> No definite decision has yet been made as to the strength and composition of the post-war air force, as until the nature and extent of any commitments that we may have under international or regional agreements have been determined it is obviously impossible to reach any final decision.

First, the minister very pertinently used the words, "no definite decision," and again, that awaiting this definite decison, no "final decision" could be made on the part of the government. I wonder if the minister is in position to place before the committee and the country what the intention of the government is with respect to the contribution that Canada will make, first, to the common defence within the British commonwealth of nations. Have there been negotiations between Canada, Australia, New Zealand and the United Kingdom with respect to the setting up of a British commonwealth air force or the continuation of the British commonwealth air scheme in the days of peace? Have there been negotiations among the various component parts of the empire which may lead to the setting up of a composite air force to be available in the event that war should break out?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): There have been no such negotiations.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: As I understand the situation arising out of the united nations agreement, Canada's contribution in the main will be an air contribution. Am I correct in that? I understand that the present plans of the government are that Canada's responsibilities under the charter will, either definitely or in substance, be an air contribution. Is the minister in position to answer that?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I have no idea what contribution Canada may be called upon to make.

Mr. HOWE: If I may be allowed to interject, I think it has been made quite clear that the reason we cannot prepare a comprehensive plan at this time is that Canada's obligation under the united nations security charter is undetermined. As soon as these obligations are known—and I assume they will be known within the next several months—we shall be able, I think, to announce our peace-time position.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Has any tentative plan been made? The reason I ask is that only the other day the high commissioner for Canada, speaking in Australia, was reported to have said that the Canadian government with a view to uniting Australia, New Zealand and Canada closer together purposed at the earliest possible date to establish an air service between Canada, Australia and New Zealand. Was he correct in that?

Mr. HOWE: That is civil aviation. I think that is rather outside the point.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Was he correct in that statement?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, it has been announced that the plans of Canada for post-war civil aviation include a service between Canada, Australia and New Zealand. But that is not a matter of defence; it is civil aviation. The structure of the post-war security council was laid at Dumbarton Oaks and was further discussed in San Francisco, but my hon. friend will appreciate that the respective responsibilities under the charter have not been determined. At least that is my understanding.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I quite agree. My question was simply this: Are there any tentative arrangements among the different parts of the empire as to the contribution which the various parts of the empire may make to such a scheme? Has anything been determined along that line?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: So that what Canada's contribution will be toward world peace so far as the air force is concerned has in no way been determined, either officially or unofficially?

Mr. HOWE: Correct.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There is one other matter I should like to bring up at this time. It has to do with repatriation. The minister gave the figures last evening of the number that had been repatriated, 37,907 since V-E day. In the last few days—and I think this applies to most members of the house—letters are being received from our men overseas strongly objecting to the slowness of repatriation. Only to-day I received a letter in which the writer, a responsible man overseas in the armed forces, points out that there is a strong feeling of resentment among the armed forces overseas at the delay in repatriation. He states that during the last few weeks there has been an acceleration of repatriation on the part of the Americans whereas, so far as Canada is concerned, within the last few days the men overseas have been advised that not only will the rate at which repatriation has taken place within recent weeks be diminished but that the bulk of repatriation has been hoisted for a period of eight weeks.

Mr. BENIDICKSON: In order to make the rates relatively equal.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is not what the men overseas think. The men overseas feel that the rate of repatriation planned for the next eight weeks is such that there is unfairness to Canada in the allotment being made by the united nations' shipping pool. They have been advised that during the next month there will be available only two small ships for repatriation purposes. I bring this matter up at this time because two or three letters I have received are dated within the last few days and they all indicate a strong feeling of resentment. I would ask the minister to advise the committee just what is being done to ensure that Canada's share of the shipping available for repatriation is a fair one and that this feeling of resentment on the part of the men will be entirely removed at the earliest possible day by an official statement from the minister.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): The shipping which is allotted to Canada to bring our service men and women home is dependent upon the allied shipping commission. The matter of repatriation is handled by the army, which allots space on the ships to the air force. The air force has been allotted its quota every month. We have received our fair share and are continuing to receive it. The number of air force personnel to be brought back from April to June, according to the programme that was drawn up, was 15,001, and from July to September, 20,602, or a total of 35,603. That was the programme. Actually we brought back 37,907. From October to December next the number projected is 9,000; January to March, 9,239; June and July 1,496. In addition, those who were employed with our 8th Bomber squadron, came back by air. That was an additional number.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: How many of all services are to be brought back in October?

Mr. GIBSON: I do not know. The figure I have given is for the air force, and that is the quota allotted. It has been worked out on a fair basis and as long as the shipping remains available those are the numbers we expect will be coming to this country.

Mr. PEARKES: The hon. member for Quebec South advanced some very sound arguments in support of the contention which was made here the other day that we should be given a clear statement regarding national defence policy. While I realize perfectly well that it is impractical for the government to tell us their final policy over a long period after the war, yet from what has been said this afternoon it is quite evident that Canada will have to stand very much on her own during this interim period. The allotment of commitments to the different nations has not yet been made. Therefore I submit that it is of great importance that during this interim period we should be coordinating our own services for defence. However, I know that we shall not get such a statement from the ministry and I do not intend to labour the point.

The Minister of National Defence for Air was unable or unwilling when this debate started to say whether the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services was going to establish a fleet air arm. Might I ask the Minister of National Defence for Air whether he has included in these estimates any funds for personnel, aircraft or equipment of the Royal Canadian Air Force which might be serving on any carriers with the Canadian navy, should the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services provide such ships?

Mr. GIBSON: No such expenditures are included in the air estimates for the year.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Mr. Chairman, in the last hour three hon. members have spoken about setting up the war expenditures committee. The only reproach that was made of the war expenditures committee which sat from 1941 to 1944 was that it sat behind closed doors. Perhaps a little history of the war expenditures committee would enlighten certain members who were not in the last parliament.

In 1940 the acting leader of the opposition, Mr. Hanson, suggested in the house that we follow the example of the British parliament in setting up a national committee on expenditures and that we follow as closely as possible the procedure in the mother country. In 1941 the committee was set up, composed, I believe, of twenty-four members divided among the different groups. When they met they decided to follow the practice of the committee in Britain, which always sat in camera. The reasons given were reasons of security and that, if the sittings were held in public, revelations might be made which might give comfort to the enemy. Those were the two reasons advanced for sitting in camera.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I think the minister will agree that only the government members on the committee approved that procedure.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): The hon. member for Cumberland in 1941 was a member of that committee. It was subdivided into three subcommittees, and I do not recall that the hon. member absented himself from the sittings, although we had adopted sittings in camera. He regularly attended the meetings and was very helpful.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): That is very true, but I did so under protest.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I know the opposition would not admit that we were right in taking that decision. They did protest. But they will also notice that what was said before those subcommittees was, in many instances, of a secret nature. We spoke of production, of what we were doing in munitions and supply; we got details from every branch of that department. We studied the three service departments; we discussed pay and allowances and the procedure of the service departments. We even got information as to numbers, formations, and all that. I am still convinced that we were right in hearing evidence of that kind in camera. Those sittings were held to give information to hon. members with a view to reporting to the house and to the government.

I myself do not like the procedure of sitting in camera, but during wartime I thought it was in the best interest of the state to do so. If a committee on war expenditures were set up this session, I agree with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar that the sittings should be public and that all these expenditures should be inquired into and investigated. I do not believe there is anything to hide, or that any harm has been done. There would be at this time no reasons of security. I did not hear the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar complain about the sittings being in camera when meetings of subcommittees were held. Both of us were members of those subcommittees.

Mr. COLDWELL: Just on that, I did. My view was that there were certain occasions on which a subcommittee had to sit in camera, but otherwise the proceedings should be open. That was the view I expressed throughout.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): We did, if you recall, meet that objection because one of the subcommittees sat openly. I recall that the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) was a member of that committee. He refused to sit on it unless the meetings were public, and that subcommittee sat publicly. It was dealing with questions which did not affect the security of the state or information which would give aid and comfort to the enemy.

As to the setting up of the future committee, I believe the government agrees with what has been said. But I resent aspersions on the former committee. Hon. members sat for three years in and out of session on that committee. They gave valuable time to it; they acted from national and patriotic motives and I really resent suggestions from certain hon. members that the work was not useful or was not well done. I was a member of that committee from 1941 to October, 1942, when I joined the government, and no better group of men could have assembled to study seriously what was taking place and what expenditures were being made.

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not think anybody suggested that the committee did not do good work. I believe it did good work, and I am willing to say so.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I am glad to hear that from the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. But when the assertion is made that we did not sit in the open to consider these matters, I must point out that certain information could not have been given had our proceedings not been in camera. I do not think hon. members should criticize that procedure. They themselves are aware that we could not let the people know exactly what was taking place in the armed services or in the Department of Munitions and Supply.

Some of those who served on that committee are not now members of this house, and I wish to pay tribute to them for the time and energy and talents which they devoted to that task.

Since this is a new house, and we are not in war time, even though it has not been so legally declared, I hope that the hon. members who will constitute that committee will do as good work as was done in time of war by those of the past parliament. I was so pleased at being on that committee and seeing how it was run, and finding that the government was doing its utmost to protect the public treasury, that were I not a minister I would insist upon being on the next war expenditures committee. I have no doubt it can do useful work and let the public know exactly what we have done with public moneys throughout the year.

The CHAIRMAN: I wonder whether hon. members, who have now had a pretty good discussion, will agree to take the items up as they appear in the list which has been distributed. I think we would make better progress if that were done.

Mr. MERRITT: Before that is done may I ask one question. The minister said yesterday that he could not give any definite or long-term decision as to the size or composition of the air force. That of course is quite understood. But he did say that it would consist of about ten squadrons and about fifteen to twenty thousand men. Will the minister state now on what principles and for what purposes the figure of ten squadrons and fifteen to twenty thousand men was decided? Why, for instance, is it not fifteen squadrons, or five squadrons?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I did not say those were definite figures. I said we were planning on that basis. We are planning on the basis of what has been recommended by the advisers of the department as a balanced force, a force which would be capable of being extended in time of necessity in order to produce a strong offensive force and a defensive force. At the same time we would have in this country the nucleus of a force which would at all times be available if its services should be required at the time of attack, should this country be in the unfortunate position of being attacked. That is the basis on which the matter is being worked out.

I might say further that, under the programme which is being considered—it is not yet definite—the only expenditures for new planes will be on those in the nature of transport planes. We realize that it is necessary to have adequate transport planes. The type we are ordering and hope to secure is the new C-54. No steps are being taken at present to secure new bombers or fighters. It is felt that we have large stocks available which have been in service in this war. There will undoubtedly be very rapid developments in that type of aircraft, and while experiments and research are going on in those fields we do not consider it advisable to commit ourselves to the purchase of large numbers of either fighters or bombers, but believe rather that we should continue for the present with those we have available. These, of course, will also be available for the auxiliary squadrons as they are formed.

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Chairman, I agree with you that to take the estimates item by item is perhaps the only way in which they can be disposed of. One might talk a long time on the thought-provokers which are on this sheet of paper which has been distributed. But I merely rise to ask a couple of questions which I do not think I could relate to subjects that are on the paper. Before I do that I should like to say that I listened with great interest to the leader of the opposition, particularly a statement that we spent more money the last six years than we had spent in the whole history of the country previously. While he was saying that I was thinking that, regardless of that fact, it did not affect the standards of living of the Canadian people.

An hon. MEMBER: It is going to, though.

Mr. GILLIS: Their standards of living were much higher than they were from 1930 to 1939. If government spending affects the economy of the country in this way it is not a bad idea to continue to spend government money. That could be elaborated on; it is merely a thought. The criticism that the money we have spent in the last six years affected the welfare of the people of Canada is not valid.

Second, the observation was made that we paid more taxes than we did in the previous fifty years. That, too, is an indication that the people had an income and were able to pay taxes. The fact that we were not paying taxes in the previous fifty years is an indication that we were a poor nation and had nothing with which to pay taxes. I hope that we continue to give the people purchasing power so that they may be able to pay taxes and advance the services of the country.

With respect to the national debt, it does not worry me at all. The only thing that worries me about the national debt is the interest we pay on it. The debt accumulated during the war should be free. There should be no interest on it. No one should sit back in a bond house or in a bank and extract interest out of blood money, because that is what it was. Investment in war should not bear interest but should be interest free. In my opinion, the hundreds of Canadian boys who laid down their lives have paid the bill, and when the war is over, the debt should be cancelled. There is no reason why when they come back and go into overalls, into plants and factories, they should start to pay tribute by way of interest to people who sat back comfortably and secure and invested their money. The national debt, apart from the interest, we owe to ourselves. It is not a liability but an asset.

Mr. FULTON: Will the hon. member permit a question? Does he think that the soldiers, sailors and airmen who invested their money in war bonds should not receive interest on them when they come back?

Mr. GILLIS: The amount of money the soldiers, sailors and airmen invested is so small—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh no.

Mr. JACKMAN: What about the war workers?

Mr. GILLIS: They are not worrying about it either. The war workers are not worrying about it. The soldier who was drawing the large sum of $1.50 a day—

Mr. FULTON: One hundred dollars is a lot to him.

Mr. GILLIS: —had a lot of money to invest in war bonds. That is only an alibi; it is not an argument.

Mr. JACKMAN: What about the war workers?

Mr. GILLIS: So that the whole story with respect to the debt accumulated, and the moneys spent, as far as I am concerned, does not ring on me.

An hon. MEMBER: That is the reason why you will never be in the government.

Mr. GILLIS: That is all right. We may be there a lot sooner than you will. What I rose to say, Mr. Chairman, was this. There are two categories within the Canadian air force who in my opinion did not receive just treatment during the war. The first is the Canadian nationals serving in the R.A.F. A considerable number of Canadian nationals went to the old country prior to 1939 and became members of the R.A.F.

Mr. MACKENZIE: 1936.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes. The question I should like the minister to answer is this. As regards Canadian nationals returning to this country who served in the R.A.F. during the war, are they entitled to the Canadian gratuity and all the rehabilitation rights to which the R.C.A.F. are entitled? That is the first question. I think they should be. Second, we had, I understand, about five thousand R.C.A.F. personnel who were radar mechanics, and they served, mostly with the R.A.F., in practically every theatre of war. They were also largely isolated. During their period of service with the R.A.F. those boys were denied promotion. The Canadian government instituted, I understand, what was known as shadow promotion. They were promoted to the ranks that they would have held ordinarily if they were with the R.C.A.F., but in the R.A.F. they were not allowed to put up their stripes, badges or insignia. During the period in which the radar personnel were with the R.A.F., when shadow promotion was granted, were they paid for their rank? I understand that this shadow promotion was discontinued in 1943. If it was, I think it was an injustice, because I do not believe there was a section of the R.C.A.F. that was under a greater handicap than the radar boys, who served largely as individuals on isolated stations with the R.A.F. groups. They should have been allowed to carry their rank and they should have been paid on that basis. If it was discontinued in 1943 it should not have been, and I suggest that the government should reinstate it and pay those boys for whatever rank they would have had ordinarily were they members of regular R.C.A.F. squadrons. I should like the minister to answer these questions because I do not see anything on the order paper whereby I might be able to relate this matter to a specific item.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): With regard to the question concerning Canadian nationals in the R.A.F., there were a large number who went over and joined the R.A.F. prior to the war, and throughout the war a large number of Canadians were serving with the R.A.F. A considerable number decided to transfer to the R.C.A.F. and they were permitted to do so up until a certain date. It was published in orders as to the date when transfers would cease.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister will pardon me, but many of them could not be got in touch with, those far away on the Pacific ocean. Are they barred now from transferring?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Where there were special circumstances such as those, extensions have been made. A large number did transfer to the R.C.A.F., but that is not the point. The rehabilitation benefits provided by Canada apply to Canadian nationals, those who were citizens of this country prior to the war. I am not sure of the exact date, but I think those who left Canada from 1936 on and served in the British forces may, on returning to Canada, if they return within six months of the date when they are demobilized —I am not tying myself down to whether these terms are the date at which the individual was demobilized or the date of the ending of the war, but within a fixed period—may be entitled to the difference between the Canadian benefits and any benefits they have received while serving with that allied force. So that Canada is looking after those Canadians who have served in the allied forces.

As regards the radar men, I have the greatest sympathy for that group and I agree very largely with what the hon. member has said about them. Early in the war we enlisted in this country the finest type of young men, men with scientific training, and got them into the radar branch. They continued in that branch and were scattered all over the world, operating radar stations throughout Europe and Africa, and they had very little promotion. The work that they were doing was not work that called for promotion. The result was that brilliant young men who joined early in the war, and who, if they had waited and gone to other branches, might have received greater promotion and even commissions, remained leading aircraftmen. I realize that they have suffered a hardship. On the other hand, they have done magnificent work. While I feel that they have been unlucky, yet they certainly have done a magnificent job.

Mr. MacNICOL: They should not be allowed to be unlucky.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): The work they were doing was not work that called for the service of men of higher rank.

Mr. MacNICOL: A radar man away up on a remote island certainly deserves some consideration.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): With regard to shadow promotion, I never heard of it. It might have been brought in and discontinued in 1943. I shall be very glad to make inquiries concerning it to find out when it was brought in and when it was discontinued.

Mr. BOUCHER: I do not wish to delay the committee unduly, nor do I wish to open up a discussion on the war expenditures committee. The Minister of Public Works said that the only complaint against the war expenditures committee was that of secrecy. We should have the record cleared up in that regard. I do not mean to say that the war expenditures committee did not do good work, but I do mean to say that there were many objectionable features in connection with it. The members of the opposition who sat on that committee did object to sitting in secrecy. While we had that objection, we did sit on it and we were very glad to do the best we could in the circumstances. But the objections were more than the mere matter of secrecy. The objections were that in the war expenditures committee matters were dealt with in secret that did not warrant any secrecy whatsoever. I give as an illustration wartime housing and the operation of government corporations. They were dealt with. If the enemy heard all that went on in connection with these matters they would not have heard anything of value. Then there was the inquiry into the price of boots and the purchase price of property and land. The evidence was given in secret before the committee. Even some of the evidence in connection with those inquiries was guarded by the departmental officials and was sometimes refused to members of the committee. I might also mention that members of the committee complained in the house that copies of the evidence were not supplied to members for their own personal use while they were sitting on the committee. Oh, there were many difficulties.

The Minister of National Defence for Air and the Minister of Public Works have gone farther than the promises made by the Prime Minister a few days ago in saying that the committee that will be set up will not sit in secret. I hope that they will take the matters I have mentioned into consideration too, and that when the committee is set up, not only will it not sit in secret but it will give the evidence untrammeled and unhampered by department officials. I urge that at this time.

I could go into a long discussion on this matter, but I do not wish to delay the committee. However, I believe that the people of Canada want a much closer scrutiny of and much more information on war expenditures than they have had in the past. I believe that the people of Canada feel that in the war expenditures committee many things were discussed in secrecy that had no right to be so discussed or investigated. The people want more information than was given to them in the past because of the secrecy.

When the new committee is set up to investigate war expenditures I hope no attempt will be made to have it sit in secret. There were other objections to the war expenditures committee of the past three or four years. I sat as a member of that committee for a year. I enjoyed it. I appreciated the energy and the efforts of the members of the committee, but I did not appreciate the little attention that parliament was allowed to give to their findings or to the total absence of discussion of the committee reports in the house. When this new committee is set up I hope that these objections will be kept in mind.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I hope that the members will now agree to take up the items connected with the department.

Mr. MacNICOL: Show me the item on which I can ask further questions about the radar boys and I shall be quite satisfied to deal with the items.

Mr. HARKNESS: Before proceeding with the items I should like a little better understanding of what this money will be used for. What proportion of these estimates will be regarded as demobilization expenses and what proportion will be used for the interim force? Can the minister answer that question?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Some of the items can be broken down in the manner suggested. What is being spent on demobilization can be broken down, but what is being spent on the interim force cannot be broken down into that force entirely. The interim force will consist partly of the occupational force in Germany and the occupational force in other places. It will consist partly of the force employed in Canada.

Mr. HARKNESS: When will demobilization be considered completed? What time will the interim force come into effect?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I cannot give the committee the date on which demobilization will be completed. According to the plan it will not be completed by March 31, 1946.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I have listened with a good deal of attention to the discussion and the questions ever since the war appropriation measure first came before us. One thing has impressed me as being singular, namely, that no member of the opposition has commended the government for the effort which apparently it is making to maintain a considerable force of fighting men and equipment in Canada in case of an emergency.

I should like to draw the attention of the hon. members of the Progressive Conservative party to the fact that it was their attitude between 1930 and 1935 which reduced the meagre defence of Canada to an intolerably and dangerously low level. This cheese-paring attitude, this worrying about the dollar, will start a similar attitude again in Canada.

I do not wish to be an alarmist; I wish to be a realist. Will any hon. member in this committee, if he asks himself the question honestly and sincerely, dare to say that the era we are now entering is an eara in which we can feel that we are safe? This is an exceedingly serious matter. I am not saying for a moment that all the money has always been spent wisely. I would say this, however, not desiring to commend the government over much, that all things being considered the government in going through this war is to be strongly commended for the high degree of efficiency and effectiveness which it attained at the price that had to be paid for it. When we want defence in this country we want it badly. We are likely to want it again, and that before very long; but whether or not that should be so it is a right, good, safe principle to keep your powder dry and be sure you have plenty of it.

I should like to encourage the ministers who are in charge of the exceedingly difficult departments of defence to do everything that lies within their power to keep the defences of this country at the very highest possible standard consistent with the conditions of the times through which we are passing. The money will be found. I notice plenty of evidence that our Conservative friends are still suffering from a money mentality. How long is it going to take them to realize that the power of the nation to fight, or to prepare to fight, or to do anything else, depends upon the productive power of the nation, the amount of goods and services it can produce? Money is merely a bookkeeping system to represent the capacity of the nation to produce and use goods and services. Does anyone in Canada think for a moment that we are less able to produce goods and services to-day than we were a year ago, or two years ago, or three years ago? Then the degree of defence of which we are capable in this country certainly must depend upon the degree of production of which we are capable. As soon as we look at this whole matter from that angle we begin to see how unwise it is to emphasize dollars when the very existence of this nation and this empire of which we form a part might be threatened at any time; when all we have won and saved through the centuries of our history, including what we have won and saved in this war and the last one, might be lost because we have been indiscreet in the matter of taking precautions against eventualities.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MACKENZIE: On Tuesday we shall take up first the interim supply mentioned this afternoon by the Minister of Finance. Then we will take up bill No. 14, in the name of the Minister of Agriculture, the resolution preceding which was passed by the house yesterday. If we conclude with that we will continue with this appropriation bill, with the Minister of National Defence completing his statement on the naval estimates first and then going on with the army estimates.

Mr. BRACKEN: We will pass over the air estimates entirely?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes, until after the navy and army estimates are disposed of.

At six o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, October 9, 1945.

The house met at three o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE moved that the report be concurred in.

Mr. BRACKEN: May I ask the mover whether it is important that this motion be passed to-day? I have not seen the report myself, and I am sure that the other members have not.

Mr. MACKENZIE. We will certainly let the motion stand over.

Motion stands.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs) presented the first report of the special committee on veterans affairs and moved that the report be concurred in.

He said: The main part of the report has to do with reducing the quorum from 31 to 20. It is important to get that adopted as soon as possible.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION—DISCOUNTING FACILITIES

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to incorporate the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for the purpose of (a) acting in the place of the Minister of Finance in the operation of the National Housing Act, 1944, and (b) providing discounting facilities for loan and mortgage companies; to provide for the appointment and salaries of the officers and staff of the corporation and the appointment and fees of the directors; to authorize the payment out of the consolidated revenue fund of sums not exceeding twenty-five million dollars ($25,000,000) for the provision of paid-up capital for the corporation; to make available for the housing functions of the corporation moneys appropriated under the National Housing Act, 1944; and to make provisions with respect to the functions and powers of the corporation.

He said: His Honour the Deputy Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

INCREASE IN APPROPRIATION FOR LOANS AND GUARANTEES

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to amend the National Housing Act, 1944, and to provide more particularly for an increase in the appropriation for loans and guarantees under Part II of the act for the payment out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund of loans and losses in respect of loans, not exceeding in the aggregate one hundred and fifty million dollars, and in respect of guarantees, up to an aggregate principal amount of one hundred and twenty-five million dollars of investments guaranteed.

He said: His Honour the Deputy Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

PACKING PLANTS—THREATENED DISPUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I have two questions to direct to the Minister of Labour, and one to the Minister of Finance.

I should like to ask the Minister of Labour to communicate to the house any information he has in his possession regarding the threatened labour dispute in the meat packing plants. Has the minister received representations regarding this dispute from the Canadian Federation of Agriculture? If so, what is the attitude of the government with respect to such representations?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I will answer the second question first. I have received a letter from the secretary of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. Any decision made with respect to the purport of the letter will be made known when the government makes a decision. The answer to the first part of the question is, yes. We are in constant touch with the provincial departments of labour with respect to what some people anticipate will be a dispute or strike in the packing house industry in this country.

Mr. HOMUTH: Well, whose baby is it?

Mr. MITCHELL: You are a pretty big baby yourself.

Mr. HOMUTH: And you are not too tiny.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Answered!

Mr. MITCHELL: If my honourable and garrulous friend will just give me an opportunity to answer the question which was put by the leader of the opposition; I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that I can add much to what I have already said.

Mr. BRACKEN: No decision has yet been made?

Mr. MITCHELL: On the first part of the question.

Mr. E. D. FULTON (Kamloops): With respect to the anticipated strike in the meat packing plants, is the Minister of Agriculture in a position to make a statement which will reassure the producers of meat that their position with respect to marketing will not be prejudiced should there be such a strike?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think all that I can say is that if there is a strike in the packing plants the position of the producer will be prejudiced and nothing this government can do will prevent it.

Mr. HOMUTH: Should do, or will do?

Mr. GARDINER: Nothing that they can do will prevent the producers' position from being prejudiced if these men do go out on strike.

Mr. HOWE: Nothing they have done?

STRIKE AT FORD MOTOR PLANT, WINDSOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I have a second question to direct to the Minister of Labour. The long continuance of the labour dispute of the Ford Motor plant at Windsor and the failure to make any apparent progress in settlement, is, I am sure, causing concern to all members of the house and all interested in the future course of labour management relations in Canada. Would the minister indicate to the house whether any further steps to bring about a settlement have been taken? If not, would the government give consideration to having the Minister of Labour proceed to Windsor with a view to facilitating the settlement of this strike?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I think my hon. friend knows the situation at the moment. We are working very closely with the Ontario Department of Labour. An invitation went to both the employers and the employees to meet the provincial minister of labour and myself in the city of Toronto. But may I make this remark, which is equally applicable to the ministers of labour of all the provinces, that there is a physical limit to what a minister of labour can do and where he can be. That is why we built up our machinery, with a conciliation service which is as good, I think, as can be found anywhere else, to face up to a situation of this kind. I believe it is a fair observation, Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted to make it, that both the Ford Motor company and the leaders of the employee's organization are grown-up men. The company have made the decision, rightly or wrongly—and I said, when I was last asked this question, rightly, in my opinion—that until the company's officers are enabled to get into the Ford plant they will not sit down with the trade union leaders. That attitude is related to a very old principle: as I said the other day to one of the hon. members from Montreal, the Canadian's home is considered to be his castle. It seems to me that if some concession on the part of the trade union organization could be made in respect to that principle, which has been enunciated by officials of the company—and after all, there are two sides to a medal—I would be prepared, in fact I would have been prepared a week ago, to go to Toronto with my good friend the acting minister of labour of Ontario and endeavour to arrive at a settlement of this dispute.

I could speak at length on the fundamental principles involved in conciliation, and as to whether the company or the trades union want this or any other government to write a contract for them. I shall not go further into that matter at the moment, because I understand that it is an issue in the discussion, but when my estimates are up, or if it is raised by any hon. member, I shall be quite prepared to give an answer.

I say frankly and sincerely that the labour departments of both governments are anxious to bring this fight to a conclusion. We were very successful in such matters during the war. But may I say in a kindly way that this House of Commons is not the place to negotiate a trade union agreement, because of the political implications that are involved. I know that persons who hold certain points of view are anxious to see such action taken by democratic legislative bodies, but it is my belief that it would not only be physically impossible, but that it is not in the interests of democratic institutions and their proper functioning, as we understand these things.

I have to be very careful to-day, because, as no one knows better than my hon. friends opposite, in an industrial dispute what is said at a distance is sometimes misconstrued at the point where the dispute exists.

I reiterate that I would be very glad to jump in an aeroplane to-morrow morning if it were necessary. I trust the parties to the dispute will act not only in their own interests but in the interests of the community and of the dominion as a whole, to assist in the reconstruction of the national economy following the conclusion of the war in the Pacific and in Europe.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): May I ask the Minister of Labour a question supplementary to that asked by my leader? I think I can solve a lot of his difficulties for him. Why not ask the parties to this strike, instead of meeting him in Toronto, to meet him in the Ford offices in Windsor? Then the picket lines are all shot, and he may be able to get these stupid people together so that they can talk to one another.

Mr. MITCHELL: I appreciate the constructive suggestion of my hon. friend, but in my opinion, and I say it sincerely, in a dispute of this description it is far better that we should meet on neutral territory. I am not standing on my dignity or the dignity of a minister of the province of Ontario, but I do not think it is in the best interests of labour relations in this country, looked at from the point of view of either employer or employee, for two ministers to go there and walk through a picket line when one party to the dispute are convinced in their own minds that the attitude taken, the picketing by the union in this instance, is illegal, though they do these things in the United States. That is why I thought Toronto would be the best place.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Surely we are not going to let a thing like that stand in the way of getting this matter settled.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Why not meet in the city hall?

STRAIT OF CANSO

SURVEY WITH RESPECT TO PROPOSED BRIDGE OR CAUSEWAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. E. McGARRY (Inverness-Richmond): I wish to direct two questions to the Minister of Reconstruction. First, has a report of the survey on the strait of Canso, with regard to the proposed bridge or causeway, been submitted to his department or any other department of government? Secondly, if so, will the report be tabled?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): The report on the strait of Canso has not been completed. It has been found so far physically impossible to complete the report by reason of the difficulty of taking borings or sounding in the strait. The water is 200 feet deep, the tide in the strait runs at five knots, and as an engineering feat, so far the problem of obtaining borings has been found impossible of solution. However, the investigation is porceeding, and I hope the report will be submitted in due course.

INTERNATIONAL CIVIL AVIATION

TABLING OF INTERIM AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): On Thursday last, in response to an inquiry by the member for Broadview (Mr. Church), I said that I would table the interim agreement on international civil aviation. If we may revert to motions I will now table two copies of that agreement, with the consent of the house.

SURPLUS WAR ASSETS

PAMPHLET SETTING FORTH POLICY AND METHODS OF WAR ASSETS CORPORATION

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): I wish to table copies in English and French of a pamphlet entitled "How to Buy War Surplus Materials". This pamphlet deals with the policy and methods of the War Assets Corporation. Copies have been distributed in English and French to all members of the house.

Mr. HOMUTH: It will likely be a small pamphlet. When will copies be available? There are many inquiries for them.

Mr. HOWE: They have been distributed to-day.

CALGARY NITRATE PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): On Friday last during the course of the debate I drew the attention of the Minister of Reconstruction and the house to a telegram I had received from the Ontario Federation of Agriculture relating to the nitrate plant at Calgary. In view of other representations which have been coming in, I wonder if perhaps to-morrow the minister would make a statement regarding the matter.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): My hon. friend read the telegram, but I did not understand that he was asking a question about it.

Mr. COLDWELL: I did; that was my intention.

Mr. HOWE: The position of the ammonia plant at Calgary, the ammonia plant at Trail and the ammonia plant at Welland is the same as that of all other war plants; from time to time consideration is being given to their sale. No definite arrangements have been made to sell any of these ammonia plants, but we have under consideration advertising one or more of them for sale in due course.

Mr. COLDWELL: The particular question was: will the government defer coming to a decision until another conference has been held with the Canadian Federation of Agriculture? That was the gist of it, as I remember the question.

Mr. HOWE: I have had two or three discussions with the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, but I shall be very glad to have another. I have no intention of moving in the matter for a month or six weeks.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF NON-PARTISAN PARLIAMENTARY SCIENTIFIC COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Cariboo): I wish to ask a question of the Acting Prime Minister. Has the government given any consideration to the appointment of a parliamentary scientific committee, to be chosen on a non-partisan basis, and similar to that appointed by the British parliament?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Acting Prime Minister): No consideration has been given to the setting up of such a committee, but the question could be considered. If the hon. gentleman will give me any information he has about the matter I shall be glad to see that it is.

Mr. IRVINE: I shall be glad to do that.

UNITED NATIONS ORGANIZATION

DECISIONS OF PREPARATORY COMMITTEE AS TO CHOICE OF HEADQUARTERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): On October 4 the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), on the orders of the day, asked me certain questions part of which had not been covered by notice he had sent in, and I stated I would get the information and make it available to the house as soon as possible. The question was:

> May I ask the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs whether the government has been advised of the decisions taken by the united nations preparatory committee regarding choice of a headquarters for the united nations organization? I ask that question because newspaper reports indicate that the headquarters of that organization is to be situated in the United States. In that connection I make one observation to the minister, namely, that I am not at all satisfied that what I regard as very strong claims for Canada have been pressed as enthusiastically as in my opinion circumstances would warrant.

The answer I wish to make is this. The government has been informed by the Canadian representative on the executive committee of the united nations preparatory commission that, at a meeting on October 3, it was decided by a majority of the executive committee to recommend to the full preparatory commission that the headquarters of the united nations organization should be in the United States of America. Other locations for the permanent site of the united nations, including more than one site in Canada, had been suggested to the executive committee. According to the reports received from the Canadian representative, it would appear that, before the recommendation of October 3 was adopted, the choice had narrowed to a selection between a site in a smaller European country, probably Geneva, on the one hand or some location in the United States on the other hand. It is understood that no recommendation has been made as yet by the executive committee as to the place in the United States at which the headquarters might be located.

MEAT

EXPORTS TO THE UNITED STATES DURING LAST SIX MONTHS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): On Thursday last the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Lennard) made the following statement and asked a question. I quote from page 758 of Hansard:

> Since Canadian canned meats are being advertised for sale by New York city retailers, and being sold free of points, will the government advise the house, at the earliest opportunity, what meats, fresh and canned, have been exported to the United States within the past six months?

The hon. gentleman gave me a copy of an advertisement from a New York paper upon which the question was based. This advertisement indicates that the meat referred to is veal and chicken pate; veal, ham and tongue; beef, pork and ham. These meats are all meat pastes, that is sandwich spreads, and are put up in seven-ounce tins. No permits have been issued for the export of canned meats to the United States in 1945. The figures of the bureau of statistics indicate that during the first six months of this year, 13,200 pounds of fresh beef and 200 pounds of pork were shipped to an army air field in the United States and were not for ordinary domestic use. Canned meat pastes of the type mentioned above have been exported in the amount of 595,407 pounds. There are no meat pastes being exported to the United States, to be sold free of points, which are under ration in Canada at the present time.

RATIONING—EXEMPTION OF HONG KONG REPATRIATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre): I desire to address a question to the Minister of Finance or to the parliamentary assistant to the minister. It is a question relating to meat rationing for repatriated Hong Kong prisoners of war. I gave notice of this question last week. I understand my colleague from Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch) did likewise; therefore I am speaking on his behalf and my own and am duly cognizant of the responsibility. My question, in accordance with that notice, is: will the government consider exempting these Hong Kong repatriates from the meat rationing restrictions, since there is probably a very special need among them, they having had extremely little meat for four years?

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, notice of the questions of the hon. members for Winnipeg South Centre and Winnipeg South was received too late on Friday to obtain an answer. However, the minister took up with the wartime prices and trade board the question of providing increased quantities of rationed foods to released prisoners from far eastern theatres of war. I am pleased to be able to announce that after consultation with medical officers of the Department of Health and Welfare and the Department of National Defence, it has been decided to issue additional ration coupons covering a period of three months to such released prisoners of war, which will entitle them to a fifty per cent increase in butter and sugar, and one hundred per cent in meat, over the amounts available to the general public. Instructions have been issued to the various ration boards for the issuance of these extra coupons to the released prisoners of war upon application.

PROVINCIAL LEGISLATION

INQUIRY AS TO DISALLOWANCE OF CERTAIN ACTS OF SASKATCHEWAN LEGISLATURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice in connection with the committee on disallowance of disputed legislation in Saskatchewan, which I believe is to be convened within the week. In view of the large number of protests which are being received by members from that province, will the Minister of Justice state why the government is taking proceedings by way of disallowance hearings instead of submitting this legislation to the courts for the determination of its validity?

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I must state first of all that the government is not taking proceedings by way of disallowance. The hon. member knows that the government considers. on reports from the Minister of Justice, all provincial legislation and before the expiry of the year from the time when the statutes are officially sent to the department a recommendation is made by the Minister of Justice to council as to whether or not the legislation should be allowed to take such effect as by law it can have. No proceedings are being taken to disallow this legislation.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What are the hearings for?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The time for a recommendation had not yet expired. While it was still running certain petitions for disallowance of the legislation to which I have already referred in announcements to the house, were received, and requests were made that those submitting the petitions be allowed to submit additional reasons through counsel. We are not up against the alternative suggested in the question of which the hon. member sent me notice. The validity of the legislation, if it is not disallowed, can always be tested in the courts by anyone who may contend that it is unconstitutional.

The governor in council renders no judgment on the validity of legislation; we merely act under the terms of the British North America Act in recommending whether or not it should be allowed to operate. That is all that is being done here.

There seems to have been the impression that some sort of court had been set up to try the constitutional validity of this legislation.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is not suggested in my question.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That impression is entirely erroneous; a report would have been made to council whether there had been any petitions or not. The law officers of the Department of Justice endeavour to take into account all that should be properly considered whether representations are made or not. Even if it were clearly demonstrated that a piece of provincial legislation was unconstitutional, that would not at all necessarily mean that the governor is council would disallow it; probably quite the contrary. These things are considered from the point of view of the national interest and not the constitutionality or otherwise of the legislation. And when there is a recommendation, as is most frequently the case, that the acts should be allowed to have such operation as they can legally have, it does not mean that their constitutional validity cannot be contested before the courts, and it does not mean that their constitutional validity is not frequently contested before the courts. Neither the Minister of Justice nor the committee will attempt to render any judgment on the constitutional validity of this legislation.

The hon. member asks why the committee was set up.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is that procedure regularly followed?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: To my knowledge this is the first time it has been done. I understood that I was being given the assistance of two of my colleagues to prepare a recommendation for council, and I had no objection. I would never have any objection to having the assistance of my colleagues in the preparation of any recommendation I may have to make to council.

Mr. IRVINE: I should like to ask a supplementary question to that asked by the hon. member for Lake Centre. Seeing that it is the business of the government to review all provincial legislation whether there are any protests or not, why did not the government advise the protesters to take their case to the courts instead of to the cabinet?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I am obliged to give a reason for that. We review legislation whether there are representations or not. We do not say to those who make representations, "Well, go to the courts." We just do not. I have no other reason.

HOUSING

STATEMENT AS TO PRIORITIES ON BUILDING MATERIALS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): Mr. Speaker, in the house on Friday last the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) asked a question as to priorities on building materials, and suggested that I reply to-day. In my remarks of last Friday I find that I have rather confused the issue, and I should now like to make a statement of policy.

In replying on Friday I was anxious to reply to the suggestion by the leader of the opposition that the government should modify its policy because of alleged bottlenecks being created as a result of the priorities in favour of Wartime Housing Limited.

In my reply I was particularly anxious to clear up a popular fallacy about Wartime Housing, namely, that owing to the assistance given to it in building houses for veterans, stocks of building materials are frozen or tied up in warehouses. It is undoubtedly this fallacy which is at the root of the complaints which have been received by the leader of the opposition and others. I referred at that time to the reports regarding Calgary which on investigation were found to be quite untrue. I might have mentioned the cases of Edmonton and Winnipeg as well, and numerous others, all of which have been investigated and found to be untrue.

In my remarks I stated that there are no building material priorities at all in favour of Wartime Housing Limited. This was not correct. I should have explained that the government is, in fact, giving assistance to Wartime Housing Limited where necessary, and requires producers and distributors in certain cases to deliver to Wartime Housing Limited in priority to other users. The purpose in giving this assistance is to enable Wartime Housing Limited to maintain its building schedule and to complete at the earliest possible time its programme of building the low cost rental houses for veterans which are so urgently required.

The assistance given to Wartime Housing Limited is not a serious factor in creating shortages in materials available to private builders. As I said several days ago, Wartime Housing Limited is building only a very small proportion of the total number of houses under construction at present. To take the case of plumbing supplies, about which the greatest number of complaints have been received, the requirements of Wartime Housing Limited during the last quarter of this year would be less than twenty per cent of the estimated production. Its requirements of other building materials are even smaller, and in some cases will have no effect whatsoever on the supplies available to private builders. In the administration of priorities for Wartime Housing Limited every effort is being made to interfere as little as possible with the normal flow of materials into the building trades. As the production of building materials continues to increase, the government may be able to modify its priority policy as suggested by the leader of the opposition, but for the present it is felt that this is not feasible, since any change is likely to interfere with the building of low rental houses for veterans.

Mr. BRACKEN: If I might comment on the statement just made by the minister, I think perhaps in his own interests he should have left the situation in the confused state it was in previously, because I have a telegram from a person interested in this matter complimenting the minister on removing these wartime controls.

Mr. HOWE: He must be a dealer in building supplies.

Mr. BRACKEN: I am not sure, but that was the conclusion he drew from the statement the minister made the other day. I am sorry I shall have to advise him that in view of the statement made to-day he was wrong in that conclusion.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO IMPERIAL CONFERENCE WHILE PRIME MINISTER OVERSEAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): May I inquire of the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs whether or not it is anticipated that there will be an imperial conference in Great Britain while the Prime Minister of Canada is overseas?

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): I cannot say that that has been any such anticipation. No suggestion has been made to this government that there should be an imperial conference at this time.

SUPPLY

STRIKE AT FORD MOTOR PLANT, WINDSOR—STATEMENT OF MR. GILLIS

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to occupy any of the time of the house at this stage with the matter I am about to discuss. However, I offer no apologies for doing so because a few days ago I endeavoured to have a brief discussion of this matter, and it might have been settled at that time.

My purpose in rising to-day is to discuss the labour difficulties at Windsor. From time to time the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) can make a statement that suits him in the house, without giving anyone on this side an opportunity of presenting the other side of the question as we understand it. I consider this matter to be of urgent importance; otherwise I would not take the time of the house to discuss it. A few days ago the Minister of Labour, in answer to a question here, referred to the difficulty at Windsor as a siege, and that is what it may very well develop into if steps are not taken to correct the present attitude of the employers, as I understand it. This is not a new matter either to me or to the Department of Labour. The fact is that I raised this question in the house seventeen months ago, and it is exactly the same dispute to-day as at that time, of course with the exception that it has been neglected and pushed aside in the interval, and hopes have been expressed that someone might take a reasonable attitude so that it would not develop into the situation that exists to-day.

While I am discussing this matter as an emergency issue from this side of the house I do not want it understood that I believe no one on the other side has tried to do anything about it. Personally I think some of the members from the area concerned have done everything within their power to have the matter settled in a satisfactory manner; and, as I see it, if the employers were reasonable the matter might have been settled by now.

As I understand it, the situation is this. Here we have our first post-war strike. If the present difficulty is allowed to develop, within the next few months it is likely to culminate in a general strike right across this country. Then, this reflects the inadequacy of th labour legislation we enacted during the war for the purpose of getting production and improving relations between labour and management. It definitely sets out one thing; that is, that the Ford Motor Company in Windsor and other large employers of labour across this country accepted government legislation during the war because of the pressure of war, but immediately the war was over they took advantage of the loopholes which existed in the labour legislation and cut the line. Now they are back where they were in 1939, with the major objective in mind of defeating any intention the government may have of laying down proper labour legislation which would bring democracy into industry in this country. In other words my conception of the matter is that once again the employers of labour across this country—if the attitude of the Ford Motor Company is the general attitude—have used the workers of this country as suckers in another war; then, as soon as the war is over and the emergency has passed, they are right back where they were in 1939 or 1914. It is because I believe the government should recognize that attitude that I am discussing the matter in the house to-day. It is urgent, because, as was suggested only this afternoon in the house, the packing house workers—an essential group of workers at this time, when we are attempting to feed the people of Europe—are proposing similar action. They are running into exactly the same problems in the packing houses that the Ford workers have run into at Windsor—the fact that the employers want to back up on an agreement and on understandings arrived at during the war.

Some 30,000 other workers in automobile plants across Canada have already taken strike votes, and to the extent of almost ninety per cent in most of the plants they have decided that when or if the Windsor workers want their assistance in similar action, they are prepared to give that assistance.

Windsor to-day is engaged in a little war, a war that can bring disastrous results to that section of Canada. The issues involved are simple. In 1941 workers at Windsor had signed an agreement with the Ford Motor Company. That agreement carried a clause with respect to grievance procedure, and the manner in which problems of the workers would be relayed to the management. That agreement worked out satisfactorily until May, I believe it was, of 1944, when the Ford Motor Company decided that that grievance procedure arrangement would not be carried on any longer. Because of a slight dispute on that issue the company abrogated the signed agreement and took its present stand. The real issue in Windsor is simply that the workers in that particular plant want to sign an agreement in accordance with the Dominion legislation. They want a union shop; they want some measure of union security, and the check-off for their union dues. That would not cost the Ford Motor Company anything; it is merely a general recognition on the part of the employers and the workers of the right to sit around a conference table, and bargain. That is the main issue.

The question of wages is one which I shall not discuss. As the Minister of Labour has said, that is something to be decided between employers and the union, when or if they decide to sit down together. And may I add this, that the matter of wages as it has been discussed throughout the press, particularly of this province, is most misleading. I have seen the statement in the press to the effect that the Ford workers are demanding a thirty per cent increase in wages. The natural assumption for anyone to make is that the workers are asking that this increase be made on top of their wartime wages. That is not true. We have talked this matter over with officials of the union, and we know the fact is that what they are demanding is a thirty per cent increase on their 1938 rates. The average 1938 wage paid by the Ford Motor Company was between $1,000 and $1,200 a year. The minimum paid in their plant was $600 a year. A thirty per cent increase in basic rates means that the Ford workers are at this time demanding a minimum wage in those plants of $1,800 a year.

[Mr. Gillis.]

Mr. HOMUTH: Would the hon. member tell us how long the man getting $600 a year worked in the plant of the Ford Motor Company? How many hours did he put in in a year?

Mr. GILLIS: My information is that these plants are seasonal. They work about eight months in each year. A large percentage of the employees in those plants in pre-war years were working eight months for a minimum wage of $600.

Mr. MITCHELL: Perhaps I might clarify the situation.

Mr. HOMUTH: Let us have the facts.

Mr. MITCHELL: I believe the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) is asking for the base rate. For instance, a bricklayer may get $1 or $1.25 an hour. The point he is driving at—and it is a fair one, and one which I cannot answer; perhaps the hon. member can—is as to the amount of the base rate at Windsor.

Mr. HOMUTH: Per hour.

Mr. GILLIS: I just referred to the minimum rate in those plants.

Mr. HOMUTH: Per hour.

Mr. GILLIS: I do not know what the hourly rates are, but it does not make any difference. We might suppose that you receive $10 an hour, but if you worked only one hour a year that would be your total wage at the end of the year.

Mr. HOMUTH: I know my hon. friend will not object to answering my question. If I had a man working in my garden for one hour, for which I paid him 75 cents, he would receive 75 cents for the year if he worked only that hour. Let us be fair about it.

Mr. GILLIS: That was the point I was making.

Mr. ROWE: You did not make it, though.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes I did; I said it did not make any difference what the hourly rate was, if at the end of the year the total take or the total earnings amounted to only $600. That is the thing that is important.

Mr. ROWE: But what do they get per hour?

Mr. GILLIS: Just a minute; Mr. Speaker—

Mr. HOMUTH: I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend, but—

Mr. SPEAKER: May I call the attention of hon. members to the fact that when another hon. member has the floor no interruptions can be permitted without his consent.

Mr. HOMUTH: I asked his permission.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: And you did not get it.

Mr. GILLIS: In a few minutes I shall be told to take my seat because my time will have expired. However, this question can be discussed by every hon. member in the house after I have finished. Mind you, I am not concerned about simply raising this matter in the house; I want something done about it. Before I take my seat I am going to suggest something that should be done. Whether hon. members are prepared to go along in this matter and see that something is done about it is a test of their sincerity.

As I said a minute ago, I am not going to argue wage rates, because there are probably fifty different classifications in that plant —different groups with different rates. But I made that point simply because the press has been misleading.

In 1938 a large percentage of the employees in that plant received $600 a year.

Mr. ROWE: How much an hour?

Mr. GILLIS: They are asking a thirty per cent increase on basic rates, or a minimum of $1,800 a year.

Mr. HOMUTH: No, no.

Mr. GRAYDON: Not $1,800?

Mr. McCANN: How does the hon. member arrive at that—$600 with a thirty per cent increase amounting to $1,800?

Mr. GILLIS: It is $600 to $1,800.

Mr. McCANN: But that is not thirty per cent.

Mr. GILLIS: A thirty per cent increase in the basic hourly rate would bring them up to that figure per year, as a minimum.

Mr. ROWE: How do you know, if you do not know what they get per hour?

Mr. GILLIS: There are many classifications in the Ford plant, as there are everywhere else.

Mr. ROWE: You do not know them, though.

Mr. GILLIS: If I had time I could tell you a lot, if you would take a trip to my office some time.

Mr. ROWE: I would prefer that you tell me here.

Mr. GILLIS: I have not time this afternoon.

Mr. ROWE: You do not know them.

Mr. GILLIS: I know them better than you do. And when I have finished you can get up and say it. Then you would be telling us something.

Mr. ROWE: I am awaiting my turn.

Mr. HOMUTH: And how!

Mr. GILLIS: As I said a minute ago, the matter of wages is not one I am concerned about. But I am concerned with the matter of establishing the collective agreement, union security and proper bargaining arrangements in the plant—the focal points in this strike.

Let me say this, that it does not reflect any great credit upon the present government in Ontario—because primarily it is their responsibility. If they were accepting that responsibility we would not be discussing the matter in this house this afternoon, and there would be no strike in Windsor.

Mr. HOMUTH: You had better talk about Nova Scotia.

Mr. GILLIS: This could not happen in Nova Scotia. We settled the matter down there thirty years ago.

Mr. ROWE: Well, in Ontario they at least know how much they are getting per hour.

Mr. GILLIS: That is the point; I have been trying to tell you. However, if what I say in the house goes over the hon. member's head, that is not my responsibility.

An hon. MEMBER: It is pretty evident what the Tory attitude, is anyway.

Mr. GILLIS: The minister pointed out that a conference had been called in Ontario, to which union officials and officials of the Ford Motor Company had been invited. If I am correctly informed, the union officials were prepared to go along with that meeting. But the Ford company took the attitude that they were not going to go into any conference with our Department of Labour or with union officials until such time as they and their office workers were permitted to go back into their offices through the picket line. The Minister of Labour in his statement the other day asserted that on that particular point he was in agreement with the Ford Motor Company. I am not going to debate the merits or demerits of the tactics of the workers in keeping out the office staff, but I am going to say this: The office workers are not stopped from going through the picket line. The fact of the matter is that the office workers are not reporting for work. That is our information direct from the union officials, that there is no one stopping the office workers from going through the picket line.

The minister makes quite a play of Mr. Campbell being kept out of his office. The Minister of Labour is an old union man and has taken part in many strikes. A strike is a war, a war between employer and employee, and the union official has a responsibility to see that that war is conducted in the best interests of those he represents. Mr. Campbell is doing the same thing, and no one is finding fault with him for that. But why does Mr. Campbell want to get back into that office, and why are the Ford workers not much interested in allowing him back into that office? My information is this, and if it is correct, there is justification for what the men are doing. Mr. Campbell has in that plant a lot of blue-prints, a lot of dies and tools, If he could take in fifty or sixty men for a few hours he could gather those up and farm them out to other plants around this province and keep that Ford plant in Windsor closed for the next seven or eight months while he is getting his work done elsewhere, and in the meantime the skilled workers at the Ford plant would be left high and dry. I am not saying that that is a correct analysis, but that is the information we get from union officials in Windsor, and I say that if that is true the workers at Ford have complete justification in keeping Mr. Campbell out of the plant.

Do not forget that Mr. Campbell is the man who started this strike seventeen months ago by his absolutely unreasonable attitude of using the workers once again for a war, and then when the war is over his attitude is: We go back into our little shell and you workers are no longer important in this country. But Mr. Campbell is going to find out before this war is through, as will every other industrialist who takes that attitude, that unless he goes along with his workers in the post-war and establishes the objectives for which we fought this war, he is going to have a very uncomfortable country to live in for the next fifteen or twenty years.

In their efforts to find a solution for the present difficulties the workers at the Ford plant have traversed every piece of machinery that has been provided by the government, all the conciliation machinery, P.C. 1003, every order in council that has been laid down by this government. The workers at the Ford plant have complied with every one of them.

Why does Ford take that attitude in Windsor? The same company, the United States company just across the line, has provided for its employees in the United States everything that the workers in the Ford plant in Windsor are asking for. Why is there industrial democracy in the United States? Why is not the same union security set up here as there? Why is not the grievance procedure with respect to the stewards that has been provided in the United States for Ford's workers there, provided also in Windsor for Canadian workers? That is something to which the Canadian government has a right to get an answer. There is no reason why the Ford company in Canada should be tying up industry and creating friction by refusing to deal with its employees in this country as it deals with its employees in the United States.

Mr. McCANN: Have they not a million workers out on strike now?

Mr. GILLIS: Where?

Mr. McCANN: In the United States.

Mr. GILLIS: The question is wages over there. The question here is union security, and that is provided in the United States.

What is the solution? My solution is this, and you have a precedent for it. I do not expect the Minister of Labour to run around all over this country wherever there is a labour dispute; for that is not his job. But he has in his department the necessary machinery and officials that he can direct. I think that what the Minister of Labour should do immediately is to send a controller to Windsor to take over the Ford plant there. If he is prepared to do that the workers at Ford are prepared to go back to the status quo prior to their going out. The Minister of Labour then, through his controller, would try to bring the employer and the employees together to work out an agreement between employer and employee that would be in accordance with the many government pronouncements that have been made in this house on the question of collective bargaining. That is the answer, and it is not something new. This government has already done it. In the middle of the war they took over National Steel Car at Hamilton. There was a strike there, and the Minister of Labour sent in a controller. The strike was settled, and there have been no difficulties there since. The government did the same thing in Montreal in connection with the Montreal Tramways strike last year, where the situation was worse than it is at Windsor now. The Minister of Labour sent in his controller and the difficulties were settled. Just a couple of months ago the Minister of Labour again, when there was a strike in British Columbia in American Can, a company with ramifications all across this continent, sent a controller in there, in a bigger show than this Windsor set-up, and to the best of my knowledge he settled that dispute satisfactorily. The United States government at the present time are not adverse to that line of action. Just a few days ago the United States government stepped into the oil industry in the United States and took over, and is now bringing employer and employee together.

The fact of the matter is that we fought this war for something; hundreds of men left the Ford plant at Windsor to join the armed forces, and now they are coming back and are working in that plant. That is their means of livelihood. We preached to them that in fighting this war they were fighting for democracy, and now they come back to the Ford plant and find that their employer is refusing them the very rudiments of industrial democracy—the right of the employee to bargain with his employer, the right to sign an agreement, the right to say what their wage rates are to be. Now what will be the opinion of the boy who comes back from fighting this war and finds his employer taking that attitude? It is the same old game that we saw in 1914-18. We fought a war from 1939 to 1945, and now the war is over, and the war slogans are down. Personally the war is not over for me, and it is not over for the hundreds of thousands of young men who are coming back to this country after fighting a war that they really thought they were fighting for democracy.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that in a situation such as this, where there is a dispute, the first one in the post-war period that can affect labour relations clear across this country, the responsible government should step in through the Department of Labour and see to it that a sensible understanding is arrived at, based on the principles which were often enunciated by the Minister of Labour and other members of the government on the subject of labour relations during the process of fighting the war.

My hon. friend over here was much concerned about the question of wages, and I said that I was not going to go into that because it is not my business; it is the business of Ford and the employees when they come together. But let me leave this thought with you, if you think that the wage demands which the employees are making at this time are unreasonable. I understand from fairly good authority that during the years of the war the Ford Motor Company, Canadian section, made $27 million profits after all taxes were paid; they increased their reserves from $60 million to $90 million; they paid dividends to shareholders of $9 million. I understand that if two and a half million dollars were taken from that $30 million of reserves they put away during the process of fighting this war and were applied to the dispute now going on at Windsor, it would settle the whole question. The company would still have a lot of money.

Mr. HOMUTH: What does the hon. member mean, that two and a half million dollars would settle the whole question?

Mr. GILLIS: It would provide for the increases in wages.

Mr. HOMUTH: For how long?

Mr. GILLIS: For a year.

Mr. HOMUTH: And after the year was up, what then?

Mr. GILLIS: Take some more out of the $90 million reserve.

Mr. HOMUTH: That is all right, but explain that.

Mr. COLDWELL: We can see where their friends are.

Mr. GILLIS: Ford's friends are very obvious in this house.

Mr. HOMUTH: No, not "Ford's friends"; but we are not going to be deluded by a one-sided argument.

Mr. GILLIS: I shall not detain the house any longer. I feel very strongly on this matter, and I seriously suggest to the Minister of Labour and every hon. member that action should be taken by the department immediately to head off what I consider to be the initial stages of a general industrial upheaval in this country if the dispute is not handled at once and in a reasonable manner.

Mr. ALISTAIR STEWART (Winnipeg North): I believe the workers of this country are puzzled, dismayed and discouraged at the lack of a positive labour policy on the part of the government. We can remember that up to June 11 they had a policy—jobs, work for all, security for all. Where is that policy now? The workers at Windsor are without protection, and surely the most elementary protection for the workers in a democracy is the right to join the union of their own choice, the protection of union security, the closed shop, and the check-off. Yet these are being denied to them, and apparently the government does nothing about it. Well, I believe either the government's promises are going to be fulfilled, or their bluff is going to be called, because the insecurity of labour is becoming more and more obvious.

All across this country to-day men are being laid off; plants all over Canada are reducing their staffs. I draw to the attention of the house the fact that when a man is laid off or when he is on strike it is a very serious matter for that individual. There are few scourges worse than unemployment. When a man is unemployed he has no income. It is true that to-day he gets this miserly pittance of unemployment insurance, but that is far from adequate to pay his rent, it is far from adequate to provide food, including the dairy products which are so necessary to keep his children in health; it is far from adequate to provide medical services if they are needed; it is far from adequate in these days of approaching winter to see that the house is kept properly warm and that the children do not suffer. Always under strikes or mass unemployment it is the children who suffer most. Therefore I suggest that there is much validity to our case and to the union case that when the worker is being transferred from war-time to peace-time employment, during the period of transition he should be given a minimum of $25 a week. He and his family cannot expect to live on less.

Under capitalism as we have known it the lot of the worker has been unemployment, then work for a little time, then unemployment again. There is no security. In our lifetime we have gone through two wars and two major depressions, and the mass of the people have always suffered the worst. There are young men coming back to this country whose only chance in the nineteen thirties was the chance in 1939 to fight and die for Canada. These boys are coming back expecting something better than when they went away. They want a Canada wherein there is work for them, and some sort of union security, but apparently the government is unwilling to provide that type of security. In Winnipeg we have the case of MacDonald Brothers Aircraft plant, which at the peak of employment had 4,500 men employed. The number is now down to 400. What has happened to those 4,100 people? Some, though only a few, have got other jobs; some have left the province; the great majority are unemployed.

I want again to emphasize the fact that unemployment is a personal tragedy for those who suffer from it, and therefore it is the duty of the government and this house to do everything within their power to ease conditions for these people and see that the pledges are kept that there shall be work for all in Canada.

We are told that there are a million new jobs in sight. Where are they, and at what rates of pay? I believe that the "million new jobs" is a mirage. It does not delude the workers of this country. It is true that there may be a million new jobs, but if there are, they are at twenty-five cents an hour, and we are not going to take them at that wage.

The trade unions of Canada are far in advance of the government with plans for reconversion. The trades and labour congress have already presented their recommendations to this government. They have asked:

(1) That all citizens who have been engaged in essential civilian industry be immediately allowed "reconversion pay" during this period of dislocation on a basis of one month's pay for each year's service up to three years;

(2) To spread available employment, a maximum forty-hour work week be put into effect, with no reduction in wages;

(3) To create confidence and maintain buying power, that general reductions of pay be prohibited;

(4) That restrictions be lifted from building materials and that the construction of homes be carried on with the same effort, ingenuity and dispatch as was displayed in the production of urgently needed war materials;

(5) That necessary public works be immediately commenced; and

(6) That the reconversion of all war plants suitable to peace-time production be speeded to the utmost.

There, Mr. Speaker, is a programme. The workers of Canada have a programme. Where, then, is that of the government? In Winnipeg we have signs of another strike, a national strike, in the packing house industry. I was at a conference of packing house workers a few days ago. These men appreciate the problems of industry and the problems of the national economy; they only hope that the government appreciates them in exactly the same way. The question of income tax was discussed by these workers. They had no objection to high rates of income tax provided they were sure that their fellow workers were getting jobs. They discussed rationing. They had no objection to rationing; they encouraged it in order to feed the starving people of Europe, though they disagreed in many respects with the way the government was handling it, but that is another matter. If the government are to be sure of getting the support of the working people of this country, they have to support—

Mr. CASE: Will the hon. member permit a question? Does the hon. member mean to imply that there is lack of employment in the Ford Motor Company, that there is no employment there? He is speaking about unemployment.

Mr. STEWART: I implied nothing of the sort. What I said is that there is lack of employment in Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: Where?

Mr. STEWART: It is very obvious. Go to any employment exchange and you will see evidences of it. Talk to the workers, and they will tell you. You can get jobs at thirty-five or forty cents an hour, but nobody can afford to work at that.

An hon. MEMBER: How much do you want?

Mr. STEWART: I want to see the workers of Canada get a living wage and some security. We will not stop until we get that. That should be the policy of the government, because it is one of the promises which was held out to the workers. The workers in the packing houses are asking for a forty-hour week and thirty per cent increase in pay, so that they would get the same wage for a forty-hour week as they are now getting for a forty-eight hour week. Wages in the packing houses are not high, and the conditions in some departments are dreadful. I do not know whether hon. members have been through the packing houses and have seen the conditions under which these men work, often wading through blood and dirt. Have they seen the workers in these shops travelling from sub-zero to almost tropical temperatures in different rooms, day after day? Here is an industry that seriously impairs the health of the worker. It is all very well thinking in terms of an hourly wage, but after all that is not the way to think of those engaged in these jobs. You must think of them in terms of an annual wage, and then ask how long such men will be able to carry on in the packing house industry. As a matter of fact, a man of fifty is pretty well through because the severity of the work in the packing plant is such that he cannot carry on after that age.

These men are asking for some improvement in conditions, some hope of security from the government, and they are not holding anybody up. I may tell the government now, and they know it as well as I do, that there is going to be a strike in this industry unless they get busy and bring down a policy which will suit the workers throughout the country. The workers do not want very much. They want union security and reduced hours of work, they want decent working conditions and incomes on which they and their families can live in comfort. These are the minimum demands of those who have been producing to win the war, of those whose sons died to win the war. They are the minimum demands of the workers of Canada, and the workers are going to get them, or they and their brothers who are coming out of the services are going to know the reason why.

Mr. FRED ROSE (Cartier): I was surprised at the easy manner in which hon. members approached the question raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis). I should have thought there would be more interest in the matter in this house. It is not for labour alone, it is not for the unions alone, it is for Canada that the Ford workers are striking to-day. They want to make sure that we do not go back to pre-war wage levels and insecurity. They are not there fighting merely for the Ford employees but for the men who are coming back from overseas and who will not be satisfied to go back to pre-war conditions.

The strike is not something that these workers have brought about because they wanted to strike. It is not that. Workers in various plants and industries have felt for the past year a change in the attitude of employers. Before V-E day, when war materials were necessary, employers were willing to collaborate, but once they felt that the war was coming to an end they started to provoke trouble in the shops. They laid off active unionists and fired certain workers and rehired at lower wages. All these methods were resorted to in order to prepare for the post-war period. The workers to-day on strike are saying that this is not going to happen. If their income is insufficient it will not be merely the Ford workers who will suffer. What about the storekeeper, the dentist, the doctor, and everyone else?

We have been speaking in government documents about high income; that is mentioned in most government documents. But how will anyone obtain a high income unless the government gives the lead by encouraging an increase in wages? I should like to know what sort of increase has there been in the productivity of labour in industry. According to certain figures I have seen, it appears that there has been an increase of thirty per cent in industrial efficiency in the United States. I do not know what the corresponding increase in productivity in Canada has been, but I believe there has been a similar increase. Thus an increase in wages for Canadian labour will not affect profits. In fact, I have no doubt that when it comes to profits there will be more than a slight cut in excess profits taxes when we hear about it on Friday night. The employers will be looked after.

What about the workers? The Ford strikers want union security. They are not asking for anything new. The Canadian congress of labour and the trades and labour congress have asked for union security, but the government has done nothing. There were no changes in P.C. 1003. In this house we see orders in council often enough, but in regard to labour legislation there has been no change. I suggest that the government can still pass the necessary order in council amending 1003 so as to give the workers union security. Union security to the worker would mean that he could go into the shop feeling that he was a human being and that the boss could not manipulate wages and working conditions to his detriment.

I was very much disappointed in the replies I received last week from the Minister of Labour regarding steps to settle the Ford strike. I was told about a home being one's castle. I did not know that the office was Mr. Campbell's home, although I understand he has built up very elaborate offices in the plant. Campbell can sit back and say, "I don't care a hoot what happens to the country; I don't care if we reconvert in a hurry so as to give employment; I will wait until I break them." But the workers cannot wait. And their only weapon is organization, union security and the picket line.

I should have liked to hear some word of encouragement from the Minister of Labour rather than the statement that he thought the other party was right. In my opinion P.C. 1003 should be amended, and it should be amended in such a way that Campbell will know that he must meet with the union; that union security is the law of the land. If Campbell still does not wish to negotiate, I fully concur in the request of the member for Cape Breton South to take over the plant. This is a time to give leadership. If nothing happens now, if greedy employers are encouraged to-day, a very bad beginning will be made in reconversion.

I have met many boys who have come back from overseas. What do they say? They have been flying officers, flight-lieutenants, lieutenants in the army and so on. They have got used to a new standard of living, and they will insist upon a decent standard when they get back.

The union is fighting for these boys just as much as for the small storekeeper. These people are fighting for every worker in the country and they should get the support of this government. It is not enough for the government to say: We will try to do our best. When the government wants to try, it generally finds better methods than those now employed with regard to the Ford strike. It is the duty of the government to act, and I hope we shall get action in a hurry.

Mr. J. S. SINNOTT (Springfield): Being a member of parliament I am much interested in this labour movement. I do not take an unkindly attitude towards the working man, because I have done much hard work myself and I know he is entitled to a day's pay. But I believe during the past few weeks there has been an attempt to incite these workers to what they are doing. I have in my hand a letter in which it is stated that ten thousand citizens of Toronto met on October 3 and passed a resolution which reads in part:

> This public rally for a labour programme on reconversion, and in support of the Ford and Guelph strikers, urge you to regard these matters as of national urgency; and that you move for their immediate discussion in the House of Commons demanding government intervention at once, (1) to grant union security in the Ford and Guelph plants, (2) to take action for the maintenance of purchasing power of the working people of Canada, and (3) to guarantee operation by government control, if necessary, of war plants now closed, or closing.
> We would appreciate your answer as to what action you intend taking in this matter.

I think this is the improper place to discuss this; I think it is improper to waste the time of 245 members of parliament to discuss the situation.

Mr. COLDWELL: Will the hon. member say what it is right to discuss here?

Mr. IRVINE: What is the place?

Mr. SINNOTT: I have the letter here which I wrote in reply, and I shall read it to the house. It is as follows:

> Ottawa, Ontario,
> October 9, 1945.
> Mr. Malcolm Murdock,
> AFL-CIO Delegate Reconversion Committee,
> 617 Yonge street,
> Toronto, Ontario.
> Dear Sir:
> Your letter received this morning, re Toronto, Ford and Guelph, Kitchener, Hamilton, Oshawa towns, etc., Ford strike.
> Please notify immediately as to the wages and conditions offered you by the Ford Company. Without this information, I would not be in a position to place your urgency before the house.

Mr. ROSE: Would the hon. member permit a question? Was the hon. member present when the strike question was explained?

Mr. SINNOTT: I continue with the letter:

> I would also give you to understand there is a Minister of Labour appointed to look after this matter, and I do not see any reason why the time of the House of Commons should be taken up regarding this matter. In my opinion, if the Minister of Labour is not attending to his position in the manner he should, others should be placed in his position.

At this time I would not be able to place your complaints before the house until I had all the information from both sides.

Hoping at an early date to have such information as is necessary so I may be able to use my influence to help settle this very important matter.

In saying what I have in this letter, I have every regard for the Minister of Labour. I think he is endeavouring to settle this question. This is his baby; he is Minister of Labour. He should deal with it, and we should not take up the time of the house in discussing it.

Mr. A. L. SMITH (Calgary West): I had not intended until quite some time from now occupying the time of this house, but inasmuch as I had occasion recently to see these men from Windsor, and also Mr. Burt, the president of the union organization in this country, and Mr. MacIntyre, their international representative, and had some frank talks with them, I think perhaps I should at least declare myself in this picture in no uncertain terms. In doing so I intend to confine myself entirely to the events at Windsor. I am much inclined to agree with my friend from Nova Scotia that they may be simmering in many other places. But may I say immediately that if we want a general strike in Canada, as these men are talking about, inflammatory speeches of the kind they are making is the best way to bring it about.

This dispute at Windsor involves a number of things, and they cannot be discussed here because we have only one side of the picture. But I am going to say this: it involves union security. I stand up in this house and I say publicly that I am in favour of union security. That is one of the big things they are talking about. I will go even further. I will go with them in the way they are going to get union security. They have it across the river from the Windsor plant. You can hit one plant from the other with a rock. Why they cannot have equal conditions with the same ownership is something with respect to which I cannot agree with my hon. friend.

In meeting these men I said this to them: "You are picketing this office building, and you are wrong. You are just so wrong—" I cannot use the language here that I used there to state exactly what I said at the time. I know a little about this business. I am no new convert to unionism. I believe in organized labour. I have been a solicitor for the biggest union in western Canada for a great many years. They are on strike right now, the United Mine Workers of America, without the consent of their bosses. I may lose a job by having made that remark; nevertheless I have made it. Of course, money does not matter to us down here; our indemnity covers all our troubles, therefore we do not need to worry about things like that. But I say I speak from conviction with respect to organized labour—and I do not mean little unions, I mean strong unions.

What is the object of talking about collective bargaining if unions sit in on the picture with no money, and the bosses have all the money? It is not a bargain unless these unions are strong. I repeat, I believe in strong unions.

These men are completely wrong in picketing the Ford office building, and I will tell you why. They have an office workers' union which is composed of 870 members. They have not declared a strike. If they want to get within the law, let them call them out on strike, and then there would be no illegality in Windsor. But they are having the plant people picket the office. They say the office people are not coming down. That is perfectly true. I would not come down if I were working in that office. But aside from that one thing I am very much in favour of the attitude of the men there.

I now make this suggestion to the Minister of Labour. I greatly fear that there is much truth in what I have heard from my hon. friends just over here. We have the packing house situation in Winnipeg, where something seems to be going on. We have the mining situation in the west. You hear rumbles here and there. I give the leaders of the U.A.W.-C.I.O. credit for this, keeping the people at work in the other plants at Windsor. I have gone into it to some extent and I want to give Burt and MacIntyre in Ford and their colleagues all the marks I can for doing that at the present time—in other words, to stop this prairie fire spreading. I make this suggestion to the minister. The conditions which exist now existed when he invited the parties to meet him and the Minister of Labour for Ontario; in other words, the illegality was there; the offices were being picketed. There has been no change from the time of his invitation until now. The owners of this company, Mr. Campbell and others, refused the invitation given by the two ministers. When I say "ministers," please remember that I am including the Minister of Labour for Ontario. When that invitation was given, conditions in that place were exactly the same as at the time the invitation was refused. I say this: when the Minister of Labour for Canada and the Minister of Labour for Ontario invite Mr.

Campbell for a conference, it is up to Mr. Campbell to come. Nobody ever lost anything by chatting about a dispute, by getting together about it.

Suppose you have a row with your wife. You cannot lay down a condition that she has to wear number ten shoes or something of that kind before you speak to her again. You may be wrong, she may be wrong, but the only way you ever straighten out these things is to talk them over across a table. Therefore it does seem to me, even if it is necessary to go to the length suggested over here, that if these people will not meet, the minister must use drastic methods. He should put the pressure on Mr. Campbell and say: Here, let us stop this nonsense. Let us say to the men: Pull out your union, if you want a legitimate strike. But in the name of God let us get together, stop this shadow-boxing and prevent a labour conflagration the like of which this country never witnessed before.

Mr. J. O. PROBE (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, when I listened in this house some weeks ago to a discussion as to whether this august assembly should declare the war at an end or whether we should wait some months before the Canadian government put its stamp of approval on the fact that peace had come to this land, even though our armed forces had ceased fighting the enemy, I was at a loss to know why we should be debating that problem. Hon. gentlemen to my immediate right kept insisting that the war should be declared over, because then the process of removing controls might get under way, which would give certain interested persons an opportunity to get back into free enterprise on a proper and unrestricted scale. First I suspected that possibly the war controls instituted by the government during the last five years were being retained to bring about an orderly transition from war to peace, as was indicated by a number of hon. members on the other side of the house. Then in reading various press reports relating to strikes in British Columbia, at Toronto, at Guelph and at Windsor, with the rumblings of a strike at Winnipeg; seeing the football being thrown from the provincial government to the Minister of Labour at Ottawa and back; seeing the Minister of Labour here step into a reportedly provincial matter and settle the American Can strike in British Columbia by forcing a board of conciliation on the two disputants; seeing that when the packing house employees all across Canada were on strike or in process of going on strike the Ontario Minister of Labour took up the cudgel and was able to settle a dominion dispute, as a novice in this house I was left definitely at sea as to who had jurisdiction in any given field of labour legislation.

Mr. MITCHELL: Might I say to my hon. friend that he is still at sea, though I regret having to say so.

Mr. COLDWELL: Just a minute, now.

Mr. MITCHELL: All right; an attack is being made on myself and on the Ontario Minister of Labour, who is not here.

Mr. PROBE: I made no attack on the Minister of Labour of Ontario. I said he settled a strike which was of dominion-wide proportions.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is a different thing. First you said it was a dominion affair.

Mr. PROBE: I did not make a deliberate attack on the Ontario Minister of Labour. I am quite happy that he settled the dispute in question, though I did not say so.

Coming back to the point I was trying to make when the Minister of Labour corrected me on my way of expressing my opinions in this matter, we have certain wartime labour controls. As I see it, if we had to have those controls at all they should have been all-inclusive. Apparently some government, whether it be the Tory government at Toronto or our own government here at Ottawa, is able under certain conditions to step in and either by conciliation or by an enforced arbitration, as happened in the two cases I mentioned, settle a labour dispute, under powers vested in the government by certain war measures and orders in council. I have come to the conclusion that the power of the government of this country is being used not to force reasonable conciliation in these disputes but to keep wages frozen, to keep overtime pay frozen, to keep minimum hours of labour frozen at a maximum figure. In my own province of Saskatchewan, where the provincial government authorized two weeks' vacation with pay for all employees, the power of the federal government was invoked to prevent those employees from receiving the holidays to which they were justly entitled. Only this afternoon I was reading in the Labour Gazette something relating to P.C. 9384, which is the wartime wages control order, in which various judgments of regional labour boards were given to this effect: "the primary function of war labour boards is to stabilize the wage structure in Canada, and that purpose cannot be achieved by equalizing wages across the various economic regions of Canada."

So we have restrictive measures still in operation and being skilfully used by employers who request their application by the government because otherwise there will be an upward revision of the wage structure as a result of which the prices of commodities will go up. These restrictions are in effect in spite of the fact that the workers of this country are in a fatigued condition as the result of long hours with little if any overtime pay. This situation was emphasized to me two years ago at Dagenham, Essex, when I happened to be the luncheon guest of the managing director for England of the Ford Motor Company. I did not discuss politics on that occasion, or I might not have been given this reply to a question I asked with respect to worker fatigue. Mr. Cooper, managing director of Ford at Dagenham, said that in the plants of his company, owing to the excessive hours workers were employed because of the need for producing all available munitions of war, and because of the extra hours that were entailed in roof watching, home guard duties and so on, the incidence of accidents was increasing and the precision of the work being done was decreasing. This being so, if employers are interested in the efficiency of their plants it would seem to me that from that point of view, if for nothing else, they would accede to the demands of their employees without having to be threatened with a strike. I will say to the credit of most employers of labour in this country that in spite of the restrictions on giving two weeks' holidays with pay each year, many of them have voluntarily recognized the necessity of their people having these holidays.

The Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) sent out a small pamphlet entitled "Employment and Income, With Special Reference to the Initial Period of Reconstruction." In this pamphlet I noted the following paragraph which seems to me apropos of this discussion:

> The transition period . . . with the demand for civilian goods, will require, taking the country as a whole, all the labour and materials which can be made available. High employment and nation-wide skill will continue.
> There will, however, be unavoidable dislocations and delays in some localities where war-time demands have necessitated heavy concentration of war orders and an abnormal war-time population.
> The government, working in the first instance through the Department of Reconstruction, is making plans to meet these local situations. These plans include the speedy reestablishment and development of civilian industry in these areas. They will be supplemented, to the extent necessary and desirable by special attention to the field of housing and public works.

In other words, following up the election promises by all political parties, the Minister of Reconstruction simply reiterates that there will be a more or less continuously high rate of employment, high income for the workers, social security and, I had hoped, collective bargaining. I could go on ad infinitum—or possibly I should say ad nauseam.

In my home city of Regina the problem of reconversion of our major industrial plant, Regina Industries, was settled rapidly. No more than a week after election day, quit slips were being handed out to the employees at the rate of roughly 150 per week. This was done to a point where, to-day, the one large industrial plant in our city is operating only on a skeleton-staff basis. The potentialities of the plant for any form of industrial production are going to be lost to western Canada, and therefore to the country as a whole because, as I understand from the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Abbott), the building is to be turned over for use as an ordnance depot.

The people in that plant who had developed certain skills did not go on strike, nor did they have the opportunity to do so. They were simply eased out because there was no work for them. The manufacture of Bren gun tripods for the Chinese government, which has been proceeding in the plant since June, is one of the outstanding jokes in our war production—simply because those tripods are obsolete. At any rate, the men and women who were working in that plant now have the option of either accepting work offered them at points outside Regina, or accepting unemployment insurance—and ultimately, of course, relief. It is not a simple matter to root up an entire family in one of the prairie provinces and move it either to eastern Canada or to British Columbia for the work obtainable in those areas. Selective service assured our workers in Regina that work was available at those points.

The acceptance of unemployment insurance offers no great incentive to the average citizen. In my view the Unemployment Insurance Act passed in 1940 is an iniquitous piece of legislation. We find that out of approximately 5,000,000 persons gainfully employed, 2,500,000 are covered by the terms of this legislation. The act is full of loopholes. Contributions must be made to the fund for 180 days by an employee in the two years immediately preceding an application for unemployment insurance benefits. To receive those benefits the individual concerned must be capable of and available for work, and must be unable to obtain suitable employment. In other words, he must be capable of earning. But if, through no fault of his own, a man becomes sick, the act is not worth the snap of a finger, because under this legislation sickness is a bar to the receipt of benefits.

I did not like the implication of the hon. member who immediately preceded me in the debate, when he said that those of us in this group who are drawing attention to the seriousness of the situation are thereby aggravating its seriousness. But may I point out that those who are now on strike, by the terms of the Unemployment Insurance Act are ineligible for receipt of benefits, because strikers are barred from participation.

Moreover, no insurance benefits are available for the first nine days of unemployment in any benefit year. I know the employees of this country are not Mahatma Ghandis; they cannot enter upon nine-day hunger strikes, when conditions develop which would cause those strikes. This is another principle which deters our working people from making the final and serious move of taking strike action. The very fact that the workers at Windsor are on strike, after seventeen months of negotiation, and after exploring every available channel to secure redress for what they considered to be their grievances signifies clearly to me that their action is definitely that of a last resort.

Another serious defect in the Unemployment Insurance Act, to which I would draw the attention of the house, is that section of the Act which states that if a worker leaves employment without just cause, or is discharged for cause, he is not eligible for benefits.

The solvency of the fund, as set out in section 79, is something which will have to have the attention of hon. members in the very near future. Figures I have, show that in 1942 there were 26,900 applications filed for benefits under the act. In 1943 that number had risen to 36,600 and in 1944 to 90,897. In the first six months of this year the number of applications was 76,821, almost equal that of the whole of 1944. These were the applications for benefits which paid to married men with dependents, if acceptable under the Unemployment Insurance Act, a minimum of $4.80 and up to a maximum of $14.40 per week. These are the figures regardless of the number of dependents.

From the point of view of solvency, the defect in the fund as it is set up under section 79 is that no provision is made for continuity of payments to the fund. I do not wish to indulge in carping criticism, because as a matter of fact I think the government should be congratulated upon having instituted the semblance of an unemployment insurance fund, even though it follows belatedly the example of other enlightened countries throughout the world. But there are so many loopholes in the Unemployment Insurance Act that either when the workers call upon its benefits they cannot get them, or the $300 million at present in the fund will soon be exhausted.

I have one more reference to make before sitting down. While our friends in the labour movement are being held at bay, so to speak, because they have infringed upon the law in a minor point in preventing a certain Mr. Campbell from entering his business premises, I notice that provision is being made to keep certain other people off the relief roll. A friend drew my attention to the dominion government telephone directory for the month of May, and in that directory I find listed under various departments of government, 1,582 telephone numbers of army officers: 9 lieutenant-generals or major-generals; 23 brigadiers; 75 colonels; 175 lieutenant-colonels; 335 majors; 613 captains; only 352 lieutenants, or second-lieutenants. That makes a grand total of 1,582 brass hats, shall we say. I was in service, Mr. Speaker; I was an officer wearing His Majesty's uniform; but when I think of the intricate mess in which the business of this country becomes entangled because scattered around various government buildings in the city of Ottawa there are enough officers to staff adequately three fighting Canadian divisions overseas, I am appalled. I do not think that all these brass hats so-called are from the province of Saskatchewan either. Even that might require some closer checking up. I have an idea also that the air force and the navy are adequately represented.

We are looking after certain people in this transition period. Certain parts of the army, as I say, are well represented. I have an idea, without knowing the actual facts, that these 1,582 telephone numbers of army officers in the May directory of the government cannot be matched by an equal number of telephones for privates and non-commissioned officers. But certain people are being provided for in this rehabilitation period while the workers of this country, who also did their bit, get the run-around. I would urge upon the Minister of Labour, for the sake of peace, order and good government in this fair Dominion of Canada, that he step into this strike at Windsor just as he stepped in to settle the labour dispute in the American Can Company in British Columbia.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, this question to me is of far greater importance than merely the strike at Windsor which happens to be the reason why the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) brings this matter to the attention of the house. Its significance is that that strike is just the beginning of a process which, if labour does not hinder it, will go on until wages have dropped to the point at which they were before the war, and it is because labour is determined to resist that and because they recognize that the power of their union, which implies collective bargaining, is the only weapon they can use to resist it, that you have the strike at Windsor. That, sir, is why there will be many more strikes in the next five years if something is not done about it. So, while some hon. members think this is not the time and not the place to bring this matter up—I have heard that said for many years in this house—I do not know of any better time and I know of no better place to talk about this matter than here and now. True, we tried to talk about it at some other time, but we were not given the opportunity. This is the only other chance afforded by the rules of the house for us to present something at least of the case of the workers at the Ford plant at Windsor.

I am not going to offer any sharp criticism of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). I recognize that his job, if I may call it such, is a very difficult one, not only in this but in all similar disputes. His department, unfortunately for him, happens to be that point at which both the employers and employees meet in their conflict, and as such he has the most difficult task of perhaps any minister of the crown. I would suggest that the government should give him greater assistance by putting behind him a better policy, a policy which he can carry out with his whole heart, and which will be in line with what we might expect in a country that has fought for and won democracy.

I would, however, suggest to the Minister of Labour that it does seem to me to be almost bringing this matter to an absurdity to say that action cannot be taken because Mr. Campbell cannot get into his office. I am not going to attempt any defence of the action which prevents him, other than to say that in my view, according to my information, the keeping of the workers out of their offices has now become a point of importance to the strikers. That is a factor in the case, but I do not believe that action on the strike by the minister should be delayed because of a minor point of that kind.

I agree most heatily with the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) that the minister should exercise whatever power he has and call the important leaders together, both of the industry concerned and of the striking men, and try to settle the difficulty—and forget about Mr. Campbell's office.

The government, I insist, must do something about this. Not only is the strike at Windsor the beginning of a struggle which, as I have said, will go on until wages drop to a point where the greatest possible profits can be made in peace time—that is the tendency—but it must not be forgotten that an essential industry, no matter which it is, has vital contacts with the whole industrial system of the nation. I would say to the Minister of Labour and to the government that it is just as important for the well-being of the nation and for the people involved in this strike that industry should be kept going in peace time as it was kept going in war. That is something the government will have to learn. True, it endeavoured to maintain full production during the war, and although it may not always have completely reached that objective it made a very creditable job. I suggest that the responsibility still rests on the government to perform that function.

It is being argued by influential people in Canada to-day that we cannot maintain war-time wages and war-time prices. It has been suggested by some of our influential newspapers that the time has come for this parliament and for the government to face up to that issue. One editorial remarks that, "what does seem to be suggested is a matter of common sense, and it is that either prices should be adjusted to wages or wages to prices." But mark this: "To leave the matter to a scuffle in the dark between labour and capital hardly seems sensible." That is precisely what this government is doing, in the case not only of Windsor but of the entire industrial system. They are leaving wage workers to scuffle with their employers in the dark in an attempt to maintain their wages at a living standard. The figures with respect to the wages of the striking workers in Windsor have been given by the hon. member who introduced this discussion. I need not repeat them, beyond laying emphasis upon the lowest figure he quoted, that of $600 a year as an income for the head of a family, which was included in an average wage which reached from $1,000 to $1,200 a year. Every hon. member knows that even $1,200 is not sufficient for a full life in Canada to-day, and we ought to be prepared to do something about it. Further, every one of us knows, if we know anything about this situation or any similar one, that collective bargaining is the only instrument which labour so far has been able to use effectively in raising its wages when wages began to go down.

I add my voice in support of the suggestion already made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) that the government should send in a controller to keep this industry going while the processes of reaching agreements are continued. That would be a good way to get into Mr. Campbell's office; let a government controller go there and I am quite sure that he will be admitted through the picket lines. That will remove the difficulty, and the minister can then proceed to his heart's content to settle the strike.

I have said that the Minister of Labour should have a government policy behind him in a matter of this kind. Of course he has, but I imagine it is a policy he cannot like very well. I cannot imagine, from his background, his knowledge, and his fights for labour, that he is particularly happy there. I cannot imagine any labour man being particularly happy as a labour minister in any government which stands for the status quo, and I know the present minister must have his difficulties in that environment.

This government stands for free private enterprise. Now free private enterprise is manifesting its capacity to meet the industrial requirements of this nation from one coast to the other at the present moment. It has entirely failed to prevent vast numbers of men from being laid off without any income except the $14 a week which they may get if and when they receive their unemployment insurance. Free private enterprise has failed to meet the situation in Windsor. Free private enterprise is dabbling away with the problem in the packing plants until the first thing we know we shall have a strike at Winnipeg, Vancouver and other points, tying up the whole live stock industry. Free private enterprise has failed so badly that in the last two weeks we have had, to my knowledge, at least three deputations from various parts of Canada interviewing or seeking to interview the government with respect to the failures of free private enterprise to meet their immediate requirements. We had, for instance, a delegation of 300 in this building a short time ago. They had a specific programme, and their whole plea was that free private enterprise was failing to meet the situation. We had a delegation from Prince Rupert and other parts of British Columbia having to do particularly with rehabilitation and the transition period from war to peace-time industry.

We had another deputation from greater British Columbia centring, I believe, in Vancouver and Victoria. These three different deputations inside of the last two weeks, along with threatened strikes which I have mentioned and the strike of which we are now speaking, indicate that in so short a time after the cessation of hostilities free private enterprise is on its knees. But it is part of the business of free private enterprise to allow the lag to come so that wages may be forced down, in order that greater profits may be assured for it in the future.

Therefore I am very sorry indeed that the minister has not a policy which would enable him to meet, and meet satisfactorily, a situation of this kind, a policy which would guarantee every possible assistance to industry in order that it might function as a service to all the people of Canada.

I know pretty well what the government policy about industry is, as I have gathered it from its own published statements. I believe its policy is to allow free private enterprise to have free play until it becomes absolutely imperative for the government to do something, and this means that we shall have perhaps hundreds of thousands of people unemployed and perhaps riots here and there. Then the government is supposed to do something, and what it will do then is to increase public expenditures on public works to take up the slack. According to my information, that is the government's policy. Let free private enterprise carry on until it sticks, as the government is quite sure it will; when it actually does stick, then the government will make expenditures, and those expenditures are to be made from borrowed money, with interest to be paid on the borrowed money, so that the people have to pay higher taxes in order to pay the higher interest to the money-lenders. And so goes our system, like a snake that starts to eat its own tail, until it gets to the back of its neck and cannot go farther. That is the kind of economic system we now have in this country. The snake is busy eating its tail now and it will not be long coming up through the body.

I want to suggest one or two things to the government, knowing of course—well, at least hopeful that they will act immediately on them.

An hon. MEMBER: You should have fired the first barrel. I think I know what you were going to say.

Mr. IRVINE: I want to point out first of all that we have fought for democracy, but I wonder whether as a parliament we have ever made any effort to say what this means, to say whether a wage of $600 a year is fit for anyone in a democracy for which young men died. I wonder if we have ever tried to visualize what this thing means for which our men have given their lives. A country that cannot provide homes for its people calling itself a democracy! A country that can find neither jobs for its people nor sufficient income to maintain a standard of decent living calling itself a democracy! I feel about this, as I am quite sure many hon. members feel, that these young men have made a tremendous sacrifice for democracy, and I am damned if I am going to stand here and watch it made a fool of by this government or any other government.

I want to see the people of Canada get democracy. I want to see them get democracy in industry; I want to see them get democracy in ownership of the means by which they live; I want to see them get democracy in the ruling of their industrial lives and pursuits; I want to see the workers have a share in the policies of industry, in what they are making, how it is to be made, and all the conditions of labour. I want to see democracy in reality.

That is the fight which is beginning. The fight for democracy has been fought on the military field. The fight now swings into the political and industrial field; as it swings in there I swing in behind it, and so do all of us in this group. And these men are merely the first to make a protest.

I want the government then to guarantee first of all—a very small thing—a minimum income of $25 a week or $100 a month to every worker in Canada between his employment as a war worker and the time he is engaged in similar occupation in peace pursuits, and I want to see at the same time that that becomes a basic wage below which no worker in Canada will be permitted to work in the days that are to come. That is the first thing.

I know the question of money will be raised as usual. I have listened for days to the discussion of a money bill in this house and hon. members, particularly to my right, have laid stress on the enormous amounts of money we hav been spending, how much more we are spending now than we spent twenty years ago. Who cares whether we are spending more now? If we were not spending more now than twenty years ago we would be fit only for a lunatic asylum. The point is, can we produce the goods? That is the first point, and the second point is, can the people of this country consume them? You may say, no; they cannot consume them all. All right; let us fill them up anyhow. Let us fill them up once; let us put something on their backs once; let us give them a home once; let us see to it that all the people of Canada have all they can eat of wholesome food, that they have homes in which to live, homes that are comfortable, beautiful and worthy of a democracy. Let us see that their children have a chance at education and that they have an opportunity to maintain a free life. Let us do these things; then what is left over we can use for foreign trade, and I imagine there will be quite a bit left over. But let us make sure that our people are not going to be deprived of anything that can be produced in Canada while machinery and workers are idle and material is going to waste. That is the business of government. That is the responsibility of this administration; the administration is going to be held to that responsibility, and this strike is the first sign of its task.

I suggest to the minister, therefore, that he do two things: first, that he call the leaders together and, if he cannot effect a settlement immediately, he put a controller in there in the interests of government until the matter is settled. I advocate this not particularly for the strikers of Windsor but as an industrial policy for the future. We cannot afford to tie up any great industry in a country in which the people need goods, and it is the business of government to see that our industries are kept going and that those who labour in them receive sufficient for their labours to make it possible for them to live democratically; that is, to live in accordance with a standard of living for which they would not be ashamed that their fighting men overseas had died.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): We all agree, I believe, with the objectives which have been expressed by our C.C.F. friends. I believe we all agree with the fine sentiments expressed by the previous speaker (Mr. Irvine). I am quite sure that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) agrees with all that. I rather suspect that ninety-five per cent of the Liberal party agrees with it. But the big problem which confronts them is, where is the money coming from to do all this?

Mr. IRVINE: You tell us.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is what I rose to do. During the ten years I have been in this house I think I have never found fault with a difficulty without offering a possible solution, and I propose to make no exceptions to that rule. Whether the people who listen to me will have vision and understanding sufficient to be able to appreciate the solution I offer is a matter for their concern, not for mine.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): We shall try.

Mr. BLACKMORE: May I point out to all hon. members something of the problem which confronts the labouring man not only in the Ford plant at Windsor but throughout the length and breadth of this country. In a few minutes I am going to read a statement from the bureau of statistics which conveys a doleful picture of the wage situation which prevailed in Canada in 1941. First of all, let me give a summary of that finding. During the twelve months period which ended on June 2, 1941, of the Canadian wage-earners 32·9 per cent received less than $450 a year. How many of my Conservative friends want to see the boys come home from overseas and go into jobs where they get as little as that? How many of my Liberal friends want to see that? The next question is, what are you ready to do about it? Do you not realize that the system you are operating to-day, against which these Ford workers are striking, is the very same system that in four years will force the labour people of Canada back into that wage structure? What about it? Do you want that? What are you going to do about it?

In the year ended June 2, 1941, 28·7 per cent of the wage-earners of Canada received between $450 and $949 a year. Now, my Conservative friends, how many of you want to see your boys return from overseas and take that wage? How many of you Liberals want to see your boys take that wage? Yes, but suppose it is your boy; that is a different matter altogether. Suppose it is you, then what? How would you like to try to support a wife and three or four children on a wage like that?

These men in this Ford plant realize that those conditions actually did prevail; they actually lived through them. The members of this house sat and twiddled their idle, useless thumbs while it went on, and the Liberal government under the charge of William Lyon Mackenzie King sat there and allowed them to do it. These are extremely serious matters.

Furthermore, 29·9 per cent of all the wage-earners in Canada received in that same year between $950 and $1,949 a year. I should like to ask how many members of this house want to see the boys they raised and saw go overseas come back and take that wage? This adds up to the following impressive total: In the year ending June 2, 1941, a war year, 91·5 per cent of the wage-earners of Canada were receiving under $1,950 a year. Before we can fully appreciate the ardour and the fervour and determination with which these men in the Ford plant are waging their battle with every means at their command, we must understand the gloom of the picture which they see, and get their point of view. And when we understand it, let us get our newspaper supporters all over this country to give that picture so that everybody understands it. I have the idea that the members of this house can have considerable influence on the newspapers, especially where these members happen to be Liberals and Conservatives.

It is of the first importance that the Canadian people be informed as to the true facts which obtain in this country. Let us take a look at the case of the Ford Motor company owners. We must understand both sides. Let us see what confronts them. But before we do have a discussion on their problem, let us ask ourselves this question. Why did those wage rates prevail in Canada? Tell me, am I right when I say that those wage rates prevailed in Canada because of a foreign trade complex which exists in the minds of the Canadian people? If I am wrong I shall welcome being corrected by any Liberal or Conservative who will produce evidence to prove his point.

When we are labouring under the foreign trade complex we naturally assume, if we are employers, that wages must come down because prices must come down, because we must be able to sell our goods in competition with other producers, first of all in our own country, and second, in other countries, producing goods that will compete with our goods in foreign markets. That is argued by producers. That puts the employers, perhaps not the Ford motor people to so great an extent, but certainly the packing people and most other producers, in an almost impossible position. Their backs, too, are to the wall. Each side in this struggle finds itself with its back to the wall; each feels that it must fight to protect its very existence; each adopts whatever weapons and tactics it considers essential to success. Thus we see the struggle in Windsor to-day threatening our very national peace, order and good government, if not ultimately our very national existence.

Our C.C.F. friends will say, well, it is an evidence that private enterprise has failed. I say that is pure piffle. It is not evidence that private enterprise has failed. It is evidence that private enterprise is thoroughly alert, thoroughly familiar with the situation confronting it, and is fighting to subsist. If it is unable to make a success of the situation it is not an evidence that private enterprise is failing; it is an evidence that government policy in this country is failing; it is an evidence that we are endeavouring to make work a system which cannot possibly work.

The thing that nearly everyone in the debate thus far has condemned in the government is this attitude which I, too, condemn, namely, that the government seems to take the position that the government is merely a referee in the situation; that the government must not participate in this quarrel between these little boys; that it is not responsible in the situation. I will not say that the minister has taken the attitude that he is not responsible, but thus far his attitude has been such that he appears to take the view that somebody else must take the responsibility before he can assume his.

Now may I say this once more. The government will simply have to change its financial system or this kind of thing will go on to the ultimate utter destruction of the country. Already we can see what may happen. The government never will be able to solve the problems under the present system. When I say we must change the system, I do not mean that we must change to government ownership, and I will discuss that for a moment or two shortly. I do not want to quarrel with my C.C.F. friends, but I wish to tell them that in my judgment they are barking up the wrong tree; they are going up a blind alley. If they were to apply their policies in this country they would not succeed any better than the present system is succeeding, because they would not be putting their finger on the main cause of the trouble.

The present system distributes too little purchasing power, and it cannot do otherwise. Let us for a moment refer to the figures I used a short time ago. If enterprise, whether government or private, in this country were obliged to compete in the foreign market, certainly it would have to bring down the prices of its goods in order to go on that foreign market. What would it do? That is a matter which has to be considered very carefully. Let us look again at the figures I gave. It will be noticed that I pointed out that 91·5 per cent of all the wage-earners of Canada were receiving less than $1,950, and 32·9 per cent of them were receiving less than $450. In a country where the wage-earners are getting such meagre incomes as those, how in the world can the Ford Motor Company or Canada Packers or any other organization sell its goods? That is the first difficulty. There just is not the purchasing power going into the hands of the people to enable them to buy the goods. And if all the industries in the country were taken over by the government and run as government concerns, that fact would not necessarily change the wage structure one dollar. If the wage structure were raised, then unquestionably the prices of goods would rise and the problem of selling the goods would be accentuated and intensified. The fact that under our present system insufficient purchasing power is consistently going into the hands of the people puts private enterprise under an impossible handicap; and to blame private enterprise for inability to deal with the situation confronting us is as bad as to tie a man hand and foot, weigh him down with a hundred pound weight, and blame him because he is not able to run. Under the present financial system private enterprise has not the ghost of a chance. There must be a means of obtaining purchasing power which can be distributed among the people, which can increase the incomes of those people whose wages we have had under review.

Even if the government owned the plants the same thing would be true. I believe the average run of our C.C.F. people and a great many of the socialistically inclined people in the Liberal party, the Conservative party and elsewhere, as well as throughout the country, have in mind an idea with regard to the profits people are making that is altogether fallacious. There are big profits in some cases, yes; but any man who has ever taken over even a farm and tried to make a go of it—

An hon. MEMBER: Or a brick yard.

Mr. BLACKMORE: —yes, or a brickyard, and tried to make a go of it, or any kind of concern, knows how hard it is to make profits. As I look over my C.C.F. friends, I do not know how many of them have ever tried to do that. It is hard to make profits and easy to lose them in just a few bad years. By way of example, in a perfectly kindly way, may I suggest that for a moment we consider what would happen if the C.C.F. were in power in Canada and took over the Ford plant. I should like to ask three or four questions. Let us ask them in a perfectly straightforward way, because we must have the truth. Would they pay all the workers a living wage?

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I imagine all the members of the C.C.F. would chorus yes, as their leader has done. Would that living wage be less than $1,800 a year? I do not think any member of the C.C.F. would dare say no.

Mr. COLDWELL: I would say it could not be less.

Mr. BLACKMORE: You would not say it could be less, would you?

Mr. COLDWELL: No.

Mr. BLACKMORE: You would not consider for a moment having a wage of less than $1,800 a year?

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not think a man can live decently on less than that if he is married.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I quite agree. You see, social crediters and the C.C.F. do not disagree very much with respect to objectives; it is when we come to techniques that we disagree. Now, this is the question the C.C.F. would have to answer immediately. Where would the money come from with which to give those workers $1,800 a year? They would say, out of profits.

Mr. COLDWELL: Out of production, not out of profits.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Well, you could not possibly get it out of production without taking it out of profits.

Mr. IRVINE: Would you let me answer that question for you?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes, gladly.

Mr. IRVINE: My answer is that we would not hesitate to create just as much money as was necessary to equal the goods we were competent to produce.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am very glad to hear that answer, and I presume it meets with the approval of the leader of the party; is that right?

Mr. COLDWELL: That is right.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Then I am going to ask the C.C.F. why they have been so busy for years now trying to destroy the social credit movement in Canada, which is the one movement which has gone on record as favouring that very thing. Now let them explain that.

Mr. COLDWELL: No; you have the cart before the horse.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is a pretty weak answer.

Mr. IRVINE: Maybe we are getting together now.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If we do it is the C.C.F. who will have to do the getting together, because they are wrong. If they agree with what the hon. member for Cariboo has just said, then no member of the C.C.F. has any right whatever to oppose any social crediter in this country; he could not in honour do so, because that is precisely the attitude the social credit people have taken.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. COLDWELL: Then why did the social crediters disapprove the hon. member for Cariboo in 1935?

Mr. BLACKMORE: If I remember correctly the hon. member for Cariboo had a rather bad record when he got out to Alberta in 1935. He did most excellent work in the House of Commons; he made some speeches of which any social crediter would be proud, but when he went to Alberta later he rather spoiled it all. But we will discuss that later on; I think we have the goods on my hon. friend which will be quite sufficient if we have to use them.

If the C.C.F. favour the creation of money to equal the goods produced, that is fine. Why have they not advocated it in this house up to this time? They have never done so. Probably now they are beginning to favour that idea. I think you will find, Mr. Speaker, as the days go by in this country, that all parties, perhaps the C.C.F. first, will come to realize that the one group which was right in this matter in 1935 was the Social Credit group. They will find that the social crediters were right in their monetary views; that they were right in their price views; that they were right in their dividend views. Why, the C.C.F. even advocate a dividend of $25 a week; that was done by the hon. member who just preceded me. Other parties will find that the social crediters were right in their war ideas and in every single thing upon which they made a public pronouncement.

Mr. FAIR: And will be right in days to come.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And you will find that the members of the other groups gradually will come to that point of view. If the Canadian people could only know that this would happen quickly enough to save us from disasters which threaten, such as the Ford dispute, then the people could breathe a sigh of relief.

There just is no possible way of solving this problem except the way I suggest. I ask this: Where would the money come from? If the C.C.F. would use the method that the social crediters suggest, use the price system they suggest, use the wage system they suggest and use the dividend system they suggest; in other words, if the C.C.F. would become social crediters, they would solve the problem. And they would find that if they did that they would not need to own the plants. All they would have to do with the Ford Motor Company is this—and I hope the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) will not make any silly mistakes because he has made many in this House of Commons. He had better not laugh a foolish laugh until he realizes that if the Ford Motor Company knew its prices would be guaranteed by social credit technique: if it knew positively that its workers would be guaranteed their incomes by social credit technique, and if the workers knew that their incomes would be guaranteed by that technique, and that markets for their goods would be guaranteed by that same social credit technique, they would end the strike to-night. There would be no further argument at all. There would be no need for any government to take over the plant.

Where could one find an organization more efficient in the building of motor cars than is the Ford Motor Company? For what do hon. members suppose the company is operating its plant? Is it just for fun? Does anyone imagine for a split second they would not sell their goods, all the goods they can possibly manage to make, if they could sell them at remunerative prices? To imagine that is to accuse them of being stupid—and they are not stupid, or they would not be where they are. It would not be necessary to have the government take over the plant. All you have to do is to guarantee wages and prices, and put purchasing power into the hands of the people so that they may buy. Do that, and the trouble will clear up immediately.

Mr. LESAGE: And in six months they like to buy more—and it will start all over again.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If the hon. member will come to my office I will talk to him. Obviously I cannot conduct him through a full course in economics right here on the floor of the house. But if he will come to my office—

Mr. LESAGE: I will.

Mr. BLACKMORE: —I will answer his questions so that he will not be able to say a word.

Mr. LESAGE: Is it a challenge?

Mr. BLACKMORE: In fact, I will offer him this challenge: If he will bring five of his friends who are not prejudiced one way or another and set them down in my office, I will undertake to answer every one of his questions so fully that his five friends will declare they are answered. There can be no question about it at all.

Mr. LESAGE: I take the challenge.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am not afraid of it, because I have done it before.

Under the C.C.F., or under any socialistic technique through which we would have government ownership, where would a plant sell its goods? How would it sell those goods on the world markets? One can readily understand how it could sell its goods on the world markets if the government were prepared to use a social credit technique, that of subsidizing exports where necessary to sell exports abroad. I can understand that. Under that system I could see where they would sell their goods abroad. I believe the Ford Motor Company could do it, as a private organization. But may I hasten to say that social credit would not bother subsidizing goods to be sold abroad in competition with goods from factories within a given nation. That is, we would not undertake to force our goods into the world markets. If a nation wanted our goods, well and good. But if it were a matter of putting our goods into the hands of another nation to displace its industry, we would be against it. I thought it was necessary to say that, because some people might misunderstand.

I believe I have said enough at this time. Hon. members in this group are entirely in sympathy with the struggle being made by the Ford Motor Company employees. We realize they are doing things which they feel they would not like to do but which the government, because of the attitude it has taken, is forcing them to do. And the Ford plant is taking measures it is not justified in taking. Once more, by persisting in the present financial system, the government is forcing them into that position.

All I would say is simply this: Let the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), get permission from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), who seems to be the one who runs the whole show, to go to the Ford plant and say to them, Look here, gentlemen; this problem must be solved, and it must be solved right away. I am not going to suggest to him the measures he should take. But I will say that it can be done, and I will say further that it must be done, if Canada's economic and social structure is to be preserved. If the minister cannot solve it under the present system, then I urge upon him that with all possible speed he adopt a system under which he can solve it.

When I read the figures I have in my hand possibly some hon. members will wonder just to what extent they are in accordance with those supplied by the bureau of statistics. For those who wish to have the information authentically may I read this letter dated

September 25, 1945, from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, and addressed to me in the following words:

Further to our telephone conversation of this morning regarding the percentage of wage-earners receiving various amounts of income.

The percentage of wage-earners earning less than $450 for the 12 months' period prior to the date of the census, June 2, 1941, was 32·9 per cent. 28·7 per cent of the wage-earners reported earnings between $450 and $949; 29·9 per cent earned between $950 and $1,949 and 6·8 per cent earned $1,950 and over. 1·7 per cent of the wage-earners did not state the amount of earnings for the year.

For your information I am enclosing herewith census bulletins showing the earnings of wage-earners by occupation and the earnings and employment of wage-earners for the various census divisions or counties as well as a number of urban centres in Canada. The above statistics are taken from these bulletins.

Yours very truly,
J. L. Forsyth,
Statistician.

So that hon. members may see these bulletins, I am holding them up in my hand. I think this will serve as a basis upon which to do our future thinking.

We shall have more discussion along these lines by and by.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

AGE AND INCOME REQUIREMENTS—PROPOSED INCREASE IN AMOUNTS PAYABLE

The house resumed from Wednesday, October 3, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacInnis:

That, in the opinion of this house, the time has arrived when consideration should be given to amending the Old Age Pension Act by lowering the pensionable age to sixty years, by increasing the amount of the pension so as to enable the recipients to live in health and self-respect, and by deleting the income requirements for eligibility.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to-night to speak to this resolution, but my colleague who was to resume the debate to-night has been unavoidably detained and so I am going to say a few words in support of the resolution pending his arrival.

The resolution speaks for itself. The time has come when in the interests not only of humanity but of our whole economic structure the old age pension should be raised so that people who have approached the eventide of life may be able to live in comfort and decency. I do not think anyone in this house will contend to-day that an old age pension of $30 a month even at the age of seventy is sufficient in the kind of economy in which we are living. From time to time figures are produced by the bureau of statistics to show that more than twice that amount is required to meet the bare necessities of living in this country; and to expect our people to live at a rate of $30 a month or $1 a day is, I think, altogether wrong at this time. We have just concluded a great war, and our industrial equipment is now many times as large as it was before the war. We are now engaged in reconverting war industry to peace-time needs. Hence it is right not only to maintain but to extend the purchasing power of the people in order that they may buy the goods which can be manufactured with our largely improved machinery and skills.

This afternoon we were discussing, for example, the rates of wages that should be paid in industry. One could discuss in the same vein the prices which must be paid for agricultural products in order that the producer might have his purchasing power largely increased. And now here in the old age pensioners we have a group of citizens getting on in years who should be retiring at sixty and enjoying the rest of their days, but who are now at seventy kept at a level far below that of a decent subsistence. Hence we believe that every consideration should be given by the government to this resolution.

There should be no means test. The means test can be readily eliminated, and if the pension is paid to all those who attain a certain age, then through our income tax structure the amount in excess of what is needed to maintain the standard of living to which the individual has been more or less used can be withdrawn by taxation as not being required to maintain the standards to which I have referred.

We therefore believe that the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) in moving this resolution has placed before the house something which deserves the support of every member on all sides of this chamber. I do not intend to say more except that I am, of course, in thorough accord with the resolution, which I hope will be recommended to the government for its consideration and early action.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, before I proceed with my remarks on the resolution, I wish first of all to compliment you, as I did when you received your appointment, upon your elevation to the Speakership of the House of Commons. In extending my congratulations to you in my letter I stated that I fully realized you were thoroughly qualified to hold the position. Also I told you that I was hoping that I might get the position myself. This was an absolutely legitimate hope, I think in view of my experience as Deputy Speaker and as one of the old-time members of the House of Commons. I am now, I believe, the senior Liberal member for the province of Ontario, and, like you, I myself have come up the hard way fighting every inch of the way to make my mark in the section of Ontario where I went as a pioneer nearly forty-five years ago. It was a hard thing to see the prize escape my grasp. However, we must take these things in our stride. I know that the position of Speaker is in absolutely capable and responsible hands, and I am sure that you will enjoy the cooperation of every section of the House of Commons, just as I did in the two years that I was Deputy Speaker of the house.

I should like to take this first opportunity I have had of speaking to this body and thanking every member of the House of Commons from 1943 to the last general election for the wonderful cooperation that I received from every hon. member.

It is not necessary for me to say that I am in agreement with the resolution which has been brought forward by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). It must strike particularly the new members of parliament when they see what we call private members' day function in this House of Commons. It is practically the only opportunity open to every private member during the session to give expression to his sentiments and to bring forcefully before the house the matters in which he and his constituents are interested. I vividly recollect when I was first elected member of the House of Commons. I sat in the farther corner of the house and for three or four days I listened to the debate on the speech from the throne and was puzzling why there was so much deliberation. At first it seemed futile. But after a few days it dawned upon me that I was hearing the voice of the maritimes, the voice of central Canada, Quebec and Ontario, the voice of the prairie provinces and of British Columbia. Here I heard discussed all the problems of every part of Canada, and I should like to say to the premiers of the different provinces in the Canadian confederation: Do not worry too much over provincial prerogatives and initiative because every federal member of the House of Commons is primarily a municipalist, then a provincialist, and then a federalist. So that there are all the necessary safeguards so far as provincial government activities and autonomy are concerned.

No one has ever doubted the sincerity of the mover of the resolution now before us. I for one during my first years of association with the hon. member for Vancouver East in parliament and in committees was inclined to be a little impatient with him. Of course, I shall never be a socialist. But after I had had an opportunity of sitting with the hon. member for Vancouver East and listening to him from time to time I was convinced of his sincerity of purpose, just as I was when he made his presentation the other day in moving this resolution.

If the Chair wanted to rigidly follow the rules of the house the resolution might have been held to be out of order, because the subject of old age pensions is on the agenda of the next dominion-provincial conference. However, I believe it was a fine thing to allow the discussion of old age pensions by every section of the house. The hon. member, in speaking of finance, said he did not know very much about it, and I believe he remarked that he was not well informed on problems of money. But he said also, in the statistics he gave the house, that to implement the scheme contemplated in his resolution would mean the expenditure of $800 million. That is interesting, for the party to which he belongs is definitely opposed to either inflation or deflation. They will never allow anything which in their opinion would inflate or deflate the earnings of the workers and farmers of this country. When I make that statement I have in mind a resolution which I believe was brought forward a year or two ago by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright), who was worrying about what would happen to the bonds belonging to the Canadian people, fearing that they might lose some of their value. We had a good discussion. I know that as far as the house was concerned there was no demagogy about it.

But I could go farther on the same lines if I wanted to. To this resolution I could present an amendment asking, for instance, that old age pensions be paid to people at fifty or fifty-five years of age, and that they should receive $75 or $100 a month. But we must remain within the limits of realism. After all, here we are in the federal forum looking after the affairs of this country, and this should be done in a national way. I believe that without exception every hon. member is progressive-minded. We fully realize that the days of the common man have been ushered in, and that there will be no retreat. The New Deal spirit must carry on. It is absolutely impossible to reverse our direction, and nobody would want it. At the same time in our discussions we must keep away from demagogy, for eventually the people will analyse and pass judgment upon our actions.

As I have said, it would be easy for me this evening to go much farther than the hon. member for Vancouver East, but I do not belive it would be fair to my constituents, to parliament, or to the country. Let me refer to one statement he made which I do not fully understand. In quoting statistics of persons of certain age groups he said that there were 610,000 employed, the remainder being nearly 700,000, and he created the impression that these latter were unemployed. I well remember a few years ago that an hon. member, when speaking on a matter of that kind, made the statement, relating to one phase of modern life, that every farmer should have at least two wives. As far as I was concerned as a single man, I was highly scandalized, but when I came to analyse his statement I thought there was some realism about it. In any event, to my mind the hon. member for Vancouver East created the impression that nearly 700,000 of these people were unemployed. It occurs to me that probably these people, or most of them, were unemployable. They may have been housewives or engaged in some similar occupation. Therefore the statistics he gave did not entirely convince me. When we discuss matters of this kind we must see the whole picture; we must survey the entire social programme of parliament; otherwise our judgments may be unfair. It is very easy, for instance, to single out and emphasize one item. Take health insurance: the implementing of that reform must be considered in relation to other reforms; you cannot single out one and leave the others out of account. Therefore I say that I have been pleased at the nature of the deliberation which has taken place so far upon this matter. We cannot afford to be backward; we are now going forward. I was greatly pleased at the fine cooperation which was shown last summer at the dominion-provincial conference between the federal administration and the premiers of the nine provinces. There were no "poor relations" there; we were all Canadians; all seemed to be equal. I hope as an Ontarian that the premier of the banner province will find it possible to maintain the same constructive attitude all the way through. The same should apply to Quebec and British Columbia, and, indeed, to all the provinces. They are in the same position as far as this country nationally is concerned as Canada is in the international sphere. If people are suffering in Europe, if there is a depressed Asia, one feels no sense of security. The same applies to Canada; if some sections of this country are prosperous while others are depressed we shall not have unity and prosperity. I must give the highest praise to the premier of every province for the fine spirit of cooperation which was shown last summer when they met in Ottawa to discuss dominion-provincial questions. I hope most sincerely that that spirit will be maintained one hundred per cent. We come from different provinces, but there is one great unifying power, which is Canada, our only country.

I wish to touch briefly on pensions and insurance, and I should like the house to make a clear distinction between the two. As far as I am concerned I shall always be in favour of pensions for the blind, the invalids, the infirm, and the veterans. On the other hand there are those who in my opinion are not entitled to pensions. During the last election I told the people of my constituency that I was in favour of a scheme of old age insurance whereby a person who reached the age of nineteen or twenty-one should pay a nominal sum per month—for example, eight or ten or twelve cents—and that he would receive at the age of sixty or sixty-five the sum of $50 a month. I believe that is the best approach as far as old age pension is concerned. I do not believe in hand-outs to people who are able to look after themselves. Under the present system I have seen many injustices. How glad I was when I heard that under the new scheme, which I believe will be accepted by all the provinces, because it will be paid for out of the federal treasury, the sum of $30 a month will be paid without a means test. That, in my opinion, is a step in the right direction. I have never favoured the means test, because I believe it created many injustices to people who had a small nest-egg.

It is often contended at the present time that the government should be the mother and father and protector of the Canadian people. I still believe in individualism. I still think people should try to work for themselves. I repeat that for the moment there is no better scheme than the old age pension, but I hope the day is not far distant when there will be inaugurated a fine scheme of old age insurance. The thing is possible. We are going to adopt health insurance, and I know of no person in Canada who expects to receive health benefits without paying a certain amount for them.

After all, the government cannot accomplish miracles. I should not like to be in the position of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) at the present time. He is in a different position from that of the hon. member for Vancouver East, who in speaking on his resolution said he was not worried because the cost of old age pensions under his scheme would be $800 million. While sitting as chairman of a committee of the house, I tabulated the requests made one evening on the different government departments, and they made a total of $2,300 million—in one night alone! It is easy to make demands on governments, but one must cut his sail according to his cloth. We all sympathize with the Minister of Finance, for we know that, although he would like to implement all the logical requests which are made to the treasury, it is absolutely impossible for him to do so.

I do not believe in decrying my own country, nor do I think it behooves any member of parliament to speak in large terms of other countries and to suggest that they are better off than we are. We shall always have problems to solve but they can be solved and we should not be ashamed of our country. Far from it, we should be proud of our achievements not only during the war but in peace time. We must look forward, and our actions should be guided in one direction, namely, to work for the common man, to see that no one suffers and that everyone is given a chance to make a full, prosperous and comfortable living.

We have been forward-looking in all our legislation. Take the old province of Ontario, for example. In this province we have the mothers' allowance, which was a progressive piece of legislation, whereby a maximum of $80 a month has been paid to widowed mothers; and now we have family allowances. No one will say that this legislation is beyond criticism. I will not say to-night that the family allowance provisions are absolutely perfect, but the measure has certainly been a marvellous thing for our people. I can assure you, sir, that many people in my section of the country, farmers, settlers who have worked hard all summer trying to put in a crop under difficult climatic conditions, have found the family allowance a blessing. It will enable them to remain the year round on their farms, so that they can look after their stock. I believe it has been a blessing.

I have made a special study of the manner in which the family allowance has been handled and the distribution of the money, and I can say that out of 100 cases I do not know of a single instance in which the parents, mother or father, will fail to husband every last dollar of that money. And for what purpose? To provide better food and clothing and in many cases better education for their children. On that score alone, I believe that this parliament, which was unanimous in the passing of that great social reform, should be complimented.

I repeat, a great deal of credit should be given the hon. member for Vancouver East for introducing this resolution, and those hon. members who have spoken on the subject also deserve our congratulations. At the same time, we must remain realistic. When I say that, I have in mind what has taken place in other countries, and let me say here that I do not intend to digress into a discussion of the political situation anywhere else. But during the election in Great Britain I received the London Times and there I read that the parties in opposition were making great promises. I am not worrying, of course, but I know the promises then made by one party in opposition, to-day the Socialist government, will not be implemented. They will not be able to carry out all the things they promised the British people. Only a few days ago they intimated that the coal situation will be no better than it was a year ago.

In other words, the moment you are harnessed with the responsibility of government you find what a sobering effect that responsibility has. I have been told by some gentlemen, married friends of mine, that before they got married they made fine promises to their brides-to-be. They were going to provide a grand piano, a fine house, a fine car, and so on. But the moment they got married they discovered that it could not be done because they had not the means. The same applies to governments. Governments would like to comply with the various requests that are made of them, but that is absolutely impossible.

Even to-day, now that we have peace, we shall have a budget of $4 billion, which will be raised in this way: $2,500 million by way of taxation and $1,500 million through borrowing. No matter what we say about gearing our financial structure to take care of our peace requirements as we did for war purposes, it will not be possible. However, I have never taken a disproportionate view of the so-called depression and I am puzzled sometimes by the socialist party when they bring up that topic. They had no infallible remedy for the depression from 1930 to 1939. They had no formula by which to bring about better conditions. The then Prime Minister of Canada may have made mistakes, but he tried to do his best. But what was the spectacle we saw in the great republic to the south of us? Could they solve the depression there? Could the people in Europe solve the depression over there? No, because all the great nations were caught in it. However, we have learned some lessons, and for my part I will never tolerate a depression of the same depth and breadth as that which we had twelve years ago. I do not think it is fair for the socialist party on every single occasion to talk about the depression. One would think it was their wish that we should have another depression. Experience has shown, and the progressiveness of parliament gives us some reassurance in this regard, that we shall never have another depression such as we had before. It is unthinkable that we should have had a bath of blood, so to speak, slaughter for the last six years throughout the world, only to end in that way.

Personally, I think it is my duty as a member of parliament to go to my people and tell them to sacrifice in a matter of meat rationing, to make other sacrifices, short of bloodshed, comparable with those which they made during the war, so that we may be able to solve the problems of peace. But I will not make any appeal to their passions.

This afternoon I listened attentively to the debate and I thought it was on a high level. No one can doubt the sincerity of the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) when he speaks on labour matters. At the same time I believe that every other member of parliament has at heart as much as he has, the welfare of our workers and of our farmers as well. The same remarks apply to the question now before the house.

Before concluding, may I express the hope that when the premiers of the different provinces come here again they will be imbued with the same spirit of unity, the same spirit of Canadianism that animated them this summer. Old age pensions must be discussed again and the legislation perhaps amended. Perhaps the monthly payment should be higher. At the same time we must be practical and logical. I fervently hope that health insurance will be implemented in every section of Canada because we are all united on that question. I hope also that the deputations, every time they speak, will think of the country as a whole and not of their own individual interests. If they do, it will be all the easier for me to inspire my own people. I could go to the people in the lumbering section of my constituency and say, "You do not have enough butter or sufficient sugar or meat". but it is not my duty to do so and I do not believe that other hon. members wish to do that.

I hope that Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia, the provinces which are supposed to be more privileged than the others by reason of geographical, industrial and financial considerations, will think of the country as a whole and not merely of their own particular localities. Although I am a Liberal I wish to pay tribute to Mr. George Drew, Premier of Ontario, for the fine spirit he showed at the conference, and also to Mr. Duplessis. I am not talking politics; I am speaking as a Canadian, and he realized that the whole is greater than any of its parts. He realized that we must work in unison if we are to reach our goal of nationhood and prosperity and comfort for every citizen of Canada.

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre): I say at the outset that I have a feeling of much sadness for my hon. friend (Mr. Bradette) who has just concluded such a fine speech. I had not known until to-night that it was anything more than just ordinary bad luck that had caused him to remain single. I now understand from what he has said that the real fact is that he did not get married because of his own intellectual honesty; he could not bring himself to make those vast pre-marital promises which resulted in success for nearly all of the hon. members of this house. I should like to say to him that even yet he may succeed, and he need not be concerned about such promises, because, as every married man comes to find out, he does not really become successful by those lies that he tells. He finds out, after somewhere between two, ten or maybe fifteen years, that he was not believed anyway. Underneath her breath the lady is probably always saying, you are lying, I know, but it is pleasant. No real attention is paid to the lies; therefore, if the hon. gentleman still desires to get married he can just let himself go and make any promise he likes; it will not be held against him at all.

In speaking on this subject, Mr. Speaker, for just a few minutes may I say that there are two or three remarks which have been made in the course of this debate and in similar debates to which I should like to address myself. People say, what we can do in wartime, we can do in peace time. That is unquestionably true. I could never understand why there had to be so much emphasis put upon that statement as though there were some chance of argument in it, as though it were not self-evident. It seems to me it is self-evident that what you can do in war time you can do in peace time. It does, however, require certain conditions to be the same; it requires a psychological condition to be the same as in war time; it requires the very general agreement in the country that you have under the urge of patriotism.

One then has to examine just how it is that certain things have been done in war time, and just what will be necessary to be done in peace time in order to carry on in substantially the same way, that is, in the way of raising and spending money. If we disregard, for example, the method of producing money by printing it or by some other such means and decide that we are talking about the raising of money for the payment of social services in the same way we have hitherto done, then all that is necessary in order to pay the bill which is asked for in the resolution is to continue the same level of taxation that we have now, the same regimentation that we have now, and all that sort of thing.

Substantially what happened in 1939 and the years afterwards is something like this. In 1939 the Minister of Finance, speaking for the Canadian people, said, We will arrange that all people in the country who are working will work a little less for themselves, out of every hour's earnings a certain part will be used for the purpose of being handed to the Minister of Defence and the Minister of Munitions; they will take it and give it to other people who will do certain things to earn it. I recall that the first sum of money about which the Minister of Finance talked in that way was $100 million. It was not very long before it was also arranged that in addition to any contribution made by the people of Canada in that manner they would dig under their mattresses and would find money, purchasing power as it is sometimes called, and they would hand that over to the Minister of Finance in order that he might, in turn, pass it on to the other spending ministers, to be used by them in the manner that I have indicated. It was not very long after that before the Minister of Finance, in the name of the Canadian people, made a similar request, the only difference being that the second or third time he spoke he was not talking about any dribs and drabs and jots and tittles like $100 million; he went far beyond that. By this time it was not the case that a person had to work about one-twenty-fifth of his time for the purpose of supplying spending money to the Minister of Munitions and the defence ministers; it had reached the point in the case of the wealthy people where the contribution was half-time at least, and in the case of the less wealthy a somewhat lower proportion, but in the case of all a very considerable percentage of their time was to be devoted to raising the wherewithal for the spending ministers of the government to spend in the name of the Canadian people.

Substantially that is the way the money has been obtained. There is no question about that. There is no magic about it. It just meant that kind of hard work for all of the Canadian people; therefore, it is absolutely correct to say that what has been done in war time can be done in peace time, granted the will to do it. But you must have among the Canadian people an equal willingness to do this that you had under the urge of patriotism in war.

The hon. member who has just taken his seat spoke two or three times about the need of being realistic. Surely, Mr. Speaker, if we ask ourselves whether the Canadian people, any section of them, will be willing to continue to work that amount of time for the purpose of supplying spending money to the ministers of this government who will be charged with the distribution of such moneys as are dealt with in this resolution, we are bound to come to a negative answer. All across the country and in all classes of society at the present time there is a demand for the lowering of taxation. I do not know what the Minister of Finance is going to do on Friday, but it is perfectly certain we can say now, that large sections of the public will not be satisfied with the reductions in taxation which he will make. That dissatisfaction we shall find in the farming community; we shall find it in the section of the public which is made up of what we commonly call the white-collar workers; we shall find it among those to whom we sometimes refer as manual workers; we shall find it among those who are well to do, and we shall find it in the wealthy classes. There is no doubt in the world that the public of Canada will not continue to pay the taxation that they have been paying.

Such being the case, is it being realistic; is it cutting the coat according to the cloth when demands amounting to something between $700,000,000 and $850,000,000 are made in a resolution of this kind? I do not know the right figure; sometimes I have heard $700,000,000 and sometimes $850,000,000, but when one gets into figures as nearly astronomical as those probably it does not make any difference. In order to demonstrate that people will not continue to pay these taxes, no matter if the taxes are imposed, it is only necessary to look at what has already happened. Many men will not go to work on Saturday mornings because it does not pay them. Plenty of my friends have told me they do not see any sense in going to work on Saturday morning because they get such a very small amount of money for it. I have known men in the professional class who have refused certain commissions which were brought to them because their fee would be hardly worth while, since they were in an income bracket in which too large a percentage went, as they would say, to Mr. Ilsley. That sort of thing, to defeat taxation, grows apace once it gets started; and if people will do that, certainly they will much more easily defeat the loans which will be necessary for some time in order to carry on the business of the country. Apparently we have made up our minds that we shall carry on what is called deficit financing for a certain length of time; I do not know how long. We shall be raising considerable sums of money by taxation and endeavouring to raise further considerable sums by loans. Well, if people will not continue to pay taxes, much more strongly can it be asserted that they will not contribute to loans to keep up expenditures unless these expenditures are favourably viewed by one hundred per cent of the people, and there is nothing like that unanimity behind a proposition such as this. In the prosecution of a war which we could all say was indeed a war for liberty and, as the Prime Minister so frequently remarked, a crusade of righteousness, you could get unanimity, but that is not the case with a social measure of this kind. To go farther than the people of the country would desire at any given time is only to endanger other things.

Mr. BURTON: If the hon. gentleman will permit a question, is he of opinion that any great number of people in Canada would oppose giving the aged people a pension such as that suggested in the resolution?

Mr. MAYBANK: Unfortunately I did not get all the question, but I think I have the sense of it. I believe my hon. friend asked if I was of opinion that any considerable number of people would oppose giving a larger pension and giving it to people at the age of sixty without any means test, as set forth in the resolution. Oh, yes, I am very strongly of that opinion. I have had many letters from people saying, "I am sixty years of age, Maybank, and by gad I don't need any pension; I don't think it is necessary yet." I have had that told me by a good many people, and I have had a great number of people write and say that unless taxes were reduced there just would not be any government in this country at all. I wonder that some of the writers who are penning these letters to me do not burn the paper with their words. I could not think of reading their letters in this house, because I am quite sure I should be ruled out for using blasphemous language. That is my opinion, at any rate; of course if I am wrong about that there is a way of finding out.

My remarks come down to this. At the present time I do not think this is a feasible proposition in the light of the present taxation; in the light of the attitude of most of the people in reference to taxation; in the light of the fact that a large social welfare programme is already envisaged which will involve the expenditure of a large sum of money, and in view of the fact that this proposal is non-contributory. That last remark leads me to say this. I am very much in favour of any kind of scheme that will be contributory. There are some features of the proposals which have been brought before the dominion-provincial conference which I do not like. The outstanding improvement that has been suggested is the payment to everybody after the age of seventy, although I think that age is too great, and the payment of the pension from sixty-five to seventy years on somewhat the present basis. The matter of divided responsibility is a feature I do not like, but I feel that no person can deny that the present proposal of the government is an improvement over the existing practice. At the same time I do not like it as well as I would like some plan purely contributory in nature, something to which my honourable friend who preceded me referred as insurance. It seems to me that old age pension payments constitute the type of social law that lends itself particularly and peculiarly to the insurance principle. I think it would be very much better, even at the present stage of the dominion-provincial conference, if everything could be dropped in favour of a straight insurance proposition. I know there are difficulties in the way. I know, for example, that already some people are under insurance schemes, such as civil servants and people who work on railroads and in a large number of industries. Even so, I believe it would be better to treat this particular branch of our social welfare legislation in a different way and put it under a straight insurance principle, make it an insurance scheme.

Some years ago I read in the Labour Gazette that at that time four per cent of our people were over seventy years of age, and of those four per cent, fifty per cent received the old age pension, which was $240 a year at that time. Just playing with the idea of insurance, I made some mental calculations. Upon the presumption, which would not hold good at all times, that money would yield five per cent interest, I soon realized that the payment of $1 by a child the minute after it was born, if that could be done, would actually provide for its old age pension. I will tell honourable members how it worked out. At five per cent, in fourteen years that $1 would become $2. In another fourteen years it would become $4. By the time that child reached the age of seventy the $1 would become $32. From what I already said we see that one hundred people would pay into the fund. That is $3,200. Of that number, two people would draw pension, and a fund of $1,600 is more than enough for the average old age pension of $240 after the age of seventy.

I mention that only to illustrate what can be done. I do not claim complete accuracy in that example, but I mention it for this reason. It shows what can be done under a contributory scheme, as against this other type of old age pension.

Hon. members from the other side of the house have said that what I am really doing is simply taking up time, and their suggestion is that I am talking the case out. I wish to deny as sharply and as emphatically as I can any such allegation. Those hon. members who speak in that way remind me very much of an old deaf and dumb gentleman who was a cooper, and whom I knew at one time. This gentleman used to have arguments and, as mutes must, he expressed himself with his fingers. After he had spoken, if I may use that word, he turned his head away which was the only way he could prevent anyone else from saying anything. He feared an answer.

That, of course, is typical of those hon. members. They do not want anybody else to have a word on any subject which, they think, is their own. Well, of course, such people cannot stop a man from talking quite as easily as the mute could, although I imagine if they wished to they could.

However, there is one thing that cannot be done by the C.C.F. party.

Mr. COLDWELL: One thing?

Mr. MAYBANK: Just one, at the moment, although there are many; they cannot come to the House of Commons and bring along their silencing storm-troopers. They might as well learn that now as at any other time. When any hon. member—and I do not care on which side he sits—undertakes to practice upon me any unfairness in connection with a speech I make he will find out, when he is finished, that it would have been just as well for him not to have started it because, to hold strictly to parliamentary language, it will not be efficacious.

Some have spoken in opposition to the means test. In my opinion it has always been objectionable. I had a good deal to do with it in those days when, because of the circumstances of the post I held, I was forced to administer relief. It is just about as disheartening an experience as anyone can have thrust upon him. Yet we have to admit that in every country where there is an old age pension system, and where it is not contributory, there is a means test.

Again, being realistic, I do not believe it will ever for long be wiped out, while old age pensions are paid out of general taxation. This is another reason, in my opinion, for old age pensions being placed on an insurance principle, and not coming out of general taxation, because, depend upon it, whether you like it or not the time will come, every once in a while, when either the means test will be placed upon people who are receiving from taxation, or the circumstances of payment will be changed, or something of that sort will be done.

I suppose it would be right to say that any such remark as that is made in sadness. But that is the truth of the matter, and those are the facts of human nature. Just as long as pensions are paid out of taxation there will be problems of that sort. And the only way to have pensions paid is, as a matter of right, resulting from insurance. As a matter of fact, the means test in this country is more severe than it is in New Zealand; at least I would think so, from my reading of the law. I realize, of course, that one can never tell for certain, until he actually gets down to administration. But those hon. members who extol New Zealand—it being the most distant country in the world, and therefore the greenest—should remember that down there they first exact an insurance premium from the citizen, and following that they give him the means test. They do both.

But we never hear hon. members say that. First of all, in New Zealand they exact a certain sum of money by way of insurance, part of which goes to old age pensions; and then they pay the old age pension only according to the means test. It is a somewhat more generous means test than the one in this country, but at least it does not come anywhere near giving a free pension to all.

Mr. IRVINE: May I ask a question? Would the hon. member kindly point to that section of the resolution which would preclude the use of a contributory system?

Mr. MAYBANK: The hon. member is quite right, and I thank him for his question, because it leads me to say that this resolution does not preclude the idea of a contributory system. But there is a general principle which most people follow in rhetoric, in logic and, indeed, in law, namely, that when something is not included in the words spoken it is generally thought to have been excluded. Everybody knows that. But, mind you, Mr. Speaker, that must not be taken as final and definite. Evidently the hon. member thinks that from the wording of the resolution a contributory system could be meant. Well, if that is what is meant, then of course I can only say that the mover of the resolution and those various persons who have spoken 100 per cent in favour of it might have been a little more clear. If they had, it would have put the debate on an entirely different plane. Of course there would not be any means test if you were first paying for it. The reference in the resolution to relinquishing means test is in the words which seem to me to preclude any idea of contribution. It would not have occurred to me—perhaps I am just a little dumb—that a person would propound a resolution which would be condemnatory of the means test when, all the time, he had in his mind that a contribution not referred to in the resolution would first be exacted from the beneficiary of the scheme.

I have given the hon. member that much explanation of the reason why I have spoken as though there were to be no contribution. However, that is about as far as I can go at the present time, because I see my time has expired.

SUPPLY

LABOUR CONDITIONS—STRIKE AT FORD MOTOR PLANT, WINDSOR

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Ilsley for committee of supply.

Mr. IRVINE: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I was about to ask the hon. member who then occupied the floor, the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) a question. My question is this: During the course of his speech he made a remark to the effect that I had done very well here, but when I went back to Alberta I had done something more or less terrible, which ruled me out. It seems to me that what the hon. member said cast reflection upon my character. I would now ask him if that was what he intended.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Speaker, I should like to read the words I used with respect to the hon. member, and then make such explanation as will make it clear that there is no reflection upon his personal character. The words were:

> If I remember correctly the hon. member for Cariboo had a rather bad record when he got out to Alberta in 1935. He did most excellent work in the House of Commons; he made some speeches of which any social crediter would be proud, but then when he went to Alberta later he rather spoiled it all. But we will discuss that later on; I think we have the goods on my hon. friend which will be quite sufficient if we have to use them.

I can readily see, Mr. Speaker, that without knowing the background which caused me to use those words, any person casually reading the record would form a wrong opinion of the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine). Therefore it is only fitting that I should offer an explanation that will set the whole matter in its right light.

May I point out that the hon. member for Cariboo—and he will correct me if my memory is in any way at fault—was part of the Ginger group elected in 1921 by Alberta as representatives of the United Farmers of Alberta movement.

Mr. IRVINE: That is correct.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Secondly, he continued as the United Farmers of Alberta representative right down to 1935. That is, he was always U.F.A.

Mr. IRVINE: That is correct.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It might be argued that they ceased to be U.F.A. members and became identified with Mr. Woodsworth in the C.C.F. organization, but I hardly think that is correct.

Mr. IRVINE: Yes, that is true. That was endorsed by the annual convention of the U.F.A.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That automatically made the hon. member a C.C.F. member. That is a matter which has quite an important bearing on what happened in Alberta afterwards. Meanwhile Mr. Aberhart—this is rather old history to some—had been working steadily for about two and a half years popularizing and explaining social credit to the people of Alberta, as a result of all of which the people of Alberta formed what is known as the Alberta Social Credit League. Mr.

Aberhart, after the league had become very strong, offered the Liberals an opportunity of expousing the cause of social credit and they refused to accept it. Then he offered it to the United Farmers of Alberta in convention assembled, and they rejected it. Now, so far as I recall, the hon. member for Cariboo, who was present at that convention, if I recall aright, did not disassociate himself from the U.F.A. convention when it refused to accept social credit.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I ask Your Honour if this is a question of urgent national importance?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I was not able to catch what my hon. friend said. I think it will be seen to be quite clear under these circumstances that that put the hon. member for Cariboo in a very uncertain light with respect to the social credit movement in Alberta. It is quite obvious that the social credit league would not know just exactly where the hon. member stood.

On April 2, 1935, in the House of Commons the hon. member for Cariboo moved an amendment to the budget amendment, and the following words appear in Hansard as identified with the hon. member:

> That the amendment be amended by striking out all the words after the word "Canada" and adding thereto the following:
> "and would appear to be based upon the assumption that poverty and debt are inevitable conditions within the country; > and whereas the real and potential wealth of the nation, based upon our natural resources and our capacity to produce, is such as to make possible an abundant provision for all the requirements of our people;
> Therefore, this house is of the opinion that the government should take immediate action to insure the fullest and most equitable distribution possible of our socially-created wealth and that, as a first step in this direction, the measures which may be necessary to meet the pressing needs of the farmers and the unemployed should be financed by the social credit of Canada, thus avoiding a further increase in the debt burden of the country."

He went on to say:

> I submit at the outset that that remedy is one which will very soon have to be accepted not only by this government but by all governments in the world. I make that prediction—

Mr. MITCHELL: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, our friend of the C.C.F. party moved an amendment on going into supply to discuss a matter of urgent national importance. I do not think a private disagreement between the hon. member for Cariboo and the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) stands above the dispute at the Ford Motor Company plant. The private dispute between the two hon. members can be aired when we have more leisure. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that we get on with the business of the house and discuss the question of urgent national importance which has been raised, namely, the strike at Windsor. I submit that that should take precedence.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The minister has just delayed the house one and a half minutes by his interruption. I would have finished in another fifty words. If I can conclude the quotation it will save the hon. member for Cariboo from rising on a question of privilege to-morrow, which he would have a perfect right to do if I did not put this matter right. He went on to say:

> I make that prediction because in my opinion there is only one alternative to that, and that is to witness the complete collapse of civilization itself.

Now, Mr. Speaker, bearing in mind that the hon. member had supported social credit in the house and then took a stand at the U.F.A. convention refusing to accept social credit, the social credit league could hardly be expected to accept him as a candidate at the election.

An hon. MEMBER: So what!

Mr. P. E. WRIGHT (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, it is not very often that I rise in the house to take part in a labour dispute. I represent, as most hon. members know, an agricultural constituency. But I believe that this particular strike is of vital importance not only to the locality in which it is taking place but to the whole of our Canadian economy.

The strikers at Windsor, as has been said to-day, are coming out fighting for a certain principle, and that principle is that their take-home pay shall not be reduced during the period following this war. The farmers in my part of the country regard this strike as their first line of defence. They are vitally interested in seeing that the take-home pay of the workers in the Ford plant is maintained because they have had a demonstration in this war of what it means to agriculture to have spending power in the hands of the workers of Canada, and any attempt by this government or by private enterprise in Canada to reduce the wages of the worker would have a repercussion on agriculture generally throughout the country. Agriculture recognizes that if the take-home pay of the worker is reduced, it will mean within one year less money for what agriculture has to sell. The farmers will sell less butter, less eggs, less milk, less fruit, and less of all those other farm products which the worker buys. So that agricuture is vitally interested in seeing that the standards of living in Canada are maintained.

Certain people speaking in agricultural communities have tried to create an entirely wrong impression in the farmer's mind with respect to the pay the worker in industry actually receives. Only to-day in the house certain hon. members wanted to know what these automobile workers received per hour. I have heard speakers in country districts say: Yes, workers in the automobile industry receive $1 an hour. Immediately the impression is created in the farmer's mind who works fourteen hours a day: That means $14 a day. The farmer works thirty days in the month, for he has to milk his cows and feed his stock every day, so that he figures that the automobile worker receives thirty times $14, or $420 a month, or about $5,000 a year, and naturally he thinks these fellows are getting fairly well paid. But that is not what happened. Statistics show that the average take-home pay of the workers in the automotive industry before the war was a little better than $1,200 a year. They want to advance that by thirty per cent to have take-home pay of approximately $1,800 a year. Every farmer in Canada realizes that $1,800 a year is not an excessive salary, that it will do no more than permit the average working man to have a reasonable standard of living. Therefore I tell the government that I believe agriculture in this country is behind the workers at this time in their efforts to maintain the rates of pay which they have been receiving during the war, and I think the government will find that out before this is over.

Another point. It is the government that are paying for this strike. If I understand correctly, the Ford Motor Company of Canada have made sufficient profits this year; any further profits would go into the excess profits tax, and the government get over ninety per cent of those additional profits, so that the company are not interested in whether the plant opens or not. But I say that the government should be interested because they are paying for this strike; they are the people who are actually maintaining the Ford Motor Company's position in keeping these people locked out of the plant. The people of Canada, not the Ford Motor Company, are paying for it. I bring that point to the attention of the minister and to the government, so that the people in the country will know what the position is.

I believe that other hon. members representing agricultural districts should rise and express their opinions and what they believe to be the opinions of the people they represent with respect to these strikes. It is a serious situation which we are facing in Canada. It is a serious situation which we are facing on the North American continent. We in this house cannot afford to remain quiet about it.

Mr. E. G. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): I rise at this time as a farmer member to add my voice to what our group, including the hon. member who has just taken his seat, has said on this subject. It is our group, the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group, which has tried to bring before the people the important fact that to-day Canadians are interdependent. To-day they have come to realize that it makes no difference whether you are a worker in industry or a farmer, you are entitled to a decent standard of living. I rise to-day recognizing this truth, that if we are to win the peace we must win this fundamental fight to establish a minimum wage scale in industry.

As a practical farmer I say that farmers recognize that the Canadian industrial worker is our best customer, and we are interested in seeing that he gets a decent wage. Now that the nations of the world have gathered, as they did at Hot Springs, Virginia, and recognized the duty of setting a minimum standard for the world, we as Canadian people have a first and domestic responsibility of establishing that standard for our own people. The leader of our group, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) asked earlier in the session that $25 a week be set as a floor for wages. That is a very good beginning, but we realize that we must have a wage scale in harmony with the cost of living, and similar treatment in respect of the things which agriculture produces. This is a fight in which all members of the house have to take part. The good things which we can produce in Canada should be made available to the Canadian people. In the past the enemies of the common people, in the form of established big business, tried to divide and rule. To-day we must recognize as a Christian nation the dignity of labour and the right of the people who work to have decent homes and decent conditions of employment.

In conclusion, I will say only this, that two things are necessary, namely, the establishment of unions and the provision of security. As a practical farmer I say that we recognize at this time the need for action on the part of this government.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I am sure we have listened with rapt attention to the various points raised by hon. members since early this afternoon. But let me emphasise that important principle, first things first. The hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) has said that this dispute was over the question of take-home pay. That is not the case; the dispute is over the closed shop, maintenance of membership, and check-off. Let us be frank about that.

Mr. GILLIS: Not closed shop.

Mr. MITCHELL: Just a minute. The hon. member had his say this afternoon.

Mr. GILLIS: The minister is not correct when he says they are asking for the closed shop.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am telling hon. members what they asked for. The hon. member can call it "union shop" or "closed shop".

Mr. GILLIS: There is quite a difference.

Mr. MITCHELL: Oh no, there is not. You and I know that. We are talking the same kind of language.

Mr. GILLIS: The rest of them may not understand.

Mr. MITCHELL: Wait a minute. I did not interrupt the hon. member this afternoon. May I remind him that the kind of language he used to-day, when used in Great Britain in 1926, created a condition from which British trade unionists have not fully recovered to this day. It took people with their feet on the ground to bring things back, although slowly, from the condition to which they fell after the general strike to the position which they held, as a result of much struggle, prior to that strike.

My hon. friend talks of war. Any fool can talk of war; that is a simple thing to do. My hon. friend used language to this effect, that "we are not going back to 1939". Who suggested that we were?

Mr. GILLIS: The Ford Motor Company.

Mr. MITCHELL: Just a minute. Who suggested that the people of this nation, whether they be farmers or industrial workers, are being asked to go back to 1939? Let us be rational and sensible in discussing this subject. I hold no brief for the Ford company; they are quite capable of taking care of themselves; but all the angels are not on one side. If my hon. friend by good luck or bad management should ever sit where I am sitting at the moment—

An hon. MEMBER: It might be bad management.

Another hon. MEMBER: On your part.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend knows something about bad management. As a minister of the crown, one must try to be fair. I have no objection to my hon. friend swinging completely to the left. This is still a free country. The right to express opinions is with us almost an article of religion. It is rather nice to know that to-morrow morning, after my hon. friend has made a speech such as he made this afternoon, when there is a knock at the door it will be the milkman and not an agent of the gestapo.

I repeat that all the angels are not on one side. All the employers in Canada are not grinding down the workers. There are many good employers in this country. Many employers need education in industrial relations, and there are many trade union leaders who, it may be said, need some education in industrial relations.

My mind goes back to the railroad organizations of this country which have had agreements with their employees almost uninterruptedly, with some slight exceptions, for the last fifty years. Take the paper industry and many others in this dominion. Why should the hon. member for Cape Breton South rise in his place and blame all employers as he did, or why should someone more to the right blame all the trade unions? The hon. member this afternoon said something about being suckers in this war.

Mr. GILLIS: Right.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not believe that. I do not believe that anyone, whether he be on the extreme left—and my hon. friend will understand what I am talking about when I speak of the extreme left—or on the extreme right really thinks he can push back the growth of the trade union organization. If he does he is fooling himself. It is like trying to push back the ocean. My hon. friend knows something about the agitation from the extreme left—leave out the right—in the trade union organization of the country. May I say this to the hon. gentleman as a democrat and, I believe, a sincere democrat: Moving as we are in these troublesome times, let us hang on to the only advance that man has made since the dawn of history, and that is the right to express himself and be a free man.

My hon. friend talks of union security. He and I, and some others with less knowledge of the fundamentals of the movement, have discussed the question, and I will say without fear of successful contradiction that this government has done more for social progress in the life of this nation than any government since confederation.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MITCHELL: I remember the hungry thirties. That is all right.

Mr. ROWE: You did not want to go behind 1939 a few minutes ago and now you are going to 1930.

Mr. MITCHELL: But there is this to be said. There is a conflict in basic thinking, but the fact remains that this government set in motion a labour code wherein for the first time in the history of the nation the right of trade unions to organize by law was made effective. My hon. friends talk about union security. Well, the next step is trade union negotiations shall to all intents and purposes be fashioned and consumated on the floor of this House of Commons.

Mr. GILLIS: No, no.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend says, "No, no", but I am reading into his language, which I have a perfect right to do—

Mr. GILLIS: I did not say that.

Mr. MITCHELL: —the implication which is there. What is the position that we are in at the moment? My hon. friends, for political reasons—and that is quite an honest reason, notwithstanding opinions to the contrary—feel that governments should by law collect the union dues. In my day and in my hon. friend's day, we always felt that to make a good trade unionist you brought him back to the union hall; that is where trade unionists were made. But the new idea today is that the government should by law insist that men shall belong to a particular organization and shall pay their dues into that organization by law. That is the effect of the suggestions made by my hon. friends.

Mr. GILLIS: You get your income tax in that way; what is wrong with getting union dues that way?

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not need to tell my hon. friend that there are four dominant labour organizations in this country, and on the basis of pure, practical administration, any government that sets out to collect dues by law is going to get into trouble.

Mr. GILLIS: No, no.

Mr. MITCHELL: I go deeper than that. We have just had a war predicated on the belief that the human being as a spark of the divine and that freedom is fundamental. You have to carry the question to its logical conclusion. This might be said truthfully, that prior to the outbreak of the last war, in 1914, the most powerful trade union movement in the world, numerically, was the German trade union movement. What happened in that country? May I say to my good Conservative friends that business went to the state, trade unions went to the state, insurance went to the state, banks went to the state; and when Hitler came along these people thought they were free individuals, whereas actually they were servants of the state. And what happened? It is a matter of history that when he got his fingers on the ammunition he said, "This is the way you are going or else", and within twenty-four hours there was a dictatorship supplanting democracy in Germany and no trade unions. To use the simple language of the man in the street, any fool can govern the country with a bayonet in his hand as long as he does not stick it into himself. That is simple.

An hon. MEMBER: Or his fist.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes, or his fist. My hon. friends are always talking about taking over industry. What they want to do is to accomplish socialism by the instrumentality of the trade union organization.

Mr. COLDWELL: Who said so?

Mr. MITCHELL: I am taking the implication. My hon. friend the member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) says, "Who said so?" That is what good solid German socialists all said, "Who said so?" When they got to the end of the road and saw what the implication of their sentimentality really meant they wound up with Hitler.

Mr. COLDWELL: They wound up in concentration camps under Hitler.

Mr. MITCHELL: I saw that, too. I was in Germany when the revolution happened and that is why I am so sincere about this. Therefore I say this to my hon. friends. Just as the destiny of a nation or a civilization swings backwards and forwards as regularly as the pendulum of the clock hanging over this House of Commons, so political thought swings likewise. If, my hon. friends, were in power for one session, the reflection of their attitude toward the nation would be in the opposite direction the same as it was in Germany, where you had the development of a powerful communist party which reflected itself in the Hitler movement.

Mr. COLDWELL: You are not mixing us up with the communist party, surely?

Mr. MITCHELL: I am talking about the swing of the pendulum. My hon. friends are so clever that they do not see much farther than the next election. What I am pointing out to my hon. friends is this. Things move along from one stage to another until freedom has disappeared—freedom as we understand it.

I am going to go briefly over the steps that led to this dispute, and I speak quite sincerely and without bias toward one side or the other. I do not think all the faults are on one side. I do not believe that in any dispute, whether family, industrial or business dispute, the faults are all on one side. One hon. member in the opposition said to-day that this dispute had been in existence for seventeen months—

Mr. GILLIS: Right.

Mr. MITCHELL: —that it had been pushed around for seventeen months. That is hardly fair. We have used the best negotiators and conciliators there are in this dominion to compose the dispute. The basic policy of the government made possible the organization of the men who work in the Ford plant and Chrysler and General Motors at Oshawa and Windsor. We went through all the machinery that was established, machinery that has been approved by the trades union organizations of this country, machinery that is administered equally by the workers and the employers in industry, with a judge or minister of labour as chairman of the respective boards. We sent Mr. Justice Richards, I think it is fair to say, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Justice Richards is one of the ablest conciliators in the dominion. We sent him into the dispute in Windsor; he was unsuccessful.

A board of conciliation was established within twenty-four hours under the chairmanship of Mr. Justice O'Connor, another able conciliator from Edmonton, in an effort to pull the dispute out of the fire. What was the finding of that board? The majority finding was for a check-off, a limited check-off, it is true. They discarded the closed shop idea. I think, if my memory serves me correctly, Mr. Speaker, even the representative of the employees did not approve the arguments put forward in that dispute for the closed shop. I think that representative's name was Bora Laskin.

These are the words of Mr. Justice O'Connor, the chairman of the board:

> We are none of us prepared to recommend a provision for a union shop but the chairman and Mr. Laskin are prepared to recommend that the parties agree to a voluntary check-off irrevocable during the term of the contract as a solution of the present difficulty.

May I go a step farther and say this also. This is a tribute paid by the chairman of that board to the departments of labour in the dominion and in the province of Ontario:

> We also wish to record our belief that you, sir, the Minister of Labour of Canada, as well as the ministers of labour of Ontario from time to time have exhausted every possible governmental effort to compromise the differences between the parties and to keep the vital Ford plant in operation.

This is the decision or the recommendation arrived at freely by the impartial tribunal set up by the Department of Labour of the Dominion of Canada. Let me say this freely and frankly. I think the hon. member for Calgary West, if my memory serves me rightly—I may be mistaken in this—talked about what was being done in the United States. In the United States the contracts are arrived at freely, without basic law behind them. In the United States there is no law to say that you must have a closed shop, the check-off, or whatever the case may be, neither is there in Great Britain.

Mr. GILLIS: There is in the United States.

Mr. MITCHELL: There is not.

Mr. GILLIS: Read the Wagner act.

Mr. MITCHELL: The Wagner act does not have anything to do with the writing of the contract.

Mr. GILLIS: Certainly not; nobody suggested it.

Mr. MITCHELL: I know whereof I speak. I am frank to admit that in Saskatchewan there is an act, but they have not any industry there, so it does not mean anything.

Mr. GILLIS: There is in the United States.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is the easiest thing to do—

Mr. WRIGHT: That is because we had a labour government for thirty years.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is an easy thing to write an act of parliament for propaganda purposes. It is not true of the United States; neither is it true of Great Britain.

Mr. GILLIS: It is in the United States.

Mr. MITCHELL: I know my hon. friend must have the last word. I say it is not; he says it is. That is the position we are in to-day. I wish to say this very frankly and with all the sincerity of which I am capable.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): May I say it was not I who said that.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am sorry; I said I was speaking from memory. I thought it was my hon. friend.

An agreement is based on the principles of conciliation, give and take, because after all a trade union agreement is based on character and understanding between the parties to a dispute; and any lasting collective agreement, whether it be in Canada, in the United States, in Great Britain or in any other free, democratic country is predicated upon that vital principle.

Mr. GILLIS: Nobody argued otherwise.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friends are arguing the other way.

Mr. GILLIS: No, they do not.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes, you are.

Mr. GILLIS: Your memory is bad to-night.

Mr. MITCHELL: If both sides are willing to meet together with myself and the acting minister of labour of Ontario I am prepared, as I say, to go to Toronto to-morrow morning or to some other city in an effort to pull this dispute out of the fire, as the trade unionists say. And I think my hon. friends have to give us credit for sincerity in that regard.

It is the easiest thing in the world to stand up in this deliberative assembly and say some of the things that have been said here this afternoon. Frankly, I believe one is playing with the destiny of the nation at this time when he does that kind of thing. I have seen it happen before. It happened in Great Britain. I saw it happen in Canada in 1919. We must have a degree of industrial statesmanship on both sides in this country, with all the give and take that one gets in industrial relations.

Some of my hon. friends seem to be pleased —they exhibited a kind of satanic humour this afternoon—with the idea that probably the packing houses will go on strike.

Mr. COLDWELL: Come now.

Mr. MITCHELL: They say, there is going to be a strike in the packing-house industry.

Mr. COLDWELL: Now.

Mr. MITCHELL: Somebody says they are hoping for it. I believe that that dispute can be settled, provided that there is the right approach from both sides, from the labour side and from the employer side. I do not think it is beyond the wit of man to compose any kind of dispute; but if you go in defeated, if you go into an industrial dispute with a negative attitude I do not think there is any possible chance of arriving at a satisfactory agreement on one side or the other.

May I say also that we have built up in this country machinery of a kind that is the equal of any other machinery in the world. I believe it is in the best interests of the trade unions and of the employers' organizations to use that machinery, and not to challenge its soundness prior to any discussions taking place.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

It has just been said that the mine workers of Alberta and British Columbia are going back to work. Nine thousand of them are going back to-morrow. That was done through the normal processes of collective bargaining. As I said this afternoon, many things might be said by myself or by some other member of this house, the import of which may be entirely different on the scene of the dispute from what it is here in the political atmosphere of the House of Commons.

I discussed this Alberta-British Columbia situation with my good friend Angus Morrison and with other officers of the organization, along with the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Ilsley), with the result that the miners are going back to work. I believe that the Ford dispute can be composed with good will. I think I have said this before in the House of Commons. I refer now to both sides of an industrial dispute. You cannot call a man a scoundrel to-day and expect him to sit down with you to-morrow morning. I remember giving this advice—like the hon. member for Calgary West—to, I will not say which side of the dispute in Windsor. I said: "If you must say something derogatory about a person"—that was not the language I used; trade unionists do not use that kind of language, but that was the import of it—"in this dispute, for goodness' sake, say it about me; do not say it about those with whom you are dealing because you have to sit down and make an agreement. I have no objections." They could not say worse about me than they have already said.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Campbell said they were lawbreakers, criminals.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is what I had in mind.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): He should not have said that.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not think he should, either. Whether we like it or not, this dispute at the Ford plant must come to an end. I suppose I have sat as chairman on more industrial disputes than any other man in Canada. I am convinced that if men of good will, irrespective of what their demands may be, will apply the old principles of conciliation and display willingness to trust the other fellow, we can have longstanding agreement develop in the course of time in the automobile industry of this country.

As I said this afternoon, there is a limit to what governments can do under our way of life, under the principles of freedom. The Minister of Labour, whether provincial or federal, cannot sit down and take part in every dispute in this country. The machinery established has set up a medium for the compromise of difficulties; but in this dispute I am prepared, as I have stated already, to join with any men of good will to bring about an agreement in the difficulty in the city of Windsor. The question of wages has been discussed, and I could go into that at great length. Mention has been made of take-home pay, and all the things that are under discussion at the moment. Let us ever remember that the wealth of the nation is dependent upon the unit of production of the individual, whether he belong to management or labour. What is the problem of the automobile industry? It is the easiest thing in the world to draw up resolutions; all you need is a piece of paper and a pen or pencil. But what they have to do in that industry is build a car that the ordinary individual earning from $30 to $50 a week can buy. If they do that, there will be work; if they do not, there will not. It may be argued that people earning from $30 to $50 a week should not have automobiles, but they do, and that is the back-bone of that industry.

In this period of reconversion, with our free economy and under democratic institutions, I believe the unions and the employers must sit down and size up the economics of their industry and, if I may use crude language, see how much the traffic will bear, both sides having in mind the well-being of the nation as a whole. I believe that with the development of industrial councils we have done a great deal in the last few years. I am free to admit that this is a matter of slow and steady growth, but we can move out of this difficult period and build a nation of which every man, woman and child, whether coming from the farm or from industry, will be proud. Mine is a difficult portfolio to administer. I am not asking for any sympathy, although I would like some advice if any hon. members have the answers to these problems. But I ask hon. members at least to give us a chance in this very trying field of industrial negotiation, so that we may move ahead and make a worth-while contribution to the life of our time.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): In his reply, Mr. Speaker, I think the minister has missed the main point at issue. This afternoon the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) spoke many times of bringing the parties together and negotiating an agreement. From the length of time this strike has been in progress it is obvious that all the usual methods of bringing the two parties together have failed. We are suggesting that the time has arrived when the government should do what under similar circumstances it has done already, in the case of the American Can company, and what was done only recently in the United States: put in a controller, carry on the business for the time being, and bring the two parties together to negotiate an agreement which so far as possible will be agreeable to both parties.

That is our suggestion. This is not a political issue. We have not raised this question because it is a political issue. We are going to raise every issue of this description whether or not we are accused of playing politics, because we believe that upon the welfare of the workers and farmers of this country and the returns they receive for their labour or their produce the future welfare of all the Canadian people ultimately depends; and we are sent here to see that these groups get a square deal. It is all very well to talk about conciliation and good will, but my hon. friend the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) forgets that behind this dispute there are many years of difficulty. He forgets that Henry Ford was the last of the great employers on the north American continent to recognize the right of the worker to organize; and only when this war became a reality and production was urgently required was Henry Ford forced to come through and negotiate with a trade union. I do not think any of us will forget that on Labour day in 1939, I think it was, a parade of union men was held in the city of Detroit. Among them was a group of men who wore masks; and they did so because they were employees of Henry Ford. They carried a banner, I am told, which read, "Next year our masks will be off."

Free men? The Minister of Labour talks about free men. What freedom did Henry Ford allow in his plants? What freedom to organize was there? Hitler? Let us not forget that Henry Ford's interests in Germany and the interests of some of our other great North American concerns, including General Motors' Opel, we now know contributed heavily to the campaign of Adolf Hitler. That has been revealed by the records which have been found in Germany by the United States army. Let us not forget this when we hear Hitler's name bandied about this chamber. As my hon. friend knows, the German labour men were not the men who built up Hitler; nor did the German socialists. The socialists were the people, with Jews and others, who went to concentration camps. They were the people who were cremated, gassed, executed. To-day few of them are left. The people who fattened under Hitler were bad employers, who tried to destroy the trade unions and the cooperatives and the people's movements in Germany. The minister cannot deny that.

Mr. MITCHELL: How about the communists?

Mr. COLDWELL: What?

Mr. MITCHELL: How about the communists? I was there when the revolution occurred.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am not talking about the communists. I am talking about the socialists and the trade unionists. We will leave the communists out of the picture; the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Rose) can speak for the communists. I am not speaking for them. I am speaking for the trade unions, the anti-nazi democratic socialists of Germany, if you will, and of Great Britain and other portions of the British commonwealth. The sooner we recognize that there is a great gulf between organizations which are democratic and socialist and those which believe in different methods, the sooner we shall get down to a decent discussion in this chamber.

Mr. McGARRY: Might I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. COLDWELL: Certainly.

Mr. McGARRY: If the socialists obtained power in Canada would there be any labour unions?

Mr. COLDWELL: My hon. friend asks if there would be any trade unions in Canada if the socialists obtained power. Are there any trade unions in Great Britain, where the socialists are in power? Are there any trade unions in New Zealand, where the socialists have been in power for ten years? My hon. friend should do a little reading; then he would know the answer to that question without asking.

Mr. McGARRY: I am just asking whether we would have any trade unions in Canada if the socialists obtained power?

Mr. COLDWELL: Why would the socialists in Canada be any different from the socialists in other countries?

Mr. McGARRY: Did they have any trade unions in Italy?

Mr. COLDWELL: Italy was a fascist state. My hon. friend had better do some reading. So let us keep these facts in mind when these matters are bandied across the floor of the House of Commons.

The Minister of Labour suggested that there was no difference between a union shop and a closed shop. He knows better than that. A closed shop requires that before a man obtains a job in a plant he must pass through a union, and be O.K.-ed by it. A union shop is one where a man can be freely employed by an employer, but he joins the union afterwards. They are two different things entirely. In one case the union approves the staff; in the other case the management chooses the staff. That is the fundamental difference between the closed shop and the union shop.

Mr. GARDINER: Which are you in favour of?

Mr. COLDWELL: I am in favour of the closed shop; because I believe, in spite of what the minister said about free men, that any man who takes the benefits paid for by his fellow workers ought to be compelled to contribute to the benefits which his fellow workers bring to all of them. If it is in a union shop—

Mr. GARDINER: Then you are in favour of a principle whereby a man cannot get a job unless he belongs to the union.

Mr. COLDWELL: I say that any man who takes the benefit obtained by his fellow workers ought to be a member of a union.

Mr. GARDINER: Answer the question.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is to say—and I am putting it in the minister's own words—that a man who expects to get a job ought to be a member of his union. That is clear.

Mr. GARDINER: Then you are in favour of the check-off?

Mr. COLDWELL: I am in favour of the check-off, yes. In fact my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who is questioning me, and his party, before or just after he left Saskatchewan—and I am not sure whether he was premier, or whether it was his successor—put into effect in that province compulsory membership in the teaching profession. And for years the government of which he was the head amended acts so that the medical profession, the legal profession and other professions in that province had closed shops. That was under my hon. friend's administration in Saskatchewan. So that what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander.

Mr. TUCKER: I rise to a point of order. A misstatement has been made. The hon. member, the leader of the C.C.F., has made the statement that lawyers are a closed shop.

Mr. COLDWELL: So they are.

Mr. TUCKER: I say that any person who is willing to take the training and write the examinations may enter the legal profession; and the organization cannot keep them out.

Mr. COLDWELL: My hon. friend is shouting, and I heard distinctly what he said. He has said that any lawyer who can pass the examinations may enter the legal profession. I think if he comes from Ontario that is so, provided that he can pay the fee of $1,500. I think that is correct.

But let me say this, that any worker who can take his apprenticeship and qualify in his trade or profession can join his trade union if he pays his initiation fees. I ask you: What is the difference?

Mr. GARDINER: I was just asking for information.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is what happened to every such person in Saskatchewan in the higher professions, under my hon. friend's friends.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): One question. I wonder if the hon. member has not confused the situation. He says that a person who gets a job in business should first belong to a union. I do not know that he meant to go that far. Does he mean, in short, that the union hires the people whom the boss pays?

Mr. COLDWELL: I say—

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): That is a closed shop.

Mr. COLDWELL: I say it is exactly the same as the legal profession.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): No, it is quite different.

Mr. COLDWELL: I know you lawyers will not admit it.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): We belong to the oldest union, but we are not a closed shop.

Mr. COLDWELL: The oldest union and the strongest union in the world.

Mr. TUCKER: But not a closed shop.

Mr. COLDWELL: And that means the most effective closed shop in the world. Yet you deny to the working class what you take for yourselves, and what you demand for yourselves.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Would the hon. member please answer the question? We would say that I am an employer and you have a union. But I may have a union shop, and may hire a man for a thirty-day or sixty-day period. The man may not be fit for the job. That is the kind of shop I would favour, one where I could fire him if I chose, if he is not suited for the job. I agree that if he stayed a length of time he must belong to the union. But surely my hon. friend would not want that man to join the union before the employer knows whether he is any good on the job.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think a man who joins a union has behind him the references he has obtained from qualifying and working in the particular field in which he has engaged.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. COLDWELL: Oh, well, there is another roar from the other side. But let me say this to the hon. member who has asked a perfectly straightforward, honest and fair question, that I believe it is in the interests of the workers of this country that when a man enters a plant and takes a job as a member of a trade or a craft, he ought, before he joins and before he takes that job as a competent workman, to belong to his union. That would be, in effect, a closed shop.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): In many plants they will not take a man until he can do the job.

Mr. COLDWELL: He could not become a member of a union until he could do the job; quite right.

Mr. ROWE: You have never hired many, have you?

Mr. COLDWELL: Probably I have hired as many craftsmen as my hon friend has.

Mr. ROWE: I do not think so.

Mr. COLDWELL: I mentioned craftsmen.

Mr. ROWE: Politicians, probably.

Mr. COLDWELL: Perhaps I have not taken as much out of the skins of some of the workers as have some of my hon. friends.

Mr. ROWE: And never put as much into them, either.

Mr. COLDWELL: No, nor into my own skin.

Mr. ROWE: Never got much into you, either.

Mr. COLDWELL: The Minister of Labour has said that freedom is fundamental. Yes, freedom is fundamental; but not freedom to injure one's fellows.

Mr. MITCHELL: I never suggested that.

Mr. COLDWELL: The basis of all law is the limitation of freedom to do harm to one's fellow man. And so far as this strike at Windsor is concerned, I say it is in the interests of Canada as a whole that it be brought to a conclusion.

On several occasions the Minister of Labour has said that he is not the only minister involved. To-night's issue of the Ottawa Journal reports a press conference given by the premier of Ontario to-day. What does he say?

> Primary responsibility for the handling of the strike at the Ford Motor Company of Canada plant at Windsor rests with the dominion government, Premier Drew stated here to-day during a press conference.
> War-time orders in council passed by the dominion government with regard to wages and other matters in the field of Canadian labour had not been altered or revoked, so it was therefore the responsibility of the dominion government to deal with the Windsor strike situation, he said. The provinces had no jurisdiction in this field.

There we have the view of the premier of Ontario. I urge upon the minister to take action, in view of what has happened recently, namely, the calling of the new strike in the power plant. We are told in the press—and I do not know how correct this is—that it will take from three to four weeks after an agreement is reached to turn on the power again, and to put that plant into operation. Every day that goes by just adds that much more to the time.

Is it not time that the Minister of Labour stepped into this situation? I say it is, and I am pleading with him to-night to do just that. If necessary—and I believe it is necessary—he should put a controller in the plant. Bring the two sides together so that they may negotiate an agreement; for as the hon. member for Cape Breton South said this afternoon, this is the first of the big peace-time disputes. We do not want these disputes. We have enough difficulty now in connection with demobilization and reconversion. We have enough difficulty in keeping the economy operating, without the addition of strikes. I take it that it is in the interests of everybody in the country that the matter be settled, and I am urging the minister to get busy and, instead of bandying words around the house, give us a little action.

Mr. D. F. BROWN (Essex West): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended taking part in this debate, but since the subject is the city of Windsor and since I represent the constituency of Essex West, which comprises chiefly the city of Windsor, I think it is only proper that I should say something on its behalf. I am prompted to do so by an editorial which appeared in the Windsor Daily Star on Thursday, October 4, which reads in part as follows:

> This country needs propaganda, providing it is of the right sort. We have suffered seriously for the lack of it, while other nations have been making wise and effective use of this instrument. We would do well to follow their example, and there seems to be some hope that we shall now do that.

There has been considerable discussion this afternoon and evening from schoolteachers and ministers and farmers from Nova Scotia, British Columbia, Saskatchewan and other provinces, so that I think we can safely say that this is not just a matter of concern to the city of Windsor but one of national import, and I think that, as such, it is about time, since we now have heard from all the so-called specialists in the opposition, that we should hear from the patient before the operation is performed.

We have heard a great deal from the opposition of the hungry thirties, of the lack of housing—all thinking in a negative way. I believe that the time has come for less oratory from the opposition especially, and a little more action.

Mr. PROBE: From the government.

Mr. BROWN: I gather from the speakers who have taken part in this debate, aside from the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), who has done such an excellent job, that they are not as much interested in the patient as they are in expounding their own views and theories. But this is a serious matter. It is a matter of national import. The property rights, the living conditions and the welfare of eleven million people are involved, and anyone who is trying to make political capital out of the Ford strike at Windsor is a traitor to his country.

The principles in this strike go deeper than appear on the surface. After all, democracy was not intended for efficiency. In a democratic state the individual is supreme; in a socialistic state the state is supreme and the individual is merely the tool of the state.

There was a statement made about the city of Windsor by one hon. member. I do not think he intended a slight upon the city or upon its inhabitants when he said that certain things were being done by the stupid people of Windsor. I do not think he intended his remark as a slight. But I want to raise my voice on behalf of the ordinary people, the common people of the city of Windsor. As hon. members know, the city of Windsor has contributed probably more in this war than any other city in the Dominion of Canada. I mean by that more by way of manufactured goods, trucks, cars, tanks, chemicals, guns, foodstuffs, and besides all that, we have contributed in man-power. I think, too, it is only proper at this time I should pay a tribute to one other who has given his life on behalf of this country. I refer to the Hon. Norman A. McLarty, because it was through his trials and tribulations during his term as minister of labour that his health gave out but he carried on on behalf of his country until we now pay our respects to his memory.

The workers of the city of Windsor are just ordinary people, and as such they have common sense. As I have said, they are ordinary people, and I would ask anybody else in the Dominion of Canada if they are not ordinary people, too, because I think we are all on just about the same level. The people of Windsor are not wanting anything unusual. All they want is an opportunity to help themselves, an opportunity to educate their children and to raise their families, to clothe and feed and raise them properly. Yes, all they want is an opportunity to worship in the manner which they desire. So that their desires are no different from those of any other citizens of the Dominion of Canada.

I feel that the Ford company have many worth-while qualities. They have done things that are desirable. The union has done things that are desirable. The Department of Labour, to my knowledge, has done everything that is possible. While what appears on the surface does not indicate all that has been done by the Department of Labour, it is to my own knowledge that they have done a great deal, in keeping with democratic rights. I would urge upon the government to follow the suggestion that has been made. There are surely some common interests; and while talking sometimes gets us into trouble, on the other hand we shall never have any negotiations started or completed until after some discussion. I feel that the company and the union can be brought together at the instigation of the Department of Labour or some other body or individual and find out those things that are common, if they are honest and sincere, and I know that they are. If that is done I have no doubt that a common basis will be reached from which to work out a solution of this trouble.

Make no mistake. The people of Windsor are the stability of the city. They are not going to do anything that will bring discredit to the Dominion of Canada. It will be found when the smoke of battle has cleared away that Windsor is still one of the great industrial centres of the Dominion of Canada. We have all the facilities necessary to great industry; we have great industries and the people to work them; we shall have, I hope, conditions of labour which not only will bring unexcelled success and advancement to industry, but will bring labour the fulfilment of its quest for happiness and contentment.

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Secretary of State): I am sure that no one is more concerned about the matter under discussion than is the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). I know something of what the Minister of Labour during the last three weeks has been seeking to do, and I say to this house, and particularly to the hon. gentleman who introduced this discussion, as one who has spent all his life in the trade union movement, from my contacts —and they have been daily—in this matter, the Minister of Labour has at heart no less than any other man in this chamber or outside it, the welfare of the workers of this country.

This problem is not peculiar to Canada. In the period of transition which is facing the world one reads of industrial unrest, of strikes, of differences between management and labour in countries where labour governments are in office, and it will not serve the cause of industrial peace in this country to enter upon a discussion of this important matter in the spirit of the suggestion that this government alone is faced with these tremendous responsibilities. One has only to take up the morning paper to find that a government composed of men like Ernest Bevin have on their doorstep, for one reason or another, this very problem.

This problem interests me deeply because, I think I can say without fear of contradiction from any group, that no one has stood up here in the last ten years and championed more vigourously and diligently than I have done the rights of the workers. To-night I say with all sincerity, knowing that my own community, my own fellow citizens, are involved, whose welfare I have at heart, that I am deeply conscious of the importance of the implications of this matter. The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) paid tribute to the work of the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Brown) and myself in this matter, and I may say that the Minister of Labour, who is so fully seized with this great problem, in connection with which at this very moment important matters are being considered, is not in the interests of the solution itself free to make full disclosure of what is being attempted. Over the week-end I myself was a party to discussions between the union and certain groups representing the management, in an effort to bring this matter to a solution, and I have refrained thus far from taking part in the debate only lest anything be said which would interfere with the things which the Minister of Labour —as ultimately will be revealed to his everlasting credit—has been doing in the interests of the workers to try to bring about a solution.

I regret that the temper of the discussion in some instances, although, I know, unwittingly, has not been calculated to help forward what is being attempted.

The Ford Motor Company is one of the important companies in this country. I am free to say that over the period of the years its policy of industrial relations has not been such as to make easy the task of any minister of labour. Mention has been made to-day of the wages paid by the company. Hon. gentlemen who do not live in industrial districts, particularly in the automobile centres, are apt to be misled by figures of the daily wages paid to workers in the automobile industry. As one who has worked in this plant, as one who lives in the community where the automobile industry operates, I say one should not be carried away by the level of annual wages paid in these plants. The fact is that, because of the mass production basis on which the automobile plants operate, over a period of time men working in these plants have found themselves employed for as little as six months in the year, and when one calculates a total annual wage on that basis it is insignificantly low, and can no longer be justified in a country like Canada.

But that is not a matter alone for a government. Industries have some responsibility in this connection, and constantly to try to put the blame upon those whose every effort is directed to improve the situation is not, in my opinion, the highest type of statesmanship.

These industries will have to learn that they cannot treat their workers as bits of steel lying on the cement floor of the plant. Of that there can be no doubt. The automobile industry, like other large concerns, will have to realize their social responsibilities to the men in their plants. That has been enunciated, in my judgment, in no more effective way than by the right hon. gentleman who leads this group on your right, Mr. Speaker. His pronouncements and those of his ministers from time to time have indicated that industry has a growing responsibility in this connection. If industry would preserve its integrity, then industry, particularly the automotive industry, must realize its responsibilities to its men.

It is not fair to say that this government is oblivious to this situation. The Minister of Labour was fully justified in saying that no government in this country and no government in the world since the advent of war has done more than the present administration to bring about an increase in legislation which benefits the workers. Take family allowances, for example. I well remember joining with the present Minister of National Health (Mr. Claxton) and the hon. member for Cape Breton South in urging upon the house the adoption of this measure, so that in times like these we are discussing, and in a situation such as the one before us, the dependents of the workers would not be reduced to complete want. That was one of the reasons for that legislation; and while hon. members may criticize the amount of unemployment insurance benefits, the fact is that if we have to-day a fund of $300 million to cushion the shock of unemployment, it is the result of legislation brought into this house by this government.

The government believes in the right of labour to organize. The Minister of Labour, I thought, succinctly stated that to-night, and he warned any group which sought to interfere with the right of organization that it was making a tremendous error. I am afraid I should say this, as a member from the Windsor district, that there have been public pronouncements of certain important individuals in the particular plant involved in the dispute which would occasion the suspicion, at any rate, of an attempt to break the union. The Minister of Labour was quite clear on that point to-night. He said that you could not shove back the hands of time, or words to that effect. Any company that tries to break the union will find that it cannot succeed in ultimate terms. It may succeed for the moment, but if it does it will bring tremendous discredit upon itself and it cannot and will not succeed.

We believe that trade union organizations are a good thing. We believe that they are a good thing not only for themselves but for Canada, and I was particularly happy to hear what the Minister of Labour said to-night in connection with their continued growth. No, Mr. Speaker; this dispute, serious as it is, is not without being fully appraised and considered by the Minister of Labour and his department, with whom I have been in daily touch in this matter. Knowing of his intentions, knowing of everything he is trying to do, I simply want to say this. I do not want to say anything that will render his task more difficult than it is. He has stated in a broad way his belief in the right of the union to exist, in the desirability of its existence, and he has made an appeal to both parties to recognize their common interest. The time is near at hand when they must sit across the table and he is prepared to sit in with them to help.

The hon. member for Calgary West, in, I thought, his helpful contribution to-day described that very thing. It is because I know of what the Minister of Labour has done that I suggest to the house that everything, perhaps not seemingly in the eyes of those who do not know the full picture, but everything in terms of ultimate benefits to both union and management, is, in my judgment, being done by the Minister of Labour, and I thank him for his consideration and his effort on behalf of the people so many of whom I represent in this house to-night. I say to the company; I say to the management; I say to the union, let us all recognize that in these difficult days we have a common responsibility. Let nothing be done or said that will interfere with the effort to solve this particular dispute. Let the management realize its responsibility. Let it realize that by taking the union into its confidence, in the pursuit of what the Minister of Labour mentioned to-night, the industrial council idea and the democratization of industry, no one will lose by that kind of trust.

These parties, for reasons which I know, but which I think I should not mention at this stage, have engendered suspicion and hate which is not shared alone by the men working in that plant. That must go. It must disappear, and a basis of mutual confidence and good faith in one another must be restored in that plant and in others so that they can get down to work on a democratic basis, not only in the interests of the company but in the interests of the men. I believe that in working for the interests of the men the interests of all are involved.

We are faced with a situation wherein we are trying to reconcile a difficult dispute. The discussion to-day reveals that on all sides of the house, no particular group has any monopoly of interest in the welfare of the workers or in the interests of settling this dispute. There is a common recognition that good faith must be restored between the parties and that at the earliest moment steps must be taken consistent with our ability to effect a final solution between the parties involved.

Knowing the difficulties, and particularly in the light of my experience over this very week-end, I believe that objective is being approached as well as, under the circumstances and having in mind the interests of everyone, that can be done. This discussion has served one purpose, namely, to bring the matter into bold relief. It has served to confirm once again, through the Minister of Labour, the merit of trade union organization and the desirability of the management understanding this and realizing the dire consequences, otherwise, not only for itself but for our country.

Perhaps this will not be the last discussion we shall have on matters like this, but I say to all groups in this house, no matter what our political parties may be, that there is an obligation, in the discussion of these matters, to give an example to those who find themselves involved in this dispute. It is in that frame of mind that I have entered into this discussion, and once again I affirm my belief in the right of trade union organization, and I urge the management to do everything it can to see that the purposes, the noble purposes, of the trade union effort are not needlessly disintegrated.

Mr. D. A. CROLL (Spadina): I had not intended originally to enter this debate. The house has devoted almost the whole day to speaking about my neighbours and my friends, and in fact speaking about many who were my comrades in the last five or six years, and I think it is just as well that the house should know that these men are neither dupes nor tools, nor are they stupid. For just a minute we can turn the eyes of reason rather than emotion in that direction.

I think the strike is an economic contest coolly planned and conducted as though it were a horse trade or a transaction on St. James street. The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) said that the issue was the grievance procedure; the minister on the other hand says that the issue is union security. Odd as it may be, they are, I believe, both right. The negotiations actually broke down on grievance procedure. They might have broken down on anything if the parties did not have good will and wanted them to break down as they did in this case. Actually the union wanted union security. In so far as I am concerned, in so far as my own personal position is concerned, if it interests the house, they know very well where I stand, and I have stood there for a very long time. I am not only a believer but a supporter of union security. But what the house has lost sight of, I think—and this is no fault of the Department of Labour, because they have provided the machinery—is that for seventeen months the negotiations have been bedevilled by hearings and boards and lawyers and politicians, or would-be politicians, with the result that the animosities have now become the ruling factor and everybody has lost sight of the principle involved and of the poor people who are now walking the streets. The animosities have become so deep, so bitter and so unrelenting between the company and the men that any conference table that will have any chance of success now must have new faces in new places.

The hon. member said that it was a matter of grievance procedure that upset the applecart; well, it might have been anything. I have lived with this problem longer than any other hon. member. I have lived with it for many years, and it has always been a struggle for these men. It has been a very long struggle and there have been many casualties, but they have all been on one side.

If we have done anything at all here today we have certainly indicated that we are not complacent about it; we certainly do not intend to sit it out. What we need at this particular time is to get at the root of the trouble and provide some leadership. The whole country is watching. What are we to do with the Ford strike? This will be a precedent; it will be the formula.

I was gratified to hear the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) say that his approach was conciliation and peace. That is everyone's approach; but we must make sure that it does not get down to the point where it becomes a knock-'em-down and a drag-'em-out contest. Then it becomes too late. I do not think it is suggested from this side of the house or from any side of the house that we should dictate at this time to either one party or the other. But I do think that under P.C. 4020 the minister possesses authority to summon either Mr. Campbell or the union leaders.

Let the responsibility be with those who do not appear at the summons of the minister, and the people of this country will judge, and judge only too well. All that we can ask here to-day is that they be called together that they be put into a room. Let them decide; let them talk it out. Mr. Bevin, Mr. Molotov and Mr. Byrnes are having their troubles too. They are going back to try to talk it out to see what happens. These are not the only troubles in the world. We have to give them a chance.

It seems to me that the minister has been trying to do it. He is a better judge of what should be done than those of us who sit outside; but the danger is just this, and we must face up to it. If we do not give leadership at this particular time men who have different ideologies and men who have direct tactics may take over, in which case it may be too late. It is our duty in this house to see that these instincts are channelled through democratic purposes; then we can feel safe.

I was gratified to sit in this house and to hear from all sides the kind of talk that would at least tell some industrialists in this country that if they have the bugler ready to blow taps on trade unionism they had better fire that bugler because trade unionism is here to stay. So far as I am concerned I cannot picture this country without a strong and responsible trade union movement. I can well remember, and the house can well remember, that in any fascist country the trade union movement fell first, and when we liberated the countries they rose first. They are the very core of democracy and we must preserve them.

I say again we are not asking the minister to take sides: it would not be fair at this time. But the minister has prerogatives. The minister can exercise his good office in order to get these people together for the purpose of talking out their problem. That problem can and must be talked out so that these people can get back to work again.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Mr. ILSLEY moved:

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $29,769,000.11, being one-twelfth of the amount of each of the several items to be voted, as set forth in the estimates for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1946, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, be granted to His Majesty, on account, for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1946.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

INTERIM SUPPLY

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Mr. ILSLEY: I move:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1946, the sum of $29,769,000.11 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ilsley thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 17, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1946.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. BRACKEN: Might I ask the Minister of Finance if this bill is in exactly the same form as the last interim supply bill?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, Mr. Chairman; it is in exactly the same form.

Mr. BRACKEN: Then there is no need to have any discussion. We support the bill.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 and 3 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

WAR AND DEMOBILIZATION

PROVISION FOR APPROPRIATION OF $1,365,000,000 FOR WAR PURPOSES, DEMOBILIZATION, PROMOTION OF TRADE AND INDUSTRY, ETC.

The house resumed from Friday, October 5, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to His Majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures deemed necessary or advisable in consequence of the war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR NAVAL SERVICES

Hon. D. C. ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): Mr. Chairman, a week ago when I had almost completed my opening statement with respect to the naval estimates I had just finished telling the committee that it was expected the main fleet bases on the east and west coasts would be maintained, but that most of the smaller bases would be closed. Continuing where I left off, may I add that it is hoped to continue the naval divisions throughout the country. These establishments have been most valuable assets during the war and it is believed that they can prove their worth during peace.

Our establishments abroad are to be in large measure closed down. H.M.C.S. Niobe, the manning and training station near the Clyde in Scotland will be closed, probably before the end of the present fiscal year and the property returned to its owners. The training base at Bermuda called Somers Isles is now being closed. In Newfoundland, our facilities are being reduced to care and maintenance or are being closed as the need dictates.

During the war the Royal Canadian Navy maintained a division for operational research. The principal members of this group were four physicists, two astrophysicists, and two mathematicians. The group was generally directed by Doctor J. H. L. Johnstone, O.B.E., and Doctor G. H. Henderson, O.B.E., both professors of physics at Dalhousie university. A close liaison was maintained with the national research council, and with the research organizations at the admiralty and in the United States navy. The section was not large but the work done was helpful. While it may be difficult to continue naval scientific research on an extensive scale during peace time, it will be generally agreed, I think, that the service should keep itself abreast of developments in the field and that an adequate organization and facilities for that purpose must be maintained.

I think perhaps I should now give the committee some precise figures on the operation of the convoy system, particularly in the north Atlantic during the war years. This was the theatre of war in which the Canadian navy played its greatest part. From 1939 until the end of May, 1945, the Canadian navy convoyed 25,859 ships eastward and 16,823 westward. The deadweight tonnage carried by these ships to the United Kingdom was 235,104,856. Of the more than forty-two thousand ships convoyed by the R.C.N., only 438 were sunk by enemy action. The greatest number of sinkings took place in 1942 when 149 merchant ships in the R.C.N. convoys were lost. In the years 1940 and 1941 ships to the number of seventy-five each year were lost. In 1943, 125 were lost. By 1944, the German U-boat threat had been mastered and the merchant ship losses in R.C.N. convoys in that year fell to the rather insignificant figure of seven.

In addition to these transatlantic convoys, the R.C.N. ran twenty-one sets of coastal convoys on our eastern seaboard in the gulf and River St. Lawrence, to Newfoundland and to some U.S. ports. The total number of merchant ships thus protected in these coastal convoys was 18,898. That record of operations is one of which Canadians may well take pride.

A word now as to the future. While, as is the case in the other services, final determination as to just what our naval establishment should be in the post-war period cannot yet be made, and will be influenced to a large extent by the nature of our obligations under world or regional security arrangements, it is possible to state with some accuracy what our establishment will probably be.

During the war our naval role was primarily that of escort duty, carried out by lighter ships, few of which would be suitable for permanent peace-time operation, and in fact the role which it was contemplated we would play in the Pacific war was of a different character to that performed in the Atlantic and required the use of other types of ships.

It is now proposed that at the outset Canada's peace-time navy should comprise two cruisers, probably two light fleet carriers, ten to twelve destroyers, and the necessary ancillary craft, all of these of the latest and most modern type, while in reserve and for training purposes, we will continue to hold a certain number of frigates. Such an establishment will require a force of about 10,000 officers and men.

I have another announcement to make which should be of interest to the members of the naval forces who have served in the second world war. As the committee knows, there have been three varieties of stripes in the Canadian naval service—the broad straight stripes of the permanent force, the curly stripes of the Royal Canadian Naval Reserve, and the wavy stripes of the R.C.N.V.R.

It is now proposed that, in addition to the permanent force, there shall be a single reserve force known as the "Royal Canadian Navy Reserve". This force will comprise all reserves, including reserve air personnel as well as personnel of the university naval training divisions. A set of regulations will cover the reserve R.C.N. The uniform will be similar in all respects to that worn by the members of the permanent force, and for the time being, the total authorized strength of the reserve will be 18,000, exclusive of those on the retired list. In due course further announcements will be made with respect to its organization. It is unlikely, however, that it will be possible to complete this until demobilization has been further advanced.

I cannot conclude my remarks without making some reference to the Royal Canadian Sea Cadets. Many of these lads graduated from the corps into the Royal Canadian Navy during the war. From reports which have been made by officers of various ships in which these ex-sea cadets served it is clear that the training they received while in the corps was of great advantage to them in carrying out their duties. There are today between fourteen and fifteen thousand sea cadets and officers in the ninety-three corps distributed throughout Canada, and the naval service will continue to extend its full co-operation to the effort being made to keep the corps up to strength.

I am grateful to the Navy League of Canada for its sponsorship of the corps throughout the dominion, and as naval minister I take some satisfaction in the part the naval service itself has played in the training of sea cadets and in the encouragement of the development of the corps by naval officers across the country. This supervision and encouragement will be continued in peace time for it is not only expected that the Royal Canadian Navy continue in the future as it has in the past to obtain recruits from the corps, but we also realize that the training received by the boys in that corps helps to make them better Canadian citizens.

In the course of the debate a little over a week ago a number of speeches were made. I would refer particularly, however, to the helpful and constructive speech of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green). He made some suggestions, and at this time I would refer to two of them in particular.

One suggestion was that the statement with respect to the three defence services should be made at the same time in order that the committee might have the over-all picture. The same suggestion has been made by other hon. members, and there is much to commend it.

So far as my own two departments are concerned I should like to have been able to accept the suggestion; however, it was not feasible at this session. As hon. members will realize, a large part of the estimates relate to past expenditures, and expenditures which carry over from the war period. I feel sure, however, that in future sessions that procedure should be followed, and I can see that it would be particularly helpful in considering the future—although not the past—of the three armed services.

I believe I could help to meet the wishes of the committee in this way. My colleague, the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Gibson) has given his statement, and I have now completed my statement with respect to the navy. Circumstances permitting, I would be ready to make a similar statement with respect to the army on Thursday, let us say, and the committee could then decide which set of detailed estimates it might wish to consider first.

Mr. GREEN: It would be helpful if the minister could do that.

Mr. ABBOTT: So far as I am concerned, I shall be prepared to make my army statement on Thursday. We know, of course, that sometimes matters come up which must take precedence. However, I shall be ready to speak with respect to the army on Thursday.

The second suggestion made by the hon. member for Vancouver South was that a special committee should be set up to look into defence matters.

Mr. GREEN: A standing committee.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes. May I say that personally I would welcome the establishment of such a committee, because I believe it could perform a useful service. The discussion and consideration of defence matters in my view should not be the subject of party strife, and I believe a committee of that sort could perform a useful purpose. I would hasten to say, however, that I feel it would not be feasible to set up such a committee at this session, one which is of a rather special nature. While I cannot commit the government as to policy, yet I would recommend personally that such a committee be established at the next session, when I have no doubt we shall not be quite so pressed for time as, I am afraid, we shall be at this session. That is all I have to say in my statement with respect to the navy, except that it has been customary to place upon Hansard the names of those who have been given operational honours and awards.

Since I last made my report in April there have been 283 such honours and awards, and with the permission of the committee I should like to place those names upon Hansard. They are as follows:

December, 1942.

Mr. BRACKEN: Before the committee rises I should like to ask a question. At some point early in the discussion in committee will the Minister of National Defence give a break-down of expenditures under the following headings: War expenditures—these would include commitments of the past—demobilization expenditures, and what one might call expenditures for defence in the future. I should personally like to have such information.

Mr. ABBOTT: I should be very happy to do what I can to meet the wishes of the leader of the opposition on that point. As he probably knows, for the last four or five years our practice has been, in connection with these war estimates, to consider the estimates of the different services under twelve or thirteen primary headings such as civil salaries, pay and allowances, travel, transportation and freight and the like. The details have, in fact, been prepared on that basis.

I shall be ready to give any information or break-down that I can; but I am afraid that at this date it would be difficult, if not impossible, from a practical point of view completely to rearrange the estimates. However, I shall be happy to do what I can to break them down under the suggested headings. I must repeat, however, that I am afraid it would be difficult to make a complete rearrangement of the way in which they are presented. I had more or less assumed that the committee would be ready to consider them in the form in which they were presented at the last three or four sessions. I realize, of course, that circumstances are somewhat different to-day, but they have become so quite recently, with the result that the accounting staffs have not been able to make any change in their method of presentation. I may say that these estimates I am going to bring before the house have already been revised three or four times since they were first prepared last March. Frankly I would hesitate to impose too great a burden upon our accounting staffs, which are already pretty heavily burdened. However, I shall try to meet my hon. friend in any way I can.

Mr. BRACKEN: I was asking that the Minister of National Defence or indeed the minister of any other department revise the set-up of the estimates. I am not asking that at all. But I think the government, in its own interests, ought to let the house and the country know what proportion of these total expenditures amounting to $3,650 million would be chargeable to commitments with respect to the war; what proportion would be chargeable to demobilization and what proportion to the future defence plan for the three services. If that information cannot be given, then it cannot be given. But I was wondering if at least the totals under these headings could be given for each of the three services. I am not suggesting that at this stage the minister should try to set up his estimates in a different form. I wonder if he understands what I am asking for.

Mr. ABBOTT: Probably as we go along in the consideration of the estimates we shall be able to follow what my hon. friend has in mind. I believe that under the primary headings to which he has referred I can give what amount would stand as carry-over from previous commitments. We will follow the practice of distributing to each member of the house an itemized break-down of the total, and if a further break-down of that is needed I will try to provide it.

Progress reported.

It being five minutes after eleven o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Wednesday, October 10, 1945.

The house met at three o'clock.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Ottawa, October 10, 1945.

Sir:—I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Patrick Kerwin, acting as deputy of His Excellency the Administrator, will proceed to the Senate Chamber on Thursday, the 11th October, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
F. L. C. Pereira,
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

PRIVILEGE—MR. COLDWELL

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE—PROVISION OF STANDING ORDERS RESPECTING QUORUM

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise to draw to the attention of the house a matter which I think affects the privileges of the house and the rules of the house.

Yesterday, the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker), parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs, presented the first report of the special committee on veterans affairs and moved that the report be concurred in.

This committee consists of sixty members. I learned accidentally this morning that twenty-four members attended the meeting of the committee at which the business reported was transacted.

Standing order 65 governs the procedure of select special committees. Paragraph 3 of standing order 65 says:

A majority of the members of a special committee shall be a quorum, unless the house has otherwise ordered.

The house had not so ordered; therefore the presence of thirty-one members was required to transact business. Only twenty-four were present.

The notes on the standing order in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, I think, are quite clear, and indicate that no valid business could be transacted under the circumstances; hence no reports should have been submitted to this house yesterday.

In this respect, Mr. Speaker, we have followed the interpretation of a similar standing order in the British House of Commons; for on July 3, 1907, Mr. A. J. Balfour raised the question of the validity of work done by a committee without a quorum. Mr. Speaker then said this, in part:

It is rather difficult to deal with hypothetical cases but on the assumption that the committee met and proceeded without a quorum, I should be of the opinion that the committee, properly speaking, was never constituted and did not meet, and that none of the work done could be accepted as being the work of that particular committee.

This is an important committee. Its need is urgent. I am not asking the house or you, Mr. Speaker, to rescind the motion of yesterday. I am merely raising the question that these rules which protect minorities in this house should be observed when organizing the work of all other special committees of this house and that care should be exercised by those submitting such reports that the rule for our protection has been complied with. I wish to draw it to your attention so that this may not occur again.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I am quite in agreement with the point raised by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. But over a number of years—and I have been in the house for more than fifteen years—for the purpose of organizing in our various committees we have proceeded possibly with a certain amount of disregard of some of the basic rules. It was the intention yesterday to ask the house to validate the routine proceedings of the committee, consisting, as my hon. friend rightly said, of twenty-four members. I think that, to put the matter beyond dispute, to-morrow morning, when that committee meets with, I believe, the quorum now recognized by the house, we had better repeat the proceedings which were gone over yesterday and have everything perfectly in order. I think the point raised by my hon. friend is well taken, but we were anxious to get ahead with the business of a most important committee, and I believe that if we were wrong in law we were right in equity.

Mr. COLDWELL: I did not wish to delay the committee.

STANDING COMMITTEES

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I move that the report of the special committee appointed to prepare and report lists of members to compose the standing committees of the house, which I presented yesterday, be concurred in. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) asked me yesterday to hold it over until to-day.

Motion agreed to.

POWERS OF COMMITTEES

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved:

That the standing committees of this house shall severally be empowered to examine and inquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the house and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon, with power to send for persons, papers and records.

Motion agreed to.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their honours that this house will unite with them in the formation of a joint committee of both houses on the subject of the printing of parliament, and that the members of the standing committee on printing, viz., Messieurs Adamson, Arsenault, Aylesworth, Baker, Beaudry, Bertrand (Prescott), Bertrand (Terrebonne), Boivin, Bradette, Bradshaw, Brunelle, Campbell, Castleden, Church, Clark, Cote (St. Johns-Iberville-Napierville), Dubois, Emmerson, Fontaine, Fraser, Gibson (Hamilton West), Golding, Halle, Hansell, Healy, Henderson, Hlynka, Kidd, Kuhl, Lacombe, Lalonde, Lapalme, Lapointe, Lennard, MacLean, MacNaught, Maloney, McCuaig, McCubbin, McCullough (Assiniboia), McDonald (Parry Sound), McGregor, McLure, McMaster, Nicholson, Robinson (Simcoe East), Ross (St. Paul's), Sinclair (Vancouver North), Sinnott, Strum (Mrs.), Tustin, Viau, White (Hastings-Peterborough), Winters, will act as members on the part of this house, on the said joint committee on the printing of parliament.

Motion agreed to.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their honours that this house has appointed the Honourable the Speaker and Messieurs Adamson, Aylesworth, Black (Chateauguay-Huntingdon), Bruce, Cardiff, Castleden, Cloutier, Dion, Douglas, Eudes, Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont), Gauthier (Nipissing), Gourd, Gingues, Herridge, Henderson, Howe, Jaques, Kidd, Knight, Lapalme, Leger, Marrier, Marshall, Matthews (Brandon), McGarry, McIlraith, McKay, Menary, Mitchell, Mullins, Nixon, Pearkes, Probe, Reid, Richard (Ottawa East), Ross (St. Paul's), Skey, Smith (York North), Stephenson, White (Middlesex East), Winkler, Winters, Zaplitny, a committee to assist his honour the Speaker in the direction of the Library of Parliament, so far as the interests of the House of Commons are concerned, and to act on behalf of the House of Commons as members of a joint committee of both houses on the library.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

RAW CANE SUGAR

Mr. BLACKMORE:

1. In purchasing raw cane sugar during this war, did the sugar administration use a brokerage firm as an agent?

2. If so, is the deputy sugar administrator connected with such firm?

3. What commission was allowed such firm?

Mr. MAYHEW:

1. No.

2 and 3. Answered by 1.

Note—The sugar administration has never used any brokerage houses. Canadian brokerage houses are, however, employed and paid by the sellers of sugar exported to Canada.

HOUSING ACT—LENDING INSTITUTIONS

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax):

1. How many lending institutions in Nova Scotia have made application to be listed under the National Housing Act?

2. What are the names and addresses of firms, companies or corporations which have been approved?

Mr. MAYHEW:

1. Three. (Three other companies made preliminary enquiries but have not followed them up with applications for approval. One of these companies subsequently amalgamated with a company which has been approved.)

2. Eastern Canada Savings and Loan Company, Halifax, N.S.

Nova Scotia Savings, Loan and Building Society, 92-94 Granville Street, Halifax, N.S.

General Trust and Executor Corporation, Barrington at Prince, Halifax, N.S.

In addition the following companies, whose head offices are not in Nova Scotia, have made loans in that province under the National Housing Act, 1944:

Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada, Montreal, Quebec; The Canada Life Assurance Company, Toronto, Ontario.

SASKATCHEWAN IRRIGATION PROJECTS

Mr. BENTLEY:

1. What has been done with respect to proceeding with the irrigation project in the Duncairn, Swift Current, Waldeck, Rush Lake, Herbert, Morse, Hodgeville area?

2. What estimated time will be required to complete this work?

[Mr. Mackenzie.]

Mr. GARDINER:

1. Construction of irrigation works has been completed in the Duncairn, Swift Current, Waldeck and Rush Lake localities. Those of Duncairn and Swift Current were in operation in 1945. Water may be delivered to the farm lateral systems in the Waldeck and Rush Lake localities in 1946. The main supply channel has been constructed to the edge of the Herbert and Morse localities; construction of a pump station and a few miles of canal is required before water may be delivered to farm lateral systems of Herbert and Morse. The main canal supplying the Hodgeville locality is constructed as far as High Field reservoir; construction of a pump station and several miles of canal is required to supply water to farm lateral systems in the Hodgeville locality.

2. Construction in the Herbert and Morse localities would require six months for completion after commencement; that in the Hodgeville locality would require twelve months.

SHELBURNE HARBOUR NAVAL BASE

Mr. STANFIELD:

1. What was the total cost of the construction of the naval base at Shelburne Harbour, Nova Scotia?

2. Was the work done under contract or on a cost plus basis?

3. What are the, (a) names of firms employed in construction; (b) nature of work done by each; (c) amount paid to each?

4. Is the base used at present time and, if so, for what purpose?

5. Are any naval personnel stationed there at the present time, and, if so, how many?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax):

1. Total amount expended to 31 August, 1945, $4,029,751.10.

2. Both.

3. (a), (b), (c).

(1) Acadia Construction Co. Ltd., works and building, base generally, marine railway, drydock, $3,202,919.31.

(2) M. A. Condon & Son (through Department of Public Works), main wharf and approach boom, defence buildings, fencing, $344,424.10.

(3) James N. Kenney, wharf sub-station, heating and power lines, etc., $103,832.89.

(4) Horton Steel Works, fuel oil storage tanks, $20,002.00.

(5) National Iron Corp. Ltd., pipe and fittings for water supply, $32,656.62.

(6) Supreme Power Supplies, transformers for building No. 25, $2,192.

Note.—Work on the naval base was also done by the Departments of Public Works, Transport, National Defence for Air and Army and by the Canadian National Railways, particulars of which are as follows:

(1) The Department of Public Works, dredging and crane, grading and levelling, boom, defence grounds, $238,124.05.

(2) The Department of Transport, naval share of power, naval share reconstructing Sand Point road, $54,264.39.

(3) Department of National Defence (Air), fire alarm system, $2,265.11.

(4) Department of National Defence (Army), naval share, Diesel generator, $2,538.50.

(5) Canadian National Railways, railway sidings and spurs, $26,532.13.

Total amount, $4,029,751.10.

4. Shelburne is still in use as a refitting base and for storage of naval equipment and ammunition. Prior to the end of hostilities with Japan a number of ships allocated for service with the Royal Canadian Navy Pacific fleet were sent there for refit. These refits are being completed, and the ships are included among those which it is proposed to retain. Certain ships being declared surplus will, by arrangements with the War Assets Corporation, be sent to Shelburne to be winterized and will then be laid up in that port.

5. As at 28 September, 1945, there were 1,162 naval personnel stationed at Shelburne, Nova Scotia exclusive of naval personnel in ships based on Shelburne.

Mr. STANFIELD:

1. On whose recommendation and on what date was the site for the naval base at Shelburne Harbour, Nova Scotia, selected?

2. From what persons was the land purchased and how much was paid to each?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax):

1. Shelburne was originally recommended for the location of a defended harbour and small advance base by a special sub-committee of naval staff appointed to consider requirements for bases and fleet anchorages. This report was delivered to naval staff 25 June, 1940.

The war committee of the cabinet approved the establishment of a naval base at Shelburne on 17 July, 1940.

The actual site occupied on the harbour was selected following an investigation by experienced naval officers and engineers of the Department of Public Works. All possibilities were considered and the location now occupied selected as being the most suitable for naval development. The site was actually selected in September, 1940.

2. The following is a list of persons from whom land was purchased or expropriated and the amount paid to each of them:

Name	Amount
1. Howard Firth et al (Adam Firth Estate)	$2,239 50
2. Henry Ebson Goodick (Wm. Hill Estate)	161 00
3. Abigail Coffin, Ellen J. McGrath & Ralph Own McGrath et al (Penny Estate)	124 20
4. Municipality of the District of Shelburne	400 00
5. Martha S. Swansburg et al (Ellsworth Swansburg Estate)	622 50
6. Locksley & Elzear Crowe et al	900 00
7. Albert McCarthy et al (Andrew Clayton McCarthy Estate)	153 00
8. Bessie E. Ringer	150 00
9. The Colin C. King Estate	3,000 00
Total	$7,750 20

ST. CATHARINES STEEL PRODUCTS LTD.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. Has the government purchased or otherwise taken over the plant of the St. Catharines Steel Products Limited?

2. If so, upon what terms?

3. On what date was the transaction completed?

4. Was the equipment purchased as well?

5. If so, at what price and what terms?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. No, the plant in question was never owned by St. Catharines Steel Products Limited. The government in 1942 acquired the then existing part of the plant by expropriation, and has added to the plant from time to time since then. The whole plant has been, and still is, owned by the government. It was leased to St. Catharines Steel Products Limited for the production of munitions of war and supplies, and since this has now ceased the lease is being cancelled and the government is taking back possession of the plant.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. Answered by No. 1.

WAR ASSETS—DROP FRAME TRAILERS

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Has the War Assets Corporation been instructed to dispose of drop frame trailers owned by the crown?
2. If so, how many?
3. How many have been sold, and how many have been scrapped?
4. How many of such trailers remain to be disposed of?
5. What disposition is it proposed to make of them?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. No.
2. None.
3. None sold or scrapped.
4. None have yet been declared surplus.
5. Priorities will be filled, after which normal disposal procedure governing motor transport will be followed.

CANTEEN FUNDS

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Have all the recommendations of the special committee of the House of Commons on canteen funds been adopted and put into effect?

2. If not, what recommendations have not been adopted?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. No.

2. (a) Recommendation of special committee that 2 per cent levy be made on all gross sales was not implemented in view of recommendation of select committee that large surpluses be not accumulated.

(b) That profits from the national organization canteens operated overseas be paid to central trust fund. All surpluses from operation of national organization canteens overseas have been frozen by Department of War Services but funds have been used as working capital and will be subject to subsequent adjustment.

PROVINCE OF QUEBEC RADIO ACT

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Has the government referred the apparent infringement of federal jurisdiction by the province of Quebec under its recently enacted Provincial Radio Act, to the law officers of the crown?

2. If so, what is their opinion?

Mr. DORION: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I should like to draw your attention to the fact that this question is not in accordance with the rules of the house. According to standing order 44:

. . . in putting any such question or in replying to the same no argument or opinion is to be offered, nor any facts stated. . . .

I think there is an opinion offered in this question, and also a fact stated, in that it mentions "the apparent infringement". Therefore I think this question should be ruled out of order.

Mr. COLDWELL: On the point of order, may I just say that I do not express any opinion in the question. I use the words "apparent infringement"; I do not express an opinion that it is an infringement.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I must say that I agree entirely with the hon. member who raised the point of order. The use of the words "apparent infringement" leaves the definite suggestion there that there has been an infringement. It is almost a statement of alleged fact. I therefore suggest it should not be part of the question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

Mr. COLDWELL: I shall re-word it.

[Mr. McIlraith.]

Mr. MACKENZIE: Apparently you will.

Mr. COLDWELL: Apparently I will.

Question dropped.

GRANTS TO APPLE GROWERS

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie):

1. What is the total amount of grants voted by the dominion government to Canadian apple growers from September 1, 1939, to September 15, 1945?

2. What part of the total amount of grants was allotted to each province during the said period?

3. On what basis and under what conditions were such moneys granted to each of the nine provinces of Canada?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. $24 923,275.

2. Nova Scotia $20,032,735; Ontario $25,000; British Columbia $4,865,900. Not all expended.

3. Grants to Nova Scotia growers through the Nova Scotia apple marketing board and to Ontario growers through the Ontario fruit export association represented, mainly, compensation for the industrial absorption of apples rendered surplus through loss of overseas markets; grants to British Columbia growers through the British Columbia fruit board represented, mainly, partial absorption of loss in the f.o.b. price of apples for acceleration of sales in western Canada as a means of surplus absorption.

NATIONAL MEMORIAL

Mr. MACDONNELL:

Did the government consult, in connection with the plan for a national memorial mentioned in the speech from the throne, (a) with veterans' organizations of Canada to see if they approve of a national memorial taking the form proposed; (b) with representative bodies representing architecture, engineering, etc., to obtain their views?

Mr. MACKENZIE:

(a) While the decision as to the national war memorial is a responsibility of the government, it is proposed, when definite plans are available which can be placed before them, to consult the principal veterans' organizations. When the time comes for such consultation, it is expected that demobilization will have been completed or largely completed, and that the veterans' organizations will be representative of the veterans of the second as well as of the first great war; (b) the government has secured the services of Mr. Jacques Greber, architect and town planning expert of Paris, France, to advise with regard to the development of the national capital and its surrounding area. Mr. Greber was employed by the government before the war in developing plans for the beautification of the city of Ottawa. It was considered desirable that the work already begun by Mr. Greber should be completed by him. In addition, the government is, of course, availing itself of the services of the permanent technical experts of the federal district commission and of the Department of Public Works. As the plans for the development of the national capital are worked out it is probable that additional expert assistance will be required from time to time. In this connection, the government has every intention of availing itself of the services of Canadian architects, engineers and town planners.

METLAKATLA INDIANS

Mr. ARCHIBALD:

What action has been taken by the government with respect to the application of the Metlakatla Indians of the west coast for the franchise?

Mr. GLEN: The request is now being considered and steps are being taken under the provisions of the Indian Act to appoint a board to consider the application.

CEILING PRICE ON WHEAT—OTHER EXPORT PRODUCTS

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. In view of the government's policy of preserving the present ceiling price of $1.55 for No. 1 northern wheat, basis Fort William and Vancouver, for the present crop year, are any other Canadian export products including textiles, lumber and pulp subject to similar ceilings for the same period?

2. If so, what products?

Mr. MacKINNON: I had intended speaking to the hon. member regarding this question, but I have not had an opportunity. The reason I am answering this question verbally is to bring to the attention of the house and to the country, if necessary, the mistaken premise contained therein. The announcement did not limit the ceiling price, did not give a ceiling price on wheat for this crop year. I merely stated that directions had been issued to the wheat board to offer wheat for the time being at $1.55 a bushel. The price may be higher before the end of the crop year, I do not know; but at the present time wheat is being offered at $1.55.

I have no wish to avoid answering the question, but in connection with the latter part of the question I can only say that consideration will be given to the other commodities the hon. member mentions in the light of conditions as they exist when these matters come up for discussion.

Mr. GRAYDON: That sounds like the Prime Minister.

AIR SERVICES—MARITIME PROVINCES

Mr. McCULLOCH (Pictou):

1. Have applications been received by any branch of the government for permission to operate a new network of air connections in the eastern maritime provinces?

2. If so, (a) from what company or companies; (b) where are their headquarters; (c) what are the names of places to be served; (d) location of terminals (i) Nova Scotia; (ii) New Brunswick; (iii) Prince Edward Island; (e) what type of plane will be used; (f) will it be an all year service?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. Yes. The air transport board has received applications from Maritime Central Airways Limited and Pulsifer Brothers Limited for licence to operate air services in the eastern maritime provinces.

2. (a) Answered by 1.

(b) (1) Maritime Central Airways Limited —Charlottetown, P.E.I., (2) Pulsifer Brothers Limited—Halifax, N.S.

(c) (1) Maritime Central Airways Limited: Moncton, N.B., Amherst, N.S., Truro, N.S., New Glasgow, N.S., Sydney, N.S., Greenwood, N.S., Yarmouth, N.S., Halifax, N.S., Saint John N.B., Sydney, N.S., Charlottetown, P.E.I. (2) Pulsifer Brothers Limited: Operating from bases at New Glasgow aerodrome located at Trenton, N.S., and at Waterville, N.S., to serve any point in maritimes within operating range of aircraft.

(d) (1) Maritime Central Airways Limited.

Terminals: (i) Nova Scotia, New Glasgow, Yarmouth, Greenwood, Sydney, Halifax; (ii) New Brunswick: Moncton, Saint John; (iii) P.E.I.: Charlottetown.

(2) Pulsifer Brothers Limited.

Terminals: (1) Nova Scotia: New Glasgow Aerodrome at Trenton, N.S.; Waterville; (ii) New Brunswick; (iii) P.E.I.

(e) (1) Maritime Central Airways Limited.

Type of Aircraft: Lockheed 10A, Lockheed 10B, Lockheed 12A, Rapide 89A.

(2) Pulsifer Brothers Limited.

Type of Aircraft: Tiger Moth, Cub Cruiser.

(f) Yes, for both operators.

BONDING OF TRUCKS, WINDSOR TO NIAGARA FALLS

Mr. COYLE:

1. Does the bonding of trucks from the U.S.A., travelling over highway No. 3 from Windsor to Niagara Falls still prevail?

2. If so, when will this operation cease?

Mr. McCANN:

1. Yes.

2. The privilege of trucking in bond over the route referred to was authorized following representations from the government of the United States that it would be helpful to the war effort. Arrangements such as these involving international co-operation should not be terminated without consultation, and the only answer which can be given to this question at the moment is that the matter is receiving consideration.

VETERANS' LAND ACT—MANITOBA

Mr. JUTRAS:

1. How many veterans of this war have been settled in Manitoba under the Veterans' Land Act?

2. What is the average size farm settled on under the act and at what cost?

3. How many have settled in the electoral district of Provencher, and what are the locations of such by land description?

Mr. TUCKER:

1. Applications for financial assistance approved, as of August 31, 1945—131.

2. 201·85 acres. $4,071.10 for land and permanent improvements and $1,095.46 for livestock and equipment.

3. No veterans have been established under the act in the electoral district of Provencher.

INCOME TAX DIVISION—VANCOUVER AND VICTORIA

Mr. PEARKES:

1. In what building or buildings, in the city of Vancouver, is the divisional office of the income tax division located?

2. How many persons are employed in that office?

3. How many people are employed in the branch office located in Victoria?

Mr. McCANN:

1. Winch Building, 739 Hastings St. W.

2. Six hundred and two.

3. Twenty.

HOUSING—VANCOUVER

Mr. MERRITT:

1. Of the 1,200 houses for veterans contracted to be built in the city of Vancouver by Wartime Housing Ltd., by contract dated in or about the month of July or the early part of August, 1945, how many were under construction on, (a) the 1st September, 1945; (b) the 1st October, 1945, and how many were completed at the 1st October, 1945?

2. What is the average estimated time required for the completion of one of these houses?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. The agreement referred to was entered into with the city of Vancouver whereby Wartime Housing Limited undertook to erect 1,100 houses and the city agreed to provide improved lots for the construction of these houses. Lots are still being allocated by the city of Vancouver and as of September 27, 1945, lots for approximately 800 houses had been allocated by the city.

(a) As of September 1, 1945, the construction of 250 houses had been contracted for.

(b) As of October 1, 1945, the construction of 800 houses had been contracted for.

No houses were completed as of October 1, 1945, but it is expected—depending upon weather and other conditions—that completed houses will be delivered starting approximately December 1, 1945, at the rate of several houses per day.

2. On a contract for 250 houses, deliveries of completed houses generally start about four months after the date of letting the contract, with completion of the last house approximately ten months' time from the date of letting the contract.

SELECTIVE SERVICE—VANCOUVER

Mr. MERRITT:

1. How many, (a) male; (b) female, employment vacancies were recorded in the national selective service offices in Vancouver on 26th September, 1945?

2. How many, (a) male; (b) female, applicants for employment were so listed on said date?

3. Of the male vacancies, how many were in, (a) the logging, sawmill or other woodworking industry; (b) mining; (c) other manufacturing industry; (d) the construction industry; (e) others?

4. What were, (a) maximum; (b) minimum, rates of pay offered in each classification under question three?

5. What was the general classification of vacancies for female employment, stating particularly how many of the existing vacancies were for domestic service?

6. What were the, (a) maximum; (b) minimum, rates of pay offered for female workers?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. The figures for September 26, 1945, are not available. Those given are for September 28, 1945—5,502 male, 1,721 female employment vacancies in Vancouver on September 28, 1945.

2. 5,673 male, 2,129 female applicants for employment, same day.

3. Of the male vacancies, there were 793 in logging, sawmill or other woodworking industry; 388 in mining; 2,148 in other manufacturing industry; 479 skilled and 149 semi-skilled in construction industry, and a total of 1,545 unskilled in all other male employment.

4. In logging, sawmill or other woodworking industry, maximum and minimum rates of pay were 60c to $1.50 per hour. In mining the rates were $4.62 to $7.55 per day. In other manufacturing industry, the rates were 50c to $1.12½ per hour. In construction industry, the rates were 50c to $1.31½ per hour; and in all others, the rates were between 50c and $1.31 per hour.

5. The general classification of vacancies in female employment were clerical workers, sales workers, household workers, waitresses, kitchen workers, textile workers, miscellaneous workers and cooks. There were 220 unfilled vacancies for domestic service.

6. The maximum and minimum rates of pay for these workers were, for clerical workers, $15 to $25 per week; sales workers, $15 to $25 per week; household workers, $20 to $60 per month, with board and room; waitresses, $15 to $18 per week, with meals; kitchen workers, $15 to $18 per week, with meals; textile workers, 36c to 65c per hour; miscellaneous workers, 30c to 62c per hour, and cooks, $22 per week.

*HOSPITALIZATION OF P.E.I. WAR VETERANS

Mr. McLURE:

What is the total number of Prince Edward Island veterans of this and the last war who are patients in hospitals in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, and other parts of Canada?

Mr. TUCKER: On being advised of the tremendous amount of work and expense entailed in obtaining an answer to this question, the hon. member who asked it was good enough to agree to have it dropped.

Question dropped.

EMPIRE PREFERENCES

Mr. THATCHER:

Has the Canadian government received any recent request from the government of the United States, asking Canada to agree to the abolition of her empire preferential tariffs?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No.

REPRESENTATIONS AS TO NEWFOUNDLAND BECOMING PROVINCE OF CANADA

Mr. THATCHER:

Has the administration received any representations during the past year, either from the British government or from Newfoundland indicating the willingness or desire of the latter, to join the Dominion of Canada as a tenth province?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No.

NATIONAL WAR SERVICES—POSTAL CENSORSHIP

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's):

1. How many employees are on the staff of the postal censorship branch of the Department of National War Services?

2. Are any of the employees of this staff being sent to Germany?

3. If so, how many; what are their names, addresses, ages, racial origin; what languages can they speak, and are they to be maintained by the government of Canada?

4. What is the estimated cost to Canada, (a) for each employee; (b) total?

Mr. McCANN:

1. 45.

2. None.

3 and 4. Answered by No. 2.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

RAW CANE SUGAR

Mr. BLACKMORE:

1. During each of the years 1940, 1941, 1942, 1943, 1944 and 1945 up to September 12: (a) how many pounds of raw cane sugar did the sugar administration import into Canada; (b) what was the total purchase price in Canadian currency paid for this imported raw cane sugar by the sugar administration f.o.b. seaboard; (c) what was the average price per cwt. so paid?

Mr. BLACKMORE:

1. On the raw cane sugar which the Canadian sugar administration imported in the years 1940, 1941, 1942, 1943, 1944, and up to September 12, 1945, did the sugar administration make a profit or suffer a loss in each of the above mentioned years?

2. What was the amount of profit or loss in each of the years indicated?

3. What was the average profit or loss per 100 pounds in each of the above years?

4. As a result of such purchases and sales of raw cane sugar by the sugar administration of Canada, how much money has been accumulated in the sugar stabilization fund over the operations of the whole period indicated?

CANE AND BEET SUGAR

Mr. BRYCE:

1. What quantities and from which countries did Canada import its raw cane sugar supplies in 1939?

2. What was the cost of same, f.o.b. seaboard in Canadian currency?

3. What was the value of Canada's exports to the countries which supplied Canada with raw sugar?

4. How many pounds of granulated white beet sugar is the full capacity of all six Canadian sugar beet factories?

5. What was the amount of Canada's beet sugar production in each year from 1937 to 1944 inclusive?

Mr. BRYCE:

1. Is there any difference between the ceiling price (wholesale) of cane sugar and beet sugar as allowed by the sugar administration in Canada?

2. Has the Canadian government at any time restricted by regulation or otherwise limited beet sugar production in Canada?

3. What is the total amount paid into the price stabilization fund established by the sugar administrator, June, 1940, by the beet sugar industry?

4. Has the paying to the fund increased the cost of beet sugar to the consumer? If so, by how much?

ENLISTMENTS FROM P.E.I.

Mr. McLURE:

What is the total number of enlistments in the armed forces during the period of the war of persons giving their domicile as Prince Edward Island?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

BEAUTIFICATION OF OTTAWA—JACQUES GREBER

Mr. BOUCHER:

For a copy of all reports made to the government and/or the federal district commission by Jacques Greber on the beautification of Ottawa.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I have no objection to the motion passing, with the customary reservation in case there are any confidential papers—I do not think there are.

Motion agreed to.

SEMI-PERMANENT WARTIME HOUSES

Mr. FRASER:

For a copy of all letters, reports, contracts or agreements in possession of any department of the government in regard to the building of semi-permanent wartime houses.

Mr. FRASER: May I say in regard to this motion that I had a conversation with the minister's office and I would be quite satisfied if I could receive copies of contracts and agreements. I do not need the letters or reports.

Mr. HOWE: May I suggest that if my hon. friend will limit further his request it will help us considerably. There are several hundred contracts. If he could suggest any particular contracts that he would like to have, he would get the reply that much sooner.

Mr. FRASER: I shall call the minister's office on that. Subject to the reservation mentioned, I should like the motion to pass.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

Mr. FRASER: No.

Motion stands.

DISALLOWANCE OF PROVINCIAL LEGISLATION

Mr. COLDWELL:

For a copy of applications for disallowance of dominion-provincial legislation, made and refused since 1920, by years and provinces.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Speaker, I am informed that a pamphlet was published in 1938 dealing with all applications for disallowance from confederation up to that date. If it is agreeable to the house I should like to file a copy of that pamphlet as a part of the return and then comply with the terms of the motion from the date dealt with in the pamphlet to the present time.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is quite satisfactory.

PETITCODIAC RIVER POWER DEVELOPMENT

Mr. HAZEN:

For a copy of all correspondence, reports and surveys in the possession of any department of the government in connection with the proposed Petitcodiac river power development.

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION—WOLVERINE CREEK, SASK., WATER PROJECT

Mr. BURTON:

For a copy of all correspondence, reports and other documents in the possession of the department, regarding the construction of a dam in Wolverine creek, approximately five miles southeast of Humboldt, Saskatchewan, under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, along with a statement showing, (a) who recommended this construction; (b) cost of preconstruction survey and testing; (c) cost of construction; (d) total cost; (e) amount of water impounded by the dam; (f) tests made.

HUDSON BAY ROUTE

Mr. KNIGHT:

For a copy of all reports made to the dominion government by the United States government of a survey made during the recent war by the United States government of the weather conditions of the waters and of the air over the waters of what is generally known as the Hudson's bay route.

Mr. CHEVRIER: With the understanding that none of this correspondence or reports is confidential or secret, I have no objection to the motion passing.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP

AVAILABILITY TO PERSONS OF CERTAIN RESIDENCE OR BIRTH QUALIFICATIONS

On the order:

Notices of motions—Mr. Castleden—the following proposed resolution—That, in the opinion of this house, it is in the best interests of Canada to establish a distinctive Canadian citizenship, which shall be available to all persons of certain residence or birth qualifications within the dominion.

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, this resolution proposes the establishment of a distinctive Canadian citizenship, available to all persons of certain residence or birth qualifications within the dominion. I notice on the order paper under the name of the Secretary of State (Mr. Martin) a bill which was allowed to stand to-day respecting nationality, citizenship, naturalization and the status of aliens. If I could have the assurance of the Secretary of State that the bill he is to introduce does provide such citizenship, I should be quite willing to let this motion drop.

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Secretary of State): The hon. gentleman was kind enough to discuss this matter with me earlier. As the speech from the throne indicated, the bill standing in my name will create the status of citizenship. It will not only meet the point the hon. gentleman has in mind; it will go much farther.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: In the circumstances I am prepared to let the motion drop.

Motion dropped.

BILL OF RIGHTS

PROTECTION OF MINORITIES, CIVIL AND RELIGIOUS LIBERTIES, ETC.

On the order:

Notices of motions—Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North)—the following proposed resolution—

That, in the opinion of this house, there should be incorporated in the constitution a bill of rights protecting minority rights, civil and religious liberties, freedom of speech and freedom of assembly; establishing equal treatment before the law of all citizens, irrespective of race, nationality or religious or political beliefs; and providing the necessary democratic powers to eliminate racial discrimination in all its forms.

Mr. ALISTAIR STEWART (Winnipeg North): I find myself in the same position as the previous speaker. My motion asks for a bill of rights dealing with certain aspects of the citizenship of the people of Canada. In view of the fact that the Secretary of State is going to introduce his bill, and I have some assurance that the things I should like to see in it will be discussed in this house, I am quite willing that this motion should be dropped.

Motion dropped.

LIVE STOCK

PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR REGULATION AND CONTROL

Mr. WILLIAM BRYCE (Selkirk) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into immediate consideration the advisability of appointing a board of live stock commissioners in Canada, for the purpose of regulating and controlling the assembling, transporting, grading, marketing and exporting of live stock and live stock products.

He said: There is no branch of agriculture, Mr. Speaker, in which there is as much confusion as exists in connection with live stock to-day. We have a great many government appointed boards, committees, supervisors, inspectors and investigators, all of whom appear to lack the cohesion necessary for the efficient operation of this important branch of agriculture. I therefore appeal for legislation to be enacted by the federal government to make possible the creation of a board of live stock commissioners, the majority of the members of which shall be recommended by farm organizations. This board would parallel in a general way the work done by the board of grain commissioners in the regulation of the grain trade.

Might I point out to the house that this is not a political gesture but something the farmers have fought for ever since I came to Canada twenty-six years ago. Farm organizations all over the dominion have repeatedly asked for this legislation. I do not intend to take up the time of the house by reading all the resolutions which would prove my statement, but I am going to quote from the brief presented to the cabinet by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture in February, 1944:

> This federation desires to repeat its request of former years that the federal government should establish a board of live stock commissioners, with powers and duties similar to those of the board of grain commissioners. It requests that the said board be empowered to administer, under the Department of Agriculture, the Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act, and that the members of the board shall be appointed in consultation with organized agriculture. The Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act should be amended and consolidated with other legislation in order to vest in the board the power to license, regulate and control the facilities for assembling, transporting, yarding, slaughtering, processing and packing, together with the facilities for grading and selling all live stock and carcass products designed for human consumption. . . .

Their recommendation in this connection in the brief presented to the cabinet in February, 1945, was quite short, and I am going to place it on record also:

> We again wish to record our sincere conviction that many of the problems of live stock marketing as regards assembling, grading, price differentials, transportation, processing, and the regulations governing these matters, can best be solved by the appointment of a board of live stock commissioners. We therefore repeat our request, made on previous occasions, for the setting up of such a board.

This board should be empowered to administer, under the Department of Agriculture, the Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act; and the members of the board should be appointed in consultation with organized agriculture. The act should be amended and consolidated with other legislation in order to vest in the board power to license, regulate and control the facilities for assembling, transporting, yarding, slaughtering, processing and packing, together with the facilities for the grading and selling of live stock and carcass products designed for human consumption. The board should have power to make such levy on the products under its jurisdiction as may be necessary to defray the cost of its operations.

Speaking on a previous occasion in the house, I said that some of the surplus money accumulated in the condemnation fund could quite easily be put to that purpose. With such a board in operation it should be possible to deal satisfactorily with many causes of difficulty and dissatisfaction to producers, which frequently arise. It would be of particular importance in developing a system of grading live stock and live stock products under which standards of grading to consumers in Canada, or for the export trade, and to producers might be coordinated as closely as practicable.

I wish to direct the attention of the government to the disability suffered by live stock producers from time to time, when the congestion of transportation facilities, packing plants or cold storage warehouses prevents live stock in process of marketing from being disposed of or being delivered for sale at the normal plant or slaughter-house. In the past western Canada has shipped hogs over two thousand miles to have them slaughtered. This is a serious business, and we hope that sort of thing will never occur again. I am also of opinion that existing price control regulations do not provide adequate protection to cattle producers. To-day certain classes of cattle are selling at below their value. It should also be pointed out that favourable weather conditions this fall have enabled producers to maintain an orderly movement of cattle to market It is obvious that any break in weather conditions would bring a rush of cattle to market which would immediately aggravate the situation.

There has been a pronounced trend in Canada toward larger business organizations, and in many cases toward monopolistic markets. The meat packing industry, and other distributing organizations have in general followed this trend, and a large part of the purchasing of western live stock is done by three companies. The concentration of buying power in the hands of three firms is a serious situation. Concentration in the buying of live stock has been accompanied by the weakening of the position of the producer as a marketer. The protection which the producer had in the public market has now practically disappeared.

It is my view that the position with respect to the marketing of live stock is simply that buying is now concentrated in a relatively few hands, and selling is largely disorganized and ineffective. Under these conditions we cannot expect adequate provisions making for a sound live stock industry in Canada.

Since 1920 a great change has taken place in the method of marketing live stock, and particularly in that of marketing hogs. This change came in the form of direct buying by the packers, and a decreased use of public markets. In 1920 only about five per cent of Canadian hogs went direct to the plants, whereas in 1938 we find that eighty-five per cent of all hogs went direct. Whatever strength or weaknesses were involved in the public markets system, it used to perform an important function, namely that of providing a meeting place for buyers and sellers, and of registering from day to day price levels which reflected competitive bidding for the vast proportion of live stock marketed in Canada.

At the same time, with sixty-five per cent of our live stock going direct to the packing plants, and only thirty-five per cent passing through the public market it cannot be said that the public market is a proper indicator of the value of live stock, because packing houses to a very considerable extent are now independent of the supplies which come on the public market.

If, as a result of direct buying, values are not finally established in the public yards, price making for live stock is not a matter of public negotiation. Under these circumstances prices of live stock are largely determined on the basis of the prices packing houses are prepared to offer on any particular day, and not as a result of a thorough bargaining process.

It may be argued that under a system of direct buying, bargaining actually does take place between the producer or his representative or agent, and the packers, in so far as the packer must offer a price sufficient to induce the producer to sell in the desired quantities. This situation, of course, is not significant in the practical marketing of hogs because, owing to the grading regulations now laid down, the producer has little or no choice as to the time at which he will sell his product. Penalties are attached to overweight and underweight hogs, and these strict grading regulations have limited the choice which the farmer may exercise in respect of the time at which he sells his hogs. His product must be sold, no matter what the offered price may be.

The board would give continuous study to the steps necessary to make more efficient and satisfactory the services of our public central markets, and the insurance of competitive bidding in the sale of live stock.

Direct shipment to packing plants has developed very rapidly and, if increased to any marked extent, may make doubtful the continuation of our public markets. This would mean a monopoly of buying in the hands of the packing plants. Such a development would have serious consequences to our producers.

The whole problem demands serious study. One-half of all the hogs delivered at the stockyards in 1938 arrived by truck, and in the same year one-third of the cattle came by truck. If truck shipments delivered direct to the packing plants were included, the percentage of the total shipped in this way would be considerably increased.

One thing we must remember is that the man who trucks stock to the market is a trucker; he is not a producer. He is more concerned about a full pay load than about the selling of the animals. Two complaints are brought against the method of marketing. One is that it is claimed that packers buy live stock from truckers at less than stockyard prices. A check made by investigators for the price spreads commission in the month of March, 1934, seems to support this contention. The packer has complete freedom of grading, when buying direct. In addition, direct purchases are made on an off-car basis, while in the stockyards animals are fed and watered before being sold. This may make a difference of seventy-five pounds in a 1,000-pound cow. The farmer saves the commission merchant's fee, the stockyard charges and part of the freight he would otherwise have to pay. In spite of these savings, it is probable that he obtains from direct sales a smaller net return than could be obtained from selling on the public yards.

Secondly, it is argued that the weakening of the stockyards system by a process of direct sales is deterimental to the producer. This seems a reasonable argument. The elimination of the central competitive market would probably put the producer at a considerable disadvantage in selling to two or three large buyers. If we are to establish fair economic returns, and security for primary producers, I do not believe we can ever again rely upon the automatic processes of what in the thirties was erroneously termed a free competitive market. Such automatic processes broke down hopelessly in the depression years, and are now almost completely discarded as incapable of the supreme test of war-time conditions.

In one of his speeches Mr. Donald Gordon, chairman of the war-time prices and trade board, said:

> Selfish and private interests must be ruled out completely and the competitive system must be replaced with one which is based entirely upon the criterion of maximum production.

Having failed us in these two periods, it would in all probability be disastrous to risk the return to such automatic processes in the post-war period, one which promises to be the third and not the least of a series of national emergencies. I am therefore suggesting that the live stock industry in Canada should be brought under public regulation through a board of live stock commissioners, and that that board be constituted with producer appointed representation thereon. Such a board might be composed of nine members. Of these the chairman, vice-chairman and one other member should be salaried and devote their full time to problems of the live stock industry. The others should be representative of producers, consumers, government services and the packing industry. They should attend meetings when required and serve without remuneration, except for fees and expenses for each meeting.

The powers accorded to this board should cover, among others, the following points:

1. The administration of the grading of live stock.
2. The regulation of all purchasing agencies, including country buyers.
3. The regulation of public and private live stock markets.
4. The establishment and maintenance of export standards.
5. The hearing and investigation of complaints from producers, marketers or processors with respect to any live stock problem.
6. The regulation and publication of grade discounts.
7. The supervision and auditing of condemnation insurance.
8. Continuous study of the economic basis of the live stock industry, including:

(a) Methods of stabilizing live stock prices.

(b) Methods of securing a better seasonable distribution of marketing.

(c) Methods of securing and maintaining adequate feed supplies and promoting their distribution within Canada.

(d) Methods of improving the quality of live stock.

(e) Promotional work in securing export markets.

(f) Methods of narrowing the spread between prices to the producer and prices to the consumer.

(g) Methods of extending research and statistical facilities.

(h) All other matters affecting the live stock industry.

In conclusion, I would say that farmer representation on such a live stock board should be the strongest available. It is no place for political appointments. The greatest interest in the live stock industry is the interest of the men and women who produce the live stock, and it is a matter of prime importance that they be fully and adequately represented on such a body. I hope the government will do something about this matter without any further delay.

Mr. MARK C. SENN (Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a good deal of attention to the arguments which have been advanced by the hon. member who introduced this motion. I think this motion is of extreme importance to the farmers of Canada. For many years the production of live stock has been an important branch of agriculture, not only in this country but I believe in every country of any consequence in the world.

If the fertility of our soil is to be maintained our farmers must not grow crops year after year without returning something to the land. Such a course may be successful for a while, but the land will finally become exhausted and crop failures will be the inevitable result. It is a proven fact that the best way to maintain the fertility of the soil is to raise animals on the farm. I think it is also a proven fact that the best way to market our crops is to feed them to live stock and then market the live stock. The production of live stock has steadily and gradually increased in Canada for a great many years, and this increase has been very marked indeed during the years of the war.

In a return brought down in answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) it was shown that the hog population of Canada in 1939 was 4,360,000. In 1943 it had risen to over 6,000,000. The cattle population in 1939 was 4,693,000, and this had risen to over 6,000,000 in 1944. Another return showed that the value of cattle marketed in Canada in 1944 was $202,000,000 odd. The value of hogs marketed during the same year was $323,000,000. The value of sheep marketed was over $12,000,000. The over-all total was $538,000,000 worth of live stock marketed in Canada during 1944.

These figures illustrate clearly the importance of the live stock industry to agriculture generally throughout Canada. It is an obvious fact that this live stock is produced by thousands of farmers. There are over 740,000 farmers in the Dominion of Canada, and well over sixty per cent of those farmers produce live stock on their farms in some way or another.

It is an obvious fact too that production is only the first stage in the live stock industry. It is manifestly impossible for a farmer to slaughter his animals and process them for domestic consumption or for the foreign market. The result is that a large army of men has grown up throughout the country for the purpose of collecting, processing, grading and distributing our live stock. This army of men is continually taking a toll of consumer prices that are realized and on the whole, the producer must be satisfied with what is left. Middlemen are indispensable in the live stock industry, because they are performing a useful and necessary service. They must have an adequate reward for the performance of those services, but I think it is apparent to everybody that the time has come when some control of this vast and intricate system should be set up.

As the mover of the resolution has stated, a similar condition prevailed at one time in the wheat trade, and the board of grain commissioners was finally set up under the grain act to control and regulate all aspects of the wheat trade. At the time that board was set up there was considerable opposition, and I have no doubt that there will be considerable opposition to the idea outlined in this motion. However, I wonder if there is anyone in this country who would advocate a return to the conditions in the grain trade that prevailed before the board of grain commissioners was set up; I wonder if there is anyone who would advocate its abolition. I do not believe there is anyone in Canada who would do such a thing.

No doubt the same arguments that were advanced when the board of grain commissioners was set up will be advanced at this time. It will be argued that there is machinery already in the Department of Agriculture to regulate and control the live stock industry in all its aspects. It is true that there are many capable men in the Department of Agriculture; they have done good work, and I can find no fault with them or with the work they have done. At the beginning of the war, under the War Measures Act, a number of boards were set up, what you might term war boards. The first was the agricultural supplies board. It would not be possible for me to read into Hansard at this time all the duties that were conferred upon that board by the order in council which set it up. One principal thing, the basis of all duties which were enumerated there, was:

> To direct and regulate through the various dominion and provincial agricultural services and through advisory boards representative of the industry which are already constituted, or which may be established, the production, preparation and conservation of farm products.

A little later an agricultural food board was set up under order in council P.C. 5163. Briefly, the duties of this board are as follows:

Subject to the approval of the Minister of Agriculture and in cooperation with the agricultural supplies board to develop and direct the policies and measures of the Department of Agriculture for the wartime production of food.

A third board, known as the bacon board, was set up, and that board was later renamed and reconstituted as the meat board. It had certain powers, and I want to read one or two of them to the committee, because I believe it shows how important they are, and to what extent their powers could go if they carried them all out. May I say in passing that the meat board did take over the export trade in meat products to, I believe, all the countries of the world. At least the export trade which had formerly been carried on by private enterprise was taken over by this meat board. Here is one of the things they were allowed to do under the powers conferred upon them:

To determine the prices which shall be paid to packers or other persons for meat delivered for export. . . .

And so on. They were to determine the prices which should be paid to packers. Under another clause, paragraph (e), they have power to fix the minimum price to be paid by packers or other persons for live stock. I do not believe they ever exercised that power, but it indicates how broad their powers are and how necessary it seemed at the beginning of the war that there should be some supervision of the meat trade. I suppose that when the War Measures Act goes out of force, or very soon afterwards, these boards, unfortunately, will automatically cease. Whether they do or not, I think I have said enough to prove that some kind of supervision is necessary over the whole live stock industry if it is to flourish as it should.

What are some of the reasons why a live stock commission should be set up? Just speaking in generalities, because I do not want to go into particulars, I would first say that they should see that the farmer, who is the primary producer, gets a square deal. They should see that the farmer receives a fair share of the consumer's dollar. They should see as well that efficient production of live stock is made possible for the live stock producer. I think they should also ensure—from the other angle—that the consumer is not exploited. They should see that he does not have to pay too much for services rendered in bringing meat products to the consumer's door. They should see as well that the spread between producer and consumer prices does not widen and continue to widen as it has done in days gone by, but on the other hand is reduced to the narrowest possible margin consistent with giving a fair return to the middlemen who have to process and distribute the food. To accomplish this, the proposed live stock commission should, as the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce) has said, be free from political influence, and I believe its powers should be clearly defined by amendments of the present live stock act. May I point out in passing that the leader of the party to which I have the honour to belong advocated at Lethbridge in 1943 that a live stock commission should be set up with powers somewhat similar to those of the board of grain commissioners.

Reference has been made by a previous speaker, and by myself, to the fact that the wheat board has done a remarkable piece of work for the people of this country, and particularly for wheat producers. But that is not the only board which has been set up for similar purposes. In 1933 the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization conducted an exhaustive examination of the fluid milk trade throughout the dominion. It was an extended investigation; there are some thousand pages of the report. It was pointed out at that time that the fluid milk trade operates mainly within the boundaries of the provinces and is therefore under provincial control, but there is a recommendation in the report which I think should be of interest to parliament at this time. It is this:

Your committee recommends that tribunals should be set up vested with authority to settle differences between producers' and distributors' organizations and, if necessary, to fix the returns to the producers and the prices charged the consumer.

Following that, some six provinces set up boards to exercise supervision over the fluid milk trade, and I am sure everyone will agree that the results have been very beneficial indeed. I know at least that in Ontario, with which I am better acquainted than with any other part of the dominion, higher prices to farmer producers were obtained than could have been realized otherwise. The price to the farmer has been stabilized and he has been given some feeling of security by these boards which have been set up.

Let me go a little further. Ten years ago there was set up a royal commission on price spreads. That commission made an extensive study of all phases of the live stock industry, and the report makes very interesting reading. It investigated the production, the collection, the processing and the marketing of live stock products of all kinds.

Its conclusions were clear-cut and were given somewhat in detail. I believe that conditions to-day would be somewhat similar if it were not for the war years and for the fact that we have boards set up already which, as I have already remarked, I assume will go out of existence when the War Measures Act is repealed.

One paragraph of the report was devoted to the stockyards and the public markets. The chief criticism which was offered in the report was the lack of competitive buying in the yards. In the early history of the stockyards there were many buyers on the market, but as the years went by the numbers grew less and less; many of the smaller packing plants were eliminated, either by mergers or by absorption in bigger plants; and then there was the other question of direct shipment, with which I shall deal in a few moments. The report also states that there was evidence of arrangements between buyers. One sentence in that report has special significance and a particular bearing on the commission now under discussion. It is this:

> When many competing sellers are faced by few buyers who act in concert or who tacitly agree to follow the lead of larger buyers, exploitation becomes possible.

This is true to-day as it was in those days.

Another paragraph deals with the retailing of meat products by stores. Chain store activities came in for criticism because of the use of "loss leaders" and inequalities in prices. Then the matter of direct shipments was dealt with, and a recommendation was made by the commission which I wish to read; it is very short:

> Direct shipments of live stock should be subject to the same rules of weighing, grading, publication of prices, deliveries, and supervision, as shipments to the public stockyards.

I believe that if that were done by the live stock commission it would very nearly meet the ideas of the hon. member who introduced this motion. It also urged that strict supervision of the export trade should be undertaken. One could mention at some length other features which were discussed and recited as proof of the need of greater supervision of the whole live stock trade. Their recommendations, as I have said, were clear and concise. It will only take a moment or two to read what they have to say in their final recommendation which was brought down late in the year 1935:

> As a step toward the solution of some at least of the problems which we have outlined, we recommend the establishment of a live stock board, under appropriate jurisdiction.
> The duties of the board should include, among others, the following:
> (a) The prompt dissemination of information to producers and the trade generally, in respect to production, marketing, stocks, and prices, both export and domestic.
> (b) Administrative jurisdiction in matters connected with all phases of live stock marketing and in connection with disputes between producers, processors, etc.
> (c) Licensing and supervision of truckers, dealers and export packers; where necessary in cooperation with provincial authorities;
> (d) Adequate inspection of all marketing stages and action to correct abuses;
> (e) Cooperation with producers, processors and the trade generally, to ensure as far as possible a balance between production and available markets;
> (f) To encourage the organization of producers of live stock for regular and orderly marketing;
> (g) Improvement of quality of all live stock;
> (h) The formation of a uniform policy on external marketing, with a view not only to promoting new, but also retaining and developing, existing markets.
> (i) The stabilization of supplies, and the regulation of quality to each particular market;
> (j) The utilization of all available means to secure fair returns to the primary producers of good stock.

The powers that the board should have under these recommendations coincide very well indeed with these powers which were outlined by the hon. member who brought this resolution into the house. This recommendation is very definite. It is strictly in line with the pronouncement made by the leader of my party (Mr. Bracken) in his Lethbridge speech, and having been a member of the royal commission on price spreads. I agree with that report and its recommendations. I have always thought since that it would be in the interests of the live stock industry at large.

One more matter. The live stock industry is now faced with a very serious situation. If the threatened strike of packing house workers materializes, the effect on the live stock industry in this season of heavy shipments will be disastrous. I was surprised yesterday when the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), in reply to a question on the orders of the day, stated that the government could do nothing about the matter.

Mr. GARDINER: I did not say that.

Mr. SENN: The minister's statement was pretty close to it.

Mr. GARDINER: I answered the question, if these men did go on strike what could the government do in order to remove the difficulties that the farmers would have? I said there was not very much that could be done to remove the prejudice if they did go on strike.

Mr. SENN: The minister said there was nothing he could do. I think there is something that could be done even then, but it should be done earlier. According to a statement made recently by the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, Canada is still at war and the War Measures Act is still in effect. It is not altogether the proper thing for the Minister of Labour to state that this is a matter that is up to the province. While the War Measures Act is in effect the federal authority is supreme and has a right to do as it likes in these matters. I urge that the question be dealt with immediately if the producers are to be saved from the consequences which would inevitably follow a strike at this particular time.

I think it is unanimously conceded that the establishment of a board of grain commissioners has been of decided advantage to the people of Canada and to the grain trade, and I think it is equally true that the provincial boards set up to deal with the operations of the fluid milk trade have greatly benefited both the producer and the consumer. I therefore ask the government to take into serious consideration the recommendation made in this motion, and in fact to adopt the motion as a forward step for the benefit of the live stock producer and of agriculture generally.

Mr. J. W. BURTON (Humboldt): I wish to say a few words in support of the motion moved by my friend and colleague the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce). In doing so I shall give a number of reasons why I consider it necessary and desirable that the members of this house should pass this resolution. First, I believe that the request contained in the motion is reasonable. If you will allow me, Mr. Speaker, I will read the motion again, wherein it states that:

> . . . the government should take into immediate consideration the advisability of appointing a board of live stock commissioners in Canada, for the purpose of regulating and controlling the assembling, transporting, grading, marketing and exporting of live stock and live stock products.

If we the members of this house consider this motion we shall find that we are asking something very reasonable of the government. All that we are doing is to ask them to give immediate consideration to taking this action. At times I look into the book that some of us occasionally need to refer to, the dictionary, and I find that "consider" means "to think, to think about." I am quite sure that the government will not refuse to think, because we would have reached a very sad state of affairs if the government refused to think. We ask them to think about appointing this board of live stock commissioners, and the terms we suggest to them to follow are also reasonable—"for the purpose of regulating and controlling the assembling, transporting, grading, marketing and exporting of live stock and live stock products."

The second reason why I am happy to support this motion is that it is necessary in the interests of the live stock industry as a whole.

I am happy that we can bring before the house and ask the government to consider a motion to take action on something that is of concern to such a large number of people, not only as producers and handlers but ultimately as consumers. There are many people concerned with the live stock industry. They are dependent upon it. I should like, therefore, to refer the house to a publication entitled "Live Stock Market Review," published by the authority of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). If I may, I would congratulate the minister and the officials of his department, first of all, on compiling the statistics given and preparing and presenting them to us in the manner in which we have them. I do not know how widespread this publication is in the country but I know that I appreciate receiving it regularly. Page 5 of this booklet indicates that there are live stock yards in Toronto, Montreal West, Montreal East, Winnipeg, Calgary, Edmonton, Prince Albert, Moose Jaw, Saskatoon, Regina and Vancouver. When I first looked over this list I failed to understand why the maritimes did not have a live stock yard or market. If they have not one I think they should get busy and obtain one. If they have a number of markets I suggest that they get in touch with the minister to see that they are put on the map. I was disappointed to see that such a large section of the dominion, which I know raises considerable live stock, is not included in this list.

We find that spread all the way from Montreal to Vancouver there are these large centres and markets where the live stock that is produced is being handled in one way or another. In that connection I should like to refer to the week ended October 4. In that week 33,727 head of cattle went through the markets I have mentioned. There were 9,912 head of calves, 18,454 hogs, and 21,131 sheep. In addition to that, we have the other situation referred to by the hon. member for Selkirk. He then indicated that a practice has developed whereby the packing houses send their own drovers out into the country to gather up live stock and hogs and ship them direct to the packing plants without putting them through the public markets or the live stock yards.

The department gives us some information on that. Included in this booklet are the shipments to plants for the week ended October 4. It shows that 53,170 cattle were shipped direct to plants whereas there were only 18,454 listed through the stockyards. There were 17,363 calves shipped direct to the plants and only 9,912 to the stockyards. In the same week there were shipped direct to the plants 52,376 sheep. To obtain comparable figures for hog marketing we are asked to turn to the table on page 6. They do not give us the total number of hogs shipped direct to the plants. I think the minister might ask the officials of his department to check into that and see if we cannot get this additional information.

On page 6 to which we are referred we find that hog carcasses graded in the week ended September 29 and also from January 1 to date, 1945. There we find some interesting figures. According to the table, in the week ended September 29, 83,538 hogs were graded. In the same week last year there were graded 112,017. I should like to have the minister and hon. members bear in mind how these figures compare. To date in 1945 there have been graded in these packing plants 4,378,655 carcasses. In the same period last year there were 6,614,226 carcasses graded.

In that connection I might refer the minister to what my colleague, the hon. member for Selkirk and I brought to his attention a number of times during the past year or so. We said that with the policy being followed we were bound to have a reduction in the production of hogs and bacon products. I might say that, speaking in the Saskatchewan legislature before that, I drew it to the attention of the then minister of agriculture of Saskatchewan, who is now chairman of the Canadian meat board, and he along with the federal Minister of Agriculture practically laughed at the suggestion that we would have a reduction in the production of hogs. However, the figures show that to-day. That is not the point with which I am concerned to-day, although it is something that we should have been concerned with during the past few years. The point that I am concerned with is to show to hon. members that the live stock business is big business and that it is affecting the lives of a lot of people. We have these markets scattered from Montreal to Vancouver. In addition to that we have eleven stockyards, and the packing plants involved have numerous drovers. Then there are shippers, cooperative concerns, individual shippers and trucking by farmers. I contend, that, with a business of that size spread all over the country, with the interests of so many people involved, and with so many people handling the product, it is in the interest of everyone concerned to have some regulating authority along the lines suggested by the hon. member for Selkirk. I suggest that the resolution, if agreed to, will not deprive anyone of his just dues, but, on the contrary, will be of service and protection to everyone.

I have another reason for supporting the motion. The majority of the people whom I have the honour to represent are greatly concerned about this matter. I believe that there are very few if any constituencies in Saskatchewan where the people as a whole are so dependent on mixed farming, as we call it, as they are in the constituency of Humboldt. In that constituency we have no mines, no timber of marketable size and no industries except perhaps an odd creamery or something of that kind. We have only two towns, which would not be of any great size as towns are considered in the east, but one is a divisional point for the Canadian National railway and the other is a divisional point for the Canadian Pacific railway. With the exception of the people in those towns practically everyone in the constituency is dependent upon the returns from agriculture for livelihood, most of them directly and the remainder indirectly. Ever since that country was opened up some forty odd years ago we have been carrying on what I have referred to as mixed farming. We did not go into it in a spectacular way; there are few if any herds of prize-winning cattle, but still the people on the land from the early homesteading days have gone into the production of cattle and hogs, and during the years have produced an enormous amount of wealth by way of live stock.

I am sure that all the older members from the west, including the Minister of Agriculture will recall the difficulty we had in persuading the governments of that time that we needed a board of grain commissioners to supervise the handling of the enormous amounts of grain being produced in the prairie provinces. Eventually, after a great deal of work and agitation, that board was appointed. Any person who would suggest now that the board of grain commissioners be done away with and that in regard to grain we go back to conditions similar to those under which live stock products are handled to-day, would meet with a cool reception and would deserve ridicule. In the early days the emphasis was placed upon the production of grain, and finally we obtained the board of grain commissioners. In the intervening years the agricultural picture in western Canada has gradually changed, and more and more districts have taken up what we have had in the Humboldt district from the very beginning, mixed farming and the production of live stock. As I mentioned previously, we have arrived at the position where the live stock industry has become big business, and I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the members of this house that it is in the interests of the producers, in the interests of those who handle our products, in the interests of those who process our products and in the interests of those who consume our live stock products that we have a board of live stock commissioners.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, in rising to support the resolution moved by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce) may I say that on various occasions during the last parliament I requested the appointment of a board of live stock commissioners with producer representation. This has been and is a plank in our platform, as was stated this afternoon by my colleague the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn), who dealt with the findings and recommendations of the commission on price spreads some years ago, which I agree were all to the good. He also dealt fully with the many boards which have been set up during the war years to deal with the production, processing and handling of meat in this country, pointing out that with the elimination of the War Measures Act most of these boards would go out of existence.

The marketing and exporting of live stock and live stock products has been most unsatisfactory even during the last few years. As has been pointed out, in western Canada at any rate in the early twenties we depended upon wheat for our livelihood. In those years I believe some seventy per cent of the income of the western farmer came from the production and sale of wheat. That picture has changed very greatly to-day. In the same area I believe wheat accounts for only about forty per cent of the income of the farmer. Great increases have taken place in both hog and cattle population of Canada from coast to coast, and particularly in the prairie provinces. In 1939 our cattle population was 4,693,500. In 1945, according to a return brought down at the end of September, it was 6,676,400, so that there was an increase of approximately forty-two per cent in the cattle population this year.

As one hon. member said a few moments ago, the production and marketing of live stock in this country has become big business to-day, and many people depend upon it for their livelihood. Previous speakers have pointed out the difficulties which were encountered a few years ago when we asked for the establishment of a board of grain commissioners, but I am sure everyone will agree that this board is rendering a great service in the various ways it regulates the marketing of grain in Canada. I hold in my hand the report of that board for 1944, setting out on the last page the regulations of the board, under some fifty-nine headings. I do not think I should take time to mention them all, but that should indicate the great service being rendered by this board to the wheat producers of the country.

Now that live stock has become just as important as wheat, in dollars and cents; now that it affects probably as many producers in Canada, if not more, I think we are just as much entitled to a live stock commission. The hon. member for Haldimand pointed out that my leader and this party for years have requested that such a commission be set up. It has been pointed out that the greater percentage of hogs marketed now go direct to abattoirs or packing plants. Not long ago the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) made an appeal in this house for a greatly increased production of bacon for shipment to Britain during the next two months. I fully agree with his appeal, but it seems strange that since that appeal was made the price of pork has gone down in various markets across Canada. I have never been able to understand why these fluctuations should take place. If I might refer again to the way in which our grain is handled, the government are now in a position to tell the producers, usually before seeding time in the spring, what they can expect for their product for the coming year. Under a price ceiling system such as is operating in Canada I have never been able to understand why these fluctuations should take place in connection with live cattle and hogs at marketing centres. Perhaps I might add that these fluctuations have been more varied in respect of cattle than hogs. On several occasions at this session I have asked the Minister of Agriculture to try to explain to the producers why the same animal which was running in pasture, on good grass, at the end of June or July, and which has grown and gained in flesh and in condition, should sell six weeks later for a smaller figure per pound. Why should this condition obtain, especially when meat is controlled as it is in Canada? That situation does prevail and has prevailed year in and year out at certain periods of each year. It is one which should not be permitted to continue.

Many other arguments have been advanced this afternoon. While I shall not repeat them, may I say that I concur in them. Certainly it is my view that a majority of producers in Canada from coast to coast are in favour and most desirous of setting up a live stock commission such as has been described by the hon. member who moved the resolution. This is something for which, as I have said, I have asked on repeated occasions since 1940.

Without taking further time I make an appeal to the government to take steps toward the setting up of a commission to operate in the interests of live stock producers in Canada as a whole, so as to assure them of some degree of justice in the marketing and processing of their live stock—operations which have become big business in this country.

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, as another practical farmer and as a member of the committee on agriculture which sat during the last parliament, I wish to add my support to that of hon. members who have already spoken in favour of the resolution moved by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce). I consider that this matter has been far too long delayed. It has been considered by farmer organizations all across Canada, and on different occasions requests along this line have been made by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture.

I realize, as do many other hon. members, that since the beginning of the war the live stock industry flourished to a greater extent than it had previously. Even at that, however, far too many abuses still exist, and far too many leakages take place. The result of those leakages is going into the wrong channels.

I believe it is in the interests of the government and of the Canadian people as a whole that the commission be set up, so that the wrongs which still exist can be set right. I do not believe it is necessary to discuss some of the questions which have been debated this afternoon. Perhaps it is sufficient to say that the members of this group are fully behind the suggestion made by the hon. member for Selkirk, and that we fully endorse it. Therefore we ask the government to give this suggestion immediate consideration, and to have the new commission appointed.

Mr. E. D. FULTON (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I should like to support the suggestion made in the resolution now under discussion that there be set up a board of live stock commissioners to order and regulate marketing of live stock products in this country. It is not my intention to enter into any great detail with respect to that matter, but there is a related subject to which I should like to give some attention this afternoon, one which has a most definite bearing on the marketing of live stock. I refer to the report of the likelihood of a strike taking place in meat packing plants throughout this country.

On various occasions in the course of this debate it has been said that those engaged in agriculture, and particularly those connected with the production of live stock, are in a better position to-day than they have been for many years. This is perfectly true, and I scarcely think it is necessary to remind hon. members that their present position is in marked contrast with the state of affairs which existed up to the beginning of the war. Therefore any steps that can be taken to prevent a recurrence of pre-war conditions are in my view essential to the welfare of the country.

I should like to refer to certain questions which have been addressed to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) in connection with the threatened strike in the meat packing plants. Two questions which were put to him on Tuesday, October 9, and to which he gave answers, sought to bring forth from him some assurance that a strike would not be allowed to take place in the meat packing plants. The questions were asked in order that the producers of live stock might be assured that their markets would be kept open, and that there would not be that decline in price which is bound to follow from any strike in packing plants.

As reported at page 827 of Hansard for October 9, the Minister of Labour admitted that he did understand the position in the packing plants, and made this statement:

> I have received a letter from the secretary of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. Any decision made with respect to the purport of the letter will be made known when the government makes a decision. The answer to the first part of the question is yes.

That is, the minister was aware of the situation.

> We are in constant touch with the provincial departments of labour with respect to what some people anticipate will be a dispute or strike in the packing house industry in this country.

I submit that very little comfort can be found in these words. There is little of the assurance which the producers of this country are hoping for, namely that the strike will not be allowed to take place, or that if it does take place their position will be safeguarded.

The minister, asked for a further statement, made this reply:

> If my honourable and garrulous friend will just give me an opportunity to answer the question which was put by the leader of the opposition—

One would have thought we were to get a reassuring answer, but he went on to say:

I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that I can add much to what I have already said.

I submit, therefore that the live stock producers of Canada have very little justification for thinking that their interests will be protected by responsible ministers of the government.

I should like to give briefly the reason why a strike in packing plants of Canada is a matter of such importance to the producers of live stock. I have a telegram from the British Columbia beef cattle growers' association asking me to take up this matter with the government. I have done so through questions in the house and private discussion with the Minister of Labour. The purport of the telegram is that the producers of live stock wish to have the assurance that the government is taking all possible steps to avert a strike and to allay producers' fears, in view of the fact that a panic at this time would mean disaster. The seasonal run now on would be aggravated by the efforts of producers to market before the threatened stoppages occur.

If hon. members will cast their minds back to the situation last July they will recall that at that time a strike took place in the meat packing industry of Canada. What I wish to do now is to show why a strike is important and why it is viewed with alarm by producers. I would show, too, the adverse effect on the cattle marketing situation brought about by the strike that took place at that time, and I would point out the adverse effect a repetition of the strike would have to-day. I am reading from the "Live Stock Market Review" published by the Department of Agriculture marketing service for the week ended July 19 of this year. On page one of the "Review," under "Summary," it is stated:

Cattle offerings, as compared with the corresponding week last year, were fairly generous, but the market showed ability to absorb everything on hand. In some instances gains were recorded.

And further down:

Eastern cattle markets. A good clearance of cattle was made at Toronto, with all grades selling firm, and the top of the market at $13.75 for two loads of prime weighty steers.

By the next week the strike was beginning to make itself felt. Reading from the same report for the week ending July 26, we find under "Summary" the following:

The demand for cattle was adversely affected this week by unsettled labour conditions. In some packing houses in Toronto there was a strike early in the week and the possibility of a similar situation developing at some other packing house centres. The larger buyers were therefore operating sparingly but the small operators, not being directly affected, were active at the somewhat reduced values which resulted from the temporary slowdown in total demand.

And further down:

Eastern cattle markets. Closing prices on cattle at Toronto were about fifty cents lower, with last sales of choice weighty steers at $12.75 and $12.80.

If we take the top price for the previous week of $13.75, it will be seen that in one week the price went down from 95 cents to $1 per hundred pounds, not 50 cents. That is the drop in price in one week as the result of the strike.

Mr. GARDINER: Not on the same class of cattle.

Mr. FULTON: Even taking the statement that they were fifty cents lower, we find on page 5 of the report that cattle marketings at public stockyards during the week were 21,121 head. Taking the average beast as weighing 1,000 pounds, which I think the minister will agree is a fairly good average, at fifty cents per hundred pounds we find the loss on an average beast amounts to $5. If you multiply that by 21,121 you get a total of $105,605, which represents the loss to the producers in one week. The decline in prices to that extent was the direct result of the unsettled labour situation, as stated in the market review, or, in plain words, it was the result of the strike in the packing plants.

I think we can see quite clearly how important this matter of a strike in the packing plants is to the producers of meat. It is of increased importance at this time because of the seasonal run of cattle on the market. This always takes place in October and November when grass on the range is getting short and winter is about to set in. Producers are anxious to market their cattle and take advantage of high prices before feeding difficulties may begin. The result is, again using the department's own figures, that for the week ending September 27, the latest report, sales of cattle at public stockyards were 29,221 head, an increase over the July figure of 8,100 head. That is to say, the seasonal run of marketings at this time is over thirty-five per cent higher than it was in July. With those two facts in mind, that in one week in July the loss to producers was over $105,000 and that in October the marketings were over thirty-five per cent higher than they were in July, I think this house will see how important this question of a strike in the packing plants is to the live stock producers of this country.

In view of this serious situation I directed a question yesterday to the Minister of Agriculture, which I should like to read, along with his answer, as reported on page 827 of Hansard:

With respect to the anticipated strike in the meat packing plants, is the Minister of Agriculture in a position to make a statement which will reassure the producers of meat that their position with respect to marketing will not be prejudiced should there be such a strike?

Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think all that I can say is that if there is a strike in the packing plants the position of the producer will be prejudiced and nothing this government can do will prevent it.

Mr. GARDINER: Read it all; read the next part.

Mr. FULTON: By all means.

Mr. Homuth: Should do, or will do?
Mr. Gardiner: Nothing that they can do will prevent the producers' position from being prejudiced if these men do go out on strike.

I submit that that answer is indicative of the defeatist attitude of this government. I am reminded of a previous occasion when a member on the government side of the house said that after all, private members of parliament could not accomplish very much, and they would soon find that out. We on this side of the house do not share that view. It seems to me that this government is bemused and bewildered by the problems which now face them. If they are going to answer a question in that way, I say to them: If you cannot do anything about it, perhaps you will move out and let somebody in who can.

Mr. GARDINER: I did not say that we could not do anything about it.

Mr. FULTON: The minister said:

Nothing that they can do will prevent the producers' position from being prejudiced—

Mr. GARDINER: If they do go out on strike.

Mr. FULTON: I am going to suggest something that the Minister of Agriculture can do to prevent the producer's position being prejudiced. There is at this time an embargo on the export of cattle to the United States. It has been suggested by members of this house and by cattle producers' associations that that embargo might be removed. I am going to suggest to the minister that if a strike in the packing plants of this country should take place, he take into consideration the lifting of the embargo on the export of cattle to the United States. The minister may answer that we are attempting to supply a maximum amount of meat to Great Britain and to UNRRA.

Mr. GARDINER: Would the hon. member like my answer?

Mr. FULTON: Not yet; wait until I have finished.

Mr. GARDINER: My memory is that every member on that side of the house voted against the trade treaty which allowed cattle to go into the United States at lower duty.

Mr. FULTON: I do not know of the occasion to which the minister is referring. I am referring to the possibility of a strike in the meat packing plants of this country. I was not here on the occasion to which the minister refers. If the minister will permit me to make the suggestion I want to make to him, I will sit down and he can have the floor to give his answer. If a strike takes place in the packing plants and we do nothing about it I am certain that Great Britain, UNRRA and the devastated countries in Europe will not get our meat. The result will be our producers will be affected and our standard of living will go down. If the embargo on exports of cattle to the United States is lifted, that country, which is also trying to export the maximum amount of meat to the devastated countries, will have our meat and they can export it. If our packing plants cannot handle it, why not make a deal with the United States to have their packing plants handle it until the strike is over in this country? I suggest to the Minister of Labour—

Mr. MITCHELL: Just to carry it through to the logical conclusion, it is the easiest thing in the world to suggest that we do what the hon. member says we should do.

Mr. FULTON: I am glad to hear that.

Mr. MITCHELL: I know my hon. friend is an expert on cattle, and I bow to his superior knowledge, but suppose they would not process the meat in the plants of the United States; what then?

Mr. FULTON: I am sorry I cannot give the minister an answer. I suggest a deal should be made or some inquiries instituted. I am offering the suggestion. Unfortunately we are not on the government benches, so we cannot carry out this suggestion. I am suggesting that some approach be made to finding a solution to this problem.

The Minister of Labour said he realized that I am an expert on cattle. I certainly do not hold myself out as an expert, but I do know that producers of meat, of whom my constituency contains a very large number, are extremely worried over the prospect of this strike. That is why I am suggesting to responsible ministers a course which they might take, a course which would result not only in the opening again of that potential market in the United States, but would help solve to some extent the United States meat shortage, would make meat available to the devastated countries without the loss of time and of meat which would follow a strike in our packing plants, would prevent a certain and definite loss to the producers, and, if it were stated now that some such step will be taken, would remove the fear they now have which may bring about a panic and a sudden run and glut of cattle on the market.

As I say, we are not on the government side and therefore are not in a position to put these suggestions into effect. But a suggestion was made yesterday in another matter to the Minister of Labour which he was kind enough to say was very constructive. All I ask is that, in the interests of the meat producers of this country, the Minister of Agriculture give the same degree of consideration to this suggestion.

Mr. ROBERT McCUBBIN (Middlesex-West): I have listened with interest to the discussion which has taken place on the motion which was moved by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce). I have also listened to other members discussing this question, and as to whether it would be in the interest of Canada as a whole and of the live stock industry if a board of live stock commissioners were appointed. All those who have spoken during this last hour and a half have taken the stand that such a board should be appointed, and have given their reasons for doing so. I am going to take the opposite view. I feel that we have now boards enough, if not too many.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Such as they are.

Mr. McCUBBIN: And at this time I do not think it is in the interests of the live stock industry to appoint such a board.

As you know, we have a dominion-provincial conference, and members of the house are watching its proceedings. It is adjourned until the end of November, when it will again meet. The government put out a little book, which I have read with interest, containing the proposals of the dominion government for this dominion-provincial conference on reconstruction. I suppose all hon. members have read it. Certainly those who are interested in agriculture will read what is therein contained with respect to agriculture, our basic industry. I am going to read into the record just a couple of paragraphs, containing proposals to the conference which should be of interest to those engaged in agriculture. I quote:

No industry has made a greater contribution to the Canadian war effort than agriculture. Its achievement has left problems of conversion to peacetime conditions comparable to those of manufacturing industry. Many branches of agriculture were greatly expanded in response to war needs, and overall production increased to levels far exceeding those of the past. This accomplishment drew heavily upon agricultural resources, resulting in heavy depreciation of machinery and equipment and great strain on the depleted farm population. The dominion government feels it has a responsibility to assist the industry in making the necessary readjustments to peace-time circumstances and to work in cooperation with the provincial governments to provide for a greater degree of stability in farm income and a greater measure of security than has prevailed in the past.

I skip a little, and come to the subject of marketing which is dealt with in the resolution of the hon. member for Selkirk.

In the field of agricultural marketing, there are two matters that merit special consideration; one has to do with the regulation of the movement and sale, the other with the grading and inspection, of products. With respect to the first, it has been noted that some of the provincial governments have provided legislation under which various marketing plans and activities are developed. It would appear that this is evidence of an interest that should be considered at this conference in so far as dominion-provincial relationships in the marketing field are concerned.

The second aspect of the matter, namely that relating to grading and inspection, is one that has concerned the dominion and provincial governments for a great many years. By various means, the regulations with respect to grading, inspection, packaging and labelling of products have been enforced to the advantage of producer and consumer alike. From time to time, however, the procedure followed has been interrupted by decisions of the courts which have indicated that either the dominion or the provincial governments had exceeded their respective powers. It is apparent that the dominion and the provincial governments are agreed as to the need for some action which will clarify the control and direction of activities in this field. Under these circumstances, it would appear that the conference should give some consideration to this matter with a view to achieving the desired control.

That is the attitude of this government at this conference in respect to agriculture and the marketing of agricultural products. The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn), who was the only speaker from Ontario, has referred to this live stock industry, which had a value last year of $538 million, as something which is worthy of consideration; and I wish to commend all the speakers who have taken part so far on their sincerity and honesty in trying to provide the necessary machinery for the orderly marketing of farm products. Though I may not agree with it, nevertheless they are putting forward their own proposal.

The hon. member for Selkirk has brought up this matter in the house before, as also has the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) and, I believe, the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross). It has been stated that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) spoke on it in a speech at Lethbridge. As the hon. member for Selkirk has mentioned, it is sought to deal with these problems in the same manner as that in which the board of grain commissioners are dealing with wheat. The price spreads report has been mentioned here to-day. I have in mind a statement which I read in that report, and also in Hansard, in the year 1935, when the ex-minister of trade and commerce, Hon. H. H. Stevens, said to the then leader of the government, Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, that he thought the government was dodging its responsibility to the grain trade by appointing a board of grain commissioners. That was his view at that time. I am not saying it was right or wrong. But we in Ontario got mixed up with the wheat board, to our sorrow, one time in the marketing of our wheat. I hate to have to say this; nevertheless it is true: the board and the administrators and the office workers in connection with it used up all the profits, after the initial price had been paid, in the administration of the board, and we as producers received only a cent or a cent and a half on our participation certificates.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I know that the hon. member will not mind a question. Is he talking about the Canadian wheat board or the grain commission? They are two different organizations altogether.

Mr. McCUBBIN: I am talking about the wheat board.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That is not the grain commission.

Mr. McCUBBIN: Did I say the grain commission? I thought I said the wheat board. It is "the wheat board" that I have written down here. That was our experience with the wheat board in the province of Ontario.

I will admit, Mr. Speaker, that wheat is not handled in a satisfactory manner in the province of Ontario; it is not handled in the way it is dealt with in the west. This, however, will be discussed at another time.

We in Ontario feel that we are not getting a fair show as regards the price we are receiving for our wheat.

Mr. BURTON: In comparing the wheat board with the board which the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce) suggests, the hon. member is in error because what is asked for is a board of live stock commissioners similar to the board of grain commissioners.

Mr. McCUBBIN: Let me go on. The question will be asked, where will the money come from to run such a board if we are to have a board of live stock commissioners. I have no doubt that some one will say there will have to be a certain percentage taken off the price of each head of cattle. Some might say it would have to come out of the condemnation insurance. At any rate, it will come from some source, and the farmers of my province do not like to see any little slices taken off their product.

I have every reason for saying that there is no class of people in the dominion who love freedom more than the farmers, and as I listened to the debate yesterday, I was never so proud to belong to that section of the population. You may say, what are we doing in the interests of marketing cattle? Are we trying to help the producers of cattle? We have now a wheat board, and we have floor prices for farm products, with a board of administration. As I have said, I have always felt that we have too many boards, and I stand by that statement. I have not heard any previous speaker mention this, but we have now an advisory committee to the food board for the administration and selling and marketing of farm products such as bacon and beef. That advisory committee is comprised of three members appointed by the federation of agriculture—Mr. Hannam, who is chairman of the board, and two others —and nine members appointed by the provinces, making a board of twelve. This is an advisory committee to the food board and it is doing a very good job. I am not here to criticize the members of that body in any way. We feel that the dominion and the provinces will cooperate in the marketing of farm products.

May I refer to a sale that was held just two weeks ago in Manitoulin island, and in this connection I commend the farmers and the live stock men of that small island for banding themselves together and organizing that sale. They had the cooperation of the provincial government, who sent up Mr. R. H. Graham, a member of the Department of Agriculture there, a very good man. I knew he would do a good job. Some 2,100 head of cattle were disposed of on that day. Not only were there farmers from my own district, who went many miles to attend the sale to procure feeder cattle, but the packing houses in Toronto sent a representative to bid in cattle, so that there was competition at the sale, and I am sure that if you spoke to the farmers of Manitoulin island they would say that they made a good sale of their cattle and that the sale had been conducted in a splendid manner.

You may say to me, "If you are not in favour of this board, what are you in favour of?" In my opinion, under the dominion department of agriculture and the departments in the provinces everything possible will be done. They have efficient officers and they will try to see that our farm products are marketed in an orderly manner in the interests of the farmers of the country.

I suggest that we need markets more than we need boards, and I would not support this government if I did not think that they will do everything in their power to procure markets for Canadian farmers.

This question of a live stock board was brought up some years ago. The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) will remember this better than I do, because I was not a member of the house. The matter was brought up by the then member for Peace River, Mr. Kennedy, who introduced the subject in 1935. At that time the leader of the government, Mr. Bennett, opposed the setting up of a live stock board because in his opinion there would be overlapping. I have a copy of Hansard of that day and I could quote from it to show that in his opinion it was not in the interests of agriculture to set up a live stock board of the kind that is asked for to-day. That was his view. As I say, we are more interested in markets.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Let us look to the future.

Mr. McCUBBIN: I am looking to the future, but we have to review the past if we are to look properly into the future. Some of the hon. members who have spoken to-day voted in 1936 against the trade agreements which did so much for the farmers and the cattle producers of the country.

The hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) referred to the lifting of the embargo from Canadian cattle going into the United States. No one would be happier than I to see it lifted, but that is not possible at the present time. However, I hope the day is not far distant when that can be brought about.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Why is it not possible?

Mr. McCUBBIN: It is not possible because we have certain commitments. The governments of Canada, the United States and Great Britain have certain commitments across the sea, and we intend to carry out those commitments. We have been asked for two hundred million pounds of beef, and another twenty-five million pounds, if we can send it, and it is our duty to see that it is shipped. However, as I say, I hope the day is not far distant when we can ship our cattle to the United States, and I wish to commend the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), my leader, for the visit he paid President Truman before leaving for overseas. I am sure that under his able leadership and that of President Truman, agreements will be consummated which will be in our interests as well as in the interests of the American people. We know that the United States Senate is permitting the president to reduce tariffs in future trade agreements by a further fifty per cent, and that will be to our advantage. I am happy to see our friends on the other side of the house willing to support these trade agreements. I hope I shall be sitting on these benches when such an agreement is voted on in the house, and I trust that members on the other side will not then do as they did in 1936 and 1939, but will stand up and support the agreements which I have every reason to believe will be brought into effect by the present leader of the government.

I am not here to uphold and commend everything the government has done with regard to the cattle industry. It has done certain things in the last five years that I do not like as a cattle producer, and the people whom I represent do not like them; nevertheless, there are certain things that must be done in wartime, and we are willing to do them. But we are willing to have them done by this government and not by any board. This government should take on the responsibility of bringing in any legislation that is necessary; it should not be done by members of a board.

Mr. CASE: And not by orders in council.

Mr. McCUBBIN: That is all right.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): There are exceptions.

Mr. McCUBBIN: I have always taken that stand because I believe in it. The other day I listened to the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario, (Mr. Macdonnell) and with a good deal of what he said I was in agreement. I am a farmer and I speak on behalf of farmers. I feel that this government, of which I happen to be a supporter, is one that will do the utmost to legislate in the interests of our farmers and primary producers; for there is no class of people who have done more—and they will continue to do a great deal—for the welfare of this country. I hope the government will go forward with the legislation that is on the statute books and not appoint a lot of boards. I hope they will take the necessary steps themselves, and if there is to be any discussion it should take place on the floor of the house or in committee.

Mr. BRYCE: Would the hon. member permit a question? Am I to assume from the hon. member's remarks that the Ontario federation of agriculture is against a board of live stock commissioners for Canada?

Mr. McCUBBIN: I never made any such statement. I am speaking only for myself.

Mr. BRYCE: The hon. member is speaking only for himself?

Mr. McCUBBIN: I am only expressing my own views.

Mr. BRYCE: A board of live stock commissioners has been endorsed by four hundred thousand farmers in Canada.

Mr. F. W. TOWNLEY-SMITH (North Battleford): May I say a few words in support of the resolution which has been introduced by my colleague the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce)? I fail to see, if the principle is sound in the case of grain, why it should not also be sound in the live stock industry. We have a board of grain commissioners to-day.

At the present time we are short of meat. The reason we are short is that our live stock producers have stopped producing live stock. There are two main reasons for this. One is shortage of help. Incidentally this may concern the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Abbott) more closely than he possibly realizes. The other reason is that the live stock producers feel that they have not been receiving a reasonable return. There is a physical limit to what a man can do. The difficulties of the war have pressed rather heavily upon the older men who have had to feed the live stock. They have not been able to feed the quantity of live stock that they might wish to do. One of the first things that a man lets go of when he feels he is unable to handle the whole situation is what is commonly known as his chores, and on the farm his chores consist principally in the feeding of live stock. Therefore live stock raising suffered immediately the labour shortage became apparent. Of course, if there is not sufficient help to raise live stock the farmer cannot do it. But if he feels that he is not getting a reasonable return he will not do it regardless of the labour situation. I know this is the feeling that obtains to a considerable extent in the west. Rightly or wrongly they feel that their position could be improved very much by the establishment of a board of live stock commissioners.

The farmers have run into all kinds of small difficulties. I do not wish to speak of them in a general way, but I shall touch on one or two. First of all, let me say that my hon. friend to the right could not understand why there was such a range in the price of dressed hogs, since the price of bacon and the grades are fixed and the animals are on the rail. That is to say, there is no need for allowances in errors of judgment of the buyer when he is buying a live animal; yet we find that there is a range of prices. Last week in Toronto prices ranged from $17 to $17.90 a hundredweight. While $17 is the average price and $17.90 is the range, it would indicate that some of the hogs were sold for even less than $17. That is one thing I, too, do not understand.

In 1936, the west was in difficulties over its shortages of feed and we were compelled to get rid of a lot of our live stock. At that time our live stock was pretty thin. The government of the day guaranteed a price of one cent a pound if we shipped in our live stock and disposed of them. Even at that we received complaints. I approached a drover who was in charge of the handling of a lot of this one cent stock in order to see what the difficulties seemed to be. These are a few of the things he told me. The cattle were taken, incidentally, from my small home town up to Edmonton, a distance of some two hundred miles in a straight line on the railway. The complaints of the farmers at that time were, first, that the cattle were taken straight to the packing plant and not weighed in the stockyards. They were weighed on the packing plant scales. The second complaint was that they were not fed and watered before they were weighed. In one case that he mentioned they were kept in the yards for fifty hours before they were unloaded. He then gave me some of the shrinkages on a two hundred mile rail journey. He had three cows which shrank 760 pounds. He had one bull which shrank 300 pounds; he should have shot him, I imagine. He had another cow which belonged to a neighbour of mine and in which I was particularly interested which shrank from 1,400 pounds to 1,160 pounds, a matter of 240 pounds of shrinkage in this cow.

Another grievance which they feel they have at the present time—and I speak quite feelingly about this because it happened to me—is the range of the different grades. Anyone who is connected with farming knows that the A-pig carcass ranges from 140 to 170 pounds, the B-1 from 135 to 175 pounds, the B-2 from 125 to 134 pounds, and the B-3 from 176 to 185 pounds. There have been difficulties and stoppages at various packing plants for various reasons, and the farmer has not always been able to gauge accurately the weight of his live animals. He guesses at it and sometimes he is a good guesser; sometimes he is quite a long way out. But in some cases his live animal was just on the edge of being too heavy for a particular grade. With another couple of pounds it would have been too heavy for the particular grade and would have had to go down a grade because it was too heavy. Then his animals were shipped away and, the packing plants not being able to handle them for various reasons, an animal was sometimes kept for a week before it finally got into the packing plants. During that week it was fed, at enormous cost incidentally, and when it did get into the packing plant it had made so many more extra pounds that it was out of the grade. That was one grievance. In my own particular case I had one particular pig which was one pound too heavy and it went down a grade. It was docked fifty cents a hundred pounds because it was one pound too heavy, and incidentally it missed the government premium. I talked this matter over and complained to a man who was familiar with the workings of the packing plant, and he thought it was very funny, because he said that with one quick slice of the knife one pound would be taken off the carcass and it would go up in the grade after it had got out of my hands and when it got into the packer's hands. Therefore, as I have said, we have the feeling that with the appointment of a commission to take charge of all these matters we could iron out many of our difficulties. If there should be a jam in Edmonton, cattle could be sent to Saskatoon, and so on. The commission would keep an eye on all these things and probably we would not be troubled with strikes or threatened strikes at some of the packing plants, as we are at the present time. I consider it highly probable that such a commission would be able to keep all these difficulties under control, and in that way we would have less trouble.

The main point I wish to make is that rightly or wrongly the live stock producers believe they would be better off under a commission. Our ambition at the present time is to get them back into the production of live stock; so let us agree with them for once and grant them this live stock commission.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I should take time to speak to the house on a resolution of this kind. This is supposed to be a day when private members have the time pretty well to themselves. However, in view of the remarks that have been made and the suggestion that the minister should say something on the matter I have decided to break the general rule and say a few words in regard to this resolution.

As the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. McCubbin) has pointed out, this is not a new question in this house. A similar resolution was introduced as far back as 1935, prior to the election of that year, which means that the matter was considered in this house before most of those now here, including myself, were elected. In other words, none of us here to-day can claim credit for having suggested for the first time that a commission of this kind should be appointed. I do not know that a resolution of this kind has ever passed the house on any previous occasion, although I have not checked the records to make certain, but it has been discussed during many sessions since I came here ten years ago, and it was also discussed before that time.

I make that statement in order to point out that the matter has been given a great deal of consideration. I agree with the statement of the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Burton) that in order to give consideration to anything you must think; and I am sure a great deal of thinking has been done about this matter. It is not necessary for the House of Commons to ask the government to give thought to it; we have done so already. On many occasions we have discussed it with representatives of farm organizations and members of this house who have brought the matter to our attention; from time to time it has been discussed in council meetings and elsewhere. So that it has been given a great deal of consideration and a great deal of thought.

I wish to speak this afternoon only in order to follow up some of the expressions of opinion that have been given in regard to the matter. It has been suggested that we ought to appoint this commission because away back, I think about 1901, we set up what was known as a board of grain commissioners to deal with the marketing of wheat in western Canada. Everyone who was in the west at that time, as I was, will recall that the situation existing then in relation to wheat was entirely different from the situation existing to-day in connection with the marketing of live stock products. Our grain was graded by elevator and warehouse men out at country points, and we had no redress in connection with that grading. It was because of the manner in which the grading was done and because of the manner in which our grain was handled that we agitated for, and I might even go so far as to say that the western farmers demanded, a board of grain commissioners. Certainly they brought their influence to bear upon Ottawa, and finally secured the appointment of that board.

I believe the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn), who this afternoon referred to the report of the commission on price spreads in 1934 or 1935, will agree when I say that it seemed to be the opinion of most people at that time that the act setting up the board of grain commissioners is ultra vires of this parliament. The question naturally arises, then, as to why this legislation has never been contested. The fact of the matter is that from seventy to eighty per cent of all the wheat grown in the three western provinces is exported, and that only a very small portion of the wheat grown in those provinces is consumed there. We are the most sparsely populated part of the Dominion of Canada; we farm great acreages, and we produce a great many bushels of wheat in comparison with the number of people in that area. So that, since we market such a large percentage of our wheat outside the provinces where it is grown; since that wheat is practically all grown in three provinces, and since at that time all the wheat had to pass through the city of Winnipeg, it was comparatively easy to set up an inspection point at Winnipeg and have all the grain that was going to foreign markets or to the mills in eastern Canada graded at one point by one set of inspectors.

I mention these facts in order to indicate two principal points of difference between dealing with wheat and dealing with live stock products. One is the fact that unlike meat or milk, the greater percentage of the product is not consumed in the province where it is produced but is shipped out and sold somewhere else. The amount of wheat grown in Saskatchewan that is marketed in that province, for example, has practically no bearing at all upon the price which can be obtained for the entire crop grown there. There is not enough consumed in the province to have anything to do with the value of the wheat to the farmer who produces it. The wheat is consumed outside the province.

Mr. HARKNESS: Is that not also true of beef, in the western provinces?

Mr. GARDINER: I will deal with that in a moment. May I repeat, in order to direct attention to the difference between wheat and cattle which I mentioned a few moments ago, and the importance of which apparently my hon. friend did not realize, that this wheat not only passes out of Saskatchewan; but it passes out of Canada, to be consumed in some other country. I mentioned that fact in order to point out that in dealing with a product of this kind no one in Canada has any interest in taking that matter to the courts of the country. They do not believe anything could be accomplished by doing so. They believe that to set up a board of grain commissioners in order to look after everything having to do with the transportation and grading of our wheat is the best possible way of handling that wheat, the greater part of which has to be marketed outside Canada. Therefore everyone agrees to let matters stand, and the question has never been taken to the courts. I am not a constitutional lawyer; in fact, I am not a lawyer at all. I have no personal opinion with regard to the matter, and I am only reciting what others have said, who are presumed to know something about it, that if it ever were taken to the courts it would be declared ultra vires, just like much of the other marketing legislation we have attempted to pass, either in this house or in the provincial legislatures.

There is, however, one thing in connection with the question which ought to be repeated—and it was stated a few minutes ago by the hon. member for Haldimand. He said that a commission which previously had investigated the whole matter of the marketing and sale of farm products had said that because milk, which is produced within provincial boundaries, is largely consumed within those boundaries, therefore this parliament had no authority to set up a commission to deal with the marketing of it, in the same sense that the board of grain commissioners would deal with the marketing of wheat.

I submit to the house that if that is true of milk, it is just as true of live stock generally; because while it is true to say that whole milk is for the greater part consumed within a province, when one lives in Montreal he knows that a great part of the milk consumed in that city comes from Ontario, which is just across the river from the city. When one lives in other cities of the dominion one realizes that a similar condition prevails in respect of a city situated across the boundary of a particular province.

On the other hand a considerable part of the milk in Canada or of the butter fat that comes out of milk, is turned into butter. Another considerable part of the milk produced in this country is turned into cheese. Nearly all the cheese, again almost seventy per cent or eighty per cent of it, under normal conditions is exported from the country. On the other hand, butter is all consumed in Canada, but it is not altogether consumed in the province in which it is produced.

The surplus of milk produced in Saskatchewan finds its way to Ontario in the form of butter, or to the city of Montreal in the same form. Therefore I would say that perhaps not any greater percentage of the milk production of the provinces is consumed within the boundaries of those provinces than there is of the meat products produced within the boundaries of those provinces.

In other words, while there may be no reason whatsoever for anyone taking any action with respect to legislation which has to do with the marketing of wheat, produced as it is in the three provinces, and selling part of it in some other parts of the world, yet when it comes to dealing with products such as meat products, the situation is not on all fours with that of wheat.

Therefore I would suggest it is not necessarily sound or right to say that because a certain board of grain commissioners has done a good job in relation to wheat, therefore we should have a similar board to handle live stock. Just what does the board of grain commissioners do in its handling of wheat? Well, it has nothing whatsoever to do with the production of wheat. It has nothing whatsoever to do with the actual marketing of wheat. It has something to do with the placing of cars at local points in order to move grain from those local points to the central elevators. It has something to do with the spotting of cars, and all that kind of thing. It does give some direction to the railway companies as to the moving of the grain. But its main work has to do with grading and the assigning of the grain that comes in from all points in the country to certain graded classifications, in order that it may be properly marketed under the price schedule set up by the board of grain commissioners. They set the margins as between No. 1, No. 2 and No. 3. Then, in cooperation with a standards board, they set the ratio as between those top standards and all the other grades of grain, running down to around twenty in number, if my memory is correct.

That is their real job; that is what they do. Then they leave the marketing, including price, either to the wheat board, as it has been done during the period of war, or to the wheat board plus the trade, as it was done before the war, or to the grain exchange and all those associated with it, as it was done before the time we had a wheat board at all. The board of grain commissioners has gone on operating in its own way and doing its own job, without any more interference than is necessary in order to carry out the regulations under which it operates.

One has only to recite the set-up in order to convince the house that is one of the chief reasons why no one has ever contested that legislation. It is legislation which is doing a job for everyone. It is doing that job efficiently; but it is doing a job quite different from the one suggested to the house by hon. members who this afternoon have supported the appointment of a live stock commission.

What is proposed in the present instance? We are not told, not in the resolution, because apparently someone was sitting in on some of the discussions before the present resolution was drafted, but hon. members have emphasized the fact that they still think in terms of the old resolution. And that old resolution did have in it words which called our attention to the board of grain commissioners. In contrast, this resolution has not.

One of the reasons why it has not is that this matter has been discussed with farm organizations, and those farm organizations apparently have taken the words out. They did not want them in. They have been convinced by arguments similar to those I have been offering the house this afternoon that the resolution in its original form was not sound. But they are still arguing that they want a commission to do certain things. They set out what those certain things are.

This takes me back to the beginning of the war. At the beginning of the war farm organizations were not only asking for a commission—or a board, whichever you like to call it—to handle the marketing of live stock, but they were asking that boards be set up provincially to handle marketing within the provinces, much as they have it in British Columbia for the marketing of their farm products, and they asked, other provinces to bring about that condition. Then further, they were asking for legislation to be passed by this federal House of Commons to provide certain powers for marketing of products as between provinces and for export.

We considered those resolutions in, I believe, three different years after I came to the house; and on the last occasion they were presented to us—I believe that was in 1940—I made a statement to the farm organizations. I am not quite sure of the date but it was some time within the first twelve months of the war.

We were asked to appoint boards or to set up legislation which would permit the appointing of boards by the farmers themselves for the handling of their own products. After discussing the matter with the government at that time, I said to those who were making the application that we were of opinion that during the period of war any boards to be set up to handle farm products as between this and other countries, largely because of the conditions existing during the war, would of necessity have to be set up by the government. I believe I am speaking correctly when I say that the farm organizations accepted my answer as the necessary action on the part of the government. In any event, during the period of war they did not press the matter; but they have kept reminding us from time to time that they would be pressing the matter when the war was over.

During the war, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Haldimand, we appointed, first, an agricultural supplies board. Then we set up under that agricultural supplies board a bacon board, which was finally converted into a meat board when it was thought necessary to do so. Then we set up under it a board to deal with dairy products, and we also set up a special products board which dealt with all other farm products which were being sold under agreements during the war. Those boards have handled the marketing of our farm products from that time down to the present, that is, the marketing of those that go outside Canada. Practically all of them were going to Great Britain.

Those boards made arrangements with the authorities who represented the British government. We delivered the products to the British at our ports and the British took them across the seas and distributed them to their own people in their own way. Our job, first, was to get the product produced, which is quite different from the job of the grain commisioners. In the next instance, our job was to get the product graded up to the quality that we had agreed with the British to deliver. As I say, those products were laid down at our ports where the British could get them and take them to their own people. We have been doing that during the war.

About two years ago it was suggested that we ought to have a food board. I believe that suggestion came from the other side of the house. We said that we did not intend to have a food board of the type suggested, but that we intended to set up in the department under the agricullural supplies board a food board. I went personally to the officers of the farm federation and asked them whether they desired to have membership on the board or whether they desired to have membership on an advisory committee. After discussing the matter in their own executive and with their own people they reported back to me that they preferred to be on the advisory committee.

Therefore we appointed the food board as it is to-day, composed largely of high ranking officials of the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Fisheries, the two departments concerned with the supplying of food. Then we asked others to name the men they desired to have appointed. The government took the responsibility for the appointments. My hon. friends have suggested that any board or committee that is to be appointed should be non-political. I think they will agree that a board composed of officials appointed by the civil service commission, most of them being appointed during the time our hon. friends opposite were carrying on the government of the country, ought to be a non-political board. It is composed of persons who have been in the civil service for a long time.

Mr. SENN: We did not play politics.

Mr. GARDINER: No, but my hon. friend knows as well as I that some of his friends nevertheless got into the civil service. But they are in the civil service and, no matter whether they were appointed under the Bennett government or the Borden government or the Laurier government or the King government, I find that they are giving 100 per cent service to the Canadian people. If they were not, of course I would have tried long ago to see that they were not there. But there they are. That is the best non-political board I know of. It is made up of the most experienced agriculturists of this country. They have been gathered up, first from the farms of Canada, then put into agricultural colleges either by themselves or by their dads where they received the best agricultural education they could get, and next they were sent out to gain experience throughout the dominion. I am quite sure the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken), although he is not in the house at the present moment, will agree with me when I say that that is the right way to produce good agriculturists. That is the way he was produced himself.

I have the benefit of knowing that he and I were born in the same year. We were both born on farms in the province of Ontario. He went to agricultural college while I went out west. I know that from his experience he has advantages which I do not have. There are officials in my department who have all the advantages that he has, whether they were appointed under one government or another. I consider them the best authorities on agriculture that we have in the Dominion of Canada. These are the men who constitute the food board.

When it came to appointing the advisory committee, about which the farm federation wanted to have something to say, we suggested that the first man appointed ought to be the president of that organization. I asked him if he would accept the appointment as chairman of the committee. He consulted with his organization and agreed. Then I asked him to name two other men. I told him he could nominate them, although I was not going to give him the right to appoint them. Then we asked the provincial governments, no matter who they happened to be, to nominate men. As the governments change they would have the right to change their representatives on the committee. We got the other nine men through nomination by the provinces. A considerable number of those men are officers of the federation in the provinces, while the others are nearly all deputy ministers.

I do not think any government has changed its representative on this committee. One government which changed during that period —to relieve my hon. friends from Saskatchewan I will say at once that it was not the government of that province—did remove from their employ—or the man removed himself who was their representative on the committee. We have been asked within the last few days to appoint another man. I have written to the president of the farm federation and to those concerned, suggesting that a man be nominated who will be appointed in the same way as the others have been. That is the way the committee is appointed.

I say this in order to indicate that our present set-up in the Department of Agriculture is non-political and has greater possibilities for doing all the things that have been suggested would be done by this board, and doing them better than they could be done by any single board that might be set up according to the suggestion made to this house. If I appear to oppose the suggestion which has been made it is not that I oppose the objective which hon. members have in mind; it is because I believe that provision is made already for doing what they suggest ought to be done in a better way than could be done under any legislation passed by this house, which would set up some other form of board.

If it is the wish of farmers of this country to have boards to handle the marketing of their farm products, then the proper place to have a board to handle the marketing of farm products, say in Ontario, would be at Toronto where most of the farm products not consumed in the rural areas are consumed. In Quebec very much the same thing would be true with regard to Montreal. In British Columbia the same thing would be true with regard to Vancouver, and in Manitoba with regard to Winnipeg. Just as milk boards handle the marketing of milk to better advantage, I believe that live stock boards in the provinces could operate to better advantage and could operate constitutionally. If we set up a board here it might immediately be challenged by the interests in those central points where a greater part of the products is consumed.

At six o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, October 11, 1945.

The house met at three o'clock.

NEWSPRINT

PRESS REPORTS AS TO SUSPENSION OF IMPORTS TO BRITAIN FROM CANADA

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): A few days ago the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) asked me a question regarding the reported cancellation of Canadian newsprint contracts by the United Kingdom authorities. I stated at the time that I would have the matter looked into, and I am now in a position to make this brief statement.

As a result of various representations which have been made through both government and industry channels, the United Kingdom authorities have agreed to accept a definite tonnage of Canadian newsprint during 1946. The tonnage specified is considerably less than the original contract amount, but is nevertheless a not inconsiderable volume. Delivery of the remainder of the contract amount is postponed. The settlement which has been arrived at is, under all the circumstances, a reasonable one, and is I believe acceptable to the Canadian producers.

Mr. GRAYDON: Will the minister please inform the house what the tonnage is that he refers to?

Mr. MacKINNON: I have not the figures before me.

CANADIAN ARMY

DISMISSAL OF EDITOR OF "MAPLE LEAF"—POLICY IN REPATRIATION OF N.R.M.A. SERVICE PERSONNEL

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence): A week or ten days ago I gave an undertaking to my hon. friend the member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) that I would put on Hansard, as soon as I received them, the two editorials in the Maple Leaf which were made the subject of his question. I now have them. The other day I said

I would table them but was advised that they would not be printed in Hansard. In order to carry out my undertaking I will therefore read them to-day.

The first appeared in the Maple Leaf on September 19, and is entitled, "On this Repat Question the Maple Leaf Reveals . . . —"

Some hon. MEMBERS: Dispense.

Mr. ABBOTT: The second appeared in the Maple Leaf for September 20, 1945, the following day, and is entitled, "To Continue . . . ".

Some hon. MEMBERS: Dispense.

Mr. ABBOTT: Hansard will reproduce the editorials.

(Editorial of September 19)

On This Repat Question the Maple Leaf Reveals . . .

There's no reason to entitle this piece "To Whom It May Concern" for it concerns the whole Canadian army, the Canadian government and the Canadian people and there's no "may" about it. It's the result of a Maple Leaf investigation on repat drafts that produced facts and figures adding up to something that shouldn't happen to a soldier—and we mean fighting soldier.

The Maple Leaf's investigation led from Nijmegen to No. 8 Repat Depot in England and involved the Saskatoon Light Infantry, support battalion with the First Canadian Infantry Division, first unit to go through the depot.

Here is the report:

"Really Boiling"

"Our draft is on the strength of 8 Repat Depot and in the same depot is the SLI. Started the investigation of two men with boxcar numbers on our draft by going to the records office and talked to . . . on the PE. He had just been going over the SLI rolls and was really boiling. To start with, here's the point score of the draft:

Officers

Points	Number
131 and over	11
121 to 130	4
111 to 120	1
91 to 100	4

The report continues: "Okay so I can settle for most of that under the unit system of repat, but here is the dope that really hurts and don't think for a minute that many of the men in the U.K. here who are handling repat (plenty of them high-point men) aren't really burned about the whole deal:

Unit strength including rank of corporal (no NRMA men above corporal)	382
NRMA strength (boxcar numbers)	115
Percentage of NRMA	30·1

(Report is that this is a little higher than non-unit drafts which normally run about 28 per cent at No. 8 Repat Depot.)

Taken at Random

Further with the report: "Just to go a bit farther I asked to see the documents of some of the NRMA men to get a picture of their points and service. I went through the documents—with an expert I might add. We took four cases, the first four we could find selected at random, and here you have it:

No operational duty, point score 57.

"Have gone into this matter pretty thoroughly and any men with six figure numbers (above 600,000 at any rate) are definitely NRMA men. When they go active, and they could do so until after VE-Day, their number was changed as is the case with Usher.

"Something which bears an investigation and a good answer is how these men got posted to a First Division unit for return to Canada when they hadn't even left the U.K. on VE-Day. If this practice is being carried out by the reinforcement depots, which everything would lead me to suspect, then it's not good enough. There are a lot of fellows in L of C with high points who rate ahead of the NRMA men, of this category at least, who could be posted to units for return to Canada—not even taking into consideration the high point men from other active units who might like to have a look at Canada."

For Fighting Men

The Maple Leaf was established in Naples, in Italy, back in January, 1944, for Canadian Forces IN ACTION. The Maple Leaf has been produced for the soldiers, the fighting men. The Maple Leaf has always done everything in its power to help the fighting men get a break. It's not stopping now.

This sort of business isn't funny. The men who volunteered to come overseas, who either went into action as volunteers or did their best as volunteers to see that the fighting men were equipped with the necessaries, deserve better treatment. This is an appeal on behalf of the volunteers who made this Canadian Army an army of which to be proud. All that is wanted is justice. J.D.M.

To Continue . . .

Men in garrison battalions, called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act, still non-active, but going home. The more we think about it, the less we like it. We like it even less than we did yesterday which was something considerably short of small huzza.

Let's get the picture straight:

These men were called up as far back as 1942. So they didn't go active. So maybe that's their business. Some blame the system, some the men. Some don't blame anybody. Some, on the other hand, think everything worked out just dandy. Some, on the other hand, wrist and elbow, still think Canadian men should never have gone overseas at all. It's a matter of opinion.

But, whatever the opinion, these men didn't come overseas until early in 1945. And they didn't come to Europe until after V-E day, after the shooting had stopped. And they came in garrison battalions. Those garrison battalions, if memory serves correctly, were slated for the occupation force.

And what happens? Some of the men in them, who have just come overseas, who have never fired a round anywhere but on the ranges, are steered into a First Canadian Infantry Division unit draft for HOME!

It may be said that they were specialists, tradesmen. If they were, all the more reason for holding them in Europe and releasing active specialists and tradesmen in L of C and CAOF with the necessary point score. It may be said that they weren't specialists, that they were just a bunch of guys. If they were, guard duty for a while with the CAOF on them would look good.

[Mr. Abbott.]

It may be said that they were needed to fill up unit drafts. And it may be answered—has the need ever been THAT great? A good many gents with the points and shooting service would like to know.

It may be said that it's the "luck of the draw". And it may be answered that this is too serious a business to leave to chance, that there was no "luck of the draw" when men volunteered to come overseas and do something about a war that needed winning.

It may be said that it's the system, that's the way it's laid down, and that's the way it's got to be; that the men in charge of repat overseas are hamstrung, are doing their best in the face of policy. That is probably the real answer. But policy has been changed before and can be again.

This situation cannot be corrected too soon.

INTERIM INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT

Mr. ROSS (Souris):

1. When was the interim international wheat agreement concluded?

2. When and where was the last international conference on wheat held?

3. By whom was Canada represented?

4. What countries sent representatives to the conference?

5. What were the purposes of the conference, and what subjects were on the agenda?

6. Upon what subjects, if any, was agreement achieved?

7. Upon what subjects was it impossible to achieve agreement?

8. What was the attitude of Canada on each of these subjects?

9. What nations took an attitude on any of these subjects, differing from the Canadian attitude, and what was the attitude of each such nation on each such subject?

10. By what nations has the agreement been broken, and in what particulars has it been so broken?

11. When will the next international conference on wheat be held, and by whom will Canada be represented?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

1. A memorandum of agreement between the Argentine, Australia, Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States of America to which a draft convention was attached, took effect on June 27, 1942.

2. The International Wheat Council met in London on August 31 and September 1, 1945.

3. R. V. Biddulph, European commissioner of the Canadian wheat board.

4. Argentina, Australia, Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States of America.

5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10. It has been agreed by the participating governments that the discussions in council are secret. Any disclosure by Canada of the information requested, without the concurrence of the other governments, would be a breach of confidence.

11. The next meeting of the council will be in January, 1946, unless a meeting is convened earlier. Canada's representative has not yet been appointed.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES

Mr. FRASER:

1. What was the total amount spent on advertising of family allowances to date?

2. How much was spent in each province, (a) in the daily newspapers; (b) in the weekly newspapers?

3. How much was spent from May 1 to June 15, 1945?

ALASKA HIGHWAY

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

Will that part of the Alaska highway which is in Canada be maintained and kept up by the government when said highway is surrendered to Canada by the United States?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The government is continuing to give active consideration to this question and an announcement will be made at an appropriate time.

COAL—TORONTO

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What action is being taken to supply the city of Toronto with anthracite coal this winter?

2. What shortage is there in delivery of Canada's anthracite quota or allotment, (a) for the whole of Canada; (b) for Toronto and district?

3. What is being done to secure further anthracite supply?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. Arrangements have been made with the United States authorities to supply Canada with anthracite coal in exactly the same proportion as is being supplied in the United States. Anthracite coal is being distributed to Toronto and to all other consuming centres in Canada in equitable proportion to their past record of consumption.

2. (a) Anthracite deliveries to the whole of Canada for the current coal year up to September 28, 1945, have been 92·8 per cent of quota or allotment.

(b) Anthracite deliveries to Toronto and district for the current coal year up to September 28, 1945, have been 94·4 per cent of quota or allotment.

3. Representations are being made as necessary and advisable to the solid fuels administrator in Washington to maintain quota shipments. In view of the short supply from the mines, however, Canada cannot expect a bigger percentage of available anthracite than is being supplied in the United States.

P.E.I. CAR FERRY SERVICE

Mr. McLURE:

1. What progress is being made in the construction of the new car ferry steamer for the Borden-Tormentine service?
2. When will this steamer be completed?
3. What will be the name of this boat?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. The hull and car deck is about three-quarters finished, with the other steel work fabricated to the extent of about 50 per cent of all steel.

The fabrication of machinery is about 40 per cent completed.

2. In the late summer of 1946.
3. Not yet determined.

Mr. McLURE:

1. Did a United States army engineer make a survey of Borden-Tormentine ferry during the summer of 1944?
2. If so, has a report been submitted to the government?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. No. A retired member of the United States corps of engineers was engaged in 1945 to review the previous reports on the Prince Edward Island car ferry terminal facilities and has submitted certain recommendations with reference to the Tormentine terminal works.

2. No. The engineer's report is still under consideration by the Department of Transport.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK

Mr. McGARRY:

1. Where is the head office of the industrial development bank?
2. How many branches are in operation and where located?
3. Is there a branch office in the maritime provinces? If so, where is it located?
4. How many loans have been made by the industrial development bank?
5. What is the total of all loans?
6. Of the loans made, how many were, (a) made to established industrial concerns; (b) to new industrial firms; (c) to ex-service men?

Mr. MAYHEW:

1. Ottawa.

2. Montreal—general manager's office; Toronto and Vancouver.

3. No.

4, 5 and 6. The Industrial Development Bank is not a branch of the Dominion government but a subsidiary of the Bank of Canada.

Section 29 (1) of the Industrial Development Bank Act requires that "The bank shall, within twenty-one days following the end of each calendar month, make up and transmit to the Minister of Finance in such form as he may prescribe, a statement of its assets and liabilities at the close of business on the last day of the preceding month." This statement as at August 31, 1945, appeared in the Canada Gazette of September 22, 1945, and showed loans and investments (excluding dominion government securities) at $711,965.87.

In addition, section 29 (2) provides that "The bank shall make up and transmit to the Minister of Finance at least once in its fiscal year or more frequently if so directed by the minister, in such form as he may prescribe, a classification of its loans and investments and of the loans guaranteed by it." Provision is made for the publication of this statement in the Canada Gazette following its receipt by the minister.

GOVERNMENT-OWNED WAR PLANTS

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Have any government-owned war plants been sold up to the present time?
2. If so, how many and which ones are they?
3. To whom have they been sold?
4. What price did each plant bring?
5. Are sales of any government-owned war plants pending at present?
6. If so, how many plants does this involve and which ones are they?

Mr. COLDWELL: May I suggest that this question be dropped? It was answered in part the other day by an answer to another question. If I need further information I will reword the question.

Question dropped.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK—PRAIRIE PROVINCES

Mr. JAENICKE:

1. Is it the intention of the industrial development bank to establish branches in any of the cities or other communities of the three prairie provinces?
2. If so, in which cities or communities, and when?

Mr. MAYHEW: 1 and 2. The policy of the Industrial Development Bank in opening additional branches will be determined by the board of directors in light of the number and distribution of applications for loans received by the bank.

POST OFFICE—HEADS OF BRANCHES OR HIGHER

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough):

1. What appointments have been made, since January 1, 1945, to the headquarters staff of the Post Office Department to positions of heads of branches or higher?
2. What are the salaries paid to each such appointee?
3. What are the qualifications and previous positions held of each such person?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier):

1. Walter J. Turnbull appointed deputy postmaster general, 9 June, 1945; John A. Sullivan appointed associate deputy postmaster general, 9 June, 1945. (Retirement effective 15 November, 1945); W. D. Adamson appointed director, Public relations branch, 9 June, 1945.

2. Walter J. Turnbull, $9,000 per annum; John A. Sullivan, $9,000 per annum; W. D. Adamson, $3,900 per annum.

3. Walter J. Turnbull—21 years experience in Post Office Department. 9 years experience in office of Prime Minister; John A. Sullivan—9 years experience in Post Office Department as deputy postmaster general; W. D. Adamson—Since 8 August 1940, private secretary to Postmaster General. Formerly news editor Ottawa Journal.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

Mr. BLAIR:

1. Who are the members of the national film board?
2. What salary is paid to each such member?
3. What are the qualifications of each such member, including a statement of their experience in film work?
4. When does the term of office of each such member expire?

Mr. McCANN:

1. Hon. Dr. James J. McCann, Ottawa; Hon. Brooke Claxton, Ottawa; Dr. Georges Bouchard, Ottawa; Mr. J. F. MacNeill, K.C., Ottawa; Mr. M. M. MacLean, Ottawa; Mr. Donald Cameron, Edmonton; Mr. C. G. Cowan, Ottawa; Mr. Edmond Turcotte, Montreal.

2. None.

3. The members of the national film board are appointed under the terms of section 3 of the National Film Board Act, 1939, and subsequent amendments, which require that the national film board should consist of eight members qualified as follows: Hon. James J. McCann, M.D., Minister of National War Services; Hon. Brooke Claxton, Minister of National Health and Welfare; Dr. Georges Bouchard, Assistant deputy minister of agriculture; Mr. J. F. MacNeill, K.C., Law clerk of the Senate; Mr. M. M. MacLean, director, industrial relations branch, Department of Labour; Mr. Donald Cameron, director, department of extension, University of Alberta. Has been in charge of educational film work in Alberta since 1937. Director of national film society since 1938. Mr. C. G. Cowan, vice-president, British-American Bank Note Co. One of the organizers of national film society of which he has been director and vice-president since 1935. Mr. Edmond Turcotte, Editor in chief, Le Canada. One of the organizers and officers of Montreal branch of the national film society of which he has been director since 1941.

4. Dr. Georges Bouchard: August 31, 1946; Mr. J. F. MacNeill, K.C.: November 11, 1945; Mr. M. M. MacLean: January 12, 1947; Mr. Donald Cameron: August 31, 1946; Mr. C. G. Cowan: August 31, 1948; Mr. Edmond Turcotte: September 1, 1947. Hon. James J. McCann and Hon. Brooke Claxton: at pleasure.

Mr. HENDERSON:

1. What is the total number of employees of the national film board?
2. What was the total number of employees of the national film board as of September 1, 1939?

1. 785.

2. None at that date as the national film board which replaced the motion picture bureau did not begin functionng until late October 1939. The motion picture bureau consisted of some forty employees at that time.

DOMINION TRADE AND INDUSTRY COMMISSION

Mr. ROBINSON (Bruce):

1. Who are the members of the dominion trade and industrial commission?
2. What are the duties and responsibilities of the commission?
3. How many sittings of the commission have been held in each of the past four years?

Mr. MacKINNON:

1. Chief commissioner, H. B. McKinnon; temporary assistant chief commissioner, W. J. Callaghan; commissioner, C. P. Hebert (overseas).

2. The duties and responsibilities of the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission are set forth in sections 15 to 27, inclusive, of the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act, 1935.

3. The board does not hold sittings or public hearings in the same manner as the tariff board, but since 1942 the commission has dealt with forty-four cases. This number of cases, however, does not indicate the total number of complaints investigated by the commission. In a number of instances there were a large number of separate and distinct complaints which, in view of the fact that they were all of the same nature and against the same people, were included with the original complaint under the one case number. For example, in case number 233 there were seventy separate complaints investigated. To a lesser extent a like situation exists with respect to other case numbers.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

SUGAR STABILIZATION FUND

Mr. BLACKMORE:

1. In the sugar stabilization fund, how much money was acquired from sources other than that of buying imports of raw cane sugar and reselling such raw cane sugar to the sugar refineries?
2. From what other sources was such money acquired, and how much from each source in each of the years, 1940, 1941, 1942, 1943, 1944, 1945 to September 12?

DISALLOWANCE OF PROVINCIAL LEGISLATION

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Were any petitions for the disallowance of any acts of the Saskatchewan legislature filed with the Department of Justice during the tenures of office of Liberal administrations in that province?
2. If so, what legislation was involved?
3. Was the Saskatchewan Liberal government notified by the federal authority of the receipt and content of any such petition?
4. Were any requests made by any petitioner for permission to make supplementary oral argument?
5. Was any such request granted?
6. What action regarding the petitions, if any, was taken by the federal authority?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—APPOINTMENTS SINCE SEPTEMBER 1, 1939

Mr. BLAIR:

1. How many persons have been appointed to the Department of External Affairs since September 1, 1939?
2. What are their names, indicating those that are temporary and those that are permanent?
3. What is the title of the position held by each and what, in detail, are the duties of such positions?
4. By whom was each such person appointed?
5. What salary is paid to each such person?

CANADIAN NAVY—RETIREMENTS—COMMODORE OR HIGHER

Mr. WHITE (Middlesex East):

1. What are the names of all persons holding the rank of commodore, or higher, who have been retired from the Royal Canadian Navy since January 1, 1943?
2. What was the date of each such person's retirement?
3. What annual pension or superannuation has been granted to each such person?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

THE BUDGET—SUSPENSION OF STANDING ORDERS RESPECTING PRIVATE AND PUBLIC BILLS ON FRIDAY NEXT

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved:

That standing order 15 in relation to the consideration of private and public bills on Fridays, and standing order 28 with regard to Mr. Speaker leaving the chair without question put, be suspended on Friday, October 12 instant, so that the budget may be brought down on that day by the Minister of Finance.

He said: This is purely a routine motion, in conformity with the previously expressed unanimous consent of the house.

Motion agreed to.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STRIKE AT FORD MOTOR PLANT, WINDSOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I have a question to direct to the Minister of Labour. Has the government been informed of a threatened strike in the steel industry in sympathy with the automobile workers at Windsor, and if so, what steps are being taken to settle the dispute?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The answer to the first part of the question of my hon. friend is, no; we have no information whatsoever of the kind which apparently he has received or obtained.

I should like to make a brief statement, if I may, in reply to the leader of the opposition. I believe he wanted to speak of the Ford dispute, not a steel dispute, and I assume that is the purport of the question.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Go ahead.

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) sent me notice of a question yesterday, but as we did not have orders of the day yesterday I was unable to reply to it. I think that I might now answer both questions at the same time.

The answer to the question of the hon. member for Cape Breton South is that the responsibility for bringing the strike of the Ford Motor company employees at Windsor to an end is one which must be assumed by the parties to the dispute. It is for the government to make available conciliation machinery by which assistance can be given to resolve such disputes. My department is ready at any moment to do so if the parties will take advantage of it. Up to the present moment it has not been possible to bring the parties into conference, but efforts in that direction are continuing.

It might be well if I were to give to the house the facts in connection with this strike. A board of conciliation had reported unanimously that the chief issue between the parties was the question of union security. The union demanded the application of the union shop principle as well as the check-off of union dues. Other questions such as increased wages, take-home pay, job security, et cetera, were brought before the board, but the board was unanimous in the view that such matters were required to be taken up with the regional war labour board for Ontario under the provisions of the wage control order. If, therefore, as some hon. members have suggested the Ford workers are on strike to obtain higher wages, and shorter hours of employment and similar improvements in conditions of employment, the way was open to them to obtain consideration of such demands by the war labour boards under the wage control order. To the extent that they are on strike to obtain such demands, they are in violation of the provisions of the wage control orders.

However, be that as it may, the fact is that the Ford workers decided to strike, their objective being to force the Ford company to give them a contract which would be satisfactory, one which would include provision for the union shop and check-off. These were the issues which the board of conciliation said unanimously were "at the root of all the difficulties between the company and the union." The union concerned was not willing to wait to take their wage and other similar demands before the regional war labour board for Ontario, or to await the reply of the company to the recommendations made by the board of conciliation on the issues of union shop and check-off, but on the next day following consideration of that report called a strike of all the employees concerned. The union now is seeking further intervention by the government, and a demand has been made that the government take over the company's operations and appoint a controller.

The situation has been made more difficult by the fact that the picketing policy of the union has prevented officials and necessary office staff of the company from gaining access to their place of business, and by the withdrawal of the maintenance employees of the company—that is, the men engaged in the power houses. Such a policy makes conciliation practically impossible. I give these facts to the house because I feel that, both here and outside, attempts have been made to confuse the issue and to make it appear that there is a lack of effective government legislation to deal with the demands of the workers and to bring about a settlement of the dispute. This is wholly without foundation. There is no lack of effective legislation, and everything possible has been done by the Ontario Department of Labour and by the Dominion Department of Labour over the past eighteen months to bring about a settlement of the dispute between the company and the union by conciliation.

May I close with this final word. I have this day wired the parties to the dispute, inviting them to attend a meeting in Toronto on Monday, October 15. I have also urged upon the union the desirability of giving company officials and necessary office employees access to their place of business prior to the meeting on Monday, which would remove an obstacle found by the company to attendance at a conference on a previous occasion, and I think would also create a condition which would help make the conference a success. I have no advice as to whether or not the union will take this suggested action. It may mean that some hon. members will be asked for guidance by the union leaders, and if so I trust they will endorse my recommendation. At the proposed meeting would be representatives of the Dominion Department of Labour and also of the Ontario Department of Labour; arrangements already have been made to this effect.

UNITED NATIONS

CANADIAN REPRESENTATION AT CONFERENCE TO CONSIDER EDUCATIONAL AND CULTURAL ORGANIZATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I understand that on behalf of the conference of allied ministers of education, the British government has extended invitations to all allied governments to be represented at a conference in London, England, beginning November 1 of this year, when the draft constitution to establish the educational and cultural organization of the united nations will be considered. Since Canada played an important part in the drafting of the chapter in the united nations charter relating to the social and economic council under which the educational council will be set up, and in view of the interest of this country in cultural cooperation among the nations, what steps have been taken to ensure adequate representation from Canada at the forthcoming conference, and, if we are to have representation, who will be the Canadian representatives?

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): The Canadian government has been invited to be represented at the international conference mentioned by my hon. friend, which is to discuss the establishment of an educational and cultural organization related to the united nations organization. The conference will have before it a draft constitution, prepared by the conference of allied ministers of education, and it is expected that this conference will be largely concerned with the consideration to be given to this draft. It is the intention of the government to accept the invitation for Canada to be represented at the conference. I hope, very shortly, to be able to announce the composition of the Canadian delegation.

FAR EASTERN COMMISSION

CANADIAN REPRESENTATION AT MEETING OF ALLIED ADVISORY COMMISSION ON JAPAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs if the government has received an invitation from the government of the United States to send a representative to the meeting of the allied advisory commission on Japan which is proposed to be held in Washington on October 23. If so, by whom will Canada be represented?

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): I had a statement prepared to communicate to the house to-day which I think constitutes a very fitting answer to the question just submitted by the leader of the opposition. On October 8 the United States ambassador addressed a note to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs which read as follows:

Sir:

Acting under instructions from my government, I have the honour to convey to you the following message:

"The governments of the United States, the United Kingdom, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and China have agreed to the establishment of a far eastern advisory commission for the consideration of political matters connected with the fulfilment by Japan of its obligations under the instrument of surrender. It is the desire of these governments that the commission include representatives of certain other states which have actively participated in the war against Japan and which are principally interested in the area of the western Pacific. A cordial invitation is extended to the government of Canada to participate in the commission."

Accept, sir, the renewed assurance of my highest consideration.

The following reply has been sent to the United States ambassador to-day:

Excellency,

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your note of October 8th informing the government of Canada of the establishment of a far eastern advisory commission by agreement between the governments of the United States, the United Kingdom, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and China. I am happy to inform you that the government of Canada accepts, with pleasure, the invitation contained in your note to participate in the commission.

Accept, Excellency, the renewed assurance of my highest consideration.

I should add that a further communication has been received from the United States ambassador, stating that the initial meeting of the far eastern advisory commission is to be held in Washington on October 23, and requesting the Canadian government to designate its representative. Mr. L. B. Pearson, Canadian ambassador to the United States, has been designated to represent the government of Canada at the initial meetings of the far eastern advisory commission.

REMEMBRANCE DAY

INQUIRY AS TO PLANS FOR OBSERVANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. GLADSTONE (Wellington South): Inquiries have come to the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald), to me and no doubt to other hon. members, as to the continued observance of November 11 as Remembrance day. I should like to ask the Secretary of State if the government has some plans to suggest to the country for the observance of that day.

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Secretary of State): The hon. member for Wellington South, the hon. member for Brantford City and to-day the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) served me with notice that they intended to ask this question.

It is intended that Sunday, November 11, shall be observed in Canada this year as a day of remembrance of those who have died while serving the country during the two great wars. This is in accordance with the arrangements which have been made for observance in the United Kingdom, which arrangements have been approved by His Majesty the King.

It is desired, therefore, that two minutes' silence be observed throughout Canada between 11 a.m. and 11.02 a.m. on Sunday, November 11. It is also expected that arrangements will be made in local centres for such services or ceremonies of remembrance as may appear appropriate in each locality. The Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League contemplate arranging a national remembrance day ceremony at Ottawa at three o'clock on the afternoon of Sunday, November 11. The detail of the arrangements for this ceremony will be announced later.

In the question of the leader of the opposition which was sent to me this morning he asked as to the intended practice for subsequent years. What will be done in future years will be a matter for future consideration. Consideration will be given to the practice to be decided upon later in the United Kingdom and elsewhere, and the decision will be made after full consultation by the Department of the Secretary of State with the Minister of Veterans Affairs and the ministers of the defence departments, together with representatives of soldier organizations of the two great wars.

SURPLUS WAR ASSETS

DISPOSAL OF PLANTS AND EQUIPMENT USED IN MAKING EXPLOSIVES AND FILLING SHELLS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): Mr. Speaker, because there has been criticism in respect of the destruction of war materials, I should like to make a statement in the hope of forestalling further criticism along the same lines.

As many hon. members are aware, following the first great war a number of accidents, some of which were fatal, resulted from the careless disposal of plants and equipment used for making explosives and filling shells. We are determined that no such unfortunate occurrence shall result from our disposal of the explosives and shell filling plants this time. For this reason, decontamination work is proceeding in all such plants prior to their being turned over to War Assets Corporation. This work is going forward under a decontamination committee of the Department of Munitions and Supply. This committee comprises a group of explosives experts. Their task is to ensure that, to the greatest extent possible consistent with safety, all machinery, equipment, buildings, and lumber shall be salvaged, and at the same time to ensure that no hazards remain.

No property is being destroyed without the express permission of this committee, and all salvageable materials after being thoroughly desensitized and freed of hazards will be turned over to War Assets Corporation for disposal.

So that hon. members may be made aware of the careful work being done by the decontamination committee and those under its control, and so that they may be assured that no salvageable material is being destroyed, I have asked the committee to arrange that newspaper men be permitted to visit a typical plant where they will see the decontamination methods being employed and view the material being salvaged. They also will witness the destruction of a building which became so impregnated with dangerous explosives that no amount of decontamination could make it safe. This press party will visit the Bouchard works near Ste. Therese, Quebec, on Friday afternoon, October 12. I would welcome any hon. members, or any members of provincial legislatures, who might wish to accompany the party. The group will leave the Munitions and Supply office at 1155 Bishop Street, Montreal, in a chartered bus at 12.45 p.m., and will be returned to Montreal in the same bus.

At later dates, similar tours of the plants at Pickering, Ontario, and at Winnipeg, will be arranged, and should any hon. member of this house or of a provincial legislature wish to attend, he will be made welcome.

RESEARCH ENTERPRISES

POSSIBLE DISPOSITION OR FUTURE USE OF PROPERTY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Reconstruction. Have any suggestions or reports been made to the minister by the administrators of Research Enterprises Limited as to the disposition of this property or its possible future use? If so, will the minister lay on the table of the house any documents or reports relating thereto?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): Recommendations have been made. They are made by officers of the department to the minister, and I regard them as confidential documents. It would be impossible to table them at this time, when the disposal of the plant, more or less along the lines of the recommendations, is under consideration. After the transaction is closed and the property has been dealt with I shall be glad to table all the relevant documents.

HOUSING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. May I refer to page 899 of Hansard where, under the heading "Motions for Papers" I find one in my name with reference to semi-permanent wartime houses. The report of the discussion is in part as follows:

Mr. Fraser: I shall call the minister's office on that. Subject to the reservation mentioned, I should like the motion to pass.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

Mr. Fraser: No.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

My understanding was that the minister agreed the motion should pass, under the conditions mentioned.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): My hon. friend sent me a note in which he set out the express documents he wished to have. I am sending him those documents. I did not understand that the motion was to be dropped, but in any event he will get the documents. If he wishes to put it back, that can be done.

Mr. FRASER: It will be all right with the minister if it passes?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

UNITED NATIONS

FOOD AND AGRICULTURE ORGANIZATION

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of bill No. 14, for carrying into effect the agreement for a food and agricultural organization of the united nations between Canada and certain other nations and authorities.

He said: Mr. Speaker, a few days ago the house was kind enough to agree that full discussion of this measure should come on the motion for second reading, rather than upon the resolution presented at that time. I said to the house on that occasion that I would give a review of the circumstances leading up to the presentation of the bill to the house, and that I would be prepared to listen to any discussion in which hon. members might wish to take part with regard to the measure itself or other matters pertaining to it.

Item No. 9 on today's order paper is one calling for the second reading of bill No. 14, an act for carrying into effect the agreement for a food and agricultural organization of the united nations between Canada and certain other nations and authorities. At this time I am moving second reading of the bill which I have before me and which, I believe, is in the hands of all hon. members.

The explanatory note to the bill sets out the real reason for its being brought to the house, it states:

> The purpose of this bill is to enable the government of Canada to give effect to the agreement for a food and agriculture organization of the united nations which is to be signed and come into force when twenty nations have notified their acceptance of the constitution set out in the schedule to the bill. The method proposed is to empower the governor in council to do whatever may be proper and expedient for carrying out the provisions of the constitution, or any recommendations of the conference of the organization, or its committees, made pursuant to such provisions. It is also provided that all expenditures incurred in carrying out the agreement shall be defrayed out of moneys provided by parliament.

I do not think I need go into detail to emphasize the importance of the measure now before us, but perhaps it would be proper to give a historical review of the circumstances leading up to its introduction.

In the spring of 1943 a conference was called at Hot Springs, Virginia, by the then President of the United States, the late President Roosevelt. That meeting was attended by representatives of forty-four united nations. It was the first international conference to deal with post-war plans and development, and it seems fitting that the first conference held to carry into effect some of the principles set out in the Atlantic charter should be one having to do with food. Since agriculture is particularly related to the production of food products both in this country and elsewhere, this measure has been placed on the order paper under my name.

It has been shown that there is a need for improved nutritional conditions throughout the world. The benefits to be derived from improved nutrition in human welfare and international relations and in the interests of agriculture and other natural products industries is well recognized by all members of this house. The recommendations of the conference were to the effect that a permanent food and agriculture organization be established, and that in the meantime an interim commission be appointed to base upon the recommendations of the conference a constitution which could be submitted to the governments of the united nations, the adoption of which would result in the formation of a permanent organization. The chairman of that interim organization was Hon. L. B. Pearson. I think we in the Dominion of Canada have reason to be proud of the fact that Canada's representative was chosen as the first chairman of that organization.

Under the terms of the proposed constitution a maximum of twenty nations must become members before the organization can be formed. I have before me at this moment a list of the names of the nations which have signified their intention of becoming members. This list is composed of thirty names which I think should be placed upon Hansard. The following is the list of countries that have indicated their intention to accept the constitution of F.A.O.:

Australia	Liberia
Belgium	Luxembourg
China	Mexico
Czechoslovakia	Netherlands
Denmark	New Zealand
Dominican Republic	Nicaragua
Ecuador	Norway
Egypt	Paraguay
France	Philippines
Greece	Poland
Guatemala	Union of South Africa
Haiti	United Kingdom
Honduras	United States
Iceland	Venezuela
India
Iraq

The organization will be an inter-governmental body. It will administer its own activities within the provisions of the constitution which are outlined in the schedule to this bill. There will be a director general appointed at the conference of the organization. An executive committee consisting of not less than nine and not more than fifteen members will be appointed by the conference and to which the conference may delegate powers. It will concern itself with studies of production and marketing problems as they relate to food, agriculture, forestry and fisheries, and it will endeavour to promote research work having to do with the solution of these problems. It will endeavour to render assistance to any government requesting such assistance. It will assemble and distribute official data and promote the development of information that can be coordinated internationally. It will serve the interests of both producers and consumers and function as an organization representing food, agriculture, fisheries and forestry in international deliberations with other international organizations of the united nations.

One matter that will be of interest to hon. members who are being asked to consent to this bill which will permit our taking part in the organization of this conference is the question of expense. I should like to set out the position in relation to the expenses of the organization. For the first year, when the organization is getting under way and when it will have only a small staff, F.A.O. will operate on a budget of $2,500,000. Any unspent balance will form a nucleus of a capital fund. The commission recommends that the average expenditures for the first five years should be estimated at about $5,000,000 yearly. A temporary apportionment of expenses has been recommended by the commission, and a division of the expenses among the different nations involved will be found at the end of the schedule to the bill which is before the house. No member nation will be asked to pay more than 25 per cent. The four major powers will assume 54·5 per cent of the total expenses. For the first year the United States will pay 25 per cent of the expenses, the United Kingdom 15 per cent, the Soviet Union 8 per cent, China 6·5 per cent and France 5·69 per cent. Canada is sixth in the list with 5·06 per cent. Provision is made for new members to the extent of two per cent of the total expenses. The contributions of liberated countries has been scaled down as a measure of temporary financial relief, but when world conditions improve and they are able to pay more, the proportions allotted to some of the other countries will be reduced accordingly.

Those are the important facts in connection with the measure itself. The need for this measure being passed with as great dispatch as possible arises from the fact that the first meeting of the conference is to be held in Quebec, opening on Tuesday October 16. I assume that the nations that are mentioned as having already indicated their desire to be parties to the conference will be represented. We are sending a delegation representative of the government. A list of those who are to go will be available to members of the house as soon as the order in council appointing them is made complete. I should like to say to hon. members that those representatives will be largely officials of the departments of agriculture, fisheries and forestry under the Department of Mines and Resources and persons representing the health department or having to do with nutrition. The delegation will be made up largely of officials of the government taken from these different departments.

There will also be present as a representative of that organization the president of the farm federation, Mr. Hannam, as well as others who have been selected here and there to a limited extent. There are others who have been selected as delegates or as advisers to those who are delegates to the conference. This list will be made available at the earliest moment. As soon as it is placed before me it will be laid on the table so that it may be available to hon. members.

In addition to the officials of the departments, Hon. L. B. Pearson will be a delegate. I understand that the acting Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) will be there on Tuesday to open the meeting, and I have been asked to attend as a member of the government and as one of the delegates. My deputy will be a deputy representative of the government at that first meeting.

It is our desire to have this legislation passed in order that our membership in the conference may be made official along with others who will be gathered there and who have already taken suitable action in their own countries to make their position legal and official, and in order that we may be on the same footing as other delegations.

I would therefore move that the bill be given its second reading.

Mr. BRACKEN: I wonder if the minister would answer one question before he sits down. The explanatory note to the bill contains this statement:

. . . the agreement for a food and agriculture organization of the united nations which is to be signed . . .

The second paragraph of the preamble contains these words:

And whereas Canada is transmitting an instrument of acceptance of the constitution to the interim commission . . .

There is a little confusion as to whether the government has transmitted that instrument of acceptance to the interim commission or whether that is to be done after this measure is passed.

Mr. GARDINER: I understand that it has been prepared and will be forwarded as soon as the legislation is passed.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the house has listened with interest to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) as he outlined the circumstances leading up to this proposal and gave a brief outline of the clauses of the bill. I am rising at this time to do two things: first, to commend the objective and the purpose of the measure, and second, to criticize the means by which the government is planning to set up and carry on this organization.

The bill provides for two things which were outlined by the minister: the carrying into effect of a certain agreement with respect to the food and agriculture organization of the united nations; and that all expenses in connection therewith shall be defrayed out of moneys provided by parliament.

As I said, we on this side approve the objective of the bill, but we criticize the manner in which it is proposed to administer it. The first question which we have to try to understand is, what is the agreement? There was an agreement made at the Hot Springs conference, which is referred to in the report of the interim commission, but I gather—and I presume it is a fair interpretation—that the government means by the agreement the terms of the constitution set out in the schedule of the bill.

Arising out of the Hot Springs conference there was an agreement that steps should be taken to form a united nations organization to try to improve the standards of nutrition and the standards of living of all peoples, and an interim commission was appointed to prepare complete plans for a permanent organization for that purpose. The report of that interim commission was tabled in this house in the early days of the session. It set out the form of constitution, and that form of constitution is now included as a schedule to this bill. I asked the Minister of Agriculture a moment ago what the government has done by way of advising with respect to the government's acceptance of the agreement, and the minister said that they have the acceptance ready to go and are awaiting the approval by parliament of this measure before the advice goes forward.

In this bill, as I read it, the government is asking that power be given to the governor in council to do all "such things as appear to him to be necessary for carrying out the provisions of the constitution." The governor in council is to be given power by this bill to "make such appointments, establish such offices, make such orders in council and do such things as appear to him to be necessary" to carry this agreement into effect or to carry out the constitution as outlined in the schedule to the bill; and further, to carry out recommendations of the organization, which may comprise forty-five or more nations in which Canada has only one vote; and power also to carry out the recommendations of any committees that the organization may set up. These are very wide powers which the government seeks in connection with this bill. Three questions arise which every member of this house, I am sure, will want to think about. First, what are the essential features of this agreement or of this constitution or of this bill? Secondly, what recommendations may come forward from the conference which it aids in setting up, and what recommendations may come forward from the committees that the conference may set up? The bill aims to give the government power to carry out not only the recommendations of the conference of the organization, but the recommendations of committees of the conference. As the bill now stands, it is giving the government power to do all these things.

Let me refer for a moment to one or two of the essential features of the bill. The schedule contains twenty-six articles, and I want to refer to two or three of them. First of all article XVIII, from which I quote:

Upon approval of a budget the total amount approved shall be allocated among the member nations in proportions determined, from time to time, by the conference. Each member nation undertakes, subject to the requirements of its constitutional procedure, to contribute to the organization promptly its share of the expenses so determined.

As the minister has pointed out, the budget proposed for the first year is two and a half million dollars, of which Canada is expected to contribute 5·06 per cent, or something over $125,000 the first year. In another place, not in the bill but in the report of the interim commission, as the minister pointed out, this organization expects that the expenses will be $5,000,000 a year after the first year. If the percentage allocated to Canada remains the same, 5·06 per cent, our contribution will come to more than $250,000 a year. The conference is given power to alter by a two-thirds vote the percentage that each nation will pay, but in any event the government of Canada will be committed on the passage of this bill to that figure for five years. In other words when we pass this bill we are committing ourselves to an expenditure of something over one million dollars—5·06 per cent of $2,500,000 the first year and 5·06 per cent of $5,000,000 for each of four years—and we cannot get out of it until the end of five years. It is clear that we are asked to commit ourselves to that expenditure for five years. At the moment I am not criticizing that feature of the measure; I am just pointing out what it is that we are being asked to do under this bill.

I have said that by the passage of this bill the government will be in a position to carry out the recommendations of the conference of from forty to fifty nations which this bill makes possible, and will be empowered to carry out also the recommendations of the committees of that conference. I think, therefore, that we should inquire as to what powers the organization is being given under this bill. Something of that may be seen in the preamble to the bill and in the outline of the functions of the organization given on page 3 of the schedule. The preamble states:

> The nations accepting this constitution, being determined to promote the common welfare by furthering separate and collective action on their part for the purposes of:
> raising levels of nutrition and standards of living of the peoples under their respective jurisdictions,
> securing improvements in the efficiency of the production and distribution of all food and agricultural products, > bettering the condition of rural populations, and thus contributing toward an expanding world economy, > hereby establish the food and agriculture organization.

Then follows an outline of the functions of the food and agriculture organization once it is set up. Here is the outline in article I of the schedule:

> 1. The organization shall collect, analyse, interpret, and disseminate information relating to nutrition, food and agriculture.
> 2. The organization shall promote and, where appropriate, shall recommend national and international action with respect to:
> (a) scientific, technological, social, and economic research relating to nutrition, food and agriculture;
> (b) the improvement of education and administration relating to nutrition, food and agriculture, and the spread of public knowledge of nutritional and agricultural science and practice;
> (c) the conservation of natural resources and the adoption of improved methods of agriculture production;
> (d) the improvement of the processing, marketing, and distribution of food and agricultural products;
> (e) the adoption of policies for the provision of adequate agricultural credit, national and international;
> (f) the adoption of international policies with respect to agricultural commodity arrangements.

There are even wider powers, because:

> It shall also be the function of the organization:
> (b) to organize, in cooperation with the governments concerned, such missions as may be needed to assist them to fulfil the obligations. . . .

And so on. I need not read it all. I have read sufficient to show, what the bill clearly indicates, that the purposes of the organization are very wide, as are the powers we are giving the government to carry out the recommendations of the organization.

I have outlined briefly the purposes of this permanent food and agriculture organization. I have shown something of their functions as set out in the bill and something of the powers being granted the government with respect to it, and I have said that we favour the objectives both of the conference and of this measure. I have said also that we object to the manner in which the government is proceeding to carry it out.

Three questions are raised in my mind, and, I am sure, will be raised in the minds of other members of the house: What is the need in Canada for this measure? What obligation does it place upon Canada, and what advantages will Canada derive from it?

With respect to the advantage to Canada, I do not think that anyone will question the advantage of trying to improve the nutritional standard of the Canadian people and of others. I have here a statement with respect to nutritional standards in Canada and in other countries, and I shall apply myself closely to it so that I can get through in two or three minutes.

With the coming of the new knowledge of nutrition we now know that inadequate diets, either in quantity or in quality, or in both, are responsible for much of present-day disease, sickness and lack of general good health. We now know also that even in such high standard of living countries as Canada and the United States, malnutrition and undernourishment are surprisingly widespread. Before the war the Canadian council of nutrition made a number of food surveys in the cities and rural areas. All these studies showed that a high percentage of the people were inadequately nourished. A shocking situation was revealed, for of the families not on relief, who were earning under $1,500 a year, 77 per cent had a diet too low in total calories; 80 per cent had diets deficient in calcium; 70 per cent had diets deficient in iron. The vitamin situation was then as bad; 61 per cent were deficient in vitamin A, 92 per cent were deficient in vitamin B and 60 per cent were deficient in vitamin C.

A former under-secretary of the United States department of agriculture stated that at least one-fourth of the people in that country who were not on relief had poor diets, and that three-fourths of the total population did not have fully satisfactory diets—and this in spite of the fact that that great nation is probably one of the best fed countries in the whole world.

With respect to Great Britain, the situation is not dissimilar. In 1939 a well known scientist, Sir John Orr, stated that the diet of at least fifty per cent of Britain's population fell short of a desirable standard of nutrition.

In Europe responsible authorities have drawn attention to the fact that prior to the war 80,000,000 people of the rural population of that continent were normally living on the verge of destitution, and that from 30 million to 40 million were permanently underfed. One of these authorities, Mr. F. L. McDougall, in 1935 said that if Europe were to raise its fluid milk consumption to a desirable standard it would be necessary to double the number of milch cows on the continent.

No statistical data are available to show the state of normal undernourishment and normal semi-starvation which is the every-day state of millions in Asia, but enough is known about periodic famines and the high death rates in such countries as India, China and Arabia to indicate that destitution and hunger to a degree are either always present or just around the corner for untold millions. So much for the need of an institution of this kind, not only for the benefit of our own country but for the benefit of other countries as well.

What obligations does this place upon Canada? First, by article XI, we are required to report to the organization the measures we take to try to carry out its purposes. Other countries are required to do the same. Then we are required to grant certain privileges and immunities to the organization —immunity from suit and exemptions from taxation. That will be found in article XV, clause 2. We are required to pay at the moment 5·06 per cent of the cost, the total of which after the first year, it is estimated, will be around $5,000,000 a year, and we are required to do that for five years. After being in for four years we can give notice if we want to get out, but we have to pay for the fifth year before we can get out.

What are the advantages to Canada for that contribution of more than $1,000,000, and for other contributions by way of cooperation, which we shall make? We shall gain the experience of other countries through an international organization which one might call a little league of nations within the limited jurisdiction of food and agriculture. We shall no doubt receive some stimulus to the improvement of our standards of nutrition in this country. There will probably be some improvement in international understanding, probably some increase in the stability of our export trade and our domestic trade, and probably also some increased demand for our own products. As other nations begin to grow what we call protective foods, there will probably be demands for a greater amount of the agricultural products which we produce.

It may be asked, what means are to be employed by this international organization, in which we shall have only one vote and to which we shall contribute over a million dollars, to accomplish these ends? As I read the bill, it seems to me that the efforts are to be directed along three lines: research, the dissemination of already existing knowledge, and the exchange of services. I am sure that every hon. member will support the organization in such approaches to the objectives in this bill.

I believe that scientific research is the key which will unlock the door to greater production, greater consumption, and a higher standard of living among our people.

With respect to the dissemination of already known information, one of the lamentable facts in our society is that there is so much known information and so little of it which gets to the rank and file of our people. As one student has well put it, the accumulation of information far exceeds the assimilation of it by the people. To the extent, therefore, to which this organization succeeds in spreading already existing knowledge in Canada and outside of Canada, it will be doing good service.

The third means they propose to use to accomplish their ends is the exchange of services. In that way knowledge accumulated in one country, another country need not go to the expense of obtaining. There is an exchange of knowledge gained and duplication of effort is lessened. One of the great advantages to Canada of being a neighbour of the United States is that through the last two or three generations we have been able to draw upon the lessons they have learned from their researches and their experiments.

How does the organization propose to use these potential aids to progress? By applying them to five things. You see them in the outline of the functions of the organization: by raising the standards of nutrition, by increasing production, by increasing consumption, by improving distribution, and, in addition, in the conservation and development of our resources.

I cannot take time to-day—it is not necessary, before this house—to point out what great gains can be made in each of these directions. We know that the standard of nutrition can be raised, and as a preventive of illness and as a humanitarian objective it ought to be raised.

With respect to increasing production, one of the serious features of our economy in the past was the danger of surpluses; those who produced the world's food often produced a surplus, and they were frequently impoverished in the process. It is said that if every person in the world were adequately fed we would have to double our production. Well, if the nutrition of the world can be raised, let us hope that the threat of poverty to the people who in the past have raised the world's food will be banished. As our Social Credit friends to the far left here have often said in recent years, one of the weaknesses of our economy is the lack of purchasing power. With that I wholly agree. With the low wages we have had, with unemployment, with low prices for agricultural products, there has not been the purchasing power for farmers or for the workers who produced the things which farmers buy. So there has not been the necessary consumption of agricultural products. We have thus been able under that system to produce more than we could consume. Let us then bring all the research which can be brought to bear on solving the problem of increasing consumption, chiefly by increasing purchasing power.

Then comes the question of improving distribution. Reference is made to transportation, and the preservation of food by quick freezing and otherwise. Let me take a minute to tell the house of something I saw in France last January with respect to the effect of poor transportation on the nutrition and comfort of a country. They told us that four thousand of their bridges had been destroyed by bombing during the war, and that only some twelve hundred had been repaired. In France a good deal of transportation is by canals. They told us that whereas they had had ten thousand ships carrying their goods, at that time only 4,500 were in operation, and only 900 available for interior transport. They told us that before the war they had 15,000 locomotives, and that after liberation there were only 1,200 fit to use, and even when we were there only 4,500 were in operation.

What was the result? In one part of France they had coal mines, and in Paris they were freezing because the allowance to each household was only a few pounds a week. In parts of France they grow sugar beets, but because these could not be hauled to sugar factories there was a shortage of sugar in Paris. In the outlying parts of France there were potatoes in large quantities, but in the absence of transportation facilities to move them there was a serious shortage in Paris.

These are typical of the kind of problem that this international organization is proposing to attack. It is the kind of thing we in Canada have been attacking alone, but now it is proposed that in cooperation with other countries, it shall be tackled jointly. What is Canada's answer to be to the Hot Springs conference? Personally I dislike the growth and expansion of bodies accountable to no responsible democratic assembly. They are apt to become little dictators within the jurisdiction given them. But to-day we are living in a world different from the world of a few years ago. We are living in a world which day by day is growing smaller, in which potential dangers increase daily, in which there are half a hundred nations separated by national boundaries, by national laws and by national traditions. In such a world Canada, like other nations, must make a choice. In such a world I think, and I am sure this house thinks, we must make some concession to internationalism. There must be some continuing approach to world understanding. There must be the maximum cultivation of good will. So we support the principle and the objective of this measure.

Under this proposal Canada will give directly more than a million dollars, and will make other contributions by way of cooperation with these other countries. Our return on this investment will be indirect, perhaps invisible; it may be that we will never be able to measure it. What the net result will be no man can tell. We could do a great deal with a million dollars toward improving the nutritional standards of the Canadian people, but as an investment in a healthier human race it is probable that we shall receive an even larger dividend. By this measure we are casting our bread upon the international waters, hoping it will return manyfold. We do this as an investment in good will; we do it as an act of faith, hoping it will contribute to an expanding world economy, to a healthier human race, and to a more peaceful world.

From what I have said, Mr. Speaker, hon. members will gather that we are wholeheartedly in support of the purposes of this measure. I come now to the parts in connection with which I have some criticism to offer.

Portions of section 2 seem to have been copied verbatim from the statute ratifying certain treaties of peace in 1919, but that makes no difference to my criticism. In this measure we are giving too wide powers to the government, powers wider than they need. The other measure referred to was an act to terminate a war. Whatver justification there may have been in 1919 does not exist now for surrendering the rights of parliament and giving the government a blank cheque to do as much or as little as it chooses in assisting in the setting up of this organization.

This bill should be meticulously examined in committee of the whole. Some of its clauses are objectionable for a number of reasons, some of which I shall mention. Section 2 of the bill provides that the governor in council may make such appointments as may be necessary. This is an intrusion upon the Civil Service Act. Surely the time has come when we should call a halt to making appointments outside that act. The government should discontinue the practice of seeking the power of appointment by the cabinet at the expense of the civil service commission. Too often in the past as new instruments of government have been created the power of appointment has been vested in the governor in council, which in fact means in the political minister, whoever he may be, in charge of the administration of the act. If the practice continues at the same rate as in the past, appointments under the Civil Service Act in accordance with the merit principle will become the exception rather than the rule.

Section 2 provides also that the governor in council may—> —establish such offices, make such orders in council and do such things as appear to him to be necessary for carrying out the provisions of the constitution.

That is, he may do what he considers necessary to carry out the recommendations of a body of forty-five nations, on which we are represented by only one vote, or for carrying out the recommendations of committees appointed by that organization. That is a most sweeping power to vest in a government. It is highly objectionable in principle; it is likely in practice to be a serious derogation from the legislative rights of parliament, and there is no restriction as to time. Sweeping powers of this kind may have some justification in war time, but they have none now, and they are not needed to carry out the constitution or the principles of this bill.

Section 2 also provides that the money shall be paid out of moneys provided by parliament. I believe that provision should be qualified by inserting after the words "provided by parliament" the words "for this purpose". Then each year we would know what votes, other than the amounts being now approved, were required by the government.

Section 3 requires a report of operations under the act to be laid before parliament "as soon as practicable after the close of each fiscal year". The phrase quoted is highly objectionable. It permits the Secretary of State for External Affairs to determine in his sole discretion when it is practicable to prepare and present this report. There is no limiting factor whatever. Other acts passed at the last session of parliament and in previous sessions indicate a more correct procedure in this respect. For example in the family allowance act, chapter 40 of the statutes of 1944, section 15 reads:

> The minister shall submit to parliament within fifteen days of the commencement of the first session of parliament in each year a report of expenditures and administration in connection with this act during the previous fiscal year.

Likewise the Exports Credits Insurance Act, chapter 39 of the statutes of 1944, provides in section 26 as follows:

> The Minister of Finance shall report to parliament on the operation of part 2 of this act within thirty days after the end of each fiscal year or, if parliament be not then sitting, within thirty days after the commencement of the next ensuing session thereof.

In the same way the Industrial Development Bank Act, which is chapter 44 of the statutes of last year, provides in section 29 that the president of the bank shall transmit to the Minister of Finance a full report within ten weeks after the end of each fiscal year. It is then provided that this report shall be laid before parliament within fourteen days if parliament is then sitting or, if parliament is not sitting, within fourteen days after the commencement of the next session. The appropriation act customarily has this clause:

> A detailed account of the sums expended under the authority of this act shall be laid before the House of Commons of Canada during the first fifteen days of the then next session of parliament.

These sections indicate what is the correct procedure in a measure of this kind, and I would suggest that section 3 should be amended to provide something like the following:

> The Secretary of State for External Affairs shall prepare and lay before parliament a report of operations under this act within thirty days after the end of each fiscal year or, if parliament be not then sitting, within thirty days after the commencement of the next ensuing session thereof.

My last point by way of criticism is this. The bill should contain a provision requiring all orders in council to be laid before parliament. That is not required in the present bill. I would suggest that a clause be inserted in the bill as follows:

> A copy of all orders in council passed pursuant to this act shall be laid before parliament forthwith after the passage thereof if parliament be then sitting or, if parliament be in recess, then within fifteen days after the commencement of the next ensuing session.

We want to facilitate in every way the passing of this bill. We support whole-heartedly the objective of the measure. We do not think, however, that the government needs the wide powers contained in sections 2 and 3, and we respectfully suggest that the government consider some limitation upon those powers.

Mr. P. E. WRIGHT (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the debate on this very important measure I want my first words to be a tribute to the work of the representatives Canada sent to the Hot Springs conference, where this measure originated. The contribution of those who went there to represent Canada was outstanding; and in appreciation of their contribution the Hon. L. B. Pearson, our respresentative at Washington, was made chairman of the interim committee which was given the job of drafting the present constitution. Mr. Pearson did a good job on that committee, and Canadians can be proud of some of our representatives abroad.

I believe there are few in the house who will make any objection to the purpose of the measure. So far as I can see, the objective is to bring into operation one of the freedoms set out in the Atlantic charter, —freedom from want. There was a time in the world's history when it was thought that that could not be accomplished. Back in 1798 Robert Malthus, a prominent British economist, in an essay on food, propounded what has since been known throughout the world as the Malthusian theory, which stated, in effect, that we would always have want, and that the pressure of population against the available food supplies would always remain. To-day, however, a hundred and fifty years later, we realize that that theory is not sound, in at least so far as the western hemisphere is concerned. We have shown that through modern technical development and improvement in our agricultural methods and equipment, and through the greater use of fertilizers, we can secure freedom from want. The objective of the bill is to spread that freedom from want to other parts of the world, and surely there can be no objection to anything of that kind.

From a purely selfish point of view, Canada is keenly interested. We realize the significance of our interest when we remember that of the ten per cent of the world's food supplies exported, Canada supplies an amount entirely out of proportion to her population. If the measure will raise the nutritional standards of the world, it will mean greater markets for Canadian food. The success of the legislation now before us to a great extent will depend upon the individual nations which have joined the conference, and upon whether they will be prepared to carry into effect some of the recommendations which undoubtedly will be made by the organization when it is established.

I cannot altogether agree with some of the deductions made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken). I find difficulty in reading into the bill anything in the nature of dictatorship, or anything which would suggest that the organization would have power to force its decisions upon members adhering to the constitution. As I read them, their powers are only by way of recommendations which they would make to the governments joining the organization.

Mr. BRACKEN: Has the hon. member read the provision respecting expenses?

Mr. WRIGHT: Yes, I have read that provision, but I would point out that the amount of money we are being called upon to contribute is but a very small part of our budget. If we can raise the nutritional standards of the world and secure better markets for our agricultural products, I am convinced our bread cast upon the waters will return a hundredfold. In my view this is one of the best investments Canada could make, and I cannot see how we are committing ourselves to anything which in the future might cause us to regret our action. My one criticism would be that we have been late in taking action. As a matter of fact at the last session I suggested that we should then have ratified this constitution. Even from the purely selfish point of view, Canada should have been among the first instead of among the last of the united nations to effect ratification. If through this measure we can raise the nutritional standards of the world, we shall have accomplished something.

According to reports presented to the interim committee, if we are to have freedom from want, it would appear necessary to increase the food supplies of the world. I was surprised to read that, even to give a minimum nutritional standard to the peoples of the world, the total world's food production should be doubled. The suggestion is made that the production of cereals should be expanded 50 per cent, of meats 90 per cent, of milk and other dairy products 125 per cent, of vegetable oils 125 per cent and of fruits and vegetables 100 per cent. It will be necessary to produce more food per acre, and eventually to bring under cultivation every acre which can be developed economically, if we are to have freedom from want.

This organization has gathered statistics on nutrition, production and distribution, and is making them available to all nations so that they can increase not only their production but also their consumption of foods. I do not think any hon. member would object to that programme.

Some recommendations made to the interim committee I should have liked to see carried into the constitution. The original document drafted at Hot Springs made certain definite recommendations which it was expected the interim committee would draft into the constitution. One of the recommendations, having to do with the distribution of foodstuffs, was that cooperative organizations throughout the world should be used to a large degree in the process of distribution. Speaking of the cooperative movement, it is pointed out that the United States conference on food and agriculture has recommended the strengthening and expanding of the cooperative system in rural and urban areas. While I have not readily at hand the reference respecting cooperative organizations, I do know that their recommendations were definite, and that they emphasized that those organizations were taking an important part in the collection and distribution of foodstuffs.

We have large cooperatives in western Canada such as the wheat pools, and there are large consumer cooperatives in Great Britain handling the distribution of foodstuffs. They recommended that these organizations should be encouraged and given a greater place in the collection and distribution of food throughout the world. That recommendation has not been carried forward into the constitution, at least in any direct way. It might be considered that it was implied, but I would have liked to see it in a more definite form.

Another thing to which I should like to direct the attention of the house is that as in the nineteen thirties, in certain sections of the world the production of food at the present time is under quota. In Canada and in certain other areas which produce wheat we have more or less come to an agreement that we will restrict the production of this essential food to the amount the market will absorb. I am not objecting to that, because under our present system it seems that that is the only way we can dispose of it, but I do want to say that any system based on that theory is wrong. In a world in which two-thirds of the population need more food, it seems ridiculous that we should have restricted the production of such an essential food as wheat. In the United States in the nineteen thirties they restricted the production of cotton, of corn, of hogs and other foods, and yet at the same time there were thousands of people in that country who were going without the necessary clothing, the necessary shoes and the necessary food to maintain a reasonable standard of living. Later they recognized the foolishness of that procedure and introduced the stamp plan for the distribution of food to those in the low income groups. I think the world should recognize that that is the most sensible thing to do. We should produce all the food we can and then see that it is distributed to the people who need it. If we want a world in which there will be permanent peace, I believe we will have to do that. You cannot have permanent peace in a world in which one part is restricting food production while another is starving to death. It is not Christianity, it is not economically sound, it is not common sense. It is one of the things I hope this organization will avoid. I hope they will make recommendations to the various governments to prevent it from taking place in the future.

Another matter on which this organization can make recommendations is agricultural credits. This has been one of the drawbacks to more efficient agricultural production throughout the world. The cost of credit for agricultural development, for the clearing of land, for obtaining proper equipment to work the land economically in order to get the best production, has been too great. The rates of interest charged throughout the world for agricultural credits have been unreasonable. In countries where agricultural credits have been made cheaper, there is greater production. I do not know whether it is correct, but I am told that in India and in other countries where small acreages are worked, very often the people engaged in agriculture pay rates of interest of eight, ten and fifteen per cent. The result is that they are always in poverty and there is never the necessary production to meet the needs of the people.

In Canada in the past few years we have been able to reduce the cost of credit to agriculture, and I think it can be still further reduced. Any recommendations which this organization may be able to make with respect to the obtaining or making available of cheaper agricultural credits will be all to the good.

Another matter on which they could make recommendations is land tenure, the method under which we hold our land. We think that with our individual ownership in Canada we have attained the best method of land ownership, but there are drawbacks to this system. I have followed agriculture pretty closely for the last forty years, and it seems to me that with our present system of ownership we have reduced the fertility of our soil. I know that in Ontario very few farms are producing what they produced fifty years ago, and in western Canada we find that our per acre production is being reduced. If we are holding our own, it is simply because we have developed better types of grain, not because we are maintaining the fertility of the soil.

I am not satisfied that we know all that is to be known with respect to land tenure, and any recommendations of this organization with respect to it should be taken into consideration by this and other governments. In Great Britain they have a different system of the land tenure from what we have, and during the past hundred years they have practically doubled the per acre production on most of their land.

Mr. REID: Because the law is laid down as to what crops to grow.

Mr. WRIGHT: The law is not laid down in Great Britain as to what crops they shall grow.

Mr. REID: It is laid down by the landlord.

Mr. WRIGHT: That may be so in some sections.

Mr. REID: All of Scotland is under that law.

Mr. WRIGHT: If that method of land tenure produces better results and more for the peoples of the world, then I say we should at least study it. I do not want anyone to go away with the idea that I am opposing our present system of land tenure, but I do say that we should study the matter and find out if it is the best method. The production of the soil constitutes the wealth of any nation; make no mistake about that. If you deplete your soil, eventually the nation will go down. It is the basis of our very existence, the food which we eat.

Another matter to be considered is that of land conservation. Certainly we can learn a lot in Canada with respect to land conservation. You can drive through Ontario or Quebec or any of our older provinces and see hundreds of farms now vacant which at one time maintained a family.

Mr. MacNICOL: And educated them too.

Mr. WRIGHT: And educated them, as my friend says. Those farms are vacant to-day because the fertility has been taken out of them. Competition became too keen and they could not produce enough to maintain a family. All these things can be studied by this organization and recommendations made.

The organization does not propose to standardize production or consumption throughout the world. There are entirely different methods that will have to be used in different countries. Such an organization as this is a step in the right direction and one which can be of great value to Canada. The money which we shall have to contribute to the expenses of the organization will be money well spent.

In conclusion I should like to quote what Mr. Appleby, the under-secretary of state of the United States, said with respect to this organization. After indicating that the organization was being developed for the purpose of obtaining a freedom-from-want programme in the world, he went on to say:

> It can be achieved, as freedom from fear can be achieved, only by substituting international cooperation for the excessive international competition from which the world is suffering.

I agree one hundred per cent with that—that cooperation among the nations of the world is the solution of a great many of our problems of to-day. Believing that this organization is a step in that direction, I am prepared to support the passing of this bill.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) in moving the second reading of this bill, but I must say that his speech will be noted more for what it did not contain than for what it did. I think it would save valuable time and add much to the clarity and effectiveness of debate in the house if the minister in charge would make a detailed and comprehensive statement on any bill or resolution that he is moving. But the practice seems to have grown up in the house of throwing into the ring as innocent-looking a measure as possible and then letting the opposition groups fight over it. We on this side are left to guess as to the real meaning of many of the measures that come before us and have to hunt around for a "nigger in the wood-pile", being often left in complete ignorance of the background or intention behind the measure. If the opposition are set to fighting each other on the principles involved, as is so often the case, then it seems so much the better. All the while I have noticed that the minister concerned sits silent, laughing up his sleeve, while we blindly grope about for the main purpose behind a measure. Often it is only by sheer accident that we stumble upon its real substance, while all the time the minister is in full possession of all the facts, or should be if he is introducing the measure in full sincerity.

We have nothing before us in this case except what is contained in a perfectly innocent-looking bill, dressed up in high-sounding phrases, but with its real intent possibly obscured by the emotional appeal of a highly humanitarian purpose.

There is one other thing I should like to say while I am at it. The minister usually comes into a debate on a measure like this loaded to the ears with documents and schedules and arguments compiled by staffs of experts, accountants and researchers that are at his disposal, while we on this side are largely on our own. We have to do all our own research. We have to prepare all our own schedules, and we have to do it often with little help from the staffs in the various departments which are overloaded with work. That is very uneven competition. It should be in the public interest to have a full and effective debate on any one of these measures, especially one so important as the bill now before us. Therefore it should be the duty of the minister to give us something worth while to debate. The members of this house should also have available to them an adequate staff to assist in preparing material for these important debates, similar to what is allowed to members of congress of the United States. Surely we are no less important to our country than they are to theirs. I hope that that will be taken under advisement by the government. The practice now seems to be to let the various groups in the opposition bludgeon each other into insensibility almost, and then for the minister to come into the debate at the last minute to close it, to apply the coup de grâce and then away, and the measure is passed.

This bill carries into effect an agreement among nations which become parties to it through legislation. Neither the bill itself nor the schedule appended thereto in my opinion gives anything like a full exposé of the terms of the agreement among the nations. Therefore I should like to examine for a few moments some of the resolutions passed and recommendations made by the conference at Hot Springs, all of which are embodied in the pamphlet entitled "Final Act" of the united nations conference on food and agriculture. There are only seven or eight points that I wish to emphasize at this time. The first is found on page 29 of the pamphlet I have just mentioned. In article XXIV, headed "Achievement of an Economy of Abundance", it seems that the conference after great deliberation made a discovery of importance, for they say:

> Whereas the first cause of hunger and malnutrition is poverty.

For the last twenty-six years, the leader and founder of this great movement of which I form a part has been pointing out to the world that the first cause of hunger and malnutrition is poverty. I refer to none other than Major Douglas, founder of the social credit movement.

I wish, Mr. Speaker, that I might phrase that sentence I have quoted in just a little different way. They say: "The first cause of hunger and malnutrition is poverty." I would put it this way: Good food means prosperity. That turns the thing right around. It would seem to me that in an enlightened age such as this the first duty of any government should be to see to it that every citizen is adequately nourished. Such things as arterial roads, new bridges, housing schemes and pleasure parks, and I might go so far as to say new wars, should take second place to providing every citizen in the land with adequate food of the proper kind. Yet we find that there never is lacking interest and also public money for the things which I have mentioned, roads, bridges and wars, to the total exclusion of the proper nourishment of the people. If proper methods were adopted it is my contention that everyone would have enough to eat, and when everyone has enough to eat I am sure that unemployment would not be a problem, and that diseases of all kinds would become very rare indeed.

One other thing which this report says interested me and is of importance. It is found on the same page, 29:

> To maintain an equilibrium in balances of payments, and to achieve the orderly management of currencies and exchange.

I wonder if they are referring here to a policy of foreign trade. If they are, I should like to say this about it. A policy of expanding foreign trade can never succeed in raising the standards of living of our own people in Canada if we persist in following the archaic foreign trade policies that have been followed by governments up to this time. This same idea seems to be emphasized on page 23 of the same booklet where they state, as the last subsection under article XV, "Long-term Production Policy":

> That with a view to balancing production and consumption the permanent organization consider to what extent and by what means such reports might contribute to international collaboration both on a regional and on a world basis in the field of agricultural production.

That appears to me to relate to two things: First, distribution within the country, and, second, balancing exports with imports. It seems to me also that it might refer to action which would be taken within any nation to make sure that the people are so furnished with purchasing power that they can buy and consume all that that nation produces, if they wish to do so.

It might be interesting at this point to emphasize to the house what foreign trade really should amount to. I have under my hand an article appearing in the Reader's Digest, which is headed, "Stuff for Stuff, the Elemental Equation; a condensation from the forthcoming book, "To-morrow's Trade," by Stuart Chase." At page 67, column 1 he says:

> Never let go the idea that stuff must be exchanged for stuff.

That is the policy of foreign trade which this group has always advocated. This article concludes with the following statement:

> Let me repeat the commonsense formula. The stuff we produce as a nation, plus the stuff we import, less the stuff we export is the measure of our standard of living.

In approaching the problem that is before us, whether or not this bill should be passed by the house, we ought to keep that formula in mind, because unless we are prepared to adopt, along with our foreign trade, policies and measures which are designed to make it possible for the people to buy the goods when they are imported in exchange for our exports, we shall fail dismally in any effort we make to raise the standard of living of our own people.

Mr. HANSELL: That is good stuff.

Mr. LOW: This same point is also referred to briefly on page 13 of this "Final Act" of the united nations conference on food and agriculture, under article I, paragraph 4. Here is the declaration:

> The first cause of hunger and malnutrition is poverty.
> It is useless to produce more food unless men and nations provide the markets to absorb it.

That is fundamental.

> There must be an expansion of the whole world economy to provide the purchasing power sufficient to maintain an adequate diet for all.

I ask hon. members how they are going to set about seeing to it that every person in our nation has sufficient purchasing power to be able to balance production and consumption in our own land and thus raise the standard of living.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Ask the Minister of Agriculture that question.

Mr. LOW: It has been amply demonstrated time and again that never has the productive enterprise in any country succeeded in distributing sufficient purchasing power to enable the products of that productive effort to be purchased by the people. I say further that there never can be a sufficient expansion of the whole world economy to guarantee a decent standard of living for everyone until full control of money policy is restored to the various sovereign parliaments of the nations. I refer particularly now to our own nation. We can never introduce a policy of expanding economy unless the government of Canada is prepared to see to it that no such condition as existed in the hungry thirties is ever present in our nation again, namely, the condition in which, when our boys were called up before the army medical boards, forty-four out of every 100 were turned back because they failed to make category A. This was owing to malnutrition born of poverty; and poverty arises out of the failure of our productive enterprise to distribute to our people sufficient purchasing power that they can buy back the goods which are produced.

I should like for a moment to refer to the Southampton chamber of commerce report of 1933 which further emphasizes the facts I have just stated. On page 7 of that report, in reference to the unemployed, such as there were at that time, and such as it seems to me there will be again unless we take extremely quick action to prevent it, I read the following:

> Any consideration of the position of the unemployed is startlingly paradoxical. Either an unemployed person is without work because we are already producing sufficient without his services being required, in which case he is poor because there is an abundance of goods and services available; or he is in want because the available wealth is not sufficient to provide for the satisfaction of his needs, in which case it is difficult to explain away why his services are not being utilized to produce more. Thus, from whatever angle it is viewed, we have the situation of widespread industrial trade stagnation, with producers capable of production and millions in want of the very things which can be produced in abundance.

Then I turn to page 9 of the same report. Speaking of industry, it says:

Industry performs a twofold function. It produces goods and distributes incomes in the process. The operation of the relations of monetary mechanism to production is along these lines: (a) Industry makes its capital assets and secures the money necessary to enable it to pay wages and salaries, buy raw material, and meet its overhead costs in the form of credit loans from the banking system. (b) In the process of producing goods it distributes wages, salaries, dividends and the profits which filter through as money incomes to the entire community. (c) The goods subsequently go on the market with price labels attached to them to include all costs of production. And (d) the community acquire goods in return for their money, which filters back through the productive system for the cancellation of credit loans originally created by the banking system. It should be noted that under this process industry is forced to charge into prices at least all its costs of production irrespective of any question of profit; otherwise it cannot liquidate its indebtedness to the banking system. Thus it will be seen that the creation of financial credits by banks results in the creation of a trail of costs attaching to the products of industry, and this trail of costs is created in the process of financial credits filtering through to the community as money incomes.

Then I should like to record the final conclusion of the committee on this matter, as printed on page 12:

The essential feature of this analysis is that, as a country becomes more highly industrialized, so it becomes increasingly impossible to distribute sufficient purchasing power to enable the community to buy the products of its industry or the money equivalent in products exchanged with other countries. This results in the country accumulating an unsalable surplus —unsalable in the sense that it cannot be bought at home and it cannot be exchanged for the products of other nations, as the purchasing power for the latter to be made available to the community simply does not exist.

That is the conclusion of that investigating committee of the Southampton chamber of commerce whose report was issued early in 1933.

Finally, I should like to refer to the declaration of the obligations of the governments of the various nations that entered into this food and agriculture agreement, as they are recorded on page 14 of the "Final Act" of the united nations conference on food and agriculture. Under section II, interim and permanent commissions for carrying out the recommendations of the united nations conference on food and agriculture, we find this:

The united nations conference on food and agriculture recommends:

(4) That the functions of the interim commission be to formulate and to recommend for consideration by each member government or authority (i) to raise the levels of nutrition and standards of living of its own people.

In other words, to set its own house in order first, which I can assure the house is a worthwhile objective.

I maintain that, since the minister has brought this measure into the house and wishes to carry it into effect, Canada, by passing this bill through the house, is committing herself to raise the levels of the standards of living of its own people, is committing herself to balance production and consumption through setting up in Canada an expanding economy; and is committing herself to ensure distribution of sufficient purchasing power among all of the people of Canada so that an expanding economy may be made possible.

I maintain further, Mr. Speaker, that the minister or the government ought to give serious consideration to just how they can carry out the responsibilities which devolve upon them through the passing of this bill and the making of this agreement. It seems to me that without a certain fundamental and far-reaching change and reform in our financial system to supplement any programme of expanding world trade they have in mind, it will be simply impossible to carry into effect those things which are set out here as recommendations and which obviously will be objectives of the permanent commission which is set up. I would suggest that the Minister of Agriculture now approach the study of a sound and scientific system of finance to assist him to ensure that the commission does its work properly, and to see to it that Canada's standard of living is adequately raised and that nutritional values and so on are made possible to every one of our people. I am anxious that we succeed in setting our own house in order and raising the level of nutrition and standards of living of our people. At the same time I am very much concerned that while we are doing this we preserve the freedom of the individuals in this nation, because I fear that by some procedure, by some techniques under which the programme of the permanent commission might be put into effect, the people of this country could lose their individual freedom.

I do not want to detain the house much longer, but there are certain things which I should say in conclusion. I am not sure as yet what stand I should take when it comes to voting on this measure, because I feel that we have not yet sufficient information. It seems to me an obligation on the part of the Minister of Agriculture to inform us, and give us answers to questions such as these which I shall shortly ask. It might be possible for me to say something further in the committee stage and to ask these questions at that time again, but I am going to put them on record now as things which I must know before I can come to a decision whether this is a good measure or a bad one.

In the first place I should like to know the relation of the permanent commission, set up as part of bill No. 14, to UNRRA and its activities. I think it is important that we should know that.

My second question: since individual countries which are signatories to the agreement thus far, as the minister read them this afternoon, have failed completely to achieve security for their peoples under the present financial system, I should like the minister to tell the house how these same countries can achieve security for their peoples by collective action, still operating under the same financial system.

Another question which I should like the minister to answer so that I can make up my mind on the matter is this: why is it not possible for a country like Canada to set its own house in order without having to set up a permanent international commission to force them to do so? I wonder whether the government has come to the conclusion that it is necessary for the housewives on Elm street to form a permanent club among themselves by legislative action before each of the good ladies can proceed to feed her own children properly. And if they cannot cooperate on a voluntary basis, I ask the minister to make it plain what assurance he can give that by the introduction of compulsion the children will be any better fed.

Another question: why would not an informal conference, operating on a purely voluntary basis and consisting of expert delegates sent by the governments of the world, be as effective in exchanging views, experience, and the rest relating to the production of food and to improved cultural methods, as the setting up of a permanent international commission and clothing it with great authority, such as is evidently the case here?

Mr. GARDINER: It is purely voluntary.

Mr. LOW: Well, we shall see. If the minister can assure us of that, good and well. Of course, I am sincerely seeking information.

Mr. GARDINER: Purely voluntary, as will be seen from reading the constitution as set out in the schedule. It is purely voluntary in the first place as to whether a nation goes into it.

Mr. LOW: That is right.

Mr. GARDINER: Then it binds itself to remain there for four years, and then it is a purely voluntary matter as to whether it goes out or not. It can give one year's notice to go out, and then it is purely voluntary as to whether that nation goes. I do not know that one can make it any more voluntary.

Mr. LOW: That is all very well, but for four years we are under obligation to stay there; and when one looks carefully at the schedule, the constitution, he sees evidence that the international authority which is set up there is clothed with considerable power and authority.

Mr. GARDINER: No authority to that.

Mr. JAQUES: What is the good of it then?

Mr. GARDINER: If I may be permitted to explain, I want to give the information asked for.

Mr. LOW: Very good.

Mr. GARDINER: The committee has power to investigate, to conduct research, to make reports, but it has no authority to compel anyone to do anything. As was stated by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright), the only authority it has is to recommend to the governments of the different countries concerned what it thinks would help bring about just what my hon. friend has been speaking of; then the governments are entirely free to adopt such recommendations or otherwise. There is nothing compulsory about it.

Mr. LOW: I am glad to have that assurance, but in referring to article V on page 5 of the schedule I find that subsection 4 provides:

> The members of the executive committee shall exercise the powers delegated to them by the conference on behalf of the whole conference and not as representatives of their respective governments.

That seems the negation of the principle of responsible government. I am quite prepared, however, to accept the minister's statement on that point if later in committee he substantiates it.

I come now to my fifth point. Does the minister believe that a permanent international food commission, set up by international agreement, will be in a better position to enforce its decisions and its dicta, if such there be? I am sure the minister will not mind answering that question in committee.

Mr. GARDINER: I have just answered it.

Mr. LOW: Sixth; does the minister think the plans of an informal world food conference would not be of equal value; and if not, why not?

Mr. GARDINER: I think it is about as informal as one can make it, if we are to have people brought together to discuss anything.

Mr. LOW: We shall just let hon. members make up their own minds on that point, and I am quite prepared to accept that statement until we are in committee.

I now come to my seventh question. Is this permanent world food and agricultural commission necessary because the government will not do what is right by Canadians without being forced by some external organization? I should like to have the answer to that question.

Mr. GARDINER: They did not force us.

Mr. LOW: Or are they afraid the social crediters will finally force them to do what is right in this country?

No. 8. Is this measure designed to set up one of the various "specialized agencies established by intergovernmental agreement and having wide international responsibilities," referred to in article 57 of chapter IX of the united nations charter? That also is very important, and I should like an answer to it before I can intelligently determine whether it is wise for me to support this bill.

No. 9. Is this conference and the commission growing out of it one of the brain children of Leo Pasvolsky, who wrote most of the San Francisco charter and the Bretton Woods agreement? I should like that information.

No. 10. What part in the origination of this scheme did Henry Morgenthau or Paul Warburg or Bernard Baruch have to play? These are important things for me to know.

No. 11. Has the minister assured himself that this measure is not one step, and an important step, toward a world coupon or rationing system? If it is, I might take one stand; if it is not, naturally I should like to know. Some months ago, I believe in 1944, the Financial Post did link up UNRRA with a possible world-rationing or coupon system.

No. 12. I wonder if the minister will say whether it is possible to solve a nation's problem effectively by making it a global problem. My reaction to this bill will depend somewhat upon the answer to that question.

Let me say in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that I find myself in sympathy with the objectives of this innocent-looking bill, but I wish to assure myself that it is as innocent as it appears. I wish to assure myself also that we are not putting ourselves into the absurd position of creating a force outside Canada to compel Canada to put her own house in order. When I am assured of these things I shall be able to advise my group exactly what stand to take, and we may have something more to say in the committee stage.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I wish to support the stand taken by my leader, that in so far as the objectives of this bill are concerned we give them our support, together with the constitution which is appended as a schedule to the bill itself. But we do raise strenuous objection to the form of this bill, and during the course of my remarks this afternoon I intend to point out that innocuous though this bill appears, it represents the furthest effort ever made in this parliament to emasculate parliamentary control with respect to a matter which must be subject to control by parliament.

To me this bill as it now stands represents very indifferent draftsmanship. It appears that someone, somewhere, simply copied a bill or bills passed by parliament in 1919 or 1920 with respect to the signing of peace with Turkey or Bulgaria, and attached this appendix without regard to the significance of the difference between those peace treaties and the constitution of the food and agricultural organization of the united nations. In certain sections this bill is identical with the bills which were passed to provide for peace after the last war with the governments of Turkey and Bulgaria. There is one exception, however; in those acts some control was left to parliament. In this act, if it is passed in the form in which it has been presented to the house, parliament will divest itself of powers such as it has not divested itself of in the past. In particular it will divest itself of the power to demand from the government full and complete information on international policies with respect to agricultural commodity arrangements.

Before I conclude I intend to suggest that certain amendments, if made to this bill, will remove any objection we of His Majesty's Loyal Opposition have to this measure and will at the same time retain all the benefits which were reviewed by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) in his opening speech.

First as to the objectives. So far as we are concerned, the agreement arrived at at the food and agriculture conference which met at Hot Springs more than two years ago is, as it was then, a constructive one, representing an attempt on the part of the united nations then at war to translate their concepts of unity into practical performance; or, in the words of the Minister of Agriculture, to translate the concept of cooperation in conformity with the principles of the Atlantic charter.

It was a great and forward step. It united the various nations who not only agreed to the acceptance of this declaration for the production of food in common alliance for the period of the war, but as well made provision for the achievement of a common objective, that of raising the standard of living everywhere in the world, as was stated by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright), the ultimate aim in the production of food being to equalize population food ratios throughout the world.

I have figures issued by the League of Nations in regard to the inequality of the distribution of food. They show that with 6·6 per cent of the world's population North America produced 18·9 per cent of the world's food. Europe, with 18·6 per cent of the world's population produced only 37·6 per cent of the world's food. These figures indicate that, on the whole, North America was better fed at the beginning of the war than was Europe. Then they show, too, that Europe and North America, representing one-quarter of mankind, produced over fifty per cent of the world's food, and consumed even more. Asia covering 53·2 per cent of the world's population consumed only 17·2 per cent of the food produced in the world.

Some cynic has said that before the war the Chinese were born in order to die of starvation—a terrible indictment against world inter-responsibility. The hon. member who has just taken his seat has stated that by raising the standard of living throughout the world we shall remove the danger or one of the reasons for war.

The McDougall memorandum to the League of Nations was presented to the President of the United States in the 1940's and upon its findings the basis upon which the wheat conference was called was founded, namely, that of equalizing permanently, through a permanent international organization, standards of living throughout the world.

The hon. member for Melfort has put certain figures on the record. I join with him in saying that, if the investigations made by the League of Nations were correct, then we in Canada should do our part toward increasing the production of foodstuffs, provided that we believe that the principles in the declaration are to be carried into effect and that mankind throughout the world is to receive a greater amount of food and a higher standard of nutrition than has been received before.

The McDougall memorandum, which influenced the then President of the United States very considerably, indicated that in order to ensure all sections of the population throughout the world having sufficient quantities of the right kinds of food, it would require in the United States of America—and this would apply to an even greater extent in Canada—an increase and expansion in production in the following orders of magnitude: cereals, by fifty per cent. I noticed that the hon. member for Melfort gave the figure as ten per cent. Apparently he obtained his statistics from a source other than the McDougall report. Then, to give further figures: Meat, ninety percent; milk and other dairy products, 125 per cent; vegetable oils, 125 per cent, and fruits and vegetables, 300 per cent.

The McDougall report concluded that only by such increases could the world hope to attain nutritional equality and a sufficiency of food and have a proper expansion and distribution of food so that the dangers of war from this cause would be removed. This report influenced President Roosevelt, realizing as he did, as so often enunciated by him, that there can be peace only if the nations of the earth have an equal opportunity not only for security, but also for a degree of economic life the like of which the world has never known before. The report leads to the conclusion that the world could achieve a new basis of economic well-being, and the nations joined in the food conference agreed among themselves in informal discussions to act through a world food and agricultural organization to achieve that great objective.

For generations security has been the aim of mankind. Mr. Eden, when he was British foreign secretary, reviewed the situation; and what he said on that occasion is reported in British Hansard for July 6, 1943. After stating that the objective according to the declaration at Hot Springs, was to secure freedom from want of food everywhere in the world, he proceeded in part as follows:

> . . . it is clear that freedom from want of food depends largely on matters outside the scope of purely agricultural or nutritional policy. This was fully recognized by the conference, which took account of the broad questions of international security and economic expansion which are the necessary background of sustained progress towards freedom from want and a higher standard of living.

In other words, the bill before us to-day, in so far as the constitution is concerned, represents one of the great endeavours on the part of the united nations to secure peace and security through the established instruments which were fashioned at San Francisco, and to take measures to assure economic well-being by making each nation in the world responsible to equalize the opportunities for food to lesser fortunate nations throughout the world.

No one believes that this will be entirely successful. We are building—and building without the benefit of experience. We are building an idealistic future on the basis of circumstances as we find them to-day, and sometimes without regard to the realities of the future. But at least, so far as this constitution is concerned, as my leader indicated during his speech it represents something we must accept, however fragile the foundation upon which it may be built.

In looking over one of the speeches delivered in the British House of Commons by Richard Law, the then under-secretary for foreign affairs in Great Britain, I found words which represented to me the epitome of the attitude statesmen are taking, in the realization that men everywhere are taking new, uncertain steps and doing things which have not been done before to assure peace. We are trying to take them in cooperation with other nations, to the end that two wars in one generation shall not be followed by a third in the same generation, or, indeed, in generations to come.

This is what Mr. Richard Law said in regard to the Hot Springs conference:

> At Hot Springs we began a process of pile driving. We drove one pile into the shifting sands upon which, in these days, our lives are founded. For my own part I am sure that this is the right method by which to approach the problems of reconstruction. We shall not find peace in a blueprint.

Those words are as true to-day as they were when they were uttered by Mr. Law, a man in whom, by reason of his Canadian ancestry, Canadians have a special interest. He continued:

> If we tackle these problems one by one, if we drive one pile after, some of them may dissolve but some of them will last and we shall have in the end a stable foundation upon which to build the temple of peace.

We are accepting the great principles contained in the constitution which appears as an appendix to the bill, as a step in the direction of peace among all nations.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

I cannot understand why this important piece of legislation is brought down a few days before the convening of this conference at Quebec. Why was it not brought down last year? This constitution has been available for two years, but during those two years it has been embalmed in the records of some department of government and at the last moment it is brought out. I say that we will accept everything contained in the constitution provided that we have an opportunity to scrutinize with every care and attention the bill to which it is attached, intended to implement Canada's responsibility under this declaration.

Two years ago the nations whose names are to be found in annex II were cooperating, but are they cooperating to-day in so far as food production is concerned? If so, why is it that the international wheat agreement of 1942 is to-day in a position where apparently the parties to that agreement are unable to agree, or, to put it in the best light, have not as yet been able to agree?

I hold no brief for Argentina the nation which did us so much harm during the dark days of the war. But Argentina has been accepted as a member of the united nations, having performed the acts she was required to perform under the act of Chapultepec. Argentina, one of the world's largest exporters of farm products, is not included among the member nations of this organization upon whom the responsibility will fall. When the Minister of Agriculture replies I ask him to let the house and this country know what attitude the government representatives are to take at the Conference with respect to Argentina; for unless something is done in this regard Argentina will act as a threat to agricultural equality and equilibrium all over the world. In my opinion, despite Argentina's attitude to the United Nations during the days of the war, we need her cooperation if the principles of this declaration are to be carried into effect.

As far as nutrition is concerned, I shall not go into detail. My leader dealt with that question in some degree, but I would point out that it is philanthropic philosophy that is contained in this constitution, the raising of living standards by the raising of the nutritional standards of the world. We know that the bureau of home economics in the United States has concluded that even in the dying days of the war, when nutritional standards were higher than they had been for years, thirty-five per cent of the population were still deficient in several essential nutrients.

I accept the objectives of the constitution, noble as they are, but I intend to ask the Minister of Agriculture to make some material changes in the bill. I want to see Canada represented at the conference, but I would point out that this bill which is to implement the constitution abrogates the right of parliament for five years with regard to any matters connected with international policies with respect to agricultural commodity arrangements. It will be said that that is a wide statement, but I make it after carefully reviewing the various sections of this bill.

We know what the powers of the international food organization will be. The minister stated very properly that those powers will not be mandatory, that they will be in the form of recommendations to Canada and other nations, merely recommending to Canada, as one of the signatories, to carry them into effect. Supposing the delegates representing Canada at the conference next week come to a certain arrangement, and there is nothing to indicate that such arrangement will not be arrived at behind closed doors; then what happens? Let me read the exact words of the declaration, showing the matters the organization will be empowered to deal with, which are:

(f) the adoption of international policies with respect to agricultural commodity arrangements.

(e) the adoption of policies for the provision of adequate agricultural credit, national and international.

As provided for in the constitution, a majority of the nations may come to a certain decision. Where does Canada come in? Parliament will never find out what has been done, with the bill as it now stands for there is not one provision which will enable parliament to know what is going on. I read the pertinent section, which states:

The governor in council may make such appointments, establish such offices, make such orders in council and do such things as appear to him to be necessary for carrying out the provisions of the constitution set out in the schedule to this act or any recommendations of the conference of the food and agriculture organization of the united nations, or of its committees, made pursuant to such provisions.

In other words, we are asked to empower the governor in council to pass orders in council ratifying or carrying out any of the recommendations made by the conference set up under the provisions of this constitution.

Mr. GARDINER: Only to establish the offices necessary.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is a fair interruption, but listen to the words, because it is not only to establish offices:

The governor in council may make such appointments, establish such offices, make such orders in council and do such things as appear to him to be necessary for carrying out the . . . recommendations of the conference. . . .

Mr. GARDINER: Provisions of the constitution.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: "Conference" is the word. I am reading from the copy of the bill that has been given to me.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not know what copy the hon. member has, but mine says "constitution."

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Everyone seems to have a different copy. I am reading from the one that was handed to me. We are even more in the dark than we were if we are using different copies.

Mr. GARDINER: I have never seen more than the one copy, and that is the one I have in my hand.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Listen to the words:

The governor in council may make such appointments, establish such offices, make such orders in council and do such things as appear to him to be necessary for carrying out the provisions of the constitution set out in the schedule to this act or any recommendations of the conference of the food and agriculture organization of the united nations, or of its committees, made pursuant to such provisions.

That section is too wide. It is opening the door to irresponsible government by order in council, to which I raise the most strenuous objections. I am going to ask the minister to have the bill redrafted so that parliament will have something more than a photographic copy of an act made upon declaration of peace between Bulgaria and Turkey and Canada after the last war. Bring it up to date. So far as I am concerned, and I think I speak also for the members of this party, we believe that the time has come to deny the placing of these tremendous powers, untrammeled by parliament, in the hands of the government.

Mr. GARDINER: On that point—

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Now, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. GARDINER: My hon. friend, I am sure, does not want to misrepresent the facts. Let him read subsection 2 of section 2, which provides that all the expenditures must be referred to parliament.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes. But I am not dealing with expenditures. I am dealing with the carrying into effect of recommendations.

Certainly the government could not make expenditures without coming to parliament to get the moneys. I certainly do not contend that we had arrived at that stage. I am dealing with section 2, subsection 1, which gives the governor in council power to enter into any arrangement with an international organization set up under the provisions of this constitution. Was it an oversight that there is no provision in the bill at all that the orders in council shall be brought before parliament? Every other bill that has been introduced during the last year, as was pointed out by my leader, makes provision for the tabling of the orders in council. But not this one.

Mr. GARDINER: If my hon. friend will allow me, we are quite prepared to accept an amendment to that effect, that the orders in council be produced in the house or that a time be set under this section when a return shall be made to the house.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: We have one thing now; we are to know what has been done by the governor in council after he has done it.

Next I say that the governor in council should not have placed in his hands the power, behind the backs of the people of Canada, to carry out the recommendations, whatever they may be, of any international organization without their being submitted to parliament, and I intend, when the opportunity comes, to bring in amendments to that effect: first, to bring in an amendment which will require the approval of parliament within a reasonable time of any decisions made by this international organization and accepted by the governor in council. We required, too, knowledge of and publicity for the orders that are made. But that demand is now done away with by the minister's promise to have the orders in council tabled.

I think any person who looks at this bill reasonably will agree, and I am sure the Minister of Agriculture will be as desirous as any member that parliament must retain the power to decide economic matters which will affect this nation over a period of five years. I feel that we are getting to a point in this country where, unless a stop is put to this type of legislation, we may very well see the day when as a result of the setting up of boards and commissions and the like, no longer when writing official letters will board members and commissioners sign themselves as they did before the war, "Your obedient servant", but they will be able to say to us, "Your omnipotent master". Against that trend I absolutely protest. Why do I criticize order in council government? I criticize it because I have consistently taken that stand, supported by certain other members of the house. I believe that the time has come in this country when unnecessary boards and unnecessary controls must cease to exist. We are in this position, that we of the Progressive Conservative party alone, except for the assistance of hon. members in other parts of the house, take that stand because my hon. friends of the C.C.F. party cannot take that stand. They will not oppose these things; they accept these things, the setting up of boards, government by order in council, and the like, because in order to carry into effect the socialistic set-up which they believe necessary for the economic welfare of this country they would be bound to intensify far and beyond anything we have to-day the boards and controls already existing. That is the reason why they invariably support these things.

Mr. IRVINE: I hope the hon. gentleman does not want to be unfair. I do not think there is any connection at all between the point he is making and socialism.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Speaker, we are constituted differently. I see quite an apt connection between the two points. I am going to ask my hon. friends on the government side of the house also to give me support in the request that I am making. I am not going to deal with ancient history. I am not going to place before the house some of the statements made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in 1920, although I have them under my hand. Certainly no man was ever more critical of order in council government in 1919 and 1920 than the present Prime Minister of Canada.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Three years after the war.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That was the stand he took, and I am asking hon. members on the other side of the house to stand up now for the rights of parliament and demand that this bill be amended to restore to parliament the right to determine the economic future of this country.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the motion before the house is for the second reading of bill No. 14, which deals with a very important subject. I would point out that if the motion carries, the principle of the bill is adopted, and it seldom happens that the principle will be revised in committee. Once we adopt the motion for the second reading of the bill the principle has been accepted by parliament. The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) before six o'clock referred to the matter of orders in council in connection with the bills which are before parliament. In addition to bill No. 14 there is a complementary measure extending the powers granted after the war in a national emergency. They relate to the same principle, namely, the reestablishment of many of the controls which the people have put up with during the war. Many of the rights and privileges of parliament were given up in order that the war might be prosecuted to a successful conclusion, and all classes of the population were glad to cooperate with the government.

As regards the particular matter which is before us to-night, when I saw the war coming a few years ago, in the sessions of 1937 and 1938 I urged upon the government the importance of taking steps to meet the serious menace of the U-boats on the Atlantic, especially in view of the fact that there were five million more mouths to feed in England than there were when war broke out in 1914. I also pointed out the great loss in tonnage that had taken place and that shipping had not kept pace with the progress of events, so that we were not in a position to meet an emergency. I urged on the government at that time the establishment of a system of food reservoirs in England to take care of 200,000,000 bushels of wheat and packaged commodities, canned goods and things of that sort. I may have been a prophet preaching in vain to those who were advocating pacifism at that time. I quote the prophet Jeremiah who said, "Where are now your prophets that prophesied unto you, saying, the king of Babylon shall not come against you, nor against this land," but he did. War came; the mother country was attacked, and the loss of southern ports just around the corner meant that Britain was nearly starved out by U-boats in her darkest hour. I had urged on the government for years, when I saw that war was coming, that we should have a proper system of storage reservoirs in Britain by which we could meet any emergency; but as a Conservative sitting on this side my proposals were opposed. There will come a day when the hon. gentleman who rose in his place last week and criticized not only the Progressive Conservative party but a good many public men in this country who have done a great deal for the empire will have to give an answer for the attitude he has taken. I was very much disappointed that steps had not been taken before the war came. The whole north American continent, both the United States and Canada, may thank providence that we escaped the horrors of war on our own soil.

I have always got along very well with the members from the province of Quebec, have urged that the principle of confederation is each for all and all for each, the old Cornish battle-cry, because what is for the good of one province is for the benefit of all. Where would the people of the maritime provinces have been; where would the people of Quebec, Ontario and other provinces have been, if it had not been for the mother country and sea protection in this war? What would have happened to our farmers? The people in eastern Canada might have found themselves confronted with internment camps, the loud speaker, the whip, the gestapo police, the tramping of feet, the brutal savagery of the axis powers. Hundreds of thousands of the population in the eastern provinces might have been carted off to work in Germany. That was the position of affairs which this country faced, and I urged upon the government the necessity for taking steps to provide some sort of food reservoir for Britain and our allies over there.

I admit that Canada did make a great contribution to the war. That contribution has been referred to by Mr. Churchill and others who have spoken of the magnificent part played by the farmers of this country throughout the war. I have no criticism of that programme at all; I am in accord with it. The people of this dominion expect the government of the day to do everything they possibly can to get all the food shipped to the mother country and the sufferers in Europe that can be provided.

I have before me the British white paper dealing with the Hot Springs conference, because I want to get the facts right. The matter was brought up in the House of Commons in England on July 6, 1943, when Mr. Anthony Eden, British Foreign Secretary, gave an account of what had taken place in connection with food at the conference which was held in Hot Springs, Virginia, from May 18 to June 3. That conference was attended by the representatives of forty-four nations, and a large number of those who have endorsed the food and agriculture organization of the united nations participated. Canada's contribution under the schedule to Bill No. 14 is to be 5·06 per cent; Australia's, 3·33; New Zealand's, 1·15; South Africa's, 2·31; Russia's, 8; the United Kingdom's, 15, and the United States', 25 per cent.

I was disappointed at the replies I received when I inquired about this conference at the time. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) made a statement to-day; and while I do not agree with the method that has been adopted I do agree, and I believe the house is unanimous in the view, that the government should do everything possible to make a success of this food undertaking. Since the house started, all parties have been working in a fine spirit of unity in order to find the solution of all our social and economic problems and as set out in bill No. 14.

Section 3 of the bill reads:

As soon as practicable after the close of each fiscal year the Secretary of State for External Affairs shall prepare and lay before parliament a report of operations under this act.

The trouble is that we have been thinking too much in terms of "external affairs," with the result that we are more than two years behind the mother country in the adoption of proposals which would have led to an improved agriculture and food situation. What did they do in the mother country? The Hot Springs conference, as I have said, was attended by forty-four nations, and on July 6, 1943, the British government got out a white paper in which there appeared all the resolutions passed at the conference. The three objects of the conference were: first, to raise the level of nutrition and standards of living of the peoples in the respective jurisdictions; the second was to secure improvements in the efficiency of production and distribution of food and of agricultural products; and the third object of the forty-four nations was to better the conditions of rural populations, thus contributing toward an expanding world economy. On the same day on which Mr. Eden made his statement in the British House of Commons, July 6, 1943, we should have had a corresponding statement here the same day. We have lost more than two years by not adopting up-to-date methods in dealing with this subject. Let me quote what Mr. Eden, British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, said that day.

His Majesty's government have no hesitation in accepting the resolutions and the obligation to give effect to them in so far as they apply to the conditions in the United Kingdom. They will also gladly cooperate with other governments in seeking ways to give effect to those resolutions which call for concerted action. They will commend the resolutions to the governments of His Majesty's colonies, dependencies and overseas territories.

The main object of the conference was to secure an abundant supply of the right kind of food for all mankind. World-wide investigations show, states the conference report, that the diets consumed by the greater part of mankind are nutritionally unsatisfactory. The white paper continues:

Nutrition therefore becomes a primary concern of governments everywhere. To give conscious planned direction to mankind's need for food in the modern sense each nation should develop a national food and nutrition policy to the full fruition of which related social and economic policies will need to be adopted.

In my opinion that is correct. A famous Conservative, Mr. Disraeli, said that the first concern of the nation should be the health of the people. Speaking at Edinburgh in 1867 to the farmers of that district, he said:

In a progressive country change is constant; and the great question is, not whether you should resist change, which is inevitable, but whether the change should be carried out in deference to the manners, the customs, the laws, the traditions of the people, or in deference to abstract principles, and arbitrary and general doctrines.

He went on to say, that "power has only one duty, to secure the social welfare of the people." That was the utterance of a great humanitarian, Mr. Benjamin Disraeli, a prime minister of the mother country. His principles have been carried out by his successors, including the government of which Hon. Mr. Hudson was recently a member.

All men are consumers of food, the report says, and more than two-thirds of them are producers of it. Clearly, therefore, the nutrition policy and the agricultural policy of the nations must be considered interdependent. If the nutritional needs of mankind are to be satisfied, a vast increase in agricultural production will be necessary throughout the world; and producers must know not only what they have to do, but also that their labours will secure for them an adequate livelihood.

The conference supported this bill No. 14. It does not refer, however, to the method or manner of controls through orders in council. The conference indicated its conviction that the types of food needed to improve people's diets and health are in many cases those produced by methods of farming best calculated to keep the soil productive and to increase and stabilize the returns of the farmers. In short, better nutrition means better farming.

There is a summary of these main resolutions in the white paper. The first deals with intention: governments should declare to their own people their intention to secure more and better food for the people.

Next, post-war shortage, which was known in this house three or four years ago to be a practical certainty. The summary states that it was agreed that the period following the liberation of occupied countries would be one of excessive scarcity. Governments, therefore, should work together to produce more food, especially cereals and other foods which promote energy and satisfy hunger, and to prevent, speculative and violent fluctuations in prices.

Immediate measures. The white paper says that while the ultimate objective must be a world in which all are fed adequately for good health, it will be necessary as a practical measure to concentrate on intermediate objectives which can be advanced as conditions improve.

The next clause of the resolutions of the food conference adopted in Britain relates to research, a matter which I urged on the minister back in 1938 in connection with reservoirs of food for the mother country. We should have taken full advantage of science and research. At that time the British medical association was meeting in London, and they pointed out that grain and canned and other goods could be stored at suitable food reservoirs in Great Britain for emergency purposes. The Hot Springs conference suggests that all nations should train scientific workers and rural leaders for service in agriculture and promote technical efficiency among producers by means of education and research. The nations should exchange with each other factual information and statistics regarding food and agriculture.

A world-wide economy is the subject of another resolution. A balanced world-wide expansion of economic activity must be achieved to secure freedom from want, since it is no use producing the food if the standard of living of the people is too low for them to buy it.

A permanent international organization such as is set out in bill No. 14 is proposed, to collect and disseminate information and statistics regarding food and agriculture.

The British Minister of Agriculture, Mr. R. S. Hudson, with whom I once had some correspondence in reference to a food reservoir, said, speaking in the House of Commons on the same day that Mr. Eden announced the government's acceptance of the conference resolutions:

> The recent conference at Hot Springs was attended by forty-four nations. That conference passed several resolutions which I think will prove to be of the greatest significance for agriculture throughout the world. These resolutions were passed unanimously. No delegations entered any reservations at all. Incidentally, it was the occasion of considerable tribute being paid to the British delegation under the leadership of the under secretary of state for foreign affairs.

That was Mr. Eden. On the subject of post-war food scarcities, the minister remarked:

> One of the most striking facts which emerged from that conference was the general agreement that immediately after the war the world would be faced with an acute shortage of food, and that this shortage would cover not only actual foodstuffs, but would also cover methods of transportation, and methods of production, such as fertilizers, machinery, draft animals, petrol and so forth.

> It is, I think, clear that the industry of agriculture, at all events in this country, will have to remain fully mobilized for a period after the war which cannot be determined to-day. . . . What is clear, and what all the nations gathered at Hot Springs were clear and agreed about, is that, taking the world as a whole, there will undoubtedly be a severe shortage of live stock and live stock products, of oils and fats, and it is highly likely, difficult as it may seem to believe, that there will be an actual shortage of bread grains and of rice. The reasons for this shortage are obvious. A large part of the agriculture of Europe, Russia and Asia has been thrown into disorder and it will take a considerable period for those countries and those continents to get on their feet again.

It will be noticed that Russia has been called upon for a contribution of only eight per cent, which I think is very fair.

As to the production programmes:

> The conference at Hot Springs recommended that all countries should plan their production programmes on a realistic basis and should concentrate on measures to relieve hunger in the first instance, even at the expense of putting nutritional improvements of diet second. They pointed out that it was necessary to concentrate on foodstuffs for direct human consumption. . . .
> The conference also said that those countries, like ourselves, which have already increased food production during the war, must maintain that increased production and if possible increase it.

Speaking of the British policy, the minister said that they agreed with the resolutions re food production, and added:

> We consider that the best contribution we can make to the food problems of the world is to continue producing from our own soil, food for as large a proportion as we can for as long as that process proves to be necessary.

For nearly a hundred years Britain has been dependent for her food supply very largely on imports from abroad. As a result of the government's recent policy they have expanded their own food production about seventy per cent since the war broke out, and have made a great contribution to the progress and security which the British farmer at present enjoys.

As to security for the farmer, I will read just one or two more sentences of this report:

> What are the economic risks to which the farmer is subjected? In the first place, he is subject to wide fluctuations in prices, with the subsequent ups and down in the returns . . . to fluctuations in employment, and to fluctuations in outputs, due to weather and outbreaks of disease. Clearly, the more mixed farming you get, the less is your danger from those fluctuations, because you spread your risks over a greater number of products.
> The conference stressed the point that all these economic and biological dangers can be greatly diminished by the adoption of systems of mixed rotational farming.

The minister goes on to say, referring to certain sections of hostile urban and politico-economic opinion:

> Is it too much to hope that those people will note that forty-four nations, assembled at Hot Springs, unanimously decided that it was in the general interests of mankind that agriculture should be based on sound fundamental principles, and those fundamental principles involve the maintenance of soil fertility and a system of mixed . . . farming.

The last resolution which is referred to deals with price stability:

> There is another resolution to which I should, in fairness, call attention, which says that increasing opportunities should be afforded for supplying consumption needs at prices fair to both producers and consumers alike, to prevent serious economic and social dislocation.

The resolution states that excessive short-term movements in prices of food and agricultural products are an obstacle to the orderly development of production, that extreme fluctuations of prices of food and agricultural products increase inflationary and also deflationary tendencies, and that these tendencies harm producers and consumers alike.

As to the world policy which has been decided upon for agriculture, this resolution sets out—and we are a party to it when we pass this bill—that the Hot Springs resolution definitely pointed the way to a world policy for agriculture, first of all for the short-term period of acute shortage and then a new period of gradual adjustment; then finally, they laid down the basic principles on which a practical policy for a well balanced agriculture could be carried out throughout the world. If these policies outlined at Hot Springs are followed and put into effect in each country according to its different economic conditions we shall, I think, have gone a long way along the road to solving the problems which faced primary producers throughout the world in pre-war days.

This interim commission was formed at the Hot Springs conference to formulate and recommend for consideration by each member government or authority a specific plan for a permanent organization in the field of food and agriculture, and the commission's first report has been published in the form of a white paper, in 1945. The British government's instrument of acceptance is signed by Mr. Eden and dated December 14, 1944. That is the policy laid down there. In 1943 Mr. Churchill said:

> Abundant food has brought our 47,000,000 Britons into the world. Here they are, and they must find their living. It is absolutely certain we shall have to grow a larger proportion of our food at home. During the war immense advances have been made by the agricultural industry. The position of the farmers has been improved; the position of the labourers immeasurably improved. The efficient agricultural landlord has an important part to play. I hope to see a vigorous revival of healthy village life on the basis of these higher wages and of improved housing after the war, and what with the modern methods of locomotion and the modern amusements of the cinema and the wireless, to which will soon be added television, life in the country and on the land ought to compete in attractiveness with life in the great cities.

So that they have increased their production by seventy per cent.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer to the method the government has adopted in this case; that is, the method of carrying on by order in council, even after the war is over. As you know there was a great deal of criticism in this country during the war because of the way government was carried on by order in council. Knowing it was for the war, however, the people gladly gave up many of their rights and privileges which it took hundreds of years to secure. This matter was referred to this afternoon by the hon. member for Lake Centre. One of the great contributions the mother country has made to the history of the world and to civilization is the ideal of a community of free men governing themselves through a free parliament, such as we had in Canada before the war started. To-day, however, we almost take for granted many of the liberties which have been given to us during the last three hundred years. Let us think of the great struggle that was carried on to secure those rights and privileges. Remember the struggle carried on by the barons against King John. After all is said and done, it was the armed strength of the barons that made magna charta possible. Now, however, under measures like this we are giving up some of the liberties and privileges won at such great cost.

Mr. SPEAKER: I should like to draw the attention of hon. members to paragraph 118 under standing order 12, which reads:

Silence is required to be observed in both houses. In the Commons, all members should be silent, or should converse only in whisper.

Mr. CHURCH: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In this connection I would refer to the Book of Revelations, to quote a verse which is relevant to this discussion:

Behold, I come quickly: hold that fast which thou hast, that no man take thy crown.

We in this House of Commons are rapidly losing the crown referred to and our control over the expenditures of the government. If it goes on much longer I do not want to be a member of parliament, because I do not want to see my rights and privileges taken away, and the institutions to which I have referred forgotten and abandoned. Men suffered at the stake to win these liberties for us, and we must not lightly drop them. This House of Commons is the court of last resort for the grievances of the people, and the private member is the connecting link between the government of the day and the electors. When he ceases to function, as he has had to cease functioning in this house during the war, free parliaments and parliamentary government is at an end.

With all due respect I repeat that I object to the method and manner by which this particular measure is to be carried into effect by orders in council. I do not believe it is necessary. The minister would be far better off to support the high court of parliament, as they have done in the mother country, and put a sum of money in the estimates to be passed each year. Heaven knows that in a rich country like Canada, where we had no invasion, where no buildings were destroyed and no damage done, we are in a very favourable position. We should have had in reservoirs overseas before the war 200,000,000 bushels of grain, instead of limiting acreage and things like that when we knew well before the war that all the grain, live stock, dairy products and other commodities we could produce would be required to feed the poor, long-suffering people in the devastated areas of Europe if war came.

Mr. DONALD M. FLEMING (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the measure before us is one of the highest importance, not only because of the provisions of the agreement but also because of the implications of both the agreement and the bill. It should be a matter of the greatest satisfaction that Canada had such a leading part to play in the negotiation of this agreement. Canada was ably represented by Mr. Lester Pearson, and we should take great pride in the fact that a young diplomat from this young country played a leading and most creditable part in the negotiation of this international agreement.

I urge that this instrument is worthy of unanimous ratification by this parliament, and I need mention only two reasons. In the first place this agreement should receive the greatest possible support because it is based upon humanitarian considerations. The feeding of the hungry in all parts of the world is and must be of concern to the people of this enlightened, Christian land. It is something of which we as Canadians should be proud that we can take a very important part in that great work. In the next place this agreement ought to command the widest support because it represents an important step in the field of international relations. It is an agreement among nations. We in Canada are looking for opportunities to assist in giving leadership throughout the world in relations between nations. Here we have the field of the production of foodstuffs in which Canada holds a position of leadership. Therefore it is only right and proper that in the negotiating an agreement and in implementing of an agreement in relation to the feeding of the peoples of the world Canada should have a leading part.

In the past we have done much for which we might reproach ourselves. Let it not be forgotten that we, along with some of the other food producing nations of the world, in days not so long removed, were busy reducing production and in some cases destroying foodstuffs at a time when millions of people throughout the world starved. Surely we have taken a step, a long step, from that discreditable situation. This agreement offers an opportunity to take a long step away from that discreditable episode of our past.

Let it not be thought that in helping to raise the standard of living among other nations of the world we are doing anything to reduce the standard of living of our own people—far from it. The surest guarantee of the betterment of the standard of living of our own people will be the betterment of the standard of living of those vast millions of people the world over who to-day have not enough to eat.

Can we ponder what it would mean to Canada, in safeguarding our standard of living, if the hungry millions of Asia, who some day may be competing with us for the world's markets, had as high a standard of living as we have?

The real hope for Canada, both in respect of her international trade and in respect of the maintenance of the standard of living of her people at home, lies in this urgent need—and perhaps in other respects as well—that we must help other nations to raise their standard of living. This measure gives an opportunity to Canada to help in that worthy cause.

I suggest that measures of this type are the kind upon which we should like and ought to see parliament expressing its views in unanimous terms. It is a matter of disappointment, therefore, that the bill now before us presents this agreement in such a way that those of us who are determined to oppose arbitrary measures find that we must criticize the bill and criticize it strongly. It would have been so much better, I suggest, both for the effect at home and for the effect abroad, had it been possible to put this agreement before parliament for simple ratification, without at the same time introducing sections which are calculated to give the government the most sweeping powers, powers which a self-respecting parliament in a time like this cannot transfer to a cabinet.

It is a matter of disappointment that we have not the opportunity, as the bill stands to-night, to express ourselves unanimously in support of the ratification of the measure. There are one or two things which might properly be said to the government at this time, and which might prevent a repetition in connection with later measures which will come before the house.

Our experience in Canada in recent years with government by order in council has put at least those of us who sit on this side of the house, on our guard with respect to arbitrary measures. It has not served to allay our fears or our suspicions when, in the five and one-half weeks parliament has been in session, the government has continued to legislate by order in council and apparently under the authority of the War Measures Act with reference to subjects which have no connection whatsoever with the war.

It is against that background that we propose to survey all the measures the government introduces at this session. The government might as well understand right now that we propose to bring critical views to bear upon those government measures. I repeat that we are on our guard against arbitrary measures. We have had so much bureaucracy in recent years that we are on our guard against the creation of more of it, or the perpetuation of existing bureaucracy.

It is no comfort to the house to have the government point to some measures which were passed in parliaments of other years and which contain language similar to that found in section 2 of the bill. That is no comfort. It may be that the parliament which was in session when those measures were adopted was a parliament which felt that the government of that day, on its assurances and on its record, could be entrusted with certain powers to proceed by way of orders in council to implement the provisions of international treaties.

That situation does not obtain at the present time. Our position on this side of the house is that there shall be the strictest scrutiny applied to government measures, and the strongest opposition voiced to anything which proposes the extension of the powers of the government to legislate by order in council.

I suggest that, above all other kinds of measures with which we may have to deal in this parliament, measures affecting international relations ought to be kept squarely within the ambit of the powers of parliament, and that those in relation to international agreements ought not to seek to take from parliament and vest in a cabinet powers which normally would be exercised by parliament itself.

The reason for that position is obvious. Here we are dealing, not with something which affects only our own citizens, but with something which affects our relations with other nations of the world, some of the leading nations of the world. Our relations with those nations may be affected by the course followed with respect to the agreement with which we are attempting to deal in the measure before us to-night.

In these circumstances, if Canada means to fulfil her obligations and to fulfil the pledges contained in her international agreements, it is vital that such measures should command the most widespread support within Canada and within parliament. Above all other measures they should be the last to seek to take from parliament powers which are properly vested in parliament. How else can we ensure that solid foundation of public support and that necessary measure of success for these international agreements, and the permanence of international relations which we mean to seek?

Very briefly, I wish to compare this measure with one or two others which were adopted in earlier parliaments. I suggest that the comparison will be decidedly to the disadvantage of the present measure. I draw attention, in the first place, to the fact that in this measure we are not being invited to ratify in express terms the international agreement. We are not being asked to ratify the agreement. Let no one think that there is one section in the bill which is, in express terms, a ratification of the agreement, because that is not so.

We are told, as a matter of information, in the preamble of the bill that Canada is transmitting an instrument of acceptance. This house and parliament are not being called upon for ratification of the agreement. We are told, in effect, that the government has already transmitted, or is going to transmit ratification of the agreement on behalf of this country. All we are called upon to do is to put into the hands of the government certain very broad powers. That is what this bill contemplates and provides, and therefore I think that when approaching the bill the house ought to be put on its guard. It would have been very much more proper if the government, in submitting this measure, had chosen to follow the very useful precedent which is to be found in the statute which provided for the ratification of the protocol accepting the statute of the permanent court of international justice, which statute was enacted in April, 1921, as chapter 46 of the statutes of that year. There we had a similar situation. A bill was brought to parliament to deal with the protocol for adoption of the statute for the permanent court of international justice, and parliament was given an opportunity to ratify it. This is how section one of that statute reads:

The governor in council is authorized—

Mark you, authorized by parliament.

—to advise that His Majesty be humbly moved to ratify on behalf of Canada the said protocol of the sixteenth day of December, 1920, in the manner thereby stipulated.

Parliament of that day was given an opportunity to authorize the cabinet of that day to advise His Majesty to sign the agreement. Not so in the year 1945. In the amendments which we of the official opposition propose to introduce in committee that situation will be taken care of and there will be given to this parliament an opportunity which the government has not given in introducing this measure, to pass on this agreement in plain and express terms, to say whether we approve and ratify it or whether we do not.

There is another phase of the matter which I do not intend to deal with at any length because it was so ably dealt with this afternoon by the hon. member for Lake Centre. Section 2 of this bill is a most extraordinary piece of draftsmanship. Certainly the draftsman of this legislation was schooled in the school of bureaucracy which has flourished at Ottawa in recent years, because this is on all fours with the kind of legislation which has been ground out by parliament in recent years. Under that section the governor in council is authorized, not only to make appointments, establish offices, pass orders in council and do whatever things may appear to him to be necessary to carry out the provisions of the constitution; he is to be granted those powers in connection with the recommendations of the conference of the food and agricultural organization.

This conference has not yet met to make recommendations. In other words, we are being asked to say to the government: although there are no recommendations in existence and may not be for months, we clothe you with power to ratify recommendations that we have not seen, that have not been born as yet. Not only is that being done in connection with recommendations of the conference, it is being done in connection with recommendations of its committees. Think of that! This parliament is being asked to commit such an act of abdication as will vest in the government the broadest powers to proceed by order in council and do all kinds of things to carry out the provisions of this agreement as well as to carry out the recommendations of the conference and, further, to carry out the recommendations of the committees of the conference which have not even been established. These recommendations have not been made and may not be made for months, but this parliament is being asked to give the government power to ratify these things before they are even born. That is government, 1945 edition. We hope there will be an opportunity to correct some of the short-comings in this measure when we proceed to committee stage.

This afternoon mention was made by my leader and the hon. member for Lake Centre of features of this bill which seem to be designed to ensure secrecy about whatever acts the government may do in pursuance of the powers it is asking to have vested in it by section 2 of the bill. We had some intimation from the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) that there may be some measure of relief in store for parliament in that respect and we certainly trust that is so. It would have been much better if the government, in directing the drafting of this measure, had chosen again to follow a worthy precedent to be found in chapter 49 of the statutes of 1922, an act for carrying into effect the treaties of peace between His Majesty and Hungary and Turkey. That measure contains these words which one will search the present measure in vain to find:

Any order in council made under this act . . . shall be laid before parliament as soon as may be after it is made. . . .

One can search throughout this measure in vain for anything which even suggests the faintest obligation on the part of the government to table these orders in council or to make them public when they are passed. We are not prepared to accept any bland assurances that that is to be expected, because we have had a great deal of that kind of secrecy which has attached itself to legislation by order in council. We hope, before this measure reaches third reading, to see it so amended that it will give parliament power to ratify this measure or at least to authorize the government to advise His Majesty to ratify the measure. We hope that it will not be left to the government to ratify the measure and then parliament simply come along and be given the glorious distinction of being permitted merely to authorize the government to carry out the measure.

In the second place we want to see an amendment introduced which will compel the tabling and publication of orders in council when they are made. Not only that; we want to see that there is no permanence given to orders in council or the measures the government may take in pursuance of the powers conferred by this bill. They must have a limited duration. In that and in no other way can parliament maintain and ensure its proper control over the implementing of this important agreement.

I have one observation to make in conclusion. I hope we are not to be offered by the government a sort of sop corresponding in form to a section of the National Housing Act of 1944, to which reference will be made in this parliament if something is not done soon in pursuance to the section to which I refer. Section 30 of that act reads:

> As soon as practicable after the end of each calendar year, the minister shall prepare a report with regard to the administration of this act and the loans made thereunder during the preceding calendar year and the report shall be laid before parliament forthwith or, if parliament be not then in session, within fifteen days after the commencement of the next ensuing session thereof.

It is not enough to have legislation which apparently requires the government to bring in a report, the sort of thing that is contemplated by section 3 of the bill. There have been two sessions of parliament in 1945 and the government is still in default under section 30 of the National Housing Act, because there has as yet been no report on the 1944 administration. The government was in default fifteen days after the opening of the first session of this year. The matter has been brought up several times this session and we still have not had a report. Is that kind of record going to give this parliament any confidence that it can expect a frank and full and complete and immediate disclosure by the government of all its acts in pursuance of the provisions of this measure? All we have to rely on is legislation in the terms of section 3 and that is not good enough. In the light of the experience of parliament in recent years that is not nearly good enough. The government may just as well take notice right now that we on this side intend to fight arbitrary measures to the limit. No matter how anxious we may be to further a measure, if it is couched in terms which seem to us to vest in the government arbitrary powers, we will criticize it and resist it to the limit.

Mr. E. G. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I rise wtih a great deal of pleasure to speak in favour of this bill with which I am in sympathy. The bill, which is to establish an agricultural organization of the united nations, recognizes one great thing, namely, that to-day many nations of the world believe in a world citizenship. Such a bill would never have come before this parliament twenty-five years ago, but since then we have passed through one of the most crucial stages in the world's history and have fought a global war. The bill recognizes that to-day all countries have a responsibility to other countries throughout the world and must have regard to the rights and needs of other peoples. I consider this a Christian responsibility.

There has been a good deal of discussion of the bill and some controversy has developed over the maintenance of controls, but the very fact that we live in a country where we are more fortunate than peoples in other parts of the world does impose upon us a definite responsibility. It is not enough to put on paper or even to inaugurate a system of world organization unless we are ready to make fundamental changes, and in the few moments at my disposal I shall mention some fundamental changes which I believe are necessary.

One of the big questions which this parliament has to decide is whether we are to have a high or a low income in Canada. During the war, in 1943, we had a gross income of $8,800,000,000, and according to the bureau of statistics that is about sixty-eight per cent over the 1926-29 level. There has been some intimation from members of the cabinet that in order to have full employment or anywhere near it in this country labour would have to take a cut-back of from twenty-five to forty per cent. We have also been told by various ministers that agriculture must be satisfied with lower returns for its products. I should like to quote what the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) said, as reported at page 425 of Hansard, in outlining to the house the measures which this government has taken for the stability of agriculture. He said:

May I say in conclusion that we have made exactly the same kind of arrangement with regard to cattle. That contract extends down to December 31, 1946. There is no one in Canada who needs to have any fear that the price will be cut in the marketing of these live stock products between now and the end of 1946, below the minimum which the contract establishes, if the stock is marketed orderly and the plants operate at capacity.

The farmer in western Canada has already experienced a decrease in cattle prices. So I say that to-day we have no safeguard against falling prices. We have been told that we have unemployment insurance and family allowances, but after all the sacrifices the Canadian people made in war I do not think they will be satisfied with that kind of floor under our Canadian economy, and so I am going to submit that we need a fundamental change. We have had in this country a government which does not believe in planning. They have said so themselves. Yet through the sheer necessity of planning to meet our war commitments we have been able to increase our natural production from around three billions to approximately nine billions of dollars. Therefore I maintain that if we launch upon a system of high income in Canada we can maintain a high level of income for all our people. The fight is not between the farmer and labour, because we in this group have shown to the people that we are interdependent. We have shown that if we can take the resources of this country and can put our people to work on them we can produce a wealth of things. What we produce on our farms and in our factories represents wealth and the social services that we can provide for ourselves. What we export in the way of surpluses means that we thereby build up credits or else we import. The fact is, as it has been in the past, that unless we import as much as we export, the Canadian people are short by just that amount of foodstuffs and other commodities. The first thing we should realize, and as a farmer from western Canada I certainly realize it, is that a larger income in the hands of the workers means a larger consumption of the products of the farm. More purchasing power in the hands of the workers means that they will buy more butter, cheese, eggs, pork and other farm products. Those of us who live in western Canada need farm machinery and various other goods. Therefore to-day we should start our factories going, producing the machinery that is required by the western farmer and by farmers all over Canada.

One of the first things we must do in order to establish Canadian domestic economy on a sound basis is to establish it on a high income basis. Then we can meet our Christian commitments, if you like, to the united nations. We can join with the other nations who are willing to recognize their responsibilities to all countries of the world to-day to feed and clothe the starving and destitute who are less fortunate than ourselves. Surely we realize to-day that it is much cheaper and much better to share than to hoard surpluses which may lead us into another war. The leader of this group said at one time, not what Napoleon said, that an army marches on its stomach, but that armies march when their stomachs are empty. I am in agreement with that. When we have starving millions in Europe and Asia, unless we do something about it we shall have trouble.

I should like to read into the record something regarding the lack of stability in this country and the need for some sort of planning. Some of the opposition members have criticized the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, and one hon. member said that we would not agree with what he was saying when he was decrying the fact that this bill would necessitate orders in council, involving a lack of power on the part of this parliament. Let me say that we have never at any time said anything against democracy. We believe in democracy and in the rights of this parliament. At the same time we recognize that orders in council, and some of the actions of the cabinet, produce what one might call "funny" things. Certainly we do not want any situation to exist such as has been described in my own constituency. A certain man went everywhere looking for underwear in the middle of the winter. He went to every town within his reach and all he could get was one suit. He needed underclothing and so did his son, but it happened that the father's shoulders were cold while most of the son's trouble was in his lower extremities, and so they cut the suit in two, each using one-half of it. That is not what we want. We want carefully considered planning so that what we have done for war we can do for peace.

In closing, let me say that I heartily endorse the principle of this responsibility which the bill recognizes.

Mr. W. G. CASE (Grey North): I wish to make a few observations on the bill before the house. In the first place, it appears to be all-inclusive, but because it has a direct relationship to agriculture I feel that it commends itself to our serious consideration.

I look upon agriculture as one of the great basic industries of the country, an industry from which we derive much of our wealth. In fact, it is the one dependable source of real wealth we have in Canada. I am thinking now of our basic industries—agriculture, forestry, fishery and our mines. The bill has a direct relationship to each of these, and therefore I think that since it has these potentialities it should receive the favourable consideration of hon. members.

Then, too, its human character must not be overlooked. It will indeed play an important part in contributing to the solution of a great problem, that of distributing our agricultural products to the distant corners of the earth, particularly if those whose names appear at the end of the bill become members of this great organization. So I say that a bill which seeks to introduce some measure whereby we can in an orderly fashion distribute the products of our fields, our forests and our streams will indeed play an important part in the future economy of the nations.

I feel, however, that a certain amount of criticism can be offered and I have listened with interest to the observations made by my colleagues who have preceded me. I have recognized, in the limited time it has been my privilege to serve in this house, a tendency to introduce measures at a time when the element of haste is always attendant upon their presentation. Indeed, this is no exception to the rule, inasmuch as I think this has happened time and again. As a matter of fact, this bill is brought in for second reading on the very eve of royal assent, so that we are in a position where we must deal with a measure far-reaching in its import, having possibly great effects; and yet I doubt whether we have the time to consider properly the various articles of the agreement.

I should like to see some provision in the bill requiring that the various signatories or representatives of the countries involved—I suppose it must be approached in its broadest application—shall have to report to their respective governments so that the peoples' representatives may have an opportunity to view and review the contributions being made by the various members of the organization.

Do we realize that in our haste, from our lack of consideration, we may be delegating to some authority responsibilities which are primarily ours and which we may not easily reclaim? I have always taken strong exception to anything savouring of totalitarianism, and yet the very provisions of the bill seem, in my opinion, to be rather far-reaching, because we become members of the organization for a period of five years, or, to be more precise, four years with one year's notice in the case of withdrawal. I say, therefore, that we may be delegating authority to some organization which we shall no longer be able to control.

As a matter of fact, I believe that a commitment for five years is too long; it savours of the closed shop, which was debated in this house recently. I should like to know from the minister when he replies what was the basis of assessment in determining the contribution to be made by the various nations. In annex II to the bill, giving the budget for the first financial year, I read:

> The provisional budget for the first financial year shall be a sum of 2,500,000 U.S. dollars, the unspent balance of which shall constitute the nucleus of a capital fund.
> This sum shall be contributed by the member nations in the following proportions.

Then the different percentages are set out, and if my arithmetic is correct, Canada's contribution will be $126,500; Great Britain's, $375,000; and the United States' $625,000. Then it appears to be intimated that the over-all total required in the next year will be $5 million. While I do not find fault with that, I should like some explanation from the minister and an opportunity to go into the matter more thoroughly.

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): I had not intended to rise on this second reading, since we are discussing only the principle of the bill, but in view of some of the statements which have been made, probably the position of the members of our party should be made clear.

First, since this bill aims to establish on an international level some controls whereby people throughout the world may be properly fed, we support the principle, as, I believe, do hon. members in every part of the house. A start has been made in real cooperation between the various peoples. Nations must learn to cooperate and look upon one another as brothers. Causes of wars are very closely related to problems of want. This international conference aims to do away with want. Modern science as exemplified in the atomic bomb has made it abundantly clear that, unless the world can end wars, wars will end us.

This conference also aims to do away with some obstacles which in the past have prevented the rank and file everywhere from receiving proper food. That is a great objective. We support these aims 100 per cent.

During the speech of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) this afternoon, he gave some figures which demonstrated the tremendous extent of malnutrition and undernourishment. I wondered whether he had made any analysis of the causes of this condition. We in this great country of ours, composing nearly half a continent and containing only eleven and a half million people, and one of the greatest food producers in the world, find these conditions of malnutrition and want here at home. Coming from the western prairies, I have seen instances which illustrate this. A boy about twelve or thirteen years of age came to town and walked into a store with five or six pounds of butter which, by herding, feeding and milking cows, he had helped to produce. He was selling that butter. From his appearance one could see that he was undernourished. I asked him if he ever ate any butter, and he said, "no." "In fact," he said, "we have to sell our butter." I said, "Why?" "Well," he said, "I am sent into town this afternoon with this butter which we have produced, and the purpose of selling it is to buy machinery repairs." The prices of the things which the farmer must buy lie beyond his control. When he comes to purchase some commodity he must pay what he is told is the price, but when he comes to sell something he is told the price at which it shall be sold, and the incomes of those who actually produce the wealth of the nation are so low that they cannot afford adequate food. As has been said this afternoon, the cause of malnutrition and undernourishment is poverty; and I contend that this conference will have to make some basic changes in the world economy before it will succeed in feeding the worlds peoples. We support that objective.

The statement was made this afternoon by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) that the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group could not oppose the setting up of boards by orders in council. I deny that statement completely. This group has been maintaining that orders in council should never be used in peace time for establishing arbitrarily any boards. If any group in this house stands for democracy it is the C.C.F. group, the one group whose programme and policy and party are based on democratic annual conferences.

Mr. REID: Since when? Your party are more dictatorial in British Columbia than anybody else.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: You can tell your little story later. We have listened to you for many years. When did you hold your last convention, 1919?

Mr. REID: I do not need any convention.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. REID: It is just a waste of time.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Section 2 of this bill as it stands should be opposed by every person who objects to the granting of unlimited powers by order in council in the hands of the government. That section states:

> (1) The governor in council may make such appointments, establish such offices, make such orders in council and do such things as appear to him to be necessary for carrying out the provisions of the constitution set out in the schedule to this act or any recommendations of the conference of the food and agriculture organization of the united nations, or of its committees made pursuant to such provisions.

How can we be satisfied with the carrying out by order in council of any recommendation which may be presented by future organizations and future councils over which we have no control? We believe that under war conditions orders in council may be necessary, but whatever boards are set up and whatever actions are taken by order in council require to be ratified by this parliament. I wanted to make that point clear.

Mr. SPEAKER: If there is no other hon. member who wishes to speak on this motion, the mover, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) will have the floor, but it is understood that, as the mover, he will close the debate.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I wish in the first place to thank all hon. members who have spoken for having taken the position that all are interested in seeing that this organization is established as soon as possible. Some have even gone so far as to criticize us for not having set it up at an earlier date. With regard to that I can only say that I have before me at the moment the resolution passed by the United States under the heading "Joint resolution providing for membership of the United States in the food and agricultural organizations of the United Nations." Then follows a resolution in five short sections, approved July 31, 1945. That is, the nation which is responsible for a greater part of the expense than any other nation involved, namely twenty-five per cent. The next largest contributor, the United Kingdom, is responsible for fifteen per cent. The United Kingdom, the second largest contributor to the expenses of the organization did not, so far as I have been able to find, pass legislation with regard to this matter. The British government apparently has much greater authority than the parliament of Canada has ever seen fit to give to the government of Canada; and I am not critical of the parliament of Canada when I make that statement. My understanding is that in dealing with all matters of this kind the British government has authority to take executive action, and executive action is either by order in council or by a minute of council. Therefore all that we are proposing in this bill to do by legislation, they proceeded to do by order in council—a course which this house seems to be somewhat concerned about.

I am not offering any criticism of hon. members who have raised the question of the government doing things by order in council on this occasion, but the measure of 1922 has been quoted so often in this debate that I think I should place on Hansard the section we are presumed to have copied in drafting this legislation. Section 1, subsection 1, of chapter 49 of the statutes of 1922, assented to on June 28 of that year, reads:

> The governor in council may make such appointments, establish such offices, make such orders in council, and do such things as appear to him to be necessary for carrying out the said treaties and for giving effect to any of the provisions of the said treaties.

Then subsection 2 says:

> Any order in council made under this act may provide for the imposition by summary process or otherwise of penalties in respect of breaches of the provisions thereof, and shall be laid before parliament as soon as may be after it is made, and shall have effect as if enacted in this act, but may be varied or revoked by a subsequent order in council.

I submit that if we had copied that section; if we had attempted to have this house place a provision of that kind in this measure, we would have been guilty of doing in relation to a measure of this kind the things which some hon. members of the opposition have attributed to us on this occasion.

Having said that, I do not wish to-night to take so much of the time of the house as to place myself in the position of having made it impossible to have this bill passed at this sitting. In view of the remarks made by the leader of the Social Credit group, however, I propose to say a little more than perhaps otherwise I would have said. In introducing a measure into this house one always leaves himself open to one of two criticisms. The first is that he took so much time and covered so much ground that no one else had anything to say about it; the other is that he said so little that no one knew just what he meant when introducing the measure. I presume it was the latter of these criticisms which the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Low) intended to apply to my introduction of the bill this afternoon. After having listened to the discussion, however, I believe most hon. members thought I covered the subject as fully as it was necessary to cover it on second reading. It is true that I did not deal seriatim with the clauses of the bill, but as I understand the rules of the house I am not expected or permitted to do so. I simply dealt with the outstanding principles of the bill, expecting that all matters having to do with the individual sections would be dealt with in committee.

The question has been raised as to what we are prepared to do in committee. At the very beginning of my remarks in that connection may I say that we do not look upon this as a government measure. We do not look upon it as the duty of the government of this country to submit to the other nations of the world any measure with regard to this matter. We look upon it as the duty of the parliament of Canada, including the senate and the governor general, to do whatever is necessary in order to indicate that Canada is entering into this food conference unanimously and with no divisions whatsoever. I wish to say to my hon. friends of the opposition, whether they be in the Social Credit group, the C.C.F. group or the official opposition, that if they believe any of their members in association with any members on this side can draft anything which states more clearly what they all seem to think ought to be in this legislation—because it is exactly what we think ought to be in it—we are quite prepared to accept their assistance in doing so; and I do not know any place where that can be done more properly and more completely than in this chamber in the committee stage. Therefore I suggest that it is not the intention of the government to do anything with the public funds of this country which we would not be prepared to submit to this House of Commons and to parliament as a whole. As a matter of fact, I am convinced that under the constitution as it has been drawn, under the chairmanship of a gentleman who was very well described by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) and who was quite capable of looking after the interests of Canada and at the same time considering the interests of all the countries involved, nothing has been taken away from any democratic institutions in any of the countries that have joined this conference, and nothing has been done to lessen the powers enjoyed under those democratic institutions within those countries. In order to emphasize what I am saying, I need only read the one section in this legislation giving us any powers at all which some might think could be used in a way which would lead to unnecessary expenditure. That provision is at the bottom of page 4, in article IV, and reads:

> The conference may by a two-thirds majority of the votes cast—

Not by a bare majority, but by a two-thirds majority.

—make recommendations concerning questions relating to food and agriculture to be submitted to member nations for consideration with a view to implementation by national action.

I do not know how it could be more clearly stated that the only function of this conference in regard to matters of this kind is first to bring together all the information it can with regard to such questions; then discuss it among themselves, and then make recommendations to the members, which means to the thirty different nations that have indicated their intention of being parties to the conference. Then it provides that when these recommendations have been made they are to be implemented nationally. In other words, no group of nations will force us to do any particular thing. We must do it in our own national way. At other points in the constitution it is indicated that it must be done legally or constitutionally, whichever term is required to indicate the manner in which these things are done. So that what I said in answer to some of the questions asked by the leader of the Social Credit group was absolutely true. This is a voluntary arrangement, and I submit that no other type of arrangement could be brought into being to carry out the intentions of the Hot Springs conference. Forty-four nations met together and drew up recommendations, many of which were read to the house this afternoon by the leader of the Social Credit group. These recommendations then were submitted to an interim conference, which was headed by the Canadian rperesentative to the conference at Hot Springs and that conference drew up a constitution which in turn was submitted to the forty-four nations which attended the meeting.

May I say to the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) that I know of no other reason for the Argentine not being a party to it than the fact that its name does not appear among the forty-four nations who first attended the conference at Hot Springs, nor does its name appear among the thirty nations which have indicated thier intention of joining the conference. In other words, I know of no way in which any compulsion can be brought to bear upon the Argentine in order to bring it into the conference. On the other hand, it has every right that any nation of the world has to become a member of the conference, and to associate itself with the other thirty nations who are now members. But what was decided there was that this constitution would be re-submitted to the forty-four nations that had attended, and that they in turn would then indicate their desires, if they had desires, to become parties to the conference.

Therefore we have now some thirty nations united, who are going to hold their first meeting at Quebec city next week. Let me repeat that those nations which indicate their desire to become members of the conference do so with the knowledge that they are joining for four years, and that at the end of that time they may give a year's notice of their intention to drop out. All they are bound to do is to pay their dues to the conference for the first twelve-month period after they have given their indication of a desire to withdraw.

I do not know how it could be any fairer than that, or on a more voluntary basis. While they may remain in, they are subject to the decisions made by the members of the conference with respect to a certain budget that may be set up. That budget is governed in the first year by the terms of the constitution where it is stated that the amount set cannot exceed $2,500,000. Then it goes on to estimate that it will not be more during the next five years than an average $5,000,000 a year. However, I would refer hon. members to a resolution passed in the united houses of the United States, in which they made it absolutely certain that the sum could not exceed that amount. They have said, in voting their amount, that it cannot exceed the percentages which are set down: Twenty-five per cent of the payment for the first year, and twenty-five per cent in the succeeding years. With that set down I think the provision covers the entire amount which will be expended, when the terms of the constitution as set out in these articles which are made a schedule to the bill are read.

With that information, may I repeat what I said a few minutes ago. We do not want this to be government legislation. We do not think it would serve the purpose which we have in mind if it were made government legislation. The government has no desire whatsoever to get any kudos from the passing of this legislation which would not come to every individual member of the house, to every member of the senate. On the contrary, we want that kudos to go to everyone, and we want it to include not only members of this house, but every person in Canada in so far as that is possible.

I would suggest again that if hon. members would give this bill its second reading now, and permit its going into committee, we will state at this stage that we will make hon. members as free as they possibly can be to assist in every way to make it absolutely certain that money cannot be spent under this bill by order in council, without its first being passed upon by the House of Commons, in carrying out the recommendation made by this organization at any time.

I think all hon. members will agree that if we are to be a party to the conference, then provision ought to be made in the bill, and it ought to be understood, that in so far as making provision for the actual administration costs is concerned, we are to pay our share in accordance with the constitution which was set up. Are we to say to the other nations that are going into the organization at the present time that we are not prepared for the four years ahead of us to pay our share of the administration costs which have been set up in the articles which constitute the constitution I am sure hon. members would not wish so to state.

I agree with what was said by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright), that the sum of money set up is a small sum, compared with the great amount of good which could come to Canada and to other nations of the world through the expenditure of $126,500 in the first year and a sum no greater than $253,000 in the years thereafter.

From what I have heard this afternoon and this evening I think the house will be quite prepared to have the undertaking given that that amount of money is available. I understand the intention of the house, and particularly that of the official opposition is that they do not desire to have any money made available by the government of Canada for the carrying out of the recommendations which may be made by the conference, in order to assist in any undertaking which they think should be proceeded with, without its first being passed upon by the parliament of Canada.

My understanding, too, is that they feel that when orders in council are passed they should be placed upon the table of the house at as early a day as possible. I think hon. members who have sat here during the ten years in which I have been a member will agree that in no case has the government refused to bring down orders in council and place them upon the table of the house, except in those comparatively few cases during the war period, when that was not possible. But as soon as it did become possible, under the conditions of war then existing, such orders in council were always placed upon the table of the house.

We have no reason whatsoever for taking any different action in connection with this particular matter. In so far as reports are concerned, we are quite prepared to have the section which deals with the making of returns to the house changed to read in almost any way hon. members of the opposition may desire to have it read. But in my own opinion —and that may not be worth much—I think it is much stronger now than it would be if we were to insert the terms suggested during the discussion.

For example, it says:

> As soon as practicable after the close of each fiscal year, the Secretary of State for External Affairs shall prepare and lay before parliament a report of operations under this act.

My understanding of the requirement related to most of the reports which have to do with my own department is that I must lay on the table of the house within fifteen days after the opening of the next session of parliament the last report brought out. Sometimes that is almost twelve months away. It may be six months, eight months or a longer period of time. But this section says:

> As soon as practicable after the close of each fiscal year, the Secretary of State for External Affairs shall prepare and lay before parliament a report of operations under this act.

I believe the house, under that section, could hold the department to bringing down a report just as soon as it is available. If someone wishes to suggest that the report should be down within fifteen days from the opening of the next session, I do not know why hon. members on this side of the house should object to it. Again I say we are in the hands of the committee, and without any difficulty we can draft these sections to satisfy everyone who is in the house. I want all hon. members to feel free to make suggestions when we are in committee.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Powers of governor in council to carry out agreement.

Mr. BRACKEN: I am sure the members of the committee have listened with interest to the remarks of the mover of this bill. Personally I wish to compliment him upon the attitude he has taken. Those of us on this side of the committee have to take the bill as we received it, and we criticized it because it did not provide for the presenting of a report or that orders in council be presented. We felt that section 2 gave wider powers than were necessary. I think the Minister of Agriculture has taken a fair attitude with respect to those criticisms. The hon. member (Mr. Diefenbaker) who sits behind me will have some amendments to offer. These will be offered on their merits. I am sure that hon. members will look upon them, not as party measures but simply as amendments carrying out the suggestions which have been made. If they are considered on their merits we will accept the judgment of the committee with respect to them.

Mr. REID: The budget for the financial year is set out in the schedule and at the end is given the percentages which will be contributed by the different nations. Canada's contribution is to be 5·06 per cent; Australia's is to be 3·33 per cent; Russia's, 8 per cent; the United Kingdom, 15 per cent, and the United States of America, 25 per cent. How were those percentages arrived at? Why has a country such as Russia, which is as large as the United States, been asked to contribute only 8 per cent as against our five per cent?

Mr. GARDINER: The only answer I can give is that these matters were all discussed very fully by the representatives of all the nations who were present at the conference. In reply to something said a few moments ago by the hon. member for Broadview, I may say that the questions we discussed this afternoon were discussed in our own agriculture committee and in this house shortly after he Hot Springs gathering. I assume that the representatives of the forty-four nations who were at that conference came to the conclusion that these proportions were what should be asked from each of the nations gathered there at that time. Our representative, along with the others, agreed to the proportions. The United States bears the highest proportion of 25 per cent; the United Kingdom, 15 per cent; the U.S.S.R., 8 per cent; France, 5·69 per cent; China, 6·5 per cent, and then we come in with 5·06 per cent. The only answer I can give is that this was agreed to at the conference at Hot Springs and that we are committed to it by the suggestions that have been made.

Mr. REID: That does not answer my question. I think the committee is entitled to know just how these percentages were arrived at. There must have been some basis. Take China with 6·5 per cent. China has a large population but very little to give at the present time. The percentage for India is 4·25 per cent, while Canada's is 5·06 per cent, as against 8 per cent for Russia.

Mr. BRACKEN: Perhaps the hon. member for New Westminster would refer to section 129 of the first report of the interim commission where there is an explanation of the allocation of the costs. Perhaps that will supplement the minister's answer.

Mr. GREEN: The constitution of this international organization describes it as the food and agriculture organization of the united nations. In the preamble to bill No. 14 now before the committee we find the words:

> . . . to prepare a plan for a permanent international organization for food and agriculture. . . .

I point out that the reference there also is to food and agriculture; the same words are used throughout in both the constitution and the bill. However, in article XVI of the constitution we find:

> In this constitution the term "agriculture" and its derivatives include fisheries, marine products, forestry, and primary forestry products.

It would seem that by including forestry and forestry products the constitution goes far beyond what the public believe to be the purposes of this organization; that is, to deal with food and agriculture. It may be that careful consideration has been given to the extent of that definition, but this is of great importance to my province of British Columbia because forestry is our major industry. The provincial government deals primarily with that industry and the federal government has very little power over it. I should like to know whether this matter of including forestry and forestry products has been discussed with the provincial governments and why it is the constitution is so broad.

Mr. GARDINER: When the proposals came back from Hot Springs I raised the same question, and that was some two years ago. When the proposals came back this time I raised the same question. I am forced to the conclusion, by the explanations I got and by doing a little further thinking, that a very considerable part of the food of the world comes from what might be called forestry. If we think in terms of coconuts, bananas, oranges and all the different fruits that come from tree production; when we think of blights that attack trees and realize that they attack fruit trees as well as ordinary forest trees, that is apparent. It is the same staffs and individuals in all countries who deal with all matters that have to do with the destruction of insects that destroy trees and plants and everything of that kind.

I think that is the chief reason why forestry is brought in under this measure. Measures must be taken to protect food, and it was thought proper to extend the activities to forestry in its other meaning, as well as forestry as related to food. The question of fisheries is self-evident because it is food practically altogether.

Mr. GREEN: Have there been any discussions with the provincial governments concerning the fact that this constitution covers forestry and forestry products which to the layman means primarily lumber and logs and not fruit trees?

Mr. GARDINER: The discussions with the provincial governments have been related only to food, but I think I am correct in saying that the discussions which will take place at this conference will be much broader because of the questions which the hon. member for Vancouver South knows have been put so often in the house in relation to the different insects that attack forest life in British Columbia and elsewhere. But it will be more definitely related to their effects upon food.

Mr. GREEN: If the minister will refer to sections 56, 57, 58 and 59 of the first report of the interim commission he will see that whoever drew up this report had in mind going a good deal further than just dealing with pests, and I suggest to the ministry that careful consideration should be given to these suggestions as to what can be done by this international organization with regard to our forests. I think there is a great deal of doubt whether it is wise to go that far.

Mr. FERGUSON: The amount of expenditure in support of a very worthy cause is nothing compared with that what we expect the returns will be, but when the sponsor of this bill was asked an important question, why a country of twelve millions of people should be paying five per cent against Russia's eight per cent—Russia, a country of one hundred and seventy millions of people—he told us that this subject was discussed in committees and in this house, and it did not seem to strike him that this was not a fair apportionment. He could not give a satisfactory answer. I think that point should be looked into before the bill is passed.

Mr. GARDINER: Probably I ought to read the section referred to by the leader of the opposition since hon. members seem to desire full information. It reads as follows:

> The commission has found it difficult to devise a wholly satisfactory scale of apportionment of expenses.

They seem to have had the same thought in mind as the hon. member, that it was difficult to apportion the expenses. They went on to say:

> It has considered whether such a scale might be formulated, based on such factors as capacity to pay modified, e.g., by the desirability of maximum and minimum limits to contributions, the importance of agricultural production, national income, foreign trade, etc. If this could have been done and if world conditions were normal, such a scale might have been adopted by the conference for an indefinite period, or, at least, for the five-year period referred to above. The abnormal circumstances created by war and enemy occupation, however, and the impossibility of knowing when they will terminate, render it impossible to formulate a scale which is likely to be regarded as satisfactory except for a very short period. During the first or second year the conference probably will wish to consider, in the light of the conditions then prevailing, the equity of the scale which the commission now recommends. This scale, recommended for temporary use, is based upon a relationship among the member nations growing out of that accepted by them in respect of pre-war international organizations, but adjusted as follows:
> (a) the assumption of 54·5 per cent of the allocations by the United States, the United Kingdom, the Soviet Union, and China.

I explained to the house in my opening remarks this afternoon that these four nations should not be asked to pay more than 54·5 per cent. Then (b):

> (b) The scaling down of the allocations, as a measure of temporary financial relief, for those countries that are occupied by the enemy, or that have, in consequence of the war, suffered from major economic disasters.

I do not think that there is any country that has suffered from more major economic and other disasters than Russia, and that may account for the fact that they determined on eight per cent as her contribution. They go on:

> (c) the placing of certain countries on a uniform minimum allocation.
> The result of (b) and (c) has been substantially to increase the temporary allocations to the remaining countries. When world conditions improve, the proportions allocated to these countries will have to be correspondingly reduced.

Those are the reasons they give. I gave that in general terms myself a few moments ago.

Mr. FRASER: What kind of committee is Canada going to set up to collect these foodstuffs in this country to be sent to other countries? Under Mutual Aid there was a committee that looked after the purchases and designated the firms to sell the stuff or give it to the other countries. What is in mind here?

Mr. GARDINER: Under Mutual Aid what happened in regard to food products was this. We entered into agreements, practically all with Britain, to take our surplus foods and utilize them in any way they thought fit in the prosecution of the war in Europe. That in general terms related to our surplus foods. The means taken were not to bring together all these different products through any organization set up by us. We simply said to the people who were in the business, in connection with meat, for example, the packing plants, the drovers, and everybody else interested in bringing live stock together at certain places to have it processed: you just go ahead with the job as you did before, gather all this food in and have it processed and put in such a form that we can take it and have it delivered at certain ports. Then Britain sent her ships and took it away. That was the process followed in war. I do not expect that we shall require to follow any different procedure during the transition period covered by the next four or five years.

I should like to refer to a remark which was made a few moments ago to the effect that the government is for the first time planning. I think hon. members on both sides will agree when I say that we have never had a government in Canada that did not plan. It did not make any difference whether it was a Conservative or a Liberal government—and they have all been one or the other—we never had at any time a government that did not believe in planning. Every government has planned. This government has planned. We have done our planning all through this war, just as we did before the war. Some may differ as to the results we obtained from the planning, but all will agree that all governments have planned. For the period immediately following the war our plan has been that which was set out in what we call the floor price legislation passed by the last parliament. Under that legislation we say that so long as the people who are engaged in business can find markets for our products at reasonable prices, we are not going to interfere with them at all. That to all intents and purposes is what we say. We say that if the wheat board as now constituted, or some other organization if at some future time some government decides that wheat should be marketed in some other way and sets up an organization for the purpose, privately or through government, is able to find markets where the prices compare reasonably with the prices we have obtained, we shall not interfere. But if they are not able to do that; for example, if there are people starving in some parts of the world who are not able to pay for surplus food products that we are not able to dispose of, we say to them: We want that surplus disposed of in certain ways. They may say to us: We can handle that for you but we cannot handle it at a loss or we would go out of business. Then under the terms of that legislation we say to them: Well, you proceed to deliver the goods where they are required, and we will utilize the $200 million fund that has been made available under the legislation to take care of the difference between what you receive and what it was necessary to pay in order to maintain the price levels we think proper in this country. That is the method which I think would be followed in order to see to it that some of these countries, if conditions are such that they cannot pay, would be provided for. We would probably provide for some of their needs in some such way or through arranging credits with them under which they could buy our products under certain set prices.

Mr. FRASER: The minister said he would call in all producers. That is what was done under Mutual Aid. Under Mutual Aid you called in producers and you asked companies to submit prices although they had never even produced the goods. They had never produced the goods, had never even shipped to Britain, and I know that in the case of rolled oats you called in the different companies and some companies quoted prices although they had never shipped one ounce of rolled oats to Britain. They were asked to tender and they did tender and received contracts. Rolled oats were shipped to Britain, and instead of the government allowing one firm that had shipped to Britain practically all the rolled oats—packaged rolled oats—which Britain ever used, they allowed firms that had never sent over any to send inferior oats. To-day we in Canada have lost the British trade for these rolled oats. I will not mention the name, but one firm spent over $3 million in advertising before the war. They advertised their rolled oats in Britain, every sign board being plastered with their name, so that the people in Britain knew their product and knew there was nothing better in the world. But this government allowed other oats to go over and gave that firm a very small portion of the contract. That is what I am afraid of now under this arrangement, that we may lose other markets for other goods unless a great deal more consideration is given to the manufacturer and also the producer of food products here in Canada.

Mr. GARDINER: If I used the phrase "called in"—

Mr. FRASER: I think those are the words.

Mr. GARDINER: —I did not intend to use that phrase or to give that impression. What I thought I said was that we called upon those who were in the business to continue to purchase and supply products. I am quite sure the hon. member for Peterborough West will agree with me when I say that the government would be very much criticized if we started going around the country picking out different companies and asking them either to submit prices or to do certain things in relation to supplying food products. What we actually do is to submit the proposition to the people of the country generally. We say, we want everyone to assist in supplying food who can possibly assist. It may be true that a company may express its intention of trying to supply a product although probably it had never supplied it before, but I cannot think of many cases where that happened during war time. Take, for example, in connection with bacon products, which is the big item that has been handled in that way. We have a considerable number of packing plants in Canada but only a proportion of them, somewhat more than half of them, did supply bacon for Britain, and there was always a controversy as between two groups, as to whether those who were supplying only the home market and those who were supplying both the home market and the British market were getting equal treatment under the different regulations we had. Nevertheless they have gone on throughout the war, some of them without supplying bacon to Britain at all and others supplying the greater part of their product. As regards the company referred to, and I think I know which it is, their trouble was quite a different one. I do not remember their ever having made a complaint to me—and they discussed the situation with me many times—that they had difficulties with anyone in Canada who had supplied a product from here, but I understand that they had difficulties with some persons or some organizations who were supplying oatmeal on the other side, and they thought that market which had been built up by them in Britain was being utilized under war conditions by someone else who was supplying the product. My understanding was that that was a company not in Canada but elsewhere. I believe that difficulty was overcome in the latter part of the war. It developed only somewhere in the middle of it. A similar difficulty has arisen since the war was over, but that has nothing to do with any company in Canada, I understand, but with the desire of some organizations in Britain to have control of that market, if I understand the matter correctly. I would only say with regard to the direct question, that it would be very difficult for us to go around the country selecting concerns and saying, you are better at this than somebody else and therefore you do it. We must say to anyone who wishes to enter the trade that he can enter, but we must insist that he provide a commodity which is up to the standard.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. FRASER: That is the point I was trying to make, that the government should insist that we send over only the very best so that we can retain the markets we have already established, especially in bacon. The minister is just as much afraid as the farmers in Canada that Denmark will try to steal that trade from us again.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I listened with considerable interest to the speech of the Minister of Agriculture. There is one question he did not answer, and I should like to ask him a question before I propose to take advantage of the invitation he has given for suggestions regarding amendments. I asked him a question regarding the Argentine in view of the fact that that nation is one of the world's largest exporters of food products, and without that nation as a member of the nations comprised within this agreement, there might be obvious difficulties. The minister indicated that any nation could voluntarily assume membership in this organization, but that is not the position at all. Article II provides in subsection 2:

> Additional members may be admitted to the organization by a vote concurred in by a two-thirds majority of all the members of the conference and upon acceptance of this constitution as in force at the time of admission.

I wish to ask the minister now, first, has Argentina given any indication of its desire to join in this conference? Second, if so, what is to be the attitude of the Canadian government toward such application? After the minister has answered that, if I may, I intend to suggest an amendment to paragraph 2.

Mr. GARDINER: I tried to answer it in making my reply. I am not sure whether the hon. member for Lake Centre was in the house at the time.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes, I was here.

Mr. GARDINER: I take from his remarks, then, that he does not accept as a complete answer the suggestion that I presume the Argentine could have made application when the forty-four nations met. It is not within my memory as to whether it did or did not at that particular time.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Has it done so since?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not know that it has, since. I would assume that if the Argentine had expressed the desire to be there at that time, or had been there, it would have been considered along with others. My statement a few minutes ago was that a nation would have voluntarily to indicate its desire to come in before anyone would expect them to come; there would be and could be no compulsion used. But I can understand why they might wish to have acceptance of a nation depend upon a two-thirds vote. I assume they anticipate that, as time goes on, some of the nations which we have been recently fighting will make application, and that others associated with them will make application. They may want to consider all the circumstances concerning those cases at that time, as to whether they shall admit them or not, and they may believe that they should have a two-thirds majority in order to bring that about. But I am sorry I cannot give any definite answer as to whether the Argentine did ask to be admitted, or as to whether it has asked since.

Mr. QUELCH: Under the agreement, every nation participating undertakes to maintain a high standard of living internally. That is one point of which I am very strongly in favour. How do we interpret that in Canada? Under the government's policy we are to try to maintain a high degree of employment, but I think we also realize that there are bound to be in this country a number of people unemployed, people who will not be covered by unemployment insurance. Just how does the minister interpret "high standard of living" in regard to such people? Are special measures to be adopted to ensure that every individual in Canada is able to obtain sufficient food to give him a decent standard of living? Is it the intention, for instance, to adopt such a procedure as the United States adopted under the food stamp plan? Is some measure of that kind contemplated?

Mr. GARDINER: I did not refer to some remarks which were made this afternoon with regard to the United States plan, and the other evening when we were discussing another matter I did not do so, because I hesitate at this moment to discuss United States plans as compared with our own. But I should like to point out, in view of the fact that the question is definitely raised, that under the United States plan as now operating, the parity price plan we discussed the other evening, upon part of which the resolution was based, ninety per cent of parity is provided for only on condition that certain provisions made for the limiting of production are agreed to and carried into effect by the persons who are involved, which means that there is a definite plan made for limiting production, in spite of what was said this afternoon to the effect that that idea has been dropped.

In Australia, on the other hand—and again I am speaking from memory and I would not want to give the exact figures—the price provided for wheat, for example, is something over seventy cents a bushel at the delivery point on the first 3,000 bushels, but if more than 3,000 bushels are delivered it is just something over fifty cents, I think fifty-three or fifty-four cents.

In other words, in quite a number of nations definite provisions are made that the prices established are established only on limited amounts, and there is no provision for the inducement of unlimited production. I think this country is one of the few exceptions to that. I think, in spite of what has been said, it is the only real exception among the nations which produce surpluses. We have never placed a restriction upon the amount of our product which can be sold. We have on occasion attempted to persuade our people by giving them acreage payments to shift from the production of one food product to another; but we have always said, in any regulations we have made with regard to the delivery of quotas—five bushels per acre for this month and ten for the next, and so on—those are there because of either a shortage of storage space or a lack of markets for the time being for the product. But we have never placed any limitation upon the price which is to be obtained for the product, provided that more of it is produced in a particular year than we have suggested it might be wise to produce. So, the other day, after it had been definitely said in this house last session that farmers would be permitted to deliver only fourteen bushels to the acre, when it was discovered that a market could be found or storage could be found somewhere in Canada for all the wheat they could deliver, that restriction was removed, and farmers who grow thirty or forty bushels to the acre can deliver it all this year.

That is the policy we have been following. It is the policy, I submit, which we said last session—and I hope we shall be able to carry it out—we intended to continue. For example, I do not feel that we would be dealing justly with people, whether farmers or others, if we had said to them, during the three or four year period we have just come through, yes, you have had big crops; you have had fine crops or you have had a big production, and we limited the amount that you could obtain for each unit of your production; but now that the war is over, if you have big production we are only going to take a fraction of it at a price similar to the price you got before. The interpretation we placed upon our obligations in the last session was to the effect that the production during that period, as well as the price, must be still taken into consideration in the period after the war in establishing a reasonable return.

Our method of dealing with this situation has been this. Take butter as an illustration. The ceiling price of butter is thirty-five cents. Farmers in Canada cannot produce butter at thirty-five cents. We have been paying the farmer a subsidy on butter of from eight to ten cents a pound butterfat. It is all very well to say that this is a subsidy to the farmer, but the real consideration that was given was that consumers, under the present wage scales, and with the returns which they were obtaining during the last three years of the war, could not afford to pay more than thirty-five cents a pound for their butter. Therefore, we said, the price is to be thirty-five cents. I am speaking now on the basis of wholesale price at Montreal. Then we took the money out of the treasury to make possible the sale of the product at thirty-five cents. As a result of that, we in Canada are eating forty million pounds more butter a year than we were eating before the war; and we have had to ration butter, not because we are short of butter as compared with the period before the war, but in order to say to the fellow who used to put butter on his potatoes and everything else he was eating and thought he could afford to do so, you will have to forgo some of these luxuries in order to let every child in this country get a proportion of the butter. That is the principle on which we have been proceeding. I submit it is the principle on which we should proceed during this period in order to see to it that our own people are properly fed with the products we produce in this country.

Mr. QUELCH: I appreciate the minister's reply, but he did not answer the question I asked. Under this agreement we pledge ourselves to give the people of Canada a high standard of living. I am quite in accord with the minister that we can provide a high standard of living, that we can produce enough food for that, but this is what I am interested in. Do we merely mean a high standard on an average, or are we going to guarantee that every person in Canada has a high standard of living, at least in so far as food is concerned? If that is the intention, then what does the government plan to do in regard to people in this country who may be unemployed, who do not come under unemployment insurance, who have no purchasing power and therefore are not in a position to buy the food that is in abundance in this country? I asked the minister whether it was the intention, for instance, to adopt the United States food stamp plan they had before the war. What I want to know is whether this guarantee means we are going to maintain a high standard of living merely based upon the average, or whether that high standard of living is to be given to every individual in this country.

Mr. GARDINER: The only reason I did not definitely answer the question with regard to the stamp programme is that I do not want to condemn anything the Americans are doing.

Mr. QUELCH: Or any other plan.

Mr. GARDINER: I believe the plan I have just outlined will better meet our conditions than any stamp plan they have had in the United States; but the stamp plan may meet their conditions better than anything we have had here. I am not discussing United States conditions; I am discussing Canadian conditions. I think under Canadian conditions we have fed our people—and when I say "we" I mean all the people of Canada—just as well as those of any nation on the allied side during this war period, and I believe we shall be able to continue to do so in future.

Mr. COLDWELL: I imagine the hon. member for Acadia was not thinking particularly of the war period but rather of the near and actual starvation which existed in this country before the war and which may exist again after the war, and what the commitments were in that regard.

I presume, Mr. Chairman, that we shall be going through this schedule clause by clause when we come to the preamble, where it is mentioned, because I think we should understand what we are doing. We are making some definite commitments both in regard to our own country and in regard to other nations, and I think we should realize that these must be more than words. Under the united nations charter adopted at San Francisco not only nutrition but full employment is pledged by every nation signing that charter.

What I really rose to ask was this, following the question raised by the hon. member for Lake Centre. Under article XIII of the agreement this is provided:

> The organization shall, in accordance with the procedure provided for in the following paragraph, constitute a part of any general international organization to which may be entrusted the coordination of the actiivties of international organizations with specialized responsibiilties.
> 2. Arrangements for defining the relations between the organization and any such general organization shall be subject to the approval of the conference. Notwithstanding the provision of article XX . . .

Then it goes on to deal with the matter of amendment. What I was wondering was this. I take it that the general international organization is the united nations international organization which was established at San Francisco. Under that charter we have set up the social and economic council, and that social and economic council provides that certain specialized bodies shall be set up, of which it is anticipated this will be one. At San Francisco, Argentina was admitted as a signatory to the charter. I must say I did not approve that, and I am sorry Canada cast her vote in favour of it, but I am not going into that matter now. However, Argentina was admitted by the conference as a member nation. She accepts the charter drawn up. The charter includes a provision for the establishment of a social and economic council, of which there are to be specialized agencies. If one of the specialized agencies is this food and agriculture council, would it not follow that Argentina would be brought into this organization through membership in the social and economic council and in the united nations organization itself? That is what I was going to ask. Can the minister tell us whether that is so, whether that would follow?

Mr. GARDINER: When I was answering the other question it occurred to me that this might be involved in the decision made at San Francisco, but I would not like to undertake to answer that question. The Minister of Justice was at San Francisco; I do not know whether he would care to answer it. I would not like to undertake to say that Argentina would come in automatically because of anything done at San Francisco. From reading these articles I would judge that she would have to obtain admission through a two-thirds vote of those already in.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is the way it appears; yet if there is a specialized agency within the social and economic council, which is one of the chapters of the charter, and the nations agreed to the whole charter, can a nation exclude itself from one of the specialized agencies? That is the point I had in mind.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not feel competent to answer that.

Mr. COLDWELL: I cannot answer the question myself, and I do not know whether the Minister of Justice would care to do so.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I would not attempt to answer the question, but it would appear to me that this organization is being set up now in accordance with the terms of this constitution; and the united nations charter has not yet come into operation. When it does come into operation it will be dealing with the food and agriculture organization as an entity existing under its own constitution, and then some modifications may have to be made in order to adopt the food and agriculture organization as the specialized agency provided for under the united nations charter. I think, though, that for the time being this organization will come into existence if twenty nations file their acceptance; and from the time twenty nations will have filed their acceptance it will be an autonomous body. Then, because its members also will be members of the united nations, if it becomes the specialized agency there may have to be some modification in the constitution.

Mr. COLDWELL: As a matter of fact, that is provided for in the constitution itself.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes; but when it does in fact become integrated in the special agencies under the united nations, some modification may have to be made as a result of the terms of the charter adopted at San Francisco.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: We are now dealing with section 2, which is the operative section; and the gravamen of my remarks this afternoon was directed to the power there given to the governor in council to—

> . . . make such appointments, establish such offices, make such orders in council and do such things as appear to him to be necessary for carrying out the provisions of the constitution set out in the schedule to this act or any recommendations of the conference of the food and agriculture organization of the united nations, or of its committees, made pursuant to such provisions.

I am not going to repeat the arguments advanced this afternoon. In this section as it now stands there is in effect an abdication by parliament of the right to deal with any decisions or recommendations made by the conference and the food and agriculture organization when it is set up. The point I was making this afternoon was that matters concerned with the future of agriculture and agricultural and economic relationships for a period of five years should be submitted to parliament. I therefore submit a suggested amendment to section 2. Subsection 2 I think expresses the general feeling of the committee. Subsection 1 is the operative section, and, indeed, is the only section in the whole bill that affords any opportunity to approve the constitution, although there is no reference therein to that fact. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Eglinton:

That section two, subsection (1) be stricken out and the following substituted therefor:

"2. (1) The constitution of the food and agriculture organization of the united nations as set out in the schedule to this act is hereby approved."

That subsection simply amounts to this, that it affords a direct operative approval by parliament of the constitution of the food and agriculture organization.

When speaking a while ago, the minister said that he desired, and what the government desired was that this house should unanimously approve the constitution. By using direct words to that effect I submit we attain that desire.

Then, so far as subsection 2 of section 2 is concerned, I move that the following be substituted therefor:

The governor in council may do such things as are necessary to carry out the provisions of the said constitution, subject to the approval of parliament within six months thereafter.

In other words, when recommendations are made by the nations comprising the conference of the food and agriculture organization, or by any of its committees, such matters shall be subject to the approval of parliament within six months.

Mr. COLDWELL: Does that mean that the recommendations could not be acted upon for six months?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No.

The CHAIRMAN: May I point out that the hon. member cannot put two amendments to the committee at the same time.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is correct. I was simply giving the whole picture. I realize full well the truth of what the Chairman has said. However, I wished to give the whole picture at once so that the purpose of my amendments would be before the committee. The first amendment is the one I now move.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I understood that it was one amendment.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is an amendment to strike out subsection 1 of section two, and to substitute the two provisions the hon. member read.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not think there can be any objection to the first part of that provision. While in my view it may not be absolutely necessary, once again this should appear to the Canadian people and to the people of the world at large as the action of the Canadian people through its representatives in parliament. As such it should be in such form as to deserve the hearty support of all members of parliament. There may appear to a good many to be some merit in a categorical declaration that the terms of the charter are approved by parliament. The first portion of the amendment would imply that.

Then, as to the second portion, I know the hon. member wishes to have something operative, and wishes Canada to become a member of the organization and to be recognized by the other members of the organization as having done so.

I would fear that the qualifying words: "subject to the approval of parliament within six months thereafter," would make it appear that Canada was accepting in an irrevocable way, because in order to adhere to the charter, instruments of acceptance have to be filed by the government. If that filing of the instrument of acceptance by the government was subject to approval within six months it might be regarded that in the meantime it was not an irrevocable acceptance.

I do not think the hon. member would wish any doubt to become possible as to the validity of the action taken by the government of Canada to make Canada a party of the organization. Moreover the terms used by the hon. member would, I suggest, be too restrictive. Under the charter, all that is necessary at a conference would be one member. Only one representative of a member can vote at the conference, and all that would be necessary to carry out the terms of the constitution would be to have one person there representing Canada.

It is intended, and I think this would be in accordance with the desire of all hon. members, that the delegate be accompanied by proper advisers. That is not necessary under the terms of the constitution, but I think the powers of the governor in council should be such as to do things mentioned in the preamble, such things as are expedient or proper to carry out the purposes of the constitution.

I would fear that with the language suggested by the hon. member it would have to be determined that the thing which was covered by an order in council was necessary, before it could be recognized as valid. I do not think the hon. member would wish to go that far. I suggest it is preferable that recommendations from the conference or from the committees require to be approved by parliament before being acted upon. That would be so under the bill as drafted, in respect of everything requiring the expenditure of money. Before any money could be used to implement a recommendation, it would have to be appropriated by parliament.

But one can conceive that there might be recommendations which would not imply the expenditure of public money. If it were felt that such recommendations should be implemented by this country, they might have to be implemented by provincial legislatures, or they might be such as could be implemented by the dominion parliament. I think in any event they should be subject to the action of the proper legislative body, before being acted upon.

I do not think there would intervene any such delay as would be prejudicial to the effective operation of the organization; for after all, according to its constitution this is not an organization to collect and distribute food. It is an organization to gather statistical information and to make recommendations for the more efficient production and distribution of food. But it is not the instrument that would do the work. When such recommendations are made, if they imply imposing obligations upon Canadian citizens, then it is my personal view that it would be quite proper that they should have to go before the body competent to legislate, whether it be a provincial legislature or this parliament. Certainly we can anticipate that there would be recommendations requiring the action of provincial legislatures.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is just what the bill as now constituted does not protect.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Does not in terms protect. But this parliament cannot give to the governor in council the right to do things that parliament itself would not have jurisdiction to do. Whatever delegation is made can only be of powers that are within the control of the one who makes the delegation. On that point I do not think there should be any quarrel between one group and another in this committee. I think we are all concerned with having this food and agriculture organization work to the best possible advantage for mankind generally and it probably would be sufficient to avoid any inconvenience that might result from delay to have the governor in council empowered to do the things proper or expedient to carry out the terms of the constitution. That may involve doing more than the language submitted by the hon. member would cover.

He uses the words "such things as are necessary," but once again all that is necessary for the conference would be the attendance of one member for Canada. That certainly would not be taking Canada's proper place in the conference. The delegate authorized to vote for Canada at any international conference should have with him quite a large group of technical advisers. What we are contemplating is a delegation that might amount to as many as thirty advisers to the official delegate. I think the language used in the statute should be broad enough to allow the things that are appropriate and expedient to carry out the terms and purposes of the constitution to be done.

I submit to the hon. member that if the language used in the bill were retained and cut off after the words "schedule to this act" in line 24, which would delete the words "or any recommendations of the conference of the food and agriculture organization of the united nations, or of its committees, made pursuant to such provision," taking the first part of his amendment as subsection 1 and having the language down to the words "schedule of the act" as subsection 2, and then numbering the present subsection 2 as subsection 3, we would have something that would correspond with what appears to be the unanimous desire of this committee; that is, that the governor in council do not go beyond performing the things which are proper and expedient to give effect to the constitution and that if there are any recommendations which have to be implemented, requiring the authority of law, whether it be provincial or federal, they go to the legislative body which by the constitution has the right to make law in that regard.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I think the minister has agreed with the contention I raised, that as this section stood it conveyed too great power to the governor in council. He suggests that that portion of section 2, subsection 1, which would empower the governor in council by order in council to carry out "any recommendations of the conference of the food and agriculture organization of the united nations, or of its committees, made pursuant to such provisions," be deleted. I think the section with the deletion of the portion referred to by the minister would be satisfactory. As it was originally drafted, it conveyed powers far and beyond any ever conveyed to a governor in council at any time. In view of the statement the minister has made I am agreeable to the amendment he suggests, provided that a later section—I take it this will be done, according to the Minister of Agriculture—it is provided that any orders in council made pursuant to section 2, subsection 1, if amended in the manner suggested by the Minister of Justice, will be tabled and made available to parliament.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If I understand the hon. member correctly, he still wishes the first part of his amendment retained.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I understood the minister accepted it.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There can be no objection to that. It is a positive declaration by the house, and there may be many who would find merit in having that expressly declared in the bill. That would be subsection 1 of section 2. What is here, down to the words "schedule to this act" would be subsection 2 of section 2 and the present subsection 2 would become subsection 3 of section 2.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is right.

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment moved by the hon. member for Lake Centre is before the committee, but he has intimated that he will accept the amendment suggested by the Minister of Justice. Is the hon. member for Lake Centre withdrawing his amendment?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes. We are getting together and accommodating ourselves to the suggestions.

Mr. GARDINER: One of you move it and the other second it.

The CHAIRMAN: It is moved by the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), seconded by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker):

That section 2 (1) be stricken out and the following substituted therefor:

"2. (1) The constitution of the food and agriculture organization of the united nations as set out in the schedule to this act is hereby approved.

2. (2) The governor in council may make such appointments, establish such offices, make such orders in council and do such things as appear to him to be necessary for carrying out the provisions of the constitution set out in the schedule of this act." And that subsection 2 be renumbered as subsection 3.

Mr. BRACKEN: Now that the lawyers have agreed as to how this section should appear, I, as a layman, would like to ask a question because it does not seem to cover one of the criticisms I have. Let me read section 2, subsection 2, as now proposed by the Minister of Justice and the hon. member for Lake Centre. It reads:

The governor in council may make such appointments, establish such offices, make such orders in council and do such things as appear to him to be necessary—

But it does not stop there. It says:

—as appears to him to be necessary for carrying out the provisions of the constitution.

One of the provisions of the constitution is that this food and agriculture organization may determine its own budget and may determine the portion of that budget that Canada will pay, and we have only one man on that organization. One of the reasons why I criticized this set-up was that by this bill we are approving the constitution. The constitution allows that organization to determine its own budget and to determine the portion Canada will pay. Then we are asked to give power to the governor in council to do all such things as appear to him to be necessary for carrying out the provisions of the constitution.

I ask this question of the Minister of Justice: Are we not committing ourselves now to further expenses than the 5·06 per cent of the present suggested budget in case the organization should ask for more? Does the minister get my point?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The leader of the opposition has not overlooked the next subsection, which reads:

All expenditures incurred in carrying out the provisions of subsection 1—

That will now be subsection 2:

—of this section shall be defrayed out of moneys provided by parliament.

There is a requirement, in order to have the money available to the extent contemplated by the constitution, that it be appropriated by parliament, and if the hon. gentleman will look at article XVIII, which is the article under which the members undertake to contribute, he will see that it provides:

Each member nation undertakes, subject to the requirements of its constitutional procedure, to contribute to the organization promptly its share of the expenses so determined.

Mr. BRACKEN: That is the very point, as determined by these people, and they may raise the proportion we are now required to pay. Under this arrangement we are subscribing to that, and it is only after that, that we are requested to provide additional money.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The constitution is before us. It requires us to accept it as it is and provides that the government undertakes, subject to the requirements of its constitutional procedure, to pay its share of the expenses, and in the authorization that is being given to file an instrument of acceptance there is this subsection 3 which provides that no expenditure by Canada can be made unless parliament appropriates the money. We place ourselves in a position where by filing the instrument of acceptance, whatever we may do here, we engage the honour of the Canadian nation to comply with the provisions of the constitution. It does not matter what we put into our statute. By filing the instrument of acceptance, that is what we undertake. We undertake it, or the government of Canada undertakes it, subject to the requirements of its constitutional procedure, and one of the requirements of its constitutional procedure is that the government cannot dispose of money that has not been voted by parliament.

Mr. COLDWELL: But we have assumed a debt of honour, and I think any parliament will agree to pay.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I would hope so.

Mr. COLDWELL: The only recourse that we have, it seems to me, is under article XIX, which provides that if we are dissatisfied with the amount required from Canada, then four years from now, having had the experience, we may give notice of withdrawal from the organization at the end of the five years.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There is this moral recourse as well. There is the implied declaration that the present budget is to be $2,500,000, and that it may go to $5,000,000, and if it were carried beyond that by action of which we disapproved we would have valid grounds for wishing to withdraw. But whatever we put into the legislation being considered by the committee at the present time, if it amounts to authority to the government of Canada to file an instrument of acceptance, we have to take the constitution as written and we assume on behalf of Canada a debt of honour to have parliament appropriate enough money to carry out the obligations implied.

Mr. COLDWELL: In other words, this has been agreed to by the nations and we cannot amend the constitution. We must either accept or reject it. That is the position.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes, and if we file an instrument of acceptance we accept it and undertake to have parliament appropriate the money required to implement that obligation.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I agree with what has been said as to complying with the constitution, but we may have gone too far with the amendment. By what clause in this bill have we power to implement recommendations that may come from the committees?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The governor in council would not have the power to implement the recommendations, and I do not think it is the feeling of the committee that the governor in council should have that power. I think it is the feeling of the committees that when the recommendations come they should be like the recommendation, for example, of the international labour organization. They should require legislative action by the proper legislative body and that is what the amendment provides. I do not think the amendment cuts that down at all. It merely says that it will take the recommendations; then the legislative body competent to deal with them will consider them and, if they are thought to be proper, will enact the required legislation.

Mr. BRACKEN: I do not wish to labour this point any farther. Nobody has raised any question about approving the constitution. There has been no question of that. The only question is what the constitution does or what it means and what this organization may do under it. I think the Minister of Justice will agree that that body can determine the size of its own budget, can determine the percentage we pay, and may raise it, and the governor in council has power to do all such things as are necessary to carry that out. But if the Minister of Justice is satisfied I accept his word. But we are voting blindly to that extent. We may have to do it. But the point I wish to make is that we do not want the government to commit us further than the figures given, $2,500,000 the first year and $5,000,000 later on, with Canada's contribution being at the rate of 5·06 per cent, because if we were committed further, this committee will have been misled.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If there was an appropriation bill being suggested there would no doubt be limitations inserted, as was done in the United States, where by joint resolution of the two houses of congress an express limitation was put on their contribution. They said that their obligations could not go beyond one million and a quarter.

Mr. BRACKEN: There is no limitation like that here.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Our appropriation is not being made by this legislation. This legislation requires that there be further action by parliament to appropriate the money to be expended.

Mr. BRACKEN: Can the minister state what the appropriation will be for the coming year?

Mr. GARDINER: I think the United States provision itself limits it. It is definitely stated that their proportion is twenty-five per cent, and that twenty-five per cent cannot exceed a certain figure. That in itself limits the amount which can be spent by the whole organization.

Mr. BRACKEN: We should not be tied by something they do.

Mr. GARDINER: We are tied by it under these provisions.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The leader of the opposition said there was no question whether we would accept the constitution. I am giving notice now that there is a question whether we ought to accept the constitution. We have to find out now whether the advantages we can derive from accepting the constitution are such as to recompense us for the dangers which we are likely to run into by accepting the constitution. I do not believe that the Minister of Agriculture or anyone else in this house to-day has shown us specifically any advantage which we can derive, either directly or indirectly, from accepting the constitution. If he can, I shall certainly be a ready listener. The problem which confronts us is, first of all, how to produce the goods, and second, how to distribute them. We have not been shown how we can produce goods any better or distribute them any better by accepting the constitution.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

TAKING OVER OF BURNS PACKING PLANTS AND APPOINTMENT OF CONTROLLER

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I wish to lay on the table copies of order in council P.C. 6481, passed on October 11, 1945, which provides that effective from twelve o'clock noon to-day, October 12, the dominion government has taken over control of the packing plants of Burns and Company at Winnipeg, Prince Albert, Regina, Edmonton and Vancouver.

Under the order the government has appointed Mr. J. G. Taggart, chairman of the meat board, as controller of these plants. The government made this decision because it was apparent that strike action was contemplated by the employees of these plants for Monday, October 15, and in view of the grave consequences which would result from any interruption of meat shipments to Britain and other European countries.

The reasons were explained to the management and to Mr. Fred Dowling of the united packinghouse workers of America, C.I.O., and to Mr. A. R. Mosher, president of the Canadian congress of labour.

The order in council requires that the company and the union shall proceed with negotiations towards a mutually satisfactory settlement of their dispute without delay, in accordance with regulations.

In all probability deputy controllers will be appointed for each branch plant. Provision for this is made in the order.

Even if Canada succeeds in keeping up the present rate of meat exports, there is a danger of many persons dying from starvation in Europe this winter. Break-down in negotiations between employers and employees in respect to working conditions in packing plants, to the point where it means a stoppage of work, creates a national emergency which under the circumstances I think would be considered by most Canadians as little short of criminal.

I am convinced that both parties to the dispute will accept the intervention of the government and that the plants will continue to operate.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Arising out of the minister's statement, may I ask a supplementary question? Were the provinces consulted in connection with the proposal he has made in the order in council? I ask the question because the minister says the provinces are involved in these matters. If the provinces were consulted, what were their replies?

Mr. MITCHELL: Communications were addressed to the provinces, but at the moment I have no knowledge of their replies.

Mr. COLDWELL: Has this been done without receiving their replies?

Mr. MITCHELL: I would not like to speak from memory. Frankly I would say that in view of the gravity of the situation and in the national interest I took the responsibility of making this recommendation to the government.

Mr. HOMUTH: Then might I interpret the minister's statement to mean that he has not received the acquiescence of the various provinces in the move he has made?

Mr. MITCHELL: I will say this to my hon. friend, that this action was taken under the War Measures Act, in the national interest. You cannot afford to fiddle while Rome is about to burn; that is the sensible way of looking at it.

ALBERTA AND BRITISH COLUMBIA COAL MINES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, during the debate on the motion to go into supply on Tuesday evening of this week, I stated, as will be noted on page 866 of Hansard, that I had been informed the 9,000 coal miners on strike in western Canada would return to work the next morning. That was the information which came to my office from Calgary.

The latest reports we have in connection with this matter are that following the decision of the district executive board at its meeting on Tuesday to recommend to the local unions a return to work, the members of the board returned to their own districts to place before the locals this recommendation. Meetings were held yesterday and to-day in various points, but no votes on the recommendation have yet been taken and it is not anticipated that these votes will be taken before Saturday or Sunday.

Although it cannot be forecast with any certainty, I am informed there is every indication that work will be resumed next Monday.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO APPEALS FROM SUMMARY CONVICTIONS

Mr. WILLIAM BRYCE (Selkirk) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 18, to amend the criminal code.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. BRYCE: The proposed amendment deals with appeals from summary convictions under part XV of the criminal code. The present condition of the law works great hardship and injustice in the case of convicted persons who reside and are tried in remote and outlying localities, such as some in my own and other northern constituencies. Because of communication and transportation difficulties it is physically impossible to serve and file the notice of appeal within the statutory period of thirty days. The purpose of the amendment is to give the judge of the court appealed to a wider discretion in extending the time for serving and filing notice of appeal to three months, and in fixing the particular sitting of the court at which the appeal is to be heard, as the extended time may overrun the next sitting. The amendment will thus allow residents of remote areas who feel aggrieved by a conviction to have recourse to an appeal, which recourse now seems to be barred to them because of the transportation and communication difficulties I have mentioned. The proposed amendments are indicated by the added words underlined in the text.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

AERONAUTICS ACT

COMMERCIAL AIR OPERATIONS, HEARING OF APPLICATIONS, ETC.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 19, to amend the Aeronautics Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. HOWE: I am informed that this bill amends the Aeronautics Act in minor particulars. In the act, which I believe was passed at the last session, there are one or two obvious errors which will be corrected by this amendment. I am sorry I have not a memorandum on the subject, but I think hon. members will find it is not a very important matter.

Mr. HOMUTH: There is no change in the act?

Mr. HOWE: No material change.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

INCREASE OF CAPITAL—CREATION OF CORPORATION TO OPERATE SERVICES UNDER CONTRACT

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend The Trans-Canada Air Lines Act 1937, to increase the capital from five to twenty-five million dollars and to authorize the Canadian National Railways to issue securities to twenty-five million dollars for acquiring the stock of the corporation; to provide authority in the governor in council to create corporations to operate and maintain air services under contract with Trans-Canada Air Lines such corporations to be controlled by Trans-Canada Air Lines; also to make provision for the payment of subsidies to such corporations payable out of moneys to be appropriated by parliament, and with provision for the termination of the present contract for the transport of mails and for a new contract for mail transport.

He said: His Excellency the Administrator having been informed of the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EXCHANGE OF DIPLOMATIC REPRESENTATION BETWEEN INDIA AND CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Has the Canadian government been officially or unofficially approached by the government of India with a view to an exchange of high commissioners between the two countries? If so, when was such approach first made, and why has Canada so far not completed her part of the suggested diplomatic exchange? Is it anticipated that a move in this direction will be made by this government at an early date? I ask this question because on April 6 of this year I made a similar inquiry of the Prime Minister, based upon certain news dispatches, and at that time the Prime Minister replied that he intended very soon to have an exchange of diplomatic representation between India and Canada. Now that six months have elapsed I think we should have some indication as to the present position in the matter.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): I am not sure the summary the hon. gentleman gave of the reply on April 6 is quite complete. The note I have here is that the answer was:

> May I say in reply to my hon. friend that the matter of exchange of high commissioners between Canada and India has been under consideration for some little time. It is wholly correct to say that Canada intends to send a high commissioner to India and that India intends to send a high commisisoner to Canada. The exchange of high commissioners will be reciprocal. The government up to the moment have not been able to decide on the particular person to be appointed as high commissioner from Canada but I hope that an appointment may soon be made.

This was the answer given at that time. There has been some further informal discussion of the matter since then, and I am informed that probably it will not be long now before an announcement can be made.

SHIPPING ACCOMMODATION

INQUIRY AS TO TRANSPORTATION TO CANADA OF WIVES OF SERVICE PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. S. HARKNESS (Calgary East): In view of the protest meeting held in London, England, by wives of Canadian servicemen in regard to their transportation to Canada, and meetings of ex-servicemen in Canada to protest the delay in bringing their wives to this country, is the government in a position to make a statement as to when these women and their children may expect to obtain transportation to Canada?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence): There is a similar question on the order paper already. Replying to my hon. friend may I say that every effort is being made to obtain additional shipping to bring wives and dependents back to Canada, but priority is being given to returning servicemen, for obvious reasons. Up to V-E day approximately 5,000 wives and 3,500 children had been repatriated to Canada. Since V-E day, as at the end of August an additional 7,000 wives and 4,600 children have been repatriated, making a total of some 20,000 odd. But there are a great many servicemen overseas who have been away from their wives for a number of years.

Mr. GREEN: Arising out of the last question, has the Minister of National Defence seen the reports in to-day's press to the effect that the Queen Elizabeth and the Aquitania are being taken out of the troop movement service? If so it might be possible to have representations made to the end that these ships continue to do this work.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have seen the reports to which the hon. member has referred. They are newspaper reports. We are in close touch with the shipping situation. Every effort is being made to obtain every available ship to bring our people back. I think that up to the present we have done very well—better, I may say, than we had anticipated we would be able to do last July. I must be cautious in making any predictions, but I have every reason to believe that the results in the future will not be out of proportion to what we have been able to do in the past.

Mr. ADAMSON: Does the British ministry of shipping control shipping on the North Atlantic?

Mr. ABBOTT: My understanding is that all the shipping is subject to the control of the united nations shipping pool, and that from that pool we get our proportion. I am told that up to the present we have had our fair proportion of the available shipping. As the house knows, there are a very large number of troops, dependents, prisoners of war and others who have to be repatriated from the far east. These are composed of British, Americans and others. I am informed we are getting, and I am sure we will continue to get, our fair share of all available shipping.

UNITED NATIONS

FOOD AND AGRICULTURE ORGANIZATION

The house resumed from Thursday, October 11, consideration in committee of bill No. 14, for carrying into effect the agreement for a food and agriculture organization of the united nations between Canada and certain other nations and authorities—Mr. Gardiner—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 2—Powers of governor in council to carry out agreement.

Mr. CASE: Mr. Chairman, my understanding is that the amendment now before the committee seeks to commit us to the articles of agreement. As I read it, we approve those articles of agreement. However, before I could vote I would want to have an explanation from the Minister of Agriculture with respect to article XIV, which deals with supervision of other organizations. It says:

> The conference may approve arrangements placing other public international organizations dealing with questions relating to food and agriculture under the general authority of the organization on such terms as may be agreed with the competent authorities of the organization concerned.

Would this in any way interfere with empire trade agreements or with the British preference? I am convinced that in Canada we have made remarkable progress as a result of the British preference and empire trade agreements, and I should like to feel that we are secure in that regard.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Before answering the question asked might I be permitted to read to the committee the suggested amendments, some of which were agreed to last night, and others of which were drafted following a meeting last night with some who had raised the objections to the form of the bill as it then stood.

I am sorry that the bill as now printed is not in the hands of every hon. member, although I had understood it would be here at three o'clock. However, it is not here because in the rush between the time we adjourned last night and this morning some things were put into the bill which were not intended to be there. That is, some of the motions, rather than sections of the bill, were reprinted, with the result that we had to have it printed over again. The reprinted copies will be available in a short time.

I would refer to section 2 of the bill, which was under discussion last night. The new subsection 1 is as follows:

> (1) The constitution of the food and agriculture organization is hereby approved.

I think that is the amendment to which reference has just been made.

Then, subsection 2 is amended to read:

> (2) The governor in council may make such appointments, establish such offices, make such orders in council and do such things as appear to him to be necessary for carrying out the provisions of the constitution set out in the schedule to this act.

That is word for word with the first part of subsection 1 as it appears in the bill as first printed. In the new subsection, however, the remainder of the section is left out. The effect is that the new section takes in all those words down to the word "act" in line 24 of the old bill. Then the remainder of the subsection is struck out as was agreed last night.

Subsection 2 in the bill as we had it yesterday will remain the same as it appears in the copy now before us, with the exception that the word "one" in the second line of the subsection becomes the word "two." The subsection would now read:

> All expenditures incurred in carrying out the provisions of subsection two of this section shall be defrayed out of moneys provided by parliament.

I have not yet had an opportunity to ask the Minister of Justice, and also to confer with those who have made this suggestion, as to whether I should not include the words "one" and "two." It would then read:

> All expenditures incurred in carrying out the provisions of subsections one and two of this section shall be defrayed out of moneys provided by parliament.

In my view both words should be included. I may be wrong, and I am asking for information on the point.

I shall discuss other points when we reach later sections.

Replying to the question asked by the hon. member for Grey North, may I point out that article XIV reads:

> The conference may approve arrangements placing other public international organizations dealing with questions relating to food and agriculture under the general authority of the organization on such terms as may be agreed with the competent authorities of the organization concerned.

I am just giving my own opinion on the matter, but I would think that any decision that is made would have no influence whatsoever upon or relate to any decision that might be made in connection with such matters as preferences. This is simply an arrangement whereby this organization can work in cooperation with other organizations, all of which come under the general council, as I understand it, as set up at San Francisco.

Mr. CASE: The minister says "as I understand it," but is there any absolute authority for his view? We are going to pass something which will delegate to them the power to do as they see fit, but subject to certain limitations.

Mr. GARDINER: I read it very carefully and I did not see anything in the article which would give any such authority over this organization.

Mr. FLEMING: In view of the fact that the amendments agreed to last night propose the addition of a further subsection, I suggest that the minister read the subsection so that the committee may have the complete proposed section before it.

Mr. GARDINER: Subsection 2 of the old section becomes subsection 3, and then there will be a subsection 4, which reads:

> Any order in council made under this act shall be forthwith published in the Canada Gazette and laid before parliament as soon as may be after it is made.

Mr. LOW: I think this is just as good a place as any to follow up what I said yesterday I might do, namely, ask for answers to certain questions. It is well known to hon. members that the delegation which went from this parliament to San Francisco did not include a member of this group. That being so we are somewhat in the dark as to the whole mechanism of the specialized agencies and so on that were discussed at the San Francisco conference.

I indicated yesterday that I was in sympathy with the two objectives that are set out in this measure, first, to see to it that Canada's house is set in order as a nation, and, second, to put ourselves in such a position as to be of the greatest assistance in the furnishing of food or whatever we can produce in this country to help the war ravaged and worthy nations to rehabilitate themselves and to raise the standard of living of their peoples. I am in sympathy with those two objectives. I want it known definitely that we are not opposed to helping as far as we can these other nations, to reaching out the hand of brotherhood to them; but inasmuch as the Social Credit movement was not represented at the conference I am anxious to settle in my own mind the relationship of this measure to other international measures which will be before this house and which obviously were discussed at San Francisco.

I did ask certain questions, but in the light of information that has been brought out before the committee since those questions were asked I have reworded some of them and have perhaps deleted others. I am quite sure the minister will not mind answering these questions to-day so far as he is able to do so. I am sincere and earnest in trying to get this information and I do not mean to embarrass him or anyone else.

I think it is vital that the people of this country should know what Canada can do if she becomes a part of this permanent world food and agriculture organization, first, about setting her own house in order that she could not do without becoming a member. I should like to have that question answered, because I am not quite clear that she could do anything more with membership in this organization than she could do without it.

Mr. GARDINER: I think it is agreed by everyone that thirty nations working in cooperation can do more, for themselves individually, for the whole group of thirty nations and for the world in general, than any one nation can do working by itself. All this bill really does is to make it possible for thirty nations at the present time, and possibly in the end forty-four or forty-five nations, to meet together from time to time—it is presumed they will meet at least once a year—to discuss problems that may arise and endeavour to help one another to work out some solution for problems that relate to food. I do not think any one nation, and particularly Canada with 12,000,000 people only, in a world of nations like China with 450,000,000 people, can do as much by itself as it could working along with thirty other nations.

Mr. LOW: I do not want to debate the question at this time, except to say that we have a very fine example to the south of us which could be placed before the committee. Hon. members should think about it. There we have a nation of forty-eight states known as the United States of America. Each state is capable of a certain production; they have a great variety of productions, they have tremendous possibilities. They have no trade barriers; they have no restrictions whatever as to the passage of goods from one to the other. They have no tariffs; they have no exchange problems. They are united in purpose, and yet I would remind the minister that those free forty-eight united states, with all their vast possibilities, operating under the present financial system, in close cooperation and collaboration, have failed to achieve a high standard of living for all their peoples. There is no other nation in the world so nearly self-sustaining as those forty-eight states of the United States of America. I fail to see how a united states of the world will assure any greater success in obtaining a higher standard of living for the various peoples of the world than has been achieved by the United States of America, for the people of the various states of that nation, so long as we continue to operate under our present vicious financial set-up.

Mr. LESAGE: It is clear that they need social credit prophets in the United States.

Mr. LOW. The young man is beginning to understand a little. My second question is this: If Canada does become part of the permanent world food and agriculture organization, what can she do about assisting other nations to raise their standard of living that she could not do without becoming a member?

Mr. GARDINER: The answer is not very different from the answer to the first question. She can do far more working in cooperation with them to help other nations than she can by simply operating from Ottawa as a government in order to look after her own interests. These people will meet together, they will discuss these matters cooperatively and then they will make recommendations to us. We will consider those recommendations and act upon them if we see fit, or otherwise. I think we can accomplish more, both for ourselves and for other nations, by acting cooperatively than we can by acting individually, for the same reason that forty-eight states acting cooperatively under the one government can perhaps accomplish more for that great mass of people than they could if they were acting as forty-eight different states.

Mr. LOW: The Falk Foundation report states that they expect by July, 1946, to have 20,000,000 unemployed in those forty-eight states.

Mr. MITCHELL: Who said it?

Mr. LOW: The Falk Foundation report. I go to the next point. I should like to ask the question I asked yesterday because it is important to me, and I believe to the people, that we should know. Is this measure before us designed to set up one of the various specialized agencies established by intergovernmental agreement and having wide international responsibility as mentioned in article 57 of chapter 9 of the united nations charter? I have quoted almost the exact wording of article 57.

Mr. GARDINER: Has the hon. member got the article there? Will he read it?

Mr. LOW: I will send and get it, but I have quoted exactly from it. It says: the various specialized agencies established by inter-governmental agreement and having wide international responsibility as mentioned in article 57 of chapter 9 of the united nations charter.

While I am waiting for the text of the article I should like to refer to a statement that was made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar last night as recorded at page 969 of Hansard. This is what he said, following a question asked, I think, by the hon. member for Acadia:

> What I was wondering was this. I take it that the general international organization is the united nations international organization which was established at San Francisco. Under that charter we have set up the social and economic council, and that social and economic council provides that certain specialized bodies shall be set up, of which it is anticipated this will be one.

That seemed to throw some light on the matter, and because of that statement and the further statement made by the Minister for Justice as recorded on the same page at the bottom of column 1 and the top of column 2, I asked my question. This is what the Minister of Justice said:

> . . . it would appear to me that this organization is being set up now in accordance with the terms of this constitution—

Referring to the constitution in the schedule. It goes on:

> —and the united nations charter has not yet come into operation. When it does come into operation it will be dealing with the food and agriculture organization as an entity existing under its own constitution, and then some modifications may have to be made in order to adopt the food and agriculture organization as the specialized agency provided for under the united nations charter.

Those two quotations, one from the member for Rosetown-Biggar and the other from the Minister of Justice, seem to indicate that this is one of the specialized agencies referred to in article 57 of the united nations charter. Would the minister say at this time whether that is so?

Mr. GARDINER: I think perhaps the Minister of Justice or the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar had better answer that.

Mr. COLDWELL: It is anticipated, as I said last night, that a number of specialized agencies will be set up. When we were at San Francisco there were several specialized agencies already in existence and recognized by governments. This was one. Another was the international labour organization; another the secretariat of the league of nations on economics and finance. It does not necessarily follow that any of these organizations will be the specialized agency to be brought into relationship with social and economic council. That is a matter for future agreement. But it is anticipated that those inter-governmental agencies that are in existence and have performed a useful function, such as the ones I have mentioned, may become the specialized agencies under the charter. We are not dealing here with the charter of the united nations, but, as the Minister of Justice said last night, with an organization that has its own constitution and is self-governing in every respect, which may or may not come under the social and economic council as the specialized agency. It seems to me that it would be better to leave the united nations charter out of the discussion until we come to deal with it on the resolution now on the order paper.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: So that the hon. member may have no misgivings of there being any possibility of divergence of view between the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and myself, in view of the fact that we were both at San Francisco, I wish to add that although it was not expressly stated in the charter, all those who discussed with me the terms of article 57 anticipated that this organization would likely become one of the specialized organizations referred to, and article 57 was, by those who talked to me about it, accepted as being something which would enable that to be done if agreement were reached afterwards.

Mr. GARDINER: I think the answer to the question is to be found in articles XII and XIII of the schedule to the bill. Article XII reads:

1. In order to provide for close cooperation between the organization and other public international organizations with related responsibilities, the conference may, subject to the provisions of Article XIII, enter into agreements with the competent authorities of such organizations defining the distribution of responsibilities and methods of cooperation.

They may do that. Then the second paragraph reads:

2. The director-general may, subject to any decisions of the conference, enter into agreements with other public international organizations for the maintenance of common services, for common arrangements in regard to recruitment, training, conditions of service, and other related matters, and for interchanges of staff.

That is, they may cooperate in administration. Article XIII reads:

1. The organization shall, in accordance with the procedure provided for in the following paragraph, constitute a part of any general international organization to which may be entrusted the coordination of the activities of international organizations with specialized responsibilities.

2. Arrangements for defining the relations between the organization and any such general organization shall be subject to the approval of the conference. Notwithstanding the provisions of Article XX.

That does make provision for this organization working in cooperation with any other world organization in order to bring about the objective set out in these articles.

Mr. LOW: Yes, all of which, it seems to me, indicates that it was unfortunate that someone from the Social Credit group was not down there to make sure whether this food and agricultural commission was or was not designed to be a part of the united nations charter.

Mr. COLDWELL: You should have joined us. But there was trouble trying to get the I.L.O. organization recognized.

Mr. LOW: I do not doubt that there was a lot of trouble; I can understand that. May I set my hon. friends' minds at rest by saying that I am not attempting here to discuss the united nations charter. I quite realize that that will come up in due course, and I realize the impropriety of bringing it up here, except that I am trying to establish whether this is one of the specialized agencies mentioned and closely related to the united nations charter. Of course the united nations charter has not yet been adopted so far as Canada is concerned. I have now before me article 57 of chapter 9 of the united nations charter, which reads:

The various specialized agencies established by intergovernmental agreement and having wide international responsibilities, as defined in their basic instruments, in economic, social, cultural, educational, health, and related fields shall be brought into relationship with the united nations in accordance with the provisions of article 63.

That is the reason I asked the question.

Growing out of that is another question which I think it is wise for us to consider and upon which we ought to have some information. This question arose in my mind as a result of something said by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) last evening as reported in Hansard, page 969, and immediately following the quotation which I placed on Hansard a moment ago. He said this:

At San Francisco, Argentina was admitted as a signatory to the charter. I must say I did not approve that, and I am sorry Canada cast her vote in favour of it, but I am not going into that matter now.

In my thinking that indicates that there may be some penalty—or perhaps I should modify that and say, some disadvantage—which might accrue to a nation if it fails to become a member of this permanent world commission. What I wish to ask is, what penalty or disadvantage would accrue to Canada in her efforts, first, to raise the standard of living of her own people, and second, to extend help towards needy countries, if she should not become a member?

Mr. GARDINER. Mr. Chairman, I have not been able to read into the articles of this constitution any suggestion that anyone is going to inflict penalties on anybody. That is not the intention of this kind of arrangement. It is simply that a group of nations are asked to come together and try by discussion to find some way in which they can help one another and help the world. I do not see that any harm can come out of that. I do not think any country is going to be punished if it does not attend, and nobody is likely to be penalized if he does attend. Simply an effort is being made on the part of a group of nations to help one another and help themselves while they help one another. I do not think there is any penalty which Canada would incur by being out, other than we might not get all the benefits of cooperation if we were to stay out, and I imagine that any other nation which stayed out would suffer from the same absence of benefits.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I say that the hon. member for Peace River is reading something into the remarks I made last night regarding Argentina which should not be read into them. I felt sorry that Canada cast her vote in favour of the admission of Argentina, because of the situation in that country. It was a fascist power under a dictatorship, with all the leading democrats in goal, including outstanding professors and newspaper men, with a police controlled press, and all the rest of it and I thought it was rather a pity that Canada recognized Argentina as among the peace-loving nations. But I realized that there was probably another side to the argument; and while I feel very strongly about it still, there are others who feel just as strongly that there would be considerable advantage to the world organization and to the hemisphere in bringing Argentina in. That, I believe, was the point of view of the United States State Department, and I think it was the view which prevailed in our own delegation. On balance I feel very strongly that it should not have been done—but not in the sense in which the hon. gentleman raises the question on this particular bill.

Mr. LOW: Just in that connection I wish it to be made perfectly clear that my point would have been the same had the nation in question been Bulgaria or any other state. The point was simply that there seemed to be some indication in that action that there might be a disadvantage or penalty or something of the kind, active or passive, which would grow out of not becoming a member. I did not want to impute any motives to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar.

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not wish to have something read into my words which should not be read into them. I think the Minister of Agriculture has given the answer—that there is advantage in cooperation.

Mr. LOW: Another question grows out of this. I do not wish to cut anybody else out of the discussion, but I do want to know these things. Has the minister assured himself that if Canada should fail to satisfy the permanent commission that she has done her best to put into effect any of the commission's recommendations, some other agency under the united nations charter will not be called upon to invoke sanctions of one kind or another which will or might contribute to the ruination of our whole economy, and with it, the solidarity of the British empire?

Mr. GARDINER: I am not going to try to predict what will be included in all the articles which may be drawn up in an attempt to bring about a friendly relationship among the nations of the world, but I feel confident that no group of men meeting for the purpose of trying to bring about better relationships among the world's peoples would inflict upon the world ideas of that kind. I do not anticipate any such thing, and it is certainly not to be found in this document. Nothing in this constitution would make it possible for anyone to dictate to anyone else, and it is this document that we are dealing with at the moment.

Mr. LOW: That may be correct, but we must not overlook the point that this may become an agency under the united nations charter, and if it does become an agency, we have to consider the possibilities which should arise in that event. I will not labour the point at this stage. I have one other question. Has the minister assured himself that this measure is not a step towards a world coupon or rationing system? I asked the question yesterday, and with the answer to it I will let my case rest.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, I am convinced, myself, that it is not.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There is one question to which I did not get an answer yesterday, no doubt through inadvertence on the part of the minister. It had to do with the Argentine, which was mentioned here again this afternoon, and which is not a member of the signatory countries or among those which were represented when the constitution was drawn. Yesterday the minister pointed out the position in which Argentina stands by reason of her tremendous export potentialities—a position of danger as far as concerns any international organization designed to adopt international policies with respect to agricultural commodity arrangements, which is referred to as one of the functions of the organization.

I asked whether the Argentine had made any application, and the minister's answer was in the negative. One question I asked to which he has not given an answer is this: if the Argentine—necessary as it is to the success of any hemispheric or world organization respecting agricultural production—makes an application for membership in this organization, what will Canada's vote be? What consideration is being given to the attitude which Canada's delegation to the Quebec conference should take? As the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar points out, there was some division of opinion, and the Prime Minister, casting a vote on behalf of Canada, did so in favour of the admission of Argentina. I for one agreed with the stand taken by the Prime Minister, for two reasons. One was the necessity of mobilizing the support of all the South American and Central American republics at the united nations conference, thus assuring in return their support to Soviet Russia having three representatives. Second, the United States had agreed at Chapultepec, Mexico City, to the admission of Argentina provided that it did certain things and declared war on Germany. Besides, Canada was in this position: had she voted against the admission of Argentina she would have been the only nation in North or South America that had done so, and instead of being the interpreter as between Great Britain and the United States, both of whom were supporting Argentina's application for admission, she would have found herself not the instrument joining these two nations together but actually the very reverse.

While I feel very strongly, as does the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, that Argentina's whole attitude throughout the period of the war was one destructive of the united nations, nevertheless, now that this nation is a member of the united nations, everything should be done to support her application, provided that she makes an application to become a member under this constitution.

As it requires a two-thirds majority for any nation who was not a member at the time of the Hot Springs conference to become a member of this organization, will the minister tell us whether or not the Canadian delegation will in fact support Argentina's application in that regard?

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member for Lake Centre has given the best reasons that I can think of why delegates should not go to the conference instructed. The reasons which he gave—and I am not stating that they are the reasons which were in the minds of the delegates who were there; I am not in a position to know—for the vote that was cast at San Francisco by Canada would necessitate the delegates being in possession of all the facts, as they were at that time and at that place.

I believe that any delegate going to this conference must be just as free to consider all the facts as they then are as were the other delegates. I would hope that the thirty nations, which have indicated their intention of meeting at a certain place to discuss our different problems, are not going to be tied up before they hear those problems discussed from one another's point of view, and that the decision will be reached only after they are discussed and when all the facts are known.

Since the hon. member for Lake Centre is still satisfied with the vote cast at San Francisco after all the facts were heard, I am sure that he will be just as well satisfied with any vote that will be cast by representatives of Canada at any conference that is held under this set of articles. I am not stating here or anywhere else on behalf either of myself as Minister of Agriculture or of the government, and I do not think any other member of the government would state, that this goverment is going to commit its delegates, in advance of the application being made, as to how the delegates should vote.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Does the minister admit that unless Argentina is a member of this organization it is going to be very difficult, if not impossible, to establish international relationships in regard to agricultural production and the like that will be effective all over the world?

Mr. GARDINER: I would say this; the more nations that are great producers of agricultural products, as Argentina is, that come into this conference the better it will be for all of us.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: And the greater the prospects for success.

Mr. GARDINER: The more that come in, the easier it will be to get the arrangements that we are all looking forward to in this conference. As to what the proper time is for nations to come in, that will pretty much be decided by those who make their applications; and the members of the conference will have to consider the applications on their merits as they are made. If two-thirds of them vote to allow them to enter, they will enter.

Mr. COLDWELL: Conditions too have changed to some extent, because lately the dictator Peron has been overthrown, and the people who were imprisoned because of their progressive and democratic views have been largely liberated. We may find an entirely different Argentina government from the goverment that was in power at the time of the San Francisco conference.

Mr. GRAYDON: There is an election in April.

Mr. REID: There is one more question I should like to put to the Minister of Agriculture, but before doing so may I say that while I believe every hon. member agrees with the object of this agreement and the setting up of this organization, I for one, Mr. Chairman, am not so sanguine of its outcome. I ask any hon. member to read over the international agreements, and the story of international agreements, of the past few years, and then ask himself what has been accomplished to date that is really worth while.

Mr. HERRIDGE: We won the war by international agreements.

Mr. REID: That does not enter into the picture. It is a question that can be debated at another time. Be that as it may, I repeat we have only to read the history of international agreements and what has taken place—I leave out the war for the moment—and ask ourselves what has really been accomplished.

I notice that when we come to fish and forest products we find that they are placed under agriculture. There is no more important food in the world to-day than fishery products. There is no more controversial subject among nations to-day than fishery products; because, as many hon. members realize, prior to the war with Germany and Japan the Japanese government had fishing boats along the Pacific which were a source of irritation. The Japanese, of all people, were not preservers of food products. There are only two countries in the world that have set out to preserve and conserve and build up the fisheries, namely, the United States and Canada. Personally I should like to see fisheries predominantly mentioned in the constitution of this organization, because if they are to deal with the conservation of natural resources, especially the natural resources of the sea outside of the three-mile limit, they are going to run into a controversial question among the various nations that are gathered together when they begin to talk of fishing and of fishing rights outside the three-mile limit. I intend to deal with that later.

I rose particularly to ask this question. If my memory serves me rightly, there were many signatories to the league of nations, but very few nations paid their contributions. If nations that are signatories to this agrement do not pay, who is to be responsible for the expenses? That is a practical question, and I should like an answer.

Mr. GARDINER: I think the only answer that can be given is the one that is found in the articles which are on the desk of every hon. member. Section XVIII reads as follows:

1. Subject to the provisions of article XXV, the director general shall submit to the conference an annual budget covering the anticipated expenses of the organization. Upon approval of a budget the total amount approved shall be allocated among the member nations in proportions determined, from time to time, by the conference. Each member nation undertakes, subject to the requirements of its constitutional procedure, to contribute to the organization promptly its share of the expenses so determined.

2. Each member nation shall, upon its acceptance of this constitution, pay as its first contribution its proportion of the annual budget for the current financial year.

So for one year it will be taken care of: these thirty nations who have indicated their acceptance must send their money along with their membership.

3. The financial year of the organization shall be July 1 to June 30 unless the conference should otherwise determine.

As I said a moment ago, as far as I know no real penalties can be imposed in an organization of this kind, but it is assumed that these nations will carry out their obligation, which is that having made the first payment they will continue to make the four additional payments. Then if at the end of that time they are not satisfied with the way the money has been expended or with the activities of the organization generally, any nation can give twelve months' notice that it is withdrawing, the definite understanding being, as stated here, that it will pay its fees for twelve months. I quite agree that if some of the greater nations were to say, "Well, we are out of this thing," they could blow it to pieces in the interval. But I do not believe anyone anticipates this happening, and I would expect that the terms here laid down will be carried out. We must remember that forty-four nations met and set up this interim commission. The interim commission drew up these articles of constitution, and those who have come into the organization have agreed to this constitution. They have all said they are prepared to make these payments, and, barring unforeseen accidents such as none of us expect at the moment, I believe the payments will be made.

Mr. GREEN: This food and agriculture organization of the united nations is to have certain jurisdiction over fisheries and forestry, and I think it would be very helpful if the Minister of Fisheries would make a statement to the committee outlining generally the effect of the organization on Canadian fisheries, and if the Minister of Mines and Resources would do the same in respect to forestry.

Dealing first with fisheries, questions such as this come to mind. We have certain conventions between Canada and other nations; for example, there is the whaling convention, which I think is a multilateral agreement, and we have conventions between Canada and the United States, as the hon. member for New Wetsminster has said. For instance, we have a convention under which was set up the international Pacific salmon fisheries commission, of which the hon. member for New Westminster is a distinguished and very useful member. I believe the Minister of Fisheries should tell us just what will be the effect of this new organization as far as the international Pacific salmon fisheries commission is concerned. Which organization is to be preeminent in the fisheries field? These are questions that come to mind, and I think they should be carefully considered by hon. members of the committee.

In the first report to the governments of the united nations made by the interim commission on food and agriculture, the present body which will pass out of exitsence when the new food and agriculture organization is set up, we find on page 16 certain statements with regard to fisheries. For instance it says that the plan is to encourage systematic exploration for virgin marine resources, and to evaluate the possibilities for their development. Does this mean that this international organization can send men into our coastal waters or into waters beyond the three-mile limit, to which the hon. member for New Westminster referred, in order to make these explorations? That, too, I think is an important question to the Canadian people. Reference is also made to the new organization performing certain functions in relation to credit. What is the idea? To whom is this credit to be given? Is it to be given to the fisheries industry in certain nations? Would credit be available to the fisheries industry of Canada, or what is the plan?

Then with regard to forestry, it does seem to me that the delegates who drew up this convention were a little over-anxious to obtain powers. They have included forestry in agriculture, though someone had to stretch his or her imagination a bit in order to do so. From what the Minister of Agriculture said last evening when I questioned him on this subject, I am quite sure he feels that they went rather far. The problems of forestry, speaking of forestry in the accepted sense; the problems of getting out lumber and the problems of the associated industries, are so different from those of agriculture that there is really no connection whatever between them. Yet this international organization is given very wide powers over forestry; and the unfortunate part of it is that this has not been done directly by calling this a food, agriculture and forestry organization. The only place in which we find forestry mentioned in the whole convention is in article XVI, which says that the term "agriculture" includes forestry and primary forest products. I am quite sure the provincial governments of Canada and the people engaged in the forest industries do not realize that such extensive powers are being given to this international organization. Last evening the minister said the provinces had not been consulted about that control, and I do suggest that the Canadian delegates should try to have an amendment put through deleting the words "forestry and primary forest products." Unfortunately we cannot change it here. As I understand it we have to take the whole convention or none at all; we cannot qualify our acceptance of it, and I would not be in favour of attempting to do so. But I do suggest that the ministry give consideration to having the Canadian delegate or delegates propose that an amendment be put through removing jurisdiction over forestry.

I believe it would be helpful if the committee could be given a statement now by the Minister of Fisheries and the Minister of Mines and Resources, who are the ministers concerned.

Mr. GARDINER: I have just suggested to the ministers mentioned that if they care to make statements it will be quite all right, but I should like to say a word in regard to the general statements that have been made. I think some hon. members are reading far too much into this constitution. No powers are given to anyone to provide credits. No powers are given to anyone to do any of these particular things. The powers given are to explore the possibilities in different countries and under different forms, then to make recommendations to the governments of the different countries as to what they think would be a good way to provide credits. They do not undertake themselves to provide any credits. They do not undertake to determine finally anything that is to be done in connection with any of these matters. They simply say, "We are going to study them all and, after a full study, we are going to make certain recommendations to the different members as to how we think they can solve some of their problems." Then it is up to the nation itself to find ways and means of putting such recommendations into effect, or to decide not to adopt them at all. Having said that, I think the ministers will be prepared to say a word.

Mr. GREEN: I think the minister is not entirely correct. Let us, for example, take paragraph 54 of the first report to which I referred. It states:

It should also perform functions in relation to credit which will be needed for the development, expansion and rehabilitation of many fisheries enterprises, similar to the functions suggested elsewhere in this report in connection with agriculture.

Then, in the convention itself we find this in article I, paragraph 2:

The organization shall promote and, where appropriate, shall recommend—

The minister will see there is both the power to promote and the power to recommend. Then at a later point in the paragraph we find this:

(c) The conservation of natural resources and the adoption of improved methods of agriculture production.

This, of course, also means fisheries and forestry production, under the defining article. Then it refers to—

(d) The improvement of the processing, marketing and distribution of food and agricultural products;—

Which of course means fisheries and forestry products.

Then it also provides in paragraph 3 of article I:

3. It shall also be the function of the organization:

(a) To furnish such technical assistance as governments may request;

(b) To organize, in cooperation with the governments concerned such missions as may be needed to assist them to fulfil the obligations arising from their acceptance of the recommendations of the united nations conference on food and agriculture;

And then:

(c) Generally to take all necessary and appropriate action to implement the purposes of the organization as set forth in the preamble.

So that I think it was the intention of those who drew up the constitution that this international body would go a good deal farther than merely making recommendations, as the minister has suggested. At this time I am not arguing whether that is a good or a bad thing; but it is the fact. In any event the constitution can be read in that way.

Mr. GLEN: In answer to the hon. member for Vancouver South, as to why forestry was brought into the constitution, may I say that some of the reasons are given as follows:

In the attainment of freedom from want, shelter is the complement of food. Wood is the largest single item in the provision of shelter.

Forestry is a form of land use complementary to agriculture. Forests regulate stream flow and thus stabilize water tables and prevent erosion. They also have a modifying effect on climatic extremes, which is favourable to agriculture.

In many sections of the world the farm woodlot makes an important contribution to farm income, besides providing for the farmers' fuel requirements.

In connection with the world situation today, investigations being made in Germany disclose that apparently in that country processes have been developed in connection with the making of sugar from wood. These are some of the considerations which were in the minds of those who framed the convention when they included forestry.

I believe those reasons are given very fully and completely, and they have already been set out by the Minister of Agriculture. I would refer the committee particularly to page 16 of the first report to the governments of the united nations by the interim commission on food and agriculture. We will find there the reason why forestry was included in agriculture. In paragraph 56 we find this:

56. Forests occupy approximately 22 per cent of the land surface of the earth. They play so important a part in the conservation and building up of soil and water resources that it is impossible to plan conservation measures on any extensive scale without including forest management—and frequently afforestation—in the plans. In most countries forestry and farming or grazing constitute possible alternative uses of much of the land, and a significant part of the forest land in many countries is owned or operated by farmers. Indeed, forests are perennial crops, natural or man-made, and their products complete with or supplement other farm products for certain important uses. Farmers are among the larger users of forest products, especially for fuel, buildings, and equipment.

Mr. GREEN: We all use forest products for fuel, buildings and equipment.

Mr. GLEN: Yes, that is so. The paragraph continues:

For these reasons many countries include forestry as a part of agriculture in their governmental organization.

Paragraphs 57 and 58 read as follows:

57. World forest supplies have been altered by the war. New supply problems have been created and new uses developed. In some countries progress in improved methods of forest management and utilization is being made at a faster rate than ever before. Thus there are now especially urgent reasons to consider forestry in world terms and to take concerted action to bring about more efficient growing, processing, and distribution of forest products, the balancing of production and distribution with needs on a world scale, and the prevention of disastrous overuse of forest resources in some countries while those of other countries go to waste for lack of effective demand, to the end that the world's forest resources may make their full contribution to the needs and the well-being of the people of every nation.

58. As in the case of food and other agricultural products discussed in this Report, these objectives would be accomplished through international cooperation in bringing all branches of science to bear upon the biological, technological, economic, social, and other problems involved in the production, distribution, and use of primary forest products; in establishing a factual basis upon which nations, individually and in concert, could build policies and programmes; in helping to work out such programmes; and in promoting widespread education and public understanding of forestry problems. The organization's work in forestry would thus closely parallel that in other fields.

The hon. member for Vancouver South is concerned about the effect that may have upon Canada. I refer him to article IV of the constitution, and the functions set out therein. Paragraphs 3 and 4 are of importance in this connection, and particularly paragraph 4 which states that:

The conference shall make rules laying down the procedure to be followed to secure:

(a) proper consultation with governments and adequate technical preparation prior to consideration by the conference of proposed recommendations and conventions;

These are the words to which my hon. friend referred when he was speaking a few moments ago. Then paragraph (b) of article IV continues:

Proper consultation with governments in regard to relations between the organization and national institutions or private persons.

And then follow paragraphs 5 and 6, which are most important:

5. The conference may make recommendations to any public international organization regarding any matter pertaining to the purpose of the organization.

6. The conference may by a two-thirds majority of the votes cast agree to discharge any other functions consistent with the purposes of the organization which may be assigned to it by governments or provided for by any arrangement between the organization and any other public international organization.

[Mr. Green.]

If I read this convention correctly, any conclusions that are based upon these recommendations are not binding upon any country unless that country through its recognized form of government shall accede to them. I fail to see what danger there could be in the recommendations, and in their including forestry, if they have to be ratified and approved by the government of Canada. It seems to me that article IV meets the objection raised by the hon. member.

Mr. GREEN: What about the provincial governments? They are primarily concerned.

Mr. GLEN: My personal view would be that the dominion government certainly would not come to any conclusions in connection with including forestry within the definition of agriculture without consultation with the provinces. In fact we are doing that to-day. All matters concerned with natural resources of the dominion are considered after consultation and cooperation with the provinces.

Mr. GREEN: That is one complaint. It is not being done with regard to forestry. The dominion government has not consulted any provincial governments about the fact that the convention covers forestry. The Minister of Agriculture said that last night.

Mr. GARDINER: The constitution of the dominion settles that point.

Mr. GLEN: I am quite sure that any recommendation that will be made at this conference will have to be subject to the jurisdiction of the dominion, and any action would be taken only after consultation with the provinces. Otherwise we could not get unanimity of opinion; there would be no unanimous consent with regard to any of the proposals affecting all the provinces. These proposals will affect not only individual provinces, but all of them. I do not think the hon. member need be alarmed that the rights and privileges of the parliament of Canada are likely to be infringed upon by commitments made at the international organization which would be binding on Canada without any reference to the jurisdiction and powers of parliament.

Mr. GREEN: I may be wrong, but I venture the guess that the Department of Mines and Resources, which is the department responsible for forestry in so far as the dominion government is concerned, has had very little to do with this convention or with the negotiations that led up to the submission of this convention. Forestry is one of the major industries of Canada, and surely steps should be taken to see that some of the Canadian delegates understand the forestry industry of this country and that proper provisions are made to protect it. If some international direction or assistance is to be given to forestry, perhaps it would be wiser to set up another international organization which would have that as its main job. I am afraid the two objectives cannot be met by the one international organization. I would ask the Minister of Mines and Resources to give consideration to these two suggestions: first, that Canada should have delegates or representatives who understand forestry, and, second, that a separate international organization be set up to deal with forestry.

Mr. GARDINER: The gentleman who has been nominated to represent us, and whose nomination will go forward immediately this legislation is passed, is Mr. D. Roy Cameron, dominion forester. He is one of the delegates to the conference who has been appointed by the minister, and he will deal with forestry as related to the production of food.

Mr. GREEN: It does not say that.

Mr. GARDINER: That is really what it is, as is indicated in the document quoted from, and it is being discussed from that point of view. I agree with the minister when he says that no matter what is discussed, the recommendations will be referred to the national government of Canada. Then if the matter involves provincial jurisdiction, it would require to be referred by the government of Canada to the provinces. It could not be done any other way under our jurisdiction. The terms used in the articles are "legally," "constitutionally" and so on. The matters will be dealt with in whatever is the proper manner.

Mr. BRIDGES: Mr. Chairman, little did I think when I left Germany on the first day of May last that I would be called upon within a few months to stand up in the House of Commons to answer questions regarding such an important bill as this. Surely I can say, to use the words of another, that the whirligig of political fortune has hurled me into high office in a very short time.

The hon. member for Vancouver South was kind enough to advise me this morning that he was going to ask some questions along the lines of those he has already asked. I appreciate his courtesy. So far as the bill is concerned, the preamble to the constitution—I do not intend to read it all—sets out four purposes, as follows:

(1) Raising levels of nutrition and standards of living of the peoples under their respective jurisdictions,

(2) securing improvements in the efficiency of the production and distribution of all food and agricultural products,

(3) bettering the conditions of rural populations, and

(4) thus contributing toward an expanding world economy.

It can be seen that these functions are phrased in very general language, are idealistic in their nature, and there can be no doubt that everyone in the world, not alone in Canada, would welcome their achievement.

So far as fisheries are concerned, it is realized that these broad idealistic conceptions must be reduced to something which can be practically applied to the bettering of the livelihood of fishermen, which is in turn tied up with the welfare of the people to whom they sell their goods.

It is felt that before such practical aims can be realized there must be a full and free interchange of thought and consideration on the part of any and all nations that will be affected. The food and agriculture organization furnishes a means of bringing together the experts in fisheries marketing and nutrition to consider the problem and to explore for the terms in which practical approaches may be recommended to their respective governments.

Under the interim commission, certain interchanges of ideas between the nations signatory to the final act of the Hot Springs conference have already taken place, and so far as fisheries go there have been certain recommendations made which will be considered at the Quebec conference.

It is realized that an approach to the fishery problem from the international point of view will have to be slow and that there will be many difficult and contentious problems to discuss. It is felt, however, there are certain of these in which there can be obtained measures of agreement; they are:

1. The developing of comparable statistics by fish producing and consuming nations which must be the basis for any intelligent consideration of the position of any nation in its economy, and it is expected that one of the aims of the organization will be to form a clearing house of world statistics.

2. It is also expected that they would act to collect, analyse, and disseminate world information relating to fisheries and fisheries products.

3. It is expected that it would foster the improvement of education relating to the fisheries and the spread of knowledge of fisheries science and practice.

4. It is also expected that it would play a very important part in bringing the fisheries nations of the world together with respect to the conservation of fisheries in international waters. A very large percentage of the thirty-seven billion pounds of fish that are yielded annually by the world come from international waters where every nation has a right to fish, and it is highly essential that nations come together in such a way as to see that the limited resources of the sea are not exhausted or wiped out. It is expected that from the deliberations which will occur under the food and agriculture organization certain recommendations will be made to governments concerning the desirability of their coming to an agreement, one with the other, with respect to conservation on the high seas. The existing agreements between nations—I think this is what my friend is most interested in—would, of course, continue to be effective, such agreements as are embodied in the various fisheries treaties between the United States and Canada, and which have meant so much benefit to our two peoples. It is the hope and the purpose of the food and agriculture organization to bring nations of the world together to consider whether an expansion of this method of approach to a common fisheries problem would be desirable and possible of recommendation to their respective governments.

I can go further and say that before we can arrive at a practical way of realizing the ideals and objectives as set forth in this bill there must be international discussion, and the purpose of this organization is to provide the means for that international discussion. I think we should all keep in mind that this organization—I think I am right in this; if not, the Minister of Justice can correct me—can only make recommendations to their respective governments for their consideration. This organization cannot bind their respective governments.

I do not know whether I have answered in their entirety the questions asked by the hon. member for Vancouver South, but I think I have dealt with what he has in mind in so far as existing international agreements are concerned. I think I am correct in saying, although I am not an authority on international law, that the present agreements will be paramount over any other agreements that may be made at a later date.

Mr. GREEN: Did the minister say that the present agreements would be paramount, or the new organization?

Mr. BRIDGES: I would say that the present agreements would be paramount.

Mr. GREEN: In other words, there is no intention that the food and agriculture organization of the united nations should take over the administration of the convention between Canada and the United States with regard to the international Pacific salmon fisheries convention?

Mr. BRIDGES: That is my understanding.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If the hon. member wishes me to express the understanding which has been that of the Department of Justice, it has been that this organization would have no mandatory powers at all. Its function would be, as the Minister of Fisheries has pointed out, to gather information and co-ordinate it and make recommendations, but it has no power at all to interfere with the sovereignty of any nation. Those recommendations, in order to be implemented, would have to be considered by the legislative body competent to deal with the subject matter of the recommendation. It might be parliament; it might be provincial legislatures. The existing agreements between this country and other countries with respect to fisheries will not be affected in any way until action is taken by the competent bodies to affect them. The food and agriculture organization would be competent only to make recommendations.

Mr. GREEN: I thank the ministers for their statements. They have been very helpful. There is one other question: What about the future? Suppose Canada wants to make an agreement with the United States next year concerning some other aspect of the fisheries; would she be free to do so without having first to get the approval of this united nations organization?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Our understanding is that she would be perfectly free to make any kind of agreement in that regard. It might be considered more courteous to the members of the food and agriculture organization to apprise them beforehand of what Canada's intentions were in that regard, but our understanding is that there would be no legal requirement to do so.

Mr. GREEN: If we advised them through courtesy, the result would be that a procedure would then be initiated that would have to be followed in all other cases, and the practical effect would be that every one of these agreements would have to go first to the united nations organization. Does the minister not agree that that would probably be the result?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, I would not fully agree with the suggestion of the hon. member. My understanding is that this organization is designed to furnish a forum where information can be pooled and from which recommendations can be made. If it were performing the function that we all hope it will be competent to perform it would seem natural that in making any arrangements which were going to have a substantial effect upon the production of food supplies, the information would be available to the organization and an effort would be made to have that fit into the general plan for the attainment of the purposes set out in the charter.

Mr. FERGUSON: There is one thing that has struck me, as I am sure it must have most of the other new members. The subject matter of this bill an international matter, was discussed in 1943, and apparently a tremendous amount of time has been spent on it, and yet this government waits until after the war to call a dominion-provincial conference to discuss matters that vitally affect this country. To-day there is hardly a man or a woman in Canada who has not grave doubts as to the future for some years to come. That is true of the soldier, of the farmer, and of men in all lines of business. I think that if more attention were given to national affairs and the affairs of the provinces, this country would not be in the state in which it is to-day and we would not find the government taking over the Burns company or see the chaos now existing in the automobile industry at Windsor. As I said, this international matter has been under discussion since 1943, and even yet full preparations do not seem to have been made.

Mr. GARDINER: While this matter was discussed in 1943, the bill itself was not discussed in 1943. The first report of the interim commission is dated Washington, August 1, 1944.

Mr. FERGUSON: But there was a body called together before that.

Mr. GARDINER: That body set up an interim commission, and the interim commission made its first report on August 1, 1944. This government as such had nothing more to do with that than that we had a delegate as one of the forty-four nations represented. We did not call together the conference at Quebec. The interim commission made suggestions as to the holding of a conference, and we extended an invitation to them to hold the conference in Canada at Quebec. As a result of that invitation they decided to come to Canada and to Quebec. They might have gone to any other of the countries represented, but they are coming to Canada. That is not the action of this government but of the group with its headquarters in Washington representing forty-four nations. The constitution which is here before us is not a product of ours at all, but a product of that organization set up by the forty-four nations. We are simply asked to accept it. I just wanted to make that clear in view of the hon. member's remarks.

Mr. FERGUSON: It probably would have been better to extend an invitation to the provinces to meet with the dominion government to discuss national affairs.

Section agreed to.

Section 3 agreed to.

Mr. JAQUES: Before the bill passes I should like to ask a question arising out of a statement that was made in the British House of Commons by Mr. Robert Boothby, M.P. He said:

> Why do we repose such childlike faith in what it is now fashionable to call economic "experts"? They have seldom been right in the past. After the last war they put us back on a gold standard, at the pre-war parity of exchange. The results were catastrophic. We emerged from that war potentially a rich country. We had fine capital equipment, the best skilled workers in the world, a prosperous agriculture. It took the "experts" less than ten years to turn us into a country which, in terms of real wealth, was poor. Upon industrial output they imposed deliberate restrictions. They reduced wages, and with them the purchasing power of our people. They forced our skilled workers to migrate. They scrapped the factories, the machinery and the shipbuilding yards with which we might have achieved a greaer prosperity than we have ever known. They put 2,500,000 acres of cultivated land down to grass, and drove a quarter of a million agricultural workers from the countryside to swell the growing numbers of unemployed in the towns. They doubled the real burden of our national debt. By linking us rigidly to Wall Street they ensured that if Wall Street crashed we crashed too. And that is precisely what happened in 1929. In the circumstances, their credentials for tendering advice as to the monetary policy we ought to pursue after this war are, to say the least of it, doubtful.

Can the minister give the house any good reason to believe that these experts will be any better able to bring prosperity after this war than they did after the last?

Mr. GARDINER: All I wish to say in that regard is this: I am sure that even if I were to give any guarantee it would not be taken very seriously. After all, I am only one minister in a government of twenty, and we are a country of only twelve million people in a world of many millions. I do not know that it would be taken very seriously if I were to say that our passing this bill is going to give prosperity to the whole world.

Mr. JAQUES: No; that was not quite the point, Mr. Chairman. There is no doubt that, although they may not be the same lot of experts, they hold the same ideas as those held by the experts of 1929. The question I asked was, what reasons are there for believing that present-day experts can bring any better results than experts holding the same ideas were able to bring in 1929? Why should they be able to solve the problem, merely by making it bigger, by making it international instead of national, any better than they did in 1929? What is the purpose of it all?

Mr. GARDINER: I think the only answer I can give to that is that all of us have changed our minds considerably since the end of the last war. I think even the experts have done that. Sometimes I am inclined to think that we on this side of the house have been converted a little by our friends who sit in your corner.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Let us hope so.

Mr. GARDINER: Family allowances, for example, have in them an element of an idea which was advocated some years ago by the Social Crediters.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is right.

Mr. GARDINER: And we all change. We do so by listening to experts talk, whether we agree with them or not—that is, provided that experts can get together and do some talking as is provided by this measure; and I hope they may convert us to some more advanced points of view than some of us hold.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull) moved:

That section 4 of the bill be deleted, and that the bill come into force after assent.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is that amendment?

Mr. GARDINER: Section 4, which merely says that the bill is to come in by proclamation, is being dropped, in order that it may come into force immediately upon its having been given the royal assent.

Mr. BRACKEN: Does the minister know what expenditures have been made already in connection with this food and agriculture organization?

Mr. GARDINER: I think that all that has been expended is any necessary expenses, and I assume they are subject to this bill being passed. For example, we are making arrangements under subsection 2 of section 2 for offices and persons to go down as advisers to Quebec City. Naturally this had to be done in advance, and it has been arranged for, but it will be paid for under this bill.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Possibly the minister is now in a position to give the list of the advisers and officials who are going.

Mr. GARDINER: I will give the list of those whom we intend to recommend immediately this legislation goes through. Would this committee like to have it read or have it tabled?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Have it read.

Mr. GARDINER: I think probably I should read it. This is the recommendation made to council for the passing of an order in council to provide for the appointments, and the active part of it is as follows:

1. That the Honourable J. G. Gardiner, Minister of Agriculture, be the member of the conference for Canada and that Doctor G. S. H. Barton, deputy minister of agriculture, be appointed as his alternate;

2. That the following be appointed as associate members of the Canadian delegation:

Department of External Affairs: Mr. L. B. Pearson, Canadian ambassador, Washington;

Department of Agriculture: Doctor George Bouchard, assistant deputy minister of agriculture; Doctor E. S. Archibald, director, experimental farms service; Mr. J. G. Taggart, chairman, agricultural prices support board;

Department of Fisheries: Doctor D. B. Finn, deputy minister of fisheries; Professor A. F. Cameron, chairman, fisheries research board;

Department of National Health and Welfare: Doctor F. S. Parney, chief, industrial hygiene division;

Department of Trade and Commerce: Mr. George McIvor, chairman, Canadian wheat board; Doctor S. A. Cudmore, dominion statistician;

Department of Mines and Resources (Forestry): Mr. D. Roy Cameron, dominion forester;

Wartime Prices and Trade Board: Mr. K. W. Taylor, coordinator, foods administration;

Canadian Federation of Agriculture: Mr. H. H. Hannam, president, Canadian federation of agriculture.

3. That the following advisers be assigned to the delegation:

Department of Agriculture: Doctor J. F. Booth, associate director of marketing, agricultural economics alternating: Mr. R. S. Hamer, director production service;

Department of Agriculture: Mr. A. M. Shaw, director marketing service, Department of Agriculture;

Department of Fisheries: chief, economics division, Department of Fisheries; Doctor Georges Prefontaine, department of biology, University of Montreal;

Department of National Health and Welfare: Doctor L. B. Pett, chief, nutrition division; Doctor C. A. Norrell, assistant chief dominion analyst;

Department of Trade and Commerce: Mr. G. R. Paterson, executive officer, combined food board; Mr. J. B. Rutherford, chief, agricultural branch, Dominion Bureau of Statistics;

Department of Mines and Resources (Forestry): Mr. J. D. B. Harrison, chief, forest economics division; Mr. T. A. McElhanney, superintendent, forest products laboratory;

Canadian Federation of Agriculture: Mr. W. J. Parker, vice-president; Mr. J. A. Marion, vice-president;

British Columbia Lumber and Shingle Manufacturing Association: Mr. L. R. Andrews, Ottawa representative;

Pulp and Paper Research Industries: Mr. A. Koroleff, director of woodlands research;

Fisheries Council of Canada: Mr. C. J. Morrow, president; Mr. S. K. Murray;

Press Relations: Mr. Bruce West, Canadian representative, Washington office of the Canadian information service;

Joint Secretaries: Mr. Mark McClung, Privy Council office; Mr. Jean Louis Delisle, Department of External Affairs.

Amendment agreed to.

On the schedule:

Mr. BRACKEN: I wish to ask one more question. Under this head has the government made any contribution to the interim commission?

Mr. GARDINER: I am not aware that they have, although I would not be certain. I would think some contribution would have to be made by someone at some time.

Mr. BRACKEN: The reason I ask, Mr. Chairman, is this. Paragraph (b) of article XXV reads as follows:

The amounts to be contributed by the member nations shall be in the proportions set forth in annex II to this constitution: Provided that each member nation may deduct therefrom the amount already contributed by it toward the expenses of the interim commission.

Mr. GARDINER: I should have said there have been votes of money put through in the estimates of previous sessions to provide for the expenses of all officials going to the Hot Springs conference and to the setting up of the organization at Washington.

Mr. BRACKEN: That brings up the next point I wish to raise. Under what authority were such expenditures made?

Mr. GARDINER: The expenses that were paid were paid under the authority of previous estimates passed here.

Mr. BRACKEN: Could the minister be more specific than that?

Mr. GARDINER: I would have to get the estimates and go through them and find out the different items, if that is what is required. A vote will be found in some of the past estimates to cover those items.

Mr. GREEN: War appropriation?

Mr. GARDINER: It would be under the War Measures Act, yes.

Mr. BRACKEN: The minister read a long list of delegates who are to go to the conference next week. Will the cost of sending those delegates be in addition to the contribution we are asked by this bill to make to the food and agriculture organization?

Mr. GARDINER: I had better read what it says:

That the expenses incurred by the members of the Canadian delegation be paid out of funds to be appropriated by parliament for the purpose of Canadian participation in the above-mentioned organization.

I presume those funds will be voted this session.

Mr. BRACKEN: There is as yet no estimate in any of the supply bills brought down.

Mr. GARDINER: I think there will be an estimate, probably under the war appropriation vote; it will come in there somewhere. Those expenses are not itemized in the sense that the supply votes are usually itemized.

Mr. BRACKEN: Could the minister say what the total expenditures will be for any fiscal or calendar year as a result of the passage of this bill? I refer to the contribution to the organization and the supplementary expenditures. I think that item should be set out by itself somewhere in the estimates and not distributed through other expenditures, so that the house can see exactly what this measure is to cost us.

Mr. GARDINER: When my estimates are up I shall be pleased to answer all these questions. The item will be in our estimates in some form if it is going through the house this session. I shall be glad to make at that time all the explanations that are required with regard to it. The total amount is as has been set out here two or three times. All that it could amount to in the first twelve months is $126,500.

Mr. BRACKEN: That does not give the answer, because the minister is planning to send a large delegation to this conference. This apparently would be in addition to what is being offered the organization.

Mr. GARDINER: I would not like to say it would be an addition.

Mr. BRACKEN: With all deference to the minister, I think he ought to put himself in a position to be a little more definite.

Mr. GARDINER: Judging by what the leader of the opposition has just said, I would say that this should be made a part of the charges. I am not taking for granted—

Mr. BRACKEN: With all deference, the minister ought to be more definite when he is asking the house to approve a measure which requires these large expenditures.

Schedule agreed to.

On the preamble:

Mr. BRACKEN: I wish to refer to article XVIII of this measure, which reads as follows:

Subject to the provisions of article XXV, the director general . . .

Of this new organization.

. . . shall submit to the conference . . .

That is, the conference of the organization.

. . . an annual budget covering the anticipated expenses of the organization.

If that means anything it means that the conference works out its own budget. I continue:

Upon approval of a budget the total amount approved shall be allocated among the member nations in proportions determined, from time to time, . . .

If that means anything it means that the 5·06 per cent is not a fixed percentage for Canada.

. . . by the conference. Each member nation undertakes, subject to the requirements of its constitutional procedure, . . .

That clause does not mean anything because money could not be obtained from this country in any other way than by constitutional procedure.

. . . to contribute to the organization promptly its share of the expenses so determined.

The only point I wish to make is by the passage of this bill we are in effect issuing a blank cheque to this organization, because as the Minister of Justice pointed out last night, and as others have done to-day, once we accept this constitution we are in honour bound to carry it out. I am not very much afraid that they are going to run away with us in the matter of expenditures, even though we have only one man on that body; but I suggest it is not a businesslike procedure to have us voting on a bill—which is a money bill—which is not specific as to what our obligations under it may be. That is my criticism; that was the burden of my criticism yesterday. The only defence we have is in the instructions given or the action taken by our representatives on that organization to see to it that they do not commit themselves to larger expenditures without first having the approval of parliament.

I make these observations in passing. I am not very much afraid that the expenditures are going to be multiplied, but I repeat, it is not good businesslike procedure. I suggest to the government that our representative, whoever he may be—I gather for the present he is to be the Minister of Agriculture—should let this organization know that a larger contribution by Canada ought not to be expected until this parliament at least approves of making it.

Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall said bill be read a third time?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Now, with the consent of the house.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Next sitting.

Mr. GARDINER moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Before the motion is put, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word. I am not going to take up very much time, but it may appear to some that this group does not want this bill to pass. So far as I am concerned, speaking for myself only, that is not altogether the case. With me the point is that I do not want it to pass too rapidly.

In that connection I want to say only one thing. When measures are brought into this house concerning matters which affect the entire world, as this measure does because it has to do with other nations in the world, we should proceed with some care. I make that statement for the reason that those responsible for world movements, whether or not we should personify them, do not view things as to how they are going to affect the world to-day or next week or next month. They look at these things as to how they are going to affect civilization, or perhaps their own interests, in generations or centuries to come. What may appear to us to-day to be perfectly plausible and perfectly safe in generations or ages to come may prove to have worked to the detriment of civilization. That is why I say that the greatest possible care should be taken in all measures of this kind.

Let no one be under the impression that we want to oppose anything. We are in favour of anything we believe to be in the interests of this country or of civilization; but we do believe we should proceed with some measure of care in respect to anything affecting the world at large. For that reason we desire not to rush into things we do not altogether understand the possibility of future implications, or the significance of which may not be fully obvious to all.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should like the minister to explain why it is necessary to give this bill third reading to-day.

Mr. GARDINER: I did explain that last week, when I said I was very sorry the situation this session had not made it possible for us to bring down this bill earlier. I repeat that I am very sorry we did not have sufficient time, as our experiences up to the moment have indicated, to have this bill and the resolution preceding it go through all the regular stages, which would have permitted discussion on two or three different occasions instead of trying to have it all at one time. We were further delayed, of course, by the fact that another resolution came in ahead of this matter on Tuesday. I am not criticizing anyone for bringing in the other resolution; it was considered important and it was brought in, but it took the day we had all arranged should be given to a discussion of this measure. Monday next of course is private members' day, when measures of this kind are not considered. The conference is meeting on Tuesday. I understand that if this bill goes to the senate and is passed there before a quarter to six, it can be given the royal assent. That is just half an hour from now, and that royal assent should be given before we ask our delegates to appear at the conference next Tuesday.

I believe the bill has been very fully discussed, and I thank hon. members for the cooperation they have shown. I am sure our friends of the Social Credit group will agree that we have tried, though perhaps not very successfully, to answer any questions or objections they have raised in connection with the legislation, and I would only ask their cooperation in having the bill pass now so that it may go to the senate and be assented to this evening, in order that we may be able to take our legal part in the conference.

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): I just want to make my position clear in this matter. If this bill means that Canada is to lose the power to determine our standards of living; if that power is to go under international control, then I am opposed to the bill. If on the other hand the minister guarantees that Canada will retain control of our economic policies and of our standards of living, then I have no objection to the bill passing. Otherwise, speaking for myself, I am opposed to it.

Mr. GARDINER: It has been repeated on many occasions that there is nothing mandatory about this bill. No right is taken away from Canada; no authority of any kind is taken away. It is simply an effort to get the cooperation of other nations to help us deal with our own problems, and offering our cooperation to them. I think I can assure my hon. friend, without any fear of contradiction from anyone, that his fears are not well founded. If that assists him in any way in deciding to support the measure, I am most happy to be able to make this statement.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

AMENDMENT OF ACT OF 1944-45

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved the second reading of bill No. 9, to amend the Department of National Health and Welfare Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Substitution of department, minister and deputy minister in certain other acts.

Mr. CLAXTON: Perhaps I might repeat the explanation I gave on the first reading of the bill. It is designed to correct a typographical error which appeared in the bill and act as passed in 1944. This measure would substitute for the word "nine" the word "eight" in the reference to the act setting up the Department of Veterans Affairs.

Upon inquiry I found that the error occurred through one of the sections of the bill which intends to establish the Department of Veterans Affairs having been struck out when in committee. The persons responsible for proof reading, or doing whatever was necessary, had not observed this error in printing the bill. This bill is designed purely to correct that error.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is no other change suggested in the measure? This is the only alteration in the proposed legislation?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I notice that the change is made retroactive to October, 1944. Are the rights of any individuals interfered with by this change?

Mr. CLAXTON: None whatsoever, or at least certainly none of whom I have heard, and I cannot conceive of any.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

AMENDMENT OF CAPITAL REVISION ACT, 1937—SECURITIES TRUST

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of bill No. 11, to amend the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act, 1937.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, before this measure is given second reading, it would seem to me that the amendments are of sufficient importance to call upon the minister for a statement giving the full purport of the changes he proposes to make. My suggestion would be that the minister should speak now.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Mr. Speaker, when first reading of the bill was moved I explained that the only amendment suggested was that having to do with section 12. The amendment is, not for a different set-up in the trustees of the Canadian National Railways securities trust, but a different method of appointing the two trustees representing the railways.

When the bill was introduced I stated that the position of vice-president of finance and accounting had been abolished. I find since, however, that I was in error when I made that statement, and that Mr. D. C. Grant, who was formerly vice-president of finance and accounting recently retired on superannuation, and that two new positions have been created, one of vice-president and treasurer, and the other of vice-president and comptroller.

Mr. MacNICOL: One more than there was before.

Mr. CHEVRIER: With reference to section 12, the Canadian National Railways now seeks to appoint their two trustees by resolution, of the board of directors rather than as set out in the original section. The section states first of all that the trustees shall be three deputy ministers, and then it proceeds to state that the other two trustees shall be the chairman of the board of directors of the national railways, and the vice-president of finance. The former vice-president of finance, Mr. D. C. Grant, has retired and two new positions have been created. But it is not sought by this amendment to create three rather than two trustees. In the event of a reorganization in the future, the Canadian National Railways would be able to appoint their two trustees by way of resolution.

Then, I believe the amendment respecting the three deputy ministers is only technical. If hon. members will look at the act they will see that the section as it reads to-day is as follows:

> There shall be a corporation to be known as the Canadian National Railways Securities Trust, hereinafter referred to as the "Securities Trust", consisting of five trustees, being the deputy minister of finance, the deputy minister of transport, the deputy minister of justice—

And so on. The section now seeks to enact that the three trustees shall be those persons who respectively hold the offices of the deputy minister of finance, the deputy minister of transport, and the deputy minister of justice. It is just a technical amendment, and does not in any way change the substance of the section as it now stands.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does the minister think the suggested amendment brings about any clarification?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The Department of Justice advises us that that is the manner in which we should proceed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On Section 1—Corporation securities trust; constitution.

Mr. GRAYDON: The Canadian National Railways securities trust, which was set up by section 12 of the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act, 1937, is described in section 13 of the act as the corporation which shall take over and hold, as authorized by the act, the indebtedness to His Majesty, together with the collateral securities held by the minister in respect thereof, as set out in schedule A of the act. In other words, the responsibilities and powers of the securities trust are very important.

Could the minister indicate whether there is any representation of the railroad brotherhoods or the workers on that board and whether or not under this bill the railway workers will have any say in so far as the securities trust is concerned? As I see it, this securities trust constitutes a link between the financing by the government and the operation of the railways. It is a vital part of the constitution of the railway set-up, and I should like to know whether any provision has been made whereby the workers will have a say in regard to this matter or others of a like nature.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The only provision having to do with the question asked by the hon. member for Peel is that contained in the section itself, namely, that the trustees shall be the three deputy ministers and such two officers of the railway as may be appointed by resolution of the board of directors. I do not know whom the resolution will appoint. If the resolution appoints those who have been appointed in the past, I presume the representatives of the railways will be the president of the board of directors and perhaps the vice-president and treasurer, one of the new positions set up, or the vice-president and comptroller. So far as representation of the brotherhoods is concerned I shall be glad to bring the suggestion of my hon. friend to the attention of the board of directors of the railway.

Mr. GRAYDON: That does not quite answer my question. As I see it, the present amendment, as well as the original act, apparently confine and restrict the appointment to certain officers of the corporation. I want to know whether among those officers who may be appointed under the terms and provisions of this amended legislation there will be anyone who may be said to be a representative of the railway workers.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I would not think so.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think this may be an opportune time to ask a question I have in mind. The securities of the Canadian National Railways under this board of trustees include, I take it, securities which have been repatriated from Great Britain during the war. Grand Trunk securities and others amounting to some hundreds of millions of dollars were brought back to Canada. I want to seize this opportunity to ask if they are still held by the government or by the railways under this trust, or perhaps by some other similar body. I should like to know what disposition has been made of them.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I cannot tell the hon. gentleman whether any securities have been repatriated from Great Britain. All I can say is that the annual report of the Canadian National securities trust for the year ended December 31, 1944, which is the last one, sets out a detailed list of the indebtedness transferred from the government to the securities trust. Whether securities have been repatriated since this statement was compiled, I am not in position to say.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think it was two years ago, or possibly three, that provision was made for the repatriation of a large block of Grand Trunk bonds and I was wondering what has become of them.

Mr. HOWE: The bonds were repatriated by the Bank of Canada and the cost of acquisition stands on the books of the Canadian National Railways as a loan from the dominion government. The dominion government lent the railway money to repatriate the bonds which are lodged with the Bank of Canada as security.

Mr. COLDWELL: They have not been disposed of otherwise?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like a little further clarification of the question asked by the hon. member for Peel. Is there anything in the act that would prevent the Canadian National Railways from appointing to one of these offices the head or some member of the railway employees unions?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do not think there is.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

APPOINTMENT OF GEORGE A. TOUCHE AND COMPANY AS AUDITORS

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of bill No. 12, respecting the appointment of auditors for national railways.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Appointment of auditors.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Perhaps I should say a word in connection with this section. This is the annual bill appointing auditors for the Canadian National Railways and it takes the same form as it has taken over a period of some twelve years or more. It seeks to appoint this year the firm of George A. Touche and Company of Toronto and Montreal.

Mr. COLDWELL: Has this firm been the auditors for a number of years and, if so, how many?

Mr. CHEVRIER: This firm has been the auditors for practically all the years since 1932, except perhaps one or two.

Mr. COLDWELL: I know this is a most reputable firm and I do not want my remarks to be construed as criticizing them in any particular, but I think it is sometimes advisable to change the auditors in connection with public bodies. I know that from experience I have had in public affairs. I recall when I was a member of the Regina city council we had a firm of auditors in whom we had every confidence. They were doing a good job, but over a long period of years they had become, shall I say, a little careless. The result was that when a new firm of auditors went in they were able to see things which perhaps the other firm had not been able to see up to that time. I am not suggesting that we change the auditors to-day, but I am placing these thoughts before the minister so that, when the matter is again considered, some thought may be given to the advisability of continuing for such a very long period of time—it will be now almost a quarter of a century—

Mr. CHEVRIER: If my hon. friend will permit me, the appointment was made in 1932 and they have continued to be the auditors since that time with the exception of perhaps one or two years.

Mr. COLDWELL: I thought my hon. friend said that they had been auditors since the organization of the Canadian National Railways, which would be about a quarter of a century ago. The minister's statement makes a difference to my argument.

Mr. GRAYDON: My memory may not be very good, but I rather thought George A. Touche and Company were appointed auditors for the Canadian National Railways in the special legislation brought down by the then Minister of Transport, now the minister of several departments, one of which is munitions and supply. I thought the appointment first took place in 1936 and I should like the confirmation of the minister, who just mentioned 1932.

Mr. CHEVRIER: They were appointed in 1936, but this bill has been before the house in one form or another since 1932. I think it was the government of the Right Hon. Mr. Bennett which appointed this firm, and then for a period of one or two years another firm was appointed. I would say that since 1932, with the exception of one or two years, the firm of George Touche and Company have been acting.

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps I can straighten this out by drawing on my memory. The firm of George A. Touche and Company were auditors for the Canadian National Railways up until 1932. The act providing for a change in the management of Canadian National Railways and the replacing of directors by trustees was put through in 1932, and the firm of Clarkson, Gordon, Dilworth and Nash were appointed auditors. In 1936 there was a change in auditors; George A. Touche and Company were appointed and they have been the auditors since.

CANADA PRIZE ACT

PRIZE COURTS AND PRIZE LAW—EXCHEQUER COURT JURISDICTION

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 10, to provide for a prize court and prize law in Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill is necessary for the following among other reasons.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Prior to this war all prize courts in Canada were established under imperial legislation and acquired their authority and jurisdicton under imperial legislation. In the last war the Exchequer Court of Canada as a Colonial Court of Admiralty, under the Imperial Colonial Courts of Admiralty Act, 1891, had prize jurisdiction under the Imperial Colonial Prize Courts Act, 1894. After the Statute of Westminster, Canada enacted the Admiralty Act of 1934, which made the exchequer court on its admiralty side a Canadian admiralty court. The Imperial Colonial Prize Court Act of 1894 does not therefore apply to it now as it has ceased to be a colonial court of admiralty, and there was no provision made in the statute of 1934 to give the exchequer court, admiralty side, jurisdiction in prize. There was, therefore, at the beginning of this war no prize court in Canada under Canadian legislation and no imperial legislation applicable to establish a prize court in Canada.

By order in council P.C. 2489 of September 5, 1939, under the War Measures Act, the exchequer court was first constituted a prize court. Prize court rules were made by order in council P.C. 2682 of September 14, 1939. Then a slight modification was made on September 27, 1939, by P.C. 2892. These orders in council were respectively published in volume 1 of Proclamations and Orders in Council, the first one at page 28, the next one I have referred to at page 61, and the third one I have referred to at page 107. These orders in council were made under the authority of the War Measures Act, and it is hoped that the authority of the War Measures Act will not now long remain a basis for the provisions in question.

The purpose of the bill is to give to the exchequer court jurisdiction in prize and to declare what is the prize law in Canada.

There have been twelve prize cases instituted in Canada since the beginning of the war, only two of which have been finally disposed of. The proceedings in the prize court were in most cases taken for the purpose of clearing title to ships and were allowed to remain in abeyance as soon as that purpose had been served and the ships made available to the allied nations. That is perhaps all I need say on the principle of the bill. There probably will be explanations that members will wish to have in committee, and I shall be glad if I can to answer any questions that may then be asked.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Charles H. Larose, Esquire, Acting Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Honour, the Deputy Administrator, desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly the house went up to the senate.

And having returned.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the house that the Deputy Administrator had been pleased to give in His Majesty's name the royal assent to the following bills:

An act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1946.

An act for carrying into effect the agreement for a food and agricultural organization of the united nations between Canada and certain other nations and authorities.

CANADA PRIZE ACT

PRIZE COURTS AND PRIZE LAW—EXCHEQUER COURT JURISDICTION

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. St. Laurent for the second reading of Bill No. 10, to provide for a prize court and prize law in Canada.

On motion of Mr. Hackett the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

He said:

I

FINANCIAL REVIEW

Mr. Speaker, in presenting to the house tonight the government's proposals for meeting the financial requirements of the present fiscal year in a budget, which is the first to follow the cessation of hostilities both in Europe and in the Pacific, I am reminded that six years and one month ago, on September 12, 1939, I presented at the special session of parliament, on behalf of the then Minister of Finance, the first budget following the outbreak of war.

I was impelled to warn at that time against expecting the war "to be a short and only moderately expensive one" and said further, "We must make our plans now with the full realization that we may be in for years of strenuous national effort". Though we foresaw the kind of problems we would have to meet and something of the magnitude of the effort, none of us realized how strenuous or how long those years would be.

It is a matter for great thankfulness that we have accomplished the task and that we can now confront, in good order and in good heart, a future which is filled with problems and difficulties but also with promise.

It was helpful to me in preparing this budget, and I think it will be helpful to the house, to take a glance back over the rugged path which we have travelled before turning our attention to the road ahead.

In the budget speech of September 1939, certain broad principles of war finance were laid down. The first one was that we should "follow as far as may be practicable a pay-as-you-go policy". It was explained that in the view of the government this meant a rapid increase in the level of taxation as our war effort and national income expanded, having due regard to the needs of war, the necessity of preserving incentive, and the need for allowing individual savings to be made. In the course of the war, the government was seldom criticized for not pressing forward rapidly enough on this policy.

The income tax was increased by 20 per cent in 1939 and moved in three more swift steps to the full war level established in the budget of 1942. The increase to this level of income taxation with the provision for refundable taxes was made possible by the withdrawal of the provincial governments from the income tax fields under the agreements of 1941. In 1943, without increasing the general level of the personal income tax, the pay-as-you-earn system was adopted and collections put on a current basis. In the course of these changes, by advancing the dates of payment we were able to augment the revenue of the war years substantially. With the exception of the cancellation of the refundable feature of the personal income tax in 1944 and of minor amendments, the taxation of personal incomes remains at the level established in 1942.

The Excess Profits Tax Act, provisionally enacted in the fall of 1939, was given its present form in 1940, and in 1942 the rate on the "excess profits" was increased to 100 per cent of which 20 per cent is to be refunded. Succession duties were first imposed in 1941 and have not been changed since except in minor degree.

In 1940 and 1941 new and increased commodity taxes were imposed for exchange reasons, to encourage transfer to war production and for revenue. Since 1942 the main increases in taxation have been in indirect taxes applying to commodities and services which were not necessaries of life and of which frequent purchase gave some evidence of ability to pay.

By about the middle of the war we had thus reached nearly the full war-time level of taxation. By previous Canadian standards, the level of taxes was enormously high. It was, however, by no means the highest tax level among comparable countries and, generally speaking, the taxation of the lower incomes was less severe than in other countries.

The result of the balance we endeavoured to keep between taxation and borrowing has been that up to March 31, 1945, after meeting all other expenditures, we covered about 45 per cent of our war expenditures out of current revenues.

The second principle enunciated in September 1939 was that, after an initial credit expansion, designed to facilitate a rapid increase in production, we should endeavour to limit our borrowings as closely as possible to the genuine savings of the country. In pursuit of this principle, our initial borrowing was from the chartered banks, followed by a war loan offered to the public but not distributed among individuals by the intensive effort which has characterized the victory loans. In May 1940, war savings certificates were instituted and the campaign to increase savings which is still being carried on was begun. With the first victory loan of May 1941, full emphasis was given to borrowing the savings of individuals, and the organization which later became the national war finance committee began the notable and patriotic work which they are still carrying on with such great initiative and thoroughness. In the first victory loan the number of individual cash subscriptions was 946,549. In the eighth victory loan of last May, the number of individual subscriptions was 3,178,275. I trust that in the ninth victory loan which is being offered to the public this month this great number will be maintained or exceeded. It is difficult to estimate the importance for the future of the very large savings now held by individuals in this country. It is possible to make a rough estimate only of the savings held by Canadian individuals in certain liquid forms. Such an estimate, which cannot be too wide of the mark, indicates that as of May 31, 1945, in currency, bank deposits, refundable taxes and Dominion government securities, Canadian individuals held savings of more than nine and a half bilion dollars and that these savings had increased by more than six and a half billions since the end of 1938. The major item in these savings is dominion government securities estimated at five and a quarter billion dollars. These figures do not, of course, include all the savings of individuals but only savings held in the liquid forms specified. They do not include savings in the form of insurance, pensions, homes, or corporate securities.

The third principle which we set out at the beginning of the war was that in our borrowings we would endeavour to set the rates of interest as low as possible. We began our public borrowings in January 1940 with the issue of a 3¼ per cent bond having an average maturity of ten years. The long-term issue which is being offered in the ninth victory loan has a term of twenty years and ten months and carries a rate of 3 per cent. At the rates now obtaining, a ten-year bond such as was issued at 3¼ per cent in January 1940 could now be issued at 2·59 per cent. As of March 31, 1939, the average rate of interest paid on the funded debt was 3·52 per cent. On March 31, 1945, the average rate had fallen to 2·51 per cent.

The fourth principle laid down for war-time financial policy was part and parcel of the other principles. It was a definite rejection of the methods of inflationary finance. That principle has affected all our operations in the fields of taxation and borrowing but its pursuit has also led us to many major decisions in other fields. It emerged in its most comprehensive form in the historic decision of October 1941, to consolidate our wage controls, institute salary control and impose a comprehensive price ceiling as of that period. The progressive development of many additional controls over the supply and distribution of goods lent support to this structure.

These simple principles have led us a long way. They have permeated war-time financial and economic policies and have given them solidity and coherence. The carrying out of these policies throughout the fields of finance and economic stabilization has been recognized, I think, as one of the most substantial of our war-time achievements and one most appreciated by the people of this country.

I have recalled briefly some of these points of war-time policy as foreshadowed in the first war-time budget because we now stand at the beginning of a new period and face new conditions and new problems. The policies which we have followed during the war have an important bearing on the choices which now confront us.

GOVERNMENT ACCOUNTS AND FINANCING, 1944-45

It is only right that I should say something concerning the financial results of the fiscal year ending March 31, 1945, but I shall confine myself to a few brief statement since the present fiscal year is already half gone and the final figures for 1944-45 are given in some detail in the budget papers which I shall table before sitting down. Further, the full public accounts for the past fiscal year will, I hope, be presented to the house shortly.

In the year 1944-45, total revenues, including refundable taxes, amounted to somewhat more than $2,900 million, a slight decrease from the revenues of the previous year. Total tax revenues, including refundable taxes, were somewhat down from the previous year, at $2,374 million. This moderate reduction in tax revenues occurred mainly in the yields of the personal income tax and the corporation tax, and to a less extent the excess profits tax. Among commodity taxes, the revenues from spirits and malt, cigars, cigarettes and tobacco, and gasoline, all showed substantial increases.

Ordinary expenditures for the year were $767 million compared with $630 million in the previous year. More than half of this increase was the result of increased public debt charges. The other major increase was in the expenditures of the Department of Veterans Affairs. War expenditures, including Mutual Aid, were $4,400 million, or slightly lower than in the previous year. The grand total expenditure was $5,246 million, about $75 million less than the previous year. Since total revenue, exclusive of refundable taxes, was $2,687 million, the over-all deficit for the year was $2,558 million, or approximately $1 million greater than in the previous year. This amount is the extent of the increase in the net debt during the year.

Other financial requirements for loans and advances and investments are set out in some detail in the budget papers which I shall table and I shall not attempt to review them here except to say that the amounts have turned out to be smaller than I anticipated in the budget of last year. Total borrowings for the year, including refundable taxes, amounted to approximately $3,360 million. Of this, $219 million was obtained in refundable taxes and $2,948 million through the sale of victory bonds and war savings certificates. I should say here that, as explained in the budget papers, the amount set aside for refundable taxes is abnormally high. It has been found as returns are assessed that taxpayers have tended to credit too much of their payments to the corporation tax and too little to the excess profits tax or not to distinguish between them. It has become necessary therefore to increase the liability for refundable taxes. The remaining borrowings were obtained by an increase in treasury bills and deposit certificates outstanding, and in the floating debt. The total amount borrowed, $3,360 million, was used to meet maturities of $252 million, to increase holdings of cash by $152 million, and to finance the cash deficiency of $2,955 million arising from the budgetary deficit and the loans, advances and investments made during the year.

As at March 31, 1945, the total unmatured funded debt, including refundable taxes, amounted to $13,984 million. The net debt was $11,298 million, having increased during the year by the amount of the budgetary deficit. The funded debt carried annual interest charges of $351,590,000. The average rate of interest was 2·51 per cent as compared with 2·54 per cent as at March 31, 1944.

The most notable financial operations of the year were the successful conclusion of the two great victory loan campaigns. The achievements of the national war finance committee in the sixth and seventh victory loans in the fiscal year 1944-45 were exceeded only by their later success early in this fiscal year in carrying out the eighth victory loan.

II

BUDGET FORECAST 1945-46 AND FINANCIAL PROPOSALS

The financial proposals which I have to lay before the house are for the requirements of the current fiscal year 1945-46 but I realize that with six months of the fiscal year gone by and with hostilities ended I shall be expected to look further forward than the end of March next. The budget which I am presenting is a war budget in that, as I have already told the house, war and demobilization expenditures will continue for a short time at high levels even though hostilities have ended and though the demands of the armed services on men and materials have fallen and are falling rapidly. The financial needs of war and demobilization are still very great in this as in every other country. On the other hand, this is also the first peace-time budget and its effects on employment and income must be accepted as of major importance.

The expenditure estimates for this fiscal year are known to the house. The main estimates covering non-war expenditures require $1,024 million. The war estimates stand at $3,365 million. The expected expenditures for war service gratuities and reestablishment credits as authorized by statute are $240 million. We expect that we shall need to ask about $30 million by way of supplementary estimates. Our total expenditures for the year are therefore estimated to be approximately $4,650 million.

On the revenue side it is estimated that under our present tax laws, revenues in 1945-46, not including the refundable portion of the taxes, will be $2,515 million, as compared with $2,687 million in the previous year. I shall place on Hansard a statement showing the details of this estimate in comparison with the revenues of 1944-45:

	1945-46 (millions)	1944-45 (millions)
Customs duties	$ 120	$ 115
Excise duties	175	152
Sales tax (net)	225	210
War exchange tax	75	98
Other excise taxes	250	236
Income taxes:
Personal	725	768
Corporate and excess profits tax	710	742
Interest and dividends	29	28
Succession duties	20	17
Miscellaneous	8	8
Total tax revenue	$2,337	$2,374
Less refundable taxes	72	219
Net tax revenue	$2,265	$2,155
Non-tax revenue	150	145
Total ordinary revenue	$2,415	$2,300
Special receipts	100*	387
Total revenue	$2,515	$2,687

It is indicated in the table that under the present tax laws we anticipate some declines in the sales tax and the war exchange tax, though the declines will be partly offset by the reduction of refunds on purchases for other governments. We anticipate some increase in revenues from excise duties and from excise taxes on tobacco. We likewise anticipate that there will be moderate increases in the revenues from excise taxes on retail purchases, gasoline, amusements and similar taxes. Personal income tax would be expected to decline somewhat were it not for the channelling back through this tax of repayments of the portion of family allowances which duplicates the tax credits allowed to taxpayers in respect of dependent children. We look for some substantial decline in the combined revenue from the corporation income tax and excess profits tax.

On these estimates there will be a decline of about $150 million in our revenues this year, though this decline is to be attributed to the distribution of rebates and refunds as between this year and last year. Taking approximate figures, expenditures of $4,650 million and revenues of $2,500 million would result in a budgetary deficit for 1945-46 of $2,150 million, or approximately $350 million less than the deficit last year.

I have explained to the house on an earlier occasion that, as in other years, we will have substantial financial requirements outside the budget. It will be necessary in the reconstruction period to extend credits to allied countries for the financing of their needs and of our export trade. On a later occasion the house will be asked to approve a very large increase in the amount already provided under the Export Credits Insurance Act and to make such provision for other loans and investments as may be required. Though these amounts cannot be fully estimated at this time, it is anticipated that to provide such credits and to make loans to the foreign exchange control board may require in the neighbourhood of $800 million this year, bringing our total financial requirements for the year to about $5,400 million, an amount which is $300 million less than the total cash requirements of the past fiscal year. No provision has been included in these figures for subscriptions to the international monetary fund or the international bank for reconstruction and development, to which, if the house approves the legislation to be introduced, only token contributions would be made this year.

These are our requirements up to March 31, 1946 and, while they represent a reduction from the previous year and some shift from expenditures to loans, they are, as the house will see, at a very high level. These requirements in themselves do not suggest that the Minister of Finance is in a position to forgo any revenue which he might otherwise obtain.

In thinking over the financial problems of an initial peace-time budget, I had occasion to look back to the budgets of 1919 and 1920 following the first world war. I found that in June, 1919, seven months after the end of hostilities, the then Minister of Finance estimated an increase in expenditures for 1919-20 and that in fact his estimate proved to be much too low. I found that the income tax, which was then admittedly at very low levels by present day standards, was increased in that budget by amounts ranging from about a third to 100 per cent of the existing rates and that the corporation tax was increased. In May, 1920, the personal income tax was again increased by adding 5 per cent to the rates in all brackets above $5,000 and an imposing array of luxury taxes was proposed, although some of them were later withdrawn. The business war profits tax was extended for another year, though its effect was alleviated somewhat by raising the exempted rate of earnings from 7 per cent to 10 per cent. The 7½ per cent customs war duty was removed from all imports. In 1921 the business war profits tax was discontinued but the sales tax was instituted and there was some increase in excise duties.

I have not referred to these budgets of my predecessors to make any unfavourable comparison or to question the judgment which they applied to the circumstances of their time. It is, however, I think, important to realize that the rapid increase in taxation which we were able to accomplish during the war and to which the people of this country gave such loyal support has left us less restricted in our choices to-day than were the ministers of finance at the end of the last war. I would further point out that, while they found as I have found that war expenditures do not drop as quickly as do war activities, nevertheless most of the increase in government expenditures following the first world war was the direct result of the wartime and post-war inflation which drove up prices and with them unavoidably government expenditures. No one is more impatient than the Minister of Finance at the slowness with which war expenditures decline. Nevertheless, they did in fact begin to decline this year as soon as hostilities ceased and our stabilization policy has so far saved us from facing that post-war increase in expendtiures which was so great and disruptive a fact in 1919 and 1920. It is essential that we maintain our stabilization policy until the danger lessens.

BASIC CONSIDERATIONS

The most obvious consideration in the mind of a Minister of Finance in framing budget proposals is the financial requirement of the future. I have already pointed out that our financial requirements for the present fiscal year will be at a high level, though reduced from the level of the previous fiscal year and very substantially reduced from those which we anticipated in the budget of 1944.

In speaking on the resolution introducing the war expenditures and demobilization bill, I intimated that our requirements over the twelve months from November 1, for which funds are being borrowed from the public in the ninth victory loan, would probably be in the neighbourhood of $4,000 million. This will be still a large requirement but it will represent an accelerating decline in government expenditures from the time of the cessation of hostilities in Europe. I have already explained to the house the chief factors which retard the more rapid decline of expenditures —the lag in payments for supplies and services delivered in the past, the length of time covered by the payment of pay and allowances, deferred pay, war service gratuities and reestablishment credits for members of the armed services being demobilized, and the necessity of financing relief through our contributions to UNRRA and of extending export credits to allied countries who must feed their populations, replenish their stocks and reconstruct their industries, if, as we anticipate, they are to be valued customers and trusted friends in the future.

Looking further into the future, there are too many uncertainties in the currents of world events which affect Canadian trade and industry for me to venture a definite estimate of our financial requirements for the whole of the fiscal year 1946-47. The lag in payments for war supplies will be overcome and the payments cease. As the peak of demobilization is passed, demobilization costs will decline rapidly. The industries of allied countries will be rehabilitated and they will find in their own exports increasing sources from which to finance their import trade. Some of the remaining need may be met by the international monetary fund and the international bank. If reconstruction proceeds steadily in the world outside, we can anticipate further substantial reductions in expenditure in 1946-47.

Faced with the present fact of a very large deficit in a fiscal year of which five months had passed before hostilities had ended, and with the prospect of declining expenditures, it may well seem prudent to maintain our revenues, reduce our borrowings and extinguish our deficit as rapidly as possible. Such a policy is not without its attractions to a Minister of Finance but there are other considerations which claim attention.

The second consideration is economic. The government has adopted, as a major aim of government policy, the maintenance of a high and stable level of income and employment. Accordingly, it becomes a major consideration in budget policy. The present condition, as I see it, is that the outflow of war workers from war plants has been pretty well completed. The demobilization of the armed services is proceeding rapidly and will continue at a high level for some time. Civilian industry and employment are expanding rapidly. There are many projects in contemplation or under way for extended capacity and employment. Capital is plentiful. Consumers have unprecedented liquid savings, some substantial part of which they hope to spend as soon as their requirements can be met and met at reasonable cost. The urgent demand for housing needs no emphasis on my part. Deferred maintenance and other urgent and necessary works of railways, public utilities and governments are awaiting execution.

It is urgently necessary that the construction of houses proceed at the maximum possible rate. It is desirable that investment, which will lead to increased employment, should be made as quickly as supply conditions warrant. It is desirable that, as rapidly as finished goods can come on the market, consumers' needs should be met. It is not desirable that the government should through its expenditures compete with these demands for labour and materials, except for the most urgent needs.

During the war, there has been built up a system of taxation which is discouraging to investment, to enterprise and to consumer expenditures. In many of its aspects it was designed to be discouraging and restrictive to all activities not necessary to the prosecution of war. Some taxes were intended to restrict trade. Others have had the effect of increasing costs. I recognize that in the course of six years, war-time taxation has begun to blunt incentives and if continued indefinitely will paralyse the development of industry and trade.

This is a consideration of the greatest national importance. In such modifications as it is possible to make in taxation, it is imperative that we do what we can to reduce costs, restore incentives, encourage investment in the expansion of the employing-capacity of our industries whether in small or large enterprises and promote efficiency in production and export.

I probably do not need to elaborate on the third major consideration. We must maintain for some months yet the economic stabilization policy. It has been a sheet anchor during the war and is not to be cast off while there is still danger that what we have gained should be quickly lost. Recalling the course of events after the first world war, we must recognize the danger that the rush of consumers to buy, of traders to replenish their stocks and of producers to enlarge their capacity may easily result in an inflationary boom. In avoiding the rock on one side, we could be swallowed up in the whirlpool on the other. Our tax changes must be such as to contribute to employment and income, not merely to inflation and speculation.

There is another set of considerations of which there is not time to speak as fully as their importance warrants. Following the budget of 1941, the government entered into agreements with the provincial governments for the exclusive use of the corporation and personal income tax fields. By their terms, those agreements expire near the end of 1946. In August of this year the government laid before the representatives of the provincial governments comprehensive proposals for new agreements covering taxation and dominion-provincial relations generally. If they should be accepted, these proposals will, to an important degree, affect the continuing financial requirements of the government and the considerations under which it must frame its tax laws. If no agreement is reached, and the present agreements expire, the dominion is bound then to reduce the taxation of corporations by 10 per cent and to revise its personal income tax downward. In these circumstances, it would clearly not be prudent to take now hasty and irretrievable steps in the modification and reorganization of our tax structure.

It is in the light of these considerations that the proposals which I am about to make have been framed. We have fortunately reached the time when, despite our large requirements, we can contemplate some reduction in taxes. In doing so, we should bear in mind the paramount importance of assisting speedy reconversion, of restoring incentives, and of encouraging enlarged and efficient production and export on which our employment, income, and welfare depend. There are many and varied demands of the moment for tax reduction or elimination but it is necessary for all of us to think not of the moment but of the future, and of the interests of the nation as a whole.

THE WAR EXCHANGE TAX

A war exchange tax of ten per cent on all imports from non-empire countries was imposed in 1940. I am proposing that this tax should now be discontinued.

There were sound reasons for imposing this tax but the reasons for removing it have now become compelling. Though the tax affects many consumer items, its major impact is on producers. We are in a period when production, both primary and secondary, is changing over from a war market to a non-war market both at home and abroad. Export markets will become increasingly competitive. Primary producers must to a considerable extent reequip themselves. Industry must be extensively modernized. An important part of the equipment and supplies for production will be imported and it would be shortsighted policy not to assist producers in reaching the lowest possible cost of expansion, modernization and operation. It is undesirable that this tax should be capitalized into the costs of the future.

The removal of the tax will have some immediate benefit for the consumer particularly in increasing the availability of supplies. Its ultimate benefit to the consumer will be very great. The removal will ease the problem of readjusting the somewhat higher prices of our neighbours to the price level which we have maintained in this country.

The imposition of this tax was fully justified by the circumstances of war and by the acute scarcity of United States dollars. It was recognized, however, that the tax was discriminatory and could not be justified under conditions of normal trade. I am glad that under present circumstances it is both desirable and possible to remove the tax and it will be discontinued as from midnight to-night.

It has been estimated that this tax would yield us in the present fiscal year $75 million. This sum, however, is subject to very substantial refunds on purchases for other governments, and it is swollen by the extensive purchase of war supplies in the United States. Though it is difficult to make an estimate, it seems probable that the loss of revenue will be about $60 million in a full year and not more than $30 million in the current fiscal year.

THE SALES TAX

I have been impressed also with the extent to which the sales tax is having a discouraging effect on the rapid and efficient modernization of our productive equipment. Whereas the war exchange tax affected imported equipment only, the sales tax applies to imports and home production alike. It is highly important in this period when the transition is being made from war to civilian production and when extensive investments in plant, machinery, tools and dies are necessarily being made, and when primary producers are replacing and improving their equipment, that we should wherever possible remove taxes which result in higher costs. Particularly we should remove those taxes which, imposed far back in the production process, increase costs out of proportion to the contribution which they make to the revenue. It is especially important that if such reductions in taxation are to be made, they should be made now so that industries should not face the future with inflated costs of construction and equipment. It is of importance further that in the expansion of our peace-time exports and in the entry of the new industries into the export field this handicap to competition in world markets should be removed.

It is proposed to exempt from sales tax machinery and apparatus (not including office equipment or motor vehicles) which, in the opinion of the Minister of National Revenue, are to be used directly in the manufacture or production of goods. This exemption from sales tax will be effective as from midnight to-night.

The house will note that the sales tax is being removed from machinery and apparatus used in the manufacture or production of goods but not those used in distribution or in the rendering of services. The principle which we are endeavouring to follow is to remove the sales tax from the costs of those industries which bear sales tax on their products, including also those whose products have been deliberately exempted as in the case of food products. The sales tax will be imposed still on machinery and apparatus used in distribution and in service industries on which no sales tax is levied.

Nearly all the machinery used by primary producers is already specifically exempt from sales tax but the provision which is now being proposed will extend the exemption somewhat further.

It is estimated that in a full year this exemption from sales tax will result in a loss of revenue of about $30 million, of which about half will be suffered in the current fiscal year.

There are some amendments to the Special War Revenue Act which are of less importance and I shall do no more than mention them. It is proposed to simplify the present unsatisfactory taxation on furs. At present there is a twenty-five per cent excise on furs, levied at the point of dressing and dyeing, and no sales tax on furs as such. The sales tax is, however, imposed on fur-trimmed garments. It is now proposed to reduce the excise tax to ten per cent and to subject all garments and articles of fur as well as fur-trimmed garments to the eight per cent sales tax. The main result of this change will be simplification and uniformity of tax treatment but there will also be some slight reduction in the tax on furs generally and a more substantial reduction in the tax on furs used in the trimming of cloth garments. The time of reclassifying manufacturers of fur garments as manufacturers for sales tax purposes will be announced by the Minister of National Revenue after a survey of the inventory position.

At the present time Canadian tourists returning from the United States are given an exemption on purchases up to $100 which they bring in with them. Under the present law the retail excise tax is levied on articles included in such purchases. The tax is difficult to collect and it is felt that its collection is an unnecessary reduction of the tourist privilege which has been reciprocally extended between ourselves and the United States. It is therefore proposed to exempt these purchases from the retail excise tax.

The considerations, which we have had in mind in framing the budget proposals, indicate that tax reductions should be concentrated on the most vital points and should not extend to the taxation of consumer commodities in general. There are other and more appropriate ways of stimulating consumer buying to the extent that it requires stimulation beyond its present high level. There will be later periods when reduction of taxes on the classes of consumer commodities subject to tax will be more necessary and will have a more beneficial effect than now.

THE EXCESS PROFITS TAX

The Excess Profits Tax Act is a war measure which has commanded overwhelming support as an important and necessary instrument of war finance. Unmodified, it seriously weakens the stimulus toward the investment of capital and the efficient operation of enterprises. In this period of reconstruction it is becoming a barrier to expanding employment.

I have therefore three major modifications to propose. The first has to do with sole proprietorships and partnerships. The incomes of these firms are also subject to the personal income tax and the excess profits tax has perhaps been particularly severe on them, particularly on some smaller firms which have experienced no great increase in profits during the war. I am conscious of the fact that in the United States the excess profits tax has never been imposed on such firms. It is now proposed to remove from all sole proprietorships and partnerships the 15 per cent rate on total profits but to leave them for the time being subject to the excess rate. In the other proposals which I have to make there will also be additional relief to this class of firms.

The second proposal is concerned with small firms whether incorporated or not. It has been argued that such small firms have suffered more than most by reason of the fact that they could be reasonably expected to grow proportionately more than the larger firms. Many of these firms have only the minimum rate of standard profits of $5,000. Many have expanded during the war and it is represented that they can be a very great factor in providing employment in the post-war period. The position of such firms has been substantially relieved both in the United Kingdom and in the United States. It is accordingly proposed to increase the standard profits of all firms by half the difference between their present standard profits and $25,000. This will have the effect of raising the minimum standard profits from $5,000 to $15,000. Further, in the case of a firm whose present standard is $13,000, its new standard will be $19,000. Firms which have a standard profit of $25,000 or more will not be affected by this proposal.

Under this and previous recommendations, upwards of 12,000 businesses will be released entirely from excess profits and many others will experience some diminution of tax.

The government has reached the conclusion that in a period when we wish to encourage the fullest expansion of employment and income the 100 per cent rate under the Excess Profits Tax Act cannot reasonably be maintained. Now that we are moving from war to peace its undesirable effects become greater. The Excess Profits Tax Act has been in operation from the beginning of the war and the standard profits established on the basis of average profits before the war are becoming more and more out of date. There is widespread evidence that incentive is being stifled and that ordinary prudence in the making of business expenditures has been seriously weakened.

As an interim step towards the ultimate abolition of the excess profits tax, it is proposed (a) to abolish the twenty per cent refundable portion of the excess profits tax; and (b) to reduce the rate on excess profits to sixty per cent. The simple effect of the proposed legislation will be that all corporate profits will bear a rate of forty per cent, and corporate profits in excess of 116⅔ per cent of standard profits will bear an additional tax of twenty per cent. In the case of sole proprietorships and partnerships, the rate on profits in excess of approximately 117 per cent of standard will be sixty per cent. It is proposed that these changes in the Excess Profits Tax Act should be effective as from January 1, 1946.

It is estimated that as a result of these changes the government will lose its source of borrowing $72 million as the refundable portion of the excess profits tax; that the reduction of the excess rate to sixty per cent will result in a loss of revenue of $72 million in a full year; that the raising of the standard profits for small firms and the exemption of unincorporated firms from the fifteen per cent rate will cost $22 million.

Confronted as we are by continuing war expenditures and with business profits still extremely buoyant as a result of high government spending and rising private expenditures, I have reached the conclusion that it is not in the interest of the country and of an orderly and rapid transition to a peace-time economy to remove the excess profits tax entirely at this time. In stating this conclusion, I do not in any way qualify the previous assurances that have been given that the excess profits tax will not be retained indefinitely.

Nor is it possible in my view at present to modify the 40 per cent rate on corporations. If the present tax agreements with the provinces lapse without being replaced by new agreements, the government is bound to reduce the corporation rate by ten per cent. If new agreements are reached the rate can be reduced promptly but to reduce the rate now by any substantial percentage and be bound to reduce it by ten per cent more at the end of 1946, would, in my view, establish too rigid a programme of tax reduction. There are, I have no doubt, substantial arguments for some reduction but the considerations stated have appeared to the government conclusive. I am bound to add further that only a very small proportion of the complaints received by the Department of Finance concerning business taxation have referred to the 40 per cent rate.

There are certain less important changes which it is proposed to make in the Excess Profits Tax Act. Now that the 100 per cent rate is being reduced to 60 per cent, it is proposed to remove the limitation which has hitherto been imposed by administrative regulation on expenditures in advertising. Its removal will of course date as from January 1, 1946.

There has been a provision of some importance to the mining industry under which the profits of new base metal or strategic mineral mines have been exempted from excess profits tax for the first three years of their operation. This exemption is due to expire on December 31, 1945. It is proposed now to extend it and to include thereunder the profits from gold mines and from certain industrial-mineral mines.

It is proposed also to extend for another year the tax credits allowed to mining and oil companies for off-property expenditures on exploration and in the case of oil companies for expenditures on deep-test wells.

In respect of forest industries, it is proposed to allow by administrative regulation the amortization of any unamortized portion of capital expenditures where, as a result of fire, insects, disease, or storm, operations in a particular area are abandoned.

In the budget of last year provision was made to allow the writing back to the profits of a war year of one-half the maintenance and repair expenditure incurred in a designated post-war year. In view of the continuing shortage of certain materials and the large amount of construction work to be done, the period has not as yet been designated but continuing consideration will be given to the matter.

THE PERSONAL INCOME TAX

I turn now to the personal income tax from which currently about one-third of our tax revenue is derived. I think there is no doubt that the personal income tax in the post-war period will continue to occupy a major place in our taxation structure. The extent and nature of the requirements of the government will necessitate dependence on the personal income tax as a major element in the taxation system. It should be, however, an income tax carefully revised to ensure its efficiency and its suitability to the post-war requirements.

As I have recalled to the house earlier, the present personal income tax was built up to its war-time level and system of collection at the source between 1939 and 1943. Many devices, including a somewhat elaborate system of refundable taxes, were adopted in order to make severe taxation tolerable in the varying circumstances of different groups. As a general rule, very high taxation must be complicated unless parliament is willing to be ruthless in the face of the hardship of individual situations. I would go further and state that the longer very high taxation remains in force, the more complicated it will become through acceding to demands for special alleviation. In 1944, provision for the refundable portion of our personal income tax was rescinded though its calculation still enters into the calculation of the tax payable. This contributes what is now an unnecessary complication to the tax.

There are clear and obvious reasons for as early a reorganization and simplification of this tax as is practicable. These reasons have been very actively in mind. As I studied the matter, however, I became aware of other important considerations. A thorough and workmanlike overhaul of the whole personal income tax structure can be undertaken most effectively in the light of a realistic post-war level of taxation. In presenting the budget a few weeks after the cessation of hostilities, a budget for a fiscal year which is already half gone, the Minister of Finance cannot, with assurance, project his estimates so far ahead. The government has made certain financial and other proposals to the provinces. If they are accepted, the government will bring forward legislation for extended social security measures involving a contribution, which, whatever its form, will have an important bearing on the equitable distribution of income tax rates. If the proposals are rejected by the provinces and no general agreement is reached, the dominion is obligated to make some reduction in its tax rates and will have to consider what responsibilities it can assume, in those circumstances, in respect to any or all of the proposals.

Any reorganization of the personal income tax must be so carefully and thoroughly done that it will not have to be re-done in the early future. I have somewhat reluctantly reached the conclusion that, at this early date and in view of the contingencies involved in our discussions with the provinces, it is wise not to attempt to combine an immediate revision of the whole personal income tax structure with reduction of the tax.

My colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, has found, however, that it is possible, even though the law is not simplified, to introduce administratively a great simplification for the taxpayer himself. When the returns for 1945 are due it will be found that a greatly simplified system of calculation has been introduced. This is not a matter of legislation but more specific information can be given the house on a convenient occasion.

The considerations which are important in contemplating some reduction of the personal income tax are those which I emphasized earlier. It is not possible, at this early date and with high continuing commitments, for a responsible Minister of Finance to propose lavish reductions in any major tax. He has to reckon with a future in which our commitments vis-a-vis the provinces are unknown. He has to plan for reasonable contraction of the budgetary deficit. I am impressed, however, with the great and harmful effect which our present high personal income tax is having in discouraging work and initiative in all groups at a time when we need a rapid expansion of employment and a willing mobility of labour. I laid great stress on these harmful effects in 1944 when the refundable portion of the tax affecting mainly the lower-income groups was removed. Conversely, I am convinced that a reduction in the personal income tax can make a major contribution to the stimulation of initiative and employment.

REDUCTION IN TAX PAYABLE

I think it wise therefore to recommend an interim measure of prompt and unquestionable relief. It is proposed that the tax levied shall be abated by 16 per cent dating from October 1, 1945. This abatement of 16 per cent will be applied to the current tax deductions at the source just as soon as the necessary change can be made. Since the change is applicable from October 1, the abatement on the whole tax liability for 1945 will amount to 4 per cent. For a full year, the abatement will be 16 per cent of the tax liability.

This is an interim measure to be applied immediately and to continue until it is possible to combine further abatement with a thorough overhaul of the whole rate structure of the personal income tax. I would hope that new arrangements with the provinces and further progress in the transition to peace-time conditions would have so clarified the outlook that it would be possible in the budget of 1946 to propose such a comprehensive revision.

ADJUSTMENT FOR FAMILY ALLOWANCES

In addition to the major change which I have just explained, there are a number of further important amendments being proposed. On the coming in force of the Family Allowances Act it was necessary, to implement the provision of that act, that steps should be taken under the Income War Tax Act to adjust the deduction from income tax on account of dependent children in order to avoid duplication where family allowances were being paid in respect of such children. A table was issued at that time showing the adjustment of tax deductions at the source in accordance with this principle. For the sake of simplicity, the table was in the form of a recapture of a stated percentage of the family allowance according to the taxable income of the taxpayer. Its effect, however, was to reduce or eliminate the tax credit allowed for children dependent on the taxpayer and on behalf of whom family allowances had been received during the year. For the sake of simplicity also, the adjustment was approximate, care being exercised that no one was penalized and that on the whole taxable persons in the lower income groups retained some net gain as the combined result of family allowances and tax credits under the Income Tax Act. In view of the proposed tax abatement, it is necessary to provide a new scale of adjustments for 1946.

In the budget of last year I announced that there were certain complicated tax problems which I felt required more concentrated attention and more public consideration than the Department of Finance was able to give to them, and that I should recommend the appointment of two special commissions to report on these problems. These commissions were appointed, have conducted extensive inquiries and both of them have now reported.

ANNUITIES AND FAMILY CORPORATIONS

The report of the commission on the taxation of annuities and family corporations under the chairmanship of Mr. Justice Ives presented its report last spring and the report has been printed and made public. I have no doubt that members of the house are familiar with its recommendations. The government is prepared to accept all the main recommendations of this commission and I am proposing that, in so far as legislation is required, the necessary amendments should be introduced. Without entering into the arguments by which the commission supported its recommendations, I will state very briefly what the government's proposals are. It is proposed that in respect of contractual annuities, the capital element in such annuities should not be taxed. It is recommended that annual or periodic payments under wills or trusts should be subject to income tax only to the extent that they are paid out of income. In respect of pensions, the resolutions will provide for the taxation of all pensions except that, where an employee has not in the past been entitled to a deduction from taxable income in respect of his contributions, an appropriate portion of the pension shall be exempt from tax when received by him or by his dependents. Earnings in the hands of trustees of pension funds are to be made exempt from income tax. The commission recommended that the present limits placed on deductions from income in respect of employers' and employees' contributions to an approved pension fund or plan should be removed. It is fair enough to exempt reasonable contributions to moderate pensions from tax and to tax the pensions as paid. There may, I think, however, be some danger in giving unlimited freedom in respect of really large contributions to pensions which may represent a major form of investment. I have noted that one of the particular concerns of the commission was that present allowances were too low in view of the fact, which the commission reported, that under present low rates of interest it might require as high as a nine per cent contribution from the employer and an equal amount from the employee to provide a pension equal to half the employee's salary. So as not to grant an undue amount of freedom before bringing all pension funds under continuing supervision, I am recommending that the deduction to be allowed to an employee annually in respect of his current contributions to a pension fund or to an employer in respect of any employee should not exceed $900. Further, it is proposed to take steps to implement the recommendation of the commission that pension funds should be subject not only to the approval of the tax authorities but to continuing supervision.

The second main subject on which the Ives commission reported was concerned with the distribution of surpluses which had been accumulated by private closely-held companies from 1917 to 1939. The problem before the commission was to determine what, if any, abatement of income tax should be made on the distribution of such surpluses in the event of the death of a principal shareholder and for the payment of succession duties. In respect of private closely-held companies, the government proposes to implement the main recommendation of the commission on this point. It is proposed that surplus accumulated from 1917 to 1939 by such companies should be free from tax in the hands of the shareholders if the company pays a tax thereon as provided in the schedule recommended by the commission and if the company elects before December 31, 1947, to pay such tax.

The commission made a further recommendation to the effect that on the reorganization, winding-up or discontinuance of business of any private company, the undistributed income deemed to be a payment of dividend under the present law should be reduced by an amount equal to twenty per cent of the income after tax earned in 1940 and subsequent years. This is a very drastic modification of existing practice and of the basic view of income established in our tax laws. This particular recommendation did not carry the unanimous judgment of the commissioners and it is the government's view that it ought not to be implemented immediately but should be subjected to further study.

TAXATION OF COOPERATIVES

The second royal commission was directed to report on the taxation of cooperatives. Its report has been received only very recently and it is now being printed for tabling in the house and distribution. There has not as yet been time to give full study to the report but, if it is possible to do so, I shall introduce in the committee on ways and means further resolutions for such changes in taxation as seem desirable after consideration of the recommendations of this commission.

Several less important amendments which are being proposed in respect of personal income tax I shall mention only briefly. It is proposed to drop the requirement by which those disbursing dividends, registered interest and royalties are required to deduct at the source seven per cent on behalf of the taxpayer. This requirement is of little value in obtaining current payment of taxes which the taxpayer himself is required to pay in instalments. The requirement that the disbursers of these payments must report the amount of the payments to the inspector of income tax will of course be retained and it is this which is the important provision as far as ensuring the reporting of income is concerned. The elimination of the seven per cent deduction at the source will save a very considerable amount of clerical work and some confusion to small taxpayers.

MEDICAL EXPENSES

The house will recall that we have had in the income tax law for some time an allowance on account of unusual medical expenses which was introduced in order to provide some alleviation under circumstances which frequently gave rise to hardship. The alleviation is one, I believe, which has been much appreciated. It is proposed to enlarge the provision somewhat to allow in the event of the death of the taxpayer the expenses paid by the estate of the deceased to qualify for the allowance and to allow the deduction from taxable income to be taken in the year prior to the death of the deceased.

ARMED FORCES

There has been a special exemption in the Income Tax Act for those members of the armed forces whose duties were performed afloat or in aircraft, and a similar exemption was allowed to civilians employed in flying by the Royal Air Force Transport Command. Now that active hostilities have ceased, the occasion for the exemption has disappeared and the exemption is being withdrawn.

ALBERTA BONDS

Last spring in connection with plans which were being worked out for the repayment of Alberta bonds and in an attempt to forestall any speculative gain on the part of those who might trade in Alberta bonds, I undertook to recommend a special tax of 100 per cent on profits made through the purchase of such bonds. I shall therefore recommend the imposition of a 100 per cent tax on any profits made on Alberta bonds purchased between January 31, 1945, and August 7, 1945. By the latter date the full terms of the offer of the Alberta government had been made known and time had been given for full publicity.

I have received strong representations in favour of a change in the law which would allow the acceptance of the average income over a period of years as the taxable income of farmers and fishermen whose incomes are subject to great variability on account of weather as well as of markets. I have been impressed with the reasonableness of the requests, though hitherto the proposals made have involved collecting a tax from farmers and fishermen in bad years in which they might actually have had a loss. I am hopeful, however, that a solution can be found to the problem and I am prepared to give the most sympathetic consideration to the inclusion of a provision of this sort in a revised income tax law.

There have been a considerable number of inquiries as to when the refundable portion of the personal income tax is to be returned to the taxpayer. It is provided in the act that in the case of taxes paid on income for the 1942 taxation period, repayment shall be made not later than the end of the second fiscal period commencing after the cessation of hostilities. That means that refunds on 1942 taxes must be paid not later than March 31, 1948. Refundable taxes for 1943 must be repaid not later than March 31, 1949, and those for the six months of 1944 not later than March 31, 1950. These are the latest dates at which the refunds can be made. It is open to the governor in council to make refunds at earlier dates but there is no provision for the return of these funds selectively to some individuals and not to others. The present time does not appear to the government to be a period in which such a general refunding of these sums is desirable owing to the strong inflationary pressures which still exist. Under changed conditions, the government would give consideration to the payment of these refunds without necessarily waiting till the dates specified.

SUCCESSION DUTIES

There are two simple amendments to the Succession Duty Act which I shall propose. In accordance with the recommendation of the Ives commission, it will be recommended that no succession duty shall be levied on the value of any pension receivable as taxable income with appropriate apportionment in the event of a pension being partly taxable and partly non-taxable. There has not hitherto been in our Succession Duty Act any provision for alleviation of succession duties in respect of so-called quick successions. Having examined the legislation in the United Kingdom and the United States on this matter, I am recommending provision for a percentage reduction in succession duties where the same property passes again as a result of a second death within a period of five years from the first death on which the property became subject to succession duties.

There is quite a number of amendments to the Customs Tariff Act but most of them are matters of redefinition and administrative convenience rather than of major importance. I shall defer my explanations of them until the resolutions are before the house.

CONCLUSION

This completes the proposals which are being put forward in this budget. The expected effects on the revenue are summarized in a table which I shall place on Hansard:

Loss of Revenue Resulting from Budget Proposals
(millions of dollars)

	Full year	Current fiscal year
War exchange tax.....	60	30
Sales tax.....	30	15
Excess profits tax.....	95	10
Personal income tax....	115	45
	300	100
Loss of refundable portion of excess profits tax	72	7

On a full year the loss of revenue from these interim tax reductions will amount to approximately $300 million. In the current fiscal year, the reduction in the excess profits tax which dates from January 1 next will have only nominal effect as even firms operating on a calendar year basis will not have remitted taxes on the new schedule before March 31. The loss of revenue from the personal income tax will be somewhat less than half of the annual loss since some payments on 1945 income are not due until April 30. The estimated loss of revenue in 1945-46 is therefore $100 million. This will reduce our estimated net tax revenues from $2,265 million to $2,165 million and increase the probable deficit from $2,150 million to $2,250 million.

In recommending these interim tax reductions, my major concern has not been the financial results of the current fiscal year. I have been concerned with making such reductions as would speed up the transition to peace-time conditions and contribute promptly to the expansion of enterprise and employment. I have been willing therefore to look beyond the end of this fiscal year and, despite uncertainty as to the tax fields which we can occupy exclusively in the future, recommend these immediate steps which will have the effect of maintaining the incomes from which all government revenues are derived.

In a period when the transition to peace-time employment is proceeding rapidly and government expenditures are being replaced by the expenditures of the public on investment and consumption, the right course seems to me to encourage that shift by tax reduction and endeavour in the months ahead to reduce our war expenditure as rapidly as possible.

There is another word to be said. By reducing taxes, we are leaving a somewhat larger deficit than otherwise to be covered by borrowing. As I have said before, our total requirements over the next twelve months are likely to be as much as $4,000 million. With these tax reductions, we cannot expect to cover more than about $2,000 million by revenues. A victory loan campaign is being launched this month to obtain from the public the funds necessary to finance most of the remainder. No other victory loan will be offered in the next twelve months. The public will be asked to subscribe their accumulated savings and to pledge their savings over the next twelve months in the purchase of bonds. I cannot emphasize too strongly the continuing need for savings. There will be over the months ahead some legitimate and increasing expenditure of war-time savings by individuals in acquiring houses and in making some of the purchases deferred for the war. As one who has had some responsibility for encouraging war-time savings, I am anxious that they should meet the real needs of the individual whether those be improved housing, better standards of living or better provision for old age. I do not want to see them dissipated as were savings after the first world war in unnecessary spending at inflated prices. There is still great national need for systematic saving and prudent spending. Hostilities have ended but men have still to be brought home and reintroduced to civil employment. Our world trade must be reestablished and our customers temporarily financed. The appeal of the government for this victory loan is still urgent and it is a national appeal.

I referred earlier in this speech to the road which we have travelled in financial and economic policy during the war. The recommendations of this Budget are that we now begin to direct our course toward the needs and requirements of a peaceful future. We are making good progress in the transition. There are difficulties and there will be setbacks, but they are proving less rather than more than we anticipated. If we move in good order and with the interest of the nation as a whole at heart, we can carry the achievements of the war into the achievements of peace in the months and years to come.

RESOLUTIONS

Income War Tax Act

Resolved that it is expedient to amend the Income War Tax Act, and to provide

1. That for 1945 and subsequent taxation years the capital element in contractual annuities be exempt from tax;

2. That for 1945 and subsequent taxation years annual or periodic payments received under the provisions of a will or trust be considered taxable income to the extent only that they are paid or deemed to be paid out of the income of the estate or trust;

3. That the income of all approved superannuation or pension funds or plans in 1946 and subsequent taxation years be exempt from tax in the hands of the trustees;

4. That all payments of superannuation or pension to former employees or their dependents in 1946 or subsequent taxation years be taxable income, provided that, where a former employee has not in the past been entitled to a deduction from income in respect of his contribution to an approved fund or plan, only a proportionate part shall be taxable;

5. That the limitations on deductions for contributions in 1946 or subsequent taxation years by an employer or an employee to a superannuation or pension fund or plan be increased to $900, and that the percentage limitation in respect of the employer's contribution be removed;

6. That the exemptions and deductions for 1946 and subsequent taxation years in respect of a superannuation or pension fund or plan be conditional upon the continuing approval of the fund or plan by the Minister of National Revenue;

7. That a payment on or after October 13, 1945, to an employee in respect of loss of office be deemed to be income of such employee over a period of five years;

8. That, in lieu of the taxes otherwise payable by shareholders of a private closely-held company in respect of earned surplus accumulated by the company from the beginning of its 1917 fiscal period to the end of its 1939 fiscal period, the company be allowed to elect to pay a tax equal to the aggregate of the taxes calculated in respect of the allocable portion of each shareholder determined in accordance with the following table:

On the first $25,000, or any portion thereof, 15 per cent,

$8,250 on an allocable portion of $50,000 and 21 per cent on the amount by which the portion exceeds $50,000 and does not exceed $100,000,

$18,750 on an allocable portion of $100,000 and 24 per cent on the amount by which the portion exceeds $100,000 and does not exceed $200,000,

$42,750 on an allocable portion of $200,000 and 27 per cent on the amount by which the portion exceeds $200,000 and does not exceed $300,000,

$69,750 on an allocable portion of $300,000 and 30 per cent on the amount by which the portion exceeds $300,000 and does not exceed $400,000,

$99,750 on an allocable portion of $400,000 and 33 per cent on the amount by which the portion exceeds $400,000;

9. That the provision contemplated by Resolution 8 be applicable only if the company elect on or before December 31, 1947, and that the tax be payable in four annual instalments, the first one being due on December 31, 1947, with interest at 4 per centum per annum on each instalment from December 31, 1946, until due and thereafter until paid at 7 per centum per annum;

10. That for 1944 and subsequent taxation years the provision for deductions of unusual medical expenses be extended in the event of the death of the taxpayer either in the taxation year or subsequently to include expenses incurred and paid either by him or by his estate in a 12-month period commencing in the taxation year;

11. That the requirement to deduct 7 per cent tax at source on payment of interest, dividends or royalties be discontinued after December 31, 1945;

12. That for 1946 and subsequent taxation years the exemption of the service pay and allowances of members of the Canadian naval, military and air forces while on active service in Canada or anywhere in the western hemisphere whose duties are of such a character as are required normally to be performed afloat or in aircraft be rescinded;

13. That for 1946 and subsequent taxation years the exemption of one-third of the remuneration paid to the civilian officers or employees of the Royal Airforce Transport Command whose duties are of such a character as are required normally to be performed in aircraft be rescinded;

14. That the exemption of limited dividend housing corporations be broadened to include institutional housing corporations and institutional holding companies as defined by The National Housing Act, 1944;

15. That a special tax be imposed equal to 100 per cent of the profits made by persons who between January 31, 1945, and August 7, 1945, purchased bonds or debentures of or guaranteed by the province of Alberta which were outstanding on January 31, 1945, and were included in the debt reorganization proposal of the provincial government, dated July 16, 1945, such profits to be the difference between the purchase price and the selling price of the bonds or debentures, if sold by such purchasers, or the difference between the purchase price and the total value of rights accruing to the purchasers on implementation of the provincial government conversion plan, as the case may be;

16. That the right of a corporation whose principal business is the production, refining, or marketing of petroleum or petroleum products to deduct 40 per centum of the exploration costs and drilling costs of oil wells which prove to be unproductive be extended to wells spudded in before the thirty-first day of December, 1946;

17. That the right of a corporation, association, syndicate or exploration partnership, formed for the purpose of exploring and drilling for oil, to deduct 26⅔ per centum of exploration and drilling expenses be extended to expenses incurred in 1946;

18. That the right of a corporation, association, syndicate or exploration partnership, formed for the purpose of exploring and drilling for natural gas, to deduct 30 per centum of exploration and drilling expenses be extended to expenses incurred in 1946;

19. That a corporation whose chief business is that of mining or exploring for minerals be allowed to deduct 26⅔ per centum of prospecting, exploration and development expenses incurred in 1946 in searching for minerals;

20. That the right of corporations, associations, syndicates or exploration partnerships whose principal business is production, refining or marketing of petroleum or exploration or drilling for petroleum to deduct 50 per centum of expenditures made directly or indirectly in connection with deep test oil wells which prove to be unproductive be extended to wells spudded in before the thirty-first day of December, 1946.

21 (a) That in respect of persons other than corporations the tax for 1945 be reduced by 4 per cent of the aggregate of the normal tax, the graduated tax and the investment surtax;

(b) That in respect of persons other than corporations the tax for 1946 be reduced by 16 per cent of the aggregate of the normal tax, the graduated tax and the investment surtax;

22. To provide for an appropriate additional tax dependent on the income of the taxpayer in cases where family allowance payments are received in order to adjust the benefits in respect of dependent children.

Excess Profits Tax Act

Resolved that it is expedient to amend the Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940, and to provide

1. That individuals and partnerships be exempt from the 15 per cent tax on total profits of 1946;

2. That the tax on excess profits of individuals and partnerships in 1946 be reduced from 100 per cent of the excess profits to 60 per cent of that portion of the excess profits which are in excess of 117·647 per cent of the standard profits, and that the provision for refund of a portion of the tax be repealed;

3. That for 1946 the following rates of tax apply to corporations:

(a) 22 per cent of the profits of corporations and joint stock companies before deduction therefrom of any tax paid thereon under the Income War Tax Act;

(b) in the case of corporations and joint stock companies which have filed consolidated returns, 20 per cent of the profits which are in excess of 117·241 per cent of the standard profits of such consolidated companies;

(c) in the case of other corporations and joint stock companies 20 per cent of the profits which are in excess of 116·66 per cent of the standard profits; and that the provision for refund of a portion of the tax be repealed;

4. That on the profits of 1946 and subsequent years the minimum standard profits of taxpayers be increased from $5,000 to $15,000, and that where a taxpayer's standard profits are on January 1, 1946, in excess of $5,000 but less than $25,000 they be increased by one-half the difference between their present amount and $25,000;

5. That the special rate of tax applicable to businesses commencing after June 24, 1944, not apply to cases where in the opinion of the Minister there has been no bona fide commencement of a new or substantially different business;

6. That the exemption of the profits of corporations derived from the operation of any base metal or strategic mineral mines be extended to the profits of corporations derived from the operation of gold mines and industrial mineral mines, and that such exemption be extended to the profits of such mines which come into production after January 1, 1946.

Dominion Succession Duty Act

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend The Dominion Succession Duty Act, and to provide

1. That no duty shall be leviable on the value of any pension or portion thereof which is receivable as taxable income within the meaning of The Income War Tax Act.

2. Where the minister is satisfied that succession duty has become payable upon or with respect to the succession to any property and that subsequently within five years succession duty has again become payable upon or with respect to the succession to the same property or any part thereof, on the death of the person to whom the property passed on the first death, the amount of succesison duty payable on the second death with respect to the succession to such property shall be reduced as follows:

(a) where the second death occurs within one year of the first death, by fifty per centum;

(b) where the second death occurs within two years of the first death, by forty per centum;

(c) where the second death occurs within three years of the first death, by thirty per centum;

(d) where the second death occurs within four years of the first death, by twenty per centum;

(e) where the second death occurs within five years of the first death, by ten per centum.

Special War Revenue Act

Resolved that it is expedient to amend the Special War Revenue Act, and to provide

1. That the consumption or sales tax shall not apply to machinery and apparatus and complete parts thereof which, in the opinion of the Minister of National Revenue, are to be used directly in the process of manufacture or production of goods; provided that this exemption shall not apply to office equipment or motor vehicles;

2. That the retail purchase tax shall not apply to goods valued at not more than $100 included in baggage accompanying residents returning from abroad after an absence of not less than 48 hours such as is presently allowed in the case of other excise taxes;

REVENUES 1944-45

2. Dominion government revenues for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1945, totalled $2,687,334,000, a decline of $77,684,000, or 2·8 per cent, from the previous year, which had been the highest in the dominion's history. The above figure represents the net revenue after deducting reserves established for the refundable portions of the personal income and excess profits taxes, and refunds and drawbacks against customs duties and excise and other taxes. The decline in total revenue was largely due to the fact that the amounts debited on these accounts were substantially higher than in the previous year. Details relating to these debits are given in later paragraphs. A table on page 16 also gives a detailed comparison of the actual revenue figures for the year with the forecast made in the budget speech of June 26, 1944.

3. A feature again prominent in the tax revenue of the year was the large proportion derived from direct taxation of income. This form of taxation is generally recognized as being most equitable. Under the individual income tax it is possible to impose taxation measured approximately by the individual ability to pay, while direct levies on corporations under the corporation and excess profits taxes assure that abnormal and unreasonable profits are not made from war production. The proportion of tax revenue derived from direct taxes in 1944-45 was 62·0 per cent compared with 32·6 per cent in 1938-39, the last pre-war year.

4. An amount of $219,500,000 representing taxes estimated to be refundable under the provisions of the Income War Tax Act and the Excess Profits Tax Act has been deducted from the overall total revenue to present a net figure for the year. This amount does not relate solely to taxes collected in the year 1944-45 but includes some additional provision for previous years which are detailed more fully under the sections relating to income and excess profits taxes below. Taken together with the amounts previously set aside on this account the latest provision brings the net accumulated liability to the end of 1944-45 to a total of $444,271,000 of taxes refundable in the post-war period. Of this amount $259,771,000 is in respect of individual income tax and $184,499,000 is in respect of the excess profits tax.

ORDINARY REVENUES

5. Net revenue from customs duties for the fiscal year 1944-45 amounted to $115,091,000, compared with net revenue of $167,882,000 in the preceding year.

6. The explanation of this sharp decline in net revenue lies partly in a small reduction in gross customs receipts, but was due primarily to a marked increase in the amount of refunds and drawbacks debited from this source during the year. As explained in the Public Accounts for 1943-44, the taxation of war supplies and munitions produced on behalf of our allies underwent a development during the war which had a marked effect on government revenues. Prior to April 1, 1943, importations into Canada or purchases in Canada by or on behalf of allied governments were granted exemption from customs duty and also from sales tax and any other excise taxes that would normally have applied, although purchases by the Canadian government for its own account were subject in full to all applicable taxes. With the adoption of the mutual aid programme the Canadian government became the purchaser of a substantial proportion of munitions and other war supplies procured in Canada for the use of other governments, and during the fiscal year 1943-44 only those supplies which were purchased in Canada for cash by allied governments were exigible for tax exemption, which exemption was granted in the form of a rebate, subsequent to the time of purchase, of the amount of duties and taxes included in the purchase price. In the fiscal year 1944-45 this policy was extended to provide for the refunding of duties and taxes on goods delivered under mutual aid as well as those paid for by cash in Canada.

7. The effect of this change was to bring within the scope of taxation in the first instance a substantial volume of war supplies excluded prior to April 1, 1943, which was the principal factor in accounting for the rise in gross receipts from customs duties and certain other taxes in the fiscal year 1943-44. At the same time it was known at the end of the fiscal year 1943-44 that a substantial but indeterminate amount of this increased revenue would be subject to rebate, and it was indicated in the public accounts for that year that there were arrears of refunds to allied governments then outstanding which had not at that time been determined. With the extension of the scope of the refunding procedure to include deliveries under mutual aid during the fiscal year 1944-45 it was also evident that the volume of such rebates would be increased over that of the previous fiscal year.

8. In the course of the fiscal year 1944-45 progress was made in determining and refunding the amount of duties and taxes not only in respect of 1943-44 but also in respect of 1944-45, so that by the time the books for the latter year were closed substantially all rebates on goods delivered to the end of that year had been made. In the results, however, not only the rebates of the year 1944-45 were debited against the revenue of that year but also the arrears of rebates from the previous year, which reduced customs and excise revenues to a much greater extent than if there had been no carry-over of arrears from the previous year and correspondingly left revenue for the previous year higher than if it had been possible to determine and refund the proper amount of taxes allocable to that year. The overall effect on customs refunds and drawbacks was that the total, including refunds on other accounts, increased from $20,010,000 in the fiscal year 1943-44 to $58,638,000 in the fiscal year 1944-45. It was this marked increase in refunds, attributable to the causes set forth above, which explains the decline in net customs revenue.

9. Excise duties are levied exclusively on alcoholic beverages and tobacco products. Revenue in the fiscal year 1944-45 amounted to $151,922,000, some $9,798,000 higher than the previous year, of which increase alcoholic beverages contributed $6,211,000 and tobacco products $3,237,000. The increase in the former classification was attributable largely to higher revenues from beer, while cigarettes accounted for the largest part of the latter increase. The extent of the smokers' contribution to the federal treasury is indicated by the overall revenue from tobacco products which, including the additional taxes imposed under the Special War Revenue Act on tobacco, cigars, cigarettes and cigarette papers and tubes amounted in the fiscal year 1944-45 to $152,106,000, or a sum in excess of one-third of the total tax revenue of the government in the last pre-war year, 1938-39.

10. Under "excise taxes" are included the wide variety of commodity taxes levied under the Special War Revenue Act, of which the sales tax and the war exchange tax are the largest revenue sources. Gross revenue from excise taxes in the fiscal year 1944-45 amounted to $737,784,000, some $64,823,000 higher than the previous year, but total refunds of $194,719,000, compared with $34,342,000 in the previous year, reduced net revenue in 1944-45 to $543,065,000, some $95,554,000 ower than 1943-44. The increase in refunds on excise taxes, mostly in respect of the sales tax, was attributable to the same circumstances as were outlined in the section dealing with customs revenue.

11. The two major revenue sources, sales tax and war exchange tax, showed respectively an increase in gross revenue of $64,853,000, and a decrease of $20,749,000. The increase in sales tax revenue is to be attributed mostly to the higher level of munitions production, while the decrease in war exchange tax revenue arose from the exemption of certain imports, including raw cotton and cotton yarns, agricultural implements and several other classes, from application of the tax. All other excise taxes yielded $235,511,000, exceeding the revenue of the previous year by $20,718,000. The significant increases occurred under the following headings (the amount shown is the increase in 1944-45 over 1943-44).

1. Cigars, cigarettes and tobacco..	$ 7,618,000
2. Gasoline	4,741,000
3. Transportation and communications	1,825,000
4. Stamps, etc., including payment of taxes on jewellery, chinaware cabaret attendance, etc	1,561,000
5. Toilet preparations and soaps..	1,022,000
6. Furs	1,020,000
7. Electric and gas appliances.....	754,000
8. Phonographs, radios and tubes..	621,000

12. Certain other revenues, on the other hand, suffered some reduction due largely to rationing of domestic consumption. The most important of these was sugar revenue, which declined from $13,049,000 to $11,744,000.

13. The personal income tax, again the largest single source of revenue, yielded a total of $767,755,000, compared with collections of $813,435,000 in the previous year. The decline was due to the fact that collection of the refundable tax ceased after July 1, 1944, thus reducing receipts for the last nine months of the fiscal year.

14. In 1944-45 a deduction was made of an amount of $95,000,000 in respect of the refundable portion of the tax which brought net revenue down to $672,755,000. This was lower than the net revenue of $698,435,000 in the previous year, a reduction which was largely attributable to the fact that the amount of $95,000,000 deducted for refundable taxes in 1944-45 related only to the extent of $70,000,000 to tax revenues of that year, the balance of $25,000,000 representing an increase in the reserves previously set aside against the two earlier years in which this requirement was in effect. The estimated total accumulated liability in respect of refundable taxes paid on personal incomes for the three taxation years, 1942, 1943 and 1944, has now been provisionally established at $260,000,000. Of this total amount $60,000,000 relates to 1942, $130,000,000 to 1943, and $70,000,000 to 1944. The reserves now provisionally established for 1942 and 1943 represent increases of $5,000,000 and $20,000,000 respectively over the amounts established previously for those years, the total increase of $25,000,000 being included in the figure of $95,000,000 deducted from revenue of 1944-45 fiscal year.

15. Corporation income tax and excess profits tax, both of which are levied on business incomes, may appropriately be discussed together. Revenue from the corporation income tax amounted to $276,404,000, as compared with $311,379,000 in 1943-44, while revenue from the excess profits tax, before deducting the estimated refundable portion, was $465,805,000, only slightly less than the figure of $468,718,000 for 1943-44.

16. It will be noted that from the excess profits tax revenue for 1944-45 there has been deducted an amount of $124,500,000 in respect of the refundable portion of the tax, as compared with a deduction of $40,000,000 in 1943-44. The magnitude of the figure for 1944-45 deserves some comment. It represents a substantial revision in the amounts previously set aside in earlier years and also the establishment of a liability against 1944-45 at a much higher level than was previously anticipated. The explanation of this upward adjustment lies in the fact that the early estimates of the refundable portion of excess profits tax were based on the level of revenue from that tax as indicated by annual receipts under that heading. It has become apparent, however, as an increasing volume of corporation returns for the war years are assessed, that the distribution of tax liability between the corporation income tax and the excess profits tax is weighted more heavily towards the latter tax than the flow of revenue had indicated. This disparity is probably in large part explained by the fact that in making their monthly instalment payments many taxpayers, although paying a correct amount in total, distinguished inaccurately or do not distinguish at all between the corporation income tax and the excess profits tax portions of their payment. It will only be possible to make an exact allocation of revenue between the two sources as assessment of corporation returns progresses and the correct total distribution of tax liability is determined.

17. This reallocation of revenue will be effected through transfers from one source to the other as returns are assessed, and probably will not be completed for some time. It was felt appropriate, however, to anticipate in so far as possible the final effect of this redistribution in establishing the reserves for the refundable portion of the tax. On the basis of such final figures as are now available it has been estimated that the reserve for refundable portion of excess profits tax revenues collected in 1942-43 and 1943-44 should be increased from the amount of $60,000,000 then provided to an amount of $119,500,000, an increase of $59,500,000, and that the reserve in respect of 1944-45 should be established at $65,000,000, subject to further change as final and accurate figures become available. With these additions the accumulated liability to March 31, 1945, amounted for all years to $184,500,000.

18. Revenue under the heading of dividends, interest, etc., is derived from special taxes imposed on certain income under Section 9b of the Income War Tax Act. In 1944-45 this revenue amounted to $27,053,000, increased by some $1,382,000, and was derived for the most part from the 15 per cent tax levied on interest and dividends paid to non-residents.

19. The dominion government has levied succession duties only since 1941, and revenue from this source is showing a gradual increase from year to year. In 1944-45 it amounted to $17,251,000 as compared with $15,020,000 in 1943-44 and $13,273,000 in 1942-43.

20. Small amounts of tax revenue are derived from the tax on the note circulation of the chartered banks, which decreases from year to year with the decline in circulation of such notes as provided by statute; from taxes on the net premium income of insurance companies; from a tax on the export of electrical energy from Canada, and from a tax on the export of furs from the northwest territories. Revenue from all these taxes amounted in 1944-45 to $8,234,000.

21. Non-tax revenues for 1944-45 amounted to $145,471,000, an increase of $12,188,000 over 1943-44. Receipts from the post office total $66,056,000, an increase of approximately, $4,985,000. The receipts from the post office exceeded the cost of operations by about $11,427,000 without taking into account any credit for service rendered other departments free of charge and without adding to the cost of operations, rentals and other costs of premises occupied by the post office. Return on investments realized $60,749,000, an increase over the previous year of about $12,468,000. The larger items making up this total are: interest on advances to Canadian National Railways, $18,282,000; Bank of Canada profits, $18,079,000; interest on loans to Foreign Exchange Control Board, $5,951,000; interest on bonds held in securities investment account, $5,545,000; interest on loans to National Harbours Board, $4,000,000; interest on loans to provinces, $2,927,000; interest on loans to Canadian Farm Loan Board, $911,000; Soldier Land Settlement loans, $797,000, and interest on advances to Canadian National Railways for purchase of railway equipment, $1,792,000.

SPECIAL RECEIPTS AND CREDITS

22. The total amount for the fiscal year 1944-45 under this heading is $387,237,000, compared with $194,924,000 for the previous year. Refunds of previous years' war expenditures totalled $298,626,000, of which the department of Munitions and Supply accounted for $220,831,000; the Department of National Defence, Army services, $52,210,000; Navy services, $2,867,000 and Air services, $20,981,000. The three principal items under the Department of Munitions and Supply were, net production refunds representing mainly return of working capital advances from prefinanced plants, $206,146,000; refunds from contracts in connection with cost audits, voluntary refunds, negotiation of contracts, etc., $9,121,000, and miscellaneous refunds from sundry companies, $4,618,000. Included in the amount of $20,981,000 under Air services, are amounts totalling $7,985,000 received from the governments of the United States, the United Kingdom and other government departments for materials and equipment supplied, and an amount of $3,097,000 received from the government of New Zealand representing certain liabilities due under the terms of the agreements governing its participation in the British Commonwealth Air Training Plan, No. 1. The remainder constitutes chiefly refunds on contracts after cost audits and proceeds from the sale of materials and supplies.

23. The amount classified as miscellaneous war revenue is $45,884,000, of which $31,445,000 represents net revenue derived from the operation of government-owned companies and crown plants—sundry companies. Some of the other items making up this total are net revenue from the sale of gasoline ration books, $1,581,000; rental of buildings and equipment and return on plant investment and working capital loans from sundry companies, $1,678,000; sundry permits and sales, Department of National Defence, Army services, $2,583,000; Navy services, $590,000; Air services, including equipment and supplies furnished other government departments, $3,461,000, and Department of Transport, made up mainly of the balance of the operating surplus as at March 31, 1945, of the Dominion Lighthouse depot at Prescott, Ontario, $2,231,000.

24. Other large items recorded under the heading of special receipts and credits are, sale of surplus war assets, $8,408,000; asset values of properties disposed of under lease purchase option agreements previously charged to war appropriation, $7,143,000, and $22,400,000, representing the net result of the changes in the dominion's equity in the Canadian National Railways for the calendar year 1944, due to surplus earnings of the Canadian National Railways of $23,027,000 less loss on capital abandonments of $627,000. This last item of $22,400,000 increased the book valuation of the Canadian National Railways' securities trust capital stock and accordingly is offset by a contra amount appearing on the expenditure side under the heading "Other Charges."

25. The table which follows gives a summary of the forecast made at the time of the last budget of the probable receipts from the various sources of revenue during the fiscal year 1944-45, and a comparison of these forecasts with receipts for the fiscal year. The increase in total receipts over the amount forecast in terms of percentage, excluding estimated refundable portion of income and excess profits taxes is 3·3 per cent.

EXPENDITURES, 1944-45

26. Expenditures are dealt with under the usual classifications, viz. (1) Ordinary expenditures; (2) Capital expenditures; (3) War expenditures; (4) Special expenditures; (5) Government owned enterprises; (6) Other charges. All disbursements under these categories, with the exception of active loans and investments charged to the War Appropriation Acts, are included as expenditures in arriving at the over-all deficit or increase in net debt.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

ORDINARY EXPENDITURES

27. Ordinary expenditures totalled $767,376,000 in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1945, compared with $630,381,000 in the previous year or an increase of $136,995,000. A few of the larger contractual and uncontrollable items, such as interest and other charges on the public debt, pensions, unemployment insurance, post office, subsidies and payments to provinces under the dominion-provincial taxation agreements, war service gratuities and re-establishment credits total $642,100,000 or 83·7 per cent of total ordinary expenditure.

28. Details of some of the larger increases in ordinary expenditure over the previous fiscal year are as follows:

Increased interest and public debt charges	$77,707,000
Increase in Post Office expenditure	6,144,000
Increase in old age pensions and pensions to blind persons	1,810,000
Increase in administrative cost of Department of National Revenue, including income tax	2,393,000
Increase in premium, discount and exchange expenditure	16,348,000
Increase in cost of treatment and after care of returned soldiers and allowances to dependents	5,795,000
War service gratuities and credits (new item)	20,228,000

29. Smaller increases, as well as decreases effected during the year are revealed in the five-year table. It should be noted, however, that many increases in expenditure which are classified as ordinary expenditures are in fact made necessary by or arising out of the war.

CAPITAL EXPENDITURES

30. Capital expenditures totalled $3,164,000 in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1945, compared with $2,622,000 in the previous fiscal year. The main items classified as capital are the expenditures arising out of the dredging of the St. Lawrence ship channel, improvements in connection with civil airways and airports and the construction costs of the new Prince Edward Island car ferry.

WAR EXPENDITURES

31. Under the authority of the War Appropriation Act and the War Appropriation (United Nations Mutual Aid) Acts, $4,453,685,000 was disbursed. Of this amount $35,239,000 was for loans, advances and investments treated as active assets, and the remainder $4,418,446,000 was classed as war expenditures. The following table gives the same classification for the last six fiscal years:

Fiscal Year	Charged to Active Assets	War Expenditures	Total
1939-40	9,092,742	118,291,022	127,383,764
1940-41	26,379,066	752,045,326	778,424,392
1941-42	42,816,676	1,339,674,152	1,382,490,828
1942-43	65,231,622	3,724,248,890	3,789,480,512
1943-44	91,906,305	4,587,023,094	4,678,929,399
1944-45	35,238,956	4,418,446,315	4,453,685,271
	270,665,367	14,939,728,799	15,210,394,166

32. The following table gives a summary of the disbursements from the War Appropriation Acts divided between the amounts classified as expenditure and those classified as active assets.

Total active loans, advances and investments from the War Appropriation, 1944-45	35,239,000
Total disbursements from the War Appropriation, 1944-45	$4,453,686,000

33. The table in the preceding section does not include recoverable outlays made under the provisions of section 3 of the War Appropriation Act which are also classed as active assets rather than expenditure. Under this section, the government of Canada may act as the agent of an allied government for any purpose which will aid directly or indirectly in the prosecution of the war and any obligations or costs incurred temporarily or assumed may be paid out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund. Furthermore, any expenditure required to be made by the government under any contract for war supplies entered into for the purpose of enabling any company wholly owned by the government to fulfil its obligations in respect of orders received by such company from an allied government may also be paid out of unappropriated moneys.

34. The principal items of war expenditure for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1945, and the four preceding fiscal years are detailed on pages 1027 and 1028. An explanation of a few of the more significant changes is appropriate. The first is the large increase in the expenditure for overseas war establishment, from $383,888,000 to $759,070,000, which was due to (1) the establishment of additional squadrons, (2) provisional payment of $100,000,000 to the government of the United Kingdom on reserve stores and pipe line supplies and (3) an advance payment of $134,000 to the government of the United Kingdom for advance training of air crew personnel.

35. A new item of war expenditure that deserves explanation is the expenditure of $50,199,000 by the Canadian Mutual Aid Board for military relief. This amount was provided to cover expenditures made during the fiscal year in connection with Canada's share of the cost of relief supplies furnished by the allied military forces in Europe to civilian populations during the period of military responsibility.

36. The large decrease under the Department of Munitions and Supply for the expansion of war industry from $677,804,000 to $205,038,000 was due to the curtailment of capital expenditure and recovery of prior years' working capital part of which was used for financing operations during the current year.

SPECIAL EXPENDITURES

38. Special expenditures for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1945, totalled $7,506,000 compared with $37,496,000 in the previous fiscal year. This decrease is occasioned mainly by the decrease in the payments of awards to farmers under the Wheat Acreage Reduction Plan.

GOVERNMENT OWNED ENTERPRISES

39. The classification of expenditures entitled Government Owned Enterprises comprises the losses of and non-Active Advances to Government Owned Enterprises which had been established before the war and are operated as separate corporations. As the Canadian National Railways has shown substantial annual surpluses since 1940, expenditure under this heading since the fiscal year 1940-41 has been of minor importance, the total for 1944-45 being $1,358,000.

Canadian National Railways

40. The operating revenues of the Canadian National Railways for the calendar year 1944 totalled $441,148,000, the highest in the Company's history.

41. Operating expenses of the railway amounted to $362,547,000, an increase of $38,072,000 over the previous year. This increase was occasioned by the higher wage rates prevailing in 1944, higher prices for materials and additional maintenance expenditures.

42. The net operating revenue of the railway was $78,600,000 and after deducting $10,876,000 for taxes, equipment and joint facility rents, there remained a net railway operating income of $67,725,000. Other income, less deductions, amounted to $3,372,000, and accordingly the net income available for payment of interest was $71,097,000. After payment of interest charges of $28,136,000 on debt held by the public and interest charges of $19,934,000 due to the government in respect of temporary loans for capital and refunding purposes, there was a net cash surplus of $23,027,000. This cash surplus was paid to the government in redemption of loans and advances.

43. The operating deficit of the Prince Edward Island Car Ferry and Terminals during 1944 was $773,000 compared with $698,000 in the previous year.

Canadian National Steamships

44. The Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited, in the calendar year 1944 produced an operating profit of $1,974,000. After payment of $521,700 in bond interest and exchange and $181,000 in current interest due to the government, there was available $1,271,000 which was paid to the government in reduction of interest arrears and capital advances.

National Harbours Board

45. The operating income of the National Harbours Board for the calendar year 1944, after payment of interest to the public but before depreciation, reserve for replacements and interest on Government advances totalled $5,580,515 compared with $4,596,917 in 1943. Interest paid to the government in the fiscal year amounted to $4,000,000.

46. Financial assistance provided by the government to the National Harbours Board and charged to expenditure under the category of Government Owned Enterprises totalled $584,674, divided as follows: $59,000 for the operating deficit of Churchill Harbour: $275,000 for non-active advances to meet the deficit of the Jacques Cartier Bridge at Montreal: $47,500 for the retirement of maturing debentures of the Saint John Harbour Commission and $28,000 for capital expenditures, Saint John Harbour; $16,500 for capital expenditures, Halifax Harbour and $158,400 for the retirement of maturing debentures of the Three Rivers Harbour Commission. Details of expenditures charged to the War Appropriation are given under "War Expenditures".

47. The elevators at Port Colborne and Prescott operated at a profit during the year and $291,000 was paid to the government.

OTHER CHARGES

48. The total of Other Charges, the final category of expenditures was $47,762,000.

49. The largest item in this category is the amount of $25,000,000, which has been added to the reserve to meet possible losses on the ultimate realization of active assets. This is the same amount as has been provided in the four previous fiscal years and the total reserve therefore now amounts to $125,000,000. The annual write-off from active assets of Soldier and General Land Settlement Loans amounted to $325,000 and the concellation of Canadian Farm Loan Board Capital Stock amounted to $1,000. The provision of the reserve and the two write-offs resulted in a proportionate increase in the dominion's net debt.

50. There was written-off from non-active assets an amount of $36,000 representing the yearly established losses on Seed Grain and Relief account administered by the Department of Mines and Resources. As this account is classified as a non-active asset and therefore included in the net debt of Canada it is offset by a similar amount on the Revenue side under "Other Receipts and Credits".

51. The remaining items in Other Charges totalling $22,400,000, relate to the Canadian National Railways Securities Trust stock. The value of this stock which represents the dominion's equity in the Canadian National Railways increased during the year by $23,027,000, due to the surplus earnings of the System for 1944, less $627,000 due to capital abandonment during the year. The Canadian National Railways Securities Trust Stock is carried in the dominion's books as a non-active asset, and thus the net debt of Canada is not affected by these transactions.

SUMMARY OF EXPENDITURES

52. The grand total of expenditure for the fiscal year 1944-45 under the various categories enumerated, namely Ordinary Expenditures, Capital Expenditures, War Expenditures, Special Expenditures, Losses of and non-active advances to government-owned enterprises, and Other Charges, was $5,245,612,000.

53. The following table shows the percentage distribution of estimated revenues and expenditures for a number of important items. Receipts from various taxes and other revenue sources, after deducting the $219,500,000 of income and excess profits taxes estimated as refundable after the war, are shown as percentages both of total revenues and of total expenditures. Similarly, several of the main items of expenditure or groups of such items are shown as percentages both of total expenditures and of total revenues. The purpose of this table is to enable broad conclusions to be drawn as to the relative burdens imposed on the public treasury by the war and the main services or obligations of government.

54. It should be noted that many expenditures attributable to the war are not charged to the War Appropriation. The interest on the increased public debt and practically all the expenses of war-expanded departments like the Post Office and National Revenue—are charged to Ordinary Expenditures. Accordingly, the so-called non-war expenditures have increased greatly during the war despite the fact that the controllable portion has only increased from $112,200,000 in 1938-39 to $119,800,000 in 1944-45. The following table gives an analysis of non-war expenditure for the fiscal year 1944-45 and the five previous fiscal years:

(2) Expenditure charged to war appropriations.
(3) Including services initiated or expanded during the war as a matter of policy, such as Unemployment Insurance; certain expenditure showing increases largely attributable to the war, such as those of the Departments of National Revenue and Post Office; contractual items; expenditures classed as "Special" (mostly for relief and farm assistance purposes); and certain bookkeeping adjustments.
(4) The Government's contribution and the cost of administration.
(5) Controllable expenditures not specially affected by the war. Note, however, that the war has increased the costs of many of the services concerned, for example by necessitating cost-of-living bonuses

OVER-ALL DEFICIT

55. As total revenues for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1945, were $2,687,334,000 and expenditures aggregated $5,245,612,000, the over-all deficit or increase in net debt for the year was $2,558,278,000.

LOANS, ADVANCES AND INVESTMENTS

56. In addition to the expenditures aleady detailed, the government makes disbursements for the acquisition of investments which are treated as "active" and are deducted from total gross liabilities in arriving at the figure of net debt. The net increase in loans, advances and investments for 1944-45 was $457,458,000 compared with $635,341,000 in 1943-44. Details of these increases together with those for the four previous fiscal years will be found in the table on page 39.

Railway and Steamship Companies—

57. The net increase in this category in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1945, was $83,608,000, and relates entirely to transactions with the Canadian National Railways.

58. In the fiscal year the government made net payments to the Canadian National Railways in the amount of $83,607,995, classified as follows:

Advances—
Under Canadian National Railways Refunding Act, 1938—for retirement of maturing issues	$ 35,000,000
Under Canadian National Railways Refunding Act, 1944—for retirement of maturing issues	56,684,000

Net Total Payments on account of Loans and for Equipment Purchased	$ 83,607,995

Foreign Exchange Control Board—

59. During the fiscal year $265,000,000 was advanced to the Foreign Exchange Control Board to enable the Board to finance the purchase of gold and foreign exchange.

Sundry Government Agencies—

60. The net change in the fiscal year in advances to the National Harbours Board was only $8,000. Advances of $19,000 were made for capital purposes at the port of Montreal, while a capital refund of $11,000 was received from Vancouver.

61. The net increase in the fiscal year in advances for Soldier and General Land Settlement aggregated $3,948,000. This increase was occasioned by advances of $7,958,000 under the Veterans' Land Act, less net repayments by settlers and $325,000 written off and charged to Consolidated Deficit Account.

62. Net advances to Sundry Crown Companies were reduced during the year by $17,374,000, due principally to the liquidation of inventories, repayment of working capital and transfer of surplus assets to War Assets Corporation. An advance of $500,000 was made to the Export Credits Insurance Corporation which commenced operations in the fiscal year.

63. Net advances to Sundry Crown Plants—Privately Managed were reduced by $10,309,000 due principally to the return of working capital provided in prior years.

Provincial and Municipal Governments—

64. Advances under this category increased in the fiscal year by $15,599,000 due to the government implementing its guarantee to the chartered banks under the Saskatchewan Seed Grain Loans Guarantee Act, 1938. The net advances for this purpose outstanding at the close of the fiscal year, less repayments recovered from amounts payable to the Province totalled $15,887,000. Small repayments on Relief Loans were received during the year from Alberta, British Columbia and Saskatchewan. Repayments of $168,000 were received from municipalities on loans made under the authority of the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act, 1938.

United Kingdom and Other Governments—

65. Net advances under this heading decreased by $38,272,000 during the year. Food advance accounts for the purchase of food by the United Kingdom increased by $10,613,000. The Canadian dollar obligation of the government of the United Kingdom under the authority of the War Appropriation (United Kingdom Financing) Act, 1942, was reduced by $55,098,000, leaving a balance outstanding of $602,510,000.

66. Recoverable advances on account of air training increased during the year by $81,586,000, due to increased advances to the government of the United Kingdom.

67. Advances to War Supplies Limited were completely liquidated by repayment totalling $71,158,000.

68. The remaining items in this category covering many departments and governments decreased by $4,215,000 during the year.

Miscellaneous—

69. In the period from April 1, 1944 to March 31, 1945, 1065 loans were approved under the National Housing Act, 1938, and 862 under the National Housing Act, 1944, in the amount of $3,772,740 and $3,575,785 respectively. During the year repayments of loans exceeded loan disbursements by $1,240,000, leaving the balance outstanding at March 31, 1945, at $14,721,232.

70. Loans by the Department of Munitions and Supply to private companies under the authority of the War Appropriation Act increased by $7,975,000 in the fiscal year ended Mach 31, 1945.

Investments—

71. The government's investment in the Canadian Farm Loan Board decreased during the year by $5,001,000, due to the purchase by the Board out of its surplus funds of $5,000,000 of its 3½% bonds due January 2, 1960. In addition $1,000 of the Board's capital stock was written off to Consolidated Deficit Account. At the end of the fiscal year the government's investment in the Canadian Farm Loan Board totalled $24,024,000.

72. Miscellaneous investments increased during the year by $153,552,000. The main item in this category is the Securities Investment Account consisting chiefly of the cost of acquisition of dominion government direct and guaranteed securities including Victory Bonds held under instalment purchase plans for civil servants and members of the Armed Forces.

73. The following table gives the details of the annual changes in loans, advances and investments in the fiscal year ended March 31. 1945, and the four previous fiscal years.

74. In the fiscal year ended March 31, 1945, the Dominion issued securities in the domestic market in an amount of $4,069,222,680. This amount includes the net increase of $20,000,000 in Treasury Bills and $210,000,000 in Deposit Certificates outstanding, but does not include the amount of the recurring issues of Treasury Bills and Deposit Certificates issued to refund similar securities maturing during the year. In the fiscal year $1,241,580,589 of Dominion obligations matured or were called for redemption, leaving the sum of $2,827,642,091, less cost of flotations, available for direct and indirect war expenditures.

The following table gives the details of issues sold during the year, divided as to original issue by sales to the Bank of Canada, the chartered banks and the general public (it does not include the $33,293,471, 4% School Lands Debentures held by the Prairie Provinces which were again renewed for one year):

75. In the fiscal year 1944-45, the Sixth and Seventh Victory Loans were sold, both being larger than any previous Canadian loan sold for cash. The Sixth Victory Loan was sold entirely for cash in the amount of $1,405,013,350, the number of subscriptions being 3,077,123. The Seventh Victory Loan was sold in the amount of $1,512,362,200 for cash and $147,544,000 in conversion of bonds maturing or called for redemption on October 15, 1944. The number of cash subscriptions was 3,306,990 and the number of conversion subscriptions was 20,325.

76. The following table sets out the bond redemptions in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1945:

(1) Maturity date October 15, 1949, called for redemption on October 15, 1944.

(2) This issue was vested by the Treasury of the United Kingdom in January, 1942. The amount (at par of exchange) purchased in the fiscal year 1944-45 was cancelled.

(3) These issues were vested by the Treasury of the United Kingdom in August, 1941. The amounts (at par of exchange) purchased in the fiscal year 1944-45 were cancelled.

(4) Total from previous table $857,544,000 and School Lands Debenture Stock, viz. $33,293,471.

77. The fortnightly issue of three months' Treasury Bills was continued during the year and the amount was increased by $20,000,000 to $380,000,000. The last issue in the fiscal year was sold at a discount of ·365 per cent.

The average rate of interest on the dominion's direct funded debt (including Treasury Bills and Deposit Certificates) outstanding at March 31, 1945, was 2·51 per cent. This compares with 2·54 per cent on the debt outstanding at the close of the preceding year.

CASH DEFICIENCY

79. The significant thing is that while the budgetary deficit for 1944-45 was $2,558,277,000, the cash deficiency (that is the excess of cash requirements over receipts other than borrowing) was $396,700,000 greater. It is the sum of $2,955,000,000 which had to be met by borrowing from the Canadian people.

FOOTNOTES

(1) "Cash" and "non-cash" transactions are sometimes difficult to define; for example, interest payments to certain trust and other accounts are left on deposit with the Receiver General. Those here treated as non-cash are limited to adjustments to the valuation of assets and liabilities, and the amortization of loan flotation charges.

(2) War requirements means outlays under the war appropriation acts and such other accounts as obviously relate to the war; non-war means all other requirements.

(3) Excluding the amortization of bond discounts and commissions, $12·8 million.

FOOTNOTES—Concluded

(4) Excluding the write-down of assets, $25·4 million, and adjustments of the valuation of C.N.R. Securities Trust Stock due to the net income surplus and capital gain, $22·4 million.

(5) For details see page 36. The advances treated as relating to the war are those for the repatriation of sterling securities, and the purchase of equipment leased to the railway under the terms of the 1940 and subsequent agreements.

(6) Including both matured and unmatured funded debt, and the premium or discount on foreign funds.

(7) Computed by adding the 10% exchange premium to the change during the year. The figures exclude changes in funds held for special purposes.

(8) Adjusted by the addition of $1·3 million (net) with respect to Premium, Discount and Exchange arising out of the fact that foreign exchange is valued at par on the balance sheet, but is valued at current levels for the purpose of this table.

(9) Excluding the adjustment of the reserve against losses of the Canadian Wheat Board, and the entry recording the increase in value of the C.N.R. Securities Trust Stock.

(10) Includes the increase in value of War Savings Certificates during the year due to interest accruals, $5·8 million.

NATIONAL DEBT

80. The gross unmatured funded debt (including Deposit Certificates, Treasury Bills and the estimated refundable portion of personal income tax and excess profits tax) of the Dominion outstanding at the close of the fiscal year 1944-45, was $13,983,764,000. Other liabilities consisting chiefly of Deposit and Trust Accounts, Insurance, Pension and Guaranty Accounts totalled $1,728,418,000 on the same date. The gross liabilities of the Dominion on March 31, 1945, were $15,712,182,000. On the other side of the balance sheet there are active assets totalling $4,413,820,000, consisting of cash, loans and advances and investments, less a reserve of $125,000,000 for possible losses on their ultimate realization. If the amount of net active assets is deducted from the amount of gross liabilities, there results a figure of $11,298,362,000, representing the net debt of the Dominion as at March 31, 1945. The increase in the net debt in the year was $2,558,278,000, or the amount of the over-all deficit for the fiscal year 1944-45.

83. Bonds and debenture stocks bearing the guarantee of the Dominion and outstanding in the hands of the public totalled $606,665,000 at March 31, 1945 or a decrease of $92,778,000 from the amount outstanding at the close of the previous year. This decrease is occasioned mainly by the redemption of two Canadian National Railway Company bond issues on May 1, 1944 and July 1, 1944 (due July 1, 1969 but called for prior payment) outstanding in the amounts of $35,000,000 and $56,684,000 respectively. The funds required to meet these maturities were loaned to the Company by the Government.

84. There were also outstanding at the close of the fiscal year other contingent liabilities authorized by various statutes.

85. Guaranteed bank advances to the Canadian Wheat Board totalled $71,166,000 at March 31, 1945, and related to wheat in the amount of $65,564,000; to flax in the amount of $5,211,000 and to rapeseed and sunflower seed in the amount of $391,000.

86. Pursuant to the terms of an Order in Council dated August 11, 1943, the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, a Government-owned Corporation, guaranteed certain advances, obtained by any person engaged in the production of logs or lumber, from a chartered bank. The liability of the Corporation is limited to twenty-five per cent of the aggregate advances made by each bank. The contingent liability of the Corporation at March 31, 1945, was $27,400.

87. Under the terms of an Order in Council dated April 6, 1944, the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation was authorized to guarantee certain advances and interest thereon obtained by any person from a chartered bank in order to purchase coal, coke or briquettes in the summer of 1944. The liability of the Corporation is limited to ten per cent of the aggregate amount of advances made by each bank, but the maximum amount of guarantee is $500,000. The contingent liability of the Corporation at March 31, 1945, was $39,277.

88. Under the terms of an Order in Council dated May 4, 1943, the Government guaranteed bank overdrafts obtained by certain Crown companies and management-fee companies doing business under the Department of Munitions and Supply. Prior to the establishment of this system of financing, funds advanced by the Government to the contractors remained idle for considerable periods. The amounts of the various overdrafts are repaid monthly, so no liability is outstanding at the close of the fiscal year in connection with this guarantee. The maximum amount of guarantees authorized at March 31, 1945, was $110,581,000.

89. Before operations under the Home Improvement Loans Guarantee Act were discontinued (October 30, 1940), 125,720 loans had been made by banks and other approved loaning institutions to home owners under the terms of this Act and the total amount of such loans was $49,959,055. The Dominion's contingent liability arising out of these loans is limited to 15 per cent of the aggregate of such loans made by approved lending institutions, but as the balance of these loans on March 31, 1945 was $246,120, the contingent liability of the Government is limited to this amount. Up to March 31, 1945, 1,249 loss claims for an aggregate amount of $454,018 had been paid. In terms of total losses to total volume of loans, this loss ratio is only ·909 of one per cent.

90. Under the provisions of the Appropriation Act No. 5, 1942, the Home Extension Plan was started. It provided for loans not exceeding in the aggregate $2,000,000 by banks under regulations similar to those of the Home Improvement Loans Guarantee Act for the purpose of financing the creation of additional self-contained housing units by alterations or additions to a building used solely or partially as a dwelling at the time application is made for the loan. To March 31, 1945, 59 loans for a total amount of $109,238 had been made. The Dominion's contingent liability arising out of these loans amounted to 15 per cent of the aggregate of such loans made by the banks or $16,309. There have been no claims for loss made by the banks.

91. Under the Dominion Housing Act, 1935, the National Housing Act, 1938, and the National Housing Act, 1944, the Dominion has accepted and is accepting certain obligations arising out of its contracts with approved lending institutions which, while not expressed in the form of a guarantee, may nevertheless be regarded as contingent or indirect liabilities.

92. The manner in which losses in respect of any loan are to be shared by the Dominion and the lending institution is fixed by the contract. The general principle under the Dominion Housing Act and the National Housing Act, 1938, is that the Dominion bears two-thirds of the loss, if at the time the loss is sustained the principal amount of the loan repaid, less any other amounts due, is equal to or less than the amount advanced by the Dominion and one-third of the loss if at the time the loss is sustained the principal amount repaid, less any other amounts due, is more than the amount advanced by the Dominion. In the case of small loans (that is, loans not in excess of $4,000 in the case of a single family dwelling or not in excess of $700 per habitable room in the case of a multiple family dwelling), the share of the loss to be borne by the Dominion is not more than 80 per cent and not less than 50 per cent of the loss. Under the National Housing Act, 1938, a new provision was added to encourage the making of small loans in such small or remote communities and in such districts of other communities as may be designated by the Minister of Finance in any contract. In respect of such loans, the Dominion has agreed in contracts with certain lending institutions to pay losses sustained by any such lending institution up to certain amounts determined by the contract which are not less than 7 per cent and do not exceed 25 per cent of the total amount of such loans made in such areas by each such lending institution. Under the National Housing Act, 1944, the Dominion bears the first one-quarter of the loss and agrees to pay losses sustained by any lending institution up to fifteen per cent of the total amount of loans made in any area by each such lending institution.

93. An amount of $2,000,000 was appropriated for the fiscal year 1944-45 to provide for advances under the National Housing Act, 1938, not exceeding with the advance made jointly by the approved lending institution, $4,000 in respect of any one house, for the construction of houses where the Minister was satisfied that permanent houses could be constructed to relieve a serious housing shortage without threatening to create a post-war surplus. Loans to the number of 21,896 have been approved at March 31, 1945, under the Dominion Housing Act, 1935, and the National Housing Act, 1938, in the amount of $87,767,957. Under the National Housing Act, 1944, to the same date 862 loans in the amount of $3,575,785 have been approved. Losses recorded and paid to March 31, 1945, amounted to $2,644.78, covering the Dominion's proportion of the loss on seven loans. This amount represents total losses to that date under both the Dominion Housing Act, 1935, and Part I of the National Housing Act, 1938. These losses are offset in part by a profit of $497.74 realized by the sale of eleven properties. The net loss to March 31, 1945, is therefore only $2,147.04. There have been no losses under the National Housing Act, 1944.

94. As announced in the Budget Speech of 1943 and provided in the Appropriation Act, the Minister of Finance entered into agreements with certain provinces guaranteeing the liquor revenues of the provinces on the basis of such revenues received during the twelve months ended June 30, 1942. No payments have been made to March 31, 1945, under these Agreements.

95. Under the terms of Orders in Council passed under the Export Credits Insurance Act, the Dominion Government guaranteed the payment to certain contractors for goods supplied and services rendered to the agent of a foreign country. The maximum amount authorized at March 31, 1945, under ths authority was $3,230,000.

96. The guarantee of bank advances to municipalities in Saskatchewan under the authority of The Seed Grain Loans Guarantee Act, 1938, was required to be implemented during the fiscal year. On December 11, 1944, the Government paid $16,469,000 to the chartered banks, the amount so advanced was charged in the Dominion's books as a loan to the Province of Saskatchewan which in the first instance guaranteed the advances. At the close of the fiscal year the amount so advanced had been reduced to $15,887,000.

97. The following is a statement of bonds and debenture stocks and other indebtedness guaranteed by the Dominion outstanding on March 31, 1945.

Mr. J. M. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, in rising to move the adjournment of the debate I should like first to make a few brief observations. It would be unnatural not to compliment the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) upon the speech which has just been read. I am sure that throughout Canada he will now have many people ready to do him honour.

I might say to him that I think he has removed from the minds of the people of Canada a fear which many of them had. Word had gone out that the Minister of Finance was so far removed from the foibles that oppress most of us that if he did not actually like paying taxes, at any rate the paying of them did not cause him the pain that it caused the rest of us. I think there went abroad a feeling almost of fear that the minister would not be able to reduce taxes, because he himself liked paying them so well, and that he might not be able to bring himself to the point where he would reduce them for anyone else. It is a very nice budget for all those people who are affected by the reduction in taxation and, as I have said, I am sure they will be duly grateful to the Minister of Finance.

But that really is not the thing which concerns us at the present time. For a few moments I should like to suggest some general considerations which, it seems to me, people should have in mind when reading this budget speech. It is not a question of whether this or that person may take pleasure from the impact the speech may have upon himself. The question is whether these proposals do or do not give us a picture which will enable us to reorganize the economic life of our country, now that we have come to the era of peace.

There is something we can all agree on, namely, that this first peace-time budget is fraught with tremendous importance to all of us. During the war we accepted the astronomical figures of the budget. The preparing of the budget was a rather straight ahead business. Everyone was ready to pay. When a man feels that his back is to the wall he will not haggle about dollars. When the flood broke over us in the spring of 1940, every man felt that his back was to the wall. It was not a question of holding back on expenditures; indeed the opposite was the case. It was a question, not of how little we should spend but of how much we could spend and how fast we could spend it. So, as I say, the task of the minister was in a way easy. All he had to do was to put the utmost burden on the taxpayer, taking care that the taxpayer, however badly he might be bent, was not actually broken; then, in addition to that, to borrow the rest from the public.

That was the situation. It is no disrespect to the job that was done to say that in a way it was terribly obvious and even terribly easy. The government came and asked for what it wanted; it got it, and no questions asked.

For five and a half years that mentality has existed, on the part of both the tax collector and the taxpayer. But the attitude of the taxpayer has now changed and changed rapidly. He feels that for those five and a half years the cart has been before the horse. We have spent what we felt it was desirable to spend and then we have looked around to see how we could raise the money. I am not complaining about that and I do not think the taxpayer complains about it. But he is now anxious; he wants to be terribly sure that we are trying to get back and will get back as quickly as we can to what he would like to think are the normal tried and tested methods of financing. When I say that I do not mean that the taxpayer believes he can get back to the 1930's. He knows that the government has assumed new obligations; he knows that there are social services which must be taken care of. Nevertheless, he feels that as long as we are borrowing these fabulous sums which are outlined in a budget of this kind, we are in great danger. According to this budget we shall have to borrow $2,000 million, and there may be another additional $800 million for credits.

He is frightened; he is really alarmed. He does not believe that we can go on borrowing for ever, as some blithe spirits think. He believes that if a debt of $14,000 million or $15,000 million develops into a debt of $20,000 million, and that debt of $20,000 million grows to a debt of $30,000 million, we may arrive at the point when finally we shall not be able to borrow. The lender will say, I am not sure that this money can be paid back. Therefore the taxpayer has now come to the point where, to use the slang phrase, he is from Missouri as to whether expenditures are being reduced to the lowest point they can be.

He considers that this budget is something like a family budget where the family revenue is $200 a month and where the wife brings in a budget showing they can get along nicely on $300 a month, without any indication as to how the income is to go up or how expenditures are to come down.

I suggest that, notwithstanding the interesting figures we have heard to-night, notwithstanding the respect that we have for those who have framed this budget, there are serious questions still left in the mind of the taxpayer. He realizes how extraordinarily difficult it is for a government which has been spending billions to get down to the point where a few paltry millions can really seem to matter very much. As I say, there are certain questions in the mind of the taxpayer, and I have noted some of those which have occurred to me and which I now propose to bring to the attention of the house.

Of necessity I must bring these to the attention of the house somewhat tentatively, because I am not one of those people who can hear a speech read as it was read to-night, analyse the whole thing and be prepared to make dogmatic assertions. But I am asking the questions which seem to me to be unanswered, questions which seem to me to be important to the taxpayer in figuring out his business. After all, it is his business he wants to know about. But I think he will feel that the astronomical figures he has heard to-night are not related to anything. They do not mean much to him. If he is told we are going to spend $4,000 million, receiving $2,000 million by taxation and raising $2,000 million by borrowing, those figures really do not mean much to a fellow who is getting a couple of hundred dollars a month. What he wants to know is how that relates to the whole nation's business.

I said I was going to be brief and I intend to be brief. What I want to do now is to read these questions that I have noted down. As I said, they will be somewhat tentative, because it may be that on a further study of this document I may have to come back and say that some of these questions have been answered. However, it seems to me that the questions I am about to read have not been answered and they should be answered.

First, however, I should like to bring to the attention of the house an interesting point from abroad—from Great Britain. They have a practical way of going at things in Britain, and I should like to quote from the writings of an Italian by the name of De Marco who just after the last war made an interesting contrast between the way Great Britain approached its budgeting task in and about the year 1920 and the way they did it in Italy. I wish to say in advance that I do not suggest that at the present time we can do what they did in Great Britain at that time. I think it was too heroic; I think it was too drastic; I think it was too sudden. Nevertheless, I believe every fair-minded and sensible man in this house will agree that this was a sensible and realistic and common-sense way of going at the problem. We are now in the position where, as I said a few minutes ago, we have spent these astronomical amounts and we must begin to look around to see where the money is coming from.

According to Mr. De Marco, here is what they did in England in 1920, as compared with what they did in Italy. I quote:

> A typical example of this difference in point of view has been provided recently by the difference in the method followed in England and that followed in Italy for the reduction of bureaucratic expenditures, which increased extraordinarily during the war.
> In the post-war period there arose everywhere the problem of reducing these bureaucratic expenditures in order to get them into equilibrium with revenue, which the war had drastically reduced, in comparison with the pre-war period.
> In England the chancellor of the exchequer, in presenting the budget for 1921-1922, said: "The revenues must not be above £910,000,000; therefore we must bring the expenditures of civil and military services within these limits."

And later he goes on to say:

> And a commission was named with the precise instructions to propose the reduction of expenditures by a total amount of £175,000,000.

Let me say again that I think that was too sudden; I think in a financial sense it was too heroic, and I think it is quite arguable that by the sudden action taken in that way evil results flowed therefrom. Nevertheless, it points to a good way of stopping increase of debt, viz., not to spend beyond your income. Mr. De Marco goes on:

> In Italy, the commission named for the purpose was charged with studying the possibility of making economies. Since, however, no government knew how to overcome the resistance of interested parties, the expenditures remained, and taxes were raised, thereby subordinating income to expenditure.

I give that illustration because I think it indicates a realistic approach to this question. I come now to my questions.

My first question is: Does the budget give us a clear picture of the amount of national income from which the government must get its taxes and borrowings, and how is this national income arrived at? Is it built up on inflated war prices or on reasonable costs at which we can sell goods abroad?

My next question is: Are the expenditures so set out that we have a clear picture of what are ordinary and recurring expenditures, and of what are special capital expenditures non-recurring?

Next, does the budget furnish us with a definite plan whereby we shall begin to work ourselves back into the position where we pay our way without borrowing? This must be done at all costs to protect our credit, though at the moment, and for several years to come, our capacity to maintain expenditures at the rate necessary to provide our commitments, including social services, reestablishment of veterans, et cetera, will depend on our capacity to borrow, as well as on our capacity to raise taxes.

My next question is: Is there any indication that the government has taken into account the relative tax position of business in the United States and Canada after post-war tax adjustments? The relative position of business in the two countries will affect their respective capacities to compete in the foreign market.

Next: Is there any indication of the necessary drastic measures to reduce the controls still piled one on another so that we may get away from our present position, which may be described in an old rhyme:

> For larger fleas have smaller fleas
> Upon their backs to bite 'em;
> And these again have other fleas,
> And so, ad infinitum.

My next question: Has the government shown any intention of adjusting taxes on mines and petroleum products, having regard to the great increase in production and employment which could be brought about thereby?

Next: Has the government taken into special account the tax position of farmers, particularly stock breeders?

My next question is this: Does the budget give any indication that the government is really grappling with the task of reducing expenditures? For example, has the government tackled the job of the reduction of army expenditures? Considering that V-E day came only five weeks after the beginning of the financial year, why are the army estimates only fourteen per cent down, as against twenty-eight per cent in the navy and fifty-two per cent in the air force?

In a word, has the government really developed a peace-time mentality on the question of public finance? Does it realize that if we do not get on top of expenditures, expenditures will get on top of us?

I have put these questions in the sincere hope that they may help people in reading the budget to take account of these considerations,—deep, grave considerations affecting our economic welfare, which are involved. If I am right in thinking that these questions have not been adequately dealt with, perhaps they can still be dealt with. Finally, I submit these considerations to the judgment of the house and, what is even more important, to the judgment of that great body, namely, public opinion, which can reach into this house and make its will felt when it wishes. Mr. Speaker, I now move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie the house adjourned at 9.35 p.m.

[Mr. Macdonnell.]

Monday, October 15, 1945.

The house met at three o'clock.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

STATEMENT OF ACTING SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

On the order for motions:

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): I should like at this time to make a brief statement which was asked for by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) on October 4, as reported at page 756 of Hansard. The hon. member asked:

> Will the acting leader of the house be in a position to make a statement within a few days regarding the St. Lawrence waterway, in view of the message of President Truman to Congress yesterday recommending an early start?

In reply the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) stated that the question would be referred to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs. I have had the statement prepared and I think it should be communicated to the house.

The Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Basin agreement was signed at Ottawa, March 19, 1941. It makes provision for the development of navigation and power resources within the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence basin for the joint account of the peoples of Canada and the United States. Generally, it covers the same fields as the Niagara convention of 1929 and the St. Lawrence waterway treaty of 1932.

2. Immediately after the signing of the agreement, a white paper, including correspondence and documents relating to the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence basin development, was tabled in the House of Commons on March 21, 1941.

For the convenience of the members of the house I am tabling additional copies, both in English and in French, of the white paper: Correspondence and documents relating to The Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Basin development, 1938-1941.

I am also tabling copies, both in English and in French, of an additional white paper: Correspondence and documents relating to The Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Basin development, supplement No. 1; (i) legal opinions; (ii) summary of outstanding features.

3. The agreement provided for ratification and it was made subject to approval by the parliament of Canada and the congress of the United States of America. In this respect, it differed from the 1932 treaty which required the observance of "constitutional methods" before ratification. The 1932 treaty could only be ratified by the President of the United States if approved by a two-thirds majority of the senate. The present agreement could only be ratified by him if it were approved by joint resolution of both the senate and the house of representatives.

4. Accordingly, the agreement was submitted to the house of representatives in 1941 and referred to the committee on rivers and harbours. It failed, however, to obtain the necessary congressional approval and no action was taken by way of ratification either in 1941 or in succeeding years.

5. An attempt was made in the senate of the United States in 1944 to obtain the necessary approval by the adoption of what would have been a joint resolution, but it was unsuccessful.

6. Upon the initiative of the President of the United States of America, a joint resolution was introduced in the senate and in the house of representatives on October 2 of this year. The procedure followed is somewhat different from that which was adopted in earlier years and the joint resolution is fundamentally different. The earlier resolutions had been designed to provide for approval of the entire agreement with a view to ratification of the agreement and proceeding with the project. The joint resolution as presented both in the senate and in the house of representatives is different from the earlier resolutions in the following respects:

(a) The resolution approves the agreement with the exception of articles VII and IX and authorizes the President to fulfil the undertakings, other than those which are contained in these articles, upon approval of the agreement, with the exeception of the articles in question, by reciprocal or concurrent legislation in Canada.

(b) The resolution indicates that it is the view of congress that the President should negotiate with Canada a treaty or treaties covering the subject matter of articles VII and IX, including the provision with respect to perpetual navigation rights on the great lakes, on the connecting channels and canals, and in the wholly Canadian sections of the St. Lawrence river, and provisions for the amendment of the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909 with respect to the diversion of waters at the Niagara river, and should submit the treaty for the advice and consent of the senate.

(c) The president is directed to provide for the investigation of the feasibility of making the project self-liquidating by the imposition of reasonable charges or tolls on the foreign commerce of the two countries utilizing the facilities.

(d) Provision is made with respect to the appropriation of funds and there is a declaration to the effect that no exchange of notes under article I, section 4 of the agreement is to impose additional financial or other obligations on the United States. (This refers to a power enabling the governments, by exchange of notes, to prescribe rules and regulations for the conduct of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Basin commission, to expand or abridge its powers and duties, to reduce, or after reduction, to increase the number of members, and to wind up the commission. The declaration does not, however, change the obligations of the governments in any respect, as the limitations would be implied in the absence of an express provision of this sort.)

(e) The President is authorized, by arrangement with the government of the state of New York, to transfer the power facilities to the appropriate agency of the state in accordance with certain principles and there is a proviso that the arrangement must be consistent with the laws of the United States and protect the interests of the United States and of other states and also that the arrangement is to be subject to approval by congress and the legislature of the state of New York.

7. For the information of the members of the house, I am tabling three copies, in English, of the joint resolution which has been introduced both in the senate and in the house of representatives of the United States of America and, if this course meets with the approval of the members of the house, the text of this joint resolution could be printed in Votes and Proceedings. May I take it that I have the unanimous consent of the house?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Consent.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: To continue:

8. If the joint resolution is approved by congress, it may be necessary for the dominion government to confer with the governments of the province of Ontario and Quebec. The existing arrangements, so far as Ontario is concerned, are embodied in the agreement at page 11 of the first white paper and in the correspondence at pages 43-45. The arrangements with the province of Quebec are embodied in the correspondence at pages 66-72. Consideration of the question as to whether the modifications involved in the procedure now before the congress of the United States of America present any difficulty from the Canadian point of view must, necessarily, be deferred until a later stage.

9. It is difficult, if not impossible, to forecast the time which will be taken (a) in dealing with the matter by the congress of the United States of America; (b) in negotiating the additional treaty, and (c) in consultations with the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, but there would seem to be a good deal of doubt as to whether the matter is likely to reach a stage at which it can be presented to parliament during the present session. In the meantime, the proceedings in congress do not in any way of course commit the parliament or government of Canada in any respect.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): As I followed the minister's statement, he indicated that the agreements which had been before the two countries, with the exception of articles VII and IX, were now being submitted to congress, through presidential action. The minister, however, did not make one point clear. Did the President of the United States or anyone acting on behalf of the government of that country submit the agreement, with the exception of articles VII and IX, to the Canadian government or any of its members, before it was presented to congress in the changed form in which it appears to have come before that body? In other words, it seems to me the President of the United States is now submitting to the congress something different from that which had originally been agreed upon between the two nations. I am wondering whether he, or someone representing the United States, had consulted with the Canadian government in respect of those changes, before the submission was made to congress.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I would not be in a position to give a positive answer to my hon. friend at the moment. My understanding, however, is that there is no intention of modifying the substance of the agreement, but rather that this proceeding has been adopted because it was felt there that with respect to all the subject matter of the agreement, not including articles VII and IX, it could be dealt with by joint resolution of the two houses of congress. It was felt, however, that with respect to articles VII and IX there should be a formal treaty. This of course would require for purposes of ratification a two-thirds vote of the senate of the United States. There were conversations, or exchanges of views, with respect to the procedure to be adopted, and Canada voiced no objection to the attempt being made to have the matter submitted in the form that is now contemplated in the United States. We, of course, will await further developments there before determining what the subject matter of our further negotiations with Ontario and Quebec should be.

Mr. GRAYDON: As this has now been put upon Hansard, perhaps the minister will supplement his statement by indicating generally what articles VII and IX, which are not before the members of the house, deal with in connection with the agreement.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I would not like to undertake that from memory. This is an international agreement, and I would not want to go beyond what is contained in the statement. Articles VII and IX include provisions with respect to perpetual navigation rights on the great lakes and the connecting channels and canals, and on the wholly Canadian sections of the St. Lawrence. There are also provisions to amend the Boundary Waters Treaty Act, 1909, with respect to the diversion of water at Niagara. These matters were covered by treaty, and my understanding is that it was felt they should not be varied in any way by an agreement that did not take the form of a treaty; that even though they were incidental to the agreement they should nevertheless be dealt with separately on the basis of a treaty and submitted in the usual way to the senate of the United States for its consideration.

Mr. GRAYDON: Canada is not voicing any objection to this taking the form of a treaty rather than being included in the joint agreement?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Oh, no; so far as Canada is concerned our procedure with respect to the international agreement will be the same, whether it be in the form of a treaty or in any other form. In either case it is to be brought to the houses of parliament for consideraiton.

Mr. GRAYDON: I suppose the procedure taken in the congress of the United States does not affect us so far as parliament is concerned?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Does not substantially affect us. It presents to us the same substantive matter in a slightly different form. So far as we are concerned, whether it be in the one form or in the other, our method of dealing with it will have to be the same.

EXTRADITION

ARRANGEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there is another matter with respect to which considerable public interest has been manifested and which I think should be made public just as early as can be. It has to do with the extradition arrangements between Canada and the United States.

Extradition arrangements between Canada and the United States have in the past been based upon treaties between the latter and the United Kingdom government and extending over a long period of years. A new extradition treaty was negotiated between the United States and the United Kingdom some years ago. It did not extend to Canada, and provision was made to preserve extradition arrangements under the old treaties in so far as Canada was concerned.

A new treaty with Canada was signed on April 29, 1942 and was approved by the United States senate in May of that year. On June 6, the president of the United States provided for ratification. The matter was about to be brought to the attention of parliament for approval when protests were made from financial organizations from coast to coast in respect of possible offences relating to dealings in securities, and further action was deferred.

An endeavour has since been made to formulate a protocol to overcome the substantial objections which were raised. It was recognized that it would be impossible to induce the United States to change their security laws so as to permit free marketing of securities within the United States without compliance with laws made for the protection of United States investors. On the other hand, it was recognized that protection must be given to Canadian business men engaged in legitimate business within this country and to Canadian publishers of advertising or other matter. Negotiations have been carried on with the United States representatives, and a protocol has been signed designed to carry out these objectives.

For the information of the members of the house I am tabling copies in English and in French of treaty series 1942 No. 10, treaty for the extradition of criminals concluded between Canada and the United States of America, Washington, April 29, 1942, and copies in English and in French of protocol annexed to the treaty for the extradition of criminals between the United States of America and Canada which was signed at Ottawa, October 3, 1945.

A resolution will be introduced in due course in both houses of parliament which will provide an opportunity for full discussion of this matter.

Mr. HOMUTH: Is it law now?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, it is subject to approval by parliament.

QUESTIONS

Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CEILING PRICE ON WHEAT

Mr. BENTLEY:

Is flour that is milled in Canada from western Canada wheat and sold on the export market subject to the export ceiling of $1.55 per bushel?

Mr. MacKINNON: Wheat for grinding into export flour is now sold to the mills by the Canadian wheat board on the same price basis as export wheat, that is, at the export price of $1.55 per bushel basis in store Fort William/Port Arthur or Vancouver. The great bulk of the export flour is sold to the United Kingdom, the U.S.S.R. and UNRRA and on these amounts the margins are fixed between the buyer and the mills. On the other smaller amounts going forward to other countries, the sales price is kept in relation to the $1.55 price by competition between the mills and the competition of U.S. flour, that is subsidized by the U.S. government to approximate parity with the Canadian export price of wheat.

EMERGENCY SHELTER COORDINATION

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. On what date was emergency shelter coordination established in Canada?
2. How many officials are employed?
3. What has been the total cost to date?
4. What cities have been placed under its control?
5. Under its administration how many persons have been, (a) kept out of each of said cities; (b) given permits to enter each of these cities?
6. How many such persons are returned soldiers?
7. Are returned soldiers given any preference over civilians when applying for a permit to enter any of said cities?

Mr. MAYHEW:

1. December 19, 1944.

2. 17.

3. Wartime Prices and Trade Board, $342,600; Dept. of Public Works, $20,500; Total, $363,100.

4. Ottawa and district, Vancouver and district, Victoria and district, Toronto and district, Hull and district, Hamilton and district, Winnipeg and district.

5. The permit system under the emergency shelter regulations was in effect until September 1, 1945, when it was discontinued. The number of families allowed to enter the areas is accurately shown by the number of permits granted, but the number of persons kept out of the area is not completely disclosed by the number of permits refused because in many cases no formal application was made. No record is available of the number of families who were told during personal interviews or by letter that a permit could not be granted. However, the record of formal applications granted and refused is as follows:

City	Granted	Refused
Ottawa	2,919	679
Vancouver	1,379	1,958
Victoria	1,864	1,172
Toronto	1,369	871
Hull	658	258
Hamilton	730	568
Winnipeg	459	107

6. Of permits granted and refused the following numbers were based upon applications from active and discharged service personnel:

City	Granted	Refused
Ottawa	1,428	72
Vancouver	831	665
Victoria	1,158	590
Toronto	no record	no record
Hull	63	62
Hamilton	526	..
Winnipeg	309	..

Where blanks are shown above, no record was kept.

7. The permit system is no longer in effect in any area in Canada and accordingly the question of preference to returned soldiers does not arise. When the permit system was in effect, permits were given without question to any service personnel who have served outside Canada for one year or longer.

MILITARY DISCHARGE DEPOT, P.E.I.

Mr. McLURE:

What action has been taken to establish a military discharge depot in Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. The matter of setting up a discharge depot in Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island has been carefully studied and it was decided not to establish such a depot for the following reasons: (a) Benefits to Prince Edward Island personnel arising from the well equipped and experienced organization at No. 6 district depot in Halifax outweigh the disadvantage of longer travel. (b) The number to be discharged in Prince Edward Island does not warrant the overhead entailed in the establishment of a separate depot. (c) Shortage of personnel specialised in demobilization procedure.

[Mr. Mayhew.]

RENT CONTROL REGULATIONS

Mr. FLEMING:

What action is the government taking with respect to the revision of the present rent control regulations, (a) in regard to accommodation for ex-service personnel; (b) in any other particular?

Mr. MAYHEW:

1. (a) Under the wartime leasehold regulations, being order in council P.C. 9029 of November 21, 1941, the wartime prices and trade board are responsible for the maintenance of rentals at the 1941 level. As an aid to this end the wartime prices and trade board have restricted landlords' provincial law rights respecting termination of leases. These restrictions, by order No. 511 of that board, effective May 31, 1945, have been modified in the case of service personnel who owned houses at the date of their enlistment by permitting a three months' notice to vacate to be given to the tenant. No further modification is contemplated at the moment.

(b) From time to time the rentals regulations have been amended and as conditions change these regulations will be altered to meet new situations.

RESEARCH ENTERPRISES LIMITED

Mr. McMASTER:

1. Are the buildings of Research Enterprises Limited at Leaside or Toronto for sale? If so, by whom?

2. Will the government, or War Assets Limited, offer the buildings separately for sale by public tender?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. Yes. By War Assets Corporation.

2. This is a matter which has not yet been determined. See also minister's statement on Research Enterprises, page 929, Hansard, October 11, 1945.

WIVES AND CHILDREN OF EX-SERVICEMEN IN GREAT BRITAIN

Mr. FRASER:

1. Are steps being taken by the government to bring the wives and children of servicemen and ex-servicemen from Great Britain as speedily as possible?

2. Does the government pay the transportation costs for the wives and children of ex-servicemen?

3. Does the government pay an allowance to the wives and children of ex-servicemen while they are awaiting transportation to Canada?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. Yes, although priority is being given to the return of servicemen. Every effort has been and is being made to obtain the maximum shipping space for repatriation of dependents.

2. Yes, P.C. 6422 of 12th August, 1944, provides free transportation from home in the United Kingdom to new home in Canada, berths and meals with 500 pounds of baggage for "the wife or widow of a member of the force and who is not resident in Canada and who was married to such member of the force while serving outside of Canada or the territorial waters thereof on active service during the present war"; also "the child or children (including adopted and step-children) of such member of the force."

P.C. 64/505 of 24th January, 1945, provides also for hospitalization and medical attention if required by dependents while enroute to destination.

3. Yes, P.C. 132/6173 of 21st September, 1945, provides for payment of dependents' allowance to the dependents of discharged soldiers while held in the United Kingdom by the non-availability of shipping. The dependents' allowance is the same amount as that paid to the dependent prior to the soldier-husband's discharge.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—SENIORITY TO SERVICE PERSONNEL

Mr. McLURE:

Will war veterans, employees of the Canadian National Railways at time of enlistment, be given credit on seniority for time spent in the armed forces?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. TUSTIN:

1. Into what divisions has the Department of Veterans Affairs been divided?
2. Who are the chiefs of each division?
3. What salary is paid to each such chief?
4. What, in detail, are the duties and responsibilities of each division?

Mr. TUCKER:

1, 2 and 3. Administration, A. J. Dixon, $5,400 per annum; Rehabilitation, Major-General E. L. M. Burns, seconded from Department of National Defence; Treatment, Dr. W. P. Warner, $8,500 per annum; Prosthetic, C. A. Bell, $4,620 per annum; Veterans' Bureau, E. V. Wilson (acting), $4,740 per annum; Veterans' Insurance, W. G. Reburn, $5,100 per annum; Soldier Settlement and Veterans' Land Act, G. Murchison, $8,000 per annum; Civil Defence, A. Ross, no salary.

(N.B.—In addition, the department provides in its main estimates for the administration expenses of the Canadian Pension commission and the war veterans' allowance board, of which J. L. Melville and F. J. G. Garneau are the respective chairman.)

NATIONAL REVENUE—P.C. 80/3440—DRAWBACKS ON IMPORTED COAL

Mr. HODGSON:

1. Has the Minister of National Revenue given consideration to the assertion of the Auditor General at page 10 of the Auditor General's Report for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1944, that order in council P.C. 80/3440 trenches on the legislative power?

2. What action does the minister propose?

Mr. McCANN:

1. Yes.

2. The order in council is deemed to be intra vires.

*PRISON REFORM

Mr. CHURCH:

What action is the Minister of Justice taking with regard to the remarks made by the Court of Appeal of Ontario on prison reform, and the lack of any proper steps to remedy juveniles and those who should come under the Borstal system?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Speaker, I think I will have to answer this question orally. To the question as drafted I must answer, none. Of course the matter of prison reform is under active consideration and is one of the subjects I hope to have an opportunity of discussing with the representatives of provincial governments during the present dominion-provincial conference.

*PENITENTIARIES

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What clauses of the prison reform commission report have been adopted by the government since the report was tabled?

2. Who is in charge of federal prisons, is it the Minister of Justice or the Solicitor General, and what is the division of authority between them, if any, herein?

3. Who appoints those in charge of these institutions and the staff, and what qualifications have they in this work before appointment?

4. What inspection is there of these institutions, and how many visits have been made by the minister in charge?

5. What practical experience have the chief officers of the department in this work before appointment?

6. Do grand juries visit these institutions and make a report? If so, to whom?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I should like to deal with this question orally. I have no doubt that the first question refers to the report of the royal commission on penitentiaries. No clauses of that report have been adopted. Full detailed particulars of the recommendations of the royal commission which have been acted upon by the department were furnished in answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Broadview on April 4, 1945. There have been few, if any, additional recommendations acted upon since that time.

In reply to part 2 of the question, I would say that the Minister of Justice is in charge of federal prisons; he is the minister responsible for the administration of the penitentiaries, under section three of the Penitentiary Act.

In reply to part 3, first I would say that the minister is appointed by the governor in council. The appointment of officers is made pursuant to sections 20 and 20A of the Penitentiary Act, as amended by chapter 27 of the statutes of Canada, 1933. Wardens usually have years of experience in penitentiary administration before appointment, and the staff do not necessarily have previous experience in penitentiary work before appointment.

As to qualifications, wardens are usually promoted to that position, but occasionally one is appointed without previous experience. Qualifications for appointment to the staff do not require previous penitentiary experience, but a guard is required to have certain physical qualifications and be a graduate of a public school. Chaplains, physicians and trade instructors are required to have the appropriate qualifications in their own profession or trade.

As to inspection of penitentiaries, they are inspected from time to time by the acting superintendent and by the inspectors. No visits have been made by the Minister of Justice.

In reply to part 5 I would state that acting superintendent G. L. Sauvant, had six years' experience as a penitentiary officer before being appointed inspector. He had four years' experience as inspector, of which he spent a year as acting warden, prior to assuming the duties of acting superintendent. Inspector J. A. McLaughlin was on the staff of the penitentiary branch for about eleven years, during which time he visited the various penitentiaries particularly with respect to industries, farms and supplies. During the last four of those eleven years he acted as inspector before being appointed as such.

In reply to the last question I would say that grand juries do not visit the penitentiaries.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I ask a supplementary question? If a member of parliament or a member of a legislature wishes to visit these institutions, can permission be obtained?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Permission may be obtained from the Department of Justice, but there is no standing rule as to those who shall be allowed to visit them. I would not be sure that there is no such rule with respect to members of parliament, but I do not think there is with regard to members of the legislature.

Mr. COLDWELL: I happened to write to a member of the British Columbia legislature with regard to the penitentiary in that province, and I was told that he could not get permission to go there. I was wondering to whom he should apply. He probably applied to the wrong person.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The application should come to the Department of Justice.

DISALLOWANCE OF PROVINCIAL LEGISLATION—QUEBEC RADIO ACT

Mr. COLDWELL:

Has the Minister of Justice referred the Radio Act of the legislature of the province of Quebec to his law officers for any opinion regarding the advisability of exercising his power of disallowance?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The Quebec statutes for the last session of the legislature, including the act to authorize the creation of a provincial broadcasting service, were received by the Secretary of State of Canada on June 30, 1945, and referred by letter dated July 9 to the deputy minister of justice in accordance with the usual practice. They are now before the legal officers of the Department of Justice for the purpose of preparing memoranda to assist the Minister of Justice in determining what recommendations he should make to council on the question whether these statutes should be allowed to operate according to their terms.

THUNDERCHILD INDIANS

Mr. CAMPBELL:

1. What moneys are due the Thunderchild Indian band from sale of reserve No. 115, (a) principal; (b) interest?

2. What moneys are being held in trust for the following reserves: Red Pheasant, No. 108; Mosquito, No. 109; Sweet Grass, No. 113; Poundmaker, No. 114; Little Pine, No. 116; No. 159, No. 112, No. 115B?

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Mr. GLEN:

1. (a) Principal, $14,827.21; (b) interest, $807.89.

2. Red Pheasant, No. 108.....	$ 437 17
*Stoney, No. 109 (Mosquito) 110 and 111.....	53,573 57
*Sweetgrass, No. 113, 113A, and 113B	5,473 73
Poundmaker, No. 114.....	1,171 18
Little Pine and Luckyman, No. 116	1,027 08
Saulteaux, No. 159.....	4,323 14
*Moosomin, No. 112, 112B, 112E, and 112F	118,621 44
*Thunderchild, No. 115, 115A, 115B, 115C and 115D.....	102,519 76

*One account includes several reserves as indicated and cannot be broken down by reserves.

WAR ASSETS—PRESTONE ANTI-FREEZE

Mr. FLEMING:

1. Is any prestone anti-freeze being kept by, or on behalf of, any department of the government in the Ford plant on Danforth avenue, Toronto? If so, how much?

2. How long has it been located there?

3. What steps have been taken, or are being taken, to make it available for sale to the public this fall?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. There is no Prestone Anti-freeze kept at the R.C.A.S.C. garage at the Ford plant, Danforth avenue, Toronto. There are, however, 3,776 gallons of ethylene glycol base anti-freeze in storage there, also, 4,192 gallons of ethylene glycol anti-freeze reclaimed from drainings from vehicle radiators last winter which contains 50 per cent water.

2. Of the 3,776 gallons of new ethylene glycol anti-freeze, 360 gallons were carried over from last winter, 2,000 gallons were received in April, 1945, and 1,416 gallons in August, 1945. The 4,192 gallons of reclaimed ethylene glycol were received for reclaiming purposes during the spring and summer of 1945.

3. None, as it is expected it will all be required by the armed services. 1,350 gallons of reclaimed anti-freeze will be returned to Petawawa, 700 gallons to Camp Borden and 1,159 to the R.C.A.F. The remainder will be used in military district No. 2.

EXCHEQUER COURT—CASES IN WHICH JUDGMENT NOT YET DELIVERED

Mr. AYLESWORTH:

In how many cases heard by the exchequer court longer than one year ago has judgment not been delivered?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Thirty-four.

PUBLIC DEBT

Mr. BARRETT:

1. What was the total net debt of the Dominion of Canada at the end of each fiscal year, 1938 to 1945 inclusive?

2. Of this amount, what amount was payable, (a) in the United Kingdom; (b) in the United States, at the end of each fiscal year?

Mr. MAYHEW:

1. March 31, 1938	.....	$ 3,101,667,570 25
1939	.....	3,152,559,314 48

INDIRECT OR CONTINGENT DOMINION LIABILITIES

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough):

1. What was the total of the indirect or contingent liabilities of the Dominion of Canada, as of March 31, 1945?

2. What is the classified breakdown of these indirect or contingent liabilities, together with the amount of the obligation under each heading?

Mr. MAYHEW:

1 and 2. Details of the contingent liabilities of the Dominion of Canada are shown on pages 49-52 of the appendix to the budget tabled in the House of Commons on October 12, 1945.

DISCHARGED MEDICAL OFFICERS—POST-GRADUATE STUDY

Mr. NICHOLSON:

1. What is the maximum grant available for medical officers on being discharged from the armed services, for the purpose of post-graduate study?

2. What deductions, if any, are being made for room and board, which the hospitals supply to interns, by the Department of Veterans Affairs?

3. How much money will be available for a married doctor who is living in a hospital taking post-graduate study on D.V.A. grants?

Mr. TUCKER:

1. The maintenance grant for a medical officer pursuing post-graduate studies under the provisions of the post-discharge reestablishment order is $60 monthly, plus additional allowances for dependents. In addition the department pays regularly university fees not exceeding $500 per academic year.

2. Full board and lodging provided to an intern by a hospital in which he is training is regarded as salary for services rendered and is valued at $30 a month. Where an intern's income, apart from maintenance grants, does not exceed $40 a month inclusive of board and lodging, no deduction is made from maintenance grants.

3. A doctor, married and without dependent children, living in a hospital and supporting a dependent wife in a separate establishment, would receive a monthly maintenance grant of $80, plus an additional allowance of $5 a week, or approximately $101.75 per month.

PAYMENTS FOR U.S. BASES IN CANADA

Mr. NICHOLSON:

How much has the Canadian government agreed to pay to the U.S.A. for American bases at, (a) The Pas; (b) Churchill, Manitoba; (c) Southampton island?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The Canadian government has paid the United States government the following amounts in United States dollars for construction carried out by the United States government (a) 415,000; (b) 6,206,800; (c) 5,318,870.

HOUSING—BROCKVILLE TRAINING CENTRE

Mr. WEBB:

1. Has consideration been given by the government to any plan which would result in the use of certain of the buildings at the Brockville training centre for housing accommodation?

2. If not, what use will be made of these buildings?

3. Has any action been taken in other sections of the country to utilize similar establishment buildings to relieve the housing shortage?

4. If so, at what centres has such action been taken?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. Yes. Part of this accommodation will still be required for military purposes and the remainder will be handed over to Department of Labour for rehabilitation training.

2. See No. 1.

3. Yes.

4. Action has already been taken at Vancouver, Victoria, Port Alberni, Edmonton, Lethbridge, Saskatoon, Brandon, Toronto, Kitchener, Ottawa, Hull, Quebec and Halifax to release vacant army accommodation for emergency housing or to other departments for rehabilitation purposes, etc.

DISALLOWANCE OF PROVINCIAL LEGISLATION—SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

For a copy of all petitions praying that the governor in council disallow any acts of the legislature of Saskatchewan since 1920.

PORT OF CHURCHILL

ENCOURAGEMENT OF USE OF HARBOUR AND PORT FACILITIES

Mr. RONALD MOORE (Churchill) moved:

That in the opinion of this house the government should take into immediate consideration the advisability of encouraging the fullest possible use of the harbour and port facilities at Churchill, Manitoba, or the transferring of the management and control of the said port to a joint board appointed by the governments of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this resolution was placed on the order paper because it is of growing importance to northern Canada and to the future economy of our country. I do not know how much latitude we are permitted in dealing with resolutions of this kind, but it is important for us to realize that our economy is gradually spreading to the northern sections of this country.

It is a significant fact that in 1812 the first settlers in western Canada came by way of Hudson bay to the spot where Winnipeg now stands. Those original settlers did not forget the route by which they landed at the gateway to the west, and for many years after the colony became firmly established there was a growing demand that they be given an outlet to Hudson bay and a connection with their mother country.

Prior to this first settlement the inland sea known as Hudson bay had its waters furrowed by the keels of many ships belonging to the Hudson's Bay company. That the route was a safe one may be judged from the fact that the Hudson's Bay company took back to England a fabulous amount of wealth.

I think it is important that we should review briefly the history of Canada at this period. In those early days, after the fall of France in Canada, the history of this country was the history of the fur trade and the history of the fur trade was the history of two great companies, one English, the other Canadian. The Hudson's Bay company, with headquarters in London, England, sent its ships out from Europe to Hudson bay to carry with them the wares they brought from England in exchange for the furs they received from the natives along the shores and in the southern part of the northern territories. The Northwest company had their headquarters in Montreal. They, too, carried on a thriving trade with the natives in this country. However, it was found that the long route from Montreal to the head of the lakes had to be made by canoe over treacherous waterways and it was difficult terrain to traverse; it was very expensive.

History records the fact that is cost the Northwest company four times as much to place their wares in England as it cost the Hudson's Bay company. Difficulties between the two companies became rife; competition was keen. In fact toward the end open conflit resulted. But the Hudson's Bay company bided its time. It was the sheer practicability of the Hudson bay route into the heart of America, that made competition impracticable if not well-nigh impossible. The two companies finally composed their differences, with the result that the flag of the Hudson's Bay company was left on every trading post throughout the northwest.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that as time went on our governments of the past repeated in railway construction the same mistakes that led to the defeat of the Northwest company in the early fur trade in Canadian history. I wish to make it plain at this time, that we are not blaming anybody for these mistakes. It was only natural that they should occur, because our development first began from the shores of the St. Lawrence river. Canadian settlement first began at these points. Montreal and Toronto were thriving cities before the west was ever heard of; therefore it was only natural that the big interests in those places should want the trade from the northwest to flow to the financial coffers of Montreal and Toronto. We are not objecting. That was the attitude they took. But we want to point out that in accepting the building in Canada of a national transcontinental railway system to carry our goods east and west we completely ignored the most feasible and the most logical route, that to the northern sea.

We feel strongly that some time in the near future Hudson bay is going to be the principal sea lane between the old world and the new. I know there are many people who say that you cannot navigate Hudson bay and Hudson strait for more than three months of the year. I am going to allow that statement to pass for the time being, but I doubt it very much. I doubt it for this reason. It will be remembered that from 1914 to 1918, when there was great danger of German U-boats shutting off the north Atlantic, plans were ready to make full use of Hudson bay; and in the war just finished, when there was danger of long-range German U-boats cutting off the North Atlantic, it was also possible that we could have used Hudson bay.

In order to demonstrate the possibilities of this route, since the railroad is now completed to Churchill, I want to quote from some of the shipping authorities who have had boats going to the seaport of Port Churchill. I want to quote from the imperial committee on shipping. This is what they say:

> As far as physical risks are concerned we are convinced that the Hudson bay route is not more dangerous, and in some respects less dangerous, than the St. Lawrence route.

In making that statement I presume that the imperial committee is referring to the season in which shipping is carried on in Hudson bay.

May I now refer to the Dalgleish report on Hudson bay shipping. R. L. Dalgleish is the president of the Dalgleish Shipping Company of England. His boats were the first to sail into the Hudson bay to take wheat from that port after the railroad was completed in 1931. Here is what he has to say concerning the possibility of the Hudson bay route:

> I loaded the first ship at Churchill eight years ago with wheat, and anyone who says that Port Churchill will not in course of time become one of the world's great ports does not know what he is talking about.

That was in 1931, and again I presume that Mr. Dalgleish is referring to the navigational season in Hudson bay, which is from approximately the middle of June until the first week in October. But I wish to indicate to the administration the possibilities of extending that season to five or six months and perhaps at some time in the future to a year-round port. As proof of that, I wish to quote from an eminent Canadian geologist and explorer, Doctor Robert Bell, Fellow of the Royal Society, explorer of the northwest and a very high authority on northern navigation. He was sent to Hudson bay and Hudson strait by the federal government in, I believe, 1881, to investigate the possibilities of navigating Hudson bay and strait, and this is the report which he gave on returning from that area in 1881:

> It is impossible that there should be at any time in the twelve months difficulty in navigating Hudson straits for they are upon tide water. In regard to the bay itself, there is no date for the opening or closing of navigation because the bay is open all the year round, like the ocean in corresponding latitudes. It is strictly correct to say that the bay is open during the winter. There is a margin of ice along the shallow water, but it never extends so far but a man on the beach can see the open water on a clear morning. Bay ice, being light and rotten after it breaks away from the shore, offers little obstruction to the steamship.

That is the opinion of Doctor Bell in connection with the possibilities of making Hudson bay a year-round port. I am not going to ask that the present administration do that immediately; I fully realize that it will take time to bring that about; but I want to point out that there are eminent explorers who believe Hudson bay can be made a year-round port, and I venture to say that we shouid approach the matter from that angle.

From 1880 until 1914 Canada expanded in a westward direction with the settlement of the plains in the western part of the country. From now on, I think we are going to expand more. We are going to see greater development in northern Canada than we have ever seen before. At the present moment the Hudson Bay railway runs 510 miles from the Pas, Manitoba, to Churchill, and over that 510 miles of steel, it is correct to say, there is not much traffic. But that railway runs through one of the richest mineral areas to be found anywhere on this continent. At places it does not pass directly through the area but it passes close by mineral fields which could be connected up by short lines of railway, and I have no doubt that within the next few years we shall see these developments take place.

Already at a place close to the Hudson Bay railway, at Wekusko in northern Manitoba, development is being made in gold mining. I understand that a site for the town has already been laid out and some time in the future it will furnish homes for eight thousand people; and there is sufficient ore to last some fifty years.

Some hon. members may ask, what is the use of our using this route when we have already three transcontinental railways in Canada capable of shipping all Canadian grain to the eastern seaboard? The answer is this. It is much cheaper to ship by sea than by rail. The sea route from Churchill, Manitoba, to European ports is approximately 100 sea miles farther than from the eastern seaboard, but the rail haul is much less, and it is the rail haul that is really expensive. From Saskatoon to Churchill is approximately 800 miles, and from Saskatoon to the head of the lakes is only slightly greater; but it is another 1,200 miles to salt water, and that extra 1,200 miles must be made either by rail or by cargo boats across the great lakes. If you make it by cargo boat you have to shift your cargo several times before you finally get it on the ocean freighter at Montreal, and that costs money.

According to the grain commissioners, the use of this northern route will mean a saving to western Canada of seven cents a bushel, basis Port Churchill. Now seven cents a bushel is a very large saving on the grain of the western farmer. I want to suggest something that the government could do in order to increase that saving, should they find it convenient to make further use of the Churchill route. At the present time the chief hold-up in connection with the use of the Hudson bay route is the excessively high insurance premiums charged on ships going into Hudson bay, and I should like to deal with the unfair insurance charges in connection with the bay route.

It is most important that something be done to bring to a reasonable figure the insurance rates on ships plying Hudson bay. At the moment the marine insurance rates are based on "whole-world" basis renewable yearly. These policies are subject to "institute warranties" which in actuality are agreements that the ships will not be taken into certain trade routes or into certain ports considered to involve extra risk. The British North American "warranty clause" provides that no ship may enter British North American ports, that is Canadian ports, with the exception of Vancouver, Prince Rupert, Halifax and Saint John, New Brunswick. Should a ship be routed to prohibited waters an additional fee must be paid, as laid down by the joint Hull committee. Then for vessels which wish to use the Hudson bay route a further and exorbitant penalty is exacted by the marine insurance people. At one time this rate was as high as ten times the figure charged for St. Lawrence bound vessels. This is bad enough, but even worse than this is the fact that no insured ships may enter the bay after the season, and the length of season is arbitrarily set without regard to the actual safety of the route. Thus you may understand that by the manipulation of insurance rates those people who think they have more to gain by having grain shipped from eastern ports can prevent the use of this new route.

I am not blaming them for that. Possibly they have interests tied up, money invested. Nevertheless we feel that it ought to be the policy of the government to make a little more use of the seaport which lies just north of the prairie provinces.

Now I wish to deal for a few minutes with navigation in Hudson bay. First I think we must realize that Hudson bay itself does not freeze over and it would be possible to keep the port of Churchill open with an ice-breaker. However, it is correct that ice drifts down from Baffin bay and from Davis strait to block the entrance to the strait at times. In the fall, navigation is made dangerous because of the fact that fog hangs over the straits. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this danger can be completely eliminated by the use of radar on ships going to those northern latitudes. Then in connection with navigation it has been said that the magnetic compass has too much deviation in those northern areas to be much good as far as navigation is concerned. I submit that this government can overcome that difficulty quite readily in this way. I understand that we have about a hundred corvettes that have been decommissioned and are to be destroyed. Practically all these corvettes are equipped with gyro compasses, and there is no reason at all why the government should not have those gyro compasses salvaged and placed on ocean-going ships going into Hudson bay.

In addition, I think we should investigate the possibility of constructing ships suitable for trade in Hudson Bay, just as the Russians have constructed ships suitable for trade in their northern latitudes. In this regard there is something else which I think should be mentioned in connection with Russia's development of navigation over the top of the world, over the top of Siberia. Annually the Russians send millions of tons of shipping from European Russia through the Arctic ocean almost to 70 degrees latitude, where it turns south and comes down to Vladivostok, on the Asiatic side of the Pacific ocean. That is done during two months of the summer. Hudson bay is much further south than the Arctic ocean north of Siberia, and I venture to say we could make Churchill, Manitoba, at least an eight month port.

I have just one further word to add in connection with this matter, and that is in regard to the future of northern Canada. I have mentioned already that we must do something in the near future to develop our north country. The Russians are developing their northland, and I should like to see Canada at least keep abreast of them. There is no reason at all why we cannot do in our northern country what they have been doing in theirs. I understand the government have a policy with respect to this route, and I am anxious to hear that policy, because I am sure there are in the present administration men who fully realize the great importance of northern Canada to the future of this country.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the motion of the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Moore), and I am proud to follow such a gallant sailor as the hon. gentleman has demonstrated himself to be through his service with our own Canadian navy during the war now ended. We are fortunate to have in the House of Commons men who are conversant with sailing and who have a knowledge of shipping, such as the hon. member. I have a warm feeling for the port of Churchill, and anything I can say or do to bring about a greater use of that port I am going to say and do. Many times I have addressed clubs of one kind and another across Ontario in an endeavour to create an interest on the part of this province in western problems. I believe the greater interest Ontario takes in the west and the problems of the west the better it will be for western Canada, because down here is the place where most of the support has to come from. On the other hand I am delighted to see western members discussing their own problems, and one of them is the port of Churchill.

I rather like to call Churchill the back door of Canada, which indeed it is. We have fine ports on the Atlantic seaboard, on the great river St. Lawrence and on the western coast, and there is no reason why we should not have a port on our northern seaboard as well. Last year I made a trip right down to the Arctic ocean to inquire into the possibilities of shipping from Aklavik on the north shore of our country, and a few years ago I made a thorough survey of the Hudson Bay railway right down to the port of Churchill, so when I speak about Churchill I am speaking about something I have myself examined into and seen.

The southern terminus of the Hudson Bay railway is the Pas. This does not mean "pass" in the ordinary sense; it is called after the Pasquia river, which flows into the Saskatchewan river near this fine thriving town. It means in Cree "the joining of the waters." From that point to Churchill is a distance of about 506 miles; and this is a mighty fine railway. Whoever had to do with the construction of that line built a spendid roadbed on which to lay the rails, which are of heavy weight capable of carrying an enormous traffic. This was demonstrated very clearly during the recent war when our American cousins shipped a vast number of tons of heavy freight to Churchill for their works in that area. So much was this the case that I believe in 1943, the year of greatest traffic, the road paid a profit of $112,000, of course on operating expenses only. That is a clear demonstration that if the road could obtain the freight, this country would not have to meet annual deficits which, using arbitrary but fairly correct figures, run from $250,000 to perhaps $550,000 for operating costs alone. In my judgment that is not a heavy deficit, but there is no reason why we should have any deficit whatever.

At the port itself unquestionably Canada possesses one of the largest and certainly one of the best built elevators in the world. This elevator was constructed at that remote northern location by a member of this House of Commons, an engineer of note, none other than the present Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe). One thing I like about the minister is that he does know a great deal about construction, and that elevator at Churchill is a tribute not only to those who planned it but to those who built it. I have not seen a better elevator anywhere, and I have seen a great many of them. The sad thing about it is that the elevator is not used to anything like the extent it should be. I believe from 1931 to 1945 the total amount of wheat shipped over that road was only something like 24,000,000 bushels. The maximum use was back in 1932, I believe, when the road carried something less than 5,500,000 bushels of wheat. The capacity is a great deal more than that, and that capacity should be used.

I should like to see some new policy in connection with the operation of the Hudson Bay railway, Mr. Speaker, under which we could arrange to deliver over that route all that it could handle and ship. The shipping capacity is perhaps not as great as some would think, though it may be greater than will be admitted by those who have not been using the shipping facilities to their limit. The general opinion is that the port is good for a maximum of about four months a year. This might be lengthened, of course, through the use of ice-breakers, to break up the very heavy off-shore ice formations, and to break up the ice in the bay itself. Ice comes down from the north toward the south end of the bay, and shipping using the port late in the season and entering Hudson bay itself would have to sail south and out around great sheets of ice. If those sheets were broken up by ice-breakers such as are in operation at Petsamo in northern Finland—at present owned by Russia—or at Archangel, the port might be kept open to some such time as was mentioned by the hon. member who introduced the resolution.

I do not feel competent to say how long the port should be kept open, but I am satisfied we could use it to the greatest advantage for between three and four months a year. If we did that we would be able to ship not less than 15 million to 20 million bushels of wheat in a season. The elevator capacity is sufficient, running in the neighbourhood of about three million bushels or more. I believe there is that much in it at the present time. So that throughout a shipping season, if we started out with a full elevator it would be an easy matter to handle between 15 to 20 million bushels of wheat a year. That operation would save the country an annual deficit both on capital and in operating costs. It seems to me that in all the years I have been in the house capital and interest charges have run as high as $5 million or $6 million a year—although I do not remember the exact figure.

If fifteen to twenty million bushels of wheat were shipped over that route in a year—and more should be shipped, if possible—the operations would save the country an annual deficit, and would seem to me to be amply justified, and the procedure which would be dictated by ordinary common business sense. In addition to that, through constant use of the route during the shipping season and the natural increase in knowledge acquired by those sailors and by those associated with shipping who would use the route, the length of time during which it could be used would undoubtedly increase. In any event I maintain it should be used.

While I had not expected this resolution would be reached to-day and, as a result, have not my notes before me, my memory is that the three western provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, backed with their crown lands the money that was invested in the building of the route, $50,000,000. At that time, when the construction of the route was proposed, the federal government did not feel inclined to advance the required sum of money, and it was for that reason that the provinces gave this guarantee, in order that the country might be opened up. For that reason those prairie provinces are keenly interested in the use of the route and, in my judgment, a greater use of it would open up new trade channels.

As the previous speaker has said, it is much shorter by rail and sea from Saskatoon or other western Canada points to the European market than it is from Chicago to that market. The water route is longer, but of course it is cheaper. The rail route from Saskatoon, or from Manitoba elevator points, down to the bay, is much shorter.

This applies not only to the shipping of wheat. I remember well having seen fine cattle pens up there, and having listened to the men at the port tell how they were able to ship cattle, and I remember their statement that the cattle arrived overseas in first-class condition. I see no reason why a number of ships could not carry cattle and other farm stock from that port to the old country, thereby putting more money into the pockets of the western farmers.

I am one who believes that the more money we leave in western Canada or with western farmers the better it will be for eastern Canada. People have said to me, "What business is it of yours whether the west develops or not?" Well, it is every man's business; it is the business of every easterner, and particularly if he is engaged in business. If he is neither manufacturing nor in production, he may not be so keenly interested. I was in my time in the manufacturing class, and naturally the advancement of the west meant a great deal to the business in which I was engaged. The greater the amount of money that is put into the pockets of western farmers, the more they will buy; the more they buy, the more men are given employment in Ontario and Quebec and other eastern provinces.

Cattle and wheat could be sent over that route. I have examined it carefully. I know that not less than 250 of the 500 miles is fairly good timber country, good fishing country, and not altogether improvident agricultural country. I have seen crops of every description in the area, and I have no doubt that if the roadway were used to a greater extent, so that all the little towns and villages along its route would have more to do and more men employed, greater and greater trade would be built up. Certainly large quantities of timber could be shipped from the area.

I do not know who would be responsible for the improvement of the Pas. It is situated at a natural trade crossing on the Saskatchewan river. That river would be a great trade artery, if used — and it is not, although I hope it will be some day. I hope the time is not far distant when it may be a shipping route of note. However the fact is that east and west of the Pas little has been done to develop trade. There is no railway east or west, only to the north—nothing but the river itself. Then, the equipment on the river is not what it should be. One reason for the lack of development is that the docks are a disgrace to that part of the country. I have no doubt the Minister of Reconstruction is familiar with them. Those docks are built on the Pasquia river, and they are a menace to life. To enter a boat at The Pas to go either east or west on the river—and those boats are small—one almost takes his life in his hands. The docks are indeed in a dilapidated and dangerous condition.

I believe the whole country could be built up and traffic developed for the railway if an honest effort were made to open up the country east and west of the town of The Pas, which has a population of 5,000 to 8,000. One must be careful in making an estimate of the size of a town; if it is too high, it is ridiculous, and if it is too low, the townspeople are offended. However, my leader would know more about that, because he represented the area for some time in the local legislature. Perhaps if I said the population is around 5,000 or 6,000 I would not be far out.

Mr. BRACKEN: That is about correct.

Mr. MacNICOL: People moved in there with high hopes. If The Pas had half a chance and was backed up as it should be, it would soon become an important distributing centre. If given a chance, there is no reason why it should not equal the size of that fine city of Prince Albert or, better still, become something like Edmonton.

The north area is undoubtedly one of the best mineral areas in the world. I do not know of any place where so much mineral wealth is concentrated in such a small area as that around Flin Flon and Sherritt Gordon. There are a score of new mines opening up along the Hudson Bay railway and along the old canoe route from the Pas to Churchill. That district is fine minerally and not too bad agriculturally, particularly the southern end. There is not a great deal of timber, but there is sufficient to meet the requirements of the country. There is a splendid road bed, an excellent elevator, and the best equipment of the Canadian National rolls down to that port.

I am going to ask the minister in charge when preparing his estimates for next year—I imagine it is too late to do anything this year, because by this time probably everything is frozen—to make arrangements to use that route to a much greater extent. We should arrange to ship fifteen to twenty million bushels of wheat over that route next year to start with. I discussed this matter with wheat importers in Liverpool, and at Birkenhead with cattle importers, and I was told that this route has great merit. So far the route has been more damned than praised, but I am always going to praise it until it is used more than it is to-day.

I do not know that there is a great deal more I can say. I have a warm feeling for that whole country. The power possibilities are tremendous. The railroad passes by two of the most marvellous power sites in Canada, the Kettle and the Manitou rapids. The banks are solid rock and the dams could be built as high as one wanted them. I may be exaggerating, but I believe that these sites are capable of producing from two to two and a half million horsepower each. I am thinking of the possible height of the dams that could be built and the reservoirs that could be built up behind them, running back almost to lake Winnipeg. In fact, the lakes almost join together and between is what might be called a river So that there is vast power there. Long before you come to Manitou or Kettle rapids there is an excellent power site at White Mud rapids where a vast amount of power could be developed. So, Mr. Speaker, that territory has a great wealth of natural resources. The only route into it by rail is the Hudson Bay railway. The more we use the Hudson bay route for shipping across the sea, the more the Hudson Bay railway will be used; the more that railway is used, the greater the number of the people who will go into that country the more the country will be opened up, and the more it is opened up the greater the volume of business that will come down to Davenport riding and elsewhere. I have to think of Davenport riding, sir, because it has I know many manufacturing plants of every description.

Mr. CASSELMAN: One of the better ridings.

Mr. MacNICOL: As my hon. freind says, one of the better ridings. I have never yet said that it is the best riding, because I think if I did Mr. Deputy Speaker, who is occupying the chair at the moment, would say "next to Brantford". But it is a wonderful riding so far as the working men in it and industry are concerned. I have never asked for anything for my riding in this house. I have never even asked for a post office. I have asked for nothing for my riding except jobs for the workmen I represent, and there are from forty to forty-five thousand of them working in plants and factories in my riding. I can see no way of getting jobs for them unless the companies that employ them get orders, and I know of no better way of getting orders for those companies than by opening up and developing this country. I will strongly support the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) or the Minister of Transport, whichever minister is responsible, in doing every thing he can in bringing about a greater use of the Hudson Bay railway and of the magnificent port of Churchill.

I shall not take time to speak of the history and the great many advantages of that port. It has a depth of thirty-five feet of water right at the docks, and modern equipment has been installed for the unloading of wheat cars.

Four cars of wheat can be unloaded on each side at the one time, approximately, 40,000 bushels of grain or more an hour, and grain can be loaded into two ships at the same time at the rate of 150,000 bushels to 160,000 bushels an hour. These are great port facilities—too splendid to have them standing idle, particularly when our western elevators are filled with wheat and are crying out for the wheat to be put on trains and shipped to Europe.

I cannot see how the opening up of the Hudson Bay railway and the port of Churchill would be anything but of great benefit to western Canada, and whatever is of great benefit to western Canada, whatever puts more money into the pockets of the farmers and business men of western Canada, means in the last analysis more orders for the factories in the riding of Brantford, Mr. Deputy Speaker, more orders for the factories in Davenport riding—

Mr. CASSELMAN: And Grenville-Dundas. Better include them all.

Mr. MacNICOL: More orders for Grenville-Dundas, more orders for Hamilton riding, for Peterborough, et cetera. I do not know a riding in Ontario that would not benefit from the development of western Canada, because every such development means more orders for the plants and factories in Ontario ridings and more jobs for the men whom I and my hon. friends represent in this House of Commons.

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I believe that the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) has won the name of parliament's ambassador of good will. It has been his good fortune to travel perhaps more extensively in Canada than any other member of parliament. He has invariably found it possible in the course of his travels to become familiar with the problems of the people living in those areas, and upon returning to parliament he has always come to the defence of those who live in remote places and puts in a word, as he has to-day, for greater consideration for the frontiers of Canada.

Having gone to public and high school in this province perhaps I might be forgiven for saying that a great many people here think that the most important part of the world is confined within the boundaries of Ontario. In view of the fact that there are 147 members in the House of Commons from Ontario and Quebec and 98 from all other parts of Canada, it is only natural that those of us who represent constituencies outside these two provinces should find it necessary from time to time to bring to the attention of the government and the house the problems of other parts of the country as we see them.

I would remind the house that two years after Champlain founded the city of Quebec, Henry Hudson left Great Britain with the Discovery in quest of a new and shorter route to Japan and China and the far east. He left on April 17, and two months later his party had reached Iceland. There they managed to gather some wild fowl to replenish their diminishing larder. On July 5, they reached the east coast of Ungava. By the 19th of July they had passed Cape Hope's Advance, and the optimism of Hudson was marked by the name he gave to that point. Then after zigzagging back and forth for five months hoping to find an opening that would lead to the far east, he was eventually disappointed and was forced to winter in the southwest corner of James bay. Hudson's journal indicates that on the 10th of November his ship was frozen in. Later in the year one of the Indians in the region came and looked for the first time upon these strange white faces with their long beards, and he was sent away feeling very happy, carrying with him a knife and a looking glass and some buttons, the gift of Hudson. He returned the following day with two beaver skins, which he gave to Hudson to express his appreciation of his kindness the previous day. He also had two deer skins with him, which were exchanged for a hatchet, and so during these winter months of 1610-11 the first trading took place up in the far north.

The records tell us that the crew had a very difficult winter, and some of its members became most unruly. When they finally set out in the spring, Hudson, his young son and seven of the sick men were cast adrift in the ship's boat. The carpenter offered to join Hudson if his tool chest were given to him. The other members of the crew were glad to have one mouth less to feed and gave the carpenter his chest, and the carpenter then joined Hudson and his companions. What happened to them is one of the unsolved mysteries of the north. No one has ever been able to guess what happened to Hudson and his small company. But the Discovery, with the other members of the crew, reached Digges Island later in the spring. Three men went ashore to see if the Eskimos there would not give them some supplies to tide them over, and the three of them were killed by the Eskimos. The mate, Juet, who was chiefly responsible for plotting against Hudson, died of starvation while crossing the Atlantic, and only four out of the original twenty-three reached Plymouth in the following summer.

It would be impossible for me in the time at my disposal to go into the fascinating history of this great north country but mention should be made of the founder of Churchill, Jens Munck. In 1619, as the commander of the Unicorn and Lamprey, he set out to find the Northwest passage. The ships were fitted out by the king. They reached Churchill and spent the winter there. They had a very difficult time. They were short of food all through the winter, and on the 6th of May, 1619, Munck wrote in his journal:

The bodies of the dead lie uncovered because none of us had strength to bury them.

By June, Munck and two of his crew were all that was left. The grass was beginning to sprout; two of the sailors crawled ashore and collected some of the grass and sea nettles, and this vegetable diet seems to have checked their disease. They returned to their ship and succeeded in restoring to health their commander, who had said "Good night to all the world" and commended his soul to God, as he did not think there was any chance of coming home alive. However, the two sailors and Munck out of the crew of sixty-four reached Norway in September, 1620, on the Lamprey.

As I said, I have not the time to go into the history of the Hudson Bay railway and the port of Churchill. The hon. member for Davenport and the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Moore) have dealt with certain aspects of the matter. There is no doubt at all that the people of Canada have a very large investment in the Hudson Bay railway and in port facilities, and that the route provides a feasible means of transportation between the prairie provinces and Great Britain.

I have on my desk a number of reports of the imperial shipping committee. I shall quote from the General Report in 1930 signed by H. J. Mackinder, Chairman. The committee comprised representatives of the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, South Africa and India, two shipowners, one shipbuilder, one manufacturer and a merchant. The report was signed at London on May 23, 1930. I quote from the summary of its recommendations:

For two hundred years the Hudson's Bay Company has transported its cargoes to and from Europe by the Hudson Bay route. For probably one hundred and fifty years of this period these cargoes were successfully carried in sailing ships, consequently it does not seem unreasonable to suppose that modern ships, modern equipment and modern ideas should meet with a considerably greater degree of success, and that a very great and important route will eventually be developed, provided always that in the initial stages of the development every precaution is taken to provide for the protection of the vessels using it.

Then there were certain recommendations regarding charting, aids to navigation, icebreakers and fuel bases. I think it must be said to the credit of the departments concerned here that the recommendations regarding aids to navigation and so forth have been carried out to a very considerable extent.

In 1939, on July 19, just before the war broke out, another report was made by the imperial shipping committee. I should like to quote a few sections from the report:

13. There have been during the nine seasons since the route was opened 64 voyages to Churchill, and in our opinion the stage of development may now be considered as over. The way is adequately charted and equipped with the usual aids to navigation, and the exceptional circumstances on account of which the warranty is imposed—ice, fog and magnetic disturbance—are known and have been provided against by the gyro compass, direction finding by radio and the very efficient services of the Canadian patrol vessels. With the sole exception, therefore, of the difficulty which might arise of securing adequate salvage if a vessel should be wrecked late in the season, it is the view of the committee that the Hudson Bay route need not be considered as more risky than the St. Lawrence.

14. The Underwriter's representatives have agreed to regard the past nine seasons as closing the development period of the route, the casualties which have occurred being regarded as paid for by the premiums received. It is clear, however, that before any substantial reduction in the rate of premium for suspending the warranty to Churchill can be secured, an increased number of voyages to and from Churchill will be necessary. There are at present (July, 1939) approximately eight cargoes of wheat in the elevator at Churchill available for shipment when the season opens, and if there is a fairly good harvest this year, it should be practicable to set up a new record in the number of voyages in the season.

15. In view of the very small number of cargoes available for transport from Churchill in 1937 and 1938, the Joint Hull Committee have not been able to see their way to recommend to the Underwriters a further reduction in the premium for suspending the warranty for the coming season 1939 and the rates to be charged will be the same as in 1938. But in consultation with our Chairman, the Joint Hull Committee have taken note of the fact that there are already at Churchill for shipment from the 1938 season's crop some eight cargoes of wheat, and they have agreed that if some twenty cargoes in all are brought away from Churchill in 1939 and no serious loss occurs, they will be prepared to give favourable consideration to the question of recommending a further reduction in 1940 from the rates of premium chargeable in 1939.

During the shipping season of 1939 war broke out and it was not possible to have the twenty vessels move through Churchill as was suggested.

I hold in my hand a memorandum written by D. J. Munro, C.M.G., a captain of the royal navy, and also a nautical assessor for the courts of Scotland. He made a careful study of the possibilities of the northern routes. Hon. members might be interested in some of his remarks regarding Hudson bay and strait. This is what he says:

The safe navigation of Hudson straits is now greatly aided by four instruments perfected during the last few years, viz:

(1) Echo depth recording
(2) Wireless direction-finding stations
(3) Gyroscopic compass
(4) Radar. An instrument which enables dangers invisible by reason of darkness, fog, snow, rain, etc., to be indicated to the mariner, especially icebergs and land.

In comparing the hazards of this route with the hazards of routes in other parts of the world he mentions that commercial ships have now gone from Murmansk to Vladivostok. This is what he said:

Commercial ships have now gone from Murmansk to Vladivostok. In 1935 two ships left Murmansk and two left Vladivistok carrying 9,000 tons of freight between them. The Vancetti and Iskra arrived at the latter port on 11th September—the Anadr and Stalingrade entered Murmansk on 11th and 15th of September. These craft carried supplies for ports established at the mouths of the great rivers Ob, Yenisie, and Lena. The distance was over 3,000 miles, and they had not the latest up-to-date instruments to aid them. The Russians have kept their war performances on this route much to themselves, but there are various substantiated reports of submarines arriving by this route at Vladivostok.

The hon. member for Churchill pointed out, and I think rightly so, that on the ships that are now being decommissioned there is a valuable equipment that might be made available on the Bay route.

With regard to the hazards, I think we should not lose sight of the fact that there are hazards in sailing the St. Lawrence route. I crossed to Great Britain on a cattle boat one summer. We left Quebec city in June. We rode at anchor for some three days in the Newfoundland area. There were ice hazards nearby; we were in dense fog. It has never been suggested that the St. Lawrence route should be discontinued because of those hazards. The evidence that is available clearly indicates that the port of Churchill and Hudson strait can be navigated successfully, and many of us feel that it can navigated for a much longer period than has hitherto been accepted by government authority.

As the hon. member for Davenport pointed out, it is important to western agriculture that its products be placed on world markets with the costs reduced to a minimum. I hold in my hand one of the booklets put out a number of years ago by the "On to the Bay" association which made an intensive study of freight rates. They give the distances betwen various centres in western Canada and Liverpool via Churchill and Montreal. According to the rates which apparently prevailed in 1931, when this report was written, on a carload of live stock being shipped from Yorkton, Saskatchewan, to the old country, there would be a saving of $102; on butter and dressed poultry from Yorkton there would be a saving of $300; on eggs in carload lots there would be a saving of $134 and some cents.

I have here one of the reports of the board of grain commissioners for Canada dealing with the movement of grain. This report was presented with the compliments of the secretary, Mr. John Rayner, dated Fort William, Ontario, March, 1939. It gives the charges in connection with handling at country elevators, railway freight to Churchill, actual handling at Churchill, ocean freight rates and marine insurance approximate average transportation handling charges per bushel of wheat between the producer in western Canada and the arrival of the vessel at British ports, first by way of Churchill and then by way of Vancouver and Montreal. The Churchill rates as given here are 29·25 cents per bushel; Vancouver rate is 35·25 cents, and the Montreal rate by way of the great lakes, 35·25 cents.

It will be readily appreciated that these substantial savings in the getting of agricultural products from western Canada to the European buyer in the shortest possible time and at the lowest cost will be important factors in determining how much trade we are likely to have in the post-war period.

It is true that the people of Canada have spent considerable sums of money in this development, but I wish to suggest that it must never be regarded as an unwise expenditure. I might remind the house that we make very large appropriations for Montreal, Vancouver and Halifax. I hold in my hand a sessional paper which was brought down in 1940 in reply to a question of mine asking for the total amounts paid by parliament to Montreal between the years 1935 to 1939. In those years we appropriated for Montreal $7,000,000 and some odd; Churchill $926,000 and some odd; Vancouver $2,234,000 and some odd, and Halifax $4,954,000 and some odd. I am not complaining about these expenditures. I think it is important that the government vote money to see that the facilities at Halifax, Vancouver and Montreal are maintained in an efficient state.

Mr. ISNOR: May I ask the hon. member a question? Are the figures he gave capital expenditures?

Mr. NICHOLSON: The questions were as follows:

1. How much was spent by the dominion government for dredging the St. Lawrence river and Montreal harbour, and for operating and administering the St. Lawrence ship channel during the years from 1935 to 1939?

2. How much was spent during the years 1935 to 1939 under the Maritime Freight Rates Act to compensate railways for the difference between the tariff tolls and normal tolls on all traffic moved during the above mentioned years?

3. How much was spent during the years 1935 to 1939 to provide for construction and improvements in connection with the Hudson Bay Railway, and to provide for losses in connection with the operation of the railway during the above years?

4. How much money was advanced by the dominion government during the years 1935 to 1939 for the following: (a) Montreal harbour; (b) Churchill harbour; (c) Vancouver harbour; (d) Halifax harbour?

I have a table which I should be pleased to place on Hansard with the permission of the house.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is already on.

Mr. MacKINNON: Is it already on?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Only the questions. The answers are as follows:

Mr. ISNOR: So far as Halifax is concerned, they were capital expenditures, not dredging.

Mr. NICHOLSON: As pointed out by one of the other speakers this afternoon, in 1908 prairie lands were definitely set aside and ear-marked to provide money for the Hudson Bay railway, and lands were sold to the amount of $42 million, of which $20 million was received in cash. I find this information in an address delivered by Mr. J. M. Stevenson, of the "On to the Bay" association, at its annual meeting in Saskatoon on December 7, 1940. This is what he said:

> But in 1908, prairie lands were definitely set aside and earmarked to provide money for the Hudson Bay railway, and such lands were sold in the form of purchased homesteads and preemptions, resulting in some $42 million, of which $22 million was received in cash. This area, therefore, can reasonably assert that it has paid almost the entire cost, and surely this constitutes a substantial reason why we may justifiably demand that the investment be not allowed to lapse.

The money that has been spent has made possible in the north country developments which have had a far-reaching effect on Canada's economy. If this railway had not been undertaken and built when it was, the very valuable deposits from Flin Flon, for example, would not have been available during these past years of war. I realize that Flin Flon is a long way from Churchill, but after the Hudson Bay railway was started it became possible for prospectors to go into the far north country, and several rich mineral areas have been developed. During the war the production of copper, zinc, silver, gold and cadmium by Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting company were important factors in Canada's war effort.

We have also very rich fishing grounds in the north. We have Reindeer lake, Beaver lake and a dozen other fresh water lakes that supply fish to the New York market. We have also very popular and promising tourist grounds. Few members apart from the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) have taken the trouble to visit Canada's great northland in the western provinces. I have been through the Alps; I am familiar with the Lake of the Woods country, the Thousand Island area in the St. Lawrence, and the Muskoka country; but I have not found any place more beautiful than northern Saskatchewan and Manitoba. Some day these places will be a resort for citizens from the United States who will come north to enjoy the fishing and hunting that are available.

Up in the northern part of my own constituency on the Churchill river we have the Island falls development. The plant supplies power for Flin Flon and Sherritt Gordon, and more than $8 million has been spent in developing this modern power project. Quite recently an article appeared in the Toronto Daily Star referring to that area as Canada's Shangri-la. All the houses are electrically heated. There are electric lights and various city conveniences. I believe every house has a frigidaire, and I have not found any place in Canada where the standard of living is higher than it is in the small community of Island Falls on the Churchill river.

I admit that this is a considerable distance from Churchill. Some who have visited Churchill say that they would not like to live in the far north. I think it is very fortunate that the people throughout the world do not all want to live in the same place. We have two daughters going to school in Saskatchewan. They have not been in Ottawa for some time, but they think that Ottawa is the last place in the world to live. In their opinion Canora in Mackenzie is the ideal place.

The last time I went into Churchill I travelled with a mounted policeman and his wife who had been away from the north a year and a half. They had gone down to visit relatives in the New England states and they said, "Thank goodness we do not have to live in New Jersey for the rest of our lives." They were most impatient to get back to the north country.

During the war a good deal of attention was paid to the improvement of this area. Just this afternoon an answer was brought down to a question of mine. I asked: "How much has the Canadian government agreed to pay to the United States for American bases at (a) the Pas; (b) Churchill, Manitoba; (c) Southampton island?" The figures are quite interesting. The amount in connection with the Pas is small, $415,000. We are paying the United States $6,206,800 for their work at Churchill and in connection with Southampton island, $5,318,870.

I was in Churchill while a good many Americans were there. My wife had the misfortune to be taken seriously ill while we were in the north and she spent several days in their hospital. She had at her service seven of the best qualified doctors to be found in the United States. They were in northern Canada to look after the health of United States soldiers who were guarding our northland. Needless to say she had the best medical and hospital services possible. Now that the war is over and Canada has agreed to pay $6,200,000 for what has been done at Churchill, I do not think it is unreasonable to ask that we spend a little more money to give this northern route a chance to prove all that some of us have claimed.

Perhaps we are over-optimistic about the possibilities. The resolution before the house states that in the opinion of the house the government should take into immediate consideration the advisability of encouraging the fullest possible use of the harbour and port facilities at Churchill, Manitoba, or the transferring of the management and control of the said port to a joint board appointed by the governments of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

I have before me a proposal that has come from one of the organizations in western Canada. A number of resolutions have come to members of parliament from people in the west who for some reason or other think that Churchill is not getting a square deal. They think that parliament's decisions are weighted heavily by members like the senior member for Halifax, who has been here a good many years, and by members from Ontario and British Columbia who are fearful lest the development of Churchill might prejudice future developments of their own favoured localities. Let me quote from the brief I have before me:

> The case for a change in management is, briefly, as follows:
> The present management is the result more of accident than design. The national harbours board was set up becaouse of conditions at other ports, not because of conditions at Churchill. All these others were established ports. At all of them private enterprise had built up trade connections. To them, the substitution of the national harbours board for the independent local boards was, comparatively, a minor matter. Trade and the facilities for promoting trade, and for handling goods, remained in private hands. The businessmen at these ports carried on, little affected by any change.
> But Churchill, when it was taken over by the board, was in a very different condition. Churchill by no stretch of the imagination could be called an established seaport. Private enterprise was not and could not be established there; and, therefore, could have not built-up trade connections. There were no established businessmen to carry on in the same manner as they had always done. As the result of a positive policy to make it so, government ownership was complete, without exception.
> Obviously, a proper management for Churchill required an organization of a different character from that of the board set up to supervise the other ports. The national harbours board is intended to be a neutral body, a sort of referee between the ports; it cannot go out full-blast in the interests of one particular port.
> The port of Churchill is a new enterprise, still waiting to be set firmly on its feet. The principal problems it presents are those connected with the securing of trade to pass through new channels. Like any other enterprise in its early stages, it calls for a vast enthusiasm on the part of its promoters. Like any other venture in its infancy, it requires of its executive, vigour, initiative, drive, freedom in action, and, perhaps more than anything else, a partizanship bordering on the immoderate. The national harbours board is fitted to supply none of these things.

And a little later on:

> What is proposed is that the national harbours board shall cease to have any responsibility for the operation of the grain elevator; for the wharf with its sheds and freight-handling equipment; and, in general, for private enterprise. It is proposed that a new organization be set up to manage, use, and find business for these commercial facilities; and to handle the business it finds. Outside of this, the board can function as usual.

Mr. CHEVRIER: May I ask the hon. gentleman what proposal he is reading from?

Mr. NICHOLSON: This is a resolution of the "On to the Bay" association; I have not the date. It is fairly obvious that the national harbours board would be subject to criticism if it did go out and direct business to Churchill that might normally go to Halifax, Vancouver or Montreal, and I think the resolution before the house has a good deal of merit. I believe the western provinces are necessarily keenly interested in this project. It might be expected that they would have their offices in Europe, with a view to securing trade for the Hudson bay route, and to see that the ships coming to Churchill for wheat are not obliged to cross the Atlantic empty. I believe that has been one of our chief difficulties in the west, that up to the present it has been hard to arrange incoming cargoes at a time when the grain must go out. Therefore there is something in the suggestion that has been made, that some responsibility should be placed upon the shoulders of the western provinces to appropriate funds and set up a board to do this important work. I feel sure the province of Manitoba is very much interested in this development. In 1939 the Department of Transport issued a report on Churchill and the Hudson bay route, and on page 50 I find this:

> It was the wish of the government of Manitoba to develop Churchill townsite in an orderly and progressive manner.

I must congratulate the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) upon his wisdom, while premier, in seeing that free enterprise was not permitted to go in and retard the development by speculation. They planned to have it developed in an orderly way.

> To this end a sloping tract of land near the railway terminus was surveyed in lots and streets as an initial development in 1931. These lots are to remain in the possession of the provincial government, neither grant nor sale to individuals or to corporations being allowed. Anyone who wishes to occupy one of these lots may obtain a lease by going through the regular formalities. In view of the severity of the climate in the winter, building regulations have been framed which require the settlers to put up substantial and warm houses. They must also take special precautions to reduce the fire hazard.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I urge all hon. members to plan, during the time they are in parliament, to travel as extensively as possible, and to become familiar with problems in all parts of this dominion. In planning their trips during the summer recesses I hope they will find it possible to include a trip to Churchill and Hudson bay, in order to decide for themselves whether or not we have great possibilities in that north country.

Mr. RENE N. JUTRAS (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, coming as I do from Manitoba, the keystone province, I think it only right, and it gives me great pleasure, to thank the hon. members who so far have extolled the beauties of the northern part of my province. I wish more particularly to thank the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), because I know he has had a deep and sincere interest in the development of northern Canada. I know also that he has travelled extensively in this country and has covered most of the northern portion, so that he is quite familiar with that part of my province under discussion this afternoon. I am very sorry that I have not had the good fortune to visit that portion of Manitoba. It has been my hope some day to take a trip north, and I intend to do so at the very first opportunity, in order to see for myself the climatic and other conditions that exist at this famous seaport of Churchill. However, I have read a great deal of what has been said on this subject both in this house and in the senate. I find that it has been discussed in both houses for many years. I must say it seems that in these discussions a certain amount of discredit has been cast upon Churchill harbour in the interests of the St. Lawrence. Now that the war is over and we are getting back on a peace-time basis, I believe the time has come when this question must be grappled with earnestly.

The position of Hudson bay itself cannot fail to impress anyone who pays the slightest attention to the topography of our country. Many people fail to realize that Hudson bay is one of our greatest lakes. As a matter of fact, some have said that it is half the size of the Mediterranean, and it is situated right at the centre of this continent. To bring home the fact that it is not next door to the north pole, as some people may think, let me remind hon. members that it has a good two thousand miles of seacoast in the temperate zone, so that I think it is high time we stopped thinking about Churchill as a group of Eskimo igloos. After all, this country has invested close to if not more than $13,000,000 in that harbour, and the facilities it has to offer to-day are quite impressive. In order to put those facilities on record I want to read from the annual report of the national harbours board:

The facilities operated by the board include: 1,855 linear feet of wharf with a depth of water alongside of 30 feet at low tide, a steel transit shed 476 feet long by 173 feet wide, a grain elevator with storage capacity of 2,500,000 bushels, equipped with galleries and spouts allowing the loading of three ships at a time, railway tracks along the wharf, a locomotive crane of 20 tons capacity, a floating crane of 10 tons capacity, shear legs of 35 tons capacity, and a marine slipway capable of handling boats of up to 1,200 tons weight.

This harbour is not so far north, as I pointed out before, when we realize that its latitude is approxmiately the same as that of Devonshire in England. Anyone who has been in England, as I have, knows that the climate of Devonshire is indeed the best to be found in the British isles. So we can think of that part of Manitoba, not as a broad stretch of ice but, in certain months of the year, as a pleasant spot in which to live.

I shall not discuss the navigational period, because there seems to be some difference of opinion in the matter. Some experts contend that the harbour cannot be operated for more than one or two months, while others assure us that it may be operated successfully for three or four months. Some hold the view, one which is shared by the hon. member who preceded me, that at reasonable cost this route could be kept open for seven or eight months, or even for the entire year. I have no doubt that with the aid of new navigational equipment developed during the war the route can be made safe because, if I understand the situation correctly, one of the dangers has been that of floating ice in the channel out of the bay.

With the new developments in radar it is clear that vessels will be able to find their way safely in the fog. However, as I said earlier, this question is intricate and capable of considerable debate. But there is no doubt that this port and harbour can be kept open for a period of time longer than it has been in the past. I hold the view that this port has never been exploited to anything like the proper extent.

A moment ago mention was made of the Hudson Bay railway. It seems to me a most significant fact was missed by hon. members who have spoken earlier. I am given to understand that this railway was most active during the war, and that it justified its existence as a railway. The annual report of the Department of Transport for the year ended March 31, 1944, shows that the volume of traffic, both passenger and freight, declined sharply in comparison with the 1942-43 traffic, and that operations in 1943-44 resulted in a deficit of $347,872.90 as compared with a surplus of $112,120.75 in the previous year.

I refer to this report to show that the Hudson Bay railway which, in the past, has repeatedly been described as a white elephant, had in 1942-43 an income of over $112,000, and thus proved that it can operate at a profit.

The same applies to the port of Churchill. If it were given the same chance as was given the Hudson Bay railway, I have no doubt that the port could operate at a profit, or could at least break even.

Further reference to the report of the national harbours board for 1944 would seem to disclose that the harbour of Churchill was not given a fair chance during the war. Shipping figures for the harbour, beginning with 1940, show that it handled in that year a little over 2,000 net registered tons. In 1941 approximately the same tonnage passed through the port. In 1942 there was an increase to 26,315 registered tons, and in 1943 a slight decrease to 25,026 tons. Then in 1944 there was a decided drop to 4,109 tons. The two heavy years were 1942 and 1943; but for some reason or another interest in the port after that time decreased, and I fear that the harbour is returning to its pre-war fate. I would draw further attention to the limited activities of the port, despite the facilities there offered. I am surprised indeed to find so limited a quantity of wheat passing through there, in spite of the fact that it has a grain elevator capacity of about 2,500,000 bushels.

The harbours board report contains a statement showing the quantities of grain handled at the terminal elevator. This table discloses that in 1940 there were no shipments, that there were none in 1941 or in 1942, and that in 1943, there were 740,219 bushels passing through the port. Then in 1944 we find the sum total of twenty-five bushels. This did not come by water, so that I would assume it must have come by aircraft, or by some other means of conveyance.

In the light of these circumstances the harbour in 1944 had a deficit of $59,266 as compared with one of $29,848 in 1943. I do not know whether there is any relationship between the Hudson Bay railway and the harbour, but the figures show that, in respect of each, the years 1942 and 1943 were the most active for some time.

The spending of $144,500,000 on the St. Lawrence seaways seems at the present time almost an accomplished fact. But let me say in passing that, while I do not begrudge this expenditure, and while I believe it is justified for the development of Canada, at the same time I cannot but view with a certain amount of alarm the constant centralization of industry in eastern Canada. The facts disclose that industry is concentrated in this part of the country, and when the St. Lawrence project comes into being, it will have a tendency to develop centralization in eastern Canada to an even greater degree. I fear for the 13,000,000 that has been spent on Churchill. I think the two are not incompatible. I am quite sure that Churchill harbour could be operated so that it would at least pay expenses, if not provide some income. As the hon. member for Davenport has just said, this would provide encouragement to industry in the west as well as to the people there. When we consider the statistics for 1941, we in the west cannot help viewing them with alarm. I strongly urge the minister to explore the full possibilities of Churchill harbour.

Mr. GORDON B. ISNOR (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I am sure this has been an interesting afternoon so far as Canadian history is concerned. The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) has travelled extensively throughout Canada and he always reviews his trips in an interesting and instructive manner. I could understand the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Moore) introducing a resolution such as this, were it not for the last few words which suggest that a joint board appointed by the governments of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta should be given control of the port of Churchill. I think the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson) placed his finger upon the question which I have in mind. He referred to the possibilities of the port of Halifax and the lack of possibilities so far as the port of Churchill is concerned. He then went on to state that Halifax has always been more or less under private control, that the merchants of that port simply carried on even though the national harbours board took over that port in 1936 as a national enterprise.

I am not opposed to the first part of the resolution; in fact I am rather in favour of the government doing everything possible to encourage the fullest possible use of the port facilities at Churchill. However, at a time like this when we are considering post-war plans and expenditures we should consider whether expenditures additional to the $13,000,000 already made should be made on the further development of this port. I am not going to debate that question, nor am I going to try to place the east against the west. The hon. member who spoke last placed the facts before us in a reasonable manner. Taking the case he has presented, I think it will be seen at once that the development of Churchill is not feasible or sound, nor is it wise for the government to spend further money.

Ships enter and leave the port of Halifax during the twelve months in the year, whereas they could use the port of Churchill for only three and a half months, from August 1 to October 15. It will, therefore, be readily understood that it would not be good business to add to the expenditures already made on an unwise development. The last speaker referred to the number of sailings. In the period 1940 to 1944 only 121 ships arrived at that port, or an average of 25·4 ships a year. The departures were 120 ships during the same five-year period. The financial returns show that there has been an investment of about $13,000,000. Approximately $10,000,000 was lost on the grain elevator, which shows an annual revenue of $47,320.94 as against operating expenses of $57,672.82. Roughly speaking, there was a deficit of $10,000 for the year.

The hon. member for Mackenzie said that I am jealous of the port of Halifax. I am jealous of the port of Halifax because of the wonderful record it made, not only during the first world war but during the recent war. I am anxious to see that port maintained at the highest possible state of efficiency. I do not want to see a repetition of what happened after the last war when a very busy port suddenly became stagnant. I do not place the responsibility entirely upon the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) or upon the national harbours board. When a merchant has a good article to sell, he should go out and sell it. It is up to the steamship companies and the other firms in Halifax to sell the advantages af that port to the rest of Canada. The Minister of Transport is head of the national harbours board, and I say to him that he should take advantage of that port which is open twelve months in the year and which has the most up-to-date facilities of any port in Canada.

The average sailing time for a sixteen-knot vessel from Montreal to London is 203 hours; from Saint John to London, 182 hours, and from Halifax to London, 172 hours. The difference between Halifax and Montreal is thirty-one hours. I mention that for two reasons. First, there is the advantage to be obtained by using the port of Halifax to bring back our troops from overseas. I do not want to say anything unkind about Quebec, but I cannot understand why certain ships sailing from England were rerouted from Halifax to Quebec about a month ago. With ships being needed so badly for the return of troops, I would have thought the authorities would have continued to bring all ships into Halifax. I bring this matter to the attention of the Minister of Transport, hoping that he in turn will bring it to the attention of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Abbott). The greater the number of ships coming into Halifax, the more space will be available for the transport of troops from England to Canada.

Since the last speaker has placed on record the port facilities of Churchill, I think it is only fair that I should also place on record the port facilities of Halifax, so that anyone reading Hansard will at once appreciate the advantages of that fine eastern port, the gateway to Canada. I quote from the annual report of the national harbours board:

> The harbour of Halifax, situated on the Atlantic coast of Nova Scotia, is approached directly from the ocean by a channel with a minimum depth of fifty feet at low tide. It is open to navigation the year round and is served by both the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific railways. Here, the national harbours board operates seven main piers and wharves having about 16,000 linear feet of berthing—

I ask the hon. member for Mackenzie to compare that berthing space with Churchill's. The report goes on:

> —and being equipped with thirteen transit sheds with an aggregate floor area of about 1,100,000 square feet. In addition, the board operates a 2,200,000 bushel grain elevator with a maximum loading capacity of 75,000 bushels per hour and a marine tower with an unloading capacity of 15,000 bushels per hour; also a cold storage terminal warehouse, with about 1,050,000 cubic feet of storage space, completely fitted with freezing, storing and packing equipment and ample rail connections. A cattle shed with yards and runways, with a capacity of 1,000 head, is provided at a location convenient to both water and rail.

Thus the port of Halifax is well equipped to handle all types of freight, and as well it possesses a grain elevator, which I regret to say is not used to anything like capacity.

The hon. member for Mackenzie also mentioned that Churchill began its operations in 1749. If I recall rightly it was in exactly the same year, 1749, that the port of Halifax commenced operations, so that if any argument is to be made in favour of state versus private ownership, then I say that on the wonderful success which Halifax has made in developing that port under private enterprise, the system of private enterprise should be continued. I recall that in 1936 we in Halifax thought it was a mistake that the national harbours board should take over our port. We thought we were doing well, but the present Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe), viewing the ports of this country nationally, thought it would be in the best interests of all the harbours that they should come under one authority, the national harbours board, and accordingly Halifax and Churchill along with the other ports were brought under the direction of the national board. I feel that it would be a mistake to divorce any one port from the administration of the national harbours board unless the whole question is to be thrown open again. Halifax would be quite willing to take its chance if all the harbours are to be made free of national control and we are told to go ahead and get what business we can. In that case Halifax, being the eastern terminal of the Canadian National Railways, as well as being connected with the Canadian Pacific railway, would have no fear of getting a fair share of the business. But if the national harbours board is to continue, I feel that all ports should remain under its administration. For that reason I do not think it would be wise for the minister to approve this resolution.

As I stated before, I am not against the west having its share. I might quote the revenue figures for the port of Halifax. The hon. member for Mackenzie said that Churchill had a deficit of $57,000 on last year's operations. Compare that with the port of Halifax, which last year showed an operating surplus of $86,756.

In connection with maintenance expenditures and the return quoted by the hon. member for Mackenzie, I would point out, although I have not the exact figures, that not in 1945, 1944, 1943, 1942, 1941 and 1940, not in one of those six years has one hundred dollars, let alone one hundred thousand dollars or four hundred thousand dollars or one million dollars been spent in dredging the port of Halifax. It is true that many millions of dollars have been spent in dredging the St. Lawrence, and that is all the more reason why we should make the fullest possible use of the port of Halifax.

I had not intended to take part in this debate. I was drawn into it because of the reference that I was concerned about the port of Halifax. I am always interested in the development of Halifax, and I thought I would just keep the record straight in regard to certain figures that had been given to the house to-day.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would it not be in the interests of all the people of Canada if we were to develop Canada to the point at which there would be plenty of use of both Halifax and Churchill? We believe that if that were done, if we really developed the west, there would be plenty of use for both ports.

Mr. ISNOR: I am very glad that the hon. member has asked me that question. I am broad enough to answer it in the affirmative, and I would hope that my hon. friend and all his western friends will join with me in creating sufficient business in the west to keep the train crews of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific railways busy transporting freight to the Atlantic coast, and supplying additional employment for large numbers of train crews running from the extreme west to the Atlantic port of Halifax.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We are doing our share now.

Mr. ISNOR: Before I take my seat may I again express the pleasure it was to me to listen to the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol). It is always interesting to listen to him. He has visited our fair province and the port of Halifax. I do not need to sell him the idea that we have a wonderful port in Halifax because he knows it. But there are a good many members from the extreme west who have not visited Halifax, although in 1940 it was my privilege to have forty-six members of the House of Commons visit that port. I do not think I need to sell them the idea that we have a great port.

Mr. MacNICOL: We are all proud of it.

Mr. ISNOR: You are all proud of it. Some members of the C.C.F. party have also visited the port of Halifax and taken part in certain activities there, and they could not help admiring the fine approach to our harbour and appreciate its many advantages.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Our sailors did not like Halifax.

Mr. ISNOR: The hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden) has paid at least two visits to the port of Halifax, and I do not think that last remark of his was becoming. It does not do the hon. member justice to criticize the judgment not only of a magistrate but of a judge of the supreme court of Nova Scotia. I doubt very much whether any hon. member who is not in possession of all of the facts is in a position to make a statement such as the hon. member has just made.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: They did not like your magistrates.

Mr. ISNOR: I did not intend to enter into a discussion on any question that has no bearing on this matter; therefore I shall close with the hope that we shall all work together for the port of Halifax and in the best interests of all of Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: What about Saint John?

Mr. ISNOR: I do not mind saying a word about Saint John. It is a fairly good port; it compares with other ports farther away from Halifax. Naturally, being in the maritimes, it ranks perhaps next to Halifax.

Mr. R. R. KNIGHT (Saskatoon City): I rise to support the resolution:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into immediate consideration the advisability of encouraging the fullest possible use of the harbour and port facilities at Churchill, Manitoba, or the transferring of the management and control of the said port to a joint Board appointed by the governments of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

I should like to point out to the senior hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor) who has just spoken, that this resolution is divided into two parts, and that his assumption is not necessarily correct that the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Moore) wants to put the second part of the resolution first, namely, to put the cart before the horse. The resolution states:

That . . . the government should take into immediate consideration the advisability of encouraging the fullest possible use of the harbour and port facilities at Churchill, Manitoba, or . . .

You see, sir, the people in that part of the country have had a good many disappointments in regard to the port of Churchill, and they find it is better to have that "or" in the resolution. In other words, if the government is not prepared to do something about it, we have people out there who are prepared to do something about it in their stead.

Geographically speaking, this debate seems to have moved considerably east. The senior hon. member for Halifax suggests that vast sums of money are now being asked for. We are not asking for vast sums of money; we are asking for a sympathetic consideration from this government to handle our own business. The building of the railroad and the opening of the port are fait accompli. What we want is sympathetic encouragement from the government, and I am proud to be able to say that I believe we are going to get it.

The senior hon. member for Halifax said that only 24·5 ships arrived the year round. If that is true then there are certain other reasons for it and they are not all geographical. I would draw the attention of the hon. member to the fact that the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras) pointed out that the route had not been used at all, or practically not at all, in the last four years. That, of course, is perfectly understandable, seeing that the British government, I am led to believe, requested that the port should not be used because they did not have the ships available to convoy commercial ships. Therefore those years cannot be counted in any calculation of that kind.

The senior hon. member for Halifax said that since the hon. member who spoke before him had praised Churchill he should be allowed to praise Halifax. By the same reasoning if the hon. member who spoke before me had the privilege of running down Churchill, I, too, have the privilege of saying a word to the detriment of Halifax. So far as westerners are concerned I would say this to him: the long rail haul to the Atlantic prohibitively raises the cost of production on all bulk commodities to such an extent that we cannot get very much benefit from using Halifax as a harbour. Another thing that was very well recognized by the United States government during the late war is that the port of Halifax is somewhat vulnerable during war time. It has a disadvantage there that Churchill has not. If shipping into Churchill were properly organized it could be more easily defended.

The argument of the hon. member breaks down when he compares Halifax with Churchill. Even speaking on the advantages of Halifax his argument is a very short-sighted one, because we believe that if our hopes are fulfilled in the years to come a healthy shipping trade will spring up between Churchill and Halifax.

I shall not speak, and the clock so reminds me, at any great length on this subject, because I had something to say on this subject when I made my maiden speech some time ago. Those remarks are recorded at page 199 of Hansard.

It is fitting that the resolution concerning the Hudson Bay route should be introduced by the hon. member for Churchill, because his port is the one that is under discussion. As the member for Saskatoon City, I could not allow the opportunity to go by without raising my voice in behalf of the development of this route, a development which is so vital to the people of my constituency and to the people of the northern and, indeed, of all parts of Saskatchewan. It is not purely a provincial project; it is one that on many counts should be classed as a national problem. Saskatoon is a city which is the centre of a large tract of fine wheat growing country. It has wholesale houses and supply houses for innumerable towns and villages, country stores and post offices. It is a distributing point for farm machinery. It has two great flour mills which process a considerable part of the grain grown in that country for the export trade. It is the natural trading centre for that part of Saskatchewan, and it is in a position to benefit enormously in the way of trade by a lively increase in traffic over the Hudson bay route.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Would the hon. member permit a question? I am seeking information. With regard to the second part of the resolution, is the hon. member able to say whether the western provinces would be content to take over this port; do we know that?

Mr. KNIGHT: I have letters and correspondence which, if the hon. member would come to my room, I would be pleased to show him at any time. My information is that there is in Saskatoon a new Hudson bay route association. I did not want to interrupt an hon. member when he was speaking, but that is now the name of the main organization which is promoting this particular project; it is the heir of the previous "On to the Bay" association. I shall tell the hon. member quite candidly what my information is and which was contained in a letter the secretary wrote to me the other day. He said that he had approached the governments of the provinces on the matter, and that as far as he could see their consideration was favourable. They are also trying to work out some cooperative trade with the cooperatives in the old country. They are going to try to get together with the federated cooperatives of the provinces. They are going to try to persuade those cooperatives to appoint trade representatives to work this out, and if they refuse so to do they are going to persuade the governments of the provinces to agree to such trade commissions. I think that proves that the governments are also looking with a friendly eye upon the proposition. As a matter of fact, the letter stated that the reason the conference between the provinces and between the group of cooperatives was not already in effect was that Premier Garson of Manitoba is now busy with the election and could hardly be expected to give his time to this project, which is not a political one. I do not know whether I have answered the hon. member's question, but I have done as well as I could.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Thank you.

Mr. KNIGHT: The headquarters of the federated cooperatives which I have just mentioned are also at Saskatoon. It is a business whose expansion has been phenomenal. The wheat producers are operating a tremendous business there this year. I do not know whether hon. members are aware of it, but the wheat pool is making an attempt to start an industry there. They have started a project to build factories which are to produce grain alcohol and to extract oil from flax and to make paint and plastics.

The ground has been broken this year by the provincial government for the building of a medical school in connection with the university. Saskatchewan has never had a medical college, but it will have one soon, and the same provincial government has done a great deal to promote and encourage home industries of which we are greatly in need. A great airport with a runway a mile and a half in length is at this moment being constructed and we are to have a great air centre in a world air route. Now, to connect all this up with the port of Churchill, I must relate that the distance from Saskatoon, all rail, to Churchill, is 814 miles, and from Saskatoon all rail to Montreal is 1,828 miles. Hon. gentlemen across the way can compute for themselves how much more it would take to get to Halifax. By rail and water, the distance to Montreal is 2,133 miles. Therefore it will be seen from the point of view of distance why we are so much in favour of Churchill.

As to the water distance—and again I did not wish to correct hon. gentlemen who spoke previously—it has been said that there is a great deal of difference between water distances. As a matter of fact, the water distances from Churchill to Montreal and from Churchill to Liverpool are practically the same. There are of course optional routes, but the average distance is practically the same. There is not a hundred miles in the difference either way.

It would be just as reasonable for us in the west—I think hon. gentlemen from the east should listen to this—to expect people in Toronto and Hamilton and points between Toronto and Hamilton and further west to ship their stuff out west by railway, take it through Churchill and ship it to Liverpool by that route as it is to expect us to use the St. Lawrence waterway down from our home. That is literally true from the point of view of distance.

I have said that this is a matter of national and not of local concern. Canada has ports and, whether it be wise or not, she has a great mileage of railways per capita. She has a vast system of transportation, and what we need in this country, and particularly in the west, is more people. The people we have now are divided too unevenly and the result is that we have an unbalanced economy. That is not altogether due to geographical conditions. In Saskatchewan, owing to the increased mechanization of farming, and owing to increased modern improvements in farm machinery, only a fraction of the people are now needed to grow the wheat who grew it before. When I first threshed in that province thirty years ago twenty-six men ran the threshing outfit; now an old man and a boy of eleven will do more work in a day than all of us did, put together.

The average age of the Saskatchewan or the western farmer, hon. members may be surprised to know, is very high indeed. The young men marched off to the war, in spite of the fact that they were farmers' sons, and boys and girls came east to get war work. Let me ask hon. gentlemen from the east this question: Have they ever considered what it would be like to have their sons and daughters going 2,000 miles to get a job? I wonder how those who come from Quebec would like that? It is an honest fact that if a boy wants a job in industry he has to go at an early age 2,000 miles from his own home and his family influences.

Mr. CLAXTON: Many people went from the east to the west to get jobs.

Mr. KNIGHT: I was speaking of industry. That is not a good national situation, and it is one which the development and encouragement of a new route would help to overcome. What I have said may give rise to the idea that some opposition may be raised in central Canada against government encouragement of the Hudson bay route, but I contend that such opposition would be purely selfish and in the long run short-sighted. For fifty years a golden stream of western wheat has flowed down through central Canada. This left a good deal of sediment in its path. It has turned into a stream of gold. When hon. members consider the long haul, the discriminatory freight rates, the protective tariff that has been in existence in this country so long, I think they will agree with me that the western wheat lands have contributed their share and more to the upbuilding of this nation.

And now we want from the east and central Canada and Halifax, not large sums of money but a little sympathy and support in the upbuilding of the west; for, as Sir Ashley Cooper, governor of the Hudson's Bay company, said a day or two ago to a western audience:

> Your imports will be governed largely by eastern Canada. The question of trade between western Canada and Britain is not so much a matter for Canada and Britain to deal with but one to be settled between eastern and western Canada. Great Britain will take all the products of western Canada she can pay for.

But the amount she can pay for will depend a good deal on the amount we in Canada are willing to import from her. I suggest that some of these imports could be profitably brought to the port of Churchill through Hudson bay. There was a good deal of opposition to the building of this road and the equipment of the port. For years the whole thing was a political football, but now we have fait accompli, a transportation system which by 1932 had proved that it would work.

Surely that selfish and petty opposition should now disappear. Surely we have reached the stage when we are prepared to put the public good before the private purse. It is queer, though, how men who will send their sons even cheerfully to war, and with some degree of resignation contemplate the fact that they will not return, will oppose tooth and nail any public scheme which will affect their own pockets.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. KNIGHT: Before six o'clock I was speaking in support of the resolution asking for sympathetic consideration and active support on the part of the government for the Hudson bay route. I had shown the importance of the route to my own community; I had discussed its importance from a national point of view, which to my mind is infinitely more important; I had pleaded for it as a means of bringing people and industries to my part of the country and to this nation as a whole, and to the best of my ability I had answered the arguments of the senior hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor) in opposition. That attitude of opposition, Mr. Speaker, has done more injury than good to this country. It is the attitude which says, if we cannot have something for ourselves, then let no one else have it. What we need in this country, sir, are kindly hearts, open minds and, above all the vision that tells us that what is good for one is good for all, the vision that will make our country great. Good luck to Halifax as far as I am concerned; long may it prosper. For the hon. member who lives there I have nothing but best wishes and sympathy. I have been there twice. My own view is that it is rather depressing to think that between Halifax harbour and Cape Race lie scattered the ribs of 280 gallant ships which have gone to Davy Jones' locker. I had hoped, nay I was almost convinced that such opposition had ceased. If you are interested in the opposite view I would recommend the reading of "Sea of Destiny" by Dyson Carter. He claims that a deliberate attempt to sabotage the route was made by eastern commercial and transportation interests and marine insurance companies, supported by the press. He even offers the terrible indictment that the sinking of the ship Bright Fan early in the history of the completed route was not altogether accidental. Of course I have no proof in regard to this statement, and he will have to take the responsibility for it himself. I do know there was joy in certain quarters in Montreal when the Bright Fan went down, but that joy was somewhat tempered some two weeks later by the news that the Pennyworth had gone down in a fog off Montreal. The Pennyworth had successfully cleared her cargo from Hudson bay just a short time before.

However that may be, shipping out of Churchill increased until in 1936 some fourteen ships steamed out of the port with 5,000,000 bushels of No. 1 wheat aboard. The Imperial shipping committee, investigating a wreck that occurred that year, declared:

As far as physical risks are concerned we are convinced that the Hudson's bay route is not more dangerous, and in some respects is less dangerous, than the St. Lawrence route.

I said, sir, I had hoped the opposition would cease. I am afraid that, like the poor, propoganda persists in being with us. I have in my hand a little pamphlet which just came to my desk. I do not know who sent it; no one knows. It just came. It did not cost a penny; I was very welcome to it. As a matter of fact, they hope I will read it. Perhaps it was sent to be received in time for this debate. Again, I do not know; but at any rate it is free. It represents this selfish viewpoint, this one-sided idea about which I was talking. It reminds me of certain other pamplets which you will remember were sent around in this country prior to June 11, except that this one is white in colour. It should have had a bit of that red mail-order paint on it to dress it up a little. No one knew who sent those other pamphlets, either; they just came, and we were welcome to them. Hon. gentlemen opposite did not know where they came from; hon. gentlemen to my right did not know where they came from, and they are all honourable men. Let me read a little from this pamphlet, choosing a place almost haphazardly. The writer seems to be interested in railroads; so am I He says:

We can realize that the C.P.R. made western Canada . . .

Well, that is a good sentence; it reads equally well in reverse. Then he goes on to say:

Public opinion on the prairies forced the government into backing great and even unwise ventures in providing competition for the C.P.R.

Then a little later comes the line that caught my eye; this is my reason for introducing this pamphlet into this debate:

Perhaps one day the line to Hudson bay will be available.

He goes on to speak of other railway ventures and then adds:

However, mistakes were made.

Then another line:

. . . and it is now taken for granted that we shall, forever, have two railways in western Canada.

The gentleman looks a long way ahead. He is also interested in tariffs and says:

As a matter of fact, even good free traders are apt to doubt whether a tariff which has been on for any length of time can be taken off completely, and overnight, without making things worse than they were . . . However, as things are, the fact has to be faced that there will not be a sudden and general removal of all tariffs . . .

He is also interested in the Winnipeg grain exchange, and says:

Unfortunately, western wheat grower opinion, still worrying about the depression of the thirties . . . has backed the idea of suspending open trading on the Winnipeg wheat market. This has almost certainly involved a heavy loss to the wheat growers.

And he feels very sorry for them.

To get back to the more serious question, although I believe what I have read has some bearing upon it, for a moment I should like to discuss the question of the danger to shipping, which of course is a vital factor in the situation, because the success of this project depends upon getting reasonable rates in marine insurance. Even before the war the dangers of the route, like those of the St. Lawrence, had been progressively mastered by scientific advance, with the installation of gyro compasses, radio direction finders and the employment of icebreakers. During the last war many devices must have been evolved making for the safety of ships at sea, devices which can be applied to the occasional fog and ice conditions encountered in Hudson bay. As some of the previous speakers have said, I imagine radar holds immense possibilities in this connection and will open a whole new field of navigation.

The other day in this house I asked that the Minister of Transport produce copies of reports furnished by the United States government in regard to a survey made during the last war by that government of meteorological conditions over the route. We were told that such a survey had been made, and I understand that both the waters and the air were thoroughly investigated. I was promised a copy of the report and I know it will reach me in due course. Unfortunately it is not available for this debate. I expect and hope it will contain information encouraging the use of the Hudson bay route. Let me draw one thing to the attention of hon. members. During the war the Americans took no chances on leaving unguarded that great body of open water which leads directly into the heart of this continent. They know the potentialities and the virtues of that great route, and so they took that survey. I am told that the Americans went in there to Hudson bay, to a frozen sea as it has been called by so many people, in the heart of winter. I am not vouching for the truth of that statement, because I was not there; but I am offering it for what it is worth. I hope to get the information from the minister later on.

With all this new information, and with all these new inventions, surely the price of marine insurance will come down. If so, the success of the route will be assured, and the wish of the people in the prairie provinces will be fulfilled. I suggest to the government that if marine insurance is not cut down proportionately as, in the light of new inventions, it should be, the government should be doing something about it, and should say to the marine insurance companies, you will have to bring your rates down, proportionately, or we will see that there is some other company operating, or some manner in which marine insurance rates may be made reasonable.

The wish that the Hudson bay route be opened was expressed in a recommendation of the United Farmers of Canada, Saskatchewan branch, to the dominion-provincial conference, in a memorandum of August 4, 1945. May I quote the following from that recommendation:

> We recommend action to make full use of the Hudson Bay railway and all facilities at Port Churchill for shipment of products from, and goods to, Canada; that Canadian trade agents be appointed to facilitate trade through the Hudson Bay-Port Churchill route; that Canadian trade agents established in other countries be instructed to develop trade through the Hudson Bay-Port Churchill route, and that the project be operated under a board of western management.

This request for a western board, about which some curiosity has been shown here to-day, in conjunction with the governments of the prairie provinces, is also put forth by the Hudson's bay route association, an organization which is leaving no stone unturned to bring about the resumption of traffic over that route. The board's being of that composition would procure action forthwith, I am sure, and would remove any suspicion that may linger in the west that pressure was being brought to hinder operations.

We hope, and have reason to believe, that the government will act upon the idea expressed in this resolution, particularly in respect of the first part of it. In that event the second part would not be necessary. I have in my possession correspondence which shows that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) attempted to find shipping to bring out of Churchill the grain that is held there. A letter from the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) states:

> The policy of the government in the matter of Churchill is to facilitate the use of this port in every way possible.

Good! We will look for action—and not next year when shipping opens up, but now, to prepare for the time when shipping opens up. May I add in passing that this has been one of the great drawbacks in the past. The authorities would wait until the weather was changing, and when ships might have been coming in there it was found that preliminary investigation and preparations had to be made. By the time that was done, the season was over.

The road is built and ready. In fact, it is now in use and it has been paid for out of the proceeds of western lands. There is at the port a fair nucleus of equipment with which to start business, and the government has assured us that the ban on shipping, which they say was a necessity owing to war, is now lifted.

We have hope of support from hon. members in the house. I hold in my hand an interesting pamphlet, somewhat yellowed with age, for it is dated 1926. This pamphlet deals with the Hudson bay route. May I quote haphazardly from the speech—for that is what it is:

> The problem of transportation is the great problem of western Canada . . .
> Since we are a democratic country governed by the wishes of the majority, and since all the produce of western Canada before the opening of the Panama canal had to move eastward, every attempt to open up new trade routes has met with opposition which has often been successful . . .
> Nor is the Hudson Bay railway the project of the west. It is national in its interest.

In this fashion the then premier of Saskatchewan, now the federal Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) proceeded to prove his point with earnestness and precision. In an eloquent conclusion he states, prophetically, in the light of recent inventions:

> Those seamen . . . will find ways and means to stretch the four month's season set down by tenderfoot engineers into six or more months.

So that in support of this cause we shall have within the government, and as an influence upon his colleagues, the driving force of the Minister of Agriculture. I have never heard it said of him—and I have heard plenty—that he has shown either reluctance or a lack of ability in fighting for a cause in which he believed.

There is another point of interest about this now historic pamphlet published by what was known as the "On-to-the-Bay" Association of Canada. On its reverse side we find the list of patrons, headed by the Hon. John Bracken, then premier of Manitoba. I do not believe that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) changed his beliefs in regard to this route when he changed over to his present company. I hope he will give as aggressive leadership in the right direction to his Ontario cohorts as he did in Manitoba to his western gentlemen, and that in his important capacity in the house he will assist in stirring the government to action in this matter, for which there is strong support both in the house and in the country.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to make a speech, but I should like to ask a question. The port of Churchill is an unnatural port, when we have two railroads which can deliver the grain to the breadbasket of the world, and to a point where we have the greatest wheat handling facilities found anywhere.

My question is this: Is it possible to heat up the Hudson bay and Baffin strait with atomic power, so as to keep the water free of ice? I would ask the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) or the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) if there is any possibility of that.

Mr. FRASER: That is the sixty-four dollar question.

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, before the minister speaks, I should like to add a word on behalf of this group in full support of the opening and the operation of the Churchill route.

I do not happen to be a resident of Port Arthur, but I do happen to be—perhaps through good luck, or bad—one of those farmers in western Canada who have been adversely affected in the past because the Hudson bay route does not operate. If we would watch the wood-pile and pull the niggers out, perhaps we would learn just why gyro-compasses and other things have been discussed to-night. We in western Canada are satisfied that there is a nigger in the wood-pile, and that if we can get it out it will not be necessary to bother with the red herrings that have been thrown across the trail.

Our group is fully behind this project.

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the house has listened with keen interest to the debate which has taken place this afternoon on the resolution moved by the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Moore). I know I have enjoyed the speeches which have come both from this side of the house and from the other side.

Hon. members who have preceded me in the debate have paid tribute to those who have spoken, and I should like to add my word of commendation to the hon. member who introduced the resolution as well as to other hon. members who have spoken on the subject. The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) has received so many congratulations that I hesitate to say anything about his contribution. When he does rise to speak in any debate he speaks with such experience that it is always interesting to listen to what he has to say.

The resolution which the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Moore) has placed on the order paper may be termed academic to an extent. I am sure that he did not intend it as such, that what he is looking for is something of a practical nature. The resolution as I understand it can be divided into two parts, but perhaps I should read it to the house. It reads:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into immediate consideration the advisability of encouraging the fullest possible use of the harbour and port facilities at Churchill, Manitoba, or the transferring of the management and control of the said port to a joint board appointed by the governments of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

The first part deals with the policy of the government, while the second part asks, in the alternative, that the port be turned over to a board representative of the three prairie provinces. So far as the first part is concerned, I may tell hon. gentlemen that the policy of the government with reference to Churchill is to use the port facilities and the railway facilities to every possible advantage. I may tell the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat and who has asked that the government give the proposition sympathetic consideration, that the government has done that in the past, is doing it at the moment and will continue to do it in the future.

Before I discuss the two alternatives in the resolution I should like to say a word with reference to the second part which the hon. gentleman who introduced it failed to deal with. It is true that the hon. gentleman for Saskatoon City (Mr. Knight) did refer to the second part, but I want to make a statement with reference to it. So far as I am aware there has never been any joint policy or any united or concerted action by the governments of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta with reference to turning over the port to a joint board. There may have been resolutions by boards of trade, but certainly there has been no concerted policy on the part of those three governments.

It would strike me that perhaps a certain part of Alberta would not be favourable to the second part of the resolution. If the information which I have is correct, the westerly one-third of Saskatchewan and all of Alberta, because of the freight rate structure in that part of western Canada, would have a greater advantage in moving their grain and other products to Vancouver than by the Churchill route. Before I go into those two angles, there are certain statements of a general and statistical nature which I should like to make to the house. Before I do that, perhaps I should say that being an easterner I do not presume to know as much about the history and topography of this country as hon. gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate.

I believe it would be opportune at this time to outline briefly the background of the project. Apparently with the growth of western Canada and the consequent increase of agricultural production the need for larger markets was felt, and those markets were the European markets. Those markets were difficult of access because of lack of railway facilities and the question arose as to how they could be made more accessible. The result was the proposed construction of the Hudson Bay railway and the development of the port of Churchill.

This project was not a new one because as far back as the eighties a great deal of talk had been going on in our country with reference to the construction of a railway to Hudson bay. As long ago as 1886, and from that year to 1908, the federal government made a standing offer of a land grant to any individual or corporation who would build a railway to Hudson bay. That offer was taken up in part by the Canadian Northern railway which constructed the line from Hudson Bay Junction to the Pas. The land grant provision was withdrawn in 1908; the Department of Railways and Canals commenced their investigation by survey parties and other explorations, and in 1909 railway location surveys were started. In 1910 a contract was let for the construction of a bridge over the Saskatchewan river at the Pas, and in 1911 a contract for 185 miles of grading was awarded.

I consider it unnecessary to traverse the different changes in policy which took place following the great war and the change of the ocean terminal from Nelson to Churchill on the recommendation of Sir Frederick Palmer, the eminent authority on port construction who was designated by the then government to investigate the best possible location for the terminal and other related matters. To do so would occupy too much time of hon. gentlemen at this juncture.

Suffice it to say that steel was laid into Churchill on March 29, 1929, and by September, 1931, harbour facilities were sufficiently developed to handle a test shipment of wheat. Two cargoes amounting to 544,770 bushels of wheat were dispatched in that year. By the end of 1932 Churchill had developed into a harbour capable of accommodating and loading three grain ships at one time with an extra ship's berth at which bulk cargo might be unloaded, with a good channel approach to the dock and a basin in front of the dock thirty feet deep at extreme low tide. There was a fast grain handling plant, a modern freight shed, as well as water, light and other necessary port facilities. The grain elevator at the port was capable of handling two and a half million bushels of wheat.

The total expenditures on the Hudson bay project, including interest on capital investment of $3,914,000 but exclusive of cost of Hudson strait investigation, aids to navigation and icebreaker, amount to $56,583,000. As has been stated by the hon. member for Davenport, there was only one year in which there was a surplus for both railway and harbour. This was in 1942 when the United States forces were constructing an airport at Churchill and landing fields on Southampton island, and one on the north and one on the south side of Hudson strait. This surplus was brought about by the tremendous tonnage of material handled by the railway and through the harbour in that year.

As the house knows, the Hudson Bay railway is operated by Canadian National Railways as agent for the government, while the port is administered by the national harbours board.

Mr. WRIGHT: Have you the tonnage handled in 1942?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I propose to put on Hansard at a later date a detailed statement of the facilities as well as an answer to the hon. gentleman's question.

Mr. COLDWELL: At a later date, or later in your speech?

Mr. CHERVIER: Later in the debate.

Mr. REID: And the grain too.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I would draw special attention to the fact that in 1944 the deficit of the Hudson Bay railway was over a half million dollars. namely, $564,940.02. That coupled with the deficit of $58,907.04 on the harbour operations made a total deficit of $623,847.06 on the railway and harbour operations alone from 1944. With the permission of the house I should like to table for inclusion in Hansard the following: (1) construction cost of the Hudson bay project to March 31, 1945; (2) net deficit or surplus; (3) summary of the number of ocean ships and business handled each year since the first shipment of grain in 1931; (4) ice out of harbour; (5) closing of navigation; (6) traffic on Hudson Bay railway, 1930 to 1944; (7) distance tables:

The construction cost of the Hudson bay project to March 31, 1945, has been as follows:

* Churchill harbour figures on calendar year basis while Hudson Bay railway figures are on fiscal year.

Although four freighters were unloaded at Churchill in 1928 and two in 1929, the harbour was undeveloped and the cargoes were entirely for local consumption in the construction of the Harbour Works. A summary of the number of ocean ships and business handled each year since the first shipment of grain in 1931 is given below:

In addition to the above in 1942 there were 10 ships which took out 25,396 tons of war materials for the U.S. Army and in 1943 there were 9 small freighters that took out 8,300 tons of war materials.

I should like to deal briefly, not with each one of the tables I have just filed, but with one or two subjects having to do with them which I think will throw some light upon this discussion.

I referred a moment ago to the total cost of the facilities at the port and on the railway to date. But I should like to go a step further and say that the construction cost of the Hudson bay project to March 31 has been as follows: the railway: $33,602,000; terminal works at Churchill harbour, $12,826,000; terminal works at Port Nelson, $6,240,000; making in round figures a total capital investment of $52,669,000.

The second table to which the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras) referred this afternoon has to do with the total exports and imports from and to foreign ports from 1931 to 1944. I think a close examination of this table will disclose one of the main reasons why shipowners and shippers find it difficult and hesitate to use the port of Churchill. It is this, that if there are wheat and other commodities as an outgoing cargo, there is very little ingoing cargo. A casual look at this table will show, for instance, that from 1931 to 1944 there were imported through the port of Churchill only 10,252 tons of general merchandise and 5,321 tons of coal.

Another table which is extremely enlightening is that having to do with ice out of the harbour and the closing of navigation. That has been dealt with by several hon. gentlemen this evening, and I do not want to go into it any great length save to say this, that I think we are all agreed that the navigation season for the port of Churchill is extremely short, namely from about twelve to fourteen weeks.

The combination of ice conditions in Hudson strait and in Hudson bay and the harbour itself limits the period of navigation from early August to the middle of October, which, roughly speaking, is twelve to fourteen weeks. In the spring the ice goes out of the harbour on the average, as the table will show, about the 10th day of June, but at that time heavy ice is in the bay and shipping will not be able to come in through the strait and the bay. Our records further show that over a period of seventeen years the earliest closing date of navigation would be October 10 and the latest date, November 3.

Mr. MacNICOL: If the minister will permit a question just for information, now that he is giving the periods of open water, may I ask if the entrance to the bay is not frozen over for the year between the three islands across its entrance. At what time does the ice open up across the mouth of the bay?

Mr. CHEVRIER: As I stated a moment ago, the time at which the ice opens up in the bay is much later than in the harbour. I have before me the report of the engineer of the transport department who made a complete survey of conditions in the harbour and who has prepared certain notes for my use. In his statement he says that in the spring the ice leaves the harbour about the 10th of June, but at that time heavy ice is in the bay and also in the strait and a ship would not be able to go through there. But even if it did, with the aid of an ice-breaker, a ship, if anything happened to it because of ice running, would not be able to get back to port. That is the information I have at hand.

I want to say something about insurance rates, which is another important feature, whether or not ships can get insurance before they move. Insurance for Churchill can be obtained from August 5 to October 15 only, and on ships going in and passing Cape Chidley at the eastern end of Hudson strait on August 5 and can be kept on ships leaving Churchill until October 7 without extra premium. From October 8 to October 15 the extra premium is twenty-five per cent. Thus the season is set for insurance purposes as from August 5 at Chidley to October 15 leaving Churchill.

May I return now to the resolution of the hon. gentleman?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I live out in that country and I have listened to the statistics given by the hon. gentleman. Would he mind telling us if he thinks this thing is any good or not? I have been utterly unable to find out what his view is.

Mr. CHEVRIER: If the hon. gentleman would permit me to conclude I think he will learn what my views are on the subject.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I beg pardon. I thought the hon. gentleman was turning to another subject.

Mr. CHEVRIER: No; I was about to turn to the first part of the resolution which deals with the advisability of encouraging the fullest possible use of the harbour and port facilities at Churchill.

This terminal was transferred to the national harbours board for administration, management and control in 1937, and by 1939 there was in sight the biggest programme of grain shipments from the port of Churchill in its history. At that time fifteen cargo-carrying ships were assigned by various shipping companies to load grain at Churchill for Europe. Nine of them were actually named and before the war it looked as though the port of Churchill was going to enjoy a really busy period. Unfortunately, however, war broke out; after a few cargoes of grain had been shipped, one ship was torpedoed on the way out to Hudson bay and the sailings of the others were cancelled because of the hazards of war. Then followed the long years of war when, although the elevator was filled with grain, nothing moved out until 1942, when between seven and eight hundred thousand bushels were loaded on United States ships and carried to New England ports for United States government account.

Shortly after the close of the German war the Canadian wheat board, the national harbours board, and other Canadian agencies made very strong and persistent efforts to secure ships for Churchill in 1945, but owing to lack of shipping, and the necessary scientific navigational equipment such as gyro-compasses, shipping definitely declined to use the port of Churchill in 1945.

I pause here to say a word about the efforts made by the national harbours board and by the Canadian wheat board to do everything in their power to get shipments of grain to Churchill. As the house knows, during the war and even at this time shipping is controlled by virtue of the united maritime shipping agreement, and is in the hands of the British ministry of transport. Notwithstanding the representations made by both agencies, the national harbours board and the Canadian wheat board, the British ministry of shipping thought there were pertinent reasons why shipping to Churchill should be declined. I should like to give the house some of the reasons why that conclusion was arrived at. They are as follows:

First, the ministry of transport was of the opinion that the hazardous nature of the voyage justified taking into account the possible damage or complete loss of the vessel.

Second, although no damage or loss may be suffered there, it is well known that there is a great risk of delay from almost continuous fog.

The hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Moore) suggested that that might be circumvented by the use of radar. That is certainly a suggestion which deserves consideration. I continue with the reasons:

Third, there is no chance—

I emphasize this because it is extremely important.

There is no chance, or very little chance of securing an outward cargo. Shippers further insist on having gyroscopic compass, together with an efficient direction-finding installation; and ships should also be fitted with an efficient echo sounder. The number of vessels . . .

Mr. KNIGHT: Does the minister mean "inward" cargoes?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes. I am now referring to the reasons why the British ministry of transport think the route is a hazardous one.

Mr. COLDWELL: Their outward, our inward cargoes.

Mr. KNIGHT: May I ask the minister another question. The minister stated there was no possibility of obtaining an outward cargo.

Mr. CHEVRIER: No; I did not say "no possibility".

Mr. KNIGHT: Have our trade commissioners in Great Britain ever made any effort to obtain such cargoes?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Well, the answer to that question is that in war time there were few or no possibilities because of the urgent requirements of ships elsewhere. There was no possibility of obtaining the ships. That would apply to them as it did to us.

Mr. KNIGHT: But before the war.

Mr. CHEVRIER: As I stated a moment ago, the national harbours board has had the administration of this port from only a short time prior to the war.

Mr. KNIGHT: May I ask one other question?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. KNIGHT: Have I the minister's permission?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. KNIGHT: Is the minister aware that certain English and Scotch cooperative representatives were out to this country this summer looking for business and that they stated they were prepared to ship goods into the western country to help pay for our natural products?

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. REID: Not Scotch; they turned it down.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am glad to hear from the hon. member for Saskatoon City, that such is the case. If it is so, I can assure the hon. gentleman that no one will be happier than myself. I wish to assure the house that I am not trying to make a case against the port of Churchill; I am pointing to some of the difficulties that lie in the way. I may say that it is the view and the opinion of the national harbours board that if the western people could get commodities to go out to the east it would then be much easier to obtain owners of ships to go in and out of Churchill.

I was dealing with the last reason given by the British authorities, namely, that the number of vessels suitable for proceeding to Churchill during the war, and even to date are extremely limited. In the pre-war days these suitable vessels worked into position weeks or months prior to a contemplated loading date. To-day that is not possible because of existing conditions. Shipping companies do not like to put their ships into a trade which will mean only one-way cargoes. Unfortunately this one-way cargo operation has been the experience in the port of Churchill. However, if the people of the prairie provinces would find the need of British manufactures, and have the goods shipped through the Hudson bay route and over the Hudson Bay railway—

Mr. COLDWELL: And a low enough tariff to get them in afterwards.

Mr. CHEVRIER: —it would be one of the biggest aids toward popularizing this route, and I emphasize this point as one of the main remedies for the inactivity of the port of Churchill.

I now come to the second part of the resolution, which I think is more or less of a hypothetical nature.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Before the minister leaves the first part, may I ask if he is for or against it?

Mr. CHEVRIER: If the hon. member will read the resolution he will see that it is couched in such terms that it is not the easiest thing to reply either in the affirmative or in the negative. But I did state a while ago that the policy of the government is to aid the port of Churchill and to use the facilities there to the fullest possible extent.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): "Now, have I answered your question?"

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am not sure whether in the second part of the resolution the hon.

member meant to include, although he did not, the Hudson Bay railway. I presume, however, that he did because one goes with the other.

Mr. COLDWELL: Not necessarily.

Mr. WRIGHT: Not necessarily.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Well, that may be so. The port of Churchill would not be worth very much if the Hudson Bay railway were not there.

Mr. COLDWELL: Nor would the port of Montreal without the Canadian Pacific railway or the Canadian National railway.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Nevertheless I wish to emphasize by way of explanation what I meant by referring to the second part of the resolution as hypothetical. It is this: so far as the Department of Transport is concerned there never has been a policy in western Canada agreed to collectively by the governments of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, requesting the federal government to transfer either the port of Churchill or the Hudson Bay railway to the three prairie provinces.

Mr. MacNICOL: One would not be of much use without the other.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is a fact that at various times and by various agencies resolutions have been passed, suggestions put forward and possibly approaches made to the federal government recommending the change in policy suggested by the hon. member in his resolution; but there never has been any united front policy with regard to the transfer of the port of Churchill or the Hudson Bay railway by the federal government to the three prairie provinces.

Since several hon. members have placed on Hansard resolutions coming from various organizations and associations in western Canada, I will put on Hansard the following resolution from the Winnipeg Board of Trade. It is dated November 28, 1944, and was addressed to my predecessor, the Hon. Mr. Michaud. I will not read the whole resolution. I will quote only two paragraphs of it:

Whereas a resolution was adopted by the Hudson bay route association at an organization meeting in Saskatoon on November 15, 1944, calling on the Saskatchewan government, in cooperation with the Manitoba and Alberta governments, if possible to secure forthwith from the dominion government power to operate the Hudson Bay railway and Churchill harbour, the railway and port should be maintained, operated and administered under a strong representative western board of management.

Pretty much the same language as in the second part of the resolution.

Therefore be it resolved that while reiterating the long-standing policy of the Winnipeg board of trade to support all measures advantageous to the province of Manitoba and western Canada, the board urge that no commitments be entered into by the government and the people of Manitoba with respect to the proposal for the control and operation of the Hudson Bay railway and the port of Churchill until all the relevant facts and data required for the formation of an intelligent opinion are available.

It would seem therefore, from this resolution, that the Winnipeg board of trade are certainly not in favour of implementing the second part of the hon. gentleman's motion at this time.

There are just one or two other statements that I should like to make before I resume my seat. The Hudson Bay railway is operated by the Canadian National Railways as the agent for the government of Canada, and I think the Canadian National Railways operate the Hudson Bay railway in as efficient a manner and as cheaply as any organization could. That is one thing which must be taken into consideration when one deals with the administration by a board other than the Canadian National Railways.

Here I should like to say a word with reference to the manner in which the Canadian National Railways have operated the Hudson Bay railway and compare it with what would happen under separate operation. Under separate operation the Hudson Bay railway would probably be faced with a number of increased costs, some of which I might enumerate. Supervision and technical services now provided by Canadian National officers would, under separate operation, require the creation of a staff to handle the functions of transportation, maintenance of way and structures, maintenance of equipment, purchasing of stores, and accounting, to mention only the major items which would be involved. This would likely produce two effects. Costs would likely be greater than the $1,000 a month charged against operations by the Canadian National for these services; and, further, it is hardly to be expected that there would be such a fund of technical skill and experience as is now available.

The general conclusion on the economics of the operation of the Hudson Bay railway is that the present type of operation is cheaper than any alternative and contains no profit element to the Canadian National Railways. The most that can be said for the resolution is that it has had the effect of bringing before the house the facilities of the railway and the harbour. The facilities, I am happy to say, are in excellent shape, and the report which I have on my desk would indicate that the elevator as well as the other facilities at Churchill are in very good condition. I need only refer to what the hon. member for Davenport said in reference to the elevator. In his own words, he said that there was no finer in the world than that constructed at Churchill.

It is the intention of the national harbours board to use these facilities. Up until this time it has made every effort, in conjunction with the Canadian wheat board, to bring shipping to Churchill. It has already made representations for shipping early next spring, and I am hopeful that ocean-going tonnage which is still pooled will be released for shipping by next year. If that is so, then I feel sure that an allocation of tonnage to move the existing stocks at Churchill will be forthcoming early next year.

I have attempted to deal with this resolution in as fair a manner as possible. I started by saying at the outset that I was not familiar or conversant with the local history, as my hon. friends were, but I wish to assure the hon. member for Saskatoon City that the department of Transport and the national harbours board are fully sympathetic to the use of the facilities there and will do everything in their power to maintain those facilities.

Mr. BRACKEN: Perhaps the minister would answer one question before he concludes. I did not gather from what he had to say that he gave the record of storage grain in that elevator since the war began. I wonder if in a few brief words he could summarize the situation there.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do not know whether the hon. gentleman was in the house when I tabled the statement covering total exports and imports. It covered the number of bushels of wheat shipped out of Churchill from 1931 to 1944. The total was 20,772,041 bushels, and, roughly speaking, the individual amounts were:

Year	Bushels
1931	500,000
1932	2,500,000
1933	2,500,000
1934	4,000,000
1935	2,500,000
1936	4,000,000
1937	600,000
1938	900,000
1939	1,772,000
1940	None
1941	None
1942	None
1943	740,000
1944	None

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. P. E. WRIGHT (Melfort): I have listened with a great deal of interest to the statement just given by the minister with respect to the route, but like the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) I am still in doubt where he stands on the matter. He spent about one minute of his time, when he started, saying that the government was in favour of the route but that he himself knew very little of the topography and very little about the circumstances of the route, and then he proceeded for thirty minutes to give facts and figures supplied to him by his officials, which are an absolute condemnation of the route. It has been in the minds of a great many people in western Canada for a number of years that there are certain officials in the department at Ottawa who are doing their best to kill the Hudson bay route, and certainly the minister's statement to-night would bear out that contention. I think anyone who listened to the minister's statement could not help agreeing that he tried, in an indirect way, to show that the route is not feasible. He gave us figures showing a deficit in 1944, for instance. Of course there was a deficit; and probably he used that year because it showed the largest deficit they ever had on that route, simply because it was not used because of war conditions; it could not be used. If the route were given a fair show; if the government would go all out, by means of their trade commissioners in the old country, to see that tonnage was brought into that port as well as going out of it, if they would encourage the cooperatives over there to make shipments through that point, and take action in other ways, there is no doubt that the deficit as far as Port Churchill is concerned could be reduced materially.

The resolution placed on the order paper by the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Moore) states:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the govment should take into immediate consideration the advisability of encouraging the fullest possible use of the harbour and port facilities at Churchill, Manitoba—

That is the first part of it. Then it goes on and suggests that if they fail to do this—

> —or the transferring of the management and control of the said port to a joint board appointed by the governments of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

The last part is inserted just in case the government are not prepared to go ahead and see that this port is used to the greatest possible extent. If the government should be prepared to do this, then the second part of the resolution does not become operative at all. For a number of years in western Canada we have had an organization which has been particularly interested in this port at Churchill. It was organized back in the 1920's, after the last war, when it seemed that the government of that day were going to abandon the project entirely. It was then called the "On to the Bay" association, and was organized to arouse public opinion in western Canada to the point where the government would be forced to continue the route and develop it for shipments to the old country. The association was successful in this. Fort Nelson, which had proved a failure, was dropped. Lord Palmer, I believe it was, carried on an investigation for a suitable port, and Churchill was chosen; the railroad was continued to that port, and the development of the route continued. To-day this organization is known as the Hudson bay route association, and again it is organizing public opinion in western Canada so that the route will not be dropped after this war as it was after the last war. It is urging that the development be continued, because the new inventions brought out during the war, together with the investigation carried on through the meteorological branches established in the north during the war by the United States forces, have placed a great deal of new information at the disposal of the government, and in western Canada it is felt that this route can and should be used now that the war is over.

This organization suggests that if the government at Ottawa are not prepared to go ahead and do the necessary advertising and, if necessary, charter vessels to come to Churchill, the management of the port—not of the railway—should be turned over to a western organization. They have some definite proposals with respect to the type of organization they would like to see take charge of the port, and those proposals have been set out in a brief they have prepared and submitted to at least all western members. They say:

> A change such as is proposed should seem highly desirable to the dominion government. The Hudson Bay railway, the railway's port at Churchill, and the bay route in its entirety, are likely to remain a matter of contention, embarrassing to the dominion government as long as that government remains responsible for the success of the bay route . . .
> To the provinces assuming administration of the commercial facilities of the port of Churchill it is suggested that they set up an ordinary joint stock company. A full half of the shares should remain with the government, or governments, and this form of organization allows a simple method for dividing and allocating shares between two or more provinces.
> Of the remaining half of the shares, a portion, or all, might be offered to such business organizations as are mentioned previously, to be acquired by actual purchase. Such shares, to add to their attractiveness, might have priority rights for dividends up to a moderate limit such as five per cent. Capital so raised would provide a working fund; and a cash investment would guarantee the continuing interest of the contributors. With assurance of such interest on the part of practical businessmen, many of the minor problems of administration would be removed from the shoulders of the provincial governments, to be carried by those whose training fits them to deal best with such problems.
> The governments should have a majority of directors. Three might be enough, if one represented business interests.
> Title to government-built properties should not pass to a joint stock company. Its rights to use of the Saskatoon and Churchill facilities should be limited to leasehold rights, with provision for cancellation.

In other words, they have definite suggestions to offer in regard to the development of the port and the facilities established there. The minister has said that the government have given sympathetic consideration to the port of Churchill. I want to point out one way at least in which they have failed to do so. If I, as a grower of grain in northeastern Saskatchewan, desire to ship to Port Churchill, the freight rate from my shipping point is eighteen cents per 100 pounds, while the freight rate to Fort William or Port Arthur is twenty-one cents. If I sell a carload of grain to go through Churchill, however, I pay the twenty-one cent freight rate to Fort William, even though my grain goes to Churchill. Therefore I do not reap the benefit of having that port contiguous to my farm in western Canada. The same applies to the whole of northeastern Saskatchewan. If the same consideration were given to the port of Churchill that is given to Fort William, Port Arthur and Vancouver, then those of us who live closer to Churchill would pay only the freight rate to that port, just as the people in Alberta who are closer to Vancouver pay the freight rate to Vancouver, even though their grain may be shipped to Port Arthur. Therefore I say that if the government were prepared to give a fair deal to the port of Churchill they would amend the Canada Grain Act of 1940 in such a way as to put shipments to Churchill on the same basis as shipments to any of the other main exporting ports.

Another way they could help materially would be by the extension of the Canadian National railway line which runs from Saskatoon to Carrot River, on to the Pas in Manitoba, to connect with the Hudson Bay railway. This would mean that the haul for grain from the northern part of Saskatchewan and Alberta would be much shorter. In addition, if this railway were continued from Carrot River to the Pas a large area of very good agricultural land would be opened up. As a matter of fact, this is the largest agricultural area in any part of Saskatchewan remaining uncultivated. It is very good land and would be opened up and developed if the railway were continued from Carrot River through to the Pas.

Those are only two ways in which the present government, if they wished to develop the Port of Churchill, could assist in that matter.

The organization in western Canada known as the Hudson bay route association, is entirely non-political; and I am glad to note that the debate in the house to a great extent has remained non-political. It just so happens that members of this group represent many of the constituencies which are particularly affected by this matter. Nevertheless, when members from other political groups represented the same constituencies they, too, spoke in favour of this route.

I have under my hand a speech delivered by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) back in 1926, at which time he strongly recommended to the dominion government that the port be developed for shipments of both outgoing and incoming cargoes. For many years the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) has been a supporter of the Hudson bay route. The former Minister of Mines and Resources in the house, who is now a member of the senate, and represented Churchill for a number of years, was also a strong supporter of this route.

I would ask the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) to give this matter sympathetic consideration, and not to listen to everything that may have been said by members of his department and staff. He, himself, should go to Churchill, see the position there and judge for himself whether or not this is a feasible route. We in western Canada are never going to be satisfied until it is definitely proven that it is not. I contend that, to date, that has not been proven. As a matter of fact, with modern radar and the new meteorological stations which have been established in the northern areas, we feel quite sure that this route can be used to a far greater extent than it has ever been used in the past.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended taking part in the debate. I always feel that people who are most familiar with the subject under discussion had best not impose their views in a manner that may tend to ruin an exchange of theories.

My association with Churchill dates back to the middle twenties. I have been there, not only at the end of August or in early September when all the tourists visit there, but also in April. I may say my face is still scarred from a frost-bite I got while walking from the train at Churchill to the nearest bunkhouse; and that was in late April.

There are certain facts in the situation which, I suggest, must be faced, particularly in view of the suggestion that the government has not endeavoured to develop Churchill as a port. June is a lovely month in Churchill; the sun shines day and night; there is no hour of the day or night when one cannot read a newspaper. But at that very time ice stretches as far as the eye can see, and that continues on to the end of June. In early July the Churchill river begins to discharge its ice. The ice breaks up and drifts out in large blocks, blocks of a size that no icebreaker with which I am familiar could be expected to cope.

The result is that insurance goes in effect on August 5, and I believe no ship would venture into the port earlier than that date. Those are facts; they are not theories in the mind of any official of the Department of Transport. I can vouch for those facts, personally; and I hope my reputation as an engineer is such that I would not be guilty of stating a fact, of which I had knowledge, without stating it correctly.

The season is closed in the fall by slush ice coming down from the Churchill river. The ice forms in the river and is carried out by the current. It would be an unfortunate boat, indeed, which got caught in that slush ice, because most certainly it would have to remain there during the next winter. It is impossible to manoeuvre.

Therefore the length of the season is pretty well determined. It is a matter of about two and a half months; and it would be an exceptional season, indeed, when navigation would be possible for a full three months.

However, we realize that much can be done in two and a half months. The government is aware of the facts, and it was aware of them when it went there. It did not make only a gesture toward developing the port; it made a magnificent job of developing it. Anyone riding to Churchill on the Hudson Bay railway and viewing the harbour facilities would not accuse the government of not having built the port in the full belief that it would be a valuable asset to Canada.

The railroad is as well built as any similar railroad in Canada. The harbour facilities are first-class. Some 1,200 feet of dock were built, and were well built under great difficulties. A grain elevator having all the facilities to be found in any grain elevator in Canada was built at that port, and was built with the knowledge that the season would be short and that the handling of grain must therefore be rapid. With that in mind four automatic car dumpers were installed there, at a time when car dumpers were a novelty in the grain trade. Loading facilities are exceptionally fast. A boat can be loaded at that port in a day without any difficulty. It was known that boats could not afford to stay long at the port, and ample loading facilities were provided so that boats could be cleared quickly. So much for the port facilities.

As I have said, they were built by a Liberal government, and they were built well. They were built with the intention of making Churchill a port of continuing value to Canada. I know something, too, about the efforts made to send business through that port. I know of the negotiations which went on with British shipping lines. Out of all those negotiations we were able to interest only one shipping line in sending boats to that port; that was the Dalgleish line. The government did make an earnest endeavour to do business through Churchill, and succeeded in doing a considerable amount of business in each season until war conditions made it impossible to operate.

The fact that no other shipping line would interest itself in the port is an indication to me that the shipping profits on the route could not have been fabulous. I know something of the efforts made to bring down insurance rates. Rates were coming down each year, until a boat was lost in the strait, and the insurance rates zoomed up again. Hon. members will understand that insurance rates are based upon the average experience of the route, and the experience on the route into Churchill has not been good, measured in terms of percentages.

I contend that every effort has been made to make Churchill an asset to Canada. Despite those efforts, however, I think hon. members will agree that up to the present time the movement of grain through Churchill has not increased the price of grain at any country loading points in Canada. There are certain points in northern Saskatchewan and northeastern Alberta which furnish the movement. If the shipping rates could be reduced, that area served would widen. But for the greater part of the west, the movement through Churchill can mean very little in the matter of increasing the price of grain at country points.

There are certain factors that have emerged from the war that will offer opportunity for a more intensive use of the route in future years. We now have a considerable fleet of ships suitable for trading into Hudson bay. These ships are owned by the government, and it will be at the option of the government whether it wishes to insure them or not. We have operated boats through the war years without insurance, and I presume the government will not hesitate to operate into Churchill without insurance.

There are certain devices that have been developed during the war, such as radar, which make it possible for a ship to detect floating ice and to obtain its own position without the use of a compass. In that way a ship is in a stronger position to undertake ventures into new routes than was the case before the war. All this will be in favour of a real trial to make the Churchill route the success that was hoped for when the facilities were built.

In spite of the short season I think it may be possible to reach the objective of those who developed the route, which was a movement of 20,000,000 bushels of grain in the season. That does not sound much when compared with the movement through Port Arthur and Fort William or through Vancouver, but 20,000,000 bushels is a considerable movement for any port. Few ports on the continent have larger movements than that. Therefore I am not suggesting that the outlook for Churchill is hopeless; far from it. I feel that in post-war years the port will develop as far as its physical limitations will permit, and I can assure the house that the government will make every effort to see that that development is pressed actively and vigorously.

As far as the "On to the Bay" association is concerned, I think the government has accepted all the practical representaitons which that body has made. It was suggested at one time that the government should employ an active agent who would be located in the western provinces and who would seek for imports into Canada. I recall that for some years the government employed one of the officers of the Saskatchewan government to perform that duty. The grain office for the port was located in Winnipeg, and a competent officer of the board of grain commissioners was given the exclusive duty of developing grain business to move through Churchill.

I hardly think the latter part of the resolution is a practical suggestion. I can assure my hon. friend that if he believes that is the best way to develop Churchill, and he can find a responsible group who wish to lease the facilities of Churchill on a basis of $1 a year, I will do my best to influence my colleagues to accept the proposal. In saying that, I am mindful of the fact that it is an expensive port to operate. There are no year-round residents at Churchill. All operators must be moved in at the beginning of the season; they must be gathered up all over the prairies and moved to the port. While the power plant is maintained in operating condition during the winter, the real crew must be moved in in the spring. The crew for the grain elevator must be moved in. All supplies must be moved in, as well as all coal to bunker ships.

Mr. MacNICOL: And all the water drained out of the mains.

Mr. HOWE: That is done at places besides Churchill. Before any boat can come in we must send one of our large icebreakers to patrol the strait. We must send up supplies of oil for the icebreaker and for other emergency purposes. Operating the port of Churchill is not a simple operation, and in my opinion its best chance of success is in the hands of the dominion government.

This has been a most interesting debate and I hardly think the mover of the resolution will wish to press it to a vote. I suggest that he withdraw his resolution.

Mr. JACKMAN: How long would the lease be that the minister mentioned, for 999 years?

Mr. HOWE: An offer has not been received.

Mr. BRACKEN: I do not know whether the hon. member who introduced the resolution is going to withdraw it. The Minister of Transport was good enough to try to answer a question I asked, but he did not answer it completely. He gave the exports of grain from Churchill, but it was the storage I wanted. My information is that the elevator was filled at the early part of the war and that it remained substantially full during the whole period of the war.

Mr. MacKINNON: I think that is correct.

Mr. HOWE: That is true.

Mr. BRACKEN: Is it full now?

Mr. HOWE: I think the United States ships moved out less than a million bushels, so that it is perhaps two-thirds full now.

Mr. BRACKEN: The capacity is what?

Mr. HOWE: Two and a half million bushels.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house that the hon. member shall have leave to withdraw his motion?

Mr. COLDWELL: He has not asked for leave to withdraw it.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Moore), which was agreed to on the following division:

ST. MARY RIVER

PROPOSED CONSTRUCTION OF RESERVOIR

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into immediate consideration the advisability of proceeding with the construction of the St. Mary river reservoir, the key structure of the Lethbridge southeast water conservation project in southern Alberta.

He said. May I give the house somewhat of the background of this resolution. There are in southern Alberta wide areas of land rich and easy to work, relatively near to railways and schools; lands most of which have already been settled and brought under cultivation. But the rainfall in that area is scanty. Crop failure is far too common. The climate is well adapted to the production of field crops of various kinds, including sugar beets, canning crops like peas, beans, corn and tomatoes and all manner of vegetables that grow in moderate climates, alfalfa and grains. As a result of all this, the area is one of great productive potentiality. It would be possible to make that particular region one of the finest sources of food in the dominion and perhaps on the North American continent. But it requires more water.

There are in the Lethbridge district four major irrigation projects; Lethbridge, Coaldale, Raymond, Magrath and Taber, comprising in all 120,000 acres. All of this land is irrigated from the St. Mary river through a canal which was constructed early in this century, about 1901 or 1902, by what was known at that time as the A.R. and I., or the Albert Railway and Irrigation company. In most years there is too little water for the area which has been brought under irrigation, so that in the months of July, August and September there is frequently such a scarcity of water that great loss results. Sometimes the scarcity is most acute. Especially is this so when the snow supply, which ordinarily is found in the Rocky mountains, is melted away for one reason or another, thereby causing the water in the river to be low. Sometimes the shortage will be forty per cent, at least, below what it ought to be.

It happens that in the system which they are using there is no reservoir. Water has to be taken out of the river just as the river runs, and consequently when the river is low the water supply is also low.

There is considerable water available in Alberta, enough of it to turn great stretches of semi-arid land into verdant blooming garden land. There are four international rivers in my constituency flowing through southwestern Alberta: Waterton river, Belly river, the St. Mary river and the Milk river. From these rivers there is available for the project which we are discussing to-night, namely, the Lethbridge southeast water conservation project, a total of 795,700 acre feet of water. This quantity, allowing for wastages through evaporation, seepage and the like would be sufficient to supply 465,000 acres of land.

To the waters of the St. Mary river and the Milk river the United States has a considerable claim. This is how it came about. The two rivers rise, of course, in the United States, but the United States made no serious claims to the waters of these rivers, so far as I know, until back in 1901 when the Alberta Railway and Irrigation company began to build the canal from which Magrath, Raymond and Lethbridge are now watered. Then the United States people began to be concerned; a reclamation act was passed by congress in 1902, and the St. Mary and Milk river project in Montana was authorized in 1903. There then arose protests of citizens on both sides of the line, each thinking that the other nation was getting too much water.

Consequently a treaty was signed on January 11, 1909, embodying an article known as article 6, setting up an international joint commission to deal with boundary waters. It also provided for the apportionment of waters between the two countries under the direction of this international commission. In the final act of the international joint commission, October 4, 1921, certain definite rules were laid down for dividing the waters between Canada and the United States. In accordance with the final act Canada between 1922 and 1940 would have received annually 403,200 acre feet from the St. Mary and Milk rivers, and the United States would have received 324,100 acre feet. During the years 1922 to 1940 and since, Canada has wasted and is still wasting fifty-five per cent of her share of the St. Mary river and practically ninety-five per cent of her share of the Milk river.

This is serious, Mr. Speaker, for two reasons. In the first place Canada has been losing all the production which would have resulted from the beneficial use of that vast amount of water. In addition, Canada has been in danger all through those years of losing her right to the waters of those two rivers; for it is recognized among nations that if a nation desires to retain its right to water it must make beneficial use of that water. In neglecting to make such beneficial use, Canada, in accordance with the understanding among nations, really has forfeited her right to it. For twenty-five years Canada has neglected to make beneficial use of her share of the water. Surely such negligence is unpardonable. How much longer are we to continue to do this exceedingly foolish thing? How much longer are those in power in Canada to delay; how much longer are they to trifle with the interests of generations yet unborn?

Meanwhile, what has the United States been doing about her share? The United States authorized her St. Mary and Milk river project in 1903, commenced to build it in 1906 and completed it in 1920. She has built the Sherburne reservoir with a capacity of 66,000 acre feet near the head of the St. Mary river and a diversion canal from the St. Mary to the Milk river. This has enabled her to carry her share of the St. Mary river into the Milk river so that she can use it more easily. Then near the Milk river she has built the Fresno reservoir with a capacity of 126,000 acre feet and the Nelson reservoir with a capacity of 66,800 acre feet. It is estimated and very much feared by people who are giving this matter careful attention that the United States is now equipped to store and use not only her share of these rivers but Canada's share as well. Hon. members can calculate what that may mean. The United States share of these two rivers is being beneficially used, and she has great need for more water than is available. The United States is finding irrigation profitable. Already her people in many parts are beginning to agitate for a request to Canada that the allocation of the waters be reconsidered. If this demand ever becomes sufficient, as it easily may, I think hon. members can see that there is cause for more than a little concern.

Why is it so important to proceed with the St. Mary reservoir in this connection? That is the key reservoir to the whole system known as the Lethbridge southeast water conservation project. The St. Mary river reservoir will be situated on the St. Mary river at Spring Coulee, in my constituency. The capacity will be 270,000 acre feet. If we could build that reservoir and store that amount of water in it, then I believe we could successfully resist any claim on the part of the United States that we were not beneficially using our share of the water.

Into this reservoir can be diverted water from the Waterton and Belly rivers. From it the water can be carried to supply the four existing projects I mentioned previously, and it can be carried to seven of the subsidiary reservoirs which will be used in storing and distributing the water in the Lethbridge southeast water conservation project when that project is completed.

This reservoir would require between three and four years to build, which means that if this government is to build the reservoir it is time it got at it. The construction of the reservoir and the expenditures thereon would be somewhat as follows, according to estimates of the engineers, and calculated at pre-war prices. In the first year $750,000 would be spent. In the second year $2,250,000 would be spent in bringing the reservoir toward completion and building certain outlet canals. In the third year the reservoir would be finished, the canals enlarged, and distribution systems would be put in to carry water to 24,598 acres. The operation of the third year would cost $2,256,485.

May I emphasize once more the fact that this reservoir will take at least three years to build. Our need is to have this reservoir right now; it should be in operation next year. We really cannot afford to wait for three years. Already one year has been lost or will be lost unless something is done this fall, which is likely now to be rather difficult because of approaching cold weather. There is another reason why this reservoir is very important. Once it was built both the dominion and provincial governments would be committed to effective action. Governments do not spend in the neighbourhood of $5,000,000 without going forward with the work. People do not see water available in a great reservoir without demanding that the water be distributed on the land. The construction of this reservoir would, therefore, be extremely important.

It is sometimes argued by politically minded people and newspapers that one reason why the government is delaying the construction of this reservoir and this system is that the provincial government of Alberta is not co-operating. I think all we need to do is to point to the fact that this year the Alberta government is proceeding with the construction of the East Pothole reservoir, which is the nearest one of the series of several reservoirs which will constitute the whole system. This reservoir will store 14,000 acre feet. Those who would argue that the provincial government is not ready to cooperate will have a good deal of explaining to do.

When these reservoirs and canals are all built, and the Lethbridge Southeast water conservation project is finished, first of all there will be developed a water supply for the 120,000 acres which are now being irrigated in four major irrigation projects. Then there will be water distributed over 345,000 acres of new land which now, because of repeated droughts, is of very little value to the country.

What I am about to say in the next minute or two may be a little bit gloomy; but I think we shall have to face the facts as they are. There is a food situation developing in the world, which, according to all the information I am able to get, is cause for the gravest anxiety. There is developing and probably has already developed the possibility of a genuine famine which might involve the lives of scores of millions of people.

There is no area on the American continent capable of being brought into the production of food and kept in the production of food any more readily than is this particular area. Crop hazards are low; we have very little difficulty with insects, with diseases, with hailstorms, or with other agencies which tend to destroy crops. We are reasonably sure of crops if we can get the water on the land. I draw this matter to the attention of the government with the most earnest seriousness. If we do not have food for the nations who are going to need food, then to the extent to which we fail to provide we shall be responsible for the lives of those people.

There is another very serious matter, and it is this: I believe too many people in this country, and probably in the world are assuming to-day that wars are past. Let me warn that there is very little justification for any assurance that wars are past, right now, in our generation. In 1936 and 1937 I warned the country that in the event of war we would be without sugar. Well, we have lived to see ourselves without sugar, and we have lived to see ourselves engaged in a war.

I am not predicting, but I would say it is only the part of plain common sense to develop this area in case we need it in a time of war. There is another aspect of the problem, namely, the one of rehabilitating those boys who will come home from overseas. The boys who are returning want land now; they do not want it four years from now. Every year we delay the construction of this project we are keeping out of possible use 345,000 acres of land. I maintain that the time is ripe for building this project right now.

I believe I have said enough to indicate that there is plenty of reason for the resolution.

Some time after 1941 the dominion government set up a committee known as the St. Mary and Milk rivers water development committee. This committee consisted of Victor Meek, George Spence and William E. Hunter. They submitted their report in February, 1942. Having gone through the report, I feel we are justified in commending the committee very highly upon the care and thoroughness with which they did their work. I should like at this time to read a passage or two from the report. Turning to page 4, I read as follows, from the findings:

7. That Canada should construct at an early date the necessary irrigation works to protect by beneficial use its share of the St. Mary and Milk rivers.

8. That there have been acute shortages in the water supply for existing projects served by the St. Mary river and that upon completion of the proposed St. Mary reservoir sufficient water would be available to supply these shortages and serve an additional area of 94,000 acres of new land.

9. That there is tributary to the St. Mary and Milk rivers a larger area of good irrigable land than can be irrigated by the total water available from Canada's share of these rivers supplemented by waters of the Belly and Waterton rivers.

10. That upon the completion of the ultimate development a total of 345,000 acres would be available for post-war settlement and for the reestablishment of many farmers at present on submarginal lands.

11. That a reservoir on the St. Mary river in Canada is the most important feature in the development and the site proposed and dealt with by this report is the most feasible for purposes of storing Canada's share of the St. Mary river and tributaries and waters from the Belly and Waterton rivers.

I should like now to read from the recommendations of the committee, as they are found at page 8:

> The construction of the main reservoirs and connecting canals would provide the necessary facilities to store in Canada, Canada's share of these international waters and would thereby be an insurance against the loss of a valuable resource.

Near the bottom of the same page I read as follows:

> That the dominion undertake and assume as a 100 per cent responsibility the construction of the main reservoirs and connecting canals to provide storage facilities for Canada's share of the waters of the St. Mary and Milk rivers as apportioned under the order of the international joint commission of October 4, 1921.

Again on page nine:

> That the dominion's part in the construction of the project be carried out as a federal post-war development, and that the cost thereof be regarded as non-recoverable.

I believe the material which I have given is such as to justify the house in passing this resolution, which reads:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into immediate consideration the advisability of proceeding with the construction of the St. Mary river reservoir, the key structure of the Lethbridge southeast water conservation project in southern Alberta.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore). I am happy to see the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) in his seat because, if anything is done in connection with the St. Mary river project, it will be done under his department. I am going to direct my remarks principally to him and I know the other members of the house will not mind. After all, it is always good politics and good business to talk to the man who has to do.

If you convince the man who has to do, then you have the job half done.

To advocate irrigation for southern Alberta should not be a difficult job, nor should it be particularly hard to convince anyone who knows anything about the problem of southern Alberta. It is a great problem. I intend to go a little outside the resolution and be more general than the resolution. I do not believe the Minister of Reconstruction can separate this one project from another project which is equally important. They should both be carried on at the same time. The irrigation of southern Alberta is a vital problem. It is of vast importance to Canada. Much of the business built up in eastern Canada, in your own city, Mr. Speaker, and in many other cities in eastern Canada; many of the plants in your city and in my city—if I were dealing with my own riding I could speak most forcibly—have been expanded because of what little irrigation—it is not little, except when compared with what has been done south of the line—has been done in southern Alberta.

I shall first confine my remarks to the resolution which asks for the construction of a reservoir on the St. Mary river. The previous speaker has already told the house that four rivers flow into Canada from the United States, all starting in the same glaciers south of Waterton park. The three westerly rivers are the Waterton, the Belly and the St. Mary, and these are the most important to Canada, more so than the Milk river.

I shall say a word about the Milk river and then leave it out from the rest of my argument. The Milk river enters Canada and after flowing through Canada for about 150 miles, or about 125 miles in a straight line, it returns to the United States. The water in that river is all United States water except for the water of some small tributaries that flow in in southern Alberta and southern Saskatchewan. None of these Canadian tributaries has water of any great volume. In my opinion the duty of Canada is to proceed with that which will mean the most to Canada, namely, the St. Mary river project.

On the St. Mary river, about ten miles more or less north of the beautiful little town of Cardston, there is an excellent site for a reservoir. I do not like to make any comment about engineering problems without knowing something about the matter, and I have visited this site. The banks are quite high and the engineers who were with me said that they could build a dam 150 feet high. They showed me where they had drilled to find foundation sites. If that could be done they could store in that reservoir about 270,000 acre feet of water. What is an acre foot of water? It means the water sufficient to cover one acre of land one foot deep. To convert 270,000 acre feet into cubic feet you would have to multiply 270,000 by 43,560, which is the number of square feet in an acre. In other words, this would be a vast volume of water.

But it is not sufficient to take care of the land which is irrigable but which is not now irrigated in southern Alberta south of the main line of the South Saskatchewan river. More reservoirs would have to be built. Besides the Spring Coulee reservoir north of Cardston, to which I have just referred, other reservoirs could be built southeast of Lethbridge, one at Chin Coulee, which would be sufficient to conserve 150,000 acre feet, and one at Verdigris, good for 140,000 acre feet. There are quite a number of other smaller sites, some of substantial capacity. The total of all reservoir capacity that could be built south of the South Saskatchewan river—quite apart from the Milk river project which I am not dealing with at the present time—is about 650,000 acre feet. That is more than would be required to take care of the possible acreage which is irrigable but which is not now irrigated, namely, about 345,000 acres. This would take care of all the additional irrigable land south of the main line of the South Saskatchewan river—Old Man river. Old Man river is the principal Saskatchewan tributary in that part of Alberta. As I say, those 345,000 acres could be irrigated by water stored from the St. Mary river, plus water diverted from the Belly river and sent into the reservoirs just mentioned. The engineering plans are ready for this project. In other words, Canada will have no trouble whatever in finding reservoir capacity in southern Alberta in which to store sufficient water to take care of the 345,000 acres of irrigable land in southern Alberta south of the main line of the Saskatchewan river.

Something was said about the cost of the Spring Coulee reservoir on the St. Mary river. The cost of all the additional reservoirs and irrigation canals in southern Alberta south of the main line of the South Saskatchewan river necessary to store water to irrigate right down to the neighbourhood of Medicine Hat would be around $15,000,000. If that can be done for $15,000,000, the Minister of Reconstruction would receive the support of this whole country. There is not a question of doubt in my mind as to the wisdom of entering into agreements and contracts for the building of irrigation works south of the main line of the south Saskatchewan river. I do not mean that Canada should pay for that, nor do I think the province of Alberta would expect to pay for it, nor do I think the people of southern Alberta would expect Canada to pay for it. But they are not in a position to do it themselves. Therefore the money required to construct these works would have to be guaranteed by the dominion government. It would not in the last analysis cost this country one dollar. Take the Taber area, where the present irrigation canals end just a short distance east of the town, south of the main line of the South Saskatchewan river. From there to Medicine Hat is a fine country, with A-1 land, containing all the chemical ingredients required to produce in abundance. That has been clearly demonstrated in the vicinity of Taber itself, where the products produced on irrigated farms are marvellous. I visited a field where something new not only for that part of the country but for Canada was being produced, namely a field of large cucumbers—I believe they call them dill.

Mr. WEIR: Dill pickles.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes. They have recently built in the village of Taber, a thriving village that clearly demonstrates the tremendous business that accrues to any village, town or city in an irrigated area, thirty very large vats, each one capable of containing some twelve tons of large cucumbers. They have also started to grow sweet potatoes in that area and are having success, which goes to show that the land in southern Alberta is A-1, excellent land. All that is required is the water. That district in southern Alberta around Taber would not grow anything of any consequence were it not for the irrigation canals that are there now. In 1943 the precipitation for that area was a little over three inches. You could not grow anything on land with a precipitation of only three inches a year, except perhaps prairie grass, wild sage and rose bush. But with irrigation, see how that area has developed! The same can be done elsewhere. There is just as good land around Raymond and Magrath and Cardston. The whole area in southern Alberta which is now irrigated demonstrates clearly what the land will produce if it has water. If it has water and produces like the one or two examples I have given anyone can readily see that the cost of irrigation works would be liquidated in time.

I am also going to ask for consideration for the territory on the north side of the river, south of the Red Deer area, which I am not going to touch at the moment. I am in favour of irrigating the Red Deer area of Alberta too, but at the moment I confine my remarks to the present irrigation canals north of the main line of the South Saskatchewan river, all of which I have covered very carefully.

The water is taken out of the Bow river on the north side of the main line of the South Saskatchewan river and diverted first to McGregor lake and from there into Little Bow lake. These two lakes have a capacity of 350,000 acre feet of water. In the area, north of the general line of the South Saskatchewan river there are 245,000 additional acres of land which is just as good land as that south of the main line of the South Saskatchewan river, and it should be covered by this general irrigation scheme for southern Alberta. You would have north of the river 245,000 acres, for which there is ample water and ample reservoir capacity, not all developed but all of which can easily be developed, and then south of the main line of the river you would have 345,000 acres, or a total of about 600,000 acres in southern Alberta which could be and should be irrigated and for which an ample supply of water is guaranteed, provided that the reservoirs are built, particularly commencing with one at Spring Coulee on the south side of the main line of the river; second, at Chin Coulee; third, at Verdegris, and fourth, at any of ten other reservoir sites.

The north side of the river is peculiarly suited right now for the extension of the irrigation system because the main line of irrigation canals are already constructed. The first area to be taken in by the new project would be the Retlaw-Lomond area, with which my hon. friends from Alberta are quite familiar. That is an excellent area of land. I have been over it, and I observed that it has an excellent fall which is peculiarly and particularly adapted for irrigation purposes. I am convinced that God Almighty in His all-wise providence, when He designed that part of Canada and endowed the soil of Alberta with that richness in chemicals which enables it to grow anything, knowing that it did not have the water it requires from precipitation, provided for it to have water, first, by providing the water in the mountains from which the South Saskatchewan river starts, and then by giving a fall to the land for not less than two hundred miles so that the water could flow down without having to be pumped.

The first area, the Retlaw-Lomond area, can easily be taken care of. It is just lying there waiting for the subsidiary canals to be built from the main canal that flows south and east from McGregor lake and from Little Bow lake. The main canal is completed right east to the Bow river, but when it reached the Bow river it stopped, for lack of money. That is to say, the connection of the canal west of the Bow river with the canal east of the Bow river did not take place. The water stops west of the Bow river, but the canal itself is completed east of the Bow river and for another fifty miles in a direct line, but perhaps sixty miles following the circuitous course which the canal takes to within sight of Medicine Hat. If the minister pays a visit to Medicine Hat and takes a motor trip on the north side of the Saskatchewan river with that brilliant and capable irrigationist, one of the ablest in Canada—I do not think there is a better one anywhere—Mr. David Hayes, of the Canada Land and Irrigation Company, he will take him, as he took me, over the route of the canal which ends very close to Medicine Hat, having started east of the Bow river. It is not connected with the water canal west of the Bow river, as I said, because of lack of money.

In my judgment the first project that should be completed is the Spring Coulee reservoir on the St. Mary river. After the works south of the river are completed, the second project is to proceed to the north and connect up with the main canal of the Canada Land and Irrigation Company so that the water will then syphon east over the Bow River and connect up to the present dry canal east of the Bow river. By that means you would place under irrigation another 100,000 acres of land. In other words north of the South Saskatchewan river you would have 245,000 acres of irrigable land, and south of the main line of the South Saskatchewan river you would have 345,000 acres of land also irrigated; in other words, about 600,000 acres of new land.

That will be an additional 600,000 acres of what I call "sure crop" land. It is just as sure crop land as it is possible for land to be. The sun shines nearly all day long. I have never travelled anywhere where I have seen as much sunlight as I saw in southern Alberta. It is no wonder that their flag contains the sun bursting in the sky. The sun as I say, shines nearly all day long. With the sun, the land and the water what place in America could ensure more certain crops than southern Alberta can? For that reason I would not hesitate at all in proceeding with the construction of irrigation works for southern Alberta, both north and south of the main line of the South Saskatchewan river.

Now Mr. Speaker, when we know what the land produces—my hon. friend, I believe, told us what the land produces and perhaps I should not repeat it—

Mr. BLACKMORE: I did not tell it all.

Mr. MacNICOL: The hon. member referred to corn. Vast crops of highgrade corn are grown there. They are developing a market for Alberta corn. It is called Taber sunshine table corn and it is in great demand all through the west and right down to Ontario. In sugar beets they produce up to eighteen tons per acre. In potatoes and all kinds of grains the crops are tremendous on the irrigated land, while across the road, so to speak, on the non-irrigated lands, sage and wild rose and grass grows.

Some will say that you can irrigate that 600,000 acres of land, but what about other millions of acres of land? I believe the time is coming, perhaps not yet, when we can do the same thing for Canada that they are doing south of the border. The minister is perhaps better posted on the marvellous results in the half dozen or more states south of the international boundary down to southern Arizona than most hon. members, but I am familiar with it too. There they have built some thirty-six major projects, and they are irrigating over three million acres of new land. On to those three million acres they are transferring over a million citizens, if one counts their families, from the dried-out areas in the dust-bowl. They are going a lot farther; they are now introducing into congress at Washington a bill asking for the expenditure of $1,900,000,000 for irrigation in the California valley drained by the St. Joachim and the Sacramento rivers. That gives the house an idea of what our United States cousins think of the value of irrigation. They have created an enormous market in the last few years for the products and the manufactures of the eastern states. They have created in brand-new business of manufactured goods a new yearly market to the total of over $200 million. That is a lot of new business. That is a lot of jobs in the towns and cities of the eastern states.

If we irrigated 600,000 acres of land that are ready for irrigation in southern Alberta, that are crying out for irrigation, we would create in Alberta alone a market that would affect not only every factory in Ontario, but in Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, because they all manufacture and ship material out there. I have seen and have made it my business to go into the merchant stores, wholesale and retail especially, to ascertain what they had on their shelves that was made in eastern Canada. If they did not have a market for it they would not have it there, would they? We can greatly increase that market by irrigating the 600,000 acres of land. But I would not stop there. I think the grand old province of Saskatchewan needs consideration. If there is any province in Canada to-day that needs consideration it is Saskatchewan. Again this year what have they? One-third of their whole southern area depressed by drought. It is heart-breaking. I myself have travelled slowly south from Regina to Estevan, and I have been very much depressed with what I saw, all dried-out land upon which farmers, with all the hope that their hearts could have, have sown their seed in the expectation that they would receive some return, but they have received little. It is land that has less than ten inches of water a year; it is land that should have a minimum of eighteen inches of water a year. That would not be enough to give them great crops, but it would give them somethnig. Take a route straight from the South Saskatchewan river from Riverhurst, right through to Estevan. There are two million acres of land that could be sure crop land. If it were irrigated it would be sure crop land. Why is it not irrigated? It could be done.

The minister is an engineer; it is fortunate that he is, because he will know better than any other member of the government of the possibilities of engineering. I count on him standing up against anybody telling him that a dam could not be built there. I could build a dam on that river if I were given enough money to do it. That is all that is required. What does it matter if the dam at Riverhurst does cost $5,000,000? What does it matter if the dam has to be 2,000 feet wide, rather thick at the base; what does it matter if it has to be 3,000 feet thick? It does not matter what the width has to be, for they have them on the Tennessee river far wider than that; they have them in the western states far wider than that. What does it matter anyway? The cost is a capital investment. I would build a dam on the South Saskatchewan river somewhere near Riverhurst, and I would build it high enough to divert water not by flow but by pumping. They are doing it down through the United States. Look at the Black Canyon dam in Idaho. That dam is 183 feet high and is irrigating 20,000 acres of land complete and another 20,000 acres of land by pumping. If they can do it there we can do it here, and I would not let anything stop me. I would give those good people between Riverhurst and Estevan a chance to live. I would carry the irrigation works in southern Saskatchewan across that country and provide a sufficient domestic water supply for Regina and Moose Jaw, giving those people also a chance to live, and an opportunity to expand, which they cannot do at the same rate as they would if they had an adequate water supply.

I am sure that if the Minister of Reconstruction would take the bit in his teeth he could do it. He could build irrigation works that would be successful in both southern Alberta and southern Saskatchewan. I am very happy indeed that the minister is here, and it is encouraging, at this late hour, to see the large number of members in the chamber. It goes to show that the heart of the House of Commons is sound. It shows that there are enough men in this House of Commons—I include the lady member also—who are thoroughly alive to and interested in giving the western provinces a chance for existence. I may say that I was associated with manufacturing in a big way in eastern Canada, and I know perfectly well what western Canada has meant to the building up not only of that plant with which I had been associated but of every other large manufacturing concern in the east. I know, from close contact with business which came from the west, that the plant with which I was associated grew from a small beginning to huge proportions, and I know that the same is true of scores of others, through the development of the west.

The people of the west have been up against it pretty hard. They must have hearts of steel to stand what they have stood. I could not do it. I could not plant crops year in and year out without having any return. Those people must come of a strong and rugged race, and I can well imagine what they would be as a greater buying population if they were assured of huge crops every year: wheat, fifty bushels to the acre; sugar beets, eighteen tons to the acre; corn, 750 cases to the acre, each case containing twenty-four cans; peas, twice as much; dill pickles, sweet potatoes and everything that goes to make for wealth in the country. Millions of new dollars additional could be produced in the west by means of irrigation, wealth which otherwise could not be produced. To me it looks as plain as a-b-c, a matter of ordinary business. The money invested in these projects would give these people a chance to live.

The first job, in my opinion, is the Spring Coulee-St. Mary river reservoir. If we do not tackle that first job to begin with, then I do not see why we should expect our United States cousins to put up with the present situation much longer. They have completed their reservoirs. I know, because I have seen them. They have stored everything they can store and they want more water. Is it not natural, therefore, for them to look across the line and say to us, "You are a prodigal people, allowing all this water to run to the sea since 1921; now the time has come to call a halt and we shall have that water ourselves unless you conserve it." And they could take it by the international treaty already signed by us.

In conclusion, let me express my faith in the minister. He is an engineer and he has go; I repeat, if he will take the bit in his teeth and begin by building the Spring Coulee and Chin Coulee project, and the other little reservoirs, and go on to the north side of the river and complete the programme there, there will be water to the Medicine Hat area and the whole programme will cost about $20 million, which is not much more than we paid for one cruiser. And three or four cruisers belonging to Canada or Great Britain were sunk off the coast of France and we never batted an eyelash. Why should we bat an eyelash at spending $20 million to rehabilitate southern Alberta? Or why should we bat an eyelash at the expenditure of the necessary millions to start a similar programme in Saskatchewan so that we might give the people in Alberta and that part of Saskatchewan a chance to live in the sun?

Hon. C. D. HOWE: I have only a minute or two to say what I have to say. I had hoped to make some remarks on this subject, but I may say that the government has rather anticipated this resolution by taking active steps to build the St. Mary river dam, which, as the resolution suggests, is the first step and the key to the entire project. Plans have been prepared in years gone by, perhaps never very seriously, because it was quite impossible to divert the man-power required by the project during war years. But the plans are well advanced. They are being studied now, and discussions are taking place with the province, because on a project of this kind the province and the federal government must work in complete agreement. It is no small engineering project. As I recall, the dam is 120 feet high, which for an earth dam is a substantial engineering undertaking.

Hon. members will agree with me that the best engineering opinions must be had from men experienced in that type of work. Not only is it a difficult engineering project to build such a dam, but the conditions under which the dam must operate are very trying in connection with an earth dam. There is a fluctuation of head that is considerable, a fluctuation of head under extreme weather conditions. The danger, as regards a dam of that type, is that the earth will slough as the water level rises and falls, and if that begins nothing can save an earth dam. Therefore the particular material must be studied carefully. It has been studied, and in my opinion the best expert engineering judgment must be brought to bear on the problem. That is being done, and I sincerely hope that a real start can be made toward the construction of the dam during the next building season.

I have given some study to the project. The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) seems to study every interesting project and has given the house a good deal of the background of this question, and I should like to show the house how much I know about it. But since it is now eleven o'clock I shall have to reserve that for another occasion.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BRACKEN: I should just like to say, that one of the two best governments in Canada has been returned to power to-day in one of the best provinces of Canada. The latest report I have indicates that the government in question has elected twenty-one members and is leading in fifteen constituencies, while the opposition is leading in four. It has been a great day for democracy.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BRACKEN: I hope hon. members will applaud after the next statement. The government of Canada defeated as well, by the representatives of the common people.

It being three minutes after eleven o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, October 16, 1945.

The house met at three o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRECEDENCE OF GOVERNMENT NOTICES OF MOTION AND GOVERNMENT ORDERS ON MONDAYS ON AND AFTER OCTOBER 22

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved:

That on Monday, October 22 instant, and every Monday thereafter to the end of the session, government notices of motions and government orders shall have precedence over all other business except introduction of bills, questions by members and notices of motions for the production of papers.

Mr. DONALD M. FLEMING (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker before the motion is put, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Veterans Affairs. It is my understanding that it is not intended at present to interfere with Wednesdays as private members' days.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No, it is not the intention at present. I rather think, however, that, following the custom in preceding sessions and parliaments, a further motion will be put in a week's time. The following figures will indicate the number of Mondays and Wednesdays given in other years to private members' business before they were taken over for government business:

	Mondays	Wednesdays
1935	4	5
1936	5	3
1937	3	6
1939	8	5

So far this session we have had five Mondays, Thanksgiving day having taken away one, and we have had a total of six Wednesdays, so in that respect we are up to the average of prewar years. I think reasonable consideration has been given to the rights of private members.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE ON ACCOUNTS AND ESTIMATES OF GOVERNMENT-OWNED TRANSPORTATION LINES

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport) moved:

That a sessional committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government be appointed to consider the accounts and estimates and bills relating thereto of the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, and Trans-Canada Air Lines, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys; and that the said committee be empowered to send for persons, papers and records, and to report from time to time, and that, notwithstanding standing order 63, the said committee consist of Messrs. Chevrier, Clark, Coyle, Beaudoin, Belzile, Bourget, Emmerson, Gibson (Comox-Alberni), Harkness, Harris (Grey-Bruce), Harris (Danforth), Hazen, Jackman, Lacroix, Lockhart, Maybank, McCulloch (Pictou), Moore, Mutch, Nicholson, Picard, Reid, Shaw.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister what the powers of this committee are to be. When a similar committee was first appointed around the year 1929, it was given the task of going over the budget of the Canadian National Railways. Since that time they have added steamship, ocean and hotel services, and now they are going to add civil aviation. Hundreds of millions of dollars have been invested by this country in the Canadian National Railways, in its ocean and hotel services, and especially in civil aviation services. Unless we solve this civil aviation question aright and have a proper civil aviation policy the British empire will face liquidation. When this committee was first appointed I asked whether the House of Commons was divesting itself of all public control over this great national system of railways, ocean services and hotel services—and now we have aviation services, on which the future of the British empire depends. I asked when this committee was appointed for the first time if individual members of parliament would have the right to go before it and ask questions, and the minister replied that they would.

I have read the reports of this committee and I fail to see where there has been any proper investigation of the affairs of this railway system. The membership of this committee, like that of other committees, is made up largely of laymen, although there are a few members who know something about transportation. However, hardly anyone who has served on this committee is an outspoken public-ownership man. Many who have served on this committee have had experience in municipal affairs, but I have been unable in other years to find any outstanding supporter of public ownership who has been a member of this committee.

As to the way the committee is conducted, I may say that I have visited the committee dozens of times. The members were all smoking cigars and they seemed to be having a good time. They travel around the country a lot, but I have failed to find any recommendations made by this committee to the high court of parliament which show that a proper detailed investigation has been made of this great public utility which is so necessary to the building up of this country and the development of its natural resources.

I warn the House of Commons that if this committee is appointed its report will be brought down a day or two before the house closes, with no time to discuss it. There will not be time to examine it as it should be examined. I notice that they are adding the consideration of expenditure relating to civil aviation. They have appointed a board to handle civil aviation. All parliament does if we pass this motion is to divest itself of all authority and hand the whole system over to boards. Who are the officers of the board? Let us look over the list of the permanent officers. Some of them have been promoted to the office of vice-president, but I doubt if they ever had the necessary experience. This is a great public utility.

You can appoint this committee if you like. No doubt it will be appointed, but the investigations by this committee in former years were practically no investigation at all of the system. I have read the reports dozens of times. It reminds me of the war expenditures committee, by which we divested ourselves of control.

Mr. SPEAKER: Standing order 38 reads:

The following motions are debatable:
Every motion
(a) standing on the order of proceedings for the day, except government notices of motion for the house to go into committee at a later date.

[Mr. Church.]

Mr. CHURCH: You are quite right, Mr. Speaker. As I was saying, we are divesting ourselves of all control over expenditures of this system.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member admits that I am right, he should resume his seat.

Mr. CHURCH: I have spoken on this motion every year, sir. I have objected to the appointment of this committee which takes from the control of parliament the whole policies of the national railway system.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have been generous with the hon. gentleman, and he should resume his seat.

Mr. CHURCH: I do not intend to allow this motion to pass without a protest from one who has been a public ownership man all his life. I fail to see where the public ownership principle in administration has been carried out by the system.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, it is with great diffidence that I rise in view of your ruling a moment ago in connection with freedom in discussing a resolution of this kind to set up a committee. I well recall, and I am sure that Your Honour will recall, that in previous sessions not only have a few moments or a few hours been taken up in debating the setting up of a committee; we have spent as much as three or four days in such a debate. With this explanation, I should like to take two ar three minutes of the time of the house, because this seems to be the only opportunity I may have, to place upon the record what I think is a well deserved tribute to a group of our Canadian citizens.

Of the contribution which has been made by other branches of our civilian population, none will occupy a greater or more glorious page on Canada's home front history of the war than that of those engaged in the various branches of our transportation services. When I say this I am but reflecting the widespread and general public opinion on this point. But it is not alone on the home front that those in transport service have done their bit. Let me take as only one example those employed by the railway systems of this dominion. It is a proud record to which railwaymen right across Canada may point when it is recorded that almost 43,000 of their number have served in the armed forces of Canada in this war. Taking as a basis the number of employees on both roads at the beginning of the war, more than one out of every four railway workers in Canada enlisted in our armed forces. It is doubtful if a better record can be shown by any other branch of our national activity.

While their brothers were fighting for Canada the railway workers at home performed an almost impossible task of transportation. The strain and pressure of war was nowhere felt at home more acutely than by our railway transportation systems. How they mastered the task was little less than a miracle; for in 1938—I would like the house to pay special attention to these figures, because they are next to miraculous—the railways of Canada carried 78 million tons of freight, while in 1944 the freight tonnage had jumped from 78 million tons to 152 million tons. Passenger traffic increases tell a similar story. In 1938 the railways carried 17½ million passengers: in 1944 they carried 54½ million passengers, or more than three times the volume of the last peace time year.

Let us not forget that with all the urgency and all the strain and all the pressure attendant upon war-time operation of our Canadian railways, only seven passengers were killed in Canada through railway accidents in the year 1944. The ratio of those killed and injured in railway accidents, whether passengers or not, is very much lower in 1944 than in the smaller peace-time traffic year of 1938. This is a silent but eloquent tribute to the efficiency of the railways of Canada which needs no elaboration from me.

It will be interesting to hon. members to know, too, that during the last calendar year, 3,100 dining car employees in the two great systems of Canada served en route with notable efficiency and service no less than nine million meals. Were time to permit, the story would go on through every branch of transportation activity to show the superb war-time job which was done.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I wish to associate myself and my hon. friends with the tribute that has just been paid by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) to the work of the men in charge of our transportation systems. Many of us who had to travel from time to time across this country before the war as well as and particularly, during the war, were amazed at the efficiency of the conductors, engineers, sleeping-car porters, dining-car stewards, and those charged with the responsibility of looking after railway offices and providing us with reservations. I am sure that what the hon. member for Peel has said is echoed by every member of this house no matter where he sits.

But what I really rose to do was to support the appointment of this committee, and I do so because of the remarks of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church). It would be a mistake if at any time we in this House of Commons, elected in a legislative capacity, were called upon to try to operate an economic utility owned by the country. The method we have adopted in Canada of establishing government-owned corporations which by statute are free from active interference on the part of members of this House of Commons is the sane and proper method of handling publicly-owned institutions. The members who are elected to this house have no right, in my opinion, to interfere with the internal management of organizations such as this, and it is our duty to see to it that politics, in the sense in which we use the term in this chamber, does not enter into the running of our railways or our broadcasting system or any other publicly-owned utility which we have established or may establish in the future. As time passes, more and more of these great economic organizations will come under the ownership and control of the people, and they should be operated entirely apart from the legislative arm; for the two arms, legislative and economic, are quite distinct. As long as we have the right to investigate the proceedings of these organizations to see that they give the people service and do a good job, our responsibility in connection with them as elected members of this house ends. As a warm supporter of the social ownership of industry I believe that in setting up these corporations under public ownership and control, under a statute of this parliament, and making them responsible to parliament through a committee of the house, we are doing what is the only sane thing to do. It is with pleasure, therefore, that I concur in the appointment of this committee.

Mr. W. CHESTER S. McLURE (Queens): Mr. Speaker, before this motion passes I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Every province is supposed to be interested in this committee and every province is supposed to have a representative on it. I notice that eight provinces are represented on the committee, but Prince Edward Island—again we come back to Prince Edward Island—is not. We from Prince Edward Island are interested in this railway, and I would like to ask the Minister of Transport why that province is not represented on the committee.

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) as well as the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Cold-well), for the tribute which they have just paid to the transportation workers in Canada during the war years. The tribute that each of them has paid is a well-deserved one, and unquestionably the service which these workers have rendered should be referred to in this house. When I made a statement in the house some two or three weeks ago in reference to the extension of an order in council on travel, I paid a tribute to the work being done by the railway and transportation workers across Canada. I think I should add a word now as to what is being done by the railways in the repatriation of our troops from overseas. I am sure the house will agree that what was done in that respect could not have been better done.

The leader of the C.C.F. party a moment ago pointed to a very important feature in the setting up of this committee, namely, that parliament should retain the right to see that the internal management of the railways is not interfered with, and the proper way to make sure of that is by the appointment of a committee such as this. It strikes me that the setting up of this committee—I know the house will agree, and the motion is in exactly the same form as in previous years—will ensure the purpose for which it is being established.

The hon. member for Queens (Mr. McLure) asked why it was that there was no representative on the committee from Prince Edward Island. The Minister of Transport is not responsible for naming the membership of the committee. That is a matter for the whips, and should they agree upon a change I shall have not the slightest objection.

Mr. JACKMAN: May I ask the minister whether or not the Hudson Bay railway accounts will come before this committee, as was agreed upon at the last sitting of the house?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. JACKMAN: And it will not be necessary to set that out in the resolution?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before putting the motion to the house may I tell the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) that I appreciate the very generous way in which he called my attention to my poor interpretation of standing order 38. I apologize to the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), and I hope knowing his kindness, that he will continue to be generous to the Speaker, who unfortunately is not infallible.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

TAXATION

SIXTEEN PER CENT INCOME TAX ABATEMENT—DEDUCTION AT THE SOURCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition). I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice, who I understand is the acting Minister of Finance. My question is meant to clear up certain confusion which has arisen in respect of the budget proposal to abate the income tax levy by 16 per cent. To make clear my question let me read from the statement of the Minister of Finance in presenting his budget. He said at page 1006 of Hansard:

> I think it wise therefore to recommend an interim measure of prompt and unquestionable relief. It is proposed that the tax levy shall be abated by 16 per cent dating from October 1, 1945. This abatement of 16 per cent will be applied to the current tax deductions at the source just as soon as the necessary change can be made. Since the change is applicable from October 1, the abatement on the whole tax liability for 1945 will amount to 4 per cent. For a full year, the abatement will be 16 per cent of the tax liability.
> This is an interim measure to be applied immediately and to continue until it is possible to combine further abatement with a thorough overhaul of the whole rate structure of the personal income tax.

As a result of that statement taxpayers were led to believe that the abatement would apply in respect of the current month's tax deductions at the source. However, on Saturday morning, Mr. Fraser Elliott, deputy minister, taxation division, national revenue department, in a statement reported in the press, in apparent direct contradiction of the minister, said that the policy would not apply to tax deductions at the source until January 1, 1946. His statement as reported is as follows:

> Employers will continue to use the present existing tables of tax deductions until the end of this calendar year without any change. Thus employees will then have paid substantially 100 per cent of their tax liability on the pay-as-you-earn basis, and the tax reduction provided by the present budget for 1945 will mean that they will have less to pay at the time of filing their returns on or before April 30.

My question is this: would the minister inform the house whether the statement of the minister in his budget speech is correct, or whether the statement of the deputy minister of the taxation division of the Department of National Revenue is correct?

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the statement of the Minister of Finance as reported at page 1006 of Hansard which has just been read by the leader of the opposition correctly set forth the intention of the government in the budget proposals which were put before the house by the Minister of Finance on Friday night. It will be noted that in that statement the minister said that the abatement of 16 per cent will be applied to all current tax deductions at the source just as soon as the necessary change can be made. As a matter of fact the deductions at the source are made in accordance with tables which have been prepared and authorized by order in council as regulations for the collection of the income tax, and the commissioner of income tax would have no authority to depart from what is prescribed by the order in council and the tables until some change is made in the regulations.

Though it is always declared in budget proposals that it is intended when the proper legislation is enacted that it will be retroactive to a certain date, it is not in fact legislation until it has passed through the houses of parliament and received the royal assent. Because of that, the commissioner of taxation apparently felt that it would be more convenient, and would make in fact no difference to each ratepayer or each employer, if deductions continued to be made according to the same table to the end of the year, because these deductions are calculated to represent only ninety-five per cent of the liability; in fact one could go on making to the end of the year deductions at the same rate, and the only consequence would be that the ratepayer would not have as much as five per cent to pay to satisfy the whole of his tax liability. There have been however a large number of representations and protestations made against this proposal or this suggestion of the commissioner of income tax, that though the Minister of Finance had not said from what date a change in the amount to be deducted might be made, he had said that it would be effective as soon as the necessary change can be made.

Mr. BRACKEN: He said it would apply immediately.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes, it would apply and it does apply, and both the minister and the commissioner intend that it shall in fact affect the amount of tax to be paid. The only question is whether it will be deducted at the source or whether it is something that a man will have to pay after he gets it—which he will have to return to the tax gatherer after he has received it from his employer. There have been a number of protestations that, though it does not affect in any way the liability of the taxpayer, the amount of deductions should be reduced at once by 16 per cent. It is intended at the earliest possible moment, because of the apparent psychological effect of maintaining the deduction at the old rate, to recommend to His Excellency a modification in the order in council, under which employers will be authorized to reduce their deductions immediately by 16 per cent without issuing the new table, because it would take some considerable time to calculate and print the new table and get it into the hands of every employer. But representations have been made that many employers are willing to have their pay clerks make the calculation, and the intention is to recommend to His Excellency an immediate modification of the regulation which will be authority, until such time as parliament has dealt with the recommendations of the Minister of Finance, to the employers to reduce their reductions by the 16 per cent. I hope to-morrow to be able to lay on the table of the house, if His Excellency will be pleased to approve it, an order making that change in the regulations.

Mr. BRACKEN: Just to be clear, Mr. Speaker: is it understood that the statement made by the deputy minister of the taxation division of the Department of National Revenue will be altered by your proposed procedure?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is proposed that the procedure he had suggested in his statement will not be followed but that authority will be granted by order in council to all employers to reduce their deductions immediately by 16 per cent.

Mr. GRAYDON: There is nothing wrong after all with Fraser Elliott's statement.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There was nothing wrong with it, and in fact it would not make one cent's difference to anyone.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister did not make it very clear, though.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: But the psychological effect, we are told, is substantial; many employees say that if there is to be a reduction of 16 per cent they should be trusted and should have the tax deducted only in accordance with the rate which will apply, they themselves to pay whatever balance they may owe as balance of income tax at the appropriate time.

EXCISE TAX—PRESS REPORT AS TO LEAK IN BUDGET INFORMATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): May I also ask a question of the minister arising out of the budget? I sent him notice of this question. I wonder if the attention of the government has been drawn to a report which appeared on page 12 of the Ottawa Citizen of October 13 last, Saturday, to the effect that the Ottawa branch of the Standard Fur Dealers knew on Thursday evening that Friday's budget would contain a reduction of the excise tax on certain furs from 25 per cent to 10 per cent. If so, does the government propose to investigate this serious charge of a leak in budget information? This report appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of last Saturday.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): The report had already been noted to be discussed with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) just as soon as he returns. As the hon. member knows, the Minister of Finance is on a speaking tour to promote the victory loan, and is expected back, if not at the end of the week, early next week. The matter will be placed before him and discussed with him to determine what should be done in the circumstances.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is satisfactory.

WAR VETERANS

REFUSAL OF SLAUGHTERING LICENCE TO RETURNED SERVICEMAN OPENING BUTCHER SHOP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I wish to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Finance. It is an urgent matter connected with the right of men returning from overseas to go into business. I am asking the indulgence of the house to put the question for the reason that since coming in here I have received a telegram in connection with it. On September 26 last I pointed out that the wartime prices and trade board had neglected to issue a licence to a butcher who upon his return from overseas, after five years of service, put all his gratuity money into a butcher shop and was then—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Speaker, this is a matter affecting every soldier in the country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Will Your Honour permit me to place it before the house? It is the only opportunity I have, and this soldier's business has been closed down because the wartime prices and trade board will not act. That is the reason I am bringing the matter to the attention of the house, the only place in which complaints from citizens can be cleared up. This soldier came back from overseas in August and started in business. He endeavoured to get a slaughtering licence, as I pointed out at page 482 of Hansard, but the matter was postponed from week to week, and finally to-day this man, after five years of service, has to close up because the wartime prices and trade board refuse to grant him a slaughtering licence. My question is this: Will the government immediately give consideration to the removal of orders and controls such as these in so far as they affect men who served this country and are returning and endeavouring to carry on the business they previously operated? The telegram I have before me comes from the Overseer of the town of Hawarden, Saskatchewan. I will not read it in detail, but it states in part:

> Our butcher forced to close unable to get slaughtering licence. Will you bring this matter before parliament?

It affects every man coming back from overseas. I ask the government: Will a general order be issued with a view to enabling soldiers to carry on the business that they operated before they went into the service?

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I have not joined in the applause which has followed the hon. member's question, because I am not informed of the facts. I am quite prepared to take the hon. member's question as notice, but I would also ask him to give me the particulars of the case in question so that I can have it investigated.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I did so on September 26, and I have been trying to get action ever since.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am not in a position to supply information about the case mentioned. If, however, the hon. member will now give me the particulars, I will at once have the matter looked into and endeavour to get a statement of the facts as they appear from the official records.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I believe this is the case mentioned by my hon. friend in a previous debate. I asked him then, when he referred to a certain letter, for the production immediately of that letter so that I could discuss it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: This is not the same matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I have not heard from the hon. gentleman in regard to that case.

SHIPPING

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHING RESERVE POOL OF SHIPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): I wish to ask the following question of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier). When ships are released from united nations shipping pool, will the dominion government establish a reserve pool of ships in Canada similar to that which the United States shipping administrator intends to establish in that country?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. FRASER: This is important.

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): The hon. gentleman sent me no notice of the question.

Mr. FRASER: It is not according to the rules to send notice.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is the practice. If the hon. member will put the question on the order paper I will see that a reply is given.

Mr. FRASER: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. According to standing orders, ministers are not bound to answer questions. It is a matter of courtesy if they do so.

Mr. HOMUTH: And so often they cannot.

Mr. MACKENZIE: You certainly could not answer any of them.

HOGS

DECREASE IN PRICES IN PRAIRIE PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. MAX CAMPBELL (The Battlefords): In the absence of the Minister of Agriculture I should like to address a question to the government. Why did the price of hogs in the three prairie provinces on October 11 drop by from $1.15 to $1.40 per hundred pounds? What held the markets at approximately the same level as the previous week at Vancouver, Toronto, Montreal, and Moncton—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member to put the question on the order paper.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PROCEDURE IN QUESTIONS ON THE ORDERS OF THE DAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Before you go on to the orders of the day, Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege I should like to call Your Honour's attention to a remark you made a moment ago in respect of the rights and privileges of those of us who sit on this side of the house, or of members generally who are not members of the government, in the matter of seeking information and receiving it from the government. I should like to make this suggestion to Your Honour, that you reconsider the statement you made with regard to our rights being only by way of courtesy. Whatever may be the letter of the rules, whatever may be the strict wording and technicalities which surround many of our deliberations here, I think it would be highly inadvisable for the Speaker of the house, Your Honour, or anyone else here, to suggest that the opposition have no rights, except by way of courtesy, in questioning the government.

Mr. CHEVRIER: He made no such statement. You are lecturing the Speaker.

Mr. GRAYDON: Just a moment. If the Speaker allows me to speak I will ask hon. members to refrain from interrupting. I should like to make this suggestion to Your Honour, with all possible diffidence, because I fear that a matter of this kind might easily grow into something much greater and much more important as time goes on. I think it ought to be established once for all that the opposition has a right, not just by way of courtesy but a right that has grown up through the years of our parliamentary institutions, to quesion the government at any time on the orders of the day on anything of national importance.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend was in the house a year ago and was acting leader of His Majesty's Loyal Opposition when this question came up and Your Honour's predecessor, the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen) gave a most comprehensive ruling on the whole subject of questions asked on the orders of the day. His ruling on that occasion I believe met with general satisfaction in the house. There is no innovation in the remarks Your Honour made a few minutes ago; they were in keeping with the ruling given at the time by the then Speaker.

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, may I refer Your Honour to citation 296 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition:

The Speaker, in common with his duties of supervision over the proceedings of the house, may rule out any question which violates the privileges of parliament in the same way as he deals with irregularities in motions and amendments. (M. 239; 2 Red. 243). He may make an alteration in the question (M. 240) or refer it back to the member for correction (b. 313). A member may call the attention of the house to the matter and may challenge the action of the Speaker.

Citation 297 reads as follows:

A certain number of oral questions are permitted in practice by members, without notice, before the orders of the day are called; but these are merely allowed by courtesy in connection with the business of the house or with very urgent and important matters of public concern.

As I understood His Honour the Speaker, he actually quoted what is contained in citation 297 of Beauchesne. I repeat:

. . . but these are merely allowed by courtesy in connection with the business of the house or with very urgent and important matters of public concern.

Some hon. MEMBERS: "Or".

Mr. GLEN: I continue:

They are always brief, no debate being permitted, and the replies are as concise as possible. The minister interrogated may reply at once or may direct that the usual notice be given. Such questions are governed by the same rules of order as questions of which notice has been given.

It has been the practice in this house for many years to allow questions on the orders of the day; if they are of immediate public concern and must necessarily have an immediate answer, they are allowed by courtesy of the house. But where the matter is not urgent, and where the question can well be placed on the order paper, the practice is—and it is a good practice—that it should be placed upon the order paper so that the government and the minister in charge may be in a position to give the answer to which the member asking is entitled. That practice has been established, and His Honour the Speaker has to-day followed exactly the practice that has been in vogue in this parliament for many years.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to ask under what standing order this ruling is made. I quite agree that it is a matter of courtesy, and I think it expedites the giving of answers if we send notices of the questions, as I usually try to do. I believe that what has been read to us are citations. An hon. member can take the rule book of this parliament and can read citations to prove anything. This brings before us once more the necessity of going into these rules and citations to protect His Honour the Speaker and the hon. members, particularly hon. members on this side of the house, so that we may know exactly where we stand.

May I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that while we must have rules of order, and courtesies must be observed—because those courtesies, as I have just said, enable the minister to answer in an expeditious and authoritative way—latitude should be allowed to hon. members who feel that they have something of urgent importance to bring to the attention of the house.

The hon. member for The Battlefords (Mr. Campbell) raised a question a few moments ago which was in his opinion an urgent one. As a matter of fact he discussed with me whether it should be put on the order paper, and I thought it was of such importance to the western hog raisers that it should be asked on the orders of the day. It does bring before us once again the necessity of examining these rules with a view to their revision. May I reiterate what I said the other day? I do not think the decisions of a Speaker of one parliament ought to bind parliament forever. We have rules and standing orders. Those rules or standing orders should govern this institution, not the variable rulings—and some of them are variable—of former Speakers of this house. Each parliament, in my opinion, is master of its own procedure.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): May I say one word in reply to the hon. member who has just spoken? If the rules of the house are to be made wide enough to allow all questions to be asked on the orders of the day, then hon. members on this side will of course discard the usual practice of finding the proper answers by going directly to the minister. Hon. members on this side no doubt get the same telegrams and requests as do hon. members on the other side. The procedure is for hon. members of the opposition to get up—and we have all done it—to ask questions for publicity's sake.

Mr. COLDWELL: Oh, no.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. REID: We all get the same telegrams as do the members of the opposition, and we could rise on the orders of the day and ask the same questions; but we do not. We go at it in a practical way and ask the minister who is responsible.

Some hon. MEMBERS: So do we.

Mr. REID: Just be frank about this thing; let us face facts. I am facing facts right now.

With regard to the rules of the house, we had an experience last year of what happens when an attempt is made to amend the rules of the house. If the hon. members for Rosetown-Biggar can show us how the rules as amended will pass, I shall be very happy. I am referring to the debate that took place last year.

An hon. MEMBER: So what?

Mr. REID: That is that.

Mr. SPEAKER: I should like to say that since the opening of this parliament—and I think the same thing has happened in the past—quite a lot of criticism has been offered on this same question. Unfortunately for the Speaker it is very hard to please everybody. Since the beginning of the session I have done everything I could to be fair to both sides of the house, and I think I have been generous, especially to the leaders of the parties when they were asking questions, even though I thought some of them were out of order. I felt that I should be generous to the leaders of the parties, and I tried to be. It is my duty to apply the rules of the house as they are written. So far as questions are concerned the rules are very clear. The Rules and Forms indicate that questions on the orders of the day, should be brief and to the point, and that hon. members should not quote from newspapers, telegrams, and the like. As the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has said, if the house feels that, for the protection of our parliamentary institutions, these rules are not all that they should be, it is the duty of the house to form a committee and amend them.

WAR AND DEMOBILIZATION

PROVISION FOR APPROPRIATION OF $1,365,000,000 FOR WAR PURPOSES, DEMOBILIZATION, PROMOTION OF TRADE AND INDUSTRY, ETC.

The house resumed from Tuesday, October 9, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to His Majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures deemed necessary or advisable in consequence of the war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE (ARMY)

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Chairman, it has been the custom in past sessions in presenting the defence estimates to give a brief operational summary as to what has taken place since the last report was presented. I should like to follow that course to-day, probably for the last time.

Some hon. members will recall that at the last session I reviewed the operations of our forces from D-day to the beginning of March, at which time the German army had been swept clear from the west bank of the Rhine and north of the Moselle river. Following the clean-up of the west bank of the Rhine the Canadian forces were regrouped for the initial attack across the Rhine. Our forces participated in the crossings of the Rhine that started on March 23, and once again were on the left flank of the assault that was to end in the final defeat of the German armies. The Canadian paratroop battalion was also with the British airborne division that was dropped across the Rhine on the same day. Meanwhile the first Canadian corps was moving from Italy to northwest Europe and during March its units took over a sector on the extreme left of the long allied line. With the reversion of the second corps to the command of the first Canadian army on the first day of April, all the units of the Canadian Army were fighting together for the first time in its history.

Following the initial crossing and consolidation of the bridgehead across the Rhine, the Canadian army was given the task of clearing Holland. These operations may be broken down into two phases, the first consisting of the initial breaking of the hard crust of resistance and the sealing off of northwestern Holland, and the second being the rapid advances and clearing of northeastern Holland followed by the turn eastwards into Germany to invest the Emden and Wilhelmshaven pocket.

In the first phase our forces attacked from the Nijmegen-Emmerich sector northwestwards, and by April 19 they had reached the shores of the Zuider Zee, thus permanently sealing off the enemy forces caught in southwestern Holland. The first corps turned westwards to deal with this trapped enemy force and ran into stiff opposition, but to the north in Holland resistance was quickly broken. By the middle of April the second corps had reached the north coast of Holland on the Ems estuary and the Kusten canal further east in Germany.

During the second phase, northeast Holland was quickly cleared by our forces against light opposition. On the right very strong opposition was met along the Kusten canal. Similarly the first corps, working slowly into western Holland, also came up against stiff resistance. By the end of the month a truce was arranged to allow food convoys to enter this part of Holland to relieve conditions of extreme food shortages among the Dutch civilians, and active operations were not again resumed in this sector.

To the north in Germany a bridgehead was established over the Kusten canal on the 17th of April which was expanding northwards into the Emden-Wilhelmshaven peninsula, when the German forces in northwest Germany and Holland surrendered unconditionally on the 5th of May.

It was fitting that the surrender of the remaining German forces in the Netherlands should be made to a Canadian commander, since our forces played such an important part in the liberation of the territory of this gallant ally. The surrender of all the German forces in the Netherlands, naval and air as well as army, was made by Colonel-General Johannes Blaskowitz to Lieutenant-General Foulkes, then commanding the first Canadian corps and now chief of the general staff. The number of German forces surrendered in the Netherlands was over 185,000.

Before leaving this brief review of the active operations of our forces, may I point out that in the ten months of continuous fighting since D-day the Canadian Army, always fighting on the left and vital—if less spectacular—flank of the allied armies, over the most difficult country, encountered and defeated no fewer than fifty-nine German divisions.

Immediately following the capitulation, our forces began to make their way into western Holland, where they were received with enthusiasm by the civilian population. The Canadian Army was then faced with the difficult task of disarming a greatly superior force of the enemy; the organization and relief of the large civilian population, hungry, and excited by the sudden turn of events, and the co-ordination of the underground forces, who were armed and eager to deal with the defeated enemy. This whole operation was accomplished without incident, and is greatly to the credit of the commanders and troops concerned.

The concentration and move out of Holland of the German 25th army was supervised and controlled by our forces, and this difficult undertaking was practically completed by the 15th of June. Meanwhile it was necessary to set up an effective military government in the area of Germany under Canadian command, to restore order in the Netherlands as well as in German territory, to prevent the spread of disease and to develop the essential services and the welfare of the civilian population. Added to these problems was the intricate question of the provision for handling the large numbers of prisoners of war and displaced persons who were migrating in large numbers over the area controlled by our forces. All these measures were carried out in the most efficient and satisfactory manner, so that by the 14th of June General Crerar's responsibility for military government in the German area was concluded and handed over to the occupational district corps command, and by the 30th of June the Dutch authorities were able to resume their functions after the long usurpation by the Germans.

During this time the important problems of reallocation and repatriation of the army's man-power were receiving attention, and all ranks were at once informed of the requirements for the Pacific war and for the army of occupation. On the 4th of July a composite batallion, made up of three different units and accompanied by a band, entered Berlin for a tour of duty of several weeks under command of headquarters of the British troops in Berlin. Machinery was set up in the Netherlands for the organization of the Canadian Army occupation force and for the early return of volunteers for the far east and of long service personnel.

The organization of the occupation force under command of Major-General C. Vokes was completed rapidly, and this force moved into Germany between the 5th and 12th of July to take up its occupation duties in the Emden-Wilhelmshaven area under command of the British 30th corps district.

Preparations were made for the immediate dispatch to United Kingdom repatriation depots of the volunteers for the Pacific force. This force was being organized in Canada as a division to operate against Japan under command of United States forces. It was therefore necessary to reorganize and to re-equip this force along United States lines, although the uniforms were to have been Canadian. As the units were formed and the volunteers were returned from the army overseas, they were concentrated in camps across Canada, together with the necessary reinforcements that it was proposed should move with the force. The units of this force with its reinforcements, after their organization and preliminary training, were to have moved to Camp Breckenridge in Kentucky to complete its organization and training under United States army command. At the time of the capitulation of Japan, this force was still in Canada and was accordingly disbanded.

That, Mr. Chairman, is briefly the record of the information available since the last report I gave the house at the previous session early in April.

Before discussing the problem of demobilization and outlining plans for the future, I should like to give the committee a short statistical resume of the development of the Canadian Army during the war.

In round figures one million men and forty-five thousand women have served in the armed forces since the outbreak of the war. This exceeds by more than 60 per cent the 620,000 who served in the war of 1914-18.

Enlistments and enrolments for the army alone number some 730,000 including 25,000 women. Of the total, 630,000 were volunteers while 100,000 men served under the provision of the National Resources Mobilization Act. In all, 158,000 men entered the army under the National Resources Mobilization Act, but over 57,000 of these enlisted for general service in the army. In addition nearly 6,000 more transferred to the navy or air force as volunteers. I am dealing, of course, in round figures.

Of the 730,000 who have served in the army, 45,000 served in commissioned ranks. Of this number, 26,000 were appointed from the reserve army or direct from civilian life and 19,000 from the ranks. However, excluding doctors, dentists, chaplains and nurses who are all appointed direct to commissioned ranks, over half of the remaining officers received their promotion from the ranks of the active army.

Until March, 1944, the strength of the army grew more or less continuously, reaching a total of 495,000 all ranks at that time. From that date forward total casualties and discharges were about equal to the numbers enlisting or being enrolled and the strength of the army remained almost constant until V-E day.

Over 370,000 all ranks served in the European zone—the highest strength at any one time being over 280,000. This strength was reached during the last few months before V-E day.

The maximum strength in Canada at any one time was 265,000 in May, 1943. This does not include those in so-called adjacent territories. This maximum strength was reached at a time when it was necessary to have comparatively large operational forces in Canada for the protection of our coasts as well as to have a large number in training for the completion of the army overseas and for reinforcements to maintain it. From May, 1943, forward, the strength of the army in Canada decreased because of the disbandment of various formations as the strategic situation improved and the dispatch overseas of units and reinforcements for the first Canadian army.

In addition to the troops in Canada, we had operational units in Alaska and in the islands of the Atlantic. At one time in November, 1943, we had over 14,000 troops in these areas, but this number decreased as it became more and more apparent that the enemy would not be able to bring an attack to bear in these regions.

Up to 30 September last, the total number of casualties reported was 80,530 including 22,553 fatal casualties. We may be thankful that the casualties in this war were so much lighter than in the war of 1914-18, when nearly 60,000 soldiers lost their lives, and the total casualties numbered nearly 200,000

The 80,530 include, besides the 22,553 fatal casualties, 51,487 wounded, 6,435 prisoners of war and 55 currently listed as missing.

There were 505 who died while prisoners of war. In the over-all casualty figures which I have given, these have been included in the fatal casualties rather than among the prisoners of war.

The grand total of 80,530 is made up of 76,514 casualties in the European zone, 1,990 in the Asiatic zone and 2,026 in the western hemisphere. The latter is made up of deaths from natural causes as well as from accidents in training, and the like.

In the total are included 6,071 men who were reported as casualties on two occasions, 492 on three occasions, 27 on four occasions, while two were wounded on five occasions. These are included two, three, four or five times as the case may be, in the total of 80,530 which I mentioned.

The two hardy young men, both born in 1919, who were wounded on five occasions each, seem to have had little respect for German ammunition, for one man remained on duty on two of the occasions on which he was wounded, while the other remained on duty on three of the five occasions. Both these young men have recovered from their wounds; one is still overseas at latest report, while the other returned to Canada in May of this year, and was discharged on grounds of long service in July. I might mention that one served with the composite American Canadian force, known as the special service battalion, while the other was with the good old Princess Patricia's Canadian light infantry.

I suppose that every soldier serving overseas tries to bring back with him some souvenir from the battlefield or from the places of interest he visited. There is one variety of prize of which I feel I should make special mention. I mentioned this a day or two ago. I refer to some 32,000 war brides from the British isles, along with 16,500 children. Both those figures are constantly increasing. Five thousand army brides and 3,500 children had been brought to Canada up to V-E day, while another 7,000 wives and 4,600 children came between V-E day and the end of August. At that time there were 20,000 wives and 8,400 children still in the United Kingdom. These will be brought out to their new homes as rapidly as shipping will permit, although, at the present time, priority is being given to the returning soldiers.

In what I have just said I have tried to outline broadly the more important figures as to strengths, and the like. I shall now try to give the committee a little more detail of what has happened since V-E day.

At that time, the strength of the army was a little more than 490,000, over 280,000 of these in the European zone. Plans at that time called for the immediate formation of the Canadian Army Pacific force and the Canadian Army occupation force. In addition, attention had to be directed to the repatriation of other soldiers and to the demobilization of personnel not required for those forces or the continuing administration and training establishments.

A total of 83,370 volunteered for service with the Canadian Army, Pacific force, 37,304 among personnel serving in the European zone and 46,066 from personnel serving in Canada and adjacent territories. There were 8,253 women included in these totals. The number repatriated from Europe for the Pacific force was approximately 25,000.

Following the defeat of Japan, and the decision that Canada's share in occupational duties, would, in so far as the army was concerned, be confined to the European zone, the Canadian Army Pacific force was disbanded. The personnel of the force were reallocated to other duties, or if eligible for and desiring discharge, were put into the demobilization stream.

The occupation force in Germany consisting of a reformed third Canadian division and certain ancillary troops, numbered on the 30th of September, 1945, 21,549 all ranks. This included 6,777 personnel who volunteered for this duty, the remainder being detailed.

Already 111,000 men of the army have returned to Canada from the European zone since V-E day, leaving fewer than 175,000 there at the present time. The number repatriated up to the present has been somewhat in excess of our expectations as announced in July last by my predecessor.

Although I must speak with the greatest caution because there are so many demands for shipping for troops of all the united nations in the various parts of the world, I may say that if present plans mature all of the army overseas, with the exception of the occupation force and necessary staffs in England, should be repatriated by March or April 1946.

May I at this point appeal to the press to refrain from over-optimistic comments on our repatriation programme. I know it has not been intentional, but there has been a certain idea allowed to get abroad when we have made announcements that additional shipping has been obtained that we can get so many men home by Christmas or so many men home by a certain date. The department is cautious, and I am most cautious about making predictions. The one which I have just given to the committee represents the best view before us, that is to say, that we shall be able to get all our boys back, with the exception of those in the occupation forces and necessary staff, by late March or April, 1946.

Any mathematical calculations based upon the size of ships that may be allocated to us are apt to be misleading, so I appeal to those who may be discussing these matters to refrain from over-optimistic predictions as to what may result. I have a most vivid recollection of my own experience sitting in England from November, 1918 to June, 1919, and hearing about other people going home. I thought I had been forgotten; I thought that shipping had been allocated to everybody but to the Canadians to get them back home. I know when men are so far away as these men are it is unfortunate if unauthorized and perhaps over-optimistic statements are issued as to what the prospects are. The prospects are good because we are ahead of our expectations as announced last July. I hope that we shall at least maintain that, and perhaps improve it. I do not want to say that we will improve it until I know definitely that we are going to be able to do it.

Since V-E day the numbers being discharged have increased rapidly month by month, reaching 34,000 for the month of September. I think the best day we have had was last Friday, when something like 1,950 were discharged and some 500 put out on extended leave. We are running at the rate of approximately 2,500 for discharges and extended leave. The total discharged from V-E day to date is just over 100,000. Incidentally, I might mention that a reduction in strength of 100,000 corresponds to a saving of about $12,000,000 a month in day-to-day costs for pay and allowances, messing, quarters, clothing and the like.

In addition, the number on extended leave has been increased from 10,000 on V-E day to over 20,000 at the present time.

Although I have already dealt with the matter briefly in the debate on the address I think that perhaps the committee would like to have a somewhat more comprehensive statement of the principles upon which the process of demobilizing the Canadian army is being carried out. There are in this process three main aspects each of which involves its own distinct considerations. I shall refer only to the aspects of repatriation, which is the return to Canada of troops who have been serving overseas, and of discharge, which is the return of the individual to civil life. The third aspect, which is rehabilitation, is not within the army ambit, but comes under the administration of my colleague the Minister of Veterans Affairs.

The common principle underlying the whole scheme of demobilization has always been, and in future, will continue to be that subject to the exigencies of the service and to the national interests, the personnel with the longest and hardest service should be given first opportunity to return to civil life. However, the loose description of this as a policy of "first in-first out" is somewhat misleading, as it ignores the two essential qualifications to which the main principle has always been subject. It is inevitable that there should occasionally occur some combination of circumstances or unusual conditions wherein a general policy becomes inapplicable, or wherein an exception must be made. In such an event the interests of Canada or of the majority of personnel directly concerned must, in the final instance, receive preference over the single person or minor group affected. The circumstances must always be viewed as a whole—and judgment cannot be correctly passed in the light of a single factor or isolated incident.

It is, of course, highly essential to maintain the effective administration, welfare and discipline of the troops still awaiting repatriation or discharge and where this depends upon the particular ability or experience of any individuals, they must continue to be retained for a further period even though they might nominally be eligible, and presumably entitled, to repatriation or discharge. The commander in the field is the only man who can judge all the circumstances as a whole and properly decide whether, in a particular instance, the eligibility and wishes of the individual must give way to the greater needs of the army as represented by the mass of other servicemen in that formation or area in order to adequately supervise the remaining troops and take care of their material needs by experienced tradesmen and specialists.

The corollary of such a policy is that "freezing" of personnel should be kept to the minimum, and constant reviews made to release such personnel as soon as their services can be dispensed with or a replacement trained and made available. Some mistakes will be inevitable, but I am confident that the respective commanders in the field, whether in formation or in unit, by whom decisions in respect of individuals have to be made, will use their judgment in a capable, fair and impartial way.

Similarly, it may have to be determined by the government, on taking all circumstances into account, that a variation or exception to the basic principle is requisite in the national interest for purposes such as carrying on vital industries or developing basic resources to create added employment, easing the critical housing shortage, lessening the gap in higher education caused by the war, or meeting the man-power shortage in certain primary industries. It is a cardinal principle, however, that the soldier still overseas awaiting his turn for repatriation and discharge should not be prejudiced in obtaining employment through any such variation or exception.

The individual point score system is the means of giving expression to the basic principle that I have been discussing but this, being a relative measurement of service, does not, of itself, constitute an absolute right to discharge: it must be applied with due regard to the other qualifying factors which I have just mentioned as being inherent in the process of demobilization.

As all members of the committee, I think, are aware, the point score is determined by allotting three points for each month of service overseas and two points for each month of service in Canada. To the total of these, a further 20 per cent is added where the individual has marital status as a married man, a widower or a divorced man with a dependent child. The scoring is effective over the period from September 10, 1939, until the selected datum date, March 31, 1945.

Point scores are being used as a guide in determining priorities for repatriation as well as priorities for discharge, but these are two separate and distinct operations. The conditions and relative interests involved by one are not the same in extent and degree as those which concern the other. Therefore, the considerations which necessitate and justify an accelerated discharge in advance of the normal priority by score are applicable only in respect of discharge and would not ordinarily carry any entitlement to accelerated repatriation from overseas. The only exceptions at present are cases of accelerated repatriation for return of "key" men in essential industry or for discharge on compassionate grounds. On the other hand, although a wide range of point scores may be possessed by personnel who have been returned to Canada as a unit, they will be required to await discharge here according to their relative scores or other qualifications for release.

The regulations governing discharge are established and administered by National Defence headquarters in conformity with the broad policies and objects determined by the government. But while the broad principles in respect of repatriation are first submitted for approval by the government and National Defence headquarters as appropriate, the operative regulations are developed through Canadian military headquarters at London, and their detailed application is carried out by Canadian military headquarters and by headquarters Canadian forces Netherlands through their local commanders in the field. They are best in a position to evaluate all the local circumstances as well as individual characteristics and experience when making final decision as to administrative needs or as to what individual may necessarily have to be retained beyond his normal expectation.

The basic plan for repatriation is, I believe, sound and straightforward, but its detailed application has involved most careful study and planning. The primary concern has been to return to Canada as soon as possible those men who had been separated from their homes and families for many long years. But precedence had necessarily to be given to the operational need of immediately moving the Canadian Army Pacific force volunteers to this country for their inclusion with the American force that was destined for the Pacific.

The limited shipping resources made it inevitable that some months must pass before the bulk of Canadian troops could be returned home and this necessitated continuation of their organization as formations and units overseas in order to adequately administer and maintain the troops during their period of waiting. Alternatively, hardship, inconvenience or discomfort might well result from breakdown of an improvised or sketchy organization. Consideration also had to be given to the interest in Canada in the return of units having a militia affiliation and territorial identity so that the invaluable provincial and community interest in such units would be recognized and formation of a strong peace-time militia assisted.

Thus it was decided in principle that following the return of men with very long service, which was to be carried out at far as feasible, the men with relatively shorter service should return by units or unit drafts in the order in which their original formations proceeded overseas, i.e., First Canadian Division, Second Canadian Division, Third Canadian Division, Fifth Armoured Division and Fourth Armoured Division. This repatriation plan, and the basis for point scoring, were duly notified to all ranks overseas by the pamphlet "After Victory in Europe" issued to them immediately following V-E day. I suppose that the committee has seen this pamphlet, which was issued by General Crerar early in May.

Exact adherence to the descending order of point scores in return of personnel would naturally result in depletion of officers both commissioned and non-commissioned, at a more rapid rate than would apply to private soldiers for, on the average, officers would have longer service. No army can function effectively without an adequate proportion of commissioned and non-commissioned officers, and accordingly a certain number of them proportionate to the total strength must be retained despite their length of service.

Moreover, the services necessary for maintenance of the health and comfort of the troops involve retention of a proper proportion of certain specialists or tradesmen, such as cooks, clerks, medical orderlies, etc. In fact, some tradesmen, such as clerks for instance, are required in even greater numbers than normal when troops are being demobilized owing to the great increase in documentation that is involved.

The exact stage at which the further return of individuals, according to height of point score, would begin to seriously affect organization and administration of the remaining troops, had to be determined by the commander in the field and it was with all these considerations in mind that General Crerar was finally obliged to decide that personnel with point scores below fifty would be retained for duty with the occupation force, and that for personnel with scores between 50 and 149 points, return would be carried out by units according to their respective formations. That movement is now in progress, and the majority of units of first Canadian division are now home.

With reduction not only in total numbers of personnel, but also in the numbers of units being maintained overseas, it becomes possible to correspondingly reduce the extent, though not the degree, of services provided. Thus it becomes possible, by interposting, to progressively take out the next higher point score men from among the remaining units and return them in what we call Canada drafts between the moves of the divisions. This works out a balance between individuals and units with fairness to each of them.

Current moves, which are now virtually completed, have been, first, personnel with a point score of 150 and over who could be spared repatriated in Canada drafts, and second, units of the 1st Division group.

Future moves as at present planned are:

1. Canada drafts made up of personnel with 130 points and over who can be spared.

2. Units of 2nd Division group, followed by more Canada drafts made up of personnel with point score down to 110.

3. Units of 3rd Division group, followed by more Canada drafts with point score down to 90.

4. Units of 5th Division group and 4th Division group, followed by remaining personnel from headquarters and repatriation depots.

I should mention here that units of divisions moving as such will return to Canada with all personnel on strength at time of moving having a score of 50 points or over. Those with a score of less than 50 points will remain for further duty.

The units of army troops will be disbanded as the administrative requirements of the remaining formations permit and their services are no longer required. Individuals who can be spared will be repatriated in Canada drafts appropriate to their point score.

This repatriation plan which I have briefly outlined was first announced by General Crerar early in May and has also been explained in detail to the overseas troops by means of a pamphlet recently issued by Lieutenant-General Simonds, Commander of the Canadian forces in the Netherlands.

On V-E day there were of course more men with high point scores overseas than there were in Canada, but the shipping situation imposed a restriction on the number of them that could become available in Canada for early discharge. The sudden arrival of V-J day brought a great demand in Canada for man-power to assist in reconversion and development of industry. In these circumstances, it would obviously not be in the national interest to maintain a considerable number of soldiers in idleness in Canada, to await the return for discharge of slightly higher point score personnel from overseas. It was therefore decided that demobilization of some of the troops in Canada had to be carried out, but in so doing, the just claims of the overseas troops to priority in obtaining employment must be protected.

The classes now made eligible for discharge from those serving in Canada have therefore been restricted as far as possible to groups who would not compete for employment, that is, students or personnel returning to jobs in which they are entitled to be reinstated.

Discharge may now be obtained, subject to the needs of the service, on point score alone if it is 120 points or over (as of March 31, 1945) which means that even if the individual has served in Canada only, he must have entered the army before March 1941 if married, and before May 1940 if single. I do not think that anyone should object to the discharge of a man who has served four and a half years.

In the case of men who are eligible for release to return to their former civil employment, or to work of national importance upon application by the employer through the appropriate industrial selection and release committee, they are not granted a full discharge unless they have a score within 20 points of the current qualifying score which means at present that they must have at least 100 points. If they have a lesser score they are only given extended leave without pay and allowances and are not eligible for discharge until their point score is as great as the current qualifying limit which at present is 120 points.

Apart from the other normal grounds for discharge which have always existed during the war, a service man is now entitled to a discharge: (i) if he has been wounded, is a liberated prisoner of war or has served more than two years overseas; (ii) if he has served in the war 1914-1918; (iii) if he has attained 42 years of age; (iv) if he had not attained 19 years of age by V-J day; (v) if he was one of the very few who on V-J day were still in district depot awaiting transfer to a training unit.

Resumption of university or equivalent higher education has also been made a basis for immediate discharge and while this may be extended to a limited degree with respect to secondary schools, it does not include resumption of technical or business training. The reason for this is fairly obvious: while the war caused a complete gap for almost six years in university training, there has not been the same material diminution in secondary education and, taking into account the personnel trained in the army or in war plants, there has even likely been an increase in trades or technically trained people as a result of the war.

In other instances where there is an acute need of man-power soldiers can be placed on extended leave, without pay or allowances, but they still belong to the army and can be recalled if they do not remain at the employment for which they were released. Supervision in this respect is maintained by national employment service, which is administered by the Department of Labour. Before any other employer could hire such a man he would have to obtain a permit from national employment service, and this would normally not be issued to permit him to leave the work for which he was released.

The soldier thus placed on extended leave does not accumulate war service gratuities or benefits during the period nor does he receive at the time any rehabilitation grant or other financial assistance available to a soldier on his discharge. Furthermore it is not until his particular point score is equal to or greater than the current nominal score fixed for discharge that he becomes entitled to obtain his discharge.

This extended leave without pay or allowances can be granted for several different purposes which are clearly indicated from the names by which they are known: compassionate leave; compassionate farm leave; hog, dairy and beef production leave; spring and harvest leave; industrial leave; emergency labour leave; construction leave; logging leave; coal mining leave. et cetera. While there is, of course, a different reason for each one, they have a common object, which is to make a soldier, presently in the army, available to meet specially urgent personal circumstances or temporary national needs (some of them seasonal in nature) without, however, releasing him from any future essential duties within the army or prejudicing the future employment of those soldiers now overseas who would be entitled to an earlier discharge.

I should also like to make some brief mention of the discharge procedure itself. Discharges are carried out through the Rehabilitation wing of the respective district depots, each of which has been extensively remodelled and reorganized since V-E day in order to best suit it for such purpose. The most apparent results are seen in the fact that the average normal discharge can be completed within 48 or at most 72 hours of the soldiers reporting at the depot, but the greatest benefits for the soldier lie, not in the speed of his discharge, but in what is done for him during the course of it.

While undergoing discharge the soldier is first given full information and assistance to aid his reorientation to the current conditions of Canadian civil life, then he receives a thorough medical inspection by means of a competent medical board to ascertain any physical conditions that may require future care or treatment or that may entitle him to a pension. In addition, an army counsellor individually discusses with him in detail any questions that he may have concerning his qualifications or prospects for the future and also brings to his attention all the benefits, advantages and privileges to which he will be entitled as a veteran and which, after discharge from the army, would become available to him through the rehabilitation policies which are under administration, not by the army, but by the Department of Veterans Affairs. Finally he has an interview with an employment officer representing the Department of Labour in order to assist him in his choice of work and to put him in touch with the local officers of the department wherever he desires to settle down, so that he may have their assitance in finding a suitable job.

It is following this thorough preparation for resumption of his life as a civilian that the soldier is given his financial settlement, his discharge certificate, et cetera, and his war service badge. And so, after receiving, in personal interview with a senior officer, the thanks of the Canadian Army upon behalf of all Canada for the service he has rendered, the soldier steps forth into civilian life as one of Canada's veterans.

Before dealing with future plans I think I should say a word about the important part which has been played by those concerned with scientific and technical research and development. In this war the application of scientific research, through development, to use by the troops in the field, has played a role more far-reaching and decisive than in any wars of the past. The Canadian Army, working as a team, at home and overseas, succeeded gradually in gathering together the professional and designing skills of the nation —in combining with those skills the military technology of our allies, and of our enemies too—so that when the guns were stilled, it can be said that we had not only contributed greatly to the scientific and technical resources of the united nations, but in some selected fields had taken the lead. Recent developments have demonstrated how vital it is that we should maintain an adequate organization for scientific research and development.

The desirability of placing research on the broadest possible basis, with close integration of the efforts of the three armed services and the national research council, is fully realized and further action to that end is now under active consideration.

As to the organization of our post-war army, it is, I think, recognized that as we disband our active forces we must concurrently develop the military establishments which it will be necessary for us to maintain in peace time.

However, the final determination of just what military establishments we will need in peace cannot yet be made, and will be influenced to a large extent by the nature of any obligations which we may later assume under a world or regional security arrangement—obligations which have not yet been clarified—and by the character of the new and terrible weapons which have so recently been developed.

There are, however, certain steps which in the interval can properly be taken, and which we propose to take, to set up and maintain a basic military establishment, and which can be added to or developed as future circumstances require. Detailed plans along these lines are now being considered.

While, as I have said, it is not yet possible to determine in detail just exactly what our requirements in numbers and types to be permanently employed will be, it is recognized that there are amongst those presently serving, and perhaps also amongst those recently discharged, a considerable number of well trained personnel whom it would be desirable and in the country's interest to continue in permanent military employment should they so desire.

As an interim measure, therefore, and pending final determination of the detailed requirements of the postwar active force, we have given an opportunity to a limited number of personnel to continue in the service for a period of up to two years terminating 30 September, 1947.

Present active service rates of pay and allowances including dependents' allowances and pensions will continue to apply to personnel electing to continue their service in this interim force.

The initial reorganization of our military forces will proceed on the basis of a plan which contemplates that an organized citizens' part-time reserve army will form the source from which a field force would be found in the event of war, with a supporting permanently employed force immediately available to meet minimum peace-time obligations and to provide the staffs and administrative and training assistance for the reserve army.

The post-war army will consequently consist of two main elements.

The first is the part-time reserve army whose organization will reflect the military potential of the country and whose staffs and units will form the basis of mobilization of a field force and of our coastal and anti-aircraft defences.

The second will be the permanently employed active force, whose duty it will be to assist in the training and administration of the reserve army and to supply the necessary staffs, services and scientific research and development personnel, augmented by a small formation of essential field units. This formation will be maintained as a trained field force, fully equipped, ready to meet whatever commitments may arise. Until we know more about our international obligations and consequent requirements, these active force units will be retained as a minimum and would be subject to whatever expansion might later be required in the light of any obligations which we might accept to assist in maintaining the peace of the world. Preliminary estimates indicate that the numbers involved in the active permanently employed force will be between 20,000 and 25,000 all ranks.

In broad outline the essential feature of the plan is the maintenance of the organizational structure of our potential field force and static home defence organization which will provide a basis of military war organization within which the training of the manpower of the country can be carried out.

Although I am not yet in a position to announce the exact terms and conditions of service in our postwar permanent forces, I am in a position to give the following information which is applicable to all three services.

1. A special committee has been set up to review the pay and allowances for the permanent armed forces with a view to obtaining a uniformity within the three services and simplification of the system. The pay structure will provide remuneration comparable to civil employment, and the pay will be good pay. We have no intention of trying to set up a cheap permanent force.

2. The present service pension plan has been under study by an interdepartmental committee for some time. The proposed plan will be applicable to all ranks, and service during the present war and in the interim force will count as qualifying service for pension.

3. The government will announce the terms and conditions of the service in the permanent forces not later than March 31, 1946, and upon this announcement personnel, who have been accepted for or are serving in the interim force, should they not wish to serve in the permanent force under the terms and conditions then announced, will be released from their engagement to serve until September, 1947.

4. Anyone who has been accepted for the interim force will be accepted into the permanent force, subject of course to continued good conduct, satisfactory medical category and military efficiency of the individual.

5. Promotion in the permanent forces will be on a basis of merit and ability and the policy for retirement of senior officers will ensure that there will be reasonable promotion for efficient junior officers during peace time.

In so far as the reserve army is concerned, it is to be organized as a force of six divisions with supporting armoured elements and selected corps and army troops for an army of two corps. In addition, the reserve army will include our operational coast and anti-aircraft artillery units and supporting services necessary for the static defence of the country.

So far as the plans have so far progressed, service in the reserve army will be on a part-time basis, and it is intended that the present three-year term of engagement will be continued. Adequate equipment of the latest type will be available on a generous scale to ensure that the training of the reserve army is realistic and interesting. It is intended to assist commanding officers of reserve army units in the training and administration of their personnel by providing for each unit full time (active force) officers and other ranks on an adequate scale.

Those who are familiar with the existing organization of the reserve army will appreciate that the new proposals follow generally the pattern of its present organization and are consistent with the arrangement of our active force during the war. A rearrangement of units will be necessary in order to secure the numbers and types required in the light of modern operational experience. I may add that it is intended to consult the representatives of the various defence associations, whose cooperation and assistance have been of great value to the department in the past, before the resulting changes in the present composition of the reserve army are finally decided.

I hope that many of those who have seen service in the present war will continue that service in the reserve army so that this important force which will form the background of any possible future military endeavour will, as far as possible, be led by commissioned and non-commissioned officers who have gained field experience in the active army under conditions of modern warfare.

This, Mr. Chairman, completes the review of operations and strengths and future plans, but with the permission of the committee, as in past sessions, I should like to place on Hansard the names of 2,433 members of the Canadian Army to whom honours and awards for gallantry, and foreign decorations and awards, have been granted.

Mr. GREEN: Could the minister give the approximate number for the reserve army?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am afraid I cannot at the moment. The strength of six divisions plus would indicate that it would be somewhere in the vicinity of 130,000 to 150,000 men, with supporting troops which might be somewhat substantially in excess of that. Before giving a definite answer I would want to discuss it with the chief of the general staff to see what his views are as to that. The general picture, as I have indicated, is a force of six divisions plus the usual headquarters staff and supporting troops.

The committee will recall that lists of operational awards and honours have been submitted previously. With those which I have presented to-day, the total is 5,765. Included in the list are the names of three members of the army who received the Victoria Cross. I regret to say that one of these, Sergeant Aubrey Cosens, of the Queen's Own Rifles of Canada, was killed in action and the cross was awarded posthumously. The other two, Major Frederick Albert Tilston of the Essex Scottish and Corporal Frederick George Topham of the first Canadian parachute battalion, happily survived and have been repatriated.

The citations in the cases of Sergeant Cosens and Captain Tilston appeared in the Canada Gazette of May 26, 1945, and in the case of Corporal Topham in the Gazette of August 4, 1945. I shall read them, Mr. Chairman, in order that they may be on Hansard.

First, that of Sergeant Cosens reads as follows:

> The king has been graciously pleased to approve the award of the Victoria Cross (posthumously) to:
> B.46495 Sergeant Aubrey Cosens, > the Queen's Own Rifles of Canada
> In Holland on the night of February 25-26, 1945, the first battalion the Queen's Own Rifles of Canada launched an attack on the hamlet of Mooshof to capture ground which was considered essential for the successful development of future operations.
> Sergeant Cosens platoon with two tanks in support attacked enemy strong-points in three farm buildings but were twice beaten back by fanatical enemy resistance and then fiercely counter-attacked during which time the platoon suffered heavy casualties and the platoon commander was killed.
> Sergeant Cosens at once assumed command of the only other four survivors of his platoon whom he placed in a position to give him covering fire while he himself ran across open ground under heavy mortar and shell fire to the one remaining tank where, regardless of danger, he took up an exposed place in front of the turret and directed his fire.

After a further enemy counter-attack had been repulsed, Sergeant Cosens ordered the tank to attack the farm building while the four survivors of his platoon followed in close support. After the tank had rammed the first building he entered alone killing several of the defenders and taking the rest prisoners.

Single-handed he then entered the second and third buildings and perosnally killed or captured all the occupants although under intense machine gun and small arm fire.

Just after the successful reduction of these important enemy strong-points Sergeant Cosens was shot through the head by an enemy sniper and died almost instantly.

The outstanding gallantry, initiative and determined leadership of the brave N.C.O. who himself killed at least twenty of the enemy and took an equal number of prisoners resulted in the capture of a position which was vital to the success of the future operations of the brigade.

The second, the citation of Major Frederick Albert Tilston, reads as follows:

The king has been graciously pleased to approve the award of the Victoria Cross to:

Captain (Acting Major) Frederick Albert Tilston, the Essex Scottish.

The second Canadian division had been given the task of breaking through the strongly fortified Hochwald forest defence line which covered Xanten, the last German bastion west of the Rhine protecting the vital Wesel bridge escape route.

The Essex Scottish regiment was ordered to breach the defence line northwest of Udem and to clear the northern half of the forest through which the balance of the brigade would pass.

At 0715 hours on first March, 1945, the attack was launched but due to the softness of the ground it was found impossible to support the attack by tanks as had been planned.

Across approximately 500 yards of flat open country in face of intense enemy fire Major Tilston personally led his company in the attack keeping dangerously close to our own bursting shells in order to get the maximum cover from the barrage. Though wounded in the head, he continued to lead his men forward through a belt of wire ten feet in depth to the enemy trenches shouting orders and encouragement and using his sten gun with great effect. When the platoon on the left came under heavy fire from an enemy machine gun post, he dashed forward personally and silenced it with a grenade. He was first to reach the enemy position and take the first prisoner.

Determined to maintain the momentum of the attack he ordered the reserve platoon to mop up these positions and with outstanding gallantry pressed on with his main force to the second line of enemy defences which were on the edge of the woods.

As he approached the woods he was severely wounded in the hip and fell to the ground. Shouting to his men to carry on without him and urging them to get into the wood he struggled to his feet and rejoined them as they reached the trenches on their objective. Here an elaborate system of underground dugouts and trenches was manned in considerable strength and vicious hand to hand fighting followed. Despite his wounds, Major Tilston's unyielding will to close with the enemy was a magnificent inspiration to his men as he led them in systematically clearing the trenches of the fiercely resisting enemy. In this fighting two German company headquarters were overrun and many casualties were inflicted on the fanatical defenders.

Such had been the grimness of the fighting and so savage the enemy resistance that the company was now reduced to only twenty-six men, one-quarter of its original strength. Before consolidation could be completed the enemy counter-attacked repeatedly supported by a hail of mortar and machine gun fire from the open flank. Major Tilston moved in the open from platoon to platoon quickly organizing their defence and directing fire against the advancing enemy. The enemy attacks penetrated so close to the positions that grenades were thrown into the trenches held by his troops but this officer by personal contact, unshakeable confidence and unquenchable enthusiasm so inspired his men that they held firm against great odds.

When the supply of ammunition became a serious problem he repeatedly crossed the bullet swept ground to the company on his right flank to carry grenades, rifle and bren ammunition to his troops and replaced a damaged wireless set to reestablish communications with battalion headquarters. He made at least six of these hazardous trips each time crossing a road which was dominated by intense fire from numerous well-sited enemy machine gun posts.

On his last trip he was wounded for the third time, this time in the leg. He was found in a shell crater beside the road. Although very seriously wounded and barely conscious he would not submit to medical attention until he had given complete instructions as to the defence plan, had emphasized the absolute necessity of holding the position and had ordered his one remaining officer to take over.

By his calm courage, gallant conduct and total disregard for his own safety, he fired his men with grim determination and their firm stand enabled the regiment to accomplish its object of furnishing the brigade with a solid base through which to launch further successful attacks to clear the forest thus enabling the division to accomplish its task.

The final citation, Mr. Chairman, is that of Corporal Frederick George Topham, which reads as follows:

The king has been graciously pleased to approve the award of the Victoria Cross to:

B.39039 Corporal Frederick George Topham,
1st Canadian Parachute Battalion

On 24th March, 1945, Corporal Topham, a medical orderly, parachuted with his battalion onto a strongly defended area east of the Rhine. At about 1100 hours whilst treating casualties sustained in the drop, a cry for help came from a wounded man in the open. Two medical orderlies from a field ambulance went out to this man in succession but both were killed as they knelt beside the casualty.

Without hesitation and on his own initiative Corporal Topham went forward through intense fire to replace the orderlies who had been killed before his eyes. As he worked on the wounded man, he was himself shot through the nose. In spite of severe bleeding and intense pain he never faltered in his task. Having completed immediate first aid, he carried the wounded man steadily and slowly back through continuous fire to the shelter of the woods.

During the next two hours Corporal Topham refused all offers of medical help for his own wound. He worked most devotedly throughout this period to bring in wounded, showing complete disregard for the heavy and accurate enemy fire. It was only when all casualties had been cleared that he consented to his own wound being treated.

His immediate evacuation was ordered, but he interceded so earnestly on his own behalf that he was eventually allowed to return to duty.

On his way back to his company he came across a carrier, which had received a direct hit. Enemy mortar bombs were still dropping around, the carrier itself was burning fiercely and its own mortar ammunition was exploding, an experienced officer on the spot had warned all not to approach the carrier.

Corporal Topham, however, immediately went out alone in spite of the blasting ammunition and enemy fire, and rescued the three occupants of the carrier. He brought these men back across the open and, although one died almost immediately afterwards, he arranged for the evacuation of the other two, who undoubtedly owe their lives to him.

This non-commissioned officer showed sustained gallantry of the highest order, for six hours, most of the time in great pain. He performed series of acts of outstanding bravery and his magnificent and selfless courage inspired all those who witnessed it.

Mr. PEARKES: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Abbott) has just read the government's appreciation of the work our soldiers have carried out during the war. I am quite certain every hon. member of this party, and every member on this side of the house would like to join the government in its heartfelt and humble thanks for the sacrifices those men made.

To-day the streets of every Canadian city are bedecked with flags in honour of those gallant regiments which are returning. Over a great many doorways one will see the sign, "Welcome home, son." True to the traditions of our country, the crowning victories of these campaigns, which have just been concluded, have not been won by regular soldiers, but have been won by that great host of citizens who came forward when their freedom was threatened, and when the principles they held dear were in danger. They left their peaceful pursuits in order that they might do battle.

Before the war our permanent force was small. Its members lived a cloistered life, far removed from the industrial and national economy of the country. When war came they, as indeed the whole nation, were ill prepared for global or total warfare. They gave of their best. Many individuals have done exceptionally well; but the fact remains that the great battles of this war were fought by men who, a short time before, were unskilled in the art of warfare.

In the tragic and costly operations against Dieppe in the summer of 1942, not more than half a dozen permanent force officers landed on the beaches. I believe that, in the main, Canada should continue to rely upon its citizen soldiers for its future defence; but we cannot slip back into the pre-war attitude, when the non-permanent militia, or the reserve army as it is now being called, was nearly reduced to inefficiency. Had it not been for the contributions made by the officers of that force, and by other patriotic citizens, it would never have been as efficient as it was at the outbreak of this war.

The efficiency of our reserve army must be assured. Our permanent force must be brought into much closer touch with the civilian life of the country, and with scientific development, than was the case before this war. The Minister of National Defence has declared that this is an interim period. I do not wish to see a drifting back into the laissez-faire attitude or to conditions of pre-war life. The time should be spent in planning and remodeling our future defence. We are faced with an entirely new situation as regards our position in the world, and I would suggest that now is the time that some investigating body should be set up to review our requirements,—a body such as the Haldane committee of 1908, which made a thorough survey of the military requirements of the old country, and changed the then volunteer system into the territorial army. It should be a committee of men in whom the country has confidence, consisting of representatives not only of all the services, but also of industry and industrial life. The minister gave no indication that he was setting up any such committee. He seems to be content to rely upon his professional and political advisers. The methods by which the armed forces will be enabled to retain their efficiency in the future, to keep up to date in their tactical and technical developments, and in the standardization of our equipment and plans for the simplification of production, and to link those plans with the plans which are being drawn up for the reestablishment of industry, call for new ideas and new plans. The practices of the past cannot be accepted, without full examination on a very wide basis. This is not merely an affair of the army, it is one in which the whole nation is deeply concerned.

There will be—and I see it in the remarks of the minister—a tendency to get back to an organization based on our pre-war system. Surely before this is done a full review on a non-departmental basis should be carried out.

It is now the time to review the past, and to formulate our plans for the future in such a way as to convince the country that they are founded on sound sense. A sound plan now may save us many anxious moments in the future.

Having experienced a period immediately after the last war when the permanent force was authorized for an establishment of 10,000, I remember vividly how the units of that then permanent force never attained anything like the numbers they were authorized to have. As the years went by they were reduced to the merest skeleton. The result was that at the commencement of this war the permanent force consisted of little more than 4,000 men, the majority of whom were employed in instructional and administrative duties.

The proposal for the permanent force of the future is for from 20,000 to 25,000. Care will have to be exercised to see that the units of that establishment are not allowed to become the skeletons which the old permanent force became, and that it should not be allowed in that way to become a force incapable of carrying out the functions for which the minister has detailed it.

As I said earlier, the country is now extending a welcome home to its returning men. In the excitement of the moment, are we to forget the Canadian occupational force which must remain in Germany? While the minister mentioned that occupational force, he said very little about it. The first announcement as to its objects and duties was made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in the last session when, on April 4, as reported at page 446 of Hansard he said:

> In Europe it is necessary not only to secure complete victory, but that achievement must be confirmed, and the continued maintenance of peace assured. Where needed, after the cessation of military operations, the inter-allied army will continue in occupation of Germany. The size of this force has been set to give continuing assurance that Germany will not be able to resist or evade the settlement which will be imposed on her.
> The burden of maintaining this force will be shared among the allies and all will be appropriately represented.

He goes on to say:

> The quota which Canada has undertaken to maintain is modest having regard to our resources and to our direct interest in the maintaining and safeguarding of the peace of the world.

Elsewhere he mentioned that that force would consist of approximately 25,000 men. The retention of that force in Germany is an obligation which Canada has assumed and she cannot shirk her responsibilities. Among the tasks which that force has to perform may be included the disarmament of the enemy, a particularly difficult and lengthy operation; the distribution of food and the reestablishment of law and order. The work to be done to restore health and to bring back the starving to life must also be carried out under the protection of that occupational force.

It is difficult to visualize the tremendous responsibilities which lie ahead of it. It is well to recall that after the last war Great Britain contributed her share in the occupying of the frontier zone for a period of ten years. I suggest that there are pointers which would lead one to believe that a more extended period, in both time and space, may well follow the conclusion of this war. The difficulties under which our occupational force is operating cannot be overestimated. It is surrounded by a hostile and still arrogant population, a people who have none of the luxuries and few of the necessities of life, whose cities have been destroyed and who must face the severe winter of central Europe without adequate stocks of food or fuel. Everything that our soldiers have—mind you, many of the essentials for them are also in short supply—will be looked upon with covetous eyes by the civilian population. Our men will be surrounded by temptation. In consequence, strict discipline will have to be maintained just at a time when many would hope that restrictions might be relaxed.

I have the greatest sympathy for General Vokes and for every man who is serving under him in that occupational force. Only last week Field Marshal Montgomery, when accepting the freedom of the city of Londonderry in Ireland, said that his great fear was that disease would sweep Europe, killing millions. Our soldiers are exposed to that danger.

Our Canadian occupational force is far from being a happy one. Few of its members are there of their own free will. Of the 21,000 who now compose the force, some 11,000 to 12,000 are general service men who expressed no desire to serve in the force when they were given an opportunity of saying how they would like to continue serving after V-E day. Some 4,622 have seen more than six months actual combat service, and 1,700 are N.R.M.A. soldiers who have been ordered overseas against their wishes.

This committee must agree that it is undesirable and unfair to leave any man in that force for an extended period and that those who have already borne the brunt of their share of fighting before V-E day should be replaced without delay. No doubt a certain number of replacements are available among low-point men who are now in England, but their number is limited and it is decreasing daily. The minister did not indicate to us what other troops he had available for the replacements which may be required for that occupational force. I presume those men who have signified their willingness to join the interim army, namely, the men now in the active army or those who have recently been discharged and who are willing to serve wherever required, can also be made available, but their number in Canada is limited.

Has recruiting at large started up? I do not believe that recruits are being taken into the interim army at the present time with the exception of those who have already seen service in the active army. Therefore, I ask: What reinforcements and what replacements are there for that occupational army if the disease, which Field Marshal Montgomery feared might sweep through Europe, should attack our men? What men has the Minister of National Defence available to replace those who are in occupational service and who have already seen fighting or who have been more than six months in an actual theatre of war?

I have endeavoured to point out some of the difficulties of that occupational force. I think it is obvious that well trained, well disciplined soldiers having good morale, are required. Therefore it is the solemn duty of the minister and the government to develop those qualities to the greatest possible extent in all potential replacements or reinforcements for that army. I suggest that this can never be achieved so long as certain categories of men are segregated into special units or subunits, so long as men must wear uniforms with certain badges designed so that the public points the finger of scorn at them, or so long as men have different terms and conditions of service while in this country.

A few weeks ago the minister described the steps which are being taken in order to avoid having any difference between N.R.M.A. soldiers and volunteers for overseas. I should like to quote from page 380 of Hansard of September 24, 1945, where he is reported as follows:

> The policy from the very outset with respect to these N.R.M.A. men has been this: Once they stepped on a ship there was no distinction made between the N.R.M.A. man and the volunteer soldier. They were all going over to fight.

And again:

> There has been no distinction made between the volunteer soldier and the man sent over under the National Resources Mobilization Act. Once the N.R.M.A. man got over there he took his place in the reinforcement pool, and when his turn came he went over to France as part of the reinforcements and was posted to a unit, just the same as any other soldier. General Foulkes told me only this morning that when people asked him over there how the N.R.M.A. men were doing, he replied, "I do not know, because I do not know who they are. So far as I am concerned they are soldiers just the same as any other soldier."
> So there has been no distinction made, and so long as I am minister there will not be any distinction made, between the soldier who is over there compulsory and the soldier who is over there voluntarily. And to old soldiers it is obvious why that must be so. There must be mutual trust and confidence in the man beside you when you are fighting, and to make a distinction between the men who have volunteered and the men who have been sent over under the N.R.M.A. would be indefensible.

I ask the minister, why wait until those men get on board ship? Is it not absolutely indefensible, just the same as it is overseas, to have a distinction made between them here in Canada? There are some thirty thousand N.R.M.A. men—that is an approximate figure—still in Canada. If it is indefensible that there should be any distinction made overseas, why is it that the minister still continues to keep his two-army system here in Canada? In the interests of efficiency, for the well being of these N.R.M.A. soldiers themselves, and for the sake of national unity, will he not now declare that this abominable system shall cease?

These N.R.M.A. soldiers are not drawn exclusively from people of any one racial origin, and their attitude has frequently been misunderstood. Some of these men come from families whose parents and grand-parents recently moved to Canada from central Europe. I am proud to say that I have had close associations with many of them over many years. I was pleased to hear the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Hlynka) a few weeks ago speak about the Ukrainian population in his constituency. These people I also know. These men, sons of immigrants from central Europe, have in many respects still the peasant's outlook. They have learned at their mother's knee that they are the true sons of the soil and that their duty is with the soil, and that if they are ever required to defend their soil, then their government will call them to the colours, the responsibility being on the government and not upon the individual man. In fact, most of these men would find it difficult to distinguish between the term "volunteer" and the term "mercenary".

There are other N.R.M.A. soldiers both of British and of French origin, and let me say here that my connections with French-Canadian soldiers have also been long and intimate. During the battle of Passchendaele in 1917 it was my exalted privilege to command a company of a Quebec regiment which was composed fifty per cent of French-Canadian soldiers and fifty per cent of British-Canadian soldiers. At the conclusion of that battle I was awarded a distinction, and when I wear the ribbon on my uniform I do so in the full knowledge that that award was made every bit as much for the courage, determination and devotion of those French-speaking soldiers as for any action which I carried out myself.

At a more recent date, in 1943, it was my privilege to see the Regiment de Hull, which came from this immediate area, standing for hours in the waters of the Bering sea, unloading stores from the boats on to the island of Kiska; and on armistice day, in November, 1943, I spent that day in the tents of the Regiment de Hull. There was an arctic blizzard blowing and the instruments registered that gale as blowing at ninety miles an hour. One could hardly stand up against it. The freezing sleet would blow horizontally to the ground, and I say here, and nobody who was on that island could contradict me, that those French-Canadian soldiers of the Regiment de Hull were the life and soul of that garrison, be they Canadian or United States soldiers who were there.

Therefore when those French-Canadian soldiers who had been called up under the N.R.M.A. were appealed to last year to volunteer many of them had to wrestle between two loyalties, one loyalty that might be described as parental loyalty, a loyalty to their home and to their family, as against a loyalty to a cause which they barely understood. With regard to the decision to be made whether they should go back on promises they had made when they were first called up, promises to their parents that they would not volunteer for service outside Canada, whether that decision should be made by them or by the government, they were unanimous in feeling that the decision should be made by the government and not by the individual man. No wonder those men placed the responsibility squarely upon the shoulders of the government. This man-power skeleton will remain long in the Liberal cupboard.

I suggest that even at this eleventh hour, in the interests of efficiency, for the well-being of the N.R.M.A. soldiers who are still here and for the sake of the unity of Canada, this two-army system be discontinued from now on.

Our soldiers are returning, but I suggest that the methods by which they are being repatriated are open to the severest condemnation because those men who have had the longest and hardest service, as the minister said to-day, are not having a fair chance in being returned; that men who have served a much shorter time overseas are now coming back, while many of the men who have had the longest service still have to remain, not because they are in some particularly essential job, but because they do not happen to be in a formation which is being brought back, and because only lip-service is being given to this policy of "first in, first out; longest and hardest, first home."

The point system as described by the minister to-day is totally unjust to the man who has seen the longest and hardest fighting. Two points are allowed for service in Canada and only one additional point for service overseas. "Service overseas" does not mean overseas in a theatre of operation; it may mean service in a pleasant camp in England. The present point system should be revised immediately if fairness and justice are to be observed. That is very much the feeling of the men who are returning to Canada to-day. I have talked with men who have been repatriated to Ottawa with the Princess Louise Dragoon Guards, with men of the Hastings and Prince Edward regiment from Belleville, with men of the 48th battalion being demobilized in Toronto, and with men of the Seaforth Highlanders of Canada who passed through here a week ago on their way to Vancouver. These men who served with me in the first Canadian division in the early days of the war, some of whom I could recognize, many of whom were able to recognize me, were all loud in their protests against the unfair way in which the present point system is working, and the fact that included in their ranks were men who had seen no fighting whatever. In the last session, the Minister of National Defence gave the information that by the 1st of March of this year, three and a half months before V-E day, only 238 N.R.M.A. soldiers had reached an actual battlefield. We hear now that a hundred and eleven thousand of our men have been repatriated. A return was tabled yesterday which gave some startling figures regarding the type of men who were in those units which are now being repatriated. I jotted down a few. Of the Saskatchewan Light Infantry twenty-seven per cent are N.R.M.A. soldiers; of the Seaforths, 19·5 per cent; of the P.P.C.L.I., 18·5 per cent, and, with all but two of the infantry battalions which are back, more than ten per cent are N.R.M.A. soldiers. Compare those figures with the statement which was given by the minister last session, that by the 1st of March of this year only 238 N.R.M.A. men had reached the actual battlefield. Also compare that with the figures which were given earlier, which I mentioned, that there were over four thousand men in the army of occupation who had served for more than six months in an actual theatre of war.

It is on these facts that I feel we must criticize, and criticize severely, the present point system by which these men are being brought back. Even at this eleventh hour it should be revised, and some additional bonus, some preference should be granted or some scheme devised—I care not how you work it out—for the benefit of the men who have been in actual combat and to whom the minister referred as having the hardest and longest service. Unless we want to pay more lip-service to that policy some action must be taken in that respect.

A short time ago disciplinary action was taken against an officer who was editing the Maple Leaf magazine at the time. But talk to any man who is coming back and he will tell you that those editorials reflect the opinion of the troops who then were actually in Germany or elsewhere on the continent of Europe.

I have confined myself in the main to criticism of the policy. I feel that not sufficient foresight is being used at this time in preparing our future defence forces so that they may assure reasonable and adequate defence of this country in another global war where we might be faced with an enemy equipped with the most scientific developments of this atomic age. We should think twice before we go back to the time-worn policies and time-worn formations which we had before this war.

I appeal that consideration be given to our army of occupation, and that some reasonable scheme of replacing those men who have served in the army of occupation for any extended period should be worked out now. No such scheme was presented to us.

Finally, I say that even now we must revise our repatriation scheme, so that those who have served the longest and fought the hardest may have the advantage of coming back and becoming reestablished in this country, or of taking some of the many courses which are being opened for them, before they find all those opportunities gone.

I have not made any comment on the various items of the establishment because I understand that an opportunity to discuss these in detail will be presented at a later date. I therefore move that the debate on this subject be adjourned.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

Mr. MACKENZIE: In accordance with the announcement of last evening in regard to the business of the house I move that the committee rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again this day.

Progress reported.

UNITED NATIONS

APPROVAL OF AGREEMENT SIGNED AT SAN FRANCISCO, JUNE 26, 1945

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved:

That it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve the agreement establishing the united nations and constituting the charter of the united nations and the statute of the international court of justice signed at San Francisco on June 26, 1945, and that this house do approve the same.

He said: On the 26th of June last it was my proud privilege to append my signature, under that of the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), to authenticate on behalf of Canada the document agreed upon at San Francisco as the charter of the united nations. That authentication did not automatically make Canada a member of this great international organization because membership in the organization is to be accomplished by compliance with article 3 of the charter, which I should like to read:

The original members of the united nations shall be the states which, having participated in the united nations conference on international organization at San Francisco, or having previously signed the declaration by united nations of January 1, 1942, sign the present charter and ratify it in accordance with Article 110.

Article 110 provides:

1. The present charter shall be ratified by the signatory states in accordance with their respective constitutional processes.

2. The ratifications shall be deposited with the government of the United States of America, which shall notify all the signatory states of each deposit, as well as the secretary general of the organization when he has been appointed.

3. The present charter shall come into force upon the deposit of ratifications by the republics of China, France, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, and the United States of America, and by a majority of the other signatory states. A protocol of the ratifications deposited shall thereupon be drawn up by the government of the United States of America which shall communicate copies thereof to all the signatory states.

4. The states signatory to the present charter which ratify it after it has come into force, will become the original members of the united nations on the date of the deposit of their respective ratifications.

Nevertheless it was a great privilege to participate, on behalf of the Canadian nation, in making to civilized mankind, of this and of succeeding generations, the noble declaration which constitutes the preamble of the charter. I beg leave to read that preamble into the record as a fitting setting for the discussion upon which this house is embarking at this time:

Charter of the United Nations.

We the peoples of the united nations, determined to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war, which twice in our lifetime has brought untold sorrow to mankind, and to reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person, in the equal rights of men and women and of nations large and small, and to establish conditions under which justice and respect for the obligations arising from treaties and other sources of international law can be maintained, and to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom, and for these ends to practise tolerance and live together in peace with one another as good neighbours, and to unite our strength to maintain international peace and security, and to ensure, by the acceptance of principles and the institution of methods, that armed force shall not be used, save in the common interest, and to employ international machinery for the promotion of the economic and social advancement of all peoples, have resolved to combine our efforts to accomplish these aims.

Accordingly our respective governments, through representatives assembled in the city of San Francisco, who have exhibited their full powers, found to be in good and due form, have agreed to the present charter of the united nations, and do hereby establish an international organization to be known as the united nations.

Does anybody doubt that Field Marshal Smuts, and those who collaborated with him in drafting this preamble, correctly interpreted the aspirations and the determination of the peoples of the united nations, of the hundreds of millions of men, women and children throughout the world, of the hundreds of millions of common people throughout the world, upon so many of whom the scourge of the last two wars has borne so heavily and to each of whom it has brought such untold loss and suffering and sorrow?

At San Francisco the respective governments of these hundreds of millions of common people seem to have sought, through their representatives, to set up an organization which, if all these respective governments will allow it to function in the same spirit of live and let live in which it was conceived, can realize the true aspirations and determination of these common people everywhere; the aspirations and the determination to have international peace and mutual security based upon mutual belief, confidence and trust in each other's honesty of intention and sincerity of purpose, rather upon the precarious balance of power blocs or the shifting delimitations of spheres of influence.

Can the common people everywhere and at all times make their aspirations and determination heard and implemented by all their respective governments and all those acting and speaking on their behalf in large or small, open or secret international conferences and committees?

Must we here not hope, if we hope for the ultimate success of the world organization, that an affirmative answer is or soon will be possible? We at least know that it is the correct answer in so far as our own nation is concerned, and it is because we know it that this resolution is before the house to-day.

We know that this house is truly representative of all the common people of the Canadian nation. We know that in this house the concept of a nation or state, as something different and something above the men and women and children who make up the nation, does not prevail. We know that those who attempt to speak and to act for this nation derive their right to do so from those men, women and children, and that they must at all times be mindful of their interests, of the interests of those same men, women and children, and even to a degree, of their own conception of what are their best interests.

That is why the Prime Minister, when moving on March 20 last, a resolution approving the participation of Canada in the San Francisco conference, told the house that the charter would, before ratification, be submitted to parliament for approval. At that time the Prime Minister said:

In proposing this course, the government is following the procedure customary with respect to treaties. No treaty or obligation could be more solemn than that which the united nations would assume under the charter. The course which the government is proposing would, moreover, ensure to a parliament newly elected by the people, the final word with respect to the adoption of the charter.

The charter was signed by fifty nations. A copy of it was tabled as treaty series number 7 on September 7; a copy of the report submitted on behalf of the Canadian delegation at San Francisco was tabled on September 10. I have been informed by the distribution office that copies were at that time forwarded through the mail to each hon. member of this house.

It is a significant fact that fifty states comprising the larger part of the civilized world have been able to reach agreement, and that they were all prepared to sign this charter. Those of us who were there know there were times during the San Francisco conference when difficulties and differences of view loomed very large, but in the end agreement was reached. When the conference met we were till in the midst of a great war. Most of those assembled at San Francisco represented countries whose peoples were making heroic efforts and very heavy sacrifices to bring the war to a speedy end. Some came from lands newly liberated from the enemy. All were deeply conscious of the appalling human sufferings which war causes. I think in the end it was this profound realization which made agreement possible.

At a great international conference of this kind there are so many national interests to be reconciled, so many adjustments which have to be made for the varying views of the different states represented that what emerges in the end is bound to be a compromise. The charter in its final form bears evidence of these compromises and adjustments. I do not think anyone would contend that it is an ideal document, and in the course of my remarks I shall mention some things which the Canadian government hopes in the course of time to see changed. But each chapter, each sentence and in some cases each comma, in this charter have been discussed and considered in the conference committees. Each clause has received the affirmative vote of two-thirds of the states represented. The charter which resulted from these deliberations does represent a great cooperative achievement. Each nation has made its individual contribution; and I think it can be said that Canada had no small contribution to make.

Before the conference took place at San Francisco the parliament of Canada had approved the principle of Canada's participation in an international organization to maintain peace and security. The words of the resolution introduced in the house on March 20, 1945, were as follows:

That this house recognizes that the establishment of an effective international organization for the maintenance of international peace and security is of vital importance to Canada, and, indeed, to the future well-being of mankind, and that it is in the interests of Canada that Canada should become a member of such an organization.

It was the task of the Canadian delegation at the conference both to safeguard the interests of Canada and to incorporate in the final charter, so far as this was possible, those improvements which could best secure the loyal and continuing support of this country for the united nations organization. The government considered it essential that the Canadian delegation to the conference should be broadly representative in character. Accordingly it was decided that it should include representatives of both houses of parliament and from both sides of the house. The delegation so composed worked together at San Francisco in an atmosphere of complete mutual confidence, and though I was there I venture to say here that I do not think any group could have been chosen from among the 11,500,000 people of Canada who would have striven more effectively to act only as Canadians and in no way as partisans or members of any one political party, though for most of the time we were there a federal election campaign was in progress here at home.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

COMMUNICATING INFORMATION

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre) moved the second reading of bill No. 5, to amend the Income War Tax Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, some of the matters to which I shall refer in support of the second reading of the bill are of somewhat recent date, for that reason I should like to remind the house that I first placed the bill on the order paper at the regular session of 1943, but, in view of the restrictions against dealing with private members' bills during the war sessions, it was not possible for the matter to be discussed until now.

The effect of the bill now before the house is to add one sentence to subsection 1 of section 81 of the Income War Tax Act. The subsection to which I have referred, as it now stands, reads as follows:

No person employed in the service of His Majesty shall communicate or allow to be communicated to any person not legally entitled thereto any information obtained under the provisions of this act, or allow any such person to inspect or have access to any written statement furnished under the provisions of this act.

This section is fairly well known to hon. members as the secrecy provision of the Income War Tax Act. It also covers the Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940, since sections 40 to 87 of the Income War Tax Act are, by section 14 of the Excess Profits Tax Act, made to apply thereto.

The sentence which I suggest should be added at the end of subsection 1 is as follows:

Provided that nothing in this subsection shall operate to prevent a minister of the crown from communicating to the Senate or to the House of Commons any information obtained under the provisions of this act.

The effect of this amendment would not, I hasten to point out, result in the immediate wholesale publication of all information obtained by the Department of National Revenue under the two acts to which I have referred. It would, however, remove the prohibition now contained in the Income War Tax Act against giving publicity to any income tax information obtained by that department.

On several occasions I have had experiences which have brought me up against the provisions of subsection 1 of section 81, and I should like to take a moment to refer to some of these experiences. Back in February, 1943, there appeared in practically all the daily newpaper in Canada a full-page advertisement inserted by the Steel Company of Canada Limited, which some of us felt was unfair in what it had to say about organized labour. It had to do with a strike then in progress.

Trade union organizations throughout Canada, in common with some of us here, wondered if the costs of advertising of this kind were chargeable as a deduction under the Income War Tax Act, and endeavoured to find out if that was so. However, our efforts were met with the reply of the then Minister of National Revenue, who is now Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Gibson), that this information could not be given, in view of the secrecy provision of subsection 1 of section 81 of the act.

On another occasion I was interested in the efforts of the employees of a certain branch of the Winnipeg Electric Company to obtain an adjustment in their wages. I discovered that when the employees of the company were before the regional war labour board in Manitoba, one of the arguments advanced by the company had to do with the income tax status granted them by the Department of National Revenue. To put it in the language which was used at the time, they declared that they had been given the status of a depressed industry. That was advanced as an argument as to why they could not agree to certain wage increases.

I endeavoured to find out here in the House of Commons, by placing a question on the order paper, if such was the case; and, if so, on what basis this status had been granted. This, too, was in 1943. Again I was met with the reply by the then Minister of National Revenue that my question could not be answered because of the provisions of subsection 1 of section 81 of the Income War Tax Act.

In connection with the same matter, I moved on another occasion in 1943 for the tabling of the relevant documents and all the correspondence that had passed between the Winnipeg Electric Company and any department of government relating to the matter. My motion was passed by the house, but when the return came down it consisted of a series of pages almost blank. All the house was given was information respecting the dates upon which certain letters had been written, to whom they had been written and by whom they were signed. But the bodies of the letters were left out because of the secrecy provision in the act, to which I have just referred.

I was also interested during the war years, and I still am, in matters relating to the Aluminum Company of Canada and its parent company, Aluminium Limited. During the war we were given certain information respecting income tax depreciation allowances in relation to these organizations. However, when I endeavoured by placing questions on the order paper to obtain information respecting the income tax arrangements made by these companies with the government in the years before the war, again I was met with the same argument that the information could not be given because of the secrecy provision in the act.

Mr. REID: You can know all about my income tax at any time.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am glad to know I have support from across the way.

Mr. REID: And I would like to know yours.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am sure this is quite in line with a view which has been expressed in the house concerning publicity in connection with other matters. I think of the squabbles we had over the question as to whether or not the committee on war expenditures should sit in camera.

Mr. HOMUTH: Now now; that is a different matter entirely.

Mr. KNOWLES: You see, the shoe is on the other foot.

Mr. HOMUTH: That is a different matter; we like to be sensible.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is what has happened; the shoe is now on the other foot. When the question as to whether or not the committee on war expenditures should sit openly or in camera was before the house, all some of us were concerned about—and rightly, I suggest—was that the government should not be given the protection of secrecy, if it were not necessary to have that protection because of the war.

Mr. HOMUTH: We were dealing with public funds.

Mr. KNOWLES: Exactly; and when the Steel Company of Canada is spending money, and sending out that kind of advertising; and when the Aluminum Company of Canada is making money and piling up profits, these companies, too, are using funds derived from the public. Just as we feel that the government should not be given the undue protection of secrecy, so do we feel that private corporations should not be given the protection of the secrecy they have under the act.

In addition to the kind of thing to which I have just referred, I should like to say a word about two other organizations which have appeared in recent years. In fact, they appeared on the horizon since I first placed this bill on the order paper. First there is the organization known as Responsible Enterprise which is carried on by one Gladstone Murray. This gentleman wrote letters to certain corporations and firms to tell them of the mounting success of socialism and the things they must do to stop the advance of a certain political movement. He called upon them—

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Page Manitoba.

Mr. KNOWLES: We shall have an opportunity to say a word about Manitoba in a moment or two, and with a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. GRAYDON: Manitoba has just spoken.

Mr. KNOWLES: He appealed to these people, as individuals or on behalf of their firms, to make contributions to Responsible Enterprise, I think it is a perfectly legitimate request to ask that the country be told whether these contributions are being allowed as income tax deductions. If they are, it means that the people of the country are paying for the misinformation they get from an organization such as Responsible Enterprise.

Mr. HOMUTH: Does the C.I.O. issue a balance sheet and pay income taxes?

Mr. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. gentleman that when an hon. member has the floor no interruption should take place. An hon. member is permitted to ask the hon. gentleman who has the floor if he may ask a question.

Mr. HOMUTH: That would take too long and it would lose its effect.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your comment with respect to the interruption of the hon. member for Waterloo South, but I confess that I always enjoy his interruptions. I was quite interested that he came to bat so quickly to-night when apparently the shoe began to pinch.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Will the hon. member permit a question? Since the hon. member is so anxious to expose private business —I am opposed to that—will he join in asking for complete publicity of all union funds? I am opposed to both, but that is the answer.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That shoe pinches too.

Mr. KNOWLES: Do not worry, I am not falling for that one.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I want the hon. member to understand that I am opposed to both.

Mr. KNOWLES: Another organization that has appeared on the horizon lately is known as General Relations Service Limited, with offices at 51 King Street West, Toronto, with which a certain Mr. B. A. Trestrail is connected. During the months just preceding the recent federal election we find that this organization, over the signature of this individual, was appealing to firms across Canada to contribute to his campaign against the political movement to which I happen to belong. In sending out letters appealing for funds Mr. Trestrail attached a printed form entitled "Retainer", and indicated that the contribution could be made by way of engaging the services of General Relations Service Limited for certain things which were listed and which all added up to the production of political propaganda.

Mr. VIAU: What about the Manitoba Commonwealth?

Mr. KNOWLES: I am glad the hon. member from Manitoba is interested in the Manitoba Commonwealth. The financial affairs of this political movement are open to the public.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. KNOWLES: Oh, yes, they are. Not only do we comply with all the requirements of the elections act about publishing expenses at election time, but at our annual provincial conventions and at our biennial national conventions we make public statements of all the funds that are handled by this organization.

An hon. MEMBER: What is a convention?

Mr. KNOWLES: A convention is something this party holds in each province every year and in the dominion every second year.

Mr. HOMUTH: It does not do you much good.

Mr. KNOWLES: I just want to say that I do not speak with any undue anxiety about Responsible Enterprise or General Relations Service Limited because in the part of the country from which I come their efforts have not had a great deal of effect. A moment ago some one asked about Manitoba. I was in Manitoba until midnight last night, thanks to the speed with which one can travel by T.C.A., enjoying with the C.C.F. people in that province the results of yesterday's elections.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. KNOWLES: I notice considerable laughter, including a smile on the face of my genial and hon. friend, the leader of the opposition who, according to Hansard, was rejoicing last night at the fact that the C.C.F. had been, as he thought then, badly beaten in Manitoba. That was before he knew we were winning eight or ten seats. An interesting thing about the vote in yesterday's election in Manitoba, according to to-day's Ottawa Citizen is that the Progressive Conservative party polled 31,000 votes; the Liberal Progressive party 69,000 votes, and the C.C.F. 70,000 votes.

Mr. WEIR: How many acclamations were there?

Mr. KNOWLES: The results were not at all in this proportion when it came to the seats won, but when one compares the percentages of that vote with the percentages of the vote in the election of a few months ago, the picture is—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Does that include the nine seats by acclamation?

Mr. KNOWLES: It does not include the seats by acclamation and there were only seven.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Does it include the seven seats by acclamation?

Mr. KNOWLES: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Will you please add the votes of every one of those constituencies to the figures you have given us.

Mr. KNOWLES: It so happens that the constituencies in which acclamations took place were rural constituencies in which the vote is quite small. The C.C.F. led the field in those constituencies where the vote is large. The largest vote polled in Manitoba was polled by S. J. Farmer, the C.C.F. leader. The bearing of all this on the bill is that I wanted it to be clear that I am not saying this just to get something off my chest about Mr. Murray and Mr. Trestrail because so far as our part of the country is concerned their kind of propaganda has not had a great deal of effect. But if organizations of this kind, and individuals such as these gentlemen, are to have the privilege of collecting money in this way, that money being in turn charged up against income tax payments, which means that the people of the country are paying for it in one way or another. The people have a right to know what is going on. I do not think I need to say any more, Mr. Speaker, but—

An hon. MEMBER: Have you said anything yet?

Mr. KNOWLES: At least there seems to be a good deal of enjoyment over the differences that we have and we seem to enjoy particularly any discussion that touches upon political developments in this country. I sense in the laughter and in the readiness with which hon. members of various parties jump to their feet, the fact that all are conscious of the progress of this movement. At times it may be slow; nevertheless it is steady and sure and it is just a matter of time until we get there.

An hon. MEMBER: Which way is it going?

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is going back fast.

Mr. HOMUTH: We are not laughing with you; we are laughing at you.

Mr. KNOWLES: To go back to the bill, I just wish to say in conclusion that democracy functions best in the clear light of day. That is the case when dealing with government funds, and it is equally true in connection with the funds of large corporations which make their profits out of the people of this country. I urge the house to endorse the second reading of this bill.

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all members of this chamber will agree that the people of Winnipeg are ordinarily a most agreeable set of citizens.

An hon. MEMBER: And intelligent, too.

Mr. MAYBANK: And intelligent, too. But I think on this occasion I should rise as soon as possible to indicate that in some respects there may be differences of opinion among members from that city. I cannot very well follow my hon. friend in support of this recommendation in the form of a bill which he has introduced. I think he probably stated matters correctly when he endeavoured in the midst of interruptions to show that while the people of our city disagree sometimes, they keep agreeable in the process. Such, indeed, is, I think, a fair picture of the place in which I live.

In the first place I am in disagreement with my hon. friend in respect of manner. He said at the conclusion of his remarks: Democracy best functions in the light of day—a trite observation with which no one would disagree, but on the other hand I cannot see how the mere enunciation of a platitude such as that has anything whatever to do with the concrete and practical proposal which the hon. member has introduced. I desire to differ with him in point of manner from the very start by not endeavouring to buttress any argument of mine with appeals in that fashion to more or less clever sayings of other people. After all, this is a very simple proposition with which we have to deal.

I think my hon. friend will not object if I point out that if this bill were enacted in the manner in which it is now presented to the house it would not make one iota of difference to any of the problems that he has laid before the house this evening. Not one particle of difference would result. The sum total result of this enactment would be that this chamber would have listened to observations upon the subject by himself and to what I am now saying and what others may say who may follow me, and there would be an end of it. There would be no disclosure of anything to anybody by anybody as a result of the passage of this amendment. I do not know how carefully my hon. friend has studied the section he seeks to amend, but I am confident that in a moment or two he will agree with me that his amendment, if carried, could not possibly make any difference with regard to disclosures such as he desires to get.

My first reason for being opposed to voting for this particular amendment as it is, is that I would be merely voting for nothing; it does not mean anything. It is a great deal like a person lighting matches and throwing them into the river. They have no effect.

Mr. KNOWLES: Be careful that you do not use platitudes.

Mr. MAYBANK: The hon. member need not fear that I will imitate him in any respect. It is said that imitation is the sincerest form of flattery. I would not imitate him with a view to complimenting him and certainly I would not indulge in any flattery.

I am sure that Your Honour and hon. members will agree with me when I say that the addition to the present law of the words proposed would mean nothing. The underlined words, which are the amendment, are:

Provided that nothing in this subsection shall operate to prevent a minister of the crown from communicating to the Senate or to the House of Commons any information obtained under the provisions of this act.

When you read the whole section as it now stands you will see that the Minister of National Revenue is not prevented by the section from giving to the House of Commons information which he may obtain from various officers of the crown, which is what my hon. friend seeks to obtain. The section itself as it is now, unamended, before my hon. friend's words come in, reads:

No person employed in the service of His Majesty shall communicate or allow to be communicated to any person not legally entitled thereto, any information obtained under the provisions of this act, or allow any such person to inspect or have access to any written statement furnished under the provisions of this act.

Of course, there will be by all people different meanings assigned to the word "employed". When you have the verb "employed" you naturally think of the noun and you know that a person employed is an employee. There will not be any argument about that. One meaning of the word "employed" would be such as to comprehend a minister of the crown. Let us say that ministers of the crown, all members of the House of Commons, all members of the Senate, as well as many others are, in one way of looking at the matter. "employed" in the service of the crown that is, they are employed in the service of the country. They are not "employed" in the service of the country any more than millions of other people about the country are also employed. All good citizens are employed, in the popular sense of the word, in the service of the country. But that is not the meaning which is ascribed to such a word in the statute. A person who is employed, an employee, is one who is paid a certain sum of money and performs certain definite services, although the degree of definiteness may vary. That person is an employee. But by no stretch of the imagination could ministers of the crown, or members of parliament, or members of the senate be called "employees" of the crown, any more than His Excellency could be called an employee of the crown. I feel quite sure that my hon. friend will agree with what I am saying when he gives consideration to it. It is not just an ordinary technical legal argument such as might be offered by reason of endeavouring to exercise ingenuity. This is one of those propositions in law upon which I am confident there will not be any disagreement.

Mr. WRIGHT: Is there such a thing?

Mr. MAYBANK: Oh, yes, there are such ideas now and then, and this happens to be one of them. I appreciate the intervention from the other side of the house; it is a natural one. There is merit in such thought that lay behind that interruption, because it is true that in law, as, I have been told, in other professions even the profession to which the hon. member belongs, the clerical profession, there arise differences of opinion; in his profession, on theological questions; and I understand that the same is the case with doctors. There can be no question that lawyers can nearly always find ways of distinguishing one thing from another, but there are some propositions on which all lawyers will agree, as there are some propositions on which all ministers and all doctors will agree; and this is one of those propositions upon which, I believe, the whole legal fraternity will agree.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I ask the hon. member a question? If that is the case, why is it that the then minister of national revenue, who I believe is a member of the legal profession, felt that this act as it now stands prevented him from giving the information for which I asked in the house?

Mr. MAYBANK: Well, I do not recall the incident to which my hon. friend has referred; and in view of the fact that he is not quoting the words of the minister I do not know whether he is correctly portraying what the minister said.

Mr. KNOWLES: I will give the hon. member several examples. One is to be found on page 2929 of Hansard for May 24, 1943.

Mr. MAYBANK: Yes, I know, but even so the hon. member may be a long way from accurately portraying what the minister said. I have no means of knowing. I should point out to him that if he desires to show what it was that the minister said on page so-and-so of Hansard, the best evidence of what the minister said will be the document itself, namely Hansard, and not a mere reference by him to a page number. I can quite understand that the minister may have said that he felt precluded by reason of the act from giving information. That is very natural; he would feel precluded from giving information by reason of the act and he would feel precluded from giving information by reason of the spirit of the act. But that is not the same thing as to say that he felt precluded from giving information by this section of the act. That is the point I was making; and I cannot see any sense in passing the proposed amendment, which would be utterly without effect and useless. That was the first point I was making. I am not saying at all that my learned friend—I hope there will be no objection taken to my having fallen into legal terminology and having called him "learned friend" across the floor. There was no offence intended.

Mr. KNOWLES: And none taken.

Mr. MAYBANK: I know it would be a most terrible come-down for a preacher to be called a lawyer.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HOMUTH: It would be far worse if you ever called a lawyer a preacher.

Mr. MAYBANK: It is certainly far from any intention of mine to insult. I say that this particular section, and that is all I have been arguing about, is not being amended to any purpose by that which is set down in the bill. But in those remarks I have not quite completed my answer to the hon. gentleman.

His remark when he asked if I would permit a question was this: "Well, supposing what you say is correct; how does it come about that the minister made such and such an answer on such and such a day?", although he has not quoted the answer that the minister made or tied it down to any particular section of the law. Of course I might be able to hazard some opinion as to why the minister made the statement in the manner in which he did, but I hardly feel called upon to do so to support the argument I am making. I am quite willing to agree with the hon. gentleman that the ways of minister of the crown are very often inscrutable, and the exact reason why the minister may have made a statement in a certain form is something I could not undertake to answer, not having a sufficient degree of clairvoyance for the purpose. I cannot say why the minister made a statement in a certain way, but I am quite confident as to the correctness of what I have said with reference to the amendment in this manner of this particular section, no matter what the minister said. While I cannot unscrew the inscrutability of ministers of the crown, nevertheless I am quite confident that if, as, and when this amendment is passed absolutely nothing will have been accomplished. For that reason I would be bound to vote against something which I believe would be a nullity after it was passed. That is about the sole reason at the moment that I would advance for declaring myself definitely against the proposed amendment.

So far as the general idea of opening up records—

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Speaker, I wonder, before the hon. member wanders around some more in search of another point, if he would mind my reading the quotation which he said I was not giving? To have the record clear, I refer to Hansard of May 24, 1943, at page

2929. At that time, in answer to a question which I asked about the Aluminum Company of Canada, the minister replied as follows:

Mr. Gibson: Mr. Speaker, it has never been considered to be in the public interest to divulge information as to the affairs of individual taxpayers, and in any case to do so would be contrary to the provisions of section 81 of the Income War Tax Act.

Later in the same year, on June 7, 1943, the same minister tabled sessional paper 348, in answer to other questions which I had asked which had to do with the Winnipeg Electric company, and the document reads as follows:

The information asked for cannot be furnished as it clearly falls within the provisions of section 81 of the Income War Tax Act reading as follows.

And then the section is quoted. I merely rose to correct the hon. member's remark about my making references without supporting them with the actual documents. I am sure he will now agree with me that I had the information at hand.

Mr. MAYBANK: Mr. Speaker, I say at once that I do agree, in the light of what has been read, that when the hon. member referred to a minister of the crown making a certain answer the minister of the crown was indeed directing attention to this particular section. I take issue with the hon. gentleman's manner again. I am quite sure that up until the time he interrupted me I was not in my argument, as he described it, just "wandering around". On the contrary, I believe I had been rather direct, definite, precise and, so far as interruptions permitted, concise. So far as the directness of my remarks was concerned, and I fancy, so far as ease of understanding on the part of an auditor was concerned, I believe I can call the hon. gentleman himself in witness because he himself understood me. I believe, therefore, that his reference to my having wandered around in an argument was inappropriate, and I am sure that upon thinking that over he will agree with me there too.

It is clear apparently that on a certain occasion, in answer to a certain question, a minister quoted section 81. As I have said, I cannot unscrew the inscrutable, and I do not know why a minister said that, why he put it in that way. But I am absolutely certain about the correctness of the proposition, which is basic to my argument, namely, that a minister of the crown is not an employee, and to say that an employee cannot give information is to say nothing so far as a minister of the crown is concerned.

Mr. KNOWLES: He thought it prevented him.

Mr. MAYBANK: I did not understand what the last interruption was.

Mr. KNOWLES: I say he thought it prevented him.

Mr. MacNICOL: He still does not understand it.

Mr. MAYBANK: Some hon. gentleman has called out that I apparently have some desire not to understand an attempted interruption. I do not think any interruption has been passed over either in fright or for any other reason by me so far this evening, and as long as interruptions are for a purpose and are good-natured—well, I do not care whether they are good-natured or not, as far as that goes, so long as they are for a purpose—I certainly will take note of them if I understand them.

As regards the general purpose underlying the proposed amendment, that is to say, its aiming at disclosure of income tax information —and that really is the idea here—I think the house will agree on consideration it does not accomplish anything along that line. But in spite of the fact that I do not believe arguments dealing with the spirit of this are germane to it, because of its wording, dealing with the spirit of it I must say that it is my understanding and has been for some years that there is one country in the world where considerable disclosure of this kind is permitted, and that is the very democratic country of Switzerland. I am not sure that I have been correctly informed, but I give the information to my hon. friend for what it is worth. I have been told that there has been worked out there a method whereby there is considerable disclosure, and it might be worth while to check up on that to find out whether it is correct.

Mr. HOMUTH: They always quote New Zealand. Do they do it in New Zealand?

Mr. MAYBANK: That is a very helpful suggestion from the hon. member for Waterloo South, but somehow or other I feel that this is not done in New Zealand. I am quite sure that the oratory from over on the other side of the house would have been by now replete with references to New Zealand if what is proposed in the amendement were done there.

I think the hon. gentleman who has moved this amendment would be willing to admit that there are some few things about some few countries about which he and his colleagues may not be fully and accurately informed, but matters with relation to New Zealand are not among them. I feel sure, therefore, that we can take it for granted that this is not done in New Zealand.

Mr. STEWART: In view of the fact that the hon. member might stumble across a conclusion, may I remind him that he has fourteen minutes to speak yet.

Mr. MAYBANK: You see, Mr. Speaker, the general tenor of that interruption. Obviously the hon. gentleman was not good-natured in that interruption, but I am not complaining about that, because, as I said, I do not really care whether interruptions are good-natured or not, although naturally it is better if a person is house-broken and acts with good nature.

Perhaps a correct and precise answer could be given to the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart), who so gratuitously interrupted what I was saying, and that is that it would be more appropriate if he put his question on the order paper.

Mr. KNOWLES: The answer might be prohibited by section 81.

Mr. MAYBANK: While I am aware of the claim made by socialist members of the house to a monopoly of nearly all the virtues—and I am not going to argue with them about that—

Mr. HOMUTH: The people of Canada settled that.

Mr. MAYBANK: —because after all, if they think they have all the virtues, I am not one who would really without need go and try to destroy happiness, even if that happiness arises from ignorance, I would say to the hon. gentleman that I believe the virtue of candour—I think it is a virtue, by the way—might be studied a little more by him and perhaps by some of his colleagues, and an attempt might be made to become more candid and frank in the presentation of matters of this sort. The hon. member began his dissertation by saying that he supposed that he was introducing something which is efficacious. It is not so. He introduced it and spoke as if it were efficacious toward some end. He said it would not require a minister of the crown to make disclosures. Mr. Speaker, the real object of this is to have disclosures made. Surely we do not need to sit opposite each other and try to fool each other by pulling curtains in front of our faces like Turkish women outside the harem. What the hon. member wants—and I can understand his wanting it, and I must say that I think everybody has some sympathy with the idea—is to get these disclosures. That is the object of the amendment. Why he had to introduce a story about it not requiring a minister to make disclosures I cannot understand and certainly do not appreciate. It would seem to me that it is not necessary to endeavour to sugar-coat that kind of pill as though he were giving castor oil to a child.

I do not really think, sir, that there was quite the candour that this house has a right to expect from the hon. member. He first of all tried to drag the house along with him by saying that a minister would not have to give out information. I really think that when we come to deal with concrete matters we shall get along a whole lot faster and we shall get along having confidence in each other a great deal more if that sort of thing is done away with altogether. The fact of the matter is—

Mr. KNOWLES: I rise to a question of privilege—

Mr. MAYBANK: If I am in order I shall continue, but if the hon. member is in order I shall sit down. I ask for a ruling, sir.

Mr. KNOWLES: I rise to a question of privilege. The hon. member has questioned my candour.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. KNOWLES: Not only has he questioned it, but he has cast a reflection—

Mr. MAYBANK: May I reply? I understand the hon. member has risen to a question of privilege and has said that I questioned his candour. Well, I agree with him, I have. Now, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Speaker, we are enjoying the good will that is prevading here, but I feel I must object to the way in which this debate is being allowed to develop into something of a farce. I rise to a question of privilege on the following grounds. According to citation 299 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, a citation under standing order 41, there are a number of unparliamentary phrases. One prohibition reads as follows:

> No member will be permitted to say of another that he could expect no candour from him.

I am not raising any great fuss about it, Mr. Speaker. I recognize the mood the hon. member is in, but it does seem to me that he is sailing pretty close to the wind.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand that the hon. member rose to a question of privilege, alleging that the hon. member who has the floor attacked his integrity. I do not think that the character, integrity or honesty of the hon. member has been attacked by the hon. member who has the floor. If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr.

Knowles) has the impression that the hon. member who has the floor did that I am sure that the hon. member will modify it.

Mr. MAYBANK: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Your Honour and hon. members will recall precisely what I said. I should now like to soften it by saying that I intended no offence at all and was not attacking the integrity of the hon. member.

Mr. HOMUTH: Just his judgment.

Mr. KNOWLES: What about the bill?

An hon. MEMBER: Three minutes to go.

Mr. MAYBANK: I should like to thank the hon. member who raised the question of privilege for the remarks he made when he said he felt that the matter in question had developed into something of a farce. Of course it will not be unnoticed by you, sir, and hon. members of the house, that he was impelled to make that remark that this debate had deteriorated into something of a farce at a certain moment. It will not have been overlooked by you, sir, that the moment which he chose for coming to that conclusion was the moment when he himself rose to speak. I must say once again this evening that I am in hearty agreement with him, because I felt it was most farcical on his part to raise such a ridiculous question of privilege as he did.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like—

Mr. KNOWLES: What about the bill?

An hon. MEMBER: Three minutes to go.

Mr. MAYBANK: The hon. member says, "what about the bill?" After he has done his utmost to get the engine off the track he complains that it is off.

Mr. KNOWLES: There are only two minutes left to talk it out.

Mr. MAYBANK: He himself spoke once or twice and said what he had to say about the elections in Manitoba and that they were related to the bill. Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, he did not tell you that most of the C.C.F. candidates who were beaten there lost their deposits, but you will find that out. It will also be borne in mind that when he gave the figures—I do not know whether this was lack of candour or not—he left out of his remarks the fact that there were seven acclamations. He did not bother counting those; and, of course, the votes about which he spoke came largely from the large centres of population. Because of the manner in which our democratic processes work nearly all the candidates who were defeated lost their deposits. The house will find out a little more about this later on, but in the meantime I give it that tid-bit to sharpen the appetite.

There are several matters connected with this bill to which I should like to refer. I observe, sir, that it has now reached the hour of nine o'clock.

Mr. HOMUTH: You talked for an hour and did not know it.

Mr. MAYBANK: I was a little afraid, sir, that I might be stopped suddenly, and to avoid that I crave the privilege of adjourning the debate.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hour reserved for private and public bills having expired, the house will revert to the order of business under consideration at six o'clock.

UNITED NATIONS

APPROVAL OF AGREEMENT SIGNED AT SAN FRANCISCO, JUNE 26, 1945

The house resumed consideration of the motion of the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs:

That it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve the agreement establishing the united nations and constituting the charter of the united nations and the statute of the inernational court of justice signed at San Francisco on June 26, 1945, and that this house do approve the same.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I was speaking of the close cooperation between the several members of the Canadian delegation at San Francisco. There was cooperation also not only within our delegation, but with other delegations as well, in respect of the work done at San Francisco. There was, first of all, the closest consultation among members of the British commonwealth. There were frequent commonwealth meetings at which frank discussions took place, but I think the San Francisco conference has proved for once and all the absurdity of the notion that all the countries of the British commonwealth will always speak and vote as a single block.

I do not want to enter into details at this stage, but if hon. members wish they may find some report of the divergence of views taken upon matters discussed at San Francisco, if they will refer to pages 18, 27 and 41 of the conference document No. 2, the report of the activities of the Canadian delegation at the conference.

It was, on the whole, by a process of free vote and discussion in the conference committees that the charter was fashioned. The individual efforts of any one delegation to secure advantage in the discussion could not have succeeded without the help of other delegations which shared their views. Canada met with generous support and assistance from many other like-minded states in putting forth certain amendments which seemed to our delegation to make for a better charter. Sometimes our amendments secured the support of other countries, and on other occasions we were ready to withdraw our original amendment in favour of those put forward by other states. Without such willingness on the part of all the nations to go some way toward reconciliation of diverging points of view, the charter would not have been written at all.

The actual management, the organization and administration of the conference constituted a formidable undertaking, and I should like here to pay tribute to the efficiency with which the state department of the United States dealt with the problems involved. Nor can I refrain from mentioning in passing the hospitality of the city of San Francisco, and the friendly welcome which its people accorded to all the members of the conference.

The charter of the united nations is, I think, a great improvement on the Dumbarton Oaks proposals which formed the basis for our discussions at San Francisco. Not only does it include many new provisions and changes in the original text of those proposals, but I think it is on the whole more liberal in spirit and language. Many of the alterations and additions effected there are of great importance, but the issues involved are so complex and cover so many fields that it would be quite impossible in this speech to do justice to the whole of the achievements of the conference. I shall touch only upon some of the salient points. In other respects hon. members may refer themselves to the report of the Canadian delegation to the conference, which has already been tabled in the house and which gives a reasonably full account of the proceedings.

Hon. members will have noticed that as an appendix to the report the charter of the united nations is printed on the left-hand page and that the appropriate extracts from the Dumbarton Oaks proposals appear on the right-hand page. Under this arrangement, in respect of any article one can see the text definitely adopted and also the form of the original proposal. It was felt it would be helpful to have these two texts placed side by side for purposes of closer scrutiny.

I have already directed the attention of the house to the preamble of the charter, which is largely the work of Field Marshal Smuts. I should also like to mention the widening in scope of the purposes and principles of the united nations organization. In the last five years we have witnessed the most brutal assaults on all the standards of civilized life—the dignity of the individual, respect for the pledged word and the rule of law among nations.

The preamble to the united nations charter reaffirms our faith in these values, without which no international organization can ever succeed in maintaining security; for the foundation of peace must be laid in the hearts and in the wills of individual men. If war is to be abolished we must begin by respecting the rights of individual human beings. Hence the Canadian delegation welcomed and supported the decision to place in the charter, among the purposes for which the organization had been brought into existence, the pledge to achieve international cooperation in promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and for the fundamental freedom of all, without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion.

The principles were set out in chapter II of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals. They now form article 2 of chapter I of the charter. It will be seen at once in what respects they have been liberalized. Thus in subsection 3 of the proposals it was provided that:

> All members of the organization shall settle their disputes by peaceful means in such a manner that international peace and security are not endangered.

> All members shall settle their international disputes by peaceful means in such a manner

This has been modified to read:

> that international peace and security, and justice, are not endangered.

It was felt that it would not be sufficient to enforce a peace, but that a proper peace to be enforced must be a peace which would be conformable with the principles of elemental justice.

Then subsection 4 of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals stated:

> All members of the organization shall refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force in any manner inconsistent with the purposes of the organization.

This has been broadened to read:

> All members shall refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state, or in any other manner inconsistent with the purposes of the united nations.

This is an obligation, assumed by all members of the organization, to refrain from the use of force inconsistent with the purposes of the united nations. I believe the only exception to this undertaking to abstain from the use or threat of force is contained in article 51 of the charter which states:

> Nothing in the present charter shall impair the inherent right of individual or collective self-defence if an armed attack occurs against a member of the united nations, until the security council has taken the measures necessary to maintain international peace and security.

The right of individual and collective self-defence is reserved until such time as the security council has taken effective means to maintain international peace and security. But otherwise the members of the organization are solemnly pledged to abstain from the use or from the threat of force, otherwise than under and for the purposes of the international organization. If that solemn obligation is sincerely observed by the fifty nations which constitute this group of nations, may we not hope that if no war is possible among them, they will at all times be strong enough to prevent disastrous wars from being waged by others.

It was further provided in subsection 7 that there should be absolute respect of the sovereignty of each state in its domestic affairs. The provisions of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals provided that the provisions of paragraphs 1 to 6 of section A should not apply to situations or disputes arising out of matters which by international law are solely within the domestic jurisdiction of the state concerned. It was felt that this was not sufficiently specific and it was replaced by the following:

> Nothing contained in the present charter shall authorize the united nations to intervene in matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any state or shall require the members to submit such matters to settlement under the present charter; but this principle shall not prejudice the application of enforcement measures under chapter 7.

The main body of the charter consists of those chapters which outline the international machinery which is to give effect to the purposes and principles of the united nations. This machinery has, I think, been strengthened and improved in many ways as a result of the work of the conference. For example, the scope of the powers of the general assembly have been considerably extended. The place of the assembly and the pattern of the organization are a matter of particular concern to the middle and smaller states. The Canadian delegation considered that the powers of the assembly should be as wide as possible and that its scope as a forum of public opinion should not be limited. On the other hand, it was important that full responsibility for the settling of disputes should be put squarely on the shoulders of the security council. This involved one important limitation on the powers of the general assembly. The assembly should not, on its own initiative, be able to make recommendations on a matter relating to the maintenance of international peace and security while it is being dealt with actively and effectively by the security council. As a result of the liberalization of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals, the general assembly now possess the broadest powers of discussion and the right to initiate studies and make recommendations for the purpose of promoting international cooperation.

The Canadian delegation felt that if the assembly were to play its full part as an instrument for focusing public opinion, its sessions must be public. Although the conference left it to the general assembly to fix its own rules of procedure on this point, the Canadian suggestion was adopted that the rules of procedure should provide that "save in exceptional cases, the sessions of the general assembly shall be open to the public and press of the world."

This is not expressly provided as one of the articles of the charter. Hon. members will find on pages 27 and 28 of the report a summary of what took place in that regard. I quote:

> The delegate of Peru moved on June 8 that the following provision be inserted in the chapter on the general assembly:
> The sessions of the general assembly shall be open to the public and to the press of the world. In exceptional cases the general assembly may determine whether it is prudent to modify this rule.
> The representatives of all five great powers spoke against this amendment. They expressed their full agreement with the principle contained in it, but objected to its inclusion in the charter on the ground that it was a procedural matter which should be dealt with in the regulations of the general assembly. Since the Peruvian motion appeared to have the support of a majority of the other delegations, there was danger that a vote on it would be misinterpreted outside the conference. The Canadian representative, therefore, made the following statement:
> It is essential that this committee make clear its belief in the principle that the sessions of the general assembly be open to the press and public of the world. It is likewise essential that this committee make its belief clear by a unanimous vote. From the speeches which have already been made, it is obvious that the Peruvian proposal to incorporate the principle in the charter will not receive unanimous approval. The public of the world will not understand this. Therefore, as a substitute for the Peruvian motion I propose the following motion:
> That the rapporteur of this committee be instructed to state in his report that this committee is of the opinion that regulations to be adopted at the first session of the general assembly shall provide that, save in exceptional cases, the sessions of the general assembly shall be open to the public and the press of the world.

The chairman decided to put the Peruvian motion first and, if it were rejected, then the Canadian motion. This enabled many delegates to vote against the Peruvian motion on the ground that it would be better to adopt the Canadian motion by unanimity than the Peruvian motion on a split vote. The Peruvian motion was defeated by a vote of 15 to 22 and the Canadian motion adopted by a vote of 34 to 0 with U.S.S.R. abstaining. The delegate of the U.S.S.R. stated that his delegation had abstained from voting on the Canadian motion since such a resolution would be without force or effect unless it were ratified by the governments of the participating countries and that it would not be submitted to them for ratification.

The discussion over the powers and organization of the security council raised what proved to be the central question of the conference—how to maintain the unity of the great powers and at the same time create an organization which should be acceptable to the middle and smaller nations. This was the issue underlying the series of debates which took place over the veto powers of the permanent members of the security council. I do not think it would serve any useful purpose here to review that controversy, but without going into detail I shall say a few words about the position which the Canadian delegation took in this matter.

It will be recalled that under the Yalta voting formula, each permanent member of the security council has the power of veto over all questions of substance coming before the councils, with the exception that with respect to the peaceful settlement of disputes the party or parties to the dispute must abstain from voting. This veto power accorded to the United States, the United Kingdom, the Soviet Union, China and France extends over all those activities of the organization which depend upon decisions taken in the security council. It thus affects the entire character of the organization, and I think it is proper to point out that it does constitute a serious exception to the principle of the equal sovereignty of states regardless of their size.

This veto power was attacked with great vigour and persistence by the representatives of many of the middle and smaller countries at San Francisco. While it was generally accepted that there must be unanimity of the great powers in applying peace enforcement action, there was opposition to many other aspects of the veto power, and particularly to its extension to covering the field of the peaceful settlement of disputes. It seemed to many delegations to be unwise that a permanent member, when not a party to a dispute, should be in position to veto the application of the peaceful settlement procedures of the charter in that dispute. It was over this particular aspect of the veto power that the debate really developed.

After a long drawn out discussion the sponsoring powers produced a joint statement in reply to a questionnaire which had been addressed to them as to the application of the Yalta voting formula. The joint statement, although it cleared up some obscurities, left many delegations unsatisfied as it envisaged the application of the rule of the unanimity of the great powers to the peaceful settlement provisions under the charter. The Canadian attitude throughout this controversy was based upon two principal considerations. It was felt in the first place that that veto power as applied to the processes of peaceful settlement was undesirable. We feared too that the incorporation of such a principle would seriously weaken the security council itself. The Canadian delegation recognized that this was in essence a political question as to what was possible of achievement in the way of compromise between the great powers themselves and between the great powers and the other united nations. It was apparent that the joint interpretation of the Yalta voting formula represented the greatest possible measure of agreement which could be obtained among the great powers themselves at this time on this subject.

The Canadian delegation, therefore, considered that while we could not accept the interpretation of the voting procedure as satisfactory, it was not too high a price to pay for a world organization which held so much promise in other respects. So that on the final vote in the conference the Canadian delegation did not oppose the adoption of the Yalta voting formula as defined in the answers made by the sponsoring powers to the questionnaire. We were influenced in this decision by the statement made by the representatives of the great powers that their special voting position would be used with a sense of responsibility and consideration for the interests of smaller states and, therefore, that the veto would be employed sparingly.

In connection with the organization of the security council, an amendment was introduced at the instance of the Canadian delegation, relating to the system of electing non-permanent members of the security council. Members of the house may recall from the Prime Minister's previous statements that the Canadian government felt that the provisions of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals were unsatisfactory in that they contained no qualification for eligibility of election to the council. The principle that power is to be combined with responsibility is recognized in the permanent membership of the great powers on the council. The application of that principle should, in our view, be carried a step further and among the six states elected to the council there should be several which can make a really substantial contribution to the purposes of the organization. The Canadian delegation, therefore, pressed for the adoption of some qualification for election to the council which should recognize this functional point of view. Our attitude was supported by a number of other delegations, but it was principally due to the cooperation of the United Kingdom delegation that an amendment was introduced by the sponsoring powers which now finds its place in article 23 of the charter.

The relevant paragraph of article 23, while it does not lay down detailed rules for the election of non-permanent members, directs that in the election of such members to the security council due regard should be "specially paid, in the first instance to the contribution of members of the united nations to the maintenance of international peace and security and to the other purposes of the organization, and also to equitable geographical distribution." It was explained by the representatives of the sponsoring powers who introduced this amendment that the phrase "in the first instance" applied to the first criterion for the election of non-permanent members; that is "to the conribution of members of the united nations to the maintenance of international peace and security and to the other purposes of the organization", whereas "equitable geographical distribution" was a secondary consideration.

It is the responsibility of the security council to maintain peace, but this does not mean that the council will function only when an emergency has arisen. Any difficult situation which threatens to develop into a disturbance of the peace may be discussed in the council and plans and recommendations may be made. It is, I think, satisfactory that the charter dealing with the peaceful settlement of disputes has been enlarged and improved, because it is before violence has broken out that the organization can do its most useful work in preventing aggression.

The peace enforcement provisions of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals have already been discussed in this house and they were not altered in many essential points at San Francisco. I should, however, mention one change which resulted from the initiative of the Canadian delegation. It was our view that there should be included in the charter some effective provision under which armed forces pledged in its military agreement by a state not a member of the security council be called out by the council only after that state had effectively taken part in the decision. Accordingly the Canadian delegation put forward an amendment, the substance of which has now been incorporated in article 44 of the charter, with article reads as follows:

> When the security council has decided to use force it shall, before calling upon a member not represented on it to provide armed forces in fulfilment of the obligations assumed under article 43—

That is the article referring to agreements to be entered into between states and the security council to provide stated quotas of armed forces:

> —invite that member, if the member so desires, to participate in the decisions of the security council concerning the employment of contingents of that member's armed forces.

Speaking to this amendment at the meeting of the committee on enforcement arrangements on May 10, the Prime Minister of Canada put forward his argument in the following terms:

> The purpose of this amendment is clear—to provide that there shall be effective consultation between the security council and a member not represented on the council before that member is called upon to dispatch outside its own territories forces which it has undertaken to make available under the military agreements contemplated in paragraph 5. It seems certain that consultation would, in fact, have to take place, and we feel that a requirement of consultation should be included in the charter itself.
> The powers which the proposals would vest in the security council to call upon all members to join in the imposition of sanctions—military, economic and diplomatic—raise especially difficult problems for secondary countries with wide international interests. It is likely that if sanctions have to be imposed against an aggressor, the active collaboration of some states not on the security council will be needed. Let me contrast the position in this respect of the great powers on the one hand and of the secondary countries with world-wide interests on the other. Each great power is assured not only of full participation in the consideration of the dispute from the beginning, but it can itself prevent any decision to impose sanctions, even if it be a minority of one in the security council. All the other members of the organization are asked to obligate themselves in the charter to carry out any decision of the security council, including decisions which might require them to send into action the forces which they are all expected to place at the council's disposal, as well as decisions which might gravely disrupt their economic life. The council could call upon any member to do these things, and there is no assurance that the member would be consulted rather than ordered to take action. I feel sure that whenever a particular member was desired to take serious enforcement action, consultation would be a practical necessity. Therefore, the amendment which the Canadian delegation has proposed would not delay action, since it would only incorporate in the charter itself a step towards action which would probably have to be taken in any event. Unless this need for consultation is recognized in some manner in the charter, the process of securing public support for the ratification of the charter will be made considerably more difficult in a number of countries other than the great powers.

I think I could not do better in explanation of the way in which this provision is expected to work in practice than to quote from the report which Mr. Stettinius, Secretary of State of the United States and chairman of the United States delegation to the conference, made to the President of the United States. Mr. Stettinius has referred to the Canadian amendment in the following terms:

One significant and constructive change resulted from the debate, in the adoption of a wholly new article, 44, which contains the substance of an amendment submitted to the conference by the delegation of Canada and strongly supported by other "middle powers." It gives realization on the level of international security arrangements to the cherished axiom of American history, "no taxation without representation." Once the security council has determined on the employment of armed forces, it must give to each state asked to contribute contingents a voice in the decisions concerning the employment of its own forces. For the purpose of such decisions, in other words, the voting membership of the security council may be increased by one—but not more than one—for each decision.

Here is the way article 44 will work: If four states not represented on the security council are to be asked to furnish armed forces to cope with an emergency, they may if they desire send representatives to sit temporarily with the council; but each of these four ad hoc representatives would participate only in the decision which concerns the use of the armed forces of his own country. No similar right is given to states when the contribution involved is only the use of facilities and assistance they have agreed to provide, and the amendment to give such a right was rejected. The conference felt that there is a substantial difference between sending men to fight and, for example, making an airfield available.

It is particularly important to notice that the membership of the security council remains unchanged for all decisions leading up to and including the decisions to impose military sanctions. Thus the operation of the security machinery will not be dangerously slowed by the new provision. Moreover the provision will not affect the use of the contingents of the great powers, which will doubtless constitute the bulk of the forces used to carry out the council's decisions. Even the process of consulting the states that are not members of the council should not appreciably delay the effective functioning of their contingents.

The peace enforcement powers of the security council are concerned with the negative aspects of keeping the peace. But I think all hon. members will agree that peace is not merely the absence of war. It it a positive condition in which nations can cooperate for the common good. This side of the work of the new organization is of particular importance to Canada. In the field of economic and social progress Canada has, I believe, an important contribution to make. The Canadian delegation therefore were particularly concerned with the provisions of the charter which deal with the economic and social council.

This body, which had been allotted a subsidiary place in the Dumbarton Oaks proposals, has now been made a principal organ of the united nations. Moreover its scope, which had originally been limited to economic and related social problems, has now been much widened. The objects of the economic and security council are defined in article 55 of the charter in the following words:

With a view to the creation of conditions of stability and well-being which are necessary for peaceful and friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples, the united nations shall promote:

(a) higher standards of living, full employment, and conditions of economic and social progress and development;

(b) solutions of international economic, social, health and related problems; and international cultural and educational cooperation; and

(c) universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Will the minister permit a question, or would he rather finish his speech before he entertains a question?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Perhaps, if it is convenient to the hon. member, I might be allowed to complete, and then if there is further information that I can supply I would be glad to answer.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Will the minister tell us at this time at what point—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It is a perfectly justifiable question. I wish to ask the minister at what point in our discussion it will be best that we do ask questions? On his speech, for example?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I shall be prepared as best I can to answer any question which you, Mr. Speaker, may allow me to answer, after I have completed my speech.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And suppose he does not allow it; when can we ask it, then?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I would not like to anticipate Mr. Speaker's decision in that regard. I feel quite sure that the hon. member will not ask any improper question, and I hope I shall be allowed to answer him.

The council, that is to say the economic and social council, therefore has definite duties and powers which are quite wide. It is designed both to execute the decisions of the general assembly and to act on its own initiative. It is free to make recommendations to governments while the assembly is not in session. It differs from the security council in that all its eighteen members are elected by the general assembly and that all the questions with which it deals can be discussed by the assembly. That is, I submit, a substantial difference. The security council is not responsible to the general assembly; it has functions of its own to perform on its own responsibility, and is not in respect of those functions controlled by the assembly, while this economic and social council is elected by the assembly and all its decisions are subject to discussion and review by the general assembly.

This strengthened economic and social council can, I think, be regarded as one of the high achievements of the conference, and it should have an important continuing contribution to make to the great work which lies before the united nations organization.

It will be observed that the resolution now before the house asks for approval both of the united nations charter and of the statute of the international court of justice.

I should like now to say a word about the statute of the international court of justice.

A committee of jurists of the united nations met in Washington from April 9 to April 20, 1945, to draft a statute of the international court of justice to be submitted to the San Francisco conference. Canada was represented by Mr. J. E. Read, K.C., legal adviser to the Department of External Affairs. The Canadian delegation included the Hon. Philippe Brais, K.C., president of the Canadian Bar Association, the Hon. Wendell B. Farris, Chief Justice of British Columbia and chairman of the Canadian Bar Association committee on international questions, and Mr. Warwick F. Chipman, then Canadian ambassador to Chile, and now Canadian ambassador to Argentina. The report of the Washington jurists formed the basis of discussion in San Francisco by a technical committee of the conference. The technical committee prepared a draft text of the chapter of the charter dealing with the court, together with a revised court statute.

The new court is, in many respects, very similar to its predecessor, the permanent court of international justice. But amendments and improvements have been introduced into the new statute by the international jurists responsible for this aspect of the work of the conference. It will be recalled that when Canada on the 20th September, 1929, adhered to the optional clause of the permanent court it expressly reserved from the jurisdiction of the court disputes for which some other method of peaceful settlement was provided. It reserved expressly disputes with any members of the British commonwealth and disputes the subject of which fall within the domestic jurisdiction of Canada.

On December 7, 1939, Canada also excepted from the jurisdiction of the court disputes arising out of events occurring during the war. Thus while Canada will automatically have, by ratification of the charter, to submit its disputes to the international court, its acceptance of the court's jurisdiction will remain subject to the reservations made in 1929 and 1939.

One of the most important conditions for the success of the united nations organization is that it should be served by a genuinely international civil service whose members are responsible, not to their governments or to the governments of which they are nationals, but to the organization itself. This was the viewpoint maintained by the Canadian delegation throughout the discussion in the conference committees at San Francisco which dealt with questions relating to the secretariat of the organization and the office of the secretary-general. I might say that this is the view which prevailed.

I have attempted to touch upon some of the most important developments arising out of the San Francisco conference. The charter which emerged from the conference should be capable of growth and adaptation to changing conditions. Its constitution should not be too rigid. It follows, in the view of the Canadian representatives, that the process of securing constitutional amendments should not be too difficult. We do not look upon it as perfect in its present form. Moreover, no charter drawn up in 1945 can be complete or final. The states and peoples of the world are, in setting up the united nations organization, experimenting in many new fields of international cooperation. For some years they will be continuing to experiment in the unusual conditions of the transition period from the great war to peace. It is therefore particularly important that the charter should be capable of change by formal constitutional amendment when the world has returned to a more normal state. Unfortunately, the efforts of many of the states represented at San Francisco did not succeed in securing what I would consider a satisfactory, flexible amendment procedure under the charter. Under that charter each of the five great powers possesses the right to veto the coming into force of any amendment. It is to be hoped they will not employ this veto power in such a way as to give the charter a rigid character.

During the interval between the signing of the charter at San Francisco and the convening of the first sessions of the principal organs of the united nations, a preparatory commission has been set up charged with making certain essential interim arrangements. The two main tasks of the commission were, first, to study and make recommendations on certain questions which could not well be handled at San Francisco, and, second, to expedite the work of the new organization by thorough preparation for its initial meetings.

In order to make it possible to set up the commission immediately, the instrument creating it was put in the form of an intergovernmental agreement with provision that it came into effect on the date on which it was signed, the 26th of June last, the same date as the signing of the charter. The commission consists of one representative of each signatory government. It is provided that the executive committee which is now sitting in London shall exercise the functions and powers of the commission when it is not in session. This committee is formed of the same states as those which made up the executive committee of the conference, namely, Australia, Brazil, Canada, Chile, China, Czechoslovakia, France, Iran, Mexico, the Netherlands, the Soviet Union, the United Kingdom, the United States and Yugoslavia.

Canada is at present represented on the committee by Mr. D. F. A. Turgeon, Canada's ambassador to Belgium. The committee's work is now well advanced, and it is hoped to hold a meeting of the preparatory commission in the near future. I understand a tentative date for the first meeting has been fixed on the 8th November, and it is hoped that a sufficient number of ratifications will have been deposited with the state department of the United States before that date.

Mr. Stettinius stated recently that already thirty of the nations had adopted approval proceedings, but formal instruments of ratification, according to the latest information available to us, had been filed only by eleven states, and it was hoped that if the two houses of the Canadian parliament are agreeable to the approval of the charter, the Canadian instrument of ratification can be signed by His Majesty and filed with the state department in Washington by the end of this month.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

In looking back on the achievement of the San Francisco conference, I think it may be said that foundations were laid for a system of international cooperation in the interests of order, security and progress. We hope on these foundations to build world peace and security, but the work of the conference cannot be isolated from the urgent and difficult problems of the post-war period. Only if these problems are wisely solved will the united nations organization have an opportunity to develop its potentialities. In particular, the conditions under which the new organization will function will depend on the nature of the peace settlement in Europe and Asia. I use the term "peace settlement" in its widest sense to include not only the treatment to be accorded the defeated enemy but the relations between the victorious allies.

If there is to be an effective united nations organization the great powers must remain united under the strains and stresses of the post-war period. At the same time it is essential to any lasting system of security that the middle and smaller powers should be accorded a voice in the peace settlement proportionate to the contributions which they have made in winning the war and which they are willing and able to make to the problems of peace.

To build a solid and enduring structure of international security will be no easy task, but the risks of failure are beyond calculation. The coming of the atomic bomb has opened our eyes to the appalling possibilities which may face the world if the united nations should fail to achieve international cooperation. The charter of the united nations is a first step in the direction of that cooperation between the nations which appears to be essential to the survival of civilization.

In concluding my remarks in support of this motion for approval of the charter, I beg leave to quote from a short speech made by the Canadian Prime Minister at the opening of the San Francisco conference. This is what he said in part:

> The people of Canada are firm in their resolve to do whatever lies in their power to ensure that the world will not be engulfed for a third time by a tidal wave of savagery and despotism. That is why our parliament overwhelmingly endorsed the acceptance of the invitation to Canada to participate in this conference. That is why our parliament accepted the proposals of the inviting powers as a satisfactory general basis for the discussion of the proposed charter. That is why the delegation from Canada received from parliament a mandate to use its best endeavours at this conference to further an agreement to establish a world security organization.

Then further down:

It is for each nation to remember that over all nations is humanity. It is for all to remember that justice is the common concern of mankind. The years of war have surely taught the supreme lesson that men and nations should not be made to serve selfish national ends, whether these ends be isolated self-defence or world domination. Nations everywhere must unite to save and to serve humanity.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate this evening I think, like most of those who were present at the great world conference at San Francisco, I shall find some difficulty in bringing into the confines of this chamber the atmosphere and the setting of San Francisco where the charter was finally moulded in the crucible of deliberation among many nations of the world.

As a preliminary to what I have to say perhaps I might properly quote a couple of paragraphs which I wrote home from San Francisco at the beginning of the conference. This is what I said:

Every time one turns around in this almost spotless, roomless, meatless city of warm-hearted hospitable San Franciscans, with their sixty-year-old, cable-pulled, Toonerville-type streetcars, a prospective story is born. Over a billion of the globe's population has someone here speaking for them. In hotel lobbies, eating-places—wherever people gather—the garb and tongue of nations, some of which to ordinary laymen like myself were almost but a memory of old public school history days go to make up this strange but glorious and compelling international panorama.

In the first few weeks of our stay no flags flew in the streets of San Francisco save the half-masted stars and stripes, waving over this city of the Golden Gate in eloquently silent memory of a common people's president, who passed away before two of his fondest dreams had been realized—victory in Europe and permanent peace in the world.

The conference opening without Roosevelt seemed like a party without the host, but his name echoed through the auditorium and corridors of the conference more frequently than any other.

I have been asked from time to time about the Canadian delegation, and with that I desire to commence my remarks. The Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) very properly pointed out to-night some of the features of the delegation's work. It was a multiple party delegation, a delegation drawn from the three parties in the House of Commons. Its structure largely followed the procedure which was adopted in the United States and in the United Kingdom.

People have asked me, and no doubt have asked other members of the delegation, "How did you get along when all three political parties were represented there together?" Well, I answered them as I answer this house to-night. My answer was the product of my own feeling. Others who were there may speak for themselves. I felt that the mission upon which we had embarked and the job which we set out to accomplish at San Francisco was one which was definitely related to the end of a war which had been hardly fought by many hundreds of thousands of Canadians. Those troops who made possible the peace we now enjoy marched shoulder to shoulder in order to win this war. While they were fighting they were not thinking very much of party differences or party divisions.

Being trustees for these men and women who had fought our battles—because, after all, that is what we were very largely, civilian trustees for them at San Francisco—we felt that we would be less than good trustees if we did not try to march shoulder to shoulder as best we could and present a united and powerful voice on behalf of Canada to the world. That is what we tried to do; that is what I hope we have succeeded in doing. I never thought that there was any room or any place for partisan politics in time of war. I did not feel that there was any room for partisan politics in maintaining the peace. It would be a poor lookout for international amity if we in Canada were not able and willing to provide a united and powerful Canadian voice in a world assembly such as this.

May I make a suggestion to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, a suggestion which is founded upon a remark which he made a few moments ago when he asked for the voice of Canada in the peace settlements of the world. In that I think everyone in this house concurs. I think he might go further than that. I think we may properly suggest that the plans which worked out so well at the San Francisco conference would also work out well at the peace conference. I suggest that consideration be given to taking to the peace conference representatives from every party in the House of Commons in order that we may have a proper and a fully united front in the deliberations that have to do with the peace of the world.

At this time I should like to bring to the attention of the house something which went very far toward making a success of the conference. I wish to pay a tribute at this time to the outstanding service rendered by the permanent officials and the entire staff of the Department of External Affairs as well as all who had a part in the work. It was a pleasure to work with them, as it was a pleasure to work with everyone of the Canadian delegates there. Canada's approach to the work of the security conference was one of helpful co-operation. There was no desire or determination on the part of our delegates to indulge in loud talk or unreasonable insistence upon our own particular point of view. We pressed amendments from time to time, but, may I say, Mr. Speaker, not to the point of hurting the chances of the charter being finally adopted. The charter was far too important and vital to allow considerations of that kind to interfere with its final adoption. In other words, we felt that it was better for Canada and the world if we approached the conference rather in the spirit of a meeting of minds than as a brittle collision of opinions. Canada did not attempt to be spectacular at San Francisco. I had for my objective, and I am sure I am speaking for those who were at the conference, first of all the doing of a good job for Canada and the world; and, second, trying to show the world that Canada was ready to participate to the fullest extent in connection with her contribution to world peace; that she was ready to assume and fulfil her full obligations to the world; that in so doing she was prepared to shirk not a single national or international duty, and that this nation was ready to pitch isolationism overboard, once and for all.

Of course Canada's geographical and national position meant that we had a key part to play, so far as conference deliberations were concerned. Our very close ties with the British commonwealth, our close relations with the United States of America and our friendship with every country great and small brought Canada to a key position, so far as exercising a great influence on the general activities of the conference went. At San Francisco I found that Canada was the enemy of none and the friend of all.

I believe I may speak with some considerable weight, and as a result of experience when I say that of all those nations which took part in the plenary sessions and the sittings of the committees day and night, there was none more popular at San Francisco than was the good old Dominion of Canada.

A minute ago I referred to the British commonwealth, and I should like to say a word in connection with the part the commonwealth played in the deliberations of the world conference, and what I say in this respect will, I am sure, be borne out by all who were there. I was never in my life more proud of the fact that Canada is part and parcel of the great British commonwealth than I was when I attended the San Francisco conference. There the many units of the commonwealth displayed a spirit of healthy and living collaboration which, I felt, should be known to the house. The British commonwealth met every single test to which it was subjected at that conference. It showed that it was an exemplary, going international concern pledged to world peace, and one which had been tried and proven in the fiery crucible of experience, and had emerged therefrom after having achieved a great victory.

I think most of us who sit in this chamber this evening will remember the occasion in 1943 when the then foreign secretary for Great Britain, the Right Hon. Anthony Eden, stood at the head of the clerk's table, and delivered his address. We well recall hearing him say on that occasion that the British commonwealth was a pattern which the world might wisely follow in its quest for peace. I have come from the San Francisco conference with the conviction, one which has been confirmed since my return, that there never was a need greater than that found at this time for uniting and bringing the units of the British commonwealth closer together.

The wisdom of holding the conference when it was held must be apparent to all. It was held at a time when the world was still under the umbrella of armed hostility. I am wondering whether, if that umbrella had been lifted before its deliberations, the accomplishments and achievements of San Francisco would have been as great, as important and as vital.

In this connection I would draw the attention of hon. members to the report of a prominent Ottawa journalist, Mr. I. Norman Smith who, among others, was with us at the conference, and whose brief but cogent remarks respecting the opening of the conference might appropriately be placed before hon. members this evening. In his brief, but most informative book called "San Francisco, the First Step to Peace," Mr. Smith said this:

> At the end of 10,000 words in which realism and idealism fought themselves to a draw, the charter's authors had lost something of their enthusiasm. The text ends very prosaically: "Done at the city of San Francisco the 26th day of June, 1945." But the united nations charter is the better for having been born the hard way.
> The San Francisco conference had its struggles. At the beginning it was not a certain starter. Half way through it was not a certain finisher. Indeed, on looking back on these two months of discussion, those of us who were there sometimes wonder how the conference survived at all. Its father, President Roosevelt, died mere days before it got under way. Russia arrested Polish statesmen sponsored by Britain. Trouble broke out betwen France and Syria and Lebanon. Sides were drawn up on Argentina. Peace rumours occupied the minds of its great men for ten days. Germany's surrender finally came through in a naturally disconcerting fashion, and the British government called a general election.

That indicates the point of view taken by one who was very close to the conference during its deliberations. But there is another matter which might be mentioned at this time, and which is of vital concern and importance in respect of the results achieved by the conference. While it was in progress the physical devastation possible through the use of atomic energy had not been made known to the world, nor had we knowledge of the psychological changes which the unloosening of that energy would bring about. The possibilities of that great power had not reached in and gripped the hearts and minds and souls of humanity, as it has since that time.

While some may argue that the advent of atomic energy has outmoded and outdated the San Francisco charter, I do not share their view. I believe the atomic bomb has made the successful operation of the San Francisco charter even more vitally important and essential than it ever was before. It may well be, however, that in any operations which will take place under the charter in connection with taking action for the enforcement of world security, scientific laboratories may enter into the picture in a fashion which was not contemplated at San Francisco. I do believe that the power plans for enforcement envisaged by the charter may have to be revised drastically, but I am equally convinced that the charter itself is even more essential and more vital to-day than it was in those pre-atomic days. In the light of the atomic bomb, San Francisco must and will of course adapt itself.

I do not hesitate to bring to the house some of the more human elements and factors of the conference because it is difficult to convey the real meaning of San Francisco in words. One found at the committee meetings of the conference the same type of people, the same kind of approaches, the same factors and features, in a greater and larger way of course, as would be found at a municipal council meeting, in a provincial legislature or in the dominion House of Commons. After all, it was a great meeting of people and, when you have a great meeting of people, you have well known characteristics coming up and asserting themselves throughout the gathering.

One part of the conference I liked was the opportunity to meet the men and women who represented the various nations. It was a great and compelling experience to rub shoulders with people from other nations and to talk with them, to know their problems and to try to understand them. But there were difficulties. There was the difficulty, of course, of language which seems to some people to prove an almost insurmountable obstacle. But as one got used to the procedure at San Francisco, as one received the various translations that followed the speeches, one became accustomed to the procedure. In spite of all the barriers of race, creed, religion and language, when one looks at this charter and sees it printed in the Chinese, in the Russian, in the Spanish, in the French and in the English languages he realizes how difficult it is for the ordinary layman to translate one into the other, let alone reach international understanding. I think one must come to the conclusion that a masterly job was done in bringing the nations of the world as closely together as this charter has been successful so far in doing.

I should like to make a further reference to the human element that entered into the conference itself. The dry bones of the words of this charter do not begin to convey what happened at San Francisco and the evolution and changes and amendments, yes and the melting pot through which these various national aspirations, national aims and national claims had to go in order to be refined into the document which is now presented to this house for approval.

A few moments ago the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs mentioned the price which it was necessary to pay in order that there should be a charter. This country along with other countries had to make certain alterations in their positions in order that the price which had to be paid for this document would be paid for by this country as it was paid for by others. I am one who believes that the price was not too great to pay if this charter only works in the days that lie ahead.

A few moments ago I spoke about the Department of External Affairs, and at this time I want to inject another note into the discussion. After having been to San Francisco, I am more convinced than ever—I hope no one will take this as a personal reflection—that there should be a separate Minister of External Affairs for the Dominion of Canada. After having watched and observed with rather close scrutiny the other international movements of like character as well which have been taking place, I feel that the appointment or creation of a separate ministry is a "must" for this dominion.

I want to say to my hon. friends opposite something which I have said to them before in this House of Commons. I think the question of international affairs is one of the most important that this nation and this parliament must deal with. The department is growing in size and in importance. If ever a department needed a separate minister, it is the Department of External Affairs. I would point out that not only is there no separate Minister of External Affairs, but there is no parliamentary assistant for this great department which has developed so fast in recent years. It is not enough for this country to have a Department of External Affairs which is a lean-to to the Prime Minister's house so far as parliamentary institutions are concerned. I hold the personal opinion very strongly that we in Canada are entering an era of diplomatic and international affairs of a serious nature, one which is fraught, I think, with possibilities of a kind which I need not enlarge upon to-night. I want to emphasize to this house the importance of having the government so organized that this department shall be something more than it is to-day. This nation deserves that, and in the days that lie ahead I believe the government will find that that is so.

There is one other criticism I wish to make of the government, a matter which I raised a few weeks ago in this house. I do not think the government of Canada pressed sufficiently hard to have the international peace centre of the world come to the Dominion of Canada. In my opinion there were most compelling reasons why this nation might properly have looked forward to being the great international peace centre of the future. In my view the circumstances warranted the exerting of pressure which was at least equal to that exerted by other nations. I have no desire to reflect upon the choice that has been made, but I do want to reflect upon the wisdom and judgment of the government which was remiss and in default with respect to our Canadian people n that regard.

I do not desire to-night to enter into a detailed discussion of the charter itself. There will be others in our party perhaps who will, as the debate proceeds, deal with the various sections of the charter. I was interested in the minister's report of the various aspects of the charter. He spoke about the question of withdrawal. As he properly pointed out, there is nothing in the charter which actually says that a nation may withdraw from its obligations or rights so far as the charter is concerned. However, when this matter came up in the senate of the United States the legal opinion was given, as most hon. members know, that according to the report of the conference itself, while it was not specifically mentioned in the charter, nevertheless the right of withdrawal was left to any nation which desired to exercise it.

The minister has made reference to the general assembly and the security council. There are, naturally, weaknesses in any charter of this kind, but in the setting up of the assembly and the security council, which are quite different in their outlook and jurisdiction from anything connected with the old League of Nations, the attempt was made by Dumbarton Oaks and by San Francisco to retrieve some of the mistakes that had been made in setting up the previous world organization by adopting an organization more suited to the circumstances which now face the world. So that we have in the general assembly and the security council two bodies with a peculiar relationship toward each other. Both of them stem from the charter rather than one from the other.

Let those who may think that the security council is something in the nature of an executive body of the general assembly disabuse their minds of that idea at once. The general assembly has powers to discuss and recommend and to initiate studies. It has no powers actually to enforce permanent peace and security throughout the world. The security council itself is the one organ of the united nations which may be referred to as having the steel knuckles required to take care of those recalcitrant people in the world of to-morrow who may attempt to start aggression.

As the minister pointed out a few moments ago, the security council, with its veto provisions, aroused great controversy at the conference. There was the question of the smaller nations which desired, of course, to increase the power and authority of the general assembly. After all the lengthy discussion of the veto provisions, that power was watered down in only one very minor respect. The veto that was agreed to at Yalta carried through at the San Francisco conference with but one minor change, and that was that there shall be no veto when the matter being decided in the security council is whether or not a certain question should be discussed. In every other respect the veto power remains, so that any one of the five great powers may by refusing to vote unanimously with the others block any enforcement procedure which the security council might otherwise adopt.

There was another Canadian amendment which I do not think the minister mentioned. It arose out of a set of circumstances which I think the house will recognize at once are important. This nation is not one of the five great powers. It could not be one of the five great powers because of our population and general strength. But, this nation more closely approaches a big power than most of the other nations of the world outside the big five powers. It was the feeling of the Canadian delegation, having that in mind, that when the question of election to the security council or of election to other bodies which may from time to time required appointments from this country came up, there should be some kind of recommendation with respect to our ability and capacity to contribute to the success of such an organization; and the Canadian delegation, while the amendment it proposed did not go through as originally drafted and was watered down and perhaps made a little more temperate, did make a recommendation to the general assembly that when elections to the security council are being held, the question of a nation's ability and capacity to contribute should be taken into consideration.

One phase of the conference's work in which I was especially interested was the setting up of the economic and social council. In the redrafting of the provisions of this new organ, which does not perhaps owe to Canada its entire birth as an organ in the united nations set-up, nevertheless the Canadian people can take some credit for at least sponsoring it in its present form, because the present charter provisions setting up the economic and social council of the united nations contain, I believe, more words written in by the Canadian delegation than by any other nation in the world. That was because the Canadian delegation brought to the conference what was almost a charter in itself with respect to this council. I think we as a nation may take some credit for the fact that in this new sphere of activity, this new sphere of human relations where human values are considered perhaps more highly than almost any other, Canada took a leading part in bringing this new part of the charter on social and economic cooperation into effect.

There are many in this chamber who, I am sure, believe with me that we should not entirely confine our thoughts on peace to curative measures after difficult situations have arisen which need remedying. I think most members of the house will agree with me that the preventive side of war as well as the curative side of war must be considered in the years that lie ahead because, as has been said from time to time, and sometimes perhaps in a critical sense, in our efforts to secure world peace the social and economic aspects of world affairs must be given a more prominent and more vital position than they have ever occupied in days gone by. The economic and social council at least does provide some ray of hope that the nations of the world will yet beat their swords into ploughshares and banish man's inhumanity to man the world over; for, Mr. Speaker, this great new world of ours to-morrow must be a world of trade and prosperity and jobs, and not a world of stagnation and depression and doles. A peace based upon social and economic justice has a chance to live, but in my opinion a peace based on any other foundation faces death at its very birth. So that, having taken a position at this world conference as a Canadian nation on the side of this progressive movement which I have just outlined and which is envisaged in this great charter, we may look with no small degree of pride upon the fact, which I think will be confirmed by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), that the nations of the world have begun to look to Canada for leadership in this great and growing important field of human endeavour.

The question of the military agreements, mentioned by the minister, should not be overlooked. It is all very well for this country to approve the charter; the question is, what shall we do as a nation to implement our fair share of the obligations which it entails? That is a matter which must not be lightly considered by this house. When the military agreements involved in the charter are presented to the house, in accordance with the terms of the charter, for ratification by constitutional process in this land, as in others, the real test of the Canadian people, whether they are ready to practise what they preach, will confront the nation and parliament. One of the Canadian amendments which the minister did not mention had to do with this matter of military agreements. As the Dumbarton Oaks document was originally drawn and submitted as a basis of discussion to the San Francisco conference it was very loosely worded with respect to these agreements. It called in a vague fashion for military agreements to be made between the various members of the organization. No one knew who would initiate the agreements; no one knew who would start the procedure, and the result was that at one stage it looked as though the Dumbarton Oaks proposal if accepted would lead to a stalemate or something worse. The Canadian amendment which was finally accepted by the conference, was, I think, a good one. As a result, agreements will now be made, not loosely with such nations as a country may see fit to make an agreement, but in the future it is the security council with which each nation in connection with peace enforcement will have to deal. We set up machinery for peace once before, and we got war. This peace must this time in every sense of the term be a people's peace, because unless it is founded upon the will of the peoples of the world the temple of peace will soon crumble and decay.

One danger which I saw while meeting with delegates at San Francisco was this: It is all very well to go to an international conference, to listen to the speeches made in plenary session, and assume that the whole world is about to enter a new era of sunshine; but it is most important for those who represent a nation to make sure that, while we are lifted into international clouds of theory, we shall come down and get our feet on the ground and not forget who it is that sends us to these conferences. We have to be realists. Idealism is good, but there must be a blending of the two. As most of us took our seats at the committee tables or in the plenary sessions of that great conference, I believe the thought came to our minds that, after all, it is the people at home, not ourselves, who are to determine whether this peace will work or whether it will fail.

There is not much room now for Canada or any other nation to indulge itself in the role of an international Pollyanna. We have a real problem to face, and we shall have to face it with all the realism in the world. In this connection it may be appropriate to point out that, were another world war to break out, Canada could scarcely count on emerging from it with her own territory untouched by enemy action. Let this house and this nation realize the full significance of these words. Our experience of comparative security in that respect in the recent war is not likely to be repeated in another. We paid a heavy price in men, money and material for failure to prepare for this war. The same is true of other nations. We must not fail to profit by our experience and realize that peace will not be the lot of the Canadians of to-morrow through talk and pious hopes alone. Canada wants an opportunity of preventing wars instead of just an opportunity of fighting them after they have broken out. A peace worth having is a peace worth fighting for. Although the cost be great, this nation must join with other like-minded peace loving nations to crush aggressors who would plunge the world into another armed holocaust.

May I in my concluding remarks answer the question, what promise does San Francisco give? After all, it was not just an idle conference. It was one from which the people of the world expected and were entitled to results. In dealing with this point I wish to speak to the house as bluntly and frankly as I know how. At the time I left San Francisco, had I made this speech it might have been a little different from the one I am making in this house at the moment because, as time goes on, the seriousness of Canada's position and its vital significance in world affairs become impressed upon one more strongly than ever. In so far as San Francisco and the charter are concerned, we cannot forget that it will not be the small nations which will start or finish a world-wide conflagration. It takes big powers to begin and end wars on a global basis. Having that in mind, I would say, let us look on San Francisco, not as a cure-all, but as a great and important advance and a great adventure in international understanding. Having that in mind, I would say in laymen's language that San Francisco is nothing more and nothing less than this. It is the table under which the nations of the world may put their feet and talk things over instead of putting rifles on their shoulders and going to war to fight it out. That is San Francisco, nothing more and nothing less May I go one step farther in my argument. When people ask, will there be peace or will there be war? I say that if the big powers of the world stick together we shall have peace, but if the big powers do not stick together we may have war.

San Francisco in my opinion is the way to peace. There is an old saying that where there is a will there is a way. San Francisco is the way to peace; but unless the nations of the world have the will to peace the way will avail but little in the solution of our international affairs of to-morrow and the bringing of a permanent, just and lasting peace to all of us. Nevertheless the San Francisco document is an advanced attempt to create the best machinery possible for ensuring permanent peace. It is now up to the nations to use that machinery. Civilization cannot afford to resort to almost certain, yes, shall I make it more emphatic than that and say certain annihilation, which now seems attendant upon another world-wide resort to force. This time, the world, in my humble judgment, will think twice before taking any step which will lead to mass obliteration of mankind. That is what the next world war would most certainly mean. It is, Mr. Speaker, a case of do or die, so far as the nations of the world are concerned, and San Francisco goes far in providing the way to peace for a world with the will to have it.

May I close with just this observation. There is perhaps more sentiment attached to the problem of world peace and the San Francisco conference than almost anything which will be brought up in this House of Commons. At least I think we as a parliament have the right to hope and fervently to pray, in the years that lie ahead, that through the instrumentality of San Francisco, through the instrumentality of the will of the nations of the world for peace, we may look forward—I do not say we can look forward with complete confidence, but at least we have the right to look confidently forward—to the days when there will be an answer to the prayers of those millions of people who knelt at their bedsides the world over while the San Francisco conference was in progress and prayed that we would see an end to the marks and scars which war leaves upon humanity, in every country of the world. Those people, our people, prayed that there would come a time when a permanent, just and lasting peace with all its sunshine would again spread its rays over the face of the earth, the time which was so prophetically immortalized in the words of Lord Tennyson so many years ago and with which words I close:

Till the war-drum throbb'd no longer, and the battle-flags were furl'd
In the Parliament of man, the Federation of the world.
There the common sense of most shall hold a fretful realm in awe,
And the kindly earth shall slumber, lapt in universal law.

We shall support the resolution.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, we have heard from two of the delegates who attended the San Francisco conference. The Minister of Justice, Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent), has given a comprehensive outline of what was achieved at that conference and has made, I think, a splendid presentation of the charter itself. My hon. friend the member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) has brought some of the atmosphere of the conference into this chamber, the colourful atmosphere, if I may put it in that way, of San Francisco. If there was one thing which perhaps we learned it was that the delegates assembled there, regardless of their race, their creed or their colour, all made a contribution. All, regardless of colour, race or language, seemed to have been endowed by Almighty God, if I may say so, with equal ability to discuss and to understand the affairs of the world in which we live.

If you will permit me, Mr. Speaker, I should prefer not to begin at this hour the contribution which I hope I may be able to make to this debate when it is resumed on Thursday afternoon, and I would therefore ask you to agree to an adjournment of the debate now and to call it eleven o'clock.

On motion of Mr. Coldwell the debate was adjourned.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE—DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Last night, Mr. Speaker, I intimated that, with the consent of the house, we should like to move two departments into supply, seeing that we have not yet a single department in. There will be no debate upon the items which I shall call. I move that the house go into committee of supply.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I would call item No. 1, agriculture, and ask that it stand.

Item stands.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I would call item No. 72, Department of Fisheries, and ask that it stand.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, October 17, 1945.

The house met at three o'clock.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REFERENCE OF ANNUAL REPORTS AND CERTAIN ESTIMATES TO RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING COMMITTEE

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I desire to lay on the table the budget of the Canadian National Railways and Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited for the calendar year 1945 and to move:

That the budget of the Canadian National Railways and Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited for the calendar year 1945 be referred to the sessional committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government, together with the annual report of Trans-Canada Air Lines for the year 1944, which was laid on the table of the house on April 11, 1945, and the following annual reports for the year 1944, which were laid on the table of the house on April 12, 1945:

Canadian National railway system;

Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited;

Canadian National Railways Securities Trust;

Auditors' report to parliament;

together with the following items of estimates for 1945-46:

Vote 377. Maritime Freight Rates Act, Canadian National Railways;

Vote 378. Maritime Freight Rates Act, railways other than Canadian National;

Vote 421. Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals deficit, 1945.

And that the resolution passed by the house on the 7th September, 1945, referring certain estimates to the committee of supply, be rescinded in so far as the said resolution relates to votes Nos. 377, 378 and 421.

Mr. STIRLING: Mr. Speaker, may I ask whether this motion does not require notice?

Mr. CHEVRIER: This is the usual motion that follows the establishment of the committee on government-owned shipping. It is usually brought down a day or two after the committee has been set up.

Mr. STIRLING: But does it not require notice?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It can be done only by consent.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE—MR. CHURCH

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING COMMITTEE—REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT OF DEBATE OF OCTOBER 16

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I wish to direct the attention of Your Honour and the house to a libelous Canadian Press dispatch dated October 16, in this morning's Globe and Mail. It quotes only one line from about nine paragraphs that I said, and I did not even say that. I was objecting to the method of reviewing railway policies. It says that the setting up of the committee on government-owned railways was opposed by me. That is not correct. When the motion was made for the setting up of the committee I knew that the motion was debatable but I was ruled out of order when I started to speak to the motion. The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) has always been a fine supporter of the railway employees and their war work, and I am sure that my hon. friend for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), who also referred to this, wishes to be fair. They will note that on September 11, speaking in the house, I was the first to pay tribute this session to the transportation employees of Canada as reported at page 88 of Hansard, in these words:

I wish to say a word by way of tribute to the transportation employees of Canada, whether they serve on land, at sea or in the air. I was talking the other day to a conductor on a train who told me he had been working eighteen hours a day continuously. These employees have made a magnificent record in this war and should receive ample compensation and reward and all other allowances for a fine work well performed.

I have always, in this house, been a supporter of public ownership of the railways run from the commercial point of view, and not from the point of view of politics. I would call the attention of the hon member for Rosetown-Biggar to the fact that I have never, as this article says, had day by day criticism of the Canadian National Railway system. I think he will be fair enough to admit that I have a record for consistently working in this house on behalf of the railway employees and for the system being run from the commercial aspect and free of politics. I just want to keep the record straight. Further, I said the motion was made subject to the right of the committee of supply as to the voting of public moneys.

I contend, Mr. Speaker, that we need protection from some of the press, because according to our rules a libel on a member is a libel on the whole house of which he is a member. I have the strongest grounds for protesting against this garbled report of what I said in the house.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I say just a word? I had no intention of reflecting upon what the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) said, but I was most anxious to place before the house the point of view that we should refrain from allowing politics to enter into the operation of these government-owned organizations.

TAXATION

INQUIRY FOR REPORTS OF ROYAL COMMISSIONS

On the order for motions:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before leaving motions I would ask the indulgence of the house to direct a question to the acting Minister of Finance. It is a question that I might ask on the orders of the day, but we may not reach them to-day as this is private members' day. I think the question is important enough for me to raise it now. It has to do with the tabling of two reports that were referred to by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) in his budget speech, as reported at page 1007 of Hansard, and also referred to by him in answer to a question by the hon. member for Queens (Mr. McLure). The reports are those of the royal commission on the taxation of cooperatives and the royal commission on the taxation of annuities and family corporations. On September 27 the Minister of Finance, in reply to a question by the hon. member for Queens, indicated that the report of the royal commission on the taxation of cooperatives had been received by the government on September 25 and would be printed and distributed as soon as possible. In his budget speech the Minister of Finance also referred to both these reports. Someone near me says that one of the reports has already been tabled. If it has, I have not seen it. In view of the importance of these reports and the desirability of their being in the hands of members before the budget debate begins, will the acting minister table copies of the reports either at once, or say to-morrow?

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I received a few moments ago a note from the hon. member of the opposition dealing with the report of the royal commission on the taxation of cooperatives. I immediately communicated with the officers of the department and was informed that it had not yet been received from the printer, and that the printer would be immediately communicated with to expedite the printing. All I can say is that just as soon as it is possible to get it from the printer I will see that the report is tabled.

Mr. BRACKEN: Would it not be possible for some of us on this side to see that report before we proceed with the budget debate? It may not be possible to make it available to every member of the house before the budget debate, but I think that before important speeches are made on the budget we should have the opportunity of seeing that report.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think that the request made by the hon. leader of the opposition is quite fair. I will communicate with the officers of the department and see if there are not copies that could be made available to the hon. member and to such other members as may wish to see it, unless of course, I am assured that the report will be available in print almost at once.

Mr. BRACKEN: Perhaps copies could be furnished to the leaders of the groups on this side at least.

Mr. COLDWELL: Thank you.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

*PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION—PEACE RIVER BLOCK

Mr. IRVINE:

1. Has the government received a request from the people of the Peace River block, that the benefits of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act be applicable to that territory?

2. If so, what action has been taken or proposed?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. Yes.

2. As hon. members will know, the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act applies only to what is known as the Palliser triangle in the three western provinces. Two sessions ago, I think it was, a report was made by a committee of this house to the effect that the principle of the act be applied to all parts of Canada. That matter has been under consideration and the whole question has been submitted to the dominion-provincial conference and will still be under consideration when the conference resumes.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

INCOME TAX—INDIVIDUALS

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough):

For a statement showing the number of individual income taxpayers, the amount of net income on which assessments were approved and taxes assessed during each of the fiscal years, 1939 to 1945, inclusive, classified according to income class groups; and the percentage amount which the number of taxpayers in each group, and the amount of taxes assessed against individuals in each group bears to the total number and the total taxes assessed, respectively.

Mr. McCANN: There is no objection to the passing of the motion, but I should like to ask the hon. member in whose name the motion stands if he will accept, as sufficient to meet his needs, the personal income taxes reference book of the dominion-provincial conference. I believe that it contains all the information asked for in his motion.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): That will be satisfactory.

Motion agreed to.

REDISTRIBUTION

READJUSTMENT OF REPRESENTATION OF THE PROVINCES IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. FREDERIC DORION (Charlevoix-Saguenay) moved:

Whereas, on July 5, 1943, a resolution was adopted by this house that an Address be presented to His Majesty the King for the purpose of securing an amendment to the British North America Act as follows:

Notwithstanding anything in the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1940, it shall not be necessary that the representation of the provinces in the House of Commons be readjusted, in consequence of the completion of the decennial census taken in the year one thousand nine hundred and forty-one, until the first session of the parliament of Canada commencing after the cessation of hostilities between Canada and the German Reich, the Kingdom of Italy and the Empire of Japan.

This act may be cited as the British North America Act, 1943, and the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1940, the British North America Act, 1907, and this act may be cited together as the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1943.

And whereas the first session of the parliament of Canada following the cessation of hostilities between Canada and the German reich, the kingdom of Italy and the empire of Japan, is now under way;

Therefore be it resolved,—That, in the opinion of this house, the government should conform to the aforesaid resolution and take into immediate consideration the advisability of proceeding during the present session with representation ot the provinces in the House of Commons, pursuant to the provisions of the British North America Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in July, 1943, when the house decided to amend our constitution for the postponing of the redistribution, I was one of the few members who opposed that amendment. I believed at the time, and I still believe to-day, that the reasons given in support of that amendment were futile, and that the measure created an injustice to an important part of the Canadian population. That is the reason why, at the beginning of this new parliament, I thought it was my duty to present this resolution.

Before coming to the merits of the resolution itself I should like to emphasize certain ideas which are at the basis of this motion.

We are just out of the most terrible war that humanity has ever experienced. The united nations have fought it to keep in this world the civilization which we have enjoyed in the last centuries, and also to safeguard the democratic system and the responsible government. Everybody knows that democracy is essentially based on government by the representatives of the people. There are to-day in the whole world two great systems of democracy: the British commonwealth of nations and the United States of America.

We in Canada must admit that we enjoy the most perfect system of democracy that has ever been known in the history of the world; and I do not hesitate to declare that every single individual living in this country expects to enjoy, in the full, this freedom for the attainment of which we have suffered in the past.

One of the essential elements of this democratic system is the right of every individual to be represented in the parliament of the nation, and to have, through his representative, the right to make legislation in the interest of the whole community. Therefore, each individual in the country must be placed on the same footing, because he has the same right as any other in regard to representation in the House of Commons. There cannot be two or three different classes in Canada with certain classes having superior rights over others.

In our country this problem presents some peculiarities on account of our system of representation which was adopted in the British North America Act. In fact, since the very beginning of the struggle of our forefathers for the establishment of a responsible government in this country, it has been contended that the representation of the country in parliament should be based on territorial divisions known as provinces.

Even under the union government of 1840 the representation in the parliament established for the two Canadas together was based on the two previous provinces, that is, Upper Canada and Lower Canada. At that time, in spite of the protest from Lower Canada, the same number of representatives was allotted to the two provinces; notwithstanding the fact that the population of Upper Canada was much less than the one in Lower Canada.

The period of 1847 to 1867 is remarkable for the struggles of Papineau, Lafontaine, William Lyon Mackenzie, Baldwin and Howe, in favour of the establishment of responsible government.

I wish to cite here a page of that most remarkable book of the joint law clerk of the house, Doctor Maurice Ollivier, entitled "Problems of Canadian Sovereignty", page 7 of the introduction:

From 1840 until now, Canada and the other possessions have struggled without cease in favour of autonomy. The inauguration of the period of responsible government in 1848 at the time of the reorganization of the Baldwin-Lafontaine ministry, the putting of tariff barriers on British merchandise in 1859 by Sir John A. Macdonald, the struggles and successes of Cartier, Macdonald and Blake, at the moment of confederation and during the years which followed, all the questions relating to the right of the dominion to govern itself without the intervention of the mother country are highlights, at the end of the second period, of our progress towards independence.

From 1867 to the present day, there must be noted also the series of events either relating to the powers of the governor general or to our right to negotiate our own treaties, or to adopt, without external intervention, the legislation required in this country. The progress accomplished is reflected and recognized in the course of the diverse colonial conferences from 1907 to 1930.

A few years before confederation, namely, around 1862, the people of Upper Canada, desiring more and more the full enjoyment of responsible government, started to make representations to the effect that the mode of representation in parliament, which had been established by the Union Act of 1840, should be changed on account of the continuous increase of population in that part of the country; they had come to the point where the population of Upper Canada outnumbered that of Lower Canada. Then they conceived the idea of another constitution, and in 1864 a convention was held in Charlottetown for the purpose of studying the project of a new constitution.

This convention was soon followed by another one in Quebec, where seventy-two resolutions were adopted to be used as a basis for the future constitution. It is noticeable that at each of these conventions every decision reached was on the basis of territorial divisions known as provinces.

Out of the seventy-two Quebec resolutions, one may notice that six of them had reference to the representation in the House of Commons, and it never was in anyone's mind that this representation should be established on another basis than the provincial. Therefore we must admit that at the very beginning of the discussions relevant to the representation in the House of Commons, nothing but a provincial representation was considered. This gives the people of this country the right to see to it that, in this parliament, each province is represented in proportion to its population as enacted in the British North America Act.

Two years later, in 1866, the representatives of the Canadian provinces gathered in London, where new resolutions were drafted based on the Quebec resolutions. There again one may notice that special consideration was given by all the representatives to the representation in the House of Commons by provinces, and again we do not observe that there was any discussion on this matter. Everyone knows that these London resolutions were used as the basis of the British North America Act.

It is worth while here to draw attention to the preambles of the Quebec and the London resolutions which read as follows. Quebec resolutions:

Report of resolutions adopted at a conference of delegates from the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, and the colonies of Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island, held at the city of Quebec, October 10, 1864, as the basis of a proposed confederation of those provinces and colonies.

London resolutions:

Resolutions adopted at a conference of delegates from the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, held at the Westminster Palace hotel, London, December 4, 1866.

This goes to prove that the statemen who drafted these resolutions were essentially representatives of the several provinces of Canada and not the representatives of Canada as a whole.

After having finally agreed on the terms of the new constitution, the British North America Act of 1867 was adopted by the British House of Commons on the 29th of March, 1867. Here again it is very important to look at the preamble of this act, which reads as follows:

Whereas the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick have expressed their desire to be federally united into one dominion under the crown of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, with a constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom:

And whereas such a union could conduce to the welfare of the provinces and promote the interests of the British empire:

And whereas on the establishment of the union by authority of parliament it is expedient, not only that the constitution of legislative authority in the dominion be provided for, but also that the nature of the executive government therein be declared:

And whereas it is expedient that provision be made for the eventual admission into the union of other parts of British North America:

Be it therefore enacted and declared by the Queen's most excellent majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

I do not need to emphasize the care that has been taken to establish as the basis of this constitution the agreement between the Canadian provinces.

Now, we come to section 51 of this act, which deals with the representation in this House of Commons. I deem it proper to cite here this section 51, familiar to everyone, but so important, in the course of a discussion like this, as to justify its being cited again:

On the completion of the census in the year one thousand eight hundred and seventy-one, and of each subsequent decennial census, the representation of the four provinces shall be readjusted by such authority, in such manner, and from such time, as the parliament of Canada from time to time provides, subject and according to the following rules:

1. Quebec shall have the fixed number of sixty-five members:

2. There shall be assigned to each of the other provinces such a number of members as will bear the same proportion to the number of its population (ascertained at such census) as the number sixty-five bears to the number of the population of Quebec (so ascertained):

3. In the computation of the number of members for a province a fractional part not exceeding one half the whole number requisite for entitling the province to a member shall be disregarded; but a fractional part exceeding one half of that number shall be equivalent to the whole number:

4. On any such readjustment the number of members for a province shall not be reduced unless the proportion which the number of population of the province bore to the number of the aggregate population of Canada at the then last preceding readjustment of the number of members for the province is ascertained at the then latest census to be diminished by one twentieth part or upwards:

5. Such readjustment shall not take effect until the termination of the then existing parliament.

Now if we come to examine the actual representation in the House of Commons in the light of this section, we come to the following conclusion: We have now 245 members divided as follows: Prince Edward Island, 4; British Columbia, 16; Saskatchewan, 21; Nova Scotia, 12; Manitoba, 17; Ontario, 82; New Brunswick, 10; Alberta, 17; Yukon, 1; Quebec, 65.

If we had an exact proportional representation, as no doubt it was intended to establish at the time of confederation, we should have at the present time the following number of representatives for each province: Prince Edward Island, 2; British Columbia, 16; Saskatchewan, 17; Nova Scotia, 11; Manitoba, 14; Ontario, 74; New Brunswick, 9; Alberta, 16; Yukon, 1; Quebec, 65. That is to say, a total of 225.

But, pursuant to the fourth paragraph of section 51, and also to the amendment of the constitution of 1915, the number of representatives must be as follows: Prince Edward Island, 4; British Columbia, 16; Saskatchewan, 17; Nova Scotia, 12; Manitoba, 14, Ontario, 82; New Brunswick, 10; Alberta, 17; Yukon, 1; Quebec, 65. That is to say, a total of 238.

The first conclusions that one must draw from the figures I just gave is that the citizens of this country are not on the same footing as regards the representation in the House of Commons. This constitutes an injustice and is contrary to the basis of responsible government and democratic system. One may ask himself if the fathers of confederation acted wisely when they inserted in the constitution this fourth paragraph of section 51.

I am bound to come to the conclusion that, in this matter as in many others, it is always the province of Quebec that must suffer from such conditions. However, I personally believe and, according to the general opinion of the people of the province of Quebec, I can state that we are ready to abide by this disposition of the law. On this point, like on any other, we do not demand more than that the law be respected, but we insist upon this. That is why I took it upon myself as a duty at the beginning of this first session of a new parliament to place on the order paper the resolution that is now before the house. I do not intend to go all over what was said during the debate of July 1943, when the amendment to the constitution was adopted by this house, as I am of the opinion that the whole question was fully disposed of at the time. I must, however, for the sake of full comprehension of my argument, refer to the resolution itself, which reads as follows:

To the King's Most Excellent Majesty:

Most Gracious Sovereign

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Canada in parliament assembled, humbly approach Your Majesty, praying that you may graciously be pleased to cause a measure to be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom to be expressed as follows:

An act to provide for the readjustment of the representation of the provinces in the House of Commons of Canada consequent on the decennial census taken in the year one thousand nine hundred and forty-one.

Whereas the Senate and the House of Commons of Canada in parliament assembled have submitted an address to His Majesty praying that His Majesty may graciously be pleased to cause a bill to be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom for the enactment of the provisions hereinafter set forth,

Be it therefore enacted by the King's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the lords spiritual and temporal and commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same as follows:

1. Notwithstanding anything in the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1940, it shall not be necessary that the representation of the provinces in the House of Commons be readjusted, in consequence of the completion of the decennial census taken in the year one thousand nine hundred and forty-one, until the first session of the parliament of Canada commencing after the cessation of hostilities between Canada and the German reich, the kingdom of Italy and the empire of Japan.

I think it timely to set aside right now an argument that could come to some hon. members' minds to the effect that, as the government has not yet decided to declare officially the end of the war, this should be a reason why the redistribution could not be submitted to the house during the present session. On this point let me remind you that this is not a measure that was passed under the War Measures Act. It is altogether different and apart from all the decisions taken by the government under the War Measures Act. The decision referred to was taken by parliament itself. It is not a matter of considering what the government has in mind, or deciding about the official end of the war; rather it is a matter for parliament to state if the conditions mentioned in the amendment of 1943 are fulfilled. Thus, the only question is: is the present session the first one after the cessation of hostilities? The reply cannot be other than affirmative. On this point I do not wish to refer to any other authority than that of the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) who, speaking on October 2, said, as reported at page 680 of Hansard:

Actual hostilities have ceased, but the state of war still exists at the present time.

And a little further down, referring to the powers delegated to the governor in council, he said:

They will be diminished; they have been diminishing by the cessation of hostilities.

Also in a speech delivered in this house by the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Gibson), on October 4, as reported at page 763 of Hansard, he said:

Following the cessation of hostilities in Europe. . . ."

And on Friday last, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) said as reported at page 997 of Hansard:

A budget which is the first to follow the cessation of hostilities, both in Europe and in the Pacific.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I contend that it is the duty of this parliament, particularly the duty of the government, to proceed, during the present session, to the redistribution of the representation in this House of Commons. If we want the people to believe in parliament, we must adhere to the decisions of parliament.

Mr. PAUL EDMOND GAGNON (Chicoutimi) (Translation): I am pleased to support the resolution moved by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion) and I am glad to have an opportunity to champion the rights which the British North America Act confers on the provinces, in connection with their representation in the House of Commons.

May I first tender my hearty congratulations to the hon. members who, in 1943, protested so energetically and eloquently against the spoliatory measure then introduced by the government, and to express the wish that the seeds they have sown may produce an abundant harvest at the end of this debate.

Reading again the motion moved by the hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) on July 5, 1943, I find that one of the main reasons put forward by the authorities for postponing the proper readjustment and delimitation of electoral divisions was the fear that the differences of opinion to which that measure might give rise would harm our war effort. So, Mr. Speaker, under the pretext of national unity and good understanding, a serious injustice was done to the province of Quebec, and parliament—as was then said by the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Bertrand)—"took the means at its disposal with a view to checking the influence which Quebec was entitled to have on the political destinies of this country". In order to avoid stirring up the resentment of orangemen and imperialists ever ready to cry shame and to assume a "holier than thou" attitude when it comes to granting to the French Canadians that to which they are entitled in the legislative, economic and cultural spheres, the government sacrificed on the altar of race and creed prejudice the sacred principles of the Canadian constitution.

The time has now come to rectify the mistakes made in 1943 and I hope that other fallacies will not be put forward for delaying the redistribution of electoral divisions in accordance with the procedure clearly stated in section 51 of the Confederation Act.

In asking and demanding that the government observe the provisions set forth in the British North America Act, we are requesting not a privilege, or a favour, but simply and solely full respect for the prerogatives which were guaranteed to us by the Fathers of Confederation. It is important that the hon. members who represent the maritime provinces, the western provinces and Ontario should not forget that the injustice done to the province of Quebec affects them directly inasmuch as it established as a precedent through which the government will later be enabled to mete out to them a partial and arbitrary treatment.

We do not intend to bother anyone with this problem which must be solved without delay. Every day since the opening of the session, the house has heard hon. ministers complain of the hard times we are going through and admit their helplessness in transforming the dictatorship they inflicted on the country in war time into a real working democracy. I have every sympathy for the government and am willing to cooperate with them so as to ease their burden, but these feelings of mine cannot make me forget that those who brought about the present social and economic chaos are the very ones who now complain of the logical results of the instructions, enactments, orders and abuses approved or issued by them as the case may be during the past six years.

Mr. LESAGE: To what great economic chaos is the hon. member referring?

Mr. GAGNON (Translation): Because of weakness or childish fear, no one would assume, in 1943, the responsibility of guaranteeing to each province the fair share of representation to which it is entitled. We waited in the hope that time would settle everything and that the people, burdened by war and unable to cope with the impending crisis, might, in 1945, allow the central authority to solve the problem as it saw fit. Unfortunately, the evil, to which the wrong remedy was applied, still remains very acute.

The temporary measure voted by the government in 1943 has now reached its date of expiry since it is clearly mentioned in the bill submitted to the privy council that the amendment to the constitution ceases to be effective at the first session held by parliament after the end of the war between Canada on the one side, and Germany, Italy and Japan on the other. I understand that according to the figures obtained through the 1941 census, Manitoba and Saskatchewan will now have a smaller number of representatives in the House of Commons; the former will elect only 14 members instead of 17, the latter 17 instead of 21. I maintain, however, that as long as the provisions of the British North America Act are not modified, we must abide, in every respect, by the terms of the pact agreed to by the fathers of confederation. At this time, it may be fitting to recall that in 1881, the province of Nova Scotia had 21 members; in 1891, 20; in 1901, 18; in 1911, 16, in 1921, 14 and in 1931, 12. Therefore, if in Nova Scotia, we applied the principle of representation according to the 1867 basis, it is only fair, nowadays, to put the law into effect as regards Saskatchewan and Manitoba. When this latter province joined confederation, it was granted a representation of 4 members and, in 1881, if the legislators of the time had abided strictly by the figures, Manitoba would have been entitled to only three members while it was allowed 5. The same thing holds for British Columbia which secured, on joining confederation, the privilege of sending to Ottawa 6 members representing no more than 40,000 inhabitants. Nowhere is it mentioned in our historical records that these favours brought about any revolution, raised the race cry or destroyed the harmonious understanding of the Canadian people. At present, under subsection 4 of section 51 of the British North America Act, which provides that the number of representatives of a province shall not be reduced unless its population decreases by one-twentieth of the Canadian population, the province of Ontario will still elect the same number of members, 82, that is, one per 46,191 inhabitants, while the electoral quota of the province of Quebec is one member per 51,213 inhabitants. As I said a while ago, however, this advantage in favour of Ontario which, normally, would be entitled to only 74 representatives, will be detrimental to Quebec and the other provinces of the dominion as long as the constitution has not been amended.

In order to amend the constitution, the unanimous consent of the provinces is required. The former minister of justice, the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, pointed this out in the House of Commons in 1925 when he stated that confederation is the result of a pact between the provinces which reached a compromise and relinquished certain rights to the central authority, and the dominion cannot amend its constitution without securing the consent of the provinces which have created it and which complement the dominion government in the exercise of their powers. Sir Robert Borden stated during a debate several years ago: "that there is no reason to modify in any way the terms of our constitution and I am inclined to think that it is necessary to consult the provinces". This was also the view held by Mr. Arthur B. Keith, an authority on constitutional law, who wrote in his book entitled "Responsible Government and the Dominion", that it was expressly recognized in 1907 by the imperial government that confederation is a pact which cannot be amended, except with the consent of the provinces. Lord Carnarvon and Viscount Haldane, jurists of repute, have shared that view, as well as the fathers of confederation, Sir John Macdonald, George Brown and Mr. McGee who said: "What we have on the clerk's table is a contract."

And yet, in 1943, not only the advice of the provinces has not been sought, but those from Quebec who protested were told that the matter concerned the dominion authorities only and that the prime minister and the leader of the opposition of the Quebec legislature had nothing to do with this matter.

I trust therefore that if some day it is decided to amend further the pact of 1867 more concern will be given than in 1943 to the legal procedure to be followed.

In the meantime, however, political or sentimental considerations should not be allowed to delay further the adoption of this resolution, and I trust that this house will deem it its duty to support wholeheartedly this resolution based on justice and security.

Mr. LESAGE (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Gagnon). But, before I would say that I am not opposing the basic opinions he expressed in his speech, because I feel that the redistribution of electoral seats by provinces should be attended to as soon as possible. In the course of his statement, he spoke of the economic chaos attributable to the present government. I wish to know what exactly is this chaos; let him define it; by economic chaos does he mean the present condition when, in Canada, the purchasing power is higher and more fairly distributed than ever?

Mr. GAGNON (Translation): I do not intend to make another speech in answer to the question of the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Lesage) concerning the present economic condition of our country. We may have another opportunity of dealing with this matter in the budget debate.

Mr. RENE JUTRAS (Provencher) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wish first to congratulate the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Gagnon) who has just spoken.

I have been greatly pleased to hear his eloquent words, for they have been doubly gratifying to me, for having been uttered in French. I must admit that I concur, in a large measure, with the views expressed by himself and the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion); however, I must say that I do not agree with these hon. gentlemen as to the means to attain the results sought.

(Text) I wish to deal with this subject briefly, Mr. Speaker, and more or less from the western point of view. We have just heard the question discussed more or less from the point of view of the province of Quebec. We have a great deal in common—

Mr. LALONDE: The hon. member for Chicoutimi was speaking for himself, not for the province of Quebec.

Mr. JUTRAS: That general view is held in some quarters in eastern Canada. When this question came before the house, I believe in 1943, I was away and did not have an opportunity of discussing it, so that I should like to avail myself of this opportunity to place on record a few facts in connection with redistribution.

Personally I feel it is unfortunate that this resolution has been brought before the house at this time, because we are not in position to deal with it as it should be dealt with. There are many great problems that we have to face at the present time. The budget has not yet been discussed, and none of the main estimates have come before the house. There is a certain feeling of unrest throughout the country, and I think it would be best to leave this matter, which is bound to be contentious and will raise many sharp differences, until a later day. To my mind this presents a serious problem and it is something that should be discussed fully and not rushed through the house. It is not just a matter of arithmetic, dividing and subtracting—mostly subtracting, in the case of the west; it is a technical problem, a problem which almost assumes constitutional proportions.

I should like to deal briefly with the census of 1941, which would be the basis of redistribution. What value has that census? We must not forget that it was taken when the country had been at war for a little over two years. Many of our young men had enlisted in the armed forces, and while those who took the census tried to show the original domicile of those men, there is no doubt a large number of them were registered in provinces other than their own. There was also a considerable migration of population from one province to another, and I shall attempt to show that this migration was to the detriment of the western provinces.

Many of our people left the western provinces to take war jobs in the industrial plants of eastern Canada or on the west coast, and there is no question that many of them were registered as living in those provinces. I do not think we can criticize the western provinces for allowing their people to go to the other provinces. They left to work in war plants and thus make their contribution to the war effort of this country. While the census may be true for Canada as a whole, I hold the definite view that it is not true as far as the individual provinces are concerned, especially when it is considered in the light of the relevant circumstances.

What was the trend in the population of the western provinces from 1931 to 1941? As I pointed out before, the census of 1941 does not present a true picture of the population trend in western Canada. The west went through some dark days in the decade from 1931 to 1941. It suffered severe drought periods during that time, and no doubt some of the younger men lost heart and moved to other provinces. We also went through another difficult period known as the grasshopper period, although that was nothing new in Manitoba. I was reading the other day that the first crop failure suffered by the Selkirk settlers in Manitoba was on account of grasshoppers. Then, like all other provinces, we in the west went through a severe economic depression which no doubt had a certain effect upon our population.

To-day the picture is altogether different. As everyone knows, agriculture is on a stabilized basis. The prairie farm rehabilitation scheme has done much to prevent drought, and I do not think we shall see a repetition of that difficult period. Just in passing, I should like to say that the story of the prairie farm rehabilitation scheme has not as yet been fully told. When it is, I am sure all hon. members will be impressed by what has been done. It fills a glorious page in the history of western Canada; it is something that is truly to the credit of the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner).

The quality of farm production has greatly improved, and during the war years production was on a more varied basis than it had been before. Safeguards have been set up against destructive pests such as the one I have mentioned. Farmers are better organized, and on top of all this we have the herculean efforts of the government to provide more steady and larger markets for the products of western Canada. I mention all this in passing simply to show that the figures of the bureau of statistics do not convey a true picture of present conditions. No doubt many of those who left during the war will return to the west in a year or so, if they have not returned already.

Therefore the conditions that exist to-day are entirely different. But these economic and climatic conditions do not account for the glum picture of population trend in the prairie provinces presented by the 1941 census. It is noticeable that not one of the three western provinces during this decade retained its natural increase of population. Saskatchewan had an actual decrease of 25,793. Let us compare the natural increase with the actual increase or decrease in the three western provinces. While Manitoba had a natural increase of 70,000, she had an actual increase of only 29,000—I am giving only round figures—which would mean that Manitoba experienced a loss of 41,000 in that decade. Saskatchewan had a natural increase of 129,000, but an actual decrease of 26,000, making a total loss of 155,000. Alberta had a natural increase of 95,000, but an actual increase of 64,000, and consequently a total loss of 31,000.

These figures show that the actual increase in all of the three western provinces would be approximately only 60,000, and if we consider both together it means that western Canada lost in that decade pretty close to one-quarter of a million people. So that, as I mentioned before, the picture presented by these statistics is certainly not a bright one, and I still contend that it is not a true one. But even if the picture were adopted as the one upon which to base redistribution, if we accepted these statistics for the lack of better, what would be the results in the matter of redistribution?

I shall not quote again the section of the British North America Act because that has already been done by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion), but I would just refer the house to section 51, subsections 1, 2 and 3, which provide that Quebec is to have a fixed number of sixty-five representatives and there is to be assigned to each of the other provinces such a number of members as will bear the same proportion to the number of its population as the number sixty-five bears to the number of the population of Quebec. The other subsection is to take care of the fractional part that may be left.

Let us take the population of the different provinces: Prince Edward Island, 95,047; Nova Scotia, 577,962; New Brunswick, 457,401;

Ontario, 3,787,655; Manitoba, 729,744; Saskatchewan, 895,992; Alberta, 796,169; British Columbia, 817,861; Quebec, 3,328,815.

Dividing Quebec's population of 3,328,815 by 65, according to the section, we get a unit of representations of 51,213, and that would give to Prince Edward Island, two members; Nova Scotia, eleven; New Brunswick, nine; Ontario, seventy-four; Manitoba, fourteen; Saskatchewan, seventeen; Alberta, sixteen; British Columbia, sixteen, and Quebec, of course, sixty-five.

There is the other amendment which was also quoted by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay, the amendment made in 1915, providing that the number of members from a province shall not be less than the number of senators representing such province. If we apply that amendment to the figures I have already quoted, it changes the picture quite materially because then Prince Edward Island, instead of having two members, would have four; Nova Scotia, instead of eleven, would have twelve; New Brunswick, instead of nine, would have ten; Ontario, instead of seventy-four, would have eighty-two; Manitoba, with fourteen, would still have fourteen; Saskatchewan, with seventeen, would still have seventeen; Alberta, with sixteen, would have seventeen; British Columbia, with sixteen, would still have sixteen, and Quebec's number naturally would not change. That makes the picture altogether a different one, because if we repeat the operation we performed when we first started and were to divide the population by the number of representatives, we would get an entirely different quotient from the one we started with of 51,213. The quotients for the different provinces would vary, in round figures, anywhere from 24,000 to 53,000, and that 53,000 applies to the province of Saskatchewan, and 52,000 to the province of Manitoba. So that Manitoba, which gets a reduction of three members, and Saskatchewan, which gets a reduction of four members, still have the highest unit of representation of all the provinces.

According to that picture, if we were to take, for instance, the Prince Edward Island ratio of representation, Manitoba would be entitled to twenty-five members, Quebec would be entitled to 139 members and Ontario to 158 members. That is one extreme.

Suppose we take the ratio of the province of Ontario, that would give Manitoba sixteen members instead of fourteen, and would give Quebec seventy-two members instead of sixty-five.

I am in full agreement with the hon. member who has just spoken. The province of Quebec at the present time under the constitution is left with sixty-five members, with a population of 3,329,000, as against 3,778,000 in Ontario, and yet has seventeen fewer members than Ontario. That to my mind does not really give a fair representation.

It is quite apparent that the fathers of confedration when they put these sections in the British North America Act had the full intention of providing representation by population, and I contend that the constitution at the present time does not carry out that intention of the fathers of confederation. If we are to proceed with redistribution at the present time, fair play should be given to all the provinces, and if we embarked upon redistribution obviously we would have quite a problem to face. I still contend that this of all times is not the time to deal with redistribution at this session, because it certainly does not affect the present representation in this house. That cannot be changed until after the next election; and so far as the western provinces are concerned, we are having a census next year, which may throw a good deal of light on the subject. I would therefore strongly urge that the enactment of this legislation, if it be done at all, be delayed until such time as we can do full justice in this house to all the provinces in the light of all the circumstances.

One of the main arguments which were brought forward at the time that the amendment was presented to the British parliament for ratification was that a time of war was not the proper time to do such a thing. That was really a good argument and a serious one. It was felt also that the matter was too contentious to be dealt with in war time. I fully agree. I still ask myself the question, why enter into such a discussion at the present time? I for one fail to see why the western provinces should be penalized for having allowed their young men and their young women to go and work in the war plants of eastern Canada and the west coast. Some allowance should be made for these circumstances. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the question is one that is full of implications and likely to give rise to sharp and acrimonious differences, and I most sincerely suggest that neither is this an opportune time to consider the motion, nor have we time at present to do it full justice. For these reasons I submit that we should delay the matter until some later occasion.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I had not intended to speak at this moment. I had been informed that several others wished to take part in the debate. But

I should not like the motion to be put without having had an opportunity of making some observations to the house.

I fully appreciate the interest of hon. members in this important matter of proper representation of the people of all the provinces in this Canadian parliament, but I do not think it would be proper for the house to adopt this motion in the terms in which it is couched. The operative part of the motion is in the following terms:

> Therefore be it resolved,—That in the opinion of this house, the government should conform to the aforesaid resolution and take into immediate consideration the advisability of proceeding during the present session with representation of the provinces in the House of Commons, pursuant to the provisions of the British North America Act.

Although I am at the present time a member of the government, I am also, and first of all, as a qualification to be enabled to participate in the government, a member of the House of Commons, and it is my view that it is not the government that controls redistribution, but that it is the Canadian parliament, and that to pass this resolution in the terms in which it is drawn would be indicative of an abdication of the rights and privileges of this house. There is nothing in the British North America Act which gives the government of Canada any control over the representation of the Canadian people in this parliament. The government is charged with the execution or the carrying out of the laws passed by parliament. But the matter of determining the proper proportional representation of the public of Canada in this parliament is within the jurisdiction of parliament itself, and I do not think it would be a democratic expression of opinion to say that it is for the government to provide for redistribution. That is the first observation I wish to submit to the consideration of hon. members.

Of course the government is composed of members of this house, and consideration was given to this matter of redistribution when it became apparent toward the end of August that there was likely to be unconditional surrender of the Japanese armies to the allied forces. At that time the legislative programme for this session of parliament had been determined; and I think the experience of all of us is that there is a pretty heavy legislative programme to be dealt with. Although we have been in session for some considerable time, there is on the order paper and there has been forecast in the speech from the throne a number of matters which have not yet been dealt with, or at any rate fully dealt with, and which require our attention at this session. Nevertheless, personally I was disturbed over the recollection I had of the terms in which the amendment to the British North America Act had been drawn in 1943, and I discussed the matter with other members of parliament who happened to be also members of the government. The situation was envisaged in the light of the legislative programme which had been prepared and which it appeared necessary to have parliament act upon at the earliest possible moment. I then asked the law officers of the Department of Justice to consider the matter of the terms of this 1943 amendment. Their opinion conforms with that expressed by hon. members who so far have taken part in the debate. We do not propose to be technical, but the expression used in the statute is "the cessation of hostilities with the German reich, the kingdom of Italy, and the empire of Japan." I think that for the purposes of ordinary comprehension most people regard the unconditional surrender of Japan as amounting to a cessation of hostilities. That would not be a cessation of the state of war as envisaged in the War Measures Act; but, as has been pointed out by the hon. member who moved the resolution, this matter is in no wise connected with the interpretation or application of the War Measures Act, and the cessation of hostilities as expressed in the 1943 statute is, I think, a matter of fact and not a matter of a technical declaration of the existence or non-existence of a continued state of war. It is well known that the existence of a state of war according to international law does not end with the surrender of one of the participants in that war. I do not think that that technical existence of a continued state of war after the actual surrender of one of the participants in the war is identical with the situation described by "cessation of hostilities". I assume we should take it for granted that when the unconditional surrender had been made and accepted we could regard active hostilities as having ceased, and it was on that basis that I asked the law officers of the department to examine the question whether or not there was an obligation, not on the government but on the Canadian parliament, to provide at its first session for a redistribution of its membership to become effective at the expiry of that parliament.

It really is a question of law rather than one of any practical consequences, because a redistribution does not operate for by-elections during the life of a parliament. It comes into effect only at the expiry of the parliament that makes the redistribution. Perhaps I may have been optimistic, but I did not anticipate that there would be another general election immediately after this session of parliament. I did not anticipate that there would not be, before another general election, opportunity for one or more sessions of parliament, during which parliament could discharge its responsibility of providing for the redistribution of its membership.

But the technical legal question did give me some concern. The opinion that was given to me by the law officers of the department is almost in the language that was used by the hon. member, the mover, and his colleague, the seconder of the motion: that the effect of the 1943 amendment expired with the cessation of hostilities, that parliament then fell back upon the situation as it existed under the terms of section 51 of the British North America Act, and that that did not mean that redistribution had to be provided for at the first session. It meant that there was no longer any special legislation in force which prevented the application of section 51, but that after the effect of the special legislation disappeared, section 51 operated. as it always operated after every previous census which has taken place, and that parliament provided for redistribution, but not necessarily at the first session when it would be legally possible to carry it out because the census results had been compiled and published.

The note that was given to me is that the British North America Act, 1943, provides that it shall not be necessary that the representation of the provinces be readjusted in consequence of the completion of the 1941 decennial census until the first session of parliament commencing after the cessation of hostilities. Section 51 of the British North America Act, 1867, provides that on the completion of each decennial census the representation shall be readjusted.

The amendment of 1943 relieves the duty imposed by section 51 until after the cessation of hostilities, and thereupon the duty imposed by section 51 again arises, that the representation be adjusted on the completion of the census. Subject only to section 51, the readjustment can be effected in any session after the cessation of hostilities. Legislation for decennial readjustments was passed, after the 1931 session, in 1933.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask the minister a question? Do we understand, then, that redistribution must take place before another general election?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That is the requirement of section 51 as I construe it. The section says that redistribution shall be made from such time as parliament shall determine. But I think the whole sense of the section is that it is the duty of the parliament in existence when the census is completed to provide for a redistribution to be effective for the election of the following parliament. Following the 1921 census, the redistribution was made in 1924; following that of 1911, it was made in 1914; and so forth.

I may assure hon. members that the members of the government, as members of the house, realize the responsibility that results from the terms of the British North America Act and are anxious that that responsibility be discharged and that parliament do redistribute before another general election; and I hope that it will be done at the session of parliament which it will be necessary to have begun early in 1946. I do not think it would be possible to have redistribution enacted during this session if we are to have, as we shall normally be required to have, another session commencing early in 1946.

Hon. members will realize that the current fiscal year will expire on March 31, 1946, and that the budget with respect to which resolutions were submitted last Friday is the budget for the current fiscal year and that another appropriation will be required for the year that will commence on the 1st of April, 1946; and I think it would be unheard of to have two budgets provided in the same session. My anticipation is that this session will come to an end before the fiscal year comes to an end and that there will be another one which will begin before the next fiscal year begins and that there will be an opportunity to bring down estimates; and if they are not passed, an opportunity will be provided to ask the house to furnish interim supply based on those estimates, before the 1946-47 fiscal year begins.

When this matter of redistribution is being dealt with by parliament, whether it be on a bill introduced by a member of the government, or introduced by some other member of this house—because I know of no provision which would prevent any member of this house from introducing a redistribution bill—when that bill is introduced and is under consideration, speaking as a private member I would hope that serious consideration would be given to the situation as it exists under the construction put by the privy council upon the application of the fourth rule of section 51.

Hon. members who were in the last parliament will remember that in 1943, when a resolution for a special act postponing redistribution was under discussion, the decision in the case with respect to Prince Edward Island, the case of the attorney general of Prince Edward Island and the Attorney General of Canada, reported in Law Reports of 1905, Appeal Cases, at page 37, was referred to and discussed. It was pointed out that under that decision the privy council had held that the language of the fourth rule of section 51, which contains the following words:

. . . at the then last preceding readjustment of the number of members for the province—

—does not require a change in the number of members for a province, but that when, after a census, the number of members for a province was compared with the result of the census it amounted to a readjustment of the representation. That was said in a case in which the attorney general of Prince Edward Island was contending that there could not be any reduction in membership for a province until there had been some increase. He was contending that until there had been some increase there had been no readjustment. Their lordships held that that contention could not be admitted and they said this:

Their lordships think this is to give too narrow a meaning to the words.

In their opinion, when as a result of a census the representation of the provinces is reconsidered and the necessary changes, if any, made to bring it into harmony with the results of the census, that is a readjustment within the meaning of subsection 4 whether there be or be not any change in the case of any particular province.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask the minister if this house has not on one or more occasions passed legislation to the effect that no province shall have its membership reduced below the number of senators allowed to such province by the constitution? Because of that Prince Edward Island was allowed to retain four members to conform to the four senators; New Brunswick, which ordinarily would have lost membership in this house, was not to be reduced below ten the number of senators that come from that province, and similarly Nova Scotia was not to have fewer members than senators.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member is quite right. That was provided for by an amendment to the British North America Act which was made in 1915. There was a special provision enacted that year that in no case was the number of representatives for the people of a province in the House of Commons to be fewer than the representatives that that province is entitled to have in the senate. That, of course, had to be done by a statute of the parliament of Westminster, because it was a modification of the British North America Act. It is because the statute of Westminster of 1931 was, at the request of the provinces, declared to be inapplicable to the amendment of the British North America Act that it was necessary in 1943 to have the parliament of the United Kingdom say that this parliament would not be required to proceed with redistribution during the war.

If there were to be any other change in the application of section 51, as it exists and as it has been construed, it would require legislation of the parliament of the United Kingdom to give it effect.

But to proceed with the argument I was trying to develop when the hon. member suggested his question, this language used by the privy council has been applied to the whole of rule 4 of section 51. Rule 4 provides that the representation of a province will not be reduced after a census unless its proportion of population compared with the population of the whole of Canada has diminished by as much as five per cent.

Mr. KNOWLES: Five per cent of the previous proportion?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Five per cent of the previous proportion.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is pretty complicated.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes, it is quite complicated; but the part of the rule which has brought about the situation described by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras) is due to the construction put upon its terms by the privy council in 1905. It means that although there may be an accumulated difference of more than five per cent of the proportion, but if it does not occur in one decade it is ineffective. If it happened to be four per cent for five successive decades, amounting in all to as much as twenty per cent, it would still be inoperative because no five per cent of it would have taken place within a single decade.

The application of the rule has worked in the manner which has been described. When I spoke on the resolution in 1943 I cited the cases of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Ontario and Quebec. There is one that I did not mention at that time. According to the returns of the last census, the population of British Columbia is 817,861; that of Alberta is 796,169. As a result of the application of this rule, in the next parliament, if no change is made in the rule, Alberta will have seventeen representatives and British Columbia, sixteen, although British Columbia has, according to the census of 1941, a larger population than Alberta by some twenty thousand. As has been already pointed out, on a strictly proportionate basis the number of representatives for several provinces would not be the same as if the redistribution proceeded upon the basis on which it will have to proceed if no constitutional change is made.

Mr. MacNICOL: To complete the record, is the minister able to give the citation for the special consideration given to the Yukon?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I know that the Yukon is entitled to at least one representative, but I do not happen to have the text at hand which provides that.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is not determined by the British North America Act; it is within the competence of parliament to decide. I quote from the document published in connection with that matter.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Therefore I am not making any plea to-day for any special interest or issue; I am merely suggesting, as one of the members of parliament, that when the matter of redistribution comes up I would expect parliament to give consideration to the question whether or not the old rule should continue to be applied, or whether there would be at that time a proposal to put representation back on a proportionate basis for each and every one of the provinces. I would expect that to be a matter which would be given serious consideration by parliament because, speaking personally and not as Minister of Justice, I think there is a good deal in the suggestion that this is what was intended by the fathers of confederation. We do not personally remember what the controversy was in regard to "rep by pop," but we have all read about it and we all know that the desire of Upper Canada to have proper proportionate representation was one of the motives which started the discussions for a new constitution to replace that of the union under which both Upper and Lower Canada were given the same number of representatives in their joint parliament.

The matter of redistribution certainly will have to be dealt with by parliament, or parliament will be failing in the responsibility which results from the constitution itself. In 1943 the government took the responsibility of recommending to parliament an address to His Majesty to have an amendment passed postponing redistribution until after the cessation of hostilities. There has been no thought in the mind of anyone to take the responsibility of requesting a further postponement of redistribution. It may well be that this house itself will wish to take that responsibility if it comes to the conclusion that it would be unfair to carry out a redistribution which would bring about the results that have been indicated by some hon. members. That is something which will have to be determined by the house itself, by the members of the house; and whatever the determination is, I confidently expect that there will be a redistribution which will conform with the constitution either as it is or as it is made to be after proper amendment. It is my earnest hope that when this is done it will not be regarded as a government proposal, but as something done by the parliament of Canada itself to discharge its responsibility to those who elect members to this house, something that will be done completely without any partisan feeling, because we all owe it to our constituents to do everything possible to keep this institution in the high regard to which it is entitled as a truly democratic, representative institution of the people of Canada. I think it would be detrimental to the best interests of Canadian democracy to have it felt that this was being dealt with as a football to be tossed about in partisan discussion or conflict. It is much more than that. It is the true representation of the Canadian people in a free parliament which is required, and that should be the only object each of us will seek to attain when we come to deal with the redistribution of its membership.

I wished to mention one further point, although not for the purpose of raising any controversy about it. The suggestion has been made that there can be no amendment of the British North America Act which would affect the representation of the people of the provinces in this house without the consent of the provincial legislatures.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does that not mean only the consent of the four provinces which originally entered into confederation?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am not sure what it means, but even if it means that much I would not agree with it, because in my view that is not something which by the British North America Act is confided to the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures. The provincial legislatures have to deal with matters assigned to them by that act; but the representation of the Canadian people in this parliament, no matter in what province they live, is not something which has been placed under the care of the provincial legislatures. It is within the jurisdiction of this house and of the members elected to this house by the inhabitants of the several provinces.

Mr. BRACKEN: Before the minister sits down I wonder if he would mind making clear the answers to two questions. His remarks satisfied me on these points, but perhaps he will not object to making himself perfectly clear with respect to them. These questions do not deal with the technicalities of the present situation but with the practical matter of whether or not we are to have redistribution before the next election. First, does the minister recognize a responsibility on the part of the Canadian parliament to have redistribution before the next election? Second, will the government say now that there will be such a redistribution?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: To the first question I would reply in the affirmative without the slightest hesitation. As to the second question, I would hope the government would take the initiative in having that responsibility of parliament to the people of Canada satisfactorily discharged before another election.

Mr. BRACKEN: From some remarks of the minister in the earlier part of his speech I gathered there was some responsibility devolving upon parliament as distinguished from the government. Surely the minister does not mean to leave the impression that there is a responsibility upon parliament which the government itself can avoid?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Not at all. I hoped I had clearly stated that those who are members of the government, with the exception of its leader in the other place, are members of the house. They all, I think, feel their responsibility, not only equally with other members of the house but probably to a greater degree, because they have some control over the disposition of the time of the house in dealing with legislation.

Mr. MacNICOL: If I may I should like to ask the minister one more question, because I did not quite understand his reply to the observation I made a few moments ago as to the necessity of obtaining the consent of the legislatures of the four provinces originally entering into confederation before the British North America Act can be amended, in regard to any amendment pertaining to anything to which they consented when they formed confederation.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Of course I am not making a judicial pronouncement; I am merely expressing my own opinion. In my opinion there is no necessity to get the consent of any of the provincial legislatures in regard to any amendment which would affect the representation of the people in this parliament.

Mr. MacNICOL: I had not reference to the representation in this parliament but to any amendment of the British North America Act pertaining to matters to which the four original provinces consented when they formed confederation.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: On that point I do not think the jurisdiction which was assigned to the provincial legislatures by the British North America Act can be taken away from them in any way without their consent.

Mr. MacNICOL: I agree.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the mover (Mr. Dorion) and the seconder of the motion, also the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras), and the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) who have spoken so well on this matter. I congratulate also the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) and my good friend, the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), upon the very able questions they have put to the minister in an effort to clarify the situation. That having been said, may I be permitted to express the opinion of the man on the street. In doing this I shall try to keep away from subtleties and legal distinctions, but I shall remind the house of what happened in the past.

In the first place, let me say that the present system is unjust. Why is it unjust? It is unjust because it was pronounced to be unjust by the Liberal party in 1933. I remember what happened when the Redistribution Act was brought down by the federal government of that day. It was a shame. The whole thing was wrongly done. Those in charge for the province of Quebec were a gentleman who was a minister at the time and who is now a judge, and another gentleman who has since died. He was a millionaire and he now rests in the Lord, I hope. They were together and they helped to frame that awful and shameful piece of legislation. That is the system that is at present in force.

The minister was very candid when he said that this matter should be considered from a high plane. Theoretically he is right, but practically it has been done otherwise except by the Liberal party, which has always been just and fair. Hon. members should read in Hansard of the Tory gerrymander of 1893, which was described by no less a person than Sir Wilfrid Laurier as gerrymander with a vengeance. What did he do in 1903 when he was Prime Minister of Canada? He saw that it was corrected. Then we had the same experience in 1933. Mr. Bennett thought that he would remain in power by carving the constituencies into the most incredible designs. It would be interesting if hon. members of the house would go to the office of the chief electoral officer and ask for plans of the constituencies to see what was done to bring a Tory parish into another constituency in order to give an unpopular member a chance to be elected against the will of the people. All hon. members complained about it in the session of 1932-33, and I remember the last week of that session was spent in discussing this very matter. Of course the government changed nothing.

I know about it because somebody had been asked by the party to do the work on the committee. I had asked to sit on the committee but someone else from Montreal was appointed. He was my deskmate at the time. He had played golf with the Prince of Wales. One day he had to make a speech on the Ottawa agreements. He was a very hard worker. He read four pages of a speech made by Mr. Bennett, who was Prime Minister, and then he read four pages of a speech by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), who was then leader of the opposition; he read those eight pages and concluded by saying, "I agree with my chief, the leader of the opposition, against the leader of the government," and he sat down. That was his speech. He met the man who was sitting on the committee for the province of Quebec, a solicitor who worked very hard, but he did not work very hard.

One day I was coming up to the house and the late Mr. Lapointe met me. He said, "Jean-François, you will have to do that work." I said, "I was not put on the committee; I know it is going to be a hard job, but I have not been appointed." Finally I gathered all the old statutes from 1853 to 1923, which was the time of the previous redistribution, and I prepared a history of the redistributions during those eighty years. I prepared the story of the effect of each redistribution upon each constituency in the province of Quebec. I gave it to the late Mr. Lapointe and to Mr. Cardin, and it was used in discussing the matter with the two Tory bigwigs who were representing their party. I supplied the stuff that they had to work with. Many hon. members expressed their opinions about the whole matter and described the gerrymander as a scandal, which it was.

We should have changed it after the last census. However, we were at war, and what humiliated me profoundly was the fact that this parliament approved a motion to kneel down humbly before the British government to ask them to make an exception and allow us to wait until the war was over, to permit the dominion government not to proceed at once with the redistribution which should have been done by virtue of our constitution. Some one has said that business is pressing, that there are many things to do, but in my humble view the first thing we should do is to comply with the constitution of this country.

The legislation which was passed two years ago exists no longer. That legislation passed by the imperial parliament was good only for the time of the war. As soon as the war was over with our three enemies, Germany, Italy and Japan, that legislation, which changed the constitution for a limited period, no longer had effect. We are now in this absurb situation: the time to revise the boundaries of the constitutencies, otherwise to pass a Redistribution Act in accordance with the census, has passed; the limited period of delay granted to Canada by the imperial parlament has passed, and nothing has been done. That is an anomaly. It is something that cannot be explained. We are in a false situation.

Whether elections take place in the near future or at a later date, the fact remains that at a time when economy is being preached everywhere we have in this House of Commons twenty members who would not be sitting here if the constitution were being applied. Therefore we are expending twenty times $6,000, or $120,000, plus travelling expenses, which should not be expended at this time.

Mr. BRACKEN: Where do you get the $6,000?

Mr. POULIOT: I am an optimist. Even putting it at $4,000, we have a total of $80,000. That is a lot of money to pay to gentlemen who are not entitled to sit among us. Moreover, we should take advantage of the rules of the house to point out these strangers, not in the gallery, but on the floor of the house. Who are these strangers? Here again it is the old story. We have to please first one and then another province, instead of doing what is right. That is the thing I have always complained of. Here we are to please or not to displease some one province or other. When we have something to do which is the right thing to do, we should do it. It is of no importance at all for us to consider: Let us please, let us be pleasant, let us appease somebody or other. That was Chamberlain's motto—let us appease. When you appease one province, then you have to appease another. It is no good to appease Manitoba, let us say, at the expense of Quebec, and afterwards to appease Quebec at the expense of another province. Let us be more serious. Let us abide by the constitution. Let us go on our knees to London to the least extent possible by way of asking them to change our constitution on such a pretext as was used the last time. The war was made the pretext, but the real reason was not to indispose Saskatchewan. And what was the gratitude of Saskatchewan to the government for that? None at all; it was not appreciated. Probably it would have been much more in the practical interests of the government to act in accordance with the constitution and to have that redistribution submitted to the house. The government would have lost no seats by that, and perhaps it was precisely because the fair-minded people of Saskatchewan were offended by that encroachment upon the constitution that they defeated more Liberal candidates at the last election.

Here we are discussing legal subtleties, citing a section here and a paragraph there, a subsection here and a subparagraph there, so the whole thing has to be examined with a magnifying glass to see where is the legal light hiding under the bushel. Let us be more practical than that. Let us stand by the constitution, or let us change it entirely—and let us do the work ourselves here at Ottawa, not have it done outside. It is an absurd situation, as has been described by all hon. gentlemen who have spoken before me, including my good friend the Minister of Justice. The situation is absurd, but it will not be absurd any longer once we have the guts to correct it.

It has been suggested to the mover of the motion that it should be addressed to parliament instead of to the government. That is a little too Philadelphian for me. The purpose of the motion is to ask the support of the house in pressing upon the government the urgency of such a redistribution. One has only to read the motion to understand it.

The complaint has also been made that this motion is brought in before the estimates have been considered. It is obvious that there is a good reason for that, because once we start to consider the estimates, private members' days will be over and no such motion as this could be brought before the house.

As my good friend the Minister of Justice has spoken on the subject in such an unprejudiced and unbiased way, and considers it as being above partisan considerations, I hope that a redistribution will be brought in by the government before the end of this session. In 1943 the Prime Minister said that we would have a redistribution. It was mentioned in the speech from the throne that year, but we had none. This year the government have said that we cannot have a redistribution. I hope that the reverse of what happened in 1943 will take place and that the government will give us a pleasant surprise before the end of the session by bringing in a redistribution measure. It is very easy; the thing is most simple. The government has only to appoint a committee to study the past redistribution act and correct it in accordance with the last census. Otherwise where shall we go?

You know, sir, that we have some powers by virtue of the constitution, and those powers are completed by other statutes passed by this parliament. The first of these is the redistribution statute establishing the boundaries of the constituencies, the polling stations and where the electors shall vote. There is also the Senate and House of Commons Act and some other acts, but the Senate and House of Commons Act applies for the most part after the member is elected by virtue of the redistribution act and the elections act. The elections act has been improved a lot. The only thing wrong with regard to the election of members of parliament is the Redistribution Act. Let us correct it in order that there shall be no complaint about any member of parliament who sits in this house.

To conclude, sir, I sincerely hope that this government will reconsider, not its decision, because no definite decision has been reached, but its views on this matter. I hope the government will reconsider it in due course and give a good example of complying with the law.

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to detain the house very long, but one or two things have been said in this debate on which as a member from Saskatchewan I wish to make some comment.

The original provision of the British North America Act, as has been stated, was based upon the idea that there should be representation by population, but because of the provision that was put in the act in section 51, subsection 4, and the interpretation placed upon it by the privy council, which has already been referred to by the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), a great discrepancy has crept into our representation. As I pointed out to the house in February, 1943, if a redistribution were made on the basis of the present act the only provinces which would have representation on the basis of population would be Quebec, British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. In other words, as has been pointed out, Prince Edward Island would have two more members than she was entitled to, Nova Scotia would have one more, New Brunswick would have one more, Ontario eight more, and Alberta one more.

I have no quarrel at all with the provision giving a minimum representation to provinces like Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, for this reason, that in Saskatchewan particularly we are beginning to run into the very thing that makes some such minimum requirement fair. The basis of the redistribution is the population of the province of Quebec, and we find that as Quebec rapidly increases in population, the unit of representation is rapidly rising, so that to-day it is 51,213. In provinces like Quebec or Ontario, where there are large cities, certain seats in the cities can be given much larger populations and the rural constituencies in those provinces can be kept down to a reasonable size. We find that that is happening in the last redistribution of the population. For example, Ottawa West seat to-day contains 94,746; Eglinton, Toronto, 72,953; Spadina, 86,431; Montreal St. Mary, 83,444; Montreal Mercier, 85,380. Thus provinces which have large industrial centres can keep the areas of their rural seats to a reasonable size. But in the case of a province which is almost entirely agricultural, the principle of basing the unit of representation upon populations which are increasing because of the rapid growth of industrial centres means that rural seats—in Saskatchewan for instance—will soon be so large that members cannot do justice to their constituents. That is the consideration which I think justifies the minimum requirement provision which obtains in the case of the maritimes and should apply, I suggest, also to the prairie provinces. As has already been pointed out, Prince Edward Island has four senators, and has been protected for some time by the regulation to which I have referred. Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have each ten senators; one of them will be protected by that regulation in the next redistribution, and the other is in a position to receive the protection right away. But, in the wisdom of those who set up the representation for western Canada in the senate, it was provided that all that section of the country should have twenty-four senators. That means that the representation of Saskatchewan in the senate is six. Therefore there is very little protection for Saskatchewan in that provision, and I submit that some consideration should be given to that aspect of the situation.

The present population of the seat which I have the honour to represent is under 40,000, which means that that seat, already so large as to occupy me pretty continually in keeping in touch with it, will have to be increased in size over twenty-five per cent. As I see the population of Quebec increasing, partly because of the big and growing metropolis of Montreal, I recognize that as a consequence the seats in Saskatchewan will be enlarged to such a size that it will be almost impossible to have them adequately represented in parliament. That does not apply quite so much to Manitoba, because that province contains the big city of Winnipeg. They can therefore provide, as they have done, that the city seats shall have a much larger population, so that the country seats do not have to be quite so disproportionately enlarged. For example, Winnipeg North has a population of over 70,000. As regards British Columbia, of course it has the two cities of Vancouver and Victoria.

Mr. MacNICOL: The Manitoba constituency of Churchill is a very large one.

Mr. TUCKER: Yes; it is a very large seat, but of course the population is mainly to be found in a few areas. The whole problem is one to which any committee assigned to study it will have to give close attention. Alberta is in somewhat the same position as Saskatchewan and Manitoba, except that its two cities of Calgary and Edmonton have a tendency to grow fairly fast, and that helps them out in some measure.

I have here some figures which I found very interesting and which I thought I might bring to the attention of the house. I do so because at one time I thought of suggesting that our representation should be based upon the result of the quinquennial census which will be taken in western Canada next year. Therefore I tried to get some figures on the trend of population in western Canada in the last three years. The only figures I could get from the bureau of statistics were based on the issue of ration books, and I found to my disappointment that the trend which had set in after the outbreak of war up to the taking of the census in 1941, consequent upon so many of our young people having come east to take part in industrial work and the war effort in general, had continued in increasing measure up to 1944. According to a study made by the bureau of statistics, in the period 1941 to 1944 the migration from Saskatchewan amounted to no less than 86,000. If we do not give time for that situation to cure itself—and it will not be cured by the time the quinquennial census is taken next year—if we base ourselves upon that census, instead of losing four seats in Saskatchewan it looks as though we might lose even more, which accentuates the importance of giving consideration to the argument I have already advanced.

The house might be interested in the trend in regard to other provinces.

Mr. BRACKEN: Perhaps the hon. member could give the numbers that left Saskatchewan before 1939. Does he have them?

Mr. TUCKER: No; I just have them from 1941 to 1944. I do not think it would be possible to obtain figures for the period 1939 to 1941, because the statistics which were furnished me were available on account of ration books having been issued, and that gave them the chance to study the trend.

As regards the other provinces, in the period 1941-44, 7,000 left Prince Edward Island, 8,000 had gone into Nova Scotia, 19,000 had left New Brunswick, 11,000 had left Quebec, 58,000 had come to Ontario, and 90,000 went to British Columbia. I found these figures very interesting as showing the migration of the population within Canada. They do not take into account at all the position of the armed services. This is just civilian migration within Canada and it indicates that there is a very important problem which will have to be faced by this house in regard to redistribution.

I urge the house not to take away any of the rights of representation granted the maritimes, but I suggest that if it is found proper to protect the powerful province of Ontario from losing her representation, so that, if we are to redistribute on the basis of the present law, she will have eight members more than she is entitled to—

Mr. MacNICOL: May I interrupt the hon. member to point out to him that the fathers of confederation, when they drew up the British North America Act, were not specifying for Ontario only. The hon. member can never miss taking a fling at Ontario.

Mr. TUCKER: My hon. friend is entirely wrong. I am not taking a fling at Ontario; I am pointing out the manner in which the British North America Act has worked out. I think that fair members from Ontario will go along with me when I say that if the constitution has worked out in such a manner that the powerful province of Ontario will be left with eight members more than the number to which it is entitled, if calculated on the basis applied to a province like Saskatchewan, then something should be done to safeguard the position of a province like Saskatchewan which will lose four seats.

Mr. MacNICOL: Ontario's representation has gone down from ninety-two to eighty-two, but we did not holler about that.

Mr. TUCKER: Yes; but if you insist that we have to go entirely on the basis of our population, then you should be willing to go on the same basis yourself.

Mr. MacNICOL: We did lose ten.

Mr. TUCKER: And you have this added advantage, that you have big cities in the province of Ontario, and in those cities you can set up seats that are very populous, giving the right to rural districts to have adequate representation. We have not that safety valve in Saskatchewan, and I think it is very important that this whole situation should be carefully considered.

Incidentally, it irks me to think that, in order to provide for the representation of our people in this parliament, we have to go to the parliament at Westminster to get that change. That, of course, is not the fault of the parliament at Westminster because it was at our own request that it was done; but my own feeling is that soon we shall have to provide some means whereby we can amend our own constitution, thus relieving the parliament at Westminster of what sometime may prove to be an embarrassing job. I think it would be better for them as well as for ourselves.

I simply rose to make that point and I wish to reemphasize, to my hon. friend the member for Davenport and other Ontario members, that when I cite the case of Ontario I am just citing what appears to have been an anomaly that has developed on the basis of a section in the British North America Act which has been interpreted by the privy council. I am sure that the fathers of confederation could not have intended that Ontario should have the right to retain eight—and perhaps, as the years go on, an even greater number than that—more seats than she is entitled to on the basis on which the number of representatives is fixed for other provinces. I suggest that if that right is to be retained to protect Ontario in the possession of these eight extra seats, then in all fairness some such provision as has been found to protect the maritime provinces should be written into the British North America Act in order to protect the prairie provinces in the possession of adequate representation in this house.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (Cochrane): It is perhaps easy for one to say that one agrees entirely with the contents of the resolution presented by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion), but I cannot sympathize with the impatience shown in having redistribution, as indicated in the words of the motion that "immediate consideration" be given to the advisability of proceeding during the present session with representation of the provinces in the House of Commons.

I do not believe I have the power, but I think I have the right, to suggest a tentative session or date. Personally, I believe that the year 1947 would be appropriate for reasons which I shall mention later on.

I listened attentively to the mover of the resolution, and I was certainly impressed by his sincerity and his force as to what may happen as far as redistribution of the representation in this house is concerned. I do not know whether all members realize how difficult it is to belong to a racial group within a nation. It is true that in the province of Quebec the racial group to which I refer is in a majority, but I am speaking of that racial group as a minority in the rest of Canada. Even under the best conditions, there is always some fear, although for my part I do not allow myself to cultivate those fears, because I do not believe in them. I believe implicitly in the fair-mindedness of the Canadian people as a whole, and that applies particularly to my own province. I was glad therefore that my hon. friend the member for Charlevoix-Saguenay made no criticism with regard to the representation of Prince Edward Island, which has four members in the House of Commons and four senators. I may say that I represent in my constituency more people than there are in the whole of Prince Edward Island. I represent nearly 125,000.

In our section of the country we are perfectly satisfied with the pact of confederation, and I suggest that if we study it carefully we shall find that it was very largely a matter of give and take. There were many sensibilities that might have been offended, and there was room for friction, racial and religious; but the fathers of confederation found it possible to build their structure, and they builded better than they knew. They built, not on quicksand but on understanding, an understanding of what true Canadianism is.

In that regard I am fully in agreement with the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay. While members from Quebec put the case for that province as forcefully as they can, so far as federal representation is concerned, I suggest that they must see to it that equity and justice shall prevail not only in the interests of Quebec but for the representation of the country as a whole.

I make that statement deliberately because I was astonished in 1943—and if I had not been Deputy Speaker I would have said a few words prior to the passing of the resolution—when the Quebec legislature passed a resolution indicating fear that there might be some injustice in connection with the redistribution measure which would be placed before parliament. I stated a few days ago here that in my opinion every member of this house is primarily what I call a municipalist, because primarily every member is proud of his own locality, the towns and cities in his own district. There exists, for example, a rivalry between Hamilton and Toronto—I cannot profess to know a great deal about Toronto, however; between Toronto and Montreal, between Halifax and Vancouver, and in my opinion that is a healthy state of affairs. Second, I suggested that we are provincialists, every one of us, because everyone of us is proud to belong to his individual province and would be the last to allow this federal government to impinge upon and be unfair to that province in respect of any question affecting its interests. That is why I was surprised at that resolution, although I know that it was proposed in good faith.

I wish to say a few words with regard to the fine presentation made by the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Gagnon). I cannot agree with some of the statements that he took occasion to make. For instance, he said that financially speaking—those are practically his words—we were in bankruptcy. The hon. member knows much better than that. He knows that this country is not bankrupt; the allies are not bankrupt. It is true we have a huge national debt, but we have preserved our natural resources. But more than that, we have the finest, most industrious and intelligenet population in the world. With that great asset we do not need to worry about the future. If the activities of our population are directed through the proper channels we shall not need to worry about the future. I resent the statement very much.

On many occasions it has been said that my French-speaking compatriots of the province of Quebec are hewers of wood and drawers of water for the rest of the population. If that were so, Mr. Speaker, and if we are in a state of bankruptcy, then we are all starting in from scratch and the people who make those statements should be happy that we are in that position. But it is not true and it cannot be true so far as Canada is concerned. If our efforts are directed in the post-war period as they were to the winning of the war we shall not have any bankruptcy in Canada; we can be positive of that. I make that statement to show how careful our compatriots ought to be in making statements of that kind, whether they be made on the floor of the House of Commons or in a provincial forum.

When we come to the matter of redistribution, perhaps we shall have to make some further amendments. Like the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker), I should like to see Canada in a position where it could deal with that matter itself. I say that not because I have any resentment against the British government. The British government and people would be most happy if we were to deal with all of our own domestic affairs and political problems. There is no doubt about that.

With regard to the question of representation, there exists a certain amount of danger. I well remember when I lived in Quebec in my youth that the population of Ontario was almost double that of the old province of Quebec. To-day there is a difference of only a few hundred thousand, and perhaps when the great mining development is carried on in northern Quebec in the near future, as it is bound to be, the popuation of Quebec may be equal to that of Ontario. Can you visualize, sir, the people of Ontario being satisfied with a representation of only sixty-five members in the House of Commons? There will be some commotion then, and we must of necessity prevent that. It should be possible to find ways and means, and not merely on a mathematical calculation, of treating the Canadian people as a whole unit. Let me give an example. Suppose some day that Quebec has a population of five million people and Ontario a population of three million five hundred thousand. You would then have a contracted parliament. Instead of a parliament consisting of 245 members there would only be 150 or 175. As my colleague, the hon. member for Rosthern, said a few moments ago, I believe that most members of parliament find their hands full to-day doing the work they have to do. I know that I find it a twenty-four hour job to represent 125,000 people. The fathers of confederation never expected that the representation should become more and more contracted instead of becoming more and more expanded. That is one of the thoughts I wish to leave with the House of Commons at this time.

I should now like to refer to some of the statements that were made by the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot). I believe the best remedy for gerrymandering in a redistribution would be the formation of a judicial redistribution commission. I know that some members of parliament would say that was taking away some of the prerogatives of parliament. That may be true. I am just leaving that thought with the members of parliament and with the country as a whole. We are all human. You cannot change human nature. It is a wonderful thing that you cannot change it altogether. No doubt in a redistribution there would be jerrymandering again, whether it be done by a Liberal administration or a Conservative administration. Surely it should be possible, when dealing with a matter of national importance such as redistribution, to leave politics on the doorstep of the committee and to work for the welfare of the provinces and of Canada as a whole.

As far as I am concerned I should be very glad indeed to have redistribution carried out at an early date, but again I do not see the urgency of it. I am sincerely convinced that, generally speaking, members of this parliament do not want an election next year. They certainly do not wish an election this fall, or at least until we enjoy some of the benefits that were granted to us last week. I know that most hon. members will agree with me on that score. I believe the country as a whole expects parliament, regardless of its political affiliations, to deal with the important matters that are before us and to work for the solution of the post-war problems.

To perform that task will test the energy, ability and capacity of every member of this house and of the cabinet. It is a man's job; it is a national job. I believe I speak for a large percentage of the population of this country when I say that, because I received a fine mandate from my own people. They told me, regardless of party affiliation, to come to Ottawa and to work with all I had within me for the solution of the problems which this country is bound to face in the post-war period.

I say these things because I believe that redistribution during the present session will trouble the minds of hon. members too much. It is too late anyway. I know it is not the intention of the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay to have redistribution accomplished before the end of this session. I doubt if it will be accomplished before the session of 1947. My main reason for saying that—and it is corroborated by the statement made by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras) and also by the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker)—is that our population, generally speaking, is in a state of flux. Take my own constituency, particularly the gold mining section of it. It was practically a war victim. They took a lot of our trained and experienced miners to British Columbia, Sudbury and to other mines throughout Canada. To-day these people are coming back, and they are coming back in greater numbers than ever. The same thing applies to our rural population. Most of our young men and women who were not physically fit to go into actual active military service went to the industrial centres of central Canada. Most of them are not back yet. Our young men will not be entirely demobilized from the three armed forces for at least a year and a half. Surely this should be a sufficient argument to make parliament realize that it would be most unfair to hundreds of thousands of young men and women in this country to carry out redistribution at the present time.

Let us not forget this, that the young men and women who went into uniforms have benefited by their experience in the past six years. Not only have they suffered but they have studied. They learned something about life and they will be keener in public affairs than ever before. That statement is borne out by the representation in the House of Commons of young men who served in the armed forces in the present war. Again, I repeat, we owe it to ourselves and we owe it to our people not to go too fast. So far as the maldistribution of the population is concerned it is bound to be rectified in the very near future. I believe that we owe a debt of gratitude to the mover of this resolution. Hon. members will readily realize how useful private members are. Their resolutions usually bring about nation-wide discussion outside the realm of politics. These discussions generally are constructive and conducive to better legislation and to better government.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I am not rising to discuss the resolution. If I were I would first congratulate the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion) upon his splendid speech and upon bringing the matter before the house. But I am sorry to say that from my point of view the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) shows such an animus toward the province of Ontario that on any and every matter that pertains to Ontario he cannot help—

Mr. TUCKER: I rise to a point of order. The hon. member has no right to say that I have an animus toward the province of Ontario. My father was born in this province and I have the very kindest feelings for it; but I do say they should not ask for special privileges over other people.

Mr. MacNICOL: Well, we are not asking for any advantage over the other provinces.

Mr. TUCKER: I think the hon. gentleman should withdraw the suggestion that I have an animus toward everything in connection with the province of Ontario.

Mr. MacNICOL: The province of Ontario had nothing whatever to do—

Mr. TUCKER: I should like a ruling on my point of order; and I believe the hon. member is out of order anyway.

Mr. MacNICOL: If the hon. member is hurt by my interpretation of his disposition toward the province of Ontario as animus I am happy to withdraw it. He is a big, good-natured man, and I know he would not display any animosity toward the province of Ontario unless he was not feeling very well at the time he made the statement.

I think it is imperative that Hansard should record the clause which was placed in the British North America Act by the fathers of confederation, not particularly for the benefit of the province of Ontario. I do not know whether this clause was fathered by the delegates from the province of Quebec or by the delegates from either of the maritime provinces; or by the delegates from Ontario. I do not know, but I have always thought whoever fathered it exercised pretty good judgment in the way they laid it out. I will read it; it is paragraph (4) of section 51:

> On any such readjustment the number of members for a province shall not be reduced unless the proportion which the number of the population of the province bore to the number of the aggregate population of Canada at the then last preceding readjustment of the number of members for the province is ascertained at the then latest census to be diminished by one twentieth part or upwards.

On the basis of that provision the representation of the province of Ontario has been reduced from ninety-two to eighty-two.

Mr. TUCKER: If I may ask a question, would the hon. gentleman suggest that if by a clause of this kind in the confederation pact a big province like Ontario in the result got, as perhaps it may ultimately, twenty more members than it is entitled to have, the province of Ontario should rely on that provision and hang on to those additional members?

Mr. MacNICOL: Well, a moment ago I withdrew the remark about the hon. gentleman's animus, but unless he remains in his seat he will continue to show it. He can hardly rise in his place without showing that feeling against Ontario and he is better sitting down.

Mr. TUCKER: It is a well known rule that if you cannot answer your opponent's case you should abuse the opposing lawyer.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is not a well known rule that the hon. member for Rosthern should be permitted to take part in everything that comes up in this house. I want to tell him that the people of Ontario, and I am one of them, have the very warmest feelings toward the western provinces and all other provinces.

Mr. TUCKER: They should have.

Mr. MacNICOL: You never hear anyone from Ontario denouncing the other provinces; they are too big for that. Paragraph (4) of section 51 is why on one occasion, or perhaps on one or two occasions, the province of Ontario suffered a loss in its representation from ninety-two to eighty-two, and may lose again not after the last census but after the one following that. That is a result of the fluctuation of the population. If our population does go down I hope it will come back again at some future time. I sincerely hope that the provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba, both of which apparently are due to lose some seats if redistribution is carried out on the basis of the recent census, will come back in their population and gain seats. I for one want to see the population of the western provinces greatly increased, thereby increasing their membership in this house.

Mr. L. A. MUTCH (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, in rising at this late hour to say a few words on the motion now before the house I am perhaps motivated more by the spirit of being against something than is usually the case when I rise in this chamber. I hasten to say to you, sir, that in my opposition to this motion I am impelled more by the implication which it arouses indirectly than by the fact that I am a representative of one of the provinces whose representation will suffer if redistribution is carried out in accordance with the existing practice.

This question of redistribution brings very sharply into focus a problem which concerns all of us in this house and the whole of Canada; that is, the right of the Canadian people to amend their own constitution without reference to the parliament at Westminster. I am not a lawyer, and I am not prepared to discuss the legal aspects of that question. I believe, however, that I represent the feeling of a very large proportion of the people of my constituency and, indeed, of the people of Canada when I say that important matters, such as the one confronting us in this motion, should be capable of settlement and solution without reference to any body outside our dominion. Therefore I am opposed to the motion, for the same reason that in 1943 I suggested that in the wording of the recommendation which then went to Westminster the house should defer all consideration of redistribution for two years following the conclusion of hostilities. I shall do what I can during this session or otherwise to bring about such deferment for at least this period of time, if that may be possible. I am opposed to consideration of redistribution at the present time, because I am opposed to any loss of representation from the prairie provinces on the basis of the 1941 census, for the reasons given by other speakers this afternoon and for the further reason that within the next year another census will be held which will give us a much more accurate picture of the population trend in those provinces. I shall oppose the reintroduction of this motion or any other motion with the same intent at this or any subsequent session of parliament, the result of which would be to reduce the representation of the prairie provinces at this time; and I shall be prepared to advocate and support, if the present system is to continue, such necessary amendment of the British North America Act as will secure to the people of western Canada at least the moderate representation they now have.

I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.
