 of Hansard. He stated that there was a great surplus of meat in Canada at the present time and that we were called upon to supply approximately six per cent of the requirements of the devastated countries. One reading that statement could not help gaining the impression that he did not favour meat rationing in this country at this time. I am glad he is in his seat and if I am wrong in my belief I know he will correct me.

Mr. GARDINER: As the press stated, I did not mention rationing at all.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I think anybody reading the remarks of the minister would gain the impression I have mentioned. He is at liberty to state now whether or not he favours rationing at this time. According to Mr. Donald Gordon, head of the prices control board, who is in charge of rationing, the great surpluses of meat are to be found at the present time in Canada and the United States. I should like to refer to a report in the New York Times of August 18, 1945. The secretary for agriculture, Mr. C. P. Anderson, who I think is recognized as the czar of food controls in the United States of America, is the sole authority in determining the need of civilian rationing. According to this article he has stated that meat rationing might well end this fall because of the cut-backs and the heavy runs of grass-fed cattle in that country.

I want it to be clearly understood that I am heartily in accord with the idea of supplying all the meat and foodstuffs possible to Britain and the devastated countries of the world, but as I have stated no reasonable explanation has been given to either the producers or the consumers of this country that we are following the proper course to see that these people obtain this much needed meat and foodstuffs. In fact statistics and experience would indicate that meat rationing at this time is an improper course to follow.

It is true that as a result of government policy hog production is down over thirty per cent at this date, but beef cattle production has increased over thirty per cent since 1939. That is the increase which has occurred during the war years. In many cases the producers have found great difficulty in marketing their stock at the various yards throughout the nation. We had meat rationing from May 27, 1943, until February 29, 1944, and during that time processed meat was allowed to accumulate and spoil at the cost of the Canadian taxpayer. It was estimated that more meat was consumed in Canada during that rationing period than had been consumed previously.

Along with other members, I have been receiving telegrams during the last few days. I happen to represent a constituency which is not entirely wheat producing. The people in my constituency are mixed farmers and I would estimate that half of them harvest their crops with the old threshing machine in order to save their straw for their stock. Among other telegrams I received one from a local processor, a butcher, pointing out that the local rationing board had not received any meat coupons for transients. This meant that during this period no farmer in the locality could purchase meat for his threshing crew. One can understand what that would mean during this busy season with the prevailing shortage of man-power.

The first thing I did was to get in touch with the office of Mr. Taylor, the food administrator, who had made this announcement to the people of Canada. I was directed from one office to another, about a dozen in rotation, but I finally found a man who said that he understood the local situation and that these coupons should have been there. He assured me yesterday that he would have this matter straightened out through the Winnipeg office. This gives one some idea of the great bureaucratic set-up we have and the enormous number of officials and inspectors employed in the carrying out of such an undertaking. I trust that this matter has been satisfactorily settled and that these people will be able to procure much needed rations. I do not know of anyone more deserving than those who are working long hours in the harvest fields producing other forms of food.

The producers of meat in Canada are extremely anxious to have as much meat as possible go to Britain and the other devastated countries in order that future markets may be established. However, they do not consider that meat rationing is the proper course to follow at this time and they are vitally concerned. We could better supply that demand on a quota basis rather than have this rationing set-up.

During the past summer and early autumn we had strikes in the packing plants across Canada which lasted for many days. During that time no meat was processed for anyone in this country or overseas. The government of the day took no action whatever. The producer who happened to have stock at the yards during that period took his trimming when settlement was made for the cattle or hogs. During those days national selective service failed miserably.

Under our prices set-up for beef why should the producer have to take at least one and one-half cents per pound less in early August for animals which had grown and were in better condition as compared with what he would have received early in July? That is what occurred at the various markets across the country and I imagine it may be worse before snow falls this winter. During the past few years there has been a racket in our marketing policy which has affected the level of prices paid to producers of meat.

The Minister of Agriculture was requested to institute a permit system covering exports to the United States of America in case there should be a heavy live stock run. This could be done quite satisfactorily on the same basis as export permits are granted for barley and oats being shipped to the United States. The differences in price are very great, usually at least fifty per cent more being paid there than is received in Canada, but that difference could be pooled for the producers. It would be very simple to handle and the producer would not be taking the licking that he has been forced to take every time these runs occur in the yards throughout this country. By so doing we would preserve our price control system for the Canadian consumer, so that no fault could be found in that respect. I believe that some such provision as this should be made immediately. As I have pointed out, we have over thirty per cent more cattle in the country to-day than at the beginning of the war, and many of our farmers will be forced this fall by force of circumstances to market almost their entire herds in certain parts of the west. Therefore it is imperative that some such step as I have proposed be taken for their protection.

We should also endeavour to obtain world markets. If we go along much further as we have been doing, the United States and other markets will be lost to the producers of this country.

As I have said, this is a vexed problem for many people in Canada, both producers and consumers, and a statement should be made by a responsible minister of the crown before we are asked to vote on this motion. We should not be asked to content ourselves with statements made by people, many of whom might not be able to have themselves elected under a democratic form of government such as we have in this country. The war is over, whether it has been declared over or not, and our people expect something different. They expect to hear from their democratic representatives.

A few words on another matter. It is quite apparent, despite all the government propaganda about its reconstruction plans, propaganda put out, by the way, at the expense of the Canadian taxpayer, that the government's plans are at this date non-existent.

My colleague the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes), in speaking of demobilization yesterday, gave emphatic proof of the unfairness of the present demobilization system, especially with reference to the overseas men who have done so much for us during the past five years and more. He also pointed out how the present system of demobilization operates to the advantage of many of the members of our second army, the N.R.M.A. men, which I think is unfortunate.

At one period of the war men in the army were allowed upon discharge a clothing allowance at $35; later on, the clothing allowance was raised to $65, and at the present time it is $100. I sincerely trust that the government will see that all the men discharged eventually receive the same clothing allowance. I think that can justly be expected of the government.

With respect to members of the armed forces wishing to take university training it is recognized in my province at least, that grade 12 is the equivalent of first year at university, and in my little town—and the same is true of many towns in the province—grade 12 is taught in collegiate. But we had a statement from the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Abbott) the other day that grade 12 will not be recognized as first year at university, and that these men must attend the university.

I noticed a statement in this morning's press by the president of the great university of Toronto that over 900 applications had been received to attend that university this fall, 600 of which were from the armed services. He said that they could accommodate only 400. Therefore I urge, Mr. Speaker, that this matter be reconsidered and that these young men be allowed to take their first year university training in their own home districts. Many of them are young chaps with no position to support them and, if this suggestion were adopted and they could take their first year's training at home, their parents would not be out of pocket for their son's living expenses.

I wish to refer to national housing. As was so well said by my leader, the present situation is a blot on the record of the government, and worse. In the prairie provinces, outside of the large cities, it is an absolute washout. The finance companies, and the insurance companies whom the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has been consulting, refuse point blank to have anything to do under the act with housing in the towns and villages of the prairie provinces, so that the plan is entirely inoperative in any shape or form outside of the large cities. That is true of every town and village west of the great lakes, where there is an urgent demand for housing to-day. Canada's housing requirements are probably half a million houses short of being met to-day. We have national housing under the Minister of Finance and we have wartime housing under the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe). It has been charged in recent days by responsible lumbermen that certain finishing materials have been frozen for wartime housing, where the material is actually not required as yet. If that is the case these materials should be released. In my neighbourhood—and I think the same is true all across the country—many people have begun to build their homes which they intended to occupy this winter, and now they find they cannot proceed to make them habitable for the winter months because of lack of materials. That is a very serious problem for many people. In the three prairie provinces seventy per cent of the population is rural; yet under our controller system there is a priority for the cities of the prairies of 70 per cent of the lumber available. The whole thing is just wrong end to. The result is that the individual cannot get the finishing materials which he urgently requires at this time, and some statement clarifying the situation should be made by a responsible minister. I trust that the responsible minister will be able to do something toward decentralization in this matter. Centralization seems to be growing in every department of the government, but now that the war is over, theoretically at least, it is time that we moved toward decentralization in many government undertakings, and the government should at least tell the people what they may expect in the matter of housing during the coming months and in the near-future years because the people are much perturbed over the present situation.

Another matter on which I should like to say a few words is the transferable vote, and this is a personal thought of my own. I know there is difference of opinion in all groups about the transferable vote. When the Prime Minister accepted the leadership of his party in 1919 he set forth in his chart the subject of election reform. It is passing strange that at this late date he has made no move in that respect. He has told us that this is his last parliament, and yet no move has been made by him to institute the transferable vote in our dominion elections. We have had the transferable vote in Manitoba for many years and it has worked most satisfactorily there. They have it in Alberta also, I think, and it has worked well there too. In a democracy such as ours surely the will of the majority should prevail to the fullest possible extent. But what happens under our present system? In the last dominion parliament we had seventy-four members who were elected on a minority vote. In this parliament we have 149 members who were elected on a minority vote. Provision should be made in our election machinery for the transferable vote, so that where a number of candidates are contesting a riding the voter can indicate his second choice and the will of the majority of the electors prevail. I have always thought we should have that in a democracy such as ours, and I trust that the government will do something along this line.

I was surprised at the way in which the Prime Minister wandered around in his remarks the other day, following the speech so ably delivered by my leader. I could understand, of course, that the right hon. gentleman might be very tired after the load he has carried. Nevertheless I had expected more of the Prime Minister than what we heard. He spoke of having received his second mandate, although he did not go into detail and tell us how he had received it. True enough, his party received more votes than any other group, but they received very far from a majority of the votes. He did not tell us of the appeals he had made to sectionalism, both during the war years and during the campaign, pitting the wishes of certain sections of the country against those of others. I am very proud of my leader; he conducted a statesmanlike campaign from coast to coast in Canada; he was prepared to stand or fall by his principles as a great Canadian. Of that I am very proud, and I would be just as proud had I been defeated in my riding.

As to the soldiers' vote, they were so confused, that the vast majority of them never cast a ballot. I can understand that to some extent. The government in power, with their propaganda at the expense of the taxpayer, and their set-up to get it across to the troops, so befogged many of the soldiers that, as I say, the majority failed to cast a ballot at all. I am very happy to be able to point out that, despite the government propaganda, I for some reason received a complete majority over both of my opponents, as did my leader, the hon. member for Neepawa (Mr. Bracken).

I think I should follow the example of the leaders of the groups and endeavour to be brief on this occasion. But there are some vexing problems before the people at the present time, and I again appeal to the responsible ministers to make some statements on them for our guidance.

I shall support the amendment moved by my leader. I will not take time to read it; it will be found on page 34 of Hansard. I do not believe that any member of the house of any group dare stand up and tell his constituents that he is opposed to any one of the three sections of the amendment and that he is satisfied with the efforts of the government in any one of these three respects. Therefore, if they are to vote conscientiously, no matter where they sit in this house they should support the amendment.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): The speech of His Excellency delivered at the opening of this parliament has received some criticism and some praise. There is, however, one paragraph in it on which all hon. members can agree, that is the first paragraph, which reads:

> You will rejoice with me that the opening of the twentieth parliament of Canada comes at the moment of the victorious conclusion of the war.

I believe that not only all the members of this house but all the people of Canada and the peoples of the united nations who, with us, carried on this victorious conflict rejoice at the ending of the war.

However, it seems to me that our rejoicing is not complete. Our people are not entirely happy. They have fears and forebodings, which were discernible for a considerable time before the war ended. The men and women in the services and the men and women in the war industries were hoping for the end of the war, but fearful of what was going to happen to them when the war ended; and I submit to you, sir, that if we consider the ten years preceding this war, and the fact that the men and women who went into our armed forces and into our war industries were recruited in the main from that section of our population which came to maturity in the ten years prior to 1939, it is no wonder that they were fearful of what they would come back to when the war was over.

I think, although perhaps he did not intend it in that way, that the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Merritt) in his forceful speech yesterday evening proved this point, although he did not draw from it the full conclusion that he should have drawn. He said, as reported in yesterday's Hansard, at page 105:

> What we do need, and what we have not had in my adult life—and what I fear we can never have from this government—is "action" to give us full employment.

I do not know my hon. friend's age, but I imagine it is somewhere between thirty-five and forty. Consequently his adult life was not only in that period when this government was in office but also in the period when his own party was in office, and the full employment we are looking for to-day was just as far distant then as it is to-day.

That brings me to the next point I wish to make, and that is that this war, the last one, and the period in between the two wars have proven one thing, and proven it beyond the possibility of a doubt, namely, that the capitalist system can give full employment only in time of war; it has never given full employment in time of peace, and it never can give full employment in time of peace because its operation depends upon a reservoir of unemployment to keep it going.

Mr. HOMUTH: Oh, no.

Mr. MacINNIS: Say your "oh's" somewere else.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): "No, no," not "oh, no".

Mr. HOMUTH: It was both.

Mr. MacINNIS: I wonder if my hon. friends will take the word of a more respectable authority than myself.

Mr. FRASER: Not "more respectable", surely.

Mr. MacINNIS: I accept the compliment, but I still insist. I have in my hands a copy of the report of the governor of the Bank of Canada to the Minister of Finance for the year 1943; and in the section where he refers to our victory bond sales he says this:

For many individuals, victory bonds and war savings certificates purchased during the war period represent the first significant backlog of saving they have ever been able to build up. . . .

I think that is conclusive. That is not the full sentence; I will read the rest of the sentence, which gives us another sidelight on the capitalist system which is no better, indeed, but perhaps worse than the one I have already mentioned. But it is strange that we had to have a war in order that our people might be able to set a little bit aside for that rainy day which we are told always comes at some time in our lives. The next part of the sentence is this:

. . . and it is apparent that some high pressure promoters of dubious or worthless securities are attempting to exploit these savings.

That is capitalism.

I shall touch briefly on two or three points in the speech from the throne. The first item with which I wish to deal is the paragraph which reads:

Preparations for the demobilization, rehabilitation and reestablishment in civil life of the men and women in the armed forces were well under way when Germany surrendered. The same is true of measures for the reconversion of the economic life of our country from a war-time to a peace-time basis, and for the maintenance of a high level of employment and national income. The plans thus developed to meet the requirements of the period of transition are now being put into full operation.

There is something wrong here. That paragraph is either a mis-statement of facts or the references that we hear throughout the country to the unpreparedness of the government, and the references that have been made in this house, are not correct. I maintain that this paragraph is a gross misrepresentation of the facts as they now are. As a matter of fact the government has no plans and it cannot have any plans on the procedure that it is following, because it does not take under its control or direction the economic life of this country on which depends the reestablishment of the returned men and the full employment and prosperity of our people.

In the copy of "Post-war Planning Information" which came to my office yesterday the government gives its objectives as high and stable employment and income, and a greater sense of public responsibility for individual economic security and welfare. Here is what they say:

(1) To facilitate private enterprise to produce and provide employment.

I want hon. members to note the wording of that statement. It is not employment that the people of this country need. What they need is production; but we are going back to the psychology of the nineteen thirties. We are thinking in terms of employment and not in terms of the things that people work for. Let us look at the different attitude that was adopted during the war. We got full employment during the war, but we did not get full employment by trying to provide jobs for people; we got full employment by providing the needs of the war. I submit to you, sir, that we can never get full employment in Canada by just thinking of making jobs for people. We have to think in terms of the people's needs and then plan and organize to fulfil those needs. If we do that, we shall have full employment; and when there are no needs to be filled, if people are unemployed so much the better.

The other objectives are:

(2) To promote bold action by the state in those fields in which the public interest calls for public enterprise in national development;

(3) To provide, through public investment, productive employment for our human and physical resources when international and other conditions adversely affect employment; and

(4) To provide, on a basis of small regular payments against large and uncertain individual risks, for such hazards and disabilities as unemployment, sickness and old age.

I tell you, sir, that the government can never meet the situation that confronts us at the present time with a policy of that kind. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard said last night that laissez-faire was dead. I go further than that and say that the capitalist system is dead. It reminds me of the old nursery rhyme:

Humpty Dumpty sat on a wall,
Humpty Dumpty had a great fall,
All the king's horses and all the king's men
Couldn't put Humpty together again.

And we are not going to put it together again with a policy of that kind.

The next paragraph in the speech from the throne to which I should like to refer is just as far off the mark as what I have read. It reads as follows:

Through the joint efforts of the government, industry and labour, the conversion of war industries to civilian production is taking place with a maximum of delay and inconvenience.

Mr. GREEN: It is "with a minimum of delay".

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes, "with a minimum of delay and inconvenience." I did not wish to be unfair to my hon. friends across the way. I do not know just when this speech was put together, but I imagine that it was before we had that fine example of cooperation at the Lambton Golf club.

Mr. HOWE: Since when did your labour leaders travel with reporters and camera men?

Mr. GILLIS: They did not.

Mr. HOWE: They did.

Mr. WRIGHT: No, they did not.

Mr. HOWE: I was there.

Mr. MacINNIS: Then it can be assumed as logically that the reporters travelled with you; you were there too. That does not prove anything, it is the manner in which they were received that is important. Those of us who have been closely associated with the affairs of labour since the war began, and long before that, know the difficulty that labour had in getting any cooperation or recognition in industry. It was one continual battle. In 1941 the government refused point-blank to sign a contract with a trade union; and it was not until the fall of 1942 that it passed an order-in-council—I do not know why it was necessary—to permit itself to sign agreements with a trade union.

If any other proof of the lack of cooperation is required I cannot do better than read a statement made by the Minister of Reconstruction at the meeting of the Trades and Labour Congress in Toronto in 1944. And may I say before I read this that I have the highest regard for the minister's ability and the work that he has done during the last six years. He has been told that from this side of the house on many occasions, but there are more things required in life than just ability. Talking to the delegates he said:

You will say at once that I could have proposed this close association during my period as Minister of Munitions and Supply. I look back over the last five years and admit that better results could have been obtained had a closer exchange of views been arranged. My excuse for not having taken the initiative in making arrangements of that kind is that there have not been hours in the day sufficient to do everything that should have been done.

We all learn by experience—

Some more than others.

—and sometimes an opportunity comes to reorganize in a way that will profit by that experience. Therefore, in reorganizing the Department of Reconstruction I intend to ask you, who represent organized labour, to take an active part in the work of that department.

That department has been organized. I do not know exactly who are the officials now, but in April 1945 all the officers of the Department of Reconstruction had been appointed. I have their names here, and I do not find the name of a single representative of labour among them. Here they are: Mr. R. A. C. Henry, who I think was deputy minister in the Department of Munitions and Supply, on leave from Montreal Light, Heat and Power Consolidated; J. H. Berry, director-general of war supplies, on leave from General Motors Corporation.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend has no right to say that. Mr. Berry has not been associated with General Motors for some five years, and he is not on leave from that company. Mr. Henry is not on leave from Montreal Light, Heat and Power.

Mr. MacINNIS: Very well; I take the word of the minister for it, but I still say there is not a representative of labour among the officials of this department. Each of them is or was a representative of big business. I will read the names. If my hon. friend is so touchy on the matter that he does not like me to read the names of the companies with which they were associated, I will leave that out. The other names are: Hon. J. A. Brillant; H. J. Carmichael, both names which are familiar to most of us; A. A. Mackay, F. M. Ross, H. Carl Goldenberg and F. W. Bruce. That is the kind of cooperation that has existed between management, the government and labour since the war began; and the feeling in the labour movement to-day is that there is a conspiracy between the government and big business to reduce wages as quickly as possible.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend himself knows that is not true.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not think my hon. friend has any right to make that sort of remark, and I ask that he withdraw it.

Mr. MITCHELL: Very well; I will withdraw it.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am not stating anything here that I do not believe to be true. I am not built that way.

Mr. MITCHELL: I will put it this way, then; I do not think it is true.

Mr. MacINNIS: Very well; it will be for my hon. friend to prove that.

Mr. MITCHELL: If I may say this to my hon. friend on a question of privilege; he is casting a reflection upon all the ministers sitting here when he says there is a conspiracy on the part of government and big business to break down the wage structure of this country. That was the language he used. I think that is a reflection upon my character and upon the character of every minister in the House of Commons. My hon. friend is not out on a soap box in the market square; he is facing his peers right here, and he should not forget it. I am not going to stand for that sort of thing.

Mr. MacINNIS: I did not say that. I said that was the opinion of labour. There is a suspicion in their minds, and usually where there is smoke there is fire.

The next words in the speech from the throne to which I wish to direct attention are these:

> Our country will ever remember with pride the heroic exploits of Canada's fighting men and merchant seamen.

To-day Canada has a fairly large merchant marine. I have in my hand a booklet issued by the Minister of Transport, which states that at the present time there are about 180 large ocean-going cargo vessels, requiring skilled seamen to the number of some 12,000. The number of seamen in our merchant marine before the war, that is under government control, was 1,400. The wages paid at the present time by the crown company, Park Steamship company, under whose control most if not all of these vessels are operated, are also given in this booklet. I have raised the question of the wages paid on Park Steamship company vessels on a number of occasions in this house. I have shown that they were out of line, being lower than the wages paid on any other line in Canada and away below those paid on similar vessels in the United States. The last time I spoke of this matter was on the estimates during the session of 1943. I am not sure whether or not the wages have been increased since that time, but the wages paid an able seaman as of 1944, according to the Minister of Transport, were, basic wage, $89.93 per month, with a war risk bonus of $44.50, making in all a wage of $134.43. Now I think there is an application by the Park Steamship company to discontinue the bonus.

Mr. HOWE: Does my hon. friend know that to be true? I am the minister responsible for the Park Steamship company, and I am sure I have no knowledge of any such application from Park or anyone else. If my hon. friend is going to make that statement, which has been made several times, I hope he knows whether it is true. Has he ever seen the statement or application?

Mr. MacINNIS: I have been so informed; I have not seen the statement.

Mr. HOWE: Bring your evidence before you make any such statement.

Mr. MacINNIS: Does the minister deny that any such intention is in mind?

Mr. HOWE: I have never heard it suggested by Park or by any official of any Canadian steamship company, and I have never seen any intimation that this move is contemplated. If my hon. friend does not know anything at all about it I think he had better say so.

Mr. MacINNIS: Then I ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). Is there an application to that effect before the national war labour board?

Mr. MITCHELL: I understand there is, but I did not get the implication of what my hon. friend said.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MITCHELL: Just wait a moment and give me a chance. You are not out on the stump now. My hon. friend has been doing mental gymnastics all afternoon trying to prove his case. No one knows better than he that this House of Commons is not the place to argue a question of wages that can properly go before the national or a regional war labour board.

Mr. COLDWELL: This is the place to argue anything.

Mr. MITCHELL: I know that is what my hon. friend says, but when you establish machinery representative of labour and the employers, with an impartial chairman—

Mr. MacINNIS: Just a moment. Mr. Speaker, I do not mind the minister asking a question, but I am not going to stand here—

Mr. McCANN: You asked the question and he is answering it.

Mr. MacINNIS: He answered it.

Mr. McCANN: You asked it.

Mr. MacINNIS: He is not answering it now; he is lecturing me and he is not going to do that.

Mr. MITCHELL: Just a minute, now—

Mr. MacINNIS: He cannot do that on my time. He answered it and he should sit down.

Mr. MITCHELL: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. GREEN: Order; Mr. Speaker is on his feet.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understood that the Minister of Labour asked the hon. member who is now addressing the house if permission would be given to ask a question. Permission was given. If the hon. member now wishes to withdraw that privilege, it is his right to do so.

Mr. MITCHELL: I will close the matter this way; if the hon. member does not want the story I shall sit down. But let us be fair about it. I have been asked a question and in answering it I was doing the best I could to educate the hon. member. Goodness knows he needs it. But if he does not want to know, I shall sit down.

Mr. MacINNIS: If the ministers could only get together before they begin contradicting me, rather than after, we would make much better progress. The conference they are now holding should have been held before they came into the chamber. In any event I shall leave the matter there.

The next point I should like to discuss is that of housing. I am not going to deal with it at any length, because it has been dealt with by several hon. members. It was referred to by my leader, and undoubtedly further reference will be made to the subject in the house, unless something is done very quickly.

So far as housing is concerned, conditions in Vancouver are deplorable. Housing conditions in most cities of Canada were bad before the war. They have continually become worse. I am not blaming the government for that, because it was inevitable that that condition should develop. In British Columbia since the beginning of the war there has been a great increase in population. From 1941, when the census was taken, to 1944, the population increased from 818,000 in the earlier year to an estimated 932,000 in the latter year. It is considered that over 60,000 of those people are settled in Vancouver. The situation grows worse daily as many of the men from the armed services who enlisted in other provinces are taking their discharge in British Columbia, or are coming to that province after being discharged. That happened after the last war, and it is happening again this time.

The government is leaving the matter of housing to private enterprise. I hold in my hand a news item from the Vancouver Daily Province, dated July 16, which says, "Ilsley introduces vast scheme to provide veterans' homes. Ottawa guarantees builders against loss." I thought my friends favoured private enterprise, and urged that private enterprise had a right to its profit because it was prepared to take risks. But the private enterprise we have to-day asks the government to take the risks while it takes the profits. Surely that is a poor sort of private enterprise. And when it reaches that stage I say it ceases to be private enterprise and should receive no further consideration from anyone.

When during the war we needed so many planes, so many tanks, so many ships and so many guns the government planned for the production of them. So far as it was able it did not permit anything to interfere with that production—and it had wonderful success, but when veterans need homes, when war workers need homes, when our people generally need homes, why in the world can we not decide how many homes we need, and then plan and organize to build them? Why should we leave those things to private enterprise, while we guarantee them against loss, if they should have any, and at the same time permit them to take a profit, if there is one? We cannot carry on the business of making provision for our people that way.

In the short time remaining to me may I make the admission that perhaps the reason for the mental gymnastics of which the Minister of Labour complained a few minutes ago is that I have been trying to understand the social and economic philosophy of the official opposition. During the election and since that time I thought they wanted the removal of controls, and a return to private enterprise so fast that it would make one's hair stand on end. But since coming to parliament and listening to them I have decided that their tune has changed. Perhaps when I say that I am not altogether correct. In my view they have two tunes, if I have caught the strains correctly, one of which is entitled Throw the Controls out of the Window, and the second of which is Let the Government Get Action. But they cannot have both. The authority which is going to get action must have control. If we want the government to act—and this group does want it, and is willing to give the government the authority and control for action—it must have control. But hon. members to my right want it both ways. I should like to quote their position as it was placed before the house last night by the hon.

member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Merritt). This is what he says as reported on page 107 of Hansard:

> The end of laissez-faire means another thing. It means that the government are no longer solely the administrators of the affairs of this country; that they can be content just to let things go. The government are ultimately responsible for every part of our national life, and there is no ill which befalls the people of this country which it is not the duty of the government to correct. If they are to correct all those ills, they must get a new outlook.

Somewhat earlier in his address—and as I said before, his maiden speech was a good one—the hon. member said we do not want a new social order. Now it seems we must have a new outlook without a new social order.

Mr. FRASER: What Canada needs is a new leader.

Mr. MacINNIS: But if the new leader has the old leader's outlook, where does it get us? As a matter of fact, my hon. friends are in an impossible position. They want to keep in with those who want the old and also keep in with those who want the new. You cannot have it that way. This group is asking for a fundamental change in our attitude toward our social and economic problems because we are convinced that it is only by economic and social changes comparable with the changes that have taken place in our means of production that we can meet the problems with which we are confronted today.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, may I in commencing my remarks congratulate you upon having been selected for the high and responsible position which you now hold. I have observed since you have commenced to read the prayers in this house that you have read them with a sincerity which is quite noticeable. It seems to me that you have approached the tasks which you are endeavouring to perform with a humble trust in divine providence. This is a fine example which you have set for the members of this house and the people generally throughout the country.

I should like to congratulate the mover (Mr. Benidickson) and the seconder (Mr. Langlois) of the address in reply. They did very well under extremely trying conditions. As these two splendid young boys spoke I could not help recalling the last war and the boys who returned from it, my classmates, my chums. The youth of my generation had the challenge thrown to them; the call went out; they rose and marched and stood-sufficient in their generation. Once more in my lifetime I have seen a noble generation of British youth rise and prove itself equal to its testing. For those who have come safely home, for those who are impaired in health and limb, for those who have laid down their splendid young lives for freedom, for those whose lives are blighted in bereavement, there is comfort I think in a line which I discovered quoted in a little poem left us by an airman whose shattered young body lies buried in Lemnos. This line goes:

> Now God be thanked who has matched us with this hour.

The boys of the last war were told that they would have "homes for heroes;" a disturbing percentage of them were unable to obtain or maintain even hovels for heroes. They were told that they were fighting a "war to end wars;" they found on return that someone behind the scenes had contrived to make another war inevitable. They were told that they were fighting a war to make the world safe for democracy; they found that behind their backs the world had been made impossible for democracy. The boys of this war have won the world one more chance to make good. It is a comforting thing that in this house there are so many returned men, so many of the boys of this war. By careful study they will discover the difficulties which confront a government of a country like Canada in times like these. That will be a help.

One thing that is disturbing is that they are so dangerously divided. I sat here and listened to four on the Liberal side who simply adored the grand old Liberal party and appeared to believe that in it lay the hopes of the future. Then we listened to one on the Conservative side who believed that there was no need at all of a new order. Apparently his devotion to the Conservative party was equal to the devotion of the other four to the Liberal party. To what extent there is a difference between those two parties I am not at the present moment going to pronounce. We heard also a returned man from the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation group who was certain that change must come in the social order.

These boys are all united in their objective, on whatsoever side of the house they are or in whatsoever party, but they will have to learn that they will have to be united in the method or the technique to be employed or their enemies will defeat them. I fear that thus far in this debate our returned boys have not given the house such hope as we wished we could have had that they will be effective in this house.

Somewhere there is a way of doing the things which the boys wish to have done. This country is able to produce all the food, all the clothing, all the shelter, all the health services, all the educational facilities, all of everything which is necessary to give every one in Canada that high standard of living to which we as a people have a right. Everybody wants them to have that high standard. I doubt if there is a member in this house who does not want them to have that high standard. The trouble is that we have not yet determined what technique should be applied to enable the people to attain their desires. I commend to the returned men that the first important task for them is to determine what that technique shall be and come to agreement on it.

So far in this debate several hon. members have been rather touching in the beauty of their expression of the lofty ideals which actuated them in coming into this house. Those ideals are all to the good; they are all dreams of a bright new world. But new worlds and new orders cost money. The main problem confronting the members of this house is where to get the money we need. There is no need for members of any party in this house to rise and rail against the members of the government. I doubt if there is a member of the cabinet who is not just as eager to give people the things they want as the people are to get them. But in the last analysis they must find the money, and I would suggest to my friends of the Conservative party and my friends of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation that they would save themselves a lot of time and the house a lot of time if they would concentrate on the problem of where to get the money.

In the world into which we are now emerging the Canadian parliament must find much money. There are four main purposes for which it must find money.

In the first place it is going to be the duty of Canada to supply more and more goods abroad. It is going to become our duty, and is our duty, to maintain a high standard of military strength in this country, as well as in all the countries of the British commonwealth and empire. It is going to be the duty of this parliament to maintain a high standard of living in all Canada for all Canadians. At the same time the government must find increasing sums of money to pay for the government services which are daily becoming more and more urgently demanded by the people. Without going into details I think it is easily observable that the demands on our purse are great.

First, with respect to the amount of goods that we must send abroad, and by the goods we must send abroad I do not mean the goods that we trade abroad. As hon. members know, we were all brought up in our schools on the doctrine of trade, and now we find ourselves embarrassed, if not confounded, as soon as we learn that the people who need goods from us happen to have insufficient goods to return to us in repayment. We are facing a situation which is rather new throughout the world. This whole need has existed throughout the war and has been taken care of by the United States through its lend-lease arrangements, and by the Dominion of Canada through an extensive Mutual Aid programme. Let us not carry away the idea that lease-lend and Mutual Aid came to stay only while the war was on. They foreshadow a new technique which will have to be employed in the post-war world. The money to pay for Mutual Aid is not going to be a negligible item in Canada's budget. We must provide our share of the goods for the nations of the world, for the peoples of the world as a whole. Otherwise how can we possibly discharge our responsibilities under the Atlantic charter by which we were committed to a policy of freedom from want? We assume freedom from want for all mankind. And now we must provide goods for the liberated countries, for there is upon us a special responsibility with respect to them. Until they can get on their feet, as we say, to the extent that they can carry themselves we must contribute our share toward carrying them.

Then we must see to it that the members of the British commonwealth are not deprived of any goods which they need that we can produce in surplus. Especially must we remember Britain. Britain has exhausted herself during the war just past as she has never exhausted herself in her history. She has had to liquidate all her foreign investments upon which she depended for great quantities of raw materials imported from abroad. Her factories in large measure were transformed into war factories and continued operating as such until so near the coming of peace that they will be several months behind the factories of such nations as the United States or Canada, which countries have been engaged meanwhile in great measure in producing consumer goods.

Then, again, Britain's supremacy in the carrying trade of the world has been in large measure impaired owing to the tremendous percentage of her shipping that was sunk in carrying goods to all her allies on the far-flung battle-fronts of the world. Long before she can overtake her previous position in shipping, there is some indication that great concerns in the United States will have entered the field with air transport and taken over the business upon which Britain to a great extent depended for raw materials from abroad.

These are the factors which have contributed to the "economic jam" we hear of in Great Britain. The damage to Great Britain's economy I fear is in a considerable degree permanent. The whole condition calls for a Mutual Aid scheme, extensive, comprehensive and in large measure perpetual. If we do not provide for such a scheme we shall be neglecting to protect the standard of living of the matchless British commoners. We shall, moreover, be failing to provide an outlet for Canadian surpluses otherwise unmarketable abroad, and we shall be failing to ensure a strong, hopeful Britain, a fearless, unconquerable outpost guarding our frontiers for the future. Where should we have been in this war had it not been for that same outpost? Is it to be supposed for one moment that the babes who now toddle around our cradles will not have an equal need for Britain when their time of testing shall come? And what sort of improvident creatures shall we prove to have been if we neglect to foresee and to provide what is required? Therefore we must find much money for goods which are to be distributed abroad, quite regardless of the goods which we shall trade abroad.

We must make sure that we of the British commonwealth shall at all future times be strong, strong enough to discharge to the full our responsibilities for maintaining the peace of the world. Let us never forget the lessons of the League of Nations. Let us not be deluded by all this wishful thinking and talking about the security council. Let no one interpret my remarks as indicating that I have any objection to the security council; I merely suggest that if we trust too far in the security council we shall probably find it weighed in the balance and found wanting, just when we need it.

Far too many of us trusted far too much in the high-sounding phrases of collective security dreamers. We permitted ourselves to become unprepared. Tens of thousands of the noblest youth our people ever produced have died by reason of the foolhardy blunder we made in leaving them unprepared. The men who left the British peoples unprepared betrayed a whole generation of the youth of over 600,000,000 of the British peoples. While we talk about German and Japanese war criminals, perhaps we should give a little attention to British, Canadian and United States war criminals and others who neglected to keep their countries prepared. Let us remember, while we are discussing all the other things which require our attention, not to allow this important matter again to fall into disregard.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Why did the British commonwealth leaders leave their peoples unprepared? Partly at least because they were deluded into believing that there was no money. Why was the Maginot line not completed to the point where it should have been? Why was construction stopped at just the point where the Germans would enter? Well, it was reported that there was no money. Why did the Bennett administration between 1930 and 1935 allow much of Canada's already meagre military strength to be dismantled? This fact must sober my Conservative friends. It happened. Well, they thought there was no money and they must economize; and flesh and blood and life paid the price of their folly. They were not alone in their error. They were the victims of a mentality. The all-important thing for us, is to see to it that we also do not become victims of the same mentality.

There are at least four reasons why we allowed ourselves to become unprepared. The first was the money reason. The second was the strange subversive doctrine of pacifism, foremost among the exponents of which, I regret to say, were the leaders of the movement which is now the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. They were deluded; yes, and they deluded a lot of others, and once more flesh and blood and life paid the price of the folly. Then there was the League of Nations delusion, the idea that somewhere or other there was a body that could take care of our troubles for us, so that we all began to think, "let George do it". Well, George didn't do it, and finally we had to do it. That is likely to occur again. Lastly, there was the doctrine of appeasement.

In this question of no money, this notion of pacifism, this delusion regarding the League of Nations, and this false doctrine of appeasement we must seek the causes of our unpreparedness. But the foundation of most of this fallacious thinking was the no-money complex; and that is likely to be the most compelling of all motives in future, unless we seek and gain enlightenment regarding money.

As to the serious responsibility which is upon this parliament of maintaining a high standard of living in the Dominion of Canada, I shall not go into details. Everyone in the house will readily recognize the significance of the items I mention. We must manage to guarantee, both to producers and to consumers, prices which will stimulate production and consumption. We must manage to maintain in this land a wage structure which will again stimulate production and consumption and will give people that high standard of living for which we all long. Then we must provide for allowances on a generous scale.

The miserable pittance which we now give our old age pensioners is a scandal. I would hesitate to tell you what I think in fifty years people on the floor of this house will be advocating in the matter of old age pensions; I would be considered an impossible fanatic, and I am afraid the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) would have to go to an institution for his nerves if he were to hear what they will be talking about in fifty years regarding old age pensions in this country. Then we must provide pensions for the blind; pensions for others who for some reason or other are unable to gain access to the wage stream and are consequently unable to purchase the goods which the producers of Canada stand ready to produce in greater and greater abundance. When we provide them with incomes to buy we shall provide ourselves with a market to the extent to which we provide the incomes. All this is involved in maintaining a high standard of living in Canada.

The health standards which obtain in this country are an utter disgrace. I need not go into detail. All hon. members know. We all know how many people have gone year after year without visiting a doctor for extremely important medical examinations simply because they dreaded that they would hear they were sick and would have to go to a hospital; many of them have continued until they died of disease. In this wonderful Canada of ours such things must not be.

Also our educational standards in the country are far, far too low.

All these things we must undertake in this parliament to provide for in some way or another on a standard which is fitting, fitting not only for the boys who have come home from this terrible war and their wives and children, but fitting for the mothers and fathers who raised those boys, and fitting for the mothers and fathers who raised those mothers and fathers, whom we are now relegating to garrets and basements in little dark, dingy unseemly places in our cities where they—I hesitate to use the word which would describe the kind of existence they have to eke out at thirty dollars a month. Remember they are the mothers and fathers of the mothers and fathers who raised the heroes of to-day.

Another major item for which we must provide money is that of discharging the responsibilities of the government with respect to our debt, the costs of government, and so forth. I shall leave that without further comment. But I believe it all adds up to this simple fact, that we are faced with a problem of providing money which is positively bewildering.

What does the government say is the source of the money we shall use? We can have no more money than that which we can wring out of the people of Canada by all sorts of taxation; the amount of money they happen to have in their pockets is the absolute limit, beyond which it is impossible for Liberals to go. Never mind how much wheat we can produce, how much milk and cream and cheese and meats and fruits and vegetables and every other kind of food we can produce; never mind how much clothing we can produce, or how much furniture, or how many buildings or how much building material, or how vast our resources, or how willing our people are to work, or how skilful they are in the performance of their work; never mind how great our industrial equipment, we simply cannot in any way, according to these gentlemen, increase our income for our government beyond that which we can squeeze out of the people by merciless and tyrannical taxation, a process which in its very application decreases their purchasing power and thereby decreases the markets within Canada. Such is the Liberal government; such are the brilliant gentlemen who managed to trick the people of Canada into voting them back into power on the grounds that they fought the war well. I would not in any way decry the way in which they fought the war. Generally speaking, most people of average intelligence can do a pretty good job if you give them a wideopen purse; and I think the government will have to grant that they had a wide-open purse. Never a dollar that was ever asked for in this house or in a loan campaign across the country but was oversubscribed if the request was made that such be the case; therefore they had a wide-open purse, and the debt which now is accumulating against the name of the Dominion of Canada clearly indicates that they used it rather freely. Therefore let us temper the praise we give the Liberals for their war effort with the reminder that we have paid rather freely for it. Not only that, but we have committed ourselves to taxation for the future, so that most of the splendid boys who come back from fighting the war have to take off their coats now and deprive themselves for the rest of their natural lives to pay the cost of the war after already paying for it in blood and sweat, risk and suffering.

There is another group of gentlemen who are identical with the Liberals, namely, the Conservatives. They, too, believe that the only possible source of even a cent in this country is what they can wring out of the people by taxation. If I am doing the hon. gentlemen any injustice I trust at the earliest convenient moment they will rise and assure me that they have begun to see the light and that they see another source of money than taxation. There you are. That is what you have on two sides of the house. I think there is no difference between the Liberals and Conservatives. I am challenging any member of the Liberal party or the Conservative party to rise and show a single iota of difference between the two parties. In fact I would judge that the Conservatives are probably just a little more liberal than the Liberals and the Liberals a little more conservative than the Conservatives. I think I have not been unkind.

Now we come to the socialist concept. Here I tread with a measure of trepidation because I am not entirely sure I have been able to learn from the speeches I have heard and the books I have read just what socialism stands for. But my idea—I speak subject to correction—is that they depend on taxation and borrowing just as the Liberals and Conservatives do. There is no difference at all in that respect between them. But they do say that if they had the government take over the industries so that the government could acquire all the profits which industries are making that would constitute another source of revenue for the government; and if they should see fit to raise the price a little on the goods coming out of the factories they would be able to tax the people in that manner too. Therefore they have another method of taxation through government ownership of industry. If I have been unfair to them I should be glad to be answered in great detail. I have endeavoured to be courteous in my analysis of the situation.

Is there not some other way? Should not the amount of money which is available to a government depend directly upon the goods and services which the nation can produce? If we think of the goods and services producing capacity of Canada and we contemplate our ability to produce enough goods and services to supply our people with all the food, clothing, shelter, housing, education and health services that they need, and to produce enough goods and services to take care of our costs with respect to armaments and to produce enough goods and services to discharge our responsibilities with respect to goods which have to be shipped abroad, and to produce enough goods and services to pay the costs of running our government, immediately hope fills our hearts. We think of the great stretches of grain-growing country and all the other resources which we have; of the tremendous machine equipment which has developed during this war, and the skills which we have acquired, including all the different technological plastic advances, and we say, surely we can produce enough goods and services to accomplish all these things. Let us go forward in faith, happiness and good cheer. But the minute we think of paying for them by taking all the necessary money out of our pockets, then, Mr. Speaker, we are immediately overcome with despair.

I should like to commend to the young men and the new members who have come to this house the proposition, that it is possible to turn into money the goods and services which the nation can produce. It is possible to turn these into money within the nation. What is physically possible is financially possible. And may I commend to them this proposition for most earnest study? May I suggest to them that through this device, through this technique, lies the way to the new order.

Mr. BONA ARSENAULT (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, my remarks shall be brief, as I had no intention of taking part in this debate. I represent in this house the county of Bonaventure, which is situated in the eastern part of the province of Quebec adjoining New Brunswick. Its population of about 40,000 people are descendants of Acadians, empire loyalists, early traders and fishermen from France and the English channel, Irish, Scottish and English. Racial harmony has ever prevailed in that county, and the majority of the people speak both languages. I am thankful indeed to that constituency for having elected me to this house by a substantial majority. One of my predecessors representing that county here, one who certainly will be remembered by the older members of this house, was the late Hon. Charles Marcil, who was elected for the first time in 1900 and represented Bonaventure without interruption for thirty-six years.

As I mentioned a moment ago, I did not intend to take part in this debate until yesterday, when the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) made certain references to service men seeking their discharge from the army. I should like to quote briefly from the address of the hon. member at page 78:

> A soldier may go up to the sergeant-major, and if he cannot speak French all he has to do is to shrug his shoulders and say, "Me no speak English" and he is out—out to go and seek a job before the long-service men come back from overseas.

The hon. member for Nanaimo, who I understand has been in charge of the Pacific command for a certain period, should know better; but there is another aspect to this matter which I should like to stress very briefly before this house. For many years a certain element in the Conservative party could not find any better solution for some of our most crucial problems than to play one part of the country against the other, than to stir up and spread prejudice against one-third of the population of our country, and to capitalize week after week, month after month upon the resentment which they themselves help to develop in certain sections of Canada against the province of Quebec. Yet to-day they wonder why that party has not had a chance to come back into office more than once during the last twenty-five years. They wonder why they were so badly defeated on the last polling day; and they wonder why an ex-Conservative like myself should be standing now on this side of the house supporting the Liberal administration. In referring to the service men in the terms he used yesterday the hon. member for Nanaimo was keeping in line with the familiar Tory way of playing ball. From 1939 to 1942 the shares of the Conservative party were so low in the minds of the people of this country that some drastic measure, some radical move had to be undertaken in order to save that party from total disappearance. In the fall of 1942 a convention of the party was held at Winnipeg, in which I actively participated in a last and vain hope that the party to which I had belonged all my life and to which I was very strongly tied by family traditions, would be regenerated. That was where and how the old Conservative party became overnight the young and up-to date Progressive Conservative party; at least I, together with many others throughout this dominion, strongly held that belief. A new leader was elected, certainly an outstanding man and, I must admit frankly, a man for whom I still have a great deal of admiration. A certain platform was adopted, and the younger generation in the party thought that at last it had got rid of the Tories and all their reactionary influence within the party.

For about a year and a half the new leader of this party succeeded in quieting down that element, so much so that at one time the name of John Bracken was popular not only throughout the other provinces of Canada but even in the far distant rural sections of old Quebec. But then came the Saskatchewan provincial election and the sweeping victory of the C.C.F. over the Progressive Conservative candidates, while the Bloc Populaire apparently was making decisive headway in the province of Quebec. That was enough for the highly inspired strategists of the Progressive Conservative party to change their mind about Winnipeg and throw into the waste paper basket the gentleman's agreements which had been arrived at there after long days and nights of laborious discussion in committee rooms. This change of mind is confirmed by a Toronto weekly, Saturday Night, in an editorial which appeared on June 24, 1944, from which I wish to quote a brief extract:

> In spite of Mr. McTague's clever pleading this new attitude—

They mean the attitude of the new party.

> —is definitely a change of mind, and a change back in the mind of Mr. Meighen and the element which had charge of the party before South York. . . . It means in effect that the party has decided to capitalize on the resentment against Quebec and to abandon all idea of obtaining any Quebec support for many years to come.

Then followed my resignation as president of the Progressive Conservative association for Quebec and the announcement that I was leaving the ranks of the party.

Again I refer the house to a brief extract from an editorial published by the Toronto Saturday Night. While this was published over a year ago, on July 1, 1944, it looks as if it had been written to-day:

> The action of the Progressive Conservatives in tossing Quebec into the discard in order to improve their position in other provinces is probably, from the Liberal point of view, a more interesting development than even the Saskatchewan election itself.
> It will make it extremely difficult for any French-speaking members from Quebec to co-operate with any other party than the Liberal, even if they do not admit to being Liberals themselves in the next parliament; and after the McTague speech they are unlikely to do anything that would bring into power a party which is practically going to the country on a platform of teaching Quebec what's what.

The short term result of such an attitude has been to consolidate the Liberal party's hold on Quebec, without lessening it to any substantial extent in Ontario where the Liberal vote was barely 5½ per cent below the Conservative, in spite of the results of the provincial elections held in that province one week prior to the federal vote.

As a long term result, the Progressive Conservative party has thrown away the best chance it has had since 1930 to take office, and has thrown that chance away for a long period of years to come. In the past any attempt to lessen in the minds of the people of Canada the magnificent war effort performed by Quebec in the last five tragic years of war has not paid dividends to the Progressive Conservative party.

Turning to volunteer enlistments, I would challenge from my place in the house any hon. member outside Quebec to place beside the record of the county of Bonaventure, which I represent, the record of his constituency in respect of the number of volunteers for the army, the navy and the air force, on a pro rata basis of population, and I am satisfied the comparison would reflect no discredit upon my riding. The same condition has obtained in the neighbouring county of Gaspe, and also in Dorchester and very likely in many other constituencies in my province.

Despite her two cultures, Canada has made a tremendous contribution to the war effort in the last five years. It is most doubtful whether the adoption of any of the drastic measures advocated by the Progressive Conservative party would have added materially to that contribution. On the contrary, I am sure that in the long run it would have torn confederation apart.

Mr. Speaker, you have now been told why I stand to-day on this side of the house pledging my support to what I believe to be the only national party in Canada, the only party the policies of which are accepted generally by all sections of the country and all classes of our population.

One point which must not be overlooked, but which must be recognized, is that the leader of the government has performed an outstanding and almost superhuman task under most adverse circumstances. During these long and tragic years of war he has spared no effort in shaping the development of an extremely powerful military and economic war effort, while at the same time safeguarding in all ways humanly possible that measure of Canadian unity, understanding and friendship which is the basic fundamental of that true and sincere collaboration shared by citizens of Canada of different racial origins. I firmly believe that this Liberal government is the one government which can bring about the best understanding in Canada, and lay the most solid foundation of a great Canadian nation of the future.

In conclusion, I should like to make a special appeal at the beginning of this session to all members of the house, both new and old, and to ask them to do their utmost to bring about goodwill, better understanding and sincere friendship among Canadians of different racial extractions and different creeds. I appeal to all true Canadians to lay aside past dissensions and to join hand in hand in building up on this continent a great and prosperous Canadian nation.

This war has taught us many things. It has taught us, for instance, that Canada is a nation among the nations of the world. It has taught us also, that what we lack most in Canada at this time is Canadian-minded Canadians. We now know things that we did not know before the war. We know that Canada is capable of great achievements. In the past perhaps we have suffered from a lack of a spirit of enterprise, a lack of vision and of initiative. Now that we have learned how to use men, money and machinery, our generation will undoubtedly benefit from that knowledge. We have used men, money and machines for war-time purposes and we must continue to use them for peace-time progress. Our society must be given the conscious purpose of inspiring peace-time devotion as well as war-time sacrifice. This aim, this objective can be attained by collaboration between the different nations of the world, but it can be obtained in the first place and more surely by cooperation by individuals. That is why I stand for cooperation. I never stood and I do not stand for a separated Quebec in a disunited Canada. I am a Canadian-minded Canadian and I stand for a united Canada which will secure the full benefit of our British connections.

The diversity of racial origin in Canada to-day should not be a problem. We have so many other problems to deal with. Why try to divide the French and English speaking people of this country on five per cent of our differences when we should stand united on ninety-five per cent of our resemblance, of our mutual interests and of our common ideals? After all, we are proceeding, sometimes perhaps by different roads, toward the same goal, toward the same aim, which is the greatness, the progress and the prosperity of this country. It is the combined efforts of all the elements of our beautiful land carried out in a spirit of justice, mutual understanding and mutual loyalty that will guide us Canadians, French and English speaking, toward glorious realization.

Mr. Speaker, may I add just one word to thank you, as well as the hon. members of this house, for the keen attention which you have had the kindness to give me, and to assure you, Mr. Speaker, of my full cooperation.

The needs of the constituency I represent are many. I shall no doubt have the opportunity of pointing them out to you in the debate on the budget, but to-day I do not wish to delay any longer the proceedings of this house.

Mr. PAUL-EDMOND GAGNON (Chicoutimi) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, your nomination as Speaker is a tribute of esteem and an unequivocal mark of confidence on the part of the hon. members of this house. I take pleasure, with the hon. members who have spoken before me, in tendering you my most sincere congratulations and my best wishes of success in the discharge of your important functions.

The mover of the address in reply to the speech from the throne the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) carried out his task with a brilliance and a skill which portend splendid successes for the future. His performance has given me much pleasure.

No one could have lauded or eulogized the right hon. the prime minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and his government more sincerely or with more enthusiasm than did the seconder of the address, the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Langlois). I congratulate him, without however envying him, for having felt the liberal grace at such an early age, and I wish he may have perseverance. May he always see, in life and in politics, only the bright side of things.

No one in this house is more delighted than myself to hear that at long last, the government intends to provide the Canadian nation with a flag of its own. If the supreme consolation of pressing to their dying breast the glorious emblem of their race and country was denied our gallant soldiers, we who shall reap the fruits of their sacrifice shall joyfully feel our hearts thrill to the sight of the glorious symbol whose folds will ever show the stain of their blood and sweat.

The plan to make Ottawa a gigantic memorial in commemoration of our brave fighters who fell on the battlefield was a happy thought. I heartily endorse it, but as a finishing touch to this magnificent scheme, I should like to see an isolated plot of soil of sinister and mournful aspect set apart for the raising of a cold unadorned pillar, similar in the style to a government order, in honour of all the civilians victimized by the wartime prices and trade board and selective service, so that the memory of the countless dictatorial annoyances and vexations borne during the war by the people on the home front may be kept alive.

I hope that the government will codify the social legislation it will submit to the approval of the house during the present session so as to grant equal privileges to every Canadian citizen. In this sphere, we already have the family allowances act which is excellent in itself but vitiated in its form and application to French Canadians. That is why the Duplessis government, hoping to supplement the federal act and to remedy its shortcomings, has decided to contribute a part of the allowance and thus ensure to large families the benefits which accrue from this security measure.

This family allowance measure is a striking example of things to be expected in the legislative and economic fields were we to allow the federal government to centralize our sources of income together with the privileges now held by the provincial administrations.

If, on the one hand, we have reason to commend the wisdom and excellence of the measures forecast in the speech from the throne, I believe that, on the other hand, the deficiencies noticeable make it an incomplete and unfinished document. I realize that the government cannot give at the opening of a new parliament, a thorough outline of all the steps contemplated; however, I think the greatest attention and the first place should have been devoted to the problems inherent to the transition from a war-time to a peace-time economy. The people of Canada want work. The earnest desire of the man on the street is to bring home a pay envelope sufficiently full to take care of his needs and those of his family. I know the worthy workers of my constituency. They are skilled men closely grouped together and who ask nothing but the opportunity to earn a living honourably, but I know that in the event of a return of unemployment, of a decline in the number of jobs available, which is the case at the present time, our workers will not relish the total or partial closing of their plants, even though the national flag be unfurled over the buildings.

Chicoutimi constituency, which I am honoured to represent in this house, besides being one of the most beautiful in the country, is among those who have been foremost in helping and speeding the war effort. Not only have we supplied, for the armed services, numerous recruits who have fought courageously on every battlefield of the world, but, by the intensive production of aluminium at Arvida, by the surprising volume of our agricultural output, our district, I am proud to say, has been one of the principal factors of victory. Having shared in the battles on all fronts, we are to-day entitled to share in the reward.

In our midst lie tremendous opportunities for industrial expansion. The possibilities for development of the Saguenay region are unlimited. We now have, besides those already in existence, previous to the war, one of the mightiest hydro-electric plants in the world, the Shipshaw power house. Thousands upon thousands of horse-power presently go to waste in the absence of industries which could utilize them. A group of far-sighted and patriotic citizens, concerned about the future of our district, have formed a board of economic guidance to develop an extensive programme designed to attract Canadian and foreign industries interested in establishing their headquarters or branch offices in Canada. However, the aim of these enterprising men of my constituency can be realized only with the help of the government. We ask neither for money nor special privileges; all we want and wish is a proper and permanent job for every member of our working class which would ensure the development and prosperity of one of the most beautiful parts of the province of Quebec. We wish the government to undertake, in and out of Canada, an advertising programme informing capitalists and business men that we possess hydraulic developments awaiting utilization and an available and skilled manpower comparable to any for efficiency and service. We demand to be free from the fear of unemployment, for we wish to live in peace and enjoy the freedom for which our soldiers, airmen and seamen have fought and died.

I believe I am right in presuming that the yearnings of my constituents, both male and female, are shared by the whole population of Canada. Our ideal is that of the youth of our country who at last desire to get their share of happiness and welfare which Divine Providence has placed within the reach of everyone.

Our ambition is to forget the hideous spectre of war and to give a deeper meaning to the word brotherhood; it is to forsake the road leading to misery, pain, hatred and death, to enter resolutely the path of hope, life and love.

Our people must not be left under the impression that war is a great cause of prosperity and that a solution to the problems which confront mankind must always be sought on the graves of our sons.

Therefore, I say that the great task facing the government, and which is one of its main concerns, is to strive unremittingly to achieve a prompt and smooth reconversion of our war-time economy to a peace-time one.

And one of the most powerful means of providing our country with a permanent and real standard of prosperity is to possess a merchant marine which will enable us to export our manufactured goods to all the countries of the world and especially to South America.

I therefore support wholeheartedly the suggestion of the hon. member for Gaspe who has made interesting and timely remarks in that respect, and I feel that the government should regard this matter as a vital one. One need not be a great economist to know that if we have a favourable trade balance, the whole economy of our country will benefit therefrom and the lot of all the classes of society will improve correspondingly.

(Text): Because I love my country and because I want it to be great, strong and prosperous, my collaboration is pledged to those who assume the responsibility of assuring its greatness, its prosperity and bringing about its financial, economic and moral strength. While keeping my full freedom of thought and action and remaining totally independent of all political parties, I feel it my duty to cooperate with government authorities so as to promote and protect Canada's interest, and I shall not fail to keep my pledge.

On motion of Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North) the debate was adjourned.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Charles H. Larose, Esquire, Acting Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Honour, the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, the House went up to the Senate.

And having returned,

Mr. SPEAKER informed the house that the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General had been pleased to give in His Majesty's name the royal assent to the following bills:

An act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for national defence and demobilization.

An act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1946.

It being five minutes after six o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, September 13, 1945.

The house met at three o'clock.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STRIKE OF EMPLOYEES AT WINDSOR PLANT OF THE FORD MOTOR COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour. What action is being taken by the government to help bring about an early settlement of the labour dispute at the Ford Motor company plant at Windsor, Ontario?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in reply to my hon. friend may I say the strike was called only yesterday. I understand the report of the board of conciliation reached the workers yesterday morning. I have had no word from the company as to its attitude toward the report of the board, but I do think at this time the history of events might be placed on the record, so that everyone may understand what we have done to prevent this stoppage of work in the city of Windsor.

In the early years of the war the Ford Motor Company operated without any signed contract between its employees and the company. Commencing in the fall of 1941 demands developed for an agreement between the company and its employees.

In November, 1941, the Department of Labour arranged a vote of the employees under an agreement with the company that it would make a contract with its employees if the majority of them indicated by the vote that it was their desire that the company do so.

As a result of these negotiations an agreement was completed between the company and its employees of January 15, 1942. Disputes have arisen since the time of the agreement and the department has succeeded in bringing about agreement with comparatively little actual stoppage of work.

Negotiations have been going on for the past eighteen months looking to a new agreement. With the permission of the house I would ask that the document I hold in my hand be placed on Hansard, and taken as read. It is lengthy, and sets out the details of the negotiations which have taken place.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think it should be read.

Mr. MITCHELL: If the house would like to have it read, I shall read it.

Mr. COLDWELL: Read it.

Mr. MITCHELL: Very well. The following is a summary of conciliation in industrial relations between the Ford Motor Company of Canada, Limited, and local 200, U.A.W.-C.I.O., Windsor, Ontario, showing action taken by the Minister of Labour of Canada and the Minister of Labour of Ontario.

November, 1941: Consent vote conducted by Department of Labour of Canada to determine bargaining agency.

January 15, 1942: Agreement completed between company and local 200 after negotiations following vote.

November, 1942: Employees went on strike to enforce claim that 37 female employees were performing work previously performed by men and were therefore entitled to equal pay. After conciliation by Hon. Peter Heenan, Minister of Labour of Ontario, Hon. C. P. McTague was appointed umpire and decision handed down December 31, 1942. He found that clerical work performed by men was incidental to other duties not required of women. Claim of union not upheld.

December 31, 1942: Memorandum to agreement concluded, amending agreement of January 15, 1942.

January 11, 1944: Memorandum of agreement concluded, further amending agreement of January 15, 1942.

April, 1944: Dispute with regard to suspension of certain stewards, followed by stoppage of work by all employees, and termination of agreement by company in consequence. Minister of Labour of Canada sent conciliation officers to Windsor. Parties accepted a proposal of the wartime labour relations board on April 28, which provided for certification of bargaining representatives and negotiation of new agreement. Work resumed May 1.

May 2, 1944: Workers again went on strike because of objections of union to grievance procedure as determined by the national wartime labour relations board. Mr. Justice O'Connor (in his capacity as a supreme court judge), Mr. M. M. Maclean, industrial relations officer, and Mr. B. Wilson, one of his assistants, went to Windsor. Work finally resumed May 11 on the understanding that board would clarify the grievance procedure, which was done on May 12.

May, 1944, to June, 1945: Mr. Louis Fine, Ontario Department of Labour, acted as umpire under terms of grievance procedure established by board. Company has refused to implement one decision of umpire, which refusal is now the subject of an application by the union to the Ontario labour relations board for leave to prosecute.

May, 1944 to January, 1945: Negotiations for new agreement continued as provided in settlement of wartime labour relations board, dated April 28, 1944.

January 22, 1945: Ontario labour relations board asked Minister of Labour to appoint conciliation officer under section 12 of P.C. 1003, one of the parties having advised the Ontario board that negotiations had continued for more than thirty days and that there appeared no likelihood of concluding an agreement.

January 29, 1945: Minister of Labour appointed Mr. Louis Fine, of Toronto, to confer with the parties and to attempt to effect an agreement.

March 28, 1945: Mr. Fine reported to Minister of Labour that in his opinion an agreement was impossible and the situation was very complicated and difficult.

April 5, 1945: Application by company to wartime labour relations board (national) for interpretation of the termination clause (section 14) of April 28, 1944, settlement. Arbitration committee appointed by the board ruled that certain sections of the settlement which preserved the individual rights of the employees could be terminated only at the expiration of one year on two months' notice by either party. All other clauses of the agreement would terminate at the expiration of fourteen days after a conciliation board reported to the Minister of Labour.

April 18, 1945: Minister of Labour appointed Hon. Mr. Justice S. E. Richards, of Winnipeg, Manitoba, an industrial disputes inquiry commission, under order in council P.C. 4020, to confer with the parties, endeavour to effect an agreement and report his findings and recommendations to the minister.

August 3, 1945: Hon. Mr. Justice Richards submitted to Minister of Labour an interim report recommending that the present agreement be allowed to stand until the end of the present year and that negotiations for a new agreement be entered into afresh on October 15, 1945.

August 16, 1945: Mr. Justice Richards' report transmitted to parties.

August 21, 1945: Reported that local 200 U.A.W.-C.I.O. had rejected the recommendation of Mr. Justice Richards.

August 28, 1945: Mr. Justice Richards recommended to the Minister of Labour that in view of the rejection of the recommendations in his interim report a conciliation board should be immediately established.

August 30, 1945: The Minister of Labour established a conciliation board.

September 1, 1945: The union nominated Mr. Bora Laskin of Toronto as a member of the board.

September 1, 1945: The company nominated Mr. S. L. Springsteen, K.C., of Windsor, as a member of the board.

September 1, 1945: In the absence of a joint recommendation from the two board members, the Minister of Labour appointed the Honourable Mr. Justice G. B. O'Connor of the Supreme Court of Alberta as third member and chairman of the board.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Mr. Justice O'Connor and other members of the board conducted hearings in Windsor last week.

The board submitted its report on September 11, and it was released to employees and employers on the same date.

The board in its report expresses the opinion that the main issues preventing an agreement between the company and its employees are the questions of "union shop" and "check off." The union asks for the inclusion of both these provisions. The company, on the other hand, is fully determined that there shall not be a condition of employment with the company that a person must be, become, or remain, a member in good standing in the union.

The report of the board of conciliation records the belief that the Minister of Labour of Canada as well as the Minister of Labour of Ontario from time to time have exhausted every possible governmental effort to compromise the difficulties between the parties and to keep the Ford plant in operation.

There were a number of issues brought before the board of conciliation other than those of "union shop" and "check-off."

In dealing with "union shop" and "check-off" the chairman and the representative of the employees recommended that the parties agree to a voluntary check-off irrevocable during the term of the contract as a solution of the present difficulty. In addition, the representative of the employees recommended that a provision for maintenance of membership be coupled with a provision for "check-off."

The representative of the company on the board of conciliation did not concur in either recommendation.

My department has one of its conciliators on the spot at this time to keep the minister and the government informed of developments.

HOUSING

CONVERSION OF MILITARY CAMPS AND OTHER GOVERNMENT PREMISES TO MEET EMERGENCY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the pressing shortage of shelter for Canadian families, which is likely to become extremely acute during the coming winter, has the government given consideration to the conversion of suitable military camps and other premises owned by the government into temporary housing accommodation to meet this emergency?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Yes, consideration has been given to the utilization of camps and other premises owned by the government. I think it was two months ago or thereabouts that the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) and I met a delegation of mayors from the larger cities of Canada and made an offer on behalf of the government to make available such premises as we thought could be given up by the military authorities and where they would be suitable. Since that time certain premises have been made available to the municipalities, and others are under discussion at the present time. There is an officer in the Department of Reconstruction who is working on this class of problem, and perhaps the Minister of Reconstruction would like to add something to what I have said. In any event I can say positively from my own knowledge that the matter has been given extensive consideration and necessary arrangements have been set up to deal with the situations that arise.

QUESTION AS TO FREEZING OF PLUMBING MATERIALS IN PARTLY CONSTRUCTED HOUSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): I would ask the hon. Minister of Finance if it would be possible to hold back the plumbing freezing order now being invoked on houses partly constructed, until such time as these houses are completed, inasmuch as the majority of them are to be occupied by returned soldiers?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I do not think that is in my department.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Perhaps the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply can tell us.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): I must say that I never heard of this order in connection with houses under construction.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): In regard to plumbing.

Mr. HOWE: There may be one, but I have never heard of it.

CATTLE

CARRY-OVER IN TORONTO STOCK YARDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. C. SENN (Haldimand): Before the orders of the day are called I should like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. This is based on a wire which I understand the Toronto live stock exchange sent to him either yesterday or to-day. The wire describes a serious and in fact critical condition which exists in the Toronto stock yards where some 2,000 head of good cattle have been carried over since Sunday with no buyers in prospect and asking that permits be granted to ship these cattle to the United States. Will the minister make a statement to the house as to what action has been or will be taken to remedy this situation?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I received the wire referred to just before I came down to the house, and I did not expect a question with regard to it. I can say that there often is a carry-over on the Toronto market at the beginning of the week but I do not think it is usually due to the fact that there are no buyers. My understanding is that the weighing capacity of the yards is only 3,500, that no more than that number can be put through whether there are buyers or not. The only way in which that could be corrected would be to have the weighing capacity increased. I understand that these yards are under the control of the provincial government and I do not know what their attitude with regard to that would be or whether the capacity could be increased. The wire includes a statement which is contrary to the facts. It states:

> Understand meat board cannot handle any further shipments of beef until end of this month.

The meat board is buying all the meat that is offered every day. All the meat that does come from the plants in shape to be shipped to Britain is being purchased by the board, so if there is any delay that is not the reason.

Mr. SENN: Will the minister permit a supplementary question? Can he say whether the abattoirs in Toronto are being operated to full capacity?

Mr. GARDINER: I doubt if they are being operated at the same capacity as they were at the peak of supplies, say last year, but they are being operated at a capacity which is very high as compared with some other times.

WAR SERVICE GRANTS

ELIGIBILITY OF MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT DISCHARGED FROM ARMED FORCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. O. PROBE (Regina City): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I regret that this matter came up so recently that I was unable to send him a copy of the question. Are members of parliament who are also members of the armed forces or discharged veterans debarred because of their membership in the House of Commons from eligibility to receive any or all of the benefits to which they would otherwise be entitled on discharge under the War Service Grants Act, 1944 or the Veterans' Land Act, 1942?

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): This question came to my attention about three or four days ago. Our policy is directed entirely toward the protection of members of this house. The matter has been referred to the deputy minister of justice for a ruling as to whether or not any benefits conferred upon relatives of any hon. member of this house would be jeopardized by the independence of parliament act. As soon as I have the decision I shall be glad to make a reply to my hon. friend.

MEAT RATIONING

EXTRA RATIONS FOR FARMERS EMPLOYING NUMBERS OF MEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance under whose jurisdiction is Canada's new meat rationing plan. An urgent message came to me this morning from one of my Peel farmers stating that he is stook threshing and corn cutting this week and will have fourteen extra men for meals at his farm. He tells me that he went to the nearest rationing board office, which is at Orangeville, to obtain extra meat rations and was advised that no instructions had been received and no authority had been issued by the wartime prices and trade board to give additional meat coupons for that purpose. In view of what appears to be a very urgent situation with respect to the rural parts of Canada I would ask the minister to give consideration to having that authority and direction delivered to the appropriate officers so that these extra rations may be available for the purposes I have mentioned.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I shall bring the matter to the attention of the wartime prices and trade board. I received notice of the question too late to permit my making a more extended reply to the question.

Mr. GRAYDON: As this matter is so urgent in the rural parts perhaps the minister would suggest to the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board that telegrams be sent to the ration board centres throughout Canada. This situation is a matter of extreme concern to farmers because they are right in the middle of the season and need additional supplies.

REQUEST FOR ABANDONMENT OF RATIONING AND REQUISITIONING FOR EXPORT

Mr. W. C. MACDONALD (Halifax): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance with regard to meat rationing. It is reported in the press to-day that retail butchers have asked that meat rationing be abandoned and that instead meat be requisitioned for shipment overseas and the balance equitably distributed throughout the country. I should like to ask the minister what consideration has been given to these representations.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): The hon. member sent me a notice of this question and I have a brief statement prepared in answer. There appears to be no difference of opinion that Canada should make every effort to make the maximum amount of meat available to the United Kingdom and liberated countries in Europe, but the question is raised as to why coupon rationing is necessary to achieve that result. It is suggested that we might requisition such meat as we need for export and that the balance should be distributed equitably among the Canadian people. The matter is not nearly as simple as that. In the first place, meat for export must come from the inspected packing plants. It is only meat from these plants which can enter into interprovincial trade. It is meat from these plants which in general goes to feed the people in areas which are not self-sufficient in meat supplies, such as the maritime provinces, the northern parts of Ontario and Quebec, and British Columbia, and it is these plants which in large measure provide for the larger cities.

Requisitioning of meat for export would therefore shorten the supply of meat from the inspected plants and create a serious deficiency in those areas which depend on such plants for supplies, leaving areas whose meat requirements can be taken care of locally with abundant supplies. The truth of that is emphasized by what took place before meat rationing was first introduced in 1943. Butchers in Toronto, Montreal and elsewhere had nothing to sell, and stores were actually closed for lack of supplies, while there was an abundance of meat in other areas. As soon as coupon rationing was introduced, that all changed. The flow of coupons from the consumer through the retailer to the packer automatically controlled the flow of meat, and every retailer and every consumer received his fair share. It should not be overlooked that the previous rationing was introduced primarily to do the very thing I have described, namely, to ensure equitable distribution. This time the ration is designed to reduce consumption of meat in Canada for reasons with which I think most Canadians are in agreement, but at the same time it will maintain an equitable distribution of the supply available for domestic consumption. I have every reason to believe that the very merchants who are protesting against rationing to-day would, with their customers, be the first to suffer in many cases, if we requisitioned meat for overseas shipment and discontinued coupon rationing.

We know also that maldistribution breeds black markets. The existence of black markets would attract an increasing amount of live stock from the normal trade channels and either reduce the amount of meat we would export or further shorten the supplies of the honest retailer who will not engage in black market activities. We would find ourselves in the vicious circle which such a situation always produces.

I am satisfied most of those who have protested do not realize the results which would follow if we had attempted to meet our obligations to our allies without rationing. If they did, I cannot believe that they would have joined in voicing these protests. No one welcomes rationing; neither the wartime prices and trade board officials who must administer it, nor the consumer, nor the retailer nor the packer. To all it means added work and inconvenience. On the other hand, however, it means an opportunity to assist those of our allies who have felt the physical ravages of war; to demonstrate that humanitarian considerations still play a part in world affairs and to maintain the enviable record which Canada has established during the war years of being sufficiently self-disciplined to provide for the needs of all its citizens in an orderly and decent fashion.

As hon. members are aware, the mechanics of the meat rationing system introduced last Monday differ somewhat from the mechanics of the previous system. These changes were introduced with a view to simplifying the problems of those who have to operate under rationing. Protests have been received, however, from retail butchers, and the wartime prices and trade board has therefore arranged to meet with representatives of the Retail Merchants Association here in Ottawa on Wednesday next, September 19.

SMALL PACKERS—TRIMMINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I would like to base a question on a series of telegrams which have reached my desk since the house convened at three o'clock, and perhaps the Minister of Finance would prepare a reply for to-morrow, taking this as notice. The telegrams have to do with the small packers. The first one reads—I will give only the substance:

Impossible to continue to remain in business under new rationing regulations for the reason that—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must remind the hon. member that it is against the rules to read telegrams.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I bow to your ruling, sir. I would ask the hon. Minister of Finance if he could tell the house what arrangements are being made to keep the small packers in Canada in business under the new meat rationing regulations, which make no provision for the trimmings produced by small packers, to find a market which would keep them in business.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I will make inquiry about the matter of the trimmings and let my hon. friend have an answer to-morrow.

MEAT RATION FOR LOGGERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): I have two questions, Mr. Speaker, to direct to the ministry, but first may I suggest to them through you, Mr. Speaker, that they speak up so that they can be heard by the rest of the people's representatives in this chamber.

I would ask the Minister of Finance, do loggers and other hard workers in the province of British Columbia get the same ration of meat as members of parliament or newspaper men or someone who does no hard work? If so, why do they not get more?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I will make inquiries.

BEDFORD BASIN NAVAL MAGAZINE

INQUIRY AS TO EXPLOSION AND SAFETY MEASURES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. C. MACDONALD (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, press reports indicate that Halifax narrowly escaped a serious explosion yesterday at the Bedford Basin naval magazine. I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence if he has had any report from there as to what happened, and whether there is danger of further explosions. I should also like to ask him if the committee of explosive experts that was to be appointed to study the design and suitability of the magazine and the adequacy of the safety precautions has yet begun its work?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): I have had a report as to the incident which occurred yesterday. There is no danger of any further explosions in the magazine. What happened was that a gasoline launch which was used by the disposal officer was moored alongside the jetty. It had been filled with gasoline a short time before, and when the motor was started the engine appears to have backfired. In any case an explosion took place and the crew were thrown into the water. The fire was put out shortly afterwards, and the crew are back at work to-day. There is no danger of further explosions as a result of that accident.

As to the committee that was appointed to inquire into the arrangements at the Bedford magazine, it has begun its work. Colonel Ogilvie, the head of the committee, Doctor Ross, of the explosives division of Munitions and Supply, and Mr. Whyte, of Woolwich arsenal, visited the magazine some time ago. I asked them first to investigate the adequacy of the steps taken to dispose of the damaged ammunition, and their report was that the arrangements made and the precautions being taken were satisfactory. They spoke highly of the competence of the officers now in charge of that work. The committee is returning to Halifax at the end of this week with some additional members to carry out the main purpose of their inquiry, which is to investigate the design and arrangements of the magazine.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

RELEASE OF PERSONNEL DESIROUS OF ATTENDING HIGH SCHOOL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the minister of defence for the army, as a result of inquiries that I have received from several secondary and high school teachers in Toronto and county of York. Would not the minister, with the Minister of Labour and his very capable deputy, Mr. MacNamara, consider extending the principle of the recent order in council which allows the early discharge of intending university students to apply also to those who wish to go back to the secondary and high schools of the country to complete their education? I do hope that the minister for the army will consider the matter over the week-end because in the case of many of these students their fathers are still overseas or they have brothers or other members of the family still at the front.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. CHURCH: I would like to get a reply from the minister, also from the Minister of Labour.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence): The regulation allows students at university or equivalent educational institutions to be discharged. That is as far as it goes. In the case of students who are eligible for their senior matriculation, which is equivalent to first year at some universities, while no hard and fast rule is fixed, I think that sympathetic consideration is being given in all three services to applications made by these students. I believe that would cover the majority of the cases, because if a lad does not come into the service until he is eighteen years old or better he should be pretty nearly eligible for senior matriculation at that time.

WAR CRIMINALS

TRIAL PROCEDURE—ESTABLISHMENT OF CANADIAN COURTS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Inquiries have been made from outside the house of the government with respect to the trial of war criminals, and particularly in relation to Canadian courts to be established for the purpose. I have thought that perhaps I should give the house a brief statement which would be of interest to hon. members as well as to the public generally.

In November, 1943, Mr. A. G. Slaght, K.C., then a member of the House of Commons, was named as honorary counsel to the government to advise with regard to the custody, trial and punishment of persons charged with war crimes. An interdepartmental committee was established at the same time, including representatives from the Departments of External Affairs, Justice and National Defence.

The Canadian government also participated in the work of the united nations war crimes commission which was set up in London and, at a later stage, Mr. Vincent Massey, the Canadian High Commissioner, was appointed as the Canadian representative on the commission.

Since the surrender of Germany, rapid progress has been made in the plans for the apprehension, trial and punishment of war criminals. The political leaders of nazi Germany are being dealt with under arrangements agreed upon by the governments of the United Kingdom, the United States of America, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and France. The others of the united nations are not participating.

War crimes arising out of conquest and occupation will be dealt with by the countries concerned, for example, the Norwegian authorities will deal with atrocities committed during the occupation of Norway. The remaining war crimes include atrocities committed in the course of battle and crimes against prisoners of war and civilian internees. It is recognized that jurisdiction to deal with such offences should depend upon the nationality of the victim rather than the national character of the place where the offence has been committed. Accordingly, arrangements are being made to establish military courts to deal with these offences. Canadian military courts will deal with offences against Canadians, including members of the Canadian armed forces regardless of their individual national status, British military courts with offences against British, United States and Soviet courts will deal with offences against United States citizens and soldiers and Russian citizens and soldiers, respectively.

In order to carry out this general plan, a recent order in council authorized regulations to govern the custody, trial and punishment of persons charged with violation of the laws and usages of war. The regulations are similar and, in matters of substance, are identical with the regulations which have been established for British military courts. Further, the nature of the courts and the character of the procedure will be substantially the same as in the case of those which are being established by the United States authorities.

A war crimes section has been set up in Canadian military headquarters in London headed by Lieutenant-Colonel B. J. S. Macdonald, who had formerly occupied a similar position in the war crimes section established by General Eisenhower at his supreme headquarters. When the section at supreme headquarters was disbanded early in the year, a number of the Canadian officers who had been associated with Colonel Macdonald were transferred to the Canadian section and they have since been engaged in the preparation of Canadian cases and in submitting them to the united nations war crimes commission for approval.

The commission will deal with cases submitted in this way in the same manner and in accordance with the same procedure as in cases submitted by other governments. If the commission considers that there is a case which should be tried, it will remit it to the Canadian war crimes section for action. Colonel Macdonald and his associates will then undertake the prosecution of the accused. The courts will be established in accordance with military law, the procedure will be in accordance with the principles of justice, the accused will have full opportunity for defence, and the arrangements for constitution of the court and execution of sentence will follow recognized military practice. In view of the impossibility of assembling all of the witnesses, some of whom may have been demobilized and many of whom will have been repatriated, there are some modifications of the rigid rules of evidence applicable under our ordinary criminal procedure. There are, however, sufficient safeguards for the accused to make it certain that they will receive fair trials, and that they will be convicted only if convictions are justified by the laws and usages of war and supported by evidence.

Under the arrangements which have now been established, the Canadian courts will be concerned with war crimes involving death or grievous bodily harm to Canadian civilians or to members of the Canadian armed forces. Prosecution will be undertaken by the war crimes section of Canadian military headquarters and the judge advocate general's office will be responsible for examining cases and for authorizing prosecution. The courts will be constituted from military personnel experienced in the laws and usages of war; and the proceedings will be conducted with dignity, fairness, and justice.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Wednesday, September 12, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. M. Benidickson for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Bracken, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. ALISTAIR STEWART (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, we have read in the speech from the throne about the intention of the government to bring the legislation respecting national status, naturalization and immigration into conformity with the definition of citizenship. Now I know as yet of no definition of citizenship, so I can say nothing about that; but this I can and must say, that many of the administrative orders and regulations in the department of immigration are iniquitous in principle and vicious in their effect.

The other day the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) suggested that when we spoke we should have facts to support our arguments. I have these facts. He also suggested and implied that captious criticism would not be welcomed, especially criticism regarding the last six years. He forgot about the years prior to that when also he was Prime Minister of this country. He forgot, I think, about those years when thousands were out of work and hundreds of thousands were on relief. He forgot about those years when the young men of Canada were an unwanted generation, when neither industry, commerce nor the government had time for them, but who—these men who were the rejected and the despised in Canada—when war was declared, suddenly became its saviours. He may have forgotten that. I can assure him that these men and their families have not forgotten.

I should like to draw to the Prime Minister's attention another statement which he made. He made it in Winnipeg on the 24th of May of this year during the heat of the campaign—and I am firmly convinced that he said it in all sincerity, and that anything he does to implement the spirit of the statement will receive not only our applause but our complete cooperation. On that occasion the Prime Minister said:

> Any man who lends his voice or pen to stir up racial or religious strife is an enemy of mankind.

I commend these words to certain of his followers. I suggest that they should treat them as a text, read them, mark them and inwardly digest them, and then act on them.

Even the blindest observer in Canada to-day surely sees the danger there is in the growing racial animosity which prevails; and there are many reasons for it. In the first place there is the stupid myth of race, which has no basis at all in science or in fact. I cannot concede the theory of a French race, an English race, a Jewish race, a Ukrainian race, because there is no fact at all behind that belief. This theory of race is a myth, and I say quite as definitely that those who spread racial animosity are enemies of mankind. They are essentially bigoted men and cowardly men at heart; the very essence of fascism when it started was to oppress the weak, and it is always the coward who is the first to do that very thing.

I suppose that if any member of this house were asked whether he had at any time stirred up racial animosity he would deny it immediately because humanity has a tendency to rationalize its most stupid emotions by regarding them as conclusions arrived at as the result of experience.

There is one small group in this country, a defenceless and economically very weak group, to whom I should like to call the attention of the house. I refer to the coloured people, Canadians who are of negro origin Many of the members of this house must know members of this group. When we pass across Canada in a train we see them occupying humble positions as porters; yet I submit that they occupy honourable positions, because any man who by his toil enhances our welfare or adds to our comfort is occupying an honourable place in our society. Yet I know one of these men, a graduate of a university, cultured, kindly, essentially civilized, who is condemned apparently forever to one job only in life and that is to act as porter on a train. That man can contribute great things to Canada, but he is given no opportunity. I know of children of coloured people who are told not to go to university because they will get no economic benefit in after life from their education. They are condemned to one sphere. I know of coloured people, friends of mine, who have the greatest difficulty in getting housing accommodation. That is true of many people, but ten times more true of men or women who are coloured. I think I have the right to ask the protection of this house for these minorities. I have the right on the basis of the following which is contained in the compendium of parliamentary rules and forms prepared by Doctor Beauchesne, at page 4, of which, there appears a quotation from Bourinot. It is the high privilege of ours—> —to protect a minority and restrain the improvidence or tyranny of a majority.

That is a sacred obligation of this house, but we find this discrimination in the highest places in the country, and in it are the seeds of tremendous danger to Canada.

Just a little over a year ago in Manitoba a group of us, Canadians, accused the board of governors of the university of permitting racial discrimination of the vilest type to exist in the faculty of medicine of the university. The charge was denied, at first loudly, and as time went on with lessening vehemence, because the facts were undeniable. Here is what happened. When the applicant for admission to the medical college sent in his name he was placed in one of four lists—the preferred list, the Anglo-Saxon, the French and the Icelandic. Then followed central Europeans, and these central Europeans came from northern Norway down to the southernmost boundaries of Europe. Then, as one would expect, there was a separate list for Jewish people, and then, as one would not expect, a separate list for women. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that there is as much discrimination against women in this country, in many ways, as there is against men because of ethnic origin or religious belief. Because we publicized this discrimination and challenged the board of governors with it the situation has been corrected. There is no statute yet on the books of the province of Manitoba to make sure it will stay corrected, but we have the vigilance of the people to ensure that.

Lest the members of this house think that this shame rests only upon Manitoba, I would say something to members who come from Montreal and Toronto, because in these two institutions of learning, McGill university and the university of Toronto, they will find that this discrimination exists against people because of race, which is a scandal in a democratic country. I hope that as part of their responsibilities and duties they will realize that it is their task to try to eradicate the discrimination that exists. In the university of McGill, I am informed, Jewish students have to have an appreciably higher percentage of marks than other students before they can expect to pass. Here is one of the examples of anti-semitism in high places in this country.

But not only do we find it in institutions of learning where we should never expect to find it; we find it in certain of the orders of the government. The Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) is not here, but I am going to tell him this. A minister of the crown is responsible to this parliament for everything which happens within his jurisdiction. He may perhaps have no knowledge of what has happened and therefore we will temper our criticism, but in the application form for wartime housing there are many questions, two of which are: What is your religion? What is your nationality? What have these things to do with the right of man who has fought for Canada to get a home in this country? I suggest to the Minister of Reconstruction that he take steps immediately to strike out these two vicious questions.

I should like now to deal with the department of immigration, and first of all I want to establish the policy which has been carried on in the past. We find it in the report for 1941:

> Canada, in accordance with the generally accepted practice, places greater emphasis upon race than upon citizenship.

That is as regards people who come into the country—"greater emphasis upon race." In 1941 when these words were being written and read in this house we were encouraging Canadians to enlist in the services to go abroad and die in order to wipe out that stupid supersitition. Yet here we practise it. Immigration into Canada has been on the basis of race, and I am going to suggest to the minister if he makes any changes in the immigration law he will be well advised to start by first of all tearing up these orders and rules and starting anew. I suggest further that he has a great responsibility because he is dealing with the lives and happiness of people, and I think it is wrong that a responsibility such as this should come to the attention of the House of Commons only when we learn of the orders. I suggest that all legislation vitally affecting any principle of immigration should come before this House of Commons.

What are the facts? Again we come to the preferred and non-preferred groups. The most preferred obviously are British and those from the United States, and in the group called preferred are included French, Belgians, people of the Netherlands, Germans, Swiss, those from Scandinavian countries, Iceland and Finland. So we have established a category of citizens. Then we have the non-preferred. We have established two categories of citizens in Canada, the non-preferred being those who come from Poland, from the Ukraine, from Austria, from Czechoslovakia and from similar countries. But we have categories even below that, those who are lower than the non-preferred, who can get into this country only by special permit; those who come from Turkey, Romania, Greece, Italy; and the Jews. I think it is a matter of statistical record that immigrants from the countries I have named have been few in number, and therefore it appears to me as though the intent of this order were anti-semitic, designed to exclude Jewish people from Canada. That feeling is still further strengthened when it is remembered that under the second category a certain discretion was given the railway companies as to who were to be brought into Canada, but no discretion was given them in this matter. For instance, a Polish citizen could migrate to Canada if the railway company brought him here, but a Polish citizen who was of the Jewish faith could not come into this country without a specific order from the minister. There is discrimination again, Mr. Speaker, at its very worst.

While I am speaking about the Jewish people I should like to say that a few years ago there were 17,000,000 of them in the world. In the last few years due to the barbaric devilment of fascism, 7,000,000 have died, and there have been few Christian voices raised in protest. In certain areas in Europe there are between 800,000 and 1,000,000 Jews left alive, but they are friendless, homeless and landless; no Christian nation in its charity will stretch out a hand to help them. Instead we have done our best to keep them out and to keep them down. For these people I ask some pity. I should like to see the Prime Minister translate that pity into action by making representations to the government at Westminster that the Balfour Declaration be lived up to in all its provisions; that Palestine be opened as a home for the Jewish people, because only there will they be free from the persecution they have suffered at Christian hands; only there will they escape these wretched perversions of human nature.

It is not only the Jewish people who suffer in Canada. There is wicked discrimination against those of Ukrainian descent. We have several hundred thousand Canadians descended from men and women who came to this country from the Ukraine to establish homes and bring up families, who contributed great wealth to Canada, who have given their sons and daughter in Canada's wars, and who deserve well of Canada. Yet because of their name, because of their ethnology, they find it difficult indeed to compete with Anglo-Saxons, let us say. Just the other day a young boy whose parents are Ukrainian, and who had served five years in our air force, came to me. He wanted to pursue a certain line of work and asked if I could help him. I did what I could, but I am afraid I was unsuccessful, because the first question I was asked was as to his nationality. If I said he was a Canadian, the reply came, "You know what we mean. Where did his parents come from?" So I failed, I am afraid; but if so, the social consequences may be bitter indeed for that boy and his family, because already he has been asked by his friends, "Why do you aspire to this vocation? Don't you realize that you have no chance? Don't you realize that you had better go to the railway shops at Weston or Transcona and work there as a labourer?"

There again are the seeds of disunity. Why talk about national unity when people have in their hearts the bitterness of knowing they are discriminated against? It is impossible to have unity on that basis. You find the same thing in connection with citizens of Polish descent. They are discriminated against because of their religion, perhaps, or again because of their name. We have in Canada people with Polish names that rank high in honour in the country of their origin; yet we in our insolence tell them that before they get work they must anglicize their names. These people need the protection of this parliament. We have Canadians of German descent, loyal, sound democrats who have fought for Canada. I know one boy who made thirty-two operational trips over Germany, who received an honourable discharge, yet again, because of his name, he is discriminated against.

We need in Canada, Mr. Speaker, a bill of rights to protect the minorities in this country, and I am going to suggest to the government that it give us such a bill. Within a few weeks we are going to debate in this house the charter of the united nations, and in the preamble we shall read these words:

> We, the peoples of the united nations, determined to . . . reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person, in the equal rights of men and women . . . and for these ends to practise tolerance and live together in peace with one another as good neighbours . . . have resolved to combine our efforts to accomplish these aims.

Here we make our declaration of faith to the world. I ask that this parliament make the same affirmation of faith to Canada. I ask that the government introduce a bill of rights and that this house place it upon the statute books of Canada, so that our children may grow together in dignity and in grace, with equality and justice, and above all in brotherhood.

Mr. J. M. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, in rising to make a few brief remarks on the motion may I begin, as others have begun, by expressing my pleasure that the mover (Mr. Benidickson) and the seconder (Mr. Langlois) should have been veterans, not in years but in military service, in this war. Speaking as one whose military service is further behind him than he quite likes to think, may I say how fitting that seemed to me to be.

May I also take just a moment to refer to the chief impressions made upon the mind of a new member at the beginning of this session. First of all it was a great interest and pleasure to watch the ancient observances that we follow here and to reflect that in countries all over the world which share our traditions and beliefs these same practices are being followed, operating, I would think, as a tie linking together in common purposes all those who believe in these institutions. The other thing that struck me and which I should like to mention was the feeling that in this house, regardless of parties, tongues or anything else, there was a friendliness such as I suppose Mr. Churchill had in mind when, not long ago, he spoke of an underlying comradeship. I suppose some people thought Mr. Churchill forgot that occasionally during the last election campaign; nevertheless I am sure he is one of the people who feel it basically, and of course basically it is there.

And I should like to say that as one who for years lived in the province of Quebec and had good friends in that province, one of the things that gave me pleasure in coming down here was to believe that I could again make good friends coming from Quebec though speaking their language so badly that I must learn to speak it better before I can talk to them except in English.

In saying that, I would add that I hope it will be a beginning of my answer to the comment made yesterday in the house, one which deeply distressed me, that the party to which I belong was a party seeking to create dissension in this country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, for a few moments I should like to speak about my constituency. I think very highly of my constituents for electing me. I represent a double-barrelled constituency, that of Muskoka-Ontario. Not so long ago it was two constituencies, until some ten years ago when they were united. It was a marriage of convenience rather than a love match, and I think the people in the constituency doubted whether the convenience was entirely theirs. However, they have lived together in amity—although I think it is probably true that if opportunity were afforded they would like again to resume single blessedness. Speaking for myself, I would regret that, because I have received kindness from both consorts, and would dislike to lose association with either of them.

I should like to say a word about the people in my constituency. For the most part, indeed almost altogether, they are descended from the immigrants who came from the British isles. However, on the western part, overlooking Georgian bay—which, by the way, I recommend all of you to visit, because we are a great tourist constituency—there is a group of French Canadians living within sight of the route followed over three hundred years ago by Champlain. In those early days he came down through the Georgian Bay district. Sometimes we are apt to forget just how long ago it was that those early voyagers travelled through our country, and just how very much we owe to them. If it will not appear simply as an advertisement for my constituency, may I say that in the midst of his other occupations that great traveller and pioneer found time to refer to the excellent black bass, and to the no less excellent blueberries which abound in that area.

Now a word about geography; geography has most definitely separated the two sections of my constituency. The southerly part is as beautiful and fertile a farming land as will be found anywhere in Ontario. I believe it was one of the premiers of Ontario who with Scottish modesty referred to his province as the banner province. At any rate, that section of my constituency is remarkably fertile. Then, going north one steps almost at one bound across to Muskoka, and there finds himself in the area of the pre-Cambrian shield, that formation we know so well composed of rock, river, lake and forest.

About the industries I should like to say one word, because what I shall say will lead to a point I wish to make. As I have already indicated, the industry in the southern part of the constituency is that of farming, while in the northern part are the industries connected with the woods, which have been developed to some considerable extent; and also the tourist industry. The tourist industry has, of course, the tremendous advantage, first of all, of being one of the greatest providers of American exchange—and at no cost whatsoever to Canadian resources. The only thing we send out in return for that exchange is good-will which, so far, has not been rationed.

Just one further word about the industries in that constituency. I suppose it is true that in pioneer countries there has always been the danger of being wasteful. One industry rushes ahead, with the result that it gets ahead of the others. In the northern part of Muskoka, by its development, the woods industry has tended to militate against the tourist industry. Woods have been gradually been taken off, streams have shrunk, and, in spite of the present prosperity we are in danger of finding that various activities which have been carried on do not jibe.

The result has been that only a few days ago in the district of Muskoka there took place a meeting which, I suggest might well be duplicated up and down this country. This was a meeting by the people for the purpose of helping themselves. They are prosperous enough now, but they are looking forward to the time when possibly they may not be so prosperous. It was because of that they held the meeting of representatives from all the townships in the district of Muskoka, for the purpose of considering and taking stock of their situation, finding out what needed to be done, where forestation might be best carried on, and the like. That meeting has been held, and the hope is that through the collaboration of the province and the dominion, assistance will be forthcoming when needed, so that those people who have set to work to help themselves will find the necessary help from others as a means of post-war planning, and various other activities of which we hear so much. Naturally they look with anxiety toward the dominion-provincial conference, and it is their hope that in God's good time it will be completed and the results available for the benefit of all of us.

The ancients, I believe, Mr. Speaker, held the view that a democracy should be small enough so that all the citizens could gather together for the discussion of their common problems. We have got a long way from that. But we who sit in the House of Commons are merely representatives, and are here only because our constituents themselves cannot be here. I thought that to-day, for the few remaining minutes I propose to detain you, I should like to imagine that my constituents, of whose intelligence I have already spoken so highly, were here. With that in mind I shall venture to put before you some of the questions I believe they would be asking if they were here.

In the first place I think they would ask a question which is so much in the minds of all of us, a most perplexing question, that of controls. Perhaps they hold rather dark views of controls, because the controls which affect them seem, in some cases, peculiarly trivial, peculiarly nagging, and from their point of view so entirely unnecessary. I am not saying they are unnecessary, but am only expressing what would seem to be their views.

I was in a very small shop one day located in my riding. Like most country stores it was really a small departmental store. In it was a dry goods section, a grocery section, a boots and shoes section, and so on. I should think one could have taken any of those departments and put it in a good-sized wheelbarrow. The owner of that shop was somewhat annoyed on the day of my visit. It seems there had been two government inspectors who came to the shop during the afternoon. They travelled in very fine cars supplied with plenty of gasoline—and this was during the rationing period. One of them examined, let us say, his dry goods; the other examined, let us say, his boots and shoes, to see that all was in order. From my own point of view it was perhaps a good thing, because I think the owner of the store was a faithful member of the Liberal party, and I left that shop with some feeling that perhaps he might change his allegiance.

However that may be, the fact is that in my constituency they take a dark view of controls. On this subject I should like to speak as I believe they would speak if they were here to say a word or two for themselves. Those of us who believe in individual private enterprise earnestly wish to get rid of controls as fast as we can. But to say that is not to get rid of them, because there are great difficulties in the way. In my view the question is one of vast importance, because I believe that to ask individual enterprise, which we so much desire, to serve us at the present time and to do its job is like tying a man hand and foot and then asking him to run a race. I do not think I underestimate the difficulties. But who is to get rid of these controls? Are we to leave it entirely to the cabinet ministers? Cabinet ministers are very busy men. No one will doubt that they are carrying tremendous burdens. I submit that it will be extremely difficult for them to attain the necessary mental detachment. They are doing a full-time job and it would be extremely difficult for them to stand off and look at it in a detached way and try to consider how it shall be changed, to decide then the time has come to get rid of these controls.

Are we then to leave it to the permanent officials, whom I greatly respect, to decide when these controls are to be done away with? One might facetiously say that would be like getting a lot of admirals together and asking them to reduce the navy. That is what they used to do, and they did not get very far. But I am not making any such cheap suggestion as that. I believe that the senior men in charge of the main controls are not men who would cling to a job. I believe that they could have better jobs to-morrow if they wanted them. They are there because they believe in their work. Again I submit, how are they to have the detachment as well as the wisdom or the courage to do this? I submit that it is extremely difficult for them. They believe that they are doing a good job, and let us admit for the moment that they are. How are they to decide when the time has come to change?

It is not an easy question to answer. The other day I read an article in the London Economist which interested me. I think we shall all agree that the London Economist is that good mixture of left and right which we would all like to be. I wish to read just one short sentence from this article which struck me quite forcibly because it contains a suggestion which surprised me. I have no doubt it will surprise a great many people who are now acting in the position of controller. In this article the Economist was urging on the present British government, with which it is extremely sympathetic, that in order to make a success of that small area of economic life which they have taken under their control they will have to make the rest of it succeed; they will have to ensure the success of all that area which is still under private enterprise. The Economist was urging them to do away with controls and, speaking of what had gone on during the war, they say this:

> By what right can a government department maintain in peace time that it has more right to the use of a building than its owners?

That rather struck me and I suggest that it would strike a great many people who are operating controls with the same force. Let me read it again:

> By what right can a government department maintain in peace time that it has more right to the use of a building than its owners?

It then goes on to ask this rather pertinent question. Perhaps it is more of a statement than a question:

> The traditional and very healthy British view puts upon the official the onus of proof of his own right to existence... The time has come to restore this.

Let me read that one sentence again:

> . . . puts on the official the onus of proof of his own right to existence.

How is he going to discharge that onus? Is he to decide it wholly with his minister? I suggest that that is leaving it in too small a compass. I suggest that he and his minister are too fully engaged in the job, too fully seized with the work they are doing. They will find it almost impossible to stand off and look at it with a critical mind. Therefore I suggest that there is only one body—as a new member it is not for me to suggest how it should be done—that should be asked to do this, namely this high court of parliament.

In that connection I should like to draw the attention of the house to another statement that was made. I realize that it is not easy for hard-working ministers and hard-working officials to be submitting everything to parliament and I have no such foolish idea as that in my mind. I know business has to be done; I know decisions have to be made, but there will be questions which I believe will be of vital importance in connection with these controls and I do not think they should be decided in camera by a small group of men. Thank heavens the need for secrecy is gone and I see no reason why we should not give consideration to these things that matter.

There was a time during the war when it would have been almost impossible to do this. A member of this house who is by no means unfriendly to the government wrote in a Canadian magazine in 1943:

> To-day the state is in business. In Canada it is conducting more than half of all the business of the nation with devices like those in the Department of Munitions and Supply and the wartime prices and trade board.

Listen to this:

> Over these parliament has about as much control as it has over the movement of the stars.

I am not criticizing that statement in 1943. It was extremely difficult when security was such a prevalent consideration, though perhaps the plea of security was sometimes over-used a little. Perhaps they were only human. But if that is true to-day in peace time then all I can say is that the sneers against parliament which have been so common up and down the land for the last two or three years and which I personally have greatly deprecated—if I had believed them I would not be here to-day—are perfectly correct. If they are correct, then all I can say is that I tremble for the situation in our country. If respect for this body in which we are sitting this afternoon is not to be maintained I wonder where the moral authority is to come from to make the people like the things they must have to put up with before reconversion is over.

If my constituents were here—this is not an original idea—they would have a word to say about taxation as everybody else would, and I would suggest that their word might have a special validity. They are nearly all workers-on-their-own; very few of them are on any payroll. They get only the money they earn themselves. If they pay out more than they take in they go broke. There is a lot of realism about people like that; you cannot fool them.

They have been patriotic citizens. When the war was on they did not complain about their taxes. They paid them like everybody else, but now that the war is over, like other people they are perplexed and troubled. They had hoped that taxation would go down, though perhaps their hopes were exaggerated.

Now what do they find? They fear that there are signs of taxation being kept up and up. They fear that perhaps the state has turned itself into a Santa Claus. Let me say quickly that there is not one of us who is more ready to support proper social services than they are; there is no one more ready to see that those who are unfortunate, those who are disabled, those who are old, those who have suffered unemployment, those who have suffered through no fault of their own, and those in distress should be taken care of. They do not want any withholding from those people. But they are people like ourselves who believe in private enterprise and who sometimes feel that there is a danger that too little stress is laid on the virtues and qualities which have brought us the distance we have come.

They begin to ask if it is really true that the state has discovered some secret store of money when the fact is that the state has no resources apart from that which is produced by its citizens. They say, "Is it still true that the goods that we have, the services that we have, the resources that we have to help those people come only from the thrift, and energy, and providence, and readiness to take a risk, of the people who have initiative and energy?" Let me say just in passing that when we talk about the profit system we are using a misnomer; we should talk about the profit and loss system. When a man asks to have his wages raised he is seeking a profit; the only difference is that he is not taking any risk.

What do these people say about taxation? I think all that they would say, all that anyone can say at the moment, is that we are now coming to a time when as rapidly as possible we are going to remove the controls from private enterprise. That is, those of us who believe that private enterprise has to carry on are ready to remove the controls. Remember that every day they continue is not only a day lost but is one day more of tampering, of retarding and discouragement for the people who are waiting and hoping for the day when they can get busy and again provide labour and wages; and taxes for the state. Do not let us forget that it is only from private enterprise and profits that the state gets its taxes, and incidentally I would point out that the Economist put that up to the British government when they urged that in all that area of economic life not yet taken over by the state they must see to it that private enterprise resumed its activities and that profits are made for it. Who has more desire to see profits than the state, because that is where the state gets its taxes from?

We shall soon be considering a question which I suppose is the most difficult one that any minister of finance has ever had placed before him. How much of the great burdens that we are to have shall we carry by taxation, and how much by borrowing? There is a sixty-four dollar question which it will require our joint wisdom to answer. It would be easy to make generalizations. Two can be made right away. If we raise too much by taxation we just grind still further into the dust all those who are seeking through their individual initiative to make the contribution which under our system they have primarily to make. On the other hand, if we raise too little by taxation and too much by borrowing, we meet the other lion in the path—inflation. I shall not detain the house one moment to discuss that. But it is a question we should all be considering, a question on he proper determination of which our happiness may very likely depend.

There is one other thing my constitutents would say if they were here. It was said by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Merritt) the other night. They would like a lead. They would like someone whom they regard as having moral authority to tell them what the score is, to tell them where we are, to tell them what can be done and what cannot be done, and to tell them as honestly as possible, as persuasively as possible, what their sacrifices are to be. Still more they would like someone to tell them honestly that the sacrifices are being shared, to tell them that there will be a square deal all round, that no one is to be left with the short end of the stick. That is what they are afraid of. They want to be assured that everyone will share in the sacrifices.

That is particularly true, I suppose, of labour. I myself have had some very modest dealings with labour. I have a good many labour friends. I believe that if things are put to them, cards on the table face up, if they are given full information, it is astonishing how quickly suspicion disappears. If labour is dealt with fairly and persuasively, there is nobody in the world that can be more reasonable or more understanding than they are. But it has to be done in time. And nobody must try to drive them. What is needed now is to try to get their cooperation, to work with them.

Finally, if my constituents were here, they would say this—or perhaps they would only feel it, so that I will say it for them: now that they are welcoming back their sons and daughters from the armed forces and mourning those who will never come back and as they are condoling with the relatives of others who have not come back, they would feel like reminding us here of the quality which these young people have shown during war time, and I think they would like to say to us that we need to have, not a double portion, for that we could never have, but some small portion of their spirit. I know it has never been fashionable to serve the state in peace time. It is astonishing the number of people who will do their utmost in war time, who will do nothing in peace time. Some who will do most in war time never think of doing it in peace time. It is a foreign idea to them. But it should not be a foreign idea to anybody here, and I conclude by saying to you, sir, and to this house, that I do not think the great affairs, the tremendous problems, such as we are going to have to face, can ever be dealt with by little minds and in a little way. And I would say that these young people who have served in our armed forces in the war and their relatives have a right to expect that we shall show at least some portion of the spirit that they have shown.

Mr. MAXIME RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few brief remarks in order to define the attitude of members of the Bloc Populaire regarding the speech from the throne as well as the two amendments which have been moved.

The present government has been entrusted with the mandate of administering the affairs of the country during the next five years, with the responsibilities arising therefrom. It is therefore bound to introduce measures necessary to take care of the grave situation in which Canada finds herself to-day, after six years of war which have completely upset its economy.

What are those measures? We do not know them yet. The speech from the throne, drawn up as usual in vague and general terms, does not set them forth in detail, but it informs us that they are meant to meet present-day needs. But how can we deal effectively with measures that we do not know? It seems to me that, logically, we should wait until those measures have been submitted to us so that we may be able to deal efficiently with them. I therefore consider that, for the present, long debates would serve only in delaying the presentation of these measures, some of which are of an urgent character, as, for example, those concerning the housing problem, and the placement of our demobilized service men and our war plant employees.

We shall therefore facilitate the adoption of the address, thus helping the government in bringing down these measures which we are anxiously awaiting; and I can assure the administration that we shall judge them on their merits with no other object than to serve the true interests of Canada. Such is our stand regarding the speech from the throne.

We are told of the formation of a committee to prepare the design of a Canadian flag. We have sponsored such a measure for a long time and I am gratified to note that the government have finally realized the importance of giving our country a distinct national emblem.

As for the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) and the sub-amendment of the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell), they are drafted in general terms and I really fail to see that they add anything whatever to the speech from the throne. I consider them, at this stage of the session, as useless and designed to delay the business of the house. We refuse to be party to any delay in our work, and, for this reason, we shall refrain from expressing our views on the amendment and the sub-amendment. Mr. Speaker, such are the few remarks I deemed it my duty to make in order to do away with any doubt as to the stand we intend to take in this house.

Mr. PATRICK H. ASHBY (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I was sorry to see the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) leave this chamber, because I happen to have discovered the solution of all our problems: in fact, sir, utopia is just around the corner. I do not know which corner, because I am a stranger here in Ottawa; but I am not the only stranger. It is, sir, an honour and a great privilege to come to this house to represent a section of the people of Canada. I consider it an honour to have been chosen by the people of Edmonton East to represent them and their will. I think I should repeat those last words, "to represent their will." I told the people of my constituency that if they wanted someone to come here to represent liberalism, socialism, communism, fascism, or any other "ism," not to vote for me; I would not accept the position under those circumstances; but if they wanted a man who would come to this house to represent them and their will, to vote for me and I would do so to the best of my ability. That, sir, is why I am here.

The people of Edmonton East, like the majority of the people of Canada, are honest, hardworking people, trying to make a living. Let me repeat—and I shall repeat quite a lot of things—they are trying to make a living; but ninety per cent of them never do make a living. They exist while trying, but they exist only. The object of work and toil is to obtain a living, and by a "living" I mean a full and abundant life. There are mighty few people in this great dominion, this wonderful country, with all the marvellous resources and advantages which God has bestowed upon it, who obtain a living. Ninety per cent never obtain a full and abundant life no matter how hard they struggle.

We are slaves indeed, slaves to these "isms", to systems, to methods such as those which this government has practised and supported ever since it has been in office. There is, however, one difference between the people of Edmonton East—in fact, the people of Alberta generally—and the rest of the people of Canada. Albertans are becoming enlightened; they are no longer voting for methods and means but are voting for and demanding ends or results. That is why I was elected to represent them and their will, and I am here on instructions from the people of my constituency to demand certain results. They are going to get those results, I tell you, before I am through. When all the people of Canada—and in the east, too they are becoming enlightened—realize that they can have democracy, by which I mean a form of government that makes it easiest for the greatest number of people to enjoy the largest amount of individual freedom and security, and when they realize the full meaning of democracy and elect individuals to represent them, and not some other form of government or some "ism" or some method, we shall begin to make real progress.

The reputation which has been built up by party politicians in the past is not an enviable one. I have yet to hear an adult speak with respect of party politicians. The name "politician", if you will pardon my saying so, stinks to high heaven. The names of many politicians are being associated with such criminals and scoundrels as Dillinger and Hitler; and when the people of Canada begin to lose faith and trust in the men they elect to represent them, it is time we turned over a new leaf and began to represent the people.

In Alberta we have a government which is respected by the people because they have tried to the best of their ability to serve the people instead of ruling them. That is our duty here as members of this parliament —to serve our fellow men, not to rule them.

We in Alberta are not hampered in this progressive movement by any natural laws or any laws that God has made, but only by man-made rules and regulations. I must say that we have been hampered only by the actions of political bosses in Ottawa and in this parliament; for had we been given the freedom to go ahead as we desired, without any interference with the rights of other provinces or any other part of the great empire we call the British commonwealth of nations, to-day we would have seen in Alberta, and possibly in the rest of Canada—for the rest of Canada would soon have followed—a majority of the people enjoying, for the first time in their lives and the first time in modern history, a full and abundant life.

We have just passed through in this war a period in human history that will forever remain a blot, and a bloody blot, upon the records of party politics. For this war was not fought between peoples, because the majority of the people everywhere are too busy trying to make a living to be bothered with making wars. The people, I know, were used by the various dictators, whether hidden or open, who wished to gain for themselves advantages over one another. On the one hand we have dictators hiding behind the scenes centralizing control, trying to gain control over the whole earth. Whether you believe it or not does not alter these facts. On the other hand there was that notorious dictator named Hitler who also coveted that position. They are insane; there is no doubt about it in my mind. It is a peculiar mania from which they have suffered, the mania to rule.

It is our duty in this house not to rule but to serve, and yet I find that the majority of members desire not to serve their people so much as to serve the party to which they belong. Before this war the federal government of Canada, who were supposed to represent the people, did not represent the people of Canada. The people of Canada wanted food and could not buy it even though the stores offered it for sale. They could not buy it because they had no money and this government said, "We have no money. We cannot build highways, we cannot build schools, we cannot reforest our burnt-out areas, we cannot build public works or carry on other activities because we have not the money." And so the people starved, living in misery, suffering and privation which was unbelievable, and must be unbelievable to many members here who have not seen the conditions under which the people lived.

Thousands of our people died as a result of the actions or inaction of this government, who were then supposed to be representing the people of Canada. Thousands of our boys who went overseas in this war rode freight trains seeking means to get a living, and failing to do so. We all know this if we stop to think. But the moment war was declared the money began to flow forth in billions upon billions of dollars. We then found money enough to produce great highways, airports, tanks, guns, ships, planes, bombs, bullets by the millions. We erected great factories and equipped them with all the most modern machinery, and we trained men and women and paid them well while training them to operate these machines. And with all this production we took the most able-bodied of our boys and sent them over to deliver these goods to people who did not want them. Those people said "We will not take them and we will blast you out of the sky and sink your ships if you try to deliver them." Our boys said, "We will deliver them and you will get them just the same." Well, we delivered them without charge to the enemy. We delivered them absolutely free, and we were all far more prosperous during the war than we ever were before.

Now the government are going to continue to let the money flow forth just as they did during the war, and if they do not do so then they will be dishonourably discharged from office as traitors to the people of Canada. I have instructions from the people of my constituency and from hundreds of thousands of returned men to demand in their name certain wants which I am going to outline to you in a few moments. And they are going to get them this time. I told them before leaving Edmonton; I said to these men, thousands of them: "I shall give you the name and address of every member of parliament who does not vigorously stand in this house and demand that these wants be satisfied." I know that these men mean business this time, and I think that they will want to call on such members and pat them on their hands, or maybe they will spank another part of their anatomy, and they will not use a hairbrush. But of this I am sure, that if any returned man is caught serving any member who does not get up in the house and vigorously demand these things he will never again be served by any returned soldier unless that soldier becomes a traitor to his fellowmen. That means that the member of parliament in this house who does not demand these things will never get a shave possibly, or a haircut, nor will he be able to buy food nor a railway ticket. That is true, for these men this time are determined that they shall not suffer as did the old soldiers of the last war. I am joining with them and will stand up for them in this house on every possible occasion. I will represent them and fight for them with all the power I can muster, because I had to make a slave of my wife and slaves of my children. For years and years we toiled and sweated and slaved under the soldier settlement board, and we suffered. I will never ask any human being to suffer as I did. I tell you, sir, that I would be willing to take up arms in defence of Canada and of the democratic rights of Canadians and die; I would much rather do that than go through what I had to go through then.

Out of twelve returned soldiers that joined with me in my community two only are left, myself and a white haired, stoop shouldered old soldier whose wife taught school to help pay that notorious soldier settlement board the shekels it demanded.

One of the first things that the people demand of me is that all taxation on all incomes of $5,000 a year and less shall be immediately abolished. I hope you have that down. The second is that the old age pensions be increased and the age limit reduced. Our national leader, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), yesterday suggested $50 a month at the age of sixty years. I always like to turn things around. I think it looks a great deal better if we say $60 a month at the age of fifty; and if the people desire it I can assure them they can have $100 a month at the age of forty. It all depends on what the people want. We are their servants, and that is what we must be if we are loyal, and if we are not traitors to them. We are here either to serve them or to rule them, and I am sure I am not here to rule the people of my constituency. I am here to accept from them instructions as to what they want; and when the people of this great British empire realize the situation and compel their members of parliament to serve them, then God's gifts will open up before us as though we saw the light of day for the first time in our lives. Then we will begin to live, for that is all human beings work and toil for—to live.

I have some horses on my farm. I know very well I could not possibly work a horse eight, ten or fifteen hours a day for twenty, thirty or forty years. The animal would die. I know a number of poor old farm women right in my own constituency who have toiled and sweated and outlived and outworked seventy-five or a hundred horses. Are we animals? Well, certainly we are beasts of burden when we have to toil all our lives. I have a letter here from the Canadian Legion, which I am not going to read, telling me of men over sixty years of age, old soldiers of the last war, who are still toiling on, though crippled with arthritis and rheumatism; poor beasts of burden. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that unless we see that human beings can live, we must resign from office; and I am afraid a good many hon. members will be asked to resign before this parliament is over.

So that is what I am instructed by my constituents to demand for them: $60 a month at the age of fifty. Who is to oppose their will? Are there any dictators in this house who will oppose them, who will say, "We are superior to those who elected us"? They are demanding $60 a month at fifty years of age, and the same for all who are blind or incapacitated.

The next demand they make is that immediate steps be taken to reduce taxation on goods of all kinds, in the process of manufacture or distribution, being offered for sale or given away. They realize that if we could give away shells, bombs and all the rest of the war material absolutely free it is not unreasonable to ask that the people be allowed to buy their own production. If the Minister of Finance does not know where to obtain revenue other than from the pockets of those who are trying to earn a living, he had better resign from office, or I will come over and show him how. Plenty of us know how, and he knows, too; for he let the cat out of the bag when war was declared. We now know there is an abundance available any time our dictators want it for their own purposes. So taxation shall be reduced on all goods, bringing prices down below pre-war levels. That will increase the purchasing power of all those who toil. I might point out here, Mr. Speaker, that it is an utter impossibility to make a people prosperous by forcing them to pay in taxes the very money which would enable them to be prosperous. That is very simple, is it not?—but it is true.

If these measures were taken, what would be the result? Immediately there would be a demand for goods, because people are just itching to get their fingers on a few dollars to spend on the things they want. As soon as they begin to buy goods the retailers go to the telephone and order more goods from the wholesalers, who wire the factories to make more goods, and the factories put out signs "Help wanted." When it comes to production in our factories, we can produce all that the people of Canada want; and who should want it and get it sooner than those who created the goods from their own natural resources, that is, the Canadian people? I say no sooner would this happen than there would be no unemployment problem at all; there would be a problem of getting sufficient help.

[Mr. Ashby.]

Then we should look upon agriculture as our leading national industry. If the Minister of Agriculture really wants the farmers to produce meat and other farm products he must go about it in an entirely different way than at present, for this government are deliberately restricting the production of food to-day. The minister has been told on a number of occasions by farm organizations all through Canada, and particularly by Mr. H. E. Nichols, secretary of the Alberta farmers' union, that unless steps were taken to place a floor price under farm products the hog population of this country would dwindle to a serious level. I know on my own farms, where my boys sweat and toil about fifteen or sixteen hours a day during the summer and twelve hours a day during the winter, with no holidays, we have been compelled to cut the production of hogs seventy-five per cent. It might interest some of our listeners in the gallery to learn that for the last load of well-finished, healthy, pure-bred Hampshire Down sheep we took to the market, my boys received the pittance of 1½ cents a pound. So when you are buying food and there is rationing, you can say to yourself something is lacking in the Department of Agriculture of this government.

The people of my constituency are demanding that fair and just prices be paid to primary producers for the kind and quality of foodstuffs required—I do not say for everything produced, but for the kind and quality required by the people of Canada. It is up to the farmers to supply the kind and quality they desire, for the consumer is dictator—or should be—as to what he will eat, and as to what its quality will be. Further, he should have sufficient money to enable him to buy what he wants of what is produced. If the quality is not satisfactory, then the people should vote against it—for money is a ballot—and, by buying better quality, compel us as farmers to produce the highest possible quality of foodstuffs desired by the consumer. If we are given a fair and just price we can do that. We can flood the country with such abundance that no facilities we have to-day could possibly handle it. I will warrant that we farmers in Canada can double the quantity of hogs we produced in the peak years of the war. I will warrant that for every pound of butter and every quart of milk we have ever produced we can—and I know this from my own experience—produce ten more. And likewise with our cattle and our sheep. And we can produce a quality of all farm production that will be superior to anything the people have ever enjoyed. All we need is sufficient reward for the services we render society in producing food for it, and in producing fibre in the form of wool. I well remember shipping wool at a time when the government said it could not pay a bonus—oh, no! I remember shipping wool when the freight came to more than the amount I received for the wool.

I have left until the last a discussion of the demands by our returned soldiers and merchant seamen. First of all, these men want good houses to live in. We have forests, an abundance of trees, plenty of mills and help. We have great factories, and can manufacture anything from nails to doorknobs. I see no reason why every returned soldier should not have a good home. There is only one obstacle in the way. That is found in this House of Commons—and it will be removed, I can assure you of that. Our returned boys want the sum of $6,000 set aside for the purpose of building houses for themselves. I do not say we should build the houses and rent them to the soldiers. They will build the houses for themselves, to suit themselves, where they want them and when they want them.

Our returned men have instructed me to demand:

First, that the sum of $6,000 shall be set aside for the purpose of providing a house for each soldier and merchant seaman returned from this war who desires one.

Second, that they shall receive hospital and medical care for life, with permission to choose their own doctors and hospitals. This would prevent their being used as human guinea-pigs, as were so many of the old soldiers in the last war.

Third, security—and that is what they are demanding for their old age. They have saved our country and saved us from destruction; why should they not have all the rewards they desire, when we can so well afford to give them to them? It would take from no one to give these boys $6,000. They are demanding security in their old age.

I have been instructed to demand, in their names, that in addition the sum of $10,000 be placed in trust in the Bank of Canada for themselves, their wives and their children. If the trustees are satisfied that the investment is sound, this money can be used to establish them in a good business of their own.

Another demand is that all the widows of all the returned men and merchant seamen continue to receive identically the same pensions as did their husbands who died.

I well remember listening over the radio when those dictators met on the Atlantic and said that they were prepared to give us poor slaves the four freedoms. I remember sitting with a companion in a hog pen, my companion being a sow who was about to increase the hog population of the country. I said to the poor old sow: "I have been far more generous to you than these dictators are to us poor slaves, because I have given you more than four freedoms. Why, I have already given you free hospitalization and maternity care. Then, you have freedom of speech, for you can grunt all you like and I care not. You have freedom from fear, for so long as you obey the rules and regulations your dictator lays down I shall never beat you. You have freedom of religion, because I don't care if you worship the old turkey gobbler roosting on the hen house. You have freedom from want, because your self-feeder is in front of you, and in it you will find everything you desire. You will find luscious alfalfa in the pasture, and you may help yourself to it. I have given you a fifth freedom—yes, I have given you freedom from toil, because I do not make you work, as we poor slaves are forced to work."

For toil is work men do because this government compels us to do it or to go without. That is toil, and work is something men do because nature compels them to do it. So it is clear that I have also given my sow freedom from work, because I do the work for her. I clean out the barn—or the members of my family do it—and grow the feed for her, grind it and feed it to her. She also has freedom of leisure. But there was one freedom I dare not give my cattle, my hogs, or my sheep, one which was purposely left out of the Atlantic charter, and that is the freedom of choice. That freedom of choice, sir, is the freedom for which the people of Canada are now crying, and which they shall get.

Mr. H. G. ARCHIBALD (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am starting out definitely behind the eight ball, because I cannot hope to duplicate the efforts of my hon. friend to my left. However, I shall do my best.

As a new member of the House of Commons, and an industrial worker—when there is work—I should like to give my impressions of this parliament for the short time I have been here. It seems to me so divorced from reality, from the everyday struggle on the job, that I sometimes wonder if our efforts are not in vain. Many similar institutions were found wanting in the last war. I hope this one will survive, and will manage to bring about conditions in the country which will warrant its continuance.

I listened with a great deal of attention to the speech from the throne. That speech is of key significance because it outlines the official programme of the administration.

It is within the power of the administration to give full employment; it is within the power of the administration to see that every worker has a job, that every worker is well clothed, that every worker is well fed. It is also within the power of the administration to stop a depression that will be far worse than the one we had before. We all know of the advances that have been made in technology; we all know that these advances have removed the worker from the job, but at the same time they have added more wealth to the country.

I must say that the proposals outlined in the speech from the throne do not fill me with enthusiasm. They remind me too much of the programme outlined by the Liberal party under Premier Pattulo in British Columbia in 1933. That programme began with the slogan, "Work and wages". The workers of British Columbia know to their sorrow how it worked out. It was much like the modern glass of beer—all froth and no content. It quickly collapsed. I speak from personal experience because I took part in many of the demonstrations and unemployment strikes of that period. Mr. Pattulo's answer to us at that time was, "Root, hog or die." According to labour we have a somewhat similar statement just lately from the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) that in its way was just as brutal.

To-day the Liberal party in British Columbia exists no longer as a separate entity; it has had to combine with the Tories. To-day in British Columbia the most popular party is the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. If the political advance in British Columbia foreshadows what will happen in Canada as a whole under the present Liberal administration, then the workers of this country are in for some bitter disillusionments.

Canada was plunged into this war with a promise of peace, a promise of more democracy, a promise of security. But to-day in all Canada fear is universal, fear of unemployment, fear of want and fear of a third world war. The next world war may very well wipe out the whole of humanity. But this is the reality that faces us: the promises of the Liberal government about the war have not been borne out by events. Those promises sound like a hollow mockery when considered in the realities of the present day.

The Liberal government speaks of a high level of employment, but that government does not contemplate an adequate programme of public works nor does it contemplate the reconverting and operating of publicly built war plants which could wipe out scarcities overnight. There is great talk about the fear of inflation, but no attempt has been made to stop it by producing more goods immediately. The factories are there and they are idle. The workers are there and they are idle. The Canadian capitalists were unable to provide jobs during the peace—I am not talking about war now; I am talking about peace—so that the working class know what to expect in times of peace. We know what to expect from such a programme as outlined in the speech from the throne.

What does the speech from the throne, or the platform that was outlined before that, offer the returned war veteran? There is an offer of small holdings to the war veteran, but in order to maintain those small holdings the veterans must have jobs. Under the Soldier Settlement Act, which is not basically different from the present act, 25,000 soldier settlers went on the land, but up to date only about 5,000 have been able to pay off their debts. I can indicate from personal experience how the problem works out.

Prior to my discharge I went to the rehabilitation officer on my station and asked him what chances there were for a job in civil life and how one would go about it. I wanted to know how it applied to the other men, and he told me that he was asking them to write personally to prospective employers in the line in which they wanted to get. Mark you, those rehabilitation officers are able to classify you fairly closely; they know what you are best able to do. The men did that, but ninety per cent of the answers that came back from those private owners were of a nature to slough off the question. They stated they did not know what their business prospects would be after the war and therefore they could not promise a job. If the ex-service man fails to find a job he cannot maintain his small holding. Therefore the political salve of the small holding fails in the case of general unemployment.

The government has offered loans to fishermen to start in the fishing industry. That sounds good, but the fact is that the government is not allowing fishermen to combine their loans in order to buy a boat capable of competing with the large fishing interests on the Pacific coast. The act states that two can combine, but the officials are not allowing them to do so. They say that they might quarrel and they do not know how to cut a boat in two and make it float. The kindness of the administration in this respect cuts me to the quick. This is a definite slap at cooperatives and plays right into the hands of such outfits as British Columbia Packers.

Then there is the logging industry and the concern of the Liberal party for the lumber monopolists. No loans are to be advanced to veterans to establish small logging claims. I had one lad who was sleeping right next to me in barracks, who tried to get a loan, but it was not there. We hear a lot about maintaining the competitive system, but we on the Pacific coast can see that it is simply not there.

Ex-service men are not all farmers or lumbermen or fishermen; the majority are industrial workers who prefer to work in a factory along with their fellowmen. Therefore their problem is directly tied up with the war worker and we can begin to see the handwriting on the wall as to what is happening to them. They face general unemployment; they face a grim future. The concern of the Liberal government for the monopolist is not new. We saw the industrialists go on strike shortly before the beginning of the war until their profit demands were met. What occurred in British Columbia was true, I imagine, of the whole of Canada. At Justkatla inlet, on the Queen Charlotte islands, a large base logging camp was built with government funds. I was in it. The machine-shop equipment was of the latest type; a locomotive could go in and out the doors at each end, and a large horseshoe wharf was built. Not one log was ever shipped out of that camp. I do not know how much the logging interests made on it, but I can imagine they did handsomely. If I were to ask the government whether that plant was to be sold to private interests I would be wasting my time; the answer is apparent. The kindness of the government toward these men in contrast to the loggers themselves is only too apparent. The loggers in those isolated camps up the coast had to remain in them for one hundred days under the most primitive conditions or lose their bonus and transportation.

It might be argued that the onerous conditions placed upon the workers during the war was due to a war-time economy; but already we are beginning to see that they are being asked to take worse conditions and lower wages, that the onerous conditions will continue to be imposed upon them in time of peace, in spite of a more highly developed industrial technology, in spite of the wealth that could be produced in this country.

In British Columbia—and again I speak of my province because I am more familiar with conditions there—poverty and unemployment during peace time, with malnutrition, were in general evidence. Many of the children still bear the marks of malnutrition. The government found that out when it came to the calling up of men for military service. They found that many were unfit owing to lack of proper food and other bad living conditions when they were children. Relief camps dotted the country in those days of peace in the nineteen-thirties. During the war the scene was much similar; only the camps this time were reestablished for the armed services. During peace time the provincial police patrolled the highways and bridges on a scale that was only exceeded after the attack on Pearl Harbor. That was when the workers at various times were demanding jobs and demanding more food. The pitiful amount of relief that was handed out to the workers during that period could be measured only by the amount they could raise by panhandling. Those were the conditions that obtained in peace time.

I realize that the government had heavy burdens during the war, but if they are to go back to the same principles of economics to which they adhered during peace we can expect an even greater depression in the next few years. To go back to the economy that we had during peace time in the nineteen-thirties just means that you will be building up for social upheavals of a tremendous nature.

After the last war a crime wave swept throughout the world. It was more apparent in Europe than on this continent. But the whole world was involved in the last war to a greater extent than in the war of 1914-18, and I imagine that ahead there are, to say the least, troubulous times.

Let me again call to the attention of the house to how the demands of the workers were met during those intolerable times of peace. We were met with tear gas and clubs in the hands of the police. We remember the attack on the unemployed workers in Regina and the attack on the unemployed workers in Vancouver in 1938. During those days the blacklist was common on the job, especially in the logging camps. A blacklist was kept, for instance, by Black's logging agency in Vancouver. It was a cruel weapon in the hands of calculating employers to keep the workers down. Are we to return to that sort of thing again or are we to have a strong, militant trades union movement where the workers can protect themselves?

In the light of this shameful record during peace time, how can we expect any improvement during the coming period? If we are to judge from past performance, the speech from the throne does not foreshadow a period of prosperity and jobs for everyone. On the contrary it is the prelude to mass unemployment.

When the Liberal government was building up the armed forces it came out with some wonderful slogans. One I shall never forget.

It was, "Have you the guts to go active?" Well, the veterans and the war workers have the right now to demand of the government: Have you the guts to give us a job and guarantee it? The men responded to these appeals, to this demand in the final analysis, and finally, through the befuddled attitude of the government on demobilization the situation at Aldershot was brought about. It was the natural result. One may well ask why it was that men had to take part in a form of riot in order to make their demands known to the general public. The sentences meted out, running up to seven years, are a disgrace for a democratic country, especially when they are measured in terms of the government's attitude toward notorius elements such as Adrien Arcand.

A staggering burden of taxation has been placed upon the backs of the workers. Salaries as low as $660 a year are taxed, and there is no sign of relief. It is notable that the first country in the British empire to lower taxes on incomes is Australia, where a Labour government is in power, which is the duplicate of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation in Canada. The Australian government has already lowered taxation to the extent of 12½ per cent. Those responsible for the enormous national debt that we now have in Canada point to its astronomical figures as necessitating the continuation of our heavy taxation. There is no necessity in our economy for the curtailment of production or the shutting down of the factories, which can only result in our returning war veterans facing lack of employment. The taxes should be lifted off so that full employment could be brought in, and when you have full employment the national debt, even at its present astronomical figures, could be wiped off in no time if the full productive forces of this nation were turned loose.

Housing conditions have gone progressively from bad to worse during the past twenty years. During the period before the war, when the administration had all the time in the world to build homes, they did not do a thing. Compare that with the action of the New Zealand Labour government prior to the war, when they were building houses for the workers and are continuing to do so. But in this country, oh, no. Under our Liberal administration, that would be interfering with private enterprise. There must be no interference with private enterprise in the face of this most acute housing crisis. Seemingly the financial institutions in this country do not believe that the workers have in their hands that tremendous back-log of savings that would enable them to pay the high rents which have been demanded over a long period of time. Therefore they are bogging down on the job. The government could go ahead and have low-priced housing schemes which would be within the range of the lowest paid workers; it just requires the will.

I should like to propose another important measure, if we rule out profits and run the economy on use. I should like to see them continue the operation of the government-financed and government-built plants. I should like to see them come in with a programme of public works to cover irrigation, the building of hydro-electric power projects, and so on. In Prince Rupert, for example, we have a government-owned dry dock. Prior to the war this dry dock was used partly as a cow pasture; yet it was recognized at the same time as a key installation. During the war that dry dock built corvettes and 10,000-ton freighters, as well as repaired many an ocean-going boat. Why does the government not modernize that plant and continue the building programme, even a minimum building programme, so as to keep that trained crew and personnel in that key installation? Capitalism is a system of war; therefore the system itself will likely produce another one. Far be it from me to advise capitalism how to protect itself, but it would be a good idea that that plant and equipment should be kept up instead of having a mad rush every time a war breaks out.

Under the government programme as outlined in the speech from the throne, Prince Rupert, like many another city throughout Canada, faces stagnation. Yet Prince Rupert has magnificent possibilities under proper planning. Let me quote the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) who, in a speech delivered at Prince Rupert in 1920, when he was leader of the opposition, said:

> Was the Grand Trunk Pacific policy a wise one? What was Sir Wilfrid's vision when the transcontinental railway was being planned, and his vision of this particular city? I know, it was of ships plying from this very harbour, crossing the Pacific with the products of this country, bringing back other commodities here, making this community one of the greatest marts of the world; of a railway running through a country as fertile as any in the world, with feeders running north and south, tapping the resources of the province, mineral and timber, and great national wealth; a great community, with ocean wharves, docks, repair yards, dry docks, round houses, hotels, railway stations, and all of the sights and signs of a great world metropolis. And what have you got to-day? A side line and not a main artery! The difference between the Liberal and Conservative parties.

We in Prince Rupert are wondering if the Prime Minister has shortened his horizon to that of a cow pasture.

It is with such experiences in mind that the members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation have come to the conclusion that only through the socialization of industry and the financial institutions will living standards rise and there be a continuous expansion of industry. During the war the federal government considered the building of the Prince Rupert highway an urgent national necessity. It wasted no time in putting men and materials on that road. It poured them on. It set an example for similar public works in peace time. But as soon as the necessity or the "squeeze" ceased up in the Aleutians the government forgot all about that road and allowed it to slip into a sad state of disrepair. One small slide was allowed to remain on that road blocking people from driving over it, with the government machinery all tied up and doing nothing. Speaking for British Columbia—and I speak for British Columbia—

Mr. REID: Oh, no, you don't.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I should like, Mr. Speaker, to have a chat with the hon. member on the other side after October 25.

May I now bring to the attention of the government the dire need of a railroad outlet from the Peace River. The people of Peace River and Skeena riding have been waiting for years for that to be completed. As I understand it, the settlers went to the Peace because of the promise that such a railroad would be built, but they are still waiting. They are still isolated in that area, and they want that outlet to the Pacific. It would increase the national wealth by building up that northwestern corner of British Columbia which has proved so vital in time of war. This would provide jobs for thousands. It would bring industry into the country; and, as the Prime Minister stated, this territory has the mineral resources, the power, and the timber. Industry will follow transportation. Thousands of jobs could be made available on such a project.

I should also like to mention another one, the building of a highway from Hazelton north through the Atlin country up to White Horse, known as the "A" route. It should be built on that route because it would drain all that northwest corner of British Columbia on to a Canadian highway, much as those who built the Canadian Pacific railroad just north of the 49th parallel of latitude so that the Canadian economy would drain into it. The necessity is apparent in that corner, so that we shall not be at the mercy of international financiers working through the Alaska panhandle. It is tragic that only the threat of war forced the government to take action. A threat to private property forces the government to bring in work with wages. I should like to see them take a lead in developing this country and making it a worth-while place in which to live.

The completely inadequate character of the government's proposals to meet unemployment in the post-war period will lead only to a devastating social crisis. If the Liberal government continues its present course it seems to me inevitable that large masses of workers will be unable to find jobs. I would think they would take a different attitude if only to maintain the respect of the people of Canada.

I have a different philosophy. I claim that a new system has to be brought into being, a system of socialism which is both national and international in outlook because it includes all those who need things in this world. Therefore, though I will support every measure that is introduced which will benefit the country, I maintain that only socialism will bring about real freedom and social justice.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. J. S. SINNOTT (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, as I am a new member of this house this will be my maiden speech. I am the new member for Springfield, formerly represented by my late good friend Mr. John M. Turner, who had many friends in this house.

I wish at the outset to congratulate you, Mr. Speaker, upon your elevation to the office of first commoner and I also wish you much pleasure in the position you now hold.

I speak here to-night for the first time and I do not intend to speak very long. I am a man of few words; I believe more in action. May I first of all congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address upon their admirable speeches, also their maiden speeches, in parliament, because they represent a large section of the armed forces. I am considerably moved and interested in the large number of members of the army, the navy and the air force who have been watching proceedings in this house from day to day, many of whom I presume left families and jobs to go over to the other side to protect dear ones at home. I am sure that this house will see to it that nothing we can do will be too good for those who have done such a magnificent job.

I believe it is my duty to say a few words about the constituency I have the honour to represent, which is considered to be one of the largest in Canada, containing one of the most varied cross-sections of our population. In that constituency there are people from practically every part of the world and we all get along very well. At the western end we take in the suburbs of Winnipeg and a large part of the Red river valley market gardeners and small farmers. To the north there are large and small lakes where there is a large fishing industry, and centrally there are farm lands which are regarded as one of the surest crop districts in western Canada. Coming to the eastern portion adjoining Ontario, we have a large lumber industry, pulpwood and paper mills. The mines and natural resources of that part of the country have hardly yet been touched.

I join with other speakers in regard to the expansion of industry in the west. In war time we have shown our ability to produce munitions and supplies with as small an overhead as any other plant in Canada. We have the Winnipeg river which supplies an abundance of power to all Manitoba, and its capacity is only partly developed at the present time.

We have in Canada the means and the people to produce far more than we can consume, which will enable us to share a large portion of our surpluses with some countries that are not quite so fortunate. It was mentioned here a day or two ago that Canada should have a large immigration. In my opinion, we can take up the slack for a while, but we have in Canada to-day the ability to produce far more than we can consume, so that the only way in which we can make it work is to have a good deal of immigration.

I am one of the many to-day who know that the horse and buggy days are gone and gone forever. I believe in the Liberal party and in the members of this house who are here at this session and I believe that by working together we can bring about the necessary reform. Our Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King)—and I have every reason to believe him—has said that we can make laws only in accordance with the desires of the members the people send to parliament. There is no reason why we should have such criticism as we have had to listen to from the other side of the house, since the war is hardly over yet. God has given man brains and man has produced science and invention, and in this machine age we have seen what science and invention have caused in this world in the way of destruction. Let us hope that the same science and invention will do as much for sound construction in peace time.

[Mr. Sinnott.]

As the representatives of the people of Canada, we shall be called upon to perform tremendous tasks, unheard of and unthought of in the past, and described as nonsense by some. We are told occasionally that we are up against a stone wall when we come up against the British North America Act. However, I believe, as many other Canadians do, that if the British North America Act does not measure up to the requirements of the Canadian people to-day, the Liberal party and the members of this house have the ability to redraft it in order that the people may have the benefits they should enjoy.

There has been a good deal of talk about full employment, and there has been much criticism. Let us not forget that to-day we are in the machinery age. At the time of confederation it took many days to get from the east coast to the Pacific coast. To-day you can have your breakfast in Halifax and be in Vancouver for supper. The machines of to-day have been so built that they will make life much easier for the working man if they are used properly. We know that at the end of hostilities, with our soldiers, sailors and airmen coming back, it will be hard to find positions for all. It will be necessary for the opposition in this house, including all groups opposite, to cooperate or we shall find ourselves in difficulties. I regret to say that in this machine age it will be impossible to find jobs for all our people. The only way we can serve the people properly is to put our machines to work and give those people who have no jobs a decent living. Let the machines do the work; that is what machines are for.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me say that it will be my endeavour to help the government in any possible manner, and to cooperate with all hon. members of this house to build a better, peaceful Canada.

Mr. PARK A. MANROSS (London): Mr. Speaker, I, too, am a new member of this house, although I do not know whether or not this will qualify as my maiden speech. Since the house opened a good many maiden speeches have been made, and some have been of such high quality that I think I shall require a little practice before I can qualify. I am a new member representing the constituency of London, Ontario. I am not going to tell you that London is the greatest city in Canada, although that word has been used, or that it is the fairest city, or the gayest city. We are quite content to call it the best city.

In the first place, Mr. Speaker, let me compliment you upon being elected the chief commoner of this house. I think that was a wise choice, and as a new member I hope I may further my education in parliamentary matters by carefully watching your decisions and judgments. Then, as a veteran of the last war, I take great pleasure in congratulating the mover and seconder of the motion for an address in reply to the speech from the throne. It gave me a great deal of satisfaction to see that they were two young men, new members, from the armed services of this country.

One or two of the first speakers in this debate spent some little time in eulogizing their respective leaders. In advertising we sometimes call that "blowing up" our leaders. There are two interpretations of that phrase, and I am not going to deal with either one. The riding of London is an urban constituency. We have 175 subdivisions entirely within the city itself, so that it is a concentrated riding with a large population. We have a great deal of varied industry there, and it is the centre of a large agricultural district. Sometimes it is called the garden spot of Canada, but I am not going to emphasize that tonight, for I might get into an argument. I was interested yesterday to receive a London newspaper, in which I saw the picture of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Abbott), who I am sorry is absent from his seat tonight. According to the newspaper he is going to pay a visit to our city on Friday and Saturday. I do not know whether the minister is adopting the suggestion offered by my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Merritt) that he visit the military districts and check up on the demobilization programme. Perhaps that is the purpose of his visit, because London is the headquarters of military district No. 1. Incidentally, on the same days there is a meeting in London of the western Ontario Liberal association, but probably that is just a coincidence. However, if the minister wishes to check up as to their demobilization I would say they are thoroughly demobilized, and very well rehabilitated, because our party made a gain of ten seats in that particular district.

The speech from the throne, which we are supposed to debate, cannot include everything the government is going to do, or that it is going to be advised to do, or that we can sell it into doing. It contains a general outline, which is purposely made broad in order that it may be varied. I think the speech from the throne has been pretty well covered by various members of our group, at least, but there are a few special points I should like to emphasize. The first point I wish to bring up is not peculiar to my riding; it is of interest to the whole country. It has to do with the nurses who are serving in a Canadian military hospital at Sogel, Germany. These nurses enlisted in the army medical corps to take care of war casualties, but now that the war is over they have been sent to Sogel to look after people, mainly Polish and Russian, who are suffering from tuberculosis. These nurses do not object to this, and we do not object to it. It is a humanitarian act. But I wish the government would look into the situation and the conditions under which these nurses are working. The patients are under canvas, and the nurses are in huts, so-called, without any conveniences. The place is muddy. They perform their duties many hours of the day in rubber boots. Nothing has been done to control the fly or mosquito nuisances, with the result that the nurses work under considerable handicaps. Up until the end of August they did not get any butter, milk or eggs, such as the patients were getting. In the final analysis, while these nurses volunteered for service to our troops, they are doing this job quite nobly for the devastated people in Europe. I would ask the government to see to it that the nurses in question have better living or working conditions. I make this plea on behalf of the Canadian nurses some of whom are from my riding. However, what I have said covers all nurses who have gone overseas from Canada. Surely we should take steps to correct this situation.

Taxation was ably discussed this afternoon by my colleague the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) in a wonderful address. This is a big subject, and it will be discussed at greater length when the budget is before the house. However, it is well to give it some thought before the budget comes down, because it is often difficult to change a budget, once it has been presented to the house. While this is my first experience in the house as a member, it is not my first experience in dealing with budgets, having been on tariff committees on various occasions. To my knowledge, the only change any committee ever saw fit to make to a budget was to make an addition of the three words "and parts thereof"—and we thought that when we accomplished that we had done something. As outlined by my hon. friend, under a system of taxation one can take only so much from the people, and raise only so much by borrowing.

I certainly would be in favour of the plan advanced by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Ashby) which, boiled down to simple terms, means old age pensions for young people. Well, I am content to settle for $100 a month at forty years of age; that is, if they will make it retroactive.

There are some nuisance taxes which do not amount to much and which I think the government would be well advised to abolish. This evening I shall refer to only one of them, a thing called a radio licence fee, or a radio tax at $2.50 a year. When the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation was set up it patterned somewhat after the British Broadcasting Corporation. The committee which investigated the matter went to England, looked over the situation, and decided that the same set-up would be satisfactory in Canada. But they overlooked one thing, namely our geography.

England, as we know, is a country surrounded by water for many miles on each side. Beyond that water, before short-wave reception, the only stations they could get were foreign language stations, to which they did not listen. In Canada, however, the situation was entirely different. By the simple turning of a dial we could bring in all stations in the United States and get the big chain programmes. At that time the government decided to set up the corporation and to charge us $2.50 per set, so that we might enjoy the entertainment offered by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, without any advertising in it.

Well, most of us were willing to listen to a few soap operas, if we could get better comedians, with the result that we tuned in to United States stations. Later on, however, it was decided that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation would take advertising over its stations to help pay expenses. This made the broadcasting corporation in Canada a commercial venture. Now, I say it is either a commercial venture and as such should be on its own feet, or it should get out of the commercial picture, and let us pay for our entertainment.

This $2.50 is not a large amount to any individual who owns a radio set. The objection to it is the nuisance feature. You do not remember when your tax was last paid, with the result that some fellow in a uniform comes hammering on your door, and says to you, "Let me see your radio licence", and you are really sunk. Yes, you had forgotten about it. Of course you may have it but you do not know where it is. I say this fee should be abolished.

There is another tax I should like to talk about because I am vitally interested in it, in fact, all the people in my riding and in all other ridings, the people in every city and town in Canada are interested, because these plants are widely distributed. Against the industry I have in mind there has been discriminatory taxation for the past number of years. I refer to beverage plants—and hon. members need not start smiling, because it is not the kind of beverage they have in mind. I refer to the carbonated beverages, commonly known as soft drinks.

I think all hon. members have received briefs from their associations. I have investigated those briefs with considerable care, because I am in a position to know something about that industry, and I make the suggestion that some attention should be paid to their appeal for relief.

As it will be recalled, and as set out in the brief, when taxes were first brought down to raise money for the conduct of the war a twenty-five per cent tax was put on this industry, an industry which was built up on the five-cent piece, the same as those other industries offering chocolate bars, and all other commodities selling at a nickel. It was the only industry so taxed. The result was that the product had to sell at six cents while the others sold at five cents.

After considerable contact with the department and with the wartime prices and trade board, and also after communication with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), it was considered—probably through double talk—that this would be corrected in the next budget. But when the next budget was brought down it put a one-cent tax on everything else, including this industry. The result is that they are still discriminated against, and still have to sell their product at a price higher than is asked by their competitors.

I bring this matter to the attention of the house because they are in a precarious position, since sugar has been rationed to fifty per cent of the 1941 quota. The result has been that the volume of these factories has been cut in half, and they are left out on a limb. I am not contending that sugar should not be cut to fifty per cent. I believe, from the figures we saw in the hands of the wartime prices and trade board and the sugar administrator of Montreal that there is a scarcity of sugar. Whether or not this industry should be at the lowest point in the distribution of the amount available is a matter of opinion. We do not think it should. It is our view that this industry should have as much sugar as is allowed other sweet goods, wines and other lines which receive twenty per cent more.

In other words, the basic period for the rationing of food was 1941, and the wartime prices and trade board say that everything shall be based on the basic period. Now they come along and give some industries more than others. In other words, they are telling the Canadian public that they did not live right in 1941, that they consumed the wrong goods, and that now they should eat more sweet cakes. Well, I do not think the wartime prices and trade board is well enough versed in nutrition to issue such an order.

The sugar shortage is a world condition, and is tied up with UNRRA. Let us look at our own situation in western Ontario. Speaking for the city of London, let me point out that we have a large sugar beet producing area at our back door. In that area are two sugar refineries, one at Wallaceburg and one at Chatham, Ontario. The one at Chatham has a capacity of 80,000,000 pounds a year. For three years it has been closed down for lack of sugar beets. That lack of sugar beets arose because of a lack of labour. Selective service has been appealed to, and labour was promised, but that labour did not come. Permission was asked to advertise for the labour over a period of months, and finally that permission was granted—but too late.

The Ontario government subsidized the growers to an extent of $1.55 a ton last year, up to $225,000, which helped considerably on the beet price situation. But the growers must know a year ahead how many beets they are going to put in. One cannot tell in the spring just what the situation will be. You cannot make arrangements in the spring for, let us say, 50 acres of beets, because you have to prepare more than a year ahead, and continue to rotate the crops. You cannot go out and produce sugar beets on such short notice, any more than you can go out and get a dozen pigs when you do not plan to raise any.

In connection with this sugar situation let me tell the house that at the present time three South American countries have over 800,000 tons of sugar, or about 1,600,000,000 pounds. We cannot get our hands on that sugar because of a pool or cartel, whatever you wish to call it. These three countries in South America will not knuckle down to this cartel policy. In a way we have sort of piously condemned this cartel, but then we have our external relations department with its good neighbour policy. Because of the cartel we say, "We will not buy your sugar," and then under the good neighbour policy we say, "We would like to buy it, but we cannot get it." It is just the same sort of double talk. So much for the sugar situation. The sugar beet growers need labour. They need a plan. They need action from the government. They should know how much help they should hire, how many acres they should plant, what the price of beets is to be. They should be given a plan and then there will be relief for the sugar situation in Canada.

Quite a bit has been said about housing in this debate. I am not an authority on housing and I am not going to tell the government what to do. However, those who are trying to do that are not authorities either, and they cannot do it. When the Minister of Finance wanted to raise money during the war by means of victory loans he did not call in a bunch of carpenters to sell bonds. He went out and got bond dealers and insurance salesmen and they organized probably the best bond selling or investment selling organization that ever existed in any country. He got the men who knew how. I know that all hon. members worked on the victory loans in whatever capacities they possessed, whether it was in a desk or outside job, speaking or ringing doorbells.

In the building of houses the same thing should apply. The government should get the people with the know-how. Get the contractors and the builders; provide them with the necessary materials; make it possible for them to get the necessary finances and they will build the required houses. I am not condemning the bureaucrats or controllers, whatever name you want to call them—you cannot call them as bad a name sometimes as you would like—because I think we collected the best group of men that we could get quickly who were out of work—I beg your pardon, I mean men who were out of essential war work. We put them on these jobs as controllers.

However, the emergency is over. Let us look at some of these miracle men who are still on the job. In my district we have a tailor who is conttroller of honey. I was a member of an association of those using small steel parts in connection with domestic production during the war. A controller of steel closures was appointed. Steel closures are made by a multiple production stamping process. After a couple of meetings with this controller I began to wonder what knowledge he had of this business and I asked him, "What did you do before you took this job?" He said, "I was secretary of a horticultural society." I think the only idea of closures that existed in his mind was the fact that a morning glory closes in the night.

As further evidence of the fact that men are being used who are not fitted for their job, may I say that I noticed in a western Ontario paper this week that a production manager of a company who had been receiving a large salary had toppled over about two months ago with a heart spell and had had to retire. It was a candy business with which he was connected but he has now been made shelter administrator for the emergency. The only thing he ever made that looked like anything connected with a house was candy which looks like a door-knob.

If we continue with this policy of not putting men with the know-how in the right jobs I am afraid that what will come about will be what was perhaps inadvertently stated by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare (Mr. Baker) who said, as reported at page 97 of Hansard, that our men will eventually be properly rehabilitated. Eventually is not good enough; we have to have it now. These men have been overseas; they have married; they have come back and they have no place to go. They are living in barracks, old sheds; they are living three and four families in a hovel. Eventually is not good enough. Unless the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) does not take better action than he has indicated he is taking we shall not have the houses to take care of these families and with the cold weather we shall be facing a serious situation. So much for controls, although I could give the house more examples.

There is one other thing I would point out to the Minister of Reconstruction and probably the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Abbott). I have not been here long enough to be sufficiently conversant with just what each minister has under his control. Some of the ministers have been here much longer, but I noticed this afternoon that the Minister of Finance looked over to another minister and said, "Is that mine or is that yours?" As a new member, who am I to say anything?

But there is one thing I should like to point out in connection with which every minister has a responsibility. This has probably been mentioned before in this debate. There are a lot of government buildings around the country which were rented by the Department of National Defence. I have a long wire, which I am not going to read, about one in London in my riding. This building was rented by the Department of National Defence and justly so because they needed the space. The firm moved out to smaller quarters because their business had been cut down by virtue of war curtailments. But they want to get back to their building. Considerable alterations will have to be made because the Department of National Defence changed it to suit their needs. At the present time it is filled with goods in dead storage, things that are not being used and that will probably be turned over to the War Assets Corporation.

[Mr. Manross.]

There are many buildings in western Ontario which have been rented on that basis and the people want to get them back. It seems almost impossible for them to get a straight yes or no. This company states that they now employ thirty men but that as soon as they get their building they will employ eighty men. They state that they want to help rehabilitate the boys coming back. That is the situation and I think the departments concerned could well look into it to see that these civilian buildings are turned back to the owners. This should be done even if the leases have not run out. They need not pay for them, although I am not concerned about the rent. I am concerned simply with getting these buildings back into production so that we can employ our veterans who are getting out of the armed services.

There has been some talk or rumour of a national registration. I hope that is not so because that is simply another control. If it were so I would be ready to wax eloquent for a long time about it. In case it is in the government's mind I should like to say something about it. A national registration was taken in 1940. The plausible story told us at that time was that it was to get track of our man-power in order to see what they could do and what they could not do. The government wanted a sort of identification system. It started out very well; it cost a lot of money, but I do not think the cost was too great if it had done the job it was intended to do. We found out afterwards that it did not work. It was found that it would take a lot of courage to make it work and the government did not have the courage. They lost their courage and they also lost their director of selective service.

While national registration had that purpose in mind it really did not work. When the national selective service came to your factory and said, "We want some men for Central Aircraft," or some other war plant, no attention was paid to the registration cards. The employer made a list of the men and what work they were doing and that is what was used. They did not use the registration cards any more than to know that when you sent Bill Jones over to selective service it was really Bill Jones and not Sam Miller. I think the purpose of the registration card is over, although, of course, various governments still use the backs of them, and I will soon have to have a new one myself. I do not think it is the function of the federal government to supply a system of identification cards or kind of human dog-tag to help provincial governments set up their liquor business or to be used in connection with ration cards. I do not think we should take the taxpayers' money to carry on this national registration.

There is another fact I should like to mention before I sit down. Practically two hundred seats in this house are represented by hon. gentlemen, whether sitting on this side of the house or the other, who were elected on various platforms, but there was one thing common to them that stood out, and that was that all of them were against mass regimentation. The way to count the votes is not to count just the votes your party got but also the votes for the party opposing you that was also against mass regimentation. In my riding there were about 34,000 votes, and about 30,000 of them were against regimentation; that is, they were split between the government side and our side. So I would say that the public have given the government a mandate, and given this group a mandate, on the basis of no regimentation, and we should always bear in mind that having this mandate we cannot represent our people and regiment them.

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, as the new member for Kootenay West I succeed a gentleman who served that constituency in this house for a period of over twenty years, and I am certain that all those who knew Mr. Esling will join with me in wishing him a happy and lengthy retirement.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HERRIDGE: Mr. Esling received the esteem and affection of all people in Kootenay West regardless of party affiliations. On that account possibly may I say that my advent to this house was delayed for about ten years.

I enter this house under somewhat unusual political circumstances, and I think a few words of explanation are necessary. I was nominated for the last federal election as the candidate of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation organization in Kootenay West, actively supported by large numbers of members of trades unions, farmers' organizations, veterans' organizations and cooperatives. I was elected to this house in support of the principles of the Regina manifesto and the present national programme of the C.C.F. Owing to the difference that has occurred within the fold of those who support the philosophy and the principles of the Regina manifesto, I sit in this house as a member of the people's C.C.F. group in Kootenay West. That difference, which was the result of sincere convictions on both sides, does not lessen in any degree my determination to work for the building up of society as enunciated in the principles of the Regina manifesto.

I have just mentioned that I entered this house under somewhat unusual political circumstances, and if hon. members will forgive a reference to my domestic affairs, I may say that I enter this house under rather unusual domestic circumstances. I come on the one side from a long line of Liberals. My father is a great admirer of the Right Hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and has been a long-time supporter of his, and he will be reading the papers to see exactly what I say to-night.

An hon. MEMBER: Be a good boy!

Mr. HERRIDGE: My mother comes from a long line of Conservatives and is a great admirer of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken). She will be reading the papers to see what I say to-night. My wife is a supporter of the Cooperative Commonwealth principles and philosophy and also an admirer of the political sagacity of the leader of the C.C.F. group in this house, and she also will be reading the papers and hoping that I give both the other parties hell.

One of my daughters—I have four daughters, Mr. Speaker—is a great admirer of the good work that she considers the Social Credit party has done in Alberta. I have another daughter who thinks that possibly the Labour-Progressive party is the party for youth, and I have two other daughters who are inclined to think that we are all wrong and that what we require in this country is a popular front of all progressive parties. They will all be reading the papers to see what I have to say in this debate. But regardless of our domestic political differences we carry on quite harmoniously so far as our family is concerned and form and have formed a family popular front against the vicissitudes of this life.

I have the honour to represent a particularly choice section of this dominion inhabitated by a progressive and energetic people. During my forty years of residence in the Kootenay West constituency I have seen it make a great development. I have seen there the development of a great mining and smelting industry. I have seen the development of a substantial lumbering industry, and I have seen the development of a considerable agricultural economy. My intention, while I sit in this house is to do my best to represent Canadian thought as a whole and to represent the people of my constituency who have placed their confidence in me. My intention is to do what I can to have a constructive approach to the questions that will come before this assembly, and I shall endeavour to be fair in my criticisms and in my suggestions.

So far I have enjoyed the deliberations in this debate. I listened with interest to the leader of the opposition and I must say I listened also with sympathy to his attempt, obviously with good intentions, to reconcile a Conservative philosophy with the necessities of this time. Unfortunately, when the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party (Mr. Coldwell) was speaking I was called out to meet an old-time resident of my home village whom I have not had occasion to see for thirty-five years. Therefore I heard only my hon. friend's concluding remarks; but I have read his speech and I congratulate him upon the logical presentation of the case he gave to this house.

I must congratulate the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Low) upon his able exposition of what are, in my opinion, economic fallacies unless they are combined with social ownership. I also enjoyed the—shall I say?—vigorous remarks this afternoon of the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Ashby). I thought he made a virile and excellent address but I should just like to say this. When he was drawing that parallel between the freedom which he enjoyed and that which he allowed his pigs, one extra freedom above the freedoms allowed by the Atlantic charter, he painted a rosy picture but failed to include a full statement of the facts. Those gentlemen who drew the Atlantic charter and made recommendations for certain freedoms to become the rights of mankind did not recommend those freedoms looking forward to the future to cut our throats.

My remarks regarding the speech from the throne will be quite brief so far as detail is concerned. I am very glad to know that this government seeks the promotion of peace, work, and health in domestic and international relations. That is a fine statement. We are told that the charter of the united nations is to be submitted to this parliament; that the government is endeavouring to secure dominion-provincial agreement in matters essential to the satisfactory progress of this dominion; that the government is considering the maintenance of long-term markets for primary industry. That is a thing which must be considered; the farmers of this country are thinking anxiously about it at this time. We are also told that the government intends to make plans for the stabilization of international exchanges.

I think the recommendation made by the leader of the C.C.F. party was a good one. These plans should be brought before a special committee of this house to be studied and considered: plans for the extension of home construction, very necessary and urgently needed; plans for a national minimum of security, very much needed and coming very late; plans for national health insurance, which the people of Canada have been waiting for for years; plans for more generous treatment of old age pensioners. These are excellent plans so far as they read in the speech from the throne. Apparently planning is becoming fashionable, because I remember that only a few years ago, when anybody suggested planning he was accused of regimentation, bureaucracy, national socialism, and so on. But regardless of the government's basic philosophy, any government to-day, owing to the realities of the situation, the economic and social conditions, is forced—actually forced—into planning. The issue is, for whom will that planning be; will it be for the many or the few?

The speech from the throne does not deal in detail with any legislation to be brought down by this government. On reading it I was reminded of going into my orchard on a spring day when the orchard is covered with bloom; everything looks fair and beautiful. But you cannot estimate the crop by looking at the bloom; you cannot estimate a crop of fruit until the fruit is set. I approach the speech from the throne in that state of mind. I trust the blossom in the government's programme will be so fertilized by the demands of the people and the activities of this house that a crop of highly necessary and urgent legislation will result.

I was elected on the basis of rendering strong support for the urgent necessity for continued united nations' cooperation; for the principles of the Regina manifesto; in support of the general programme of the C.C.F.; and of one other major plan, the necessity of democratic mobilization far beyond the confines of partisan politics. I am sure that the principles of the Regina manifesto are known to most hon. members. It is not my intention to deal with it this evening; if any hon. member is ignorant of the principles of the manifesto I shall be only too glad to supply him with a copy. The general or national programme of the C.C.F. will no doubt receive attention at a later date.

I wish to deal specifically with the urgent necessity for continued united nations' cooperation and the necessity for a mobilization of the Canadian people far beyond the confines of partisan politics. We believe that our economic structure must be based on the foundations of continued united nations' cooperation and mutual aid. I wish to express just a few ideas in that connection.

Upon the right relationships of the British commonwealth of nations, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and the United States depends the future welfare of the world. Without mutual understanding and resolute action a horrible future faces us. What a contribution those three great nations have made toward a common victory: the British commonwealth of nations, with a thousand years of struggle for peace; the Soviet Union, with its immense and recent experience in the building of a new civilization, the greatest social experiment in history; the United States, with its vast industrial machine, its magnificent organizing ability, and the vitality of its people. If we can only keep that combination together, what possibilities we have to win the peace in the days that are ahead! We have all much to learn. Unity will develop only through understanding; but with understanding I am certain we can distil from the joint contributions and necessities of the united nations an international order of justice and of peace.

I wish to deal briefly with a few possibilities of the future. Let me emphasize that at the conclusion of this war the world is different from what it was at the conclusion of the last war. We now have over one-sixth of the world's area a great socialist nation, a nation which has gone through great trials and tribulations and has come through this war successfully as an ally of ours. That produces an entirely different set of circumstances from what existed at the conclusion of the last war. From this time on the eyes of the world will be focused on the public economy of the Soviet Union. We are going to see a form of socialist-capitalist state emulation. Not all those who support the capitalist system in this country are unprogressive; but we have a core of reactionaries in all the western democracies. There are some people who support and endorse the capitalist system who are progressive in their outlook and so realize that the world of to-day is entering a new stage. The western capitalist democracies from this point on must keep their eyes open and watch the public economy of the Soviet Union. That will produce an entirely different psychological approach to current questions on the part of the people in the capitalist democracies. There will be a good deal of watching of future developments in the Soviet Union, and the Soviet Union will watch our trends in production. I believe that we can learn a great deal from one another; they will learn from us and we shall learn from them.

As I said before, we are willing to seek mutual understanding, and I am sure that out of this will come a better world order. I do not look to the future from a pessimistic or negative point of view. I realize the great dangers that face us in the days ahead, the most dangerous days the Canadian nation has ever faced. At the same time I realize the great opportunities that lie ahead, and I believe that if we approach the present situation from a pessimistic or a negative point of view we are unwise, because if we do so we may undermine the morale of the people. I say that, because, without confidence, without courage and without faith in the future, we shall not succeed. If we approach our problems from the pessimistic or negative point of view we shall undermine that confidence, that courage and that faith in ourselves which are necessary if we are to remain united.

We have these two great economies, the socialist economy and the capitalist economy. This world is growing smaller every day owing to the rapidity of transportation, and we have several factors working in our favour, factors which I would wish that more members would consider when viewing the question as a whole. Owing to the rapidity of transportation we shall have a tremendous increase in the exchange of ideas as between the western democracies and the Soviet Union and other countries in the world. In the post-war period we shall have great exchanges of literature and art and science and an enormous increase in travel as soon as that becomes possible.

In regard to the world situation, not only have governments to seek to cooperate, but we have great hope in the possibility of co-operation among peoples, the direct representatives of the peoples meeting together to discuss world problems. We have the illustration afforded by the world federation of trade unions. In London in February representatives from thirty-six allied countries and seven neutral countries representing sixty million workers met to discuss questions common to all the workers of all countries. That is a good sign; it indicates the great possibilities for the future from the use which the peoples of the world can make of available machinery to meet and discuss problems with a view to promoting understanding and ordered peace.

Organized labour can play a great part in the international field for the building up of world unity. The unity which is being forged by the world trade union federation and other organizations will anchor the united nations and keep them together. Victory on the battlefield won, organized workers are better able, in my opinion, than people in many other walks of life to realize that unity in the post-war world will be essential, a unity that will be strong enough to overcome some misunderstandings and possibly many disappointments.

Then we shall have world agricultural councils. We shall have the farmers of the world meeting together to discuss the distribution of the primary products produced by the farmers of the world, not planning scarcity but planning that the undernourished people of the world shall receive surpluses from countries such as ours.

We must not forget that so long as there are understandard and undernourished people living in any country their condition is a constant challenge and a constant threat to our standard of living. I congratulate the Canadian federation of agriculture upon the work it has done to promote the coming world agricultural conference which I think will be held early next year. Our Canadian federation of agriculture is doing a great work for the farmers of Canada, and in this connection I should like to quote briefly from a booklet issued by them recently. I recommend it to hon. members. I think they should get it if they have not already done so. It is entitled "Farmers to Take a Hand in World Affairs," and I would quote the following from page 16, from the federation statement with regard to the world agricultural council.

More and more, from different angles, it is being brought home to us these days that world affairs are our affairs. Unquestionably the primary producer of our country—and similarly of other agricultural countries—can no longer think in terms of domestic policy without finding himself drawn into a consideration of international policy. There is widespread acknowledgment that in this interdependent world no nation can stand alone and no nation can any longer intelligently plan and direct its food and agriculture programme without first ensuring that its domestic plan harmonizes with the collective plan of other food exporting, as well as the food importing countries.

Canadian farmers are fundamentally in agreement with the declaration of the Hot Springs conference. They believe that the goal of freedom from want of food suitable and adequate for the health and strength of all people can be achieved; that we must start dealing with international problems in an organized international way; that we must replace international anarchy by international order in the field of agricultural production, distribution and consumption.

Our farmers have always believed in an economy of abundance, but they are no longer interested in a laissez-faire programme of unorganized abundance. They are convinced that the almost unlimited possibilities of an expanding world economy should be organized and coordinated on a world scale. Accordingly they believe in promoting and expanding international trade on a planned and orderly basis.

Looking to the post-war period, we believe that security for agriculture and for the farm family must be the keynote of a forward-looking programme. While we seek this as a goal for our own primary producers, we naturally acknowledge it as a legitimate and desirable goal in all other countries. Moreover, we do not believe that a substantial measure of security is possible or likely to be permanent in any one country unless it is based upon a solid foundation of international collaboration which will provide a comparable measure of security for fellow farmers in other countries.

[Mr. Herridge.]

There, in the spirit of our Canadian farmers, the spirit which is being exhibited also by farmers in other lands, lies a great opportunity for the primary producers to get together and do something in the way of working for the future benefit of the nations as a whole.

I think we shall also have a great getting together of veterans of the united nations. These men fought in this war a common enemy and they will meet together in the not very distant future on an international basis. There will be a united nations' veterans' federation embracing representatives from all countries to continue the friendships and the comradeship commenced in the war. They will continue for many years to come, and these men can play a great part in promoting world peace and world improvement.

I would suggest to the federal and provincial governments that instead of erecting memorials in cold stone throughout the country to those who have not returned from this second world war, nothing better could be done as a tribute and as a permanent memorial to the sacrifices of these men than to provide funds to see that some representatives, some of the teen-age children from every county in Canada, have an opportunity annually to visit other countries in order to attend meetings of international youth organizations. Youth can play a great part in the development and improvement of international relations.

Then again we have the coming development of world cooperative organizations, in connection with which there is great cause for hope and, I think for confidence. Also without question there will be international organizations of women in the future on a considerable scale. Through these great groups of the peoples of all countries meeting together I see a great opportunity, with the assistance of governments, for the building of a peace that will be permanent and secure.

I see my time is going very rapidly, but I should like to deal briefly with national affairs. The capitalist system is very hard to assess. Its fall has been anticipated by some people for many years. I suppose inflation might hasten it, but inflation is one of the great dangers of the days immediately ahead of us. Whatever the immediate future holds, however, I do not see the collapse of capitalism at once. As I try to study the situation as it exists in this country to-day, I believe we are in for a period of state capitalism, in which many of the chief industries of this country will be financed by state loans bearing interest. I believe we are now just entering that stage. My point is that this will be the most dangerous period in our history. Time alone will show whether we shall move toward a totalitarian economy or toward a general cooperative commonwealth. I see that great danger. The question is whether state capitalism will become a rigid means of maintaining the system for the benefit of the few, or whether it will evolve democratically into a cooperative commonwealth. If we are to have an orderly, planned evolution to a cooperative commonwealth, I believe we must have the people of this country organized in groups far exceeding the bounds of parties and politics, to defend and improve democracy and work together to meet concrete situations and specific conditions. We have men of varying political beliefs. We have them in the labour unions, the veterans' organizations, the farmers' organizations, the women's organizations, and the cooperatives. Here are great bodies of public opinion; and if we are to preserve democracy and evolve in the right direction we must have a mass mobilization of the people, without regard to partisan politics, to meet situations which may change from day to day.

I am hurrying to complete my remarks before my time is up. The one great enemy we have is reaction, and the one great weapon that they can use is disunity. As I see it, the only way the Canadian people can be prevented from evolving a democrative cooperative commonwealth is by the spreading of disunity. That was the method used in European countries; it has always been the method of those who try to destroy the efforts of the working class. In this country they will try to arouse the enmity of race against race, religion against religion, veteran against labour, unorganized labour against organized labour, farmer against worker, east against west. That is the thing we have to watch, the thing we have to fight and defeat. The greatest danger of the future is the possibility of disunity among the Canadian people.

We have some factors in our favour. We have the hope of cooperation between the peoples of the united nations. We have a mass desire for change. We have our democratic traditions which have come to us through the centuries of struggle. We have our great natural resources, and our great capacity for adjusting ourselves to changing conditions. Finally, we have the vitality and intelligence of the Canadian people. Because the C.C.F. Regina manifesto approaches the problem with an understanding of Canadian requirements, Canadian psychology and Canadian conditions, I support it. The next step will be the control and finally the ownership of the banks and great monopolies of this country, to be followed by a great extension of social ownership in provincial and municipal fields. That will be the beginning of a wide basis for cooperative ownership throughout this country.

I see my time is nearly up, Mr. Speaker, but I should like to relate what some of my constituents in Kootenay West expect from this government. Organized labour in my constituency expect legislation to protect and advance the interests of the working class, and they expect it soon. The organized farmers expect security, and therefor endorse the proposed national natural products marketing act, a draft of which was recently presented to this government. The farmers of West Kootenay are also very much concerned about the government taking immediate action to investigate the Little Cherry disease, which may bring about the ruin of the cherry crop in Kootenay and Okanagan and possibly throughout Canada. The organized veterans expect more action in the development of the reestablishment programme. All the people of my constituency expect this government to implement its promises.

In conclusion, I should like to say that I am certain members of this house are divided not so much by the matter of aims as by the matter of methods. Therefore I urge that this thought may be with us in our deliberations in this chamber. If we strive for national unity of purpose; if we persevere to that end, we shall wrest from the hand of privilege and monopoly in this country its power to defeat the desires of the people, and will build in Canada a civilization that will justify to the full the sacrifices of the boys who will not return.

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, the new members who have taken part in this debate find themselves speaking in an atmosphere very different from that which prevailed at the commencement of the last parliament. Hon. members will recall that during the first few weeks we were in session in 1940 the low countries were overrun and the collapse of France became imminent. Now everyone is rejoicing that the nazi forces have been completely defeated and the democracies have triumphed. But those of us who are here will have during the life of this parliament responsibilities almost as great as we had during the past five years.

Regardless of where we sit in this chamber there can be no difference of opinion as to the effectiveness of the contribution Canada has made toward the allied victory. The men and women in our armed services have matched the heroism of the fighting forces of any of the united nations.

Our people at home, in the factories, on the farms, in the mines and in other civilian occupations have surpassed all previous records established in Canada. I am sure that members of the government would not for one moment try to claim credit for Canada's magnificent performance. The people of the whole country were responsible for the achievements.

During the war years many orthodox ideas were exploded. It has been proven conclusively that a nation's war effort is in no way related to the amount of gold in the Bank of Canada or in the hills of Kentucky. The important considerations always were these: Have we the materials? Have we the man-power required?

The government was forced to adopt planning. Free enterprise was not interested in making guns, tanks or planes sufficient to meet the law of supply and demand. However, they were willing to make them on a cost-plus basis, which assured them that they could not lose. However, there is no use in quarrelling about what has been done; we must look to the future. But I think, having established during the war years that whatever is physically possible must be made financially possible, we should accept that as a suitable policy in war time.

The present Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) and his predecessor made it clear on different occasions that in no way would Canada's contribution to victory be limited by financial considerations. In other words, to establish an air training school the only questions asked were: Is there a suitable site? Have we the water available? Have we lumber and other building materials? Have we carpenters? Is there a need? If the answers were in the affirmative the job was executed, and the workers in the building trades and the lumber yards cooperated to the fullest extent in seeing that the work was done.

Since I have come to parliament the problem of housing has received a good deal of my attention. Every year I have tried to urge the administration to face in a realistic way the providing of adequate housing for the people of the country. I argued that if the government intended to spend $10 million to build a new war plant at Windsor, Toronto, or Hamilton, some consideration should be given to the matter of providing congenial living quarters where people were going to live, for those working in the plant.

There was a critical housing problem on our doorstep when war broke out. During those ten years of depression, when we should have been building new houses, our carpenters were walking the streets in idleness; our factories were failing to produce building materials because we had no money in Canada in those days. Therefore, when war broke out we had a most acute housing shortage from coast to coast. Eventually the government recognized that there was a problem and Wartime Housing was set up. However, I feel that we failed during the war years to give sufficient consideration to the problem.

I am greatly encouraged to find that at this session hon. members in all sections of the house are emphasizing the immediate job that must be undertaken in facing up to to-day's problems. I have been interested in the remarks which have come from our Progressive Conservative friends to our right. These have been observations of protest. However, I suggest they should not protest too loudly, for fear we might be obliged to inquire into just what they did when they were in office, and also inquire as to what plans they would have introduced, had they been elected to the government benches.

Let me remind the house that between the years 1930 and 1935 we had a Conservative government in office. I suggest that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) should be congratulated upon being able to change the name of the party. Certainly it reflects credit upon his personality, and his long term in public life. But the majority of those associated with him have come from the Conservative side of the family. One might ask what was accomplished during the years Viscount Bennett was Prime Minister of Canada.

I have in my hand the report of building activities in the principal countries of the world between the years 1929 and 1937, taking 1929 as a base period, with the figure 100. In this table we find that Canada has the worst record of any among the principal countries. The following table will show building activities in Canada during those years:

1931	47
1932	16
1933	9·7
1934	12·8
1935	18·6
1936	17·6
1937	29

But while we were unable to grapple in an imaginative way with the housing problem, countries like the United Kingdom, New Zealand, the Netherlands, Sweden, Norway and others which had progressive governments were forced by public opinion to take advantage of the depression, and to see that, instead of keeping people on doles and relief, something useful should be produced. Let me point out, in passing, that some of these governments were not labour governments; in fact, some were Conservative.

Of course, the production of houses is one of the most economic undertakings in which any country can participate. For instance, in the year that our building index was down to 9.7, in the United Kingdom they had an index of 114.5.

For many years the leader of the opposition was premier of Manitoba. I would remind him that all the time he was in office disgraceful housing conditions existed in the metropolitan area of Winnipeg. I do not think housing conditions are any worse in Winnipeg than in most other cities, but in that city they have had a public health department that was not afraid to face up to the fact.

I hold in my hand a report of the public health committee for 1942. This is what Mr. Alexander Officer, who was so well known for years throughout Canada and who was chief inspector of the division of sanitation and housing in Winnipeg, had to say about conditions which prevailed in Winnipeg:

> Surely our present housing shortage cannot continue much longer. The risk to health of our substandard housing, not to mention that of the fire hazard in our non-descript tenements, may be brought home to us with painful remorse. Already, we have much evidence in the toll of moral and mental standards, also the cost of crime in our blighted districts. Children are denied the elementary innocent amusements of youth, and are indeed often exposed to health and moral hazards.

And further down:

> The doubling up of families is one of the chief characteristics of slum areas and this condition is spreading like a cancer into some of our most exclusive residential districts. It is only a matter of time, therefore, when these districts will degenerate into blighted areas. . . .
> Slums have for centuries been the curse of large communities, serving as breeding places for all manner of crime and the spread of disease.

And at page 7 of the report:

> It is surely not too much to say that when our men on active service return to civil life they have a right to expect that decent living quarters for their future family life is available, or at least in process of construction.

These are the conditions which prevailed in Winnipeg when the hon. member was premier of Manitoba. If he was interested in providing housing for people in low income brackets, then something should have been done by the provincial government for the city of Winnipeg at that time.

When the Conservative party was in office at Ottawa a special committee on housing was established. But it was not until 1935, not until it was clear that they were on their way out, that the committee was set up. Witnesses were called to review the situation. They reviewed conditions in Toronto, Halifax and Vancouver; they considered the cost of maintaining slums in terms of crime, fire hazards and disease. These matters are all set out in the report, but nothing very much was done.

Something was done. I was living in northern Saskatchewan at the time and we had some assistance from the federal and provincial governments in carrying out a housing programme. I mentioned in the house at one time something of the housing achievements of the Progressive Conservatives during those hungry thirties, and in looking through my old files I found a return that had been brought down in connection with housing assistance to three veterans in my constituency. One of these is a veteran of two wars. One sent two sons to the present war, one of whom will never return. The third served during the last war.

These three men who fought for freedom from 1914 to 1918 had committed no crime. They were carpenters who just could not get a job in Regina at any price, so they journeyed to the Hudson Bay Junction district, where I lived, under a scheme financed partly by the city, partly by the province and partly by the federal authorities. According to the particulars furnished by the dominion authorities the following expenses were shared by the federal and provincial governments, both of which were Conservative at the time.

I shall not give the names of these veterans, but I have them here. Under the housing programme the governments of the day provided a payment of $6.70 for six windows. The next item is $3.80 for stovepipes, tar paper and hinges. The next item is $35.75 for lumber. The ceiling that was permitted in those days was $50 per unit, and you can see what a careful manager this settler was because his total expenses came to $49.75.

Of course, it should be remembered that all logs were free for the cutting. They were on a plot of land of 160 acres and so thick that you could not possibly drive through them with your oxen. You did not have to pay for the logs, but expert carpenters were obliged to go north; they were not forced to go north, but they came to the conclusion that nothing could be worse than living on relief in Regina. They thought that if they had 160 acres of free land, all the fuel they needed, some berries and maybe some wild game in the winter time, if they would not be in heaven they would be better off than they would be on relief in Regina.

Here is the next case—and I want to say that I know these families very well—which concerns a father, mother and eight children. They were limited to $10 a month for food and were permitted to cut down on their lumber and put more into food. So this family spent only $31.60 for lumber. On account of having so many children they had to get along with fewer windows, and they had only $4.50 for windows. The total expenditure for the house was $36.10.

In the next case $5.45 was spent for windows and it is not stated how many. Then there was $5.85 for building material, $31.75 for lumber and $5.20 for tar paper.

As I mentioned, those were the houses that were built for heroes. These were settlers who came north in the thirties to try to get off relief. They were given $50 at a time when the governments of the day in Great Britain, the United States and Sweden were saying, "We cannot ask our people to live in $50 houses when we have plenty of lumber, plenty of building material and plenty of carpenters; our relief programme should be more ambitious".

I give this same reason for failing to support the Progressive Conservative amendment which, if carried, would amount to a vote of want of confidence in the present government. Who knows but what we might have them to take their place. Therefore I cannot support an amendment which says that the government has failed to take adequate and timely action to meet the ever-mounting housing crisis. I do not think they did that. I am going to support the C.C.F. amendment, but if that does not carry I shall not be able to support the Conservative amendment in view of their record while in office.

Coming back to the immediate problem, I must admit that the present administration has recognized that there is a problem. As I said, Wartime Housing was set up several years ago. While I was critical of the building of potential slums when permanent houses could have been built for about the same cost under some sort of plan, as I said, that is all gone and all the talking I could do would not change the situation. But I repeat that I think it was unfortunate that the federal administration should spend such large sums in building what have been called temporary houses and giving a guarantee that they would be torn down. Surely they must have known from past experience that these houses will never be torn down so long as there are less desirable houses being occupied in Hull, Halifax or Vancouver. I am afraid that at the rate of travelling this situation will last for a long time.

In 1943 a special subcommittee on housing and community planning was set up by the advisory committee on reconstruction. The terms of reference were:

> To review existing legislation and administrative organization relating to housing and community planning, both urban and rural, throughout Canada, and to report regarding such changes in legislation or modification of organization and procedure as may be necessary . . .

And so on. If hon. members have not read this report I urge them to do so, because I think it one of the best pieces of work done by the groups working on reconstruction. It is certainly the best study by far that has been done to date on the housing problem in Canada The recommendations are set forth in an easily read fashion at the commencement of the book. They review conditions in different parts of Canada; they deal with urban housing, rural housing and legislation in other countries. Nothing less than the carrying out of the recommendations of this subcommittee will be good enough in this day and age.

In 1944 the National Housing Act was brought down, supposedly to implement the recommendations in this report. This act has been in force for over a year and we must judge the government's performance by the results to date. I think it should have been recognized that housing activities would provide one of the most popular and most useful post-war activities. Sir William Beveridge in his recent book on full employment says:

> Adequate and healthy housing presents the largest single objective for desirable outlay after the war and affords the largest scope for raising the standard of life, health and happiness. Housing involves the setting up of a long-term programme of building to approved designs with the maximum of economy. The scale of the programme must be determined not arbitrarily but with reference to the total labour available; some forms of building and construction can be used as the balancing factor in the national man-power budget. The prospective importance of housing makes it vital to secure, by new methods if necessary, the maximum efficiency of the building industry. It is even more important to secure that national planning of town and country is made a reality, before permanent housing begins.

The legislation that has been passed has assumed that private enterprise would be able to solve the problem. The National Housing Act which had been in force previously was altered in several important details, but the fact is that the present National Housing Act is just not of any use to people in the lower income brackets. What chance has the average worker in a war plant, a non-commissioned officer or a member of the armed forces who has been away from this country for four or five years to make the down payment and monthly instalments that are required?

Our National Housing Act is proceeding without sufficient consideration being given to town planning. Here, there, and everywhere houses have been built on lots without proper consideration of modern building requirements, and without consideration of the need which is everywhere recognized for town planning. Proper surveys have not been made to determine whether houses built under the National Housing Act are meeting the needs of the people who most deserve houses. According to the statistics that have been compiled eighty-five per cent of the houses built under the National Housing Act are designed for five persons or fewer. Is it the policy of this government to sponsor a housing programme designed to keep our birth rate low? The scheme operates without any large-scale administration to take advantage of reduced building costs. The programme also operates without adequate supervision of standards, without recognition of the interests of union labour, and without trying to find out whether the mortgagees would be able to negotiate the mortgages independently. There is no argument about it that those who have been able to take advantage of the national housing loans have been able to get their houses built at a much lower cost than they could have done before we had a national housing act. But providing cheap money or making lower rates of money available to those in the upper income brackets will not solve the problem in this country. That part of the programme dealing with low rental housing has been a complete flop to date. I noticed in the press yesterday a dispatch from Toronto saying that formation of limited dividend companies to finance the construction of low-rental housing projects throughout Canada would be proceeded with immediately by the Canadian life insurance companies as soon as a charter for the holding company, to be known as the Housing Enterprises of Canada, is obtained from the Secretary of State. I protest, Mr. Speaker, against a democratically elected government handing over to private corporations the responsibility of sponsoring the building of low-cost housing for the people of Canada. There is no country in the world where a scheme of that sort has worked out under private enterprise. The only countries that have dealt effectively with slum clearance and low-rental housing have recognized that it is a national responsibility, that the federal government is the only authority that can adequately finance the problem.

Mr. HOMUTH: What are those countries?

Mr. NICHOLSON: The United States, for instance. I suggest that hon. members take a trip and see what has been done in New York, Washington, and Pittsburgh. I am not suggesting that they have solved their problem in the United States, but at least they have demonstrated what can be done. In New York city, for example, one will find the Vladeck houses in one of the oldest districts, including Cherry street, where George Washington at one time had his residence. It was one of the worst sections of the city, one of its worst slum areas. New houses have been built there for 1,771 families, or nearly 6,000 people. They are living in modern fire-proof apartments, with running water, electric light, gas stove, electric refrigerator and modern bathroom. The rents range upwards from about $15 a month. The rents are a little higher in New York city; the average gross rent including services is $24.80 a month for the Vladeck houses, which is regarded by the people who live in them as a very low rental. But it would not have been possible for people to live in this sort of housing had it not been that some public authority realized that it is more costly to maintain slums than to face the problem and clear them.

Mr. ADAMSON: Has the hon. member the figures for the Metropolitan Life Insurance company's scheme?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Yes. They have a beautiful development at Parkchester, where they have cleared a slum area. The rents are a good deal higher in Parkchester. The rentals, which include both gas and electricity, are for two rooms, $32 to $34 monthly; three rooms, $39 to $53; four rooms, $52 to $64; and five rooms, $63 to $71. The Metropolitan Life Insurance company has received no funds for this work from the federal treasury. Later on, this group will have something to say as to how life insurance companies in this and other countries do get their funds.

Anyone who has visited the public housing developments in the United States, Great Britain or on the continent will agree that no private agency has been able to devise any scheme for building suitable houses and making them available to people in the lower third of the income brackets. In the United States the federal authority has popularized what it is doing. The pamphlet I have in my hand shows what has been done, what these areas looked like before and after the projects were built; and if you go through these districts now which formerly were slum areas and see the children playing in the parks or playing in the recreation room in the basement, you will realize that for them the world is quite a different place from what it was before.

But in Canada we are passing the buck to the insurance companies. The act provides that municipalities, provinces and philanthropic organizations may contribute to a rent reduction fund—everybody under the sun but the federal government. But slum clearance should not be regarded as a charitable proposition. We must recognize that we have to pay for these slums directly or indirectly. We maintain our penitentiaries at a very high cost, and we have to provide fire and police protection for these slum areas. It has been established in many countries that it is cheaper in the long run to tear down the slums and rebuild to provide decent homes for the people.

There are those who say that the working people would not appreciate decent housing. Hon. members all know the old slander about working people using the bathtub for storing coal. But there is not a single case on record in any country where working people have used the bathtub for a coal storage. On the contrary, people living in the Vladeck houses in New York city appreciate the chance to have running hot water so that the kiddies can have a bath regularly.

Farm housing received a good deal of attention by the Curtis committee. The statistics compiled by the dominion bureau of statistics revealed shocking conditions in farm housing in Canada. To those who are interested in selling furnaces, radios and bathtubs I suggest that they should get behind those who are fighting for an ambitious housing programme. In Canada the percentage of farm people who have refrigeration, radios, automobiles, bathrooms, vacuum cleaners, is only 3·9 per cent. In Prince Edward Island it is ·07 per cent; in Nova Scotia, 3·4 per cent; and so on down the way; a very small percentage. Like the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken), I was born in a log house. Neither of us should apologize for that. Neither of us had anything to say as to where we were born. But my father and mother moved out of the log house as soon as they could, and I never once heard any suggestion that we should go back.

Mr. GARDINER: How many are there in the province that has had a socialist government over a year?

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Mr. NICHOLSON: There are a great many, but the people who elected the socialist government are not proceeding on the assumption that log houses are good enough in this day and age.

Mr. GARDINER: No; but how many bathtubs are there?

Mr. MACKENZIE: And what are you doing about it?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Saskatchewan has a poor record, I admit, but I must remind the minister that these statistics were taken in 1941, before we had a C.C.F. government.

Mr. GARDINER: What I want to know from my hon. friend is: they have been in office for something over a year, and they have statistics, what are they? How many bathtubs are there?

Mr. COLDWELL: More than the hon. gentleman's friends put in in forty years.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not think you have put any in.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The minister must know that at the present time we are very short of bathtubs and almost everything else.

Mr. MACKENZIE: So are we.

Mr. NICHOLSON: And these statistics were taken, as I said, in 1941, before we ever had a C.C.F. government.

Mr. MITCHELL: Does that argument not cut both ways?

Mr. NICHOLSON: I agree that housing conditions in Saskatchewan are the worst in all Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE: In the last year, you mean.

Mr. NICHOLSON: We have not materially altered it in the first year, but I will stake my reputation that by the time we have been in office for a few years we shall have a much better housing record than you have now.

My time is almost gone, but before I conclude I should like to make a few constructive recommendations.

The government is now accustomed to making very large appropriations. The National Housing Act was passed on the assumption that if more money were needed it would be made available. I suggest that immediately the federal government negotiate with a view of setting up five experimental units, with the municipalities I mention: Vancouver, Winnipeg, Toronto, Montreal, Halifax. I would suggest that in Vancouver, Winnipeg and Halifax, from 200 to 300 units be built, and that in Toronto and Montreal the number be 500 each. I cannot prove that the Canadian people would like to live in such beautiful surroundings as have been prepared by the United States government at the Green Belt, near Washington, or at Baltimore, or at Chicago, or a dozen other experimental centres which I could mention; but I think that at least the government might go so far as to spend $15,000,000, if necessary, to set up these experimental units, so that you would have 500 houses laid out, according to a town plan, in the Toronto area where you would have your schools, recreational centres and parks, all laid out by technical men who are here available and just dying for a chance to do the job. I hope no one will ask, where are you to get the money? I need not answer that. All I need say is that the Canadian government has done a magnificent job in building Shipshaw, in the construction of aircraft plants and the synthetic rubber plant at Sarnia; that when a Catalina is sent out it has cost the government $250,000, and that the young pilot who takes over the controls has been trained at a cost of $25,000, so that we need not inquire about cost. Let us approach our housing problem from the same point of view, that whatever is physically possible must be made financially possible. Have we the materials, the carpenters, and other artisans, and the imagination to embark on an ambitious housing programme, so that everyone who has fought for his country will have a home in which to live?

Mr. FRED ROSE (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, I should first like to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. It is most appropriate that both the mover and the seconder, the one from English Canada, the other from French Canada, have come from the ranks of the heroic Canadians who fought and died at Dieppe, on the beaches of Normandy, France, Belgium, Holland and Hong Kong to safeguard Canada from the nazi hordes and the Japanese fascist militarists and to maintain the rights of the people of Canada to determine the destiny of this country. But I am sorry that I cannot extend the same type of congratulations to the government because of the lack of concrete proposals in the speech from the throne to meet the present emergency situation.

On the same day that the people of Canada read the speech from the throne, President Truman sent a message to the United States Congress outlining a programme for the people of the United States, to meet what he called a great emergency. There is a marked contrast between the two messages, the speech from the throne and the message of President Truman. The president made one statement which I will quote, because I believe it is a basic statement of the type which we should have found in the speech from the throne, a statement which in a few words says exactly what is expected from governments at the present time:

> The cost of transition from war to peace is as much a part of the cost of war as the transition from peace to war, and we should so consider it.

That is, we must consider the present emergency a continuation of war, and the same government responsibility that it had in the period of war in order to supply our men with arms, ammunition and everything else, the government must accept to-day. We have proved in the course of the war that we can do as well as the United States in all respects, in the field of production, of organization, and I do not have to say also, of course, on the field of battle. We can probably say that we in Canada blazed the trail in the matter of financing the war and stabilization. On some occasions when I visited the United States people told me that they envied our system of stabilization. If we could be trail blazers in war time, why can we not do the same to-day? Unless we work to-day in that spirit and unless the government accepts responsibilities in that spirit, military victory may be followed by economic disaster.

Everyone knows that the problem of reconversion is no simple matter. There are difficulties connected with it. We all recognize these difficulties, but the government should not try to hide behind difficulties. Instead of hiding behind difficulties and explaining away everything, it is necessary to tackle the problem in the same spirit in which we tackled problems in war time. Positive steps have to be taken to-day, to-morrow and the day after. It is the responsibility of the government—and these are not my own words; they are from the white paper—to maintain full employment and purchasing power. Basically to maintain purchasing power means to maintain war-time wage levels, to raise substandard wages, to provide means of livelihood for workers and their families in the reconversion period.

As I said before, in official statements of the government it is asserted that it is the policy of the government to maintain high income and high employment; but it is not enough to say that. Steps have to be taken, and rapidly, in order to make these things possible. It is a fact that tens of thousands of workers who have been demobilized from the army, the navy and the air force, and many thousands who have been let out from war plants, are being forced by circumstances to accept wages far below war-time levels.

Surely this is not the way to maintain purchasing power. Men and women who are released from the armed forces and from war plants are not asking for anything extravagant. They want jobs at decent wages. If such jobs are not available, it is the responsibility of this government to provide them with a means of subsistance commensurate with a Canadian standard of living. I like that phrase, "Canadian standard of living". The trade union movement is unanimous in its proposal that the worker with a family should receive the sum of $25 a week during the period of reconversion, and this is a perfectly justifiable demand. If any hon. member considers this an extravagant demand I would urge him to read the statement of President Truman on the same subject. I quote:

> During this emergency every eligible worker should be entitled to twenty-six weeks of unemployment benefits in any one year. The maximum weekly payment for those workers whose previous earnings were high enough, should not be less than $25 per week.

Hon. members will see that those people who came here the other day were not, as some newspaper editorials stated, a bunch of radicals but were workers laid off from war plants asking for something which President Truman, who is no radical, also asked for.

Where is the money to come from for this undertaking? I know there is always that question. Well, there is $300 million in the unemployment insurance fund. If the government does not see fit to make an upward revision in unemployment insurance benefits the difference can be financed out of general government funds. Many workers have told me that even if this proposal were accepted by the government they feared they would be deprived of this benefit if they refused to take jobs at low wage levels.

The only condition for a man or woman receiving $25 weekly compensation should be willingness to accept work at a minimum wage recognized by the federal government as essential to the health and well-being of people. I emphasize that—a minimum recognized by the federal government—because we have in some provinces minimum wage scales which are a disgrace to Canada.

I have in my hand a reference book for the dominion-provincial conference on reconstruction entitled, "Health, Welfare and Labour." On page 86 we find the following:

> Weekly minimum rates for experienced workers under minimum wage acts.

[Mr. Rose.]

What are these weekly rates for experienced workers? I will start with my own province of Quebec. These are the provincial minimum wages: province of Quebec, zone number 1, which we are told is Montreal and district, twenty-six cents an hour; zone number 2, which is Quebec and district, twenty-four cents an hour; zone number 3, Terrebonne and area around it, twenty-two cents an hour; and other parts of the province, twenty cents an hour. Lest some hon. members from Ontario say this is only in Quebec, I want to disillusion them by citing the following for Ontario. In the Toronto area, $12.50 for female workers.

Mr. IRVINE: An hour?

Mr. ROSE: No, a week; and $11 in towns with a population of 5,000 to 50,000, and so on. I insist that this government cannot under any circumstances accept these as just and decent wage levels. These provincial minimum wage acts will not help to provide purchasing power for our people. It is true that at the dominion-provincial conference on reconstruction this government indicated willingness to discuss with the provinces the setting up of national minimum wage scales, but this is definitely insufficient. It was the responsibility of the government to come before the conference and suggest a minimum wage which they believe is a Canadian minimum wage. In this matter the federal government should have given the lead to the country. They should have told the provinces what they regarded as decent minimum wages for Canadians. How did President Truman react to the same problem? In the United States, too, they have constitutional difficulties, but President Truman did not hesitate to tell congress what sort of minimum wages he expected in the country. He said:

> The goal of a forty cent minimum was inadequate when established. It has now become obsolete. . . . I therefore recommend that the congress amend the Fair Labour Standards Act by substantially increasing the minimum wage specified therein to a level which will eliminate substandards of living, and assure the maintenance of the health, efficiency and general well-being of workers.

That is a different sort of language from what we find in the speech from the throne. I do not believe it is too late now for the government to go before the next session of the dominion-provincial conference and state what they believe a national minimum should be. There are constitutional difficulties, it is true, but the fight for a national minimum must be started some time, and the time is now. By giving such a lead, the government at the same time will discourage certain employers from going in for some terrific wage slashes; and if any hon. member doubts that such a practice is being followed at the present time in Canada, or that there are certain employers bad enough to think we should have wage cuts now, I want to quote a statement I found in the Montreal Standard of September 1, 1945, made by Victor M. Drury, president of Canadian Car and Foundry. He is quoted as saying:

> The party is over. Not only will there not be enough jobs, but wages will have to be brought down to former peace-time levels. If the employees won't take a cut in wages, the plant will have to close down. We can't afford to have our profits cut into by paying the high war-time wage levels.

At the same time, according to the Standard, Mr. Drury admitted that the average take-home pay of his workers at no time was more than $28 a week.

After reading that statement in the Standard I decided to look into the figures of profits of various companies, and of course I was interested in Canadian Car and Foundry. After taxes and depreciation the net profits of this company were as follows:

1943	830,000
1944	1,130,000

So I ask you, Mr. Speaker, whose party was it?

It is because there are employers of this type that labour needs greater protection on the part of this government. Of course primarily it will be up to the workers and their organizations to fight for what they want, but they also need protection on the part of the government. Therefore this government should help the labour movement achieve a forty-hour week (but with no cut in take-home pay so that there will be fewer unemployed), union security, and other measures that will help to maintain purchasing power.

In the speech from the throne this government speaks of a high level of employment. Here again I wish to say that we fall short of what President Truman gives as an objective for the people of the United States. He speaks about full employment, not high employment, and he has called upon congress to pass a full employment bill now before it. I have that measure before me to-night; it is known as the Murray-Wagner bill, and I want hon. members to listen attentively while I read from it, because we can afford to copy it, and not only to copy it on paper but to fight for it:

> All Americans able to work and seeking work have the right to useful, remunerative, regular and full-time employment, and it is the policy of the United States to assure the existence at all times of sufficient employment opportunities to enable all Americans who have finished their schooling and who do not have full-time housekeeping responsibilities freely to exercise this right. . . .
> How is it to be done?
> To the extent that continuing full employment cannot otherwise be achieved, it is the further responsibility of the federal government to provide such volume of federal investment and expenditure as may be needed to assure continuing full employment.

Here they set down the responsibility in black and white, in a way that unfortunately we do not see in the speech from the throne or in any of the other statements made by government leaders. One of the ways to maintain purchasing power for the Canadian people is through public investment. Any programme of public investment must have as its aim the greatest possible contribution to the prosperity and well-being of the people, and I can think of no better investment than in homes for the people. In my first speech after coming into this house on January 26, 1943, I raised the problem of housing, because I saw that the situation was becoming more and more acute. At that time I called for the freezing of leases, and some hon. members thought that was not necessary. Well, since then the government has been forced to accept certain measures to which it would not listen at the time, but they far from meet the situation.

I am further reminded of the seriousness of the problem every time I return to my constituency. A few months ago a number of families living on a back lane came and asked me to plead with the municipal health authorities to allow them to remain in homes that had been condemned for the past twenty-five years, and were again condemned a few months ago. They were living in the centre of the city, with no electric lights and with leaking roofs. The situation was awful. I went to see those people in their homes and wondered how they could live there; yet they pleaded with me to be allowed to stay because they had nowhere else to go. Just before the opening of school this fall a French-Canadian woman came to plead with me to find a boarding house for her children. They were living in a store; she was ill and her children were ill, and they had to get out. The parents were going to take a room, and they wanted the children in the boarding home. Incidents like this can be multiplied hundreds of times throughout the country.

In this morning's Montreal Gazette we find the report of a meeting of a veterans' rehabilitation housing committee in Montreal, in which the situation in respect of veterans returning from the armed forces is described as follows:

> It has been revealed that approximately 300 men of the three services are being discharged daily in the Montreal area and that nearly twenty per cent of these are in urgent need of housing accommodation. Since this has been going on all summer it is now estimated that between 4,000 and 5,000 families are now seeking accommodation.

Without in any way minimizing the value of legislation enacted, it is obvious from these facts that the situation is not being met so as to provide homes for veterans, and for all who need homes, and to provide employment for the people. This government must decide to take the responsibility for the rapid construction of homes. This has been tried for a number of years but those who were to build homes have failed. We are not getting along rapidly enough. If Wartime Housing can build them faster, then Wartime Housing should build them.

The advantages offered to the limited dividend corporations should be extended to municipalities. The government should consider other means of cheapening the prices of houses and should make further research into methods of standardization. Experience has been gained in Great Britain and elsewhere in these matters. Perhaps the government can undertake to pay part of the taxes to municipalities in respect of newly built homes. It is obvious that much more drastic measures have to be adopted if the situation is not to become worse.

In tackling the problem of reconversion, I wish again to emphasize to the house that social security is an essential feature in any programme to maintain purchasing power. Money distributed by the government to individuals either to maintain them during unemployment or in their old age, or to maintain public health, helps the nation as a whole, as well as the individual receiving it.

From this point of view the proposals of the federal government to the dominion-provincial conference on reconstruction regarding health measures, and other matters, constitute an advance and a substantial step forward, and should be supported by all. Despite the fact that the proposals for a national health programme are not ideal, I believe they deserve support. If there is opposition from certain circles I would urge the people of Canada, through their members in the house and through their organizations, to do something about it, so that we may put out of the way those who would obstruct the application of the health programme offered by the federal government.

In respect to the problem of old age pensions I must be much more critical. I say that $30 a month does not mean a decent standard of living to anyone; and seventy years of age—that is a long time to wait. I would say that we need at least an old age pension of $50, and that it should be given without a means test at the age of sixty-five.

I know there are difficulties in connection with implementing the proposals offered by the federal government and some of those difficulties have been created by some of the provincial governments. I hope none of the provincial governments will stand in the way of the application of these health and other measures, so that action may be taken without delay. If some governments in the provinces refuse to go along with the federal government, then the government at Ottawa should be prepared to act in unison with those provinces which are now willing to collaborate.

The measures I have described might be described as domestic measures. But they are most necessary if we are to increase or to maintain the purchasing power of the people. Might I point out, however, that there are other means of maintaining purchasing power, and that one of these is the development of greater export trade. It is a fact that thirty per cent of our workers depend upon exports.

There is a great need for our products in many countries of Europe and Asia. But the people in those countries cannot pay to-day. They must have long-term credits. From press reports I have learned that the government is contemplating substantial credits to Great Britain and France. This is good. Such a policy is in accord with Canada's needs, as well as our responsibility to those people who have suffered. But it is not enough. To keep our export industries working at capacity it is essential that Canada should also maintain all the other outlets, and create new ones in a number of countries, including Belgium, Greece, Poland, Jugoslavia, the Soviet Union, China and the Latin-America countries. We shall have to "step on it" to see that we help these countries to-day in their reconstruction, so that to-morrow they may be permanent customers for our goods, thereby helping to create work for our people.

In the remarks I have made this evening I have concentrated chiefly upon problems of reconversion, because I believe they are the key problems of the day. The manner in which the house deals with these problems will be the test of our ability to meet the problems of peace as effectively as we met the problems of war. We won the war because we allowed nothing to stand in the way of our war effort. We can win the peace if we approach the problem with the same determination.

I do not often permit myself to indulge in pessimism. I believe no hon. member can charge that I have done that. I wish to say, however, that unless the government meets the needs of the people in the present emergency we may find that we are heading back for the hungry thirties.

I should like to deal with a number of other matters, but in order not to offer any distraction from this key problem of reconversion I would simply add, in passing, that I fully endorse the idea of a Canadian flag and of Canadian citizenship, and have so expressed myself in the house on other occasions.

There is one further problem upon which I should like to touch before concluding my remarks. This one deals with destruction rather than reconstruction. Every hon. member must have been impressed with the report of the terrible devastation newsmen found in Hiroshima and Nagasaki. It staggers the imagination of human beings to realize what will happen to our civilization if this dreadful weapon should ever again be used in war between nations.

We in Canada have a special responsibility in this connection because of the great deposits of uranium which are to be found in our country. If science succeeds in harnessing this mighty power to the service of human well-being, I am sure that as a nation we will gladly share this tremendous natural asset with the other peoples of the world, but until that day the potentialities of the atomic bomb for destruction should not be placed at the disposal of any nation to use against other nations. I propose that this house and government place the uranium deposits of Canada at the disposal and under the control of the security council of the united nations organization, and under the control of that body alone. Such action will be more than a gesture; it will be a concrete demonstration of Canada's will for peace. Such action, along with policies aimed at full employment at home and generous assistance to our allies in repairing the destruction of war, will be a significant contribution by Canada toward lasting peace and prosperity in the world.

Mr. ANDREW E. ROBINSON (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, may I first offer my congratulations to you upon your election to the high office you now occupy. I am sure you will fulfil your duties as they should be fulfilled. To the mover (Mr. Benidickson) and the seconder (Mr. Langlois) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, who like myself are new members, I offer my congratulations upon the wonderful speeches they made. To our Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) I wish, not continued success as a politician but health and longevity. To the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) I wish publicly to acknowledge my allegiance. To the hon. members of the political parties in this house I wish the best guidance.

I represent the county of Bruce and I am proud to represent that constituency. There cannot be many hon. members in this house who are not familiar with the good qualities of Bruce. During this session we have heard the Peace River district spoken well of by the hon. member for that riding (Mr. Low). We have heard about High Park from the hon. member from that riding (Mr. McMaster). I should like to tell the house a few things about my riding. First and foremost, Bruce is known over this country as one of the best, if not the best counties in the dominion. Bruce has put forth a tremendous effort toward winning this war and the war of 1914-18; in men, money and materials we have contributed a great share. In the past Bruce has contributed greatly toward populating the western provinces, those provinces which have done so much toward feeding the hungry people of the world. Speaking as a Bruce boy, I must say that I am not too proud of the political trend that has taken place in some of these western provinces. To those who are thinking along the same lines may I say that they should not worry because these people are good people and eventually will see the error of their ways.

Not the least achievements of Bruce have been the able men that the county has sent to the different parliaments of Canada, myself excluded. We are proud to claim the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) of the present government as a native of our county. There are Senators Donnelly and Marshall who are active in the senate at the present time. In our town of Kincardine we are glad to have with us yet the Hon. Hugh Clark who for many years served our riding and the government of Canada in time of war. The late Hon. James Malcolm, who in his time was Minister of Trade and Commerce, was also a Bruce boy. We have no great centres of learning in our county, but we have produced many men and women who have made outstanding records in the business and professional life of the country.

At the present time there is in Ottawa a deputation of Indians, the original inhabitants of this country. They are here to have injustices removed and grievances corrected.

In that delegation our Indian people of Bruce are represented. One of them is a sergeant and another a corporal who were in the same unit with me overseas in the last war. We had a platoon of those Indian boys in our unit and I feel safe in saying that there was not a better platoon in the Canadian army. We must remember that the Indians were here before we were, and the least we can do is to give them their just dues and the comforting assurance that their future welfare is in good hands. May I at this point read to the house a letter which I received from a corporal of Indian ancestry who is now overseas. This is from B company, first battalion, Regina Rifle Regiment, Canadian army overseas, under date of June 1, 1945, and reads:

To your letter of March 15, 1945, which I just received a few days ago due to changes of address. It took time for the postal corps to find me.

I have done you the favour asked by you. I myself have no use to, whatever party may be in. As to my status of civil life I am an Indian. I have no citizenship. All I have is a vote which is no good to me whatever. I have no voice in government, therefore my attitude to the government is poor. In the past I was looked down upon. It is what the future may bring can only change that, to change it from that. Can you give me some advice on what I could do in line of farming. Not that I want a big one. I want one that can bring me some profit, to be independent, to get by in every way. I understand the ups and downs of a farmer. Right now I am at wit's end. I am afraid to step into civic street. The setback I face is bigger than the battles of the beachhead in Normandy.

I would be very grateful for any advice I may get.

I thank you.

Why should that boy not be given the chance of settling down on a farm under the veterans' reestablishment scheme without losing his rights and status as an Indian?

While Bruce county is the finest in Canada economically, we are not in the best position that it should be possible for the people of this country to achieve. For a number of years now we have not made the progress that it was our right to expect, due partly to the fact that Bruce is principally a rural county and agriculture is not getting its fair share of national income, and due partly to the centralization of industry.

At the present time, Canada has an acute housing shortage, but let me say, Mr. Speaker, that we have no housing shortage on the farms of Bruce county, and I feel safe in saying that Bruce county is typical of most rural counties all over Canada. To save the situation we must have decentralization, and to have decentralization we must revise transportation rates and power rates. By so doing we shall keep alive those centres like Bruce which have done so much toward building the country we live in and love. If consideration is not given to these facts Bruce, along with similar counties, will decline in population and in productivity.

It is nice to see our industrial centres grow, but if they grow at the expense of our smaller urban places and at the expense of our agricultural counties, we know that such is not good for the future of Canada.

Permit me, Mr. Speaker, to mention one of the greatest problems in Canada to-day, namely unity within our dominion. I believe that every hon. member is interested in finding a remedy. In this war it fell to my lot to have charge of a platoon of sixty men engaged in loading and unloading ships on the east coast. In that platoon were men from every province. Those men got along good together, and I believe that was the case in most units. The mixing up of those men from all over Canada will, I believe, help in the future toward unity; knowing each other's viewpoint will also help. To learn one another's language will go a long way toward solving the problem.

International good will is just one step on, a step that will ensure peace for the world. With the world machinery we have to-day it should be possible to arrange an exchange of scholarships throughout the world that would help every nation better to understand that we are all human beings.

I shall not criticize the present government, but I wish to state two facts: (1) The present administration did not have Canada ready for war in 1939; (2) in 1945 the present administration has not Canada prepared for peace. We all believe that Canada is the best country in the world. Let us get together and prove that such is so.

Mr. D. F. BROWN (Essex West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on behalf of probably the finest constituency in the Dominion of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh!

Mr. BROWN: I am glad to see that hon. members agree with me. While we have a diversity of population, we have at least honesty of purpose. We are all hardworking, thrifty and sincere, and I think all hon. members will agree that we are a dynamic people. I refer, of course, to the constituency of Essex West, and in particular to the city of Windsor.

I should like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to the gentleman whom I have succeeded. I refer to the Hon. Norman A. McLarty, a gentleman and a scholar who devoted a great part of his life to his country and to his constituency in particular.

I should also like to compliment the mover (Mr. Benidickson) and the seconder (Mr. Langlois) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. It makes me feel proud to be a Liberal to be associated with these fine young men.

I can not let this opportunity pass without paying a tribute also to the one who has done do much for Canada, one who has given, shall I say, his human sense of life to his country. I refer to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King).

I should also like to pay tribute to the men and women of the armed services. We shall never be able to repay them for what they have expended for us. We can, therefore, only make an attempt at giving some satisfaction.

To you, Mr. Speaker, I extend my congratulations. You have already shown in your conduct of the proceedings of this assembly that you are being fair and conscientious.

It is interesting for me as a child in this House of Commons to sit here and listen to this debate. It is interesting from many points of view, because in this assembly we get the thinking of all parts of Canada. I shall not say what I think of that thinking, but at least it is an expression of what is being thought throughout the country. While some of our debate may seem frivolous or not very sound to the people at large, yet it is an expression that should not and, I am sure, will not be curtailed. However, sir, I hope you will not think it presumptuous of me to take exception to a remark that was made in this chamber this afternoon. As I heard the remark, it was that politics "stinks to high heaven." Well, I agree with the speaker that probably in Alberta it does. But we in Essex county elect Liberals. I take exception to that, because I think there is nothing finer for a young man or a young woman in this country than to get out and take an active part in the public affairs of the nation. I feel sure that if we would all do that honestly, conscientiously and intelligently, there would not be so many political parties in the house. Politics to me is the science of government, and as such should be studied thoroughly by everyone. If that were done, the people, especially the younger people, would be more interested; we would get a more representative vote, and we would probably have better government.

I want to commend the proposals in the speech from the throne, in particular that with respect to the memorial by way of beautification of the city of Ottawa. Taking the dominion as a whole, and likening it to a human body or individuality, one can probably say that Ottawa manifests the mind or the soul of the nation, for a nation we are; and as such manifestation it should be beautiful, complete and perfect. From a practical aspect, beautification would attract not only the constituents whom we represent, but people from outside our country, people who would come here to enjoy the beauty and to create for us a more friendly world. If we bring about that beautification of Ottawa there would be a certain material return, for I think we shall agree that the tourist business is one of Canada's largest industries. The human anatomy cannot be complete without the manifestation of the face, the eyes, and the limbs, and so it is that the beautification of Ottawa is not complete until we have a contribution from all the outlying parts.

Speaking on behalf of Essex West, we live in a district which has in front of its door more lake fresh water traffic than any other fresh water system in the world, passing by it. We have lake St. Clair at the north and lake Erie to the south. Across the river to the north of us—this may sound strange—is the city of Detroit, for Detroit is to a great extent to the north of Windsor. Detroit, which surrounds us on three sides, has a population of about two million people. Two hundred and fifty miles away is the city of Chicago with about four million people. About a hundred miles away is the city of Cleveland; also near us are the thickly populated states of Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, and others. I do not need to tell the house of the population of that area.

We have in the city of Windsor, as I have said, a dynamic people. We have set up a town planning commission for the purpose of beautification and putting the city in proper order. The people of that constituency have an active art association, an active handicraft guild, and other cultural and literary societies and movements which express the thought of our people. What I am getting at is this: the city of Ottawa should be beautified, and I know it will be; but probably more tourists visit the city of Windsor and the county of Essex in one week than find their way to the city of Ottawa in six months. Being practical, I think we should try to capture a part of that traffic, not only for the material purpose of making money, but to let our friends see what we have, find out what kind of people we are, and cement the bonds of friendship which unite our two peoples. So that, I would recommend to this government that it consider ways and means of beautifying not only the city of Windsor but other ports of entry; because when we regard the human anatomy, the first thing we look at is the face, the eyes; and those ports of entry correspond to the face. Therefore, let us make those ports of entry spots of beauty which may attract tourists and help our common cause.

On motion of Mr. Claxton the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, September 14, 1945.

The house met at three o'clock.

WAR AND DEMOBILIZATION BILL

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF PUBLIC ACCOUNTS AND AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I had intended asking the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). However, in the absence of the minister, perhaps the Prime Minister would answer. If the answer is not immediately available, we could have it later.

According to the orders of the day we shall shortly be considering a government bill in respect of war expenditures and demobilization. Before that is proceeded with we should have before us the public accounts for the last fiscal year. I would ask the Minister of Finance to table the public accounts and the auditor general's report for the fiscal year ended March 31 last, at the earliest possible time.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I can assure my hon. friend the reports will be tabled at the earliest moment after they become available. I shall direct the attention of the Minister of Finance to the question, for further reply.

[Later:]

Mr. BRACKEN: Would the Minister of Finance mind answering the question I asked in his absence a few minutes ago?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): The leader of the opposition was good enough to send me notice of the question which he asked, I believe, before I came in to-day, regarding the tabling of the public accounts and the auditor general's report for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1945. The statute, the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, provides for the tabling of these documents on or before October 31 if the house is in session, and if the house is not then in session in any year within one week after the house begins to sit thereafter. We have been trying to get ready to comply with that provision of the act, that is to have these reports ready by October 31. They certainly cannot be ready before that, and I am sorry to say that I am afraid it will be physically impossible to have them ready by that date. I am told that there is a shortage of help in the printing bureau, there is a great press of printing work, and I may have to resort to some expedient or take some measure to give ourselves a little time, even then. However, I gather it does not make very much difference, so long as we cannot get it before the discussion, whether it is October 31 or a little later.

WAR EXPENDITURES

INQUIRY AS TO SETTING UP OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE —WAR ASSETS CORPORATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Arising out of the answer given by the Prime Minister to the question asked by the leader of the opposition I should like to know if the government will again consider the setting up of a war expenditures committee to study war expenditures as well as the activities of the War Assets Corporation?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I would mention to my hon. friend that there will be a public accounts committee. With respect to setting up further special committees at this session, I shall be glad to see that his suggestion is considered, but I am not in position at the moment to give a reply.

WATER CONSERVATION

LETHBRIDGE SOUTHEAST PROJECT—ST. MARY RIVER DAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Munitions and Supply. Will the minister make a statement to the house at an early day telling us when he expects to proceed with the construction of the St. Mary river dam, part of the Lethbridge southeast water conservation project in southern Alberta?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): The project mentioned is receiving the attention of the Department of Munitions and Supply. I am not sure that I shall be able to announce the date of commencement at an early day. However, I shall do so as soon as I can.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Is the work likely to commence this fall?

Mr. HOWE: No, it will not commence this fall.

MERCHANT SEAMEN

SPECIAL BONUS FOR SERVICE IN DANGEROUS WATERS S.S. "PRINCE EDWARD"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. CHESTER S. McLURE (Queens): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Through the minister the government has announced that it will pay a special bonus amounting to ten per cent of total earnings for service at sea to any seaman who has served on a Canadian ship for at least six months in dangerous waters, since September 10, 1939. My question is this: Are the seamen of the S.S. Prince Edward who had been sailing in the Northumberland straits in complete black-out and with an escort of planes on occasions when submarines were sighted to be entitled to this special bonus? I ask this question on behalf of Prince Edward division No. 127 of the Canadian brotherhood of railway employees and other transport workers.

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): I received the hon. gentleman's question shortly before coming down to the house. I made inquiry from the director of merchant seamen but I have not before me sufficient information to give him a reply now. I shall attempt to give him this early next week.

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY

LAY-OFF OF MEN EMPLOYED ON GUN MOUNTINGS AT NEW GLASGOW, N.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. C. BLACK (Cumberland): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Muntions and Supply. The president of the board of trade at New Glasgow, Nova Scotia, informs me that several hundred men who have been employed on the building of gun mountings have been notified by the minister's department to discontinue work and they are receiving notices of dismissal. There are eighteen gun mountings in process of manufacture, five being for Canadian needs. It is desired that these guns be completed, if at all possible, pending the supplying of other employment. Can the minister make a statement?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I have no personal knowledge of the situation at New Glasgow. My hon. friend will appreciate that the Department of Munitions and Supply is merely the agent for the armed services. When instructions come from the armed services to cancel an order, we cancel it. If the information received by my hon. friend is correct and the order has been cancelled, the Department of Munitions and Supply would not be in a position to change the situation.

CATTLE

CARRY-OVER IN TORONTO STOCK YARDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. C. SENN (Haldimand): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture relating to the question I asked yesterday. In view of the statement made by the president of the Toronto stock yards that the statement of the Minister of Agriculture yesterday regarding the weighing capacity of the Toronto stock yards was in error, will the minister now give assurance that further excess holdovers of live stock will not be allowed to accumulate which result in depressed prices to producers?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I wish to thank the hon. member for having sent me a copy of his question. I have checked the report of the president of the live stock association at Toronto. His statement is to the effect that while there were 5,700 cattle on the market on Monday the weighing capacity is 4,000 instead of 3,500. That corrects my statement to the extent of making the weighing capacity 500 more than the figure I gave yesterday, which was based on an eight-hour day.

Mr. SENN: He says "in excess of."

Mr. GARDINER: But even the president's figure of weighing capacity leaves 1,700 cattle that could not have been weighed. I have the statement I made yesterday before me and here is what I said, as reported on page 131 of Hansard:

> I can say that there often is a carry-over on the Toronto market at the beginning of the week but I do not think it is usually due to the fact that there are no buyers.

Cattle accumulate over the week-end. There is always a very heavy run of cattle on the Toronto market on Monday, or at least there usually is, and the result is the weighing capacity is not sufficient to weigh the cattle on Monday. Monday of this week was no exception to other weeks. There were 5,826 cattle on the Toronto market on Monday which means that there were over 1,800 that could not have been weighed even taking the statement made by the president of the association.

The proposal we have made in order to remedy this situation—this proposal was in a document I was quoting from yesterday—is to have Mr. Fletcher himself go on the radio, along with one of our men, and make an appeal to the farmers in the area who supply cattle to Toronto to spread their cattle more evenly over the week than they have been doing in order that the marketing capacity will be sufficient and in order that buyers can take them as they come. In order to indicate the importance of this I should like to give the numbers that have been marketed on that market during the last six weeks. They are:

Week of—	Total cattle sales
August 9	4,616
August 16	5,606
August 23	7,884
August 30	8,829
September 6	6,938
September 13	8,082

It will be obvious to hon. members that if those cattle were spread over the whole week the weighing capacity and purchasing capacity of that market could be utilized to much better advantage than by simply trying to rush all cattle in on Monday. The highest number here is 8,829, and if you are going to put 5,800 of those on the market in one day it is obvious that the facilities sufficient to handle cattle in that manner cannot be maintained on an economical basis in the city of Toronto. The suggestion is to have them spread their cattle over the week and we have asked the president to go on the radio along with our man and make that appeal to the farmers. We think the proper way to deal with the question is to ask and secure the cooperation of all parties to make the best possible use of the existing facilities.

MEAT RATIONING

REFERENCE TO REPORTED SPOILING OF COOKED MEATS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance if representations have been made to him that large quantities of cooked meats have been spoiling because of the rationing and will consideration be given to removing certain kinds of cooked meats from the ration list.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): No representations have been made to me, but I saw an item in the press referring to meat pies, if I remember correctly.

Mr. MacINNIS: I have another wire from British Columbia.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will bring that situation to the attention of the rationing authorities and see if any solution can be found to the problem presented.

SMALL PACKERS—TRIMMINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): Yesterday the Minister of Finance was good enough to say that to-day he would answer the rationing question I raised with regard to provision for meat trimmings which are processed for sale in the larger centres of population, and unsold meat such as meat pies. Will the minister clarify the situation?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I did not understand yesterday that that was the complaint of the packers who sent in the telegrams. I think the best way to clear the matter up is for the hon. member to send me a copy of the telegrams and I will see what answer I can suggest to them and what the situation is.

I made inquiries so as to put myself in a position to answer my hon. friend's question of yesterday, and I was informed that the meat rationing regulations provide for trimmings by naming coupon values for them when sold by anyone at wholesale or at retail. Trimmings are usually processed into sausage, bologna, cooked meat, and so on, and the consumer coupon values of these processed meats are more favourable than coupon values of fresh or processed meat cuts. That is the statement of the rationing authorities. Apparently it is not working very satisfactorily, according to the questions which have been asked to-day and the items that appear in the press, and there may be some possibility of an adjustment of coupon values or something of the kind.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): The minister has already had the copies of the telegrams, but I will give him the originals.

WAR CRIMINALS

JAPANESE—RULES GOVERNING QUESTIONS ON ORDERS OF THE DAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. FULTON (Kamloops): I have two questions to put to the Prime Minister, and as they are closely related I ask the right hon. gentleman to permit me to put them together. The first is: The Prime Minister made a statement yesterday as to the trials of European war criminals but he did not cover the case of Japanese war criminals. Will he please clarify the situation in this respect and in particular will he state whether the procedure in trials of Japanese war criminals is to be the same as that which he outlined yesterday?

The second question is: According to statements recently appearing in the press, Canadian prisoners of war in Japanese hands have said that the most brutal of their captors was a Canadian-born Japanese. The individual in question is alleged to have been born or to have resided—I am changing the wording slightly—in my constituency of Kamloops, British Columbia. Will the Prime Minister please inform the house whether this person will be tried by Canadian court martial?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend sent me notice of his question. To the first question I would reply that the question of the trials of Japanese war criminals is now under discussion by the nations which participated in the war in the Pacific, preliminary to its being presented to the united nations war crimes commission. It is probable that arrangements will be made to have Japanese war criminals tried by military courts.

With regard to the second question, I should like to direct my hon. friend's attention to the rules that govern the asking of and replying to questions. Possibly it would be of interest to some hon. members who are not familiar with the rules if before attempting to answer this question I were to read the rule which governs the asking of questions. Beauchesne's "Rules and Forms", standing order 44 set forth is as follows:

> Questions may be placed on the order paper seeking information from ministers of the crown relating to public affairs; . . . but in putting any such question or in replying to the same no argument or opinion is to be offered, nor any facts stated, except so far as may be necessary to explain the same.

This rule, of course, applies to any question that is asked on the orders of the day instead of being handed in to the Clerk to appear on the order paper.

May I say to my hon. friend that both questions might have been handed in to the Clerk rather than asked on the orders of the day, because they are not of such an immediately pressing nature that the time of the house on the orders of the day should be taken up with the question and answer. But I am very happy to make the answer I have done to his first question.

Let me read the second question, as my hon. friend has himself stated it:

> According to statements recently appearing in the press, Canadian prisoners of war in Japanese hands have said that the most brutal of their captors was a Canadian-born Japanese. The individual in question—

My hon. friend has changed the next words from "was born, as a matter of fact," to read:

> —is alleged to have been born or resided in my own constituency of Kamloops, British Columbia. Will the Prime Minister please inform the house whether this person will be tried by Canadian court martial?

In the first place, I do not know who this person is who is referred to. May I say that I think my hon. friend will see, and the house will see, that the question as it is worded has been drafted not so much for the purpose of obtaining information as for the purpose of supplying to the country certain representations which may or may not be true. My hon. friend must assume full responsibility for the accuracy of the statements that are appearing in the press before I can begin to answer his question.

That would be the first thing. But apart from that, what the hon. member has stated in his question is not necessary at all to obtain the information that he is really seeking from the government, which is whether or not the trial of war criminals will be by Canadian court martial, even if they happen to be Canadians.

Let me read what May's "Parliamentary Practice", 12th edition, has to say in support of what I have quoted from the standing orders. It is quoted by Beauchesne, in his second edition, at page 113, as follows:

> The purpose of a question is to obtain information and not to supply it to the house. A question may not contain statements of facts unless they be necessary to make the question intelligible and can be authenticated; nor should a question contain arguments, inferences, imputations, epithets or controversial or ironic expressions.

The house will recognize that the question does contain alleged statements of fact, statements however which are not necessarily authentic. I think also that the question is so phrased as to give rise to some controversy.

I hope that my hon. friend will not think that I was not anxious to answer his question, but it is important that the rules of the house should be observed in these particulars. I would emphasize again that where a question is of the kind that has just been asked, it should be placed on the order paper rather than directed to the ministry on the orders of the day. A further reason for having it placed on the order paper is that the Clerk himself would see whether the question was properly worded or not, and if it were not properly worded he would direct the attention of the member to it privately.

I have spoken of this matter, not by way of criticism, but rather by way of explanation so that hon. members may not unintentionally disregard any rule of the house.

HOUSING

BUILDING MATERIALS FOR WAR VETERANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. B. McKAY (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, I have a question to direct to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Is there a government order forbidding or limiting the sale of building materials to war veterans in the Ottawa district or elsewhere in Canada, first, under private contract, and second, under the Veterans Land Act?

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I received notice of the question just before I entered the house. The answer in both cases is in the negative.

QUESTION AS TO THE FREEZING OF PLUMBING MATERIALS IN PARTLY CONSTRUCTED HOUSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): May I receive a reply to my question on the wartime prices and trade board order regarding the priorities on plumbing fixtures, either from the Minister of Finance, or from the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply to whom the Minister of Finance referred the question yesterday? He has had twenty-four hours' notice, and perhaps I can now have an answer.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): The question was asked yesterday whether there was an order freezing plumbing fixtures. The answer was no, is no, and always will be no, I think.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I should like to ask the Minister of Reconstruction if the order of the wartime prices and trade board giving priority to ten items of plumbing fixtures is to be rescinded or is to stay in effect and have the effect of freezing the plumbing supplies on houses which are partly finished until such time as this priority is lifted.

Mr. HOWE: I am sure my colleague who administers the wartime prices and trade board will take the second question under advisement, and reply.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

INQUIRY AS TO PERSONNEL DESIROUS OF REMAINING IN SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. PEARKES (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence for the army? Is he aware that a large number of desirable and experienced personnel who would otherwise consider remaining in the Canadian armed forces are now being discharged daily owing to lack of information as to the future size and conditions of service in the permanent forces to be maintained by this country? Will the minister make a statement on this subject?

Mr. SPEAKER: I wish to draw the hon. member's attention to the fact that he is not simply asking a question but rather is giving information to the house. I would appreciate very much the cooperation of every member in abiding by the rules of the house.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I agree with your ruling, but with your permission, as the hon. member did give me notice of his question, perhaps I might be permitted to reply in view of the fact that the question was so framed as to purport to give information rather than to seek it.

In reply I would say that the conditions of service in the permanent force will, of course, be announced in due course. Some time ago the conditions of service in the interim force were made public, and they are now in the hands of commanding officers in all districts both here and overseas. We have not forced the demobilization of any man who has evidenced a desire to continue in the armed forces.

LONGSHOREMEN'S RESERVE LABOUR POOL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. members for Halifax have been inquiring about the Longshoremen's reserve labour pool, and I now wish to table copies of order in council

P.C. 5980 passed on September 11, providing for the abolition of this pool on November 3, next.

This revokes the stabilization of longshore labour order of June 25, 1943. Members are aware of how important Halifax was during the war and the necessity for the quick turning around of ships in order to rush supplies to Europe.

Under order in council P.C. 3511 dated April 30, 1942, a controller of loading operations was appointed at Halifax to supervise more efficient organizing of the working force there. What turned out to be a most effective means was the establishment of a central dispatching agency, through which longeshoremen sought and were assigned to jobs. Then came the setting up of the labour pool to assure that there would always be men on hand to handle the uninterrupted stream of war materials passing through the port.

I may say that the pool has worked out very satisfactorily in heading off labour shortages and assuring that cargoes were loaded and unloaded promptly and Atlantic convoys not delayed.

Recently I was in Halifax and conferred with employers and union leaders concerned because an undertaking had been given by me that no change would be made in the labour arrangements at the end of the war without such consultation.

I cannot speak too highly of the cooperation which has been extended to the government by both the employers and the port workers. Carrying on under adverse conditions and under great pressure, they combined to do a vitally important war job in a splendid way.

I think it is true that the unglamorous jobs of the war are not sufficiently known to the general public. Perhaps the rest of Canada has heard very little of what the longshoremen at Halifax and other ports did during the war, and it should be known that their efficient and conscientious service was a most important part of our war effort.

Consideration is now being given to continuing the hiring facilities for longshoremen, up to now carried on by the dispatching agency, as a permanent function of the national employment service.

DAYLIGHT SAVING

REVERSION TO STANDARD TIME ON SEPTEMBER 30

On the orders of the day:

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Secretary of State): On Tuesday last, in answer to a question by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken), I stated that it was proposed to revert from daylight saving to standard time at a date subsequently to be announced. The present intention is to revert from daylight saving to standard time in Canada as and from two o'clock a.m. Sunday, September 30 of the present year.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Thursday, September 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. M. Benidickson for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Bracken, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, may I first join those who congratulated you on your appointment to the highest office in this house. I do so for two special reasons, the first of which is our long association and friendship, which goes back long before either of us had the honour of election to this house; the second is that I happen to represent a Montreal division, and I am sure I express the satisfaction of all citizens of Montreal of all races at your election at this time. I feel, too, that their satisfaction will be equalled by that of members in all parts of the house in the way in which you have begun your duties and in which we are sure you will continue to carry them out.

In addition to congratulating the mover and the seconder of the address and many of the other speakers who have taken part, may I especially refer for a personal reason to the election and speech of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare (Mr. Baker), because of a friendship which goes back a good deal longer than seems possible when one realizes that he was young enough to serve the country during this war for the length of time that he did.

There is another member, too, to whom I should like especially to refer, namely, the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) with whom I have had a friendship going back more than twenty years, with whom I have been associated in many good causes, and with whom I hope I shall continue to be associated in working for the good of Canada, he in his way and I in mine. Most hon. members in most parts of the house will agree that his speech was reasonable and fair. We on this side of the house say that particularly, not only because of the reasonable way in which it was delivered, but also because his views on the two concrete matters with which he dealt, namely controls and taxation, were almost exactly in accord with the policies of the government as laid down in the white paper and in the proposals of the government of Canada to the dominion-provincial conference on reconstruction.

Might I express, also, sir, a special word of welcome to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mrs. Strum). She said that she was the sole representative of her sex in the house. I think there are 244 members in this house who will say that that is not strictly accurate, because most of us could not have been elected without the support of the women electors of our constituencies. What is more correct, perhaps, is that she is the sole example of her sex in this house; and I hope that time will cure that condition.

I should like to express the hope that she as a woman as well as a member will take a special interest in the affairs of the Department of National Health and Welfare, concerned as it is with matters pertaining to the health and welfare of the people of Canada so far as those matters lie within the jurisdiction of the federal government. May I indeed invite the attention of all hon. members to these matters. This is a time when social security is very much to the fore, and I hope that hon. members in all parts of the house will not hesitate to bring to the attention of myself and the officers of the department matters relating to its business.

Not long ago I wrote a letter to all members of the house expressing that hope and I am glad to say that we have not been flooded with complaints. I really mean it when I say that the work of this new department can be greatly assisted, facilitated and extended if its affairs become a matter of general interest and members on all sides really take an active interest in our work for the health and welfare of the people of Canada, and give us their support.

The organization of the department has proceeded and we were in the position to begin the payment of family allowances on the day planned, namely the 18th of July. Since then, in fact, by next week over four million cheques will have been issued to 1,300,000 families in Canada. I wish I had time to put before the house and before the people of Canada some of the letters that we have received in acknowledgment of these cheques. People in all parts of Canada, in every kind of circumstance, have sent in the most moving letters saying how this cheque will be spent for the welfare of the child, how it will mean clothing, dental care, camp, education, more health, more nutrition for the members of the family.

It is quite a temptation during this debate to follow hon. members of the opposition in some of their remarks, but to-day I thought it would be better to deal with the dominion government's proposals to the conference on reconstruction, particularly, if I have time, as they relate to health and welfare. The proposals there put forward with regard to social security were not new. They were foreshadowed in the speech from the throne delivered on January 27, 1944. Many of them were implemented by legislation during the session of 1944 and then they were referred to again in the speech from the throne on January 31, 1945.

Before I go on to deal with them, however, I should like to make one or two short observations. Some hon. members have expressed concern over matters of demobilization, reconversion and housing. Every member of this house is concerned with such matters, just as everyone in Canada is concerned with them, and everyone in every other country in the world is similarly concerned over such matters. But I believe that as the facts are laid before hon. members during this session and as they reach the public, it will come to be recognized that the people of Canada have less cause for concern over these matters than the people in any other country in the world.

We must count the blessings that we have in this country when we consider that we are in a world that has been shattered and shocked by six years of war, with its unparalleled destruction of human life, of property, of means of transportation, of channels of trade and habits of association, destruction possibly of moral standards that will have to be slowly built up. When we consider the position of Canada and contrast it with that of practically every other country we should count our blessings. We should consider our resources, consider our capacity to produce food, minerals, consider manufactured goods, which has been built up during the war, consider the skills that our people have added unto themselves during the war and their ability to meet every challenge war has made.

Recognizing this, hon. members will not be surprised that Canada to-day has the standing that it has in the eyes of other countries. It almost takes attendance at a conference of other nations such as that of San Francisco or Bretton Woods or UNRRA or the food conference, meeting the representatives of other nations and hearing what they have to say about our country, hearing the admiration and respect they express for our country and its people, for us Canadians to realize that things are not so bad after all.

Then, too, it is fair to say that while the war effort has been the work of the Canadian people working in a great partnership, it has been possible to develop administrative knowledge and the skills that are necessary to lead and direct that effort. That is perhaps shown most dramatically in our control of prices, our prevention of inflation, brought home by the fact that to-day the Canadian dollar buys more than its equivalent in any other country.

Some people during the war have exploited the difficulties and even the disasters of war for purposes of their own. We must not fall into the habit of exploiting the difficulties—and they are real—of the period of transition over to peace as if peace itself were a disaster. Let us look at the facts and let us develop them here. Let us blow away some of the smoke of battle, some of the smoke of the election, and some of the smoke-screen that has been developed from time to time.

Remember this, that the celebration of victory over Japan took place on the 15th of August, a month ago to-morrow, and that the surrender of Japan took place on the 2nd of September, two weeks ago to-day. When we consider that and then look at the problems of demobilization and reconversion and get the facts as they will be developed in this house, the Canadian people will not have cause for anything but confidence in the future.

From the point of view of demobilization I may say—and this is a fact that very few Canadians appreciate—that we have demobilized something like 400,000 men and women of the armed services since the outbreak of war. We know what we are doing. We have demobilized 100,000 since V-E day on the 8th of May.

From the point of view of housing, this house will receive assurances that every house for which materials can be made available is being planned and built. From the point of view of conversion, I think the relative figures of employment as they will be brought before the house will show that we are to-day as far advanced as any other country, if not farther.

The fact is that we in Canada have a Canadian habit which is a good one, that of judging our Canadian practice by the best that can be found anywhere else in the world. The remarkable thing is that we can usually measure up to that standard.

The government of Canada, far from being caught flat-footed with its plans for reconversion, presented in the week of the atomic bomb and the Russian declaration of war its post-war proposals to the provinces. Some hon. members seem to forget that Canada is not a country of one government but a country having one federal government with nine provincial governments. The needs of our people can be satisfactorily met only if all the governments cooperate in arriving at satisfactory arrangements to meet the needs, not of government, but of the people of Canada and of every part of Canada. Then, an arrangement, having been arrived at, it should be carried out in a spirit of cooperation and goodwill, with the recognition that what seems to have proved to the advantage of one or another instrument of state is really working to the advantage or disadvantage of the people, of people like ourselves.

I would have thought, Mr. Speaker, that the dominion government's proposals to the conference on reconstruction would receive a good deal of attention during this debate. I think they met with general satisfaction. These proposals are responsible. They were put forward by the government after months of study. A subcommittee of the cabinet was set up in February, not February, 1945, but February, 1944, to plan the work of preparation for the conference. Fifteen intergovernmental departmental committees were established, and practically every department of the government was brought into the work of preparation at one time or another. Then, too, we asked the provinces more than a year ago to send their financial experts to Ottawa to work with us in a spirit of cooperation in order to arrive at statistics and figures which would be on a fair and comparable basis. I am glad to say that the representatives of the provinces came here; they worked loyally together and arrived at a book containing figures which must be the basis of any study on this subject, and that has been substantially agreed to by the provinces represented. There has been no dispute about that. After the proposals had been passed through the expert stage they were considered day after day by a cabinet subcommittee and then day after day by the cabinet itself. They represent a considered and responsible plan.

These proposals are practical; they contain detailed economic and other information, and the detailed economic studies to support them have already been made. Engineering studies necessary to carry out the work contemplated there are already completed or are so far advanced that no work which may be decided upon need be held up for lack of adequate plans.

These proposals are liberal; they provide for greater security and greater opportunity for the individual than has ever been presented to the Canadian people and ever presented to the people of any other country.

These proposals are comprehensive; they provide in their entirety a rounded and comprehensive programme for high employment, income and security. No other country has entered the post-war period with the physical advantages and the formulated objectives and completed plans for a better and more secure life than Canada. These proposals are bold and imaginative; they are in keeping with the leadership which Canada has made in economic and financial matters during the war and which have been copied by so many countries.

Canada has been the first country to set forth a practical post-war policy for the maintenance of high employment and income. We hope that the proposals will be accepted. We cannot afford delay in working out satisfactory and acceptable arrangements. The transitional problems of reconversion dealing with export markets and the like will be sufficiently difficult without the added complication of uncertainty on the part of the dominion or the provinces as to what the financial and other arrangements between them are to be.

Finally, these proposals are the only comprehensive programme of post-war reconstruction put before the Canadian people. They constitute a broad pattern. The proposals themselves are contained in the document headed, "Proposals of the Government of Canada". They are supported by a number of reference books dealing with various subjects.

This document, which I should like to discuss at length but have not the time to, deals with national problems and objectives, transition measures, and finally the dominion proposals under the heads of: "public investment policy", "social security", "financial arrangements", and "conclusion".

Dealing more specifically with social security, may I say that the only comments on the social security proposals so far made in the house relate to old age pensions. These social security proposals are based on the idea of trying to achieve three main objectives. The first is humanitarian, to give the Canadian men, women and children a better chance for health and welfare and security than they have ever had. The second is economic. They are intended to provide purchasing power which will provide a steady flow of funds with which the Canadian people can purchase the things they need and help to maintain employment and national income. Third, they are national; they deal with the Canadian people as the people of a nation, and they treat everyone alike.

To deal more specifically with health, the health proposals include matters which I can mention briefly under four heads: (1) A grant for planning to the provinces to assist them to plan their health measures. (2) They include health insurance proposals which are designed to meet the needs of the provinces, of the people in the provinces in every part of Canada, and which are also designed to meet the criticisms that were directed at the proposals previously put forward, with features of flexibility so as to meet the most urgent needs first. (3) They include proposals for health grants to the provinces for purposes of preventive medicine under some eight heads. (4) They provide for financial assistance to the provinces and their institutions for the construction of hospitals.

These proposals have been discussed, and while they are subject to amendment in detail, I think I can say that they have been framed so as to meet with general acceptance by the people of Canada, and by the people most concerned in this field.

Then there are the proposals with regard to old age pensions. First, it is proposed that there shall be a national old age pension of $30 a month, payable by the federal government to everyone over seventy years of age and, second, a contribution by the federal government on a fifty-fifty basis to the cost of old age pensions, payable on proof of need to people between sixty-five and sixty-nine years of age, to be administered by the provinces.

As I said, the only criticism directed against these proposals by any hon. members in the course of this debate was to the proposal respecting old age pensions. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) made some remarks in that connection, but he did not make any positive suggestion. Then, three other hon. members have proposed that the rates be increased; that the age be lowered; and I think all three of them also proposed that taxes be reduced as well.

In considering social security measures we must be realistic, and agree only to what is in the real interests of the country as a whole, so that security will not be bought at the expense of productivity, the basis of all wealth, so that the generosity to some will not amount to unfairness for the many.

The suggestion by one hon. member was for a pension of $50 a month, payable at the age of sixty years. I have asked my officers to calculate what that would cost, and they tell me it would cost $850 million a year, based on the estimated population of Canada in 1948. The proposal made by the federal government in its proposals to the provinces for a national pension of $30 a month payable at the age of seventy years to everyone, without proof of need, is estimated to cost $200 million.

These proposals now put forward by the dominion government are as generous as we can make them, while at the same time keeping the whole plan in balance, and workable. We have reached a balance in our estimates; the plan hangs together, and can be made to work. But neither it nor anything else can be made to work if we create appetites that cannot be filled, and then arouse people's fears that we cannot meet things we never intended to do at all.

Mr. KUHL: That is not what you said about the war.

Mr. CLAXTON: My hon. friend has spoken for five years in the house about the war, and about the possibility of doing this and that. He has been answered on numerous occasions by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) and others. At the present moment I am dealing with social security, and I should prefer to finish, without entering into a discussion with my hon. friend at this time. However, I should be glad to discuss it with him at some later day. On this occasion the time left to me is short.

These proposals are put forward for consideration by the provinces. They are in their hands, and no doubt are being studied by provincial officials. We hope and trust, from their attitude shown at the conference, that they are studying them in the light of the observations made on the concluding page, and in particular in the concluding paragraph where we find this:

> The dominion government asks careful and mature consideration of these proposals, which it is anxious to discuss fully and freely with the provincial governments. It asks that they be considered in the light of the responsibilities which each government has to the people. Let no other advantage be considered than the advantage of the people of Canada.

They were put forward in that spirit and with that hope.

As the session develops, in the discussion of the estimates and on other occasions, I should like to lay before hon. members and to develop the proposals of the Department of National Health and Welfare for the extension of services within the field of the federal government. I can announce to the house, as has been announced to the public, that subject to the approval of parliament, the government has authorized the construction of a national laboratory within which to concentrate and coordinate activities in the field of research in public health. We have also announced a health service to the civil servants of Canada, and we hope to be able to extend services in other directions.

All this is part of an effort to meet the real needs of the Canadian people. I believe that, with unemployment insurance already in force, with unemployment assistance as proposed, with family allowances, as they are now paid—on a more generous scale than in any other place in the world—with health insurance, health grants and other health measures, together with old age pensions and pensions for the blind as they are put forth in the proposals, taken together with the measures already in force in the provinces, or proposed by the provinces, Canada will lead the entire world in matters of social security.

But the basis of this must be the work of the Canadian people; there is no other basis. Here in the House of Commons during this session we have an opportunity of meeting the challenge of peace, as we met the challenge of war. That great partnership must not be dissolved. We won the war, and with it our freedom to be and to do. We must fight to extend the areas of freedom—freedom from want and freedom from ignorance. We must fight and work together, so that we may make the utmost use of our human and material capacities, thus giving our men who are coming back from overseas that Canada of which for so long they have had a true vision.

Reference was made by one speaker to the need for action and leadership. We have had action during the war. During the war we have had leadership—leadership, I suggest, unparalleled in the history of Canada. Under the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) Canada has accomplished wonders it never dreamed possible. It is no accident that for twenty-six years he has led the Liberal party, and has been Prime Minister for a period longer than any other prime minister now in office anywhere in the world. It is no accident that this government alone, among governments in democratic countries, is the government which was in office at the beginning of the war and has remained in office at the end of the war.

Mr. COLDWELL: What about New Zealand?

Mr. CLAXTON: Not with the same Prime Minister. But this government cannot do the job alone. I believe hon. members in all parts of the house will feel that they will truly represent the spirit and wish of the Canadian people if, without bitterness or partisanship, we work together to make Canada the country we all know it can be.

Mr. E. D. FULTON (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, a great many congratulatory remarks have been made since the beginning of this session and I should like to associate myself with all the congratulations which have been extended. Particularly I should like to congratulate the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Bridges) upon his election and his appointment to the high office he now occupies. I had the great pleasure of flying back from Prestwick, Scotland, with him. We had a somewhat similar experience to that undergone by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare (Mr. Baker). One would almost have been inclined to think that had it not been for the fact that there were government candidates coming back in that plane the government had somehow adversely influenced the weather because we were forced up to 23,000 feet, an even higher height of democracy that the 15,000 feet to which the plane in which my hon. friend was flying was forced. Perhaps that may be taken as indicative of the fact that Canadian democracy is capable of rising to absolutely untold heights.

Next I should like to refer to an incident which took place in this chamber this afternoon and to apologize to you and to hon. members of the house for having been the occasion of having taken up so much time apparently to no good purpose. However, I should like to make my motives clear. I was under the impression that I was asking a question of national import. I recall that in my question I made reference to statements by Canadian prisoners of war in Japanese hands. I though that was a question of national importance. I made reference to their ill treatment by a Canadian-born Japanese. I thought that was a question of national importance. Perhaps we regard it more seriously in the province and the constituency from which I come than may be the case in the rest of Canada. I hope we shall be able to show the rest of Canada that even as we regard their problems as being important to us, we would like them to help us in solving this very real problem.

The third matter I should like to take up is the fact that I was called definitely to task for introducing a matter of local importance in an oral question asked in this house. I referred to the fact that the Japanese referred to was alleged to have resided in my constituency of Kamloops. Perhaps I was guilty of infringing the rules of the house and I would ask hon. members to excuse me and put it down to the inordinate pride in his constituency of a new member which did not permit him to wait until the customary time to make his maiden speech even though he was down to make it that same afternoon.

(Translation): Mr. Speaker, in addressing the house this afternoon I cannot forget that I have but recently returned from overseas. You will therefore understand that, while I intend ever to serve the best interests of all Canadians, both French and English-speaking, the interests, the welfare and the ideals of our armed forces will necessarily be foremost in my thoughts.

Let me emphasize, Mr. Speaker, that I have a special esteem for our French-Canadian friends who have served in the armed forces, and especially for those who were members of the glorious Royal 22nd Regiment, with which I had the honour of being associated for a long time in the First Canadian Division. May I pay a tribute to the record of that regiment which compared favourably with that of any other unit, whatever may have been the language spoken by its members.

Mr. Speaker, I think that one of the noblest motives for which we fought was the hope that our Canada would become a truly united country. Personally I have a keen desire to understand the thoughts and the ambitions of the French-Canadian people. We fought overseas for the same cause; it is my hope that here, in peace time, we may continue to work jointly with that object in view. I wish that we may work sincerely together, on both sides of this house and in the different parts of Canada to remove every trace of bitterness and misunderstanding.

I ask my good French-speaking friends not to judge my sincerity of purpose by the poor way in which I speak French. I hope to improve my knowledge of that language through study and practice, until my French equals in quality the friendship I hope will arise between us.

(Text): In speaking to-day on the address in reply to the speech from the throne I feel it is only fitting to say at the outset that I humbly thank God that I am here to make this speech and to serve my country, Canada, and to continue to serve my king whose representative delivered that speech. It was only in May that I returned from Europe after the end of the war there. I feel most humbly and with a certain awe that it was only due to God's grace that I am back at all. At the same time the very fact that I am back gives me the greatest determination to use my time to serve my country and my people to the best of my ability, and particularly to keep faith with those who were not so fortunate as myself, who have not come back as yet or perhaps who are not coming back at all; to keep faith with them, to build this Canada into the country they had in mind to preserve when they went over to fight for it. So I ask God's further help and guidance that even as He has preserved me, so I may be helped and inspired never to break that faith, but always to serve my country and its citizens in parliament or out of it as they deserve to be served.

I think the keynote of my speech is the words "as they deserve to be served." As a member of His Majesty's armed forces it was my inestimable privilege to see the heights to which the Canadian people could rise when called on to serve in a great cause. No questions were asked, no mention was made by those average Canadian citizens of the sacrifices that might be involved, although many of them gave all that they had in that service. Canadians showed themselves possessed of a high measure of unselfishness, possessed of extraordinary ability to cooperate to secure a worthy end. These same abilities were shown at home by the people of Canada for the same reasons. They were Canadian people engaged in tasks which they believed to be worth while.

Now the points which I am trying to make here are two:

First, these performances, these qualities, call for a reward of the highest order. No questions were asked when the people I have described were being called upon to make their efforts and their sacrifices. No questions must be asked by this country and this government when they are called upon to see that these people get the reward which they deserve.

Second, the qualities shown and the efforts made reached their finest peak when leadership was given, which was a spark to set those qualities blazing. The Canadian people are fully as capable now as then of the same qualities. They were in the past, they are now, and they will be in the future, and for ever. But the leadership must be there, and it is because I have no confidence, and a great many others of our people—too many to be laughed off—have no confidence that this government will give that leadership or is giving it that I am speaking to this motion this afternoon.

I think hon. members will agree that this view is justified if we make a brief review of the government's past and present record in a few more important particulars. The first of these is the matter of what I might call fair dealing with the people of Canada, and by that I mean that policies should be adopted because they are honestly believed to be in the best interests of the whole country, and not because they are designed to gain votes in any one or more parts; that that policy should be given to the house and the people fairly and squarely, and that the people should be told all the facts all the time—not one set of facts to one section of the people and another set to another. What I have in mind here is, of course, chiefly the government's man-power policy. I want to make it perfectly clear to hon. members that I am not simply raising a ghost of the past and trying to draw further bitterness from it. What I am concerned to do is to examine and establish the facts of yesterday in order to draw from them lessons for to-morrow.

I wish to warn the government, and for our own part here to pledge our efforts to this end, that that sort of action which characterized the period of the man-power policy will not be tolerated by us on this side of the house, or I think by any members of the house nor by the people of Canada. I do not think the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was justified in the remark he made in referring to the speech of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken), that it sounded to him as though the leader of the opposition was simply repeating the same sort of thing that had been repeated ad nauseam in the period leading up to the election. I would remind the Prime Minister that he lost a considerable number of seats in the election. I would remind him and other responsible ministers that the remarks which were made by people in possession of all the facts about the man-power situation were not without their effect upon the country. They were not without their effect in my own constituency of Kamloops, and I feel it is my duty to go on record, probably for the last time, to say what I feel about those facts.

The truth of the situation is that last November when the Prime Minister and the then responsible Minister of National Defence in this house were assuring the house and the people of Canada that there was no shortage of reinforcements, the men overseas, and I speak particularly of Italy, were at that time being overworked to the point of exhaustion on account of the lack of reinforcements. I ask hon. members to imagine the thoughts in the minds of a Canadian soldier, say a French-Canadian soldier, to whose fighting qualities I have already paid tribute, who was called upon to carry more than his fair share of the burden in the battle line because there were not sufficient reinforcements to relieve him, either replacements which would be ideal or the replacements which would be operationally correct. When these replacements or reinforcements did not exist, what was the effect on the mind of that soldier when he read the statement of the Prime Minister and the responsible minister of defence at that time that there was no shortage of reinforcements? It had a very bad effect, one which I can assure hon. members I shall never forget. Those statements which were made, in the light of the facts as they existed at the time, have impressed themselves on my mind, and not only on my own mind but on the mind of a great many other Canadians, in such a way that we shall never be able to forget that that is just the way, in our view, that politics ought not to be conducted.

I ask hon. members not to forget those facts when accepting assurances or listening to promises of legislation or action by the Prime Minister and his government, when many members of the government to-day are the same men who sat there and made those statements in the house when men overseas were in desperate need of reinforcements.

If further justification were needed, Mr. Speaker, for referring to this man-power question I think it is to be found in the fact that the government policy in that respect is responsible for the extraordinary situation facing the country to-day with respect to repatriation and demobilization. The government has adopted strange and devious methods to try to get around that situation, and I think it is time the real reason for those methods and the facts behind the situation were outlined to this house and the country.

It may be said that the present regulations with respect to demobilization, which were attacked by my hon. friend the member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes), are in some respects an effort to make the best of a bad job. I shall say nothing about the places where they only make a bad job worse, as was said by the hon. member for Nanaimo and the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Merritt). What I want to draw attention to is the fact that the government, finally yielding to terrific public pressure for the release of personnel to fill essential jobs, has issued instructions for the immediate release of personnel regardless of their point scores. This, of course, operates to the prejudice of overseas personnel. It cannot help but do so because the overseas personnel could not be brought back fast enough. So in an effort to safeguard their rights, the regulations provide that the low-point personnel in Canada who are released can only be released to return to their former jobs; they can only be given long-term leave—not discharge. This is a complicated and confusing procedure and is only an attempt to make the best of a bad job. The proper method, the fair method, of course, would be to bring back the high-point overseas personnel and discharge them first. The answer of the government is that this is not possible owing to lack of shipping facilities. Reserving our right to criticize that statement, and I shall refer to it shortly, I say that we will for the time being accept that answer. But what I want to point out is this: The fact that overseas there are only high point personnel, while back here in Canada there are only low point personnel with little or no overseas service, is the result of the government's man-power policy. It is as a result of that policy that that bad condition has been brought about. The proper course would have been to keep the reinforcement stream flowing, to keep men as they were called into the army or any of the armed forces in Canada proceeding overseas, ready when necessary to replace casualties, and available as indicated to take the place of men with two or three years' front line service. That, I submit, would have been the proper course, and then those old long-service veterans could have been brought back in the same stream of shipping and would be back in Canada now, ready to accept their discharge. That would have been the proper course. Then none of this dallying, confusion and prejudice would exist—none of those circumstances which are so irritating to all and which characterize the present regulations. These characteristics I submit, are part and parcel of the government's every policy, and there is in that government no promise and no likelihood of action. I ask hon. members to bear this in mind in voting on the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition.

As I say, for myself I hope and believe that this is the last time that I shall refer to the man-power question. Sufficient bitterness was created throughout this country, and my efforts from now on will be devoted to trying to heal that bitterness and to understand the opposite point of view. But I want to make it perfectly clear for myself, and I believe sincerely I may speak for the whole of our party, that we are not ashamed of our stand on the man-power policy.

Mr. ABBOTT: What was the stand?

Mr. FULTON: I should like here to point the lesson which is to be drawn from the facts to which I have just referred, by a reference to statements which were made by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Abbott) and by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). Speaking with reference to remarks made by the hon. member for Nanaimo the Minister of National Defence implied that instead of criticizing the present demobilization difficulties we should be praising the government because they have brought back so many men from overseas and demobilized them. The Prime Minister did the same thing. He said that we have brought back 120,000 men since V-E day to demobilize them. I should like to read the words of the Minister of National Defence as reported in Hansard, page 101:

The hon. member—

Referring to the hon. member for Nanaimo.

—made some reference to the reduction in the point score from an original figure of 150 or 160 to 130. One reason for the reduction in the point score is that since V-E day we have repatriated from overseas over 120,000 of all three services.

The inference there is that those men were brought back since V-E day as part of a repatriation and demobilization programme.

Mr. ABBOTT: They were.

Mr. FULTON: Yes? I took the trouble to telephone the minister's office and asked how many of that 120,000 were personnel who came back as volunteers for the Pacific force. The answer was that in the army, of 75,000 personnel repatriated, 25,000, or one-third, had volunteered for the Pacific force and been brought back on those grounds, and that it would be fair to say, although no definite figures could be given, that the figure of one-third represented the proportion of the whole number that had come back as volunteers for the Pacific force. So that out of 120,000, 40,000 came back as volunteers for the Pacific force. That was an operational commitment; and actually, of that number, the majority are short-service personnel who had recently proceeded overseas and had volunteered there for the Pacific force. So in fact we have brought back a large number of personnel who actually would not have been eligible for discharge on a pure point score; yet the minister and the Prime Minister tried to take credit in this house for having brought back 120,000 for discharge, when actually out of that number 40,000 were brought back for an entirely different reason.

I should like to refer next to the second paragraph of the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition, that this house regrets that His Majesty's ministers have failed to provide adequate measures for reconversion from war to a peace-time economy. This was no idle motion. We on this side honestly feel that the government of this country has forfeited the confidence of the people in this respect. It is all very well for the Prime Minister and certain other ministers to sit over there and shake with laughter and scoff and say, "Oh, but we won an election three months ago. When you mention these things you really must be wasting our time because after all we won the election three months ago." I am not given to strong language, but I rather feel that that attitude smacks of hypocrisy, when we consider that at that very moment there was in this House of Commons a labour delegation some hundreds strong who were here because they did not have confidence in the government, and because they were out of work. They were not agitators, they were not bad citizens; they were just ordinary average Canadian citizens who had come up here to see their government to try to get some reassurance that the jobs which they had been promised would actually be forthcoming. Those are the reasons why they were here, not because they wanted to find any minister in his golf club, but because they came to the House of Commons to see him, where they ought to see him, because they wanted action; and they were not even seen by the government. They were, however, seen the next day. They were received on the day they arrived by a delegation from the other parties represented in this parliament. I think that the reception of that labour delegation was typical of the state of affairs in this country to-day.

Mr. MITCHELL: Mr. Speaker, if I may—

Mr. GREEN: Oh, let him alone.

Mr. MITCHELL: Wait a minute. I just want to tell the truth—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MITCHELL: From my point of view. I wish to say to my hon. friend, in a friendly way, that that delegation was met by the government.

Mr. CASSELMAN: A couple of days later.

Mr. MITCHELL: No, the next day.

Mr. FULTON: I said it was met the next day.

Mr. MITCHELL: But prior to that the chairman of the delegation had been wired. I am sure my hon. friend does not want the impression to go out to the country that the government do not meet delegations. We were very glad to meet them. We met the two congresses.

Mr. FULTON: That was certainly the impression in the minds of the delegation. I admit that the delegation was met the next day by the government, but I simply say that I think the reception of the delegation in the vicinity of this parliament was typical of the situation throughout the country. They were spoken to and addressed by a C.C.F. member of parliament who said, "What you want is a new social order." That is what he said they wanted,—not jobs, not homes, not meals, but a new social order. They were addressed by a member of the Social Credit party, who said,

"What you want is a new kind of money." They were addressed first, however, by a member of the Progressive Conservative party.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member does not want to misrepresent what was said. Not a word was said about a new kind of money. If the hon. member knew a little more about social credit he would know better than to say that. What was said was, a new source of money.

Mr. FULTON: I accept the correction—a new source of money. What was said by the Progressive Conservative member who addressed that meeting was, "Gentlemen, I have just received your proposals and I shall study them at the first possible opportunity. I intend to take immediate action on those of which I approve." On that day there was no action and no representation from the government. I think that is typical of the situation in this country to-day. I looked at their signs carefully and these people did not ask for a new social order or a new source of purchasing power. They asked for jobs, for a continuation of present wages. I do not remember exactly what it was, and I do not want to lay myself open to a charge of misquoting, but they wanted jobs and security. They want that now, and this party is the only one that proposes to take action to give it to them now. The government met them the next day, but only after their hands had been forced, and that again, I suggest, is typical of the situation.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is unfair.

Mr. FULTON: I suggested to the minister—

Mr. MITCHELL: It is not correct.

Mr. FULTON: If I am in error in making the suggestion, it will be open to the minister to correct the impression later. It was a suggestion that that was the impression that was left in the minds of the people.

Mr. MITCHELL: Once your story has gone through the country; once you have got your story over.

Mr. FULTON: I should like to refer further to some remarks made by the Secretary of State (Mr. Martin) in dealing with the question. His remarks I think are typical of the government's attitude on the question. At page 60 of Hansard he is reported as having said:

> I am frank to admit that difficulties attend other countries, as well as our own; and the fact that we have now in a number of localities a situation of surplus labour is perhaps not all that one might desire.

[Mr. Fulton.]

I suggest that it is very far from what one might desire. I regret very much that my remarks appear to have been misinterpreted, but I am anxious to impress upon the ministers the fact that, like the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Merritt), the member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes), and the leader of this party (Mr. Bracken), as well as most of the members of this house, I want some assurance that action will be taken now. We certainly know that the situation is not all that might be desired, but we feel more strongly than that and we want to know whether or not the government feels more strongly than that. I am pointing out to the ministers that their actions have not to this date inspired in the minds of the people of the country the belief that the government does feel more strongly about is than that. That is the only point I am trying to make.

When we come to the third paragraph of the amendment as moved by the leader of the opposition, criticizing the lack of action on housing, again I say it is very difficult to understand the attitude of members of the government when they sit there and say, "Well, after all, we won an election three months ago and you are really wasting our time coming here and talking about housing because it does not matter." I do not care, nor do the people of the country care, whether the government won an election three months ago. What the people want is houses, and so far, I maintain, they have received no assurance from this government that they are likely to get houses very quickly.

This housing problem is one that affects my own constituency in the same degree, though not exactly in the same measure, as it affects the constituencies in Vancouver, one of which is represented by the member for Vancouver-Burrard, who made the strongest plea for government action in this respect. I will not attempt to go over his observations again, but I bring them to the attention of the government and ask them whether they are now prepared to give the country that factual and actual assurance which it desires, that houses will be provided. There has been a statement from the Minister of National Health and Welfare, a reassuring statement, as to the government's intentions with respect to social security, but the problem of housing has not been tackled. All we have is a measure of disagreement as to whether or not refrigerators and plumbing are frozen.

One other question with respect to housing which I should like to bring to the attention of the house is this. As I have said, the responsible ministers of the crown have failed to give that assurance which they are called upon to give the people. The question of housing was mentioned by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson). At the time he was making his remarks I had a certain feeling of disagreement with him and lack of support for his views. Somebody near me informed me that the member for Mackenzie was the gentleman who at one time made a speech in this house opposing the sending of beer to the troops in Italy, and I knew then that I certainly had no sympathy or support for his views. I do not know quite what was the official government pronouncement or policy on the question at the time the hon. gentleman was stating his opposition, but I assure him that he need not have worried in the slightest, because, whatever the government said about it very little beer got to the troops in Italy and I felt that he was wasting his time on that occasion as much as he was working to no purpose on this.

It will be recalled that the hon. gentleman devoted considerable time at the beginning of his speech to a criticism of the then premier of Manitoba for his failure to solve the allegedly desperate housing situation in Winnipeg, and devoted an equal length of time in the latter part of his speech to a bitter criticism of the suggestion that anyone but the federal government is responsible for housing measures, attacking this party for suggesting that anyone else might be entrusted with solving the housing problem. You cannot have it both ways. You cannot attack the provincial government for not taking action, you cannot attack its leader for not taking action, and then attack that same gentleman, who is now leader of this party, because he suggests that somebody other than the federal government might take action.

The responsibility is clearly a nation-wide responsibility, a responsibility that devolves upon municipalities, provinces and the federal government and private enterprise. What we ask for on this side of the house is action and leadership from the government to coordinate the efforts of all those who are only waiting and anxious to do what they can to solve the problem.

I am running short of time, and I realize that so far I have made but passing reference to my own constituency of Kamloops. I hope that hon. members will realize that this is not because I am not proud of my constituency of Kamloops, British Columbia, but because at the moment I felt, as I still feel, very strongly and very much disturbed about certain national problems which are as common to my constituency as they are to the rest of the Dominion of Canada. That is why I put these problems first, without making any reference to my constituency. I know that the people of Kamloops feel possibly no more seriously, but certainly no less seriously and no less strongly about these problems than the people of the rest of the Dominion of Canada, and they have asked me as their representative to come down here to see if I can do something in this house, working in conjunction with all other hon. members, to solve them.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that some of the criticisms directed at the government by hon. members of the opposition have been severe. I do not agree that they were bitter, although they have been severe. This is simply because we feel that the problems which confront the country are terribly serious and action is not being taken to solve them. In all these things we fear we see a lack of sincere determination. What we call for is action. These are difficult but not insuperable problems. The Canadian people have shown what they were capable of in war. They put forth that effort in order to preserve Canada as a better place. Now we must make it that better place they had in mind; and it can be done with intelligent direction and action.

As a member of His Majesty's Loyal Opposition I realize it is not my duty and function merely to criticize. For myself I can promise that whenever the government shows signs of action, of producing a solution of the Canadian problems, based on honest effort to solve them in the best interests of Canada, and whenever they introduce any legislation for the purpose of implementing such solution, they will find us honestly and sincerely cooperative. But whenever we see signs of dallying and delay, when we see a danger that Canada's welfare and the potential realization of our highest ambitions will be frustrated by any other consideration or by lack of sincerity or lack of confidence in action, then we will exercise our constitutional prerogative of criticism and opposition. We will not allow the confidence, the high reward, the ideals and expectations which the Canadian service men and citizens have earned by their valour and endurance in this war to go unfulfilled, because we feel that they can be fulfilled if action is taken now.

Mr. HARRY LEADER (Portage la Prairie): I rise to take part in the debate which is lengthening out and perhaps getting better as it lengthens. If that is the case, I shall be sorry if I do not live up to the standard which has already been set by previous speakers. I have quite a lot to say this afternoon and I hope that I can get through in the allotted time.

I am not going to take up the time of the house by offering congratulations to the different hon. members who have been elevated to rather exalted positions, but I want them to take it for granted that they have my very best wishes in the work which they will be called upon to do. I should like to address a few remarks to the younger and new members of parliament, and perhaps it will apply to the older members as well—I know it certainly applies to me. First, I wish to say that it is a great honour for anyone to be the advocate and the representative of his district in this great dominion of ours. When you think that you were chosen out of perhaps forty thousand other citizens in your district you can understand that you have quite a weighty responsibility, and while it is an honour it carries with it huge and consistent responsibilities. My advice to the younger members is to take stock of themselves once in a while. That is what I do, and then let them ask themselves, what are we here for? As I said, it is a great honour and a great privilege but it carries with it great responsibilities. I do not want to tender any further advice than that, but I think it is good advice to give to the younger men, and the older ones, including myself, always remember the people back home.

My main reason for rising to-day, Mr. Speaker, is to deal with a question which has been up on previous occasions. I think I have addressed this house four times on the matter which I intend to reintroduce to-day. It is something that is left over from previous sessions, and therefore it might be called a matter of unfinished business. Perhaps some hon. members have already guessed that I intend to bring once more before the house the matter of Doctor Davidson's research work in endeavouring to find a preventive or a possible cure for cancer. What I wish to impress upon the house to-day is the necessity, if we are to clean up this matter once and for all, of the government of Canada taking upon their own shoulders or in cooperation with the provinces the responsibility for a clinical test of not only Doctor Davidson's work but of every other medical practitioner in Canada, there may be others who have worked as hard and as long as Doctor Davidson of Winnipeg, and who may have some clue that, if followed to its logical conclusion, would lead to something that would benefit mankind.

Hon. members may think this subject is monotonous. Well, at the risk of having them bored, may I say that I believe it is a worthy cause. In my opinion, if I have done nothing in my thirty years and more of public life but press for more research work in regard to cancer and other ills that affect the Canadian people, then I would be content to leave this as my only reason for being in parliament.

Cancer, statistics tell us, is second on the list as a man-killer; but in actual suffering and untold sorrow and huge expenses it is away out in the lead, and it is increasing. Therefore it is a matter that is worthy of consideration.

Perhaps the house will bear with me if I outline briefly some of the activities which I attempted in previous sessions in this house on this very important matter. I believe in Doctor Davidson and in his work. While I do not claim I am cured of cancer, neither does Doctor Davidson. But I know he has helped me. Not only do I believe that; I know it. Therefore, if the remarks I am about to make to-day come from my heart, hon. members will understand the feeling I have for other cancer victims who might be in the position in which I am, and would have a chance for a hope of recovery.

I asked our government if they could help Doctor Davidson in his research work by making a grant so that he might carry on his work. He has no money, and very few friends in the medical profession. I knew what he did for me; I knew of dozens of others who believed in Doctor Davidson. I said his work was worthy of a grant, and asked the government of Canada if they would assist Doctor Davidson financially if, after making an investigation, they thought his work merited assistance.

As hon. members know, that matter was referred to the medical committee of the research council in Ottawa who, after a farcical investigation, advised the government that no money should be granted to Doctor Davidson. He never wanted a dollar. What he pleaded for was some young medical men from across Canada who would come to his office, listen to his story, understand his investigations, and carry on where he will leave off in the very near future.

His one ambition was to hand over what he has found to the medical profession of Canada, in the hope that it would be of some benefit to humanity. The money was denied him. At times I might be accused of being somewhat too aggressive; perhaps stubborn would be a better word. However, I asked the government if they would institute a more comprehensive investigation into Doctor Davidson's work. I know that the government was concerned in the matter and that the then minister was in deep sympathy with the project. The result was that they asked the province of Manitoba if it would cooperate with the federal authorities in making an investigation, on the understanding that the federal government would make a grant.

To make a long story short, officers of the crown decided that the making of a grant to any province for health purposes was not within the jurisdiction of the federal government, with the result that the investigation fell through. Following that, the government of Manitoba undertook to conduct an inquiry of its own, with the result that a cancer commission was appointed.

After about ten months of investigation they decided—the report has just been published—that Doctor Davidson's work did not warrant a money grant. The verdict was against the doctor and his work. I should not say that it was against Doctor Davidson personally, because the commission did add that, although its report was negative, it did not in any way reflect upon the integrity and good faith of Doctor Davidson.

Yes, and it comes to my mind that there was another investigation, before that of the commission to which I have just referred. I believe it was the secretary of the railroad associations of British Columbia who undertook a private investigation in regard to this doctor's work. With that in mind this secretary journeyed to Winnipeg and, while there, met many of the doctor's patients.

In a letter written to me recently this gentleman expressed his disappointment regarding the report, and the fact that the commission saw fit to find against the doctor and his work. He pointed out that he remembered vividly those eight hopeful patients he had met while investigating in Winnipeg, that he could still see the light in their eyes, and their hope of renewed health. He cannot believe that these people are either dead or doomed. The idea behind it all was that he expected their cases had been reviewed by the Manitoba cancer commission.

Some hon. members have, from their places in the house, stated that Doctor Davidson's treatments have been investigated on previous occasions. Well, I have mentioned one of those investigations, namely that carried out by the medical committee of the research council, an investigation which was nothing but a farce from beginning to end.

May I be permitted to cite an authority higher than some of those who have set themselves up as critics of Doctor Davidson and his methods. I shall quote in a few moments from page 4864 of Hansard for July 14, 1944. These will be the words of Doctor Howden, who was then the member for St. Boniface. He believes in Doctor Davidson, and that this doctor has something which, if properly explored would benefit humanity. Hon. members who were in the house at that time will remember the story that the then hon. member told, the story about the lady in the hospital in Winnipeg. It had been stated that the doctors could do no more for her, because she had cancer, and that following this pronouncement Doctor Davidson had taken her case, given her his treatments and brought her back to the hospital for examination. I do not know whether at that time Doctor Lehmann, to whom reference was made by Doctor Howden, was president of the hospital, or consulting physician. However, this is what the then hon. member for St. Boniface said in his speech on that occasion:

> He called in Doctor Lehmann to look at the woman and he said, "I thought you were dead."

Remember, these are Doctor Howden's own words. Then the quotation from Hansard continues:

> She said, "No, I am very much alive, thank you." Lehmann said to Davidson, "I think you have got something; you had better go ahead and work on it."

So I am telling the house to-day that Doctor Davidson was advised by the medical profession to carry out this work.

The work of this doctor was assisted earlier not only by the medical association, but by the late James Richardson, by the Winnipeg Kiwanis club, and by other organizations the names of which do not come to my mind at the moment. The quotation from Hansard continues:

> That was the beginning of experimentation with rodents. Doctor Davidson has definitely established two principles. He has definitely established that he can retard the advance of cancer by a high nutrition diet. That is something definite; that is a principle. Let me explain the experimentation with rodents. They take a mouse and shave the hair from the back of its neck. Then they put a little spot of tar on the shaven place, and the mouse scratches away at that tar until he causes an ulcerating sore, which eventually becomes cancerous. As I told this house previously, Doctor Davidson experimented with two families of mice, one on ordinary nutrition and the other on high nutrition. He discovered that the mice fed on the high nutrition diet did not develop cancer after they had tar put on the back of their necks. Then he went a step further; he decided to experiment with the serum of the healthy families of mice in the unhealthy families of mice, and actually discovered that when the unhealthy families of mice were injected with the serum from the healthy families, their cancerous sores cleared up. So that another principle was established. Those two principles cannot be denied by the research council of Canada or anyone else, because they have been definitely proven and shown.

I want to get back to the cancer commission again and direct the attention of the house to the fact that I put on Hansard on June 27, 1944, letters which I had received from twelve patients. They all claimed that they had been benefited by Doctor Davidson's work. One would need to look at the evidence submitted to this cancer commission before one would know how they dealt with these several cases. The following item is clipped from the report:

Note: Of the 376 names listed in exhibit VIII, twenty-three are listed again in exhibit IX. The twelve cases cited by Mr. Harry Leader in House of Commons debates are also included in exhibit VIII.

As I say, I do not know what conclusion the commission came to in regard to these people, but I want to tell the house that I have kept track of these patients. I wrote to them and, while they did not all answer, six or seven answered and I have the letters here. I know the house does not want me to take up time in reading them, but they all state that they were either helped or cured by Doctor Davidson. When I wrote to them last spring they replied that they were well on the road to recovery and yet, when we come to read the report of the commission, we find that they were classed as non-cancerous. I wish I had the time at my disposal to read these letters, but they are available should any hon. member want to see them. Surely the old biblical saying of a prophet having no honour in his own country is true in Doctor Davidson's case. The commission made the following finding:

Five other cases are unusual. Their numbers are 19, 32, 60, 88 and 113. All had been definitely cancerous and all took Doctor Davidson's treatment. Apparently they all were cured, so far as the time lapse permits of that statement. However, in none of these cases can credit clearly be given to the treatment under investigation because other treatments had been applied shortly beforehand. These included surgery, X-rays, radium and electro-cautery, either singly or in combination.

No credit allowed to Doctor Davidson at all. I am sure hon. members have in their minds the same question I have in mine, the question that was in the mind of a lady to whom I was talking not long ago: if these people were cured through the regular channels of the medical association, why did they go to Doctor Davidson? According to the cancer commission they went to Doctor Davidson after they had been treated by other sources and apparently were cured. Is that fair? I ask that question of every hon. member. I will give the answer: it is not fair to Doctor Davidson, and I think hon. members will agree with me.

I come now to a case which I never wanted to bring before this house. The record will show that I had arranged for two other hon. members to bring up the case of Doctor Davidson in this house after I had gone home to continue my treatment with him. That was two years ago. No real action was taken, so I deemed it my duty, even though a layman—I can speak from practical experience—as a public man to tell the story of my own condition to hon. members in the house and people throughout the country.

As I said, hon. members will have to look over the evidence before they get the full picture of even my case. However, I recognized it when I saw it in the report. It is the sixth case referred to as No. 70, and I quote:

The sixth case (No. 70) has a very low grade tumour. To quote Mayo clinic—"it is a very low grade tumour and slow growing type of cancer and we know of instances where patients have lived from twelve to fifteen years after it had been found to be just as extensive as yours was.

There is some hope in a statement of that kind and I am glad to have that hope. If it is the will of God that I should live many more years I shall be truly thankful. But they could have said this, and this is what came direct from the Mayo clinic: Leader's case was impossible after careful exploration of his abdomen. There was no guesswork about that. They said they could not attempt a colostomy operation, which might prove a matter of life or death for me if I were threatened with a bowel obstruction. They said my case was impossible and they could do nothing for me.

The commission did not quote that, although they had the full story. The Mayos wired me, asking me if they might send it to them. I told them to send it by all means and let me have a copy. So they got it and this would appear to be a hopeful sign. I ask hon. members to think of that because of what is coming next. The commission continues:

Also his own doctor writes—"I have prescribed morphine for pain on several occasions this past summer (1944). There may be subjective improvement but objectively there is no evidence of retrogression of the tumour." Your commissioners do not consider this case as cured or even arrested, as the attending physician clearly points out that the tumour and some of its accompanying symptoms have shown no improvement after two years' treatment and the continued need of morphine to allay the pain shows that the disturbing factor has not been arrested.

In the first place there is a promise that I may live for many years; next, my goose is cooked. It reminds me of the song that Gracie Fields sometimes sings. She is referring to a refractory or lazy husband and she says, "The old man is dead but he won't lie down." The worst factor in regard to my case is the fact that the secretary of the commission told many patients as she visited them that Harry Leader was very ill and that he had to take the strongest drugs to deaden the pain. She made the picture as bad as she possibly could.

I am afraid I am going to exceed my time, but that will be in the hands of the house. Information was presented by my doctor in Portage la Prairie. I want to say here that he is a clever young man. I would place my life in his hands any day as a medical practitioner who is following a careful and capable father. But he did not know all the circumstances. He prescribed the medicine all right but he did not know whether I took it. I am going to give the house some information in regard to that. He prescribed what I later found out were morphine pills. The number is 55200 and the prescription was filled on July 26, 1944. I never took one of those pills. They were morphine pills. My wife told me that she had stronger pills for me, but I did not want to take them. I did not know they were morphine, but I thought I could get along without them. That was July 26, 1944, and the commission's report was printed I think on August 2, 1945. In other words, about fourteen months afterward, the report comes out that I have to take the strongest drugs to deaden the pain.

Now I want to give the complete story. The next prescription was No. 48521, filled March 16, 1945. Another prescription, No. 47526, was filled on the same date. That would be just about six months ago. I have not taken a pill since. Those were sleeping pills. There was another pill which I have learned had codeine in it. I took those pills more to put me to sleep, not to deaden pain although there were times when I suffered intensely. But I have not taken any of those pills for six months. And the real morphine pills which had been prescribed for me, I did not take one of them. Another doctor from Portage was sent out, substituting for my own doctor, and I really had pains at that time. That was perhaps fourteen months ago, and in the fall of last year. He gave me morphine, a hypo, and left some pills with my wife. She admits she gave me three, all in a very short time, because I was suffering intensely. This bears out the fact that some of the morphine pills prescribed for me I never took at all, and the others I have not taken for six months. Yet the lady doctor, the secretary of this cancer commission, Doctor Lautsch, has gone up and down this country, not building up their morale, not giving them hope, but telling suffering cancer patients, when they asked how Harry Leader was getting along, that he had to take these drugs constantly to deaden the pain. When I showed this to my doctor he said, "Isn't it true?" I said, "Yes, Jack, it is true but I did not take the prescriptions." Then he said, "The conclusion of the commission is not fair. A better word for 'constant' would be occasional", and I agreed with him.

I have an affidavit here, and I am going to tell the house from whom I got it. I got it from Mr. Stubbs, a member of the provincial legislature of Manitoba, one of the members for the city of Winnipeg, a man who is deeply interested and entirely sympathetic to the work of Doctor Davidson. He made a speech in the Manitoba house not long ago and produced affidavits from some of these patients and presented them to the house. He has a keen legal mind, is a skilful debater, and I believe a man of integrity. Does the house wish me to read all of this affidavit or just that portion of it that deals with my own condition and the fact that the secretary of the cancer commission had made these statements to other patients throughout the province?

Mr. COLDWELL: Read what you think is necessary.

An hon. MEMBER: Put it on Hansard.

Mr. LEADER: I will read part of the affidavit of Victoria Wilson, of 367 Kensington street, St. James, Manitoba. She made a sworn affidavit before a notary public on July 3, 1945, and from it I quote:

That the said Doctor Edith Lautsch—

That is the lady doctor who is the secretary of the commission.

—interviewed me for about an hour and a half and made lengthy notes. She talked a great deal about Doctor Davidson, his patients, his methods and his treatments. She made the definite statement that there was nothing in Doctor Davidson's supposed cure for cancer; that his serum treatments did more harm than good by postponing operations which ought to be performed at the early stages of cancer.

7. That the said Doctor Lautsch asked me whether I thought that Doctor Davidson had helped me. I replied that I certainly thought he had; that I had been greatly benefited and my health much improved since coming under his care and taking his treatments and gave him the credit for it.

8. That the said Doctor Lautsch said, among other things at the said interview, that it had been proved that some of Doctor Davidson's patients whom he claimed to have cured of cancer had never had cancer at all; and that out of about 400 of his patients over 300 had died.

9. That the said Doctor Lautsch further said she considered Doctor Thorlakson one of the best cancer doctors in Winnipeg, that she would recommend me to go to him, except that he was so strongly prejudiced against Doctor Davidson.

There are some good features in the commission's report. If I have not already done so, I want to say now that I believe that every man on that commission was a man of integrity. I only know one of them personally, and that is Doctor Savage, the chairman. I know he is a capable pathologist. He is a man of integrity for whom I have the utmost respect. The other members are medical men whom I do not know personally, but I ascribe nothing but honesty to their motives. But when we remember that these men are steeped in the old orthodox doctrines of medical men it will be understood that there might be a little prejudice there, and while I am willing and glad to admit their absolute honesty, it may be that their reasoning is not so good as it might have been. Here is another extract from the report which gives us an inkling that there is really something to Doctor Davidson's treatment, because it says:

> Approximately seventy per cent of the patients living at the time of the investigation claimed subjective improvement and gained weight at least for a time. Many testified that they felt better than they had for years, in spite of evidence that the disease was extending.

Mr. Speaker, are we to continue to combat the greatest scourge of mankind, the disease of cancer, by following the old orthodox methods? Is it not time we looked around for something that might prevent cancer? This was Doctor Davidson's ambition since he started this work. Curing cancer was only a secondary consideration. He was advised, as I said, by at least one medical practitioner to carry on his work, and his idea was to find a preventive for cancer. If you can prevent disease you do not need a cure. Just think of what they have done with diphtheria, typhoid fever and smallpox, and imagine what they are going to do in the future, both our older doctors who remained home in Canada and those who are overseas. Great improvements will be instituted with regard to all diseases, and I am looking for some great improvement in regard to cancer.

But I am dealing with the commission, Mr. Speaker, and I want to give you one of the conclusions to which they came:

> 2. That no public money be voted to aid further experiments of the general kind carried on by Doctor Davidson with mice unless it be for an extensive and prolonged programme of experimental work conducted by an adequate personnel.

That is exactly what Doctor Davidson has been asking for; not a dollar of public money, not a donation, although he has received some, and was glad to receive the help. But he asks for a clinical test. There is the ray of hope; there, gleams out the fact that if the dominion government will play ball with the province of Manitoba a clinical test will be made. Why should there not be? They are making them in other lands. I read the other day that a pathological institution, I think it is the university of Cleveland, Ohio, is now carrying on a clinical test in regard to a serum discovered by some Russian. This investigation or test is going to be carried on over a three-year term, and they are getting $30,000 to help conduct the test. We want something like that in Canada, and this matter will never be cleared up until we get it. I received a letter from the minister of health of Manitoba, who stated in the concluding paragraph that if the matter is to be carried on further he will be glad to lend his cooperation in whatever action is taken. We expect action, and I think we are going to get it. If you will permit me sir, I will read a statement made in this house by the Prime Minister himself. Speaking on July 14, 1944, as reported in Hansard, at page 4885, he said:

> One point should be made perfectly clear. From the discussion here to-day it may be assumed throughout the country that, because of decisions given as to jurisdiction, the dominion government is preventing Doctor Davidson from making certain investigations which might be made at the instance of government authority. What I cannot understand is this: Doctor Davidson having the reputation which he has, hon. members from Manitoba believing him as they do, why the province of Manitoba itself does not undertake the work of research in relation to cancer and retain Doctor Davidson for the purpose. It should be made perfectly clear that the province of Manitoba, if it wishes to do so, can undertake all this work of research so far as Doctor Davidson is concerned. In Ontario the provincial government has undertaken similar kinds of research.
> To show at least the sympathy which the federal government has had with research in a case where success has been proven, I recall very well that, when Doctor Banting had found a cure for diabetes with insulin, I myself had placed in the estimates and headed a discussion in this house to have Doctor Banting given a life endowment of $7,000 a year, and it was so voted by this house. That surely is an indication of the sympathy which the federal parliament has with the work of research where it has reason to believe that matters have proceeded sufficiently far to justify making a special grant and special endowment. If the province of Manitoba were to have Doctor Davidson undertake to make a research into cancer at the instance of the province, and he were as successful in his subject as Doctor Banting was in his, I for one would be prepared to ask this house to adopt toward him by way of endowment the same course which it adopted toward Doctor Banting.

I want to advocate here to-day, as I have on previous occasions, that we spend more money for medical research. I think we spend less than $50,000 a year on medical research—which certainly is no compliment to the ability of the Canadian parliament. I think we should spend hundreds of thousands of dollars on research work, and in this connection may I quote the statement of the authoritative journal of the American medical association:

The only hope of solving fundamental problems of cancer lies in research.

I will support any amount of money the government sees fit to grant in cooperation with the provinces, which the Department of National Health and Welfare allows them to do at the present time, for the work of Doctor Davidson and other men who have given their lives to this research.

In conclusion I wish to say that this is not the end. We must have finality in this matter. Casualties of the war have ceased, but the death toll of cancer victims goes without an armistice. I do not believe the Canadian people are satisfied with conditions as they are. They will insist that something substantial, perhaps radical, be undertaken to combat this terrible disease. It seems to me that if we do not undertake this we shall break faith with those 14,000 people who died from cancer last year; we shall dash the hopes of the 50,000 people who are now suffering from cancer in Canada; the death toll will go on, and over 14,000 people will die from cancer next year, with a constant increase in the years to come. I believe that the people will demand action, and that the government will fufil their duty. This is not a partisan matter, and I ask every hon. member on all sides of this house to support me in the appeal which I have made this afternoon.

On motion of Mr. Knight the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie the house adjourned at 5.43 p.m.

Monday, September 17, 1945.

The house met at three o'clock.

WHEAT

INCREASE IN EXPORT PRICE—INITIAL PAYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the increase in the export price of wheat announced on Friday last, will the board increase the initial payment to producers at time of making delivery?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The hon. gentleman gave me notice of his question. As he well knows, the increase in the price of wheat will increase the participation certificates, but no thought has so far been given to increasing the initial payment, and I do not think that will be done.

HOGS

INQUIRY AS TO INCREASE OF BEEF AND PORK CEILING PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance. As the wheat board has announced an increase of nine cents per bushel in the export price of wheat, will the government immediately consider an upward revision of the ceiling price of beef and pork and by so doing help to check the present decrease in the hog population?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): So far as my own attitude is concerned, the answer would be in the negative, and I have every reason to think that will also be the attitude of the government as a whole.

HOUSING

QUESTION AS TO FREEZING OF PLUMBING MATERIALS IN PARTLY CONSTRUCTED HOUSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): Has the Minister of Finance anything further to add with regard to the directive on priorities for ten sets of plumbing fixtures, the request with respect to which was made on Friday?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): The priorities officer of the Department of Munitions and Supply has issued priorities to certain contractors who are building houses for Wartime Housing Limited, for the Department of Veterans Affairs under the Veterans'

Land Act, and for certain other government-approved housing projects. These priorities apply to various building materials and among other things to plumbing supplies. A number of plumbing supplies are in short supply, and in order to ensure an equitable distribution of the balance of the supplies which may be available after satisfying the priorities, and in order to ensure that deliveries to priority holders out of current production do not exceed their current monthly requirements, a plan of distribution has been worked out by the administrator of distributive trades in cooperation with the Department of Munitions and Supply and the priorities officer of that department.

Particulars of this plan were announced to the wholesale plumbing trade by letter on September 10, 1945, and at this time the administrator of distributive trades requested certain information as to the stocks on hand. He considered that in order to protect priority users until the plan became fully effective, stocks in the wholesalers' hands had to be frozen, except for priority users. The question as to advisability of such a freeze was further considered and the decision taken that the freeze was not necessary. On the afternoon of September 11, telegrams were sent out to all the persons to whom the administrator's letter had been addressed instructing them to ignore the freezing direction. These telegrams, in many cases, were received by the wholesalers prior to the receipt of the administrator's letter so that in fact the freeze occurred only in a limited area and there only for a period of not more than twenty-four hours.

There is no order of the wartime prices and trade board conferring priorities with respect to the purchase of plumbing supplies. As stated above, priorities on building materials are being issued by the priorities officer in the circumstances indicated above. Issue of these priorities may mean that persons who have commenced building houses may be unable to complete them through failure to obtain certain materials in short supply, of which plumbing supplies are one, and it may be that it is that feature of the matter to which the hon. member is really addressing himself. That, however, is a matter which is exclusively under the jurisdiction of the Department of Reconstruction and Supply.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

CONSTRUCTION OF HOSPITAL IN MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. P. WHITMAN (Mount Royal): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Is it the intention of the government to proceed with the construction of a hospital on Benny Farm, Montreal? If so, when will construction begin and what class of patients will be treated?

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): It is our intention to proceed with the construction of a hospital in Montreal. The type of treatment and the date of the commencement of construction will be decided this week.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Friday September 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. M. Benidickson for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Bracken, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. R. R. KNIGHT (Saskatoon City): Mr. Speaker, I feel that I should first thank hon. members of this house for extending to me the courtesy which they did on Friday night, a courtesy which was a greater one than I realized at the time. I know now that hon. members were willing to give me an opportunity as a new member to speak without having to make a break in my remarks to an audience which is if anything even more distinguished than the one I was to address on Friday night.

I take it to be a great honour to speak for the first time in this place. I know that hon. members will not have the faintest idea who I am, but I speak here with the consent of the constituents of Saskatoon City. I hold this privilege not, I believe, through any ability or virtue inherent in myself, or because of any failure on the part of the former representative, who was a very popular member of the Progressive-Conservative party, one who was universally esteemed by his constituency, and one who I am sure had won the favour of all those in this house who knew him.

I would say that the C.C.F. candidate was elected in Saskatoon City on a basis of principle rather than personality, because the constituents of that place, like those of many other places in the commonwealth of British nations, realize that progress is on the march to-day, and we cannot stand still in a changing scene or, as the great master of English himself expressed it;

> . . . God fulfils himself in many ways,
> Lest one good custom should corrupt the world.

I was astonished to hear my hon. friend the member for Regina (Mr. Probe) describe Britain as old Tory Britain. I wonder if I might be allowed to digress for a moment to bring before the house a matter about which I feel deeply, and that is with the respect to the participation of school teachers in the public life of this country. May I offer to my hon. friend my sincere sympathy in that the collegiate institute board of the city of Regina has refused to grant him leave of absence while he serves his country in this house. This captain, who for four years, three of them overseas, served his country in His Majesty's uniform, is thus subjected to petty persecution by what are often little men. Hon. members will understand that I can sympathize more readily with my colleague because I myself have suffered to all intents and purposes the same treatment from the high school board of the city of Saskatoon. I say that without any personal animosity, because I say in tribute to that board that its relations with its teachers have always been extremely cordial, and that includes myself. But I am fighting for a principle, for teachers across this land, and I would ask the members of the high school board of the city of Regina whether that is their idea of cooperation with this government or any government in the matter of rehabilitation of our returned men. I wish to go on record as protesting most strongly against this tradition which I am afraid is fostered by school boards across this country, that teachers should be denied the right to take part in public affairs. I protest against this idea that teachers should be regarded as intellectual sissies or mental milque-toasts, in whose veins runs skim milk instead of red blood.

That gallant battalion, the Saskatoon Light Infantry, for all I know is returning to its native city to-day, though it may still be on the water. I do know that the man at the head of that gallant battalion, which fought its way through Sicily, Italy and Holland, Lieutenant-Colonel Walker, was decorated at Buckingham Palace by the king the other day. He is a man beside whom I had the honour to teach; for he is history teacher in the institution from which I come.

I crave the indulgence of the house in speaking of this matter; for I know that it may not be of particular interest to many members, but I wish to get on record the naive statement of the high school board of the city of Saskatoon in regard to myself, in a clipping which was sent to me. I shall read a part of it. The heading in this newspaper clipping is: "Knight granted leave of absence." It goes on to say:

> However, it is stressed by the board that this did not imply he would be reengaged, which matter would depend upon the recommendation of the school principals and the approval of the board and—

Note this:

> —competition with other school teachers at such time as the request for reengagement is made.

Hon. gentlemen can judge for themselves whether that comprises leave of absence.

I noticed in the Winnipeg Free Press a few days ago that Doctor Carlyle King, a professor at the University of Saskatchewan, was attacked by a gentleman by the name of Mr. Paul Prince for participation in political activity. It does turn out, although I do not think this has any political significance, that Mr. Paul Prince happens to be chairman of the Liberal Association in the province of Saskatchewan. I say I do not think that has any political significance, because I would not accuse gentlemen on the other side of the house of condoning any such action. I am pleased to say that the Winnipeg Free Press, which could hardly be considered a non-partisan paper, roundly takes Mr. Prince to task for his attack on Doctor Carlyle King.

As I look round me here I see in this house many ex-schoolteachers, some of them distinguished members of this house. I shall name three. First, my leader, the member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). He himself has had some experience with Regina school boards. Second, the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken), and third, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), sitting on the government benches.

But à nos moutons. I was saying that the hon. member for Regina City had described Britain as old Tory Britain. Well, Tory Britain she has been, but many members of this house, particularly those of the French race, will remember that little incident in "Le Médecin Malgré Lui" de Molière—and en passant, Monsieur le Président, je regrette depuis longtemps que je ne puisse pas parler trés bien cette belle langue—the incident you will remember where the quack doctor, on being taken to task, and that by a lady, for saying that her heart lay on her right side instead of her left, said, "Ah, madame, nous avons changé tout cela!"—and so Britain, too, has had a change of heart.

May I say how much I have enjoyed listening to the speeches in this house? I think the speech with which I was most delighted, that is to say from the point of view of oratory, was delivered the other day by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Lalonde). His speech, of course, was one with the subject matter of which I am not able altogether to agree.

That, I suppose, would be natural, seeing that we sit on opposite sides of this aisle. May I suggest to him that there is much to be said for tradition, of which he spoke a good deal; so long as it does not stand four-square in the path of progress. His viewpoint, I hope, is not betrayed by an expression which he used, perhaps a little loosely, as reported in Hansard of September 11, page 76:

. . . from the highest rank to the humblest labourer. . . .

That a labourer, sir, should necessarily be humble is not a part of the philosophy of this group to which I have the honour to belong. I suppose that the remark was merely a trick of vocabulary; I have no idea that the hon. gentleman intended to put any significance in it. But it shows a tendency to which we are all subject. Another expression which he used, and to which I can heartily agree, particularly in its application to our day, was his remark in French, at page 80, that "il faut enfin, ouvrir les yeux." We must indeed open our eyes, particularly to the inevitability of the social advance of which I have spoken.

I had intended to draw to-day three things to the intention of this government. I do not know whether I have time to cover them, but I shall begin with the subject of housing, which seems to be a particularly popular subject in this house—naturally enough, because it reflects the importance of the subject in the minds of the people. I doubt whether badgering further the minister responsible for this matter will serve any useful purpose. The government seems to be powerless to do much about housing. I say, sir, that it is again a matter of "too late." I would suggest that the housing of the heroes who fought in this war is, or should be, a war measure and should have been acted upon contemporaneously with the war itself. Now we find ourselves in short supply of lumber, plumbing materials and other necessary articles. I do not know the figures, but I do know that you cannot dry lumber overnight; and I will venture a guess—you may correct me if I am wrong—that in 1944, forty per cent of the lumber cut was exported for sale outside this country. To my mind, sir, a part of that—yes, all of it, if necessary—should have been stored and dried for our present-day use.

An hon. MEMBER: What about helping Britain?

Mr. KNIGHT: I doubt, sir, if it all went to Britain.

Mr. COLDWELL: It went to the United States.

Mr. KNIGHT: No one in my hearing in this debate has raised the question why so many people need houses who did not need them before the war. Is it explained upon the basis of an increase in population? I submit that the chief reason is that because of the war people have money in their pockets with which to rent and purchase houses, and they are not prepared to crawl back into holes in the river bank, nor are they willing to go on the marginal farms to which they were sent out of the cities to get rid of them. Having emerged into war prosperity they are not inclined to go back to where they were when a government of the same complexion as this one was in power, or when, for five years previously, the government which was sponsored by the party of the hon. members who sit upon my right was in office.

Much of the discussion with regard to this housing question has been general; I want now to turn to a specific case, namely, the condition of housing or the lack of it in my home city of Saskatoon. There we have those heartrending and lamentable conditions which I have heard described here in relation to other cities. I could tell this house harrowing tales of people living in shack, in granary, in tourist cabin. I know one young woman, whose husband is overseas in the service of his country, who has been living with her little children for two years in a family garage in our city.

I have here an extract from my home paper which a messenger brought to me to this desk the other day. I noticed this:

Great Activity in Housing Deals. Selling Boom. Fifty to 150 per cent More than Normal Selling Price.

For houses. Below that we find these words:

Harder hit, however, are persons in moderate or poor circumstances who have to buy a house in which to live. Nearly thirty per cent of the residences have changed hands in the last year. One hundred and thirty-eight home owners in Saskatoon City are seeking to dispossess their tenants in order to occupy their own houses.

That will give you something of the general picture. In the city of Saskatoon there are some houses being built for returned men under the Wartime Housing Act. When they were in course of construction it was realized that the houses were not at all suitable for, shall I say, that invigorating climate. I have in mind particularly the plans for plumbing. Specifications for these houses did not include any basement, nor did they include plumbing which would comply with the provincial statutes. The city council of Saskatoon discussed this matter sympathetically. They even went so far as to say that on account of the fact that the houses were needed for the returning boys they themselves would pay the small difference required to make that plumbing fit to live with, if I may put it that way. A delegation of members of the city council with the city commissioner came here and interviewed the competent authorities. They urged them to change the blue-prints. They pressed for basements. The committee was told that it was impossible to make any concession in the case of Saskatoon. I would like you to observe the reason: they were told that basement would be too much added expense, and that a man should not be living in a house which was worth more than $1,200 if he were paying only $20 a month for rent. The committee then asked for an extension of, I believe, two feet on the surface wall so that the soldier by his own industry and work could construct a basement for himself; but that too was refused on the ground of setting a precedent for Saskatoon. Of course I was not here, I did not hear this being said; I am merely quoting from clippings which I have before me. Recently the council, when it discovered that the estimate which had been submitted to it was low and that the work would cost more money, refused to put in the added improvements. That was quite within their right, and I heard one of them say at that meeting that the dominion government would have to shoulder that responsibility and the onus of blame for any inconvenience that might be occasioned these men. I suggest that the whole business smacks of unimaginative bungling on the part of the present administration.

The plumbers of Saskatoon now enter the picture. They refused to work on these homes, new ones already built and others which had been planned, and they gave as their reason, quite correctly, that they were anxious to see the finest standard of work put into the houses for these returning men. They did not wish to see the families of these men inconvenienced by reason of bad plumbing, and they refused on that basis and not because of self-interest. At any rate, they refused to do the work. Unfortunately that refusal held up the work in connection with houses into which these people would have gone, people who were anxious to get accommodation under any conditions so long as they had a roof over their heads. And so the plumbers after a short time capitulated, in the knowledge that these houses were needed by these people, who would accept any kind of shelter and who in fact had been living in such places as I have described.

There is one point to which I would call attention particularly, and which to my mind backs up the accusation I have already made, that this government lacks somewhat in imagination. The reason this request was refused was, forsooth, that you could not give Saskatoon something that you were not giving someone else. I would ask this question. If you were sending a contingent of troops away, dividing it and dispatching half to Australia and half to Iceland, and you were not issuing woollen underclothes to men going to the tropics, would you ipso facto refuse to issue woollen clothes to men going to Iceland? If basements are not necessary in Victoria, or for aught I know in southern Ontario, they are necessary in that western climate in which I have lived for the last thirty-five years.

The government boast about their enterprise, about the rights of individuals and about individualism. Well, I would say that we have here an example of uniformity and regimentation. I am afraid that tradition, to which I have previously referred in this speech in another connection, is again apparent. I refer to that tradition which unfortunately has always existed, particularly in regard to the private soldier after a war is over, which tradition was stated, in better language than I have heard elsewhere, in Rudyard Kipling's Barrack Room Ballads:

> It's Tommy this, and Tommy that, an' 'chuck him out, the brute!'
> But it's saviour of his country when the guns begin to shoot.

The subject to which I am now going to refer, and it is a complete change of subject, is one about which the people in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and to a less degree Alberta are seriously concerned. I refer to the Hudson Bay railway and port at Churchill. The people in the western part of the country are disappointed in what looks like government apathy towards this railway and port. For the information of hon. gentlemen here who are not so well acquainted with the situation, I might say that this apathy, or at least this lack of action, has caused the people in the west to form a new association called the Hudson Bay Route Association, with the object of promoting action in regard to the use of the railway and port.

This association and its energetic secretary, Mr. Frank Eliason, have done a great deal of valuable work in the matter of research. The secretary has constantly been demanding action from the Minister of Trade and Commerce in connection with trade for this port. We know the difficulties, of course. We know about the tie-up and so on. But it seems to be difficult to get information about this particular situation.

The Hudson Bay railroad baby seems to have been disowned by the board of transport commissioners and laid on the doorstep of the Canadian National, and so far as I can see at the present moment it seems to be rather a rickety and undernourished baby. Let me warn the government that while I am making no accusation at the present time, there is a distinct and vocal opinion in the western prairies that there is a nigger somewhere in the Hudson Bay railway woodpile.

The latest information I have on the matter with regard to shipping wheat overseas this fall is found mostly in communications from ministers of various departments of the government to officials and private people in the west. I gather that the Park ships with which the government might come to the aid of the project are not equipped with gyro compasses, or are engaged in essential services elsewhere, and I understand that the season is now too far advanced to do anything about it. The absolute limit of sailing is October 10, and, in the next place, any British ships that might have been available have either been sunk or are not properly equipped with gyro compasses. Again it is a question of being too late. Whether the latest in compass equipment is necessary for sailing into this port is open to debate, but if the old pioneers of the country had waited until they could get the latest gadgets there would have been no pioneering and no discoveries.

The question has been asked whether the N. B. MacLean could not be used to lead in sister ships equipped with ordinary compasses through the area of magnetic disturbance, and some people wonder why one mile of slob ice cannot be kept open later than October 10, say to October 31. Whatever the answers to these questions may be, I know that if one hundredth part of the energy and research was put into this matter that was put into certain matters in connection with the war, that route would be in full operation and a solution to most of these difficulties would already have been found. I think it is a case of where there's a will there's a way. We cannot say too much about it now. I realize the season is getting on, but we will look for the government to do something definite about that situation in the year to come. It will be coming up on the floor of the house and in discussions throughout the whole western country.

We should link this matter of the Hudson Bay route with the matter of cooperative trade. Cooperative enterprise is increasing by leaps and bounds in the province from which I come, and I have the honour to have had some connection with it. Cooperative enterprise in Great Britain, Scotland and England, is particularly anxious to promote reciprocal trade. Hon. members scarcely need to be reminded that after this war Britain finds herself in a particularly difficult situation. Before the war years she was greatly dependent upon two things, one being export trade and the other, interest upon her foreign investments. In the great cause in which we have all been engaged, Britain has freely sacrificed her foreign investments, and it is more and more important that she be dependent upon a good export trade. In that, sir, I think we should be very ungrateful if we were not prepared to assist her.

With a view to promoting such reciprocal trade a delegation of cooperatives came to this country some time ago. They were very anxious to ship to us some of their fine goods in exchange for our primary products. And these goods could very readily be shipped—and perhaps this is the nigger in the woodpile to which I alluded before—to them through the Hudson Bay route in the ship which took over to them these primary products. We could all do with some of those fine British textiles at this time. I do not know how other hon. members of this house are equipped for certain items of their wardrobes, but I could do with a couple of shirts myself. I have not had time since the session opened, but for four days before it opened I walked the streets of Ottawa in an attempt to buy two shirts, and was unsuccessful. I think it is about time we had some good British textiles on the Canadian market.

Mr. HANSELL: We cannot afford to lose our shirts.

Mr. KNIGHT: I hope you do not take mine; you cannot, because I haven't any.

I appeal to the government to do something about this matter of reciprocal trade to encourage cooperative trade through Hudson bay. If they are not prepared to do it—and even if they are prepared to do it—I suggest that the better plan would be to accede to the wishes of the Hudson Bay Route Association, to allow a western board to be set up to control the railway and the port, in conjunction with the governments of the western provinces.

Now, sir, being a tyro in the matter of speaking, I have no idea when I started or how many minutes I have left. If I have time enough left I shall go on to another subject which lies very close to my heart, namely, the matter which was introduced here the other day by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny) when he said that there should be some federal aid to provincial education. We have in late years revised many of our ideas in regard to the responsibility of the state to supply this education. To my mind, sir, equality of educational opportunities is the greatest single factor in the promotion of a true democracy. For instance, I believe that the implementation of the new education bill in Great Britain will result to a degree in the lessening of the class idea, in a destruction of the class system which has been for generations the bane of old country life. The solution for the problem of the old school tie, sir, is to make the old school tie available to everybody.

Hon. members are aware that the average per capita taxable wealth of the people of the provinces of this country varies very greatly. This means that in some provinces they have less money to spend on education of the children than in others, and therefore there is inequality of opportunity. The result of the difference is, of course that some children do not get a very good education. I find, for example, a statement in 1944 that one of our Canadian provinces spent $31.70 per child on its education, while another province spent $83.38, a ratio of two and a half to one. We who come from Saskatchewan have had some idea of how that operated during the last depression. To my mind education should not be altogether a provincial matter in so far as finances are concerned. I would not interfere with the study or with the curriculum in the different provinces, nor would I interfere in the administration; but in the the ultimate manner of providing finances for equality of opportunity in the provinces, the dominion government should be standing squarely at the back of the departments of education in the provinces.

In the report of the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations we find this statement:

> The quality of education and welfare services is no longer a matter of purely provincial and local concern. In Canada to-day freedom of movement and equality of opportunity are more important than ever before. These depend in part on the maintenance of at least minimum standards for national education.

Will hon. members note these two words: "freedom" and "equality"?—because education can bring freedom in more ways than one. To us in this little but increasingly larger group, freedom means more than the negative thing of freedom from domination by other people. To us it means the freedom to have the opportunity to live a full, free and happy life. Only by that method can equality be brought about. We believe that all men are equal in the sight of God, not in physical stature, not in intellectual ability, but in the same inherent right to the enjoyment of life.

Equalization of educational opportunity has been achieved in a smaller way in our own province of Saskatchewan with the larger school unit. There, a child who is unfortunate enough to be living on a farm that is infertile or on a farm which is temporarily dried out, has the same advantages provided for him as the child of the wealthier farmer in the same district. He has the same opportunities. That, of course, I shall mention with bated breath, because it is an example of the awful thing which the hon. members in this house so dread. I shall now read a clipping about education; it is as follows:

> Rural Students Get Aid to go to High School
> Fifty cents a day living allowance, payment of fees and free text books and exercise books for pupils in rural areas who attend town or city high school is what the . . . school unit does to aid country youngsters in getting a high school education.

I shall give hon. members one guess as to what province is referred to in this clipping.

Mr. GILLIS: Quebec.

Mr. KNIGHT: The idea that we are responsible for the education of other people's children is still new to some people. I remember just before the war, in the city of Belfast in Northern Ireland, talking to a cabinet minister in the Ulster parliament. We were discussing free secondary education, and I, of course, was advocating it. His position was this. He said: "Why should I educate the children of those people?" Hon. members know the implication contained in "those people." He said: "I have paid for the education of my own children. Why should I give to those people anything more than a mere public school education?" There are more implications there than appear upon the surface. His children went to a different type of school. They received a different and better class of education, and they grew up to belong to a class much better equipped in life than the children who went to the other schools or who did not go to any.

We in this group believe that the answer to the age old question: "Am I my brother's keeper?" is a resounding "yes". We believe in equal state financed education—note, I said, "financed"—both primary and secondary for all the young people in this land.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me add my voice to that of those who have expressed the view that this government is not unwilling but is actually unable, in spite of its good intentions, to bring in the new social order it has promised. It is not prepared to make the economic changes which alone can support the social services which are essential and reasonable. This government represent the wrong party to bring about any vital social changes. They will only bring in halting and grudging reform, compelled to do so by the public will. The task will have to be entrusted to those who have long had the new social order as a vision and a dream, a thing for which they have long striven and prepared.

If you were employing a gardener—and that is spelled g-a-r-d-e-n-e-r—to beautify a piece of ground, would you employ a man who did not like being out of doors, a man who was allergic to the pollen of a daisy, who shuddered before the beat of the wind and the rain in his face, or would you entrust the task to one who loves and cherishes the growing things, who sees in the face of a little flower the very hand of God?

If we wish to write into the book of history the poem of economic freedom and social justice we shall have to choose as its authors those who have long wooed that muse, who have given of their devotion and their toil, like the one of whom Longfellow wrote:

> Who, through long days of labour,
> And nights devoid of ease,
> Still heard in his soul the music
> Of wonderful melodies.

Mr. G. RUSSELL BOUCHER (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, may I join with other members of this house in congratulating you upon your election as first commoner of the country by being chosen as Speaker of this honourable house. Then I think it would be but proper for me, as the member for Carleton county, to make some reference to the passing of a very esteemed colleague who sat in this house for a number of years. I refer to Hon. Norman McLarty, whose untimely death occurred over the week-end. In common with some other members of the house, during sessions of parliament and at other times Mr. McLarty was a resident of Carleton county, and I think perhaps that fact was in part responsible for his good judgment, popularity and pleasant personality, because I think we will all agree that he was an extremely popular member of this house.

I am pleased to see two of my old university and law school colleagues on the treasury benches, in the persons of the Secretary of State (Mr. Martin) and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier). I well remember, during law school days, taking my good friend the Secretary of State aside and urging him to mix political judgment with legal learning and become a member of the Progressive Conservative party. I was not very successful. My friend, I believe, chose the easier way, the way in which there was less competition to reach high rank, the insecure way, and, I feel, the unsound way. He chose the Liberal party. Another colleague of the class of '28, Osgoode Hall, the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), chose the wiser way, the sounder way, with the Progressive Conservative party. Then we are all pleased to see in the press gallery a fourth member of that class in the person of Mr. Frank Flaherty, who has distinguished himself with the Canadian Press.

The war is over now, Mr. Speaker, and we owe our first tribute to our fighting men and women and our war workers. They have won the war; our task is to win the peace. The men who fought our battles overseas and our war workers at home did not choose the easy or secure way. Let us in this house decide now to choose opportunity rather than security and ease. I believe that in the past we have done altogether too much holding out of security, without paying sufficient attention to the opening up of opportunities. We live in a country with vast resources and a comparatively small population, a country where security may not be the greatest thing but opportunity certainly is. Given wise leadership and progressive government, with our energetic people we can have opportunity, and security will follow.

In the speech from the throne mention is made of dominion-provincial relations. We all realize that Canada has become a vast nation and has outgrown the situation that prevailed in 1867, when dominion and provincial rights, duties and responsibilities were dealt with. Reconstruction is needed in our political institutions as well as in the social and economic spheres. I believe a new alignment of powers, responsibilities and duties is long past due. As the premier of Ontario said in his opening remarks at the dominion-provincial conference last month. It is not a question of whether or not this conference will succeed; it is a certainty that it must succeed.

As a member of this house may I first express my hope that the adjustment, modernization and reconstruction of dominion-provincial affairs will be carried out at the earliest possible moment. In that reconstruction I believe we should take it as a first principle that a government should itself raise the money it spends. To me it seems a sound principle of good judgment and common sense, as well as of political economy, that the institution spending the money of the people should raise it from the people and accept responsibility for its expenditures. We have gone through five years of very extensive expenditures, during which both our budget and our taxation have mounted higher and higher and more and more of the income of the people has been taken from them by sources beyond their control, to such an extent that individual enterprise has been stifled and impeded and individual ambition has been impaired. Therefore I believe our first responsibility should be to see that not only in this house but in all the other institutions throughout the country we proceed in the spirit of economy and thrift, instead of keeping in mind the great expenditures we have made in the past.

In connection with dominion-provincial relations I believe we should take careful note of the great work our municipal councils are doing, and should leave them to carry on within their own spheres. I do not believe there is any other elected body in the Canadian or British economy so close to and so well acquainted with the people they represent as our municipal councils. In matters of administration, social reform and economic activities our councils can do a great work, from the humanitarian, the economic and the social viewpoint. Therefore I say that in reframing or rearranging the powers under the British North America Act the municipal councils should play a prominent role.

As a result of the war, and particularly as a result of war production, we in Canada have seen a great centralization of power and authority, not only in the dominion government but also in some of the financial, industrial and economic institutions of the country. Small business men, those seeking to establish themselves in new businesses, undertakings and professions, have found the way difficult. I believe one of our first responsibilities should be to discourage any tendency to greater centralization or to over-centralization, to see that authority, power and opportunity are spread over the lower financial brackets of our people rather than the higher. I believe individual enterprise should be given precedence over corporation control and that the small business man should get much more consideration from the parliament of Canada than he has been given in the past.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it is my view that one of the first tasks to which we should proceed in our post-war reconstruction is the cutting down of the heavy taxation enactments which impose such great burdens upon our people, and at the same time we should give greater opportunities in the sphere of individual enterprise than we have given during the war. Production for other than war purposes has been greatly curtailed and, as the hon. member for Saskatoon City (Mr. Knight) said a short time ago, many of our people desire to have a little more and a little better clothing and other commodities. There are many things our people would like to have, and I believe the time has come when we should see to it that they have those commodities. Production in Canada should be increased as it has never been increased before, as long as we can couple with that increased production a proper distribution of the commodities produced. Distribution has been a problem for the last fifteen or twenty years. During war time we were able to achieve a much more equitable distribution than might otherwise have occurred, and I think we should continue to give our attention, our energy and our efforts to providing a more equitable distribution of these world goods than we have had before.

Research has done a wonderful job in connection with war production. Canadian research is deserving of our highest praise. In increasing intensity the research energies and achievements of the past few years will gradually permeate to the good of the Canadian people. We did not realize the lack of these advantages, but I believe we have now won a name for ourselves in connection with our research enterprises. We know now how lacking we were in proper research endeavours prior to the war. In my opinion this work should be extended very considerably at the earliest possible day. Experimental areas should be set up throughout the countryside. Small experimental plots should be established where the training airports used to be, and there trades, professions and different techniques could be taught to the people in the area.

One of the greatest difficulties in Canada for a good many years has been seasonal unemployment. We should endeavour to cure this difficulty by providing seasonal employment rather than unemployment insurance. I believe a great deal could be achieved if this and other governments within Canada embarked upon the development within the country of little trades, little handicrafts and little endeavours that could be undertaken by these people when their main occupation is not being practised.

This afternoon I should like to dwell upon the idea of a federal area. I regard the proposal as one having to do with a federal area rather than a federal district. I trust that this will not be looked upon as just a city of Canada; it should be looked upon as an area containing the national capital of Canada and demonstrating Canadian aims, Canadian endeavours and Canadian achievements, not only to Canadians but to those who visit our country either as tourists or businessmen or as members of the staffs of the many embassies situated in Ottawa.

I trust that this national area will be considered as an exemplification of the national pride of Canada, as a stimulant to national consciousness of Canadians. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has announced the setting aside of something like nine hundred square miles in the Ottawa valley for a federal area. When we are setting up a federal area I hope that we go cautiously as far the the franchise of the people in concerned. I hope that the franchise will be kept for all the people within the federal area. The franchise is one of the fundamentals of a democracy, and as the government of Canada we should encourage the greater exercise of that franchise and a greater appreciation of its value. In any scheme of federal district or federal area the franchise should be retained for the Canadian people within that area.

The Prime Minister has announced that Jacques Greber is coming to Canada at an early date. This town planner who resides in Paris is to be asked to make a further report on a federal area. As a Canadian I submit that this federal area should be typically Canadian. It should demonstrate Canadian planning to the Canadian people. I believe we have within Canada many outstanding town planning experts and landscaping experts who could give valuable assistance to any person seeking to set up a federal area, possibly even greater than that which could be given by Mr. Greber himself.

In any federal area that is set up, the dominion, provincial and municipal governments should be working hand in hand with the utmost harmony and cooperation. If this parliament sets up a federal area, particular attention should be paid to the exemplification of Canadian art, Canadian ability, Canadian aims and Canadian achievements.

I do not think it would be wise for me to dwell upon the advantages of the Ottawa valley, the Gatineau valley and the Rideau valley as a federal area. The wise judgment of our predecessors who chose Ottawa as the national capital shows that they appreciated the economic, social and scenic advantages of this area. In the Rideau valley, some ten or fifteen miles south of here, there is a fine farm, beautifully landscaped, called I believe Rideau Bend. It is the home of the distinguished leader of the official opposition (Mr. Bracken). I could also take you across the river and show you at Kingsmere the summer home of the Prime Minister, which is not quite so important.

[Mr. Boucher.]

This proposed area of nine hundred square miles will take in portions of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. In setting up this federal area I urge that consideration be given to the differences that exist in the two provinces in connection with property rights, educational administration, customs, and so on. We should retain to each province all its provincial authority and rights and use only its cooperation in the development of this federal area. We should not look upon the federal area just as a city; it should be an exemplification of Canadian life. If we go through the valley, you will find that it is one of the greatest cheese producing and dairying sections in our country. That should play a prominent role in any scheme for a federal area. This area should be segregated into three classifications according to the territory. There should be a park area, retaining the natural beauty which has been bestowed upon this country. There should be an urban area, representing man's moulding of nature to his requirement for homes and habitation. There should be a rural area representing man's moulding of nature to the production of the necessities of life.

It will be noticed that I have not mentioned an industrial area. The Ottawa valley has abundant resources in power and raw materials; it has great transportation facilities, and with its nearness to larger centres it could become a great industrial community. But whoever chose Ottawa as the capital of Canada did not contemplate the development of an industrial area. Ottawa and the Ottawa valley have willingly forgone industrial development so that they might fit properly into the sphere of a national capital, and they wish to continue so. I shall not dwell at greater length on the industrial advantages or disadvantages of this area.

The beauty of the Gatineau park area can best be appreciated, as well as the beauties of the Gatineau and Rideau rivers, by taking a drive in any direction from Ottawa when the leaves are turning in the fall. Hon. members will be astonished by the gorgeous beauty of the landscape, the beautiful foothills of the Laurentians and the scenic beauties of the three streams. I think that the park area, in these days at least, should remain in the background until more important developments are undertaken in our federal district.

I do not intend to dwell on the urban area. Suffice it to say that all members of the house realize the congested condition within Ottawa. The city has outgrown its present boundaries. It is confined within altogether too narrow a space. It badly needs expansion. The housing situation is acute. Our transportation and water services should be extended into the suburban areas. Then take the railways. It is a disgrace to any nation to permit railways to cut across a city as they do across the capital of Canada, dividing it, interfering with its traffic, interfering with its planning, interfering with its development.

In Ottawa the government have built numerous temporary war buildings on some of the finest sites in the city. But we have not improved the old buildings. If any hon. member will go through the west block or the east block or the Langevin block or the Daly building he will notice that there is great room for improvement in the conditions under which employees, yes, of the government of Canada, have to work. I shall not elaborate on that.

We in Ottawa are proud of our war memorial. But if you walk down to the war memorial at almost any hour of the day you will observe a scene of traffic confusion and congestion where one would expect to find a scene of peaceful, reverent memories and reflection. I believe that right now something should be done to improve conditions around the war memorial, built as it is of stone and brass and bronze, so that we could commemorate our heroes of the last war in a more fitting atmosphere. Let us take a lesson from that, and in future build a memorial to the achievements of our heroes of this war and our war workers and their contribution to the cause of individual liberty and of peace by demonstrating within the federal area what Canada as a growing nation is and aspires to be. We have a great community here. We have ambassadors from nearly all the countries of the world. We have trade commissioners, industrialists, distinguished visitors in all walks of life who come to Ottawa for a little while and then go back, taking to the various countries of the world their impressions of Canada and Canadians. Let us think of that in the planning and developing of our capital city.

I should like to discuss for a few moments the development of the rural sections of the federal area. The dairy industry is one of the greatest industries in our rural sections. But we have found that with the development of mechanized farming, the one-hundred acre farm,the efficient unit of bygone days, is now being replaced by larger farms. In our suburban areas we find also small holdings of from one to five or twenty-five acres. I think we could do a great deal to develop small holdings around our Canadian cities, and particularly around our national capital. With the increased knowledge of soil productivity that we have to-day, and the increased use of commercial fertilizer, and improved farming methods, I am confident that many families in our suburban areas could earn a substantial livelihood close to our cities, where labour is convenient, and there could successfully grow various fruits and vegetables and raise pigs, poultry, eggs and other farm products.

We could also do a great deal to counteract the present tendency of people in the agricultural areas moving into the congested cities, leaving the farms vacant and adding to the housing shortage and labour surplus in the cities.

I believe that trade schools should be established in the federal area. Many of our returned soldiers—and this part of the country has contributed generously to the armed forces—could be settled on experimental stations or on small holdings or established in trade schools, teaching and receiving instruction. That would be a good example of what Canadians can do in post-war reconstruction. We have in Ottawa, the seat of the national capital, many skilled technicians and many members of the learned professions, arts and sciences working for the dominion government who could assist in building up this federal area and developing it along truly Canadian lines.

Our reward would be great. There is no question about it that tourists would compensate us adequately for any expenditures made, and there need not be any great expenditure. The tourist trade could be attracted to Canada and be much developed. Canada needs a national consciousness, a national pride. But something is required to develop a national spirit within Canada. How can we do it better than by properly planned development within the federal area? I believe that the development of a federal area is a matter to be considered and planned for now. The actual development would be spread over the years to come. We cannot have it all now; we would not want it all now, but I do believe that with the location we have here and with the national capital here we should plan wisely, plan now and plan well. I believe that we could establish a fitting memorial to our war heroes and our war workers much better by demonstrating and promoting a new Canadian nation at peace and in prosperity than we could by commemorating their achievements in any monument of stone and mortar, brass or bronze.

Mr. L. A. MUTCH (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, as this is the first opportunity I have had to address the house since the conclusion of hostilities, it is perhaps most natural and certainly most fitting that my first remarks should express the pride of the community from which I come in the achievements of her sons and daughters during the long period of the war, and in particular to express the thought which I feel sure is in the hearts of everyone from Winnipeg and Manitoba particularly, and that is the gratitude that we all felt in the realization that the survivors of the Hong Kong expedition, the Winnipeg Grenadiers, are for the most part once more in the hands of friends and in the process of being restored to their families at home. I could easily elaborate on the theme of the contribution of the community from which I come, but that story, the story of four gallant regiments serving in different fields and in all the ancillary services, is one which is written in the hearts of everyone who comes from Manitoba and the west, and is one which through history will be made known to generations yet to come. It so happened that in the early stages of the war regiments from that city were early engaged—at Dieppe, at Hong Kong, and then with the first division in Italy, and the impact of casualties came quickly and fell heavily on that area, more so perhaps in proportion to the population than elsewhere. However, the war is over and the problems which confront us today, while they are connected with and complicated by our experiences in the war, are separate and distinct.

Before proceeding, however, I think it is a good practice, and one which has been honoured during my time in the house, at the beginning of a session to say something about the constituency from which one comes. There are those who think of their constituency in terms of its scenic beauties, of its manufacturing capabilities, of the raw materials it produces. But during my period in public life my interest has been chiefly concerning persons rather than things material; and when I think of the constituency which I have the honour to represent I confess I think of it in terms of the people who inhabit that constituency. Perhaps it is worth mentioning that in the last election no less than eight of my own constituents were candidates for membership in this house. I am glad that some of them were elected—not, of course, the ones who opposed me; I could not have welcomed that with the same enthusiasm. I might even say quite frankly that I am glad some of them who contested other ridings were not elected. But I think it is indicative of the type of citizenship in that community that so many were found suitable as candidates in the province of Manitoba.

The constituency has been indirectly honoured in at least two other ways. I think it most fitting that I should mention a former constituent of mine who has been signally honoured by the people of Canada since he left that constituency, and I take the first opportunity I have had in this house to tender my personal congratulations to the leader of the opposition for his election to a seat in this house. I have never in my political experience, so far, indulged in personalities, and very seldom in pleasantries at the expense of individuals; but I see no reason why one should not pay tribute and acknowledge anything he may owe to anyone. For that reason I think I should say to the hon. gentleman who now leads the Ontario party in this house that I am under a sense of personal obligation to him, perhaps in two ways. When he accepted the leadership of the Progressive Conservative party and left the city he relieved the housing situation to such an extent that I am now comfortably esconced in the house in which he formerly lived. In the second place, I think his contribution to the leadership of that party materially assisted me in my return to this house.

I should like to refer also for a moment or two to one other former constituent of the constituency of Winnipeg South, the brilliant young gentleman who moved the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Back in 1935, when first I was a candidate for the House of Commons, the gentleman who now represents Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) was one of the exceedingly bright young men who interested themselves in that campaign for the return of the Liberal party. I was the fortunate beneficiary of his enthusiasm; and perhaps—I do not say this too solemnly—when he decided to move to Kenora-Rainy River and help to spread the leaven of western liberalism in the province of Ontario, it may have been—I do not say it was—a fortunate circumstance for me, because even at that time he was obviously one who was ticketed for a career in politics and eventually membership in this house.

I have in the constituency of Winnipeg South an organization which from time to time has been prominent in the news and for a long period of years has been prominent in the economic life of the west. I refer to the Winnipeg grain exchange. Some days ago, when the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair), in seeking leave to introduce a bill, spoke of his enthusiasm for doing away permanently with that institution, I resolved to do something which I have not done during the period I have been here—to refer to an institution specifically and say something on its behalf.

The Winnipeg grain exchange has been investigated by royal and other commissions more than a score of times within my own memory, and without exception it has been held to be making an important and worthwhile contribution in the marketing of the products of the prairies. During the whole of that period it has been a simple matter in some sections, and in some areas it still is, to get an audience and a sympathetic hearing by detracting from that institution. It is made up of business men who know their business and perform a useful service. Whether the method under which they operate is one which commends itself to all citizens of Canada is a matter of opinion; but certainly I for one am serving notice that, while I do not appoint myself a defender of the institution, I get a little tired of the suggestion that there is something reprehensible about a type of organization which has performed a useful task, which has taken its share of the community load in every enterprise for community welfare, whose members have been doing a legitimate business and have endured without undue complaint very considerable sacrifices not only in this war but in one other war; who have gone on and made a contribution and have kept their contracts. I suggest that we might do well, with respect to any organization, to attribute to those who are doing a business which they believe in, conscientiously and honestly, at least the same sense of public service and the same sense of morality which we attribute to ourselves.

It is only a short time since the election, and I do not propose to repeat here for the benefit of hon. members who were not able to take part in my campaign, or to hear it, my campaign speeches. I know it is a time-honoured practice at the opening of a new session, and there are a large number of questions in which other hon. members, my constituents and theirs, are particularly interested. I might conceivably use all the time at my disposal to speak to the house on housing, on old age pensions, on reduction of taxation, on rehabilitation, on reconstruction, but at this time I feel that the constituents of Winnipeg South are well aware of my views with respect to each of these admittedly important questions.

During the campaign I argued for, expounded, defended and upheld the policies of the present administration with respect to each of these questions adding from time to time those qualifications or extensions which I myself felt should be added to or subtracted from that programme. I am not prepared, two or three weeks after the house has met, before we have had an opportunity to assess the problem in the light of the sudden termination of hostilities, and before the legislative programme of the government has had an opportunity to be tested, to elaborate on each on any of these at the present time. I mention them simply because, before I pass on to the one subject which I do wish to discuss for a few moments, I do not wish to be reminded that I rose in my place in the house without giving any indication that I was aware that these problems did exist. I gave plenty of indication of that during the campaign. I think perhaps I have given ample notice to ministers concerned both of my own interest and of the interest of my constituency in these matters. I shall be here continually and I shall be reminding them continually both of the needs and of the aspirations of that constituency and of the province from which I come.

I was and am primarily concerned in the problem of the highest possible degree of employment in the dominion and the maintenance of the highest possible standard of living. I was struck, when the member for Carleton was speaking a few minutes ago, by his relationship of two words, because I wrote down three or four words to guide me when I speak to you to-day, two of them in the same relationship in which he used them. Those words are opportunity and security.

I have been concerned throughout the whole period of the war, during my association with thousands of young men, with the degree to which particularly the younger people of our country had become what I dislike to call security minded. I had always thought of Canada in much the same way that my father thought of it when seventy-four years ago he left Scotland as a boy to come to Canada—that is, as a land of opportunity. I know it is the policy in some quarters, with some types of politicians and with some parties, to ridicule the idea of the country as a land of opportunity and to magnify the pitfalls that lie ahead of us, and to exaggerate, if that be possible, those dark days behind us and to capitalize continually upon the natural fear which such conditions have engendered in the public mind. I wish it were possible for those earnest, hard-working souls who do that, to be patriotic enough and unselfish enough to devote to the rebuilding of confidence, particularly in the young people of the country, something like half the energy which they now devote to frightening people so that the emphasis might once more be placed upon opportunity rather than security.

I was struck by the fact that this goverment, committeed to the highest possible employment and the highest possible standard of living, had omitted to mention in its first speech from the throne, a question which I think is inextricably interwoven with the possibility of carrying out that programme, namely, immigration. I am convinced, from my knowledge of the development of Canada as well as of the United States, that it is for ever impossible to maintain the standard of work and of living which we as Canadians demand for our people and ourselves under the condition of settlement which exists in the dominion to-day.

In 1937, standing in this house, I said, if I quote myself correctly, that ten million people could not forever hold half a continent in a land-hungry world. Since that time we have engaged in the most devastating war in all history. Since that time we have seen areas formerly prosperous and populated destroyed by war. We have millions on the march, incapable of easy reestablishment where they are. At the same time we have something which we did not have when I spoke in 1937, and that is the experience of the last five years in our relationship with the United States.

I can go to areas on the Red river in Manitoba where men engaged in various types of farming, small-holding farming, have always their best years when they have a poor crop, a short crop, which is easy to handle and when prices are high. The capabilities of developing small holdings have been considered and experimented with by the Department of Veterans Affairs, and the possibilities which should be a real part of any high employment and higher standard of living have been explored; yet many areas which are suitable for the purpose are ruled out from the probability of successful large-scale development by virtue of the paucity of population.

I believe that we in Canada to-day have the opportunity to do in twenty or twenty-five years something which it took England seventy-five years to do, and which under the open-door policy, it took the United States fifty years to do, and that is to double our population and multiply many times our national income. I believe we should be thinking about it and should be doing something about it now, because I do not believe that if you separate from the present day programme a very much broaded policy of immigration and a realistic attitude towards export trade, you are going to achieve the goal towards which we have set ourselves and which is demanded of us.

In Canada we are singularly fortunate in some respects from the point of view of the resumption of immigration into this country. We have an over-all labour shortage in Canada to-day, we are told. Certainly there is a labour shortage in the unskilled labour group, and if anyone thinks there is not a labour shortage in the highly skilled groups I suggest that he consider some of the trades which are currently operating in Canada and which have not been able, through the apprentice system in the last ten or twelve years, to train any considerable number of men. If you go into the composing room of any publishing concern in Canada and count the number of men in that trade who are under fifty or even fifty-five and compare that number with the group who are fifty-five or over, you will realize that that is one trade where there is a real shortage and where there will be a greater shortage of skilled men. If you want a cabinet maker, as sometimes one did when materials were available and adequate, a man capable of doing a finish job—I am not talking about someone who can wield a saw and call himself a carpenter but one who can do a finish job—I believe that if you found out how few men of that type there were under the age of fifty-five you would probably be shocked.

I suggest that there is plenty of room both at the lower level of unskilled labour and at the top level of those who are highly skilled. That being so, we can easily begin at an early day a much accentuated immigration which will not only not deter those at present living in the country from proper rehabilitation but will assist them very materially, because it is established in the experience of the world that immigration does not result in lower wages.

We are fortunate in another respect. Those of us who are old enough to remember the days of mass immigration and the policy of the open door know that there was a waste of natural resources, that there was failure to utilize to the fullest extent those very lands and those natural commodities which were sometimes uneconomically developed. In Canada to-day the natural resources of the country are in the hands, not of the dominion government sitting down in Ottawa far away from somewhere, but of the provincial governments who are on the spot and who know or should know the probabilities in their local provinces. In addition to that, we are not faced with, as were the earlier pioneers and the immigrants, the problems of transportation and supply which were great deterrents in those days. In Canada to-day we have multiple systems of transportation spanning the country east and west and in the air north and south, providing all the facilities which are required for greater development. We have government facilities, we have transportation facilities, we have our undeveloped natural resources, and we have those who are responsible for stewardship of them on the job on the spot.

In addition we have a condition in labour which is out of balance, because we have a superabundance of what one might call semi-skilled labour. There are those who say when men walk out of an aircraft plant or some other place where they have been doing semi-skilled work at high rates of wages for a considerable time that they have to go back and take what they can get in some other place. That is not always possible. It is not always possible for this reason: during the period of that development—some of it mushroom—during the war, unskilled workers came because they were required. They found employment in the industries of war in which they worked. It is true they were paid higher rates of wages than they were able to obtain as unskilled labourers in other places; but these men have made commitments. In the city from which I come it was impossible during the last four years of the war for a man coming in there to do a job such as I mentioned to find adequate housing for himself anywhere within the limits of where he would be required to work, unless he bought a house. Many of these people bought houses at prices which were perhaps higher than the property was worth in terms of the type of money that that man might hope to make in the work he formerly did. It may be all right to say to a man who has been laid off in a plant that he will have to go to work for less money in another area, but it is no use saying it to him that he can sell his house. If he can sell his house he may recover what he has put into it. But does anybody know where he can get shelter for his family unless he purchases another house in the town to which he goes? Certainly that is true of the west, and where would he find it?

It must be realized that many of these men are not so much victims of the fact that they refuse to work for lower wages than they were getting during war time, as they are of the fact that it is economically impossible for them to maintain the existence of their families at the present time at that rate. Yet, if we are to assume that it is the responsibility of governments—or even of society, to make it more general—to see to it that a man gets a job which will provide for his family—and it will be a contract whether society is represented by the municipal, provincial or federal government—then that man must accept the converse of the picture. A man who admits that society should provide him with a job must be prepared to go where he is sent and accept that which is given. If that is not done, then the contract falls down.

I do not think it would be possible to return immediately, or perhaps ever, to a policy of open door immigration; but I do believe a larger population is essential for the long-term success of that which is the ideal and hope of every decent Canadian in parliament and out of it, namely, the maintenance of a high standard of employment. A decent standard of living and high rate of employment will not be realizable until our population has increased to the point where we have a better balance between the home market and the foreign market. We live, and we may as well realize it, in an unsettled world. We have had to rely on conditions over which we had no control for too much of our prosperity which comes from outside markets through the medium of trade. Therefore I urge on the government and on those who understand the situation in Canada that we begin to think about it. I urge that we not only think about it but that we talk about it and that we do something about a policy and a programme of immigration. To-day Canada is recognized as something more than one of the small nations, although we are not yet in the secure economic position of a great nation. If we hope—and we do hope—to preserve our place, if we expect to be able to play the part which destiny seems to have cast for us among the nations of the world, then I think that to-morrow is not too soon to begin to think about that development.

I remember with pleasure and I recount with pride the record of thousands of sons of immigrants from all the different nations of the world who played a part the equal of that played by anyone else in the war which has just ended. One has only to look over the casualty lists or the roster of any unit going from that part of Canada which I know best, the west, to realize that in their thousands the sons of our immigrants of the last thirty years played an exceedingly important part in the war effort of Canada.

I was pleased when the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) delivered his maiden speech the other day, designed, and properly so, to bring a measure of comfort to representatives of minority groups, many of them the first generation children of immigrant parents, and to strike a blow, perhaps not as necessary as he appeared to think, and to go on record for the strengthening of the position of all minority groups within the fabric of Canada as an individual nation. The speech was calculated, and commendably so, to please those who in large part sent him here. Despite the fact that we disagree on so many other things, I have no hesitation in associating myself with the sentiments of his remarks, namely, that it is important at this time that we develop a real Canadianism. It is more important at this time than it has ever been, because we have engendered in Canada during the war a sense of appreciation of each other, a sense of comradeship, a sense of citizenship, which was not possible before; and if it slips away from us now it may not be easily redeemable in the near future.

I dissociate myself from some of the criticism in the hon. member's remarks of specific institutions. I dissociate myself for the reason that I have not certain knowlege. I have, however, no hesitation in saying that as a Canadian I will be found associating with anyone, in whatever party he happens to be, who does anything he or she can do to make of Canadian citizenship a living, vital thing in the life of this country, perhaps because I had the opportunity to teach in days gone by; I escaped sooner than some of my hon. friends; perhaps because I have had some association in business and in politics with original immigrants themselves; perhaps because I am, as I have said, the son of an immigrant. I have knowledge of the contribution these people have made, and I have a profound belief in their possibilities for the future. I have the most devastating contempt for people who try to draw the line in any sense as between citizenship of one group of Canadians and that of another.

What has this to do with immigration? Simply this: that when we come to face that question, as we shall have to face it; when we come to the time when we want to make this a real, vital department which will contribute materially to the development of the Dominion of Canada, I hope we shall not resort to the subterfuges to which all parties have resorted in the past, in an effort to draw a line between races on the basis of occupation or for any reason other than their health, their ability, their readiness to work and their desire to become Canadians. I think of those people who stood at the borders of Mexico in years gone by, refugees if you like, seeking to escape into the United States and Canada. That is the attitude of mind which I think we must cultivate toward this country.

I have spoken longer than I had intended, but there is nothing in which I am more interested than in this question.

I have noted with gratification the plans of the government with respect to a national flag and a national anthem. I do not have that gratification because I personally feel the need of either. As far as I know I have not in my veins any blood but Scots, and the present flag and national anthem have been adequate for me during my lifetime either as a soldier, or as a civilian. But I think there is something more important, whether or not I have been able to make it clear this afternoon, and that is, the welding together of the people of this country and the millions who I anticipate will come here. I believe a national flag and anthem can be a focal point for the drawing together of all our people, whether or not I like it or some of our confreres from other provinces like it. I believe the matter transcends personal feelings. I think it is something to which we can anchor the sentiment and feeling of the people who are here and those who are yet to come.

One final word and I am through. In spite of the better judgment of most Canadians there still exists in this country a racial prejudice and discrimination which I utterly despise. It has raised its ugly head in one particular manifestation against which I wish to protest at this moment, not to this house but through this house to the people of Canada. There is a tendency in some districts and some places, in some firms and, I am sorry to say, in some professions—I am particularly sorry to include the professions because we expect a higher standard of humanity and understanding on the part of professional people than from ordinary mortals engaged in business—toward an exclusiveness which has never been understandable to me and which I do not believe is in keeping with British or Canadian traditions. It is being extended even to keep out those who have served this country on the field of battle, in the air and at sea. It has arisen and is still arising with men and women being excluded from certain professions and businesses because of their racial origin. I believe the people of Canada should take steps to end that sort of discrimination right now. We have an opportunity to do so in this parliament, not only because many of us are new and have nothing behind us to live down; not only because some of us have been here for a while and have seen these problems arise, but because throughout the country there is an awareness of the fact that things cannot be as they were and a desire that all may share in the building of a better Canada.

When I commenced my remarks, Mr. Speaker, you were not in the chair. Before I resume my seat I should like to extend to you my congratulations and to express my personal satisfaction on your elevation to the position of first commoner.

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to offer you my congratulations on having assumed your high office; it is indeed a pleasure to me, having been a personal friend of yours for some time. Perhaps I am more interested than some other hon. members. Some two years ago, when you represented the constituency of St. Mary, I remember that you came to me, as representing a farm riding in British Columbia, and asked if I could find employment in my riding in far off British Columbia for your son during his school vacation. At that time I could scarcely understand why you should want to send your son at tremendous expense to a farm in the fertile Fraser valley, and asked for the reason. You explained to me that you wanted your boy to be among the finest Canadians and in the finest part of Canada. I wondered why the boy should be sent across Ontario and the vast prairies to the Fraser valley, and only the other day I discovered the reason. We in British Columbia are very fond of fruit. The other day I went down to the market here in Ottawa and bought a basket of peaches. Now, having seen the peaches they grow in Ontario, I can understand anyone crossing this province to get to British Columbia, where we have the finest of standards not only for fruit but for all farm produce. That is why the best markets in the world are open to British Columbia. If any hon. members dispute that statement I want to show some of the peaches I bought in Ottawa for $1.25, marked "grade No. 1."

An hon. MEMBER: Pass them around.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I should be glad to pass them around to hon. members from Ontario. Here they are, covered with beautiful pink gauze. They look lovely; they look ripe and fresh. But let me take off the pink gauze and show hon. members from Ontario what you are selling as No. 1 peaches, and I think you will understand why anyone would want to move to British Columbia. These are not from the bottom of the basket; they are from the top. Fortunately for me this morning a friend of mine sent me a crate of peaches from Keremeos, British Columbia. There we do not sell them covered with pink camouflage, in an almost fraudulent manner; we sell them by the crate. I want hon. members to look at them; these are the smallest ones in the box.

I should like to congratulate the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) on the forceful way he read his address. I am glad we now have a leader of the opposition who at least can be heard in this chamber, and I hope the cabinet follow his good example. I want also to sympathize with the hon. gentleman on the poor material which he had to read. Bracken House must have had an off day that day.

Now I want to speak to the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell) and to congratulate him on the very fine way he delivered his address. I am in a good humour to-day, congratulating everybody. He spoke in the manner we expect of him; always fair, always courteous and always interesting. I also extend my congratulations to the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Low) on the forceful way he delivered his address. As usual, and after having listened to his predecessor for some years, I still have not the faintest idea what his platform is.

I will move on to the mover (Mr. Benidickson) and the seconder (Mr. Langlois) of the address in reply and congratulate them on the honourable positions they hold and the right they have to represent their particular forces in this house.

I should like to say a word to the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes). We in British Columbia are proud of the fact that so many winners of the Victoria Cross during the present war come from that province. Five out of the eleven winners in Canada come from British Columbia. It is an honour to this house, not merely to the opposition party, that two winners of the Victoria Cross share the same desk. I am sorry to add that this is the only parliament in which they will have that unique honour.

The hon. member for Nanaimo is a gallant soldier and I believe he will always fight for the rights of the soldier. I agree with what he said the other day that it was not fair, just or sporting for a soldier in Canada to be discharged so that he could shop around and secure a job while other men were still serving overseas. I agree entirely with him, and no one in this house is better qualified to speak about that than the hon. member for Nanaimo. That is exactly what he did.

Mr. GREEN: Pretty cheap stuff.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: With 245 seats to choose from he decided to contest the seat of a member of parliament who had distinguished himself in this war by winning a decoration for gallantry and who was still serving overseas. That was the position when the hon. member secured the nomination in that riding.

I should like to say something about demobilization. I have heard about demobilization all across the country. I believe and always will believe that the fairest way is to demobilize on the basis of first in, first out, except on extremely compassionate grounds. I presume it is the policy of the opposition, as it was the policy of the leader of the opposition before, to want to have every one in uniform and at the same time he was complaining bitterly because fishermen's sons and farmers' sons were being called up.

They also put up a fight for housing and housing immediately. I commend them for that and I am willing to support them in every way possible. However, I cannot understand their attitude in demanding housing and housing immediately and then attacking the government for discharging skilled tradesmen from the active army in Canada in order that they may go to work constructing these houses. That, in my opinion, is not consistent.

I should like to make a suggestion to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Abbott). When he starts demobilizing I think he should consider demobilizing all the brass hats we have parading around this country. They are really not parading because these admirals and generals and air commodores are generally being driven around by beautiful C.W.A.C's. When they are discharged I know of an excellent place for them to retire to in British Columbia, one of the most beautiful spots in the country, a place called Duncan. There is wonderful scenery, wonderful fishing and the climate is magnificent. It is an ideal place for them to retire to, because as you drive along you will see that each and every mail-box has the name of an admiral or a general on it. There is no one beneath the rank of major. I remember after the last war a man from my company retired out there and he painted his mail box "Private Roy Brown" and immediately there was an investigation into what he was doing there.

I should like to compliment the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) upon having brought so many outstanding young men into his cabinet. I am sure the other members of the cabinet will forgive me when I say that in my opinion the present Minister of National Defence is one of the most outstanding young men we have had in the public life of Canada for a long time.

I want to commend the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Merritt) for making one of the very few good suggestions we have had from the other side in connection with housing. I consider it is the only good suggestion we have had. He pointed out that there was a bottle-neck in connection with housing. We in British Columbia have heard about that bottle-neck. Whether or not it is true, the story is that certain mills have in storage large amounts of flooring and other lumber being held for higher prices. We are told that certain firms have plumbing fixtures and electrical equipment which they are holding. I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard who suggests that some authority should be sent in there to go to these firms and, if it is found that they are holding back supplies, order them to release them at once.

There is another thing this authority could do. Many individual contractors who are building houses for soldiers find that they are unable to get priorities. I think a soldier's house should be given every priority, whether it is being built by private or government contractors.

I wish to say a word about labour, in which I am very much interested. In this connection I am speaking particularly for the benefit of my C.C.F. friends who seem to think they have a monopoly of the desire to work or cooperate with labour. There are in my riding some 2,000 members of a local union. I know every one of their leaders and organizers personally and I have always found them willing to cooperate. They have always been ready to sit down with me to work out any problem. I do not always agree with them and they do not always agree with me, but we have always been able to get together to try to arrive at a solution. I cannot understand why firms and individuals cannot adopt the same attitude. I am proud of the fact that the labour political action committee in British Columbia endorsed George Cruickshank, the only member that was endorsed by organized labour in that province.

I should like to show the house how our employers are ready to cooperate. While mine is mainly a rural riding, I have one logging company that produces one million feet of logs a day. Any hon. member who is familiar with logging knows that is real logging, and that is just one concern. Every man in the employ of that company was hired at the union hall, and the member for the riding had something to do with that.

I should like to commend the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) for what he has accomplished, and in doing this I realize I may be antagonizing a little support in my own province. I think I speak for the benefit of hon. members and certainly for the benefit of the members of the legion in my own riding. When a member comes here he sometimes forgets that he is just one member out of 245; he feels that he is going to set the world on fire, that he is going to accomplish wonders. Even the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) thinks that, but he will be disillusioned before very long. I want the members of the legion to realize that the Minister of Veterans Affairs, or any other minister, is merely one minister out of twenty and sometimes he cannot accomplish all the things he wants to accomplish on behalf of the veterans or anyone else. When you have been a minister of the cabinet for a short time you realize that there is another little select committee to be considered. I do not know who they are and I do not think they know who they are. It is called the treasury board. If you can overcome the treasury board you will get what you want. They have a committee over there called the Graham Towers Gordon committee, and that must be overcome.

I started out to commend the Minister of Veterans Affairs for consolidating all veterans' legislation into one act. This will assure that the orders in council will all be carried out so far as veterans are concerned. However, I should like to suggest to him that he has not gone far enough. During the election campaign he stated that a committee would be set up to study the Pension Act and other matters pertaining to veterans. I hope he will see to it that the War Veterans' Allowances Act is discussed and that the means test is abolished.

I should like to refer briefly to old age pensions. While there has been a move in the right direction, there is still a long way to go. I do not believe it is sensible, wise or economical for the country to wait until a man has one foot in the grave before he is given a pension. It has been suggested that the means test will be abolished in connection with old age pensions, and I repeat it should also be abolished in connection with veterans.

I wish to say on behalf of my riding a word in connection with meat rationing. I do not know whether it is necessary or not, and I should like to hear some explanation from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). I think I know as much about it as the Globe and Mail, and I am certain that I am looking at meat rationing from a different viewpoint from that of Mr. McLean of Canada Packers. I believe that this country is justified in asking for an explanation from the Minister of Finance as to the actual need or otherwise of meat rationing. The hon. member for London (Mr. Manross) commented the other day on the lack of ability or knowledge of many of the officials of the wartime prices and trade board. I can agree entirely with him because I noticed that many of them offered themselves as Conservative candidates and were to become cabinet members if that party were elected to power.

I believe that we have a sufficient market for some time to come for all our farm produce, but I believe it is the duty of every member of parliament, whether he be a supporter of the government or of the opposition, to see to it that farm prices are maintained at a reasonable and stable level. I believe that it is the duty of every member of parliament, and I hope that members on the other side of the house will follow through on this, to see that co-operatives' development is not hindered by taxation or in any other way and that every effort at cooperation be encouraged and assisted in every way.

I believe that one of the things in which the government has fallen down is that too little attention has been paid to our greatest source of income, a source that can bring us in a tremendous amount of money with very little expenditure. I refer to the tourist trade. Probably I am prejudiced, coming from British Columbia, but I believe that there is nothing that we can sell so easily to our good friends to the south as our tourist attractions. I do not think the federal government has yet done its duty by the various provincial governments in connection with the tourist trade. Let me mention one small way in which the federal government can help, and this affects my riding and probably every riding in British Columbia. That is by contributing, and contributing heavily, to any highway leading into British Columbia from the international boundary, to connect up with the transcanada highway, which must be completed as a postwar project.

I wish to say one word in connection with the party I support, and the principles for which it stands. I believe in free enterprise. I believe that free enterprise can and must succeed. I believe that if free enterprise fails, it will not be because the soap-box orators cause it to fail, but because of the abuses of free enterprise itself—the actions of such concerns as American Can, Canada Packers and other monopolies. It is the duty of the government to see that free enterprise is given a fair opportunity, and such monopolies as I have mentioned should be treated as a contagious disease and be quarantained by government order.

In conclusion, I wish to commend the Prime Minister for having set such an excellent example in the brevity of his speech, and I hope it will be followed by all my fellow members from British Columbia.

Before I sit down I would remind the house and particularly my own party and the government that the people of British Columbia will not permit the return to the province of the Japanese.

Mr. G. S. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to extend my congratulations to you on your elevation to the high office you now hold. I am sure you will fill this office with dignity, distinction and merit. I should also like to congratulate the mover (Mr. Benidickson) and the seconder (Mr. Langlois) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. They are new members of the house, lately members of the armed forces, and it was only fitting and proper that they should be chosen for this signal honour. It was a fitting tribute to them, one which I hope will be followed in this country. There are many members of this house who have seen service in world war I or world war II. This is all to the good because it assures that the house will have many members who will see to it that the rights of the returned soldiers are fully protected.

Several speakers taking part in this debate have made reference to the supremacy of parliament. They have asked that the supremacy of parliament be restored to this parliament. It is a subject in which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has always been much interested. On many occasions during the last parliament he made reference to the supremacy of parliament. He said that parliament was supreme, that only the people themselves were supreme over parliament. Yet only a few days ago, in this very session, the Prime Minister rose in his place and tabled another large batch of orders in council, one of a succession of thousands of orders in council which have been tabled in the house on previous occasions. Many of these orders in council were passed while the house was in session. Many of them even changed the provisions of statutes which had been passed by the parliament of Canada. Hon. members who were in the last parliament will recall that on occasion after occasion this parliament was denied information on many subjects, and always there were standard excuses: first, it was not in the public interest to give the information; second, it could not be given for reasons of security; third, the British government did not wish the information to be released. I will cite only one example.

The war expenditures committee sat behind closed doors for several years. The members were sworn to secrecy, so that nothing could be discussed in the house. I would ask the Prime Minister to state on an early occasion whether or not it is his intention again to set up a war expenditures committee. If so, let its meetings be open to the public and the press.

In the short session of last March we had another example. Everyone knew it would be necessary to call parliament; yet the call was delayed and delayed and parliament was not finally summoned until March. Surely, after the retreat of General McNaughton from Grey North parliament could have been called. When parliament was finally called, no opportunity was given for any debate on the address. The session was very short. Absolutely no opportunity was given for any discussion or examination in detail of expenditures under the war appropriation bill or under the civil estimates. Despite that, huge sums were voted. But, Mr. Speaker, there was plenty of time to discuss whether or not Canada should accept the invitation to attend the San Francisco conference, an invitation which everyone here was most willing and anxious that Canada should accept.

Only a few days ago the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) asked the house for the appropriation of a very large sum, again without any examination of any of the expenditures. No doubt next month he will again ask for further appropriations, still without examination. Surely, now that the war is over, the time has come when all the rights and privileges of parliament should be restored to it, and government by order in council should cease. No longer should this country or the Canadian people be regulated and controlled by boards and commissions not responsible to parliament.

We had an example during the last few days in this house. We read in the press that the wartime prices and trade board had passed an order whereby certain plumbing fixtures had been frozen. The Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) said on Friday in the house that there was no such order. That was repeated to-day by the Minister of Finance. But we have read in the press that there is such an order and that such an order is here to stay. Surely, Mr. Speaker, if the Prime Minister who has always paid so much lip-service to the supremacy of parliament, really believes that parliament should be supreme, by his own actions he should restore these rights and privileges to this parliament.

Much has been said in this house with regard to housing. I concur in the remarks made by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) who so well presented the facts in that regard. To-day we see in Canada the tragic result of government planning as far as housing is concerned. Thousands of veterans are returning daily, with no suitable housing available. We hear much of what is known as low rental housing and housing at moderate costs. Frankly, in my opinion there is no such type of housing; because when you consider the huge increase in the price of building materials, the high wages paid to members of the building trades and the great scarcity of building materials, it is simply impossible for the returning veteran or the average wage-earner to build a house for himself or to buy a house which can be referred to as under low housing. Many of the houses being constructed for veterans are too small, and lack many conveniences; yet the prices, which range from four to six thousand dollars, are certainly beyond the purses of a great many of our returning veterans.

Here I should like to say a word on behalf of that much-abused person known as the landlord. Apparently it is almost a crime for anyone in Canada to own and rent housing accommodation. Landlords have been held up as being almost monsters; and I would point out that the traditional rights of landlords both in equity and in law have in many cases been ignored, because they have lost all control over their property. They cannot deal with their property in any way without first obtaining permission from the rental board. The landlord cannot raise his rent because the rent is frozen; yet in many cases tenants will sublet part of the rented property. The poor landlord then can only apply to the rental board, and any increase he receives is very small. The landlord is bound to keep his property in a proper state of repair, and yet no attention is paid to his pleas. Building materials are not only scarce; they have also greatly increased in value. Wages are high. If he repairs his property he is then in difficulty with his income tax return, as to whether the repairs will be classed as such or treated as a capital expenditure. To-day a man purchasing a house in Canada for his own use and that of his family cannot obtain possession; and I would point out that this is a typical example of the bureaucratic methods of this board.

This order applies to all Canada, even to small villages and hamlets. It may be necessary in some larger cities, but I say frankly that in many towns and villages no such order is necessary. Under a former order, where the tenant was given six months' notice during the summer months, he was amply protected. Apparently the board forgot that owners of realty and landlords are the pillars that support the municipalities with their taxes. I suggest to the minister that he give serious consideration to an amendment of this order whereby, in places with populations of less than ten thousand, any man who purchases a home for his own use shall be allowed to obtain possession of his property within at least a reasonable period.

The speech from the throne refers to the beautification of the city of Ottawa as a "national" war memorial. Well, perhaps it is commendable to beautify the capital city, but to consider such a scheme as a national war memorial is entirely another matter. I point out that this is a typical example of the methods adopted by the Prime Minister. His announcement of the proposed plans to beautify the city of Ottawa as a national war memorial were made just on the eve of the opening of parliament. According to press reports the French architect who devised the plan started some years ago has already been communicated with and asked to come to Canada to further these plans. I might pause and say here, Mr. Speaker, that if a war memorial is to be erected in the name of Canadian soldiers, surely in this land of Canada there can be found an architect clever enough to devise and carry out such a plan. I would ask the Prime Minister whether, before he made this decision, he consulted the legion or any other veterans' organization, or if he consulted any body of citizens whatever. Certainly he never consulted the members of this house. The citizens of Canada who have to provide the funds for this plan should have at least something to say as to what shall be the nature of the war memorial. No one will attempt to deny that at any rate the war veterans should have something to say in these all-important matters. After all, the city of Ottawa is a very small part of this great dominion. Millions of Canadians have never been to Ottawa and never will be here. And, frankly, what benefit will the beautification of Ottawa be to the veterans? They will never be here to see the beautiful scenic drives which will be planned around the city of Ottawa and the suburbs. Such a plan will not help to reestablish the veteran in civilian life; it will not help him to get a job, obtain proper housing, educate his children or earn a living. I am sure that if the voices of the Canadian boys who were left behind at Hong Kong, in Sicily, in Italy, and on the continent and other spots of the world could be heard in this chamber they would be raised in condemnation on any such war memorial to be erected or carried out in their name.

Any national war memorial should be of such a nature that all the citizens of Canada will benefit from it; that the youth of our country, the children of veterans, will benefit and that generations yet unborn will receive some advantage.

No sum has been announced by the Prime Minister as the probable cost, but one may judge from pictures that have appeared in the press, the sum that will be expended will run into many millions. I would suggest to the Prime Minister that whatever sum he has in mind to be spent on a national war memorial for Canada, this money be placed in a trust fund and that the income from that fund be used annually for scholarships in every university in the dominion, these scholarships to be open to all Canadian boys and girls. From the modest sum of $5 million, which is probably only a fraction of what this memorial will cost, the annual income at three per cent would exceed $150,000, and even this small sum would be the means of assisting from 150 to 200 boys and girls each year in furthering their university education. This fund would continue in perpetuity, and in the years to come thousands upon thousands of young Canadians would benefit from Canada's national war memorial.

Who can say but that from among these young Canadians who would be benefited in this way there might emerge some young scientist, some medical man who might happen to find the magic key to unlock the secret to the cure of cancer and many others diseases which to-day baffle the medical profession? Who can say but from among these boys and girls in the future there might emerge a surgeon whose skilful hands would bring restored health to many? Such a plan might produce a composer who would write a symphony that would outrival those of all the old masters, or an artist whose skilful fingers and whose brush might leave behind a legacy of beauty in colour for the whole world. Such a plan might produce a musician or a singer whose trained hand or voice would bring pleasure to millions.

The possibilities of such a plan are unlimited, and I am sure that the boys whose names this proposed memorial is to be erected to commemorate would approve it. I say to the Prime Minister, in all sincerity, I hope that before this plan is made final he will consult not only veterans organizations but all the Canadian people and the House of Commons as well; for, after all, Mr. Speaker, this is not a pressing matter. Even as late as last week the daily press of Canada was still publishing casualty lists.

I wish to concur in the remarks made by other speakers in this debate as to the need for a reduction in the present income tax, and I would point out to the new Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) that under the system which has grown up in the district income tax offices they send to the taxpayer an assessment form in which they merely set out the amount of assessment, the amount of extra tax, the penalty, the interest and the date on which it must be paid. They give no explanation, nor do they show in any way how the assessment is arrived at. Furthermore, in many cases these assessments are not made for years, and when the poor taxpayer does receive the assessment he finds that the income tax people do not believe in three per cent; they charge five or eight per cent, and there are certain penalties.

I contend that in all cases where there has been undue delay on the part of the department in making assessments, the taxpayer should not be penalized either in interest or in penalties; for it is not enough for the department to say that it is the duty of the taxpayer to make out his income tax form correctly before it is filed. To-day, with the continual changes in income tax and the complicated form and the various regulations, who can say when he makes out his form that it is correct? I have found in my experience that in many cases I have had chartered accountants make out income tax returns which have come back as incorrect.

I suggest that the exemption for single men should be raised to $1,200 and the exemption for married men to $2,000, with increased exemptions for dependents.

The speech from the throne mentions a charter for veterans. As my leader well pointed out, the mere amalgamation of the acts and regulations affecting veterans will not improve or change in the slightest degree the operation or the benefits of these acts. If there is to be a veterans' charter of even the slightest benefit to the soldiers I would be all for it, but I say to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) that if we are to have a veterans' charter, that charter must mean something. I suggest to him that the very first clause in the charter should provide that every returned veteran shall be given a decent job at a scale of wages that will enable him to support himself and his family with a good standard of living. Let the second clause of the veterans' charter provide that the veteran shall be furnished with proper housing at a cost within his means. If we are to have this charter for veterans, let the charter amend and rectify the many inequalities that exist in matters relating to veterans' affairs. Let the so-called preference in the civil service for veterans really mean something, and let it apply to veterans who have actually seen service in the field of battle. Let there be an adjustment in the matter of clothing allowance whereby veterans shall receive $100 clothing allowance irrespective of the date of discharge. Let there be provided an adjustment in the difference of the amounts paid officers to purchase outfits. Let the scale of pensions, which has not been revised in years, be brought up to a proper level to measure up to 1945 conditions. This grateful country still pays a veteran with 100 per cent disability $75 a month, and anyone who has had dealings with the pension board will bear me out when I say that when the Canadian pension board rules that a veteran has 100 per cent disability he certainly has 100 per cent. Let this charter provide that the pension board shall accept the category of the soldier on enlistment as his true and correct category and that any lower category on discharge, or any disability, be taken as due to war service. Let the charter provide for a speeding up in the handling of pension claims, and let it provide for an end to the continual fight by the private soldier against the pension board to establish his right. Let the charter provide that in all cases of doubt the benefit should be given to the returned soldier. I know the minister is probably thinking there is such a provision now, but let it be actually put into operation. Let the charter provide that the insurance principle will be reinserted in the act. Let the veterans' charter provide that the Pension Act will cover all men in the armed forces who receive injury, that such men be entitled to the full benefits of the act, and that no one should receive a pension at the discretion of some official of the board or subject to any regulations. Let all the charitable provisions be struck out of the act, and in particular I refer to section 11. Most important of all, let the veterans' charter proclaim that the veteran is entitled to these provisions and benefits as a matter of right and by statute.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, if we are to have a veterans' charter, let us have something more than a mere amalgamation of the various acts. I would point out, as I mentioned before, that it is the duty of all hon. members who have served in either war to see that the rights of all veterans are fully protected.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) stated, as reported at page 39 of Hansard:

> . . . only one government remains in power which dares to admit that it is Conservative, and that government can be found in the province of Ontario.

Well, I hardly need to remind the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar what happened in the Ontario election of June 4 to the party that he leads. That demonstrated plainly that it had no place or room for socialism.

An hon. MEMBER: Good old Trestrail!

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): The methods adopted by the socialist party, along with their communist friends, in the provincial legislature was just too much for the province of Ontario to swallow.

On the same page the hon. member made reference to his pleasure in referring to the vote that his party received in the dominion election of June 11. Speaking for myself and my own riding, I can tell the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar that my riding did not vote for his candidate nor did the soldiers vote for his candidate. When the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was making those remarks I wondered if there did not run through his mind the speech that he made on the floor of this house in September, 1939, the day that war was declared, when he advocated that there be no participation by Canadian troops overseas; that our efforts be confined to economic aid. I wondered if he recalled the day that the vote was taken in this house on bill No. 80, the bill which would provide that our troops overseas would have proper reinforcements. On that occasion the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and every other hon. member of his party voted against the bill. I wondered if the same hon. member recalled that in the short session of November of last year when the reinforcement crisis was at its height that he and his party supported the half-hearted measure of the government. Was he more interested then in the fact of seeing that the troops overseas were adequately supplied with reinforcements, or was he and his party seeking and trying to obtain votes in the coming election from members of the N.R.M.A., the pacifists and other isolationists?

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer briefly to the amendment moved by my leader. I would point out to hon. members, and especially to soldier members who conscientiously have the interest and welfare of their former comrades at heart, that they cannot vote against this amendment because, if they do, they will clearly show by their vote that they are content, that they approve and uphold the method and manner in which the government is demobilizing the men and women of the armed forces; that they approve the lack of planning by the government to provide jobs at fair wages for service personnel and war workers, and, further, that they are content with the housing situation which confronts Canada to-day. If you, soldier members, vote against this amendment, how can you then face or attempt to explain to the service personnel in your own riding your absolute disregard for their interests? I intend to support the amendment.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. F. D. SHAW (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, before proceeding to the discussion of certain issues which I consider to be of vital and immediate concern, I should like to make brief reference to a statement or observation made by the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. White) during the course of his address this afternoon. In referring to the proposed beautification of our national capital as a fitting memorial to those who sacrificed and died during this war, the hon. member declared that in his opinion we should give some consideration to utilizing the services of a Canadian architect. That suggestion brought to my mind the thought that the memorial we have in this city to those who gave their all in the last war was designed by Englishmen, the March brothers. Possibly I should say first that the site for the memorial was selected, as we know, by a French town planner, Greber by name. The stamp commemorating the unveiling of the memorial was engraved in New York by an American. It is said that Canada's part was the pouring of the cement and the paying for the memorial, with interest. Since the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has frequently indicated his interest in the advancement of Canadian art, I would suggest that we might give consideration to the suggestion advanced by the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough.

This parliament, Mr. Speaker, now faces that world for which the toil, the sweat and the tears of six savage war years were expended. This twentieth parliament is assembled at a time when the thoughts of Canadian men and women are turning away from war and being centred upon that new freedom and that new security so often referred to both within and without this house. It has been said, and I concur in the view, that it is a time of new life and new hope for which millions fought and died. I realize that no man can properly foretell what the future may hold, but those of us in this group believe one thing is self-evident, namely, that within the hands of those here assembled rests the power, or better still the means whereby most if not all the hopes and aspirations of our people can be translated into realities. Once that translation is complete, we can truly say to those who have sacrificed, suffered and died, "It has not been in vain." Those lads who went forward from our constituencies did not go to preserve that way of life which all too many of them knew. In my estimation they went to do battle that we might have one more opportunity to build for peace, for security and for real happiness. Each member who sits in this house does so by virtue of the acceptance of a certain challenge, and I say that challenge is to assist in making this country a nation worthy of their magnificent courage and heroic sacrifice. This is a collective responsibility, and I believe we should all appreciate that fact no matter where we may sit in this house. The task will not be an easy one, but certainly there is no one here who would say it is insuperable. Time alone will answer the question whether we are worthy of the confidence placed in us.

Before proceeding to the main subject I propose to deal with, namely certain policies of the War Assets Corporation in the disposal of what is sometimes regarded as surplus, obsolete or valueless equipment, I desire to devote a moment or so to another matter which arose at the time of the election and which, by virtue of the circumstances surrounding it, we found ourselves unable to answer at the time. I have no particular desire to endeavour to exhume certain things from the past, but where those things have a direct bearing upon the future I feel quite justified in bringing them forward. I have in my hand a clipping from an Alberta newspaper dated May 19, and headed, "Social Crediters assailed by King." I am informed that this is the report of a closed meeting, a meeting attended by invitation only. I would ask if the applause at that meeting was rehearsed, as I am told it was on another occasion. According to this report, in connection with our so-called opposition to government financial policy the Prime Minister said:

> I do not hesitate to say that the policies of the Social Credit group, if followed by any government would, in no time whatever, lead to a worse depression than we had in the 1930's.

In that connection I have before me a statement made by the Prime Minister just ten years ago, relating to those so-called proposals which we have advocated in the field of finance. We agree with the correctness of the statement made at that time, when he said:

> Once a nation parts with the control of its currency and credit it matters not who makes the nation's laws. Usury, once in control, will wreck any nation. Until the control of the issue of currency and credit is restored to the government and recognized as its most conspicuous and sacred responsibility, all talk of the sovereignty of parliament and democracy is idle and futile.

Nothing much more than that is required in defence of social credit monetary policies. Sometimes we are obliged to wonder what has happened to the Prime Minister during the last ten years. Who have been responsible for changing his mind and his views, because we feel that he was quite sincere in his beliefs in the observation he made at that time.

Another statement included in this press report is as follows:

> In the years they have been in parliament, the Social Credit members have consistently ignored—I might go so far as to say they have denied—the vital necessity of external trade to the prosperity and welfare of Canada and particularly of Alberta.
> In a world that is steadily shrinking and where the interests of nations are becoming increasingly one, they continue to preach national self-sufficiency and economic isolation.

May I say with all the vehemence at my command that we have never in this house or out of it preached national self-sufficiency or economic isolation. It is true that during the early years of the war we protested most vehemently about the shipments of scrap metal and wheat to Japan. Surely the Prime Minister would not regard that as a denial of legitimate trade. We also protested about the shipment to Germany of planes, plane parts, air engines, automatic pilots, compasses and so forth by certain countries which were called our allies, such materials being used to bomb Chinese women and children at a time when governments were patting the Chinese upon the back and commending them for their magnificent struggle. We condemned such shipments. Surely that is not regarded as a denial of legitimate trade. I could give other instances.

At the same time we condemned the fact that the financiers within Britain, within the United States and undoubtedly within our own country were advancing the financial means that made it possible for Japan, and for Germany, to produce many of those commodities which were used against us, against the Chinese and against others. That cannot be regarded as any denial of legitimate trade. When this report in which this accusation was made appeared our leader, who is now a member of this house, issued a statement to the press. That statement contained the stand which we have taken, do take and will continue to take with respect to this matter of trade. May I be pardoned while I read this report, which is as follows:

> "It is not true, as the Prime Minister said, that Social Credit members have consistently ignored and denied the vital necessity of external trade to the prosperity and welfare of Canada and particularly of Alberta," Mr. Low asserted. "The Prime Minister is well aware of the many times Social Credit members have put themselves on record in straightforward, single barrelled language—a thing he never does—as favouring the development of Canada's trade with other nations to the utmost of our possibilities and that with an eye to the peace and welfare of Canadians as a whole. Social Credit members have always advocated making it possible for every nation to have access to a fair share of the world's trade and have consistently supported any fair and honourable attempt to extend Canada's cooperation into the shrinking world community of nations that this access might be made possible.
> "It is quite understandable, of course, that a training in the psychology of scarcity has made it impossible for the Prime Minister to understand that what Social Crediters have always fought for is the proper evaluation of foreign trade. We are determined to see to it that the standard of living of the Canadian people is not kept down to a poverty line level —as it has been in much of the time under Mr. King's ministry—by gearing our whole economy to the needs of foreign trade. We will continue to fight for keeping production high, for the release of the abundance we do produce, so that our own Canadian people can enjoy as much of it as they want; and for trading the real surpluses of our production to other nations for their surpluses on a mutually satisfactory basis. We are quite well aware that trading as freely as possible with other nations will add to the variety of things Canadians can enjoy and will make possible more steady employment for our people, provided exports are matched by imports. But in our cooperation with other nations, Social Crediters hold that Canada must not part with her sovereign integrity to any centralized, 'supra-national' government, such as the Prime Minister seems to wish to do.
> "Thinking Canadians are becoming more and more convinced," Mr. Low continued, "that the volume of international trade for Canada which Mr. King talks about so much can never be maintained for any length of time at all unless Social Credit monetary reform is applied in our dominion by a thoroughly democratic government. Further, the Prime Minister is not the only person in Canada desirous of peaceful cooperation among the nations. We are all heartily sick of war and the terrible carnage it has wrought throughout the world. But Mr. King somehow overlooks this fact—peace cannot be built by force. It must be induced. Its foundation must rest in the well-being and happiness of every human family. No form of internationalism, power politics or dollar imperialism can possibly compel human satisfaction and therefore peace among human beings."

I regret taking the time to read all that, but it certainly denies the accusations made at a time and in a place where we could not answer them. There is only one other reference I wish to make to this press report. It states:

He did not believe Social Crediters had spoken the true voice of Alberta in parliament.

I wonder if he realizes, now that he has lost five out of the seven members he had in the province, that we are quite justified in saying that we do voice the views of the people of our province?

A matter to which I wish to give some attention is the disposal of certain crown assets. During the past year or eighteen months there have emanated from different sources a number of reports having to do with the wanton destruction of useful and valuable crown assets purchased during the course of the war and disposed of later. We had complaints with respect to the Alaska highway. The people out west are still not satisfied that they got the facts as the facts should be presented with respect to what happened there. Certain reports came out with respect to the destruction of air frames and other parts of aircraft in Calgary. I cannot say that I am completely satisfied with the nature of the so-called investigation that may have been conducted, or with the statements that the government issued from time to time from certain of its offices. The Alaska highway was some distance from my constituency; Calgary was a matter of eighty-five or ninety miles away, but I woke up one morning to find that there was a complaint with respect to this same thing happening in my own constituency, namely, at Penhold No. 2 technical signals unit. I received delegations of civilian employees from the Penhold air school and I received reports from service personnel at the airport. Not desiring to seek publicity with respect to the matter, not desiring to embarrass any department of government or the government itself, I did not run to the press to have this thing carried across Canada. I worked very carefully and conducted a personal investigation. When I was satisfied that all was not well I wired the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe). Three days later, on August 28, I received the following wire:

As no report of surplus involving radio equipment at Penhold has been made am referring your telegram to the Department of National Defence for Air.

[Mr. Shaw.]

That made me wonder because I recollected that War Assets Corporation was set up under the guidance of the Minister of Munitions and Supply, who piloted the measure through the house, bringing the corporation into legal existence.

On August 31, I received a wire from Royal Canadian Air Force headquarters in Ottawa, advising me that a senior officer from headquarters in Ottawa had proceeded to Penhold to make a thorough investigation—I emphasize those two words "thorough investigation"—and report back to headquarters here. I considered it strange that an officer of the Royal Canadian Air Force should be sent out to investigate the Royal Canadian Air Force. It does not seem to me completely correct.

On August 28, I was advised by one of the service personnel at Penhold that an order had been issued to halt the destruction. After all, that was the thing I was concerned about, plus what I hoped would be a proper type of investigation.

Quite unknown to me the M.L.A. for Banff-Cochrane was also conducting an investigation into certain reports which he had received respecting Penhold. I did not meet him until after I had wired the Minister of Munitions and Supply. Mr. Wray advised me that he had wired almost everywhere but had become entangled in what appeared to be the spider-web of government red tape. No one seemed to know who enjoyed, if I may use that word, the responsibility of dealing with this matter. The local office of War Assets Corporation at Calgary disclaimed any knowledge of there being surplus goods or that destruction was going on at Penhold. Mr. Wray gave his statement to the press because he did not seem to be able to get to the bottom of this after endeavouring to communicate with responsible officials in the east. He was anxious to have destruction halted.

Mr. Wray in his statement to the press charged that the destruction of materials having a value, let us say, in educational and other fields was going on at Penhold. He charged that J. H. Ross, who had been appointed liaison officer between War Assets Corporation and the provincial departments of education had not been consulted. He charged, moreover, that the local officer of War Assets Corporation was not aware of what was going on.

The Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Gibson) gave out a public statement in answer to the charges contained in the paper, and his answer in actual words, was:

Perfect nonsense. The air force destroys nothing of value.

Possibly others would have given a similar answer. But the answer was not correct, as was subsequently shown.

On August 28, Mr. Wray received the following telegram from Northwest Air Command, in Edmonton:

Air Commodore Tackaberry proceeding from this headquarters to Calgary by air to-night. Will contact you within few days.

Air Commodore Tackaberry, I understand, was on the special duties list at Ottawa. On two occasions Air Commodore Tackaberry himself stated in Calgary that he was not out there to make an investigation at all, that he was there merely to visit the station, look around and report back to his minister, and then an investigation might or might not be ordered.

Air Commodore Tackaberry proceeded to Penhold and stayed there a very short time, surprisingly short, as a matter of fact. I should like to know the exact nature of the investigation that he made at that point.

Later, on September 5, the Minister of National Defence for Air issued this statement, which was carried by the Canadian Press:

Air Minister Gibson announced he had received a report from Air Commodore Tackaberry concerning peace-time destruction of certain air-borne equipment at No. 2 Technical Signals Unit of the R.C.A.F., Penhold, Alberta, and said that though the original value was approximately $600,000 the actual serviceable parts would not exceed a few hundred dollars. Mr. Gibson said surplus was turned over to War Assets Corporation, and War Assets Corporation gave the order to destroy.

I believe he also stated at the same time that the cost of extraction exceeded the recovery value. But this is the point. I am not concerned whether it was one hundred dollars worth, one hundred thousand dollars worth or one million dollars worth of equipment. It is the principle which I think is the extremely important factor. The Minister of National Defence for Air had stated previously that it was perfect nonsense to say that this material at Penhold was being destroyed. But his own statement later indicated that materials were being destroyed at Penhold. For that reason alone I believe that the general public demand which existed out there for a proper investigation into what was going on should certainly have been met.

I have a couple of editorials here one from the Red Deer Advocate. The city of Red Deer is very close to Penhold airport.

An hon. MEMBER: That is a social credit paper, isn't it?

Mr. SHAW: I would not say that. I do not always agree with its editorial policy. It is not an official C.C.F. publication but the editor throws his weight that way. It is not a social credit newspaper. The editorial says:

Will the Government Never Learn?

There just doesn't seem to be any way to teach the federal government that the people of Canada will not stand for usable goods being destroyed by service units on instructions from Ottawa. We had it on the Alaska highway, we had it again at Currie barracks, a few months ago, when aircraft were burned, and now we have it again at Penhold. Mr. Wray's statement, which the Advocate reprints in part on another page, with its own story of the Penhold activity, is but a further indication of the complete lack of perception shown by the highest authorities. What Ottawa cannot seem to grasp is that the people of Canada, who paid and paid willingly for the best possible equipment for their fighting forces, are determined that any of that equipment no longer useful in the service must be made available for civilian purposes. They are not prepared to see it destroyed. This is not to say that any large sum of money is involved in the present destruction of unrepairable instruments at Penhold. The second thing that Ottawa apparently cannot understand is that the public are entitled to know what is being done with the equipment they paid for.

They go on to suggest:

Much, if not all, of the present bother at Penhold could have been avoided if a small group of people, which might have included F. D. Shaw, the federal member; David Ure, the provincial member; J. H. Ross, the liaison officer between War Assets Corporation and the department of education; a commercial radio engineer, and a few newspapermen, who represent the public much better and more often than the said public ever imagines, had been invited to visit Penhold first.

I agree with the Red Deer Advocate, not necessarily with the personnel suggested, but that the public should be fully and completely informed whenever destruction of this sort is to take place. The editorial goes on to say:

If this group or one like it had been given the opportunity to look the stuff over and hear why it was being destroyed, and had seen the job done, they could have and certainly would have told the public exactly what was happening. But no, Ottawa just couldn't do it that way. They have the thing done privately where none of the public can see what goes on, and naturally there are fireworks. The government attitude is wholly indefensible. They have had warnings galore, and yet they persist in doing just what the public rightly dislikes. The guilt does not lie at the door of the air force, the Advocate believes—

That should give the minister for air some comfort:

—as it knows for certain that a large number of officers and airmen deplore the present action just as much or perhaps more than those of us outside the service. The responsibility lies higher up, and in this day of representative government, the man who must carry it in the last analysis is the Prime Minister (Mr.

Mackenzie King). Hon. Colin Gibson's reply of "perfect nonsense" to Mr. Wray's charges is not an answer, nor will any air force inquiry do. Nothing short of a royal commission, where service men can give their evidence under full protection, will meet the situation, and it should be set up at once.

There is another editorial here from one of the Calgary papers, very much in the same vein.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there are two or three questions which I should like to put to the minister at this time, without of course expecting an immediate answer. Maybe it is fate, and maybe something else, but one of the ministers happens to be following me this evening. I should like to know:

First, whether or not all airforce contracts with manufacturers contain the clause that this equipment would be destroyed and not allowed to flood the markets.

Second, are all so-called surplus goods, or goods without commercial value or obsolete goods, inspected by a representative of War Assets Corporation? If not, what is the exact procedure in all cases of disposal?

Third, what claim have educational institutions to materials declared surplus, obsolete or without commercial value? What procedure is carried out with respect to such institutions acquiring these materials?

Fourth, since, as was demonstrated at Penfold, branches of the service are granted authority to dispose of crown assets, is a complete inventory of all surplus assets retained by War Assets Corporation?

I might add one more: do they also keep a complete inventory of the goods which have been destroyed?

It was asked in the house the other day if a committee would be set up during this session for the purpose of examining into the operations of War Assets Corporation. I believe the Prime Minister indicated that he would give consideration to the proposal. I am not objecting to the setting up of a committee to examine into the operation of War Assets Corporation; in fact I welcome it, although I must confess that I cannot be extremely enthusiastic about what might come out of these deliberations. On behalf of those I represent, because of the feeling which has grown throughout the west with respect to certain destruction, I would urge on their behalf that a royal commission be set up, and that destruction be halted. There is no need for any great rush, with respect to the destruction of a great many of those commodities.

I consider it my duty to bring this matter forward, because evidently it has been closed by the authorities that be, and we are not at all satisfied that the Royal Canadian Air Force should investigate the Royal Canadian Air Force and report in favour of it or in any other way, and then have the matter regarded as closed. I am going to leave it just at this point, because I have one or two other matters with which I should like to deal.

Much has been said in this house with respect to controls. The view is held in my part of Canada that we recognize and appreciate the necessity of the government proceeding with caution in the removal of certain controls which have been in effect during the war. But there is also this feeling that, with the war once successfully concluded, new controls and restrictions, with the army of civil servants necessary to administer and enforce them, should be avoided at almost any cost. Canadian people are heartily sick of government controls and what is often referred to as bureaucracy. During war time—I think I am fair in making a statement of this kind—those whom we presume to be our servants have in effect, become our stern masters. This is a position which I am afraid many of these individuals will be loath to see reversed. New controls certainly tend to perpetuate the powerful bureaucratic setup which some might argue has been a necessity during war time. The longer this set-up remains, the further away will be any reasonable reduction in the strangling rates of taxation. I read in the press recently, and I concur in the view expressed, that Ottawa bureaucracy has no monopoly of intelligence, judgment and foresight in this country. It should and must be the duty of each and every member of parliament to demand and fight for the restoration to parliament of that legislative authority which they alone should possess. It astonished me when, some few years ago, the decision was handed down, I believe by the Supreme Court of Canada, that these boards possessed legislative authority. I said to myself at that time: good-bye, parliament. I urge, Mr. Speaker, combining with my urging a recognition that there are certain conditions which could develop and which we must guard against, that we remove at the earliest possible opportunity these controls which have borne us down during the period of war.

I wish to say one word to my hon. friends on my immediate right. During the past more than five years that I have had the privilege of being in this house, I have heard constant and repeated references by them to socialism as being something new. I have always held the view that socialism is in reality as old as the hills. In my opinion, democracy still remains the greatest and most radical venture of mankind. Self-government and the right to conduct enterprise freely and privately are still the revolutionary idea. The regimentation of socialism is in truth the call of dark reactionism back to the days when there was a planned economy, a strange mixture of the aristocracy and the guilds. They are endeavouring to impress upon us that they are advocating something new, but in fact it is something which, if one looks upon it from the point of view of its age, should have been pensioned a long time ago.

In my references earlier to the disposal of surplus crown assets I hope I made it abundantly clear that I am just as much concerned about this matter as are my constituents and others across western Canada. I have tried to be completely fair in my presentation. I merely suggest to hon. gentlemen that they examine what I have put on Hansard and ask themselves if they would be satisfied to permit this matter to stand where it now rests.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply and Minister of Reconstruction): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I wish to add my congratulations to those that have been given to the mover and the seconder of the address. Both are new members in the house and both distinguished themselves by the manner in which their presentations were delivered.

I am very glad indeed that the mover of the address comes from northern Ontario. In fact, his constituency adjoins my own, and I am perfectly satisfied that the representation from northern Ontario, which in my opinion has always been able to make itself felt in this house, is further strengthened by his presence in this parliament.

I had not intended to take part in this debate. In the ten years I have been in the House of Commons I have never participated in this particular debate. Like most of my colleagues I am always glad to see the debate finished in order that we may get on with the more serious business of the session. However, two or three hon. members have asked that some members of the government tell them the score, and therefore I am very glad to do what I can to tell them the score about the work over which I am particularly responsible.

I wholly concur, Mr. Speaker, in your advice to the house that speeches should not be read and I have no intention of reading my speech; but since I desire to cover a good many subjects to-night, I trust you will not object too seriously if I occasionally refer to my notes.

The government's reconstruction plans for the immediate post-war period were outlined in a white paper presented to parliament last April and later were set out in more detail in the proposals of the government submitted to the recent dominion-provincial conference on reconstruction. The plans outlined in the white paper are now being put into execution and I consider that the results to date are reasonably satisfactory.

At this moment we must recognize that only one month has elapsed since hostilities stopped and only two weeks since the Japanese surrender was signed. During the past month war orders representing production having a value of approximately $150 million a month have been cancelled. It is not unnatural that the inevitable dislocation resulting from these abrupt cancellations is causing some uneasiness among the workers. At this time, when we are reabsorbing workers laid off from industry, we are also called upon to absorb men who are being mustered out of the armed services at a rate approximating 5,000 a month. This is certainly the testing time for reconversion plans.

I see nothing disturbing in the present situation as far as employment is concerned. The official labour report of September 7 shows a net labour demand of 132,520 men and women, and unreferred applications for employment numbering 73,150.

An hon. MEMBER: The same locality?

Mr. HOWE: Not exactly. All Canada is the locality. During the first week of September the net labour demand actually increased by 6,000. The number of unreferred applicants is, of course, too high and is an indication of the time lag required to fit workers into new and suitable occupations. I would further point out that even in the periods of the tightest man-power situation the unreferred applications in the Department of Labour have never fallen below 25,000 and the figure usually stands around 35,000, so that the present number of 73,000 is not particularly serious.

One thing that is abundantly clear is that there are at this moment two jobs open for each and every applicant for a job. Surely this is not an unhealthy situation under the circumstances. The work of reconstruction has been in progress since early in 1944 and has been accelerated since the establishment of the Department of Reconstruction in the summer of 1944. The work divides itself into the following branches: First, over all planning including studies of economics and statistics; second, industrial reconversion; third, research and development; and, fourth, control and distribution of materials.

Our planning for the initial stage of reconversion was set out in the white paper of April, 1944. The plan provides that private enterprise shall have the right of way until such time as an over-all shortage of employment appears. At the moment it is apparent that private initiative is meeting the situation adequately, and there is every indication that it will continue to do so for many months to come.

As Minister of Reconstruction I am at present in the strange position of being compelled to refuse building permits for a vast programme of private construction that is pressing to get under way, and this because of lack of man-power in the construction industry. Permits for small houses and for all industrial expansion promising substantial continuing employment are being granted freely, but we are still compelled to refuse permits for churches, schools, hotels, community halls, theatres and industrial projects such as breweries.

The construction industry normally is our largest employer of labour, but at the moment it is employing a small fraction of its usual complement. A great effort is being directed toward the expansion of this important industry and toward balancing builders' supplies with which it functions. The back-log of maintenance work as well as new construction facing this industry is enormous. Almost every building in Canada requires repairs more or less extensive as soon as man-power can be had. Our forest industries are still very short of labour, while our goldmining industry, starved for labour during war years, is steadily increasing its man-power requirements and will continue to do so.

Industrial reconversion has been under way for several months. More than a year ago the Department of Reconstruction called on all war contractors to advise the department of the manner in which assistance toward reconversion could be given. Since then a gradual change-over from war to peace has been under way. At the peak of war production some 900,000 men and women were employed in direct war work. By V-E day this number had been reduced to 650,000 men and women, and by V-J day the number was down to 450,000. By V-J day many plants had been reconverted to the point where the cancellation of war contracts meant only a limited and temporary lay-off or in some cases no lay-off at all.

[Mr. Howe.]

An example is the motorcar industry, which has been one of our most important war contractors as well as one of our largest employers of labour. In this industry tooling for civilian type trucks had been completed to the point where complete cancellation of war contracts involved a temporary lay-off of only about fifteen per cent of personnel, and that for a period of about two months. After so much effort had been put into reconversion from war to peace, it is regrettable that the workers in one of the principal motorcar plants should choose this time to go on strike for closed shop and check-off. I am not familiar with the merits of the dispute, but I simply suggest that the timing is unfortunate. As far as reconversion is concerned, had this strike not taken place I would have held the reconversion of the motorcar industry one of our better efforts.

It is important to note that practically all war plants are planning reconversion for a far greater production and far greater employment than in pre-war days. The Canadian General Electric company has recently issued a statement pointing out that present employment after complete reconversion is about double pre-war employment. This may not be typical of all war industries, but I can say that in general most war industries are planning reconversion along lines that will provide employment near and in some cases higher than the war-time scale. I have found no pessimists among the management of privately owned war plants about the post-war prospects of those plants. My contacts indicate that private initiative is operating at a high tempo throughout Canadian industry.

It is interesting to note the operation of the provisions of the 1944 budget, permitting double depreciation for industrial expansion during the reconversion period. All applications for double depreciation are filed for approval with the Department of Reconstruction and contain certain information needed to justify their approval. The double depreciation feature was made operative on November 10, 1944. As at September 1, 1945, 960 applications involving expenditures of upwards of $176 million had been approved. Of this amount the estimated expenditures for machinery and equipment amount to $120 million and for buildings $55 million. Of the latter figure $21 million was for on-site labour costs. The foregoing includes a large programme for modernization as indicated by the large proportion of cost of equipment.

Information available on plants covered by 729 applications involving $142 million of capital expenditure shows that the gross sales values of their products rose from $787 million in 1939 to $1,979 million in 1944, and is expected to increase by an additional $189 million after completion of the projects. Exports of products from these plants rose from $214 million in 1939 to $257 million in 1944, and a further increase of $115 million is anticipated after completion of the expansion. The average employment in the plants covered by 729 applications rose from 155,000 in 1939 to 303,000 in 1944. A further increase of 18,000 employees is expected one year after completion of the expansion.

The foregoing increase applies only to direct employment in the plants and does not reflect the corresponding increases that would take place in the allied industries supplying the materials, nor does it include the labour actually required to make the improvements.

I have spoken of reconversion in privately owned war plants. Reconversion is also under way in war plants owned by the dominion government. This is more difficult in that a sale of the plant to private industry usually is involved. For some months we have had a fairly definite idea of the nature of the peace-time industry which would use each government-owned plant; but when each plant is ready for sale other claims are put forward which must receive consideration. We find that the only practical methods is to call for tenders for each plant and then choose the buyer offering the best price consistent with the highest and most stable employment. All this takes time. The work is moving forward as well as can be expected. Several war plants have already been sold and are now fully converted as peace-time plants. Others are at present in process of being sold. As nearly as possible we endeavour to keep each plant in a line of work comparable with its former employment in order that the workers living in the vicinity may find employment in the same plant without too great a change of skills.

The sale and reconversion of government-owned war plants is a delicate operation which requires, and is receiving, the constant attention of myself and senior officers of the Department of Reconstruction. I am happy to say that there is no lack of applicants for purchase of government-owned war plants, except for a few plants unsuitable for any peace-time use or in locations unfavourable for peace-time production; the demands of private industry are greater than the supply. There is also an active demand for government-owned machinery. The sale of this machinery is helping many war plants to arrange quick conversion to peace-time production, and every effort is being made to dispose of this machinery in a way that will be most helpful to that end. A limited number of war plants are being retained by the crown and rented for multiple occupancy as an incubator for small industries. Here again the demand for space exceeds any reasonable supply. The most promising small industries are being given preference, and it is expected that from these multiple occupancy plants will develop industries which will in time build and occupy their own premises.

I suggest that few Canadians have any appreciation of the work involved in terminating war contracts and in clearing plants of unused and semi-fabricated raw materials, in removing government war machinery and in bringing about final settlement with each contractor.

The Department of Munitions and Supply has laid down carefully studied procedures in order that these various steps may be carried out with a minimum of delay. Especially chosen officers have been schooled for months in the procedure. I am satisfied that no other country in the world has any better procedure for accelerating conversion from war to peace.

I am particularly interested to note the new types of production which are being established here. Canada's record in producing munitions of war obviously has attracted the attention of manufacturers in other countries with the result that many have located or are locating plants in this country. The record of the relations between labour and management has been a contributing factor in attracting manufacturers to Canada, as has our favourable position in the export field.

It is quite obvious that during 1946 we may expect an expansion of peace-time industry comparable with the expansion of industry generally during the war years. Many of the largest expansions of industry yet to be reported are now being processed in the Department of Reconstruction.

In our earlier studies of requirements to provide continued full employment we estimated that one million jobs in excess of those obtainable in 1939 would be required. I can report that the one million additional peace-time jobs are definitely in sight, and that there is little likelihood of any over-all lack of employment in the near future.

At the end of this year seasonal unemployment will be added to the influx of discharges from the armed services, and there may be localities where workers cannot readily be placed. There will, however, be other localities still requiring workers, and it is hoped that the winter months will witness a readjustment of our population to conform to peace-time patterns of employment. Just as it took many months to move people from one locality to another into war jobs, it will take a shorter period to redistribute our people into peace-time jobs. The employment offices of the Department of Labour have ample machinery to facilitate the movement of workers, and I am confident that, given time, the desired readjustment will be effected.

I have not referred to large public works projects as a means of providing post-war employment. Great numbers of public projects have been deferred throughout the war years and are now ready to go ahead. As Minister of Reconstruction I should like to see as many as possible of such projects deferred for some time yet. It is greatly in the interests of Canada to give the right of way to private building. Considerable time must elapse before we have all the labour and materials that will be required for public projects after the needs of private construction have been met.

The dominion government itself has a large shelf of public projects available for undertaking at the proper time. Every province and every municipality are in the same position. Hon. members will have noted that at the recent dominion-provincial conference the dominion government offered to subsidize all public projects that would be listed for timing with the Department of Reconstruction. Our plan of reconstruction involves the timing of public projects as a means of stabilizing employment and avoiding periods of unemployment. The dominion government plans to act with courage and vigour to maintain a high level of employment and income, and can be depended upon to undertake public projects on any scale necessary to that end.

There is no lack of desirable public projects to be undertaken in this Canada of ours. The failure of the government to bring forward public projects at this time is leading to charges of lack of planning. Such charges are wholly unfounded. It is because of careful planning that public projects are undesirable at this time except in a few localities. Canada desires a stable economy rather than an economy of booms and depressions, and all our planning is directed to the desired objective.

A service of the Department of Reconstruction that is growing in importance is offered in collaboration with the national research council, in furnishing scientific information and technical advice to industry. Close contact with industry is being established in this field, and is having an excellent reception. Now that Europe is no longer a source of information on scientific research, it is all the more important that Canada expand its activities in the field of research and development. An effort is being made to integrate private and public research, and to stimulate both. The budget of 1944 gave encouragement for private research. The government, through larger appropriations, will continue to expand public research, which during the war years has played so great a part in the development of new weapons of war. The adaptation of war-time scientific discoveries is even now playing an important part in our general industrial expansion.

Perhaps I should say a word about housing. It is not generally understood that even in the war years house building in Canada was proceeding on a constantly accelerating basis, even though the diversion of materials from war uses was difficult. The years 1943 and 1944 saw more houses built in Canada than in any previous year with the exception of 1928. In 1943 some 28,000 housing licences were issued to private builders, and in 1944 the number increased to 32,000. Licences were granted only for low-cost housing, and great numbers of low-cost houses were built. It will be recalled that the objective set by the government in its white paper was 50,000 new housing units during the first full construction year following V-E day. Subsequently it was stated that the government hoped to accomplish its objective during the first twelve months immediately following V-E day. It now appears that we shall come close to this figure during 1945, and may even surpass it, and this in spite of the fact that the war in Europe did not end until well into the construction year. Already during 1945 licences to private builders have been issued for 38,000 new housing units. In addition, the government programme under the Veterans' Land Act calls for the construction of 3,000 veterans' houses during 1945. Wartime Housing Limited, which during the war years built some 18,000 houses for munition workers, was called upon to undertake a programme of 7,000 low rental houses for veterans, and this programme is well under way. Thus on September 1, some 48,000 houses either had been commenced and completed during 1945 or were under construction.

As I have said, throughout the war the government has recognized the vital need for housing; and while it was necessary to exercise some control on the production and distribution of building supplies, the revocation and removal of those controls was effected at the first possible moment. The last of such controls was revoked early this year, even though we were still at war and even though war requirements continued to place a heavy demand upon our resources. Plants producing materials required in house construction have in many cases been unable to maintain full labour staffs, with the result that production has been less than capacity. Some months ago the government decided that the need for new housing accommodation was of such importance that the building products industries must be recognized as of equal if not of greater importance than many of the war industries. Therefore government assistance was given to the building supplies industries long before the war ended. As part of this assistance labour was directed into brick yards, foundries, sawmills and logging plants in greater numbers, thereby enabling these industries to meet to an increasing extent the tremendous demands of new house building. In many cases, factories producing building material were in need of rehabilitation and modernization. This was the result of reduced demands for their output during the depression years. The government has given direct assistance here also, making it possible for such industries to expand and improve their production. This has taken the form of priorities which enabled manufacturers to purchase new machinery and other equipment, as well as the granting of financial aid in the form of double depreciation, which assistance the building industry has taken advantage of in no small measure. The full effect of such assistance is being realized now that the man-power situation has improved, with the result that the building products industries are getting back to capacity production. The supply of all kinds of building materials had greatly increased even before V-J day, and since then the increase has been even more marked. I am confident that the position will continue to improve rapidly and that within the next few months the difficulties which builders are meeting at the present time will be largely overcome.

In the time at my disposal I have endeavoured to outline the working of the government's reconversion plans, now that the war is ended. I have seen frequent statements to the effect that the war with Japan had ended earlier than was expected, and that the government was caught unprepared. It is true that the shock of reconversion would have been less had the war continued longer, but in the past I said frequently that temporary dislocations incidental to cancellation of war contracts would be unavoidable whenever the war should end. Personally I am the last man entitled to claim surprise at the end of the war, having known months in advance the approximate date of the use of the atomic bomb. While I felt reasonably sure that the atomic bomb would end the war, it is obvious that I could not set my judgment against that of military experts, nor could I fail to arrange for the production of munitions of war at the rate demanded by our own military authorities and those of our allies. I could, however, gear our reconversion machinery to be ready whenever the war ended, and that was done.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): If I may ask the minister a question on that point, how closely was he in touch with the research department in connection with the atomic bomb? I quite appreciate that, as he says, he could not be sure the war would end so soon, but I should like to know just how closely he was in contact with those conducting the research into the atomic bomb.

Mr. HOWE: I was a member of the joint policy committee of Great Britain, the United States and Canada which directed the whole investigation leading up to the atomic bomb, so that I think I can say I was at least as close to it as any other man in this country.

Some hon. members have questioned the fulfilment of my promise to seek the cooperation of labour in the work of the Department of Reconstruction. Apparently they are not as well informed as they might be on the degree of cooperation that has been established. Therefore I shall take this opportunity to clarify the situation in this regard. On April 29, 1945, I issued a statement on labour and the Department of Reconstruction which was widely circulated throughout the ranks of organized labour. Following the issuing of this statement and in accordance with the policy outlined therein, I communicated with the principal trade union congresses and other associations, requesting that each one nominate a representative on a reconstruction labour committee to cooperate with the labour adviser of the Department of Reconstruction. As soon as these names were submitted, the committee was appointed as follows:

John W. Bruce, chairman of the committee on reconstruction and rehabilitation, Trades and Labour Congress of Canada;

Pat Conroy, secretary-treasurer, Canadian Congress of Labour;

Alfred Charpentier, president of the Canadian and Catholic confederation of labour;

A. J. Kelly, chairman, dominion joint legislative committee of the railroad transportation brotherhoods.

For the information of the house, this committee which, as everyone will agree, consists of senior trade union officers selected by the organizations themselves, meets frequently with our labour adviser, who reports to me, and as often as necessary with myself. It is a standing advisory committee to the department, under the chairmanship of my labour adviser, with which I have full and frequent discussions on reconstruction problems in which labour is interested. I have at different times referred matters to the consideration of the committee for advice, and have as far as possible tried to implement its recommendations.

It is also one of the functions of this committee to arrange meetings between different trade unions and myself. Some meetings have already been held, and others are now being planned. These arrangements are left to the committee, working with the labour adviser.

I consider the reconstruction labour committee a valuable adjunct to my department. I have received from it the utmost cooperation, and am satisfied that the members themselves feel that, through our discussions, many points affecting reconstruction have been, and are being, clarified. I feel that the setting up of this committee and its successful functioning, are an answer to the criticism that my department does not seek the advice and cooperation of organized labour.

For the most part, organized labour is recognizing the problem, and is cooperating in the work of reconversion. I think that, in general, workers formerly employed in strictly war plants are finding employment at comparable wages in peacetime industries, or at least could do so if they wish to move to localities where comparable jobs are available. The task of reconversion requires the full cooperation of government, management and the workers, and, to the extent that that cooperation is lacking, the work of reconversion will be delayed, and the dislocations which accompany it will be intensified. Full cooperation will mean a minimum of hardship, but lack of cooperation, such as is in evidence at Windsor, Ontario, to-day, can very well lead to considerable hardship. Fortunately, the men and women of Canada are sensible and well balanced. Therefore, I am confident that Canada will set an example to the world in bringing about an orderly return to peace-time living.

While I am on my feet, perhaps I might say something about the destruction of war materials. Hon. members will know that we have tremendous stocks of war materials to dispose of. Some perhaps will suggest that these should be put away in storage and kept for possible use in the next war. I can tell the house that no longer than a year ago there were reported to the War Assets Corporation surpluses which had arisen out of the South African war. Very fine saddles and harnesses were put in storage at the end of the South African war and had never been used since, but they had been guarded and polished and taken care of for all the years that had elapsed between that war and the present one.

I suggest that a responsibility devolves upon those who have to do with surplus war assets to see that that type of expense is not saddled upon the dominion for years to come. While the dominion is in the disposal business, it should clean up those surpluses that are obviously useless for the future. That is the duty which devolves upon us. In ordinary times there is very little machinery for the disposal of assets of that kind.

As far as the equipment referred to to-night is concerned, this is classed by the air force as class E, that is, as material damaged to the point where it is not worth repairing. This happened to be radio equipment, but it is not radio equipment that any citizen could find any use for, because it is only good at high altitudes. We have many times the amount of usable and valuable radio equipment of exactly the same type than could possibly be disposed of in this country.

An hon. MEMBER: You could give it away.

Mr. HOWE: It is of no value as radio equipment, but it has some value as scrap material and is salable as such. It is not salable in any other form. Therefore, by agreement betwen the air force and War Assets Corporation, after the material had been examined approval was given to remove every valuable part from the radio equipment, such as tubes and other parts worth saving, and render the balance into scrap, thus making it salable. That was done, and we did salvage something out of material that would otherwise have been quite useless.

The question was asked as to whether we had an agreement with manufacturers of radio equipment. We had no agreement of the kind. We have quite an amount of exactly the same material in usable form that we are offering for sale. If inquiries are referred to us I am sure we can satisfy them.

The question was asked as to whether the material should not have been given to schools. We have an arrangement with every school in Canada that material of that kind will be sent to the school on indefinite loan. We do not give material away, but we are willing to lend it without charge to any educational institution that has a use for it. This applies to all types of equipment from aeroplane engines down to the smallest item.

Mr. SHAW: Did that apply to Penhold? Did Mr. J. H. Ross, the liaison officer between the department of education and the War Assets Corporation examine the material at Penhold to see whether it had educational value?

Mr. HOWE: As I have told my hon. friend, I am not sure what Mr. Ross examined. I believe that he covers the whole dominion and keeps in touch with every educational institution in the dominion.

Mr. SHAW: He is only in Alberta.

Mr. HOWE: This is a dominion problem; it is not confined to Alberta. I will say that if there was any material there that was of educational value, we can supply a duplicate in much better condition and will be glad to do so. We will supply this to any educational institution that will apply. The disposal of war materials is a very difficult and complicated problem.

Mr. LOW: Not with a bulldozer.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend who has just come from the provincial legislature is having a good deal of entertainment. I wish he would just refrain until I have finished speaking.

An hon. MEMBER: He is being entertained now.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend is a veteran and he is quite at liberty to say that. The question was asked whether inventories were kept of materials destroyed. Such inventories are kept and will be available to any committee that wishes to explore the transactions of War Assets Corporation.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is hospital equipment available on the same basis?

Mr. HOWE: No; hospital equipment is in great demand; it is a saleable product. The loans to educational institutions referred to materials not readily salable but having an educational value.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): What about the wrist watches which were said to have been destroyed by torches?

Mr. HOWE: Have you seen a wrist watch that has been destroyed by a torch?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): No; but I am asking about those that were reported to have been destroyed.

Mr. HOWE: You saw the report and you are taking the responsibility for spreading that report by rising in your place and asking a question in the house. Unless you know something about it you should not do that. You are taking responsibility for spreading the report by asking that question. Unless you know something about it you should keep quiet.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): You and I are absolutely ignorant; we know nothing about it.

Mr. HANSELL: We know plenty about it.

Mr. HOWE: I wish to say one final word about controls. We are getting rid of controls as rapidly as we can. Controls based on scarcity are pretty well gone. But controls that have to do with the cost of living are being and must be retained if we wish to protect the economy that we have built up during the war years, and I think it is an economy to be proud of. For example, if we took the control off lumber, which seems to be an irksome control, there would either be no lumber in Canada, or users in Canada would pay anywhere up to $20 a thousand more for their lumber. Without the control, the lumber would move across the line, where prices are vastly higher. That is why we keep the control on lumber. There are reasons, and sound reasons, I believe, for every control that is being maintained at this time.

Let me say this. The controllers who are being criticized in this house from time to time have, during an acute period of shortage, seen that Canadian citizens were supplied with their requirements. We have had, for instance, to restrict the use of gasoline. Nevertheless, the controllers have seen that when a coupon was issued for gasoline, the gasoline was there in the pump to honour the coupon, and Canada is the only country I know of in the world that has been able to keep that position.

Therefore, I say, let us not be too critical of the work of these controllers. Theirs has been a difficult task. It has been difficult to keep them at their task for the time sufficient to remove the controls in an orderly way. Scarcity controls are going rapidly or have already gone. As time goes on, history, I think, will treat kindly the work of the controllers in Canada's war period.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): May I ask a question which is on everybody's mind?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, at the outset may I, on behalf of the members of this group, express our very deep regret at the news we received this afternoon of the passing of the late Norman McLarty. Some of us in this group had the privilege of sitting in this house with him for five years, and we got to know him and to like him. He was always a very courteous gentleman, regardless of our differences in politics, and through you we should like to express to his family our deepest sympathy.

In rising to take part in this debate, I am reminded very much of the parliament of 1940. In that parliament, meeting for the first time when we were engaged in one of the greatest conflicts the world has ever seen, the problem that faced the government and the members of the house was the changing over of our economy from peace to war. It was a difficult task; it took a long time, and many mistakes were made. Nevertheless, perhaps despite the government, this country made a substantial contribution to the winning of that conflict.

This also is a new parliament. We have here approximately ninety new members. The war is over. It is the responsibility now of this new parliament, and of the same government, to transform our economy from war to peace. That also will be a difficult task, one that will require the patience and understanding of everyone in this house. But we cannot afford to make mistakes at this stage of the game, because we cannot afford to quibble over the future of those who fought the war on the field of battle and are now returning to us. Nor dare we quibble over those employed in industry who provided the sinews of war which were vital to our fighting troops.

During the process of fighting the war this country had a national objective around which we could rally our people. That objective was the winning of the war, the defeating of totalitarianism abroad, and preserving on this continent that framework of democracy within which we have sufficient freedom to go forward into a better future. But at the present time, as far as I can see, we have no national objective. That national objective must be established. The people of this country must be given leadership and rallied around certain objectives for which they think they fought this war.

Our leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), set out briefly, in seven or eight points, the things which we think the government should be doing at this time in order to give the necessary leadership to the country. His points were plain and very simple.

First, we believe that the people of this country waged this war in order to improve their standard of living—the standard of living of all Canadians—and it can stand considerable improvement, even the standard established during this war.

Second, we believe that everyone in this country is entitled to a decent home to live in, at a reasonable cost.

Third, we believe that the federal government must accept greater financial responsibility in the field of education and that the educational standards across Canada must be raised in some parts and made uniform throughout the dominion. We believe that the teaching profession must be given greater recognition in the job they have to do in building the future citizens of Canada.

Fourth, we believe that all the people of this country are entitled to something in the way of social security. We believe that this government should as soon as possible bring down a national social security act, to be administered under one department, which will remove the fear of insecurity from the minds of our people, a fear that they have had over a long period of time. We believe that our aged people should be cared for and that the youth of the country are entitled to better standard than they have had in the past.

These, Mr. Speaker, are the objectives for which we think we have fought this war. But in listening to the discussions in this house and in travelling across this country it seems to me that there are two opposing groups in Canada who fought this war for two entirely different reasons.

The working people of Canada, and that includes the farmers, the fishermen, the industrial workers and the small business people, fought this war to preserve this framework of democracy within which they could establish within this country, when the war was over, the things that we visualized we were fighting this war for; that is, to eliminate the conditions that breed war. On the other hand, watching the struggle to-day, we find that the owning classes in this country, those who control the means of life, claim our resources and are administering all of our economic processes. I am led to believe, by some discussions I have heard in the house, that the reason they fought this war is to preserve the status quo and to get back to 1939 as soon as possible. That is the impression I got from the discussion. You hear men say, "We still believe in the system of private enterprise." The government accepts that slogan; the Conservative party to my right accept it; the fact of the matter is that every part of this house other than the members of the group for whom I am speaking to-night accepts it.

What is this so-called free enterprise or private enterprise? I want someone at some time in this chamber to rise in his place and define it. What are the plans of free enterprise for the future? We must not forget that under that system of free enterprise we have had three wars in one lifetime—the Boer war, the great war, and now this last conflict. If the system of free enterprise can bring about for us the social objectives for which we fought this war, we should not have had the last two wars. They have had three opportunities in the past over a lifetime to prove that they can do these things, and they have not succeeded. Personally I think conditions in the world to-day with the prospect of wars in the future are such that we cannot afford to take the chance of any more wars, because if we do, it will perhaps mean the end of civilization.

I was interested in listening last Thursday evening to the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell). He made an excellent speech. However, I was struck by a few of the phrases he used. For example, he built up a nice story in favour of the maintenance of what he calls private enterprise, and I sat here thinking I would like to get his definition of it. I hope that some time before the house rises he will tell us exactly where there exists in this country to-day private enterprise as we have had it in the past. There is no such thing. For example, he stated that the system of private enterprise should be maintained, that those who are risking their capital are entitled to a profit on it. Well, there is no one risking any capital in this country to-day, and they have not been risking any capital all during the process of fighting this war.

I happened to sit on the reconstruction committee for some three years, and during that period we had the privilege of examining practically every business organization in this country which would be giving employment in the post-war period. They came in and gave us their plans; they told us what they were prepared to do, but they all wound up with the same statement: they were prepared to do that, contingent upon the federal government making available the capital necessary and guaranteeing the profits. So, you see, none of these people were prepared to risk any capital.

The situation, as I see it to-day, thinking the thing over quickly, is this. The government has established the industrial development bank. Any risk entering into the establishment of new industry after the war will be underwritten by the government through that bank. It is going to underwrite the profits. In the field of housing the federal government has handed over to the major insurance companies the building of houses, and is underwriting the risk. In fact there is no risk. In mining the same thing applies. The federal government is expected to carry on the geological surveys and to send out the prospectors. If a prospector makes a discovery he reports it to some mining company. The mining company then carries on the development and makes the money. In lumbering the same thing is true: the government will build the base roads into the timber; they will improve the waterways for driving purposes; the workmen will go in and cut down the lumber for very inadequate wages; but all the initial outlay in developing the timber resources, fire prevention, and so on—for all those things the government pays the shot; someone else steps in and makes the money.

The whole picture across Canada to-day is as I have described it. If the government is expected to carry on and develop the resources, take the risk, and make this investment, why should the government not take the profits, and turn them back ultimately to the working people of this country on the basis of social security, to give them some reward, when they are through with their labours, other than the scrap heap which they have had from generation to generation?

Mr. MacINNIS: "Depreciation."

Mr. GILLIS: Oh, no, they have no depreciation; they just "get the axe," and stagger away to an old man's home, if they can find one. In most of the provinces there is not any place that will accept them.

So, thinking in terms of seventy-five years ago, I can understand the philosophy of the Liberal party, the Conservative party and the Social Credit party in the maintenance of free enterprise. But it no longer exists. What we have to-day straight across this country is four or five large monopolies in every field, which have set up holding companies, driven out the small shareholders, and concentrated power completely in the hands of a very few individuals who to-day wield economic dictatorship over the whole country and largely dictate the policy of any government which is in power which tries to play ball with them and maintain things as they were in 1939.

Getting back to 1939, I heard an hon. member across the way say that they did not want a new social order, that things were all right as they were, remove the controls and get back to where we were. What did we fight this war for? To go back there? Those who fought this war with certain objectives in mind had no such intentions, and anyone who takes that attitude today is completely out of touch with the world picture. You cannot get back there if you want to. We can struggle and continue to use on that basis this House of Commons or the legislatures we still have across this country, and we can do what they did in Europe—bring our house of cards down around our ears. To-day we have to recognize the fact that certain economic reforms must be made in this country; otherwise it is not possible for us to enjoy freedom, democracy, and the things for which our service personnel fought this war.

The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario—I am not trying to pick on him particularly, but certain phrases he used jarred on me—also had this to say: you have a right to exploit your fellow-man and take a profit for it, because of the risk. He said that every worker who demands a wage increase is demanding a profit. That is not my conception of profits. Then, of course, he said that the worker was not taking any risk. I should like to ask him if he ever checked the industrial casualty lists of Canada. Those who go to the sea in boats, those who are employed in the mining industry, the steel plants, and so forth, across this country; check the figures year by year and you will find that their casualties greatly outnumber those of war. See them creeping around suffering from silicosis, going prematurely to their graves, without reward of any kind. I should like to have the hon. member on the east coast and put him in a boat with the shore fishers at four o'clock in the morning, to go out and set his traps and pull his trawls. He puts perhaps $1,500 worth of gear into the water this morning; to-morrow a storm comes up and the whole thing is gone. He is wiped out and it will take ten years for him to get that gear together again. There is plenty of risk there. Or go into the coal mines of Nova Scotia with a coal miner, at five o'clock in the morning. That man goes some six miles under the Atlantic ocean, working eight hours with nothing on but a pair of shoes and overalls. There are many casualties in that industry, and after a man has drawn his meagre pittance and budgeted on a deficit every week for years for himself and his family, if he lives to be seventy he will be given a cane and asked to make his way to the nearest poorhouse. There is no depreciation, no reward, no consideration. The risk which the industrial worker takes is physical. My hon. friend was thinking in terms of money, but we have to get away from that philosophy. In the future this country has to think in terms of human life and the needs and rights of human beings; otherwise we have fought another war for nothing.

Take the business man who is managing his own business. He draws a certain amount per week and what he takes out for managing his business is a wage for services rendered. What I would consider a profit for the average worker across the country would be this: provided that he had a job which would pay sufficient wages for him to meet all obligations, rent, fuel, family requirements, and with a sufficient income to send his children to university, if he could bank a thousand a year, that would be profit, but there is no industrial worker and there are few farmers with that kind of set-up.

I am not trying to lecture my hon. friends, but I make this statement because I am convinced that, after private enterprise has been given a chance to fight three wars, throwing men into war, giving them a uniform and then taking it off them and putting them on the street, and then telling them to get ready for the next war, that day is gone, and we shall not have that chance again. We must therefore change our philosophy in this house. It is the job of every member in this house representing a constituency in Canada to study the subject himself, not on the basis of slogans or on the basis of things as they were in the past. The job that has to be done now in Canada is to live up to the promises made our service personnel and our industrial workers during the process of fighting the war.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) spoke of a new world, a new philosophy, something new that was to come out of this war. But it seems to me that we have the same old order, the same old philosophy, because the basic thing that some people apparently are thinking about is money and getting back to where we were in 1939.

I wish to say a few words now to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie), who I regret is not in his place at the moment. He has a large department and there will have to be a good deal of discussion in the house before this session closes. There is one matter I consider of urgent importance that comes within his jurisdiction. The speech from the throne intimates that there is to be established a veterans' charter. That is all right, but I am getting a little tired of slogans, and unless that charter means something I am not very much concerned about it. Centering veterans' problems in one department with sympathetic administration is a good thing and if that is what the charter means I am all for it. But I wish to call attention to this particularly. Coming back to this country to-day from overseas is a large number of service personnel, boys who committed some misdemeanour, some slight infraction of military law and who were sentenced to detention on the other side, many of them to two or three years. I have seen copies of some courts martial; I have seen where a boy was sentenced to three years on the other side after having two and a half years of combat service, and some of these boys have been sentenced after the close of the war in Germany. A large number of these boys are being brought back to the country. They are taken first to Kingston and then sent back to their respective district depots and are discharged and sent to some civilian prison in Canada to complete sentence.

I have written to the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) and have been in touch for some time with the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Abbott). I claim that for an infraction of military law they cannot send a boy after discharge to a civilian prison in order to complete his sentence. I have not had any definite word from either of the ministers as to whether I am right or wrong on that point, from the legal point of view, and I do not care particularly whether I am, because what I am thinking about is this. I know of one case where a boy had two and a half years of combat service. He went through Italy, and into Germany till the war was over. He picked up a couple of army blankets one night and went and sold them to get some wine—many hon. members will understand that. That boy was sentenced to three years. He has a wife and two children. A civilian picked up on that charge in Canada would get a fine or a month or two in one of the county gaols. What has that boy got? He was sentenced to three years, fined all his gratuity, and in addition to that he is placed in a civilian prison so that he will come out with the stigma of a convict. His wife and children lose their allowance. He is dishonourably discharged and that will militate against him for the rest of his natural life. No recognition whatsoever is given for services during the period of fighting the war.

What this house should press for is the setting up immediately of a parliamentary committee on veterans affairs where all these matters can be analysed by members. I believe there are seventy members in this house who are veterans either of the last war or of this one, and they should be given an opportunity as soon as possible to get together and look over the veterans' charter, examining all legislation, because it requires examination. No legislation is effective or worth the paper it is written on unless it is administered properly. I am not going to take more time on this subject, because I know that later on it will receive a good deal of discussion. The whole matter of rehabilitation calls for considerable checking up.

I would say a word or two to the minister of munitions, who has just spoken. I would judge from the talk he gave that he is Canada's greatest optimist, to say the least. The picture he painted in the field of employment across Canada is certainly not true in the province from which I come.

Mr. MITCHELL: He has to be an optimist to tackle the problem.

Mr. GILLIS: But optimism, speeches and statistics will not solve that problem. Jobs have to be found and wages must be paid.

Mr. MITCHELL: You cannot solve the problem by a negative approach.

Mr. GILLIS: It is not a matter of being negative or positive; it is a matter of finding out what you can do and getting busy and going after it. The unemployment problem is pretty bad in Nova Scotia. In January, 1944, the reconstruction committee tabled in this house a report that meant something from the point of view of employment as far as Nova Scotia is concerned. They decided then to build a causeway across the strait of Canso and to double-track the mainland from Sydney to Moncton, tearing up the old one and taking out the grades and curves. That would give considerable employment to the people of Nova Scotia at the present time. It would perhaps take up the slack while you are getting ready to find out what you intend to do in the next year or so. When the minister gets an opportunity I should like him to tell the house exactly what progress has been made with respect to bridging the strait of Canso and so forth, because that is one of the province's major post-war projects. I see it as a cushion in the reconversion period which could take care of a lot of the people coming out of the services and out of the war industries. There is no reconversion in Nova Scotia; it is a matter of closing out the industries and putting the workers back on the street. The project to which I have referred means something down there, and I should like to know what progress is being made.

Then I should like to get a statement from the Department of Reconstruction with respect to the coal commission. The coal mining industry of Canada is a very sick one. It requires considerable reorganization. The government recognized that, because it appointed a royal commission that is inquiring into the coal industry all across Canada with the view of reorganizing the industry and establishing a fuel policy. That commission has been on the road for some considerable time. I would urge the minister to render it every assistance and to do everything possible within his department to have the report of that commission brought down as early as possible. I believe they are completing their hearings in Sydney at the present time. It should not take very long to analyse those hearings and bring in a report. That industry certainly requires reorganization. Coupled with that is the whole steel set-up in the province. I am not going to go into that now. I noted that the minister tabled an order in council in the house on September 7 dealing with subsidies for the Dominion Steel and Coal industry. The number of that order is 1952. That order is very generous. Perhaps that generosity is required, but it certainly indicates that there is something wrong with that industry. The subsidy paid during 1943 was some $9,678,829.49. Well, an industry that has to get money poured into it like that should have some public supervision; it certainly is not private enterprise. Under private enterprise that assistance is necessary, and I am glad to see that according to this order in council the assistance is to be continued. The agreement has been extended into 1945.

Mr. HOWE: If it stops, the industry ceases.

Mr. GILLIS: That is exactly what I say. If that assistance from the government is stopped, then that industry is through. That is why we in the province are concerned. Steel and coal is the basic industry. The whole economy revolves around it. We believe that the commission is doing a thorough job in examining the industry and we should like to see that report brought down as soon as possible because it holds everything else up. If you start to talk about housing in that province the first thing you hear is; "We cannot do very much about housing until the commission reports; we do not know what the future of this industry is or what the prosperity of the country will be like in the future." I leave that with the minister to see if the report cannot be expedited as much as possible.

I now wish to say a word to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). We are likely to say a lot of words to him before the session is over; but there is one matter that comes within the jurisdiction of his department that I am interested in, namely, the apprenticeship system established in the mining industry under the fuel emergency order. I wish to say at the outset that I think that is perhaps one of the best things the government has done for the coalmining industry of Nova Scotia. It worked well and it raised the status of coal mining to a trade. Young boys who previously went down into a coal mine and took the chance of getting their necks broken while learning the business were taken down under this scheme and put under the supervision of competent instructors. The bill was handled jointly by the federal government and the coal company. On two occasions I complimented the minister on that set-up and I asked him if it was the intention of the government to continue that apprenticeship system into the post-war period. He assured the house that so long as he was Minister of Labour or had any say in the labour department that apprenticeship system would be continued. I now tell him that for the past five months nothing has been done on that particular scheme; it has been allowed to peter out. Certain people do not want it. They are not doing anything about it.

In discussing the problem of vocational training with some of the department's vocational training officials in Sydney within the last couple of months, I found they were very much interested in it, because there are hundreds of returning personnel who did not have a job previously and who would want to go into the mines if they had an opportunity. If that scheme was functioning there would be some place for the vocational training officers to send the boys under a rehabilitation plan to give them the necessary training to become coal miners. I wish to leave that with the minister because I think he is interested. I ask him to check up on that matter and resurrect the system because it was worth while.

There are many matters that could be discussed during this debate, but I am not going to try to go into all of them. There are two more committees that I think should be set up in addition to the parliamentary committee on veterans' affairs generally. I believe that the Canada Shipping Act requires considerable revision. It is old; it has never been changed. During the past week we had the privilege of meeting with the Canadian Seamen's Union. In discussing their problems with some of them we found that a lot of their difficulties are based on the Canada Shipping Act. It is a long story and I am not going to try to go into it at this time.

I believe it is the intention of the government to have a merchant marine in the post-war period—it certainly should be. If we are to have merchant marine in Canada in the post-war period the first thing we have to do is to train officers immediately. Most of the officers sailing our Canadian merchant ships during this war were brought from the old country, particularly the captains and the higher ranks. That happened during the last war. The British shipping companies saw to that. When the war was over, the boats were beached; the skippers went home and Canada had no qualified officers to carry on the work of her merchant marine. The same thing is true this time. There has been a lot of protest about it. Great numbers of naval personnel will soon be demobilized. A lot of them may be qualified. As part of our rehabilitation project we should definitely decide on maintaining in this country a merchant service of at least three hundred ships. Certain naval personnel may want to follow the water in the post-war period. They may be interested in taking the higher positions; but the seamen advise us that at the present time we have practically no qualified skippers and under-officials to take charge of a merchant marine in the post-war years.

The Minister of Munitions and Supply dealt extensively with reconversion. A lot can be said about war assets and so forth. I do not think that fighting over it on that basis will serve very much purpose except confusion. I do not agree very much with what he said with respect to reconverting plants and so forth, but I think it is a terrific problem and there are many headaches in it. There is no one man or two men or ten men in Ottawa who can be expected to handle that problem successfully and protect the equity which the Canadian people have in war plants and so forth; it cannot be done. Hon. members could be utilized. I believe a committee on reconversion should be set up in this house, to which could be passed many of the problems of the department. Surely we can unite in making use of materials in which the Canadian people have an equity of a billion dollars or so, regardless of our political philosophies. It is our own business, the business of government. That is the business of the Canadian people, and it is a billion dollar business. Regardless of what we may think from the point of view of political philosophy, surely we can get together to protect that equity and utilize it in the best interests of this country. I believe a committee of this house should be set up for that purpose.

We see a great many wild stories in the press, and I do not believe the press very much at the present time. If I see something in the Globe and Mail I say, "That is just a Tory story to embarrass the government." If I read something in the Toronto Star I say, "That is just a story to bolster the government," while if something appears in the C.C.F. News our hon. friends over here say it is only propaganda endeavouring to establish socialism. But if we all get together in a room and get the facts from the Department of Reconstruction, we can sit down and analyse those facts from the point of view of dollars and cents and what they mean to the Canadian people, and perhaps we can help the minister. At least he would be in this position, that when he came to the house there would be forty or fifty members here knowing something about the ramifications of the department and the job he is doing, and our minds would not be beclouded by the propaganda we are getting in the press.

Now, Mr. Speaker, my time is up. I wish to say that I am sincere in regard to the matters I have discussed. To every member of this house representing a section of Canada I say we have won the war on the battlefields, but if we continue to have the opposing factions we see in this country to-day all we shall do is change the uniform of the soldiers coming back. We shall throw them into the ranks of the unemployed, or into industries which do not provide adequate standards, and they will become soldiers on the home front in Canada for the next few years, perhaps carrying on the sort of struggle we shall not like. And it is not necessary. The members of this group are prepared to do anything they can now and in the future to establish for the people of this country the things for which we think we fought this war.

Mr. L. O. BREITHAUPT (Waterloo North): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of the few remarks I desire to make I wish to add my congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. It is noteworthy that each hon. gentleman represents a distinguished branch of the service, the air force and the navy; and I might add with some pride that the mover of the address, the youthful member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) happens to be my house office mate. Even if he is from the bush country, to which the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) referred, he is a good scout, and I think he will get along. In order that there may be no confusion as to the riding I represent, I should like to make it clear, particularly to new members, that there are two Waterloo ridings, Waterloo North and Waterloo South. Some misunderstanding seems to exist in the house and in some press reports with regard to the members representing these two constituencies. It has been said that "east is east and west is west and never the twain shall meet." The same might be said of the two Waterloos; north is north and south is south, and never the twain shall meet. This applies only, however, to the political philosophy of the two representatives, and has nothing to do with their personal relationships. As far as the two ridings are concerned, our interests are mutual to a large extent. They are both highly agricultural and highly industrial, and many Canadian insurance companies have their headquarters there. The town of Waterloo, which is in my riding, is often said to be the Hartford of Canada.

So much for my little sales talk on behalf of my riding, which I think every hon. member is quite justified in making. I join with other hon. members of this house in giving thanks to Almighty God for the success of allied arms and the complete and unconditional surrender of our axis enemies. I am particularly pleased at the presence in this house of one who so recently languished in a German prison camp where he had been confined, together with a very near relative of mine, Lieutenant Arthur Breithaupt of the Calgary Tanks, ever since the memorable storming of the beaches of Dieppe by Canadian armed forces. I refer, of course, to the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Merritt). In my maiden speech in this house after Dieppe, I recommended to the government that Cecil Merritt be made a senator upon his return to Canada, in recognition of his outstanding services. Hon. members who were here at that time will recall that suggestion. Apparently this was not to be, and he decided to enter parliament the hard way. In spite of the fact that he sits on the opposition benches, I wish to pay him a well earned tribute, quite apart from his political affiliations. His maiden speech delivered the other day has been the subject of much favourable comment even by many Liberal members, some of whom have said that the Liberal thought expressed therein would almost entitle the hon. gentleman to cross the floor of the house to the government benches. His criticisms were both fair and constructive, so we might still make him a senator.

At this time I wish to pay a very respectful and heartfelt tribute on behalf of my constituents as well as myself to those members of Canada's armed forces from Waterloo North and the entire Dominion of Canada who laid down their lives for a just and great cause, to free the world from tyranny and oppression. May we prove ourselves worthy of their great sacrifice.

During the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne I have heard from opposition parties a good deal of critical and sometimes unfair comment in regard to the government. I agree with the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) that we all make mistakes. I make plenty of them; so do the opposition parties, and even the government sometimes makes a few. My conception of the duty of a supporter of the government is that he should not only commend the government for good work done but also suggest where improvements can be effected. The trust placed by the Canadian people in such generous measure in our great leader, the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and his historic party in 1940, when he received a record majority, was certainly not misplaced. The clear mandate at that time was to win the war. The Prime Minister and his party have kept Canada united in spite of some talk we hear from opposition parties; they have delivered the goods, and the war has been won. To my mind actions speak louder than words. If in the post-war period every Canadian citizen assumes his share of the burden and pulls a strong oar, surely even the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell), who made such a strong plea for leadership and guidance, will have to admit that this country really has had it. It has had that leadership for many years past, and again the people of Canada saw fit to entrust the fortunes of this great country to the Liberal party. I would point out that recently another record has been set up to the credit of the Prime Minister; that is, that after having led the country to victory his government was returned to office. So far as I know never before in Canadian history has a government been returned after a period of war administration.

A good deal has been said on the subjects of reconstruction, reconversion and housing. I am a realist, and my training is to face facts and deal with them accordingly. I am firmly of the opinion that we cannot change over from a war-time economy to a peace-time economy as speedily as some people think we can. There is bound to be more or less dislocation. At the ending of a war we cannot be expected to continue to manufacture munitions and war equipment merely to employ labour. Even at that I firmly beileve that at the present time there is no actual shortage of jobs in Canada. The figures given by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) this evening further verifies that fact. In fact I know there are many communities, including the industrial centres in Waterloo North, which are actually experiencing a far greater shortage of help and far more absenteeism at the present time than they did at any time during the war. While it is true that there is not an over-all shortage of jobs in Canada, nevertheless it is true that there is a shortage of jobs in some localities where war plants previously existed. Many of those who migrated to some cities to work in temporary munitions and manufacturing centres should, in my humble opinion, bring themselves to the point where they see the wisdom of returning to their former abodes throughout the length and breadth of this country.

Much concern has been shown over the fact that there is a shortage of housing accommodation in many communities where war-time production reached an all-time high. Right here I wish to sound a note of caution. It seems to me that necessary as additional housing may be in some communities, such as those communities which are expanding their peacetime production or such communities as the cities and towns in my riding where diversified industry is characteristic of the locality, there is grave danger that in other districts an over-extended housing programme may backfire when adjustment and filtering back home of much of the urban populace take place.

While I am on the subject of housing, I should like to refer to the fact that the government plans to have insurance companies and limited dividend corporations build houses on a large scale. These plans are commendable. However, the fact should not be lost sight of that throughout the country there are many small builders who have started from scratch, who could, if given a greater chance, contribute greatly to the alleviation of the present housing situation. The figures given by the Minister of Reconstruction in this connection are impressive, that 38,000 homes have been built by smaller builders. This is only a start and many small builders would be pleased to amplify this programme, as well as other individuals who are capable and willing to build their own homes, if the granting of permits and the loosening up of building materials were simplified.

Personally I think the Department of Reconstruction is doing a good job under an able minister, but I respectfully submit that a good deal of the red tape and delay in the issuing of permits by the construction controller's department should be removed. We are sympathetic with the department in the enormous amount of work that they have to do, but I think a little word from the minister in this connection would be quite in order.

May I suggest also to the minister that the green light might now be given to a much greater extent in the issuing of permits for plant extensions and additions where such will assist in the government's plans for the creation of jobs. Surely it is a good policy to further encourage the expansion of industry for the manufacture of the much needed civilian products now in such short supply and thus provide jobs for returning personnel of the armed forces and for others who have faithfully discharged their duties at home through the very difficult war years. Building materials such as cement and steel used in plant construction are not in any case in a critical position and are not generally used in volume for home construction.

I come now to the subject of meat rationing. As I said before, we all make mistakes. In my humble opinion it would appear that we as a government have definitely made one by putting into force a clumsy and complicated form of meat rationing at the end of a great world war. This comes at a time when reliable sources indicate that the United States is discontinuing meat rationing. Only a few months ago their supply position was more critical than ours. Merely because plans were made in Canada for meat rationing prior to the end of the Pacific war is in itself no reason why we should now proceed with it. No doubt some money has been spent on the preparation of this plan, but there is no reason to send good money after bad or to attempt to cover up an old mistake with a new one.

More meat products are apparently needed throughout the world than ever before, particularly in the United Kingdom. God knows Great Britain has stood by us through thick and thin during the most fateful hours of the war. We in turn owe her a great debt and should continue to stand by her in peace as we have done in war. In order that we may do this I have a suggestion to make. The cattle population of Canada is apparently in excess of all requirements, domestic and export. Let me therefore suggest that the government immediately put forward a plan to have meat production substantially increased so that these cattle may be processed. To do this, meat producers throughout the country, large and small, could, I am told, increase their production if further additional help is directed into the industry. If this does not entirely remedy the situation and floor space is the problem, I would suggest that the government lease some of its now idle munitions plants which the Minister of Reconstruction has told us to-night are not suitable for other purposes, to meat processors until such time as the situation has, by intelligent planning, been corrected. Let us get on with the job, but let us not saddle the country at this time with meat rationing.

I wish to say a word about the proposal to have a national flag for Canada. I am all for the idea as long as the union jack forms an integral part of that flag.

The ministers of national defence for the various forces are to be complimented upon the efficient manner in which the return of the forces from overseas has been effected, and I wish to express the hope that a further speed-up will result. I trust that the recent announcement which came through from London that there might be a shortage of ships because of certain movements in the Atlantic will not materialize and that everything will work out all right.

I understand that some of the army personnel are being kept in the armies of occupation against their wishes. Surely at this stage of the war service men and officers who have fought through bloody battles in Europe should be able to choose their own location and return home if they so desire. Since much confusion still exists in connection with releases and discharges from the armed services, I would suggest to the ministers that the latest regulations be sent forward to all members of parliament so that they can at least inform their constituencies intelligently as to up-to-date procedures.

Along with most Canadians I heartily approve the government's plan, as mentioned in the speech from the throne, to revise and clarify the definition of Canadian citizenship. This should have been accomplished many years ago.

I now come to what I consider to be the most important item in my speech. While pre-budget comments on the subject of tax reduction made by our able Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), and all the rest of the Liberal candidates, both on the hustings and in the house, lend some cause for hope, nevertheless I observe that in our present Canadian economy our people feel that a substantial tax reduction for all sections of the community is a positive commitment of the government.

During the stress and strain experienced during the war years people have been willing to take it on the chin and to bear the brunt of taxation so long as the patriotic urge of a final and complete victory over our enemies was in the process of being achieved. But now that the war is over they feel that they have a right to expect relief from many of these imposts, and a more careful scrutiny of the national budget seems to be in order. When one considers that after this war we shall have a national debt about five times the size of that of 1939 and a national budget not less than three times the highest pre-war figure, it is time we took the situation in hand. If the results desired seem difficult to achieve at this time owing to fixed charges, commitments, uncontrollable expenditures and the costs of social legislation, all of which are quite in order, then I say it is high time that steps be taken to cut down controllable expenditures, and cut them down to the bone where it is possible to do so.

I respectfully suggest that the country's business is very much like any other business, only on a much larger scale. Where the necessity exists in private business to reduce costs or else suffer extinction, remedies are not long in being found. Usually a situation such as this is carefully analysed and studied; expert advice is sought as to just where the necessary remedies should and could be applied, and then they are applied.

As to government expenditures, I suggest that a special committee of the house be appointed to cooperate with the Minister of Finance in making an exhaustive study of governmental spending. Comparisons should be made between the ordinary expenses of carrying on the government in 1939 and in the present year. Recommendations could then be made as to what steps should be taken to straighten out the whole picture, so that taxes might be reduced and Canadian credit remain at a high level. I respectfully submit that unless early and energetic steps such as these are taken, the next victory loan may receive only lukewarm support in many sections of the country.

There is also little doubt that unless income taxpayers receive some measure of relief this year from their tax burdens, hardships will ensue and incentives to work and produce will be lost. Heavy war-time excess profits taxes on industry should also be removed if the government's own plans for jobs in the post-war period are to be successfully carried out. Psychologically, and from every other angle, the time is here for us to give serious consideration to these problems.

Mr. J. W. MURPHY (Lambton West): Mr. Speaker, may I at this first opportunity compliment you on the high honour that has been conferred upon you? I am sure that you will continue to exercise that necessary degree of tolerance and fairness expected from you, especially to the new members who are not so familiar with the rules, and who rise for the first time, I can assure you, with some trepidation.

May I also extend my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Benidickson) and the seconder (Mr. Langlois) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne? My most sincere congratulations go to these two hon. members, because they chose to serve their king and country in time of war. I am sure that no member of the government or of the other parties to our left will forget that sitting in the ranks of the Progressive Conservative party are also distinguished soldiers, including two holders of the Victoria Cross. To these hon. gentlemen I cannot find words to express my gratitude. It is indeed an honour to be associated with them. It is a healthy sign to see so many young members in this House of Commons, men who are entering the political arena for the first time.

I am very proud to represent the riding of Lambton West, which includes Sarnia, not only because it has the largest oil refinery in the British empire, not because it has also the Polymer Corporation, commonly known as the rubber plant, but because I hope to be of some service to my riding and my country. That is the reason why I am here. I maintain that one must accept his responsibility or take the consequences.

I was sorry, Mr. Speaker, as a new member to hear some of the members to your right and to your left charging the Progressive Conservative party with being responsible for stirring up disunity in the Dominion of Canada. I think that sort of debate is beneath the dignity of this house. Of one thing I am proud, namely, that members of our party cannot be charged, as can the members of some other parties in this house, with spreading the gospel of class hatred, distrust and discontent. Of all hatreds within a country, class hatred is by far the most dangerous, and to those who for political purposes are playing around with such high explosives, may I suggest that before it is too late they desist from such contemptible tactics, and that instead of preaching blue ruin and hoping for a depression so that they can stir up more class hatred, they act as real Canadians and stop selling Canada short. I maintain that our party preached national unity from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and that all would have equal rights, with no favourtism to anyone. Apparently some parts of this great dominion did not choose to take the chance of being treated on an equal basis.

We were elected as members of our respective ridings, but if we are to discharge our responsibilities as members of this house we must have a national outlook and consider that each and everyone of us represents a united Canada. I can best picture my thought by a simple illustration of nine men—I use the figure nine purposely—with their arms so tied and bound that they could not feed themselves and yet had plenty on the table in front of them. They solved their own problems by each feeding the one to his left.

I should like at this time to emphasize that it is a distinct honour for me to represent Lambton West in this house. In 1943 I contested the riding of West Lambton in the provincial arena. The ridings of Lambton West and West Lambton differ somewhat in their boundaries, and in the 1943 provincial election the riding of West Lambton was won by the C.C.F. party by a small majority. That was, as hon. members all remember, the time when the Polymer Corporation was being rushed to completion, and some 4,000 temporary workers from other parts of Canada were engaged in that construction. I may say they did not repeat it on June 4 in the Ontario government election, but ran a low third, the Progressive Conservative of course winning.

Most hon. members know that the dominion riding of Lambton West has been traditionally Liberal. It had a Liberal representative ever since confederation except for one term, when it was ably represented by the highly respected and recently deceased Mr. Le Sueur. It is with great satisfaction I say that the C.C.F. candidate lost his deposit, and thereby helped our Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) to the tune of $200; and if they ever find another C.C.F. candidate we shall assure them of the same generosity. So, Mr. Speaker, I have reason to be proud of being the second representative of our party for Lambton West since confederation.

I should like to quote from one of Canada's most popular and highly respected newspapers, the Windsor Star of last Friday:

> As the Liberals and Progressive Conservatives are the only two parties with any claim to national status, they are the parties who have to look to seats in all parts of the dominion. The other parties do well in this province or that, but they are not national parties. They are sectional groups, speaking for one area only.

To all those who are on the right of you, Mr. Speaker, and to my left, I wish to say, listen to this, and this will be my eulogy of my leader:

> John Bracken is doing all right as leader of the Progressive Conservatives. He is the type of man who wears well and gathers strength as he rolls along. He is never spectacular, but he is impressive.

I wish for a few moments to dwell on the more material angle of my riding. We have heard some reference to sugar beets and the scarcity of sugar. Sugar stocks at Wallaceburg, normally a high production area, are reported as nil and have resulted in the actual importation of 2,000,000 pounds of cane sugar. This action was necessary to provide consumers and processors with even their very much limited ration. We did grow great quantities of sugar beets in Lambton county; and knowing the reasons for the lessened production I did not relish the billboard advertising of some months ago by the wartime prices and trade board, to the effect that there was plenty of sugar in the sugar bowl.

There are two reasons why Lambton county produces less sugar beets than formerly. The first one is common to sugar beet producers in all parts of Canada; that is, the government's much-muddled man-power system or, should I say, lack of system. The second is a serious menace to the sugar beet industry in our locality. It is a fact not known to many hon. members, but I am assured it is known to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). This disease is a nematode, affecting the sugar beet. The entomologists of the Department of Agriculture are well aware of this menace and have made some surveys concerning it. The disease is considered so injurious to the industry that farmers in certain areas are not permitted to ship their beets by truck to the factories but are compelled to ship by railroad. It is feared that in shipping by truck beets may fall off and spread the disease. This same nematode is what created such havoc among the sugar beet growers in Utah. The disease has already spread elsewhere in Ontario. It is a serious situation, and every effort must be made to control and eliminate it entirely; otherwise I fear for the sugar beet industry in Ontario.

Some months ago representation was made to the Minister of Agriculture to take further action, and at the same time representation was made to the minister of agriculture of Ontario. Two creeks, or rather small rivers, which drain thousands of acres of land in this area empty into lake Huron. I have known there to be as much as four and a half feet of sand washed into the mouths of these creeks or rivers, thus preventing proper drainage. As a result of this, vast areas are sometimes under water, which simply means that it accentuates the spread of the disease to other lands. Engineers have suggested that the only way to keep the mouths of these creeks open is by constructing breakwaters at the mouths. The mouths of these creeks are subject to dominion government regulation, and the dominion government is the only agent that can legally rectify the situation. The minister of agriculture of Ontario, realizing the seriousness of the situation, agreed to pay one third of the cost of these breakwaters if the dominion government and the drainage areas paid the balance. It is my earnest desire that the minister will again look into the matter and cooperate to preserve the industry, since not only are all sugar beets subject to infection, but also table beets, carrots and other vegetables. The market gardeners are very much alarmed, and in my riding, owing to boat shipping facilities, market gardening is an industry of no mean proportions. We have many hundreds of acres in Lambton West used for no other purpose than raising vegetables.

At a later date I may have something further to contribute regarding the sugar beet industry, and I may not confine my remarks to the production of sugar beets.

The other subject which I wish to discuss for a few moments is the greatest potential industry in Canada—and I do not purpose to qualify that statement—that is, the tourist industry. Sarnia is within one day's automobile drive in the United States of America of as many people as are in the whole Dominion of Canada. It is little wonder, therefore, that I am and will continue to be interested in the tourist industry.

I have heard with interest of the scheme to beautify the nation's capital. I am in hearty accord with the idea of beautification, and suggest that at Sarnia, where, as I said before, we are the front gate to so many millions of Americans, much could be done as a dominion government undertaking as part of the programme to promote and increase our tourist industry. Every port of entry into Canada gives the tourist his first picture and impression of our country, and I think the federal government could and should lend its aid to the provincial and municipal authorities in the beautification of all these ports, through which flow these great streams of wealth, so essential to our national interests. We are fortunate in having courteous customs and immigration officials who faithfully accept their responsibilities and are a credit to the service. They are the first officials to greet these tourists. Might I at this juncture emphasize and endorse a plea for these competent men, that they receive a wage or remuneration commensurate with their duties and responsibilities. I am advised that they have not received the consideration to which they were and are entitled to monetarily. I believe I am right in saying that their scale of wages has not been raised except on a much too modest scale since 1925. Surely since the depression these men should receive decent wages. I maintain here and now that a man qualified to enter the customs or immigration service should start at not less than $1,800 a year and not $1,200 or thereabouts, and that his increases should be on an equitable merit system.

For those hon. members who do not know, we have in Lambton West some ninety miles of shore line—partly along the St. Clair river and about sixty miles along the shores of lake Huron; a paradise for the American, and it is the American who is developing the shore line. Sarnia is less than sixty miles from Detroit. In 1939, 312,564 cars crossed the Blue Water bridge between Sarnia and Port Huron. Since that time, owing to the war and restrictions, the traffic has been less. But that will give the house an idea of what we may expect by considered planning.

It is not necessary that hon. members be told by me that we live in the best country in the world and that its changing beauty from east to west or north to south is unending and unequalled in its entirety. Nature has largely endowed our land with everything for the contentment and the happiness of our people and for those from other lands and climates who come to visit Canada. Canada must compete with the tourist attractions of other countries which are at all times being expanded and improved. One pre-war year alone, it is estimated, 16,000,000 United States tourists came to Canada, leaving in the country about $300 million. Ninety-five per cent of United States tourists came to Canada on "rubber tires".

We must be prepared not only for a return of this traffic in increased volume but also for those using the even more modern method of transportation, the aeroplane, which will open up our country to those even further removed from our boundaries than those to whom I have already referred.

The tourist traffic is valuable to our national life to a large extent and it might not be amiss to consider 1938 as a normal pre-war year. In 1938 Canada's credit balance of international payments amounted to $184,800,000. A favourable balance in the tourist trade amounted to $145,000,000, or 78·5 per cent of the total credit balance of international payments. If it had not been for the tourist trade, Canada's credit balance of international payments would have been negligible.

Much care and consideration is given by the government to the gold mining industry. Canada's credit balance in gold shipments amount to $156,500,000, or about nine per cent more than the tourist industry.

The Canadian government has established trade commissioners in many foreign countries to sell Canadian products. The credit balance in the tourist trade as mentioned above amounted to $145 million as compared with $180,500,000 credit balance in the external trade, of all merchandise shipped from Canada, including agricultural products.

In 1938, Canada's tourist trade was of greater importance to Canada's national economy than any other single industry, with the exception of gold mining.

As a result of the Atlantic charter a great deal of consideration is being given to foreign trade. To offset this there will be a natural desire on the part of countries to be self-contained, particularly with regard to strategic materials.

Canada will continue to need foreign currency. As in the past one of the greatest sources of this currency will be tourist travel into Canada.

Canada has more at stake per capita in foreign trade than any other country in the world. Foreign travel in Canada, because of its advertising and educational value, could be used to create more foreign trade.

Advertising, better understanding, and a proper interpretation of Canada and Canadians, to foreign countries will be invaluable.

Canada is a large country populated by a relatively small number of people. There are several distinct population centres. Such conditions tend to create misunderstanding, resulting in local discontent and sectional prejudices. There is nothing which will counteract these unhappy conditions more effectively than travel.

The tourist traffic will compare more than favourably with any other industry in the amount of employment produced per dollar expended. Not only is there a direct benefit to farmers, retailers, purveyors of lodging and food, to travel systems, to gasoline and to other entrepreneurs, but this money creates much indirect employment because it passes through all channels of human enterprise. Even as the tourist traffic has become of primary importance to Switzerland, so the tourist traffic could be made of utmost value to Canada's national economy.

Canada abounds in natural attractions. From the Cabot trail in Cape Breton to lovely Victoria, every section has its own national appeal. Much can be done to exploit this.

Canada's facilities for recreation must be regarded as a natural resource to be developed under wise guidance for the benefit of the greatest possible number of people. They are a natural resource, just as our mines, forests, and farm lands are natural resources. They possess only one outstanding difference; they are not exhausted by use. Scenery, climate, and environment can be "sold" over and over again; can be drawn upon in perpetuity without any impairment of the original capital.

Development of Canada's recreational activities as a post-war enterprise has another important advantage over the production of material goods; there is practically no possibility, under reasonably prosperous conditions, of oversupplying the market. Aside from catering to the recreational needs of her own population, Canada has the advantage of lying alongside a great and populous country, perhaps the most travel-minded in the world, well disposed toward Canada and eager to make closer acquaintances. Development of Canada's recreational possibilities on a scale comparable with those of, say, Switzerland, would easily attain a monetary value in excess of a billion dollars a year.

For the past six years Canada has had a great corps of ambassadors all across the world, in the persons of those serving in His Majesty's uniform bearing Canada's name. These men and women have done much to advertise Canada abroad, although that was not their primary objective, but it should be the primary objective of the government of Canada to capitalize on their good work and foster the tourist trade to help make Canada a better country for these returned heroes to live in and as a lasting memorial to those who did not return.

Development of a recreational industry on a large scale will help to solve that problem by bringing a foreign market for our goods to Canada, instead of taking the goods to a foreign market over such obstacles as tariffs, exchange differentials and highly organized and well financed competition. Tourists are good spenders. They will consume substantial quantities of our agricultural products and will buy goods which have a Canadian flavour—maybe a Scotch flavour too—whether of handicraft or factory production, to take back home. They will furnish employment to large numbers of Canadians, who, in turn, because of their increased prosperity, will become greater consumers of Canadian products. They furnish increased revenues to transportation companies, hotels and all enterprises catering to the travelling public, to the wisespread advantage of Canadian economy.

Preservation and promotion of the health of the people must also occupy a prominent place in post-war planning. It would be a natural conclusion that residents of a great country like Canada, blessed with a healthful climate, descending from vigorous antecedents, with pioneer blood still in their veins, would rank high among all nations in the matter of general health. Any such pleasant conclusion has had a severe shock from the facts revealed by medical examination of recruits for war services. It appears, indeed, that Canada needs to take serious counsel with herself as to what she is going to do about the national health.

In a country like Canada, a land of great area and small population, and with even that small population clustered in distinct geographic groups, it is in the national interest that people should travel back and forth to become acquainted with each other, to see each other's problems and circumstances, to form friendships, to acquire the national rather than the parochial point of view.

What is true of the development of a real Canadianism in Canada is equally true in the promotion of friendly foreign relationships. The good will toward Canada felt in the United States has undoubtedly been fostered by the great exchange of travel which in normal times occurs between these two countries. The extent to which that good will has prospered the cause of the united nations in the war would be hard to estimate. At present the interests of the two nations seem to be identical, but it may not always be so, and good will will be needed to assure cooperation and generous attitude on both sides toward issues which may arise in the future. What is true of relationships with the United States is also true, if in lesser degree, of relationships with the other American countries, and with the world as a whole. Making Canada the travel centre of the world after the war will pay dividends in international relationships, including opportunities for international trade, which probably could not be acquired by any other form of investment.

But people will travel. The money poured into the manufacture of munitions and supplies has transformed a large working-class population into a class of people with money to spend.

The tourist industry needs to be retooled and remodelled, to be put on as practical a hard rock basis as any manufacturing industry or service organization, for there is no real difference between them; in tourism we shall get customers only to the extent that our goods are better than those of our competitors.

Tourism to-day is no longer a parochial question. It extends beyond the confines of any one province, for each and every part of our vast dominion is beautiful and attractive. Each of the nine provinces that form our land has its own special attraction and charm for the visitor, and we should all work together, for the common good of the country, to bring about unity out of this very diversity.

Speaking more specifically on the tourist industry and what it means to my riding, I said before that we had ninety miles of shore line. There are at least sixty miles of shore line between Sarnia and Grand Bend on lake Huron which to-day could be developed, as well as some thirty-five miles between Sarnia and Port Lambton along the St. Clair river. Some of it is now owned by Americans who have homes costing upwards of twenty-five thousand dollars. Right here let me emphasize that we welcome the United States tourist who comes even for a few hours; the one who comes for two weeks is worth more as is also the family who come for the season and it is they with whom my riding is chiefly concerned. We appreciate the travelling tourist and every effort should be made to have him return, and ultimately buy a piece of property and build a summer or semi-permanent home. In some parts of Canada, he is of greater value to us nationally. Let me now specify how important this type of tourist is to my riding in particular in that ninety miles of shore line, and the same can no doubt be said of other parts of Canada, but very few places in Canada are so fortunate in having so many so near. There is room for, say, in fifty miles, at least ten thousand homes, assuming it was highly developed and with fair-sized lots, and none of them more than four hundred feet from the shores of lake Huron or the banks of the river St. Clair. The property purchased would be in the neighbourhood of ten million dollars; the total building costs in the neighbourhood of fifty million dollars, and I have reason to believe that every American with a summer home spends on an average one thousand dollars annually. This in round figures is ten million dollars a year in our riding alone. The Americans will also buy many items of British manufacture in addition to Canadian-made goods. This extends our trade with Britain, and by these purchases we readily obtain foreign exchange including sterling so necessary in international trade. No other industry can compare with this. This is Canadian material used and made by Canadians and a means to-day to employ thousands of returning veterans, and in addition I say that the quicker we have the materials, the sooner we develop our greatest industry. We all agree that about eighty per cent of the cost of a frame house is labour, lumber and cement. At the moment we have a shortage of many building materials, including lumber.

May I submit that we need not have discovered ourselves in this position if the manpower of the nation had been properly used, and if our bifocal army—the term I borrowed from the hon. minister from Vancouver-Burrard—

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Minister?

Mr. MURPHY: I was just elevating him about four years ahead of time.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): From Vancouver-Burrard?

Mr. MURPHY: I am a little deaf. I sometimes hear more intelligent sounds from the cradle.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Hear, hear.

Mr. MURPHY: The baby was not crying for milk either. Now let me finish my sentence: If our bifocal army had been otherwise engaged, or at least some part of it.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Go on with Sarnia.

Mr. MURPHY: You heard from Sarnia on June 11, and you will hear from Sarnia at the next election.

Mr. MACKENZIE: You heard from Canada.

Mr. MURPHY: The country now finds itself not only without proper homes for our returning veterans who were promised so much, but also with a serious shortage of building materials to construct these homes which are so sorely needed.

Between Sarnia and Grand Bend, a shore line of some sixty miles, there is not a harbour for the protection of commercial fishermen. In the event of a storm, some may head for Sarnia; others have to beach their boats. Harbours are their only protection, and may I say in this connection that the two creeks or rivers I referred to previously as not having proper outlets, could be made into ideal natural harbours if proper and not necessarily expensive breakwaters were constructed. These harbours would also bring in many United States boats and sailing craft and be a tremendous factor in promoting our tourist industry.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Boats?

Mr. MURPHY: I may tell my hon. friend I can take care of myself.

Mr. MacNICOL: You would not expect much from a cradle.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Family allowances.

Mr. MURPHY: I have heard about the dodo bird before. Many of these people, if they could harbour their boats, would erect summer homes of no mean proportion, and of this I have been assured. We should have a dominion tourist commission or the tourist industry under a senior minister of the crown to give the necessary support and cooperation the industry warrants.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say first, that I should like to learn the French language. I like your pleasant accent and, if I could, I would go down among your compatriots and teach them to sing, "I am beginning to see the light."

I earnestly hope that when the dominion-provincial conference again convenes the tourist industry will be a subject of major consideration, that the dominion and the provinces will correlate their activities so that we may take advantage of all that we have so much of an abundance to offer, and I can assure my hon. friends to the right of you, Mr. Speaker, that if the present government does the best it can possibly do, the Progressive Conservative government will finish the job after the next general election.

On motion of Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni) the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, September 18, 1945.

The house met at three o'clock.

STANDING COMMITTEES

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS—EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That standing order 63 be amended by striking out the words "and international" in subsection (j) and adding after subsection (k): (l) On external affairs, to consist of 20 members, 8 of whom shall constitute a quorum.

He said: Hon. members will recall that it was suggested by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) a few days ago that the committee on industrial and international relations should be divided into two separate committees, one having to do with labour and industrial relations and the other with commonwealth and foreign relations—I think those are the words my hon. friend used. I mentioned that at a previous session of parliament the same suggestion had been made. It was, I think, by my hon. friend the leader of the C.C.F. group (Mr. Coldwell). At the time I intimated that that course might be advisable.

As I said the other day, I think it is desirable to have two separate committees, one on industrial relations and the other on external relations. I chose the words "industrial relations" and "external affairs" as being sufficiently comprehensive to include all that has been suggested. The leader of the opposition suggested, if I remember rightly, a committee on "labour and industrial relations". Of course, labour is one party to industry, and by using the expression "industrial relations", other parties, which would include management, capital and the community, would be included. I should think the more comprehensive designation would be the preferable.

In regard to international relations my hon. friend suggested "commonwealth and foreign relations". Here again I feel that the term "international relations" or "external affairs" would be broader and would include everything which is suggested by "commonwealth and foreign relations". The term "external affairs" has been used by different governments of the commonwealth in dealing with matters pertaining not only to relations between the different nations of the commonwealth, but also with regard to matters that relate to foreign countries. It is important that the distinction should be kept between foreign affairs and those affairs that might be regarded as interimperial or commonwealth. But all are included in the term "external affairs". The term was used when the Department of External Affairs was created to cover both relations within the commonwealth and relations with foreign countries. I therefore feel it would be preferable to use the term "external affairs" rather than "commonwealth and foreign relations".

The conference which was held in London in 1926 drew up a statement of the relations as they now exist within the commonwealth, and defined the position which had been attained by the dominions as well as by the United Kingdom. In what is known as the Balfour declaration the term used is "domestic and external affairs," there being no subordination one way or the other between the dominions in regard to the control of their own affairs, whether domestic or external, and the United Kingdom and its control of its affairs, domestic or external.

In these circumstances I would suggest that to use the term "industrial relations" in the one case and "external affairs" in the other for the names of the two committees would be the more appropriate; and may I say that the government is only too happy to have these two committees established in place of the one which at present exists.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I am very glad to see this motion moved, and I think the Prime Minister's suggestion as to the naming of the committees is a good one. It seems to me accurately to portray what those committees should be concerned with.

But there is one phase of the motion which I want to draw to his attention—that it provides for only twenty members, eight of whom shall constitute a quorum. I think that this is a very important committee; more members of the house are interested in external affairs than in some of the other committees where the membership runs up to well over fifty. Indeed there is only one standing committee with a smaller number of members, and that is on debates, where we have twelve members.

The proposal for the industrial committee is, as I take it, that it remain at thirty-five members; and it seems to me that this very important committee on external affairs should have a membership at least equal to that of the industrial committee, because many members of the house will want to be on that committee.

Then, too, there are in the house at the present time several parties, all of whom will want some membership on that committee, and twenty, it seems to me, does not give the necessary representation.

I do not want to move that "20" be struck out and "35" substituted therefor. I believe that one has only to draw the matter to the attention of the Prime Minister and a satisfactory solution will be arrived at.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that after the notice was placed on the order paper the Clerk drew to my attention the fact that the numbers he had inserted were "20" and "8", and I really intended to mention that if the house wished to have a larger number, a larger number could be immediately substituted. With the consent of the house I would have "35" substituted for "20" and "10" for "8" in the resolution, which would make the membership of the external affairs committee the same as that of the committee on industrial relations.

Motion as amended agreed to.

CANADIAN NAVY

INQUIRY AS TO CONDITIONS OF POST-WAR RECRUITMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): I wish to ask the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services a question in regard to a statement which appeared in the Vancouver Daily Province to the effect that recruiting for the navy was to be opened for 4,000 out of a post-war total of 12,000. It pointed out also that those who were applying were largely civilians, but that increasing numbers of those now being demobilized were anxious to get into the permanent naval service. Would the minister be good enough to make a statement with regard to this, as to whether it applies all over Canada and whether these recruits will enter direct into the Royal Canadian Navy or, as hitherto in recent years, into the volunteer reserve?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): I did not see the press item to which my hon. friend refers, but the position, as I think the house is aware, is this. A week or ten days ago—it may be two weeks—recruiting in all three services was authorized in what was referred to as an interim force, the term of enlistment to be for a period to expire on September 30, 1947. No definite number for these recruitments has been fixed, and so far no definite decision has been taken as to the size of the permanent force in any of the three services. The enlistments for these interim forces are being taken from those who are now serving. One of the main purposes in arranging for such enlistments now was to give men who might be interested in serving in the permanent forces after the war the assurance that over the next two years they would have a definite engagement and they would be able to decide, after the conditions and the size of the permanent forces were known, whether or not they would wish to serve in them. The statement which was issued at the time this type of enlistment was authorized indicated that men who enlisted for this special term would be given special consideration for enlistment in the permanent forces.

Mr. FRASER: Further in regard to the question asked the Minister of National Defence by the member for Yale, will the minister say whether the boys who wish to sign up in the Royal Navy have to sign for seven years, or has that been reduced to five?

Mr. STIRLING: The Royal Navy?

Mr. FRASER: The Royal Canadian Navy.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think it is still seven years, but I will make inquiries and give an answer to-morrow. I believe it is still seven years.

MEAT RATIONING

CONFERENCE BETWEEN GOVERNMENT AND MEAT DEALERS ASSOCIATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. C. SENN (Haldimand): I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister or the responsible minister in charge of the department under which this matter comes. Owing to differences of opinion and some misunderstanding which I think exist throughout Canada to-day with respect to the rationing of meat, will the government undertake that the conference which is to be held to-morrow between government representatives and the Retail Meat Dealers association be held in public, so that the widest possible information regarding meat rationing may be available to the people of Canada? I know a number of members who would like to attend that gathering.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I should wish to consult with the Minister of Finance before giving an answer to that question. There are advantages in having the conference in public, and there are distinct advantages also in having some conferences held in private where matters of a technical character are being discussed and where suggestions are being put forward by different sides. In most of these matters, I think, the government usually leaves it to the parties themselves. In this matter I should think that it might be advisable to ascertain in advance the opinion of the members of the wartime prices and trade board, since they will have a good deal to do and say in the matters that are being discussed. However, I am not giving any final word at the moment.

Mr. SENN: Would it be possible for us to be informed in time to attend if it is decided to hold the conference in public?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should not like to say that the government would make an announcement on the radio, but we might have it understood that if hon. members will inquire of the officials at the front door the information will be given to them at least an hour before the committee meets.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): In view of the interest in this subject and the lack of knowledge on the part of members of parliament of the real situation regarding both meat in storage and shipping facilities needed and stock available for slaughter, might we have a detailed statistical statement placed before the house by one of the ministers? We cannot all attend this meeting, but we are all getting resolutions and telegrams. While I think we have to do all we can to feed the hungry people of Europe, and I am thoroughly in favour of any rationing that may be necessary, I find it difficult to answer inquiries that are coming in, because we have never had quite the statement we require to appraise the situation accurately.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will direct the attention of the Minister of Finance to my hon. friend's inquiry.

[Mr. Senn.]

BRICKLAYERS' STRIKE IN EDMONTON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. PATRICK H. ASHBY (Edmonton East): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Has the minister been informed of the bricklayers' strike now being held in Edmonton? If so, would the minister consider immediately the setting up of an arbitration board to settle the bricklayers' strike, which is holding up the wartime housing programme in Edmonton?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I have knowledge of the bricklayers' strike in Edmonton. I understand that employers and employees have come to an agreement on all points with the exception of one, which is to pay bricklayers, when they work within ten miles of the city of Edmonton, board and transportation in addition to the regular hourly rate. Unfortunately the province of Alberta in its judgment did not adopt the labour relations regulations with respect to provincial activities, and under the circumstances the federal government, the Minister of Labour, has no authority to set up a board of arbitration or even of conciliation. Might I suggest to my hon. friend that he address his question to the minister of trade and industry in Edmonton, under whose jurisdiction is administration of labour relations in the province of Alberta.

POSTAL SERVICE

DAILY MAIL DELIVERIES IN URBAN RESIDENTIAL AREAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General. Is consideration being given to the restoration of two mail deliveries a day in urban residential areas? In other words, will the war-time practice of sending urban mail carriers on two different walks a day soon come to an end?

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Postmaster General): We still have a large number of employees in the armed forces. As soon as they return in sufficient numbers we intend to resume that service.

HOUSING

NEED OF PLUMBING MATERIALS FOR CONSTRUCTION OF SOLDIERS' HOUSES

On the orders of the day.

Mr. NORMAN J. A. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): I have just received a long distance telephone communication, and I have had no opportunity of consulting with the ministers concerned. Perhaps the responsible minister would allow this to stand as notice of a question. It appears that in the finishing of soldiers' homes, which in a good many urban centres are being rushed to completion by reason of the cold weather, there is a tie-up through the freezing of plumbing fixtures, bath-tubs and so on. I was informed over long distance an hour ago that there are in the airports in St. Catharines, where I come from, hundreds of units of this equipment. Will the appropriate minister inquire whether it would be possible to release them directly in order to get these houses completed rather than have them sent through the channels of the War Assets Corporation, which is a tedious and tiresome procedure? It is urgent that these houses be completed before the cold weather sets in. Dozens of houses in my locality are in need of this equipment, and I suggest that something be done to expedite matters. The equipment is lying there. The Nobel plant has been mentioned. I would ask the appropriate minister to deal with this matter.

MERCHANT SEAMEN

SPECIAL BONUS FOR SERVICE IN DANGEROUS WATERS—S.S. "PRINCE EDWARD"

On the orders of the day:

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): On Friday of last week the junior member for Queens (Mr. McLure) asked if the seamen on the steamship Prince Edward are entitled to the special bonus. Since then, and before, the senior member for Queens (Mr. Douglas) has also made representations on behalf of the same seamen. I have had inquiries made and am now able to reply to my hon. friends as follows.

The merchant seamen special bonus order, P.C. 3227 of the 3rd May, 1945, provides for the payment of a bonus of ten per cent of earnings of seamen serving on Canadian ships, who have performed at least six months' service in dangerous waters between September 10, 1939, and April 1, 1944.

The definition of "dangerous waters" means waters in respect of which war risk bonus is paid.

The seamen serving on the S.S. Prince Edward have been receiving war risk bonus by a ruling from the national war labour board which came into effect on February 26, 1943. The said seamen would therefore be entitled to the merchant seamen special bonus of ten per cent of their earnings from February 26, 1943 until April 1, 1944, upon making an application in the approved form to the director of merchant seamen, Department of Transport, Ottawa.

WAR MATERIALS

LOANS TO SCHOOLS OF CERTAIN TYPES OF EQUIPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. CASE (Grey North): The Minister of Reconstruction last evening referred in his address to certain war materials that would be lent to schools, the title remaining with the crown. Will it be lent for an indefinite period, and on what condition?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): I believe I stated that it was lent for an indefinite period. There is a special officer of the War Assets Corporation whose duty it is to be in touch with educational institutions. If my hon. friend will write to the corporation he will be referred to the proper officer.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Monday, September 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. M. Benidickson for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Bracken, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. J. L. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, it is with a feeling of trepidation that I rise to address the house for the first time, but having seen how well the other tyro members have done I am glad to jump in and join in the debate. In this my first address to the house I should like to emphasize the fact that I am an independent. I believe that there has been some discussion on that point. I believe that my ballot paper overseas was marked "Independent Liberal", but I should like to clear up that point and say that I am following along in the tradition of Comox-Alberni as a straight independent, and in my vote in the house I shall try to reflect the opinions and the wishes of the people of Comox-Alberni who sent me here.

The constituency of Comox-Alberni consists of the northern and western three-quarters of Vancouver island. It is the constituency of which Mr. Rudyard Kipling once said, in a masterpiece of understatement, that it was the fairest jewel in the British crown.

At this time I should like to pay a tribute to the gentleman whom I have the honour to succeed. I am quite certain that all the old-timers in this house will recall with great affection and high regard Mr. A. W. Neill, the former member for the constituency. I have been particularly pleased since I came to Ottawa to find in all groups and sections of this house, and also among the civil service, that he was very affectionately regarded. As a matter of fact that is just the way we have always felt about Mr. Neill in Comox-Alberni, and I am particularly proud to be here to succeed him. I should like to tell the house at the same time that the only reason I am here succeeding him is that he did not choose to run again.

I should like to congratulate you, Mr. Speaker, on your election to the high office of first commoner. I should also like to congratulate the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) and the hon. member for Gaspe (Mr. Langlois) on the able way in which they opened the debate. On behalf of the Liberals in the constituency of Comox-Alberni, I express my thanks to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and to the members of his cabinet for the able way in which they administered the affairs of Canada during the past five years. I wish also to convey to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken), who has taken over the reins of office, the very high regard in which he is held by the Conservatives of Comox-Alberni. To the hon. members of the Conservative party who were in opposition during the last five years I extend the thanks of my constituency for the able job they did at that time.

Now, coming to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) I should like to say that a number of people in my constituency are adherents of his, and now that I have met the hon. gentleman I must say that I can well realize why he is held in affection by that large number of people—there were more than I expected on election day. He is very highly regarded there.

I come now to the Social Credit party. They have a new leader in the house, and I congratulate him on his election. I should also like to mention the former leader who was in the last parliament. I thank him on behalf of my constituency for the contribution that he made. I am sorry that the philosophy of social credit has not penetrated to the dark fastness of Comox-Alberni. I sincerely trust that my position here, adjacent to the hon. members, will allow me to acquire some of their philosophy.

I was particularly interested in the speech of the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Ashby). He made a suggestion that was very interesting to me. He said it was possible that we might pay an old age pension of $100 a month at age forty. In one more year I shall qualify for that. I was particularly interested as an independent, because the past tradition of independence in this house does not lead me to believe that I shall be put out into the lush pastures when I have lost my usefulness; therefore I really believe that he has something there that will interest me greatly.

I was disappointed when I read the speech from the throne, because of its obvious omission. I feel that I would not be maintaining the standards of Comox-Alberni if I did not point out that we were not told anything about our Japanese problem and the solution of it. Hon. members, of course, are accustomed to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni bringing up this vital point. Now that the government's dispersal policy has brought the problem into almost every constituency in Canada, I am hopeful that the British Columbia members—there are eleven of us to whom this is a most vital problem; the other five, of course, are "agin us"—will receive the support of other hon. members in the house.

I should like to make it very clear—and I am not going to take up a lot of time on the Japanese question now, because we shall have time to discuss the problem later—that our opposition to the Japanese in British Columbia is not based on the matter of race. If hon. members knew them as well as we do they would find that our opposition is based upon the fact—and I have lived among them for thirty years—that they are not loyal and never have been, and I do not expect they ever will be, to Canada. The Prime Minister felt that it was a wise course to appoint a quasi-judicial committee to look into the matter, but I believe the proper time to judge the loyalty of the Japanese citizens in this country was after Pearl Harbor—about a week after that—and at the time of Singapore, and at the time we lost the Prince of Wales and Repulse. We could have decided then, and I believe we would have had many more of them who would have applied to return to Japan than will do so now after they have had Mr. Howe's atomic bomb.

I would be remiss in my duty to my constituents of Comox-Alberni and to the members of the government if I did not present a true picture of how we feel in our constituency—and I may say I have the temerity to speak for the other ten constituencies I mentioned—if I did not say that I believe the people of Comox-Alberni are definitely determined that the Japanese shall never return to British Columbia again.

I was glad to note yesterday that the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) injected into this debate the subject of the monopoly of the American Can company in British Columbia. As a canner in British Columbia I should like to bring before this house some of the facts in that regard. I charge definitely that the American Can company could have prevented the loss of fish and vegetables at the time of the strike had they so desired. Make no mistake about it; they were definitely aware that this strike was coming. They could have provided every cannery in British Columbia with all the cans they required to put up all the food we had there at the time. Instead of taking that course they supplied the large canners in British Columbia. It is significant that at the time not one large cannery in the province ran out of cans. Because of the fact that the small canners did not find it possible to put up the necessarily large amounts of money required, they were unable to get a large stock of cans ahead to carry them through that strike. Speaking for our own cannery, we are 5,000 cases of salmon short in our pack this year because we did not have enough cans in storage prior to the strike. Definitely that was because the American Can company put their cash dividends and money matters ahead of the necessity of providing food for the people overseas; that is why we are now short a large part of our normal pack of salmon and vegetables in British Columbia. When I mention the figure of 5,000 cases I am referring to one cannery only. Numerous other small canneries were involved to the same extent. Five thousand cases represents 200,000 cans, which means salmon for 200,000 British families for one week. When you multiply that by possibly ten canneries of the size of ours, you can see that it will make a tremendous difference in the food supplies available to people overseas. I am particularly anxious that the small farmers and fishermen of British Columbia should never again find themselves in the position that this large United States monopoly will have a stranglehold on them, as has been the case in the past.

I am glad to see that our new Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Bridges) has come into the house, and I particularly want to congratulate him on his appointment to this high office. I hope very soon he may be able to take time off to come out and visit us on the Pacific coast, where I can assure him he will receive a royal welcome. His predecessor as minister, the present Postmaster General (Mr. Bertrand) has left an enduring monument to his administration in the Hell's Gate fisheries project. I understand about a million dollars was spent there, but I can assure the house that this amount will be returned in new wealth every year as a result of the work done at that point. As yet I have not run into this mysterious treasury board which was mentioned yesterday by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank), but I sincerely trust that in future it will look with more favour upon the estimates of the Minister of Fisheries. Every time during the war years we asked the fisheries department to make any expenditures we were given the same answer, that there were more important things to do in connection with the war; and with that attitude I was largely in agreement. Now, however, the time has come when the fisheries department can make a valuable contribution to the economy not only of British Columbia but of Canada as a whole, and I should like to think that the regime of the new minister will come to be known as the golden age for the fisheries of my province.

Soon the budget speech will be brought down. I share with most Canadians a high regard for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) for the splendid job he has done. I should like to point out, however, that our present system is really one of incentive, and, that being so, as long as the excess profits tax remains in operation the incentive is taken away. I may be telling tales out of school, because I know the Department of National Revenue is highly efficient, but so often I have heard of someone who was said to be "taking a trip on Ilsley" or "buying a bottle of Scotch on Ilsley" and so on. Perhaps the Excess Profits Tax Act actually has worked against the best interests of Canada. I should also hope that in the new budget some reduction will be made in the taxes now imposed upon the small wage-earners; surely we can manage that. We should go ahead and finance this year for our ordinary expenditures, but I suggest that extraordinary expenditures in connection with demobilization, reconstruction and so on should be budgeted over a period of five years. You will note that I am expecting the government to remain in office for five years. If a proper job is done during this reconstruction period I should think it even possible that the government might last for ten years.

If I might make another suggestion to the Minister of Finance, I would point out that this year the income of the pilchard fishermen on the west coast of Vancouver island has been almost nil. It seems to me only fair that those engaged in industries where there may be such wide fluctuations should have the privilege of spreading their income over a three-year period and paying their taxes on that basis, just as we have done for those in the fishing industry and in agriculture.

There has been a good deal of discussion here in regard to housing, and in that connection mention has been made of the lumber shortage. I was glad to notice that finally, in response to requests from several hon. members on this side of the house, statements were made from the ministerial benches giving us some idea of what may be the policy of the government with regard to housing, which of course ties in with reconstruction. Two days ago I had a telephone call from a British Columbia lumberman advising me that he was short 150 employees. I should like to point out that his plant is only three hours' drive from Vancouver, where at the same time we had thousands of men demonstrating, asking for severance pay and a continuation of uneconomic industries so that they might not have to move out of town. This lumberman's plant is in a large town, which is just as modern as this city of Ottawa, so that there is no reason in the world why men should not move out to those jobs. When I refer to loggers and saw mill workers in British Columbia I should like hon. members to note that the average wage is around 80 cents an hour in our saw-mills and at least $1 an hour in the logging camps, so that taking these jobs would not involve any great economic hardship.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the homes for them to live in?

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): They are close to the source of supply of lumber, in Port Alberni, and we can build them homes. I think the real solution of this problem must be for the people in the large cities, who have been drawn there to do war work, to get back to where our real primary wealth lies; that is, away from the great centres of population. Those are the places from which these people have come, and those are the places to which they will have to return.

When I speak of the lumber camps in British Columbia I should not like the house to get the impression which was conveyed the other day by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Archibald), who told the house that the loggers on the Queen Charlotte islands were living under the most primitive conditions. I have lived in logging camps for the last thirty years—

Mr. ARCHIBALD: So have I.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I think you spent most of your time in the post office.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I worked in the camps.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I do not think you worked in the camps very much. I would have my hon. friend know that the accommodation and food in the logging camps of British Columbia are infinitely better than in the city of Ottawa. Any time hon. members have an opportunity to come to British Columbia I shall be glad to give them a real logging camp meal. Only once since coming to Ottawa have I had anything to compare with it—and I must mention that occasion now because I see my host sitting here in the house. I can assure him, however, that I say this with great sincerity.

I should like to congratulate the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) upon his most able address delivered last night. But, if he does not mind my giving him a slight suggestion, I would say that he has a difficult job on his hands, in the vast department he administers, if he is going to try to run interference for every one of the, let us say, brass hats—I believe I have heard them called that—working under him in his department. I refer to brass hats both in and out of uniform.

The minister is a busy man, and I know, too, that he is very much overworked. Perhaps some time he would be able to come to Comox, and if he does I should like to take him fishing. I know that if he did that it would do him a tremendous amount of good, and provide him with the rest he so badly needs. While we are trolling along I will see that he gets some salmon, and I shall also take him and show him some charred hulks of valuable landing barges we have out there. I do not take the minister to task for this, because I know he has been extremely busy, but I would convey to him the thought that if occasionally some hon. members in the house question the disposal of war assets he ought not to run interference too readily. I believe him to be a man who is extremely loyal to the officials associated with him, and for that I honour him greatly. I suggest to him, however, that the real intention of hon. members sitting over here is that of being helpful, and that they have no desire only to be critical.

Many people have been bothering the Minister of Finance about meat rationing. Just how meat and money go together has always been somewhat of a mystery to me. I say to the minister, however, that the present meat ration when applied to logging camps in British Columbia is entirely inadequate. We hear talk about a man living on a pound and a third of meat per week, but those of us who buy meat to keep our commissaries supplied in the logging camps have found that it takes a pound of meat per man per day to supply their requirements. I do not think we should cut down the ration of those who are doing very heavy work. As a matter of fact, in a masterpiece of overstatement, one man said that it was a day's work to walk around one of our trees. I suggest that some special consideration should be given to the men in the logging camps who eat in the camp cook houses, and also to the people who, while occupied in that industry, live in their homes, and go from those homes to their work. They require substantial lunches, and need three heavy meals a day.

An hon. MEMBER: What about coal miners?

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I agree with the hon. member, but I have always understood that after working in the mines, and under mining atmospheric conditions, their appetites are not as hearty. But if they require more meat, in view of the heavy work they are doing, they should have it.

Since coming to Ottawa I have been deeply impressed by the many courtesies and kindnesses I have received from members of the civil service in this city. I pay tribute to the members of that service, realizing that all too often people in other parts of Canada do not realize what a fine job is being done here.

I interpret the approaching vote as one of confidence in the government. As I have seen no sign that hon. members on the opposition side of the house could get together and replace the government now in office, I feel that in the present instance I shall vote with the government.

Mr. E. B. McKAY (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, may I first congratulate the mover (Mr. Benidickson) and the seconder (Mr. Langlois) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Veterans generally will appreciate the recognition accorded the armed services by the selection of these two very fine young men to lead off the debate. I trust that veterans in the house on every side will cooperate in seeing that our returning service personnel are not only properly housed, but receive decent jobs; and also that those who are disabled as a result of war service receive not only compensation but satisfactory treatment for any injury so received.

I represent the constituency of Weyburn, and in being so selected I feel that I have been highly honoured. It is no easy task to follow in the footsteps of the former member for Weyburn, who is now premier of Saskatchewan, the Hon. T. C. Douglas. It is Weyburn, too, that was the home of the South Saskatchewan regiment, which so ably distinguished itself at the battle of Dieppe.

Most people are aware of the fact that Weyburn is a typical agricultural community. Because it is such, it is my purpose at this time to deal with certain facts pertaining to agriculture, and to outline as briefly as I can some of the policies of the C.C.F. in regard to that major industry.

In spite of our vast war-time development, agriculture is still Canada's No. 1 industry. According to the 1941 census, twenty-five per cent of our workers are still following agricultural pursuits, while twenty-three per cent of the workers are engaged in other industries. Moreover, many of the workers in those other industries are employed in factories which, in order to operate successfully, must depend upon raw materials from the farms.

In a recent bulletin the Canadian association on adult education stated that 126,000 young people left the prairie provinces in recent years to seek outside those provinces employment in industries which are more remunerative than the industry they have been accustomed to serve, namely agriculture.

It is a tragic story that many of these people come from rural homes. The 1931 census, which dates back another ten years, reveals for the first time in our history that there were more people living in urban centres in Canada than there were in rural areas, and during the last decade the trend to the city has been definitely accelerated. Obviously that is a most serious situation. The basic reason, notwithstanding war conditions, is that farming is unattractive to a large part of our population. It holds out few inducements to our young people; and while it has been more profitable within the last few years, owing to a false condition of war prosperity, most farmers realize that it is far from a permanent period of prosperity.

Most young people and their farm parents are all too familiar with the vicissitudes of farm life. They recall all too vividly those distressing days when they received the pittance known as relief. I am sure all hon. members are aware that during the depression agriculture suffered a tremendous loss of income. I wonder just how many know that that loss of income amounted to two-thirds of what it was in normal times. Between 1928 and 1933 it went even lower than that. Many do not realize that since the last war the farmer has never received a fair share of the national income. His share is still too low, even now, in relation to other sections of our population. In normal times one-third of our people live on the farms, but never since the last war have the farmers received one-third of the national income. During the decade 1930 to 1940, not so long ago, that income fell to one-tenth of the national income. It is obvious, then, that so long as farm folk receive this inadequate share of the national income there will be difficult days for agriculture.

The advisory committee on reconstruction has expressed itself thus regarding agricultural policy:

> Agriculture cannot be made attractive to those seeking a means of living unless it can be restored to its historic position of self-dependence and self-respect. The price received by the farmer for his products must be such as will maintain a standard of living comparable to that enjoyed by urban communities and adequate to supply farmers and their families with the ordinary conveniences and comforts of life.

Prosperity for agriculture definitely depends on world markets. The United nations conference on food and agriculture, which met in the United States in 1943, stated:

> The world's agriculture must be organized and expanded to provide enough of the right kind of food for everyone.

Statements emanating from the San Francisco conference were to the effect that two-thirds of the world's present population is still underfed. Contrary to the belief of some upholders of free enterprise, overproduction was not thought possible for years to come. This is, of course, provided that the world is to be properly fed. The C.C.F. wholeheartedly supports the efforts of the food conference to lower trade barriers and to establish a permanent international organization on food and agriculture. Such an organization will have sufficient data, we hope, to plan scientifically to meet the world's needs in an orderly way. Any other system permitting of disorganization such as we have seen in the past, when our grain elevators in western Canada were bursting with grain, while hundreds of thousands of people in our Canadian cities were going hungry and millions more were going hungry across the seas will only develop into a condition of trade rivalry and economic chaos.

I doubt that security for agriculture is attainable in Canada without the stability provided by external commitments, these arranged through international agreement. We welcome the government's efforts to obtain such agreements. But important as export markets are, the chief demand for farm products is here at home. The consumption of food stuffs has materially increased during the war years, and the reason is obvious to anyone. It is because people now receive more money with which to buy these goods. Yet in spite of that, many of our people are still living without sufficient of these necessities of life.

Surveys show us that urban dwellers consume less than one pint of milk a day, that in forty per cent of our homes cheese is virtually unknown, and that if everyone had sufficient meat to eat we would consume in Canada more than three hundred million pounds of meat more than we do now. It is also interesting to note that three-quarters of our population eat less than one egg a day, the cheapest and most nutritive food we have. Let us then keep in mind this vast home market.

Everyone in this house will appreciate the need for social security measures so that the living standards of our people may be raised, and help provide healthful living for the children of these families. Besides, such measures will definitely increase the demand for farm products.

This group will continue to advocate research in the field of chemurgy. Dyson Carter, in his book "So Man May Prosper" states that one hundred American factories are utilizing the products of the farm to-day to produce synthetic materials. Oil, industrial alcohol, syrup, plastics, are produced in this manner. All of us know that during the great European war just concluded a large number of vehicles ran on rubber made from low-grade grains in urban factories. We are also advised that cotton is a synthetic product that can be made from low-grade grains. This should interest Canadians, who import each year large quantities of cotton for domestic consumption. The western members of the C.C.F. regret in this connection that no branch of the industrial development bank has been established on the prairies. Small industries dependent on raw materials from the farm must of necessity be established in western Canada if we are to stabilize western Canadian agriculture. Such industries would utilize any surplus which may accumulate and do much to balance western Canadian economy. They would also provide thousands of jobs for our young people, who now travel to distant parts of the land in search of work.

Reference is made in the speech from the throne to the government's policy of floors under farm products. Commendable as that may be, we in this corner of the house believe it would be much more satisfactory to establish basic parity prices for all farm products, these prices to bear a direct relationship to the cost of production—not a floor price but a price that varies with the changing cost of production and is related to the cost of goods which the farmer buys and uses.

Buying and equipping a farm costs a considerable sum of money, and operating costs vary little whether the crop be large or small. Canada has been protecting her manufacturing for quite some time. But no protection has been afforded agriculture except during war time. The agriculturists of this country have to compete in a world open market in order to sell their goods. Protective tariffs have cost this country enormous sums of money. According to the late Hon. Norman Rogers, testifying before a royal commission dealing with the relationships of Nova Scotia with the rest of Canada, these are the actual figures: in 1931 Canadians paid $425 millions more than the world level of competitive prices to sustain their manufacturing plants. That amount was $40 per capita, or $200 per family of five persons, and whether or not a Liberal or a Conservative government has been at Ottawa has made little change in these schedules. Protection for manufacturing has increased our living costs, and if we can afford to do that for a secondary industry I insist that we should do the same thing for Canada's first industry, agriculture. The establishment of parity prices for farm produce commensurate with changing costs of production would do for the farmer what has been done in this country for the manufacturing interests for generations.

In addition to suggestions which I have offered, we of this group insist that better credit facilities be provided for the farming industry. In 1941 the "Canada Year Book" stated that forty-eight per cent of our owner-operated farms were mortgaged, and the average throughout Canada was $2,372 per farm. In the west the situation was even more serious. Credit unions have done us considerable service in western Canada and, I believe, in the province of Quebec, but this excellent cooperative enterprise, while it has rendered outstanding service, has its hands more or less tied. The C.C.F. has long advocated, and still continues to do, that an agricultural bank for western Canada and for eastern Canada be established in order that mortgages may be refinanced at 2½ per cent interest. The government did establish an institution known as the industrial bank. It was apparently to assume the most risky and unprofitable post-war credit operations, namely the financing of small industry. Instead of bringing our credit system under social control, the government hopes that that institution will facilitate the construction of small industries which in pre-war days could not get credit. The efforts of this group at the time the industrial bank was set up to establish an agricultural institution of a similar kind fell on deaf ears.

Another part of our policy would be the appropriation of funds for water conservation and for irrigation of areas, particularly in western Canada, that are subject to drought. Such a programme would preserve our farms and at the same time would provide post-war employment. Projects of this kind in the United States have been particularly successful, and we are informed by practical and experienced engineers that they are feasible on both the Saskatchewan and the Red Deer rivers. Definitely that programme will be a necessary part of our post-war industrial development, on which the Saskatchewan government has already embarked on a small scale.

In reference to crop insurance I should say this, that those crops, no matter whether they be in western or eastern Canada, which because of the nature of their production carry great risks, should definitely be protected. It is essential to the stability of agriculture. The present government's policy, implemented by the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, of providing a maximum of $2.50 an acre when the area is declared to be an emergency area owing to drought, is excellent as far as it goes, but I would suggest that that amount be increased from $2.50 an acre to $6 an acre and that payments be on an individual farm basis rather than on a township basis as is at present the case. The cost of such a programme could be calculated when computing the basic parity prices set for agricultural products.

Reference has been made in this house by several speakers to the income tax. I suggest that some consideration be given to the position of the farmer's wife who normally performs all the duties of an urban wife together with many heavy burdens of outdoor tasks. Frequently her labour saves the hiring of extra help which normally would be chargeable against the expense of operating the farm unit. I suggest that a further exemption be granted the farmer to take care of this situation.

Last, but not least, it would appear to a good many of us that farming conditions must be made more attractive if young people who are being discharged from our armed services are to return to the farms. While serving in the Royal Canadian Air Force as a personnel counsellor, in a period of three months I had 106 boys come to me who were formerly from farms. Of those 106 only twenty-three indicated any inclination to return to farm life. That seems a serious situation, but on inquiry the reason seemed obvious. Briefly, I will put it in this way. They have seen urban life, and they too vividly recall the days of distress they went through at the time of adolescence. Roughly speaking, only twenty per cent of our farm homes have electric current with which to do labour. Only one per cent of our farm homes have flush toilets. Only one farm in three has a telephone, and despite the need for transportation there is only one car to every two farmers.

I trust that in some small way I have shown the needs of agriculture and the urgency of enriching prairie farm life. We can ill afford to neglect the people who till our soil. If that neglect persists the effect upon our national life may well be tragic. Goldsmith, in his "Deserted Village", depicts the consequences of a declining agriculture:

> Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
> Where wealth accumulates, and men decay.

Mr. Speaker, I submit that the necessity should be recognized of Canada adopting an enlightened policy toward agriculture, a policy which not only will meet the needs of the farmer, but rehabilitate Canada's greatest industry.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I have been in this house for fifteen years—five years of that time on the government side and ten years on the opposition side of the house. During the last ten years I have been here, the work devolving on members of the official opposition has been strenuous, because until lately there were fewer than forty of us. But this session is altogether different. A large number of capable and brilliant men have been added to the Progressive Conservative ranks, and I wish to say a word of appreciation of those who have spoken on our side. I have not time to mention the new members who have spoken from the other parties, but a number of them have done very well also. On our side, however, the hon. member for Neepawa (Mr. Bracken) had held for a longer period than any other man the premiership in a British legislature. He has surely lived up to our fondest expectations and, in my judgment, has conducted himself on an eminent plane since coming here this session. The hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes), the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Merritt), the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell), the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), the hon. member for London (Mr. Manross), the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy), all new members, have given addresses which have not been excelled by those of any other new members in my time during the past fifteen years. They will all add greatly not only to the strength of the opposition but to the debating powers of this parliament.

So far three ministers have spoken in this debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I will not make any comment on the remarks of the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin). I will refer briefly to the remarks of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton) and at greater length to the words of the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Howe). I simply wish to make an observation or two with reference to the remarks of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George. I will tell him of something I heard on Sunday last while on a visit to western Ontario. I heard this from a gentleman by whom I had the honour to be driven to a meeting which I was to address. He is quite well off and has two sons. Speaking about the family allowance, he said, "I am putting in the bank money sent me in the form of family allowance for my two sons for their future education in the event of its being required at some time. But I am wondering how it will help the education of the sons of the humble man, the son of the blacksmith, the machinist, the carpenter or any other artisan, and the humble farmer. I hope that if you have an opportunity you will mention this to the minister and suggest that he consider some means whereby something can be laid aside for the sons of those who are not as well privileged as my sons."

I thought that was a happy suggestion, because in my experience the sons and daughters of humbler people, wherever they have had a chance, have given a great account of themselves in this life.

This gentleman mentioned another matter with which I agree. It has to do with the soldier. In fact, I myself had a similar experience on Saturday last with a young soldier who is the counterpart of the one mentioned by my friend. This young man came to me on Saturday and seemed to be in distress. He said, "I have been six years overseas and hardly know what to do with myself. Everyone I speak to talks about something with which I am not familiar. They talk about baseball, golf, bridge, and one thing and another, whereas my last six years have been spent with guns, shells, cannon and bayonets. I cannot get my head down to thinking about a job." I suggest to the minister that in considering provision for returned soldiers special consideration be given these men; that the greatest sympathy be exercised and every effort made to get them back on their feet, and until they are back on their feet they should be taken care of in the manner in which soldiers who served four or five or six years, or less for that matter, should be cared for. That is all I have to say in reference to the remarks of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George.

With regard to the remarks of the hon. member for Port Arthur, I shall have to disagree with some of the statements he made. The hon. member for Port Arthur, the Minister of Reconstruction, has a habit of making all-embracing statements. I have had long experience in employment. Not many in this house have had more; perhaps none has had more and perhaps not many have had as much. So that I know something about employment. I was therefore surprised to hear the hon. member for Port Arthur, the Minister of Reconstruction, make the statement yesterday that at this moment two jobs are open for every applicant for a job. In my opinion that is absolutely impossible. I do not for a moment say that the minister was making a misstatement; he was just enthusiastic. It is not possible under normal circumstances, however, and much less under the present circumstances. There is no such thing as such a number of jobs going at the present time.

A little further the minister said that in 1946 we can expect an expansion of peacetime industry comparable with the expansion of industry generally during the war years. I was in big industry during the last war; I was in big industry following that war, and again I say that statement cannot possibly be correct. I am not saying the minister intended to make an incorrect statement, but from my experience what he suggests is not possible. Everyone knows that, during this war, industry has been operating at many times the capacity it did during peace time. How, therefore, can the industrial fabric of Canada again in peace time take care of the number of positions which the minister has suggested in his statement? As I say, the minister is all-embracing in his statements about employment.

The brilliant young cartoonist of the Globe and Mail, of Toronto, Jack Boothe, on September 8 had a cartoon which in my opinion should attract the attention of the entire nation. The word "jobs" is perhaps the most important in the English language, and he emphasized this fact. He showed how all-important it is at the present time. The cartoon, which was a classic, depicted jobs as monumental, gigantic and all-impressive; and they are. Anyone who has not a job or has been out of a job for any length of time knows how important it is to him to obtain one.

Two days later, to be exact, on September 10, backing up the cartoon of the young cartoonist, a large delegation of workers came here. They would not have come if the statement of the Minister of Reconstruction were correct, namely, that there are at present two jobs for everyone wanting a job. No; they came here because jobs are scarce and are getting scarcer. As every one knows who was there, they filled the railway committee room on that morning. Those who heard their remarks could realize their anxiety and their grave fears that the situation will become worse and that more and more men will be laid off. I know that in my own constituency of Davenport, which has a large number of factories, some of which are large and some not so large, ever since the capitulation of Germany, and particularly since the capitulation of Japan, some factories have been laying off twenty hands, or perhaps a few dozen or a hundred or several hundred, and in one case a thousand or more. Now, that does not bear out the statement that there are two jobs for every one who wants one. My own experience, which has been gained from people coming to my door to get me to write letters for them to this place or that to get a job, is that the situation is not at all like that represented by the Minister of Reconstruction. I hope that he will not keep that frame of mind, but on the contrary that he and the government will do their utmost to organize and prepare in every possible way not two jobs for one but a job for every one, which will be amply satisfactory.

The minister also spoke about government plants. I presume he had in mind plants that the government had a lot to do with so far as their organization is concerned, wartime plants, and I intend to speak about two of them. I shall refer briefly to the Polymer plant at Sarnia. I spent quite some time in that plant, and having a knowledge of chemistry and engineering I could plainly see through all the various chemical operations that are carried out in that plant to produce the rubber.

In passing I wish to compliment all who have had anything to do with either the planning or organizing and completion of the Polymer plant. It is a credit to Canadian engineers and Canadians all round that they were able to build a plant to produce rubber in the satisfactory way in which the Polymer plant produces it. I am not going to take up the time of the house to say much about it, because there are other matters on which I wish to touch. The Polymer plant would be a subject for a forty-minute address in itself; but it was intensely interesting to watch the two different chemical reactions that produced the two different kinds of rubber, one kind for the tube and the other kind for the casing. On Sunday last I met a doctor at a memorial service I was attending. He had come over from that part of the province, and in the course of our conversation we talked about the Polymer plant. He told me that he had four tires which were made at Sarnia, that he has now driven them thirty thousand miles and that they have given him eminent satisfaction.

I suggest to the Minister of Reconstruction and to the government the imperative necessity of keeping the Polymer plant in operation in some way for the making of rubber if it is at all possible so to do. I hope the time has come when we Canadians can make at least some of the rubber we require. For the sake of trade perhaps we shall have to import some of it from outside Canada, but if the four thousand men and women now employed in the Polymer plant can be kept making rubber it will be an excellent thing for Canada. I hesitate to think what it would mean to the county of Lambton and the fine city of Sarnia if the Polymer plant ceased to make rubber. I suggest to the minister and to those associated with him, in view of the fact that the government has provided fifty million dollars to build and put that plant in operation as a war work, that if it is necessary to keep the plant in operation they allow whoever is operating it now or will be operating it in the future to use that capital investment on a long term and low interest rate. I would go so far as to suggest that the interest be not collected if that would keep the plant in operation. If it will keep four thousand men and women employed and give us our tires and rubber at the same price as that at which we can buy them elsewhere—and I am told they would be able to do that; I am not in favour of the Canadian people paying more for rubber than they can buy it for elsewhere —under those circumstances I am not opposed to the government letting the investment lie, not demanding the interest and not capitalizing the interest unless returns permit it.

I now wish to say a word or two about another great industry in a section of the country in which I spent some time this summer, namely, the lake St. John area in Quebec. The province of Quebec has a vast treasure in the lake St. John area. It is a fine agricultural section. I did not know that before I went there. I had the idea it might be a barren, cold area, but I found it wholly the reverse. I found fine farms and prosperous farmers. So far as I could see, the whole area was a good agricultural area. It is an area that is rich in forest resources. There are a number of pulp and paper mills, such as at Jonquiere and Chicoutimi, and I have forgotten the names of the other places. It is a fine area both industrially and agriculturally. In the midst of it is that great lake, not so large as lakes go, but still a substantial lake of four hundred square miles area at the highest water level—not the normal but the level maintained by the dams at Isle Maligne. It is a beautiful picture. From the air the whole area looks like a flat bowl and in the centre the lake. In fact the Indian name for lake St. John was Peguagomi, meaning "flat". We now call it by the beautiful name of lake St. John, from which runs a magnificent river. That river is not very long; I believe it ends about thirty miles south of the lake, because from there on while it is still called the Saguenay river it is really an arm of the sea, with the tide rising at the mouth of the river and going right up beyond Chicoutimi to the foot of the Shipshaw power plant discharge. In that thirty miles the water drops 320 feet.

Here is one of the most remarkable demonstrations of the ability of Canadian engineers, of whom I believe the principal one, whom I knew quite well, was the late Mr. H. G. Acres. His was the conception, I understand, of the final magnificent simplicity of that great power plant, which is almost inconceivable. I can picture how the first engineers, looking at the discharge at lake St. John (past) Isle Maligne and the other islands, watching the rushing waters go down Chute à Caron, must have been staggered by the magnitude of the task of harnessing that river; but thanks to the late Mr. Acres and those associated with him, whose names I cannot recall at the moment, this remarkable undertaking was carried out.

The first power plant is immediately south of the lake, at Isle Maligne, where there is a drop of 110 feet. From there down to the canal above Chute à Caron the water is level, because of the dams and two power plants at Shipshaw. At No. 1 plant the water drops 160 feet and at No. 2 plant it drops 210 feet. These power plants, taking water from the same canal, I believe represent the greatest concentration of power development at the present time in a single plant anywhere in the world. I am thoroughly conversant with Grand Coulee and Boulder dam, neither of which, so far as I know, is yet complete as to power installations. When Grand Coulee is completed it will be able to produce about 2,700,000 horse-power. Boulder dam when completed will produce about 1,835,000 horse-power. These three plants on the Saguenay river really are all one combined power plant, though the one at Isle Maligne is twenty miles up the river, since they all draw water from the same source. The day I was at Shipshaw the plant at Isle Maligne was producing 540,000 horse-power; No. I plant at Arvida, adjacent to Shipshaw and drawing from the same canal, was producing about 260,000 horse-power but could produce another 130,000, since they have the positions ready for the installation of two more generators, and at Shipshaw itself the production was 980,000 horse-power. I was surprised to find that the name "Shipshaw" is just a name for the whole development. The Shipshaw river flows right in there at the very place where the tide itself stops, and the first proposal was to deliver the water out of No. 2 plant into the Shipshaw river, which is immediately below it. But the engineers felt that the Shipshaw valley would not be large enough to take the water from that vast power plant, so they just turned the plant around and delivered the water into the Saguenay at the base of Chute à Caron falls, where the tide ceases. As I said, the day I was there No. 2 plant was producing 980,000 horse-power, so at that time the three plants were producing a total of something less than 1,800,000 horse-power; and that was not their full capacity. They could produce a great deal more than that. I believe if they added another storage reservoir to the three they now have they could raise their production to 2,500,000 horse-power, which would make this larger than any other plant in the world, barring Grand Coulee alone; and it may be some time before Grand Coulee produces anything like that.

The engineers deserve unstinted praise for what they have done. To have power of this kind it is necessary to have a continuous flow of a stated amount of water. I believe that with the reservoirs they have adjacent to the Saguenay river they can maintain a constant flow of 42,500 cubic feet per second. They are able to do this because away up the Peribonka river they built a large lake. That river was made famous by a noted writer, the author of Maria Chapdelaine, whose name I forget at the moment.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Louis Hemon.

Mr. MacNICOL: That river has on it a lake one hundred miles long, about what is called Passe Dangereuse; I suppose in English we would call it Dangerous Passage. The lake behind that dam contains a reservoir of 183 billion cubic feet of water in storage. Not far from that, on a stream which runs into the same river, they have created what they call lake Manouan, in which they have another 78 billion cubic feet of water in storage. In other words, on those two rivers or in those two reservoirs they have about 260 billion cubic feet of water in storage; and by raising lake St. John itself, with its own area when raised of 412 square miles, they are able to store another 170 billion cubic feet of water. So that they have behind their power plant an almost inexhaustible supply of water in storage.

Many times I have wondered what we are going to do to keep that vast power plant in operation after the war is over. If it can be so organized I believe that in this area, with the power available, we can locate enough industries to make up a large city, and still be able to send out to Quebec city and other cities in that vicinity such volumes of power as would make them all grow—because nothing in the world will make a city grow faster than cheap power. If that area is given the support it should be given, then I say that there is destined some time to be there a vast manufacturing industry.

At the present time, and I believe for some time to come, the aluminum plant at Arvida will use all the power available. The set-up of that plant is marvellous. I hold in my hand a piece of bauxite I took from one of the boats which come to Port Alfred. This is non-metallic, but because it produces metal I should imagine it would be classified as a metallic ore. The bauxite is light enough, but we know that out of every ton of bauxite brought in from Demarara-British Guiana, half a ton of aluminum is manufactured. It is most interesting to watch a ship unloading bauxite, and later being loaded with paper from the Jonquiere paper mill, and from other paper plants in that area. After being loaded, the ship sails for England. Upon reaching there it is loaded with merchandise, and sent back to British Guiana. That is real trade! That is the kind of stuff to bring to Canada. Through the labour of about 8,000 men and women at the Arvida plant about half a million tons of aluminum is turned out each year.

May I say a word on behalf of the company operating at that point. It has built fine houses for its employees. A worker is permitted to buy his house at a low rate. I talked to several men and found them very happy in their employment at Arvida. The houses are heated and plumbed. Some of them are of stone, and all are beautiful. They range in size from four to six rooms, and I believe that about 1,800 have been built in that city. Arvida is a beautiful city, a credit to Canada, and particularly to the province of Quebec. The houses are rented at rates as low as $13.50 a month, running up to $34. That, indeed, is a low rental.

And that is the way it should be. A company of that description should go the limit—and, so far as I can see, it is doing so—to care for its employees. I believe it is taking the best of care, and is looking after the welfare of its employees. I, for one am going to urge as strongly as I can upon the minister in charge that if at some future time all the power there available cannot be used in the making of aluminum, some effort should be made to use it in the manufacturing of other commodities, so as to give employment to Canadians.

Last night the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) spoke about the coming conference, and I believe other members of the government who have preceded him in the debate have made a similar reference. But we cannot be sure that the conference will be a success. I, for one, would ask that the ministers should not put all their eggs into one basket and base their hopes for employment upon something which may never materialize. The problem is too serious to neglect or to leave entirely to a conference.

I recommend that a careful survey be made of the report of the committee on reconstruction and rehabilitation which has met during the last three or four sessions of parliament, and over which at the last session the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) presided. That committee has tabled two excellent reports, to which reference was made yesterday by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis). He was one of the most active members on the committee. He and I saw eye to eye on almost everything, with the exception of politics. When it came to jobs we were unanimous. The hon. member made reference to the work of that committee when he addressed the house yesterday, and had I the time I should like to do so to-day. However, I would point out briefly that no less than twenty splendid opportunities are set out in that report for the providing of jobs in a big way.

Every provision should be made to provide men with jobs, men from Toronto and elsewhere who are out of work. I say that projects should be ready to provide jobs. For instance, mention has been made about irrigation, one of my pet subjects. I am sorry to say that up to the present time very little can be done for Saskatchewan from the Saskatchewan river. Two or three years ago I recommended strongly in the house that the government should set up forthwith a Saskatchewan river authority, organized along the lines of the Tennesee valley authority, because that great Saskatchewan river runs through three provinces and should be given special attention. Certainly if all the water is taken out of it before it reaches Manitoba, then Manitoba will be left holding the bag.

Such an authority could state what volume of water should be taken from the river and at what points it should be taken. If such an authority were set up Saskatchewan should most assuredly receive from the South Saskatchewan river all the water required to irrigate west of Regina. This would mean the construction of large dams. But we are not ready to do that; why? Had I been the minister of the responsible department—and perhaps I should not say this—I should have had plans ready. I was a business man, and as such did things in a business way. Business men do not monkey-doodle and fiddle around, but go straight to work and do things.

Had I been minister I should have had ready at least the plans and specifications for the dams where required. Now look at the box we are in! While it may be said that nothing can be done for Saskatchewan, the same cannot be said about Alberta. We must do something. I ask the responsible minister to tell the house why he has not plans and specifications ready for the building of the Spring Coulee reservoir, which should and must be built, if we are to retain for Canada the water rights on the St. Mary river. Those plans should be ready.

I have surveyed the site carefully; I have made careful examinations there, and I know that the engineers have stated the position correctly. A dam can be built there and water can be conserved. Let me add that water is a most priceless heritage for the prairie provinces—and yet to-day we are letting billions and billions of cubic feet of it flow off down to Hudson bay, thereby making no return whatsoever to this country, when water required should be taken our of the river in Alberta—and might as well be, because in the states south of the boundary line they are taking it out, for purposes of irrigation.

The minister should be ready to send men at once to do that work. I would ask him this: What are the boys from the prairie provinces going to do when they come home? Last night he said:

> Just as it took many months to move people from one locality to another into war jobs, it will take a shorter period to redistribute our people into peace-time jobs.

I presume a great many of the people who came from Saskatchewan to work in factories at Toronto, Stratford, Hamilton, Galt, Brantford, and other eastern cities, will want to return to the west. What will there be for them to do? The minister should have his programme ready. Many are engineers. Many of them know something about the making and pouring of concrete, and how foundations should be set. The programme should be ready, so that those brave lads who rendered such high service on the plains of Europe, in the skies over Europe and on the seas, boys who had never seen ships or aircraft before they enlisted and were compelled to operate them, may have something to do when they return to their homes.

Orders would soon be coming back to the factories in eastern Canada, and in that way men would be employed east and west. I would not hesitate to support a programme of $100,000,000. What is $100,000,000?. It is hardly the price of a super-battleship, and nobody makes any fuss over the sinking of one battleship. But a programme of $100,000,000 would rehabilitate the whole of the three western provinces, particularly Saskatchewan and Alberta, and provide them with power and irrigation, and water for such fine cities as Regina and Moose Jaw, so that they could maintain their identity, and the power that would be developed would lead to the establishment of many industries in the western provinces. Irrigation now planned would put into productivity approximately 3,000,000 more acres of land. Look what that would mean all along the line, right down all the way from the irrigated area itself to eastern Canada. I have been out west many times, and my observation of all the towns and cities in the west has been that perhaps the city of Lethbridge is the finest example or at all events an extremely fine example of the prosperity which comes to a town or city in the centre of an irrigated area. The benefits flow all along the line from that thriving, prosperous and healthy city of Lethbridge.

In conclusion, may I say that I have deliberately refrained from saying anything of an acrimonious nature because from long association with workers and employees my heart goes out to them and I want to see them continued in employment and security. All of us together, every member of the house, should be devoting his time not to such debatable subjects—I mean in these times, perhaps I should call them educational subjects—as a new flag or a new anthem for Canada. Our minds should be concentrated on the production of jobs to take care of the thousands and thousands of our boys who are coming home and those thousands and thousands who are going to be thrown out of employment in this country.

It is all very nice for the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply to say: I can see one million jobs. Well, I cannot see them, and no other living man in this country can see them. A man came to me for a job some days ago and I told him, "I have just read that selective service state that there are 143,601 jobs vacant" —I am using just an arbitrary figure—"and there are only 31,275 applicants"—again an arbitrary figure. This unemployed man said to me, "The figures should be turned around the other way."

Last night the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply said something like this—and again I am using arbitrary figures—that there are 232,601 jobs vacant and only 73,000 applicants. But you go to selective service for a job and what sort of job do they send you to? To a pick-and-shovel job or something of that sort. They are not sending men out to take a job as an engineer or machinist or as a chemist or other professional man. Oh, no; there are lots of so-called pick-and-shovel jobs, but not the kind of job a man wants to take who has a wife and family to keep and a home to maintain that he is purchasing. While on that subject I am going to suggest to the responsible minister that it is time that some plan be put into operation so that the unemployed worker will not, as he did during the depression, lose his equity in the house he is buying merely because he has lost his job and is unable through lack of earning power to keep up the principal and interest payments. Men are buying houses to-day at inflated prices, and they are inflated prices. A man that I know well bought a house some days ago. I would not give $3,200 for it, and it cost him $7,800. He never will be able to pay for it. If he loses his job he may lose all his equity in the house. I hope that that will not be allowed to happen again. It was the most heart-breaking thing I saw during the depression. Yet I saw it happen to so many of our finest citizens, whole-souled, thorough Canadians, who had invested one or two or three thousand dollars in the purchase of a home which they would have been able to own some day had their jobs continued, but many of them lost their jobs and, in due course, lost their equity in the homes they had been buying. It was one of the saddest things I have seen, and I hope that the government will take steps to see to it that workers unfortunate enough to lose their jobs do not also lose their equity in their homes, that at least they will get back the money they have put into the property.

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the last speaker (Mr. MacNicol). I think the whole house always enjoys hearing from the hon. member for Davenport. We always have an informative speech from him, and I know that so far as the members from western Canada are concerned they are glad to hear what he has to say because he shows that he is interested in problems right across Canada. Sometimes it has seemed, the problems of the prairies claim his special interest. When he presents a picture to us it is always clearly painted. I was disappointed for a little while this afternoon when he stayed away from the prairies for so long, for I feared that we were not going to hear from him to-day on our part of the world. But I was glad to see him come at last to the Saskatchewan river. I was reminded, as he spoke, of the old story of there being no mill by the dam site. We can only hope that he is wrong in his fear that irrigation will not soon be developed in the west.

In my first words, I wish to speak of two famous regiments. Reference was made to them yesterday by my colleague from Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch). Respecting these regiments I wish to make a suggestion, indeed a straight request of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Abbott).

The final turn of the scroll of the tragic drama that we call Hong Kong is being unwound, and the closing scenes bring some compensation for all the horror of that terrible episode. Equally those closing scenes remind us of the heroism of that episode. Greater even than the horror is the heroism. The final scene to-day shows that we have reunions in the city of Quebec, and reunions in my prairie city of Winnipeg. The Grenadiers will again meet their loved ones in my city, and the Royal Rifles of Canada will embrace their dear families in historic Quebec.

The whole picture as I review it leads me to make this specific request of the government through the Minister of National Defence. It is this, that in determining the composition of the permanent force of Canada for the future he will make sure that the identities of these two brave regiments will be maintained. It is my submission that the names of these heroic units should be kept in the Canadian army, before all the people, as a daily reminder to us of the imperishable deeds which are associated with their names.

The hon. member for Winnipeg South yesterday paid his respects to the new leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken), and thanked him for getting out and giving him his house to live in. I wish to pay my respects to the leader of the opposition, he being for a long time a distinguished citizen of my province. I am sorry to see him in his present plight, but still, since he apparently desires it, I congratulate him upon the leadership of the Conservative party. That term "Conservative", I may say, comes most usually to my lips although I have no constitutional bias against using the expression "Progressive Conservative". I realize that nobody will be fooled by the prefix, so what does it matter?

Well, I congratulate him not merely upon leadership but upon the speech he made in this house a few days ago. It is not the first time I have heard the hon. gentleman discourse. In fact I have heard him a number of times, and it has always been my view that he spoke with clarity and sometimes with the force of conviction. I feel that he is to be congratulated to-day upon his usual clarity. I underscore at once that my congratulations are upon the form of the speech, not the subject matter.

Adding to what I have said, I should like to review some of the leader's statements; and the first one to which I will refer commands my whole support. The hon. gentleman said as reported in Hansard at page 28:

> I want to say, with all the emphasis at my command, that this nation will not stand for any chiseling down of the promises and commitments made to service personnel while they were fighting our wars abroad.

In these words the leader of the opposition was absolutely right, although why he should have adopted, as I thought, a minatory tone was rather hard to see. It must be admitted, I think, that Canada has enacted already the best veteran legislation there is in the world. In spite of that, we all know there are still some blanks to be filled in and some improvements to be made. This must be done, and I do not think there is any disagreement about it.

Certainly the Canadian people are against "chiseling" in this matter; and I think that is why a great number of the Conservative old guard were left at home, because the electors remembered the chiseling operations of the Conservative government between 1930 and 1935, and they were not going to be fooled by the fact that the party had chosen a new leader and put a prefix to its name. However, the main point I wish to make is that we are all agreed that there must be no chiseling, that the administration of veterans' laws must be characterized by the utmost generosity.

I want now to offer a warning to the speaker whom I have quoted; I think it will not be out of place. I believe that he should tread warily in offering any criticisms of veterans' legislation. He should be careful not to suggest or seem to suggest that somebody else might do some chiseling. When he was premier of Manitoba he was the first person to take away a tax exemption which had been granted to veterans by the government which preceded him. But he who later admitted that he was "the most continuously successful political leader the British empire has produced in this century", was the first responsible statesman in this country to do a little chiseling on the veterans of the last war; and it is not likely to be forgotten.

I should like to make a further short analysis of the hon. gentleman's remarks.

We all know that the opposition do not have to formulate policies when they are criticizing the policies of the government. Nevertheless it is not unreasonable to expect that a national figure will declare his belief or his disbelief on some points, or that there will be a positive assertion about something, to be found at some place in a speech which he makes. Now, perusal of his speech will reveal that never from start to finish did he declare himself as being favourable to an action or definitely against some action. There was only one exception; this was when he said he was in favour of a reduction in the income tax. Of course everybody is in favour of a reduction in the income tax, nobody, probably, more profoundly or firmly than the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) himself. So that it is hardly worth while to give the leader of the opposition a score for that one positive statement of belief.

When the hon. gentleman dealt with meat rationing, for example—and this is illustrative of the whole thing—his unwillingness to commit himself was very noticeable indeed. He says, the people are asking so and so; the people are wondering what about this; they think such and such a thing ought to be done; they are going to be disappointed if so and so is not done. Never once did he state that he was against meat rationing; never once did he state that he was in favour of meat rationing. He says that if rationing is necessary it is due to some former fault of the government. Well, suppose that is admitted for illustration's sake. Even so, the situation has to be dealt with. If some sin of this administration in bygone days is the reason that meat rationing is necessary, still the problem is there, and he does not seem to be willing either to condemn or to approve.

Thinking over the whole speech, I was reminded of a poem of Kipling. I do not remember the name of the poem, but it was the story of a man who had died. He went to heaven seeking admission. Upon examination up there it was found that he had never done very much harm in his life, and prima facie it would appear that he was entitled to entrance; but on the other hand he had never done any good, and St. Peter slammed the door in his face. So he went down to the other place. But when he went down there the same sort of thing developed. St. Peter having thrown him from the one place, Nick interviewed him at the other; and sure enough he found he had never done much good and therefore he appeared to be entitled to admission to hell; but on the other hand there was no great evidence of depravity or wrongdoing in his life and Nick, being more robust in sin than usual that day, chased him off the premises of hades and he was not admitted there. He was too neutral for either place. I do not remember just what did become of the soul after that; he moved back and forth, I think, between the two stations. While I cannot say for certain the subsequent facts, it has occurred to me that perhaps there is something in the doctrine of reincarnation. This neutral soul perhaps entered the body of another person, or if that be not so, he will yet do so and will be back in this life before long. If already back, I presume he has already been chosen as leader of the Conservative party, and if he is not already reincarnated I expect that before long he will be chosen as leader of that party when in a couple of years' time they are shopping around again to get another leader. In a couple of years they will have to have some person else to carry their burnt-out torch.

I do not wish to emulate the leader of the opposition by leaving any uncertainty as to my views on the subject of meat rationing. I do not believe in pussy-footing about it. I recall that Jesus spoke with approval of those who had fed other people who were hungry and who had clothed other people who were naked. I know of no better doctrine than that, and it directs me to support the plans of to-day. I know there may be a difference as between the Christian concept of charity and the aim of serving our own convenience, but in any such case I am going to be guided by the former and not the latter consideration. I wish to add, although I think it unnecessary, that if any economic justification is needed you will find it in this, that the wheat we already sent to Greece will pay dividends to us and to our children, great fat dividends, for many years to come.

If we are to feed the hungry we shall have to see that there is fair play with regard to the remaining food in this country. We cannot just leave it to be purchased by the more well to do in the community. We have to have some plan for dividing it up. That means rationing.

I think it is probable some changes will be found necessary in the plans at the present moment. It would be an odd thing if such were not the case. But the need of rationing, when you have induced scarcity, surely must be apparent to all. There may be quarrelling about some detail or another, but if we are to feed the hungry we must have a plan of division for that part which is left. I believe that after what I have said no one will be in any doubt as to my view. Whether my stand will be satisfactory to all or most, I do not know, but I do not want anyone to be in doubt as to where I stand on this matter.

One of the troubles of the Minister of Finance is that people ask for tax reductions and also ask for expenditures. I am afraid I would have to plead guilty if a charge of that kind were made against me. However, the expenditure I wish to recommend to the government is an urgent one, and on the other hand I believe it is not a large one.

What I wish to recommend is that the insurance principle with relation to pensions should be extended to those of the forces who have seen Canadian service. I have already met with a considerable number of cases of injustice where veterans who, through no fault of their own—and mark that, that is one important point I would put forward—did not have overseas experience, and are disabled, which almost certainly would not have been the case if they had not been in the forces. Worse still, there have been cases of death and widows are without pensions by reason of the law as it stands to-day. It seems to me that the extension of the insurance principle is a most important piece of legislation.

Moreover, the cost of this can now be seen. It could not be seen in 1940. It will not all come at one time. It extends over a period of time, and I believe it is absolutely necessary in the circumstances to-day.

About the reduction in taxation, as I said, everyone is in favour of it. I have been satisfied all along that every possible reduction in direct taxes would be made. I have a feeling that the Minister of Finance cannot do as much in 1945, when the budget comes down so late in the year, as can be done next year, but I feel sure that the government is well seized of the fact that we cannot have a satisfactory reconversion, a reconstruction; we cannot have a recreation of productive life and consequent employment unless there is a substantial reduction in rates.

I hope that indirect taxes will not be overlooked. They press most heavily upon those who are least able to pay. Indirect taxes pyramided on top of one another result in a great increase in the final cost of the articles people use. A friend of mine had to get two chains for his bicycle in the United States. The cost was $6, and by the time he got them it was $10. Shotgun shells and other types of ammunition are prohibited from import by reason of indirect taxes. I am not suggesting that the articles I have mentioned are weighted heavily in the cost of living chart or schedule. But they illustrate facts covering a very long list of articles that people have to buy and that figure often quite importantly in the cost of living and increase it greatly.

[Mr. Maybank.]

Another thing about indirect taxes—and this applies particularly to tariff taxes—is that the government often does not get the tax anyway. It very often goes to some local manufacturer instead of going to the government.

Since I have said a word about both expenditures and taxation, I should like to make a suggestion tending to harmonize the two apparently conflicting ideas. It is this. Search for waste and unnecessary expenditure, and be vigilant in searching. There must have been lots of waste during the war and I do not think anyone is very critical about it. When a six thousand million dollar business or machine is quickly developed and is made to function it is inevitable that there must be a great deal of waste, particularly when the purpose of the machine is to save the liberties of people. People are not going to be too finicky about the careful conservation of a dollar in these circumstances. The situation has changed now, however, and I submit that economy should be the order of the day from now on.

Here is an example of waste. John Doe is going to be discharged from the air force. He is located at Saint John and is on furlough in Winnipeg. He is going to be discharged; that is decided. Why should he not be discharged from Winnipeg? No; it cannot be done. He has to go to Saint John, the reason given being that he has to turn in his equipment. No business concern would operate in that way. There is no business man in the world who would put himself to the expense of bringing a man back from Winnipeg to discharge him in Saint John in order to give him signature for some articles he has in his possession. Of course, expenses have to be paid both ways, from Winnipeg to Saint John and back again; and other expenses besides travelling expenses are paid. In addition you have a loss to the community of that man, who is not engaged in the production of wealth when he could be. I believe such acts can be carried out more expeditiously and cheaply. Economy should be the order of the day. I know that officers who are making rules will impose all kinds of objections, but when officers are told that such and such a thing must result, it generally results. As a matter of fact, in the particular case I have mentioned, if all the equipment that John Doe had were lost it would not add up to as much as it cost to take him to Saint John and back to Winnipeg again.

Finally, I wish to say how much I welcome the policy of the government, as evidenced in the speech from the throne, of the recognition of a growing spirit of Canadianism in the country. For a great many years it has irked me that if I said I was a Canadian my assertion could not end there. In effect it was claimed that there was no such thing as a Canadian. Like millions of others I thought and spoke and felt and acted like a Canadian, but I imagine I was not one because there was no such thing. This people within the bounds of what is called Canada—there cannot be any argument about the name of the territory—is great enough to declare that there is such a thing as a Canadian, and the world will certainly respect it. Our stature in the eyes of the world is greater than it has ever been before, and it has grown apace in the last few years. I welcome particularly the legislation that is forecast, which is thus a recognition of Canadianism, the law respecting citizenship, the law adopting a national flag of suitable design and the law adopting a national anthem.

There is another step we should take. We should devise a method for ourselves of amending our constitution, and we should do it soon. We could have done this long ago but we gave preference to other things. Not merely is it inconsistent with our own dignity as a nation to leave matters as they are, but it is putting an improper onus upon the parliament at Westminster. We have been and are treating the British parliament like a chore boy. Moreover, there may some day be an application for a constitutional amendment in the manner that we have so far been following which will be a highly contentious matter; the parliament over there or the government of the day over there will be placed in a highly embarrassing position in being required to decide between two contending factions in Canada, and we have no right to impose that burden. We should make sure that it will never occur; we should make sure by taking into our own hands the power of amending the constitution.

I am not at the moment going to suggest what formula we might adopt. Some sections of the constitution might be amended by the mere passing of resolutions in these houses of parliament; resting a certain period of time on the table, as the expression is, and no objection being taken, they would then constitute amendments. That would apply only to minor matters. On the other hand, it may be that we would have to work out some voting method—I think that is the most likely plan to be acceptable—such as they have in the United States and in all federal countries. The late Ernest Lapointe at one time spoke with approval of a plan, namely, that if two-thirds of the provinces advocated a change in constitution, that would effect the change, provided that it did not impinge upon racial and religious rights, and if such rights were touched, then unanimity of the provinces would be necessary. That plan would probably be acceptable across Canada. I am not advocating it especially, but it is one of the plans that could be considered as soon as we decide that we shall take the constitution into our own hands. All I wish to urge to-day is that we must turn our attention to becoming masters of our own constitutional law. From that much more can follow in the way of progress and improvement.

As a footnote I should like to point out to you, sir that the various interprovincial conferences we have been having these last few years have been adopted really as a cumbrous substitute for constitutional amendment. Of course that is a dangerous and unsatisfactory method of getting along in this country. As all hon. members know, as the situation now stands, practically any person out of ten people can upset any possibility of agreement. Remember what happened a few years ago. Three men did not wish to sit in a conference; result, no agreement. Over the last several years this government by dint of tremendous work has overcome to a certain extent the difficulties that have resulted from the breaking up of that interprovincial conference. It has been a heavy task, and we cannot hope to carry on our governmental business in this country by various makeshift agreements, one following upon the other. We cannot run the risk of progress being held up by one, two or three wilful men.

Mr. BLACKMORE: You had better change your system, then.

Mr. MAYBANK: Well, I do not believe that this funny money system from Alberta will do any good in that regard.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Men like you would not.

Mr. MAYBANK: The way toward greater progress is to give to the people of Canada full control over their basic legislation just as they already have complete control over their ordinary domestic laws.

Mr. W. F. KUHL (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to just about all of the speeches which have been made thus far in this debate. I would say as a general comment that there is complete unanimity in all parts of this house in the expression of the desire for a better Canada. I would say, however, that there is not the same unanimity as to what constitutes a better Canada. Certainly I do not consider that some of the policies which have been advocated thus far, if applied to our nation, would make Canada a better nation. Furthermore, I believe there is also a lack of complete unanimity as to the means to be employed to bring about a better Canada.

Mention has been made by a few of the hon. members who have thus far spoken of the fact that we have not yet established a national objective. It has been suggested that before we can proceed logically we must lay down some fundamental objective to attempt to attain in the future. Personally I recognize that we must pass through a period of transition, and that during the period of reconversion we cannot hope for the things we may expect later on. Nevertheless I believe we should certainly indicate what we consider to be the long range objectives we are hoping to achieve, and do all in our power to implement them gradually as we pass through this period.

What is the objective that has been enunciated more frequently than any other thus far in this debate? I would say that with the exception of the members of the Social Credit group each hon. member in turn has enunciated an objective which I consider to be both impossible and undesirable. What is that objective? It has been proclaimed on the hustings as well as here in the house. Each individual member, in monotonous repetition, has proclaimed that the thing we must have above all else in this country is full employment. Hon. members have been talking about a new order, a new way of life and a new outlook. Well, I beg to ask: what is new about full employment? Work is the oldest thing in the world; it is as old as Methuselah. Most hon. members may have been elected on a programme of full employment, but I can assert that I was not. As I listened to radio broadcasts and such public speakers as I had the opportunity to hear, invariably they said, "Elect me and I will put you to work." Personally I did no such thing; I told my electors that if they saw fit to reelect me I would do everything humanly possible to put everybody out of work, and I think I spoke to as great a cross-section of the electors of my constituency as most hon. members did. I addressed no fewer than forty-nine public meetings during the campaign; I do not know whether any hon. gentleman here did better than that. But I can say that on every occasion I made the same statement, and the electors of Jasper-Edson saw fit to reelect me as their spokesman in the House of Commons for the third consecutive time with a greater majority than ever before.

I have already asked the question: what is there new about work? If all we want out of this life is full employment and a job, why did we ever dispose of Adolf Hitler, who was the greatest provider of work the world has ever seen? He could create more jobs in one day than the Prime Minister of this country could create in his lifetime. Not only did he put all Germany to work; he put all Europe and eventually the whole world to work. I say that at least as far as my constituents are concerned, they are looking for a holiday. Some of them have worked for one hundred years and have not had a holiday yet. I should like to suggest as an antidote to the phrase "full employment," the slogan "full enjoyment."

As I have said already, I believe those elected on the platform of full employment have been returned on a programme which is impossible as well as undesirable. Why do I say it is impossible? As I listen to hon. members take part in this discussion, I am amazed. One would think we were still living in the oxcart days, when people made their living with their bare hands. Every hon. member, whether he is an industrialist, a professional man, a farmer or whatever he may be, must know we are living in the greatest age of machine power and mass production methods man has ever seen. Everywhere you go in industry to-day, whether into a manufacturing plant, a mine, or on a farm, you see one man with one machine doing the work of hundreds or perhaps thousands of people. Just consider the position during the war. We had approximately two million of our ablest producers out of work, as far as the production of the essentials of life was concerned. They were not producing those things which would have enriched our lives; they were producing things which were destroyed and wiped out of existence. Yet with those two million of our best producers out of production the rest of us carried on and provided all the essentials for ourselves and for them as well, on a grander scale than has been enjoyed by most people in the last fifteen or twenty years. Surely this indicates that there has entered into our national life a factor the like of which has never before been witnessed in the history of mankind; that is the power machine. No doubt yesterday hon. members received in their mail, as I did, copies of a publication entitled "Timber." I should like to draw to their attention—probably they noticed it, but did not get the full significance of it—the illustration on the first page of this publication. It seems to me particularly applicable at this time, inasmuch as a great deal of the discussion in the debate has centred around housing.

On this page I find two illustrations of lumber-piling machinery, and under one of those illustrations I find this statement:

Paul Bunyan, the legendary Hercules of the woods, was just a piker! Here's a man equipped to lift up to 15,000 pounds of lumber to a height of 17½ feet from bottom of load to ground. He can trundle that load around the yards at speeds up to 35 miles per hour and manoeuvre like a jack rabbit.

Then the descriptive material in respect of the second illustration, which shows a lumber-carrying machine, is as follows:

Or take the lad in photo B. He straddles 6 tons of lumber, picks it up and rolls away with no more muscular exertion than Paul Bunyan selecting a toothpick.

This publication came into the hands of hon. members only yesterday. I point out, however, that probably they do not get the significance of what is involved in these illustrations.

Turning to a later page in the magazine, I find an illustration of a chain saw, and the following advertising material:

A well deserved tribute, for its speed in felling and bucking is almost uncanny . . . enabling one crew to do the work of 20 men using cross-cut saws.

Those are only a few of the illustrations I chanced upon in looking through this publication. In addresses I have had the privilege of making in this chamber I have placed on record page after page of statistics indicating the extent to which the modern power machine has displaced human effort. I shall not worry the house on this occasion by repeating what I have said earlier. However, I think every hon. member must be aware of the fact indicated by these illustrations, because time and again they have seen the actual machinery in operation. These labour saving devices are typical of every industry, including farming. To-day one man and his son can accomplish on a farm what it required crews to accomplish only a few years ago.

The same is true throughout all industry. I ask, in all sincerity: How can hon. members suggest logically that we can have jobs for everyone who is willing and able to work, in the face of such circumstances. They must realize that there are only so many hours of work to be done. Regardless of what is to be produced, only so many hours of work are required for that production. If it takes four hours to produce a certain unit, how can anyone insist logically that it must take eight? Yet that is what hon. members are implying when they are insisting that we must have full employment.

I have heard it argued before and probably before the conclusion of this debate it will be argued again, that machines make more rather than less work. About the only come-back ever made to me in respect of machines displacing human labour was that of an hon. member who pointed out on one occasion that someone has to make the machines. Well, for goodness' sake, are the machines made with bare hands? No; machines are made with machines.

To-day employment has become largely that of button pressing and lever pulling. During the war I had the pleasure of going through a number of industrial institutions, and I can say that most of the work boils down to just that.

I have before me some statistics indicating the truth of the assertion that the necessary number of hours of work is constantly decreasing, and that machines are putting men out of work. These figures are taken from a United States publication entitled "Man-hours and Distribution," and I refer particularly to a table taken from a study entitled "Machinery, Employment and Purchasing Power" made by the national industrial conference board in the United States.

This publication gives statistics in respect of the number of hours of work and the material produced over a period of years in the United States. The figures show that at the turn of the century, 1900, the number of man hours per unit of production for all industry in the United States stood at 6·3. Then, leaving out the intervening years, we find that for 1935 the figure under the same heading is 2·31. Does this not indicate that the use of machines is having the effect of decreasing the number of hours of necessary work?

It will be noted that the last figure set out in the table is for 1935. While I have no figures for 1945, I should not be the least bit surprised if the figures stood at about one man hour per unit of production. These figures show that to-day with the use of machinery it is possible to produce in one hour about six times the quantity produced in the same time at the turn of the century. Or, to put it another way, to produce an article today only one-sixth of the time is required that was required at the turn of the century.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

MEAT RATIONING

CONFERENCE BETWEEN GOVERNMENT AND MEAT DEALERS ASSOCIATION

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the house I should like to answer a question that was asked this afternoon in my unavoidable absence. The question was whether the meeting to-morrow between the retail meat merchants and the wartime prices and trade board would be open to the public. I have given this consideration. Since the meeting is for the purpose of trying to obviate grounds of complaint or objections to the meat rationing system as it now operates I have come to the conclusion that we would be much more likely to make real progress if the meeting were held in private, and that is the decision.

Mr. FLEMING: Does that mean that the press will be excluded?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. W. M. Benidickson for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Bracken, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. KUHL: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I was endeavouring to establish that the future welfare of Canada must be predicated upon a sound objective, and I had indicated that the objective which was being proclaimed by most hon. members was that of full employment. I challenge that objective as being either sound or desirable. I think we have not yet decided in this house or in this country whether full employment is a means to an end or an end in itself. As I listen to hon. members discussing the subject in the house I find them constantly confusing the two. I have not heard anyone yet clearly and distinctly indicate whether he believes in full employment as an end in itself or merely as a means to an end, and I think it ought to be made definitely clear by every hon. member who speaks on this subject. So far as I am personally concerned I consider that full employment is not an end in itself, but a means to an end, and it should never be regarded as anything else.

From time to time in this house hon. gentlemen, including such members as the member for Davenport, (Mr. MacNicol) who spoke this afternoon and others, arise and indicate the tremendous number of public works projects of one kind and another that are feasible and desirable in this country. I commend them for all these suggestions, and in particular the hon. member for Davenport, who has rendered valuable service to this house for the work he has done in that regard. But the question I wish to ask him is: What is his objective in all of these suggestions? Is his objective the schemes he has in mind, or is it that of merely providing jobs for people? Do we want to build roads to put people to work or because we want roads? Do we want to build bridges to put people to work or because we need bridges? Do we want to build homes to put people to work or do we want homes in which people can live? I suggest that the only logical and sensible attitude to take is to build roads, homes, bridges, schools and hospitals for the sake of the object itself which is being built, and not merely for the sake of giving work. If all these projects can be carried out by a few individuals sitting in their offices and pulling levers and pushing buttons, then let it be done in that way. That is just about the stage we have reached at the moment in our production system.

I have asked on previous occasions—and I do so again and shall continue to do so just as long as this subject is discussed in the manner it has been—hon. members when they rise in their places and discuss full employment to define that term which they use. I think much of our discussion is fruitless largely because we do not define our terms. We debate and discuss subjects and each of us has a different definition of the terms we are using. I would ask those who assert that we must have full employment, what have they in their minds as to what constitutes full employment? The general term used is a job for everybody who is willing and able to work. What does that mean? Does it mean that there is available or can be made available an eight-hour day for everyone from sixteen to sixty years of age? Or what does it mean? I shall not dwell on this angle much longer. But I wish to indicate that for my part I consider full employment is only that work which the power machine cannot do. I consider that sound and sensible and logical, and if it is not, I want to be told why it is not. Is that the definition which hon. members have in mind when they speak of full employment?

I have pointed out in times past, and supported it with statistics, that if in this day and age we use machine power to the maximum possibility—this was true before the war and it is certainly more so since the war—the man-hours of work necessary to produce the highest possible standards of living in this nation need be very few. I indicated by statistics that an income of over four thousand dollars' worth of consumable goods for every family of four in this nation could be produced with no more necessary hours of work than four hours a day four days a week by those between the ages of twenty-five and forty-five. I am not going to take the time to produce that evidence which I gave to the house on a previous occasion. I simply mention it now to indicate a different angle to the subject from that which has been discussed so far in the house in this debate.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And let anyone disprove it who thinks he can.

Mr. KUHL: The Liberals and Conservatives in this house have been championing the cause of private enterprise. I wish to do so too, because as a Social Crediter I believe in private enterprise. But I believe that the Liberals and Conservatives have unknowingly done private enterprise a great deal of harm by reason of the fact that they attribute a responsibility to private enterprise which is not a responsibility of private enterprise, and by so doing they leave themselves open to a first-class charge by the socialists and the communists. They assume that it is the duty and the responsibility of private enterprise to provide jobs and employment. They assume that responsibility on behalf of private enterprise, and then the socialists come along and say, Well, you had ten years before the war to prove it, and you did not do it; there was more unemployment than ever before in the history of the nation. And what come-back have the Liberals and Conservatives? Well, they have not any, but they should have, and the only way they can have a come-back is by denying responsibility for full employment. Speaking on behalf of private enterprise, I deny that it has any responsibility to provide jobs for anyone. That is not the purpose of private enterprise. I would ask hon. gentlemen of the C.C.F. who have businesses of their own, those who have farms, do they hire men on the farm when they do not need them? Do they hire them for the fun of it? No, they hire men only when they need them, and when they are through with them they dismiss them.

Mr. LOW: To make a profit.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And to produce goods.

Mr. KUHL: I assert that it is not the duty or the responsibility of private enterprise to provide jobs for anyone. It is the duty and function of private enterprise to produce goods, and it has no other function.

Mr. HANSELL: They can do it better than the government can.

Mr. KUHL: We must reconcile ourselves to two conditions. The first is that we are faced with an ever-decreasing number of man-hours of work. I granted in my preliminary remarks that in a period of readjustment we probably cannot hope to achieve what we should as a long-range objective, but I believe we are here laying down long-range objectives, as well as policies for the immediate future, and I repeat that we must reconcile ourselves, because we are in a power machine and mass production age, to an ever decreasing number of man-hours of work.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And an ever increasing amount of goods.

Mr. KUHL: Along with that, as my colleague points out, an ever-increasing amount of goods. That has been the trend all the way through. Another thing to which we must reconcile ourselves is a new source of income. The concern which I have for the people whom I am privileged to represent is not that they shall have jobs but that they shall have incomes, and that is a vastly different thing.

Mr. LESAGE: How will you do it?

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is the thing you have to learn.

Mr. LESAGE: I want to know. I did not hear it yet.

Mr. LOW: Just keep your ears open and you will hear.

Mr. KUHL: The reason we must reconcile ourselves to that fact is quite obvious. If one machine displaces 100 or 500 or 1,000 men it is obvious to anyone that it also displaces the pay cheque. But the goods go on piling up; the prices are still on them, but the people have not incomes with which to purchase those goods.

The first thing we must do is to set up a national balance sheet. As a nation we have never done that. We must discover what we have in real wealth on the one hand and what purchasing power the people have on the other, and compare the two, and I am satisfied we shall find that the people are short just about forty to fifty cents on the dollar. I have not time to attempt to prove that, but as time goes on during this session we of the Social Credit group are certainly going to elaborate on that aspect of our policy. I grant that if that premise is destroyed the basis of the whole Social Credit proposals ceases to exist, but I am satisfied that it cannot be disproved. What we are suffering from and will suffer from more and more as time goes along is an actual physical shortage of purchasing power, and not a maldistribution. We hear a lot, particularly from the socialists, about a redistribution of profits. I challenge them to redistribute all the profits and they will still be short of money to distribute the goods. The greatest false assumption which is made in economic thinking is, that for every dollar's worth of goods there is somewhere a dollar in money, and that if you divide up the money you are automatically dividing up the goods. The conclusion would be true if the premise were correct, but the premise is not correct.

So we must reconcile ourselves to a new source of purchasing power. No adjustment of wages or prices either to the primary producer or to the secondary producer can effect a cure. There must be a source of income outside of wages and outside of prices, and that source of income must arise through the national bank of Canada. National money must be issued to the people direct in the amount of the deficiency which exists between total production and total buying power. The issuance of national money direct to consumers in this fashion is not something for nothing. When the government through its national bank issues purchasing power direct to consumers it is doing nothing more or less than monetizing the wealth which already exists, which has been produced and belongs to the people, but which they cannot acquire because there is no money anywhere in existence with which to buy it.

I shall not have sufficient time on this occasion to develop fully the thought which I have introduced. There is one other important point I should like to make before I resume my seat.

Most of the discussion which has taken place thus far has centred around providing or enabling the people to enjoy security. Each member in turn has indicated how he believes the people should be enabled to become secure, but how much have we had said about the freedom of the individual? How many hon. members have dwelt at any length on the freedom of the individual? I thought that was largely what we fought this war for. I should like to hear hon. members define freedom. What is freedom? When is a man free and when is he not free? If one may judge from the remarks of some hon. members it seems that all that is involved in freedom, as far as they are concerned, is a full belly and a warm back. I consider that there is more to freedom than that. That is the freedom of a slave. I consider that no one has freedom unless he has the freedom of choice, as was indicated by my colleague the hon. member for Edmonton East. Freedom of choice means freedom to choose or to refuse one thing at a time. Canadians will never have freedom of choice until they are first secure. They must be enabled to enjoy their heritage, which is substantial, whether they work or whether they do not. In addition to that, they must have the right to add to their purchasing power by securing the necessary work of their choice.

A few government supporters have pleaded for patience with the government on the part of opposition members. I am willing to be patient for legitimate reasons. I grant that there are physical limitations which it is impossible to overcome; but as I listened to some of the ministers, notably the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Claxton), I detected something that I suspected I would be hearing before long. He said something about creating appetites which could not be satisfied. It will not be very long before I expect to hear members of the government side, each in turn, saying that we cannot do this and cannot do that because we have not the money. To establish a new order it is not necessary to throw out the whole of the old. Let us preserve the best in the old order, remove the abuses and take care of the deficiencies and it will work to perfection.

Mr. LEWIS MENARY (Wellington North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate you on your elevation to the high office you hold. I am sure you will fill it with distinction to the house as well as to yourself. I am one of the many new members who have come to the house this year and I have enjoyed the wonderful addresses made by different members. It has indeed been a treat. I have also enjoyed the barbs of sarcasm that have been good-naturedly leveled by each side. Especially do I remember the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), addressed to our side of the house, that we were unfortunate enough to come in third position on the soldier's vote. This reminds me of my boy coming running to me when he thought I had done something wonderful, "Daddy, daddy, how did you do it?" But that is the way with children.

To-day in my mail I have twelve letters which I have received from butchers and meat-merchants in my riding and none of them is praying for the government to retain the controls on the rationing of meat. To some of these men the loss is largely in cooked meats. If you take this list and add it up you will see that they have lost in the past few weeks possibly 3,000 pounds of cooked meats, and some of the butchers say they will not continue in business. One of them says it is impossible for him to do the work he has to do. He serves his customers, and it takes him so long to explain the rationing system, and the bookkeeping afterwards again takes up so much time that he cannot do the work.

I am sure that all citizens of Canada are willing to help the mother country. We have plenty of cattle to do this and after that commitment is filled we have enough for ourselves. There are great herds of cattle in my riding. I can name three farmers within a radius of four or five miles of my local town. One farmer has 100 large steers weighing around 1,300 pounds each; another farmer, his neighbour across the road, has about sixty steers and forty head of dairy cattle; and a third farmer—I will mention his name, Frank Gamble—has 325 head of cattle on the grass. There does not seem to be a scarcity of cattle but we want a market.

This is common throughout my riding, and I may say that last week there was a load of cattle returned from the stockyards to that part of the country because of the glut caused by bad marketing. There is no shortage of cattle. Take the statistics for 1944 and look at the marketings of different stockyards across Canada. For the first thirty-seven weeks of 1944 there were 933,736 head of cattle marketed, and for the first thirty-seven weeks of 1945 there were marketed 1,168,157. That does not show any scarcity of cattle.

In my opinion the government should remove these controls because, as I have said, we have an ample supply of cattle to fill our commitments to the mother country and after that is done we can open the gates to the United States. We do not want a continuance of the stockyards being glutted with stock with the result that prices fall and farmers lose money. A farmer takes in his cattle expecting to receive 11, 11½ or 12 cents and after keeping them for a week he sells them at 10½ cents. I know a farmer in our district who took ten head of cattle to the union stockyards. He sold nine head, and one bullock was left for two weeks and finally died. This man could not get any insurance and he had a loss of over $100.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) last week mentioned something about the weighing of cattle at the stockyards. He stated that the capacity for weighing was only 4,000 cattle a day. As we are conversant with stockyards and have sold many thousand of dollars worth of produce to them, I would say that this could easily vary. For instance, if they weighed these cattle by the carload I am sure they could weigh 10,000 head of cattle in one day; but if they have to weigh them by one or two to a lot, or two or three, it takes up more time.

They have four scales in operation at the stockyards and I do not think the trouble is in the matter of weighing. It is a matter of the packers going into the country and buying cattle and shipping them into their own yards and to the stockyards and the public are not aware of this fact. This condition can only be corrected by the government under their emergency powers.

The people of Canada to-day want to do everything possible to help to feed the multitude of people who are starving in Europe and who have suffered so much in this terrible struggle. I believe that all parties in this house desire to see this accomplished. To-day we are witnessing in Canada and throughout the continent one of the biggest strikes in history. I believe that the great trouble of this mass unemployment in the big cities is partly owing to living conditions. There are no gardens, no lawns, no playgrounds for the children. I have always believed and advocated that no city should grow over a hundred thousand in population and that manufacturers should spread their manufacturing plants over the rural sections where certain parts could be manufactured and shipped into a central point to be assembled. In that way the labouring man could have an acre or half an acre of ground and could keep some hens, a cow or something like that. In that way he would be a more satisfied man and the farmer would also have a market for his products nearer to his home.

I wish to speak on the income tax. I should like to say a few words here in regard to the farmer's income tax. As a farmer I know something of the difficulties of the farmer, the poor remuneration he receives for his work, and so forth. He possibly works longer hours and has less opportunity to take a vacation than individuals in any other occupation. He can do his best in cultivating the soil and planting his seed, but he has no control over the rainfall or the dry weather, or the pests that prey on his crop. He suffers more than anyone else from extreme variations in prices. When he has a large crop there is usually a lowering of the price level. If he has a poor crop he gets probably a higher price but he may have very little to sell. His only opportunity to make any money is when he happens to have a good crop and there is failure in other districts. His average earnings over a period of years are only very moderate, and therefore it is unfair to have to pay income tax on the years when he has a fair return unless the years of poor return are taken into consideration.

I think it would appeal to everyone, and all fair-minded persons would agree that the ordinary farmer should get some redress as to his income tax, because in the good years he pays out and in the bad years he gets no rebate. Probably in no other business do values fluctuate so radically as in the case of the farmer. The ordinary farmer with a hundred acres or less should not have to file an income tax return as far as his farming operations are concerned, if he is solely engaged in farming.

I should like to say a few words about the adoption of a new flag for Canada. My riding views with alarm the matter of a new flag and a new national anthem. I represent a great constituency which has sent overseas over one thousand boys, many of whom have not returned to the families who loved them. We offer our deepest sympathy to them. These boys went to fight that we might in the future be saved the horrors of war that other nations have suffered, and more especially the continuous bombing, the restrictions on food, clothing, housing and other necessities which have been the lot of our mother country and during which they have shown such wondrous endurance. This has awakened our sympathies and admiration for these brave people. We cannot forget the great work of the British navy or the great fight put up by her soldiers, assisted by soldiers of the British commonwealth, in North Africa, Sicily, Italy, France, Holland and Germany; and I am sure my constituents will not be satisfied with any flag that does not display as a most important part of its design the old union jack which has braved a thousand years the battle and the breeze, and which throughout the past through all the world has stood for bravery, integrity and fairness of the British people.

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, like other hon. members from Winnipeg who have spoken in this debate, I should like in my first words to give expression to the deep sense of gratitude that is felt in our city over the release from imprisonment of those heroic Canadians who fought at Hong Kong, including the Winnipeg Grenadiers. As has been said already by others who have preceded me, the fact that people in Winnipeg are now receiving messages from their loved ones, the fact that some of these men are already arriving home, has touched the heartstrings of the people of our city in a way we can all understand.

I have looked over the lists of the men who have been freed as they have appeared in our Winnipeg papers these past few days, and I have been struck once again by the large number of the men in the Winnipeg Grenadiers who came from the constituency I have the honour to represent. I cannot forget that many of these young men, enlisting as they did in the early months of the war—many of them went to Jamaica before they went to Hong Kong—are young men from homes that experienced the deepest bitterness of the depression this country went through in the 1930's. Nevertheless these young men were prepared to do their part, and I trust that this parliament will take a solemn vow that they must never again return to the conditions they and their families went through in those tragic thirties.

I wish to join with those who have urged the government to make suitable recognition of the experience through which these Hong Kong heroes have gone. I support particularly the suggestion made by the leader of this group, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), when he urged that any special pay and allowances or other provisions that were to have been given to soldiers in the Pacific war should be given to these men, retroactive to the day they embarked in 1941, and that amounts due a deceased soldier should be given to his next of kin.

Mr. Speaker, as I understand it the purpose of this debate is to permit hon. members to discuss the government's proposals and activities in the light of what we believe to be the desires and the best interests of the people we represent. I shall endeavour to gear my remarks to that purpose. Perhaps before I launch into the main body of what I have to say I might offer the comment that it seems to me in this debate we have had more than we needed of rehashing the last election. Particularly has that been true of my hon. friends of the Progressive Conservative party. Time and again they have simply rehashed what they thought were the issues in the election.

Mr. CASSELMAN: That was the last session.

Mr. KNOWLES: My hon. friend refers to the last session. Their speeches in this debate have sounded very much like the last session to me.

Mr. CASSELMAN: We are a new parliament now.

Mr. KNOWLES: Across the way we have had a different song from our hon. friends of the Liberal party. Again we have had more than we have needed of their theme song. It has been, I regret to say, one of complacency, expressed again and again in the statement by hon. members opposite, particularly in reply to members of the Progressive Conservative party, "But we won the election."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. KNOWLES: With typical enthusiasm comes "hear, hear" from across the way. It is perfectly true that my hon. friends opposite won a majority of the seats in this house, and if we had done so or if the Progressive Conservatives had done so, I dare say some of us would be boasting of that fact just as they are doing. But it does seem to me that the seriousness of conditions in Canada at the present time calls for a realistic approach to our problems rather than that sort of complacency. As a matter of fact, I doubt if any government in this country ever had less reason than the present government for being complacent. They won the election; yes, they won a majority of the seats in this house, but one should take into consideration, and the government members especially should consider, the way the people of this country voted. Taking the country as a whole, thirty-nine per cent of the people of Canada voted for the Liberal party. Without giving the breakdown for the other groups the fact is—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Why not? Break them down.

Mr. KNOWLES: The fact is that sixty-one per cent of the people of all Canada voted against this government.

An hon. MEMBER: And ten per cent for the C.C.F.

Mr. KNOWLES: Since you want the figure, it was sixteen per cent; and I suggest to the members of the Liberal party opposite that the fact that a total of sixty-one per cent of the Canadian people voted against the Liberal party should sober them far more than it is apparently doing.

Mr. BROOKS: Sober is the right word.

Mr. KNOWLES: I do not blame hon. members for being particularly impressed with the way the vote went in their own constituencies or their own parts of the country. Hon. members who have come to this house from parts of Canada that went predominantly Liberal feel that everything in the country is Liberal, but they are sadly mistaken. I come from western Canada, where only thirty-four per cent of the people voted for the Liberal party and sixty-six per cent voted against this government. Included in that sixty-six per cent were thirty-two per cent who voted for the C.C.F. I shall have to make a slight correction, Mr. Speaker; I have been quoting the figures for Manitoba only.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. KNOWLES: I will have the laugh in a moment; I am now going to quote the figures for the whole of western Canada, where the percentage was even higher. In western Canada as a whole the vote was twenty-nine per cent for the Liberal party and seventy-one per cent against it. If that does not sober my hon. friends across the way sufficiently I suggest that they look at the figures for the constituency of Winnipeg North Centre, which I have the honour to represent. They will find that there we enabled all four of our opponents to contribute their $200 deposits to the federal treasury. The total vote against the government was more than eighty per cent, while the vote for the C.C.F. in my riding, with four candidates against us, was more than fifty-five per cent of all the votes cast, and our majority was the largest in the history of the riding.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Do not hold that against Manitoba.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What about seats? That is what counts.

Mr. KNOWLES: My hon. friends across the way, who seem to be enjoying this picture of the precarious position in which they find themselves, are asking about seats in western Canada. Very well, I will give the figures. The people of western Canada sent to this house twenty-seven members of the C.C.F., nineteen members of the Liberal party, eleven members of the Progressive Conservative party, thirteen Social Crediters and two Independents.

I have made reference to these facts concerning the last election—and there are more I could give, particularly the soldier vote, which gave the C.C.F. first place overseas, but I had better watch my time—not just for the amusement I seem to have caused but to suggest to the government that this is no time for complacency on their part. Not only have they serious problems with which to deal, but they have a country in which the majority of the people lack confidence in the present administration. They have a real task on their hands. They must deliver the goods.

Another reply that I feel we have had all too often from the government side of the house is that the war is just over; that V-E day was only in May and V-J day only in August; that the surrender of Japan was signed only two or three weeks ago, and we are asked to be patient and give them time. Well, Mr. Speaker, that was not the attitude in September, 1939, when war broke out. There was a war to be won and something had to be done about it without delay. I suggest that peace has broken out and that the time to win the peace is now, before we lose it by allowing the problems of housing, insecurity and unemployment to pile up until their solution is made that much more difficult. So I urge that we have done with this complacency, with this stalling for time, and that the government get down to business and deal with the problems confronting the country right now while we are in session.

As I indicated earlier, I believe the purpose of this debate is to provide a chance for us to discuss some of the proposals the government has made. One of the fields in which we have had such proposals is that of social security. The other night the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Claxton) spoke on this matter, dealing particularly with old age pensions. He expressed great pleasure in the proposal that had been made of $30 a month for all those over seventy, and rejected any suggestion of a larger amount or a lower age limit on the ground that it would cost too much money, at the same time making the elaborate statement that Canada would soon lead the world in social security. I earnestly hope that day will come, and it will come when a C.C.F. government is across the way.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. KNOWLES: But while the Minister of National Health and Welfare and his enthusiastic friends over there are boasting about a proposal of $30 a month, they have not told us when it is to commence. Incidentally, it is still only a proposal, and all the figures with reference to it in the proposals made at the dominion-provincial conference, and all the figures given by the minister in his address the other day, referred to the year 1948. I wonder why 1948; is that the year of the next election?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CLAXTON: May I answer that now?

Mr. KNOWLES: I suggest that we should have something more than proposals for the distant future.

Mr. CLAXTON: May I answer the question now?

Mr. KNOWLES: I shall be glad if the minister will.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. CLAXTON: Most of the figures for the proposal put before the conference were based on the year 1948. That was the first year following the war when we thought full conversion from war to peace would be in effect.

Mr. KNOWLES: Has the government or the minister or anyone speaking on behalf of the government given any indication that the proposal of $30 a month is to come into effect any sooner than 1948?

Mr. CLAXTON: It will come into effect as soon as the provinces agree to the proposals.

Mr. KNOWLES: There we are, right back to the old problem of agreement between the dominion and the provinces before we can move anywhere. I submit that the government by making these proposals, and the Minister of National Health and Welfare by boasting of them, have admitted the rightness of the request which has been made not only from this corner but from all sides of the house that changes should be brought about in the old age pension legislation; that the amount should be raised and the age lowered; that the means test should be done away with; that liens against property should be abolished, and that the residence qualifications should be eased. In other words, every suggestion contained in the government's proposals is an admission that we have been right. They have now admitted we are right. Then why the delay? The government has power to make these increases and to make these changes now, and that is what the people of Canada are expecting.

The other night the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Claxton) said that we must be careful—I am quoting from memory, but I think this is right—not to whet people's appetites and then find that we cannot satisfy their desires in connection with what they hope they are going to get. I want to tell him I am already having to answer letters from old people asking me if the new amount of $30 a month is to come into effect on January 1, 1946. They have the idea that this is something they will get while they are still alive. I have to write back to them to the effect that no such announcement has been made by the government, but that we will do our best on the floor of the house to persuade the government to make such an announcement soon. If the minister meant what he said when he argued against whetting people's appetites for something they cannot be given, I suggest that he should pull all his weight toward bringing this $30 a month proposal into effect as soon as possible, because he has already whetted their appetites.

Incidentally I want to say to the government that I am glad the administration of old age pensions has been transferred from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. My saying this has nothing whatever to do with the personalities of the two men involved. But it has seemed ridiculous to me that, prior to this time, the Minister of Finance in his capacity of administrator of old age pensions, in the event of wanting more money had to argue with himself in his capacity of Minister of Finance as to what he should do about it. The result has been a sad story for old age pensioners. However, we now have a separate minister to argue with the Minister of Finance on behalf of old age pensioners. I believe he is interested in their welfare and I hope he will put up a real fight along the lines I am suggesting to-night.

Even when we get this $30 a month, which I hope we will get before 1948, I am afraid the Minister of National Health and Welfare will find that he must go still farther, if indeed he is going to achieve his ideal of a Canada leading the world in measures of social security. I am going again to refer to the country of New Zealand—and I suppose that already someone is trying to think up some wise-crack as soon as I mention New Zealand.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Why not Saskatchewan?

Mr. KNOWLES: Saskatchewan is doing a good job too.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Let us hear about it, then.

Mr. KNOWLES: There are plenty of Saskatchewan members here; they will tell you about it.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: You will not give them a chance.

Mr. KNOWLES: In the New Zealand parliament at the present time the government, has proposed, and we have reason to believe that its proposal will carry—

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Why?

Mr. KNOWLES: That is what happens here. The government's proposal in New Zealand is to increase old age benefits at the age of 60 years to two pounds sterling a week. Let us do a little simple arithmetic. I checked carefully with two banks in this city to-day to make sure that there could be no mistake as to the rate of exchange. At both banks I was told that the New Zealand pound at the present rate of exchange is worth $3.60 in Canadian dollars.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): It used to be worth $4.86 before the labour government took office.

Mr. KNOWLES: Just a minute, and my hon. friend may stop laughing. That two pounds, therefore, amounts in Canada to $7.20 a week, or $31.20 a month.

I secured from the library to-day—and, by the way, it was quite a trip, going back and forth through all those hidden areas where so many books are kept; we might well spend a little money to improve the facilities of our own parliamentary library—a copy of the International Labour Office Year Book of Labour Statistics for the years 1943 and 1944. This book is published by the International Labour office, and it is not C.C.F. or New Zealand propaganda.

In this book will be found statistics as to the cost of living index for various countries and at page 207 is found the latest data available, that of October, 1943, for comparing Canada with New Zealand. At that time the trend was rising, and from that I conclude that if we had the figure for to-day it might be worse. These statistics show that at that time one dollar would buy in New Zealand, in food, what it takes $1.79 to buy in Canada.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Nonsense!

Mr. KNOWLES: You are not arguing with me; you are arguing with the International Labour office.

Mr. REID: Quote the rest of it.

Mr. KNOWLES: I have given my hon. friend the title of the book and the page number from which I am quoting. I have stated that information fully. I am giving every opportunity to any hon. member who wishes to take this book and review it.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Are you afraid to put the rest on Hansard?

Mr. CASSELMAN: You do not know what is in it, anyway.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order; when an hon. member—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: You are not on the back bench either.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order; I must remind hon. members that when an hon. member has the floor, no interruption is allowed without his permission.

Mr. KNOWLES: The hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) has asked me to put it all on Hansard. May I explain that there are pages and pages of statistics and that it would take two or three days to put them on Hansard—and then I fear the hon. member would not understand them, anyway.

Mr. REID: I wonder if you would allow a question.

Mr. KNOWLES: Certainly.

Mr. REID: Have you any figures to show what farmers in New Zealand are getting for that cheap food? That would be most interesting; let us have it.

Mr. KNOWLES: I have not farm income figures here at the moment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. KNOWLES: You need not laugh; we will give them to you gladly. There are many more speakers in this party who can give that information as this debate proceeds.

Mr. REID: And I will give plenty, too.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I will give the answer.

Mr. KNOWLES: In other words, the old age benefit of two pounds a week translated into Canadian dollars and related to the cost of living index in the two countries has an equivalent value, in terms of food, of $59.28 a month in Canada.

I suggest to the Minister of National Health and Welfare that his proposal of $30 a month at seventy years is hardly leading the world. The New Zealand benefit it at sixty and the new rate goes into effect this fall. I suggest, therefore, that Canada is hardly leading the world—although she will some day—in social security.

While I am speaking about what they are doing in New Zealand at the present time, may I point out that the parliament now in session in that country has before it a government measure to increase the benefits to be given to widows. In Canada we have no widow's benefits, except mothers' allowances for widows with children. Even those allowances are only provincial in this country. The New Zealand government is increasing to one pound and ten shillings a week the benefit to widows. That is the equivalent, on the same basis I have outlined, of $44.46 a month in Canada.

A widow with two children will receive two pounds for herself and ten shillings for each child, making a total of three pounds a week or the equivalent in Canada on the same basis, of $88.92 a month.

In addition to these benefits, another increase is being made, and this time it is with respect to the special benefits given to wage earners who are sick or unemployed. This benefit is being increased to two pounds a week for the father, plus two pounds a week for the mother, plus ten shillings for each child. In other words, a family of four would receive five pounds a week when the wage-earner is unemployed either because of sickness or for some other cause. This, on the same basis I have already given, is the equivalent of $148.20 a month in Canada.

All this is being done in a country with only about 1,500,000 population, as compared with our 11,500,000. One has only to reflect upon that to realize the economic problem they must have in a country as small as that. It will be realized that their problem is much greater than ours, in our larger economic unit.

Mr. MITCHELL: Would my hon. friend tell us something about taxes? Let us see the other side of the medal.

Mr. KNOWLES: I do not mind doing that, except that it does take up a good deal of time from other subjects that I had wished to discuss. The fact of the matter is that when the New Zealand Labour government has gone to the country with its taxation programme, and has set against its taxes its increased benefits and its wider arrangements for social security, the people have returned them to power. That is the test.

I should like to refer for a moment longer to the question of old age pensions. The other day the Minister of National Health and Welfare objected to a proposal of an old age pension of $50 a month at the age of sixty years on the ground that it would cost $850,000,000 a year. That was the final answer to the proposal so far as he was concerned. This parliament from time to time has heard many objections to improving old age pensions on the ground that we cannot afford to pay an improved pension. In 1939 the Hon. Charles Dunning, then minister of finance, objected to a slight increase then proposed by this group on the ground that it would cost an additional $18,895,000. Now, the government itself makes the proposal to spend not $18,000,000, but more than $200,000,000—

An hon. MEMBER: And a good thing.

Mr. KNOWLES: A good thing is right. It is an exceptionally good thing. Eighteen months ago I rose in my place in this house and made a proposal respecting better old age pensions which so far as I could compute from the statistics and figures available to me would bring the total cost of old age pensions to $206,000,000. I made the proposal very seriously and pressed it as hard as I could, but unfortunately my motion was ruled out of order by the Speaker. However, the Winnipeg Free Press—

Mr. HOMUTH: What is that? A paper?

Mr. KNOWLES: A paper in the city from which I come, taking note of what I had to say—

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Is that not the same paper which urged the people to vote for Mackenzie King in the last election?

Mr. KNOWLES: It never did anything else. What a question to ask a Manitoba member!

I was going on to say that a few days after I had made my proposal in this house which would have brought the total expenditure on old age pensions to $206,000,000 the Winnipeg Free Press ran an editorial headed "A Mere $206,000,000", in which the member for Winnipeg North Centre was taken to task for his irresponsibility in proposing to spend so large a sum of money. $206,000,000—it could not be done. Now the government itself, only eighteen months later, comes down, I am glad to say, with a proposal that is going to cost $200,000,000 for the men and women over seventy years and another thirty or forty million dollars for those between sixty-five and sixty-nine. I hope the Winnipeg Free Press will call me irresponsible again to-night if it means that eighteen months from now the federal government will pay an old age pension of $50 a month at the age of sixty—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Hear, hear.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am glad to note that I have support from across the way, and I hope that the members of the Liberal party will express that support most vehemently in their own caucus.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK. I did so yesterday.

Mr. KNOWLES: Hear, hear. Let us take a look now at that sum of $850,000,000 which the Minister of National Health and Welfare quoted the other day. It sounds huge. I find in Hansard of February 11, 1944, that on that day the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) asked us to vote certain moneys for the war appropriation. That was the last full year of the war, and included in that war appropriation bill was the sum of $985,270,670.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: And seventy cents.

Mr. KNOWLES: No. Seventy dollars. No cents.

An hon. MEMBER: How do you spell that?

Mr. MacINNIS: Wrong again.

Mr. KNOWLES: It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that I should get an extra five minutes for all these interruptions. That sum of money was needed for pay and allowances for the members of the three armed services. Please note what we were doing. We were taking three-quarters of a million men and women out of productive activity and providing them with food, clothing, shelter, medical and dental care, personal supplies, everything they needed, and on top of that we paid them more than $985,000,000 in good hard cash. Did the country go broke as a result of that? No, we had the most prosperous year in our history, and I submit that if we can pay, when we have to, $985,000,000 a year to a large body of our citizens for purposes of war, we can pay $850,000,000 to our respected aged citizens for the purposes of peace, so that they might enjoy the kind of retirement they are entitled to and so that the country as a whole might reap the economic benefits of such a policy.

Since my time is passing, I shall refer only briefly to other subjects upon which I wished to touch. I want to say a word about housing. This is a subject in which anyone coming from Winnipeg North Centre is keenly interested. We have had a lot of talk in this house about housing. We have had arguments about whether private enterprise or a public authority is best able to provide homes for our people. That has been threshed out fully. Members of this house know quite well where I stand on that matter, and I think events are proving that private enterprise cannot be counted upon to provide the homes our people need. I think the day is fast coming when even this government will have to set up a public housing authority to deal with this pressing problem.

I want to bring this thing down to cases by suggesting that the government, through a public housing authority, should, if it means business, take a constituency such as the one which I represent and do something about the housing problem right there.

Many hon. members who in the course of this debate have spoken of their constituencies have told of the beauty of the ridings they have the honour to represent. I am proud of my constituency. I am proud of the people who live in it. They are a people who know the score. They have done their share and more than their share in the conflict through which we have just passed. And I say with real pride that they are the people who do the world's work. They are industrial workers, and while there are parts of my constituency that have lovely homes there are other areas in my riding—well, Mr. Speaker, come to Winnipeg and I will take you in my old car and drive you around, and you will hang your head in shame that Canadian citizens who do the world's work to the extent that it is done by the citizens of Winnipeg North Centre have to live in the kind of places that some of my people live in and bring their children up in the environment and atmosphere that is to be found in parts of the city of Winnipeg, in my own riding, and some other Winnipeg ridings as well. I have no lakes and mountains in my constituency such as other hon. members have spoken of, just working people who live in homes which they try to make worthy of the name, but many hundreds of them should be torn down and new ones put in their place, and I suggest to the government that if it means business it should go into an area like Point Douglas, or an area like that along the C.P.R. tracks, or go to Brooklands, where good streets, yes, sewer and water, are sorely needed, and in place of some of the dwellings to be found there now let us set up a model housing community. The people who live there work in the C.P.R. shops, for Dominion Bridge, Manitoba Bridge and the Vulcan Iron Works. They work in factories and offices of all kinds. They do the heavy work of the world and produce tremendous wealth. For whom? Do they get back what they produce? They get only a pittance on which to live; that is all. This country should provide for them the best homes that architects and engineers can design, with all the conveniences and advantages that go with a modern model community. I have no hesitancy in making this plea for my constituency, realizing quite well that it might prompt other members to do the same for their constituencies, and if it does, hear, hear; all power to them.

Every constituency in Canada which has a housing problem such as mine deserves consideration by the government of a project such as I have suggested—clearing out the slums, building model communities, with all the best medical, recreational, and educational advantages human beings should enjoy. Let us have a little imagination. Let us go to work and really win the peace.

There is in some of these areas to which I have referred, such as Brooklands and Weston, a keen community spirit. In Weston, for example, there is a move at the present time to build a community centre as a memorial to the many lads from that part of the city who have given their lives in the conflict which at last has ended. These people are finding it difficult to raise the large amount of money they have in mind for a suitable memorial. It seems to me that they should be encouraged in that project, and that other communities across this country should similarly be encouraged so that we may beautify not only the national capital—I am all for that, too—but so that we might beautify every city in this country, with suitable memorials, and above all, proper homes.

I see, Mr. Speaker, that you are edging to the front of your chair. I shall be just a minute or two. I should like to say that I hope we shall begin to get something concrete soon in the matter of employment. I listened with interest to the speech which the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) made last night, but I think the day will come when the government will be sorry he made that speech. It sounded well, but nothing specific was in it. It was simply added to the election promises which they must now fulfil. I hope he is right in saying that he has a million jobs; we need two million; but I suggest that what we want is, not flamboyant speeches full of enthusiasm, but the delivery of the goods, or in other words, actual jobs.

Not only must we have jobs, but the time is long overdue for some real indication that we are going to achieve industrial democracy, which surely was one of the aims of the war. No reference to it is to be found in the speech from the throne. The references to it in the government's proposals to the dominion-provincial conference are very scant, and only in terms of temporary expedients which, to my way of thinking, are not at all in keeping with the fine words of the Secretary of State (Mr. Martin) the other night when he said that the government is determined to maintain the position labour has gained. Words are not enough. If the government means these things let them deliver the goods, not with complacency here in this house, not with boasting about the fact that they won the election, but with performance equal to its promises.

With this last word I sit down. I join with others in support of the proposal for a distinctive national flag and for the other measures designed to make more real and definite our distinctive Canadian citizenship, and I trust that these very desirable steps will be achieved with a large degree of unanimity in this house. I hope, however, that, having done that, we shall put new meaning and real glory into Canadian citizenship by establishing in this country security, justice and freedom for all our people.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak in this debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne because I think I have something sensible and true to say. The speech suits me for several reasons. First, I find in the opening words this expression:

> As you assemble at the opening of a new parliament, I join with you in giving humble and grateful thanks to Divine Providence for the deliverance which His mercy has vouchsafed to the peoples of our own and other lands.

That utterance, whether by the Governor General or the government, is sensible, because you cannot explain in any other way the victory and the peace which we now have. You cannot explain Dunkirk and the successful evacuation of our men from that place unless you believe in an answer to prayer. You cannot explain why Hitler did not wipe old England off the map unless you believe the same thing. You cannot explain why Hitler attacked Russia when he did unless you agree that the Great Architect of the universe did not think that Hitler was fit to rule the world. For these reasons I congratulate the government upon having this sentence in the speech from the throne. Also, they did not omit to give thanks to God for victory, because with peace came the declaration of a day of thanksgiving all over the British empire. The speech also gives credit to our Canadian forces for having a part in that victory. I find also plans to help those who are destitute, and it is a Christian programme to feed the hungry, clothe the naked, visit those who are sick and help those who are in prison. These things we are trying to do now. Those who do not agree with rationing should think the whole thing over again in the light of putting that programme into practice.

I find, too, in the speech from the throne proposals for making Ottawa a little more beautiful, perhaps, than any other city in Canada. This is as it should be, because the cream of Canada meets in this city, at least part of the time, and it is in keeping with the conception of the late Queen Victoria that our capital should be more beautiful than Toronto or Montreal. I will, however, throw out this suggestion to the government, that all the money for a community centre should not be spent in Ottawa. We are planning a community centre in Fort William, and we think we have as good right as Ottawa to some support for the beautification of our city. It is not second in natural beauty even to Ottawa. In pursuance of a plan for a community centre we have raised nearly $80,000 in cash, so that we are helping ourselves before we ask the dominion or provincial government to help us.

The dominion government took away our skating rink. We have no home for our national hockey game; they turned it into a big armoury; it was necessary then and perhaps is necessary still. So that I warn the government through the ministers who are here and I shall not be treading gently on somebody's toes if we do not get back somewhat more than the $20,000 which was paid in compensation for that rink.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is supporting a declaration which he made before the meeting of dominion prime ministers in London, that Canada is a nation, that we have a right to our own national anthem, that, as the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank) said, we have a right to make and control our own laws; and we think we can rule ourselves better than any jurist from the city of London or old England.

Again, we have a right to have our own flag. I know some of our boys were in England, and—I say it with all respect—they did not have the same respect for England that we of the first generation that came from the old land had, because they did not like it when some of the officers whom they refused to salute called them "bleeding colonials". We are not colonials. We are a nation and we have a right to our own flag—and I am going to show you what some people in Ottawa think should be the flag of Canada. I have it here. I showed this to members of the Liberal party about a year ago and I flew this very flag in Fort William on victory day. I thought it was all right. Whether it will be the future flag of Canada or not, at any rate Fort William got a foretaste of what some manufacturer in Ottawa saw fit to design. Here in this flag you have the red, white and blue, and those hon. members who believe just as strongly as I do in the flag can still sing, "Three Cheers for the Red, White and Blue." There is a stripe for each province; there is the Canadian coat of arms, and there is the green maple leaf, which is the natural colour of the maple leaf. Not only that, but green is the "go" sign of Canada as well as the "go" sign of Fort William.

I have not spent any time in congratulating anybody, but I was greatly proud to think that one of the northern members was chosen to move the address in reply to the speech from the throne. He demonstrated, what we know, that northern men are men still. We had an election in Fort William and I would say that there was not a cleaner contest in all Canada. I did not see a man anywhere at any time who seemed to have had too much ginger ale. Those who were opposition candidates were kind enough to me, so kind that they did not advertise a single mistake that I had made, either while I was in this house or while I was out of it. I must say I am eternally grateful, because I have made a few mistakes. I am grateful to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). I do not know whether he had anything to do with this, but when we needed workers in Fort William, a good many workers came from the province of Saskatchewan, and there were good enough Liberals and people with sufficient common sense to elect me. I pity the C.C.F. when they go back to Saskatchewan, because there is going to be a change.

Some people think that all we have in Fort William is fresh water, rocks and lake Superior trout. But I can assure you sir, we have in that part of the country one of the best farming districts in Canada. We have an experimental substation that is paying for itself hundreds of times over. We have the best potato land. We have a 500 bushel to the acre club in Fort William. Just think of it, an Irishman coming from the old sod and raising 500 bushels of potatoes to the acre! We have the champion potato grower in Canada seventeen miles west of Fort William. Cape Breton and the maritimes are not in it.

Again, we have proved that the district will grow first-class fruit. I am sorry I was not in the house when the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) was advertising his peaches. I congratulate him; but wait until he comes to Fort William; we will give him a peach that will make his mouth water.

We have in Fort William one of the best feeding grounds for fattening cattle because in the fall of the year it is damp and cool and we have fine, healthy grass. It is a splendid place for finishing cattle.

We have a great boom just starting in mining about 55 miles west of Fort William where there is opening up another gold mine—a find they call it—and the people are going there. I do not need to speak of Steep Rock, with its hematite iron ore, the best on the American continent. I do not need to speak of lumber, nor do I need to speak of our elevators, which constitute the breadbasket of the world. We have a new industry springing up in Fort William where the waste of the sawmills from pulp and paper is being pressed and manufactured into a very fine type of fuel. When the estimates of the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) are up I will show him a sample.

There are two or three things we need to get in Fort William. We want to get the transcanada highway along the north shore of lake Superior. We want to get it finished because it would mean a great tourist boom for Sault Ste. Marie, for Schreiber, for the head of the lakes, for Kenora and Winnipeg. We believe that is needed, and since the tourist trade is the third best trade in Canada we think we should get it.

Take again the great lakes waterways. This ought to come, and we are encouraged to know that President Truman of the United States is prepared to support it. We are prepared to support it and I do not think there will be opposition in this house.

We need hospitalization in Fort William. We expect to get cheap money and I expect that the Social Credit members will support us in that. But whether they do or not, we believe that our government has common sense enough to help us in getting our new hospital.

I now come to what I consider the best part of my remarks. There was a considerable lay-off in Canada Car. I believe 3,600 were laid off. That plant had been empty since the last war, but the Minister of Reconstruction stood by us in great shape. He got us orders for planes when neither England, France nor the United States would allow any of their better type of plane to be made by anybody else. One thing followed another until there were over 6,000 people employed in Canada Car, and I would say that the work done by that plant is second to none in any of the war plants of Canada. In fact we think it is just a little better. The day came, however, when the war was over, and thank God it is over and we can turn our thoughts to something else. The Minister of Reconstruction came along and helped us splendidly in getting orders for buses of a fine type. Not only that, but he will stand behind us, because the Minister of Reconstruction is the man that stood behind us when we were fighting for holidays with pay and when we wanted cooperation between the management and unions and workers. He is the man who stood behind us when we needed help. I find in Hansard that the minister has invited more leaders of labour than any other minister ever did in the history of Canada to cooperate with him. He has called upon the head men of these union organizations and has meetings with them regularly, and he will take their advice and the findings of their judgment. I wish to pay a tribute to the labour leaders of Canada because from the very first time I met my old friend Tom Moore I had a profound respect for these leaders. They compare favourably with the leaders of any of the parties in this house. They have been through the mill; they know their own capacities, and they have sympathy with the toiler.

When war broke out hon. members will remember how often the Minister of Reconstruction heard and how often we heard it said that the attitude of the government was, "Too little and too late". And it was true, because democracy is never ready for war. It is a difficult thing to turn peace industries into war industries, but to my mind it is not so difficult to turn industry back into peace-time pursuits. Notwithstanding that, we at the head of the lakes are grateful as are others in Canada that the Minister of Reconstruction is the man who will have the opportunity of putting industry back into peace-time production.

The minister said yesterday that he was hopeful of having full-time employment. I would say that he has good reason for that, and so have we because of the number of jobs there are waiting for somebody to take. I should like to say that sometimes I am disappointed with the Minister of Reconstruction. Just before the session opened I and a number of men from Port Arthur and Fort William tried to make an appointment with him for the 4th or 5th of September. He turned us down. I then found out that he was in Toronto having just the thing that he tried to give to the workers of Canada, a holiday. I have nothing to say in favour of the labour leaders who did not treat him with the respect that he deserved, because he wanted to have a holiday before he had the meeting with them that he had arranged for in the city of Ottawa. I was surprised at the minister's patience because, as you remember, Mr. Speaker, the newspapermen said that his putting was poor that day. He came in there and he missed a glorious opportunity to make a hole in one. He did not do so, but he was more courteous than I would have been in the circumstances. I would say to any man, whether on the government side of the house or anywhere else, that if you try to meet the Minister of Reconstruction no man will meet you more courteously and efficiently and send you away with a warm spot in your heart than he, but if you try to put something over that is crooked, try to get something to your advantage that hurts somebody else, I can tell you that you will get an answer just as plain and polite as you deserve.

So far as Canada Car is concerned, we who support the labourers and workers say that wages should be kept up. President Truman said: "We can never go back to forty cents an hour." I do not think any man can have a home, a wife and family, earn a living and educate his children on forty cents an hour. We have no right to go back to that. I am one of those who will fight as far as possible to give a man a full day's wages for a full day's work.

I believe that on the other side there are some leaders of corporations that do make men sore and I was almost going to say they make them see red. I think of a big abattoir where I was once able to secure work for a bright young man. He worked for eighteen years and was then directed to go to another town. In reality it was a demotion instead of a promotion. He refused to take the position, and of course this man in the corporation who was more interested in profits than anything else said, "If you do not take the job, you know what to do." The young man said, "I do, and you can give my job to somebody else." He then came back to Fort William and within a week he had a better job than that which he had worked up to in eighteen years with Canada Packers.

I was disappointed when the warehouse operators at their convention a while ago said that their only hope was to get wages reduced, and their only hope of getting wages reduced was to get men to come back from the war. Any corporation that will use the sacred life of our boys, who went over there and fought for us and then came back, in this manner, and ask them to take a reduction in wages, is not fit to get the support of the people of Canada; it is a disgrace to civilization.

I listened to the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Rose) and I agreed with him in some things. I was terribly disappointed when he quoted a statement that appeared in the Montreal Standard as coming from the president of Canada Car. I shall read it as it appears at page 169 of Hansard of September 13, because we need to know it. It is a newspaper report that I hope is not true. If it is true, then the sooner Canada Car gets out of Fort William, the better it will be for us. This is the quotation:

> The party is over. Not only will there not be enough jobs, but wages will have to be brought down to former peace-time levels. If the employees won't take a cut in wages, the plant will have to close down. We can't afford to have our profits cut into by paying the high war-time wage levels.

Who would not get hot under the collar after reading that, "The party is over"? The cream of Canada, the boys and girls, men and women went over there, but they did not go to a party. They fought for your freedom and mine, and with the help of God you and I will see that they get fair play. The party is not over; the party is just beginning and we are going to have a fine time.

I should like to compare these two corporations with another corporation. I suppose some hon. members have been reading about it. Perhaps they do not know any more about it than I do, but I got my information at first-hand. There is a firm called "Jack & Heinz" of Cleveland, Ohio, who treat their employees like human beings. They pay good wages. They supply recreation at the expense of production. The first thing they do with a new employee is to get him a pair of new boots. They send him to a specialist to have his feet examined and get him a pair of boots in which he can stand and work and do an honest day's toil. There is no time clock in that manufacturer's concern, but if anybody is not there on time then the workers look after him. There is no loafing and no smoking on the job, because if a worker does either he gets enough catcalls to make him sick and he goes back to his job again. During the war they paid large bonuses and were taken to task for it; but they showed that they could pay those bonuses to their workers and do more and better work than people like Henry Ford.

Hon. members may think I am speaking at random, but I went across the line last week-end and it was reported to me that the Ford people have been sending out groups of investigators to investigate the workers to find out if there is a streak of red in them, or if they lean that way. These are the people that put on the drive against the Hebrews in the United States. If they find that these people are communists then they are displaced by men from the forces at a lower rate of wages. What a difference it would be if the Ford people would send out their investigators as this other company did to find out where the distress is, to find out where there is not enough money coming into the homes to feed, clothe and educate the children! If they could find out where there is sickness and distress and practise the teaching of the Master Workman of Nazareth, then Ford would leave behind him a name worth far more than all the money he could pile up. These people are safe and secure, and we think we in Canada also can be safe and secure. I will admit that around each member of this house is a group of friends who are loyal, but I am sure hon. gentlemen will not be surprised when I say—because I think it is the truth—that the rank and file of the people of Canada do not care a snap of their fingers what party is in power. What they want is a living wage, to be secure, to be treated like human beings, and to do an honest day's work. I would say, too, that the workers of Canada are always entitled to one day's rest in seven. That should be the Sabbath day, so that after toiling all week they may go to some cosy place and listen to music that has the strains of heaven in it, and hear something that will take away their cares and leave them disgusted with their sins, ready to face what may come in the days that lie ahead. In my opinion the cure for distress in Canada or any other country is for labour and capital to adopt the principles of the sermon on the mount, to practise forgiveness even unto seventy times seven, to go out and do an honest day's work and to serve our fellow men. If we do that we need not fear what the f ture may have in store for us, because we know we are going in the right direction.

In conclusion, I should like to congratulate the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) on having come into this house. I helped elect him when he first ran for public office in Manitoba, as a Progressive. The Liberal and Conservative candidates, together with another candidate who called himself by two or three names, were too fond of ginger ale to suit me, so that I voted for the Progressive candidate. I congratulate him on having gone a long way and then having come here. I hope he will practise the principles he followed when he entered the provincial house, and if he does so there will be changes. I should like also to congratulate the Prime Minister on having done what I advised him to do; that is, for having contested the seat of Prince Albert in the last election. I told him it would be better to go there and take a licking than not go there at all. He did take the licking, but only after he had first won, then lost. I am convinced that by the end of this parliament the Liberal party will have shown Canada that it can provide work and wages, better living conditions and Christian charity, and that it can be forgiving even to the opposition.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I believe most people in Canada were relieved to see the unwieldy majority of the Liberal party in this house reduced following the last election. Certainly that is true of all members on this side of the house, and I do not doubt for a moment that many hon. members sitting on the government benches realize that this result will be of benefit to the country. I make that statement because in future it will not be quite so easy for the government carelessly to disregard public opinion in this country. In other words, it is to be hoped that in future we will have a more democratic form of government than we have enjoyed in the past, and one that will be subject, at least in some degree, to the will of the Canadian people.

During the past year there has been a rather bitter campaign waged in this country against socialism, a campaign in which members of the government have participated. Yet it is well to realize that the growth of socialism has been stimulated in this country largely as a result of the failure of the policies of the Liberal party and their predecessors, because socialism and all other isms are always stimulated in times of extreme poverty and want. People in this country to-day, remembering what occurred after the last war, remembering the conditions that existed during the hungry thirties, are fearful as to what may happen in future; and the organized attempt on the part of certain industries to reduce wages at the present time is not increasing the confidence of the people in the immediate future. If the government are really sincere in their desire to halt the growth of socialism in Canada they should realize that the way to do this is not by a campaign of abuse but by action to introduce certain essential reforms which will make the present system work, so that the resources of Canada may be developed to their full capacity in the interests of the Canadian people, and so that the Canadian people may receive the benefits therefrom together with the greatest possible degree of individual freedom. If that is not done; if instead we allow another depression to come upon this country such as we had in the thirties, then I believe we shall be paving the way for troublous times in Canada; for I believe most of us will agree that there may be a great deal of trouble in this country if such conditions reoccur. I do not believe the people of Canada ever again will be satisfied to listen to the sort of blathering they heard in the thirties, when it was said that no money was available to develop the resources of this country. I must admit that I have been disgusted in the past to find many of those people who so bitterly attacked socialism at the same time being just as bitter against those reforms which are absolutely essential to the successful operation of the capitalist system. Apparently they do not realize that by such opposition they are merely developing the growth of isms in this country; and of course when I refer to essential reforms I have in mind those which have been advocated in the past by the social credit movement.

There is very little in the speech from the throne to indicate that the government realize any need for fundamental change in their policies. Apparently they are still going to depend to a very large extent upon exports and foreign investments in order to maintain what they call full employment in this country. This was emphasized in a speech on the post-war programme delivered in New York by the deputy minister of finance, Mr. W. C. Clark. It is also referred to in the white paper on reconstruction. Apparently the government still intends to follow the same old road in regard to international policy that has in the past lead us to international friction, depressions, and wars. Before the war that kind of policy was defended in this country on the ground that we were a debtor nation, and that therefore it was necessary to maintain a large favourable balance of payments in order to meet our foreign obligations.

It will be recalled that from 1935 to 1939 we maintained, on an average, a favourable balance of payments of $219 million a year, thereby helping to bring about a reduction in our external debt. But it is also well to remember that during that time we had extreme poverty in Canada. A million people were on relief and a half million were unemployed. At the same time industry was operating only at a percentage of its capacity. Hon. members who sat in the house from 1935 to 1939 will recall how members of this group repeatedly urged upon the government the necessity of introducing large-scale social services and large-scale national projects, so that money paid out for these services would help to create a demand for the imports that could have been brought into this country in return for the credits that we had abroad.

As the demands for goods was stimulated in that way production would have been expanded, so that we could easily have produced sufficient goods to meet our foreign obligations and at the same time raise our standard of living. But hon. members will recall the reply we always received in the house from the then Minister of Finance, the Hon. Charles Dunning. We were always met by his hysterical outburst that the government did not have any money for such projects, and that the only money available to the government was that which they could obtain from the people's pockets. When we used to suggest that it might be possible to have monetary expansion for the purpose of meeting those expenditures he used to brand the suggestion as one of crude inflation.

Yet, within a few weeks of the declaration of war millions, yes, hundreds of millions of dollars were created by the banking system for the use of the government. Yes, over three billions of dollars were created by the banking system for that purpose during the war.

I know that in the past, especially during bond sales, it has been popular to tell the people that the war is being financed by taxation and bond sales to the public. But let us remember that if we had depended upon those methods alone we would have had a war effort quite different from the one we did have. It is only because just as soon as war came the government was willing to have created almost unlimited amounts of money that we were able to develop the resources of the country to the extent that they were developed.

It is strange that the government was not prepared to create money to meet the needs of the people of this country in peace time; but the minute war came they were prepared to have money created in order to save their skins. The situation to-day, of course, is entirely different. Our external debts have largely been liquidated. In addition to that, we have a number of large credits abroad. So that there is no possible excuse for maintaining large favourable balances of payment in the future. Our aim should be to bring about an even balance of payments, apart of course from those exports that may be required to meet our moral obligations. These would be exports in the form of contributions to the war-stricken areas in Europe and Asia.

So, Mr. Speaker, we should not for one moment tolerate a policy of foreign investments until all the people of Canada are receiving an adequate standard of living. While a policy of foreign investments may help to maintain employment, it is bound at the same time to bring about a reduction in the standard of living of the people to the extent of the investments made.

This attitude of the Liberal party in respect of foreign trade is well illustrated in a full-page advertisement which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press. A good deal of this type of propaganda is being circulated throughout Canada at the present time. The one I hold in my hand is number six of a series of advertisements on Canada in the post-war world, and appears under the caption "Can't we keep this up forever?" I shall quote only a few paragraphs to illustrate the absurdity of this type of policy. The advertisement begins in this fashion:

> Do you remember when we had large-scale unemployment in Canada? And now it's gone. And everywhere you hear men saying, "We can do for war what we can't do for peace. Why can't we keep this up forever?" The answer is: We can. If we really want to.

Then the article goes on to say that we have had prosperity in Canada during the war, the reason being that in that time we have had an almost unlimited market for everything we could produce. Then it goes on to say:

> That is in war time. What about peace? We can go on producing at our present rate and we can keep up a high level of employment in the future—when the war is done—provided we find customers who want to buy what we produce.
>
> We can, if we want to, go on producing in peace time and give the stuff away (as we do in war time) if we want to. We can make boots and shoes and pots and pans and crockery and textiles and automobiles and a hundred other things, and give them away, instead of giving away tanks and guns and planes.
> But nobody would be better off for that, for we would get no more goods for ourselves than we have now.

Then the writer comes to this conclusion:

> Then we will have to find markets for what we make, markets in which we will be paid for what we ship. If we can find markets, we can go on working as hard as we are doing now, and we will all be better off. Much better off than we are now. But it will depend on trade. If we can get the trade, our boom can go on and on. If we cannot get it, it won't.

Well, in the first place I would ask: Who wants to have to go on working just as hard as we have been working during the war? Ask the farmers in the west who have been slaving sixteen hours a day, because of the absence of their sons, if they want to keep that up in the future.

This advertisement is a good illustration of that hoary, old slogan: "Export or perish." I agree that we must have markets. But what about the Canadian market? Certainly we can give goods away; but do we have to give them away in foreign markets? Can we not, for a change, give our goods to the Canadian people? Let us recall what it says here:

> We can, if we want to, go on producing in peace time and give the stuff away. . . . But nobody would be better off for that, for we would get no more goods for ourselves than we have now.

Does that not depend upon to whom we give those goods? Instead of giving them away in exchange for foreign securities which, in future, may not be worth the paper they are written on, why not give them to the Canadian people, in the form of social service or for services rendered?

Speaking yesterday, the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) referred to the fact that when in Alberta the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) had attacked the Social Credit organization on the ground that we were opposed to international trade. May I emphasize the fact that that charge is absolutely false. At no time has any member of this group attacked international trade. What we have done is something entirely different; we have attacked the Liberal government's policy in regard to international trade, because that policy has always been directed toward maintaining a large favourable balance of payments and foreign investments, while at the same time we have maintained that the correct function of international trade is to bring about an exchange of goods on the basis of mutual advantage to both parties concerned.

I would say that the government's policy on international trade is just about as phoney as was its policy on monetary reform in 1935, when they told the people that we were going to have currency and credit issued in terms of public need to meet the domestic social requirements of the Canadian people, and then for the next five years sabotaged the resources of this country under their deflationary policy, so that upon the declaration of war we found ourselves in the pathetic position of having thousands of men rejected from the army because they were medically unfit owing to malnutrition.

We in this group have in this house repeatedly emphasized the need for expanding the purchasing power of the people to the point where it is possible to maintain an effective demand against our production or the production of other nations for which our own production can be exchanged; and when I say effective demand, I mean an effective market. Therefore we believe that in order to stimulate consumption in this country, and thereby production, there should be as rapidly as possible a progressive reduction in taxation, first of all on the people in the lower income brackets by substantially increasing the size of the exemptions, and second, by abolishing the sales tax, which falls most heavily on the people in the lower income brackets.

We in this group have always maintained that the real purpose of taxation should not be to provide revenue for the government but to prevent inflation, and during the war the government have on repeated occasions acknowledged that fact.

Then we say that to the extent that taxation fails to meet government expenditure there should be an expansion of money through the Bank of Canada, so that the resources of the country may be developed to their full extent without any expansion in the national debt or increase in taxation.

Then, of course, as the transition from war to peace progresses, as the production of peace-time goods is expanded, we shall be in a position to extend social services in this country and carry out various national projects that are now urgently required.

It is true that the government has taken certain steps to expand social services in this country and is, I believe, proposing others, but these proposals are altogether inadequate to meet the needs of the people. For example, take the old age pension paid at the age of seventy years of $30 a month irrespective of other income. Undoubtedly that is a step in the right direction and is a great improvement over what we had in the past. But would anyone suggest for one moment that $30 a month is a sufficient amount of income for anybody to live on? When we realize that these old age pensioners must have resided in Canada for at least twenty years and therefore have been slaving and working in this country during all that period, surely nobody would suggest that a miserable pittance of $30 a month is a sufficient amount. When we recall that the national income of Canada today is around $9,000,000,000, which works out at an average of $3,000 for a family of four, no one can argue that Canada could not very well pay them a substantial amount, and we have therefore urged that a minimum pension of $50 a month be paid at the age of sixty regardless of any other income that the individual might happen to be receiving.

On the other hand I realize that the government is facing an almost impossible task when it attempts to finance a balanced programme under a debt creating system. You often hear it said by people throughout the country that we found the money for war, and therefore we would have no trouble finding the money for peace. You may say that we can finance the peace in exactly the same way in which we have been financing the war; but can we? These people apparently think the Liberal party have found some new way of financing during the war. Unfortunately there has been no real change in policy. The government is still depending upon taxation and borrowing. The only difference is that instead of depending on the borrowing of the savings of the people, it has been financing quite heavily by borrowing newly created money from the banking system. As a result of that policy, the national debt has risen from a figure of around 3½ billion dollars as of December, 1939, to around fourteen or fifteen billion dollars as at the end of 1944. Does anybody really believe that we can continue to expand the debt in that way? Some people may be optimistic and say: Well, there is no reason why in the future we should not be able to reduce this debt. Yet what is the record of Canada in the past? In no year since confederation have we ever reduced the amount of public debt in this country. I know that the assistant to the Minister of Finance last year mentioned that from 1924 to 1930 we had a balanced budget and reduced the national debt by $250 million. But he should have added that during that period, owing to the policies of the federal government, the provincial debt increased by $500 million, so that on balance the public debt, instead of being reduced by $250 million, was expanded by $250 million. That has been the growth of public debt in Canada. Year by year ever since confederation the public debt has steadily grown. So does anybody really think, now that our debt burden has been multiplied many times, that we are going to find it easier to finance in the future than we have found it in the past under this type of financial policy?

I was interested in the statement made by the principal of McGill university, Doctor James, to the reconstruction committee a few years ago. He said that if we want to maintain full employment and an optimum standard of living for our people we would have to adopt an entirely new budget philosophy. He said that in so far as current expenditures and revenue are concerned the budget could be balanced, but so far as capital expenditures are concerned we would have to be prepared to maintain an unbalanced budget, that we might have to expand our debt every year by three or four hundred million dollars, and be prepared to see that go on for the next one hundred years. The only quarrel I had with his statement was, why say one hundred years, and not for ever so long as we maintain our present financial system? So that if, according to Doctor James, it is necessary to expand the national debt by three or four hundred million dollars every year, what hope is there that we are ever going to pay off the national debt? Yet the Minister of Finance had the audacity last year to bring down a paper in which he said that the government after the war would introduce a scientific scheme of budgeting so that the national debt could be paid off. I think all of us will be interested when the budget comes down in hearing the Minister of Finance explain how in the future they are going to pay off the national debt through some scientific scheme. I agree, of course, that they may be able to do so if they are prepared to leave the road they have been travelling in the past and adopt the policy we have been advocating, which is that to the extent that taxation fails to meet government expenditures, national money should be issued through the Bank of Canada so that we can finance without any increase in debt or taxation.

And so we find that the government, in their confusion, in trying to remove the surplus production from this country, not surplus to the needs of the people but surplus to their ability to buy, in order to maintain full employment, are going to carry out a policy of large-scale foreign investments. This merely means that the standard of living of the people of this country will be reduced to that extent. That is why this group have always quarreled with the term "full employment" unless it is at the same time coupled with the words "in order to maintain an optimum standard of living". because we can very well have full employment and at the same time a lower standard of living, by exporting goods which are required by the people and not bringing imports back in return; that is, by a policy of foreign investment.

Notwithstanding anything I have said, I want it thoroughly understood that we of this group realize that we have a moral obligation to make goods available to the devastated areas of Europe, to the war-stricken nations. For that reason we have always supported in the house the principle of mutual aid and such measures as UNRRA. But we must keep this fact in mind: some day those areas will no longer be destitute. The day will come when these countries will rebuild their factories, and when that day comes these nations will desire to pay for their exports with their exports. At that time we must be prepared to accept freely the exports of other nations in payment for the exports we ship them. I would say that the real test of the economy we are building to-day will come four or five years from now, when these nations desire to pay for their imports with their exports. The test will come, whether or not we have built up an economy in which we have an effective demand against the production of the country and the production of other nations for which our own production can be exchanged. If we have not done that we shall be visited with a situation which may very well develop into a serious depression.

The speech from the throne states that we are to be asked to approve a measure to provide for Canada's participation in the final act of the Bretton Woods agreement; that is, to join in the international monetary fund and the bank of reconstruction. Without any hesitation I can say that in so far as this group is concerned the government will get no support from us in that programme. We shall oppose the measure because, in the first instance, it means a restoration of the gold standard. I know some will say, "Yes, but it is a different gold standard." Well, the gold standard of 1925 was different from the gold standard of 1914, but still it was a gold standard. The main difference between the gold standard of Bretton Woods and that of 1925 is that the former is of an even more vicious character. Second, we shall oppose it because in its present form it is bound to create international friction. I have heard many people say, "Do you not realize that the experts of forty-four different nations signed that agreement and consented to participate in this scheme, and did so voluntarily? Is it likely that these experts would have been willing to participate in that scheme had they thought it would be detrimental to their countries?"

In the first place, let us realize that these experts did not necessarily represent public opinion in their own countries. But there is another matter of even greater importance. To show what I mean I should like to quote from an editorial which was published in the Fundy Fisherman of August 28, taken from the New Zealand Mirror, to show to what extent these agreements are being signed voluntarily:

> The lend-lease agreements which the various nations were obliged to sign before obtaining supplies contained a provision which was not in the legislation enacted by congress. This laid down that the debtor nations were to enter into agreements directed to the expansion, by appropriate international and domestic measures, of production, employment and the exchange and consumption of goods, etc. The international money plan is the first of these measures. It is one thing to consider the plan on its merits. It is another matter altogether to discover what the consequence of rejection will be.

In the London Economist of July 21 we find this statement regarding the situation in which Britain is being placed by having to say "yes" or "no" to this agreement:

> As a matter of plain economics, there would seem to be a clear balance of argument against the Bretton Woods scheme—that is against the monetary fund. . . . But as a matter of politics or (if the word is taken to imply something sinister) of amicable relations between governments, there is almost everything to be said in its favour. How much economic hazard is a reasonable price for continued generosity and friendship or at the least for avoidance of American disappointment and resentment? It all depends upon the size of the hazard and the intensity of the friendship.

I would say, "some friendship!" The sincerity of a friendship which demands economic chaos as the price of its maintenance may indeed be questioned. In other words, we find that nations which are acquiescing in the Bretton Woods agreement are indulging in a policy of appeasement, and surely this war has shown that appeasement never pays; a showdown has to come, and the longer you appease the other nation, the greater will be the showdown when it comes; it is far better to have it at the start.

I am not going to say any more at this time about the Bretton Woods agreement, but when th measure is before the house we shall have quite a bit more to say.

The speech from the throne refers also to a measure to establish a veterans' charter. This charter is to embrace, I understand, the various orders in council which have been passed in regard to soldier rehabilitation. We are strongly in favour of a committee being appointed to investigate that charter and to suggest any necessary amendments. Most people realize that to-day there is a good deal of confusion and dissatisfaction with regard to veterans' affairs. Let me add that much of that confusion is to be found right amongst the officials of the minister's own department.

I want to briefly refer to the Veterans' Land Act. My reference to it will be brief because no doubt the time to discuss it will be when the matter of setting up a committee is brought up; that is, if a committee is appointed, which I trust will be the case. I was on the committee in 1942 when we discussed the new Veterans' Land Act. I realized at the time that the new act was a great improvement on the old Soldier Settlement Act; nevertheless I recognized that there were certain weaknesses in it. I pointed them out at the time. Unfortunately many of them still exist. I am going to refer to this now because I hope the minister will take steps to remove these evils and not wait until a committee is set up.

I have in mind especially section 13. I am not surprised that that section was labeled "13," because it has been and is a hoodoo to many returned men who hoped to benefit under it. The director of the Veterans' Land Act, Mr. Murchison, has stated that he does not consider this is a matter of very great importance, because, of one thousand soldiers settling under the Veterans' Land Act, only six have gone under section 13. Well, naturally no soldier would go under section 13 if he could possibly avoid doing so, but I am quite certain that if that section is amended as it should be we shall find that a very large number of soldiers will take advantage of it.

Section 13 provides that where a soldier has a farm with a mortgage on it he can obtain a loan from the soldier settlement board in order to pay that mortgage back. He will not, however, receive any of the other benefits of the act. He will not receive any grant. I pointed that out in the committee and I pointed it out in the house. The Minister of Veterans Affairs will remember that the leader of the opposition at that time asked him whether my statement was correct, that there was discrimination, and the minister himself admitted that there was. But unfortunately nothing was done about it.

This is the situation. You may have a soldier with a half-section of land valued at $5,000, with a mortgage of $3,000, in which case he has an equity of $2,000 in that land. All he can do under the Veterans Land Act is to get a loan to pay off that mortgage with interest at 3½ per cent, but he does not get benefits beyond that. He does not get a grant but merely a loan. On the other hand, if a veteran returning has, instead of an equity of $2,000 in a half-section, $2,000 of an equity in bank deposits or $3,000 in bonds, he can get the benefit to the full extent of the act and can get an outright gift of around $2,300.

I maintain that the soldier who has a farm with a mortgage on it representing an equity of $2,000 should be able to sell that land back to the board and take advantage of the Veterans Land Act and get the full benefits of that act. Why should he be treated differently from the soldier who has his money tied up, not in land but in bonds?

The minister recognized last year that discrimination existed, but so far nothing has been done. Unfortunately, however, that is not the whole story. If a soldier obtains a loan to pay off a mortgage he loses the whole amount of the reestablishment credit. I could not believe that because, according to the act, he could lose it only to the extent that the benefits he receives are greater than the rehabilitation credit. But I telephoned the deputy minister regarding this and he informs me that if a soldier comes under section 13 he loses the reestablishment credit.

No one would argue that when a soldier receives a loan he is receiving more than his rehabilitation credit. Apparently they are taking the stand that a loan of $3,000 is the same as a gift of $3,000. The soldier does not receive any gift when he receives a loan; the only benefit he receives is a reduction in the rates of interest. Therefore the soldier who comes under that section should be entitled to the full amount of the rehabilitation credit, although it states that when he comes under the Veterans Land Act he loses those benefits. So long as he is under section 13 he should receive the full amount of the rehabilitation credit, and the minister will find, I believe, that the members of his staff are fully in accord with that suggestion. However, since we shall be discussing this question later on I will go into greater detail then.

One more question that I would refer to in this connection is the question of the merchant marine. Unfortunately the merchant marine is excluded entirely from all benefits of rehabilitation unless the seaman has received a disability while serving on a ship. That is as I understand it. We discussed this question in the soldier rehabilitation committee in 1942, and the opinion of the majority of the committee was that the merchant marine should benefit under the Veterans Land Act. But the minister then pointed out that it would not be in the interests of the country to encourage the seamen to leave the sea at the end of the war. The seamen would be needed, and therefore they could not make the act applicable to the merchant marine, but at a later date that might be done.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Has my hon. friend seen the order in council passed last year in regard to merchant marine benefits? If he has not I will send him a copy to-morrow.

Mr. QUELCH: Does it apply to the Veterans Land Act? Do they benefit under the Veterans Land Act?

Mr. MACKENZIE: No, but there are lots of other benefits.

Mr. QUELCH: That is what I am referring to. I am glad to hear that sailors do now receive certain benefits.

Mr. MACKENZIE: If pensionable.

Mr. QUELCH: Yes, provided that they suffer a disability while serving on a ship. But the soldier or the airman need not have received any disability in order to get the grant or the rehabilitation credit or any other rehabilitation measure. Why, therefore, should the merchant marine have to suffer a disability? All hon. members realize the tremendous service which the merchant marine has given the country.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I should be glad if the hon. member would defer this part of his remarks until I can send him a copy of the order in council to-morrow. I am afraid he has not seen it.

Mr. QUELCH: I was informed by an official of the department that a man had to be pensionable to get the benefits. He had to receive a disability.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Not for some of the benefits, but for the land act.

Mr. QUELCH: The minister admits that so far as the Veterans' Land Act is concerned the merchant marine are not eligible. The minister remembers that when this matter was discussed in the committee it was felt that at the earliest possible date the merchant marine should be eligible. Perhaps right now it is felt that these men are needed at sea, but as soon as we can spare them from the sea, then the act should be made available to them. In all sincerity I would say to the minister that perhaps the best way to encourage merchant marine seamen to stay on the sea would be to maintain a decent wage and not to do as the Park steamship company is trying to do, to bring about a drastic reduction in wages. That is not the way to encourage seamen to remain on the sea.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must remind the hon. gentleman that he has spoken for over forty minutes.

Mr. QUELCH: If I might have one minute longer, I should like to have said a few words regarding the necessity of putting into operation certain national projects for irrigation. I understand from what the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) said yesterday, and from the white paper, that it is not intended to make a large expenditure in that regard now. They are going to build a shelf of national projects to take care of unemployment if it should occur in the future. In other words, national projects apparently are once more to become relief projects. I feel that where it can be shown that there is absolute need for implementing a certain project, that project should be carried out to-day just so long as the men and materials required can be found.

Mr. H. O. WHITE (Middlesex East): In rising to address the house for the first time I wish to congratulate you, Mr. Speaker, on the high office to which you have been elected. I wish also to thank you for the kindness you have extended to new members in overlooking some of their shortcomings. I know I shall be needing some of that consideration myself. I represent the constituency of Middlesex East, the area surrounding the city of London, and while surrounding the city of London I have not yet been able to surround the member for that constituency.

I am in a rather peculiar industry, possibly. While I am a farmer, I am surprised at the lack, shall I say, of words in appreciation and support of the farmers' position in the country. Not only am I a farmer, but I am engaged, as I say, in a peculiar industry in that I am able to steal a living from my neighbours. I am in the business of producing honey and those who want to get my product must line up and produce coupons.

A good deal has been said about housing and sanitary facilities, but no one seems to think about the men and women on our Canadian farms who have done without things for years, while at the same time producing the food to feed starving Europe. According to a survey, there are 125,000 sub-standard farm homes and it is also well known that there are hundreds of vacant homes throughout the farming areas of Canada. One only needs to drive through western Ontario to realize that conditions must change. We see weeds on every hand, fences and buildings in need of repairs. There is no shortage of things to be done. There are jobs for all. The very fact that this government subsidized farm products is an acknowledgment that the farmer is not receiving adequate prices and at a time when consumers generally are more able to pay for food than ever before. Farmers fear, above all else, that agriculture may be allowed to descend to the level of European peasantry.

It is my wish to direct the attention of the house to the noticeable absence in the speech from the throne to any specific plans for agriculture. This lack of plans for agriculture is noticeable in many instances, but more particularly in the present situation with regard to cattle marketing and failure to maintain hog production in face of the professed need for meat products. It is in the best interests of this house that the representatives of the people get back to earth occasionally. Anyone who was among the farmers and the people last week could not but understand that the farmers are up in arms over the cattle marketing situation.

The statement of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) on Friday, that the weighing facilities were responsible for the congestion at Toronto yards, is not the opinion which I received from A. M. Stewart, the oat king, one of the directors of the stockyards, residing in Middlesex county—

Mr. GARDINER: Partly responsible.

Mr. WHITE (Middlesex East): —and which was to the effect that 6,000 a day could be weighed. He stated that so far they have weighed without delay every lot that has been purchased and were prepared and equipped to handle all the cattle that come into the yards.

Mr. GARDINER: May I call the attention of the hon. member to the fact that the president of the organization said that the number was 4,000.

Mr. WHITE (Middlesex East): Farmers resent the strikes planned by labour in food processing plants which are timed at the most critical marketing periods, and apparently neither labour nor management care how great a loss these strikes are to the farmer. Labour is entitled to support in obtaining its high levels of employment, for decent hours and fair pay, but the farmers expect fair treatment as well. Information is not available as to the number of cattle sold directly to the packing houses, while hundreds of cattle are left in the stockyards unsold, to be purchased later at a loss to the producer.

A farmer acquaintance of mine, living near the Montana border in Alberta, told me that in the five years of war, the difference in price of cattle between Alberta and Montana has cost him about twenty thousand dollars.

There is a need for all the meat that we can produce, but farmers must not be forced to take a loss of from ten to twelve dollars on every good beast. On the other hand, small butchers and grocers are objecting to the complications and extra work the ration entails. Small operators are being sacrificed to the large packing companies. We hear considerable about the decentralization of industry. The best interests of the country are served when as much as possible of the processing can be done nearest the area of production, and not as the farmers are compelled to do under the present regulations, which send their produce to the plants of the big packers.

The much heralded free enterprise must also include free markets for our cattle and produce. George Bernard Shaw once said that this planet was the insane asylum of the universe. I think this is the only explanation of our meat ration and housing situation as it exists to-day. Some of its more erratic patients are in charge of those plans.

Let us take one look at the soil of Canada. Soil fertility is not an ever-flowing spring that is renewed each year by the snow and the rain. Every farm product that is sold off the farm removes certain essential elements of fertility. A glimpse of things to come along this line may be found in the decreasing yields of farm crops. The numerous deficiency diseases of plants, animals and humans are but an indication of the lack of these essential elements, as is the enormous increase of weeds which in a way is nature's attempt to repair soil depletion, by the return of humus to the soil. History has shown that man cannot disregard this important matter. Many once fertile areas of the old world are now deserts. Ever westward moved the farmers of America. Let us plan to maintain our soil, the basic wealth of this country. The farmer under present conditions is unable to make provision to maintain soil fertility. The government of Canada must not again permit the farm income to fall to such a low level that the farmer will be unable to buy the needed material for rebuilding his source of income.

A word or two about free enterprise. The farmer, to my mind, knows better than most just what free enterprise means. To him it means freedom to market his crops and sell his live stock where he pleases and at the best possible prices. He does not ask for state controls that hamper all his activities. He does ask for protection from the government in his dealings on the markets so that he may hold his own. We, as the parliament of Canada, must see that he gets that protection. We do not want conditions such as would drive him in defeat to the socialist way of life; conditions where he has to sell to the big packer at a loss on his cost of production when he could sell elsewhere at a profit, for instance, in the United States. Socialism thrives on a defeatist attitude and our farmers must not be allowed to fall into it. They have their hopes pinned on us. We must fulfil their expectations.

Farmers are not looking for social security. All they have ever asked for is an opportunity to sell their products at a parity price with the things they have to buy. Given a parity price, they will be able to equip their farms and homes to modern standards; they will be able to educate their children; they will be able to have leisure time; they will be able to lay something aside to provide for their old age Just as in the case of the worker, where real social security means the right to a good job at good pay, the farmer can provide his own social security if he is given the opportunity.

I wish to say a word or two about the Veterans' Land Act housing. Veterans' Land Act houses are a menace to rural municipalities. They must be the dream of a bachelor. Municipalities are going to be saddled with these houses. Drainage, roads and many services will be demanded. Fortunate are the municipalities that are without these rural slums. There is something the matter when good hundred acre farms with house and barns in Middlesex, Lambton, Huron, Perth and many other counties sell for less money than these veterans' land houses of questionable value. Before the veteran has paid for the house, he will certainly have lost his equity in it.

With the war over, we all want to see a reduction in taxation and in our national debt. With gratuities and the social security measures planned we shall not find this easy. It must be done, however, if we are to go forward in the post-war period. Canada needs selected immigration. If our population were double what it is now, our debt per capita could be cut in half. If prices of farm products and basic industries are allowed to fall to one-half their present level, that would be the equivalent of doubling our national debt.

I wish to say a word about the transatlantic conference lines. Prior to the war I was engaged in exporting honey to the United Kingdom. At that time an agreement existed between the principal steamship lines in regard to rates from Montreal and other seaboard ports. Owing to an oversight Toronto was not included in this agreement, and small Norwegian freighters could come to Toronto, pick up freight and deliver it in the United Kingdom for much less than the conference rates. With the advent of a Canadian merchant navy owing to the war and, at some future date, the deepening of the St. Lawrence river, let us be in a position to market our Canadian produce in Canadian boats, at rates which are not set by any cartel or outside shipping monopoly.

On motion of Mr. Belzile the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie the house adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

Wednesday, September 19, 1945.

The house met at three o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REFERENCE BY MR. SPEAKER TO DISPLAYING OF EXHIBITS DURING SPEECHES

On the order for motions:

Mr. SPEAKER: I desire to draw the attention of the house to a new practice which, in my opinion, should not become general in the debates of this house. I refer to members' displaying of exhibits when making speeches. On Monday last, an hon. member came in with two baskets of peaches and showed them to the house in order to make a point in the discussion. Yesterday, another hon. member unfolded a large flag and spread it wide over one of the gangways. I think the house will agree that such a practice is far from adding to the dignity and decorum of the House of Commons of Canada. The proper places for the production of exhibits are the standing and special committees where they may be required as evidence in certain investigations. If perchance the display of merchandise on the floor of the house should become part of our procedure, I am very much afraid it would create an atmosphere hardly desirable for a parliamentary institution, and I trust the house will bear with me when I say that hon. members should refrain from such a practice in the future.

WHEAT

MAXIMUM PRICE FOR EXPORT—ESTABLISHMENT OF LONG TERM FLOOR PRICE

On the order for motions:

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a brief statement on wheat prices.

The second world war has concluded with Canadian wheat producers in a particularly strong marketing position. Not only has the general disruption and bad weather reduced production in the war areas, but the Australian and North African crop failures and a small crop in Argentina have left Canada and the United States as the only countries at present having substantial export surpluses of wheat. This has coincided with the release of pent-up demands in the liberated areas.

In these extraordinary circumstances, Canadian wheat might well command for a limited period very much higher prices in the world market. The importing countries, nearly all of them our allies in the war, are buying out of necessity and, to a large extent, on credits. They would be compelled to meet through larger credits or through sacrifice of other food and rehabilitation supplies whatever higher price is demanded for Canadian wheat.

It is in the interest of Canada and of Canadian wheat growers that the importing countries should continue to obtain Canadian wheat at prices not in excess of those prevailing at the end of hostilities. Accordingly the government, by order in council, has instructed the Canadian wheat board to offer wheat for sale for export overseas at prices not higher than the current export price of $1.55 per bushel, basis No. 1 northern, in store Fort William/Port Arthur or Vancouver.

In asking Canadian producers to forgo such benefits as might be realized in the short run through higher export prices, the government recognizes the paramount need for relative stability of income to wheat producers. Toward this end, the government undertakes that in the five-year period ending July 31, 1950, producers will receive not less than $1 per bushel, basis No. 1 northern, in store Fort William/Port Arthur or Vancouver on the authorized deliveries for each crop year. For the balance of the 1945-1946 crop year, at least, the Canadian wheat board initial advance will continue at $1.25, where it was set two years ago. By providing a long-term floor price of not less than $1.00 the government will protect producers against the consequences of any sharp reversal in the world wheat position during the next five-year period.

The government, in adopting this policy of a maximum price for overseas shipments for the present and a floor price for five years, is asking the producers, in their own interests, to forgo exceptional short-run advantages in favour of a long-run stability of income. In arriving at its decision on this policy, the government had the following fundamental considerations in mind:

Any further increase in wheat prices now would aggravate the problems of economic and political readjustment of the liberated areas to Canada's detriment in future trade with those areas. There is a moral obligation not to take advantage of our recent allies in their time of compelling need.

Higher wheat prices would encourage the importing countries in a hurried return to wheat production and pre-war wheat policies very directly to the detriment of the wheat exporting countries, particularly Canada. Moreover, production in a number of exporting countries would be unduly encouraged.

I wish to lay on the table copies of order in council P.C. 6122.

Mr. WRIGHT: May I ask a question with regard to the statement the minister has read? Does it imply that the wheat board will continue to operate until 1950?

Mr. MacKINNON: It does not refer to that. The hon. member can deduce what he wishes from the statement, but there is no reference to the continuation or non-continuation of the wheat board. I anticipate and the government anticipates that the wheat board will continue indefinitely.

Mr. COLDWELL: In view of the importance of this statement, with the material it contains, to the producers of western Canada particularly, will the government set aside a day when the matter might be discussed by members who represent the wheat growing areas of the country? The statement is so important that it should not be tabled without discussion.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Do I gather that deliveries of wheat in the years between now and 1950 are to be governed by a quota, as was the case during the war?

Mr. MacKINNON: I made no reference to that. If the hon. member reads the statement he will see that the point is covered.

Mr. SENN: Does the statement apply to winter wheat from the eastern provinces as well as the western?

Mr. MacKINNON: The statement refers only to western wheat, wheat grown in the western provinces. Ontario wheat production is dealt with on another basis.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I gathered from the minister's statement that a quota was to be imposed on the amount of grain which could be delivered. Of what value would it be to the farmer to have a guaranteed price if the quota which he can sell is too small to enable him to live?

Mr. SPEAKER: I must point out to the hon. member that the matter is not debatable.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The leader of the opposition asked if it would be possible—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I meant the leader of the C.C.F. party, who is also a part of the opposition. He asked whether the government would set apart a day to discuss the matter of wheat just referred to. First of all let me say, as to giving information immediately to the house, I hope the house will accept that as a mark of respect, if I may put it in that way, rather than as something to be criticized. The desire of the government was to have the house given information on this important matter at the earliest possible moment. As to setting apart a day, I think we should conclude the debate on the address before we consider fixing any time for other matters. Once the debate on the address is concluded there will be occasions, as for example when the house is moved into committee of supply, on which this matter could be brought up for discussion in a regular way. I think that would be preferable to fixing a special day at present.

Mr. COLDWELL: We will bear that in mind. May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether the government is also imposing the wartime ceiling on exporters of textiles, lumber and all other goods based on our primary products? I ask this question because of the information I have in regard to textiles.

Mr. MacKINNON: I would appreciate it if my hon. friend would put his question on the order paper; I do not think I can answer it offhand.

Mr. COLDWELL: Very well.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

WINDSOR AREA—BOARDS OF CONCILIATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. F. BROWN (Essext West): Will the Minister of Labour please indicate what the present situation is in the Windsor area with respect to the arrangements made for meetings of boards of conciliation established as a result of applications by the U.A.W.-C.I.O. under the wartime labour relations regulations, P.C. 1003, and when the reports of such boards may be expected?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): A number of boards have been constituted in the Windsor area on application of the United Automobile Workers of the C.I.O.

The boards of conciliation dealing with the disputes affecting Canadian Automotive Trim Limited and Bendix Eclipse of Canada Limited have filed their reports and copies were transmitted to the parties yesterday.

The board dealing with the dispute affecting the Windsor Tool and Die Limited has concluded its sittings and its report is expected at the end of this week.

Two boards under the chairmanship of Judge Ian M. Macdonell of Toronto dealing with disputes affecting Dominion Forge and Stamping Company and Walker Metal Products Limited, and one board under the chairmanship of Judge E. Lovering of Toronto, namely, Truscon Steel Corporation of Canada Limited, have been fully constituted and I am advised that hearings have been arranged for next week.

Another board of conciliation has been established in the dispute affecting Chrysler Corporation of Canada Limited, but it has not yet been fully constituted, the company having nominated its representative only on Monday of this week. The nominees of the union and the company are now conferring with respect to the selection of a chairman.

I should like to point out to the house that there are certain time limits imposed by the regulations for the nomination of board members by employers and employees, for the selection of a chairman by both, and within which the boards are required to report to the minister. This is made in view of the fact that sometimes the employers and sometimes the employees make certain observations with reference to delays in the constitution, the sittings and the findings of boards of conciliation. Once a board has been fully constituted the time set for hearings is a matter for decision by the board itself, that is, the representatives of employers and employees and the chairman of the board.

ADVERTISEMENTS SEEKING CANADIAN WORKERS AS POTATO PICKERS IN MAINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. DONALD M. FLEMING (Eglinton): May I direct this question to the Minister of Labour? Is the minister aware that there have appeared in the press of Montreal and other eastern cities in recent days advertisements purporting to be inserted by the national employment service, unemployment insurance commission, for workers to offer their services as potato pickers in the state of Maine, at a time when there is a shortage of labour in the timber-producing areas of Ontario, where operators are not permitted to advertise for workers?

Mr. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. member that the question shoud be short and to the point.

Mr. BLACK: Mr. Speaker, may I—

Mr. FLEMING: May I have the minister's answer? It is an important matter.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I say this in a kindly way; after listening to some of the speeches from the opposition in the last couple of weeks—

Mr. ROWE: You are not making a speech.

Mr. MITCHELL: Just a moment. After listening to some of the speeches delivered by hon. members of the opposition in the last two weeks I am glad to know that in some parts of Canada at least there is a shortage of labour. I thought there was a terrific unemployment situation all across the country.

Now, dealing with my hon. friend's question, for many years past, perhaps longer than many of us have been alive, there has been a natural movement of labour in certain parts of this country—I speak now of the Atlantic and the Pacific—across the border during harvesting time. In western Canada there is that movement from the Dakotas and Utah to assist in harvesting there. Last year, and as a matter of fact every year since the war broke out, we have had a movement of labour from certain localities in Quebec and New Brunswick into the states of Maine and New Hampshire, and I hope it will always be that way. Even during war years we were able to man the lumber camps in this country, and I anticipate we shall be able to do the same thing next winter.

Mr. FLEMING: Is it a fact that Ontario operators engaged in the production of timber and pulp are not permitted under existing regulations to advertise or canvass for men in the province of Quebec?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman should put his question on the order paper.

Mr. FLEMING: With great respect, I am told that this is a matter of very great urgency in the timber producing areas of Ontario.

Mr. SPEAKER: From what I have heard there is no great urgency about the matter, and the question should be placed on the order paper.

CANADIAN NAVY

CONDITIONS OF POST-WAR RECRUITMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Yesterday I asked a question of the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services with regard to the Royal Canadian Navy and the minister said he would make inquiries and answer the question to-day.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): I apologize to my hon. friend; I overlooked making the inquiries. I shall make them this afternoon and give him an answer to-morrow.

KHAKI UNIVERSITY

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT IN UNITED KINGDOM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): May I ask a question of the Minister of National Defence? Has the defence department established a khaki university of Canada in the United Kingdom? If so, will the minister give full particulars as to the site, staff, cost and function?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence): I shall be glad to give the information, Mr. Speaker. Of course I cannot do it to-day. Whether I should do it in answer to a question on the orders of the day, or whether it should be put on the order paper or be asked on the estimates, is a matter of opinion.

Mr. SPEAKER: I should like to remind the hon. member that questions on the orders of the day should be short and to the point, and should deal with matters of urgency. If there is no urgency they should be placed on the order paper.

Mr. BRUCE: I ask the minister to take it as notice of my question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

MERCHANT SEAMEN

INQUIRY AS TO ELIMINATION OF WAR RISK BONUS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON B. ISNOR (Halifax): I have received a large number of communications, telegrams and letters with respect to the war risk bonus being paid to seamen. I desire to ask the Minister of Labour the following question: Is it true that the war risk bonus paid to seamen is to be discontinued; and specifically has the Park Steamship company applied to the national war labour board for a wage reduction which would represent the elimination of the bonus?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): There are two questions involved there. I shall answer the last question first. The answer to my knowledge is "No". I should like to tell the hon. member and the house that no steps are being taken at the moment for the elimination of war risk bonus.

UNITED NATIONS

CANADA AS INTERNATIONAL PEACE CENTRE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister in his capacity as Secretary of State for External Affairs. In the press of this week there have appeared articles relating to the preparatory work being done by the interim commission for the setting up of the united nations organization. In these reports it is stated that two sites are being considered for the site of the united nations organization and the international peace centre. The two sites mentioned are Geneva and San Francisco. Would the Prime Minister be good enough to inform the house whether or not an invitation has been extended by the dominion government to the organization looking towards the choice of Canada as an international peace centre? It would seem to me, and I am quite sure to the Prime Minister as well, that there are powerful and compelling reasons which could be advanced by way of argument to have the centre in Canada.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Secretary of State for External Affairs): May I say to my hon. friend that no formal invitation has been extended to the interim commission with respect to the matter to which he has just referred; but I think it is well understood by all the nations that are members of the united nations organization that if the interim committee should wish to have the whole or any part of the organization located in Canada, this country would regard a request of the kind as complimentary, and one which would be cordially welcomed and sympathetically reviewed. I understand that the interim commission is not considering any one locality but is considering the advantages of different countries. I have not the least doubt in the world that Canada is among the number.

MEAT RATIONING

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PROGRESS OF CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. C. BLACK (Cumberland): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Agriculture if they are in a position to make a statement as to what progress is being made in the conference on meat rationing, which I understand is proceeding at the moment. I have communications from my constituency and from the maritime provinces pointing out that it is difficult, indeed almost impossible, for them to carry on supplying meat and marketing meat products and at the same time adhere to the regulations. They are greatly interested in knowing whether the regulations are to be cancelled, modified or confirmed. I have been informed that as the regulations stand at the present time they will not continue marketing after the 24th of this month.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must remind the hon. member that questions should be short and direct, without any statement being added to them. Moreover, I should like to say that when there is no urgency they should be placed on the order paper.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I cannot report on the outcome of the conference because it is not yet over.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): The conference is in progress, however?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

LIVE STOCK

GOVERNMENT ACTION IN DROUGHT AREAS OF SASKATCHEWAN AND ALBERTA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. J. McCUAIG (Maple Creek): In view of the very critical drought conditions, the second worst in thirty-five years, in southwest Saskatchewan and south-east Alberta, would the Minister of Agriculture inform the house what steps the federal government is prepared to take to relieve the congestion in shipping and packing house facilities in those areas?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I thank the hon. member for having sent me a copy of his question. As far as I know there has not developed, up to the moment, any serious problem in connection with shipping or the utilization of packing house facilities in the drought area of western Canada, but a very serious condition does exist there which may necessitate shipping the live stock from that area because of lack of feed. I have been in communication with the provincial governments, and more particularly with the government of Saskatchewan, for the last six weeks, since I made a trip through the area and discussed the matter with the provincial minister of agriculture. Since that time arrangements have been made for the distribution of feed, in regard to which I may have something further to say to-morrow, and both governments also have urged all those in that area who have live stock ready for marketing to get it out at an early day. In other words we have been urging farmers who have cattle on the grass almost ready for marketing to get those cattle out as soon as they are ready, and that may have something to do with the fact that up to the present time killings in the plants are running through at record rates as far as cattle are concerned. That is being done in order that there may not be an undue marketing of cattle next month, particularly toward the end of the month. I may add that this does not concern something we are going to do; we have already started to do it. We have had the cooperation of the provincial authorities in the matter, as they have had ours.

HOUSING

STEPS TAKEN TO RELIEVE SHORTAGE—TABLING OF P.C. 5794

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): Will the Minister of Finance make a statement at an early day as to the steps his department has taken to meet the acute shortage of housing throughout Canada and, arising out of that question, would the minister place on the table of the house order in council P.C. 5794 of August 30, 1945, dealing with amendments to the National Housing Act?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I table now the order in council referred to. As to the first part of the question, amendments will be proposed to the National Housing Act, at which time I will make a statement.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Tuesday, September 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. M. Benidickson for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Bracken, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. GLEASON BELZILE (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, since your election as first commoner you have received many congratulations, all appropriately expressed and all well deserved. You have even been complimented upon your wisdom in your choice of ancestors. I shall be very brief, because I do not want to repeat any of the things which have already been said much better than I could say them.

(Translation): However, Mr. Speaker, I wish to call forth your kind rcollections. I go back some twenty-five years, when I had the pleasure of being your fellow-student in the same institutions, first at the Collége Ste-Marie, and afterwards at the Université de Montreal, and I take the liberty of telling you that, even then, your kind-heartedness and your intelligence, your industriousness and your thirst for knowledge were foreboding the high success which life held in reserve for you. In fact, you were among the few people about whom a poet said:

Aux âmes bien nées, la valeur n'attend pas le nombre des années.

Let me assure you that I am glad indeed to delve into that past and to recall those memories to you, because I am sure you will thus be prompted to deal kindly with your former comrade.

(Text): I also compliment the mover and the seconder of the address. The speeches they delivered in this house disclosed their sense of duty toward their fellow members in the armed services, and they may rest assured that in due time their representations will receive my most cordial support. All who participated in our victory are entitled to the gratitude of their country. They deserve that peace be kind and consoling to them. They are entitled to a chance to forget all the horrors and atrocities they have suffered.

I also compliment the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) upon his election to this house. In the interests of my constituency I sincerely hope that his service in that capacity may be equal to or even longer than the service of the Prime Minister, which is something over twenty-five years.

(Translation): I am proud, Mr. Speaker, to act in this house as spokesman for the people of the constituency of Rimouski. However, that implies a heavy responsibility because my constituents expect me to represent them with dignity and courage; I dare hope that I shall deserve the confidence they placed in me. Unassuming and industrious, the population of Rimouski includes farmers, workmen and settlers who follow the traditions left by the pioneers of this country. During the last twenty-five years, twelve new parishes have been established in my constituency and they are to-day among our most populous and prosperous communities. There are other constituencies which cover a larger area, but there are few which are more outstanding in the field of cooperation and education.

(Text): In the cooperative field, the county of Rimouski compares most favourably with any other county either in Quebec or in Canada, except possibly the counties of Bonaventure and Gaspe. Every parish has its own agricultural cooperative and its credit union or caisse populaire, which to a great extent have contributed to its development and progress. We also have consumers cooperatives which rendered great service during the war.

Last year two professors of the university of Wisconsin came to Rimouski to study, on the spot, the working of these organizations. They were dumbfounded by what was revealed to them. They saw a consumers' cooperative founded five years ago with an initial membership of 80 and a capital of $800—$10 per member—doing business at the rate of $200,000 a year, in 1944, and in the midst of the labouring classes.

Since coming to the house I have heard practically every hon. member who has spoken deal with the housing problem in his constituency. I have read in the newspapers that this is an acute problem throughout Canada. I have pleasure in informing the house, however, that there is no housing problem in the town of Rimouski. Our credit union or caisse populaire saw to that. Since 1939 they have made 575 loans, ranging from $500 to $8,000 for the repair and building of houses.

The professors from the university of Wisconsin, to whom I referred a moment ago, saw a whole suburb of Rimouski, comprising some 3,000 people, living in houses built with those loans. This is how the caisse populaire system works. It pays for all the material and skilled labour, the borrower building the house with his own hands and with the assistance of his friends and neighbours whom, in turn, he helps. The result is that a loan of $2,500 builds a house which would be valued at $4,000. So that now the parish of St. Robert Bellarmin, thanks to the caisse populaire, forms a distinct community in the town of Rimouski. It has its own church, its own school and, of course, its own caisse populaire. It needs now only a post office, and I am now asking the Postmaster General (Mr. Bertrand) to grant them this much needed service.

(Translation): I have just mentioned the educational field. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, Rimouski's teaching institutions and schools are among the finest and most extensive in French Canada. The inhabitants of Rimouski riding are fully aware of the advantages derived from education as shown by their steady contribution to the building and maintenance of institutions devoted to spreading knowledge. The secondary schools of the town of Rimouski can hold their own with those of wealthier and larger cities. As a matter of fact, Rimouski, as far as statistics go, comes immediately after Montreal and Quebec for the facilities its puts at the disposal of young students. There you will find every type of school required by studious young people. I refer particularly to the Rimouski Seminary which ought to obtain the title it so well deserves, that of rural university.

Indeed, the Rimouski Seminary includes a school of theology, a classical college, a school of agriculture, a school of commerce, a naval school and also an arts and crafts school. This great French-Canadian institution receives each year over twelve hundred boarding pupils. I wish to emphasize particularly the contribution of our arts and crafts school and of our naval school to the war effort of Canada. Thousands of young men have received there technical training which enabled them to become specialists in the various branches of the army and the navy.

Here, may I express the wish that those who have lived among our people and who have learned to know them will make known throughout Canada the kindliness which has been shown them in our section of the country. They will thus contribute to strengthen the ties which eventually must unite the exponents of our two cultures; part of their education will have been acquired among us, and we hope that their remembrance will be lasting and friendly.

I wish to pay a tribute to the teachers, both ecclesiastic and lay, who, for a mere pittance, have dedicated their lives to our young people, and I assure them of my utmost respect and gratitude.

Sitting for the first time in this house, I am now going through the ordeal which marks the initiation of a new member. I have conscientiously done everything prescribed. With the greatest care and attention I have followed and admired the impressive ceremonies which have taken place on the opening of this parliament, and I was quite moved when I heard His Excellency, the Governor General of Canada read the speech from the throne in the language of my forefathers. A deep feeling of piety and gratitude arose within my soul toward all those who, after the conquest, won for us the political freedom we now enjoy; I refer to Viger, Morin, Papineau, Lafontaine, Cartier, and all those great patriots who laboured without respite so that the vanquished of 1760 might become the equals of their conquerors. May God forbid that I should forget the example of their devotion to their compatriots and their self-denial in the fulfilment of their duty.

I listened with much attention to the speeches delivered on the address. Gradually, the emotion which at first gripped my heart was transformed into a feeling of surprise. Some speeches delivered from the other side of this house greatly amazed me. I cannot deal with all of them, but I shall mention a few.

An hon. member of the Progressive Conservative party has expressed his astonishment at the little support granted to his party in the province of Quebec. Yet, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the election of two members, one French speaking, the other English speaking, sets a record which should satisfy the hon. member. Nothing in the Progressive Conservative platform could appeal to the legitimate aspirations of the electorate in my riding to whom overbidding and exaggeration are distasteful. While they feel the deepest respect for His Majesty the King and the Crown, and are honestly proud to be part of the British Commonwealth of Nations, they object to obsolete imperialism and colonialism. They are content that Canada should be as free as the United Kingdom to direct its own policy so as to further its own interests; they ask but to be masters in their own home, and they well realize that the Westminster statute was the work of a Liberal government. Others, while expressing themselves satisfied to a certain extent with Canada's war effort, have severely criticized the Liberal administration of the past five years. I have a habit of looking back, and I recall that Canada was at various times under Conservative leadership; I also find that all crises and depressions occurred under Conservative administration. In 1890, when the rural parishes of Rimouski constituency were emptying into the American melting pot, were not the Conservatives in power? What had their government done to prevent that unfortunate exodus which deprived the country of millions of citizens? How can it be explained that industries which rise and expand in New England were not launched in our country? Yet, in those days, high tariff was the recognized panacea. At the time of the 1911 crisis, was Canada not governed by Mr. Borden? And who but the Conservatives were in power through the inflation and deflation periods of the first world war? Finally, how did the Bennett regime solve the unemployment crisis which sapped our country's fundamental strength? Yet, in those days, Mr. Bennett commanded a sufficient majority to implement his programme providing for continued prosperity and employment while remaining within the limits of the Constitution. How can it be explained that Conservative principles of government, legislation and control of the country did not prevent these disasters? To my mind, it is ill-advised to demand that such principles be applied to the present day administration of the country.

It cannot be claimed, Mr. Speaker, that these unfortunate happenings were entirely coincidental and solely dependent on world-wide causes. A brief glance backwards shows that Canada's periods of greatness occurred under Liberal administration. Around 1900, we had the period which historians now call "the Laurier prosperity." It is sufficient to recall the revival which took place during the first term of the present prime minister, and it is sufficient to think of the record of the present administration, of the great strides made by this country, of its magnificent war effort and of the achievement of a truly Canadian spirit. And shortly we shall have a symbol which is necessary now that our country has attained the rank of a great international power.

It is unnecessary to dwell at greater length on this matter as everyone in this house knows the position occupied by Canada in the international sphere; the greatest powers in the world have recognized the greatness of our country and have sent ambassadors to our capital. And Canada has her own ambassadors; she has sent trade commissioners to strategic places throughout the world and the international agreements which she has concluded with various countries have opened numerous outlets for the products of our industry and our agriculture. It is true to say that it is due to the policies of the Liberal party if Canada has, to quote the words of André Siegfried, risen to the rank of an international power. Those are the results of the application of the principles of Canadian liberalism.

And, Mr. Speaker, my amazement gives way to apprehension when I consider the programme of the C.C.F. party.

Basing their theories upon mere assumptions or resentment, the exponents of socialism attack the very foundations of social order. They consider the whole of civilization as being based solely upon economic factors, and establish on this shaky foundation the relations of individuals among themselves and with society. They subordinate man, composed of flesh and mind, to matter and place him under the absolute control of an all-powerful state; there lies their grave mistake. It must not be overlooked that there is in the socialist movement some idealism which might attract the mass of workers. Indeed some of its claims are partly justified and this may account for some of its successes at election time. But the social problem has other angles which make their whole programme absolutely unacceptable. Socialism stems from a false interpretation of values and it advocates a utopian organization of labour. The experiment already carried out in other parts of the world with a state which both produces and distributes shows how dreadful the application of this system would be in our country. Indeed, those who have tried to apply it fully are now abandoning their original uncompromising attitude and agree to return to the respect of individual rights, all of which shows the mischievous nature of this doctrine. The socialistic solution can only bring about ruin and general poverty; it will of necessity hold back production because the labourer who is deprived of the stimulus of personal interest will not have the courage to work. It still remains true that personal interest and the desire to better one's condition constitute the greatest stimulus to work and that any attempt to abolish it is simply an idle fancy.

This is so true that this house heard the remark of an hon. member when he humorously congratulated his brood sow for the freedom from work she enjoyed. Such irony when carried out to the extreme, amply demonstrates the utopian character of this theory. Work remains and will remain the lot of humanity.

Lastly, the socialistic solution is unjust because it encroaches upon the natural right of property which is anterior to society and inalienably belongs to the individual and the family. The state makes use of undue authority when it endeavours to restrict the exercise of this right, when not compelled to do so in the interest of the people.

It is absolutely certain that no government in Canada could put into practical application the socialistic principles. Such an experience would necessarily reduce our people to slavery and result in the loss of their economic freedom. All the pioneers and founders of this country came over here for the sake of freedom and with the will to enjoy it completely, and their descendants, whose needs are the same, would have nothing left but freedom of thought limited by the obligation of holding their tongue. The ideal situation is not that man should be wolf to man, according to the English philosopher Hobbes, but should strive rather by the actual practice of justice and even of charity to create a more and more intimate relationship between capital and labour. They are indispensable agents in the same achievement and they are destined to cooperate rather than to oppose one another.

The time is riper than ever for the implementation of the doctrine of Canadian liberalism as advocated by Laurier. It is national in character and capable of application to all classes of society from one ocean to the other. Its ideal of freedom for all is its immediate field; social justice and security, the bettering of the living standard of the humble and the poor have been the dream of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. To-day, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is on the point of making it come true. Money has been relegated to its proper function, that of serving the interests of the human race. At this moment, I think of the achievements of the Liberal party in this field: child welfare, national employment organization, unemployment insurance, veterans relief, family allowances, old-age pension. In another sphere, there are the arbitration of labour disputes, the establishment of minimum wages, the granting of agricultural loans and the civil re-establishment of veterans of the armed forces.

Fairness in social relations flows from such legislation and their proper enforcement. Although defective, like all other human achievements, they nevertheless place Canada first among the civilized nations in the field of social legislation. It is through these measures that the Liberal party has shown its concern about the welfare and the betterment of living standards both for the individual and the family. In them are incorporated all the progress realized in other parts of the universe. Experience has taught the Liberals how to control traditional doctrines; liberalism has remained faithful to the absolute and unchaning principles of individual freedom in society and of natural property rights; however, it has adapted their application to the new conditions that now prevail for the greater good of all our citizens. Thus, it was in a position to grant requests which, at first, seemed incompatible. It has endeavoured to reconcile authority and freedom, individualism and social sense; it has carefully avoided opposite errors and aimed at the maintenance of peace and harmony on all social levels and among all classes of Canadians. This ideal was so commendable that other parties are endeavouring to claim it as their own.

I find confirmation of these statements in the first part of the speech from the throne. It takes into account both the anxiety of the man on the street and the problems of the social worker. It raises politics on a level with human solidarity and the practice of social justice. Is it not astounding that some have found it vague and even incomprehensible? The speech from the throne is inspired by an ideal far above the economic and monetary planes and this may be why some people have not understood its implications. On hearing it, I remembered a short definition of civilization given by a contemporary philosopher, Mr. M. Daniel Rops:

> Civilization is a state of equilibrium between a moral ideal and a practical economic and administrative system.

Mr. Speaker, the implementation of the principles enumerated in the speech from the throne is a guarantee of a sound and just administration of the country. I am proud, as representative of the people of the constituency of Rimouski, to give my unfailing support to a government who advocates such an ideal and gives such a guarantee. It is the assurance of a progressive and united Canada where living will be a pleasure.

Mr. RONALD MOORE (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to this debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I understand it covers most of the legislation which the government propose to bring forward at this time to meet the conditions which confront the people of this country. It is to be regretted that more has not been brought forward in the speech from the throne because there can be no question about it, the Canadian people face the most crucial period they have ever experienced in their history.

The first condition with which I think we have to deal, and to deal with very shortly, is reconversion. I notice the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) told us that already plans had been laid for rebuilding Canadian industry to peace-time conditions. But what plans have been laid? I understand some industries have already been reconverted, but just last night we heard that reconversion will not be completed until 1948. That is a most serious situation and should receive the earnest consideration of this house. I have received letters, in this morning's mail, telling me that war workers who were laid off in the city of Winnipeg and received peace-time jobs in packing plants have already had to cash in on their bonds in order to keep up their standard of living. I think it is imperative that the government do something; indeed they should already have done something, to raise the wages of war workers who are going into peace-time work. According to the Toronto welfare board it requires $35.90 a week to live up to modern standards. What is the average wage of a war-time worker in one of our war plants? It is around eighty cents an hour. It may vary in different parts of the country, but generally speaking eighty cents an hour is a good average. The worker needs approximately $35 a week after all expenses by way of taxation have been met. I submit that that amount of money is not too much to receive for a week's work. So far nothing has been done by the present government to increase the rate of pay of those working in our peace-time industries, those industries which are going to become so important in the very near future, because we have now finished the war, and are on to peace-time work, peace-time construction. So much for the necessity of a more definite policy so far as reconversion is concerned.

I want now to deal for a few minutes with rehabilitation. I am very much interested in the rehabilitation policy of the present administration, because I, too, am a returned man. I might say that from D-day on until the end of the war every Canadian service man was discussing the rehabilitation policy of the present government and wanting to know if he would have a job when the war was over. Not only that, but they wanted to know what was the chief issue in the election campaign, and whether they would be assured of full employment. During that period, the administration issued a pamphlet which was entitled "Back to Civil Life." First, I wish to congratulate the administration upon their war service gratuities. Taking them as a whole they are very fair, possibly higher than those of any other country in the world. No doubt some changes could be made. I do not think the clothing allowance is high enough. Also, as regards the department's reference to the buying of power machinery for those who are going to take up farming, $1,200 is not sufficient to outfit a farm with power machinery. As I have said, however, taking the gratuities all in all they are, I think, very fair.

What about the carrying out of the policy? In the little pamphlet to which I have referred, and which I believe was issued by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie), it is stated that the success of the government's rehabilitation policy depended, first, upon the initiative of the veteran himself, and second, upon the ability of private enterprise to supply jobs. If the success of our rehabilitation policy is dependent upon the ability of private enterprise to keep our soldiers employed, I venture to say that when the next depression hits this country the service men will go down like tenpins in a bowling alley.

I know there are hon. members who hold stern views as to the necessity of maintaining private enterprise as the basis of our economy. I respect those views, but just as honestly as I respect them, I want to make clear my opinion that it is impossible for private enterprise to solve the problems which confront our people. When the next depression strikes this country we shall have mass unemployment, because it is not the policy of private enterprise to supply employment; their interest is only in the making of profits; when there is no profit in a certain business private enterprise will take no part in further production in that line.

In order to prove that this is the case I wish to quote from the Bankers' Magazine for January, 1943. Listen to what it has to say about the necessity of unemployment to maintain the private ownership system of production:

> And is there not also a tendency in much of this modern planning—not forgetting the Beveridge plan—to overlook the fact that, human nature being what it is, the workers of the future, capitalists and wage-earners alike, will require the old spur of rewards and punishments (good profits and good wages, fear of losses and bankruptcy, and, yes, fear of unemployment and poverty) to ensure the necessary drive in this work of internal and international competition?

I am sure that hon. members would have to look through a great many magazines in the parliamentary library before they could find one paragraph containing as much nonsense as there is in that one paragraph in the Bankers' Magazine.

But that is not the most serious implication of the Bankers' Magazine. We must have unemployment and poverty, so they say, to maintain the efficiency of the capitalistic system; but what about the necessity for "drive" in the field of national and international competition? That is the most serious implication of this statement in the Bankers' Magazine. Obviously, if that is the case the Atlantic charter means no more to the international bankers than does the Beveridge plan or the Marsh report, for if we are to have "drive" in national and international affairs, how can we ever subscribe to the fourth and fifth paragraphs of the Atlantic charter? I wish to quote those paragraphs:

4. They—

Meaning the United States and Great Britain.

—will endeavour, with due respect for all their existing obligations, to further the enjoyment by all states, great or small, victor or vanquished, of access, on equal terms, to the trade and to the raw materials of the world which are needed for their economic prosperity.

How can any system of private individualism or private initiative subscribe to that? I do not see how they can do it.

5. They desire to bring about the fullest collaboration between all nations in the economic field with the object of securing for all, improved labour standards, economic adjustment and social security.

These are noble commitments, but I earnestly submit that this government cannot subscribe to them and maintain the private system of ownership.

Let us consider for just a moment the great economic concentration which has taken place, a condition which applies not only to Canada but to the capitalist system generally. It is true of the United States and of every other country operating under that system. According to the survey of financial corporations for 1934, what do we find? Our three largest banks control seventy per cent of all the banking assets of the country, and in addition to that the same three banks control 832 directorships in 375 of the largest corporations in Canada manufacturing practically every known need of the Canadian people. I ask the administration, do they think that is a fair basis on which to build up an economy to bring about "a bright new world?" It cannot be done. The only solution to the problem is to begin right now to build a cooperative system in this country and I am suggesting to the government that they should begin the building of that system at once. We already have in some of the war-time controls, in our cooperative enterprises, a large measure of cooperation and I think the government ought to continue to extend that, because in cooperation lies the future of the Canadian economy.

In order to explain fully what I mean I should like to quote an article which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of September 5, 1945. I am sure hon. gentlemen to my right will be very much interested in this article because it deals with one of the greatest socialist enterprises to be found anywhere in the British empire, and possibly it is as great as any socialist enterprise to be found in the Soviet Union itself. I am referring to the Ontario hydro electric commission. I quote the following:

There is little to be reviewed that is new; but it is well that the public mind should be refreshed sometimes with some of the salient facts about this great provincial asset, and the commission and its work. Established by the Ontario legislature in 1906, the commission is now nearly forty years in operation. An enterprise considered dubious in 1906, the commission has long proved a magnificent success. It now supplies cheap hydro electric power to over 900 municipalities in Ontario, to all the cities, 26, of Ontario, to 106 towns, 305 villages and 487 townships. This service to the townships means service to a great part of the farming community of Ontario.

Here is the report itself, and I ask every hon. member to listen to it because we find here the very essence of C.C.F. policy.

The basic principle governing the financial operations of the undertaking is that electrical service be given by the commission to the municipalities (and by the municipalities to the consumer) at cost. The "cost" includes provision for eventual repayment of all capital expenditure. Notwithstanding this, Ontario has meanwhile the cheapest electric service in the world.

I think the Ontario government is to be commended for maintaining that system, and in fact it is hard for me to understand how the province of Ontario, for the past forty years first Liberal, then Conservative, and back to Liberal and then Conservative again, has been able to maintain as a public enterprise one of the greatest businesses within that province. I suggest to the federal government that they continue the good work by carrying the principle of cooperation into the federal field. I wish to suggest where they could make a beginning.

I notice at the present time, because of the tempo of the war, that we now have in Canada $800 million worth of government-owned war plants, many of which could be reconverted to peace-time production. I suggest to the present government that instead of handing over these war plants to private individuals for a song, or possibly less than that, they maintain the plants as public enterprises, run on the same basis as the Ontario hydro electric commission, to supply peace-time goods on the same basis as the people of Ontario are supplied with cheap electric power at cost.

I should like to make special reference to one of these very large industries, one which has been built up during the present struggle. I refer to Research Enterprises Limited, which I understand is located at Toronto. At its peak of employment it employed 7,000 men; at the present time, I understand, it is employing approximately 5,000 men. I believe that that plant is one of the most up-to-date scientific research plants to be found in the British empire and I wish to urge upon the government the necessity of controlling that plant. It is the only plant within the British empire which manufactures optical lenses. It is the only plant which can manufacture on a large scale radar equipment. Practically all the American radar equipment used in the west African campaign had to be made in that Toronto plant, and I think it is important that the present administration should maintain the plant for the people of Canada, retaining ownership and control of it. So much for that.

I fully realize that the present administration cannot go forward with any vast programme of socialism, but there is a great deal that they can do to relieve unemployment as it develops in the near future and as it is bound to develop because of the economic system under which we are operating. I suggest that they should begin as soon as possible the development of northern Canada. Northern Canada is the last frontier left to capitalistic expansion. Personally I do not like to see it developed under capitalism, but if that is all there is at our disposal we shall have to be satisfied with it. I suggest to hon. members that our neighbour to the north of us, over the north pole, the Soviet Union, is making marvellous developments in its northern land, and I should like to see Canada emulate that development by carrying out similar developments on our side of the north pole.

There are many things that could be done in that section of Canada to further private interests, to further private development. They could develop water power. On the Nelson river, for example—and this is only one example—there is a hydro electric power site at which there could be developed 700,000 horse-power which would supply all the mining area for 100 miles in radius. In addition to that, that electrical power could be transported to the northern part of Manitoba and Saskatchewan and used for rural electrification, something that ought to be done in the near future. Then I should like to see the government take on some form of reforestation programme. At the present time our forests are rapidly dwindling in every province, and I think the federal government, in co-operation with the provincial authorities, ought to establish as soon as convenient some kind of reforestation measure to replace our forests, which are rapidly diminishing.

I wish now to deal for a few minutes with education. Other speakers from the same group as that to which I belong have already dealt with the subject, but it is so important that another word along the same line will not hurt. I wish to deal in particular with the school at Churchill, Manitoba. The school at that point is in particularly bad circumstances owing to the fact that most of the property held at Churchill belongs to the federal government and is therefore untaxable. In connection with schools in unorganized territories such as this, I think the federal government should be willing to make a larger grant to carry on education.

There is something else in connection with education which ought to receive the consideration of this government. I refer to technical education. I take it that the present federal government is in an excellent position to provide technical education to the children of this country. For instance, take the three armed services. They were provided with technical schools well furnished with the latest equipment. I see no reason why the federal government could not take the machines from these different technical schools and redistribute them throughout Canada to schools which would be much smaller, thus giving our boys and girls a chance to get technical education in the line of work they intend to follow.

I believe that we should have a more balanced economy in western Canada. To obtain that we should have a few more factories built in that part of the country. If we construct factories in western Canada I suggest that they be based on agriculture. Now that rubber is such an important industry in Canada, I see no reason at all why we should not have a synthetic rubber plant built in western Canada to make tires for motor vehicles from synthetic rubber produced from alcohol as a base. That is, grain alcohol would be the base of the raw materials for the production of rubber. I understand that alcohol as a base for synthetic rubber is a much better raw material than oil which is now used.

There is something else I should like to mention with respect to western Canada, namely, the absolute necessity of keeping the Winnipeg grain exchange out of the picture. The Canadian wheat board, with the able assistance of the federal government, has done an excellent job in marketing Canadian wheat. I believe that they can do just as well in the future as they have done in the past, which would completely eliminate the necessity of reestablishing the Winnipeg grain exchange.

I come now to the question of taxation. We have heard a great deal about taxation in this house in the last few days. I am quite willing to admit that in some places taxation is unfair. I do not think salaries of $660 a year should be taxed; but I am not opposed to paying high taxes as long as the government can maintain the present tempo of employment. As long as they are able to do that, I for one am quite willing to pay my fair share of taxes in order to maintain our living standards at a very high level.

Another matter was mentioned in the house which I think ought to be dealt with. I believe the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Ashby) suggested that we should have retirement from industry at sixty years of age at a pension of $50 a month. Another hon. member to my right said that that would be giving old age pensions to young people. There may be some reason to believe that, but I ask the house to consider what Henry Ford told us about the automobile industry a few years ago. Mr. Ford told us that in the automotive industry a man was considered old at thirty-five. When we get reconverted to peace-time production I venture to say with our mechanical production it will be very difficult for a man to keep a job in the automotive industry when he passes thirty-five years of age. Therefore I do not think the suggestion made by the hon. member for Edmonton East was wide of the mark.

I now wish to deal for a little while with housing. This is another subject which has received a great deal of consideration from hon. members. Once again I am not blaming the government for the housing situation that exists in Canada. That situation is the result of the manner in which we have been doing business for the past thirty-five years. It is the result of private initiative. Private initiative will not build houses if there is no profit in them. The working people of Canada have not received sufficient money in the past thirty or thirty-five years to enable them to build adequate houses; therefore houses have not been built. You can go back to 1911 and you will find that a housing shortage existed in this country. At that time an editorial appeared in a Toronto paper deploring the condition which existed in the four largest cities, Toronto, Winnipeg, Vancouver and Montreal. It stated that there were developing in those cities slum conditions similar to those which existed in Europe. That was in 1911. Shortly after 1911 we had a depression. Then we had world war I. No houses were built during that time. Then we had another depression from 1919 to 1922, and very few houses were built. Then from 1922 to 1929 we had the wild spree which culminated in the great depression in 1929. Very few houses were constructed up to and including the present war and we now have the whole problem on our hands. Competent authorities tell us that we shall have to construct the same number of houses in Canada as exists now in four of our cities, namely, Calgary, Edmonton, London and Brantford. That means that we are short approximately 150,000 houses in this country, and it will take approximately five years to complete that construction. It will require an expenditure of $1,750,000,000, and will provide work for 190,000 men. That is one way in which we can help to solve our unemployment problem if the government see fit to find the money and go ahead with the construction. If we do undertake anything like that, I would suggest that we should resort to the use of brick instead of lumber for that construction, because it will be very difficult to get sufficient lumber and season it in time to go forward with the construction.

I shall mention just one other matter which has to do with my own constituency and which I think the house will hear more about later. I refer to the Hudson Bay railway and the port of Churchill. I am very much interested in seeing that development carried out. I want to see the whole north country developed because it is Canada's last frontier, and I think it ought to be developed if for no other reason than to keep abreast of our neighbour across the north pole. I submit that that route can be used for more than three months of the year because we now have newer and better equipment. We have radar, which can be installed both on the ships and at convenient points on islands in Hudson bay and along Hudson strait to warn us of the ice floes and of moves made by the ice coming down Davis strait.

In addition to that, we should build up mining throughout northern Manitoba and northern Saskatchewan. I do not think there is anything else I wish to say at the present time. I consider my remarks adequate at the moment and shall conclude them.

Mr. GEORGES H. HÉON (Argenteuil): (Translation): Mr. Speaker, intentionally, I shall direct my first remarks to you in the French language in order to emphasize, once again, that it is one of the two official languages in this country. Unfortunately, in certain quarters, there is too much inclination to forget that fact. It is proper to recall it, even if only to awaken some of our compatriots whose faint-heartedness would make them partisans of eternal compromise. Our English-speaking friends like frankness, truth and virility. We rise very much in their esteem when we expound our legitimate claims in a firm but ever courteous and dignified way, because they like, as I said truth and frankness, while loathing every form of obsequiousness.

(Text): Mr. Speaker, I should like to discharge immediately a most agreeable duty. Congratulations being apparently in order, I extend them to you personally, sir, on your unanimous election as Speaker of this house. Heartily endorsing the remarks made by all the leaders of the different parties, and by the press, I would add that your varied and not inconsiderable experience in the Quebec legislature and in this house will prove immediately beneficial to all of us. We are assured that your unfailing courtesy, your particular generosity (which I have already experienced), and your indulgence, will render your tenure of office most pleasant.

Both the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne are also deserving of our felicitations. The fact that they wore the universally honoured and respected uniform of Canada's armed forces greatly enhanced the significance of their words.

I feel also, Mr. Speaker, that in all sincerity I should warmly congratulate the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) and the Secretary of State (Mr. Martin), both of whom I hold in particularly high esteem, on having attained cabinet rank. I am convinced that the ability and personal distinction of both these gentlemen will greatly redound to the credit of their French-Canadian compatriots. They may not be sitting in the first row, but that matters not a whit since it is only by his honesty of purpose, ability and efficiency that a public man is judged by all intelligent, unbiased and right thinking men.

Finally—and this will rudely jolt those who would carry bitter political feuds into this house—I extend felicitations to the leaders of all the political groups on their election. I am not so deeply ingrained with the red or blue pigment that I cannot readily acknowledge, the sincerity, earnestness and patriotism of our political leaders. We may not always agree with them. I for one may have respectfully to dissent more or less often. We may not agree with their ways of attaining the only true destiny for this country, that of a strong, united, prosperous and sovereign nation; nor may we always agree with their methods, which at times may seem to be highly unorthodox, and illogical to the common man, but who in this House will dare deny that they are all giving their time, their energy and indeed very often their health and whole life to better the lot of their fellow Canadians?

At this point I should like to make a suggestion which is not entirely new but is deserving of serious consideration. I believe it should be possible for the so-called boards of strategy—which appellation is very often a misnomer since sometimes they have turned out to be boards of blunders and errors—of the various political parties to reach a gentlemen's agreement whereby the election to the house of their regularly-chosen and nationally-recognized-and-accepted leaders would be assured, or at least greatly facilitated. The present situation is unsatisfactory and unfair to the leaders and to their constituents. We all know what a general election means to a party leader. It involves speaking engagements and conferences with party brain-trusters across the tremendous distances of this dominion in a very short period of time; the adjustment of innumerable clashes, differences and frictions among the faithful in various provinces, constituencies and even villages, with the inevitable result that the average leader will be lucky if he is able to spend twenty-four hours with his own constituents. This gives his opponent or opponents a tremendous and unfair advantage The evil of this situation has been abundantly shown, I think, by the predicament in which the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) found himself recently; and I am serious about this. Here was the leader of a party which had secured the largest number of votes, the man who thus was Prime Minister-designate of his country; yet when he signed at San Francisco on behalf of Canada he was a defeated candidate who had been denied a seat in the house where the nation had expressed some desire to see him direct and lead the government of the day. No one will deny that this situation, in addition to giving him no particular cause for rejoicing, I imagine, was highly incongruous and paradoxical. The distinguished leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) was also similarly affected prior to the last general election. Although I did not attend the Winnipeg convention where he was unanimously chosen, I am informed that the convention was representative of all party factions in the nine provinces. The party he leads always has been and will remain a major factor to be reckoned with in Canadian politics. It might be argued that he was offered an opportunity to run in a by-election; but with the probability that the cleverly-conceived and smartly-executed York South strategy, which had so effectively beheaded his immediate predecessor, might again be brought into play, it was tantamount to jeopardizing his chances of election, and personally I think he was very wise in not falling into the trap. Yet on this account, the regularly-chosen and nationally-accepted leader of a dominion-wide party was prevented from leading that party in the house during the war years, when his leadership would have been most essential; and when I make that statement, I am not detracting from the highly-creditable performance of my old friend the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), who discharged a most ungrateful obligation with a contagious and perpetual smile.

Canada has just emerged from its participation in two world wars in one generation. Our victory has been achieved through a tremendous sacrific of life which this young nation could ill-afford, and a national debt which has reached unbelievable and almost terrifying figures for a nation of twelve million people. The reward, however, lies in the satisfaction of complete victory; a job well done; a fair chance for a long era of undisturbed peace if our statesmen will rise to the occasion, and the still not-fully-implemented pledge of the four freedoms to all nations, powerful or weak, and to all individuals, rich or poor. But this war has also left its scars on Canada, as all prevoius wars have done. One of the ugliest of these scars has been caused by the very nature and progressive degree of our participation. Let us call a spade, a spade. The conscription issue has been used again, as in 1914-18, by unscrupulous politicians to foster their own petty, personal, political advantage. Through it, racial and sectional animosities, not wholly-extinguished before the war, have been rekindled, and thus national unity and inter-racial harmony, which are so essential to the welfare of Canada, have been seriously impaired. Shall we ever get rid of the conscription bogey? Frankly I do not know, although I must say that the present government, by almost imperceptible degrees, has successfully imposed a measure of conscription on the province which previously had been most violently opposed to it i.e., Quebec. If election figures mean anything, the electoral results on June 11 showed by the overwhelming number of government candidates returned that the voters, although perhaps unwittingly, had approved the principle of conscription as applied by the Liberal government. Personally, I feel that if, God forbid, this country should ever again become engaged in another total war, where our very existence was threatened, and universal service was resorted to by the government of the day, it should be done by something similar to the United States system, under which the millionaire and the pauper, the son of the president and the son of the labourer, the influential and the insignificant, the Republican and the Democrat, alike are called by number and treated on the same footing. If the number comes out, and if the holder is not entitled to an exemption—and these exemptions are clear and well defined—he is inducted into the services. But if his number is not drawn, he can still attend to his civilian duties and walk around in mufti, without taking the risk of having a white feather planted in his lapel by some patriotic but irate old maid.

Mr. Speaker, I have been elected in the old historical constituency of Argenteuil as an Independent Conservative, to preach and practise—but mostly to practise—principles which were in the forefront at confederation and inspired the real founders of the Conservative party, Cartier and Macdonald; equality among the races, discrimination against none, respect of the constitutional rights and sincere opinions of all Canadians.

If the Progressive Conservative party will adhere to this doctrine it shall have my full support; and I express the hope that it will prove as easy for the present distinguished leader of the party to render the old Conservative guard as progressively-inclined as the progressive element is conservatively-minded. Perhaps here, Mr. Speaker, the words of De Tocqueville may find their application:

> The political party I would call great, is the one which clings more to principles than to consequences; to general more than to special cases; to ideas and not to men. Such a party is usually distinguished by a nobler character, more generous passions, more genuine convictions, and a bolder and more open conduct than others.

However, I cannot conceive that this parliament, which must unflinchingly shoulder the terrible responsibility of taking the country over the hurdles of the immediate post-war period, with its greatly-aggravated problems of a temporarily-unbalanced economy, will try to do so through strict party lines. The tasks ahead transcend party advantage and, this time at least, it is not the party leaders who have set the real issues, and they can not evade them if they try.

The issues have "come out of the depths of that deep, which is called public opinion." That all-important group of Canadians which is not bound by party lines, and votes according to its common sense and calm judgment, has a right to expect that we shall legislate only in the national interest. Further, the little man and the little woman of no fixed political party, in my constituency and in all constituencies this dominion over, who have enlisted or who have generously given their sons and daughters to the services, forged the tools for war during long hours of the night and day, bought the bonds, given their generous blood at Red Cross clinics, and gladly borne the burden of back-breaking taxes, without even the shadow of a complaint, are entitled to be represented here. That is why, I for one, propose to reserve my independence and freedom of speech and vote, every time the social security, material prosperity and immediate welfare of this same little man and woman will be at stake.

The speech from the throne has many more omissions than commissions; and although it has its good points, such as, for instance, a Canadian flag and Canadian citizenship, which will help to put an end to the plague of divided loyalties, it is not sufficiently clear-cut, and far too nebulous as to what the government proposes to do in the way of helping our war veterans reestablish themselves in civilian occupations, and in reducing the burden of taxation which weighs too heavily upon the industries, the salaried white-collar worker, and the labour and agricultural classes of my constituency. I cannot accept it in its entirety, and therefore must withhold judgment until the measures implementing it are brought before this house. There is much with which I can agree in the opposition amendment, and even the sub-amendment as it concerns housing. These amendments are in the nature of warnings to the government that the Canadian people will brook no side-tracking or fence-sitting in the execution of reconstruction policies.

Mr. Speaker, one more word. In my constituency which is a perfect cross-section of this dominion, since it is half industrial and half rural, and is inhabited, almost in equal proportions by Canadians of English, Irish, Scottish and French origin, we have made an honest and loyal effort to solve the problem of true national unity, through forbearance, respect and generous interpretation of one another's voiced opinions, and unbounded faith in Canada and Canadians. True, there still remain in Argenteuil, a few islands of resistance wherein dwell narrow-minded fanatics; but they are held up to the ridicule of, and held in contempt by their fellow men.

All the racial groups in Argenteuil have given me a majority vote, because I have pledged myself to fight sectionalism, and racial and religious prejudice, wherever I find it. I propose to fulfil my pledge and carry the fight wherever the enemy is, not excluding my own racial group, and behind whatever political party it may lurk, because, unfortunately, as Bulwer once wrote:

> It is the misfortune of all miscellaneous political combinations, that with the purest motives of their more generous members, are ever mixed the most sordid interests and the fiercest passions of mean confederates.

May I therefore appeal to all hon. members gathered in this most important post-war parliament, where the destiny of this and coming generations of Canadians is at stake, to help heal all war-wounds by forgetting and forgiving past quarrels and dissensions, and by rededicating ourselves to the cause of a true and broad Canadianism, harmony between our two great races, help, cooperation, equality between all classes, and opportunities for all. This Canada of ours is big enough, rich enough for all of us to live in it, in equality, peace and plenty.

The countless thousands of our fellow-Canadians who have given their lives in the war which has recently been brought to a successful conclusion, have traced with their generous blood the path along which lies Canada's glorious and only true destiny; a strong, united, proud and prosperous, sovereign nation, freely associated with the other peace-loving nations of the Commonwealth and, for that matter, all other peace-loving nations of the world to ensure peace to all men of goodwill, and the welfare of mankind.

To paraphrase a Churchillian expression: "Let us all then to the task".

Mr. L. W. SKEY (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, in rising to make my first contribution to the proceedings of Canada's twentieth parliament, may I commence by offering you my congratulations, and saying that I listened with interest to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) when he spoke of your illustrious family record. I have read, too, with further interest, the tribute paid you in this week's issue of Time magazine.

May I also extend my congratulations, sir, to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) and the hon. member for Gaspe (Mr. Langlois) upon the excellent manner in which they acquitted themselves in their difficult duty of moving and seconding this motion.

As a new member of this house I must admit I face this task with more anxiety than I would a flying operation. However, may I begin by saying that I hope my contribution to the efforts of this house will be a useful one and that I shall at all times be able to keep faith with its dignity and high tradition. This afternoon I should like to speak for a few moments about my constituency, the services and Canada's future.

I speak as the new member for Trinity. My riding runs through the heart of Toronto, the second largest city in Canada. It extends from the harbour to St. Clair avenue. It has within its boundaries three great hospitals, two of them military hospitals. There is Christie Street and the Red Chevron as well as one Ontario hospital. It has as well the Canadian national exhibition grounds now inhabited by No. 4 release centre of the Royal Canadian Air Force. It takes its name from the park where stand the beautiful but vacant buildings of the old college.

The people in my constituency are good Canadian citizens. They have sent thousands of their sons and daughters to our services and to fight with Canadian forces overseas. They are war workers; they are unionists; they are peaceful tradesmen. Their businesses are large and small and they have manufactured many war materials as well as peacetime products. The origin of the people of my constituency is Canadian, British, French and American. Besides this, there are large numbers of new Canadians of Polish, Ukrainian, Estonian and Scandinavian descent.

During this war they have laboured constantly, each in his own way, to accomplish the defeat of our enemy. They have for six years produced the supplies, the war materials, the men, the women, the money, the service comforts and the courage which go to make up a nation's war effort. If they could be here to-day they would ask me to express for them the hope that there might be some relief from the taxation which they have borne without murmur, so that mothers and fathers will be able to put aside something for their own security and comfort in old age as well as to assist their sons and daughters who are returning from the services. They would ask for some relief from controls.

More than this, I think they would ask for leadership; they would ask to see a beacon into our future. They want guidance and leadership from Canada's government and the lifting of the secrecy that has surrounded the proceedings of this great house for the past six years. They would like to know how to reconvert themselves individually and how to reconvert their businesses as best they can to Canada's advantage.

If I may pause here for a moment I should like to say that never in Canada's history has there been such a disposition among all our people, among our unionists and business men to accept clear and direct leadership from their government. These same people in my constituency would like to have peaceful homes with some security and assurance that they will be able to remain in them for a short time. But above all they would want me to express in this house that they desire not only unity in their local riding but in Canada as a whole.

If I may speak for a moment on the subject of political peace and unity I should like to liken the constituency from which I come to that of your constituency, Mr. Speaker, that of St. Mary in Montreal. I understand that it runs through the heart of your great city, and the two ridings are not dissimilar. In the last general election four political parties contested my riding. Three of the candidates finished within a few hundred votes of one another, while the fourth candidate received substantial support. During the campaign there was some exploitation of religious faiths, some exploitation of racial prejudice and a beginning of class consciousness among our labouring groups. While I have every sympathy with their efforts to reconvert to peacetime industry and their efforts to gain leadership and guidance from the government, I have no sympathy with any method or means they may use to exploit class consciousness in this free, democratic country of Canada. To show that other members of this honourable house are aware that this condition exists, I should like to refer to what has been said before in this house. One hon. member said that on the morrow of the conclusion of this great war there is a beginning of much that looks like efforts to itensify controversy in some of our domestic fields. Then again an hon. member said that those who lend their voices to unnecessary and unjustified agitators may help to create a situation which will be much more difficult to meet than they have reason to expect.

Last April the legislature of Ontario was dissolved and the provincial government sought a mandate from the people of Ontario. But there were certain parties and groups in that house who did not seem to agree that it was right to ask the lieutenant governor to dissolve the legislature and call a general election. Those groups came to the locked doors of the legislature, demanded admittance and asked that the session continue. When I refer to these class conscious elements in our community and these political methods I have in mind that that is an example of what we may expect in the future if the integrity and authority of the free parliament of Canada is not maintained by all its members.

In any urban riding in Canada I think we have in miniature a picture of the forces of disunity that are at work in the world to-day. Here the problems of peace are presenting themselves to us in our own communities. These problems are well understood by the new Canadians in my constituency, these new Canadians who come from European homes, who have lived under difficult and different and absolute political regimes, who have sought freedom and sanctuary in our great country, who have fled from the mass-mind control of states such as nazi Germany.

I would be the first to say that we should be very careful to guard the rights and privileges of a free parliament in Canada. These new Canadians know what we need for the future. They know we need a friendly exchange of goods, of cultural achievements, of news, of ideas, of friendship and free and open travel and press facilities. These new Canadians know we cannot enclose any part of this world behind barriers of thought or barriers of wire and steel, because they know well that behind those barriers fear, suspicion and mistrust must grow, fear, suspicion and mistrust which can destroy us and the peace of this world. That other hon. members are aware of the same problem is evident from the record of Hansard. As one hon. member has said, these problems will not be solved by pitting one group against another and by creating needless suspicion and hate. And the challenge of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) extends, I feel, not only to the government but to all groups in this great House of Commons. As reported at page 26 of Hansard, he said:

> . . . that we be worthy of these days. We must build an economy in which our people will have faith; a democracy in which we can all have confidence and a programme for Canada in which, on its fundamentals, we can all be united.

I will now pass on to say a few words about the amendment moved by the Progressive Conservative party to the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I think in my previous remarks I have expressed well the feeling of doubt, which is prevalent in my constituency and must be prevalent in many other parts of Canada, that there is a lack of positive leadership for the future. I feel that we have well expressed in our amendment these doubts of the Canadian people as a whole, and that the desire for public leadership and the necessity of homes and jobs and quick reconversion has been fairly stated by my party.

The reinforcement issue is an old one to many hon. members, although it is a new one to many of us in the services. I do not propose to say a great deal about it to-day, but I would not be on this side of the house if I had not agreed with the stand taken by my party. I should like to add that I do not think the government of our country would be facing the great difficulties of demobilization had they followed what we consider to be a more enlightened policy with regard to the armed forces.

The problems of the services do not seem to me to be dissimilar from those of the civilians. The men must be released, and our civilian population would like to be freed from many controls. The men of the services require rehabilitation, and our civilian industries require reconversion. The men of the services will receive pensions and gratuities; our civilian groups would like to be able to enjoy lighter taxes. Both groups are concerned with homes and jobs. Previous speakers on this motion have dealt adequately with the subject, so that I shall leave it now and pass on to what I think the service men would like to be reassured about with regard to the attitude of this house and the present parliament.

I think they would ask first of us that we produce as much of a feeling of national unity as is possible in any community. I know they would ask of us a fearless approach to our national problems. In the past they have been controversial and they must be solved to help Canada's progress. I know the services would say to the government to-day, bring them down, bring them before every party and group in this house; let them see the light of day and let us face them fearlessly.

Many men and women in the services have obtained a wide knowledge of Canada during their time in the war. They have seen many provinces; overseas they have fought beside Canadians of all races and creeds from all parts of the dominion. They cannot tolerate any longer the petty divisions which seem up to this time to have been so easy of exploitation by politicians in this country. I know they would have us make an end of all these that can possibly be buried. If they have been as fortunate as I have they would have seen all the provinces with the exception of Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia. They would have enjoyed the friendliness of Prince Edward Island, seen its red soil and its potato fields and tasted its lobsters and oysters. They would have met the friendly people of Nova Scotia and formed an idea of the great contribution of that province to the building of our mighty Canadian navy. They would have seen the woods and farms of New Brunswick, and maybe they would have had the experience, which I had some months ago, of flying over that province and witnessing from the air a forest fire which was consuming the wealth of the province and apparently ranging unchecked. They would have seen the historic capital of the province of Quebec and cosmopolitan Montreal. I happen to have lived in Ontario; I was born there and have travelled over it widely; and for three years I was resident in friendly Manitoba. The rest of the provinces of Canada it is my intention to see before the close of this parliament, and I hope that other hon. members among us will travel as the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) has done and investigate all the provinces and become acquainted with the people of all provinces and tongues and faiths in our dominion.

Before I speak about my own service, the air force, I should like to pay humble tribute as an air force officer to our Canadian army and navy. The army, fighting for the first time as an integral unit, suffered a long, hard struggle in Italy, then gallantly marched into Normandy, and from there through the Netherlands, Belgium and Germany to the Baltic sea. They displayed in siege and battle the greatest powers of invention and endurance.

In my experience in the air force I have had a lot to do with the Canadian navy and with the Royal Navy. I have witnessed their phenomenal growth, their vigilance in the home waters and on the broad Atlantic, and seen the way in which they have admirably discharged their tremendous responsibilities of convoy escort.

Turning for a moment to our branch of the service, I should like to give this house a short description of it. It is young; it is lusty; it is imaginative and it is still growing. Its members have fought alongside the army and navy of Canada and of other countries, and I know those other services will appreciate a claim that can be made for the air force, that they should have a certain amount of freedom to digest their immense expansion and the immense power they achieved during war time.

I would commend to this house the stand that has already been taken by the government in allowing the ministry for air to remain separate for some time. It may take the air force as long as from two to three years to get straightened away on its new path in peace, and I would commend leaving it to its own growth until it has achieved full manhood and adjusted the new factors which have so recently brought it into discussion again. The air force at present requires a policy for peace. Young men, good men, able men, technicians, pilots and men whose knowledge and duties cover all the services that it governs would like to stay with it. It has seized their imagination, and they would like to stay with it and play a part in the future defence of Canada, should that ever be necessary. They would like to know what the government has to offer them in the way of a career.

I should like now to pass on for a moment and speak on the subject of technical research. I am sure that when the appreciation of this war is written historians will give to the technical capacity of the scientists of the united nations, England, the United States and our own great Canada, credit for a tremendous achievement, that they will judge that our scientific potential was, apart from the will of our people to fight, the dominant factor in our victory.

I feel that our scientific potential is the greatest factor in our peace-time recovery and in our continued prosperity. Were I not such a junior member of this house I might go so far as to recommend that we have a ministry of technical research to which the heads of all services could take their problems, to which industry, agriculture, medicine and all our other professions in Canada could go with their problems for solution and help.

In summing up my remarks, I should like to leave with the house the thought that the services and civilians alike would ask of this government, and ask of us, unity in Canada. I would put forward the suggestion that perhaps our wartime information board and the national film board, controlled by a joint parliamentary committee, could be used as two great instruments to teach all parts of Canada about their neighbours, their friends, about the problems of other provinces, and to educate us to a national outlook.

I believe that science and scientific research and technique as an aid to all Canadian businesses and to our services is the great need of the future. With no desire to delay the house any longer, may I say that in a few days' time hon. members will be asked to consider grants for the armed services. I have no information and no idea as to what these grants will be, but I would leave with the house this one thought. I believe it is necessary that we should keep the weapons of war in the hands of the people who love peace.

Mr. FREDERIC DORION (Charlevoix-Saguenay): Mr. Speaker, I should like first to join with the other speakers who have taken part in this debate in offering you my most sincere congratulations on the high honour conferred upon you unanimously by the House of Commons. In the last few years we have learned to know you, and I am sure that, with the sense of justice and equity which characterizes you, you will maintain the tradition that has been established by those who in the past have so illustriously occupied the seat which you hold at the present time. There is no doubt that this honour reflects also upon your family, and especially upon your country and also upon our province.

Since we last met in this chamber there have been many changes as a result of the general election of last June. Among the newcomers, particularly those from the province of Quebec, there are many young men who will no doubt be a valuable asset to the House of Commons. I would call attention to the fact that the bar of Quebec is very highly represented among the members. Some of them have already been called to fill important positions, as, for example, attorneys for the crown, members of the council of the bar, and a president of their association. Allow me to mention the present batonnier of the bar of Montreal, the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett). I have no doubt that all these members will make their contribution to the keeping up of the good reputation of our bar, which has already furnished this house with a great many prominent members.

If on one side new representatives from the province of Quebec deserve the honour that has been conferred upon them by their electors, I cannot forget that unfortunately we have lost some members who for one reason or another were very close to some of the members of the house. I wish to mention my friend Mr. J. S. Roy, the previous member for Gaspe, who for the past five years sat in this house commanding the respect of all his fellow members. Even if we did not share his political views, I am sure that every member sitting in the last parliament had the utmost consideration for my former colleague, and I have no doubt it must have taken a capital man such as the present sitting member for Gaspe to defeat him.

As many hon. members have said in the course of this debate, and as we have also read in the newspapers throughout the country, the speech from the throne contains a few good suggestions. On the other hand, it is noticeable for its lack of measures which were expected by the people of the country. I note with satisfaction that the government has finally decided to bring before the house a policy providing for a national flag. I am sure that this decision will be welcomed by all fair-thinking citizens, by those who hold Canada above everything else, and by those who want to see our country secure its share of sovereignty. I am also pleased to note that the government has decided to define Canadian citizenship. I really believe that this is a new step toward what everybody wishes, and I sincerely hope that these two measures, when they come before the house for discussion, will be discussed with broad-mindedness.

Mention was also made in the speech from the throne of the international part that our country is called upon to play, and I expect that when the appropriate measures dealing with this question are brought before the house we shall have an opportunity of expressing our point of view. I may state now that the events of the last years and particularly of the last months have changed to a certain extent the ideas one could have with regard to the important role that our country is called upon to play in international affairs.

(Translation): Mr. Speaker, if Canada is to play the part she is expected to take in the international sphere, and even if she is to weather the difficulties of the post-war period, she must, to my mind, fulfil two essential conditions. The first is that we should continue our march toward absolute independence; the second, that we should find a fair and equitable solution to our domestic problems.

In order to fulfil the first condition, I think it would be necessary to destroy some remaining vestiges of the colonial spirit of old. The first and one of the most important of those vestiges is, I believe, the view that is taken in the matter of amendments to our constitution. As is well known, under the terms of the statute of Westminster, we are still compelled to go to the London parliament in order to obtain consent to any amendment to this country's constitution which we may want to bring about. That clause of the statute of Westminster, which was supposed to guarantee the rights of minorities in Canada, has indeed become a grave danger. I could not illustrate that better than by mentioning what happened in 1943 on the occasion of the last amendment to our constitution. In July 1943, the House of Commons, following a discussion and by a majority vote, passed a resolution whereby an address was voted to His Majesty the King, requesting him to have the kindness to amend our constitution so that the redistribution of electoral districts might be deferred, and on that occasion, when the resolution came up before the British House of Commons, it was thoroughly discussed. I have in hand the British House of Commons report of July 22, 1943—the date on which the Secretary of State for the Dominions, who then was Mr. Attlee the present Prime Minister, made his submission on the matter—and I shall quote the following excerpt from that statement:

At the time of the passing of the Statute of Westminster, an express provision was made at the request of the government of Canada, taking out from the general powers then conferred any power to amend or repeal the British North America Act, and the procedure therefore for amending the British North America Act remains as it was before the Statute of Westminster.

And in order to indicate what is meant by that clause of the statute of Westminster, I shall refer to a speech delivered by Mr. Edmund Harvey:

Mr. Edmund Harvey (Combined English universities): Surely the whole question depends on section 7 (1), of the act of Westminster, which was expressly put in at the request of Canada. I think that meets the point raised by the hon. gentleman the member for Altrincham (Sir E. Grigg). It was put in in order to protect the interests of certain minorities in Canada who at that period desired that, in the event of any change being requested by the Canadian parliament which they themselves did not unite in, there should remain the possibility of this parliament protecting the interests of the minority. It is an entirely exceptional position placed in the act.

I believe therefore, Mr. Speaker, that such are the exact wording and the true meaning of that clause inserted in the Statute of Westminster; for that reason, we must now wonder whether that clause, inserted for the protection of the rights of minorities, still constitutes the guarantee for which it was intended. In order to answer that question, I shall quote the speech delivered, in that same debate, by Sir Edward Grigg, and I quote:

Sir Edward Grigg (Altrincham): I suggest that it is really improper in present circumstances for the house to question the discretion of a sovereign parliament in the Commonwealth of Nations. It is only owing to a technical legislative peculiarity that it comes to the house at all, and it is very improper that the house should question the discretion of a national and absolutely sovereign parliament. I hope that that will be accepted by the house and that this legislation will be passed without further comment.

Which means, Mr. Speaker, that each time the Canadian parliament adopted a resolution similar to another brought down before the British House of Commons, the latter considered themselves bound by the majority vote given in this House of Commons and consequently cannot and will not discuss the question as to whether or not such a procedure endangers the rights of minorities in this country. We must remember that on that occasion, one of the provinces had signified its unanimous opposition to this amendment to the Canadian constitution, therefore, it is obvious that the protection which existed in the past was no more existent. Therefore I think I am right in saying, as I said then in the debate in this house on the proposed amendment that our constitution has simply become an ordinary law which a majority can modify at will and according to the good pleasure of the party in power. That is why it is urgent that this government set up an organization to inquire anew into this matter of vital importance to us. I would suggest, for example, that the federal government set up a commission of jurists, appointed not only by the Canadian government but also by the governments of the different provinces of the dominion. However, great care should be taken to include in this commission representatives of minorities in order that the sacred rights of minorities may be effectively protected. Such a commission I believe, could solve the problems that arise and would perhaps enable us to determine the procedure we would have to follow to amend our constitution ourselves without having to apply to the British parliament.

I said, Mr. Speaker, that the second condition we must fulfil to pass through what I would call the post-war crisis is to give to domestic problems the most equitable solutions. These problems, of course, are extremely numerous, but I believe that some are more important than others. There is for instance the problem of employment about which we have heard a great deal since the opening of the session. I do not intend to labour the point, but I wish to point out that last August, on the 20th to be exact, the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada sent to the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) a petition the conclusions of which I shall now quote. I believe that, if accepted by the government, these conclusions would go a long way to solve the problem. Here is the concluding part of that petition dated August 20:

We realize that it is impossible to do anything without funds; that is why we are in favour of maintaining war-time taxation, in accordance with our request of April last when we asked your government to raise the exemptions to $2,400 a year for married persons and $1,000 for single persons, during this crisis. To face the crisis we are now going through we urge:

(1) That every worker in an essential civilian industry be granted immediately a "reconversion salary" during this period of dislocation, namely one month's salary for each year of service up to three years.

(2) In order that the greatest number may benefit from available employment, the adoption of a maximum forty-hour week without salary reduction is recommended;

(3) To inspire confidence and maintain the purchasing power, all general salary reductions should be banned;

(4) Restrictions on building materials should be lifted and a housing programme launched with the same energy, ingenuity and industry which were applied to the production of urgent war material;

(5) The immediate launching of the required public works is suggested; as well as

(6) The speediest reconversion of all war industries which can serve in peace-time production.

To this problem of employment, the housing problem is closely allied. During recent sessions, we passed certain legislative measures intended to help Canadians build themselves new houses; but I must draw the attention of the federal authorities to the fact that these enactments, while they might easily apply in Canada's important centres and large cities, are altogether inappropriate in rural areas and in ridings similar to my own constituency of Charlevoix-Saguenay. As a matter of fact, I wrote the housing administrator not very long ago to inform him of the difficulties encountered by the people of the Charlevoix-Saguenay constituency when they applied to insurance companies for loans provided by the said enactment. Unfortunately, no solution has been found to the problem and the people of my constituency who wish to build homes in order to take advantage of this act cannot do so because the insurance companies claim that their needs are not sufficiently important and that it is not worth while to send inspectors to examine the projects and to supervise the work.

I wish to call your attention to the following letter which I received last July from the director of housing:

Sir:

Replying to your letter of July 6, I regret to inform you that we cannot do anything in regard to the reluctance shown by lending institutions to make loans in more or less remote communities.

The national housing administration cannot avail itself of any legislative authority in order to dictate to the authorized lending institutions where and when they shall make loans.

However, steps are being taken in order to enlarge as quickly as possible the field of action of lending institutions.

And this letter is signed by Mr. U. Mignon for Mr. F. W. Nicolls, director of housing.

[Mr. Dorion.]

Mr. Speaker, at this session this housing act should be amended so that it may apply as fully to rural districts as to urban centres.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is another matter which should not be overlooked, a matter which comes up from time to time, but which should certainly be settled if we are to live in peace and in harmony in this country. I refer to the grievances that are continually being aired because the rights of the French population of this country are not always fully recognized. In this respect, may I point out that too frequently official publications of the dominion government written exclusively in English are sent to French-speaking centres, both to civil servants and to French-Canadian taxpayers, who have difficulty in understanding them. Thus, for instance, I know that in regard to the selective service, the representatives of this service in the province of Quebec receive a great deal of literature written exclusively in English, and on account of their insufficient knowledge of the English language, they cannot become sufficiently acquainted with such instructions to be in a position to reply to the enquiries which they receive.

I also know that, within the last few months, the government have sent in French-speaking districts of Canada, some English forms for the use of the members of the armed forces who wished to be demobilized. In this case, however, I must give credit to whom credit is due. This state of affairs in the province of Quebec having been called to my attention, I asked for French forms and I was told that they were not quite ready, which fact explained the sending of the English version, but that I would receive them as soon as possible. I am glad to state that a few days later, a fortnight, I believe, the city of Quebec and all other French parts of the province, I suppose, were supplied with the French forms.

I bring this to the attention of the authorities, because I feel that all official documents distributed through the country should be printed in French and English, so that both versions could be sent to all parts of Canada at the same time.

Another point which has been the subject of numerous conversations and newspaper articles is the matter of family allowance cheques. It seems to me that it would be the simplest thing for the federal government to have all family allowance cheques printed in both French and English, and thus fulfil a general wish. To my mind, it would be only fair to the French-Canadian population of the dominion and I hope the federal authorities will very soon see that those responsible have these cheques, which are distributed through the whole of Canada, printed in both official languages.

There is another point which I believe should be discussed and settled very soon, if we are anxious that peace and harmony be maintained in our midst.

A while ago, I referred to the amendment of the British North America Act, issued in 1943, in connection with the redistribution of electoral seats. All hon. members will have noticed that I have put on the Order paper a resolution concerning this matter and I hope we will be given the opportunity of discussing it in the house. I hope that this year, now that the war is over, all private members, resolutions may be discussed in this house. When the house passed this amendment in 1943 it was well understood that the delay was accepted on the sole condition that this redistribution of seats would be proceeded with at the very first session following the end of the war. At this session, the government should at least appoint a committee to study the matter so as to assure satisfaction to all groups of citizens.

Mr. Speaker, in all measures passed by the Dominion government and particularly in all social legislation, of ever growing importance, consideration should be given to the rights of each and every province. Of course, it may be difficult at times to conciliate provincial autonomy with all the social measures which this parliament is called upon to adopt, but care should be taken not to deprive the provinces of their rights, because, in my opinion, they are sacred and are the foundation of the structure of our constitution. Moreover, this autonomist feeling is certainly shared by the majority of our people throughout the country, and it is quite natural. As a matter of fact, if we are asked to state our preferences, we immediately think of our birthplace, of the places where we have spent our childhood, then of our district, of the region where we live, then of the province to which we belong. Therefore, in the matter of federal legislation, enactments must necessarily take into account the autonomy of the various provinces so that their rights may at all times be entirely respected.

Mr. Speaker, we are faced at present with another very acute problem to which I believe the federal authorities should give immediate attention. I refer to the status of young men who are on the blacklists of the Department of National Defence. I am concerned with those who, for some reason or other, did not answer the call to service or who, perhaps for some excellent reason, did not report for duty after having obtained leave from the military authorities.

Mr. Speaker, the war is over and it seems to me the federal government should show leniency and generosity. It should see to it that these young men are not treated as criminals and hunted down as they are at the present time. As an example I need only to relate what happened last week in my county, in the parish of Chateau-Richer. During the night of September 12 the military police raided the parish and forced their way into private homes. Let me mention a pitiful case. The military police forced their way into the home of a sick woman to search the premises, with the result that this woman is now seriously ill in the hospital.

Mr. Speaker, such a situation should be ended. These young men who are not criminals, but who may have broken the laws of the country in wartime, should no longer be pursued. To-day, now that the war is over, we should consider giving them the benefit of an amnesty. Besides, the Liberal members should have no trouble in understanding my request, as I could refer them to the speeches they made in 1919. At that time, after the last war, when the government kept on hunting down the recruits, as we se it done to-day, the members of the opposition of the time clamoured for, and rightly so, the amnesty of the so-called deserters.

These questions may come up again for discussion during this session, but I thought I would bring them to-day to the attention of the house and particularly of the government.

Mr. ALDERIC LAURENDEAU (Berthier-Maskinonge) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, it is customary for the hon. members of this house, at the beginning of a new parliament, to congratulate the Speaker on his election. I do so with much pleasure because he is a personal friend of mine who has had something to do with my entrance into public life, and who has studied in the same college and the same university. I am pleased to see him again to-day in the post which he now occupies in this house. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that you will preside over the debates of this house with tactfulness and judgment and that, true to Liberal traditions, you will give your rulings with justice and to the satisfaction of all members of this house.

I also wish to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

Now, Mr. Speaker, allow me to take up another subject. We have all seen in the newspapers, not long ago, that the smallest known part of matter, the atom, had been split with the resulting discovery of a tremendous war weapon intended for the destruction of humanity. A few days or weeks later, the newspapers informed us that the new weapon had saved thousands of human lives, however paradoxical that may appear. We have also read that great plants and splendid laboratories had been built for research work in that connection, and that scientists from all allied countries, and even some of German origin, along with others from Britain, the United States and even Canada, which fact honours us, had all had a share in that discovery. We find that this research work was achieved through cooperation to the best advantage of mankind. The point I wish to make, Mr. Speaker, is that it was absolutely logical that research work should be carried out in war time in order to save civilization. Now that peace has been restored however, I wonder whether those same studies could not be made on the human cell. We, physicians, do know the morphology of the human cell. Without entering into medical details, I say we know that this cell which is the basis of all the organs and tissues of the human body, multiplies itself while modifying its shape; this proliferation produces a malignant growth which reaches such proportions that it becomes necessary for the patient to consult his physician. In the great number of cases, I do not say in all cases, the physician diagnoses cancer. It is the death toll for the patient for, I must admit, to the confusion of the medical profession, that we know of no specific treatment for cancer and that we do not even possess any recognized symptom of incipient cancer. I know by experience, that ever since I have been in the practice of medicine, though I have no accurate data to offer, this disease has been on the increase, at least in my district. I need not describe the sufferings of the patients. I know of no disease more painful than certain cases of cancer. I have personally administered doses of seven to eight grains of morphine to relieve for a few hours the sufferings of a patient who was doomed. It is a fine thing to enact laws for the welfare and comfort of our citizens but of what avail will those laws be unless we enjoy good health. I therefore urge the government to set up as soon as possible a world organization equipped with the finest laboratories similar to those which were used in the discovery of the atomic bomb and to enlist the services of learned medical men from all countries so that through such total and complete world cooperation they may save mankind from the atrocious sufferings of this terrible scourge and find a cure for it.

I now wish to congratulate the government for its splendid social laws which lean toward a fair and moderate socialism. I congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) for having given us the Family Allowances Act. Therein, as in my previous comparisons, the family is considered as the foundation cell of society and when you protect that cell the nation is happy. I congratulate the government for having included in its programme the health insurance act. This is another social measure which will help to raise our national standard of living. Mr. Speaker, for over a quarter of a century I have been in contact with human sufferings and I know that very often when a mother is told: "Your child must be operated on", the financial resources of the majority of our good Canadian families are not sufficient to allow them to go to such an expense and for this reason the child is not operated on immediately and its health becomes more and more impaired. That is an example of the benefits which will accrue from this new social legislation laid down by the administration of the Right Hon. Mr. King. Some may object that we have a law of public assistance; I will not discuss it. I know by practical experience that it has not been satisfactory to the public. I am ready to assist the government with all the means at my disposal in cooperation with the medical associations, so that this legislation will be put into force as soon as possible.

I also wish to congratulate in a special way the Liberal administration of this country for having promised a national flag in the speech from the throne, a symbol which will rally every man of good will wishing to work in a spirit of cooperation for a greater, a more beautiful and more prosperous Canada. I would like to see expressed on this emblem in a tanglible way the symbols of our race and of our survival.

I wish to avail myself of this opportunity to declare on the floor of this house and before my colleagues that I am a sincere Catholic and in doing so, I think I am voicing the sentiments of every French-Canadian member and of the citizens of every other race in this country. I want the government to understand that if we have fought this war in order to protect our civilization, our way of thinking and of living and our democracy, we have also done so to safeguard our language and protect our faith. In order to ensure national unity, I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the deep religious feelings of the French Canadians be clearly symbolized on the new Canadian flag, as well as in the splendid improvement projects of the cities of Ottawa and Hull which the government intends to undertake as a legacy to future generations. Then, Mr. Speaker, you shall see the French Canadians of to-morrow defend their new flag with the same courage, energy and love that our forefathers displayed for the French flag, in the early days of the colony.

The government also suggests the adoption of a national anthem as a complement to the flag. I feel that the most appropriate national anthem would be the splendid Canadian song, "O Canada", written by Calixa Lavallée, and I believe that all Canadians would unanimously agree to its acceptance.

I may not be a talented speaker, but I have a practical outlook on life and I believe my suggestions are the expression of the sound aspirations, the deep feelings and the sincere religious convictions of all Canadians anxious to promote national unity.

(Text): And now, Mr. Speaker, I cannot close my remarks without congratulating our good friend, the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), upon the friendly sentiments he has expressed toward my fellow citizens, the French-speaking Canadians. I wish, in the interest of the welfare of Canada, that hon. members on both sides of the house would follow his example.

On motion of Mr. Reid the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, September 20, 1945.

The house met at three o'clock.

PRISONERS OF WAR

REPATRIATION FROM THE FAR EAST—ARRANGEMENTS FOR RETURN OF CIVILIANS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) asked me some days ago if I would give to the house a statement with respect to the repatriation of Canadian prisoners of war and civilians in the far east, letting the house have such information as would help to bring the position up to date. The statement I have to make is as follows:

All Canadian prisoners of war liberated at Hong Kong have, with one exception, been evacuated to Manila, where they are awaiting transportation to Canada. The exception is the case of one man whose lack of strength at the moment rendered it inadvisable for him to be removed.

Some 500 Canadian prisoners of war liberated in Japan have been evacuated, half to Manila and half to Guam. As of September 20, 1,086 prisoners of war have been officially reported safe in allied hands. Thirty-two liberated prisoners have already reached Canada and nineteen more are known to be on their way.

Brigadier Kay, Canadian Military Attache at Chungking, having completed his mission at Hong Kong, is now returning to Chungking.

Satisfactory reports on the progress of the liberation of Canadian civilians are being received. As was announced yesterday, a small group of eleven Canadian missionaries has already reached Oakland, California. Official word has been received of the liberation of 200 of the 600 known Canadian civilians. A list of these was recently given to the press. Some of the 600 are missionaries and persons who made their homes in the east and who may wish to stay there. On the other hand, there are a number of Canadians who are not known to us and a number of British subjects not included who will be coming to Canada to join their families here.

As reported in the press, Mr. E. H. Norman, of the Department of External Affairs, accompanied by two other officers of the department, has set up headquarters in Manila to look after arrangements for the relief and repatriation of Canadian civilians. They have been joined by two officers of the Canadian Red Cross whose primary function will be to look after the welfare of Canadian civilians.

It is hoped that the larger proportion of prisoners of war and civilians will be transported direct to Vancouver and arrangements have been made there by all the departments concerned, together with the Canadian Red Cross, for their reception. However, a certain number will arrive at United States west coast ports. The army has made arrangements for the reception of liberated prisoners of war and the Department of External Affairs has sent an officer to San Francisco who will be in touch with the United States authorities at all ports and with British consuls. The Canadian trade commissioner at Los Angeles will assist in the handling of any Canadians who may arrive there. In addition, the Canadian Red Cross will station one or two officers at San Francisco and will send on other personnel as may be needed from time to time.

All prisoners of war and civilians arriving at United States west coast ports and destined for Canada will be sent to Vancouver. Provisions for medical care and for the supply of clothing, comforts and small luxuries are being made by the services for prisoners of war and by the Canadian Red Cross for civilians at all points where they are likely to arrive.

The Canadian government has informed the United Kingdom that the Canadian authorities and the Canadian Red Cross will be glad to afford every assistance possible for the repatriation of liberated United Kingdom prisoners of war and United Kingdom civilians from the far east who may be repatriated by way of Canada. If shipping facilities across the Pacific make it possible for the United Kingdom to make use of this route, large numbers of repatriates destined for the United Kingdom may arrive at Vancouver and be transported across Canada.

WHEAT

POLICY WITH RESPECT TO FLOOR PRICE—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

Mr. P. E. WRIGHT (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bentley), the adjournment of the house under standing order 31, for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the government's policy with respect to a floor price under wheat as announced by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and its effect upon the income of the farmers of western Canada.

In support of the urgency of this matter, Mr. Speaker, I would beg leave to point out to you that this may mean a possible decline of thirty-five per cent in the purchasing power and income of a large area of our agricultural industry.

Mr. MACKENZIE: On a point of order, the hon. member cannot debate his motion now.

Mr. WRIGHT: Therefore I believe it is a matter of urgent public importance.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is asking leave to make a motion for the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance. I must draw the attention of the hon. member to the fact that this question is already before hon. members in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. It is the privilege of every hon. member to make any suggestion and any recommendation to the government, and to discuss any matter which comes under government responsibility; therefore I do not see any urgency and cannot allow the motion to be made.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to dispute your ruling, but I should like you to reconsider the ruling in the light of the circumstances—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Order.

Mr. COLDWELL: —in which this house may be placed from time to time. Under such a ruling almost anything that an hon. member wished to place before the house could be ruled out.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is not debatable.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must say to the hon. member that I have already rendered my decision and it is not debatable.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am not disputing it, but I am asking for reconsideration.

CONSULTATION WITH FARMER ORGANIZATIONS AS TO SETTING OF PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. BURTON (Humboldt): Did the government confer with any farmer organizations in regard to the setting of the price of wheat, announced yesterday by the Minister of Trade and Commerce? If so, what organizations were consulted? Further, did anyone agree to it, on behalf of the organized farmers?

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. gentleman to be good enough to place his question on the order paper.

REQUEST THAT 1945 BE DECLARED A CROP FAILURE YEAR IN ALBERTA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): Would the Minister of Agriculture say whether or not it is the intention of the government to declare the present year a crop failure year in the province of Alberta?

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not see any urgency in the question of the hon. member. It should be placed on the order paper.

BARLEY

MEASURES TO COUNTERACT REDUCED YIELD IN WESTERN PROVINCES

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the house and before you proceed with the next item I should like to read a statement on barley which I promised to the house yesterday.

Due to drought conditions extending over the greater part of the crop growing areas of western Canada the yield of barley has been greatly reduced and action has been taken to counteract this condition so that the live stock production programme of Canada will not be jeopardized.

In order to protect Canada's live stock feeding programme and because of the short crop of barley, the agricultural supplies board is of the opinion that all barley marketed in 1945-46 from the 1945 crop should be made available for the domestic market. With this in mind the feeds administrator advised the grain trade on August 22 last that no further export permits would be granted during the crop year 1945-46 for barley, whether whole, ground or processed.

To enable farmers to purchase and feed the higher grades of barley, some of which would normally receive a premium, when sold to domestic maltsters or exported, it has been decided as a temporary measure to add five cents to the advance equalization payment, thus raising the amount from fifteen cents to twenty cents per bushel on all barley marketed in the prairie provinces, the Peace River block of British Columbia and Creston-Wyndall area, British Columbia, during the crop year 1945-46. This increase will be made retroactive to August 1, 1945, on all barley delivered and sold since July 31, 1945, without receiving the malting premium. If any barley has been marketed and sold since that date without receiving the full five cents per bushel premium, then payment will be made up to the five cents. Regulations in this regard will shortly be released by the Canadian wheat board and these regulations will fix the effective date for payment at country points of the twenty cent advance equalization payments as farmers deliver their barley.

These regulations will also change the present methods of payment of malting premiums by domestic maltsters. Instead of paying the malting premiums to the seller of the barley, the maltsters will be required to pay five cents per bushel on all barley purchased into the equalization fund. The same system of paying the premium into the equalization fund will be used by exporters, if the assurance of domestic supplies will permit the export of some barley later in the crop year. The effect is, therefore, that the increase in the equalization payment replaces for the present crop year the malting premium that would otherwise have been paid to some farmers on barley sold to domestic maltsters or exported.

To further safeguard the feed situation throughout Canada, the present policy of holding reserve stocks of feed grains at Fort William and in eastern Canada, on which the government pays interest and storage charges, has been extended to cover part of the prairie provinces and British Columbia.

Mr. SENN: Is it the intention of the government to continue the freight assistance policy for the movement of feed grain to the eastern parts of Canada during the year?

Mr. GARDINER: As I remember it, the present position is that the order in council authorizing that assistance earlier provides for the payments until further announcements are made, and there has been no announcement made of any change with regard to this year.

Mr. LOCKHART: Is this subsidy, if that is what you call it, to apply to eastern as well as western barley?

Mr. GARDINER: This provision has to do with the control of the barley crop in the western part of Canada.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

SURVEY OF POST-WAR EMPLOYMENT PROSPECTS—REPORT OF INTERDEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): May I direct a question to the Minister of Labour, of which I sent him notice earlier to-day. Will the minister table the interim or completed report of the survey on post-war employment prospects made by his department last year, which on March 23 last he stated was incomplete? Further, will he also table the report which I understand was made in August last by an interdepartmental committee, appraising employment prospects in war and civilian industry.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I want to thank my hon. friend for giving me notice of this question; but I think he will agree that it has become an established precedent in this house that memoranda submitted to a minister by officials of his department are not subject to being tabled.

Mr. COLDWELL: Were they memoranda, or were they surveys?

HOUSING

BUILDING MATERIALS PRIORITY FOR SOLDIERS' HOUSES IN ALBERTA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. PATRICK H. ASHBY (Edmonton East): In view of the serious shortage of building materials in Alberta, will the government empower and authorize the local emergency shelter administration in Edmonton to commandeer what supplies are available and give priority for their release to returned men where houses cannot be completed before winter sets in unless such action is taken?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): The distribution of lumber is handled by the timber controller, and there is quite an organization responsible for that distribution. I feel quite certain that to have another authority intervene, even in one province, would lead to confusion; therefore I believe the present system, which we are trying to perfect as much as possible, is the only feasible method of handling the situation.

Mr. ASHBY: Then may I ask a further question. In view of the serious shortage of plumbing and other building materials in Alberta, will the minister say whether the air force station at Penhold could be dismantled and the material made available for the construction of houses in Edmonton for returned men? I am informed that sufficient material would be thus made available for all their needs.

Mr. HOWE: That is not a question which could be answered on the orders of the day, because it will be necessary to obtain information from my officers and, as a matter of fact, from another government department. I suggest that the question be placed on the order paper.

PLUMBING MATERIALS FOR CONSTRUCTION OF SOLDIERS' HOUSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. NORMAN J. A. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): A day or so ago I directed a question to the minister in this same connection. I thought perhaps a statement might be made as to whether or not this material is available, because houses are being held up waiting for equipment. It seemed to me a statement in this house would be timely in order that the people might know the situation.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): I gave an extensive answer to that question when I spoke in the house on Monday last. Perhaps if the hon. gentleman will read my speech he will find the answer there.

Mr. LOCKHART: The minister said, "No, no, no," but this equipment is lying idle.

[Mr. Ashby.]

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Arising out of the last question I should like to ask: might we be informed what the question was, and what was the answer?

Mr. IRVINE: Put your question on the order paper.

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY

QUESTION AS TO TRANSFER OF CONTROLS TO PRICES AND TRADE BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Are the controls that have been carried on by the Department of Munitions and Supply being transferred to the wartime prices and trade board?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): The controls carried on by the Department of Munitions and Supply have to do with scarcity, and those controls are not being transferred. Some of the controllers often act for the wartime prices and trade board as administrators of prices; they are subject to a dual jurisdiction, and that situation is not changed. If the scarcity control ends, the price control is left where it always has been, as the responsibility of the wartime prices and trade board.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

HOSPITAL ACCOMMODATION IN TORONTO

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): May I direct the attention of the Minister of Veterans Affairs to a report which appeared in the newspapers this morning in regard to the serious shortage in accommodation available at Christie street hospital, and the lack of sufficient staff to deal with the situation? I should like to ask the minister if he will make a statement in the house shortly dealing with the whole subject, and with particular reference to the progress being made in the construction of Sunnybrook hospital.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I shall be very glad to take my hon. friend's question under advisement.

MEAT RATIONING

AVAILABLE SUPPLIES, STOCK FOR SLAUGHTER, AND SHIPPING CONDITIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): On Tuesday I asked the Minister of Finance if he would be good enough to consider making a statement to this house with regard to the meat supply in the country, the possibilities in regard to stock for slaughter, and the shipping situation, in order that we in this house might understand the position. I am not opposing rationing, but I should like to get the information with which to answer many of the inquiries that are coming to me

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I read in Hansard the remarks of my hon. friend, and I am considering whether I should make a brief speech during this debate, if it lasts long enough, to put some of this information on Hansard.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Wednesday, September 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. M. Benidickson for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Bracken, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, in complimenting you upon your election to the high office of Speaker of this house let me also commend you for having drawn to the attention of hon. members the rule prohibiting the reading of speeches. If I am to judge by past years your task is not going to be an easy one; and as one of the twenty-five or so hon. members who have sat in the house since 1930 or prior to that year I await with some interest your enforcement of the rule, after the new members have made their maiden speeches.

We on this side may be pardoned if we seem to take pleasure at the return of the Liberal government to office in Canada after six years of war. It is a unique record in the political life of any government, and I think it well that we take note of the fact that in no other country has the government been returned after holding office during war-time. This government is faced with a difficult task in the period which lies ahead of us; but, as was pointed out by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) our plans are being well and truly laid, and in fact are further ahead than those of any other country in the world to-day.

Much has been said about Canada's enviable record, and the splendid contribution in men and material this country has made toward the defeat of Germany and Japan. Another record has also been made, one which to my mind will be of great help during the critical years lying ahead, and that is that this country for the first time has undertaken a great financial effort through and by its own people. We have not borrowed, nor have we had lend-lease; yet billions of dollars have been expended, all of which have been contributed by the Canadian people.

In an endeavour to be as brief as possible it is my intention to touch upon only one or two matters. In the speech from the throne the matter of a Canadian flag was touched upon, and has been discussed by some hon. members. I think more people in Canada to-day will welcome the fact that the government has decided to have a Canadian flag. If the choice were left to me I could see none better than the one which flies above the parliament buildings. The red ensign is beautiful and distinctive, and carries all those symbols which I believe would please all groups in Canada. Certainly it is more striking than the flags of either New Zealand or Australia—and I shall refer to those countries later. If I were to change anything on the red ensign it would be to place thereon the maple leaf, something which I suggest might be done to good advantage. Now that we have decided to have a distinctive flag, I trust that any discussions in regard thereto will be free from recriminations from any section of the country.

Mention has been made of old age pensions. While I had not intended discussing that subject in this debate, I must say I was disappointed in the proposals for the betterment of the present old age pension plan, as outlined by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Claxton). I should like to see something more, and to have heard proposed a proper contributory system, retiring everyone who so desired at the age of sixty-five years. Under such a system, any person receiving the benefits would receive them by right rather than as a matter of charity.

I have one criticism to offer. When members of the C.C.F. party deal with social security measures, and proceed to tell what has been done in other lands, for reasons best known to themselves invariably they do not tell their audiences that in most of those countries, if not all, the people or the workers involved make a direct contribution toward the social security provided. By that omission they leave the impression that the money comes from the state as a whole; whereas, if one will look at the record concerning most countries, and particularly Great Britain, New Zealand and Australia, they will find that the people there, and especially the workers, pay in large measure—and, Mr. Speaker, as I shall show in a minute or two, they pay plenty.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) referred the other evening to conditions in New Zealand. Before proceeding to dissect his remarks may I point out that if we are to have discussions in Canada about New Zealand or Australia, and if it is to be suggested by any party that the policies in those countries are the ones we should follow, then I say for any sake let us have all the facts, not just part of them. I am prepared to discuss the facts, as I know them, from official records of New Zealand.

Mrs. STRUM: Is the hon. member aware that New Zealand began as early as 1939 to pay old age pensions at the age of sixty?

Mr. REID: If the hon. member were to read my past speeches about New Zealand, she would find that I am perfectly well aware of the social measures of that country. What I have said is on the record.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre mentioned first of all, the price of food. If hon. members will recall, or will look at Hansard, they will find that I interjected, and that the hon. member was good enough to take his seat to permit me to ask a question. I asked him, if food was cheaper in New Zealand, what were the farmers receiving?—because, after all, it is they who produce the food. Let me assure hon. members, however, that when one is dealing with percentages he finds that at times they do not always reveal the complete picture. Be that as it may, in the cost of living index for New Zealand it is shown that the cost of food is only some 29·52 per cent of the entire living costs. The remaining 70 per cent is made up of manufactured goods, including rents, all of which must be paid for. Those manufactured goods purchased by the people of New Zealand cost from two to four times as much as the same articles in Canada.

Not only are lower prices paid to New Zealand farmers, but their labour costs are higher, and the farm machinery they use—the same kind used in Canada—costs far more than the same machinery would cost in this country. Had I the time I would be prepared to talk costs in dollars and cents. Sometimes, I realize, that is not always a complete picture; but I could tell the house what farmers have to pay in butter, wheat and eggs for farm machinery in New Zealand, as compared with what like machinery would cost in Canada.

Mr. KNOWLES: Would the hon. member give the source of the information he is now giving the house?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The New Zealand year book.

Mr. MacINNIS: Where did you get it?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I will lend you a copy.

Mr. MacINNIS: You are not making the speech.

Mr. SPEAKER: Again I must call the attention of hon. members to the fact that when a member is addressing the house no interruption can be allowed without his permission.

Mr. IRVINE: We have a right to know the source of the hon. member's information.

Mr. TUCKER: Oh, you are the only people who know anything, probably.

Mr. COLDWELL: We want its source.

Mr. REID: This speech seems to be a thorn in the flesh of the group now interrupting, because they have been speaking so much on the subject, and do not like to hear an answer. Now we find that an hon. member asks for the source of information before I have given that information.

Mr. KNOWLES: We want the source of the information you have already given.

Mr. REID: Well, wait until I give it—and if there is going to be a free-for-all, then all I ask is that they come one at a time.

Mr. KNOWLES: As you did the other night?

Mr. REID: I am sorry, but the other evening I asked a real question, as the hon. member knows.

At the last session, information with regard to taxes in New Zealand was put on the record by myself, and so I shall not weary the house by repeating it; in any event I have not the time to do so now. But the amount paid in New Zealand for income tax is set out in a speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) which I hope every member will accept as official. I am sure that will be good enough authority. He gave the information last year when he brought down his budget, and it can be found in Hansard.

Let me now put on the record just what the man in New Zealand has to pay for his social security measures—because some hon. members are leaving the impression that what is done in New Zealand is done without any direct contribution from the people. First of all, everyone employed pays five per cent on his wages, and seven and one-half per cent for war tax, making a total of twelve and one-half per cent deduction from his wages or salary as a start. Then each year he has to pay £1, or $3.60, as a registration fee. There is also a sales tax of twenty per cent, and another item which may interest some hon. members, although it does not interest me—a tax on beer of nine cents per pint. If a man in New Zealand drives a car, he pays twenty-five cents per gallon on the gasoline used, and if he owns a radio he has nearly $6 per year to pay. There are, I believe, other taxes, but perhaps these examples will be sufficient for the moment. I hope that people in this country when they hear these members talking about New Zealand will do what I have done—investigate and find out for themselves what is being done in that country. If they do, they will hesitate a long time before they elect the C.C.F. to office. We are hearing a lot of what if I were outside the house I would call loose talking, but as I am in the house I will say it is just piffle.

An hon. MEMBER: You are right in your own line.

Mr. REID: If you want me to tell the line you should be in I can do so. The C.C.F. talk about more social security and a reduction of taxation. In New Zealand—we are keeping to New Zealand because the C.C.F. introduced it, and I am glad they did—it is a matter of soaking the low wage earner and letting the man in the higher brackets off as far as income tax is concerned.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is why they vote for the Labour party.

Mr. REID: We will likely hear plenty about the Labour party. I said that we would not hear much about New Zealand after I made my last speech in the house, and I was quite right. Is it any wonder that the leader of the opposition in New Zealand, whose remarks must be taken to be just as authentic as those of the opposition to this government, who says that in New Zealand the farmer is the forgotten man? The Labour government of New Zealand are becoming perturbed about the farmer because they realize that the stranglehold they have on him and the things they have done to him are not going to last much longer. I ask hon. members to note what is now taking place in New Zealand. The New Zealand Labour government, which has few, if any, farmer cabinet ministers, are now out to take some representation away from the farmer constituencies. At the last election the farmers nearly outvoted them and so it appears that before the next election comes along the New Zealand government plans to reduce the representation of the farmer constituencies so that the balance of power will be held by those in the cities.

Many people in this country are carefully watching the new government which was elected in Great Britain. I came from that country in my early days, and it is my humble opinion that the people of Great Britain will take less during the serious days that lie ahead with better grace from a Labour government than they would do from a Conservative or even a Liberal government. Probably that is all to the good. Have you noticed however, the change in the attitude of certain people in this country and the United States since the Labour government was elected? We did not hear much about Great Britain from the C.C.F. members in this house before the war, although we heard a great deal against the British empire and the British commonwealth of nations. Hon. friends opposite now seem to have a kindly feeling toward the British government. This has arisen only since the election in Great Britain.

Be that as it may, I am going to quote what one of the cabinet ministers in that Labour government had to say. I ask hon. members to note the dissimilarity between the policies of the Labour government in Great Britain and those of the C.C.F. in this country. I quote from the Ottawa Journal of September 5, which contains a report of a speech made by Herbert Morrison to the national conference of labour. The article is headed "Nationalization no 'magic cure', says Morrison".

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. REID: I am glad hon. members say "hear, hear". The article says:

> The test of success will be whether those industries will be better run, whether they will show a steady increase in technical efficiency and public spirit from top to bottom.

And then later on:

> Morrison warned that if people in industry —both labour and management—lose their spirit of enterprise, then the new Labour government will be helpless and unable to better Britain's standard of living.

Mr. COLDWELL: What is wrong with that?

Mr. REID: Nothing. The labour men of Great Britain believe in free enterprise; they believe also in private enterprise and in profits. They talk of their taking over the Bank of England, but we did that in this country ten years or so ago. We are not behind the times here; we are abreast of the times, because we took over the Bank of Canada long ago. There are those who speak about the socialization of industry. That is what the C.C.F. have been talking about, and I should like to give another interesting picture. I quote from the Ottawa Journal of September 15, where reference is made to a report by Sir Keith Murdoch, who owns a number of newspapers in Australia and who I think is in a good position to discuss the affairs of that country. Here is what he said:

The annual money losses have been fantastic since 1915. They reached a zenith of £10,000,000 in 1931, and in the year before the war were still £2,750,000.

I trust I am speaking loud enough so that all will hear.

Socialism really got going in the state of Queensland and there many enterprises were socialized. During the period of state operation they lost:

£1,669,804 plus £324,000 uncharged interest on cattle stations and closed them down.

£28,014 plus £3,396 uncharged interest on butchers' shops.

£143,000 on a cannery.

Then follows a long list of other socialized industries which they now have let go back into private hands.

Mr. COLDWELL: What country is the hon. gentleman speaking about?

Mr. REID: Australia.

Mr. COLDWELL: A Labour government in power two years.

Mr. REID: In that country they have states just as we have provinces. I say this because we are now having socialized industries tried out in Saskatchewan, where they have gone into the brickyard and other businesses. I am interested in that brickyard and will want to know how it turns out, and other socialist ventures, too.

The experience of other states in Australia has been about the same. Let me give a few of the high points. The state of Victoria had a socialist mine, the product of which was wholly taken over by the government. That mine always had a loss. After four years it had a total loss of one million pounds.

New South Wales, another state in Australia, took over a coal mine, and charged two shillings and sixpence a ton more for their coal, yet they are losing something like £300 per week.

Mr. GILLIS: A worn-out operation before they took it over.

Mr. REID: Sir Keith was asked the reason for these failures, and this should be of interest to the people of Canada. I quote:

Why then have these socialist ventures failed in Australia? Sir Keith says that many of the Australian enterprises had capable managers who knew their business. The failure was due to other causes. Sir Keith puts them into a few paragraphs:

"Australians . . . are, alas, so very human that, when governments have gone into industry, those concerned have used their unions and their pressure politics, their votes and their influence to get personal advantages."

And again after observing that managers and executives were capable, he says, "They have been powerless against constant political interference, leading to over-development, over-capitalization and faulty finance."

And finally:

To-day nearly all these state enterprises are back in the hands of private enterprise after having proven inefficient and a huge drain on the taxpayers.

In fact to-day it is open to question whether Australia has more state enterprises than Canada, and they are not as successful as those in Canada. From what I know, Mr. Speaker, they are not nearly so successful as the government enterprises we have in Canada. I thought it advisable, in view of what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said in introducing this subject, that I should put the other side of the picture before the people of this country. In passing, if we are going to discuss these questions, I say let us have the entire picture. I do not want to be accused as I was on former occasions, of intending by my remarks anything derogatory to the people or the country of New Zealand, but I do feel that when a party in this house is constantly dangling before the people of Canada what New Zealand has been able to accomplish, we ought to know just what the facts are. These hon. gentlemen have been pointing to New Zealand with pride for three or four years, but before the people of this country turn over all they have to an untried socialist government, I say we should know what the actual facts are about New Zealand and Australia.

Mr. KNOWLES: Will the hon. member permit a straightforward question?

Mr. REID: Certainly.

Mr. KNOWLES: I asked it once before, but perhaps the hon. member did not hear it. Will he give the house the source of the information about New Zealand that he has placed on Hansard this afternoon? I have before me the official New Zealand Year Book, and my hon. friend's information does not tally with the official record.

Mr. REID: I think that is a fair question. The last time I spoke on this subject I stated, in answer to a question put by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), that I was quoting from the official New Zealand Year Book, the latest edition obtainable in the library, and the figures I gave of income tax comparisons I took from the speech which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) made in the house last year. I have already given the source of the information which I quoted to-day.

Mr. KNOWLES: Oh, no.

Mr. COLDWELL: Just newspaper reports, Lord Beaverbrook's.

Mr. KNOWLES: The hon. member gave us the sources he says he used last year, but he has not stated the sources of the figures he has given the house to-day.

Mr. REID: These statements come from New Zealand, and most of the information from the statement of the Hon. Mr. Nash, the finance minister of that country. He dealt at great length with their social security measures and the payments which workers and the people were called upon to pay to support these socialist ventures. I have a copy of it here. I think that when the Minister of Finance gives these figures they should be accepted as authentic. Who could give a truer picture than the minister of finance?

Mr. COLDWELL: It does not sound to me like one of Mr. Nash's speeches and I have read many of them.

Mr. REID: I shall be pleased some time to show the hon. member the documents.

Mr. KNOWLES: Send them across.

Mr. REID: Not until I am through. You do not catch me like that. I know that old game.

It was not my intention, Mr. Speaker, to say one word about the Japanese this afternoon, but the subject has been introduced into this debate. I have one question to propound to the member for Winnipeg North Centre, who spoke of the great deeds of the men of the Winnipeg regiment, who are now returning from Hong Kong. When it comes to the time to dispose of the Japanese in Canada, I am just wondering whether my hon. friend would leave the decision in that matter to those Winnipeg men who are returning from Hong Kong. If he would not, I would like him to tell the house why these men should not have some say in this matter. I do not want these words of mine, Mr. Speaker, to be twisted around outside this house, as they have been before, to make it appear that I nurse some racial hatred against the Japanese. Those are tactics that have been resorted to in the past; they could not discount the arguments that we put up, so they talked of racial hatred.

May I say to those who have become the champions of the Japanese in this country, that I would be willing to abide by the vote of the people of British Columbia; and if that is not the democratic way to settle it, I would like to hear why it is not. I would like to be told a better way. I am sure that if this question were left to a vote of the people of British Columbia there would be no doubt as to what would be done with the Japanese in this country.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): Who brought them here?

Mr. REID: Not I, sir.

In closing I want to say one word about the atomic bomb. I think Canada has been rather too timid and backward in not seeking to take some credit for the development of the atomic bomb. Canada supplied the minerals, the scientists and other kinds of help in its development, and we are just as much entitled to credit, if credit is due, as is the United States. If I had my way, though, I would not divulge the secret of the atomic bomb to any other country, because if we pass the information around it is going to be more difficult indeed to keep it a secret. God forbid that there should be another war! But who can tell? When one looks round at the multitudes of people in the various countries some of whom are beginning to arm, I think that from a practical point of view we should keep that secret to ourselves, because the day may come when we may have to use it again.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, in opening my remarks to-day may I, as so many others have done, congratulate you on your appointment to the high office which you now hold, and may I say that judging from the manner in which you have fulfilled the duties of your office since the opening of the house, I am convinced you will preside over our deliberations not only with fairness but with quiet dignity and kindliness; that means so much to every member in the chamber. I believe you are a worthy successor to our former Speaker, the present minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen), who also possessed these gracious attributes in a very large measure.

The attitude of the government in this debate has taken quite a change during the last few days. When the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) rose to reply to the speech of my leader, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken), he acted as though there were nothing to answer—nothing had been brought out that was even worth answering. He went on to boast a bit about the election results, and I could not help admiring his nerve in doing so. Here we have a government which had approximately half its supporters defeated in a general election, now holding office by the support of a group of members who were formerly independent, a group who have shown considerable facility in changing their political coat, a group who will not be very comforting people to have behind one in a pinch, and yet the Prime Minister says: "Oh, well; we won a great election; what is there to complain about? Let us get on with the business of the house."

A few days after that, on Friday last to be exact, the Prime Minister went to his new riding of Glengarry. Apparently he is going to keep up his political fences a little better this time than he did in the last parliament. He went to the annual fair, and according to the press he made certain statements. He is reported as follows.

Mr. King said that the three most important things facing Canada to-day were demobilization, employment and housing.

So that so far as he at least is concerned the amendment offered by the official opposition has had some effect.

Now I notice that the ministers are being smoked out of their holes; they are coming out and making statements, and the whole attitude of the government is not at all as smug as it was a few days ago. I suggest they would be very well advised not to try to assume that smug attitude at any time from now on until the end of this parliament, because they are very much under the observation not only of members on this side of the house but also of the Canadian people.

I have mentioned the main facts set out in our amendment. Let me read the amendment again for the benefit of all our friends to the left. I do not see how any one of them who is dissatisfied with the government's progress on the questions mentioned in the amendment can conscientiously vote against it. I quote:

We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that Your Excellency's advisers have:

(a) failed to demobilize our armed forces on a fair basis and, in particular, have failed to prevent serious disadvantage to overseas service personnel;

(b) failed to provide a speedy and effective plan of reconversion from war to peace, and failed in particular to join in partnership with labour and industry in devising a workable scheme to provide jobs, with fair wages, for discharged service personnel and war workers;

(c) failed to take adequate and timely action to meet the ever-mounting housing crisis.

To-day I propose to say a few words about demobilization and housing, to emphasize two features of reconversion which have not yet been dealt with to any extent in this debate, and to conclude with some remarks on Canada's policy or lack of policy in the Pacific.

First of all, demobilization. Our amendment sets out the position of members of the Progressive Conservative party, and it has been adequately dealt with by various speakers from our party. But yesterday there appeared in the press certain statements from overseas which I think require an explanation from the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Abbott). They deal with the repatriation of N.R.M.A. troops overseas. They allege that N.R.M.A. men who were forced to go abroad, and who were never in action, are being sent home ahead of men who fought. Apparently this is being done because these N.R.M.A. men have a high point score, most of such points earned by long service here at home in Canada.

This article quotes from the Amsterdam edition of Maple Leaf, which is a Canadian army newspaper and as such is entitled to the most careful consideration of every member of the house. The clipping says:

The editorial asked why National Resources Mobilization Act personnel who hadn't left the United Kingdom for Europe by V-E day now were returning home with the first division—

Not the fourth or the fifth division, if you please, but the first. It added that thirty-one per cent of a draft from the Saskatoon Light Infantry, support battalion of the first division, consisted of N.R.M.A. personnel. It went on to put the situation clearly:

This sort of business isn't funny. Men who volunteered to come overseas, who either went into action as volunteers or did their best as volunteers, to see that the fighting men were equipped with the necessaries deserve better treatment. This is an appeal on behalf of the volunteers who made the Canadian army an army of which to be proud. All that is wanted is justice.

That statement by the army paper seems very fair, and I think the government policy, if it is as alleged in the army paper, is very unfair. The Canadian people do not believe in a policy of that type. I suggest to the Prime Minister and his Minister of National Defence that the Canadian people from one coast to the other believe that N.R.M.A. troops who are available should be used for the army of occupation and that those still in Canada should be sent over to relieve the volunteers as soon as shipping can be arranged.

Then, housing. Like demobilization, it has been dealt with by those who have preceded me in this debate. I think it is largely a question of supplies. After all, we have everything here in Canada to build houses. The problem is to turn our resources into buildings. I advocate that the government should lead an all-out drive, the same sort of drive that enabled us to build ships and tanks. There is not yet any evidence that an all-out effort to solve this housing problem has been made. The government have many war plants; surely some of them could be put to use for the production of supplies and equipment needed for buildings. I see by this week's press that in the United States all restrictions on construction have been removed. Perhaps the time has arrived when that should be done in Canada too. The construction industry in Canada has always been a progressive and up-to-date industry. I know that is true in the west. Men engaged in building have always been a good deal ahead of most other industries, and I am sure that if they are given their heads, if they are given every encouragement, they can provide the buildings much more rapidly than buildings have been provided in the last few months. I agree that houses are the first need, but the need does not stop there. There is a great need for small stores. Hundreds of houses have been put up with no stores to service them. Office space is needed. Doctors being demobilized from the forces are unable to get offices. The same thing is true of other professional and business men. This question of building is going to be of vital importance to Canada for a long time to come.

So far as office space is concerned I suggest to the Prime Minister that he have a survey made of all the office space in Canada being used by governmental departments. I know in my city of Vancouver there are government departments scattered around in practically all the large office buildings; they are in the very best space available in the city. At the same time we have the government using the old Vancouver hotel as an army headquarters. I am quite sure that many of the governmental departments could be put into that hotel, thereby freeing large areas of office space. Probably the same condition exists in many other centres in Canada.

I now come to reconversion. The first feature of the reconversion plan is the complete and utter failure to consider the human factor. Let me take you to Vancouver. On V-J Day, August 14—and no doubt the situation was exactly the same in other cities in Canada—the people were rejoicing; everybody was happy because at last this terrible war had ended. Within forty-eight hours—in fact within twenty-four hours in many cases—thousands of our citizens were thrown out of work, not knowing where to turn. I think the minister responsible for that policy failed to realize its effect on the people. And, mind you, the Minister of Reconstruction said something the other night which shows that he deserves a lot of blame for that policy. At page 227 of Hansard he used these words:

> Personally I am the last man entitled to claim surprise at the end of the war, having known months in advance the approximate date of the use of the atomic bomb.

There might have been some excuse for him and his department if he had no idea when the war would end, but certainly the man on the street, the man in the war job, had no way of knowing that the war was about to end. He was being told by the press and public men that it would go on into 1946. There was not the slightest suggestion that it was about over. He had been making a great contribution; had considered himself a partner with his loved ones overseas. Remember that many of our fighting men came from families the heads of which were engaged in this war work. These people in war work were high-spirited; they had answered every appeal made by the government; they were paying heavy taxes with not much chance to save; many of them were putting what little they could save into houses and trying to become established; and then immediately after V-J Day they were thrown out of work. They were told to get out to the woods and the mines. Many of them were not physically fit to do so. Many of them, by this time skilled tradesmen, were told, "You go out and get a job in the woods." Very little sympathy was shown to them in official quarters. They were treated as though they were a commodity like lumber or steel; and, Mr. Speaker, that shook the confidence of the people in the whole reconversion plan of the government. It affected not only war workers but also men and women engaged in ordinary peace-time activities. Everybody was jittery. They said, "Am I going to lose my job too?" It had a bad effect on the morale of the people in our province; also it was a bad example to set for private employers; it gave the private employer an excuse to fire people in just the same way. I think it is a very serious matter that the official mind worked in this way, and if it worked in that way on V-J day it will do so again. To me that is a very serious matter. It might have been all right in 1939—I do not think it was, even at that time—but since then there has been a steadily increasing value placed on people, placed on the human factor. The whole trend has been in that direction. Take the trend of legislation passed in this house—the social security legislation; the whole trend has been to think of people before we think of material things and of wealth. The Atlantic charter promised freedom from fear and freedom from want. That is what the Canadian people expect. Instead, after V-J day they got this vindictive treatment; were thrown out of work without any warning. I suggest to the Prime Minister that is not good enough in 1945 from any government, federal, provincial or municipal.

It was not necessary. Other methods could have been used. The Minister of Reconstruction and other members of the government could have explained to the Canadian people that there was now a great need for men in the construction industry, in the woods and in the mines. They could have asked them to change over, to take these jobs in other industries. They could have called on the shipyards in Vancouver—and I use Vancouver only as an example—to release a certain number of construction workers, of miners, of loggers, and might have augmented their wages for a period of three or four months until these Canadians had become reestablished in other industries.

I also think some provision might have been made for the expense of moving, and there could have been a delay in the dismissals, rather than throwing people out by the thousands without any notice, as was done.

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member says, "without any notice". They were given seven days' notice.

Mr. GREEN: I was there; I know what happened. They were given seven days' pay and kicked out. That is what they were given. The picture is this: it was put clearly by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Merritt) in a speech I heard him make during the election campaign, and no one had a better right than he to make the statement. He said: "You can lead a Canadian anywhere, but you cannot drive him one inch." That should have been in the minds of the government in starting their reconversion plan.

Let me refer now to the second feature of the reconversion programme. The Minister of Reconstruction the other night used the words, "peace-time pattern of employment." What does that mean? It means that we either have or will have a pattern of employment for peace-time, a plan that will say which industries are to be maintained and which industries are to be allowed to die, that will say, as a result, where people are to get jobs. That decision is in the hands of the dominion government to a greater extent than ever before. They have these government plants; they have interests in other plants operated by private industry; they are placing many orders; they have great influence in marketing, in deciding where our goods are to be sold and what goods are to be sold; in producing and distributing materials; and through the industrial development bank. It is largely in the hands of the dominion government to-day to determine what industries are to be maintained in Canada and where the people will have to go to work. That pattern, if there is one, should be made public, for every portion of the country is vitally interested. Take as an example the people of British Columbia. We should know the pattern, should have a chance to discuss it with the government, and to take some steps at least to help maintain industries which we believe should be carried on into peacetime. Now we are working in the dark; there is too much uncertainty.

Let us look for a moment at the aircraft and shipbuilding industries in British Columbia. At one time the Boeing aircraft plant employed, either directly or through its subsidiaries, over ten thousand people. Men and women were working not only in Vancouver but in other centres throughout the province, doing a great job. In the United States the bulk of aircraft manufacturing is done on the Pacific slope; yet now in Canada that Boeing plant has been shut down. We would like to know whether it is the policy of this government to stop manufacturing aeroplanes on the Pacific coast and, if so, why that has been done.

At one time we had more than thirty-three thousand men engaged in shipbuilding in British Columbia, and in that province we turned out over seventy per cent of all the merchants ships produced by Canada. Many other subsidiary engineering industries were built up, and in fact industries of all kinds; many skilled workers were trained. Now there have been extensive lay-offs. There is some talk that in future our shipbuilding industry will have to go on a repair and maintenance basis, merely doing the repairing of ships. That happened after the last war. We had a flourishing shipbuilding industry on the Pacific coast then, but after the war it died. It is true that at present some government work is continuing, but there is no certainty about the future. This government has not announced any policy in regard to shipbuilding, and really there is no excuse for not having done so. In July of last year the Canadian shipbuilding and ship repairing association presented to the government a brief in connection with shipbuilding; various representations have been made by labour unions and by members of the last parliament; yet no one knows just what the shipbuilding policy is to be. Last September it was announced that an interdepartmental committee was being set up to review the proposals submitted by the shipbuilders. I do not know whether that interdepartmental committee has ever met. It was supposed to meet and then the shipbuilders were to be called in. Labour union leaders also should have been called in, but no promise ever was made that this would be done. Apparently there have been no results, although all this happened over a year ago. Now what do we see happening? The Canadian Pacific Railway Company, one of the firms which will be requiring many ships, is placing its orders in Great Britain. I have a press dispatch, dated August 28, to the effect that their first freighter already has been launched at Glasgow, and that three more are to be produced in Great Britain. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company will require many passenger ships, both for transoceanic service and for coastal service. The same is true of the Canadian National Railways. Is it the policy of this government that Canadian companies are to be required to use Canadian ships? We must have a peace-time pattern for both the aircraft and shipbuilding industries, and we must have it at an early date.

So much for the amendment of the official opposition. In conclusion I come to the question of Canada in the Pacific. The centre of world activities either is shifting or has already shifted from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Far-reaching decisions are being made in that area this very day. As an example take the decision as to what treatment is to be meted out to Japan. It seems clear that a very strong hand will be required. That is something which should be of concern to every Canadian. Press dispatches show so clearly the attitude being taken by the leaders of that country. I have here a press dispatch dated August 15, which tells of a Tokyo broadcast by the chief of the Japanese broadcasting corporation's overseas bureau, one Kusuo Oya, who was broadcasting to the troops on the fighting fronts telling them about the surrender. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) laughs; I have no doubt he has had to learn a great many Japanese names since he took over the administration of the Japanese in Canada.

Mr. MITCHELL: When you pronounced that name I said you were doing pretty well.

Mr. GREEN: This broadcast is significant, because here is what the man said:

> We have come to a point where it is useless to resist the enemy further. We have bowed to the enemy's material and scientific power. . . . We have lost, but this is temporary.

The press dispatch goes on to say:

> Oya added that Japan's mistake was the lack of "material strength, necessary scientific knowledge and equipment," and declared: "This mistake we must amend."

A few days later we had a dispatch in which the sultan of Johore quoted the former Japanese commander of Singapore as saying:

> We hope that peace will last for twenty years, and then we will be back here again.

Then General Wainwright, that heroic soldier who led the United States troops in their last stand on Corregidor, told the American people the other day that no soft peace must be given to the Japanese, and according to the press dispatch he stated that the Japanese—

> . . . are not sorry for what they have done to countless thousands. . . .
> They are not sorry for the torture they have inflicted. . . . It simply would not occur to them to be sorry, because they have done nothing which is at variance with their accepted philosophy.
>
> That is the point which should be clearly understood. I am a soldier and I do not pretend to know how long will be required or by what steps the bestial elements in their nature can be eradicated.
> But until we are assured that these qualities have been extinguished—not simply submerged—then the Japanese nation, powerless as it is to-day to make war, will remain a menace to our world.

A strong hand is needed with Japan, and Canada's voice should be heard. The Canadian flag should be flying in Japan to-day. Other nations are showing great interest in the Pacific. Here we have the United States planning now for bases in different parts of that ocean. Russia is edging in, having moved into Manchuria. I have a dispatch dated September 4, which reads:

> The Soviet Khabarovsk radio said to-day that Russia is planning a large scale development of her northeast Pacific coast and will build new harbours on the Kamchatka peninsula opposite Alaska.
> Khabarovsk also told men of the Red army that Russia would turn the twenty-odd islands of the former Japanese Kurile chain into "varitable bastions forming a screen of steel" protecting Russian Pacific waters.

Australia also is taking a great interest and demanding that she be treated as a principal power in the Pacific, not as a subsidiary power. There is also the question of trade. Everyone knows how vital it will be to Canada to develop a great trade across the Pacific ocean.

Canada should be one of the principal powers in the Pacific. And yet, what is Canada's Pacific policy? Nowhere is our position more uncertain. Throughout, the government have been hesitant. True, Canada was the first to declare war on Japan. Then we had the ill-fated expedition to Hong Kong. When it came to taking part in the Pacific council the Prime Minister had to be pressed before he would have this nation join the council. He took the position that it only had to do with the southwestern part of the Pacific; that there was no hurry for Canada to join it.

Then came the Kiska force in August, 1943, when Canada sent troops up to that island. But when the island had been taken, Canadian troops were not sent on to take part in the fighting on the other islands of the Pacific, as had been done with the United States troops. Oh, no; they were brought home, and they did no fighting whatever until more than a year later, when some of them were forced to go over to Europe.

Within the last few weeks we have had the spectacle of the Canadian cruiser Uganda taken from the firing line across the Pacific and brought back to Canada, because of the man-power policy of this government for the Pacific—something which did little good to the fair name of Canada around the Pacific shores.

At the present time the government shows little sign of being interested in the Pacific. Well, the Canadian government, the Canadian parliament and people would be well advised to watch very closely what goes on around the shores both of the Pacific and of the Arctic, as well as the Atlantic. Canada must be prepared to play her full part, and the government must take the lead.

Finally I would say a few words about this House of Commons. We are most fortunate in having among our number so many new members who have served in the armed forces of the country during this last war. Those who have spoken have shown clearly—oh, so clearly—that they have an important contribution to make to Canada's public life. They and their comrades are the greatest asset of this nation. The young men and women who have been in the fighting forces of Canada are the biggest asset of this nation to-day, and will be in the years to come.

Hon. members of those forces who have taken seats in this chamber have shown a fine spirit. I might add, too, that that same fine spirit has been shown by other new members who were not privileged to serve in the forces. There is on the part of members of the house a keenness to serve which I suggest is truly remarkable; to me it has been inspiring. In the years which lie ahead I am sure the house can, if it so chooses, give the Canadian people real leadership.

Many Canadians have been afraid of the post-war years. There have been many head-shakers, many prophets of doom. They have been wrong. Canada has come through the war stronger than ever, largely because of the character, courage and intelligence of the individual Canadian. Canadians can surmount every obstacle in the future; but let me repeat that this House of Commons has a duty to give them bold and straight-forward leadership in facing such obstacles.

Mr. P. E. WRIGHT (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the debate I should like first to associate myself with the concluding remarks of the hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. Green). At first I had not intended speaking in the debate. I had been enjoying the valuable contributions made by the younger members who appear for the first time in the house. The contribution not only of members from the armed forces but that of other members has been of a high standard indeed, and one of which we may well be proud.

A further reason for refraining from taking part in the debate was that during the six sessions I have been here it has always seemed to me we have spent too much time on the debate in reply to the speech from the throne. In those sessions we spent on this debate periods ranging from two to six weeks, with the result that invariably in the last few days of each session we found ourselves passing millions of dollars' worth of estimates without having given them proper consideration. Therefore in future sessions I suggest we give some consideration to having this debate conclude when the various leaders of the groups in the house have spoken. I would ask that this suggestion be taken into consideration.

To-day I was moved to take part in the debate because of what was said yesterday by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) respecting the setting of a floor price under wheat for the next five years. This is a matter of great importance not only to western Canada but to agriculture throughout the dominion. Let me say at once that I am not objecting to order in council P.C. 6122, which sets a ceiling price of $1.55 on wheat for export. It seems to me the reasons given by the minister for the setting of that ceiling price are logical and carry great weight. Under the conditions existing in Europe there is every reason why we should contribute to their betterment. I would point out however that in doing so we should not place the burden upon only one section of our Canadian economy. Under this order in council that is what we may be doing, especially if we allow the floor price of $1 a bushel, f.o.b. Fort William to remain, as suggested by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon). I am sure all hon. members will agree that as applied to the average half-section farm in western Canada to-day, it is below the cost of production.

I stated that I believed the floor price for wheat was of importance not only to western Canada but to agriculture throughout the dominion. During the last twenty-five years, in our agricultural economy in Canada, wheat has been king. If one were to follow wheat prices he would find that with very few exceptions—and these always where there were scarcities—the prices of other agricultural products have followed the trend in wheat prices. When we have had prosperity in western Canada and have had a good price for wheat, there have been good prices for other agricultural products throughout Canada. In those circumstances not only was there prosperity in agriculture, but that prosperity reflected itself throughout the economic life of the dominion. Prosperity in western Canada meant jobs in eastern Canada, better prices for fruit in British Columbia, and better prices generally throughout the dominion.

Wheat has been our greatest exportable commodity, and I believe it will maintain that position in peace time. The climatic conditions of a great area in Canada are such that not only is wheat the easiest crop to grow, but it is the most profitable. It will be seen therefore that a floor price for this commodity is of great importance to the country at large, and it has particular significance to-day because it gives some indication as to what the government's policy is going to be with respect to floor prices for other agricultural products.

Last year we passed floor prices legislation. The government stated that the legislation was being introduced for three purposes. First, it was to compensate agriculture for the low prices it had received for many of its products during the first two years of the war. During those years prices for agricultural products were really below the cost of production. I can remember in 1940 when there was a frozen wheat crop in northern Saskatchewan, the district from which I come, and our wheat was selling at from twenty-seven to thirty cents a bushel for feed wheat. We were buying British Columbia apples at $1.80 to $2.35 a box. It took five bushels of our wheat to buy one box of apples. That fall I had the privilege of visiting British Columbia, and I saw some of the orchards in which these apples were being grown. I found that the fruit grower was getting from thirty to forty cents a box for his apples while he was paying $1.95 per hundredweight for our feed wheat. In other words it was taking six boxes of his apples to buy a hundredweight of our wheat, while it was taking five bushels of our wheat to buy one box of his apples. The result was that there were thousands of children in western Canada who never saw an apple, and many fruit growers in British Columbia were not able to diversify their production as much as they would have liked to do. That, I say, was one of the reasons the government gave for introducing floor prices under agricultural products.

The other reason was to compensate for the price which agriculture might have received had there been no price ceiling structure in Canada. We all know that had there been no price ceiling structure, the prices of many agricultural products would have gone above the prices which were paid. The present legislation is being brought in recognition of the fact that the price of wheat probably would have gone to $2 or $2.25 per bushel if there had been no ceiling, and the same with beef and many other agricultural products.

The third reason they gave for bringing in floor prices was that it was to give the producer the cost of production. These floor prices were supposed to represent the cost of production of farm products, plus enough to give the farmer a return on his capital investment and a reasonable standard of living. I want to say that I do not think that the $1 per bushel for wheat will do any one of these things. That $1 per bushel for wheat is not $1 per bushel on the farm. It is really 80 cents per bushel on the average farm in western Canada, and that does not compensate the farmer for the low prices he received in the early years of the war or for the prices he might have received had this order in council not been passed. Nor will it give him his cost of production plus a reasonable return on his capital.

If you are prepared to farm three, four or five sections of land as a corporation farm, it is just possible that with economical management you might get away under the present legislation, but not under any other circumstances. I wonder if it is the policy of this government to have large corporation farming become prevalent in western Canada—because that will be the result of this present legislation.

This legislation is important because it indicates what the government's policy is going to be with respect to floor prices under other agricultural products. It means a reduction from the present price of approximately thirty-five per cent. That is, floors under agricultural prices are to be placed at thirty-five per cent under the existing prices. I had a great many inquiries during the election campaign; and I have received many since, as to what I thought the government policy would be with respect to floor prices. I must say that at no time did I answer that I thought the policy would be a reduction of over fifteen, or at the most twenty per cent under present prices. But here we have legislation which is going to mean a possible reduction of thirty-five per cent in the purchasing power of the largest group in Canada.

Mr. GARDINER: It is just twenty per cent.

Mr. WRIGHT: One fifty-five and one dollar; figure it out. If that is not thirty-five per cent I will have to go back to school.

Mr. GARDINER: The floor is now $1.25, and if you reduce it to $1, that represents only a twenty per cent reduction on the floor. This does not prevent the farmer from selling higher, if a market can be found for a higher level.

Mr. WRIGHT: The legislation under P.C. 6122 sets the selling price at $1.55. That is the price we shall be getting for our export wheat under this legislation.

Mr. GARDINER: It is $1.55 for wheat sold overseas, but it does not say that that is the highest price that can be obtained for Canadian wheat elsewhere.

Mr. WRIGHT: I admit that if the legislation had not been passed we might have received higher prices. I believe the government at the present time is selling wheat in Canada for $1.25 per bushel for domestic consumption. That is being sold to our millers and the farmer is getting nothing.

Mr. GARDINER: Worse than that; the wheat board are selling it at seventy-eight cents to millers.

Mr. WRIGHT: I was going on to say that not only were they doing that; they were paying a subsidy to the miller, which means that the miller was grinding wheat at seventy-eight cents per bushel, basis Fort William. I wonder if that is what the government considers as the floor price, seventy-eight cents per bushel, basis Fort William?

As I said, this matter of floor prices under agricultural products is one of the most important problems we are faced with in the reconstruction period. It has to do with the purchasing power in the hands of a group of people which represents the greatest market in Canada. These people purchase more machinery, they build more houses, they buy more clothing and equipment than probably any other group in the dominion. If we are going to reduce their living standard by thirty-five per cent, I want to tell you that there will be a lot of people out of work in the next five years.

We are in favour of the quota system for marketing our wheat. I think this has been generally accepted in western Canada, especially the quota with respct to deliveries. It is good legislation and it has worked out quite satisfactorily. This $1 per bushel which we are getting under the proposal by the government as announced yesterday is not $1 per bushel for all the wheat we can grow in western Canada; it is only $1 per bushel for the wheat we grow under the quota, which is fourteen bushels to the acre on eighty per cent of our 1940 acreage.

What does that mean in income? I have a neighbour who is farming a quarter section. He has a family of six. Under the quota he can sell only from twenty-three acres, which means that he can sell fourteen bushels per acre from twenty-three acres of land. Anything he grows over that he cannot sell. I ask hon. members to use a little mental arithmetic to figure out how far that man can go toward clothing, feeding and educating his family on that sort of income. It just cannot be done. I am positive that this floor is not the floor which will be accepted by the people in western Canada.

The minister has not given us any indication whether organized agriculture in western Canada was consulted or not, or whether organized agriculture in the whole of Canada was consulted. Was the Canadian Federation of Agriculture consulted? Were other farm organizations in Canada consulted? We do not even know whether the advisory committee to the wheat board were consulted.

The minister has not stated in this house, nor has any other member of the government, that this is a satisfactory floor so far as the farm organizations are concerned. I doubt very much whether it is. I know western Canadian agriculture well enough to know that it can never be a satisfactory floor for wheat from western Canada with prices where they are to-day for the things the farmer has to buy. We have no guarantee from the government that if wheat drops thirty-five per cent in price, the prices of the implements the farmer buys will go down with it.

Indeed, we know quite well from past experience that that will not take place. During the last war the price of agricultural implements and all the other items that enter into the farmer's cost of production went up and stayed up practically all through the depression. Prices increased then, and prices have increased since this war started, despite the price ceilings. Anyone who has bought agricultural implements knows that. I had to pay $2,050 just a few months ago for a tractor that I could have purchased for $1,600 in 1939, and that $2,050 was after removal of the ten per cent war exchange tax. The prices for the implements the farmer needs will stay up when our agricultural prices decline.

What agriculture in Canada wants is some tie-up between the floor prices the farmers are to receive for their products and the prices they will have to pay for the things which enter into their cost of production. That is what they ask for, but there is no indication of that in the legislation brought down by the government.

Here is another point. Is the government treating all other industries in Canada on the same basis as agriculture? We have a government board dealing with textiles and a government board dealing with lumber. I have not heard of any price ceilings being placed on what the lumberman may charge for his exports. It is true that they can export only a certain quota, but for what they can export they can get any price that the buyer wishes to pay. Lumber is just as important as food to the people of Europe. I was over there last fall with other members of the house and saw the destruction of houses that had taken place in Europe. Houses are important just as food is important. Yet we have had no indication from the government that they intend to treat other industries in the manner in which they are treating agriculture. I hope the minister when he speaks will give us some such indication.

What does agriculture in Canada want?

Mr. BURTON: A fair deal.

Mr. WRIGHT: Yes, my hon. friend says agriculture wants a square deal. That is all that agriculture asks for. Agriculture does not ask and has never asked for special privileges. Agriculture wants only a fair deal. It wants to obtain only its fair share of the national income, according to production and according to the number of people engaged in agriculture. That is all the farmers have ever asked for through their organizations, and they have never got it. The only time in my life when agriculture received its proportionate share of the national income was between 1915 and 1919, during the last war. Even to-day, with agricultural prices where they are, agriculture in Canada is not receiving its proportionate share of the national income.

The farmers believe that they can do a lot for themselves through the organization of their own industry. They have asked this government to pass a natural products marketing act which would allow agriculture to organize so as to obtain the best possible prices for their products. They want a natural products marketing act which will allow organized agriculture, when a majority of the producers of any agricultural product signify their desire for it, to have a marketing board through which all of that product would be marketed, so that a small percentage of the growers may not be able to disorganize the whole market. They would be prepared to abide by regulations passed by the dominion government or provincial governments with respect to the quality of their products, so that the consumer would be protected. Marketing boards and export boards which would take care of the exportable surpluses of agricultural products, so that when they were to be marketed in other countries the government would step into the picture and through long-term agreements with importing countries stabilize the export market—that is what agriculture is asking for.

Last fall I had the privilege of visiting England and talking to quite a few members of the present government there. I know that so far as the food of Britain is concerned, they do not want to see it go back into the speculative markets. They intend to buy through government agencies, and I am sure that they would prefer to deal with cooperative agencies and government agencies for their requirements in the countries from which they are importing. They would be prepared to make long-term contracts which could be negotiated on a satisfactory basis to both the consumers in Europe and the producers in this country. But the present legislation indicates just the opposite. It indicates that it is the intention of the government to go back to the marketing of wheat in the manner in which it was marketed in 1939, when the war started. That is, we are going to have a wheat board which will be prepared to accept delivery from the farmer. The Winnipeg grain exchange will function again, and growers who are not prepared to deliver to the board will be able to sell their product on the open market. The floor has been set so low now that it is going to force many farmers to sell on the open market if they can get an additional five cents a bushel for their wheat because the initial payment is not sufficient to meet their expenses.

But that is what your legislation amounts to, and that is not the desire of the western farmer as expressed through all his organizations.

Mr. GARDINER: The last resolution they passed asked for an initial payment of one dollar.

Mr. WRIGHT: That was not a floor price. I know of no resolution that has been passed by any farm organization during the war which states that one dollar a bushel would be a satisfactory floor price for wheat.

Mr. GARDINER: They have passed resolutions to the effect that the initial payment should be one dollar. That is the last resolution they passed.

Mr. WRIGHT: When was that passed?

Mr. GARDINER: In 1943.

Mr. WRIGHT: That is an entirely different thing from a floor price.

Mr. GARDINER: It was the last resolution. It asked for $1 initial payment, and that is the only way under our system that a floor can be established, namely, by establishing the initial payment.

Mr. WRIGHT: It was not dealing with initial payment. I have here the latest report from the Alberta Farmers Union and the United Farmers of Saskatchewan, and this is what they say with respect to floor prices:

> Until a proper system of parity prices is established, farmers must be guaranteed floor prices for their products on a scale not less than the prices including bonus received by producers in August, 1944.

And so on. That is what they state in their official publication.

Mr. GARDINER: The farm federation is the official organization.

Mr. WRIGHT: I have here the statement of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture with regard to floor prices. I quote:

> Full consultation with organized agriculture in the working out of the government's proposed post-war policy of floor prices on farm products.

I wonder if that has been carried out.

> The basic principle of such a policy to be to guarantee to producers, price returns properly related to costs of production and to the need of providing for security and good living for the farm family.

That is not by any means what this legislation does. Not by any stretch of the imagination could this legislation be regarded as complying with that request.

As I said, we should have export boards which would make long-term agreements with the importing companies so that we would have stabilized prices for agriculture. I believe that such agreements could be made at the present time. I believe that this government could have made agreements with those countries for a five-year period and at prices which would mean a better return to farmers than under this legislation. I am sure that $1.25 a bushel is the lowest floor price that should be set for wheat in Canada. That is a price which would give to the average producer a reasonable return for his labour and for the investment which he has in his farm and in his equipment.

This group have been accused by certain sections of the press of being opposed to export trade. That has never been the policy of this group; we have never been opposed to export trade. What we were opposed to was export trade carried on by international cartels and monopolies for their own private interest and gain. That is a type of export trade which in the past has led to international ill will—the effort of certain people to obtain special concessions over the raw resources of the world, and the pitting of one nation against another. You can see what took place in South America, and you can see it taking place in the eastern countries to-day, and in fact right across the world. They are pitting one nation against the other so that the international cartels and monopolies can make private gain for themselves.

What we want is export trade controlled by our governments and used as an instrument of government for creating good will and cooperation throughout the world and a better standard of living for all the peoples of the world. Almost invariably these international cartels have made their profits out of the exploitation of backward nations and backward peoples. That has been the basis of their profits. We think that, from the point of view of the government, that sort of thing should cease and from now on we should operate on a different basis, using our export trade as a means of creating good will and cooperation throughout the world and raising the standard of living of backward peoples and nations, so that we may all have a better living standard. That is the policy of the C.C.F. with respect to export trade—not that we should be insular but that we should trade on the conditions I have suggested.

Another thing that the present legislation indicates is the reopening of the Winnipeg grain exchange. The minister shakes his head; he suggests that it does not. I hope he is right and that when he makes his statement he will assure us that it is not the intention of the government to see that the Winnipeg grain exchange again functions in the handling of either coarse grains or wheat in western Canada. If he does that he will have the blessing of every farm organization in the west, because they have been asking for that consistently for the last ten or fifteen years to my knowledge. I hope therefore it is the minister's intention to see that these requests of theirs are complied with.

Agriculture can never be prosperous where there is fluctuation of income to the extent that the income of farmers has fluctuated over the past number of years. This legislation indicates that it is the intention of the government to allow that fluctuation to continue over a thirty-five per cent range. There is no other industry in Canada that can be prosperous on that basis, and neither can agriculture. We have to have stable prices. We must know from year to year, when we sow our crop, what we shall obtain for it. We must know, when we start to raise a hog, what we shall get for that hog when it is finished. We must know, when we raise or buy beef cattle, that we shall get a reasonable return for them when we have them ready for market.

We did this during the war. We stabilized agricultural prices to a large extent then. There have been a few fluctuations, I admit, and the government knows quite well the objections raised every time there have been such fluctuations. Surely they will not again throw the agriculture industry back to the wolves of speculation and allow them to treat that industry as it was treated in the past.

Give agriculture a chance to organize herself, give her a reasonable chance to put her own house in order, and she will do it and make a real contribution to our Canadian economy.

There is another reason why we should have stabilized prices for agriculture. Our returned men are coming back now, and a large percentage of them are going back into agriculture. They are taking up land under the Veterans' Land Act, and they are buying land to-day on the basis of present prices. Land prices in Canada, the prices of good land in sure-crop areas, have increased from fifty per cent to seventy-five per cent since 1939. In my own area you could buy a very good quarter section for $3,000 or $3,500 in 1940 and even in 1941. To-day the same quarter section sells at from $5,000 to $7,000.

The boys who are returning will buy that land on the basis of these prices to-day, and we are saying in this legislation that we will allow a decrease of thirty-five per cent in our farm income, which means a decrease in farm values, which will entirely wipe out not only the grant the government is making to the returned men in the buying of farms, but their little nest egg which they themselves have accumulated through savings which they will put in as the ten per cent payment on the land. So that the returned man will find in four or five years' time, when agricultural prices have gone down, that we have entirely wiped out the savings which he made through deferred payments during his service overseas.

That is not a bright future, and it is exactly what happened after the last war. It is exactly the way we treated the returned men after the last war, and we are doing the same thing again in Canada. I remember quite well after the last war when school lands in western Canada were offered to the public in 1918 at an up-set price—I am thinking of one particular section—of $10 an acre by the department of national resources in Ottawa. They did not get a bid on it. The returned men came back and within six months offered $10 an acre and were told that they could not buy the land except at open auction. They were informed, three months later that the land had been turned over to the soldier settlement board and if they wished to buy it they could communicate with the board. When a returned man did communicate with them, what do you suppose they asked him for the land? They asked him $21.50 an acre for one quarter and $23 an acre for another quarter, and he could take it or leave it, whichever he liked. That is what we are doing here again. It is not fair; it is not fair to our returned men. The setting of a floor price under wheat where the government proposes to set it, according to the statement made by the minister to the house yesterday, means the wiping out of the equity of the returned men in their land, which they may purchase under the Veterans' Land Act.

Mr. GARDINER: May I correct the hon. member's statement? The order, as I read it, does not set the advance at all. What the order says is that any time in the next five years it cannot be lower than $1; it can be set higher.

Mr. WRIGHT: The Minister of Agriculture knows as well as I do that every time the government had done that very thing in the last years before the war, almost invariably the price of wheat went down and sat on that peg or very close to it during the full period. That has been the experience in the past and the minister knows that.

Mr. GARDINER: The order does not say that the government is setting the price at $1;

it cannot be set at less than a dollar at any time to July 31, 1950.

Mr. WRIGHT: We are having a different story now.

Mr. GARDINER: That is what the story is, and I am telling the hon. member that he is telling a new story.

Mr. WRIGHT: Maybe the minister does not agree with the policy of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) and is still fighting for a better floor price. I hope he is; I hope that the cabinet will listen to him. I know from experience in the past they have failed to listen to him in other matters.

Mr. GARDINER: The order in council the hon. member is discussing says that the floor shall not be less than $1. It does not say it has to be.

Mr. WRIGHT: I am afraid the minister is making his old familiar play on words. He has done that and kidded the people of Saskatchewan for a long time, but he came mighty near to not kidding them the last time.

Mr. GARDINER: I was one of only four in Saskatchewan to have a clear majority.

Mr. WRIGHT: That is simply because there were only two candidates.

Mr. COLDWELL: The other three are in the C.C.F.

Mr. GARDINER: No; two are over here.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Twenty-eight is a good majority!

Mr. WRIGHT: I hope that, as indicated by the Minister of Agriculture, this is not the final word with respect to a floor price under wheat, and that we shall have a reasonable floor price set for that product. That is the whole basis of the plea I am making to the government to-day. I hope that they will bear it in mind and that it will have some effect on them.

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member who has just taken his seat, I have been to a certain extent forced into this debate because of the announcement made yesterday by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon). I am very glad to know that at least some of the ministers of the government are not satisfied with the meaning we took from that announcement yesterday. We are hoping that something better is coming about.

Before going on with what I have to say, I wish to thank the editor of the Ottawa Citizen, for the help he rendered in getting me back to this parliament. The help was in the form of a left-handed compliment in an editorial of April 26 last. The editorial was obviously false and deliberately misleading. Of course the objective was the return of another candidate for the Battle River constituency. The editorial was widely advertised over the radio, in local weeklies, and in posters on many telephone poles in the Battle River constituency. However, the net result, thanks to the editor of the Ottawa Citizen, was that his candidate collected less than twenty per cent of the votes polled and made a contribution of $200 to the national treasury. I hope that the government will make good use of this money, because the man who lost it perhaps could ill afford to lose it.

On another occasion earlier in the session I introduced a bill to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act. As I stated in introducing that bill the object was to do away forever with the Winnipeg grain exchange. On Monday last the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch) speaking in the debate—and his remarks can be found at page 207 of Hansard—mentioned the fact that I had introduced this bill, and undertook to uphold the grain exchange as an institution. I did not in any way attack the grain exchange of any of its members, and I feel that the hon. member who took their part is perhaps one of the residents among the sleek and fat operators of that institution, while I am here interested in the lean, overworked and impoverished victims of that organization.

At page 207 of Hansard of September 17, the hon. member had this to say:

> The Winnipeg grain exchange has been investigated by royal and other commissions more than a score of times within my own memory, and without exception it has been held to be making an important and worth-while contribution in the marketing of the products of the prairies. During the whole of that period it has been a simple matter in some sections, and in some areas it still is, to get an audience and a sympathetic hearing by detracting from that institution.

Any hon. member who is interested in the remainder of the hon. member's speech in that regard can find it at page 207 of Hansard as I have indicated.

I think we all know, some of us from sad and costly experience, that the grain exchange is something like the gold standard. During the depression years of robbing the farmers and other classes in this country we stayed on the gold standard, but in 1940, owing to the pressure of war financing, we went off the gold standard. That, I think, is sufficient proof for us that it is not good in a time of need. We also found that during the war practically all the grain exchanges in the British empire were closed down. The Canadian grain exchange was the last of them to close down, as far as my memory goes. I believe also we read in the press that Mr. Ranke, of the British cereals purchasing agency, refused to buy Canadian wheat if the exchange were left open. I remember also one of the senior members of the cabinet who has now gone to another section of parliament for security in his old days, possibly because he was scared to face another election, went to England late in the fall of 1939.

As far as legitimate business of the exchange is concerned I believe that they are allowed to operate by legislation, but that legislation is not just as it should be. In the past we have had millions of bushels of wheat sold on the exchange that was never grown. It has been operated as a gambling den in most cases to the detriment of the farmers of western Canada. At the present time and for a number of years past the wheat board paid commissions to these operators, many of whom render no service whatever on sales of our wheat. I believe the same system is carried on in the old country where they are subsidizing some of the idle members of the exchange, so that they will have the gambling den all ready to set up after the war is over and the party is finished. I have often wondered why we did not sell automobiles and other types of merchandise on the exchange as wheat is sold. I am wondering why we do not put our money on the exchange or on some similar organization, and then we would hear some of those who are helping to conduct the Winnipeg grain exchange do a lot of howling. Personally, in case anybody should have any wrong impression as to where I stand, I am definitely opposed to the operation of the Winnipeg grain exchange for the sale of wheat or other grains. When I say that, I am uttering the opinion of all of the farm organizations in western Canada. The grain exchange is not run for our benefit. There is no question about that. I have taken part in the debate to-day and have said what I have because I believe the present policy of the government is heading us for further use of the grain exchange. If that is the government's programme, then I wish they had told the farmers of western Canada about it before June 11, and we might have had some different results on that day.

When the minister made the announcement yesterday I do not think he felt very happy about it. The minister is an honest man and knows conditions in western Canada much better than some of the other members of the cabinet. I think he was a little bit ashamed when he made that announcement yesterday. Of course, it is in his department and there was nothing else for him to do but make it. I cannot agree with the interpretation the Minister of Agriculture places upon it.

In yesterday's Hansard we find the following at page 289:

> In asking Canadian producers to forego such benefits as might be realized in the short run through higher export prices, the government recognizes the paramount need for relative stability of income to wheat producers. Toward this end, the government undertakes that in the five-year period ending July 31, 1950, producers will receive not less than $1 per bushel, basis No. 1 northern, in store Fort William/Port Arthur or Vancouver on the authorized deliveries for each crop year.

From the words "authorized deliveries" I take it that we are still to be on a quota basis. Let us go back a number of years and take the wheat crop of 1935. At that time the price was established by the wheat board at 87½ cents, as a concession, I believe, granted by a number of parties, the government, the wheat board, the grain trade and the pools. In any event, when I came to the house first the price was 87½ cents a bushel, but I think the house will remember that before long radical changes were made in connection with selling our wheat. We soon found the price down to eighty cents; then legislation was brought into this house fixing the price at sixty cents. Later someone wanted to get a pat on the back, and had the happy idea of raising it again to seventy cents. That figure did not mean seventy cents in the pocket of the farmer delivering his grain to the elevator. On the contrary, in my part of the country, for the average grade, it meant about forty-five cents for the best grain grown in the world. That price obtained until the 1941 crop was sold. For the 1942 crop the price went up to ninety cents, and in September, 1943, another change was made which brought it up to $1.25 a bushel. Now, in September, 1945, the Minister of Trade and Commerce tells us the party is over, that we are going to get down to business.

Perhaps some people think the farmers are getting too well off, and I readily admit that to-day they are in a much better financial position than they were when the war broke out. But I would point out also that farmers are working more than twice as many hours as any other occupational group in this country, and that their standard of living is not nearly as high as that of most other groups. Now we are to get a floor price, but I am afraid that after this year we are going to break our backs reaching down to that floor. That is what I was afraid of right along, when the legislation was brought in last year giving us guaranteed floor prices. No one even hinted where that floor price would be, and many of us were afraid it would be down in the cellar, that the legislation would be good for election purposes only.

I am not satisfied even with to-day's level of prices for farm products. It does not make any difference whatever what may be the prices for our farm products unless the prices of the commodities we have to buy are kept in line with them. During the years 1930 to 1940 the average portion of the national income received by the farmers of this country was 9·4 per cent. That is, 9·4 per cent of the national income went to approximately one-third of the Canadian population, who in most cases, as I have said already, were working twice as many hours as any other group. Even if we go back and take in a few of the good years prior to the beginning of the man-made depression, we find that the farmers of Canada, still representing one-third of the population, received only 11·3 per cent of the national income. If we take one specific year, 1932, we remember that many of us who had good crops at that time and hauled them to the elevators did not get back the cost of the threshing, and that year the farmers of Canada received five per cent of the national income. The Liberals were not in power at that time, so that we cannot blame them, although most people say the Liberals and Conservatives are alike. In any event nothing was done then to help the farmers. No move was made in the direction of cutting interest, the settlement of debts or anything of the kind to relieve the position of the farmers, with the result that we had to take it on the chin and come through as best we could. The condition that existed on the farms during that period is reflected in the statistics concerning the men who tried to enlist in the armed forces during the late war. In one case, out of 93,000 men who offered their services to the air force, only some 15,000 were able to pass the examinations, or one out of six, which is not a very good record.

I am not going to go into a great many details in connection with these matters, but I believe that the floor price should not be less than $1.25 a bushel for the next five years, with participation certificates issued for the balance. That will net us less than $1 a bushel for the average grade of wheat produced in my particular section of the country, and still will not give us our proper share of the national income unless the prices of the commodities we have to buy are kept down or cut down and the prices of other agricultural products raised. This also would help to make up for the low prices we received during the depression and the early years of the war and would let us pay interest on the debt which, because of the policies of the different governments, accumulated during that depression period. At the present time labour is demanding a thirty-per cent increase in wages, and in some of the newspapers we read that labour wants a forty-hour week. Just where does the farmer appear in that picture? The farmer is not organized. Time and again I have told farmers that they have the remedy right in their own hands, and have tried to get them to apply it, but apparently some of them still have the wool pulled over their eyes.

We were not told by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Finance that during the next five years prices of other commodities would be cut or controlled, and I am just wondering what their policy will be when they come to deal with some of the other commodities. As I said earlier, I believe the present programme is designed to prepare the lambs once more for the slaughter-house; that is, to prepare the farmers for the reopening and operation of the Winnipeg grain exchange. That is a definite detriment; and while twenty or more commissions have been appointed to look into the affairs of that institution, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Winnipeg South, my reply is that twenty or more white-washing jobs were done, through which the farmers can see very clearly. I remember that on one occasion we sent to the old country to get the services of an economist over there—Sir Josiah Stamp, I believe it was—and that he made an excellent job! But the fact remains that the grain exchange was in operation during the worst depression years we had, and that they did not in any way succeed in keeping the price of grain up where it properly belonged.

While I am speaking about agriculture, perhaps I might mention one other point, namely, the necessity for some amendments to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. I suggest that act should be amended so that settlement might be made on an individual basis. In years past hon. members in this group have advocated that, time and again. I believe even the Minister of Agriculture would understand very well that a farmer on one side of a road allowance may have a good crop, because of rain, while the farmer on the other side of the road might not have had the rain and would therefore be without a crop. In my view this should be settled on an individual basis, and we should also widen the scheme to include a proper and complete crop insurance coverage.

There is something further that is wrong in the act as it now stands. Some provision has, I believe, been made in the regulations. The point I have in mind, however, affects the farmer who is in a dry belt and qualifies for bonus, but moves out before a certain date in the fall. Even though he has incurred expenses during the year, he is denied the bonus provided by the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. This should not be allowed, and is a wrong which should be corrected.

Then, I say the eight-bushel yield is too low, and should be set back to the original twelve bushels an acre.

Then, in respect of a father and one or more sons operating their holdings with one outfit of machinery, I suggest all should be given the benefit of individual bonuses. Otherwise farmers' sons will be discouraged from starting up in agricultural pursuits.

I now come to rationing—and I have heard a good deal about it. I believe that the idea of sending meat overseas is a noble one, and that most people are in agreement with it. However, I have not yet heard of very many people who are in agreement with the programme or policy in that connection as set out by the wartime prices and trade board. I feel that this is one of the most disadvantageous times in which to bring it into operation, because we are now having large runs of cattle into the stockyards, and we find that the facilities there available are not adequate to take care of the offerings, unless, as the minister pointed out the other day, the stock can be shipped out at the rate of so many a day. I am not sure that that suggestion can be followed. It is something which may sound very nice, but the practising of which may present some difficulties, because of train services and for other reasons.

I do not believe that rationing will cure the problem. I think it will be found that large quantities of meat will spoil, as it did spoil on that earlier occasion when rationing was discontinued. Many people at that time refused to give up their meat coupons for cheap cuts of meat, or for the processed varieties. To-day merchants seem to be understaffed, and are complaining about the extra work placed upon them, if they are to keep records, and all that kind of thing.

Yesterday morning I received a letter which, in part, is as follows:

> Why should meat retailers in the Dominion of Canada be on the dirty end of the stick because of the short-sighted policy of the Liberal government?
>
> Any ten-year old kid could have foreseen a drop in hog population with the existing differential between coarse grains and live hogs.
>
> If Messrs Gardiner and Ilsley would use some of the money they have been taking from the public by taxation to pay a just price on hogs, we could have so many hogs that the existing facilities could not process them and meat rationing would not be necessary.
>
> You can rest assured we do not intend to carry on under this system for many weeks. The amount of labour at our disposal will not permit us to comply with existing regulations, nor can we afford to pay for additional help solely to make up the innumerable returns and statistics demanded—
> Unless meat rationing is lifted, without any doubt, a total strike of meat retailers across Canada will ensue.

Only this morning I sat in a barber shop for a few moments awaiting my turn. A man was in the chair and, although I do not know who he was, what he had to say about rationing, and what the barber afterwards told me concerning their general conversation, would not be allowed by you, sir, in this chamber.

As I said earlier, it is a noble thing to export our surpluses to feed hungry people in other countries. First of all, however, I suggest our own Canadian people should be fed. I believe, too, that other action might be taken which would help increase the production of stock, and possibly bring our production to a point where we could more readily feed other people, and ourselves as well.

In order to do this, I believe in inducements, rather than in compulsion. One inducement would be that the bonus of ten and fifteen cents a bushel on barley—I believe it is ten and twenty cents at the present time—which is being paid to hog or cattle raisers who do not grow their own feed, should be extended to all those who feed and market hogs, regardless of whether they produce their own grain. We may be told that this is impossible; but I should think our statisticians would certainly be able to estimate how many bushels of wheat, oats or barley, are required to raise a hog, under ordinary conditions. If a man receives pay on the basis of ten and twenty cents on the number of bushels used in raising a hog, I believe that the difficulty would be overcome. By that means I feel production would be encouraged, and I believe that some action along this line should be taken, because production in my part of the country at least, and I believe in other provinces as well, will decline much faster now that the war is over, and with conditions as they now obtain.

It has also been suggested that because we have very few veterinarians in the country the government should assist in some way in training and in keeping these veterinarians available. This is a profession which is not practised to any great extent to-day. Unless something is done the life of valuable stock will be jeopardized because of the absence of veterinarians in communities.

I have another item before me, one which I do not believe I could discuss fully before six o'clock. This would come under the heading of unfinished business; and when I say "unfinished business" I mean it was left over from the last parliament. I believe hon. members will agree it is one of those pieces of unfinished business which have followed the first world war and which have not yet been dealt with.

I have been glad to listen to so many young returned veterans from the war which has just been completed, and I hope that their courage in supporting the proposal which I make to-day, and which I have made on several other occasions, will not fail them, as it did not fail them when they faced the enemy. I would hope that before this session ends we would do something worth while for men who, in some cases, are the fathers of hon. members who represent constituencies in this parliament. I refer to the old soldier settlers from the first great war. As has happened after this war, a number of soldiers who took part in the first world war were recruited from farming communities. After the cessation of hostilities a number of these men decided they wanted to go back to settle on the land. After some sifting out, we find that 25,017 of these men were finally settled on the land under the soldier settlement board. The former Minister of Mines and Resources, who administered this scheme until recently, told us that the scheme was a hastily improvised one, and I agree with him. At the time these men were settled on the land there was advanced to them $109,034,331, which amounted to $4,358 each. The rate of interest was five per cent on current account and seven per cent on their accounts as soon as they went into arrears. They were given twenty-five years to pay. I have a lot more detail which I am not going into. I wanted to give a rough picture of things, because anyone who is interested can find full details in last session's Hansard.

Hon. members will remember that agricultural, cattle and hog prices went down, and a number of these men found that they were up against an impossible proposition. First, the land was purchased at very high prices and even under ordinary conditions they would not have been able to make things go. When poorer times came there was nothing for them to do but to get out. Finally some sixty per cent of them did get out; they had sense enough to see that far ahead. However, many others who had not that foresight kept on battling against almost impossible odds.

I am using the date of March 31, 1944, as the cut-off date. If the government persists in its policy it will not be more than possibly ten years before most of these old veterans will be dead. The government will be able to get back the land and sell it possibly to some Japs or Germans or Italians at one-half of the cost of the land as they are doing under present circumstances.

The total amount repaid was $75,888,550, made up of $50,507,493 principal and $25,381,060 interest. I am giving these amounts separately because I should like hon. members to note that during the same period the cost of administration of the soldiers' branch only was $27,340,763 or approximately $1,100,000 a year for the period under review. If you take the interest of $25,000,000 and the cost of administration of $27,000,000 you have a total of $52,000,000 odd. The amount of principal repaid was $50,507,493. A number of necessary adjustments were made amounting in all to $44,000,000 up to the end of March, 1944, at which time there was a total amount outstanding of $7,715,954.

At that time there were 6,153 men still remaining on the land. By that same date only 4,130, or sixteen per cent of the original settlers had been able to obtain title. The 6,153 who were still on the land represented twenty-five per cent of the original number. The average indebtedness at the end of March, 1944 was $1,254. I am bringing in this amount for a definite purpose. The original debt of these men was $4,358 and, after twenty-five years' hard work, in many cases persecution by the officials of the board, each man still owed an average of $1,254. That is equal to twenty-nine per cent of the original purchase price. Under the present Veterans Land Act a veteran who keeps up his payments over a ten-year period gets a grant of $2,320 which is thirty-nine per cent of the original amount of credit extended to him. On many occasions the government has made promises to these men, and that is exactly what another government did. I have here an address of Sir Robert Borden, then Prime Minister of Canada, which he made in 1917 to the Canadian expeditionary forces. He said:

> The government and the country will consider it their first duty to see that a proper appreciation of your effort and of your courage is brought to the notice of the people at home, and it will always be our endeavour to so guide the attitude of public opinion, that the country will support the government to prove to the returned man its just and due appreciation of the inestimable value of the services rendered to the country and empire; and that no man, whether he goes back or whether he remains in Flanders, will have just cause to reproach the government for having broken with the men who won and the men who died.

Similar promises have been made by the present government and I hope they will make a better job of living up to them. Back in March, 1941 an order in council was passed which I think is of interest to all Canadians. It has made many of us hang our heads in shame. At that time it was found that a number of veterans of great war I were enlisting to serve in the second great war. A number of these old veterans were soldier settlers and they found they could not keep up their payments. They saw a way, at least for the duration of the war, to provide a means of livelihood for their families and they enlisted. No payments were coming into the soldiers settlement board, and on March 19, the treasury board, on the recommendation of the former Minister of Mines and Resources passed this order in council:

> The board has had under consideration a submission of the honourable the Minister of Mines and Resources reporting that:
> 1. A considerable number of persons who agreed to purchase farms from the soldier settlement board or from the director of soldier settlement on long term contracts have enlisted in the Canadian armed forces.
>
> 2. In many cases the dependents of such enlisted persons continue to occupy their farms but no provision has been made for payment of instalments in respect of their contracts or of taxes in respect of their farms.
>
> 3. The director of soldier settlement has no authority to carry such accounts indefinitely and it is considered desirable to provide for deduction from dependents' allowances to cover local taxes and interest due.
> Accordingly the board recommended . . .

That is the treasury board about which we have heard so much, the board that has so much control over parliament and to which some consideration should be given at an early date.

> . . . that notwithstanding any provision to the contrary contained in any of the regulations providing for payment of dependents' or marriage allowances in respect of dependents of members of the Canadian armed forces, that in all cases where the dependents of an enlisted person continue to occupy the farm for which such person is indebted to the director of soldier settlement and in respect of which the contract terms are not otherwise satisfactorily provided for, there may be deducted from the dependents' or marriage allowance amounts sufficient to provide for payment of taxes levied by the local taxing authority in respect of the property in question and interest accruing annually on indebtedness to the director of soldier settlement, such deductions to be made monthly and in no case to exceed $20 per month except with the consent of the dependents concerned.

Promises were made to these men after the first great war and definite promises were made during this war; yet we find that order in council in operation. In the case of the ordinary man who enlisted in this war for the first time there are no deductions from the allowances paid to his wife and family. But those fellows who have offered everything for the second time are penalized simply because they have entered into a contract with the soldier settlement board and are not able, on account of conditions man-made, artificial and deliberately planned, to make their payments.

Again, for those fellows who felt they had a little longer lease on life than some others and wanted to continue, order in council P.C. 10472 was passed on November 19, 1942, providing that those settlers with courage who wanted to try to carry on a little longer could bring their cases before the board or committee that was set up, and if that committee saw fit it could reduce the man's indebtedness by a certain amount, and give him a further extension of twenty years in which to pay off his indebtedness—forty-five years of his life to pay for a quarter-section of land and starve himself and his family in the process, simply because of the policies designed by this and former governments.

The action of the government in bringing down the price of our wheat to $1 a bushel for the coming five years is a challenge to the men who are settling on the land under the Veterans' Land Act at the present time. By that act—and I expect that policy will be continued—the government are making it impossible for any man, no matter how hard he works, or what kind of farm he may buy, to carry on and ever get possession of his home. It does not take many years, even for those who have established themselves in the farming industry, to find themselves thrown out on the road, as many of my neighbours have been in past years, when they are compelled to sell below cost of production and pay exorbitant prices for everything they buy. Before this order in council is made effective the government should review its whole agricultural policy and programme and take into partnership with them representatives of the farm organizations and have the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) divorce himself from his unhealthy and unholy matrimony with the banks and other financial institutions.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. M. E. McGARRY (Inverness-Richmond): My first desire in rising to speak this evening is to put the house at ease, and I do not think I could do better than to announce that my remarks will be brief. I wish, however, to preface them by extending hearty congratulations to you, Mr. Speaker, on the great honour that has been unanimously conferred upon you by this house. In the last parliament you, sir, and my very humble self had a close association in being seat-mates in what you might call the suburbs of the House of Commons. Now we are separated by distance. There is an old adage that says, "absence makes the heart grow fonder." If I might be allowed to change the wording I would say that distance makes the heart grow fonder, and that would be applicable to our associations at this session.

I know, sir, you are quite conscious of the fact that with the great honour bestowed upon you there goes a great responsibility, and knowing you as I do, I realize your willingness to assume that responsibility. I know also you are quite competent to discharge the duties which will devolve upon you, and I think I can speak on behalf of the house when I say that in the performance of those duties you will have the cooperation of every hon. member. The very unanimity displayed in appointing you to the position you hold is a prelude to that cooperative assistance which you will receive.

I wish also to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, and right here I think I should compliment those who had the selection of those speakers. I think their choice was splendid inasmuch as they selected two hon. members who had contributed a great deal to the conflict of war. Now they come into the house and are just as solicitous and as ardent in the conflict of peace. Young men as they are, they have projected, in this conflict of peace we are now undertaking, thoughts which may very well be given consideration in the rehabilitation and reconstruction era.

I have listened to the speeches delivered in this house and I have nothing but congratulations to offer; but if I may be allowed to be critical on one point it is this. I do not like that mist of gloom they seem to cast over the country now that we are undertaking a conflict which is just as serious as the conflict of war. Comparing the visibility of affairs in Canada to-day with conditions six years ago, one can say that six years ago the people of the Dominion of Canada were suffering the agonies of the damned and at that time they had very little hope of redemption. Finally peace came. The war was won and it was won at an exorbitant price. It was won in suffering; it was won in losses irreparable; it was won in the agony of our loved ones and in the torture of the innocent. That was the price we paid for war. A new era has now arrived. We are given an opportunity now to show whether we are worthy of that redemption, and I think the outlook is not too gloomy.

We have to-day in Canada, fortunately, a government that has carried on a gigantic war effort. We have a government that not only prosecuted the war successfully but have brought down measures designed to deal with the problems which they anticipated would arise and which are arising at the present time. When this conflict of war was on we in Canada were fortunate. We were fortunate because we had at the head of our war departments men who not only had great experience in military affairs but had the wisdom to select an executive that was competent to initiate, develop and carry on to a successful termination a gigantic war effort. I say we are fortunate in that we must always remember that despite the efficiency of our war ministers very little could have been accomplished in this war conflict had it not been for the cooperation we received from every element of our Canadian citizenship. Our labour men, our industries, our farmers, our fishermen, our transportation facilities and everything that could be integrated into the war effort assisted. Our young men volunteered and went willingly to the front; and comparatively old men, men who had passed middle age, who in the last war had gone through the experiences, the sacrifices, the hardships and the miseries of that struggle, volunteered and stood in arms to protect our country. Young women who were occupying lucrative clerical positions left those offices and went into war industrial departments and undertook the onerous employment of making implements of destruction.

Our people were not only generous; they were tolerant. They were generous to a degree. They gave not only of their savings but of their earnings to war bonds to supply a fund for Canada to carry on our gigantic war undertaking. They accepted the restrictions of rationing and all other regimentations without a murmur. They complained very little about the ever-increasing tax imposts. They regarded these as a matter of war necessity.

As a matter of fact, our civilian population conceived the idea that this was an all-out war effort, and while they could not display the same equality of sacrifice they at least offered equality of service. There was something else that they did. They maintained the morale of the nation. Valour is a virtue. There is no doubt about that. It was a necessary virtue of those who were standing in arms against the aggressor. But it is no more a virtue with the fighting forces than it is with the civilian population, whose thoughts are bound up with those brave men who have to undergo the dangers of every day and face the uncertainties of the morrow.

So I say that while incidentally it may appear that I am offering some eulogy to the government, which they well deserve, neither this government, however efficient the ministers in the war departments might be, nor any other government, could have done what Canada did had it not been for the cooperation of our Canadian citizens. Let us not forget that the intelligentsia of Canada are just as much concerned in this conflict of peace to-day as they were in the conflict of war. Therefore it does not behoove us in the House of Commons to be throwing misty or gloomy shadows in front of the effort that is now being presented to the people of Canada. Six years ago I was not so hopeful that the conflict of war would be won. To-day, because of the measures that this government brought down in war time to deal with such great problems as unemployment, I am hopeful that we shall win the conflict of peace. I am perfectly sure that the speech from the throne reflects the spirit of a policy which will bring about a happy and successful rehabilitation and reconstruction programme.

When a country is at war there are two responsibilities which devolve upon the government. The first is to supply men, money and materials to carry on war projects. But just as important is the responsibility of maintaining the economy of the nation. I believe that this government did a very good job in that field. Mark you, three hours after war was declared this government established the wartime prices and trade board. We all know the effect of that action. The effect was that there was a check-up on hoarding and profit eering. We all saw the result of that. We did not see, as we did in the last war, men waxing rich on the blood and sacrifice of the people; we did not see our prices mounting to a dizzy height as they did in the last war, and when the fall came, not to ordinary peace-time level, but below, it was responsible for the depression which followed. The action taken by the government is one of the things which has kept Canada economically sound, and has made for a proper distribution of wealth throughout the nation.

May I recite just a few of the measures that are not promises but measures which are operative at the present time. First of all, there is the Unemploment Insurance Act. That is certainly going to serve a great purpose now It was timely inasmuch as it was introduced and put into operation at a time when there was no unemployment. The result is that to-day we have a repository of cash which will certainly render auxiliary assistance in the days of transition when there must necessarily be some unemployment. Mention might also be made of the amendment to the Land Settlement Act, a great improvement on the old act. It not only improved it but extended it. Then there was the compulsory employment act. One could recite many measures. These were all brought into force and will be of auxiliary service in this transition period. When we add to that the proposed measures contained in the speech from the throne I, for one, am greatly surprised that some hon. members say that this government has no plans for the future. I cannot see where there has been one omission. There was no lack of provision for what might be anticipated by any sensible government. I cannot understand why hon. members say that there is no planning. It must be that they have not followed the history of this government since 1940, or they say it for some ulterior purpose.

Inquiries have been made in the house as to whether or not the war was terminated so far as Canada is concerned. I do not think we can give an intelligent answer to that question until we find out the meaning of the two words "war" and "peace". I shall quote what one authority says about the definition of war. This is Webster's definition of war. He describes war as being "the absence or cessation of peace or cooperation; that condition of a nation or a community which is not at peace." Therefore, if we were to judge from the remarks of some hon. gentlemen opposite, we would come to the conclusion, following that definition, that Canada is still at war.

Mr. GILLIS: And will be for some time.

Mr. McGARRY: To confirm my theory of war, let us look at the definition of peace. Peace is "active cooperation by means of spiritual, mental and material forces between nations, states and rulers, and between parties in the same nation and state; the employment of spiritual, mental and material forces against evil powers at home and abroad, such as ignorance, injustice, ugliness, disease and intolerance." When these agencies are eliminated we are supposed to be at peace; but whatever the meaning of the words may be, we cannot have any peace in Canada unless we have the active cooperation of these mental, spiritual and material forces.

Canada did not enter this war as an aggressor; she entered it for the purpose of preserving our democratic rights and to establish a lasting peace. Paradoxical as it may seem, it was necessary to go to war to have peace; we won military victories, and finally we won the last and most essential victory. But in a war for peace military victories are only milestones which mark the pathway that will lead to the haven of peace. But there is another conflict in which we must take part; we must enter into it with the same generosity, the same spirit of cooperation and tolerance as we did in the conflict of war, because I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, it is just as serious a conflict.

I would say to my hon. friends opposite, be a little patient; remember that we are only just now at the transition period between war and peace. I do not think any hon. gentleman can suggest more than this government is going to do, some of which it has in operation and some to be put into operation before this session closes. No one can deny that we have wise and effective planning, and I would say to these hon. gentlemen that they should not expect performance before planning. Take a little time. It took the greatest Creator and Builder of all six days to make this world. Now we are trying to build a better world, and some hon. gentlemen think that should be done, with our efficient ministers, in two weeks. They should not speak in that way; they should not be spreading these words of gloom among the people. If that sort of thing had been done at the beginning of the war, possibly we would not have come out of that conflict as successfully as we did. I am absolutely in earnest about that. Let no one make these gloomy assertions that we are working in the dark. Visibility is good, but, as I said before, we must cooperate; we must have generosity; we must have tolerance, and we need every help the people of Canada can give.

To the government I would say, make as much haste as you can. Translate into performance the plans already laid down; and when this programme of reconstruction and rehabilitation is under way, do not forget that you cannot have absolute peace in Canada while there is one section discriminated against, one section which does not fit into the general picture. I have certain appeals to make to the government in regard to my own constituency. I am not going to present them now, but I say that if we want to have peace and contentment in the whole of Canada we must see to it that no section of this great nation is listed among the forgotten units.

Mr. W. D. WYLIE (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, it appears that new members are having a field day, so to speak; and, being a new member, I wish to take this opportunity of discussing some serious problems pertaining to the constituency of Medicine Hat, which I have the honour to represent. As many hon. members know, my constituency was represented in the last parliament by Doctor F. W. Gershaw.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): A good man.

Mr. WYLIE: A very good man and a very good friend of mine, and a gentleman held in high esteem by all who know him, regardless of their political views. I am pleased that he is now in the upper house, and I am sure southern Alberta will be well represented in that chamber by Senator Gershaw.

I regret that I am unable to use the expression of some hon. members in describing their constituencies. I have heard many of them say theirs were the best constituencies in Canada. I can say that the people of Medicine Hat constituency are the best people in Canada; and if I cannot say that Medicine Hat is one of the best constituencies, that is because of the inaction of the federal government. When I say that I include also our Conservative friends to my right, because, after all, they were in power for a few years and nothing much was done in my constituency. We did sell our wheat for twenty cents a bushel, and our hogs for two to two and a half cents a pound, and I do not forget that in 1937, when the present government were in power, they purchased a good deal of stock in that area at the handsome price of one cent a pound, so that they did not do so very much better. From this I believe hon. members will understand what I mean when I refer to the inaction of the government.

The largest part of my constituency is in what is known as the drought area. We have an average rainfall of from seven to nine inches. A few small portions may have an average of twelve inches, but that would be only a very small part. We have three irrigation districts. The first is the eastern irrigation district at Brooks, comprising some 1,500,000 acres, with approximately 200,000 acres irrigable. This project is well known for its high production not only of grains but of alfalfa and all kinds of field crops, and also the large number of dairy herds of good quality stock. They also take great pride in the wonderful buildings in that area, the homes of which they are so proud. This project is also known all over western Canada and parts of the United States for the wonderful pheasant shooting which may be enjoyed there. Thousands of dollars come into that area every fall from this source alone, and every available room in the town of Brooks and throughout the district is reserved a year ahead.

Then we have the Canada land and irrigation project at Vauxhall, which is much the same as the Brooks project, though not quite so extensive. Finally we have the Taber and Lethbridge irrigation district, which is known for the production of sugar beets. Here we have an industry that fits perfectly into the general irrigation farms programme. The growing of sugar beets gives the farmers a hoed crop which keeps their land clean, gives them an assured price for their product, and yields valuable by-products utilized in the now extensive live stock industry, which takes in the winter feeding and finishing of 25,000 head of cattle and 100,000 head of lambs. The Lethbridge feeder association alone does over a million dollars' worth of business each year. The sugar beet industry brings into the country several million dollars' worth of new wealth a year. The area under sugar beet production is approximately 30,000 acres; many growers are harvesting from twelve to fifteen tons or better per acre and receiving around $10 a ton for their deliveries. In addition, they have the valuable beet tops, beet pulp and molasses from the Raymond and the Picture Butte factories, at a nominal figure, for live stock feeding. Production has reached a point where additional factory space will be necessary, if production is to be stepped up; and the Brooks project has gone on record as wanting a factory. I see no reason why they should not have a factory. I know that all arrangements were made about two years ago for a sugar beet factory. The only thing required to establish it was a permit from the dominion government; but this permit, as the residents of the Brooks area know, was rejected.

Since coming to this part of Canada I have heard it said by many people that sugar manufactured from sugar beets is not of the same quality as that manufactured from sugar cane, and that fruits preserved with beet sugar will not keep. A statement of that kind is, in my opinion, entirely wrong. I believe that we in Alberta will recognize good, canned fruit as quickly as would any others, and I am quite sure that any canning done with beet sugar will keep just as long as if it had been done with sugar cane.

When I go back to Alberta, or perhaps before that time, I am going to suggest that the best thing our sugar factories can do is to put on an advertising campaign so as to advertise their product properly, and to let the people in eastern Canada know that we have just as good sugar in Alberta, produced right in that province, as is found anywhere else in Canada. It is an industry for which there is a big future, a future in which not only Alberta but all Canada will share. There is no reason at all why we should not be producing four or five times the amount of sugar we are producing to-day. I am sure most members from Alberta, and especially those from the southern part of the province, will recognize the truth of that statement. Southern Alberta's sunshine and fertile soil combine to produce flavourful vegetables, with the result that we have the development of the vegetable factories processing some 7,000 acres of peas, corn, beans and turnips. In addition, the only dehydration plant in the province is situated at Lethbridge for the processing of carrots, table beets, potatoes and turnips. In addition to all that, dairy herds have been improved and cheese factories are set up throughout the district.

From what I have said respecting his constituency it would almost seem that I am boosting the constituency of the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore). However, it shows what can be done by means of irrigation. In the greater part of my constituency we have two proposed irrigation schemes, namely the St. Mary-Milk river and the Redcliff-Ronalane. I am sure many hon. members have heard discussions in the house respecting this problem, and will remember particularly the contribution made to that discussion by Senator Gershaw. I do not think a session went by without the senator's having discussed that matter. Might I reiterate that, usually, before election there was a little more stress put on it. However, that is something which is essential to the welfare of that part of the province.

During the last election campaign the Liberal candidate for the constituency of Medicine Hat said that unless the people voted Liberal they would not get irrigation. Then, on the night he was defeated he said that he was pleased to see a Liberal government returned to power, but that the people of the constituency of Medicine Hat would still have to get in touch with him before they could get any government jobs.

I do not think irrigation should be made a political football. It has been played with for twenty-five years, and I suggest it is just about time the government got down to business and gave us some action in this respect. Anyone who has lived in that part of Alberta must know what hard times mean; they know what it is not to produce any crop. As the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) knows, the yield in the last three years has been very low, many townships averaging less than from two to four bushels an acre for wheat, and for coarse grains the yields have been even lower than that.

I have before me many telegrams and resolutions from various organizations in Medicine Hat, but I shall not bother reading them tonight. I might state briefly, however, that behind this project is the Medicine Hat council, and municipalities affected by the projects M.D. 13, M.D. 64 and M.D. 65, as well as the Medicine Hat-Lethbridge water conservation committee, the Bow Island board of trade and many other organizations. They are convinced that these projects must be completed; otherwise a dark future is in store for that area.

International waters are involved in the St. Mary's-Milk river project, and Canada has long neglected to use these waters. On the other hand the United States has built reservoir facilities to store practically the whole flow. In fact, they may claim them on the basis of prior use, if we keep on postponing the development. Canada should therefore at an early date construct the necessary irrigation works so as to protect and use its share of the St. Mary's and Milk rivers. The St. Mary's-Milk river project is feasible in every way. It has been surveyed and resurveyed, and I believe that even at the present time engineers are again on the Redcliff-Ronalane project. In the early days we had trails made by buffalo; at the present time I believe we can see trails made by surveyors and engineers, so that the scheme is feasible in every way.

The Milk river project would bring into irrigation around 345,000 acres at an estimated cost of $15,000,000 which in my opinion is not high when one considers the benefits that would be derived from the projects. There would be benefits not only for farmers already residing in the area but for farmers who reside several miles away. In drouth years those farmers would be able to purchase feed at a fair figure, something that many of them will have to do this year at a high figure. It would prove an insurance against crop failures in years of drouth and provide opportunities for the diversifying of crops to meet changing market requirements. It would increase land values because of the increased production and would provide an opportunity for home building with higher standards of living and improved social services.

We must not overlook the national benefits. There would be insurance against loss of the valuable national resource which I mentioned a few minutes ago. It would provide employment, a matter that is on our minds at the present time. The lands made irrigable would provide an opportunity for establishing returned soldiers and farm families now located on sub-marginal land, thereby effecting substantial savings in relief expenditures. The increased production and the volume of trade from the irrigation projects would result in business expansion through transportation, manufacturing and to the general benefit and advantage of Canada as a whole.

The construction of this project as well as the Redcliff Ronalane project is absolutely essential. They should not be regarded as projects to provide employment when unemployment develops, as was suggested by the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe). If the reconstruction policy of the Liberal government is based on unemployment, making it merely a job factory, then Canada is headed into an era of relief camps. How can Alberta and Saskatchewan go ahead without extensive irrigation projects? Prices for agricultural products must be maintained at a high level and never again allowed to drop below the cost of production. Prosperity in this country depends almost entirely on the income received by the farmer. This was so ably dealt with this afternoon by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) that I need not dwell on it this evening.

How can Alberta and Canada face the future without a vast network of first-class highways? Tourist traffic means a lot to any country and without first-class highways western Canada will not receive its fair share of the tourist trade. I have heard many farmers say that they have no interest in the tourist trade, that it simply meant increased business for service stations, restaurants and auto camps, but the fact is that this trade affects the whole economy. These people have to eat when they come here and they are going to spend money.

There is no reason why the transcanada highway should not be extended through western Canada. This highway should have the support of every hon. member from the west, not only those who believe they are located on the proposed route but everyone. I trust some consideration will be given to this matter and I hope the hon. members for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) and Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) will come to our support and do what they can.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What about the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. MacKinnon)?

Mr. WYLIE: And the hon. member for Edmonton West too; there should be plenty of support from the hon. member for Edmonton West. The government should move now to give official approval to the building of the transcanada highway and the completion of these irrigation projects by voting in the new estimates a sum large enough to permit a start on these projects.

We should have more industries in the west. When I refer to the west I am thinking, of course, of Medicine Hat in particular. We have an abundance of natural gas. Few people realize the benefits to be derived from natural gas. As Rudyard Kipling once said, Medicine Hat is the only city in Canada with all hell for a foundation. All we have to do is to drill a hole, put in a pipe and there you have power, you have heat and you have light if you wish. I should like some of the eastern members to come out to that area and see what can be done, not only in the city but in some of our ranchers' homes. We can certainly do with more industry in the west.

I have listened with a great deal of interest to what has been said about the housing problem by members on both sides of the house, especially returned men. Hon. members on this side of the house who have returned from the war are just as anxious to have a housing programme that will work as are hon. members on the other side. They want the same thing. What they want are houses. They want a programme with action, not just talk.

I know as far as my own city is concerned, there has not been a single house built there by wartime housing or with government assistance. It was suggested that we could put in a small holding project of one acre plots outside the city limits. The land was surveyed several times, but it was decided it was not suitable because it would cost too much to put water on it. The majority of the residents never did think very much of that project and the city council and citizens of Medicine Hat could see no reason why returned soldiers should be placed outside the city limits. We believe that they should have the privilege of living with the other residents right in the middle of the city. There are lots available there for their homes, and the city council is quite willing to give them lots of from fifty or seventy-five feet by one hundred and thirty feet if the government will apply this project to the city. I believe that this proposal should have consideration by the government, and that Medicine Hat should have the benefit of small holdings within the city limits. We have plenty of lots right on the power line where all services would be available. After all, we all want the same thing; we want homes; but the whole building project is not advancing very fast. It will require the cooperation of everyone and of all governments to get the project really going.

I was pleased to see that the government is proposing to make changes in the Old Age Pensions Act, although I am disappointed that these changes may not apply until 1948. It is very nice to know that when you reach the age of seventy the means test will be done away with. However, I agree with the leader of this group, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), that the age should be reduced to sixty years and the pension increased to $50 a month. I am sure that there is not a member of this house who would wish to live on a pension of $30 a month at the age of seventy or even sixty.

In the very near future I am sure that all civil servants, provincial and dominion, as well as the employees of most concerns, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company included, will be pensioned off at the age of sixty. The C.P.R. have that now, I believe, in some of their departments. In the civil service in Alberta the pension age is sixty-five; I am not sure about other governments, but I am quite sure that it will not be very long before they will all be superannuating at the age of sixty. I believe that is a good plan because it will enable people to enjoy a little pleasure in their old age, especially if the pensionable age is reduced and the pension increased to at least $50 a month.

I should like to say a word about education. I believe that the time has come when we should have uniform standards of education from one end of Canada to the other and that the government should make grants to assist in higher educational standards being attained. Education is the main training for any young person; it is something that will stay with him or her through life, and the more education they can have the better. I agree with the hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. McGarry), that Canada has a wonderful record so far as the war effort is concerned; I also agree with what he said as to the sacrifices that were made by our boys, and I believe that if we will only work as hard to win the peace as we did to win the war we shall have homes for these heroes and a decent Canada for all to live in.

Mr. WILLIAM BRYCE (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I am in the fortunate position that I do not need to come to the house to tell about my constituency of Selkirk, because anybody who has gone to school has read about those hardy pioneers from my native land, the Selkirk settlers, who came up the mighty Nelson and up lake Winnipeg and settled at Selkirk, Fort Garry and along the Red river valley. Later on, people came there from Iceland, people with a democratic point of view which has enriched our own democracy. Still later, we had people come to us from the Ukraine and other parts of Europe, who have helped to develop that great interlake country and have added to the wealth of Canada.

When I sat in the last parliament, Mr. Speaker, I was many times reminded that there were only two official languages in the House of Commons. I can assure you, sir, that my French has improved slightly but my English is no better. I should like to remind you, sir, of that age-old alliance between Scotland and France and to assure you that your countrymen and mine still respect that, and I am quite sure that when you think about it you will have no difficulty in understanding what I want to convey to my hon. friends on the other side.

The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) asked the other day when the war would be over, and there was quite a little amusement among hon. members when he asked that question, but I can assure them that it is a serious question for the dairy farmers to-day. The dairy farmers are being kept in business by a subsidy. The consumer is able to buy the milk his children require because of that subsidy, and I should like the government to come out and tell us if and when it intends to cut off that subsidy. The dairy farmer wants to know that so that he can plan his work. How long will this subsidy last? I do not know whether the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) or the government can tell us that, but it is something that the dairy farmers require to know, and know pretty soon. We have practically no butter in the country. The government at the present time is paying ten cents a pound subsidy to make it possible for our farmers to produce cream. It is a disgraceful state of affairs that the dairy industry has to be subsidized by ten cents a pound to produce butter. Where will our butter stocks be if that ten cent subsidy is taken away? We shall be in a deplorable state. The dairy business is not something that you can go into to-day and step out of to-morrow. You have to plan ahead and make arrangements; you have to get the feed up this summer that you will use next spring. I appeal to the government, through the Minister of Agriculture, to let us know something about that in the near future. It would be nice to know, too, when the subsidy to the millers is coming off wheat.

I should like to add a few words to what the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Wylie) said a few minutes ago. He talked about the beet growers. I am interested in beet growers, because we took a great deal of trouble in Manitoba to set up a beet factory so that we could establish a better way of farming and get away from straight grain growing. We set up that beet factory for that purpose, but the position to-day is such that we can hardly keep going.

I do not want to go over the whole thing again. The hon. member for Medicine Hat explained how we can feed pulp in the winter time and make as good sugar from beets as ever was made from cane. I want to put on the record, however, some of the things that these beet growers are thinking about. They were good enough to invite me to their meetings, and since they are constituents of mine I feel it my duty to bring their demands before the house.

1. The establishment of a sound sugar tariff in which ninety-six per cent raw sugar is taxed with at least ninety per cent of the white sugar rate of $2.64 and $1.84 per 100 pounds.

2. The immediate reinstatement of the customs duties specified in items 135 and 135 (b) on raw sugar until change in tariff is made.

3. An investigation of the profits of cane sugar refiners in the last twenty years and their justification.

4. An investigation of the real purpose of the so-called "sugar equalization fund" and of its use.

5. Publication of the operation and accounting of the "fund" by the sugar administration from its establishment up to date amounting at present to over $16,000,000.

6. The immediate appointment of a beet man as deputy sugar administrator, which position at present is held by a man who has made his living practically all his life out of commissions on raw cane sugar imports.

I wish to call these matters to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture. The hon. member for Medicine Hat wanted to know the reason why we could not have four or five times the sugar we have. I am going to put certain information on the record. I do not know why he did not if he had it. I am quoting from Canadian Sugar Policy:

Another unfortunate condition in the complicated Canadian sugar business is the fact that the two Ontario beet sugar mills in Chatham and Wallaceburg and the two Alberta beet sugar plants in Raymond and Picture Butte are owned and operated by the Canada and Dominion Sugar Company and a subsidiary of the B.C. Sugar Refining Company respectively, which companies operate at the same time large cane sugar refineries in Montreal and Vancouver. These people will never go all out for the beet industry as long as there is more profit in the cane refining than in the beet business, and by holding down, in conjunction with the St. Lawrence Cane Sugar Refinery, owned by Mr. J. W. McConnell, who also controls the Montreal Standard, Montreal Star, and Montreal Herald, and with the Atlantic-Acadia Cane Sugar refineries, the expansion of the beet industry to the status quo, they assure themselves of comfortable monopoly markets for their cane sugar products.

Like other speakers, I wish to be brief and I do not want to say more about that. But everyone seems to have been talking about what I intended to talk about.

The Winnipeg grain exchange is pretty close to me and I endorse everything which the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) said. I say to the government or any other government that follows it, heaven forbid that you should ever reopen the grain exchange, because every particle of stone, brick or lime in it was paid for by the sweat and toil of the western farmer. Do not ever forget that. Do not let it come back again. The wheat board has done a good job. It is not often that I hand bouquets to the government, but I say, you did a good job this time, although it can be improved on. In a world such as Henry Wallace talked about when he wrote of the century of the common man, did he expect that in 1945 or 1946 we would go back to gambling in the produce of the farmer? Certainly not. You can never again justifiably have gambling carried on with the produce of the farm. I am saying in pretty blunt words what I mean, but I mean it from the bottom of my heart when I say that we should never again allow gambling in this way. I do not think any man should have the right to gamble in the food of a nation; it should never be tolerated. I have nothing against the men on the grain exchange. They are all good fellows. It is the principle of the thing that I am thinking of. Why should they be parasites on the other fellow? Maybe I have said enough about that because I know there are a lot of people who want the grain exchange back. I do not know what the government was thinking about. I say to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) that he controlled wheat, barley and oats, and then he took over the flax and did a good job on the whole lot. Then he left the smallest crop so that they would have the thin edge of the wedge to start gambling again.

What about September rye? When the farmer sold his rye on September 21 of last year, he got ninety-one cents. Look at the newspaper to-day and see what the price is. It is $1.62⅝.

Mr. BURTON: The same old story.

Mr. BRYCE: That is the same old story. They did it with the wheat and they are still doing it with the rye. I say, shame on the government for allowing them to do it.

Mr. IRVINE: Coming through the rye.

Mr. BRYCE: I am sorry that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) is not in his place at the moment, because if my constituents ever get him back in Selkirk—

Mr. MacNICOL: He will never be in his place.

Mr. BRYCE: —they will have a lot to say to him. In the first place the income tax level is too low. An exemption of $660 and $1,200 is not good enough.

May I come back to the dairy farmer? Nobody in this country has exploited his family like the dairy farmer, and I am one of them. When my children were going to school they had to milk the cows before they went, so that we could send milk to Winnipeg to have some money to spend. These things are not taken into consideration by the income tax people. It is unfair. What about the farm woman? The Minister of Finance said last year that every woman would want the same concession if it were given to the farm wife. I say that the farm woman does far more than the city woman. She has to get up in the early morning to have the breakfast ready for the men to be in the field at half-past six. Then she has to wash dishes the last thing at night. No city woman does that. The sooner the Minister of Finance revises the income tax regulations, the sooner it will be safe for him to go back to Selkirk.

I do not wish to say very much more about cream production, but the income tax is a big handicap to getting cream to-day. In the constituency of Selkirk there was one man who had not filled out an income tax form. The forms were brought in and he was asked about it. The reply was that he had never earned enough money to fill in one. The inspector said to him, "You received so much for your grain?" The man said, "Yes." The inspector then said, "You sold some cows; what else did you sell?" He said, "I sold an old steer." The income tax man added these things up and made up a statement. He then said, "You sold some cream." The reply was, "Yes, we took a few cans of cream." The income tax man said, "Well, the dairy company in Winnipeg said you sold $400 worth of cream." He then tallied up the income tax form, gave him credit for the number he had in his family, and said, "You will have to pay income tax on $400." The farmer then got into the old car, or maybe the old buggy, and drove home. He then began to think about it. You see there are some people like that; they take a little while to think. He thought about it and he found that he was paying income tax on $400 that he and his family had earned before breakfast and after supper, and he said to himself, "I will never milk cows for Ilsley." The upshot of it is these cattle go to market and the country is deprived of another supply of cream. I want the government to take that into consideration. The man who is working a double day producing that cream before breakfast and after supper is entitled to some consideration in the income tax regulations; and do not let us forget the woman on the farm, because we would never get along without her.

Last year I asked the Minister of Agriculture some questions about condemnation insurance, and he assured me he would look into it. I am looking forward to having him tell us something about it because it still is as bad as it was. I showed the house that in 1943 the packing industry of Canada got about $800,000 more than they were entitled to in condemnation insurance alone. The figures all appear in government publications; there are no figures of mine in there. It is a disgrace that that should go on. They have given us a new schedule in the west, and they take so much a head, fifty cents for a female animal and thirty cents for a steer, half of one per cent on hogs, and so on. Why should that thing go on when we have established tuberculosis free areas in Manitoba? I live in a T.B. free area. Why should I have to pay condemnation insurance to the packer when I have no T.B. animals? Condemnation insurance has become a racket and the government should look into it. I can see the minister smiling. I assure him this is a serious business. We are still working on the T.B. insurance that was established a number of years ago when cattle were worth fifty or sixty dollars apiece. When I replace an animal in my herd to-day I pay $150, but I get only $38 from the government when they come and take it away because it is infected. That should be revised.

[Mr. Bryce.]

I ask the minister to revise that. Something should be done about it, because it is not a square deal.

I want to be as brief as possible, but I should like to touch on the cattle situation to-day. A few days ago the minister made a statement in which he said that we can be sure of the price for twelve or twenty-four months ahead. That is not the case. If I sell steers on Monday and get twelve cents for them and send the same quality of steers on Thursday and if there are plenty of steers on the market the packer will pay eleven cents. The only thing that happens is that the farmer loses another twelve dollars and the packer makes it, because the animal goes into the same grade as the ones he bought on Monday. The reason the twelve cents were paid on Monday is that there was not enough cattle on the market to bring down the price; on Thursday the market is perhaps flooded. Perhaps I can explain better what I mean if I quote from the Ottawa Journal of Thursday, September 13:

Board buying surplus lamb

The meat board is buying surplus Canadian lamb for export to Britain.

For lamb of exportable quality, and of 38 to 55 pounds cold weight, the board is paying one-quarter of a cent per pound below the ceiling in each marketing zone.

These lamb purchases, together with the board's action in buying all surplus mutton since July 24, assure Canadian farmers and ranchers a market for all their surplus lambs and sheep, said J. G. Taggart, chairman of the board.

That is not true. If there is a lean market it will work. The only person this protects is the packer. There is neither ceiling nor floor on live animals; it is only on the dead animal; when these lambs are dead they will be protected and the packer will have a market for them. But let you or me strike a market such as we had a year ago, when there were nine thousand lambs and sheep at Winnipeg; the minister knows what happened. We pleaded with him to open the market to the south; that was done, and what happened next morning? The packers had said they did not want those lambs; they were too leggy; they were thin; they were a poor type. Everything was wrong with them, but when we received the telegram from the minister saying that the market was open, the next morning the Winnipeg market rose $1.50, and one of the packers who said he did not need any lambs bought sixteen double-deck carloads. That is what happens, and I am sorry the government makes regulations like that. There is no protection for the farmer in a flooded market, because the packer can go in and buy at his own price. I used to blame the Minister of Agriculture for these things. I used to think the packing industry dominated the Department of Agriculture. Now I am satisfied that the packers dominate the government. That is the state of affairs which exists not only on the Winnipeg market but on other markets. The farmer has no protection whatever when he goes to the market; he has to take what he is offered, and the packer, being a shrewd business man, will buy at the lowest possible price.

We also have that situation in the fish industry. Look at the fellow who catches the pickerel in lake Winnipeg; he gets ten cents a pound; but when I go to buy that pickerel in the store in Winnipeg I pay forty-seven cents a pound for it, filleted. There may be some fish men here, and I want them to understand that I know a little about fishing. I have been there in the winter and taken the fish out of the nets, and I have been there in the summer time also. When a fish is filleted it may lose fifty per cent. That would make it equivalent to twenty cents a pound, but there is an awful killing for someone between twenty cents and forty-seven cents. The primary producer, the man who risks his life to get the fish, does not receive his fair share. I asked about that. I went to the fish packers and asked why there should be such a spread between the amount paid the primary producer and the retail market price. They replied, "Oh, we have nothing at all to do with that. Donald Gordon set the price." Well, Donald Gordon needs to revise his prices.

Recently in this house, Mr. Speaker, we have heard quite a bit about rationing. I do not object to rationing; I am all for it if it is going to spread the meat farther. I think the mistake made by the government was in removing rationing when they should have kept it on. I imagine they would begin to see their mistake last February or March, and they should have started rationing again at that time, but I suppose it was too near the election for them to risk it. Let us be fair about this. I have my own flesh and blood in the old country, and to-day they are eating less than they did during the war years. Those are the people who came through the blitz. We know what our own boys have done and what they have suffered. Do not let us kick about a little rationing in order to let the other fellow have something that is coming to him. Some time age I read a story about a prominent citizen of Ottawa who was visiting the ruins in England during the blitz, when people were being dug out and so on. A little fellow came along and for something to say the gentleman from Ottawa asked, "What do you hope to be when you grow up?" The little lad replied, "Alive." Let us be true Canadians about this. Any sacrifice we make will be nothing compared with what they did for us.

I want to get finished within my time, Mr. Speaker, or I shall not be able to say I was brief. After reviewing all these things I believe it is apparent that the putting into force of the necessary long-time agricultural policy, which should be in operation, is prevented through the domination of government policy by the meat packers, the millers, the sugar combines and so on. The result is that the primary producer is left with uncertain returns and at the mercy of big business.

Mr. P. C. BLACK (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, personally I should have preferred not to intervene in this debate at this time, but I think it only fair to my part of Canada that something more be said with respect to Nova Scotia and particularly Cumberland county. You have been offered many congratulations, sir, but the best I can wish for you is that at the end of your term you will prove to have been as acceptable to this parliament as your predecessor was to the last parliament.

This debate has been carried on largely by the new members, who have contributed many splendid addresses. There is no doubt that many of these new members will also make great contributions to our public life. Personally I miss the friendship of some who were here and with whom I was associated in the last parliament. I miss my friend Hon. R. B. Hanson, who was leader of the opposition for several years. Mr. Hanson had twenty-five years in public life; he served his country well.

I miss another colleague who sat near me, whom we called Billie Esling. He was, and is, one of the finest personalities who ever sat in a house of commons, respected and loved by all.

I should like to refer to another colleague who sat beside me. I have in mind Leonard O'Brien, who was an honour to any constituency fortunate enough to have him as its representative.

From across the way I miss a friend from my home town, Hon. J. L. Ralston, who served the people of this country in peace and in war, since 1908.

I miss, too, a friend who was with us a week ago, and whom I saw within twelve hours of his death, Hon. Norman McLarty, who was anxious to be helpful, and always extended to us his friendship.

These men and others we of this parliament miss. But we are glad to welcome the new members. Especially I would welcome the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Merritt), a man of whom everyone in Canada and in the allied armies is proud. The hon. member comes in a direct line from one of the greatest, if not the greatest statesman Canada ever produced, his great-grandfather being Sir Charles Tupper. This evening, on behalf of the people of Cumberland I extend to this hon. member an invitation to return to the place where the war-horse of Cumberland lived, to the constituency he represented and from which he made such a great contribution to the public life of Nova Scotia and of Canada. This country would not be what it is to-day, had it not been for the statesmanship of Sir Charles Tupper.

I am also pleased to have in his proper seat our leader, Mr. Bracken. Throughout all his life he has served the public, and I believe he has still a greater service to render to his country. It is a great misfortune that party leaders have such difficulty in gaining election to parliament. Surely that is a reflection upon the voters and the opposing parties. One can look over the history of leaders of political parties in Canada, and he would recognize at once how unfortunate it has been that they have had so much difficulty in having themselves elected—and I am sure the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) will agree with me in this.

There are many subjects with which I could deal, but I shall make my remarks fairly brief. The subject of greatest concern in my province, is the future industrial prospects of Nova Scotia and, in particular, the county of Cumberland. It is only fair to say that they are very much disturbed, very much worried.

To-night I am going to read some of the statements made on Monday of this week by the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe). I have done what I could to assist him during the war, when he served as Minister of Munitions and Supply. At least I have not made his work any more difficult, and I have endeavoured to uphold him both in the house and in the country. I assure him I will give him all the support of which I am capable in the great task that is his in this period of reconstruction.

The people of Cumberland and of Nova Scotia generally have been very much disturbed, but if they could accept the statements made by the minister they would be completely reassured, and would feel that they could take their place in the industrial life of this country.

[Mr. P. C. Black.]

In the statement of the Minister of Reconstruction to which I listened on September 17, and which I afterwards read, he said, as reported at page 223 of Hansard:

I see nothing disturbing in the present situation as far as employment is concerned.

My constituents, and the people of Nova Scotia generally, will be very glad indeed to receive that statement, if they can believe it and if that promise will be fulfilled. In my town of Amherst there was an industry employing 3,000 during the war. The staff has been reduced to about 300, most of whom are working on inventories and records.

At a later point in his speech the minister said:

One thing that is abundantly clear is that there are at this moment two jobs open for each and every applicant for a job.

That is welcome news for people in my constituency, if they accept it, or hold the minister to his assurance.

Again he said, on the same page of Hansard:

The work of reconstruction has been in progress since early in 1944 and has been accelerated since the establishment of the Department of Reconstruction in the summer of 1944. The work divides itself into the following branches: First, over-all planning including studies of economics and statistics; second, industrial reconversion; third, research and development; and, fourth, control and distribution of materials.

My people in Nova Scotia will want to know what planning there has been; they do not know. They will want to know what industrial reconversion there has been in their province; they do not know. They want to know what research and development there has been; they do not know. They want to know what control and what distribution of materials there has been.

I could make many other quotations from the minister's speech, but I must hurry on. He stated further, as reported at page 225:

Reconversion is also under way in war plants owned by the dominion government. This is more difficult in that a sale of the plant to private industry usually is involved. For some months we have had a fairly definite idea of the nature of the peace-time industry which would use each government-owned plant.

We have government constructed and owned plants and buildings in the town of Amherst, and our citizens are most anxious to know what has been done or is to be done with them.

Further on he said:

As nearly as possible we endeavour to keep each plant in a line of work comparable with its former employment in order that the workers living in the vicinity may find employment in the same plant without too great a change of skills.

That is the best news the town of Amherst and people in other parts of Nova Scotia have heard since V-E day or V-J day, when our forces became victorious. But they want a little more evidence that this policy will be applied.

Then he goes on to say:

A limited number of war plants are being retained by the crown and rented for multiple occupancy as an incubator for small industries. Here again the demand for space exceeds any reasonable supply. The most promising small industries are being given preference, and it is expected that from these multiple occupancy plants will develop industries which will in time build and occupy their own premises.

That will be great news for the people back home. Then the minister goes on:

It is quite obvious that during 1946 we may expect an expansion of peace-time industry comparable with the expansion of industry generally during the war years. Many of the largest expansions of industry yet to be reported are now being processed in the Department of Reconstruction.

We would like to have more detailed information with respect to that policy as it applies to our part of Canada. Then the minister goes on:

In our earlier studies of requirements to provide continued full employment we estimated that one million jobs in excess of those obtainable in 1939 would be required. I can report that the one million additional peace-time jobs are definitely in sight, and that there is little likelihood of any over-all lack of employment in the near future.

The province of Nova Scotia and the other maritime provinces consider that it is within their rights to share in this reconversion and industrial expansion which the minister promises will be forthcoming to Canada. Many of our work men and women are walking the streets and many have had to leave recently for central Canada in order to obtain employment. I could go on to give further quotations and hold the minister to an accounting and ask that he apply these assurances to our part of Canada. I believe the maritime provinces have earned a right to sympathetic and fair treatment. I will help the minister; I will help the government and I believe every member of parliament should do everything possible in order that the maritime provinces may participate and share in this industrial activity or expansion that he promises is coming to Canada.

I do not want to make any complaint, but our part of Canada was the last to get wartime industry. The work men and work women of Amherst were enticed away, as were the people in the rest of the maritime provinces. I have under my hand advertisements which appeared prior to the establishment of war industries in our town by which working people were induced to go to central Canada. Here is one which reads:

Wanted

Women to work in a war industry.
Fifty miles outside of Montreal.
Must be between the ages of eighteen and forty.

Here is another one:

Wanted

Girls to help in the production of munitions which are urgently required by our armed forces, the war industry near Montreal requires immediately girls for the following classes of work:

A—Cartridge machine operators.
B—Cartridge inspectors.
C—Matrons.
D—Stenographers.
E—Typists.
F—General office clerks.

While we were slow in getting under way, we have made a good record. I believe the Robb engineering works has made as good a record in the production of shells as any plant in Canada. But this industry has now had to let out a large number of its experienced and skilled help. We have a good clothing industry and we have an aeroplane industry that employed, as I said, three thousand men at one time, but which now has only three hundred. Six or seven industries in the country were given the responsibility after the battle of Britain of assembling and building the Avro-Anson training plane, and one was located at Amherst. The first Avro-Anson training plane that flew in Canada was built in the Amherst plant. Many of the workmen in that plant were not trained, but they were natural mechanics. They felt they had a high duty and responsibility, and the result was that they did such efficient work that they built the first plane put out by any shop in Canada.

Certain information was brought out in the war expenditures committee, but we are not supposed to refer to it and I do not intend to do so. However, information came to me from other sources that the Amherst shop gave the best results of any aeroplane factory in Canada. It was not perfect because there was some waste and lost time; nevertheless its record was the best. They got the best results. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) will confirm that because he got full cooperation from labour, which gave him no difficulty whatever. I have here a report by the minister of labour of Nova Scotia which was given publicity on September 6. It reads:

Another high achievement has been emblazoned on the war record of Nova Scotia, it was ascertained yesterday when Hon. L. D.

Currie, minister for labour in Nova Scotia told Kiwanis club listeners that the province, man for man, had the highest percentage of production and the lowest percentage of absenteeism in the whole of Canada.

The province was also lowest when the count of men stopping work through strikes was tallied up.

The brisk town of Amherst led the dominion in single town performance, closely followed by Pictou, with Halifax following in third position.

This set of records was highly gratifying and throughout the war Nova Scotians paid attention to their knitting in sterling fashion.

Mr. Currie said there was no reason why Nova Scotia cannot continue in peace what she has done so magnificently in war.

All I ask on behalf of the people of Nova Scotia, of the maritime provinces generally and of my own constituency is that they be given an opportunity. It is the duty and responsibility of the minister to see that this is done. Our part of Canada has played its full part in building up Canada. It has played its full part in the war. Enlistments there have been as high as in any part of Canada. It has played its full part in industry. All it asks now is that it be given an opportunity to have a place in the peace-time industrial life of Canada.

The working people of Amherst will cooperate with the minister. I believe that every member of this house should be anxious to see Amherst and other places in the maritime provinces have a share in the industrial activity under reconversion. I do not want to take up much time but there are a few matters I should like to deal with.

During this session reference has been made to the building of the St. Lawrence waterway. I think the people of Canada are satisfied that that great waterway should be built. I am in favour of it, but I make this condition—and I believe every member from the maritime provinces should support me—that at the same time the Chignecto canal should be built. This portage was used by the early French settlers three hundred years or more ago when they crossed the isthmus of Chignecto. The building of this canal is justified from a commercial point of view. It is justified also from a defence point of view and we should have the cooperation of the United States in its construction. It would have justified itself in the last great war, and we in the maritime provinces are entitled to have this construction proceeded with. Cheap power should be available, either by the construction of power plants on the Petitcodiac river or by the use of coal at the mine mouths. With this power available, industry in the maritime provinces would be on a parity with industries located along the St. Lawrence waterway. I appeal to the people from all over Canada to see that some measure of fairness is extended to the people of my part of Canada.

I want to refer to the ferry boat Kipawo, which with its predecessor plied between Wolfville and Parrsboro' across Minas basin for forty years. It is the only ferry service in all Canada that has been discontinued during the war. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) will bear me out when I say that it was discontinued because the boat was needed for war purposes. I ask that that boat and service be restored.

I also ask that greater measure of justice be extended to the people of the maritime provinces as regards the cost of many commodities which they buy in central Canada. I pointed out to the house in the previous parliament that bicycles, for instance, with a ceiling price were sold at higher prices in the maritimes than in any part of Ontario or Quebec. Automobiles and trucks are also sold at higher prices in the maritime provinces than in central Canada. If we cannot build these articles and many scores of others in the maritime provinces I believe that there should be an equalization of freight rates so that the people of the maritime provinces will not be penalized by having to pay higher prices than are paid in central Canada.

In Nova Scotia there is also the question of the sugar refinery which was closed down in the early days of the war. I saw a short time ago a ship of 6,000 tons discharging its cargo of raw sugar at Halifax harbour, and that sugar and following cargoes were shipped through Nova Scotia to be refined elsewhere, while our Nova Scotia industry was idle.

The rolling mills at Trenton have been closed, and now the users of secondary products have to buy many of them in central Canada and have delays and the additional freight rate to pay in getting them delivered to their machine shops in the maritime provinces.

I want once again to refer to the marsh lands, and in this I know I have the support of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). The marsh lands are deteriorating year by year. They are the most fertile lands in all Canada. While millions are being expended to develop virgin areas in the west—and I have supported it—we have never been able to have any complete programme undertaken by this government to protect these marsh lands from the tides, to drain them to utilize their fertility. We had the assurance from my leader when he was in the maritime provinces that such a programme would receive his support. Again I say that as regards the marsh lands there has been no sense of fairness in what has been done for these fertile lands at the head of the bay of Fundy in comparison with what has been done under prairie farm rehabilitation in the west. I appeal again to the Minister of Agriculture and to the government that they do not allow this condition to obtain any longer.

An hon. MEMBER: Question.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, some members are crying "question," but I have not taken up very much of the time of this house, and I am pleading now for some measure of justice and some measure of appreciation with respect to what is required in the maritime provinces.

A great duty devolves not only upon this government but upon the Canadian Car and Foundry company, which had its inception in the town of Amherst, its first president being the Hon. N. Curry. But central Canada has drawn its activities away from Amherst. Canadian Car and Foundry has a great record in this war. Its production has totalled over $300,000,000, and it has paid out in wages $121,000,000. It has undertaken projects for the British government, the United States government and the Canadian government when other industries were loath to do so. I repeat, it has a great record in the war, but if it is to be a real Canadian industry carrying the confidence of all the people of Canada it should make it its duty to see that some post-war industry is established in the town of Amherst that will employ one thousand workers. I appeal to the government to see that that company gets all the assistance to which it is entitled and that every means is taken to bring about the establishment of such an industry in Amherst.

I am not going to take up any more time, but I have felt it my duty to place before the house the situation as regards the maritime provinces, Nova Scotia and my own constituency of Cumberland. The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply gave a glowing report to the house the other night, but I want to tell him that the people in my part of the country are much disturbed over what is to be their fate in the post-war years, and they will hold the minister and the government and all the members of the federal parliament to an accounting that in the years that are ahead a greater measure of justice be done to the people of the maritime provinces than has been done in the last twenty-five years.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, before you put the question on the amendment I should like to say a few words.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Dispense.

Mr. HANSELL: I must inform the hon. gentlemen that I cannot possibly dispense with what I have to say. It may be wondered why I rise at this time, while the vote is in process of being taken; and some may wonder why our party took the position we did on the motion which has just been defeated. I may say that we regarded the motion, as it was worded, as a political motion, one of those I used to call, once upon a time, a double-barreled motion: you get heck if you do and you get heck if you don't. The wording of that motion was not particularly clear; at least there was one word in it we did not like, the word "alone." The motion said that the government had failed to propose the fundamental social and economic changes which alone—

Mr. IRVINE: I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman is discussing a motion which has been dealt with by this house.

Mr. HANSELL: Perhaps I am out of order, but I was only explaining why we did not vote for the motion. If the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine) will say out loud what he has just said under his breath I am sure this house and his constituents would like to hear it.

Mr. IRVINE: Don't worry; I will say it in a minute.

Mr. HANSELL: He will not repeat the words he has just used.

I wish to embark upon a subject which has not been mentioned this session and which indeed, during the time I have been in this house, has not been given the attention which I believe it deserves. I refer to the question of electoral and parliamentary reform. I do not speak on this subject with a claim to any superabundance of knowledge by reason of any particular research I have conducted. I base my arguments purely upon my own observations after sitting in this house for several years.

I have concluded, Mr. Speaker, that the most futile business in the world is that of a private member of this house. I have a desire to bring about in Canada a parliamentary system which at all times will get for the people the results they want. I notice quite a number of new faces in the house, quite a number of new members, some of whom I believe are distinguished gentlemen. I understand there are some who have the distinction of having won the Victoria Cross. I believe we have in our midst some high ranking military men. We have one hon. gentleman, who was also here in the last parliament, who on one occasion was lieutenant-governor of Ontario. These men should be of inestimable value to this country; but as time goes by and they sit here I think they will discover that their business here as private members is just about as futile as anything in the world. We have in this parliament some young men with all the exuberance and ambition of youth; someone has said that this is a young man's age, and I am glad to welcome these young men into parliament. I do not agree, however, that this is particularly a young man's age; I rather agree with Henry Ford, who a few years ago said that if you took out of the world all the brains over sixty-five you would not have enough brains left to run it. I suppose these young men came into parliament with visions of doing great things. As they sit here as private members, I am afraid it will not be long before they will be sadly disillusioned. Before I came here to the session a gentleman stopped me on the street and said, "I believe parliament has been reduced to nothing more than a glorified debating society".

Mr. SINNOTT: You said it.

Mr. HANSELL: It was said by a gentleman in my own town, whose name my hon. friend would not know. He was a good Conservative, but that does not make any difference. I replied, "Well, you are wrong. It is not even a glorified debating society". It is not even a good debating society, for in a debating society the side that has all the arguments can win on points, but that never happens here. It does not make any difference who has the best of the argument; the government always wins. Before we ever start out in a debate we know who is going to win. So I say it does not make any difference how logical an argument may be, or how forceful it may be; the government always wins.

When parliament opens it does so with a good deal of pomp and dignity. There is the firing of guns, the playing of bands and the officials dressed in their official robes. Soldiers are there as their bodyguard; the mounted police stand at attention dressed in their bright red tunics, and the whole thing gives a tremendous air of importance. I have no criticism to make of that. Perhaps it is as it should be. But sometimes I wonder if all this is simply to fool us into believing that we are really going to do something.

I am sure we are glad to welcome the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Bracken) to the House of Commons. He is a public servant paid for guiding the opposition in the house. I believe he should be paid. Further, he should be paid all he is getting—and he should try to get all he can. I am inclined to believe that the leaders of other parties should also get just a little more for their efforts. However, be that as it may, what happens? In reality, what is happening is simply this, that the leader of the opposition is paid to be an expert in argumentation—and nothing else. Because even he, no matter how forceful his argument and no matter how logical, can never expect to win. The government always wins. And whether it be he or the leader of any other party, no matter how they may feel about their work, they are private members just the same and, so far as power is concerned, they have no more power in parliament than the little page boy who sits in a dignified position at your feet, Mr. Speaker.

The government is all-powerful in these things. What I am calling for is a real, democratic parliament. I am calling for a type of electoral and parliamentary reform under which each and every member of parliament would be directly responsible to the people of his constituency—and nobody else. But what we have in our present parliamentary system is not that. Let no one think I am wholly against the party system; what I am against is rigid party machinery, whereby a man when he is out stumping for the election is bidding for the people to send him to parliament on the basis that he will do what they want, but when he comes to Ottawa finds that he has to do what his party leaders want. That is the thing I criticize.

For what reason does this parliament exist? What, in reality, is its purpose? I do not know that I have ever read a definition of it, but I have prepared one of my own, and I would like hon. members to tell me if there is anything wrong with it: The Canadian parliament exists for the purpose of passing such legislation as will give to the people of Canada the results they want. I do not think there is anything wrong with that as a definition of what this parliament should be. But may I ask this: Do the people of Canada get the results they want?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. HANSELL: Of course they do not. Did they get the results they wanted between 1930 and 1940? Are the old age pensioners to-day getting all the results they want? We could go through the whole gamut of public life in Canada, and I am quite certain we could not say that the people have had the results they wanted.

Why not? Well, if parliament is here to legislate, surely it should be able to legislate without fear or favour, and with no strings attached, party or otherwise, so that legislation would be put on the statute books of Canada which would give to the people exactly the results they want. To a great extent, they do not get those results because of the impotency of parliament. Believe me, it is a brave man who will rise in his place on the government side of the house and vote against his party because he stands for great principles.

I am convinced that under our present electoral and parliamentary set-up the only democracy we have in Canada is the right to cast a ballot—and democracy ceases at the ballot box. Just the same, may I say I was very glad when the gentleman who ran in the Prince Albert constituency, and whose name on the ballot appeared as the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King, was defeated.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HANSELL: Imagine my Liberal friends applauding my saying that I am glad he was defeated!

Do not misunderstand me; I was not particularly glad that he was not coming back here, or that it appeared that he would not be coming back. I am sure we would have missed him. It does not make very much difference to me whether it is a Liberal leader, a Conservative or a C.C.F. What I want there is a Social Credit leader. When I say I was glad he was defeated, it was not because of anything personal. Do not judge me too harshly. But I am glad that there is enough democracy left in Canada to say to any man, "We do not want you."

Some hon. member suggests that he could go somewhere else to get elected. That supports my argument, because there is still enough democracy left in Canada that one section of the country cannot dictate to another.

Does anyone suppose that in Germany at an election anyone could have defeated Adolf Hitler?

An hon. MEMBER: He is dead.

Mr. HANSELL: Do you suppose they could have put out Mussolini?

An hon. MEMBER: He is dead.

Mr. HANSELL: Do you suppose that to-day the people of Russia could put out Mr. Stalin?

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. HANSELL: Has it been noised around that Russia is to hold an election? I say, we have a democratic heritage we must safeguard. What we must do, further than that, is to make it a real and effective democracy. I want a democracy where the people themselves are all-powerful at all times. Are they to-day? I do not think I shall be contradicted —perhaps my Liberal friends will contradict me—when I say that one man in Canada under our present political system is all-powerful. I am not concerned with the name of this man; I do not care who he was twenty years ago or who he may be five years from now, but I refer to the man who holds the position of Prime Minister of Canada. There has been plenty of proof for my statement in days gone by.

I need to refer only to the by-election held in Grey North some months ago. What happened there? The Prime Minster said, "I want to find a seat for my Minister of National Defence. If the people of Grey North are prepared to nominate him I shall have him run in Grey North." Personally I think he should have won the election and had his minister here, but that is not what happened. Before nomination day the Prime Minister said that he hoped his minister would not be opposed. It is a nice thing to be able to send out a feeler. However, other parties had a right to nominate candidates, and they did so. Then what did the Prime Minister do? Before nomination day he threatened that if his candidate was opposed and national issues were discussed he would call a general election.

Do you mean to tell me that one man in Canada should be able to do that. That is being all-powerful. National issues were brought into the picture and then the Prime Minister said that if his candidate was not elected he might not even have a session of parliament; he would call a general election before the session. That was quite a threat. Imagine all that power in the hands of one man. Is it right that in an effective democracy one man can talk to 12,000,000 people in that way? That is the position.

Take the matter of the calling of an election. Who decides when we should have an election? Is the leader of the opposition consulted? Is anybody consulted? I do not know whether the Liberal party is consulted, but certainly the country is not. Who sets the date for an election? One man. Why? Because that one man is all-powerful. I am inclined—I am not expressing the views of my party because I have not discussed it with them, although I know they are in favour of parliamentary reform—to favour the United States system with respect to the calling of elections and have elections held constitutionally on a certain day of a certain year, whether it is every four or five years does not make any difference. I believe that would be more democratic. Under such a system the country would not be left in suspense as to the immediate future when rumours of an election appear upon the horizon.

There is another thing I should like to refer to with respect to our parliamentary procedure. The Prime Minister of this country together with his cabinet should at all times be the servants of this house. It may be said that they are and there may be an argument there, but it does not work out that way in practice. In practice the government bring down the legislation. They say, "Here it is, boys; take it or leave it." The party machinery gets going; the whips get going; you know beforehand that the legislation they bring down is what they have determined must pass, and it passes in spite of anything else.

I claim that that is not free democracy. The cabinet of Canada should be the servants of this house. Again I rather favour the United States plan. There the President and his cabinet have no seats in congress. I am not going to be extreme on this, but I am making a suggestion that the cabinet of Canada should not have seats in this house. They should constitute an executive body to administer the legislation that this house passes whether they want it or not.

I know what the argument against that will be. It will be said, "You do not mean to say that that executive body would have to do something they would not want to do?" Could there possibly be anything they would not want to do that the people's representatives, who are the mouthpiece of the people, decided the country wanted done? Of course there would not. They might offer some excuse and say that there were other factors, that we would want them to do something that was impossible, but surely the members of parliament would not be so stupid as to put legislation on the books that was physically impossible of accomplishment.

But I know the reason they would take that view. The reason is that money is their master. Many of the new members may not realize that it is against parliamentary procedure for a private member to bring down a measure involving an increase in expenditures. I think that is one of the most vicious things in our parliamentary system. It simply means that parliament is subject to the money powers. The cabinet, which would be the executive body, is tied hand and foot by that which finance dictates. It has been said by us over and over again and it was said the other day by one of my friends to my right —I think he copied it from us—that that which is physically possible must be made financially possible. If anything is physically possible and is desirable, is there any reason in this world why the cabinet, the executive body, should not be the servant of parliament and do that thing which parliament says is physically possible and desirable?

Another matter. I am not satisfied that just because a motion moved in the name of the government is not passed it should constitute a want-of-confidence motion. I never could bring myself to believe that it should, and yet that is the big club which the government uses all the time over the members of this house and over their own party in particular: you must vote for this motion or it constitutes a want-of-confidence motion and that means an election; so you cannot vote for the motion. Surely, if parliament is supreme, we can vote against government policy without meaning that we want these men in the government to cease administering the affairs of the country. They do it in the United States and in other countries. Personally I must really confess I am not in agreement with all my colleagues in that I have not any particular grievance with the way the government has been managing affairs.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not know whether I appreciate that applause or not. What I am against is government policy. I believe their policy is all wrong. But if it is business administrators you want, I do not know why the Liberal party should not have just as good administrators as any other party. That is my personal position. I know there are a lot of little things wrong and things wrong which appear on the surface to be big things—housing, the return of our troops, and that sort of thing. But I want to be fair. I realize that in this transition period these are big jobs. Why should not parliament be able to say "yes" or "no" to any government legislation without running the risk of plunging the country into an election?

I have offered these suggestions which I think are reasonable ones. What I say is all in favour of the argument for some type of electoral and parliamentary reform. I believe that there should be some reform of the senate, but I am not going into that to-night except to say that seats in the senate should be won by election and not be granted by appointment. But seats in the senate have largely become a system of political rewards, and that should never be in a democratic country.

A word about money. Why should the government say: We cannot do anything because we haven't the money. Let parliament tell them what should be done. We do not say: You cannot run any trains because we have no tickets. We do not say: You cannot make any cloth because we have no more yardsticks. We do not say: You cannot have any roads because we do not have any miles. Physically it is possible to do all these things. If this parliament should decide that a thing is physically possible and desirable, that should be legislated, and the government of the country, who are supposed to be the servants of the people, should forthwith act accordingly. Then they would be the true servants of the people. Then we would have an effective democracy.

There is a good deal more to say along this line, but I see that it is getting towards eleven o'clock, and I suppose it is only right that I should stop speaking now because I have an amendment to the amendment to propose which I now move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low):

That the amendment be amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

and has further,

(d) failed to meet the needs of Canada for a prosperous peace and in particular, to provide a means of ensuring that the national production shall be kept at a sufficiently high level to provide every Canadian with a standard of living commensurate with Canada's ability to produce;

(e) failed to provide this country with an effective and scientific financial policy for distributing to all Canadians their fair share of the national production without increasing the burden of taxation or the national debt.

On motion of Mr. Matthews (Kootenay East) the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, September 21, 1945.

The house met at three o'clock.

MEAT RATIONING

STATEMENT ON CONFERENCE BETWEEN OFFICIALS OF THE WARTIME PRICES AND TRADE BOARD AND MEAT DEALERS

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I was asked two or three days ago to make a statement about meat rationing in the light of the discussion with the representatives of the meat dealers who were here this week.

A meeting was held on Wednesday between officials of the wartime prices and trade board and a delegation representing the meat dealers' division of the Retail Merchants' Association of Canada. In the course of these meetings the members of the retailers' delegation adopted a resolution requesting the immediate suspension of meat rationing in favour of a plan to requisition the required percentage of Canada's productive capacity in meat and meat products sufficient to enable the government to meet its commitments to the United Kingdom and liberated Europe, permitting the balance to be distributed through the regular channels of trade, subject only to the provision that the dominion government, through the wartime prices and trade board, use the board's existing facilities to ensure equitable distribution.

The resolution went on to request that this plan be tested out for the remainder of this calendar year and if it failed to function satisfactorily, the retail merchants' association offered its further cooperation in endeavouring to work out some other plan that would achieve the objective of both meeting our overseas commitments and ensuring equitable distribution to Canadian consumers.

The delegation of retailers made it quite clear that they were opposed to consumer rationing in any form. Without prejudice to their main recommendation, however, they also made a number of suggestions with respect to technical details of the rationing system.

The very sincere representations which were made by this group have received careful consideration. Hon. members will appreciate, however, that their main recommendation is not a new one, and in this connection I would refer to the statement which I made to the house on September 13, appearing on pages 140 and 141 of Hansard. As I said at that time, no one welcomes rationing, neither the officials who have to administer it nor the consumer, nor the industry, nor the trade. Before rationing was decided upon, both the officials of the wartime prices and trade board and the members of the government gave most careful and prolonged consideration to ways and means of achieving our objectives with the minimum of inconvenience to all concerned. Our dual objective is to reduce domestic consumption so that we may be able to provide the United Kingdom and liberated Europe with the meat which we contracted to supply and the additional amounts we undertook to endeavour to provide, and at the same time to ensure fair shares at fair prices to all Canadian consumers.

I do not want to repeat everything that I said here a week ago yesterday, but I should like to reemphasize the following points:

(a) Only meat originating in inspected plants can enter into interprovincial trade or be exported. It is meat from these inspected plants which supplies a large part of the necessary meat requirements of deficiency-producing areas such as the maritime provinces, the northern parts of Ontario and Quebec and British Columbia, and in addition, the larger metropolitan centres in Canada.

(b) The requisitioning of meats in sufficient quantity to fulfil overseas requirements would shorten the supplies, with the effect that areas of surplus production would have abundant supplies, amply sufficient to meet the entire consumer demand, and the deficiency areas would go extremely short. Throughout these deficiency areas and large urban centres the serious maldistribution would breed black markets and lead to a breakdown of price controls.

(c) The meat trade is a highly complex organization with highly complex channels of distribution. The wartime prices and trade board has been able to devise no practical means other than rationing whereby meat could be directed through these complex channels in any way that would assure fair shares to retailers and to consumers in all parts of Canada.

Members of the retail meat dealers' delegation which made the above recommendation are reported to me to have said that they were prepared "to take their chances" on getting their fair share of meat. We are convinced that in fact each would not get his fair share, and we believe that in a very short time the dealers in the areas I have referred to would be demanding redress as they did late in 1942 and early in 1943 and as they were beginning to do in the spring of 1945 when temporary shortages began to appear in certain eastern cities.

If the retailers were the only persons who would suffer by such an experiment there might be something to be said in favour of trying it. But the real sufferers, the final victims of the maldistribution which we are convinced would occur, would not be the retailers but the families who depend upon them for supplies. The government do not consider that they would be justified in gambling where the stakes at issue are the essential food of hundreds of thousands of Canadian families.

The policy of the government, therefore, is that meat rationing will remain in effect until it becomes clear that we can fulfil both our overseas responsibilities and our responsibility to our own consumers without it.

Hon. members are also aware that apart from the principle of rationing, we have been receiving many representations respecting the details of the rationing system. I believe that most of these complaints are the result of unfamiliarity with the details of rationing which is inevitable during the first week or two of its operation. Already we are receiving evidence that a great part of this misunderstanding is disappearing, and that both consumers and the trade are rapidly adjusting themselves to the new situation.

On a number of points it is still too early to form a fair judgment as to whether complaints are simply due to unfamiliarity or represent actual defects which should be corrected. During the next few weeks numerous conferences will be going on with a view to smoothing out both the real and the apparent difficulties.

The wartime prices and trade board, however, has decided to make one immediate change, and it has to-day issued an order temporarily removing from the ration what are sometimes termed "edible butchers offals" and sometimes "fancy meats," that is, such items as livers, hearts, kidneys and tongues. The reason for this temporary suspension is that these meats are relatively more perishable than others, and that there appears to be evidence that their sales have slowed down in some areas to a point where actual spoilage threatens to occur.

It is estimated that in a full year the quantity of these meats normally available for consumption in Canada is about 50 or 60 million pounds. The permanent removal of these from the ration would therefore mean that consumers would have available to them 20 or 25 million additional coupons with which they could purchase other meats, which would in turn reduce the quantities available for overseas shipment.

The board therefore proposes first to re-examine the practicability of putting these items back on the ration at a date, say, six or eight weeks hence, by which time everybody will be readily familiar with the rationing system, or if that seems impracticable the board will take some other appropriate step to keep over-all meat consumption within the target set, such as widening to two weeks the gap between coupon validity dates once every three or four months.

In the meantime, the meat board, under the Department of Agriculture, which handles all export commitments, will be authorized to requisition such additional quantities of edible offals as may be necessary to fill export demands as they arise.

The wartime prices and trade board realizes that the lifting of the ration on these items will probably result in considerable maldistribution of them in many centres. In order to meet this difficulty as far as possible, the board is directing all inspected plants to maintain pro rata equitable distribution of their supplies of such products as between secondary meat processors, public eating places, hospitals and institutions, and retail outlets. It will be impossible to guarantee equitable distribution between areas and between retailers, but the board will endeavour to see that undue proportions do not go to secondary processors or hotels and restaurants. It will be understood, of course, that public eating places will still be prohibited from serving liver, hearts, kidneys, tongues and the like on meatless days.

Another question was asked by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) involving the presentation of certain statistics. I am afraid I shall not be able to make a complete presentation of those until Monday, but I intend to put them on record at that time.

With regard to the difficulties of the meat dealers, I may say in conclusion that the government has the greatest sympathy with the administrative embarrassment that the meat rationing system causes to members of this trade, and is willing to do anything within reason to help them meet their problems. But the considerations involved in meat rationing are so much broader and so much more important than this, that the decision to go on with it or to cease must be based on those broader considerations.

PACKERS AND DEALERS—FREEZING SPACE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): I should like to ask the minister what arrangements have been made by the government to take meat from the packers or meat dealers so they will have ample freezing space. A report was broadcast over the radio, and also appeared in the press, that an official of the wartime prices and trade board told a meat dealer, Mr. Kline, of the civic abattoir in Toronto, that he could throw the meat into the lake if he did not have sufficient freezing space. Is the government taking that meat off the hands of these people, or what arrangements have been made?

Mr. ILSLEY: To begin with, I do not know whether there is any foundation whatever for the report to which the hon. member refers.

Mr. FRASER: The minister has heard of the statement?

Mr. ILSLEY: I saw some reference to it in the press.

Mr. KNOWLES: There are many things in the press.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. I would be very doubtful if anything like that was said. In regard to the cold storage situation, I am not in a position to make a statement, but I am informed that there is some congestion in regard to the facilities for what is called sharp freezing, which they hope will be cleared up within a week. With regard to cold storage proper, I am told that the facilities are ample and there is no congestion.

Mr. FRASER: This statement is reported to have been made to Mr. Kline, manager of the killing plant of the Toronto civic abattoir.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The statement of the minister is not debatable.

WORKERS IN HEAVY INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): Has any action been taken by the wartime prices and trade board to make available to miners, loggers, threshers and others, increased quantities of meat? This question has been raised on at least three occasions in the house, and I am wondering what has been done.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order, I would ask the hon. member to put his question on the order paper.

Mr. FAIR: Mr. Speaker, only this morning I received a telegram from Drumheller stating that some of the miners' unions out there intend to go on strike by Wednesday next, or at least to consider going on strike if something is not done. A copy of the telegram has been sent to Mr. Donald Gordon. I suggest there is an emergency here.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member would put his question on the order paper, even if it is urgent, it could wait a few days, and the minister would have time to look into it.

Mr. FAIR: The question was asked a week ago, and on two different occasions since. I suggest we should have an answer.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would call the hon. member's attention to the fact that in giving my decision I am only following what the house itself decided.

BRITISH COLUMBIA LOGGERS

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): May I have an answer which was promised by the minister in connection with the action contemplated or intended in respect of meat rationing in so far as the loggers of British Columbia are concerned?

Mr. FAIR: Order paper.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member to put the question on the order paper.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Mr. Speaker, the minister promised me an answer.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I wrote the hon. member two or three days ago giving him the information. I did not realize that he necessarily wanted it made public.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

HOSPITAL ACCOMMODATION—CHRISTIE STREET—SUNNYBROOK

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Yesterday I was asked by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce), who does not appear to be in the chamber at the moment, a question in reference to hospital accommodation for veterans in the city of Toronto, and particularly with reference to the question of congestion relating to out-patients at Christie Street. I may tell the house that a week ago we took active steps to meet and deal with that situation, by sending a senior medical officer and a senior administrative officer to Toronto. We are now endeavouring to obtain downtown premises in Toronto where out-patients may be interviewed and those screened who do not require to go to the hospital for treatment.

In regard to the general hospital situation in Canada, I intended to deal with this matter later on when my estimates were being considered by the house, but it may interest hon. members to know that we now have in Canada in this department a normal bed capacity of 9,603, with 7,226 patients and 2,379 vacant beds. There is either being constructed or about to be constructed accommodation for an additional 6,000 beds, of which 1,200 will be for health and occupational centres. It may also interest hon. members to learn that all battle casualties with the exception of twenty-six have been returned to Canada, which reflects tremendous credit upon the Minister of National Defence and his staff.

In regard to the second portion of the question asked by the hon. member for Parkdale, dealing with the progress of the construction of Sunnybrook hospital, I would ask permission to have that answered by my colleague the Minister of Public Works, who is in charge of that work.

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): Last week the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) and yesterday the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) inquired as to the progress of the construction of Sunnybrook hospital. I have now a report from our consulting engineer. This hospital is composed of six units, and I have been given a summary of the progress of the work.

The status of the work is as follows:

Boiler house. The building is completed, except for finished floors which are not ordinarily laid until all machinery and piping work is done. The chimney is up to sixty per cent height, but work suspended awaiting more of the special brick. All three boilers are well advanced, and should be completed next week. Pumps and other equipment have been set on their bases, and piping up is proceeding. Most of the piping in the tunnel leading to neuro-psychiatric building has been installed.

As to the neuro-psychiatric building, the plastering is finished, except the putty coat on halls and a few rooms on two of the floors. Terrazo and wall tile work are substantially completed. Owing to delay in decision as to paint colours, this work has not been started. Heating, plumbing and electric wiring are substantially completed, except for installation of fixtures. Elevator guides are being set, and other work around elevator shafts is proceeding.

As to up-patients building, concrete subfloor in basement is ninety-five per cent finished, and considerable tile partition work done for storerooms and refrigerators. All concrete floors and roof slabs have been placed in north and east wings, except roofs of main and elevator penthouses. Stone, brick and tile work in exterior walls is about sixty-five per cent completed. This building should be closed in by about September 30.

As to the active treatment building, all the structural steel framework is erected, and about fifty per cent rivetted up. Three of the concrete floors in the east wing have been placed, and exterior wall stonework of the said wing started.

As to the out-patients building, concrete work in the basement walls and column shafts is proceeding, and erection of structural steel framework was started on September 10.

As to the Red Cross pavilion, the foundation concrete work is within about a week of completion, and brick walls of south wing are partly finished for a height of one story.

Services. Sewers, water and fire mains are all laid, except a few short branches to buildings. All this piping is now in course of being given final tests. Roadway grading is substantially completed, and sufficient base course has been laid for construction use. The permanent electric service to and including the substation is completed.

Mr. FLEMING: Can the minister give us a projected date for the over-all completion of the work?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I would not attempt to give that information, because of the labour situation and the difficulties in respect of materials we have had. However, I shall consider making a report to the house later on.

Mr. SKEY: Perhaps the Minister of Veterans Affairs would permit a supplementary question on the subject of Christie Street hospital and the new facilities the department is endeavouring to provide. I understand that the difficulty in connection with out-patients at Christie Street hospital in Toronto arises from lack of facilities for medical dispensation, rather than floor space.

Mr. SPEAKER: Let me remind the hon. member that he cannot make a statement when asking a question, nor can he set out particulars. He may ask only the simple question.

Mr. SKEY: I regret having transgressed the rules of the house. May I ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs if additional facilities for medical dispensation are planned for the out-patients at Christie Street hospital, Toronto?

Mr. MACKENZIE: The answer is yes.

PRIVILEGE—MR. McIVOR

POST-WAR INDUSTRIAL CONDITIONS—CANADA CAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. On Tuesday last I quoted the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Rose), who had quoted a statement from the Montreal Standard which was detrimental to President Drury of the Canada Car. These are the words I quoted at that time:

> The party is over. Not only will there not be enough jobs but wages will have to be brought down to former peace-time levels. If the employees won't take a cut in wages, the plant will have to close down. We can't afford to have our profits cut into by paying the high war-time wage levels.

I find now that the Standard has corrected that, with these words:

> The inaccurate interpretation of the interview referred to above appeared in the September 1 issue of the Standard. The Standard regrets the error.

My own statement at this time is that from the time I first met the late President Butler, to the present time, I have been proud of Canada Car. I am thankful now that President Drury is not in favour of low wages or fewer jobs, but rather of going all-out to work in cooperation with the Minister of Reconstruction.

[Mr. A. Fournier.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS APPEARING ON THE ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. Inasmuch as questions on the order paper cannot be answered until this debate is concluded, I wonder if he would not make some motion reversing the order, so that questions on the order paper may be answered at regular intervals—say even as early as Monday. Otherwise, since the debate may go on for another week, questions now standing on the order paper will not be answered until that time.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Order paper.

Mr. SPEAKER: May I call the attention of hon. members to the fact that at the opening of the session it was the House of Commons that decided to give precedence to the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. That decision was made by all hon. members. Therefore I believe the hon. member will have to wait until the debate on the address is completed.

TRUCKS AND TRACTORS

AVAILABILITY TO RETURNED SERVICE PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. E. JAENICKE (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe). Was the sale of army trucks and field artillery tractors to farmers in Markham, Ontario, by the War Assets Corporation, as set forth in a Canadian Press dispatch of September 20, held with the approval of the government? Is it the intention to hold sales of such trucks and tractors on a similar basis . . .

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member's question should be brief and to the point. I think this is the type of question that should appear on the order paper.

Mr. JAENICKE: In view of the urgent need of trucks and tractors I should like to ask the Minister of Reconstruction a question. I may say that I sent him notice of this question. Is it the intention to hold sales of such trucks and tractors, as was recently held in Markham, Ontario, on a similar basis in western Canada? Has the government given consideration to conferring priority in the purchase of such trucks and tractors upon returned veterans—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is out of order. I would ask him to put his question on the order paper.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, I am not disputing your ruling, but I would point out that this is a matter of urgency. Trucks are needed to take the grain away from the combines.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. COLDWELL: The hon. member is simply asking if some arrangement could not be made to facilitate the sale of trucks so that farmers and others in western Canada may get them. It is a matter of urgency.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have given my ruling and the hon. member must abide by it.

IMPERIAL CONFERENCE

QUESTION AS TO DISCUSSIONS LOOKING TO MEETING IN OTTAWA OR ELSEWHERE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether or not any discussions have been entered into in the last three months between the government of Canada and the government of Great Britain or any of the members of the commonwealth with regard to the holding of an imperial conference at Ottawa or elsewhere?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): In reply to my hon. friend I would say that there have been no discussions between the British government and the Canadian government during the last three months with respect to the holding of an imperial conference at Ottawa or elsewhere. My hon. friend will recall that when the council of foreign ministers was about to meet in London to take up matters which arose out of the Potsdam conference, the Prime Minister of Great Britain sent a communication to the prime ministers of the several dominions. Mr. Attlee said it would be of help to himself and his colleagues and mutually advantageous if the prime ministers of the different dominions might be in London at the time that the council was meeting, but he recognized that probably in all cases that would not be possible. He suggested that where it could be arranged conveniently a representative who could speak in the name of the Prime Minister might be present to ensure closer consultation and continuous discussion.

The council of foreign ministers is a body composed solely of the foreign ministers of the five great powers. There was no invitation extended to any dominion to be represented at the council. I should like to make it clear, because there seems to be misunderstanding in some quarters on this point, that the council is not authorized in any way to conclude treaties of peace or territorial settlements. It is a body called together for the purpose of doing essential preparatory work on draft treaties and draft proposals which will be submitted later to all the united nations concerned with the settlement of the peace.

In reply to Mr. Attlee I said that I regretted that it was not possible for me to be in London for purposes of consultation with him while the council was meeting. If it had been possible at all I should have been happy to go over to be in England just at this time, as there are a number of questions about which I feel it would be desirable if at all possible to have personal conferences with the members of the new government, the Prime Minister, the Foreign Minister and the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs. I have been turning over in my mind what might be possible in that way, and it may be that when the house gets along a little further with its business I shall ask the house to allow me to visit London for that and other purposes which I may take occasion to mention later on.

TEXTILES

REDUCTION OF MONTHLY BATTLE DRESS REQUIREMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. S. HARKNESS (Calgary East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the present shortage of textiles and the fact that demobilization is going on rapidly, why have monthly requirements of battle dress only been reduced from 75,000 to 70,000 units and—

Mr. SPEAKER: This question should not be asked on the orders of the day.

Mr. HARKNESS: May I ask the question in this form?

Mr. SPEAKER: I have already ruled that this question is of the type that should be placed on the order paper.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE IN REPLY

The house resumed from Thursday, September 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. M. Benidickson for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Bracken, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Hansell.

Mr. J. H. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) was moving the address in reply to the speech from the throne he spoke of himself as taking his first faltering steps in national politics. I believe those words found an echo in many of our hearts, for there are many of us who are here for the first time. We are indeed taking our first steps in national politics. We have much to learn about the rules, regulations and privileges of this house, but I am sure that under your gracious guidance, sir, we shall be kept on the right track.

I want to say that our work here is not made any easier by the bad acoustics of this chamber. Many hon. members speak in conversational tones, and consequently much of their wisdom is entirely lost to us. I hope the hon. member will forgive me for using his name as an illustration, but I do want to confess to a very high regard for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). I think he has done a remarkably good job in a very difficult period, and I hope he will maintain that fine record during the life of this parliament. But I am afraid he will fall from the pedestal upon which some of us have placed him unless he speaks louder. I have noticed that when he rises to speak, members lean forward, and the visitors in the galleries cup their ears to hear what he has to say. The same shortcoming might be imputed even to the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). Surely, sir, if there are two men in this house who ought to be heard well and correctly, they are the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance. Fortunately there is a remedy. We are living in a scientific age. Why, then, not put to full use our scientific discoveries by placing amplifying equipment in this chamber? I noticed in the press recently that in the new British houses of parliament both loud speakers and air-conditioning units are to be installed. If Great Britain in her war-impoverished state can go that far, surely we in Canada, with all our wealth, can do the same.

Ministers of the gospel, Mr. Speaker, are sometimes criticized for being long-winded in the delivery of their sermons, especially if they go beyond the usual twenty-five or thirty minutes. I am afraid that if some of the ministers of the crown were to occupy the pulpits of this dominion they too would be criticized for taking the whole of forty minutes, the time allowed them here. Be that as it may, I can assure hon. members that I am not going to transgress the rules, neither am I going to be longwinded. In fact, I may establish a record for brevity. There are one or two things in which I am deeply interested, of which I should like to speak.

First I would suggest to the government that there is need of immediate revision of the Indian Act to bring it into conformity with present-day requirements. Some hon. members may think I am speaking on a subject with which I am not familiar, but I do know something about the Indians in this dominion, because I have spent some twelve years of my life as an Indian missionary, living on their reserves and ministering to their needs. I am speaking now particularly of the Indian tribes of the northwest Pacific coast, particularly the Tsmpsheans of the Prince Rupert area, the Bella Bellas, the Kitamaats and the Haidas of the Queen Charlotte islands. Some people think it is very funny to say that the best Indian is a dead one. With that I must disagree, because among our Indian population there are many very worthy people indeed. They are thrifty, honest, industrious, intelligent, and very ambitious.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I should like to pay a tribute to the splendid work that is being carried on among the Indians of Canada by the various Christian churches of this dominion, which over a period of years have consistently tried to lift up the economic, moral and spiritual life of these wards of the government. In this endeavour I believe they have succeeded to a very remarkable degree. The time has come, or is fast approaching, when we should give earnest consideration to changing the emphasis, and thinking not so much of building up the Indians to our own standards of living, as of developing a programme that would prepare the hearts and minds of our own people to receive the Indians on a basis of equality—because, sir, there are many Indians who are our equals now, in knowledge, in ability and in courtesy. Indian young men and young women from our reserves have gone through our high schools; some of them have gone through our normal schools and have received their teachers' certificates and joined the teaching profession. Yet these young people are not citizens; they have not the right to vote. I believe, sir, that the time has come when a large section of our Indian population should be enfranchised and given full rights of citizenship. I would suggest that a standard of education be set up; that our Indian young men and women should be encouraged to reach up to and to pass that standard, and that the prize for so doing should be full citizenship. I am satisfied that if that were done, many of our Indians would do just as much honour to our citizenship as many of our other citizens.

May I remind the house that many Indians in the Dominion of Canada have served, and served splendidly, during this war. I have in my hand a news letter emanating from the Windermere district of the Columbia valley. It tells me that Mr. J. Coleman, inspector of Indian agencies for British Columbia, has been visiting in the Windermere district and says:

> Mr. Coleman, giving credit where credit is due, emphasized that well as the Indians throughout British Columbia have responded in the war, those from this Cranbrook agency have exceeded all others by far. The corollary, of course, is that more Indian veterans are among the men returning to this area. It is up to the council and the community to see that these men who have worn the king's uniform with credit and distinction and who have been correspondingly treated in English and Scottish homes are not forgotten with the indifference, which would appear from Mr. Coleman's talk to be part of the reason for the backward life of our local Indians to date.

In this connection too, sir, I would also suggest, when you are thinking of full citizenship rights to the Indians, that they be conferred without forfeiture of any of their rights on the Indian reserves. I know there are many people in this country who think that Indian rights are non-existent, or were surrendered when treaty agreements were entered into. As a matter of fact there never have been any treaty rights so far as the British Columbia Indians are concerned. Not one dollar of treaty money has ever been paid to the Indians of British Columbia. Let us, then, give to those who are deserving the full rights of citizenship, whether they live on reserves or whether they do not.

I should like to say a word concerning the constituency of Kootenay East, which I have the honour to represent. It was created in 1914, thirty-one years ago, and like many of the other electoral districts it has given to the parliamentary life of this country men of high distinction. First of all I should like to mention that East Kootenay is justly proud of Hon. J. H. King, who is now Speaker of the Senate; also of Hon. H. H. Stevens, who served the Conservative party so ably and so well; and last but not least, my predecessor in office, Mr. G. E. L. Mackinnon, of Cranbrook, who I am sure is held in high esteem by hon. members on both sides of this chamber.

East Kootenay is one of those glorious areas of country of which one might almost say that "every prospect pleases, and only man is vile." For beauty of landscape and abundance of resources, Kootenay East stands unbeatable. We have coal in abundance, coal to burn. Why, sir, I know of one seam of coal which has been burning for the last fourteen or fifteen years. It would be difficult to say how many thousands or millions of tons have been consumed in that time. The fire is still burning, and will burn, because apparently it is no one's business to put it out. We have gold and silver; we have lead, and zinc, and many other of the base metals. Our big game areas are something to dream about; and I can assure you, sir, that the wonderful and luscious fruit which comes from the Creston valley is equal in quality to anything that comes out of the Okanagan valley or from Ontario. However, I am not going to bring any peaches in the house to-day. It is enough to speak of them to make your mouths water.

But despite the beauty of the landscape of the Kootenays there are a few blots on it. We have some company towns, communities where every house is identical in construction and where all are alike as far as dilapidation is concerned—houses which lack all the modern conveniences which help to make for a happy home life.

The hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Ashby), addressing the house on Thursday of last week, spoke of the four freedoms of the Atlantic charter, and of their relationship to the animals upon his farm yonder in the far west. I believe he made his point quite clear, that those four freedoms had been achieved for the animal world but not for the world of men. To use a current phrase, "that will be the day" when those four freedoms are made a reality for mankind. He would be a bold man indeed who would dare to say that we now have freedom from want or freedom from fear, even in Canada. I know very well that in the coal mining area of the Crowsnest pass we have not freedom from fear. The coal miners in that area have vivid recollections of those depression years which we speak of as "the hungry thirties", when the coal mines were operating only two days a week, and now they are beginning to fear very much the threat of the "hungry forties". And why, sir, should this be? We have coal in abundance, the mountains are full of it; and we have the miners, as brave and heroic a band as you will find anywhere, men who go down into the heart of the mountains day after day to dig the coal, always under a strain, always risking life and limb.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) spoke on Monday evening of the casualties among the workers in the coal mining industry. I know something of what he was talking about, because it has been my sad duty to bury many of their broken and mutilated bodies.

What we need now in the Crowsnest mining area, and all of British Columbia as far as that is concerned, is an expansion of our markets. We have the coal, we have the miners, but we need an extension of markets even as far as Ontario. I hope some day to have the privilege of addressing a question to the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen) asking for the figures as to the amount of coal which is imported into Canada, especially into the Ontario market from the Pennyslvania coal mining areas. I know that there is a point somewhere between our western coal fields and the eastern coal market beyond which it is not economically sound to bring our western coal because of the increased subsidy which would be required; yet I also know that it is not economically sound to continue importing coal from the United States and have our own coal miners idle, our coal mines not operating, and the miners existing on relief allowances, as they did during those depression years.

I have brought down with me to-day the copy of the brief presented by the Western Canada Bituminous Coal Operators' Association at the Calgary sitting of the coal commission on April 7 of this year. I have no thought of wearying the house by reading all of this brief—that would be imposing on good nature indeed; but I should like to read, if I may, one paragraph from the summation, which is as follows:

> In dealing with the industry we have emphasized chiefly the production of our products. We need hardly point out that in its relation to the economy of western Canada, that is only one part of it.
> Around our coal mines have grown up towns housing the mining population, and businesses catering to them. Railways and bus lines serve these communities, and the products of the mines goes out in revenue freight. Railway employees share in the created work, and when the product reaches its destination other hands take over and in turn find their livelihood in distribution, in turn enabling them to take their places as citizens in the communities of their choice.
>
> From all go a portion of the receipts of their activities to support government, municipal and rural districts, and from the mining communities with which we are most intimately connected, none can say that it has not been freely and generously given.
> It is the coal industry, but it is also an integral and vital part of the life of Canada.

Before taking my seat I should like to refer to one other subject, namely, the Prime Minister's plan to beautify the city of Ottawa as a national war memorial. With this plan I am in fullest agreement, provided that it does not in any way detract from an over-all plan to give our Canadian people, no matter where they live, decent and desirable homes. It is all very well to make Ottawa a city that will compare with, or even surpass, other foreign capitals, but let us first of all make Canada a land worth fighting for, and a land to love. That will be a memorial indeed of which we can all be proud.

Mr. R. H. WINTERS (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, you will note that I brought my notes along with me, so that, despite what you said to the contrary, I hope you will not be too harsh on me if I refer to them occasionally and perhaps somewhat closely.

So far I have had the pleasure of listening to a great many speeches in this house, both by new members and by seasoned veterans, and I must say that I find the quality uniformly high. One gets the impression as a new member that he is among orators. I gather that a great many of the speakers have had experience outside the house owing to the fact that they are lawyers or clergymen or have other backgrounds. I should like to say at the outset that I am an engineer, and I feel sure that other engineers in the house will agree with me when I say that engineers generally are not expected to rise to any great heights of oratory.

Mr. WEIR: You are doing very well.

Mr. WINTERS: At this point, Mr. Speaker, if I am not too late, I should like to compliment you on your elevation to your high office. It is gratifying to note that recently you were selected in a prominent Montreal weekly paper as the "man of the week."

I would join with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson) in congratulating the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Bridges). I freely admit that we cannot compete with British Columbia in the size of our timber. Some of the finest production methods I have seen anywhere have been in the sawmills of Alberni; but I think when it comes to fish we can put up a fair race.

Mr. REID: Just fair.

Mr. WINTERS: I said "a fair race." The biggest single source of income in Queens-Lunenburg is the fisheries. In my opinion, to have a Minister of Fisheries from the maritime provinces is clearly justifiable on the grounds that the maritimes produce more fish than any other single province in Canada. I think that statement is fair when size and density of population are considered.

As hon. members know, I have the honour to represent the constituency of Queens-Lunenburg where the people for generations back have the reputation of being sincere, hard-working and industrious citizens. To the rest of Canada they are known as sea-faring folk. Indeed, many derive their living directly from the sea, and others depend indirectly on undertakings associated with the sea such as shipbuilding, ship repairing, fish curing, fish packing, and the like. Manufacturing, which was carried out only on a small scale before the war, flourished during the war, and this constituency made a worth-while contribution to Canada's over-all manufacturing war effort. In my opinion there is every reason to believe that, given the same facilities, this constituency could do just as good a job in manufacturing as the larger centres of Canada.

Farming, too, plays an important part, particularly in those regions remote from the seacoast. I do not know whether it is generally known, but there are many fine apple orchards in the Queens-Lunenburg constituency, and although they have suffered the misfortune of having a poor crop this year, as has the rest of Nova Scotia, the orchards are normally very productive.

Hon. members who sat in this house in former years have heard all this before; they have heard of the wonders of this constituency from the former stalwart members, now senators, Duff and Kinley. My point in bringing this up at this stage is that since September 6 I have listened to a great flood of criticism of the government from opposition members, and I feel it is worth while to reiterate these points at this time because the constituency represents a fair cross-section of Canada. It is significant that a constituency representing a fair cross-section of Canada can still decide to place its faith in a Liberal government. Then, too, as a new member I find this criticism carried to the point where to me it is amazing. When opposition members rise in their places they invariably say that they want to be constructive. All of us, regardless of party, profess our good faith in working toward the common interest of Canada. There would appear to me to be no good reason to believe that all the good faith should be on one side of the house; yet, despite what the government does and proposes to do, there are those who rise and immediately criticize the government for falling down on the job; shirking its responsibility; doing too little or doing it too late.

I believe that everybody realizes the value of constructive criticism; but I sometimes wonder whether hon. members of the opposition, who criticize the government for not carrying out the programmes which are being pursued with all possible vigour, can convince themselves that they are being constructive. In this connection I recall an incident which occurred in a large industrial plant where I once worked. The department head called a meeting of his staff to try to get to the bottom of some irregularity, and each member in turn blamed some other department for falling down. Finally the department head cut in and said, "Don't try to tell me that all the brains of this company are in my department, because I don't believe it." I think that statement should be applied in this house. I have found it helpful and I believe we might all learn something from it.

There is no doubt in my mind that this government is doing the best it can in the interests of Canada. I have seen no evidence in any of the departments that they are not willing to get on with the job. It has been recommended by hon. members in the opposition that what may be needed with respect to programmes such as housing and reconversion are "expediters." In this regard may I say that both as a civilian and as a member of the armed forces I have had very close contact with the Department of Munitions and Supply, particularly in those trying days when supply was tight and production was hard to get. Most of us feel that this department and "expediters" are synonymous. Officials of this department have, in my opinion, been chosen for their ability to crack the whip and get things done. Those of us who know these "expediters" and realize what they have done under trying conditions can hardly believe that the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) is pulling his punches now or has taken off the pressure.

May I now say a word about the armed forces. We have all watched the navy, the army and the air force grow from a small nucleus to the large forces they are to-day. I think my own corps is a good example in that regard; that is, the Royal Canadian Electrical and Mechanical Engineers, commonly known as R.C.E.M.E. It was not in existence at all at the start of the war; the functions it now performs were carried out by engineers and other technicians in ordnance. But with the growth of technical equipment and the mechanization of the army it was found that some other way was necessary to keep this equipment in operation. The British army experimented and finally formed a separate corps, the Royal Electrical and Mechanical Engineers, commonly known as R.E.M.E., which proved itself in North Africa; and based on this experience we formed our own corps on May 15, 1944. It is a good example of the growth of all the forces, that this corps grew from nothing to the point where at one stage the first Canadian army had more than 20,000 R.C.E.M.E. personnel alone under its command. It is true that there were controversies on various points in connection with the armed forces, such as those best known to the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes), but the net result was that, in every case, the force did more than was required of it, and brought great credit to Canada.

These forces are now being repatriated, demobilized and rehabilitated. I compliment the ministers of national defence on the efficient way these troops have been returned to Canada. It bears repeating, too, that Canada's rehabilitation programme ranks with the best in the world. There is one point, however, on which it appears to me that more specific and definite action should be taken by the government; that is, in the declaration of policy regarding its permanent forces. Many really good men who are thoroughly trained on army equipment and in army methods, and who would undoubtedly remain in the army if that policy were clear, are now being lost to the army. The two-year interim establishment does not provide sufficient inducement to these men because the policy beyond the two-year limit is not clear. This is particularly true in technical corps when tradesmen are in great demand by industry. In these corps, too, the army has a heavy commitment of work; they are still held responsible for getting out the job. Yet because of the demand from industry for tradesmen and the absence of a clear-cut permanent force policy we cannot hope to hold them, and we are losing them at the present time. I suggest that all possible action be taken by the government at the earliest day to clarify this policy. I think, too, that in the field of development and research as applied to army equipment, a policy should be laid on as quickly as possible. The present state of scientific development can be attributed to a large extent to the armed forces, and we should not take any chances on losing ground at this time.

I will pass on now and say a few words on reconstruction. In this connection the problem in Queens-Lunenburg is far from easy. There was little manufacturing before the war; but, as I have stated, a good effort was put forward during the period of the war. In particular, several well equipped plants expanded and assumed responsibility for the repair of naval ships. They carried a heavy load, and carried it well. A great contribution was made in the building of wooden ships of all types. Since the constituency of Queens-Lunenburg is well adapted to work of this kind and is not blessed with the all-round facilities of the larger centres, any work along these lines will be welcomed in the post-war period. I do not think it is sufficiently well known that several plants in this constituency manufacture gasoline engines complete. These engines are designed locally for rugged use, and there are few complaints that they do not stand up under what may be conservatively termed adverse conditions.

I now come to fishing, which is the real core of our existence in Queens-Lunenburg. It is well known that Lunenburg in particular is the home of the fishing fleet on the east coast. I have no doubt this house has been reminded of this fact a good many times. Most of the industry and enterprise is allied to fishing, either directly or indirectly. In the past few years great strides have been made in modernizing fishing methods, improving ways of marketing fish in a more attractive way. Cold storage methods have, of course, helped a great deal in this regard. I would recommend to the Minister of Fisheries that a programme of research be pursued with a view to improving facilities and conditions for fishing and providing advice on marketing. It is suggested that a great field of development in the use of fish by-products remains to be explored more fully. I would expressly urge that all possible action be taken along these lines, on the ground that it will play an important part in the reconversion programme, and will prove in future a good investment for Canada. In this regard I was interested to see this morning an editorial in the Ottawa Citizen dealing with the Department of Fisheries and placing it perhaps more in the spotlight than it has been previously. In time I think this department will grow in the eyes of the public and assume its rightful position, higher than has been the case in the past.

Apart from the deep-sea fishing, for which my constituency is best known, there is a great potential source of revenue in the inland fisheries. The Medway river, for example, in Queens county, is one of the best salmon and grilse streams to be found anywhere. It attracts many tourists, most of them from the United States; and I am told that the ratio of money coming into Canada because of this stream, in proportion to the pounds of fish taken out, is very high. This particular river also provides water power for a number of small industries along its course. I think it could well be termed a multipurpose river. I mention this river only as an example. The government is well aware of its potentialities. I believe that a development programme is already on the books, but that during the war it has been held in abeyance. I would urge that now we should lose no time in exploiting this river to the full, and getting on with the development. The same may be said, of course, for many other equally productive streams in Nova Scotia.

Further, in connection with fishing it is urged that a complete and thorough survey be made of the coast-line, with a view to providing adequate and satisfactory shelters, harbours and wharves and other docking facilities for fishermen operating small boats along the coast. These fishermen receive little or no publicity but contribute in great measure to the economy of Canada.

Complete dredging facilities to be used where and when required should also be provided; buoys, too, should be provided and located on a more generous basis. I feel, Mr. Speaker, that these matters are already in hand, and will be carried out when more facilities become available after the pressure of war time production is terminated.

I should like now to say a few words about communications—and by communications I mean what is known in the trade as communications of intelligence by electrical means. With the exception of the United States, Canada has the greatest number of telephones, per capita, of any country in the world. In my opinion the telephone companies have done an outstanding job in providing service under most adverse conditions. There have been practically no serious break-downs or even delays in having communications established and maintained.

Manufacturers of communications equipment have given an exceptionally fine account of themselves. They have met their commitments well, and have done so under adverse conditions of tight schedules and shortages of materials. In most instances, it must be remembered, that they have been dealing not with routine items, but rather with highly complicated technical devices, including radar. These points have complicated their problems to a considerable extent.

My point in discussing communications is that I feel that at this time we should consider extending the facilities to localities lying on the fringe of the present systems, and to the small islands lying off the coast which, at the present time, have no means of two-way communication, with the exception of their boats and, in some instances, horse-and-buggy communications.

Off the coast of my constituency there are many islands. I have in mind two in particular, those of La Have and Tancook, which are practically isolated during the winter months. The coast-line is rugged; the weather is severe, and there are days on end when they find themselves quite out of touch with the mainland and with other centres. The developments resulting from the war, and the simplicity achieved in electrical communications, whereby we have means for putting many messages on one pair of wires, or of using one wireless or radio set to transmit many messages at the same time, bring these means of communications within easy reach of all. I would urge the government to take whatever steps are necessary and possible to make these facilities more adequately available.

In this I would also include communications to lighthouses, which are notoriously isolated. Then, too, I believe there is a field to be exploited more fully in connection with radio location devices for ships, and even in the application of radar for meteorological uses, and other uses which are now reasonably well known because of the publicity recently given to the development of radar.

In conclusion, I believe it is fair to say that the constituency of Queens-Lunenburg has demonstrated during the war, as did the rest of Nova Scotia, that it can rise to an emergency. We, too, are anxious to hold what we have gained. We are looking forward, beyond this period of transition, commonly called a reconstruction or reconversion period, and to the fullest extent we will cooperate with this government in its efforts to improve our common lot.

Mr. W. G. CASE (Grey North): Mr. Speaker, until the amendment to the amendment was moved last night I had not intended taking part in the debate. Now that the opportunity is offered to me, however, I should like to join with those who have preceded me in the debate in paying my compliments to you, sir, upon your elevation to the highest office within the gift of the House of Commons. I feel that you have already given ample evidence of your willingness and ability to discharge the duties of your high office with dignity and dispatch, and to the satisfaction of all.

I have listened with much interest to hon. members who have spoken in the debate, and must say that I have been impressed. I believe all hon. members after hearing these special references to the various constituencies, their advantages and their special features, will have a greater appreciation of this great Dominion of Canada.

I was interested, too, in the remarks of the hon. and gallant gentleman, the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Winters), who has just addressed the house. May I say to him that criticism is not in any sense of the word confined to His Majesty's Loyal Opposition. His observations indicate that there is reserved to members supporting the government the right to criticize the opposition —and I suppose that is as it should be. But as a loyal subject of this great British commonwealth I am always prepared to bow before and pay tribute to constituted authority.

I have never been a narrow partisan, and I am sure I will not be misunderstood if I say that under the present administration we are likely to enjoy reasonably good government —even though I might reserve the right to say that I believe we would have had better government had my own party succeeded in its appeal to the people of Canada. The fact remains that we shall have government, although we differ, largely in the matter of policy. Our basic approach to government varies but little from that of those who occupy the treasury benches.

This is not so with my C.C.F. friends. I do not want to appear to be too critical, because in the few years it has been my privilege to enjoy some degree of public activity I have learned to appreciate more and more those who have ideas. However, when one approaches the problem of a radical change in government I wonder sometimes if it is realized that of the twenty-eight members in this house, twenty-five of them do not enjoy the majority support of their constituents. They may believe that they have the system that will produce pie in the sky or utopia, but as yet they have failed to sell themselves in their various constituencies. I am not unmindful of the fact that there are other minority representatives; as a matter of fact we have no less than 149 minority representatives in the house. In the main, however, we are not advocating a radical change in the system of government.

It would appear that the C.C.F. would seek to have hon. members believe that they are friends of labour. I am not going to deny that, because why should they not be friends of labour? I would remind them that the labour unions are the greatest evidence of freedom, that they exist only in democratic countries. That is something we should consider carefully. Where other forms of government have been adopted, governments of a dictatorial or totalitarian character, labour unions have soon become submerged. Under those governments labour lost much that they had gained.

I would say that business is the heart of our social life, and profits are the vital incentive to enterprise. I have listened to my friends refer to the profit system. If it was all a profit system we would all soon become very wealthy. However, there is another side to the picture which is seldom mentioned by those who are ready to cry down big business and soak the rich. I refer to the loss possibility. When I view this great country of ours—and it has been my privilege to see quite a lot of it—I cannot help feeling that we owe something to those who have been willing to take a chance and willing to pioneer. I want to be a twentieth century citizen; I want to be able to recognize the need for social security, because I realize that freedom is an empty farce if our people do not enjoy some sense of economic security. Yet I wonder if in our determination to fix things so that everyone will enjoy the good things of life we may not rob the people of their individuality and finally become a nation of leaners rather than a nation of leaders. As those who have studied ancient history would tell you, the pattern of the past may be repeated in the future and we may cause a deterioration of our greatest asset. I have heard reference made to our streams where fish are in abundance, to our forests, to our mineral wealth and to our great agricultural fields, but the greatest asset that any nation can possess is that nation's people.

We must indeed be on guard. We learn more as we travel into the future, because the future only is ours. Some one has said, "I expect to spend the rest of my life living in the future." That is very true. We always expect a great deal, but we do not always attain that which we expect. It is only when the forces that seek to hold you back are actively at work that the best you have comes forward. There is a story told of a farmer who took a hog to market. When the hog was weighed he turned to the purchaser and said, "Well, it does not weigh as much as I thought it would, but I did not think it would." I suppose that is exactly our own position in life. We do not get exactly what we expect, but I doubt if any of us expect that we will get as much as we do expect.

As far as our Social Credit friends are concerned, I feel that I can speak kindly of them, because they provided an opponent for me in the immediate past general election. Our people were thus able to hear something of the theories they are putting forward. As I said before, I like to think of myself as one who admires people with ideas. I do not know why they call themselves the Social Credit party, because there has never been much sociability in any credit that I have ever enjoyed. They say that if you want a short winter just give your banker a three months' note in the fall. You will then find out how much sociability there is to it.

With reference to their amendment, which I think has considerable merit, I wish to say to my hon. friends that I do not think Canada, of all countries in the world, is in a position to give leadership in monetary reform. We produce a tremendous volume of goods in this country, and we must find a market for them in the markets of the world.

Mr. KUHL: How about the home market?

Mr. CASE: The home market could never consume the amount of goods we produce, because we produce enough for 50,000,000 people. The productive capacity of this nation during the war absolutely staggers human imagination. If those with whom we seek to trade were to discover that we were using a monetary base which resulted in subsidizing our goods to the detriment of their standard of living, I am sure they would soon find means of applying dumping duties or an embargo to prevent us from finding our way to their market. The whole matter is greatly involved. I am glad that there are those who have the courage to come forward with these ideas. I like to think of myself as being a student of monetary reform—sometimes I think our system should be reformed—but I have yet to be convinced that Social Credit policies will fit in with our plan of world affairs.

I feel I would be remiss in my duty if I failed to pay tribute to those who have made it possible for us to enjoy the advantages of a free parliament. This, after all, is the greatest monument to freedom, to liberty and to civilization, that one has the right to be able to express oneself in a free parliament as the representative of people who have selected him by their ballots on election day. I happen to be a majority representative. There were many candidates running in opposition to the Progressive Conservative candidate in Grey North, and two of them failed to get their passports out; they lost their deposits.

I am not unmindful, Mr. Speaker, of the tremendous sacrifices that have been made by our service personnel for you and for me. It is difficult indeed to assess their great contribution; but we can, I believe, prove ourselves worthy of that contribution, by seeking to bring about the Canada they felt they were fighting for, a country of golden opportunity, a country that will be a challenge to every red-blooded Canadian. I only hope that we shall capture something of the spirit of the pioneers and seek to roll back our far-flung frontiers and tap the treasure chest which remains hidden in the bowels of the earth in our great hinterland. Here we are, a population of a little over eleven millions, blessed with a great country, the prize indeed of the civilized world. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that this country is worthy of us and of our best traditions, and I simply ask myself: Am I worthy of Canada?

There are some things that can be done for our service personnel. I believe—and I have mentioned this before in the house—that the reestablishment credit should be made available to a soldier's widow. Had he survived he would have received the reestablishment credit. Having lost her husband, the sacrifice of the widow is all the greater, and she needs this reestablishment credit. Many of our lads who have fallen were married shortly before going overseas. Others have left several little children who need a mother's care, and they need to live in better surroundings than they have at the present time. Therefore I would urge the government to give consideration to making the reestablishment credit available to the soldier's widow.

Another matter which might well engage the attention of the government is the granting of loans to soliders to help establish them in some small business. I know that a grant is made to help the soldier acquire farm land, and that is good in itself, but all soldiers are not going to be farmers. At the present time many soldiers are using up their gratuities to acquire a small business, and the government might well give consideration to the making of loans to help the soldier play some part in rehabilitating himself in some small business enterprise.

There is another matter which has come to my attention more recently. Transportation should be granted by the government to soldiers who desire to reestablish themselves in some particular part of Canada. I am sure that the soldiers would appreciate this. They have rubbed shoulders with their fellows from various parts of Canada, and many may wish to reestablish themselves at some place other than the point of their enlistment. Every effort should be made to provide them and their families with transportation to the point where they feel they can best reestablish themselves.

We have heard from speakers on the government side of the house and many others, and in the main the suggestions offered have been constructive. But in two instances that I have in mind, members apologized for sitting on the government side of the house. I do not know exactly why they did this, but it is perfectly all right with me. One of the most courageous statements made in this debate was made by the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Viau), and I offer it as an answer to those who suggest that this party would interfere with unity in Canada. Nothing could be further from the truth, because we are all loyal Canadians desiring to bring about unity within this country.

The hon. member for St. Boniface said, as reported at page 99 of Hansard of September 11:

> If the government will implement this programme and assure the house that one or two years of military training will be given, we shall have better citizens, and we shall not witness those incidents which took place in the House of Commons when some members from Quebec, those ultra-nationalists, were ready to betray their country when it was at war and the enemy almost at its shores, and insisted that we take no part whatsoever in a war which was then in progress. That attitude in the House of Commons will remain a blot on the history of our country. As a Canadian of French descent, who has lived in western Canada, I say that attitude was sorely felt and will never be forgotten.

I have never pleaded that I have been misquoted in anything I have said during an election, but I know that sometimes my words have been improperly transposed. No member of this house has a higher regard than I have for our brother Canadians in the province of Quebec, and I have never criticized them at all. All that I have criticized has been the leadership to which they were subjected, and not the French Canadians themselves. I think there is a challenge to this house and every loyal Canadian to seek to bring about that sense of national unity which we all profess to admire. No doubt an opportunity will present itself before very long to do something for national unity when we come to consider some major items having to do with our national life.

I said earlier that I had not intended to take part in this debate, and I believe I should not detain the members at great length. But I must say this. Outside this chamber, outside this building, there is in Canada a vast army of business men, industrialists, farmers, soldiers seeking to be rehabilitated, labour men, all of whom want to know what this government's taxation demands are going to be. They will find that out only when the budget is presented to this house. I hope that the budget will have some regard for our position at the present moment. I believe that the country will become very critical, and in a sense properly so, if the bringing down of the budget is unnecessarily delayed. Further, the government will soon be seeking to sell a post-war victory loan of immense proportions, and they will be appealing to all classes of our people, to business men, industrialists, farmers, our service personnel and labour to subscribe to the loan.

We shall do well to consider the matter of taxation. Ability to reduce our taxes will place us in a more competitive position to take advantage of market conditions in the post-war period. In my humble opinion our problem has never been one of overproduction, it has been one of distribution. Statisticians to-day, by means of modern facilities of communication and transportation, can make an accurate estimate of world production and world consumption; and we know now that in the dark thirties—when our granaries were bulging with wheat and we were slaughtering our cattle and wasting them on the prairies—in distant China, which is now one of our gallant allies, they were living on locusts, and in India they were starving; so that statisticians will tell us now that a falling off in world production of ten per cent means that millions of people will be in distress, and that with a falling off of twenty per cent, millions will starve. Therefore, with the tremendous productive capacity this nation enjoys, a tax structure which will encourage private enterprise to give of its best, with some feeling of confidence in its planning, will do more to see us through this reconversion period than anything else I can think of.

I also recommend that controls be removed as rapidly as possible to give the individual a chance. At the present time wartime housing have practically a monopoly on building material. In my home city, Owen Sound, they are going to erect fifty of their houses, and every one will be built on posts. The building by-laws in our city would not permit a private builder to build a house unless it was put on a concrete or stone foundation, but this is the concession we have had to make to wartime housing in order to have them go there and provide shelters which I am told will cost around $3,900 per house. Whether those figures are accurate or not I do not know, but I know that private enterprise in the building trades of this country could give wartime housing spades and aces if they had the leadership and an opportunity to do so, and we would have a better class of construction.

So that I say that we have an opportunity now to prove our real worth. We are here charged with a definite responsibility. I wonder how many of us realize how critical this hour is in Canada's history. If we allow our people to become uneasy, to lose their confidence, wondering whether they are to be unemployed and what the country has in store for them, the responsibility will be largely ours. We must so apply ourselves as to give the necessary leadership and encourage all our citizens to play their full part. After all, the history of Canada for the years which are before us will be largely written in this chamber. I realize that a country's history is largely a story of sacrifice, particularly on the field of battle in war time, but now the responsibility is in our hands. The history of the world is nothing more or less than the history of the world's peoples, those who have played their part in the onward march of civilization.

Reflect for a moment on the contribution which this young country has been privileged to make, and the wealth of leadership that has been provided by this greatest of all empires, the British empire. It is time we were a little more "chesty", a little more proud of the great position we occupy in world affairs; and when someone would dare to suggest a lessening of the ties which bind us to the motherland, I say, and I want it to be clearly understood, that if we ever lose our British connection we shall lose the greatest bargaining power we ever had. With the British empire everything is possible of attainment. It gives us strength; it gives us moral courage. I am proud to say that where the great old union jack flies, there you will find freedom. That is something which we possibly value lightly; yet it is the most precious possession we have.

During the war days we had in the city of Owen Sound a Polish legion. Those who know the history of Poland know that for 120 years prior to 1917 they were a subjugated race. As a matter of fact the flag which flew over the Polish camp at Niagara-on-the-Lake in 1917 was the first Polish flag to fly from the masthead in over 120 years. Following the great war they hastened to obtain their freedom; and it is to the credit of the Polish people that the Fuehrer, Herr Hitler, was never able to set up a puppet government in Poland.

Mr. REID: It was the influx of Scots which helped.

Mr. CASE: The Poles were prepared to die to the last man rather than part with their freedom. One thing I always appreciate about the Scottish people is their faculty of making themselves heard and understood. I believe I can say that with the kindliest feeling toward my good friend, because of the little bit of Scotch that is in me, and of which I am very proud.

I was saying that freedom is something you must cherish and guard; if you ever lose it you may never recover it. Many great sacrifices have been made for it in the years which have passed. Do we, I wonder, fully appreciate all that it means to us.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the amendment moved by my honoured leader is indeed fair and has a claim to the support of all those who are not already pledged to support the party in power. Let me reread it so that you will know we have tried to make constructive suggestions while criticizing the government's neglect to give effect to matters contained in the amendment:

> We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that Your Excellency's advisers have:
> (a) failed to demobilize our armed forces on a fair basis and, in particular, have failed to prevent serious disadvantage to overseas service personnel;—

I have ample evidence to support this, and I would be absolutely remiss in my duty and unfair to those who depend on me if I did not support that clause of the amendment.

> (b) failed to provide a speedy and effective plan of reconversion from war to peace, and failed in particular to join in partnership with labour and industry in devising a workable scheme to provide jobs, with fair wages, for discharged service personnel and war workers;—

There is concrete evidence that the government has not taken labour and industry into its confidence in planning for reconversion.

Paragraph (c) of the amendment is as follows:

> (c) failed to take adequate and timely action to meet the ever-mounting housing crisis.

I think I have substantiated that in my reference to wartime housing in my own community; therefore, Mr. Speaker, I propose to support the amendment, and I leave it to the good judgment of my hon. friends to my left to rally to our cause in this instance.

Mr. MAX CAMPBELL (The Battlefords) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate you for having been selected to preside over the debates of this house. Your high qualities and your parliamentary experience give us the assurance that you will discharge your important duties with dignity and impartiality.

I also wish to congratulate the hon. members who respectively moved and seconded the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

(Text)

I am not trying to impress the house with my limited knowledge of French, but there is one thing that I have been trying to do for many years, namely, to bring about national unity. I was born in the city of Montreal a great many years ago, too long a time to think about. I left there as a boy and have spent the last forty-one years in western Canada as a grain grower. I had a great many French-speaking friends while I was in eastern Canada as a boy, and I have also made a great number of French-speaking friends in the west. I have tried to say a few sentences at the beginning of my speech in the French language.

I thought possibly that I might find time to study the French language after I came here. As a boy I did have a smattering of French; but since I came here I found that if I start learning the French language I may possibly have to learn some other language. We had a demonstration of a peculiar sort of language last night, and I thought that if we could just have a Swede from Saskatchewan make a speech here now it would make me feel more at home in this house.

At my nominating convention and during the election campaign I emphasized this point of national unity. I said during that campaign, and I have said it for a long time, that one of the things that Canada needed before we could have national unity was Canadian citizenship. I am pleased to see that at last the government realizes that, and I hope that we are going to have our own Canadian citizenship in the very near future.

One other great need in the bringing about of unity in Canada is an economic policy that will give all of the people of Canada a square deal. I like to call myself a socialist. I may say that I did not arrive at the decision to believe in the socialist philosophy overnight, and I did not do so because I listened to soapbox orators. I possibly had pretty much the same sort of environment in my early days as most hon. members. I was brought up in a good home where we had modern conveniences and modern comforts. Then I went to a new country, a country where settlers from practically all over the world went to build up a home for themselves. I went through the struggles with those people; I have studied some of the reasons why those people had to suffer so many hardships and get so little for the things that they produced, and I came to the decision, after I studied the different monetary reforms that have come on up during the last years, that what we needed was a different sort of economic system, an economic system that would put human values first. In this country we have a system that puts the dollar first; we have a dollar economy. I say, and we in the C.C.F. say, that that must be changed.

I am pleased with the fact that we have a large number of new and young members in the house. I think youth is the great hope that this country has. In the future I believe we have to look largely to our young people because they are the ones who will have to solve the problems that our older people were not able to solve.

I was interested in hearing the last speaker say that we must have foreign markets. We in the C.C.F. realize that we must have foreign markets, we realize that we produce great quantities of natural products that we cannot possibly consume in this country; but practically all of the politicians of the old parties have emphasized for the last fifteen or twenty years the necessity of foreign markets, and they have absolutely overlooked the tremendous potential market we have right here in Canada.

We went through a good many years of trying times in Canada, especially in the district from which I come. During all these years, from 1930 until the war started, we had all the things that the Canadian people needed to have a very high standard of living; we had natural products, natural resources, all kinds of man-power, machinery and practically everything that we needed to give the people of this country a high standard of living. I ask hon. gentlemen who have been in this House of Commons in the last twenty years why have the Canadian people not had these things?

An hon. MEMBER: Lack of purchasing power.

Mr. CAMPBELL: It was mentioned here last night that the people of the old parties gave the C.C.F. the opportunity to ask "Why were these things not done?" Of course we are asking that question. We realize that the whole motive for keeping our machinery going in the past and to-day is the profit motive. We contend that we must get away from the profit motive to where people's whole ideas are not based on the making of profit.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the farmers?

Mr. CAMPBELL: Farmers never did make a profit. I am going to say something about profits. There are different kinds of profits. There is one kind of profit where the business man has a mark-up on the cost of the goods that he is handling or selling, or the mark-up on the cost of the goods the manufacturer or industrialist produces. If that mark-up is not out of line, I have no quarrel with it; but the kind of profit against which I protest, the kind of profit that has kept this country down, is what a great many people call unearned income. I want to see that sort of profit wiped out. I want to see exploitation halted; but after having given years of study to this old, so-called private enterprise system, I am quite certain that will not be done. When someone gets something for nothing—and that is what some people have been getting in this country—it means that someone is going to get nothing for something.

In common with other hon. members I feel a great responsibility because I represent here some of the people of Canada, those in my constituency. I feel honoured because I was chosen to represent them here; I also feel that these people did not support me so much for myself but sent me here to support the programme of the C.C.F., and while I am here I intend to try to represent them in the way they would like.

I was going to say something about my constituency, but I think I will omit that, because I do not want to take too much time in this debate. We have tremendous problems to face, and I do not expect they will be solved. The problems are there, however, and we should not spend too much time in talking about our constituencies. We have the two problems of rehabilitation and reconversion, which include finding jobs for about two million people. From what I have heard I believe pretty much the same condition existed all over Canada during the 1930's that existed in the part of the country from which I come. I know a large percentage of the boys in our district enlisted when war broke out and have been in the various branches of the armed forces ever since. Some of those boys are coming back now; some will not come back. I contend that it is up to this parliament to find the very best methods of seeing that these boys get a square deal when they do return.

I wish to give one or two illustrations. The first is the case of a young man who worked for me for about seven years. He was a good man, willing and with a liking for his work, a chap I was very happy to have around because my work was well done. Then my boys got big enough to help me on the farm, the depression came along and I was not able to keep this hired man any longer. This young man did what probably a great many other young men did during that period; he spent three months travelling from one end of Canada to the other, trying to get a job. After the three months he walked into my yard, and he was a pretty sorry looking specimen. He had always been neat and clean, but now he was dirty and his clothes were worn out. I asked him how he had made out, if he had found any work. He said, no; he had travelled all over Canada and it was the same thing everywhere he went. In fact he said, "In one town, I had run out of money and when I came to the outskirts of the place I had a loaf of bread and a little tea, so I started a fire and made myself a cup of tea. I was just going to eat my lunch when a policeman came along and said, 'What the hell are you doing here?'" That policeman came down, kicked over this boy's pot of tea, grabbed him by the back of the neck and put him in gaol. It seems to me that if we cannot use our boys any better than this something is wrong. A great many of these boys enlisted; they have done their duty to their country, and now they are coming back.

Let me give just one more illustration. Last winter and this summer I travelled a good deal on the trains. I make it a point to meet as many of the returned boys as possible, and try to get their stories from them. On this particular day I met one of the finest looking young men I have ever seen; in fact as I look around this chamber I do not see anyone who would compare with him. He would weigh about 220 pounds and was very handsome. I had a long talk with this boy. He told me he had been piloting Lancaster bombers for three and a half years. Then he said, "Now they are through with me. I am worn out, and have been discharged. I do not know what I have to face, because I do not know how to do anything but fly bombers. That is the only job I ever had. I never had a job in my life until I got in the air force. Worse than that, I married while in the old country, and as soon as I can find a place for my wife I want to bring her over here." I believe practically all the people of Canada wish to help these boys get jobs. I am also quite sure that most of those who employ labour are going to make earnest efforts to give jobs to those who left their employ to go to war. But many of these boys did not have jobs or training, and they will have a hard time. Some of them have been receiving pretty fair pay in the services. Some of them have bought homes; they have other commitments they will have to meet, and they do not know what is ahead. As far as these boys are concerned I can see very little hope for them in the future under the present economy.

I should like to say something about what was more or less a bombshell which was thrown into this house yesterday, when the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) told us that the floor price of wheat was to be set at not less than $1 a bushel. For twenty-five years the farmers of the west have been trying to get an agricultural policy. Now we have a policy of a kind, but I can say that a floor price of $1 a bushel for wheat is not satisfactory to the western wheat growers. I am not going to rehash all the arguments which were presented so well yesterday by one of our members, but I wish to say that I do not believe the farmers of this country should be called upon to make a sacrifice in this connection. I believe that in every possible way we should help the nations needing this wheat; but if any sacrifice must be made, then all the people of Canada should be asked to make it. In the past the farmers have been sacrificed all the way through to build up an industrial Canada. We who live in the west know that only too well, because we have had to pay hundreds of millions of dollars in higher costs for all the things we have had to buy. This has been the result of tariff protection given to industries in eastern Canada.

Not only that, but if we are to make loans to these countries to buy the wheat, the sacrifice should not be made only by the grain growers of western Canada. The government would have been well advised had it placed a floor price on wheat of at least $1.25 per bushel.

Mr. GARDINER: Under the legislation up to date, $1.25 is the only floor price that has been placed.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I should like now to say a few words about taxes. Certainly I am in favour of a reduction in taxation, and I am prepared to make a suggestion as to where we can get money to make it possible to reduce taxes. I find that in the report of the Bank of Canada, dated February 10, 1945, the net profit from our operations in the central bank for the year 1944, after providing for contingencies and reserves, amounted to $20,312,659.68. There is one instance where the government through the operations of the central bank made a profit of that much money.

Then, again, in the report of the Canadian National Railways security trust for the year ended December 31, 1944, the surplus earnings of the system are set out at page five as $23,026,924.35 less the abandonment of dock facilities at Seattle valued at $626,871. I do not think that figure should be taken into consideration.

[Mr. Campbell.]

Something was said a few days ago about the machinery of production. I believe people throughout the world realize to-day that the machine has displaced man-power. Millions of men have been replaced by machines, and this means that we are faced with the necessity of changing some of our ideas. I contend that the machinery of production should be owned by the people of Canada, for their benefit. Whoever controls that machinery also controls the economic life of the people. I contend that if the machine is to be started only when someone can make a profit, there will be many times in the coming years when it will be idle.

There is no reason why we cannot produce enormous amounts of wealth in Canada under a planned economy. If the people throughout the country do not plan the economy for this high production, it will not be attained. I understand that in 1932 Canada produced only a little over three billion dollars worth of wealth. But when during the war years we had a plan to win the war, to build ships, to build jeeps, tanks, trucks and the like, we went to work with a plan to win, with the result that our production jumped up to around nine billions of dollars.

To-day we hear a great deal about full employment and a high standard of living for our people If they are to have that standard of living we must produce great wealth. If it was possible for us to produce wealth to the value of nine billions of dollars in 1944, when 750,000 of our boys and girls were in the armed services, and when a large percentage of our people were engaged in war factories—and of course they were producing part of that wealth—I do not see why we should not set our sights for at least nine billions for the next year, and increase our production during coming years to the point where we can supply the needs of all our people. If we plan our economy with that in view we must see to it that those who produce the wealth will receive enough purchasing power to buy it back.

That cannot be done under a profit system, because under that system one group of people get too much purchasing power, and this means that there will be a large group who will not have sufficient purchasing power. If we are to have a condition where wages are knocked down—and it looks as if that is taking place to-day—and if we are to look to foreign markets to get rid of surpluses, I am afraid that Canada is in for a lot of trouble. Not only will this country be looking for foreign markets, but every country in the world producing surpluses will be looking for them. Those countries which to-day are not producing surpluses will no doubt produce them in the near future. Under those circumstances what are we to do?

An hon. MEMBER: War.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Of course. The tremendous competition for world markets in the last forty years has to a great extent resulted in the last two wars. More than anything else, those wars have been wars to get markets. I do not see why we cannot get down to a policy of production for use. All people cannot make a profit. If that were possible I would favour the profit system. But, as I said before, if someone makes a profit, someone else must make a loss; that is an absolute fact. I believe that more than anything else the people of Canada are concerned first with security and, second, with a high standard of living. Can we give those two essentials to them under a private enterprise system?

An hon. MEMBER: Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL: If we can, why have we not done so?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: We have.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Few people in Canada have a high standard of living.

During this debate mention has been made of the grain exchange. Let me say that one can go to the city of Winnipeg and, if he will go to a certain district, where the members of the grain exchange live, he will find the finest houses in Canada. They have done well through the grain exchange, and have attained a very high standard of living. One can go to the city of Toronto and find in that city thousands of beautiful homes. They, too, have a high standard of living. One can go into other places where there are good homes and where people have high standards of living. But one can also go into sections of this city, or go on to many farms throughout the country and find people living in abject poverty, and they will have to continue to live under those conditions as long as we have the so-called private enterprise system.

I like enterprise and I like initiative. I like private enterprise as long as it is private enterprise, but the people of Canada will not be fooled much longer by being told that we have private enterprise. We have not private enterprise except in a few cases. There is one thing I have been watching for in this house but as yet I have not seen it. Before very long, possibly during this debate, I hope to hear something said about the abuses of capitalism and the abuses of the free enterprise system. No one in this house, outside this group and the little group to my left—I do not agree with them but they have ideas—has any idea as to what is to be done about the abuses of capitalism or the abuses of the private enterprise system. No one has any idea as to how private enterprise is to be made to work. I hope that before this debate is over or before I have finished serving my constituents in this parliament somebody will rise in his place and tell me and this group just how this can be done.

Are we to continue under this so-called private enterprise system? I call it "so-called" because it is not a private enterprise system. Our industries in Canada have largely reached the point where they are controlled by a small group of people. We have not private enterprise in Canada; what we have is monopoly enterprise. This small group of people who are directors in banks, insurance companies and industries of all kinds control the whole economic life of this country. When people think parliament is running this country they are just fooling themselves. I have no illusions as to that.

We in the C.C.F. talk about a planned economy. We say that we must plan our economy to produce such wealth as it is possible to produce and distribute that wealth to the people in the form of wages and costs of all kinds. We have had a planned economy in this country; the small group I have mentioned have planned our economy for their own benefit and the people of the country have suffered as a result. If we allow this small group of people to control this country we are condemning our youth as well as the present generation to the same kind of conditions that existed during the thirties.

I am going to vote against the subamendment and I am going to vote against the amendment. Why? Each of these amendments simply says that the government have failed here or failed there or somewhere else. Perhaps they have. I feel quite sure that they will fail, and they will fail because they will not do the things that must be done to make a success of the things that they want to do.

I wish to say something now in their favour. We have heard a good deal of criticism in connection with bringing home the boys from overseas. I do not claim to know enough about how to get these boys back and give them a fair deal to say whether the government have failed or not. I do not want to brag about my boys, but three of them are in the active forces—two in the air force and one in the army—and one came home from overseas a few days ago. He told me that the treatment he got all the way back was wonderful and I want to thank the government for what they have done. I think they are entitled to that. The boys coming back are well satisfied with the treatment they are getting. They have been treated like kings on board the vessels and the trains have been met all along the way by the different service clubs. These boys were given a royal welcome. That may have nothing to do with the government, but the government had to see that there were ships and that the boys were looked after on the ships and I wish to give them credit for that.

On motion of Mr. Beaudry the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie the house adjourned at 5.40 p.m.

Monday, September 24, 1945.

The house met at three o'clock.

PROVINCIAL LEGISLATION

INQUIRY AS TO DISALLOWANCE OF CERTAIN ACTS OF SASKATCHEWAN LEGISLATURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Minister of Justice if the government has under consideration the disallowance of any acts of the Saskatchewan legislature. If so, what acts are being so considered, upon whose petition, and what procedure is proposed to give to the Saskatchewan government and other interested parties an opportunity to make representations?

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I received notice of this question from the leader of the opposition just a few moments ago, and I can give him from memory the information desired. I may not have the exact titles of the acts, but I think I have them sufficiently so to identify them.

The government has under consideration petitions which pray for the disallowance of certain acts of the legislature of Saskatchewan. These are the farm security act; the mineral taxation act of 1944 and an amending act of 1945, and an act to amend the local government board (special powers) act.

The Dominion Loan and Mortgage Association petitioned for the disallowance of the farm security act and the act to amend the local government board (special powers) act, and in sending in its petition asked for an opportunity to add some oral representations, which I assume to be along the lines of the material set out in the petition. They were told that on October 11 I should be glad to hear such oral representations as they might wish to submit.

The Canadian Pacific Railway Company filed a petition asking for the disallowance of the mineral taxation act of 1944 and the amending act of 1945, and also asked for leave to make oral representations in support of the petition. October 15 has been fixed as the date on which they will be permitted to make such representations. The petitioners were immediately asked by the deputy minister of justice to supply the attorney general of Saskatchewan with a copy of their respective petitions, because there would have been delay had we taken time to copy them here and forward them, and we have been informed that they have supplied the attorney general with these copies. In addition he was at once advised of the dates we had indicated to the petitioners on which their oral representations might be heard. The Hudson's Bay Company have sent in a petition, which was received this morning, also dealing with the mineral taxation act of 1944, and they are also being asked to send a copy to the attorney general of Saskatchewan. They have not asked to be heard orally in support of their petition.

Mr. COLDWELL: If I may ask a supplementary question, when was the attorney general of Saskatchewan notified that these petitions had been received? The time between now and October 11 and 15 is very short for a government to prepare a brief in reply to something which probably has been carefully prepared by clever and competent lawyers.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I would not like to give exact dates, but notice was given as soon as we were notified.

Mr. COLDWELL: When was that?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The first petition came in more than a week ago.

Mr. COLDWELL: The time is very short for the provincial government to prepare a statement in rebuttal.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Perhaps it is, but I understand that we have only the period from now until November 10 within which to decide whether to allow the provincial legislation to take its course or to recommend the disallowance thereof.

Mr. COLDWELL: The petitioners themselves allowed very little time for consideration by this government or the government of Saskatchewan.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The legislation was already under consideration by the law officers of the department, after it had been officially received from the government of Saskatchewan; and I assume it is the privilege of a citizen to file a petition at any time. We had not waited for the reception of the petitions to give consideration to the legislation of Saskatchewan generally.

Mr. COLDWELL: That was done on the initiative of the department itself?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is always done. We always receive provincial legislation for examination and there are law officers of the department whose function it is to examine that legislation, and to prepare memoranda for the minister to submit to council.

CANADIAN ARMY

DISMISSAL OF EDITOR OF "MAPLE LEAF"—POLICY IN REPATRIATION OF N.R.M.A. SERVICE PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence. Will the minister make a statement on the dismissal of the editor of the Canadian overseas army paper Maple Leaf for criticizing the repatriation policy, as reported in to-day's press; and will he also state the policy of the government on repatriation of N.R.M.A. soldiers?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence): My hon. friend was good enough to inform me of his intention to ask this question, and I am very happy to answer it.

May I preface what I have to say by stating that the action which General Simonds took in removing the editor of the Maple Leaf, and the statement which he issued giving reasons for that action, were entirely on his own initiative, and without any instruction or request from Ottawa to do so, but that both action and statement have my entire approval.

Perhaps it would be useful if I gave the house first a statement of what the policy of Maple Leaf is with respect to matters of this kind. When the various editions of the Maple Leaf were first established, Colonel R. S. Malone, assistant director of public relations, (army) discussed what the policy of the paper should be with the various interested parties, including General Crerar, commanding officer overseas, and the then Minister of National Defence.

As a result a signal was sent overseas which is referred to in one of the signals from General Simonds, which I shall read later, and which summarizes that policy. I shall give the house an extract from that signal, as follows:

1. No editorial directives, regulations or policies for the Maple Leaf have at any time been issued by either military authorities or from Canadian government sources. Decisions on editorial matters rest entirely with the Maple Leaf staff. On the founding of the various editions of the Maple Leaf, however, the A.D.P.R. Lt.-Col. Malone in each instance set forth a basic policy to be followed as long as the Maple Leaf functioned. This policy involves two principles only and was accordingly registered with Field Marshal Montgomery, General Crerar and the defence department in Canada. They in their turn agreed to a policy of non-interference. This policy which must be maintained at all times is as follows:

(a) There will be no holding back of actual news at any time either domestic, military or foreign events. All factual stories considered of interest to the troops will be published with a prominence according to reader interest. No such stories will be deliberately overplayed if such treatment could result in loss of morale or friction within the army or political controversy, i.e., troops within the army are entitled to their own political views whether Liberal, Labour, Conservative or C.C.F., etc. As there is only one newspaper available to the troops, there can be no special emphasis given to news of one particular political body, racial group or provincial division.

(b) Editorial comment and opinion appearing in the editorial column proper of necessity represents the official view of the Maple Leaf. The basic purpose of the Maple Leaf is for assisting troop morale and at the same time keeping our forces up to date with the news as well as providing some interest and entertainment.

2. For the above reasons the following subjects will not be dealt with editorially:

(a) Any comment or opinion on domestic, political issues in Canada which would cause friction within the army and between the troops overseas and people at home thus injuring army morale.

(b) Any internal military question which would tend to cause antagonism and set one group, formation or service within the army against another. This applies equally as regards other national interests within the Canadian army, i.e., subjects which would cause friction between Canucks, Limies, Poles, Yanks, etc. Rather the governing principle should be that the Maple Leaf should be a strong medium for binding our army together and maintaining a team spirit throughout. The strength of the Maple Leaf lies entirely in that direction.

Then follows another paragraph relating to letters to the editor, etc., which I need not take up the time of the house in reading.

When I saw the press report of the first editorial which appeared on the 19th, while it caused me some concern, because it did not disclose anything new, and expressed an opinion which seemed to me would cause some disturbance among the troops overseas awaiting repatriation, I did not feel that it called for action on my part.

The next day I saw a report of a second editorial in which reference was made to the matter of the repatriation policy, indicating that that policy was determined in Canada, and leaving the inference that it had been changed before and that it could be changed now. To me that editorial had definite political significance. I then asked the chief of general staff to obtain for me a report as to the publication of the two editorials.

My wishes in this respect had been anticipated, and a signal was sent to General Murchie, chief of general staff at headquarters overseas, asking for a report on the publication of these two editorials. On Friday, September 21, General Murchie cabled to General Foulkes, chief of staff in Ottawa; and I think I will read to the house the text of that cable. This is what General Murchie said:

Ref. DPR. 1762 Amsterdam edition of Maple Leaf followed up repat story and editorial of 19th September by a further editorial on 20th September entitled "To Continue" which further criticized the present system of repat. Both editorials written by Major J. D. MacFarlane, managing editor.

Have now received following from Simonds. Begins. Reference Maple Leaf editorials September 19 "On this repat question Maple Leaf reveals"—

That is the title of the first editorial.

—and 20th September, "To continue"—

The title of the second editorial.

—I pointed out to the editor, Major J. D. MacFarlane, that these contravened the policy of the Maple Leaf in particular reference COS. 660 of 101630B July 1945 para 2(B)—

That is the signal from which I read an extract a moment ago.

—and CGS. 365 of 181740 July 1945 para 2 and para 3 last sentence. I requested Major MacFarlane to publish editorially the other side of the controversial question raised in the editorials referred to above namely that in view of common obligations of service after reaching this theatre and DND policy as regards repatriation there was no differentiation between NRMA and volunteer soldiers of equal point scores. I further said to him that raising this issue was creating a schism between groups within the army detrimental to morale and to no useful purpose and that to present a one-sided case was bound to do much harm. He refused to accede to publication of the editorial which Col. Gilchrist and I considered necessary to give a just presentation of the case and in principle was not willing to accept as policy that a balanced view as opposed to his own personal view must be expressed in editorial columns of the Maple Leaf. I have therefore ordered the removal of Major MacFarlane from the editorship and am going to arrange repatriation as early as possible to which his point score entitles him. I regret that this action should be necessary but in view of his refusal to accept the basic policy as laid down for the Maple Leaf I consider no other course was possible. I am issuing a statement for publication in the Maple Leaf explaining the action I have taken the reasons for it and presenting the side of the case which I consider was not properly presented in the subject matter discussed in the Maple Leaf editorials. A copy of this I will forward as soon as complete. Col. Gilchrist was present throughout interviews with MacFarlane and agrees as to issues under discussion and action taken.

Then General Murchie added:

I consider that Simonds took the only action possible under the circumstances and I will forward the statement to which he refers as soon as received.

Information requested para 1 DPR. 1762 being obtained and will forward earliest.

That signal was given to me on Friday. On Saturday afternoon I received a copy of the signal containing a copy of the statement which General Simonds had caused to be published in the Maple Leaf, and which he had given to the Canadian press. That has already appeared in the newspapers.

I think for the purpose of the record I should like to have it on Hansard; but since it has already appeared in the press perhaps the house will consent to its being taken as read, and placed on Hansard.

Mr. GREEN: If that is to be done, I think it would be fair to place the editorials on Hansard also.

Mr. ABBOTT: I should be glad to do that, but they have not been cabled to me as yet. The Maple Leaf is not published here. I shall be glad to see that those are placed on Hansard as soon as we can get them. I shall ask that they be cabled at once. I have seen only the extracts which appeared in the Canadian papers.

Mr. GREEN: I suggest that they all be placed on Hansard together, General Simonds' statement and the editorials.

Mr. ABBOTT: All I am talking about now is General Simonds' statement and the statements which appeared in the Maple Leaf which have been referred to in this morning's papers. I want it on the record here. I am trying to give a full explanation of this matter. I thought it would save time, but I am prepared to read it. This is the message which came on Saturday to General Foulkes from General Murchie:

Reference my GS. 2091 following is text of statement issued by Simonds to the Maple Leaf with copy to Canadian Press under heading "Statement by Lieutenant-General G. G. Simonds commanding Canadian forces in the Netherlands". Statement begins.

On September 21, 1945, I reluctantly ordered the removal of the editor of the Maple Leaf, Major J. D. Macfarlane, M.B.E. I give you below my reasons for so doing.

Freedom of the press is a vital principle which we are all concerned to uphold. But the position of the Maple Leaf differs from the ordinary newspaper in that it holds a monopoly. It is the only daily newspaper regularly presenting its views and news to the whole Canadian army overseas. Ordinarily in our country or community there are a number of newspapers presenting news and providing editorial comment on current problems. In this way important and controversial subjects are presented and discussed from many angles—if one paper or group of papers emphasizes one aspect and advocates certain action others will independently present other and contrary angles. A balance of views is available and each individual is enabled to form his own opinions based upon all the information and arguments available through the whole press.

Because of the monopoly position of the Maple Leaf—because it is the only newspaper regularly serving the whole Canadian army—it is inherent in its charter that its editorial columns must present all points of view and a balanced statement of the subjects with which it deals. Particularly is this important when it deals with the subjects in which all soldiers are acutely interested. It is quite wrong for the editor of the Maple Leaf to give a biased view or what is his own personal view in disregard of the views of others on internal military questions which would tend to cause antagonism and set one group formation of service within the army against another.

So long as the editor of the Maple Leaf adhered to his charter and presented unbiased and impartial argument in his editorial comment he was free and would always be free from any interference by myself or any other commander. But on September 19, 1945, there appeared an editorial entitled "On this repat question the Maple Leaf reveals" and on September 20, 1945, a further editorial entitled "To continue" both of which in my opinion made biased and most unfair comment upon an issue affecting every soldier awaiting repatriation. I met the editor and told him that though I had no quarrel with his statement of facts and no desire to suppress or hide them I thought his comment biased and unjust and far from doing any good could only cause unhappiness and dissension in the ranks of the army. I gave him what I considered "The other side of the picture", which I give in full below, and told him he was under an obligation to present those aspects as well as his own personal views in an editorial in the Maple Leaf. This he refused to do and he further stated that he refused to adhere to the principle that a balanced expression of opinion as opposed to his own personal opinion should govern the editorial policy of the Maple Leaf. Under these conditions I considered I had no alternative but to order his removal as editor.

It is with deep regret that I have had to take this step. I do not believe that anyone has a greater appreciation of all Major Macfarlane has done than I have myself but in a newspaper holding a practical monopoly I cannot concede the principle that the editor may use it as a medium of expression of his own views regardless of the views of others. I have no personal antagonism towards Major Macfarlane—on the contrary I offer him my personal gratitude and thanks for all he has done since the inception of the Maple Leaf. I would be the very last to suggest that the fact he holds strong personal views is any detriment to his personality or character. His point score entitles him to repatriation now and in arranging this I wish him good luck in his future undertakings.

"The other side of the picture."

I have said that I considered the editorials in the Maple Leaf of September 19 and 20 presented a biased point of view and were unjust. I am not challenging the facts as presented and have no desire to suppress them.

I consider the editorial of the nineteenth unfortunate, first of all because the very title of it and the whole tone implies that the Maple Leaf has unearthed something that the authorities are trying to conceal.

Every soldier in the Canadian army overseas ought to have known long ago that the plan approved by the Department of National Defence for repatriation of the Canadian army, the plan for the execution of which I have been made responsible, envisages units returning as such with personnel of point scores between 150 and 50. This was stated in the official publication "After victory in Europe" issued last May. It was repeated in General Crerar's circular letter of July 10, and I have personally so informed officers, N.C.O's and men when speaking to them on this problem. The fact that a concession has been made to high point scores by inserting further Canada drafts between the moves of successive divisions has not changed the policy that units when they move as such will take with them all personnel on their strength with point scores of between 150 and 50. There can be no "revelation" in that it has been known and published in the Maple Leaf and discussed for months.

The real issue by the Maple Leaf and the real reason why I condemn the editorials of September 19 and 20, is that they advocate that N.R.M.A. soldiers should be treated differently from volunteer soldiers for purposes of repatriation. It may be unfortunate that the individual cases referred to in the Maple Leaf editorial of September 19, 1945, were posted last June to a unit of the first Canadian infantry division but to remove them now I am convinced would be unjust for it would mean that for soldiers with equal points the volunteer and N.R.M.A. soldier must be treated differently. This would be wrong from both the practical and moral point of view.

Of soldiers who started their service in the N.R.M.A. some after being called up and while still serving in Canada volunteered to come overseas. Some who were sent to the United Kingdom as N.R.M.A. became "active" volunteers whilst in the United Kingdom, some sent to reinforcement units on the continent became "active" volunteers after reaching the continent. Some sent as reinforcements to the continent never became "active", they were posted forward to infantry battalions and fought as N.R.M.A. men. Of this last group, i.e., those who never changed their N.R.M.A. status, sixty were killed in action, 192 were wounded.

When we were hard pressed last autumn and spring and the N.R.M.A. were sent over as reinforcements I believed the feeling of the whole army was that if they "did their stuff" they would be accepted as equal members of this army. They did "do their stuff" and it would be morally wrong at this time when the fighting is over to say that they should be treated differently from other soldiers.

If the criterion is taken as to whether or not a soldier served in an operational theatre, what about volunteers who never served in an operational theatre. A comparison of risks run is not valid at this stage for those of us who are awaiting repatriation, have in fact survived, we are here alive and well regardless of comparative risks to which individuals might have been exposed. There are both volunteers and N.R.M.A. men who have fought in battle. Some of both have been killed. Some of both have been wounded. Some of both have come through the battle unscathed. There are both volunteers and N.R.M.A. men who have never served outside Canada. There are both volunteers and N.R.M.A. men who have never served in an operational theatre. Length of service and length of service abroad are the only proper individual yardsticks at this time. Two points for a month's service in Canada, three points for a month's service abroad discriminates in favour of the man who has served abroad. But between men of equal points there cannot be further moral discrimination.

I have used the term moral discrimination because there must be some practical discrimination between individuals. There are many with high scores who must be prepared to wait because duty so requires.

I consider it my duty to see that those who have to wait the longest before returning home are at least as well served as regards health, education, sports, welfare, recreation and leave as those more fortunate ones who have returned to Canada in the earliest drafts. To do this I must retain, sufficient experienced staff and regimental officers, warrant officers, N.C.O's, clerical staffs, cooks, administrative specialists and tradesmen and units of the services to ensure that a proper standard of administration is upheld until the end. That is why it is impossible to let the point score be the only consideration in the order of return home. Some with very high scores, others with medium group scores must subordinate their own personal wishes to return home to their duty to the group as a whole.

Feeling as we do about this question of return home it is not difficult to find individual cases here and there which appealing to our emotions give rise to feelings of indignation and injustice that our particular turn has not come sooner. But the few individual cases do not really affect this problem which is still to be solved in terms of many thousands.

I assure you that it is my intention to work the repat plan with the greatest possible degree of fairness to the individual providing that this does not react to the serious detriment of the remaining groups.

My hon. friend asked me to give a statement on the repatriation policy. The broad details of that policy I think are pretty well known and are as indicated in General Simonds' message. They were outlined in the pamphlet which was issued after VE-day early in May.

Mr. GREEN: What I asked about was the policy of the government on repatriation of the N.R.M.A. soldiers.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is pretty well indicated too in General Simonds' statement. But may I point out to the house, as I indicated in the statement I gave to the press last night, that this repatriation policy is not a policy which was adopted here in Ottawa and imposed on the army overseas. That policy was evolved overseas, by the men over there, by General Crerar and his officers. It was, of course, approved in Ottawa, but neither my predecessor nor I, nor for that matter the staff here in Ottawa, initiated or designed that policy. It was worked out overseas. It was felt here that the policy would be more satisfactory if it were designed by the men on the spot who knew the problem. I want to make that perfectly clear, because this editorial indicated, as some others have since, that this was a policy imposed by somebody here in Canada. That is not the case.

The policy from the very outset with respect to these N.R.M.A. men has been this: Once they stepped on a ship there was no distinction made between the N.R.M.A. man and the volunteer soldier. They were all going over to fight. There has been a lot of talk in this country—not by me, let me say—of two armies, but so far as overseas service is concerned we have never had two armies. There has been no distinction made between the volunteer soldier and the man sent over under the National Resources Mobilization Act. Once the N.R.M.A. man got over there he took his place in the reinforcement pool, and when his turn came he went over to France as part of the reinforcements and was posted to a unit, just the same as any other soldier. General Foulkes told me only this morning that when people asked him over there how the N.R.M.A. men were doing, he replied, "I do not know, because I do not know who they are. So far as I am concerned they are soldiers just the same as any other soldier."

So there has been no distinction made, and so long as I am minister there will not be any distinction made, between the soldier who is over there compulsorily and the soldier who is over there voluntarily. And to old soldiers it is obvious why that must be so. There must be mutual trust and confidence in the man beside you when you are fighting, and to make a distinction between the men who have volunteered and the men who have been sent over under the N.R.M.A. would be indefensible.

Mr. GREEN: Is it not a fact that the complaint made in the editorial was about N.R.M.A. troops who were never in the fighting at all but went over to the continent after the fighting had ended and are now being sent home ahead of the men who did the fighting?

Mr. ABBOTT: As General Simonds indicated in his message, it was perhaps unfortunate that a few N.R.M.A. men should have been posted to the first division on or shortly after VE-day. That was the case, although I believe there were very few. But having been posted to the first division in the ordinary course, not by any process of special selection but just in the ordinary course, they were no longer N.R.M.A. men but just soldiers who had been sent over from England to reinforce a particular unit. As General Simonds has indicated, perhaps it was unfortunate that that step was taken, but it was taken, although not by the Minister of National Defence or the government here in Ottawa. That step was taken overseas. That may be a subject for criticism; I do not know. However, I am advised that relatively few in that category were posted to that division. Having been posted to that division, if the men had a point score in excess of 50, between 50 and 150, they would come back with their units. If they have not that point score, they will not.

I do not know that I should go into details to justify the present system. The reason, to anybody who understands the problems of repatriation, are obvious. If you did not follow that system you would soon, for instance, be without any cooks, senior officers or N.C.O.'s. It was felt after most careful consideration by General Crerar and his officers overseas, and this has been known to the troops overseas and to this country for the last four or five months, that there should be no distinction made—and this is the policy which is being followed—both as to the volunteer soldier and the so-called N.R.M.A. soldier, provided he has the required point score.

Mr. GREEN: Am I to understand that the minister will obtain copies of the editorials and—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. GREEN: Mr. Speaker, this is a question arising out of the minister's statement.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I think I have already been very generous to hon. members. I would call their attention to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, page 125, also May, 245, on standing order 44:

> After a minister has answered a question asked by a member when the orders of the day are called, no discussion of any kind should take place. Mr. Speaker Lowther laid down the rule about this on the 5th July, 1915, in the British House of Commons, where the practice is practically the same as ours. He said: "All supplementary questions are irregular and are not provided for at all in any standing order. It is entirely a matter of grace. I may say generally that the object of supplementary questions is to elucidate any ambiguity in the reply of a minister or to seek for some further information if he can give it; but supplementary questions should not be put, and ought not to be put, to embarrass a minister or to lead him to give an answer in a hurry which at a subsequent time he might be sorry that he gave. I will give as much freedom as I possibly can, but at the same time there must be some limits."

Mr. GREEN: Mr. Speaker, I was not intending to carry on the discussion. All I wanted to do was to ask the minister to make sure that he had given his undertaking that he would obtain copies of these editorials and place them on Hansard. That is all I ask.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have already given that undertaking, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GREEN: That is all I want.

Mr. BRACKEN: May I ask the minister, arising out of the statement he has just made, what body determines the official policy of Maple Leaf? The minister may have mentioned that in his statement.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, I did. The Maple Leaf, as the leader of the opposition knows, is purely an army newspaper set up by the department of public relations, headed overseas by Colonel Malone, and in discussion with public relations officers overseas Colonel Malone worked out the method of editing and publishing the Maple Leaf. Following those discussions the policy was laid down which I have outlined and which is contained in this signal from which I have quoted. It was approved by the other defence ministers, by General Crerar, and by General Murchie, chief of staff here. That is my information as to the manner in which the policy was determined.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE IN REPLY

The house resumed from Friday, September 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. M. Benidickson for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Bracken, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Hansell.

Mr. ROLAND BEAUDRY (St. James): Mr. Speaker, I rise with some diffidence to undergo what might be termed the "baptism of speech" of a member new to this house, since the constituency I represent has nothing at first sight to single it out. It is a constituency of Canadians who believe in Canada as an entity achieved almost eighty years ago, and who have lived, thought, acted, and at the last election voted, as free men aware of the fact that living in a free country is one of their most precious prerogatives, and desirous above all of retaining their prerogatives and of taking pride in their citizenship.

When I say that St. James has nothing to single it out I am perhaps a bit inaccurate. St. James is the constituency which gave this house one of its finest exponents of the graces of parliamentary eloquence, and one of its outstanding former cabinet members, the late Fernand Rinfret. It is the constituency which recognized the qualities of heart of his successor, my predecessor in this seat, Eugene Durocher. His span of life, all short as it was, allowed him to endear himself to a good many in this house and to everyone for whose hopes, interests and wishes he stood in this chamber.

In one respect, Mr. Speaker, St. James stands out in almost paradoxical relief. By its very lack of singularity it becomes singular. In point of population it is one of the largest constituencies, if not the largest, in this dominion. and it is probably the most clearly outlined cross-section of this country's component elements. Representing as I do one of the largest bodies of people who may send a representative to this house, I am fully conscious of the responsibilities entailed, and fully aware of the hopes, desires and needs of these Canadians of various origins who make up the entity which, since the beginning of our political history as a nation, has been, with Quebec East, the bell-wether of Canadian Quebec's opinion. This I say, Mr. Speaker, fully cognizant of the fact that each constituency claims equal importance, but also mindful of history and tradition.

Through my voice, sir, St. James speaks its hope, its desire, its determination that Canada shall become the country which it was meant to be by the French settlers, to whom self-sacrifice was the means to an end; by the English conqueror, upon whom through the taking over of this vast territory devolved the duty of meting out justice and of recognizing rights; the country which has been the promised land to so many new Canadians.

Of course—we on this side of the house, and I trust those on the other side, are aware of it—rights, prerogatives and their enjoyment entail duties—duties of understanding, duties of commission, duties, if I may so term them, of omission and remission, and duties stemming from divine law. Since the opening of this parliament there have been many statements on both sides of the house which hearten me in my belief that this country at large intends to discharge its duty of understanding —of understanding that in matters of language and of religious tolerance numbers do not necessarily imply right; that in matters of controversy arising from different viewpoints—viewpoints of necessity dissimilar because they spring from a dissimilarity of antecedents and precedents—both sides at times may be right; of understanding that abuse cast by either party at an ideological opposition will never bridge a flow of opposite thought; understanding that under the present circumstances the problems of government may often find a solution, not ideal perhaps to each individual but reasonably acceptable to all. This duty Mr. Speaker, the people of St. James, the French and English speaking, the Catholics and the non-Catholics, the old Canadians and the new Canadians of different origins, living together in harmony in the largest constituency in the largest city of our country, have lived up to and will continue to live up to. I am equally sure that they have noted the utterances of many in this house with a renewed assurance that we may yet achieve the unity of thought and purpose which this party has set as its goal, and for which the leader of this party stands out as a symbol.

The duty of omission and remission is perhaps not as easy to define, but certainly its performance can be far more of a daily occurrence and the opportunities for its discharge far more numerous. May I define what I term our duty of omission and remission as being: omitting to take offence at provocation, whether it be just or unjust in all spheres of thought, and, in such cases of provocation, as omitting to condemn before or without a full hearing; of refraining from verbal or factual behaviour such as may lead a fellow Canadian to believe that his rights to full citizenship are being disputed. May I suggest that we remember at all times that if we have reason to be spurred on to greater nationalism, or to become the nationalists which the new glory, the new opportunities, the new horizons which open before Canada justify us to be, our nationalism may take different means of expression.

Let us not condemn our neighbour's form of expression because it does not fully coincide with our own. If both are sincere, if neither is inspired by selfish motives of local sublimation, both have their place in our spiritual economy and both should with time be merged into one common means of expression. Both should eventually have one sincere, one all-encompassing joint purpose, the happiness of all Canadians to whom religion, language and custom shall not prove an obstacle to a common interest, a common sense of citizenship, and a common flag.

The accomplishment of the duty which I have termed that of omission and remission has at times been difficult for the people of St. James; yet they took the opportunity offered by the last election to recall to the country at large that they saw their duty. Their overwhelming vote in favour of one who, in our minds, is the symbol of tolerant yet firm Canadianism, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), proves it. And, Mr. Speaker, many were there to influence them, in some cases to urge them that now was the time to mingle their voices with the cry for separation, with the cry for isolation of mind and of thought if not of corporeal presence, and that cry had not always found its accents from sheer selfishness. At times it may have been provoked by what seemed to some, and not the least enlightened, sound justification for their attitude.

The men and women of St. James proudly discharged their duty of omission, anxious to remain free citizens in a country of freedom. They were oblivious, if not forgetful, of the castigation of a few and of the blandishments of a fewer still, to whom Canada is not an end, not an achievement, but an instrument and a means. St. James, sir, did a magnificent job of discharging its duty of remission and omission, and it omitted all considerations other than the furtherance and aggrandizement of the destiny of our homeland.

I shall not dwell on the duties stemming from divine law, but all this country should be thankful for the family allowances act. The men and women of St. James are grateful for the family allowances act, and have accepted family allowances in the spirit in which they were proffered by this government: For the purpose of making the citizens of Canada who are in process of growth both physically and mentally, such as they may become wider in their horizon than the boundaries of St. James, than the boundaries of their province; that they may become citizens of a closely knit yet far-reaching Canada, masters of the two languages which are recognized as the twin tongues of this land, masters of both mentalities which spring from this duality of languages, and above all masters of themselves in their own land.

May I now, Mr. Speaker, submit my views on our approach to the performance of our duty of commission. Here I say that full understanding of the importance of the duties I have outlined previously is imperative if we are to agree on our various duties of commission, and I submit that it is imperative for our future that we do agree. There are many in this land who have advocated in word, and others in thought if not in word, that the greatest tangible evidence of the discharge of one's duty of commission to this country is military service for war purposes. I agree that military service for war purposes is not only commendable but necessary; and that it definitely represents a duty of commission. But they in turn surely will grant me that this performance, no matter how heroic it may be, no matter how great its repercussions, no matter what it entails in loss of that which is dearest to man, his very life, is not necessarily given to each generation. Let us hope that it shall never be given to the generations to follow. They will also grant me that the performance of many other duties of commission is no less important to national life and survival. When I say this, it is farthest from my mind to detract one whit from the greatness of the sacrifice, the hardships that accrue, the sorrows that follow, to lessen the glory, the merit or the gratitude which they deserve, of those who a quarter of a century ago, and more recently in the last six years, have shed their blood or have given their lives in the accomplishment of their duty. To those with heads bowed St. James pays its debt of gratitude for their part in saving Canada. And so that I may be understood by all of those who shared in the battles for the survival of Canada as an entity, and for the safeguarding of our way of life, I say: Nous vous sommes profondément reconnaissants.

I regret I cannot repeat what I feel in the language of origin of every Canadian who helped to save civilization, but to every one of these goes my deepest admiration and gratitude in the knowledge that for minorities as to language the obstacles and the sacrifice were, of necessity, greater.

In St. James as everywhere else in Canada we have cause to honour a great many of our own who gave up years of blood and life; but in St. James as everywhere else in this country there are a great many more who will never reap glory except in their own hearts, whose everyday prosaic task is known to but a few, and who are yet daily deserving of their country and who daily carry out the acts of commission which they owe to their country. Of these too many are slighted in times of war, too many forgotten in times of peace. They are the workers, the labourers, the consumers, the taxpayers, the artisans of our daily bread, the fathers and mothers of the present and of the future generation, who perhaps do not always see their duty of commission as their neighbour sees it, but who are none the less sincere in its accomplishment.

When we shall all have in this country a similar interpretation of our duties of understanding, of omission and remission, of divine laws, we shall better understand, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, what the duty of commission means to ourselves and to our neighbour. To those and to others Canada also owes tangible recognition. For those and all others it is the duty of this parliament and the avowed intention of this party to enact such legislation as may ensure unity, peace and security.

I am gratified that old age pensions become part of our individual economy. I am not fully in accord with the limitation of time set upon their enjoyment, and would strongly advocate that within the bounds of our financial ability to meet our obligations, the men and women of Canada should receive old age pensions at the age of sixty in cases of dire need and at the age of sixty-five in all other cases. I believe and advocate that plans for our physical construction and reconstruction should be laid not in the light of a bounty but in direct consequence of the immediate needs of our people, and that the realization of these plans be unhampered by the dictates of what I hope may soon become the unnecessary evil of bureaucracy.

I appreciate that this is not all easy. Certainly the contradictory statements and suggestions on this score coming from the opposite side of the house will prove of no great help. Just here may I suggest to hon. members of the opposition that to them is given at once the opportunity of carrying out their duties of understanding and omission for the true benefit of this country. In connection with the demobilization and rehabilitation in civilian life of our forces, those non-combatants who owe a debt of gratitude are perhaps more desirous than anyone else of prompt and effective action. May I be allowed here to call attention to what seems to be an anomaly, this, that men who enlisted for general service, and who through no wish of their own but because of the necessities of military discipline and organization did not see service overseas, are not granted rehabilitation treatment equal to that of front-line men. I submit that all non-commissioned ranks, at least, who enlisted with an equal sense of duty and an equal willingness for self-sacrifice, should be treated with an equality of recognition. If it is true that circumstances may alter cases, I believe it equally true that in the main the ends of fairness to all may be best served in this way.

This house already has been too kind to me, and I should not like to wear out my welcome. I conclude with the hope and faith that the immediate future will see the development of Canada not only as a member of the community of nations but as a land of fruitful realization for all those whom the Almighty has placed within its confines; and for that purpose the additional duty devolves upon us of helping every Canadian in the task of fulfilling each of the duties I have outlined earlier. Let us keep constantly in our minds the thought that we as individuals hold our fate in our hands, and that the fate of each of our fellow Canadians is at all times inseparable from our own if we are to be true to our own interests and shall be worthy of Canada.

Mr. ANTHONY HLYNKA (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, during the course of the past twelve days we have had the privilege of listening to some very fine contributions to this debate, dealing with the problems mentioned in the speech from the throne. The most important and immediate problems, of course, are those which have arisen directly as a result of the war. Our domestic problems should be less difficult of solution, particularly in view of our fortunate geographic position, since Canadian soil has not been ravaged by war. But in war-torn Europe the problems of providing food, clothing, shelter and medical supplies, finding refuge for millions of displaced persons and their rehabilitation, are matters of great magnitude and extreme urgency. It is my firm conviction that on humanitarian grounds alone we have a moral responsibility to those unhappy people, particularly when we consider the tremendous sacrifices and limitless contributions they made to the winning of the war. It is true that the lion's share of this gigantic task is being discharged, and with some success, by such official organizations as UNRRA, intergovernmental committees, the International Red Cross and its auxiliaries, and so on. However, I am more concerned with that phase of the problem which extends beyond the scope of officialdom but which is by no means less deserving of the most sympathetic and humanitarian consideration.

Before proceeding further I should like to say that I have nothing but the highest admiration for the organizations to which I have referred and for the work they are doing with the limited resources which have been placed at their disposal for such a colossal task. I believe, nevertheless, that we have fallen short in our humanitarian response to that other phase of this gigantic problem which, as I have said, extends beyond the jurisdiction of the organizations I have mentioned. I would refer to the situation which exists in regions where complications have arisen due to racial or political differences. In order to alleviate the situation with respect to food, clothing and other supplies in regions where complications do exist I should like to make the suggestion that societies, private individuals and relatives of displaced persons be permitted to make direct gifts to those needy people so that all such articles may be received by those for whom they are intended. Under the present arrangement all articles of food, clothing and so on are collected into a common pool and distributed in the various zones by local officials and agencies as they see fit. Should the suggestion of direct gifts be adopted I am certain that additional aid would be forthcoming, both from those who are interested in their own relatives and from many other public-spirited individuals and societies on this continent.

Speaking in this house on March 26, 1945, in a debate on the San Francisco conference, I suggested then that there was a great need for some mechanism to be devised whereby stateless peoples and persons would be provided with the means of voicing their own opinions on their own behalf, when and if they consider themselves not represented by the various de facto governments. To-day, in the light of what is taking place in the Soviet sphere, I am convinced more than ever that there has become a still greater need for the setting up of such mechanism. For it is quite obvious that any problem which involves millions of people cannot and must not be lightly dismissed or brushed aside. To substantiate my contention that the magnitude of this problem has reached serious proportions, may I quote from an editorial which appeared in the Ottawa Evening Citizen of September 15, 1945, under the heading "Estonian Odyssey." The editorial says:

A small Canadian press item from London tells of the setting out in a 37-foot sailing yacht of a group of sixteen Estonian refugees from the west coast of Scotland. The destination of these seven men, five women and four children is the United States. Three times already the small craft has set out, but it is in an earnest of the determination of the group not to return to their native land that a fourth attempt is now being made to reach the new world in the hope of a new life.

The desire to go far from their own land will surely raise problems on this side of the Atlantic if they complete their desperate voyage. It emphasizes the plight of many thousands of what are now known as displaced persons.

Such lands as Estonia and Latvia, and other territories in Europe where governments have changed, inevitably leave numbers of former residents unwilling to return to their former homes. In the case of the Estonian group they are unwilling to return to the land which is now incorporated under the Soviet union.

It will take a great deal of wisdom and understanding to deal with this class of refugee. The war has been fought in the great cause of freedom. It would be a negation of that struggle to be a party of the unwilling return of such refugees or other displaced persons—they include victims of nazi forced labour from Poland and even Russia—to former homelands. The united nations, particularly the big three, have a test of their ideals in stern realities to face.

I have other reports describing in the most pathetic and desperate terms the fate of these homeless millions. Here is another extract found in the Czech press service bulletin of June 28, 1945. This bulletin is published in London, England. The article is entitled "News From the Crucified Continent," and the subheading reads, "Be Communist or Perish." It states:

According to information received from Trieste, the western allies are forcing large numbers of people who escaped the wrath of Tito communists to return to the parts they ran away from. Thousands of Croats and Slovenes who sought refuge in the British-American zone in Karinthia, have been handed over to Tito. They were stripped naked and executed by the deadly fire of machine guns. The Bishop of Lubljanja, together with 161 Slovenian priests and clerics, made their way into the American zone beseeching protection. It has not yet been decided whether they will be given up to Tito or not.

There is silence over these horrors in the press of the Christian civilized countries in the west. It seems almost as if a decision has been taken that the peoples of the European continent must be communist, or else perish.

It will readily be seen, Mr. Speaker, that the two quotations which I have cited reveal the desperate situation which faces so many freedom-loving people of the world. I may say further that the fate of the continent of Europe is in the hands of the English-speaking nations—Canada included.

According to the figures of the international labor office there are no less than 40 million displaced persons as a result of the war. A good number of these persons will return to their former homes of their own free will, but in the case of what I call "stateless persons" the word repatriation has a different meaning. To them it means penal servitude, concentration camps, or, to use the favourite Soviet term, liquidation. This group of stateless people comprise several millions of Ukrainians, Jews, Czechs, Slovaks, Estonians, Latvians, Lithuanians, Finns, Poles and others, and the most tragic and ironic thing of all is that this group is made up of persons who hold democratic views, and, as the quotation says, democracies are forcing them to become communist or perish.

I find brief reference to this subject of repatriation in the British Hansard, for August 20, 1945, wherein Hon. Ernest Bevin, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in the British government, asserts "that over 600,000 Russians," as he calls them, "have been transported from the British zone to the east," and, "that it was expected that by autumn only 645,000 will be left, of whom 500,000 will be 'Poles'."

During the past several weeks desperate letters, messages and pleas have been reaching many of our Canadian homes, and we have read press dispatches to the same effect, that the group of displaced persons who are found in American and British zones are being repatriated by force to their former homes. Many of these displaced persons commit suicide rather than return under the Soviets. Still others go so far as to resist the British and American military police in self-defence, and we learn from the latest reports that the situation is growing worse. In dealing with this question I should like to ask: Is repatriation by force a solution to the problem, and is it in conformity with the principles proclaimed in the Atlantic charter and later endorsed at Yalta, namely: "the right of all peoples to choose the form of government under which they will live," and also "afford the assurance that all the men in all the lands may live out their lives in freedom from fear and want?"

Representations have been made to me, Mr. Speaker, by many of our Canadian veterans of world war II, who have met many of these displaced persons and who have personal knowledge of the situation as it exists with respect to the question of repatriation; and being of Ukrainian origin themselves, they asked me to plead the cause of these unfortunate people, among whom there are many Ukrainians. In addition to this I have been receiving letters and telegrams almost daily from all parts of Canada, sent by Ukrainian church bodies and other Canadian-Ukrainian organizations, requesting that I bring this matter to the attention of the Canadian government and to the attention of this democratic tribunal.

I should like, therefore, on behalf of Ukrainian refugees who are involved in this repatriation, and on behalf of others, to submit a plea to the Canadian government to transmit through its high offices to the British and United States governments an appeal to cease forceful repatriation of displaced persons, and in addition to give sympathetic consideration to the following specific requests:

1. That permission be granted to representatives of Ukrainian relief committees to visit various camps and districts where Ukrainian refugees are found. These representatives to act on instructions of the British and United States commanders in their respective zones.

2. That where the number of Ukrainian refugees warrants it, they be organized or granted permission to organize themselves into Ukrainian refugee camps, and that they be permitted to organize their own welfare committees. If this were done, all material aid meant for Ukrainians would be more likely to reach them.

3. That radio news and information broadcasts—now being transmitted to Europe in many languages, but not in Ukrainian—be also given in the Ukrainian language. For at present all authoritative information is broadcast in languages which are not adequately understood by Ukrainian people.

4. That British and United States military governments alone issue and announce statements of policy in regard to problems respecting refugees, instead of permitting Russian and other representatives to confuse the Ukrainian refugees.

5. That permission be granted to Ukrainian refugees to edit, print and distribute a "news letter" in the Ukrainian language for the benefit of Ukrainian refugees, as is being done in Russian, Polish and a few other languages.

From the five specific requests which I have just placed before the government and this honourable house it will be quite evident that not only do Ukrainians share the unfortunate fate of a refugee life, but they also have been overlooked in respect to the privileges granted to Polish, Russian and other refugees. It is in the light of all these cruel and horrible conditions and because of the tragic fate of the Ukrainian refugees that I make this plea.

In conclusion, I should like to read an extract from Mr. Churchill's speech which he delivered in the British House of Commons on August 16, 1945 and which is recorded in the British Hansard of that date. This extract describes a scene which appears in the tragic world drama of to-day and which I could not even hope to describe in my own inadequate words. Mr. Churchill said:

It is not impossible that tragedy on a prodigious scale is imposing itself behind the iron curtain which at present divides Europe in twain. . . .

I cannot conceive that the elements for a new conflict exist in the Balkans to-day . . . Nevertheless not many members of the new House of Commons will be content with the new situation prevailing in those mountainous, turbulent, ill-organized and war-like regions . . . for almost everywhere communist forces have obtained, or are in process of obtaining, dictatorial powers. . . . We must know where we stand, and we must make clear where we stand in these affairs of the Balkans and of eastern Europe, and indeed of any country which comes into this field.

Our idea is government of the people, by the people, for the people—the people being free without duress to express, by secret ballot without intimidation, their deep-seated wish as to the form and conditions under which they are to live. At present . . . a family is gathered around the fireside to enjoy the scanty fruits of their toil and to recruit their exhausted strength by the little food that they have been able to gather. . . . Suddenly there is a knock at the door and a heavily armed policeman appears. . . . It may be that the father or son, or a friend sitting in the cottage, is called out and taken off into the dark, and no one knows whether he will ever come back again, or what his fate has been. All they know is that they had better not inquire. There are millions of humble homes in Europe at the moment, in Poland, in Czechoslovakia, in Austria, in Hungary, in Yugoslavia, in Rumania, in Bulgaria—where this fear is the main preoccupation of the family life. . . . "Freedom from fear"—but this has been interpreted as if it were only freedom from fear of invasion from a foreign country . . . but that is not the fear of the ordinary family in Europe to-night. Their fear is the policeman's knock. . . . It is for the life and liberty of the individual, for the fundamental rights of man, now menaced and precarious in so many lands that peoples tremble.

. . . Democracy is now on trial as it never was before, and in those islands we must uphold it, as we upheld it in the dark days of 1940 and 1941, with all our hearts, with all our vigilance and with all our enduring and inexhaustible strength.

Yes, democracy is on trial. No atheistic philosophy of force, torture and extermination shall ever restore the God-given democratic right to humanity unless the surviving democracies write a new chapter of history founded on Christian principles.

Mr. H. R. JACKMAN (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, there are many of us in this house who feel that the sooner we can wind up the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the better, because we wish to get on with the important topics of reconversion and the rehabilitation of our armed forces. If at the moment I trespass on the time of the house I do so because I wish to speak on a subject which I think has a great deal to do with rehabilitation and reconversion, that is, the financial measures which the government will bring down. It is not that I have any fore-knowledge, but I do wish to give some ideas which are uppermost in my mind and which I believe are requirements in the budget which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) will bring down, we hope in the very near future.

Although the elected Speaker is absent from the chamber at the moment I should like to offer my sincere congratulations upon his elevation to the high office he now holds.

Inasmuch as parliament was not called for some two weeks after the first appointed date because of the intervening of V-J day, one might have expected that the financial proposals of the government would be made known, at least as far as principle is concerned. However, we find that whatever the government did during that period it is not ready to make this announcement to parliament and to the people of Canada. One would have thought that with the ending of the Japanese war our expenses would be curtailed substantially and therefore the amount of revenue to be raised would also be curtailed substantially. One would have thought that when parliament was called the government would have made known something of its plans. The only reference to the budget in the speech from the throne was this short sentence:

My ministers' proposals with respect to taxation measures will be disclosed in the budget.

Those of us who have followed the workings of government in this and other British countries for many years realize that the position of the budget has changed considerably, particularly since 1939. There are two reasons in my opinion why the budget should be mentioned, in principle at least, in the speech from the throne. The first is the changed character of the budget proposals. There was a time when the budget had merely to do with the ways and means of raising for the government money to carry on the ordinary administration of the country. In pre-war days the budget seldom ran over $500,000,000; now it runs to many times that amount, and represents a substantial proportion of our total national income. In other words, there was a day not so far distant when what a man earned in open competition with his fellow men, or what he could induce his employer to give him, was his take-home pay. But that no longer obtains. What a workman gets or what an industrialist may earn bears little relation to the amount which he may take home to spend. He must wait until after the budget is announced before he can know, and this year, here we are in September, still waiting to know what the budget for the year 1945-46 is going to be. So far as one can see, the Minister of Finance is taking his own good time before he brings down the budget and acquaints the people and the business men of this country, who must do the planning, with what the incentives and budget measures are likely to be for 1946.

Everyone I think realizes that budgets now are much more far-reaching than they ever were before. They go right down into the very life of the people. I can think of nothing of greater consequence, because the whole industrial and agricultural fabric of our nation is determined by budget measures. Everyone in this house knows that the power to tax is also the power to destroy, and it may very well be that if the budget measures are on the scale which we have seen during recent years, and are wrong in principle or in incidence, they may very well destroy the whole economic life of our country. I hesitate to think what the results may be if this government, because of ill-founded budget proposals, causes us to have great unemployment in Canada.

The second reason for speaking on what I would term budget principles at the present time is conveyed in a sentence that was uttered by that staunch supporter of the Liberal government, the hon. member for Prescott (Mr. Bertrand), who in the early days of this debate said:

> As we all know, when the budget is announced it immediately becomes law.

I am not against the old principle of the budget becoming law the day it is announced, because there were times, and there may again be times, when tariff or other changes could be taken advantage of by some if they knew of the measures before they actually became operative. But that is hardly so to-day, and inasmuch as the budget ramifies through our whole economic life and determines virtually our daily bread and butter, I believe it is the duty of the people's representatives to have some say and to interpret the will of the people in the framing of the measures which determine how the money shall be raised. The government which takes the responsibility for the budget is, of course, aided by certain economic experts, for whom generally speaking I have the highest respect. Nevertheless these so-called experts are not in touch with public opinion, nor do they know how business functions in the same way that members of parliament know, because the members have an intimate acquaintance with the daily life and the welfare of our people.

It is my recommendation, Mr. Speaker, that we should have a committee of this house to decide the ways and means by which the amount of money shall be raised which the government decides must be raised, instead of having brought before the house, as is the practice now, a series of proposals from which no deviation whatsoever is allowed; for only in the minutest detail is any deviation permitted, according to my experience in this house. Unless we resort to such a system, the government becomes in effect a dictatorship, and we have little better than a totalitarian state. The budget is now all too important to be decided by the government and its technical staff rather than by the representatives of the people.

I should like also to say that we are interested now in the budget proposals not simply as a matter of percentages, whether this tax shall be at a certain rate, but we should know the principles, we should know exactly what type of taxation we are to have, and whether taxes are to be increased or lowered in certain brackets, and how business is to fare; for without that knowledge the business men cannot do their planning.

I could also make a plea, and I think on sound grounds, for some relief from taxation. Certainly the people of Canada are expecting relief from taxation. Everywhere one goes he finds that the Canadian citizens believe, and I think the Minister of Finance will agree with them, that they have done a wonderful job in the raising of war revenue. There has been no quibbling and no lack of good will in connection with it. But I am not so much concerned with the relief of the taxpayers, necessary as that is—I believe the government will have to pay some heed now to public opinion because the government's narrow majority in the house will not permit them to railroad measures through, irrespective of what the people think. The second reason we should know now what budget principles the government has in mind is this. The budget has a great deal to do with jobs, and it is to that aspect of the matter, rather than from any feeling in regard to relief from taxation, that I wish to address my remarks.

What is the history of our present high taxation? At the beginning of the war, taxes were raised substantially. They were raised higher in subsequent years, first of all for the purpose of raising revenue, and secondly for syphoning off spending power, so that there would not be too much pressure on inflation. The revenue was necessary, and so was the syphoning off. But the main reason for the high taxation was to stifle and check any increase in civilian production. The reason for that was that we had a war on our hands, that we must fight for liberty, and all our materials and all our man-power must be transferred to war account for the production of the needed munitions of war. In that regard we have done a grand job. The government proceeded to freeze the profits of industry and of business generally, so there was no incentive to produce more for civilian consumption. The average profit for the four preceding years was ascertained and under the Excess Profits Tax Act no one could earn more than that. Shortly after profits were frozen, wages in civilian industries were likewise frozen. But when it came to starting a new aviation plant or a gun plant or some other plant for war production, wages not having been paid before in such industry, there was no level at which to freeze them; consequently substantially higher wages were paid. This had the effect of inducing workers to leave civilian industry and go into war industry at higher rates of pay. That was the natural working of economic law. People who had never worked before went to work in war industries in order to turn out the goods for beating the enemy. So civilian production, as I have mentioned, was frozen in order to make available for war production all the resources of this country which we could possibly spare, apart from maintaining some standard of civilian welfare. But now, sir, we are happy enough to have won victory both in Europe and in Asia. We no longer need manufactured goods for war; we no longer have that insatiable demand, and we must manufacture for civilian use. One would think therefore that if the government during the war saw fit to adopt certain measures in order to get war production and stifle civilian production, they might now adopt the reverse procedure, undo those measures and reduce taxation in order once again to provide the stimulus for civilian production, which means jobs for our returning men and for our people coming out of war industries.

We should at the present time put every stimulus on production. The whole accent of our budget legislation and all other legislation should be on production, because it is out of production that we pay for our daily bread; it is out of production—not out of money—that we pay for our social services. Does the government lack courage to reduce taxation and bring about increased production through once again restoring incentive? I think we in this house should know whether or not the government expect that result irrespective of any lowering of taxation or restoring of incentive. Do they count on a small boom in order to make up for the pent-up demands which have grown during the war period, and then perhaps we may go into a slump? What is the government's idea?—so that business may do its planning and so that we may know what are the proper tax measures to be brought before this house?

Let us centre our fiscal thinking on job creation, not primarily on lessening taxation.

In my opinion, and I believe the house will agree with me, jobs are made up of two parts. First, there is the creator of the job; secondly, there is the seeker after work. Both must be considered in any reconversion or rehabilitation plan. Taxes must not be a wet blanket on incentive or on production.

So far as 1945 is concerned I do not think it necessary, however desirable it may be, that taxes, so far as they are to be paid in this year, be reduced. If they need to be reduced at all it is in the lowest brackets. Carpenters and other workmen will not work on Saturday mornings because the pay they earn is not worth their while; they would rather stay at home and do nothing than work for such a small rate of pay. Perhaps consideration should be given at once, considering the housing shortage, to the workman getting as good a return for himself in the forty-fourth hour of his work as he gets in the first hour. But for 1946 there must be a real promise of reward for effort and some return for risk-taking; otherwise we cannot expect business men and leaders of industry to do the planning necessary to bring about the full employment or even the high rate of employment which is essential and desired by all.

I could say much about the value of leaders and leadership in the economic field. Without them there is no direction. Jobs do not occur of themselves. Jobs arise because someone has an idea of manufacturing something or providing some service and is willing to put his savings in that enterprise. In the making or the providing of that service he creates jobs, but there must be some incentive to men in order that they may do the planning and take the risk. Without planning and leadership our standards of living in this country and in America generally—standards which have risen higher than in any other country in the world—would fail to rise any further. It is not through government action that standards of living improve, but through the action of business leaders who cause more goods and more services to be produced.

Let us look at taxation at the present time. After the meagre exemptions which a married or single man may receive, the next $500 is taxed 37 per cent. Is it any wonder that carpenters and other artisans do not see it worth while to work additional time, or overtime? The same condition applies through the whole gamut of our economic structure. I believe the house knows as well as if not better than I do that human nature is pretty much the same whether you look at it in the lowest brackets or in the highest. Nearly all people are motivated by the same considerations. Then if you look in the higher income tax brackets you find that present taxation takes over 70 per cent of any income over $20,000. There is no incentive to venture. There is no incentive to the development of our resources. There is no incentive to production of much-needed goods through which we must pay for our social services and by which we earn our daily bread. The reason is perfectly obvious to us all: it is that there is virtually no net return for increased work. In many cases there is not even enough in the way of return to compensate for the risk factor. The present taxation is designed to lead and does lead to state socialism. Nothing could lead more directly or more quickly, if continued, to state socialism.

May I remind the minister that if his government did not receive a direct mandate on the issue, certainly it was to the fore in the minds of most of the electors—it was the crucial issue in the province of Ontario—that we should once again operate under a system of free enterprise and not under state socialism. I say that the government of this country has received a mandate to operate under the system of free enterprise, and if incentive is not restored, the motivating power for that system is lost. May I say to him to that not only can he count on the votes which his party, now forming the government, received, but he may also count on the votes which the Progressive Conservative party received, and I do not think I am mistaken when I say he may also count on the votes the Social Credit party received, as an endorsement of the free enterprise system.

So far as the corporation tax is concerned, the government puts up no money, but it shares in forty per cent of the profits, and takes no losses. Many of us would consider that a better deal than putting up all the money and taking all the risk. At the same time, if a business is prosperous there is the excess profits tax. As I pointed out when this tax was first introduced, the name is really a misnomer, because it is an excess tax on profits. For whereas prior to the war the corporation tax was fifteen to eighteen per cent, when the excess profits tax, so-called, came in, a business, even though it earned less than it earned in the pre-war years, was subjected to the forty per cent rate, which people have now come to consider the normal tax rate. May I remind this house that the corporate tax is a system of double taxation, because the earnings are first taxed in the corporation, and what is left of them is taxed again in the hands of the individual. That is different from the British system, where there is but the one tax in effect on the earnings.

I should like also to point out that the corporation tax is of the nature of what writers on taxation would call a retrogressive tax. Whether or not it is the widow's $5,000 that may be invested in the corporation, or the industrialist's large sum of money, it is taxed at the same rate, namely, forty per cent as a minimum, and what is left is taxed in the personal brackets of the shareholder, whether the shareholder be a widow or an industrialist.

I want to say a word or two about a matter which may be considered by some a little technical, but which on analysis will be found to be so vital to the mainspring of our business that it is worth the consideration of the house. I refer to the risk factor pertaining to investments. If a man has $1,000 to invest, he may lend it to the government at three per cent and make what may be termed a riskless investment. On the other hand he may, as a partner, hand over that $1,000 to some veteran who is starting up a small shop, taking a chance on getting a better return, say, seven per cent. The difference between the three per cent on the government bond and the seven per cent on the industrial or merchandising investment, as the case may be, is not income in any sense of the word. It is nothing more or less than a premium for having taken the risk.

Mr. IRVINE: A premium for the soldier having taken the risk, or you?

Mr. JACKMAN: If the hon. member wishes to speak at another time—

Mr. IRVINE: I am going to.

Mr. JACKMAN: —he may do so, but his remark is irrelevant to the point I am making. I say, the four per cent difference is nothing more or less than a risk premium. If a man put his $1,000 in an enterprise of the kind I have described, he takes a chance on that business failing, so that the four per cent is additional to what he would get if he invested in a government bond, as a compensation for the risk he takes, because when we are dealing with these small industries, far more businesses of that kind fail than succeed. That four per cent, which has nothing to do with income, is a risk premium and is taxed by the government as if it were income, so that very little if any is left. Perhaps not as much as one per cent of that risk factor is left to a person in order to encourage him to put his money into risky enterprises or businesses. I am not suggesting to the minister that I have any way of levying the tax so that it shall fall only on the true income of three per cent. I am saying, however, that the effect of the present rates of taxation is to take nearly the whole of the amount of the risk factor. If you applied the same principle to life insurance, within a year or less the insurance companies would be bankrupt.

The result of all this is that the man who has money with which he might open up the north country, or start new industries, or back someone who has a new idea, says to himself, "It is no use trying to get seven per cent on my money, because if I do succeed the government will take practically all of it away, and if I lose, the loss is entirely my own. I am better off if I stick to government bonds." That policy may have been all right during the war years when the government provided all the employment necessary owing to the demands of war, and when they wanted all the money they could get in the form of subscriptions to government bonds; but now comes the time when the minister and the government will want to have businesses created as far as possible so that we may provide employment. Production is what counts. It is the sole objective which any modern budget should have in mind.

During the last five years we have had great increases in production in this country, and notwithstanding the stifling measures which the government sought to put into effect we have had an increased and a better distribution of the standard of living than we ever had before. And we have achieved that high standard of civilian living notwithstanding the fact that there were one million of our people engaged in war industry and 750,000 in the combatant services. So that we have at least one million workers, according to the white paper, available to increase the civilian standard of living if things are properly handled by this government. In other words, the machinery is there to provide a higher standard, and if we cannot provide that higher standard under the system of free enterprise, if it is spoiled for political considerations, we no longer deserve to operate that machine.

Let me say however that no machine will run without motive power. There must be a spark-plug somewhere; there must be a generator to impel activity. You have state-controlled totalitarianism plus the concentration camp as one form of motive power. People will do what they are told, unwillingly, half-heartedly, and ineffectively in that way; nevertheless you will have full employment with everyone working and a high measure of production. On the other hand you can have freedom of enterprise, opportunity and an adequate incentive as another motivating power, and that is the motivating power which this government has a mandate to put into operation immediately.

The country has chosen. Let the government implement that mandate. Let the government not fall, for want of courage, between two stools, one of control through taxation and the other of free enterprise, giving businessmen their head, so to speak, in order that they may get on with the job. The government may try to ride both horses and so fail in its objective. It must decide, and so must this house decide, which motivating power is to be behind the industrial and agricultural machine so that we may get on with the business of the country and achieve a high standard of living.

Business men now have confidence. In fact, they have a superabundance of confidence at the present time, and if they are given some idea of what they may expect to receive in the way of returns and compensation for the risk factor, that confidence will not wane. I can assure the minister however, and he knows this thoroughly, that business confidence is a plant of very tender growth. While governments may easily put on the brakes when it comes to economics, it is very difficult for the government to stimulate the economic process because you are up against the human factor, and if men are afraid, if they feel that it is not worth while, and that they are likely to lose whatever little capital they have available for risk, you will not attain your objective.

We have the refusal of workers, skilled craftsmen, to work on Saturday mornings because the higher tax brackets have destroyed all incentive. Why have the farmers reduced the hog population of the country by a third? I was interested in the remarks of the member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce)—and I do like to hear occasionally from the C.C.F., because I find that if you scratch a little under the skin you will discover that we are all brothers. The hon. member told a story of a dairy farmer who had some cows. He and his family looked after the cows before breakfast and after supper in the evening. But he did not file an income tax return. One of the inspectors called upon him and said the creamery had reported that he had sold them $400 worth of cream, and the farmer found he had to pay a tax on that amount. After a while he said he was going to get rid of his cows, because, to use the words of the hon. member quoting the farmer, "I will never milk cows for Ilsley." That goes not only for that farmer in Selkirk, but for men occupying much higher positions. It runs through the whole economic structure. People are not going to work for nothing, particularly now that the war is over. If I may quote from the minister himself, when he delivered his budget address in 1942 he said this, at page 3579 of Hansard:

> There is a danger that high progressive rates of income tax may interfere with the incentive for harder and better work for efficient production. We can and must rely upon other than economic motives to a large extent these days. Nevertheless, we cannot afford to dispense entirely with the incentive of improved earnings as a stimulus in the continual week-in week-out production work of a nation at a time when production is of vital importance.

I suggest to the minister that if we needed incentive in those days we need it all the more at the present time. The question might well be asked, why work beyond the bare minimum if there is no adequate reward for extra endeavour and sacrifice? In the dominion-provincial relations booklet of the government we find the same idea expressed, that something must be done; yet the government has not given to business men, who must do their planning for 1946 well in advance, any indication of the rules under which they must operate. In the proposals of the government of Canada to the dominion-provincial conference in August, 1945, we find this:

> The creation of conditions under which the initiative and skill of private enterprise will result in new investment on a scale far exceeding pre-war levels is one of the principal problems of reconstruction policy. The tax policies of all governments can be a fundamental factor in the removal of undesirable and unnecessary obstacles.

The government wrote this; I hope they will elucidate it themselves.

> The elimination or reduction of taxes on costs, the removal of tax penalties on enterprise, and the effect of taxes upon the taking of risks, are basic considerations in determining a satisfactory system of dominion-provincial financial relations.

[Mr. Jackman.]

Yet I find that the speech from the throne merely mentions taxation in the barest possible manner. It should be one of the principal items in that speech. We in this party, and I think all Canadians, are for as generous a measure of social security as may be possible but we can have social security only if we have production; we can have increased standards of living only if we have increased production, and any measure which prevents increased production is bad legislation.

In the speech from the throne we have only the barest reference to trade policies. What are we going to do to maintain the market in Great Britain for Canadian bacon after the wonderful job the farmers of this country have done? Foreign trade is essential. It is true that we have taken some measures to help in a small way, but the business men do not ask for such assistance as this. Business men ask that incentive be restored, and they will do the business without government interference and without any of these paternal measures. We must give our men in industry incentive to maintain and enlarge all our foreign markets. We have the capacity and the brains; the incentive must be restored. Trade makes jobs; jobs make high employment and give our people full prosperity. The road to depression is through a high tax on a small and diminishing volume of business. The road to prosperity is through a moderate tax on a large and increasing volume of business.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday last the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), speaking in reference to meat rationing, asked if it would not be possible for me to place before the house a detailed statistical statement relating to meat in storage, shipping facilities needed and probable slaughterings. My purpose in participating briefly in this debate is not to prolong it, because I hope it will end to-morrow, nor is it to discuss generally the speech from the throne, but primarily at least to comply with the hon. gentleman's request. I have had some figures put in form for presentation to the house. The information is not new, in that it has been given on other occasions, but possibly not as part of a single statement.

Following the tri-partite food conference called by the late President Roosevelt in the spring of this year, Canada undertook that in addition to the amounts previously contracted for she would make an effort to provide an additional quantity of meat to bring her total shipments for 1945 to the United Kingdom and liberated European countries up to at least the following amounts: Beef, 225 million pounds; pork, 450 million pounds; canned meat, 114 million pounds, a total of 789 million pounds. During 1944 Canada actually provided for the same purposes 129 million pounds of beef; 692 million pounds of pork; 39 million pounds of canned meat, a total of 860 million pounds. In addition Canada exported moderate quantities of meat sufficient to supply the essential requirements of Newfoundland and the British West Indies.

From January 1 to August 31, 1945, the Canadian meat board actually exported approximately 85 million pounds of beef, (carcass weight), 350 million pounds of bacon and ham; and 44 million pounds of canned meat, a total of 479 million pounds. That means that we would need to ship another 310 million pounds of meat in the last four months of the year in order to meet our 1945 objective.

While cattle slaughterings are running considerably in excess of 1944 there has been a sharp drop in hog slaughterings and total meat production in 1945 is less than in 1944. Total slaughterings of beef, veal, pork and mutton in inspected packing plants for the first eight months of 1945 are estimated at 1180 million pounds as compared to 1450 million pounds for the same period in 1944—a drop of 270 million pounds or a little more than 18 per cent. Details are given in the following table:

	Actual inspected slaughterings		Estimated cold dressed weight
	Jan.-Aug. 1944	Jan.-Aug. 1945	Jan.-Aug. 1944	Jan.-Aug. 1945
			Pounds	Pounds
Cattle	782,688	985,508	393,921,000	476,820,000
Calves	476,016	570,407	50,612,000	60,445,000
Sheep and lambs	460,256	458,785	19,990,000	20,946,000
Hogs	6,120,701	3,942,207	986,000,000	622,547,000
Total			1,450,523,000	1,180,758,000

On the other hand our export requirements are only about 70 million pounds below our actual shipments last year

Meat in storage in Canada at September 1, 1945 was approximately 49 million pounds. The corresponding figure for September 1, 1944 was about 70 million pounds. When rationing was discontinued in February 1944 storage stocks were about 150 million pounds. Details are given in the following table:

	Meat in Storage
Storage	Sept. 1, 1945	Sept. 1, 1944	March 1. 1944
	Pounds	Pounds	Pounds
Pork	23,692,000	40,722,000	98,793,000
Beef	17,497,000	21,429,000	40,043,000
Veal	5,390,000	6,491,000	2,982,000
Mutton and lambs	2,147,000	1,922,000	7,740,000
Total	48,726,000	70,564,000	149,558,000

These figures include some meat in process but intended for export. To that extent they overstate the amount available for domestic consumption. However, they do clearly indicate the trend of supplies.

Cold storage facilities fall into two categories, the sharp freezing facilities into which meat to be frozen must first be placed; and secondly the ordinary holding cold storage space in which frozen meats can be stored. Due to the heavy cattle runs of the past three weeks the sharp freezing facilities are being used close to maximum capacity and in some localities, there has been congestion, but it is fully expected that this will be cleared up this week. There are no serious problems in respect of ordinary holding cold storage space.

At the moment cattle runs are at an all time high. The inspected kill for the week ending Sept. 1, 1945, was 41,477 which set a new record. For the week ending September 15 the figure increased to 46,293. The figures for the week ending September 21 will not be available until to-morrow or next day.

As long as there is reasonably orderly marketing of cattle, it appears that the slaughtering facilities of the country are adequate to handle the expected slaughterings of cattle which for the last six months of 1945 are estimated at about 900,000 head.

Hog slaughterings, however, will continue to be considerably below the record figures of 1944, as the following table shows:

	Actual inspected Slaughterings July-Dec., 1944	Expected inspected Slaughterings July-Dec., 1945
Cattle	783,147	900,000
Hogs	3,627,468	2,500,000
Calves	306,672	350,000
Sheep and lambs	631,502	775,000

With respect to transportation facilities the United Kingdom Ministry of Food is prepared and able to provide ample shipping for all the meats we can export. The supply of refrigerator cars for movement to seaboard also presents no difficulties. There is therefore no reason to anticipate the kind of bottle-necks that occurred early in 1944.

For the current year, 1945, meat consumption per capita has been running at the rate of 145 pounds per annum. The scale of rationing is designed to reduce consumption to the annual rate of about 130 pounds per capita. This is a figure about twelve per cent below 1944 but about twelve per cent above pre-war.

It has occurred to me that, as I wish to make this brief statement presenting to the house the information requested, I might add a few words in which I might state in simple language, and without technicalities, the reasons why the government is rationing meat.

One must have some conception of the background of our relations with our allies during the war. From the beginning of the war this country tried to do its part in the struggle, and has been most conscientious, I believe, in doing so. We have been obliged and have found it advantageous and in the interests of all concerned to make what might be called partnership arrangements with other countries, particularly Great Britain and the United States.

The fundamental principle underlying these arrangements has been that each of these countries would bring forward and put into the common effort what it was able to bring forward. We have been dependent upon the United States, particularly, and to a smaller extent upon parts of the British commonwealth, for certain things we had to have which were vital to our very existence.

In that connection I might mention such non-food commodities as coal, gasoline and cotton, which we have obtained from the United States, and also sugar which we have obtained from American controlled sources of supply, and from various parts of the British empire. Our allies and partners have treated us with great fairness and have striven, as we have striven, so far as possible to base our contributions upon the principle of equality of sacrifice.

I believe I should read to the house, so that the picture may be somewhat clearer than I have been able to make it in these few words, an extract from a speech delivered over the radio the night before meat rationing was introduced. This was the speech of Mr. K. W. Taylor, foods administrator, who has been closely associated with the combined food board, and whose words carry weight in this connection. He said at that time:

Meat supplies are part and parcel of the whole international food problem. No country is completely self-sufficient in food. For example, we in Canada have surpluses of wheat, meat, dairy products and fish; but we depend upon other countries for all or most of our sugar, tea, coffee, cocoa, spices, rice, and practically all of our vegetable oils used in soap, shortening and salad dressings.

Most of these items are in short supply, and will be short for some little time yet to come. In order to see that the available world supplies are distributed as fairly as possible among the united nations three countries—Great Britain, the United States and Canada—set up a body in 1942 called the combined food board. Each year this board examines each of those food items which are in short supply, finds out what supplies are available, and then allocates these supplies fairly to all the countries that need them. Through this board each country is a receiver as well as a contributor. The success of the board—and it has been a notable success—depends upon each member country playing its part; that is, each country must make its maximum contribution to the common pool, in return for getting its fair share of things it needs but cannot produce.

If we want our fair share of sugar, tea, vegetable oils and many other imported foods, we must be prepared to contribute our fair share of meat, cheese, canned fish and other items which we have in abundance.

I can speak with some personal knowledge of the work of the combined food board, because I have been quite closely associated with it. For instance, earlier this year I had to spend several weeks in Washington assisting in the working out of the allocations for 1945. After a lot of very hard work, we reached a series of agreements, which set up our fair share both of the things we wanted and of things we should contribute to the pool.

In the case of meat, Canada undertook to do its very best to supply 225 million pounds of beef, 465 millions pounds of pork—

Which would include shipments to the British West Indies and Newfoundland.

—and 114 million pounds of canned meat. It has become clear in recent months that we will fall short of these obligations, unless more definite restrictions are placed on meat consumption in Canada.

It seems to me that the first reason why we should ration meat in Canada, and continue with the rationing we have introduced, is in the discharge of our obligations. These obligations are not clean-cut in the sense that contractual commitments are; but if we are to carry out the spirit, if not the letter—in this case it is both the letter and the spirit—of our understandings with our partners and allies, we must, I think, put forward reasonable endeavours to make available as much meat as we can, provided, of course, that we do not ask our people to accept any unreasonably low ration.

Apart altogether from that, if we had no commitments, if we had no such arrangements with our partners and allies as I have mentioned, I believe this country would want to do something along these lines for humanitarian reasons alone. As a country whose government must be internationally minded, as a country which is a great exporting country, as a country which has a good reputation and which must maintain that good reputation for breadth of view and humaneness in its attitude toward other countries, I think this country in its policy should have regard to humanitarian considerations. I have not the temperament or the language to make a powerful sympathetic appeal, but I think it is the sensible thing for this country to have regard to humanitarian considerations.

That brings us to the consideration of what the need is for meat in what we call the liberated countries. We have tried faithfully to get a picture of the situation and it seems to be something like this. In the United Kingdom the weekly meat ration is one shilling and two pence worth per person and three ounces of bacon. The bacon ration was reduced from four ounces to three ounces in May. I am told that the ration there is such that it makes possible only two or three decent meat meals a week. At any rate it is a small ration and it has been reduced. It will have to be reduced again if we do not come somewhere near fulfilling the undertakings I mentioned in the earlier part of my remarks.

In France the meat ration was reduced in May to 400 grams, which is fourteen ounces a month. The outlook is bleak and the shortage is the worst since the beginning of the war. In some areas the ration has been as low as the equivalent of one thin slice of ham each week, and sometimes even that is not available to the consumer. It will take about four years to build up the cattle herds to the pre-war level. Meat is not evenly rationed over the whole of France; it varies as between cities such as Paris, where our information is that the ration is about one-tenth pound a week, to other cities where it is about a quarter pound a week. In Saturday's papers there was a dispatch to the effect that the United Kingdom was flying some meat to Paris in an effort to relieve the great shortage of meat there. Those who are acquainted with conditions in France paint a very dark picture of the extent of anaemia, malnutrition and so on among the population. It is impossible to get statistics to bear that out; nevertheless that is the fact.

In Belgium the meat ration is thirty-five grams, which is just over one ounce a day. In Holland the ration at the present time, that is in September of this year, is reported to be one hundred grams or about one-fifth of a pound a week. In Greece and Yugoslavia meat is not rationed because no supplies are available. In Yugoslavia eighty per cent of the live stock has been destroyed by the enemy. In Czechoslovakia the ration is reported to be about ten ounces a week.

In a comparison of meat rations in the different European countries it is important to bear in mind that the official ration does not really indicate the amount of meat available to the individual consumer. Frequently no supplies are available to meet the ration, while at the same time many consumers supplement their rations by supplies obtained on the black market.

The representatives of a number of these European countries were interviewed just before meat rationing was instituted in Canada and the substance of those interviews was given to the press. It would take too long to read them all, but a summary was presented to the press in the form of a release by the wartime prices and trade board. This sets out the situation in Europe somewhat more graphically than do the figures I have just given. It reads:

> Tens of millions of people in the war-ravaged areas of Europe are starved for a taste of meat, a survey of conditions made through the embassies and legations concerned on the eve of meat rationing indicated last night.
> In countries like Greece and Yugoslavia there is no meat rationing, for there is no meat to ration. In Holland the ration is about one-fifth of a pound per person per week; in Belgium it is a little over an ounce per person per day; in Paris the people are entitled to one-tenth of a pound per person per week. But rationing, the representatives of these countries made clear, does not necessarily guarantee that the consumer will be able to buy the amount of the ration.
>
> The picture, except in degree, is the same in all the liberated areas to which Canadian meat will be going. Ambassador, minister, charge d'affaires representing the different countries told of the confiscation and annihilation of the live stock by the enemy so that herds were depleted. They told of malnutrition and disease resulting from famine; they told of the serious loss of strength and vitality on the part of the people. They pointed out that the live stock that remained were unfit for slaughter because they were lean and food for them was unavailable. They said it would take years to rebuild the herds and that the problem was complicated by fields sown with mines, lack of fertilizer and lack of farm implements.
> The most serious need in the liberated areas is meat, fats and dairy products, the representatives stated. Any meat that Canada can spare from her table to share with the starving millions, they emphsized, would help to repair the damaged bodies and restore the vitality necessary for the people to rebuild their countries.

In Belgium, which has been more fortunate than some of the other liberated countries, the Hon. Alexandre Paternotte de la Vaillée, ambassador to Canada, reported that the Germans had confiscated two-thirds or more of the cattle and that nine-tenths of the chickens had disappeared. Slaughterings, he said, were now forbidden because of the shortage of feed and in order to reconstitute the herds. He was deeply concerned over the health of the children; the number of tubercular children, for instance, had doubled.

J. J. Poelhekker, director of the Netherlands information service, related how people everywhere were being treated for hunger oedema. The Dutch, he said, had lost sixty per cent of their hogs, one-third of their dairy cattle, nearly all beef animals and eighty five per cent of their poultry.

In France, Michel Dumont, director of the French information service, said there were fifteen million people without enough food for normal requirements. Infant mortality is up fifty per cent over pre-war; anaemia affects fifty per cent of the children, tuberculosis is forty per cent higher. The situation in the cities is particularly bad. Sundays and legal holidays are the only days on which meat may be served in public eating places.

While conditions are appalling in many parts of France, Belgium and Holland, they are worse in the countries in southern Europe where Canadian meat is scheduled to go. In Greece, Yugoslavia, Poland, Czechoslovakia and Albania, to whom meat is being supplied through UNRRA, the health of the people has been so seriously undermined that very many deaths are still taking place due to starvation. In Greece, Philon Philon, charge d'affaires, reported that half the population was suffering from anaemia, recovery from which could be greatly aided through the vitamins and protein supplied by meat. One hundred per cent of the pigs have disappeared, ninety per cent of the dairy cows, sixty-five per cent of the oxen, sheep, goats and asses, and fifty per cent of the horses, mares, mules and buffaloes, he said. Pero Cabric, charge d'affaires, the Yugoslav legation, said, "We have nothing for ourselves, and we have nothing to help other countries which were dependent on us for much of their live stock. Eighty per cent of our stock was destroyed by the enemy."

Doctor Frantisek Pavlasek, minister from Czechoslovakia to Canada, stated that nearly everyone in his country was suffering from anaemia.

One after another of the representatives of the various countries expressed their gratitude to the Canadian people for sharing their meat supplies with the less fortunate peoples of Europe. Meat, they said, would help to restore both physical energy and national stability. As Doctor Pavlasek said: "When Canada rationed meat before, she did so in the interests of her own people. Now Canada is to have meat rationing to give help to the liberated countries of Europe. The moral uplift which this gives our people cannot be too strongly emphasized. This sacrifice has a great appeal to those who receive the help."

Therefore, on humanitarian grounds I believe we should continue with the rationing of meat. But there are other grounds as well.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

The economic recovery of the continent of Europe is in our interests, and political stability on the continent of Europe is also in our interests. We must not, if we can avoid it, let malnutrition and starvation arrive at such a stage that it generates revolutions and possible wars; nor must we allow the populations of these countries, if we can avoid it, to drift along in an aimless sort of way, not able to do the work they otherwise would do, and thereby postpone too long the economic recovery of these countries. I said before, and I say again, that this country is not a self-contained country at all. It is a world trader. It imports tremendously and exports tremendously, and must continue to import and export tremendously after the war. Therefore we have a selfish interest, if I may put it in that way, a prudential interest in the rapid economic recovery of the continent of Europe.

While the United States has not the same dependence upon foreign countries and is not as great a trading country per capita, I think the United States takes the same view. It has been said recently that it looks as if the United States would go off meat rationing. But the other day President Truman was reported as saying that the United States government would let nothing stand in the way of supplying the liberated countries with the supplies that they required to permit their recovery. I thought I had the press clipping but I do not seem to have it. Any official information that we have been able to get indicates that the United States intends to look at the matter in the same light in which we are looking at it and to continue to make available to the extent of its ability the food and other supplies required by the liberated areas.

I have not very much more to say to the house on this subject. We have a great many people in Canada who are impatient with this step that we are taking, and some of them even more than impatient with it. But that arises from a feeling that the war is over, so why continue these vexatious measures which might have been borne with toleration in time of war but which cannot be borne in time of peace? The war is over in one sense only. It is over in the sense that the shooting has stopped. But the consequences of the war in a very direct way are still with us.

This nation should not be a quitter. This nation should see the job through to the end. It cannot be said that we have seen the job through to the end when conditions such as I have described exist in so many of the liberated countries of Europe. I think our people, perhaps the majority of our people, are disposed to look at it in that way. If one were to get out his pencil and try to prove mathematically that we would in the short run or in the long run gain materially by cutting our consumption of meat down from 145 pounds per person to 135 pounds, he might not be able to prove it. But when we act in character, when we keep our word, when we fulfil our obligations, when we act with humaneness and charity to other countries, when we help not only Canada but the world to some extent to get on its feet, I am sure that we are really adding to what I may call the national heritage. We are giving ourselves and our children and our children's children just cause to have pride in the fact that they are Canadians. We are making the name of Canada respected and honoured.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I am quite sure that all hon. members will be in substantial agreement with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), who has just completed his speech.

During this debate there has been, as is usual, a good deal of advice offered to the administration, and a good deal of criticism. It will be the duty of the government to pay due heed to the advice given, especially since it has all been given quite freely, and to attend to whatever good there may be in the criticism offered. I hope that the government will hear in the expressions of opinion from hon. members in all parts of this house the actual voice of the nation, and in hearing that voice I hope it will not hesitate to make alterations in its policy and introduce the legislation that may be required to meet the demands of the voice of the people of Canada.

I am naturally in entire agreement with the opinions expressed by my hon. leader and by other hon. members of the C.C.F. party, and of course I have found myself in agreement with many of the things that have been said by other hon. members.

The major themes of the speech from the throne, including such matters as reconversion, full production, an adequate income in the pockets of the consumers to buy that production which they are assured we are competent to produce—all these matters have been thoroughly covered by other hon. members, and I do not intend to repeat views which they have already expressed so adequately.

But I note that there is in the speech from the throne a significant sentence which seems to have escaped all other hon. members, at least those that I have heard speaking. I shall read it:

> . . . we seek to bring into being a new order founded upon world security and social justice.

I do not remember reading anything so imaginative, so daring as that, in any other speech from the throne. I remember as far back as 1921, when the great J. S. Woodsworth first came to this house, that was one of the reasons he came, to encourage and help the initiation of the new social order; and while that hon. gentleman in his day was highly respected by his contemporaries here because of his fine character, I can well remember how very often, when he made allusion to a new social order, he would be greeted with jeers and sarcasm. But now it is in the speech from the throne, written in by the Prime Minister, (Mr. Mackenzie King) and his cabinet: a new social order to be based on social justice and world peace. I have no knowledge of course to what extent the government propose to translate this rhetorical phrase into practical human life; but even though they should do little about this at this session I still welcome it as a harbinger of progress. I do not believe that this sentence would have been in the speech from the throne if the government had not been pretty well convinced that the people of Canada want a new social order. In putting that sentence in the speech from the throne the government has, I believe, correctly interpreted both the spirit and the temper of the Canadian people.

But I may suggest that the Canadian people will not long be satisfied with the new social order on paper, they will not be long satisfied with it in words. They will want that new social order to be translated into beautiful and comfortable homes for every family in the dominion; they will want it to be translated into higher living standards commensurate with our capacity to produce the wealth which is required for human life; they will demand that new social order in equality of opportunity in education, in equality of opportunity to obtain health services. They will require that new social order in new and better schools, in new and better hospitals, in more and better highways, in better bridges and railways and all the other things which go to make up an economy in which people live a fuller life.
