The new social order promised is to be based on social justice. I believe that this phrase requires defining; I do not think I should take up the time of the house now in defining it, but I might say one thing which I believe most of us will agree that it is not. I do not believe any hon. member will regard it as being social justice that, for instance, this country's hydro electric power, its great mineral resources in coal and iron and copper and gold, its oil fields, its timber, its means of transportation, its financial institutions, should be owned and controlled by private corporations for profit while great masses of the people are in want. That is the kind of social justice which we have witnessed in Canada heretofore. That is the kind of social justice spawned by free private enterprise. It was free private enterprise which we had in this country from confederation to the "hungry thirties"; and I hope that no member of this house will suggest that it is social justice to give the ownership and control of all the means of the life of this country, for an ulterior purpose, into the hands of private corporations. I hope we do not suppose that the profits of private corporations are of greater concern to the people of Canada in our coming new social order than the wages of the workers who work for such corporations.

Seeing, then, that it was free private enterprise which we suffered—not enjoyed—during the hungry thirties and prior to the war, there must be some change if we are to have the beginnings of that new social order which the government foreshadows in the speech from the throne. I welcome that pronouncement not only because I believe it is a true interpretation of the spirit and temper of the Canadian people, but because by implication it repudiates the pledges of the orthodox to adhere to free private enterprise; for as I have said, that was what we had before the war, that is what we have had throughout the war; and now we are to have something different. It cannot be free private enterprise, for in that case there would be no need of a new social order. So that there is to be a change.

Frankly, I am sceptical about the change. I do not see how any government that is pledged to retaining the very essence of the old order can be entrusted with the establishment and the building of a new. I am also a little bit sceptical about it because, if hon. members notice the phraseology, the government is going to "seek" a new social order, as if it were some elfish creature that was fond of hiding itself in dark corners for fear somebody might find it and in order that statesmen might spend their time in hunting it in a game of hide and seek. That is not the character of a new social order. A social order will have to be created if it is to be a new one. It will have to be created by us. It will have to be built by us. To the extent to which the government proposes to initiate that new social order which is adumbrated in the speech from the throne, to that extent, as my leader indicated, this group will be here to help them, and if they do not move in that direction we shall be here to push them to the best of our ability.

[Mr. Irvine.]

Speaking of this new social order reminds me of a humorous remark—it was humorous to me at least—made by an hon. gentleman who sits to my left. In his criticism of socialism he tried to argue that it should not be considered because it was so old. I have of course much respect for a great deal that has been said by hon. members to my left. I think they are to be congratulated on having brought to the attention of this house and of Canada a phase at least of our economic problems. But I would point out to my hon. friend that if he has no better argument against socialism than the one referred to he had better stop. Surely private enterprise, which he himself champions, is older even than socialism, which we have never had at all in this country. But I would say to him that if we are to have full production and ample income for every consumer in Canada it will take more than a monetary patch on the worn-out breeches of so-called private enterprise to bring it about.

As I wish to turn now to another subject, Mr. Speaker, would you mind calling it six o'clock?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. IRVINE: When the house rose at six o'clock I was commenting on the statement in the speech from the throne that we might expect a new social order.

I turn now to deal with a matter of great urgency and great importance to the people of the riding of Cariboo. The matter on which I desire to speak now is not directly connected with any proposal in the speech from the throne, but it might appropriately be considered in connection with the rehabilitation programme of the government and the new social order we have been promised. The matter to which I refer is the outlet to the Pacific coast from the Peace River district. This is not by any means a new subject for this house. Mr. D. M. Kennedy, who represented the riding of Peace River from 1921 until 1935, made it his business to bring the subject before this house year after year, consistently. I believe he brought the question of the Peace River outlet before parliament thirteen times in thirteen years; and during eight of those years, from 1927 to 1935, he was ably assisted by Mr. John A. Fraser, who at that time represented the Cariboo riding. These two hon. gentlemen succeeded in having a resolution passed favouring the building of that road. The motion, which was passed in 1933 and again in 1934 read:

That in the opinion of this house the Peace River country should be connected by a direct railway outlet to the Pacific coast when circumstances permit.

The words "when circumstances permit" were added as an amendment by the Minister of Railways of that day, as a sort of safeguard, which hon. members will appreciate. That resolution was passed during the hungry thirties, in the heydey of private enterprise, and a time when it might have been expected that works of this kind would have been undertaken. Speaking in this debate, the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) had some pertinent things to say about the money complex. If he had been in the house at that time he would have seen a very fair illustration of what he was trying to bring to the attention of hon. members. I will quote the actual words of the Minister of Railways of that day, who said:

The total programme is still out of the question; I am quite frank about that. The people of Canada simply have not sufficient money at the present time to embark on a programme embracing anything like a complete Peace River project which would cost anywhere from thirteen to seventy-five million dollars.

That was the official view at that time in regard to the project, and according to the minister in charge, lack of money would appear to have been the only reason why the project was not carried out. But as the hon. member for Lethbridge pointed out, from 1939 up to the present time there has been no lack of money for much larger projects than this. Canada seemed to have no difficulty in finding and making the money when it had to.

As a matter of fact the reasons given for not building the railway at that time were the very reasons why it should have been built during the depression years. If that project, the St. Lawrence waterway project and a number of others had been undertaken, then we would not have had any depression in Canada; but that was not the official view of either party at that time. My predecessor, Mr. Gray Turgeon, as member for Cariboo I have no doubt was just as anxious to have this railway built as were any of the hon. gentlemen I have mentioned, but he had the misfortune to serve that constituency during six years of war, when of course it would have been inadvisable to enter upon a project of that kind, since there were so many more pressing problems facing the government. Now, however, we have come to a time when the excuses of the past have no meaning. No longer shall we be given the excuse of lack of money, I am sure, in regard to a project of this kind; and the war is no longer with us. The war is over, and we are entering upon what probably will be called the rehabilitation period, in which a project such as this should be welcomed and undertaken.

There is little of data or argument that needs to be added to the presentation made by hon. members for Peace River and Cariboo in years gone by, but I desire to summarize briefly the position as they set it forth, so that I may recall to the minds of hon. members who were in the house prior to the war the views and facts in regard to the Peace River outlet, and at the same time give newer members the situation as it now stands.

I shall begin by pointing out that all party leaders in this house and in previous parliaments at least since 1924 have, to my knowledge, gone on record as being in favour of this project. I am going to quote their pledges. They have been quoted before. If I recall aright, the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) quoted the statements of leaders of that time dealing with this matter. I shall just quote them again in order to refresh the memories of those leaders who are still in the House of Commons, who pledged themselves to build this line. First I quote the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) who, speaking in Edmonton in 1924, said:

I pledge myself that as soon as it is humanly possible the great Peace River country will be given that measure of railway relief that will bring to the pioneers of that country the outlet they have been so long denied and will open up the country for prospective settlers.

An hon. MEMBER: Was that before an election?

Mr. IRVINE: Yes, getting pretty close to one. Then Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, speaking I think in Winnipeg in the same year, said:

I have always urged that the north country should have railway relief.

That is not much of a promise; it is like a fish winking at the bait. Then he went on to give a sort of clip on the ear to his opponent, when he said:

I cannot be accused of making futile promises such as the Honourable Mackenzie King promised in the speech from the throne at the opening of the last session of parliament, when he stated he was going to give railway relief to the north country but nothing has been done.

Then I come to the pledge given by Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, now Lord Bennett:

We pledge ourselves to the improvement of the whole scheme of Canadian transportation, northward by the completion of the Hudson bay route and the construction of such branches as may be necessary to render it most readily available to every part of Canada; to the Pacific slope by a Peace River outlet and east and west by the development of the St. Lawrence waterway.

Then I come to the statement of the Minister of Veterans Affairs, which I believe he will stand by to-day:

I believe to-day, when we are going to consider entering upon gigantic projects of public works in the near future, there is, regardless altogether first of partisan considerations and second of the various reports that have been made by engineers, an obligation of honour resting upon this chamber to carry out the promises that were made as long ago I believe as 1924, ten years ago.

That is twenty-one years ago now.

There are other party leaders in the house. I cannot quote them, but I know they have gone on record as favouring this project. I know the hon. gentleman who leads the official opposition has gone on record as favouring the building of the Peace River outlet. My own leader has also definitely said that he was in favour of it. Then the hon. gentleman who sits to my left and who leads the Social Credit group is the member for the constituency of Peace River and, as all members will have noticed, he introduced the subject in his speech when addressing the house during this debate. He also made it clear that this would be one of the things he would strive to achieve while a member of the House of Commons.

So that this makes it unanimous, so far as party leaders are concerned. It is, Mr. Speaker, a matter of honour in this chamber; there is no question about that. But it is more than that; it is also a matter of urgent necessity for the people living in the territories concerned, and a matter of great importance to Canada as a whole. This is a local thing in one sense; but it is such a great "local thing" that it touches all Canada. I believe it has been the major issue in every election, provincial or federal in the Peace River district, at least since 1911, and undoubtedly the promises made have induced many settlers to come in there.

Those settlers have pioneered that great country under severe hardships, and while enduring almost unbearable difficulties. It is the duty of this parliament to see that the people living in the Peace River block, especially those in the Cariboo area, shall not suffer these difficulties any longer, and that they shall no longer have to nurse their disappointment.

Settlers from the dried-out areas of southern Alberta and Saskatchewan came into the area which the proposed railroad would serve. Those people had suffered extensively before they left their old homesteads. They have striven to build new homes in this new country, the Peace River block, and it is not reasonable to ask them to put up with any more misfortune.

As I say, this is not merely a local thing. Surely it is not presumptuous for me to suggest to the government that it is high time it adopted a definite national railways policy in respect of Canada, a policy which will see to it that every part of the community is reached and served, and it will not be a question then of whether this little branch or that little branch pays, but rather whether the whole system pays because of the service rendered to the nation.

It is a very extensive area which would be served by the Peace River outlet. According to a pamphlet issued by the Department of the Interior some years ago, there are 10 million economic acres in the Peace River area alone. Mr. Kennedy, when debating this matter in the house, said that this acreage would allow 6,000 economic acres for every mile of railway, whereas on the prairies only 5,000 economic acres are served by each mile of railway. In addition to that there are the territories which embrace the Prince George country; the Cariboo with its mining, and its extensive ranching, and the Lillooet country still farther south with its agriculture, fruit growing and mining.

The Peace River district therefore, is only a small part of the great territory to be served by a railway of this sort. The resources of the total area are vast and varied. As I have said, the hon. member for Peace River when introducing this subject, referred to the richness of the soil, the advantages of climatic conditions, the growing of all kinds of field crops, and the raising of live stock. The figures will verify his statements.

The 1943 agricultural census is not yet available, so that I cannot give the latest figures. But in 1934 Mr. Kennedy stated in the house that in that year twelve million bushels of wheat were raised in the Peace River country alone. In 1911 Sir Henry Thornton had promised that when the Peace River country produced ten million bushels of wheat for three years, or an equivalent tonnage, it would be economical to build the Peace River outlet. May I point out that the Peace River country alone has had that tonnage since 1925.

As to the quality of the grain raised in that area, one has only to refer to the fact that world championships have nearly all gone out that way. Eighteen world championships were won at Chicago in eight years following 1926, a fact which put Peace River in the forefront of the grain growing areas of the world.

British Columbia has published some facts about this area, and the adjacent country, which would be served by the railway. It speaks of one town, namely Dawson Creek, which has five huge grain elevators, and states that 2,000 head of cattle and 25,000 hogs are shipped out annually. The publication continues:

Hudson Hope area is noted for its mineral wealth, especially of the exceptionally fine Peace River coal and for its production of fur-bearing animals. It is rich in minerals with definite promise of oil production.

Then as a power site the possibilities of the canyon—

That is, the Peace River canyon, which would be tapped by this proposed railway.

—are outstanding. Engineers thoroughly familiar with projects of this nature, have expressed the view that the canyon is capable of developing power for a city of one million people.

Then, as to coal:

It is reliably estimated that in British Columbia Peace River district there is in the neighbourhood of three billion tons.

The coal is second to none and superior to most in any present producing or known field in North America.

It may be extracted at comparatively low cost and loaded in cars at a price permitting it to compete in any west coast port.

And as to timber:

British Columbia Peace River district is estimated to contain 48,000 acres of merchantable timber; 90,500 acres of immature timber of all species, about 160 million board feet in spruce and 32 million board feet in jack pine.

Then, summing up in respect to the resources of the British Columbia Peace River section, the government publication says:

While this folder devotes itself mainly to the agricultural aspects—the opportunities from the industrial standpoint are many and varied. The following suggest themselves as industrial enterprises for which the field is already ripe and waiting: Refrigeration plant, packing plant, dairy products, mill work, coal industry, oil industry and the pulp and paper industry.

Thus it will be seen that there is a vast area of very rich country to be tapped by the building of the Peace River outlet through the Peace River country to the coast.

In passing, might I mention the great productive possibilities of the Cariboo, with its mining and its ranching. That country has been served in a sort of way by a railway known as the P.G. and E. It is a railway which began in the middle, and goes nowhere at each end. I happened to attend a conference of cattle men in the town of Clinton last summer, and there was universal protest against the P.G. and E. for its failure to give proper service. Their greatest objection was the cruelty to the cattle in shipping and the shrinkage caused by the time taken.

I am going to propose to the government that this railroad be taken over as part of the Canadian National Railways; that it be built through along the coast to Vancouver or that it be built south to join with the Canadian National Railways; that it be extended in the north to join at Prince George and that a line be built from there into the Peace River. There would thus be provided an outlet for the Peace River people direct to the coast and a servicing of all that vast territory right through down the valley of the Cariboo.

That is a reasonable proposition. There have been many routes proposed for building this road, but to-night I am not particular about that. A route has been surveyed through the Aggie Obed pass, through the Monkman pass, through the Pine pass and through the Peace pass. At the moment I am not particular through which pass it goes so long as it goes through one of the passes. When the government decides to build the line I shall have something to say as to which pass it should go through, although I would be willing to leave that to the government engineers to settle.

There are rumours that the present government of British Columbia is proposing to offer part of the natural resources of the province as a bait to a private corporation to build this road. This may be just the ordinary pre-election stirring up that has occurred in British Columbia for many years. I have no doubt that some private company may grab this opportunity to get these natural resources, to some of which I have referred to-night. The people themselves want this railroad; they want it so badly that they may even be ready to have it built by a private corporation. However, I assure the house that if they had their way they would have it made part of the Canadian National Railways.

The people are entitled to this road as citizens engaged in economic pursuits essential to their own lives and essential to the whole national economy. They are entitled to it because of the large population which was settled in the area on the strength of promises made by every party leader in Canada for twenty-five years. They are entitled to it because of the volume of wealth that they are producing already, and they are entitled to it because of the possibility of greater wealth through new industries and untapped resources awaiting means of transportation. They are entitled to it, to use the words of the Minister of Veterans Affairs, because it is a moral obligation. Promises to build this road have been made to the people who live in that section of Canada.

There is no question about the practicability of the proposal. There is no question about our ability to find the money. There is no question of the obligation. There is no excuse left to be used for not acting now to do this thing. Therefore I ask that the government include this project as part of its rehabilitation programme and that it proceed at the earliest possible moment to keep its promise to the people of the Peace River and Cariboo districts. It would be a splendid thing if in the crowning years of the Prime Minister's long period of service to the people of Canada he were privileged, not only to introduce a new social order to this country, but to fulfil his pledge to the people of the Peace River district and the people of the Cariboo district made in his election speech in Edmonton in 1924.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join with all those who have spoken in this debate in congratulating you upon having been chosen for the high honour which has been given to you by this house. I wish to associate myself with all those who have spoken in glowing terms of the speeches made by the mover (Mr. Benidickson) and the seconder (Mr. Langlois) of the address in reply. I wish particularly to associate myself with all the remarks of approval that have been made with regard to the speeches of many of the young men, particularly those who have been associated with the armed forces, who have come into this house for the first time. I think I can say without any fear of contradiction from any of the old-timers in the house that never in the experience of any of us has a more promising group of young men come into this house. I apply these remarks to members from all parts of the house who have spoken.

Having extended my congratulations to others, I think in extending a welcome to the fourteen new members from my own province I should congratulate myself upon being here at all. Since this debate began, a number of hon. members have suggested that I have reason to be thankful for the majority which was mine. I must admit that the road over which I travelled during the election was much more difficult than the one I travelled when I contested a constituency with the last speaker. On that occasion I entered this house for the first time as an elected member, and I wish to express to him my appreciation for the opportunity given to me to come here on that occasion.

[Mr. Irvine.]

The election through which I have just passed was made difficult for a number of reasons. One of these was the fact that I was one of I think seven candidates in Canada who had only one opponent. Under our system it is a little more difficult sometimes to get elected when you have only one opponent than it is when you have seven or eight. But when you are all through with such a campaign there is one thing that stands out: if you get here at all you must have had a majority. The fact is that I stand here as one of the minority in this house who reached the house through an absolute majority. With that majority small as it is I wish to address myself to the house on a number of questions which I think are of considerable importance, one of these being the question which was introduced into this debate for the first time by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) and which was spoken to this afternoon by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley).

Before proceeding to do so, I wish to put on the record one reason why my majority was not as great as it might have been. The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), I think it was, called attention to something that he considered to be a fact—I do not know whether it was a fact or not—that some twelve members sitting on this side of the house owed their seats to the cooperation of the C.C.F. party. I can assure the house that I do not owe my seat to the cooperation of the C.C.F. party because, as they will all admit, I had the decided opposition of the C.C.F. Then, too, I had the opposition of my good old friends, the Conservatives. I think I got some of their votes, but that was through no fault of the party as this document which I have in my hand will demonstrate. I have here a circular letter which was sent to the whole mailing list of the Conservative party in my constituency. It opens with a news item in which this statement appears:

> The cabinet ministers being asked to speak in Neepawa include the Honourable J. G. Gardiner . . .

Then it continues:

> As you will note by this item that every effort is being made by the Liberals in the constituency of Neepawa to defeat Honourable John Bracken, so why not, "An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth?" . . .
> Why not, for once, defeat the Honourable J. G. Gardiner in the Melville constituency? It is not necessary to become a member of the C.C.F. party to vote Mr. Gardiner out of office on June 11, 1945.
> Sponsored by the Melville Progressive Conservative Association.

It is signed by the President: Philip Goll.

I put that on the record in order to assure the hon. member from Toronto that there is no doubt about how I was elected in the constituency of Melville. It was not with the cooperation of the C.C.F. party; It was not with the cooperation of the official Conservative party, although probably I had the votes of a number of Conservatives who did not agree with their own party.

Mr. COLDWELL: Who was the other member of that party besides the president in Melville?

Mr. GARDINER: There are not very many but there are some.

Having placed that on the record and cleared up any doubts as to whose support I had and whose opposition I had, may I proceed to a discussion of the address in reply to the speech from the throne; and in so doing I call attention to two or three statements made in that speech. On page 8 of Hansard of September 6 of this session, I find this statement in the speech from the throne:

> To the promotion of national well-being, cooperation and good will between the dominion and provincial governments are as essential as these attitudes, between nations, are to the maintenance of world peace and international prosperity.

That statement is made after the speech has reviewed the accomplishments of our armed forces and of our people during six years of war, and I am sure that those references in the speech are concurred in by everyone in the house.

The speech goes on to refer to the relationships which exist between the national government and the governments of the provinces, which by inference call attention to the relationships which exist between the peoples of the Dominion of Canada as such and the peoples of the different provinces. Coming as I do from Saskatchewan, I want to pay a particular tribute to one group of the population of that province which I shall not refer to as a class in that province but as a part of the citizenship of Saskatchewan and a part of the citizenship of the Dominion of Canada, and I wish to connect up my reference to them with this other statement which is made in the speech from the throne:

> The government also considers that it is advisable to revise and clarify the definition of Canadian citizenship, and to bring the legislation respecting national status, naturalization and immigration into conformity with the definition of citizenship. You will be asked to approve the required measures.

I know of nothing which I have heard more criticized during my association with the people of Saskatchewan throughout the more than thirty years in which I have represented a constituency in that province than the fact that it is very difficult for us to convince a court or any official organization in the Dominion of Canada that we have a right to call ourselves Canadians. Therefore I hope that when this legislation is brought down it will make it perfectly plain to everyone in this house and outside it that we as a people in Canada have at least the right to designate ourselves as Canadians wherever we may appear. In associating myself with that point of view, I wish to say something with regard to the service of our people in this war.

Our population in Saskatchewan is composed to about forty-six per cent of people who came there from the continent of Europe or whose fathers and mothers came from the continent of Europe. I have in my constituency people who have come from every nation that has been fighting in this war on one side or the other, and they all want to be called Canadians. I want to say to this house now what I could not have said during the war—and I emphasize it now because we could not speak as openly during the war as we can now—that I want to associate myself with everyone in Saskatchewan and everyone outside it who have throughout this war resented the position that was taken in relation to the first great war and in relation to this, that men who have been naturalized as Canadian citizens were called upon to report to the mounted police throughout the last war and in the early period of this war. That is one of the reasons why we in Saskatchewan want to be designated as Canadians and feel that we ought to be treated as Canadians.

In addition, I wish to associate myself with those who during this war found themselves called up to serve in the N.R.M.A. forces or any other place when they had to submit to the indignity of having their parents told that they were aliens and could not receive naturalization in this country because they could not read or write either the English or the French language. Any parents in Canada who are willing to be citizens of this country and who are prepared to raise sons who enter the armed forces of this country ought to be considered capable of becoming Canadian citizens, whether they can read or write or not.

In order to impress upon the house my point of view in relation to these matters at this time, when we are congratulating ourselves upon the service which has been given by our people throughout the length and breadth of the land, may I say that when I look for the record of the heroes of this war

I do not look among the civilian population, many of whom are to be congratulated upon their very great and effective service in helping to prosecute the war. When I look for the heroes in this war I do not look in the headquarters staff or in the groups of men extending from the city of Ottawa to the city of London, filling important official positions, which are necessary in connection with the administration of affairs having to do with the war. Nor do I look in the N.R.M.A. forces or in the forces of those who have volunteered but who for one reason or another have not found it possible to get to the front lines. All glory and all honour to them for having attempted to do so in their own way. I look for the real heroes of this or any other war in the front lines, in the air, on the land and on the sea, and when one puts that test to the people of Saskatchewan I do not care whether the man says, "Me no speak English". While a little over forty per cent of the population of our province bears the names of nationalities that had their origin on the continent of Europe, a little under forty per cent of the men who gave their lives for this country from Saskatchewan bear those same names. That to me, Mr. Speaker, is the reason why I glory with these people in the fact that they can come to me and you and say: I have lost my son, too. We are all on common ground; we are all on a common level; we all have given a common service, and out of that common service have come all the honours that are due to all men who have served overseas, whatever their nationality or however they got to the front line.

Having said these things with regard to the war itself and our association with it from the province of Saskatchewan, may I call to your attention the fact that there is another matter here which has been referred to indirectly on a number of occasions. A bill to merge the Department of Munitions and Supply and the Department of Reconstruction into a single Department of Reconstruction and Supply will be introduced. If I understand that bill correctly, it is a bill which sets up a department to be presided over by the minister who down to the present has been the Minister of Munitions and Supply, a department which is to be provided with funds in very much the same way as the defence departments were provided with funds during the war, and other departments of government which are associated with reconstruction will have to convince those connected with that department of the necessity for doing certain works in which they are interested in order to have an expenditure of money made upon them.

In so far as my own department is concerned, one of the outstanding ventures upon which we have been urging that money should be spent, and for the expenditure of which we have had the support of quite a number of hon. members from western Canada who have spoken up to the present time, is the expenditure of money upon water conservation and irrigation. In my reference to this I include hon. members of every party, because the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act was introduced first in 1935 by my predecessor the Minister of Agriculture in the Bennett government, and one hon. member sitting opposite was a member of the first committee appointed and remained a member of that committee until he became a member of this house after I took over the Department of Agriculture. We have had it constantly urged by those from western Canada who belong to other parties that the rehabilitation work under this act is most important. Therefore I would say that while, since I took over the department, we have spent $20 million upon irrigation work and the re-grassing of lands and the fencing of sub-marginal lands, we look upon that as only the beginning of a very important development in the western part of Canada. I can assure the house that the support which has been given to these operations up to now has been greatly appreciated by those associated with me in this work.

I said in the beginning that one of the reasons why I wished to speak to-night was to deal with a question which has been before this house in one form or another during the greater part of this session. It has to do with meat. In order to have meat at all you must have it produced, and our association in the Department of Agriculture with meat is that we are responsible for direction in connection with policies having to do with its production.

In order that I may place the facts with regard to meat production before the house, I consider it advisable that I should recall one or two of the criticisms which have been made of policies followed down to the present time. The first of these I find in the speech of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken), when he stated, as reported in Hansard, at page 31:

> If there is need for rationing, the government is, to a great extent, responsible for it.

In leading up to that statement the leader of the opposition dealt with the matter of price for hogs in relation to prices of grain, and called attention to the fact that we have a reduction in hog production in Canada in 1945 as compared with 1944. I wish to deal for a few moments with the position taken.

The leader of the opposition raised three questions: the need for rationing, government Policy on production, and the relation of price to production.

With regard to the first, the need for rationing, I think it is unnecessary that I should say very much to-night. This afternoon the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) gave the house the statistics with regard to our position, and in giving them placed before hon. members the real reasons for the establishment of rationing in Canada. But I want to put the matter in the manner in which I heard it put yesterday by the minister of one of our leading churches in presenting the same problem to his congregation; and in putting it in the manner he did, he said he was only repeating the statement of a leading minister from New York who spoke the other day in Toronto. What he finally said was this, that after we have produced all the food we can produce in Canada and in the United States; after there has been produced in the other countries of the world which are favourable to such action, all the food that they can produce, and after we have rationed ourselves to the limit, according to our present information over 300,000 children will die in Europe this winter for want of food. Statements of that kind may not have as much of reasoning behind them as some of the facts which we present in this house, but they appeal to the hearts of the people of Canada as they do to the hearts of the people of the United States. I know that the flying men who flew over Europe thought more of the children whose lives they might save in the end than they did of anyone else. I know that the fighting men and those who sailed the seas had the same feeling; all one had to do was to look at the many pictures brought back from the front and placed upon the screen, in order to see that anyone who desired to work upon the feelings of our people had only to place before us a little child; and if over 300,000 children in Europe are threatened with death this year, the question of whether there should or should not be rationing should not worry us very much if we feel that rationing and production will provide them with more food.

As a matter of fact the question which arises in this regard is whether rationing interferes with production. Some people argue that it does; some argue that it does not. But the government has decided that, whether it does or not, there will be a greater amount of food supplied to the needy nations under rationing because of the reductions in consumption than would be kept from the people of Europe because of any reductions in production owing to the fact that we have rationing; therefore, on balance, more food will be available under rationing.

That is the first point I wish to make in connection with this discussion, namely that rationing would have been necessary to meet the shortage in Europe, no matter what the production.

I have before me this evening the figures of production. I have the facts with regard to the accomplishment of farmers in Canada in meat production during the war. In answering the question as to what are the facts, I shall confine myself to two main classes, namely, beef and pork. There have been similar results in the others. The table which I am going to ask the privilege of placing upon Hansard is one that indicates production, exports and estimated consumption from 1938 to 1945. If I have the permission of the house I will put it on Hansard, as follows:

Production and Distribution of Meat

	Beef
Year	Total production [1]	Exports [2]	Used for canning and by non-civilians	Total for civilian consumption [3]
	000 lb.	000 lb.	000 lb.	000 lb.

[3] Same as note [3] above.
[4] Estimate.
Note.—Apparent discrepancies in these figures are accounted for by year end carryovers of meat.

These statistics show that our production of beef went up from 700,080,000 pounds to over one billion pounds between 1938 and 1945. They show that production of hogs went up from over 587,000,000 pounds to over 1,504,000,000 pounds in 1944 and dropped back to 1,149,000,000 pounds in 1945. They show that exports of beef to the United States and the United Kingdom went up from 62,000,000 pounds in 1938 to over 158,000,000 pounds in 1945, while our exports of pork went from 178,885,000 pounds in 1938 to 719,000,000 pounds in 1944 and dropped back to 451,000,000 pounds in 1945. Of course, that last figure is an estimate. These figures show that our domestic consumption of beef and pork rose from 1,058,643,000 pounds in 1938 to 1,386,836,000 pounds in 1944 when not under control, and we estimate will fall to 1,314,489,000 pounds under controls in 1945.

In other words, while our production was doubling, our consumption, with all the purchasing power and freedom of purchase this country can ever hope for, increased by about 33 per cent. This would tend to show that the home market does not and will not for many years consume our possible production.

These figures show that production of meat in 1943 was approximately the same as is estimated for 1945 and that exports will be greater in 1945 and home consumption less. If one were to take the 1942 figures and compare them with 1945, the results would be even more favourable. The figures for the year 1942, the complete year 1943, and the complete year 1945 . . .

An hon. MEMBER: 1944.

Mr. GARDINER: . . . 1945, established the peak production of meat which is possible under normal conditions upon our farms. The year 1944 was an abnormal one in hog production and cannot be considered as anything else in establishing a sound agricultural policy for this country; and in order to show why that is so it will be necessary for me to place other statistics on Hansard with regard to grain production. The figures are as follows:

Production of grain crops in Canada 1938-44
(Millions of bushels)

	Wheat	Oats	Barley
1938	360·0	371·3	102·2
1939	520·6	384·4	103·1
1940	540·1	380·5	104·2
1941	314·8	305·5	110·5
1942	556·6	651·9	259·1
1943	284·4	482·0	215·5
1944	435·5	499·6	194·7
*1945	321·4	388·2	161·1

* First estimate Sept. 5/45.

Live stock production and finishing of live stock in Canada depends upon grain production in Canada. Eastern farmers never do produce and cannot produce the feed grains necessary to feed all the live stock they have facilities and other feeds for. Live stock production is therefore limited by the production of feed grains in western Canada. The general production figures for the same years are contained in the table which I have just placed on Hansard and which is much shorter than the previous one.

It will be noted that the production of oats and barley in 1942 was more than double that of any previous year. It will also be noted that wheat production was only slightly lower in two previous years if hon. members will refer to the table I have placed before the house.

Those who claim that wheat production has been encouraged at the expense of live stock production should also note that the reduction in wheat production for the years following 1942, as compared with those before, is much greater than the reduction in feed grains. In other words, these statements made with regard to the trends in the production of meats and other live stock products as compared with wheat are largely picked out of the air and based upon nothing.

Prior to 1942, when we were producing from 305,000,000 to 384,000,000 bushels of oats annually and from 102,000,000 to 110,000,000 bushels of barley, we completed the period right down to July 31, 1942, with only one month's carryover of feed for the live stock we had in this country. Therefore everyone who wanted greater live stock production in order to assist in the war was delighted when in 1942 we came to the end of that season with twice as much feed grain as we had ever produced in this country in any one year previously. It is that feed grain which we produced in 1942 which has not only carried this country to the greatest heights of production in live stock products which it has ever experienced but helped to carry the United States to the same heights of production in order that we might be able to place at the disposal of Britain and her allies the supplies of meat necessary to feed her armies and her civilian population. But in doing that, hon. members will note by the figures which have been placed before the house, the production of coarse grains has gone down year by year since 1942. Some people say, "Yes; that is because you have encouraged the production of wheat."

But the production of wheat has gone down even more than that of coarse grains. I have heard men in this house, since this debate began, calling attention to the fact, or stating that it was a fact, that because hog production is down the income of farmers in Canada is down. The income of farmers from live stock in 1945 as compared with 1944 is down by $14,000,000, but the income of farmers on grain production is down by $44,000,000. In other words, our grain production has been going down year by year since 1942, with the result that we enter the year 1945-46 with only two months' supply of feed grains in the bins of the country, sufficient to feed the live stock we have for two months. On top of that we have the most limited production of grain we have had in the dominion for some years and particularly since 1942.

That brings me to this statement, that when we are considering a policy for agriculture in a country like Canada, with 700,000 farmers, the best policy for us to follow is one of placing the facts before the farmers from one end of the country to the other well in advance of the new season, and we have been doing that in December of the previous year, ever since the war started, and then telling them our desires and asking them to try to meet those desires.

I am sure the leader of the opposition will agree with me when I say that no man knows more about how to run a farm than the man who milks the cows. I am quite sure he will agree with that. The man who milks the cows and feeds the pigs, if he has all the information, knows more about how to run a farm than anyone else. When 700,000 farmers see their bins filled to capacity they increase their production. When 700,000 farmers look into their bins and see their supplies going down day by day, week by week and month by month, the only sensible thing for them to do is to try to feed fewer live stock. So we have tried to place the earnings from live stock on approximately the same basis as the earnings from grain. Then we have said to the farmers, take stock of your conditions. When you have taken stock remember that until now you could sell every pound of any live stock product you produced, but until now you have found it difficult to market your wheat in the volume you have been producing it. Therefore we have said the tendency ought to be to get down on wheat and up on feed grain and live stock production. In 1943-44 hog production increased because the bins were overflowing.

But no farmer can produce more live stock without grain; and I can say to the house now, without fear of contradiction from any farmer in Canada, that unless we have a more bountiful crop in the summer of 1946 than we have had in the summer of 1945 it will be absolutely impossible for our farmers to increase their live stock production before the end of 1946.

With these facts before us we came to the conclusion that while it was all very well to use the argument last spring in February, March and April that rationing might reduce production we are now looking at the present crop; and we know that meat production cannot be immediately increased. We know that the statement made in the question asked me the other day was absolutely correct. In western Canada this year we have the poorest crop we have had since 1937. For an area taking in almost half the Saskatchewan grain growing area and a little more than half the Alberta grain growing area the crop this year is poorer than during any of the 1930's with the exception of 1937. With that fact before us we know there is not the grain in this country to produce more live stock, even if we had all the other facilities necessary for such production. So that our policy for 1945-46 must be governed by those facts.

Then I said that one other question had been raised, having to do with price as related to production, and I wish to take a few moments to deal with that point. At page 28 of Hansard the leader of the opposition is reported to have said:

> Some two years ago the government announced an export equalization bonus of fifteen cents per bushel for barley and ten cents for oats. Immediately farmers started to cut down hog production.

Then a little further down the same page he said:

> This is chiefly due to the government's policy of keeping hog prices so far out of line with feed prices as to discourage hog production.

I have already attempted to show the house that the real reason for the decrease in hog production is associated with the fact that grain supplies have been going down steadily. I personally went to the United States twice in 1943, when the Americans were pleading for more feed with which to feed their live stock, and announced to them that we had 900,000,000 bushels of grain stored in our elevators and on our farms in Canada. As a result of those two trips we did make an arrangement under which, in the fall of 1943, our grain went to the United States in great volume to assist in the finishing of their cattle as well as our own. In making that arrangement we provided for these bonuses upon feed grain. One only needs to quote the figures, which are published weekly and are available to all farmers and agricultural experts throughout the country, to indicate that the policy followed does not keep hog prices out of line with feed prices. The last issue put out by the meat board on September 20, 1945, gives these figures:

Hog-feed ratios	Hog-barley Winnipeg	Hog-feed Toronto
Long-time average..	17·4	6·7
Last week.....	22·9 (19·5)	7·7 (8·3)
Previous week	22·9 (19·5)	7·7 (8·3)
August, 1945	22·5 (20·6)	8·0 (9·1)

Note: Figures in brackets indicate ratio when 15 cents added to barley price at Winnipeg and dominion premium on hogs added to price at Winnipeg and Toronto.

I am sure every authority in this house will agree when I say that before the war, when that ratio was above 17·4, which was the long-time average, it was always considered that it paid a man to feed the barley to the hogs rather than to sell it. Since the beginning of the war, however, because of the higher cost of labour, we have been inclined to say that the figure where farmers would question hovered somewhere around 20, which is about the position of those in western Canada who have had grain to sell, if you add the 15 and 10 cents to the ceiling prices. The ratio was 19·5 last week and the week before and 20·6 for the month of August. In other words, the relationship as between barley and hogs in western Canada is almost exactly what it ought to be to permit of farmers deciding, to feed or sell barley, and that is where we have been trying to keep it.

This simply means that a farmer in the west must make a decision, and must have an argument with himself as to whether it pays best to feed barley or to sell it, and that is exactly the position in which we wanted him. The reason is that the farmers of eastern Canada, from lake Huron to the Atlantic, cannot grow sufficient grain with which to feed their live stock. They must get it from western Canada. If we should create conditions in the west under which all the grain was to be kept there, these live stock men in the east would have to go without their barley, and the extent to which they would get out of hog production would reduce production in this country very much more than would be the case if a number of farmers on the western plains decided to sell a certain quantity of barley rather than to feed it. So that we say our policy has benefited feed grain prices as compared with live stock prices to the extent necessary to make it possible for us, over the whole period of the war, to set an all-time record for the production of live stock and live stock products throughout the dominion.

Now, for a moment I wish to call attention to the contracts with Britain, because, after all, those contracts have established the floors right from the beginning of the war down to the present time. We have made six contracts so far, and I want to give the figures for the first five, because they bear upon the statement made by the leader of the opposition, who said we gave a sort of belated support to the hog producers by making possible a $3 premium on grade A hogs in the spring of 1944. Well, we did more than that, as the figures will show. The British contracts have set the floor prices of hogs since the beginning of the war. The first was on the basis of $17.70 per one hundred pounds of bacon and ham. The second opened at $17 and closed at $19.60. The third was on the basis of $19.90; the fourth was at $21.95 and the fifth at $22.70. That will indicate that there was an increase of seventy-five cents in the 1944 contract, as compared with 1943. In addition to that, the government paid a premium of $3 and $2, which made the increase to the farmer as great as the average increase in any previous contract. And that was the contract signed eventually to cover the period down to December 31, 1946. So to-day we are committed to send to Great Britain not less than 450 million pounds of bacon and ham, based upon that particular price. The table I have already placed upon Hansard will show that we estimate at this time that with rationing we shall probably be able to send to Great Britain about 451 million pounds. This is very much less than the 717 million pounds we sent in 1944; but the 717 million pounds we sent in 1944 amounted to just about 75 million pounds more than anybody ever expected we would be able to send. It was our abnormal year.

If we in the Dominion of Canada can produce 450 million pounds of bacon a year over and above what we require in this country, for the years that are ahead of us we shall just about be able to supply that part of the British market which we hope to retain after this war is over. Therefore we are asking every farmer in this country who has been accustomed to produce hogs, who likes to produce hogs, who has the facilities for producing hogs, and who can produce hogs on the present return—and more particularly if he can produce them at a lower return, and still make a profit—to stay in the business and help us to retain that market which we have done so much to build up during this period of war.

May I say in conclusion that we have made exactly the same kind of arrangement with regard to cattle. That contract extends down to December 31, 1946. There is no one in Canada who needs to have any fear that the price will be cut in the marketing of these live stock products between now and the end of 1946, below the minimum which the contract establishes, if the stock is marketed orderly and the plants operate at capacity.

After that we have the floor price measure to help us. After that we have family allowances. After that we have all the social services that have been organized by this government for the Dominion of Canada.

We are asked: How are we going to finance it?

Not by policies that have been presented to this House of Commons by the socialists; not by policies that have been presented to this house by the Social Crediters; not by policies that have been presented to this house by the official opposition.

We intend to meet that problem by the good old policy of Liberalism. It is based, it is true, upon Manchestrian free trade, as our C.C.F. friends claim. But, Mr. Speaker, it is on the revised edition of it—brought out first in 1906 by Lloyd George, applied to Great Britain in the form of unearned increment taxes—about which my honourable friend from The Battlefords (Mr. Campbell) spoke the other day; applied through income taxes upon earnings; applied through unearned increment taxes of all kinds.

Mr. ROWE: The highest protection we have ever had!

Mr. GARDINER: We in the Dominion of Canada have followed the same plan from the time the present leader of the Liberal party became its leader down to the present time. During the war we have developed it to a point to which it has never been developed by any other country in the world.

Mr. ROWE: Because nobody understands it.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, my hon. friend does not understand it.

Mr. ROWE: Neither do you.

Mr. GARDINER: His thoughts are governed by old-time Tory doctrines. He never looks at it with the mind of one who could understand Liberalism.

Mr. ROWE: The highest protection we have ever had!

Mr. GARDINER: The people of the world understand it; other nations of the world understand it.

Mr. ROWE: But you do not.

Mr. GARDINER: And they have eulogized this government and this country upon the great assistance we have given in the prosecution of the war. How has it been done?

Mr. ROWE: By noise.

Mr. GARDINER: The people of the world understand it; other nations of the world understand it, and they have eulogized this government and this country upon the great assistance we have given in the prosecution of the war. How has it been done? While my friends opposite have been talking about doing something, this government has gone into the treasuries of big business and small business and taken out all unusual profits in the form of excess profits taxes, in the form of corporation income taxes, and in the form of individual income taxes. In the total they have taken out $1,600 million. We have spent a great part of it to perform those services which every one in this house who has spoken has eulogized, in prosecuting the war in the manner in which it has been prosecuted. They have spent another part of it in providing funds to establish social services; and the final effort of the government in that direction has been the placing of floor prices under farm products, to the extent of $200 million, and the placing of opportunity in the hands of the people of Canada to attain purchasing power, by distributing $250 million in family allowances.

So that Liberals, as usual, have been acting while others have been talking. I submit that the expenditures we have arranged for will not take all the $1,600 million, and that therefore it is still possible to lower taxation and perform the services.

Mr. COLDWELL: Just to have one point clear, I should like to ask the minister a question. He has mentioned figures concerning exports of meat. Did those figures include exports to our armed forces, or do they appear elsewhere?

Mr. GARDINER: Well, I think all the meat which went overseas was included in the agreement we made with Great Britain.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is, Great Britain supplies our troops overseas.

Mr. GARDINER: That is my understanding of it, that under the agreement all bacon and beef that go overseas go over under this agreement.

Mr. COLDWELL: And go to our army afterwards.

Mr. GARDINER: They are included in those figures.

Mr. C. E. STEPHENSON (Durham): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak for the first time in the House of Commons I wish to say I consider it an honour to be one of its new members, and trust that I shall be capable of contributing in some small measure to the task of governing this great country of ours, Canada.

First, permit me, sir, to congratulate you upon being elected to the high office you now hold. Upon assuming the office of Speaker of the House of Commons on the opening day of the session perhaps you felt slightly nervous, as I do at the present time.

To the two new supporters of the government who moved and seconded the address in reply, and who so recently served in His Majesty's forces, may I also add my congratulations.

With the kind indulgence of hon. members I shall endeavour briefly to express my views on a few matters which I consider are of paramount importance at the present time.

Many hon. members who have spoken during this debate have referred to their constituencies—their locations, their industrial production and their human and economic problems. In this way we in the central provinces of Canada have learned something of the eastern and western provinces and the conditions that there exist. We have thus all been enabled to gain a more comprehensive understanding of the over-all problems we shall be called upon to deal with in the near future. Therefore I should like to say a few words about the district, and particularly the county I have the honour to represent.

Durham county, one of the fine counties in Canada, is situated in Ontario about 225 miles west of this city. It fronts on the north shore of lake Ontario. Durham is predominantly an agricultural county and it contains many fine farms where the raising of pure bred stock is carried on. There are also many fine orchards in the county which grow some of the finest apples in Canada. About five years ago it was discovered that there was a fairly large acreage suitable for the growing of tobacco and to-day tobacco growing has developed into a large industry.

Scattered throughout the county are several prosperous towns and villages. News is supplied to Durham county by weekly and daily newspapers, one being the finest weekly in Canada, the Bowmanville Statesman. There is one daily paper, the Port Hope Guide, which has been published continuously since 1831. In the large centres are situated several factories, one being a large rubber industry which produces great quantities of synthetic tires. Other factories produce plumbers' supplies, conveyers, fertilizers and other commodities. Located in Durham county is the only file factory in the British empire.

Here also is located a great radium refinery that contributed much to the making of the atomic bomb which brought the fanatical Japanese nation so speedily to its knees and won a victorious conclusion of the war for the allied nations. Hon. members may be interested in hearing something of the part the radium refinery in Durham county played in the making of the atomic bomb. Some years ago while prospecting in the Northwest Territories Mr. Gilbert Labine landed his plane near Great Bear lake and by following around the east coast of the lake discovered a vein of pitchblende ore from which radium is refined. The discovery was of great interest not only to Canada but to the whole world, because it was well known that only a few countries in the world possessed deposits of pitchblende ore.

Shortly after the discovery was made a refinery was built in Durham county. The concentrated pitchblende ore was flown out by plane to the head of the great lakes and shipped from there to the refinery. Monsieur Marcel Pochon, who I understand is the only living pupil of Madame Curie, the great scientist, came to Canada to take charge of the new refinery which in a few years was supplying the rare metallic element known as radium to the world. Also produced from pitchblende ore is the heaviest element known, uranium. This was produced in quantity at the refinery and was first used for the glazing of earnthenware, but we are now given to understand that it is from this element that the atomic bomb was created.

It may be asked why the refinery was located in Durham county when the pitchblende ore deposits were hundreds of miles away up at Great Bear lake. As explained to me, the reason is that it requires about seven times the amount of chemicals in weight for the refining process as the weight of the concentrated ore itself, and it is therefore more economical to fly the ore out from Great Bear lake than to transport the necessary chemicals to the location of the pitchblende deposits. We have all read of the might and destruction of this new discovery, which is almost incomprehensible. While we are fervently thankful it was the scientists of the united nations who first learned how in some measure to control this energy, let us hope that it will be controlled so that in the future it may be used, not for destruction but for the good of all mankind. I trust that what I have had to say of Durham county has been of interest to hon. members.

With regard to the conditions and problems that face the people of Canada, I believe at the present time the housing situation is of first importance. The need for houses is desperate, and especially is this so in the county I represent. With your permission, sir, I should like to read from an article which appeared in the Bowmanville Statesman of September 6. This reads:

> Too little and too late has been the charge most frequently laid against the Ottawa government. Its recent emergency orders covering the housing situation have come too late for at least one returned soldier of this town. Here is the story. Born in Bowmanville this lad enlisted the week war broke out. Married in England, he fought in Italy, was captured, suffered from malaria in a German prison camp, was repatriated, got a job at home. His wife and small child rejoined him here, have since lived in temporary, emergency quarters. With winter coming on they have sought to find a suitable home.

But none were available. The article continues:

> His reaction was as characteristic as the impulse which led him to enlist. He resigned his job and has booked passage with wife and child to return to England. There, among friends still suffering war's privations they will seek both a job and a home. These are the simple facts in the case, just one case by the way, that points to the indifference of a government and a people whose boast was that we should make this land fit for heroes to live in.

The rehabilitation committees and building contractors are doing their best to alleviate these conditions, but they find they are running into difficulty because no priorities for building materials have been granted to build veterans' homes. This being the case, why does the government not come out and make a plain statement to the public as to the actual conditions that exist? No doubt thousands of letters are being written every day to the various departments of government and to members of this house making futile efforts to find out the real answer to this housing problem.

There also seems to be no understanding in the smaller municipalities as to just how the various housing schemes work. I have had several individuals and small contractors write me to inquire, "Where do we go from here?" It is true there has been different housing legislation enacted and published, but what could John Jones, say, learn from reading subsection 27 of section 2 of the National Housing Act, which reads:

> (27) "Minister" means the Minister of Finance and includes, in paragraph 6 of this section, paragraphs (b), (c), (g), (i), (j) and (k) of subsection 2 of section 4, paragraphs (a), (f), (g), (h), (i), and (j) of subsection 2 of section 8, subsection 2, paragraphs (a), (b), (e), (f), (g), (h), (i), (j), and (k) of subsection 3 and paragraphs (a), (c), (e) and (g) of subsection 4 of section 9, paragraphs (a), (c) and (d) of subsection 2 and paragraph (a) of subsection 3 of section 11, paragraphs (a) and (b) of subsection 2 of section 12, paragraph (a) of subsection 1 of section 14 and subsection 1 of section 15 of this act, a person designated by the minister to act on his behalf.

This may be good practice in learning the alphabet, for it seems that only a few letters are left out, but I imagine John Jones will be asking the $64 question, "Who is what?"

It must be remembered that the men interested in building houses are business men, not Philadelphia lawyers, and I suggest that simple and concise instructions be published to guide them, with regard not only to housing but all other government rules and regulations with which the ordinary business man must deal and to which he is subjected. I venture to suggest that if free enterprise were given a free hand we would soon have the houses built which are so urgently needed.

I should also like to deal for a short time with the subject of controls. It is but reasonable that in war time any government is justified in setting up certain central controls. Such controls were set up by the present government, and it might be said that on the whole the people of Canada complied with the regulations admirably, in spite of all with which they had to contend. The government has informed us that these controls are being removed as speedily as possible, but that some will have to be retained and perhaps other emergency controls added. We trust that this is not just a way to retain these bureaucratic offices. No doubt many hon. members have been amazed at the attitude of some of those who were appointed as inspectors and officers in charge of the wartime prices and trade board offices throughout the country. These appointees were no doubt put in their offices to assist the public and to serve the people, but many have assumed the role of dictator. To bear out my statement, I will cite an incident which happened in my constituency.

The roof blew off a building in which were stored perishable goods. The owner went to the wartime prices and trade board office with the request that he be granted enough roofing to replace the damage. After considerable humming and hawing the answer was: "Why do you guys have to bother me on a hot day like this? I will think about it."

Another instance. I appealed to the board on behalf of a man in my constituency for a tire for his car. This man lives eight miles from town and drives in each morning, bringing with him two sons to attend school. This man is a diabetic case, but in spite of his handicap was working in the flour mills all day. At night he picked up his boys and returned home. I think hon. members will agree with me that this man was doing a real job working under such conditions and trying to educate two sons, but I was informed that he would not be granted a tire, and that if I encouraged such requests I would only be adding to their work. If we are still to be harnessed with controls, surely the government can issue instructions to the employees in these offices to be reasonable, and at least civil to the public.

In connection with youth training, I should like to speak for a few moments of a situation that has arisen in my constituency. We have located there the Bowmanville boys' training school, with an average of 500 or 600 boys to be looked after annually. This boys' training school was conceived as a foster home for underprivileged children generally lacking proper home environment, and it has achieved a magnificent record. Pupils are cared for between the ages of seven and sixteen, and records show that after graduation literally hundreds have joined the armed forces and served with distinction and, coming home, have voiced their appreciation of the gifts given them by teachers and supervisors. Others have gone on to college for professional careers, while hundreds more have entered honourable occupations in various spheres as first-class citizens.

It will be seen, therefore, that the school deals in human values of the highest character. This school has been the means of doing some very useful work from its inception, but in 1941 the dominion government took it over and converted it for use as a camp for German officer prisoners, and it was so used until April, 1945, when these prisoners were removed to other accommodation. Since then the main buildings and grounds have been empty and neglected and now present a scene of utter desolation. Doors and windows swing open to the elements; birds nest among the fixtures; lawns and gardens are deep with weeds.

I understand that the dominion government, under a signed agreement with the government of Ontario, undertook to restore the property to its original use immediately the German prison camp was done away with, and restore it to the same condition in which it was prior to 1941. I trust that the dominion government will take immediate steps to fufil that agreement in order that the splendid work of the Bowmanville boys' training school may be carried on under suitable conditions.

There is a matter of importance, Mr. Speaker, which I think should be discussed by the dominion-provincial conference when it resumes this fall. It is that of conservation and reforestation. Considerable study has been given to this matter, and action should be taken as soon as possible to remedy the serious degree of soil erosion that is taking place in certain districts throughout Canada. I realize that during the war it was impossible for the government to give this matter attention, but I hope that as a post-war measure the dominion government will give every assistance possible to the provinces and municipalities in reforestation and flood-control measures in order to check the ever-increasing depletion of the best of our soil, on which we depend for our very existence.

In Durham county a survey of the Ganaraska watershed has recently been completed, and I have had the honour to be a member of the advisory board. This watershed covers the greater part of the county. The turbulent Ganaraska river drains the watershed, and it has been revealed that in one year 32,000 cubic yards of top soil has been dredged from the Port Hope harbour into which the river empties. It has also been revealed that there are over 20,000 acres of land in the county resembling a miniature desert, which must be reforested as soon as possible to prevent the blow sand from covering up adjoining valuable acres. The property damage caused by one flood has been estimated at $100,000, and to remind hon. gentlemen how serious soil depletion can become, I need only remind them that history informs us that the Sahara desert was once the granary of the Roman empire, and it is still to-day encroaching on the fertile lands surrounding it. We are anxious in Durham county that speedy action be taken by the dominion and provincial governments to remedy the conditions of which I have just spoken.

There is another matter of importance which I think should be discussed at the coming dominion-provincial conference. It is my opinion that there should be a national minimum wage act covering the whole of Canada, and the wage set should be sufficient to enable every one in this country, no matter what his or her occupation, to live decently and enjoy those things in life to which he or she is justly entitled.

Another matter which I feel should be given consideration at this conference is the extending of our research efforts in Canada, and lending every assistance possible to the universities engaged in this work. We have in Canada great natural resources, but it would appear that we have been content in the past to barter and sell them in their natural state rather than to process them in this country. I believe that through research many new uses may be found for those natural resources with which Canada has so generously been endowed. We could then encourage factories to locate here, and in this way we would supply labour as well as be adding to the national income.

In closing, I just wish to say a word about a distinctive national flag for Canada, about which we have heard so much. It reminds me of questions which are asked in this house on the order of the day and with regard to which you say: "There is no urgency about the matter." I feel that there is no urgency about the selection of a new national flag in Canada. I think the people of Canada as a whole should be given an opportunity to say whether they want a distinctive flag or not. I am not unmindful that in 1940 all that stood between us and possible destruction was the union jack of old England.

I should also like to pay tribute to all those members of the house who served in the last war or in this war, and finally as a member of parliament I wish to pay my tribute also to all those who have served in any of the armed forces of Canada. I am sure that hon. members will join with me in remembering those who have paid the supreme sacrifice and in expressing our deepest sympathy with those who sorrow for their loss.

Mr. E. G. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I rise with great humility to speak for the first time in this house, recognizing the great responsibility and the honour which have been placed upon me. I arrived in this city on September 2 and came immediately to this building. The beauty and majesty of it thrilled me, and I rededicated myself, sir, to carrying out with the best I have within me the new responsibilities which have been entrusted to me.

The speech from the throne indicates that it is the intention of the government to beautify Ottawa and district. This project is to be highly commended, for things of beauty are in harmony with man's highest ideals and deepest longings. But I am also reminded of little fishing villages where fishermen and their families eke out a living; of the slums in our great cities; of farms which have become derelict and of farmers and their families who, through a vicious, outworn and outmoded system, have had to leave their homes. I remember these conditions which I have seen. I submit to all hon. members that, when we are thinking of a memorial to those who have suffered and sacrificed in this war, and when we realize that the heartaches and sufferings are not only for the duration of the war but will continue for years to come, all of us should dedicate ourselves to building a memorial in the form of a new Canada based upon a system which will give opportunity and security to all our people.

During the debate many hon. members have spoken about their own constituencies, but I should like first to focus the attention of hon. members upon our national and our international problems. I believe I voice the unanimous opinion of the party to which I have the honour to belong when I say that the winning of the war and the winning of the peace are two aspects of the same problem.

Winning the peace—a part of this problem—lies before us, and as Dwight D. Eisenhower is reported to have said when he arrived in the United States a few weeks ago, it is the bigger job which still lies before us. To-day, when the sacrifices of this war have given us another chance to win the peace, in my opinion it is the real emergency facing us.

Referring to the speech from the throne, I am a little disturbed at the vagueness of its allusions to what may or may not be put before us in the way of legislation. To begin with I would point out that in the building of a new Canada we must recognize that we are not French Canadians and English Canadians, but Canadians, and that we are not only citizens of Canada but also citizens of the world. We must recognize that in formulating a domestic policy for Canada we have a responsibility to the world.

The problems of housing and employment which face us to-day are tremendous and pressing; but at this time I desire to deal with some other questions. First, there is the idea of an emergency. As I understood some hon. members, in discussing the present emergency their idea seemed to be that if we could muddle through in some way for the next year or two, if we could deal with reconversion and the housing shortage, somehow or another we would get out on the broad plane of economic stability. In my opinion we could make no greater mistake, because while we have these immediate problems to-day, the biggest problems will arise after the pent-up purchasing power which exists to-day is exhausted. After the accumulated domestic and foreign demands for consumer goods have been dealt with, then what? Therefore, I say that to-day we should be planning for making fundamental changes; we should be establishing the four freedoms, recognizing the implications of the united nations food conference at Hot Springs, Virginia, where a minimum standard of living was set up for all the peoples of the world. We should so establish the Canadian economy as to be able to fit in with any plans for world order or world peace which may evolve out of the San Francisco conference.

During the war our government has failed on many counts. I would point out something which has not been mentioned here this session, namely the government's responsibility for moral leadership. It is a disgraceful thing that during a period of national dislocation the government has allowed the liquor industry of this country, controlled by private enterprise, to undermine the morale of our people. We are threatened with a serious condition of moral decay, for which in future we may have to pay in a wave of crime and a weakening of citizenship and leadership. The time has come to do away with corruption in high places. Parliament through this government should take responsibility for moral leadership.

One thing which disturbs me is that many hon. members want to remove all controls and get back to good old pre-war capitalism. Well, pre-war capitalism is as dead as the dodo. We are now in a new stage of capitalism. To-day we find the government underwriting the risks of the so-called free enterprise system. This is a crucial stage in Canadian history. To-day the government is underwriting these risks of capitalism; for instance, we have the national housing plan, the industrial bank, family allowances, unemployment insurance.

May I first deal briefly with family allowances. It is a good thing as far as the wage-earner in the low income bracket with a large family is concerned, but it does not take the place of decent jobs and adequate wages. In this regard it appears to me as though the government intends to allow private industry to go into lucrative forms of enterprise and exploit them, and then step in with the taxpayer's money to look after papa's children.

With regard to national housing, there again we find not very much of free enterprise; again we find the government underwriting any risk that is involved. The question is, where are we going to stop? When we speak of planning, the fact remains that to-day we are to have planning whether we like it or not; but the point is, who is to do the planning? Here we have a capitalist-government planned by big business, whereas we in the C.C.F., who also have a plan, propose a democratically planned idea for Canada, instead of allowing industry to take all the lucrative enterprises with the government stepping in and assuming the responsibility for capitalism's failures. To-day this is what happens. Private enterprise assumes no responsibility for unemployment; it has no responsibility for the real needs of the people, but the government steps in when unemployment becomes acute. That is the system under which we are operating at the present time.

The C.C.F. plan is that if the government is supposed to use the taxpayers' money to carry on vast social services it is only good sense that the government should also participate in the remunerative and revenue producing industries and thus be enabled to give the people a high standard of living. In that way, through co-related planning, we would do away with duplication and the wasteful system of capitalism.

It would seem to me that this government is concerned in preserving the special privilege of private enterprise. I am more concerned in preserving the industry of our period.

I should like to give some idea of my conduct in future in this house; and while I recognize that hon. members on the opposite side of the house will have the whole say in any legislation which is passed, nevertheless, on occasion, when measures are brought in I shall vote for those that provide some alleviation to the distress and to the worry and trouble of our people resulting from the vagaries of this system which the government seems to wish to uphold.

I wish to deal for a few minutes with agriculture, and first of all let me say that there is no group in Canada more willing to make the sacrifices that are necessary to build a lasting peace than our agricultural community. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) presented order in council 6122, paragraph 4 of which deals with stabilization of the economic and political life in war-torn countries.

In the sixth paragraph it is stated that as a further means of stabilizing wheat prices during the post-war period it is the intention that steps shall be taken to ensure that producers will not at any time up to July 31, 1950, receive less than $1 a bushel, basis Fort William, Port Arthur or Vancouver.

The point I wish to bring to the attention of the house is this. Here we have an appeal from the government, from the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), asking for cooperation. I can assure the house that western farmers will be ready to cooperate in the fullest measure to attain stability and lasting peace, but here by this order in council we have $1 a bushel being assured to the farmers, basis Fort William and Port Arthur. This would mean, with twenty cents freight rate, that the farmers would receive as low as eighty cents a bushel. Again may I say that we may be scraping our bins, and from the speech of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to-night it would seem that, with a short crop next year, 1946 may bring that condition.

I do not agree with the minister when he states that it is impossible to increase production or that we can bring any form of stability to agriculture by means of the plan which is being submitted to this house by the government. I wish to put before the house a plan which in my opinion would bring some stability to agriculture, and that is a plan whereby we would establish the principle of the ever-normal granary by storing in our bins one thousand million bushels in years of plenty, whereby we would have a granary on which to draw in years of scarcity which we might face in the future. It is clear to this house that if the war had gone on for one more year we would have been in a crucial situation in Canada. Therefore I say that it is a good sound plan to have the principle of the ever-normal granary. In years of plenty we would store for years of scarcity. I would ask the government to advance the farmers money to buy cement and building materials to build proper storage facilities, and I suggest that the Canadian wheat board be continued and that it take deliveries, or advance storage on the same basis as is paid to the elevators at the present time. In this way the farmer in a few years would own these storage facilities, and if we had scarce years our live stock production would not be jeopardized. In this way we could establish a stable agricultural policy for the country. But if we adhere to the old policy of trying to dump surplus wheat as soon as we have a few hundred million bushels we shall always remain on an unstable agricultural economy.

I wish for a few moments to direct my remarks to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie), and at this time I would refer to those veterans who served in the last great war as well as in this one. I would ask very respectfully that a pension of $50 a month be granted to those veterans. Second, I would ask that they receive complete health insurance and, third, that the means test of securing a pension be done away with.

I make this appeal on the ground that these men, who number over 2,000, have given up civilian employment and gone out to give service to their country. Moreover, it would mean that well over 2,000 of these veterans would be relieved of the necessity of seeking employment and would have some measure of security. I would point out further that there is an injustice to be remedied so far as these people, who are living in a state of insecurity, are concerned. Let me state a case so that the members of the house will be in a position to sympathize with my suggestion. I have looked into the case of a veteran who served in the imperial army and who again served in the last war. As a matter of fact, in the last war he was a prisoner in Germany and he entered this war as A-1 but was let out as an E category man. For the last three years he has been trying to get a pension, and although he is suffering from an injured knee, from hernia and rupture, he has not been able to get a pension up to date.

While I might be able to make this appeal on grounds of service rendered by these veterans, I would say that they should be given the pension out of simple justice.

Still directing my remarks to the Minister of Veterans Affairs, I should like for a moment to deal with the matter of veterans wishing to settle on the land. I believe we should recognize that the best advice we can give our returning young men and women is to go on farms, away from the congested areas; but under the land settlement act as it is set up to-day this is not happening. A recent survey, which shows that very few of these young people wish to go back to the farm, would indicate that something must be done. As far as I have been able to find out, those coming under the Veterans' Land Act may receive a maximum of $6,000, of which $4,800 is for land and $1,200 for equipment. I am a farmer, and I think I can speak from practical experience. In the first place $4,800 is too small an amount for land, and $1,200 is totally inadequate for equipment. Here is what a lad going on the land must pay for his equipment. He will have to pay $1,700 for a modern small combine, $1,500 for a small tractor and $1,200 for a modern small truck, or $4,400 for these three major pieces of machinery. Therefore it is clear that this total of $6,000 is quite inadequate. I have tried to find out if there is any other way in which a veteran may get further assistance, but I find that the veteran, having hypothecated his land under the Veterans' Land Act, cannot get any help under the farm improvement act of 1944.

In this connection I should like to make some proposals to this house. My first suggestion is that $10,000 be the minimum amount given to veterans wishing to settle on farms. I further suggest that those showing good faith by remaining on the land for three years should be given a five per cent discount on the original loan; those staying five years should be given an additional ten per cent, and those remaining for ten years another fifteeen per cent, or a total discount of thirty per cent over a period of ten years. Then I submit that this amount should be amortized over twenty-five or thirty years. If any hon. member thinks this is an unreasonable amount I would remind him of what we were able to do during the war. We found $25,000 to train each pilot, and we found $50,000 to $100,000 for a plane in which to put him. Therefore I respectfully submit that these recommendations should receive consideration.

I should now like to direct my remarks to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). To-day we find a great deal of unrest in the ranks of labour, which seems to have very little faith in what the future may hold. I quote from page 223 of Hansard, where the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) said:

> I see nothing disturbing in the present situation as far as employment is concerned. . . .

Then he went on to say that there were 132,520 jobs and 73,150 applications. I wish to point out that many of these jobs are of a temporary nature. For example, I should like to mention a veteran who went into the employment office at Regina to look for a job. The official told him there were many farmers who wanted combine operators and asked the veteran if he could drive a combine. He replied that he could not, that he had been in the transport division of the army. The official replied, "Well, if you can drive a truck you can drive a tractor, and if you can drive a tractor you can drive a combine." Then the veteran said that he had a wife and two children and that he was concerned about getting something permanent because winter would be coming on in a couple of months. The official said that this work was permanent for the next few weeks, and that he had better take it. I do not want to give the rest of the conversation, because it would not look good in Hansard, but hon. members will understand that this statement by the minister does not in any way reflect the real situation. I have in my hand a little pamphlet which was put out by the Department of National Defence, which says that no man wants to be a square peg in a round hole. We will all agree with that; but now that peace is here, at least we should be able to do for our people what the government has done for our boys in the services, and that is what I am asking.

Further in regard to labour I should like to mention the need for a national labour code and the extension of the already existing though perhaps temporary order in council P.C. 1003. In my constituency I have great coal fields. A year ago the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) was there, and was reported to have said that Bienfait was the coming Pittsburgh of western Canada. I visited those mines about two years ago, and I know something of the conditions which exist, and something of the need for labour legislation of a permanent nature. For the benefit of those who have never been in a coal mine or who have never come in contact with the needs of labour I should like to repeat some of the things brought to my attention at that time. We have both dominion and provincial laws giving certain rights to workers in the mines, but I found that some of this legislation has not been carried out. Prior to 1939, when there were large numbers of unemployed, if any person working in the mine tried to impress upon the management the need of doing something and carrying out this legislation, he immediately received his discharge notice. This shows the need for collective bargaining, so that workers may gain recognition and have something to say about their hours of work, rates of pay and the conditions under which they are employed. I submit that this would only be establishing two of the four freedoms, freedom from fear and freedom from want, for labour.

I should now like to refer to the War Assets Corporation. This was a highly contentious question in my constituency during the election campaign; and since it involves over $800,000,000 of plant and equipment belonging to the people, for which we have paid, and around $3,000,000,000 worth of surplus war material, I say that what is to be done with it should be the concern of everyone in this house, for this is the property of the people. We believe a lot of it is being destroyed. A week ago I had a telephone conversation with one of the high officials of War Assets Corporation. Without any solicitation on my part he admitted that some of this equipment had been destroyed.

I do not wish to spend too much time on this subject, but I should like to submit a plan to the government for the disposition of surplus war assets. I would point out that many of them could be used for civilian uses. When I was speaking to that official I suggested to him—and I now suggest to the house—that in addition to the plan which, I have been told, is in operation, under which aeroplane parts may be assembled in a field—parts such as fuselages and wings—and sold at a nominal fee, wings and frameworks may well be used on farms as cabs for tractors and the like. Hydraulic jacks could be used to make small hydraulic presses.

I would ask that consideration be given to my suggestion, and that when surplus war assets are being sold the government should advertise widely so that the public would be informed.

In this my first speech in the house I have tried to submit some of the plans offered by the C.C.F. But I believe that if we will seek to build a new order based upon the needs of the people and the inherent right of every person to a job and to security, we shall be able to say in the words of Tennyson:

> Ring out the thousand wars of old;
> Ring in the thousand years of peace.

Mr. JEAN LESAGE (Montmagny-L'Islet): (Translation) Mr. Speaker, I am sure you will allow me to express publicly the congratulations which I have already had the honour of tendering you on your elevation to the very high post of Speaker of this house. We are all assured—and you have given evidence of that fact during these last three weeks—that your dignity and impartiality betoken the preservation of parliamentary freedom in this country.

I also wish to join in the chorus of praise which was occasioned by the speeches of the mover and the seconder of the Address in reply to the speech from the throne. They gained the admiration of each and every member of this house.

It is my privilege to be the representative of the constituency of Montmagny-L'Islet. That electoral district is composed of two provincial counties. One of them, L'Islet, is represented in the provincial legislature by the Hon. Adélard Godbout, leader of the Liberal party in the province of Quebec, and the other, Montmagny, by Mr. Fernand Choquette, K.C., president of the Quebec City Bar Association.

I scarcely need to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the task of representing such a constituency weighs heavily on my young shoulders. From the bottom of my heart, I thank my electors for having given me such a mark of confidence, and my sole desire is to remain ever worthy of it.

My constituency has flourishing industries, large and small; farming is prosperous and progressive and land settlement is gradually developing. All classes of the population are enjoying, thanks to the present government's policy, a standard of living which had never been known heretofore. That is due to the government's policy, it is true, but also to our faith in the future, a faith which enables us to contribute, in a truly Canadian spirit, to the development of a truly united Canadian nation. My constituents are primarily and above all Canadians, and it was because I expounded Canadianism and advocated the political and economic independence of a united Canada, that I was elected as a member of this house.

The greatest evidence of patriotism on the part of my constituents is to be found in the number of those among them who volunteered for active service, went overseas and fought for our democratic freedom. All honour to the heroes from Montmagny-L'Islet who sacrificed their lives in order to save their fellow-citizens and who lie in foreign soil, in the glory of their eternal sleep!

(Text): Mr. Speaker, new members have come to this House of Commons in a very critical time. We are just out of a global war, in which all our economic standards have been upset. The people of Canada do not want to go through years such as we had between 1930 and 1939. Something must be done, and we have a strict obligation to prevent the reappearance at our doors of the monster of depression.

I respectfully submit that it is possible to achieve economic stability through what we call full employment. As a matter of fact, in the last few years we have gone beyond what we usually thought of in peace time as full employment. That was due in great part to the fact that our export trade had reached a peak we could not have attained in the past. But the majority of these exports belong—and I quote the words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon)—to the category of temporary, abnormal wartime trade. A considerable percentage has been financed by mutual aid appropriations, and thus has been paid by the government itself. If upon the one hand it is impossible to maintain our export trade at such a cost, we must not forget upon the other hand that under present conditions those countries which have suffered directly from the devastation of war are not in a position to pay us in cash, or by imports which would be needed for the help of our internal economy.

However, we must have a greater volume of exports than we had before the war. It is the only way to full employment, or anything near it. The present index of employment and the index of the immediate future is not a normal one. Our reconverted industry will employ thousands of people to produce goods of which the population has been deprived during the period of war. For that reason the index of employment should remain very high and, consequently, the national income should also remain at a high level. But the demand for those goods the population wants so badly now will lessen, and employment will go down to a low level, if we are not in a position to export.

It is important to know that the goods required by the people of Canada at the present time are not the goods we may expect to export over a long period of years. Let us not forget that the nations devastated by war will do their utmost to reorganize their industries and become self-sufficient, and even exporters in the industrial field. If we ignore foreign prospects until domestic demand has been satisfied we shall wake up in two, three or four years without foreign customers. We must direct our industrial power toward the constant needs of the exterior which will serve at the same time the import needs of our Canadian market.

In my humble opinion we should do our utmost to seize every opportunity of selling outside Canada the products of our natural resources, which are mostly agricultural and animal products, lumber, paper and minerals, including non-monetary gold. The net profit these products bring to the nation is the highest. I respectfully submit that it is the duty of the government to assure full production and the opening of new markets for these products.

In order to expand our foreign trade the government should, first, guide Canadian production and economy; second, cooperate with the other nations of the world in a programme of free multilateral trade and monetary stabilization and, third, open credits to other nations.

First, the government should guide Canadian production and economy. The common good of the nation does not reside in the addition of the good of each and all of the citizens, but in coordinating the good of each citizen with the good of all others. The advantages and sacrifices of each and all toward the common goal must be coordinated. By themselves men are seldom ready to make the sacrifices necessary to the common good. Every man naturally seeks his personal advantages. If private enterprise is free of all controls, if we give free rein to competition as requested by so many members of the Tory opposition, we shall find, as experience has taught us, that we are heading straight to economic dictatorship.

The state must regulate the economic life of the nation, but it cannot provide equality for all. It is fair to distribute production according to the needs of each individual, but it must also be according to his merit. The Social Credit theory that every citizen should not have to work for more than four hours a day is not applicable. None of the hon. members of that group will ever prevent an individual from earning more by his talents or his capacity to work. As I have said already, the individual naturally seeks his personal advantage. We cannot change the natural law or the law of God that some forget in their arguments. When I heard the hon. member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Kuhl) say last week that instead of looking for full employment we should look for full enjoyment I said to myself, "That is an old gag, thousands of years old." The hon. member for Jasper-Edson must be a great reader of the classics, because it reminded me of the cry of the decadent pagan Romans as they yelled in the circus, "Panem et circences." We are not a decadent state and, if the government controls the economic life of the nation to prevent economic dictatorship and assures a fair distribution, it must leave to the individual sufficient liberty to allow him to be interested in helping the state by his talent.

In conclusion, national economy and production should be controlled in order to ensure for every citizen a decent standard of living, but room must be left for competition which is generative of great achievements.

I said that the government must cooperate with the nations of the world in a programme of free multilateral trade and monetary stabilization. Canada more than, or at least as much as, any other nation is dependent on her foreign trade to ensure her economic life. Therefore, Canada is most interested in the expansion of free total world trade. Our Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is the most far-sighted Canadian of all because, since the beginning of his long and fertile stage at the head of the nation he has always looked for friendly political and economic relations among nations and the disappearance of all obstacles to a peaceful and important world trade.

The Prime Minister has always understood that we stand to gain more from multilateral world trading than from bilateral trade treaties. Multilateral world trading will be a precious advantage to Canadians especially if exchange rates are stabilized. The articles of agreement of the conference of Bretton Woods announcing the establishment of an international monetary fund and an international bank of reconstruction and development are of special interest to us Canadians who have so often had to pay for our surplus imports from the United States with the depreciated money paid to us by others for our surplus exports. That point in our monetary relations in international trading is so often forgotten by our teachers of Social Credit in their evolutions in the clouds of theory.

Mr. LOW: Did you ever read Social Credit?

Mr. LESAGE: I had an opponent who was a Social Crediter and he lost his deposit.

Mr. LOW: Did you ever hear him speak?

Mr. LESAGE: I heard him speak, but he could not convince me because he was in the clouds.

Third and last, I said that we must open credits and that for many reasons. As Christians we have no right to let our brothers of other nations starve, even at the cost of depriving ourselves of some of the things we would like to consume. What is rationing when misery is the best ground for the seeds of revolution and totalitarianism in all its forms? Our faith in democracy commands us to avoid the formation of a bloc of nations, even by one of our allies, to stand against a bloc of democratic nations. These reasons are apart from the fact that we must create good will for our foreign trade and take the place that we have so dearly earned in the world markets. Experience has shown us, paradoxically enough that even gifts to other nations ensure us a high national income. We must pay for them, it is true, and that is where our financial and monetary difficulties begin.

The government should take the money from a high national income in order to open credit to other nations. There are two ways of obtaining that money, loans and taxes. We cannot expect to go on for very long with loans of the importance of victory loans. Too much of the money—I am sure this will please hon. members of the Social Credit group—comes from the chartered banks and financial institutions, as was said by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley).

Mr. LOW: Where did you learn that?

Mr. LESAGE: I certainly did not learn it from my hon. friend. This is what the Minister of Finance said:

> These are sobering facts because to the degree that the government has had to borrow from the banks rather than directly from personal savings, to the degree that the spending power of the government has been increased and the spending power of the public has not been reduced by an equal amount, we have contributed to the pressure on prices and on supplies of necessary products.

That was said in 1943.

We must limit government loans to the saving public; otherwise we go directly to inflation and then depression. It is exactly the same as if we tried to put into practice the Social Credit theory of inconsiderate issues of currency.

The government must face its responsibilities and convince the people that we cannot have a high national income and social security without a level of taxes somewhat higher than before the war. Canadians will be ready to make sacrifices and to pay taxes if they love their country as their only motherland. It is by nurturing a true Canadian patriotism that the people of Canada will best discharge their responsibilities toward the country. The people of Canada are now more Canadian-minded than ever. In this connection I shall not minimize, as some Tory newspapers have done, the importance of having a Canadian flag and a Canadian citizenship, and also, I pray, our own national anthem.

I am not of those extremists who proclaim that we should be a republic or one of those who say that we should be governed by Downing street.

I do not approve the partisans of La Laurentie, but I do not approve either those who will not recognize the fact that we are a bilingual state.

One of my electors, who is a manufacturer of saws, sent a statement of account to a customer in another province which I shall not name. It had four words in French on it. It said "facture" instead of "invoice," and "manufacturier de scies" for "manufacturer of saws." Clearly it was not a cheque which anybody would accept in whatever language it was written. It was a statement of account, and the answer sent back was: "Make out your account in the official language of Canada. I do not recognize French."

As long as we have men like that, of either French or English language, who will not recognize what I will call the "Canadian fact" or, if you like, Canadian unity in diversity, we shall not be a nation. The government should do its utmost to spread the idea of a bilingual state. For instance, should not the family allowance cheques be bilingual all over Canada? Why should cheques be written in French for Quebec and in English for the other provinces? All the provinces are part of the same country, which is bilingual. No province must be regarded as a reserve. I live in the province of Quebec, but I am at home everywhere in Canada. My ancestors came here three hundred years ago, and I am here to stay with my faith, my language and my traditions. I am tolerant, but I want tolerance. The unity of Canada is a sine qua non condition of its future.

The other condition is its high ranking among the nations of the world. Canada will reach its place only through political and economic independence. Canada has everything to lose by being tied up to any other country or group of countries; it has everything to gain if it is free to join as a free nation in the deliberations of international conferences of all the nations of the world. There is our future. There lies the prosperity and the greatness of our beloved country.

In conclusion, may I say that I believe the present government will achieve the common good of the nation. I have faith in the Prime Minister. His glorious past, in the most difficult days our country has seen, is a guarantee that he will steer the ship of state to a safe port. May God keep him long for Canada, to which he has devoted all his life.

Mr. D. J. McCUAIG (Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, as a new member of this parliament, I realize that I have been given a stewardship and a responsibility.

I am not a manipulator of words or a maker of phrases; I work with my hands. I represent the federal constituency of Maple Creek in Saskatchewan, in the southwest corner of the province. Eastend is my home town. I have farmed there continuously for thirty-three years.

Being now a full-fledged commoner, I take it to be my bounden duty to work for and to serve all the people of Canada, regardless of race, colour, creed or political faith.

First, I should like to acquaint the government with certain conditions in the part of the country which I represent, conditions brought about by drought. We are experiencing the second worst drought in the thirty-three years that I have been in that country. Wheat will not average over two bushels to the sown acre. That means that on thousands of acres there will not be one bushel at all. The year 1937 was our worst year. In that year the grass never got green and the soil blew and drifted all summer. There was not one dollar of return for all the seed planted, the wearing out of equipment, the year's living expenses and labour, and there was no seed for the spring of 1938. We are hearing now about the 1938 seed grain.

The year 1936 was just about like this. Conditions were disastrous for stock-men. Trainloads of stock were shipped out at one and two cents a pound, and someone made a harvest on the stockmen's misfortune. Feed was the problem then. Feed and water constitute the problem now.

The stock-man is trusting the government to give him a stabilized price. He can see no reason for wide price fluctuations—more times down than up—when the demand is steady and meat is urgently needed. In my opinion, government control is the only thing which will attain the desired end. Company or monopoly control would do just the opposite in this kind of situation for their motive is: In business to make money.

The way the set-up is at present, shipping and slaughtering facilities cannot handle the offerings. The pastures are brown and bare. The water situation is bad, and the people are clamouring to ship their stock. Before I left Eastend to come here the shippers told me that shipping was restricted. The longer they keep this stock, the poorer the quality will be. This is a waste when meat is so badly needed in Europe, where people are starving. We fought to save humanity; now they need food to live. I hope the government will move with all their war-time efficiency, speed and energy to take care of this situation.

After seeing the accomplishments of Mulberry, after reading about radar and atomic power, it seems to me that by comparison the achievement of many of these things would be very easy. If these men who are endowed with such wonderful gifts and training, the knowledge of science, of engineering and planning, almost likened unto the infinite, were given the job of making the world a fit place for all peoples of the earth to live in, what a world it would be! "Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done on earth" would surely come to pass. This basic fundamental was ignored by Mussolini, Hitler and Tojo and their followers. Six years ago they were the biggest men in the world. To-day they are no more. What an ignoble end was theirs! They did not recognize this basic fundamental of life, and if we in Canada do not recognize it, can any man in this parliament say where we shall be six years from to-day?

I have not been able to find in the speech from the throne any basic solution which will take care of the problems of the great masses of the people, the producer, the men who must work for a living from the age of sixteen to seventy. Family allowances and old age pensions, desirable and indeed necessary under our present economy, are only props to hold up an unworkable system. We must get down to the basic fundamentals of life. The army could not get very far without basic training. The farmer would not go far without knowledge of basic agriculture. On the plains of Saskatchewan the record of thousands of years is found in the top foot of soil. That record tells a man whether he should break up land and how much he may expect to receive from that ground over a period of years. If he ignores that record it is just too bad for him; in other words he requires basic knowledge. In my humble opinion we must deal with basic principles if we are to have a prosperous, happy national economy. It is not only cooperation with our fellowmen; it is cooperation with God, carrying out the purpose of creation. I say these things in plain, farmer's working-man's language, because that is the only language I know. As I see things, there are four institutions in Canada, four main arteries through which the very lifeblood of Canada flows. They have to do with the welfare of every one of us. They are natural resources, industry, transportation and finance. The men who, by company or monopoly control, sit in the seats of the mighty and pull the levers, hold the economic destiny of every man, woman and child in Canada in the hollow of their hands. They exercise power and control that defy governments. They are the invisible government of Canada.

To support this contention, I will use Hansard. In June, 1939—before the war—there was brought down provision for a defence purchasing board under the War Measures Act. The profit was to be five per cent on capital, which apparently was not accepted. From page 179 of Hansard of September 12, 1939—after war was declared—I quote the words of the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe):

> I can say to my hon. friend that from that day to this the defence purchasing board has done its very best to place contracts on that basis and has used every pressure that could be brought to bear in the form of patriotism and so on, but to date it has not succeeded in placing a single contract on that basis.

Who was the power in Canada? Big business staged the first sitdown strike. We were at war. Our men needed the tools to do the job. It is evident that big business got their own price. Would you expect men who would not accept five per cent profit to bid against one another for a less amount? I do not know what they got: But here we have an exhibition of monopoly enterprise.

Lord Tweedsmuir had something to say about this in his book, "A Prince of the Captivity," at page 308. I quote:

> There is a great and potent world which the government do not control. That is the world of finance, the men who guide the ebb and flow of money. With them rests the decision whether they will make that river a beneficent flood to quicken life, or a dead glacier which freezes wherever it moves, or a torrent of burning lava to submerge and destroy. The men who control that river have the ultimate word.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), too, speaking prior to the 1935 election, as reported in the Western Producer, said:

> Canada is faced with a great battle between the money power and the people, a battle which will be waged in the new parliament. I plead for a sweeping Liberal victory to carry out my policies of public control of currency and credit. Until the control of currency and credit is restored to the government, all talk of sovereignty of parliament and democracy is idle and futile.

On October 9, 1942, in speaking to the convention of the American Federation of Labour at Toronto, the Prime Minister is reported also to have said:

> The war has shown us that the way of monopoly, of unrestricted power, is a way that leads to destruction, desolation and death.

I am at a loss to know who is the supreme authority in Canada. I, as a citizen of Canada, have always been of opinion that the people's democratically elected representatives were the supreme power and authority; that it was their democratic duty to lay down policies, and that the government was the executive of parliament to carry out those policies.

Yet, in the last few days, I behold a minister laying down a policy, making a definite regulation that affects the most vital industry in Canada, the raising of food. He does this without any consultation, so far as I am aware, with the people in this industry, nor has he received any mandate that I know of from this parliament. The democratically elected members of this house have had nothing to say about it.

Is this the kind of thing that is to take place in all our departments of government? If it is, we might as well go home. No excuse, not being able to consult the people; the people's representatives are right here now. Is that the kind of thing our boys fought and died for? No.

Whence comes this minister's authority or motive power? Could it, by any chance, come from the "invisible government", the powers that ride on the backs of the poor?

A fitting citation from the prophet Amos, in 720 B.C., goes:

> Forasmuch, therefore, as ye trample upon the poor, and take exactions from him of wheat; ye have built houses of cut stone, but ye shall not live in them.

Wheat and other farm products are the farmers' money. It is not the price of a bushel of wheat, but what a bushel of wheat will buy, that concerns me. I have in my hand two notes given to Bussie Brothers of Gull Lake, Saskatchewan, dated March 9, 1914—one for an 8-foot McCormick binder, price $165; one for a 20-run double disc drill, price $125—for the two implements $290, f.o.b. Gull Lake. Wheat was then sixty-five cents a bushel. It took 446 bushels of wheat to pay for those two implements. The binder now costs $400, on rubber, and the drill, power lift, $317.50 or a total of $717.50, f.o.b. Eastend, and it takes 850 bushels of wheat at eighty-four cents to pay for those two implements at $1 floor price, as announced by the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Farms were mortgaged in 1914 to carry on under much more favourable conditions than now. What will happen this time?

We have in Canada to-day, a mechanized industry which has eliminated fifty per cent of man-power, as compared with twenty years ago. The machine is doing the work. How are we to take care of the remaining fifty per cent? We carried on the biggest production Canada ever had from 1940 to 1945 without any help from our young men in uniform, who numbered 800,000 by the end of the war. This God-given gift to man was to take the toil, back-break and slavery out of his life and put it on the machine. But under our economy it starves him.

Mr. HANSELL: You should be sitting over here.

Mr. McCUAIG: If the hon. gentleman will be quiet—

Mr. HANSELL: It is a good speech you are making.

Mr. McCUAIG: I am not used to this kind of thing. The last reason why the people back home sent Duncan McCuaig to Ottawa was my ability to make a speech, but they had confidence in the C.C.F. and they were certain that I would carry out their philosophy.

The Tories did not recognize the basic fundamental, and they were absolutely floored in 1935 and nearly had their very name wiped off the map of Canada.

The Liberals did not recognize it from 1935 to 1940. In that very short time Canada was on the way out. In the thirties the national income dropped to a low of $2,723,000,000 as against $9,186,000,000 in 1944. Thousands of our boys were riding the rods, and as late as January, 1940, more than 3,000 older men were being fed in a soup kitchen on Princess street, Winnipeg. That is what the man at the desk there told me. I was in the place and personally talked with those men on several occasions. Another thing. In the ten years from 1930 to 1939, of Canada's children 166,972 died under one year of age, in a land of great potential wealth, food and other materials. A terrible indictment against our civilization!

Along came the war and snapped us out of it. War is the only thing that has ever saved the capitalist system. It gave us money and prosperity. It was blood money.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. It is eleven o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I would ask the unanimous consent of the house that the hon. gentleman be allowed to finish his address.

Mr. McCUAIG: I thank the house for its courtesy.

To-day, Mr. Speaker, nearly every invention that science and industrial development have given us is owned or controlled by companies and monopolies, who use them with one end in view, one motive, namely, to make money, not for the use and needs of men; because, if the money is not forthcoming, man can darn well go without, and he did go without, between 1930 and 1940. This is the kind of thing this government was elected to solve. It is the biggest job any government in Canada ever undertook, and in my opinion they will have to implement social ownership of the means of production whereby the people will produce first for the needs of the people, as a first principle, or compel the present owners of the machine to do that very thing. The people of our country produced almost unlimited supplies for war and could continue to do so, and would continue, if the war went on. By the same token, if the government so wished we could keep every man at overtime work, for there is no end to what the people of Canada need and could do with. Listen to this from the book of Proverbs, chapter 29, verse 18:

Where there is no vision, the people perish.

We need half a million new and improved homes, with everything that goes with them. Good homes, good churches, well equipped schools—these are the very foundation of the nation. We need parks; not only the beautification of Ottawa but the beautification of Canada. Thousands of miles of good roads are needed. We require irrigation. We are only spending crumbs where a billion could be well spent in the restoration of lands and forests and the irrigation of thousands of acres in the west. We should harness the great Saskatchewan river; the water that flows from the mountains in the divine plan should be used, but we have not had enough sense to use it. We should have vocational training; recreational centres; the arts, crafts, drama, music and forums. All these would be real wealth and real value, and the very best kind of security for the Bank of Canada to have. Once again I hear a pleading voice coming from the dismal past and saying:

I plead for a sweeping Liberal victory, to carry out my policy of public control of currency and credit.

It is my very soul's desire, Mr. Speaker, that this parliament should do this very thing; and should the Prime Minister make to this house the appeal that he made to the people of the country, I believe this parliament would support him and this Canada of ours would go places.

On motion of Mr. Blackmore the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie the house adjourned at 11.05 p.m.

Tuesday, September 25, 1945.

The house met at three o'clock.

PROVINCIAL LEGISLATION

PETITIONS FOR DISALLOWANCE OF CERTAIN ACTS OF SASKATCHEWAN LEGISLATURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to ask the Minister of Justice if he has received a telegram from Saskatchewan inquiring about the dates of the filing of the petitions for the disallowance of Saskatchewan acts, and indicating that Saskatchewan's first notice was received on September 20?

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): No; no such telegram has yet been brought to my attention.

Mr. COLDWELL: I will send the minister a copy of it; I received one.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

SECURITY TO CERTIFIED UNIONS UNDER FEDERAL CODE—QUESTION OF JURISDICTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour. Has he asked the provincial governments to agree that the present federal labour code make provision for full union security to certified unions upon request, pending disposition of jurisdiction on the subject at the forthcoming dominion-provincial conference?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I should like to thank my hon. friend for giving me notice of the question. No such representation has been made to the provincial governments in the matter referred to by my hon. friend, but representations have been received from the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, the Canadian Congress of Labour, and other labour and employers' organizations, with regard to amendments to the code generally. All those representations have been sent to the provincial governments. The representations received from the employers have been sent to the trade unions, and those received from the trade unions have been sent to the employers for their information.

PARLIAMENTARY ASSISTANTS

ANNOUNCEMENT WITH RESPECT TO APPOINTMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table orders in council passed to-day appointing certain parliamentary assistants.

Mr. R. W. Mayhew, the hon. member for Victoria, has been appointed parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley).

Mr. W. C. Macdonald, the hon. member for Halifax, and Mr. Hugues Lapointe, the hon. member for Lotbinière, have been appointed parliamentary assistants to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Abbott). As the house is aware, the Minister of National Defence has responsibility for naval services as well as for the army. Mr. Macdonald will be concerned particularly with naval services, and Mr. Lapointe with the army.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE IN REPLY

The house resumed from Monday, September 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. M. Benidickson for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Bracken, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Hansell.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, either this parliament will discover and apply a solution to the dismaying problems confronting the Anglo-Saxon world, or it will fail to discover and apply that solution. Either this parliament will redeem democracy and parliamentary governments generally from the slough of despond and contempt into which they are rapidly descending all over the world, or it will drag still deeper into the mire the reputation of parliament. The matter rests in the hands of members of this parliament.

There is in this parliament I am sure a knowledge of how to obtain a solution of the problems of the world. If the government would call together the representatives of the various parties in a round table conference in a non-political manner and discuss earnestly for whatsoever time was necessary this matter of a solution, I am confident that a solution could be found.

We shall never be able to find a solution by sneering at each other's ideas as did the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank) the other night when he referred to Social Credit as funny money. We shall never do it by indulging in outbursts of fantastic misrepresentations as did the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Lesage) last night, or in bursting forth into ecstatic pæans of glorification of the present obviously hopeless orthodox system of finance, as did the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) last night in his otherwise excellent speech. We may be able to find a solution by approaching the situation with humility and a disposition to be open-minded, to consider and weigh and assess the value of the various arguments as did the hon. member for Grey North (Mr. Case) on September 21. At that time the hon. member said as recorded on page 369 of Hansard:

—I do not think Canada, of all countries in the world, is in a position to give leadership in monetary reform. We produce a tremendous volume of goods in this country, and we must find a market for them in the markets of the world.

Mr. Kuhl: How about the home market?

Mr. Case: The home market could never consume the amount of goods we produce, because we produce enough for 50,000,000 people. The productive capacity of this nation during the war absolutely staggers human imagination. If those with whom we seek to trade were to discover that we were using a monetary base which resulted in subsidizing our goods to the detriment of their standard of living, I am sure they would soon find means of applying dumping duties or an embargo to prevent us from finding our way to their market. The whole matter is greatly involved. I am glad that there are those who have the courage to come forward with these ideas. I like to think of myself as being a student of monetary reform —sometimes I think our system should be reformed—but I have yet to be convinced that Social Credit policies will fit in with our plan of world affairs.

The hon. member's words indicate a somewhat sincere desire to know something about social credit, why it is called social credit and the basis of facts upon which it founds its philosophy. What is its philosophy? What is the basis of fact upon which it founds its technique? What is the technique which social credit proposes? How shall social credit deal with the great problems which confront us at the present time, the great phenomena such as the surpluses in Canada and in other nations—wheat for example—and the deficiencies in other nations, such as are found in a country like Jamaica; inflation or boom, deflation or depression; monopolies and cartels; foreign investments in Canada which upset our trade balances or balances of payment; Canadian investments abroad; international debt and adverse trade balances; international commercial rivalry or trade wars? How would social credit enable Canada to sell her goods on the world markets? How would Canada protect her economy against foreign goods seeking to enter her market in competition with Canadian goods? Would she use the tariff under social credit, or exchange control, or quotas, or embargoes, or just how would she proceed under social credit? How would Canada attain monetary stabilization, first of all in Canada and then internationally?

What is social credit's attitude toward international trade? What is social credit's attitude toward the Atlantic charter? What is social credit's attitude toward war, its causes and the remedy for those causes and provision against war? What is the social credit attitude toward the British commonwealth and the empire? What is the social credit attitude toward world organizations such as were attempted in San Francisco? What is the social credit attitude toward the world as it is to-day? How do they interpret the world? Why is it we have people pitted against each other in great organizations ready to fly at each other's throats? Is Canada of all countries in the world in a position to give leadership into social credit? These seem to be some of the major questions in the mind of the hon. member for Grey North.

These questions are all fair and reasonable, and they require to be answered. Any sound economic system ought to be able to answer them. The proposals necessary to answer them should be definite, consistent, realistic and logical. Can social credit answer these thirteen questions definitely, consistently, realistically and logically? If it can, and to the extent to which it can, then social credit has a valid claim to careful consideration as the possible technique to be used in establishing a new world order of freedom from want and fear, together with freedom of speech, worship and choice.

Can social credit answer these questions with definiteness, consistency, realism and logic? Let us see. Consider, first, the meaning of social credit, the first question the hon. member wanted to get clear in his mind. The credit of a nation is like the credit of an individual. It is of three kinds. There is the credit of honour, whether or not a man's word is any good, and this applies also to nations. There is the credit which means the ability to produce and deliver goods as, when and where required. This is called the real credit of the individual and it is the real credit of a people. Finally there is the financial credit, which means the ability of the individual or the ability of a nation to produce as, when and where required, money, which is a quite different thing.

Social Crediters maintain that the financial credit of a nation should reflect the real credit of the nation and correspond to it. They believe that when there are more goods and services on a nation's markets than the consumers of that nation are financially able to buy, then the people's representatives in parliament should lay down a financial policy under which a national finance commission or authority would create and distribute scientifically to the people money tokens or dollars enough to enable those so-called surplus goods and services to be bought and consumed by the people of the country in so far as the people can use them, or perhaps by the peoples of other countries in so far as the people of this country cannot use them. Under such a policy the national money authority would render available to all the people of our nation their real credit, the goods and services they produce. The social credit movement favours rendering the people's real credit social through the creation and use of financial credit to represent or correspond to that real credit, that is, the creation of enough tokens or dollars to make it possible to distribute to all consumers in Canada that portion of our goods and services which otherwise would be wasted.

One of the great faults we have to find with the members in this house who undertake to criticize or sneer at social credit is this simple fact—they never do take the trouble to find out what social credit claims to be, and consequently they have not the slightest idea what they are criticizing. So they make the most idiotic statements and say the most stupid things, simply because they do not know what it is. I have made that completely clear. I have given the facts concerning the social credit concept.

What is the basis of fact upon which social credit philosophy is founded? First, we as a people and as a world have solved the problem of production. That is, we have now got to a position in this world where mankind can produce more goods than mankind is at present able to buy. Consequently there are more goods than mankind is at present able to sell, and this is one of the major causes of depressions and war.

Second, machines have displaced men so that production has increased and jobs have decreased, and consequently wages have decreased, the result being that there is ever present a deficiency of purchasing power in the hands of the people which renders it quite impossible for them to buy the goods which they are able to produce in normal times. Of course in times of war it is different because then so many goods are taken away and destroyed. These are the facts, which are incontestable. They are the facts upon which the social credit philosophy is based.

What is the social credit philosophy? It is that the government must so manage things that purchasing power will be put into the hands of the people sufficiently to enable them to purchase the goods which at the present time they are unable to purchase because of lack of purchasing power in their hands. By doing that the government will, first of all, raise the standard of living of the people, who will be able to buy the goods, and secondly it will increase their capacity to buy, which will increase the market so that producers will be able to sell and be able to employ people, and the unemployment problem, again, will be cleared up in a natural way.

What are the basic facts upon which social credit founds its technique? First, money—and social credit deals entirely with money, the monetary science of money. Money is merely a claim to goods. Do you agree with that? Money is a claim to goods. We might call it, instead of a claim to goods, a medium of exchange, and certainly we must call it a creation of man. Nature does not produce money; Providence does not produce money. Man produces money. Money is manufactured just as much as picks and shovels are manufactured. These are important truths.

Second, the value of money depends not upon gold nor upon any other kind of backing, metallic or otherwise. The value of money depends entirely upon the goods and services which are available for purchase in the country. Money is a claim to goods, and if the goods are there, the money is good; if the goods are not there, the money is not good.

Third, money need not be a debt. It can be debt-free. No one has ever looked upon a five-dollar gold piece as being a debt, any more than a five-dollar nugget of gold is looked upon as debt. It is accepted freely in exchange, but it certainly is not debt. There is a fallacy all over the country to the effect that money must be debt; as long as we keep that idea regarding money we are indulging in fallacy and we are bound to come to false conclusions and to a false policy. Money need not be a debt. A five-cent piece is not a debt. During the last war the Conservative administration in this country printed, through the Department of Finance, $26,000,000 of money—bills—under the Finance Act of 1914. That money was not debt. That money was used to pay the expenses as they came along, just exactly as though it had been raised by a loan or by taxation. That money was debt-free. It never was redeemed. We have never paid a cent of interest on it. It never was registered against this country as a debt. Why, I wonder, have Conservative members in this house all during this war never even whispered about that? There was involved there a principle which was extremely important, namely the principle of debt-free money. There will be those who say it causes inflation. Well, the money in circulation during this war would have caused inflation, without any $26,000,000 of printed money, if it had not been for the controls. So to use that as an argument against the creation of debt-free money, I would say is very short-sighted indeed.

The fourth principle upon which we base our technique is that money is created by banks to lend as a debt. It could be created by the government or by an agency acting for the government to be used debt-free.

Fifth, the amount of money that could be so created and issued without causing inflation would depend only on the unclaimed goods, because money is a claim to goods. It would depend only on the unclaimed goods or on the unused productive capacity of the country, whether that be resources, factories, man-power or whatever else enters into production.

Then what is the technique that social credit proposes, based on these five truths or facts? Social credit says that, first, in the nation there should be formed a national credit account which should give in detail the amount of goods which are available on the shelves throughout the country and in the store-houses, and probably give an estimate of the amount of goods which can come into existence within a given period, say one month or six months or twelve months, depending on the kind of goods you are dealing with.

Second, the national monetary authority should create the money debt-free to correspond to or claim the goods in the national credit account which are not being claimed by the purchasing power already going into the hands of people through wages, salaries, dividends and so forth.

Third, this new money when thus created should be used first of all to produce a just price structure. It should be used in subsidizing the prices of primary products to raise them to a standard which is the best standard obtainable under the nation's economy. It should be used also to discount the prices of manufactured goods to bring them into line with the price structure of primary products. In this way a balanced economy will be produced as regards prices. This is the first important matter in connection with using the money or disbursing it.

Finally there should be a distribution of purchasing power directly to the people in such things as wage bonuses, pensions and allowances and in other ways to enable all the people of the country to gain access to the purchasing power stream in the country and thereby gain access to the goods in the country. This will raise the standard of living of the people and provide markets and distribute goods. So much for the social credit technique.

What is the social credit approach to various perplexing phenomena of our day?—and we have plenty of them. We find our friends of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation much concerned about them. They are not the only ones concerned about them, although perhaps they talk more about them than most of the rest of us do. Let us see what social credit will do with these perplexities.

Take surpluses, such as wheat. The first important thing is that we should enable all the people of Canada to use all the wheat and wheat products they can. Then we will draw off as much of our wheat for the purchase of goods from abroad as may be necessary to reach the point where our people have all of those goods that they can purchase. We shall still have a surplus of wheat, which according to the principles of orthodox finance it is utterly impossible to dispose of. What shall we do with that?

In the new order which is coming, in which we guarantee all men freedom from want and freedom from fear, we shall make our surplus wheat available in a great international pool from which the needy peoples of the world will be able to draw according to their needs. That is the only sane and sensible attitude to take. If you do not take that attitude you limit your production, which means that you will keep your vast resources as a dog in the manger, hiding them away from the people who need the products those resources could yield.

This is the social credit approach to surpluses. It says: Let the government encourage the people to produce just as much as they are able to produce. Bring about conditions under which they will produce buoyantly and confidently, knowing that they have guaranteed markets and guaranteed prices which will be remunerative. Then with money created by your national Money Authority buy your surplus and place it in an international pool, under a system of mutual aid on a wide scale, from which people will be able to draw in a manner never even dreamed of by UNRRA.

What is the Social Credit approach to deficiencies in other countries, we will say like Jamaica or Porto Rico? Porto Rico, I understand, is a country in which there are two million people but which has resources to support only one million. What is to be done for the Porto Ricans? With all due respect to them, we do not want them in Canada. They will be much happier in their own land. How are we going to help them to stay there? Only by a system of mutual aid whereby the strong and richly endowed nations will contribute to the support of nations less fortunately situated. So a mutual aid scheme financed with the national credit, debt-free, such as I indicated under number one deals with the deficiencies of other countries, and if this were applied all over the world it would make each nation able to support itself adequately and able to introduce a social credit system to distribute the goods on hand, just as though it were able to produce those goods itself.

I will give you, sir, an illustration to show what we are running into in Canada. During the war we have learned how to manufacture rubber. Before the war, I am told, about 100,000 Malayans were engaged in manufacturing rubber for us and gained their living through that activity. We now propose to produce the rubber we need in Canada—which, considering the dangerous international situation, is a wise policy; but we shall thereby deprive 100,000 Malayans of their source of livelihood, I understand. How are we going to make up this loss to the Malayans and to the millions if not hundreds of millions of other people whose livelihood will be taken away from them because we choose in our own interests to produce our own sugar and rubber and other goods which in this marvellous scientific age we can produce? Only through a system of mutual aid. We can help these people; we need have no anxiety on that score.

What are we to do about inflation? What is inflation? Inflation is a rise in price. A good many people think that an increase of money is inflation. That is not so. Surely Donald Gordon and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) have told us enough about that over the radio during this war, so everybody must know what inflation is. It is a rise in price resulting from a scarcity of goods. If you can manage to keep your goods plentiful so that there is no scarcity of goods of any kind, you cannot have a rise in price, consequently you cannot have inflation, no matter how much money you bring into circulation; for the people will be able to buy all the goods they want, and will certainly call for no more. This is one of the great truths which must be learned by this parliament and by this generation if it is to solve the problems which confront it. Inflation is a rise in price which results from scarcity of goods. It has nothing to do with money in this modern age.

How do you overcome inflation? The first thing is to see that you have an abundance of production of all kinds so that, no matter how much people want to buy of coal and milk and cream and cheese and sugar and a thousand other things, there will be always more than they require, and prices will not rise. Such a condition can certainly be brought about in a land of abundance like ours.

Next, look after your prices. Social credit has a technique which we call the compensated discount. It means this, that the financial authority, the monetary authority, pays part of the price of goods. For example, if a pair of shoes is being sold for $5 and it is deemed advisable in the interests of Canada that these shoes shall sell at $4 a pair, the financial authority will pay one of the dollars, enabling the consumer to buy at $4. This device brings the price down, and it can be used in the national economy all over the country. The only limit beyond which it cannot go is the amount of goods and services you have in the country: those are what make you rich and strong. This compensated discount, if applied throughout the economy of the country, will completely prevent inflation. Furthermore, credit can be and should be regulated, and would be, under a social credit regime. Finally, if necessary, if some difficulty should arise, such as a great crop failure, say of apples or something of that sort, we would have to ration that particular commodity.

What would social credit do about deflation? First of all, what is deflation? Deflation is a fall in price. Why a fall in price? Because there are more goods on the market than there is money coming into the markets to buy goods with; consequently there is a glut of goods and the prices of goods go down. Under the law of supply and demand that will always tend to happen. The present government has already introduced a system of floors under prices, which indicates that they are already beginning to see the light. Social credit will introduce floors under prices, and the money required will be paid from the national credit without new taxation or debt.

So floors under prices and floors under wages will be maintained, and credit will be regulated. If the banks fear to lend and begin to draw in loans, the government comes in with an agency through which it begins to lend until the banks are encouraged to go forward. Thus deflation would be checked.

Fifth, monopolies. Social credit first of all believes it can control any monopoly for the simple reason that it has control of price. All it needs to do is to tell monopoly it will not give it the advantage of price, and I think that any monopoly with any sense will come into line. If monopoly chooses to be disobedient—"uncooperative" is the word we like to use—it becomes very easy for the government monetary authority to advance money to private companies to establish businesses,—say, to produce aluminium, or whatever it happens to be; and with government bonuses and assistances that little company could cut into the markets of that big monopoly and utterly destroy it, and it would be impossible for that monopoly to avoid it. There is no need for the government to take over the monopoly and thus have a government monopoly.

Now as to the matter of cartels. There is only one really safe solution to the problem of cartels, and that is to make the country as nearly as possible self-sufficient. In this day of remarkable scientific advancement, of the development of plastics and the like, together with the vast resources which we possess, we can become very nearly self sufficient. If there were difficulties with a few cartels we would probably have to resort to some sort of international agreement, but the general attack would be as I have described it.

With respect to foreign investments in Canada, these cause a great deal of difficulty. There is altogether too much foreign capital investment in Canada. Social credit would make it the government's business to see that these great interests which have investments in Canada were encouraged to sell. The government could lend money to private interests to buy these people out and send them home with their money. That can be done, and it is going to be done; it will have to be done. Mexico had to resort to that device in 1938 with respect to United States interests in her oil industry. It will be found as the days go by that it will be necessary for that device to be applied generally throughout the world, otherwise how can a nation govern itself, when it cannot be master in its own house?

With respect to Canadian investments abroad, such investments would not be encouraged by social credit, for the simple reason that Canadian investments abroad would be unwelcome, just as foreign investments in Canada would be unwelcome. Some people will say—and I can almost see my Conservative friends thinking it—"We had to have foreign capital come in to develop this country." Yes; that was done when you still thought that you had to have money come in from outside. But we have learned that we can create our own money; we have no further need at all of foreign capital coming in.

What would we do with international debt? First, it must be agreed that any debt should be payed in goods and services, which is the only way such debts can be paid. The sooner all nations come to realize this, the better. Today the United States is rapidly coming to a realization of this truth in her arrangements with Great Britain. All nations will have to realize that international debt must be paid with goods and services. Then we would stimulate our own production, and we would lower our own prices in Canada by the method of the compensated discount, which would encourage people to buy Canadian instead of buying foreign; that would enable us to have a favourable trade balance. It should not be difficult at all in a country like Canada. In fact it would not be difficult if we were using a social credit system.

What shall we do about international commercial rivalry? This is one of the problems in the mind of the member for Grey North, who asked that question with great sincerity. He is much troubled about how Canada would get her goods into foreign countries. Well, Mr. Speaker, the day has to come when we must realize that we must not force our goods into a foreign market in competition with other people's goods or in competition with the goods of that country in its own market. If we persist in so forcing our goods we shall disrupt the economy of the country concerned and begin to sow the seeds of war.

All wars are the result of hot commercial rivalries—successful commercial rivalries. That principle was definitely enunciated by Woodrow Wilson, who was one of the men who in their time knew these things. Social Credit would trade not on a competitive basis but on a mutual aid basis. If we are financing mutual aid to various nations, why should those nations not finance mutual aid to us? If we can provide them with the things that they are unable to produce, why should they not provide us with the things that we ourselves are unable to produce? Surely they should not hesitate to do that, and I am certain that they would not. Imagine Britain refusing to send us goods which we cannot produce in return for goods that we have sent to her which she could not produce! It is not conceivable; neither would it be conceivable in the case of Australia, New Zealand or any other country under intelligent government.

And so we would trade not on a competitive basis but on a mutual aid basis. We would trade the goods we have, such as aluminum, copper, wood pulp, lumber, the products of wheat, salt fish, sugar, rubber, machinery and all sorts of things which we are able to produce. We would trade all these commodities for such products as bananas, oranges and other things we need from abroad.

There would be no attempt to "blast our way" into the world's markets in any shape or form. We could reduce our price—as the member for Grey North conceived we would—by means of a subsidy, to enable other nations to buy our goods, but we would not force those goods on those nations. We saw an illustration of this concept in operation in the statement on wheat which the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) gave to the house recently. He pointed out definitely that we must keep the price of wheat down so that the British people could buy it. Under social credit that could be done with any commodity. If a nation wanted to buy our goods we could bring down the price of the goods by a subsidy to producers so that other nations could buy those goods without reducing the price received by farmers and other producers. That could be done on a world-wide scale, especially by a nation as fortunately endowed as Canada is.

The tremendous difference between bringing down your price—may I impress this upon the hon. member for Grey North—so as to enable other nations to buy, and bringing down your price in order to force your goods upon other nations, is a difference that must be apparent to all. The first is a blessing; the second is a curse which must result in war.

How would social credit protect Canada's economy against foreign goods—by using tariff, exchange control, quotas and embargoes? Each of these could be used, but the social credit technique is that of price discounting. If goods were coming from a foreign country underselling ours by fifteen or twenty cents per unit, all we would have to do would be to subsidize our own producers to bring down our own price to enable that article to be sold under the goods coming in. That can be done and has been done; I could point to plenty of instances in which it has been done. We need have no use of a tariff. If we could not get along without one we might have to have one, and we would use it only under those circumstances; but there is no need of one, so far as I can see.

How would social credit attain monetary stabilization? First, in Canada, it would lower the price structure by subsidies to producers or compensated discount to consumers. The lower the price structure in a country, the higher the value of that country's dollar, which means that by means of the compensated price you can raise the value of your dollar in the world to any desired standard. That is the technique we would use, in that way stabilizing our own dollar, so that we would know exactly what it would be worth, and everyone else would also know. In a similar way the other nations could do the same thing. We would have to agree on prices. Social credit is absolutely opposed to having any fund, such as the Bretton Woods agreement envisages, set up with the power to dictate to a nation how its money shall be managed. What a nation shall do with its money is that nation's business and nobody else's. If they do not choose to trade with us, that is their lookout; we will get along anyhow.

The next question is, what is social credit's attitude to international trade. I have already stated that social credit is prepared to trade with any nation on a mutually advantageous basis. It will trade what others need for the things which Canada needs.

What is our attitude to the Atlantic charter? Social credit is the only known system on the face of the earth under which the Atlantic charter can be established so that there can actually be freedom from want and fear among the nations of the earth and all the earth's peoples. I defy any economist anywhere in the world to show any other system whereby that can be done. The only system under which it is possible is social credit.

What is our attitude to war? We hold that the cause of war is economic; it is fear and want. The system of mutual aid which I have indicated would entirely remove fear and want and thus remove in a large measure the cause of war. We would trade through a mutual aid arrangement instead of having competition, and thus go far towards removing the cause of war. And if after that there were still people who wanted to fight—well, there is only one thing to do and that is to see that our walls are strong. Social credit would see that that was the case, and it has taken that attitude ever since coming into public life. We would see that we had a strong economy, strong armaments, strong and healthy people, well educated, strong through exercise and strong in morale.

What is our attitude to the British commonwealth and the empire? We believe that the British commonwealth is the greatest and most dependable guarantee of freedom of every kind thus far developed in the world. The greatest demonstration of democratic strength, through decentralization, is found in the commonwealth. We favour full understanding and wise cooperation with the British peoples. We insist that local sovereignty be completely and unchallengeably guaranteed. We insist that Canada, while being daughter in her mother's house, shall be mistress in her own, with all that term implies. We believe that, with respect to the British peoples, united we stand, divided we fall.

The British have a great responsibility to discharge in the world, and the British commonwealth, on a social credit basis, could withstand any enemy on earth or any combination of enemies. No combination could then destroy it politically or economically.

We favour putting the British empire and British commonwealth on a social credit basis, and then, under God, going forth facing the future without wavering. The British commonwealth can be economically self-sufficient.

What is the social credit attitude to world organization? We are ready to cooperate. We are ready to discharge our full responsibility. But we are not willing to surrender our sovereignty to any international or other external force on earth.

What is the social credit interpretation of the world situation? It accepts God, it accepts Jesus Christ, it believes that there is a struggle between the powers of righteousness and the powers of evil waging in the world to-day. Evil is forever seeking to enslave men, to centralize power and destroy men's freedom, politically, economically and financially. Good is with equal determination struggling to free men and to guarantee their freedom, politically, economically and financially.

The powers of evil are headed up by certain international bodies or powers. Among those powers we consider international finance to be one of the foremost.

Is Canada fitted to take the lead in the social credit movement in the world? The member for Grey North asked that question, and it was a good one. Let us see: Canada is rich in resources. She has very varied resources, almost inexhaustible resources, and she could be almost completely self-sufficient. She has industrial equipment of a very high order, and industrial skills coming out of this war of first-rate quality. She has administrative skill of the first order. She has scientists of high quality, as witness the great developments in plastics on a commercial scale. She has hundreds of thousands of people already enlightened in social credit, and hundreds of thousands more much interested in it, as the hon. member for Grey North indicated the other day. Her people believe in individual enterprise; her people are a freedom-loving people, very brave and dreaded in war. She is a part of the British commonwealth of nations and is therefore protected through that association. She is a part of the North American continent and derives protection from that relation.

She is eager to find a solution to the economic difficulties which confront her; she is eager to find a solution to the problem of war; she is fearful of failure. Where could you possibly find a nation more admirably fitted, apparently more designed and destined by Almighty God, to take the lead in the world in the solution of the world's economic problems? I commend the whole system of social credit to the most earnest consideration of all hon. members in the house and of all the people in the country as the only means whereby we can emerge from the old order of doubt, insecurity, irregularity, injustice and war, into the new order where there shall be actually guaranteed freedom from want and fear, and where people will be able to enjoy freedom of religion, of speech and of choice.

Mr. D. S. HARKNESS (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, I should like at the outset of this, my first speech in the house, to add my congratulations to the many which you have already received on your election to your high office. I also wish to congratulate the mover (Mr. Benidickson) and the seconder (Mr. Langlois) of the Address in reply to the speech from the throne, first on the excellent addresses they gave, and second because they are representatives of the air force and the navy respectively. I think it was fitting that those services should have been honoured in this way.

At this point I should like to pay a tribute to the men of the particular arm of the services with whom I served, namely, the Royal Canadian Artillery. I believe few will dispute the statement that, with the exception of the infantry, the gunners were more responsible for winning all our battles than any other arm of the ground forces. I am proud to have served with such a fine body of men, and I was anxious to have this tribute to them put on the record.

I should like to make a plea here for the foot soldier. Throughout the war he was the lowest paid of any service man, and during the earlier years of it was the least regarded, because it was commonly believed that technological advances had outmoded him, and that the gun, the tank, the signals, the repair services, and so forth, were much more important. Yet on the actual field of battle it was found that the infantryman was still the most important and necessary man there. He had the worst conditions under which to live, suffered the most privations, took the greatest risks, and incurred the highest casualties; yet his pay remained lower than that of the motor mechanic working in comparative safety some thirty miles behind the battlefield. I maintain that this was all wrong, and I hope to see this parliament authorize a complete change in the scale of pay of the services, so that it will bear a much closer relationship to the risks run, and to the conditions endured, than has been the case in the past. I feel very strongly on this matter because of my personal experience. As a result of the man-power policy of the present government the artillery regiment which I commanded spent three and a half months of last winter acting as infantry. During that time many men came to me and remarked that they had never before appreciated the difficulties and hardships of the infantry, and reckoned that they should be paid two or three times as much in that role as they were paid as gunners.

In the short time I have been in this house I have observed that it is customary for a new member to say something of the glories of his own constituency. In the constituency of Calgary East, which I have the honour to represent, we have a post office and a polling division called Bragg Creek. Do not be alarmed that the name is indicative of what is to come. In fact there is no need to advertise Calgary East, because, I believe, it is known to practically every person throughout Canada, because of two things. First, it is the site of the Calgary stampede, and second it contains Turner valley, the only large producing oil field in the dominion. At this point I will do a little advertising. I earnestly recommend to all hon. members that they make use of their travelling facilities to come out and see either or both of these attractions. For my own part I propose to do the same thing in eastern Canada. I am sorry to say that I have not seen anything of Quebec and the maritime provinces. I believe it is my duty to do so, and I intend to do so as early as possible.

What is not so well known as the Calgary stampede and Turner valley, is the fact that Calgary East is a representative cross-section of Canadian life. It takes in most of the central or business district of Calgary, and embraces residential areas representing all levels of income, and people of nearly every racial origin and religion to be found in Canada. These people are engaged in most of the occupations followed in this country with the exception of those connected with the sea. The rural part of the constituency runs from twenty-five miles south of the city, west to the British Columbia boundary. In it there are found dairy farms, mixed farms, wheat farms, cattle ranches and the odd small saw mill, and on the outskirts of the city a large number of small holdings, where people are engaged in vegetable growing, fur farming and other rural enterprises of a small kind.

As a result of fairly close contact with a large number of these people, of all conditions of life, I assure you, Mr. Speaker, and hon. members of this house, that the three things uppermost in their minds are those with which the amendment proposed by the leader of this party deals. They want their men now in the services back home and into civilian life as rapidly as possible; they want houses for these men and for themselves to live in, and above all, they want jobs and the assurance that these jobs will continue.

These subjects of demobilization, housing and jobs have been dealt with by many other speakers in this debate; therefore I do not propose to say anything further on them except that I believe any hon. member of this house who has these matters sincerely at heart cannot conscientiously do otherwise than vote for the amendment proposed by the leader of this party.

I should like now to touch briefly on certain other matters. Because of the nature of my constituency, and because the prosperity of Calgary and of Alberta is very closely connected with the prosperity of the beef producers, I am very deeply interested in that industry. Some ten days ago the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) and I, had several long talks with Mr. George Ross, chairman of the Council of Western Beef Producers, and a large rancher in southern Alberta. From their contacts with cattle men in the United States, his organization is convinced that unless at least token shipment of beef are allowed to go from Canada to the United States shortly, we will lose that market, which meant so much to us in the pre-war years in the matter of disposing of our surplus beef cattle, and thus in keeping prices of beef at a level which made it possible for cattle producers, and beef producers particularly, to operate at a profit. Mr. Ross states that beef producers are not interested in the three to four cents a pound more which can be obtained on the United States market. They are quite content to let the government take this in the form of export licence fees, or in any other way that it sees fit. But the beef producers are very anxious that this market be not lost in the future, and to ensure this they believe, with their expert knowledge of the situation, that some shipments of beef to United States markets are essential at the present time. To use Mr. Ross' words, "We have to keep the ditches wet, or there will be no flow in the future". I earnestly recommend to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) that this matter receive his immediate attention.

Another thing which exercises the beef producers is that the Income War Tax Act places them at a disadvantage as compared with people in any other business. The proceeds from any cattle sold by cattlemen are considered as income, and taxed. But a cattleman's breeding stock, his cows, are actually his capital, or his tools, comparable to a grain farmer's machinery or a manufacturer's plant.

A cattleman normally runs let us say 300 head of breeding cows. If, owing to a dry year or adverse conditions of any kind, he is unable to carry those cows through the winter and has to sell off, we will say, half of them, along with his normal turn-off of beef cattle—say 250 head—with income tax at present levels it means that he gets practically nothing back for those 150 cows. He is in a position where he has lost his capital, or his tools, and is not able to go back into production on anything like his former scale. Surely this is an injustice which parliament should redress by a provision in the Income War Tax Act to the effect that a farmer or rancher's normal breeding cows, brood sows, and the like, shall be regarded as capital, and not have to pay income tax upon the sale thereof.

I should like to compliment the Minister of Agriculture, who, I am sorry to see, is not in the house at this time, upon his eloquent dissertation of last night. I am certain he convinced himself and hon. members on his side of the house that the government's bonus on coarse grains and the price ceiling set on hogs has not been responsible for the marked decrease in the number of hogs produced. I am equally certain that he did not convince the men whom I was glad to hear him credit with knowing more about farming than any other group, that is, the men who milk the cows and feed the hogs. In this I refer more particularly to Alberta; and the fact that the farmers in that province were not, and are not, convinced of this, is amply demonstrated by the very large decrease in hog production which has taken place in that province, despite the fact that these farmers had plenty of feed.

I can assure the minister, too, that from conversation with large numbers of men who formerly produced hogs, but who are not now producing them, it is clear that the sole reason they stopped such production was that it paid them much better to sell their grain. They maintain that they will not go back into hog production unless the price of hogs is raised. I can also assure the house that, so far as my constituency is concerned, hog production at the present time is falling from month to month.

I was glad to hear the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Wylie) discuss the question of irrigation for southern Alberta, when he addressed the house on Thursday last. I join with him in the hope that this question will not be made a political football, and that the government will proceed immediately with at least one of the irrigation schemes surveyed and talked about so much in Alberta.

I do not purpose at the moment giving the house any of the mass of facts and figures which is available to show the tremendous benefits which the construction of irrigation systems in western Canada would produce for the whole dominion. The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) has already done a great deal along this line, and on behalf of Alberta I should like to thank him for his work, and for what he has accomplished in bringing to the attention of the house and of all Canada the possibilities of irrigation, and of many other natural resources in western Canada.

I was pleased, too, to hear the Minister of Agriculture state in his speech last night that the government proposes to go ahead with irrigation schemes, and I trust it proposes to do so immediately—not three or four years in the future.

During the debate several hon. members have discussed the subject of immigration. I hope this is an indication that there is an increasing interest in this matter, and that the fear-begotten closed-door policy, and ideas of the kind which were prevalent in the pre-war era, are disappearing. While we had hundreds of thousands of people on relief rolls, anyone who proposed an immigration policy or made the suggestion that we should bring more people to this country was looked upon as a lunatic. Such an attitude of mind was quite understandable at that time. Now, however, I think we should go back to the basic truth that we just have not enough people in Canada to make our great transportation systems economically sound, to make for a well-balanced economy, to develop properly our natural resources, or to support our multitude of governments—municipal, provincial and dominion—in the manner to which they have become accustomed.

To elaborate on the last point: our taxes are too high, but I see no good prospect of reducing them materially except by getting more people into the country, producing more wealth, and thus spreading the load.

However, I would not be in favour of a policy of unrestricted immigration. I believe the test as to whether a man should be admitted to Canada should lie in the answer to this question: can we readily and rapidly assimilate him? If the answer is no, then he should be excluded. Our experiences in the past fifty years should be a good enough guide to us in deciding as to whom we can or cannot readily assimilate. Certainly in that class would come all orientals. I believe we should rigidly close the doors against them. When I take this stand I trust that hon. members to my left will not accuse me of racial prejudice. My views are not founded upon racial prejudice, or racial grounds at all, but rather on common sense, observation, and a strong desire to build a great and united Canada.

I believe that even hon. members of the C.C.F. will admit that more than ninety-nine per cent of the white population of Canada will not intermarry with orientals. Those few who do, and their children, are exposed to all the cruelties, hardships and humiliations of social ostracism. I think it is only honest to make this admission, and to admit also that these oriental people cannot be assimilated into the broad stream of Canadian life. They cannot be made into thorough-going Canadians, and therefore it is better for them, as well as for us, to keep them out of the country.

Throughout the debate I have been glad to hear a large number of speakers say something on the subject of national unity. I think this is basically the greatest problem we have in Canada to-day. If we are to make this the great and united country which it is possible for us to build, we will all have to pitch in and work to that end. National unity has had a great deal of lip service in the past, but as far as I have been able to find out very few people have really worked actively and in a practical manner in order to get results.

We have had far too much sectionalism and distrust and suspicion in each part of the country toward every other part of the country. Provincialism too often has been fostered and encouraged for political reasons, which is one of the chief reasons it still exists to the extent it does at the present time. I trust that this sort of thing will soon become a thing of the past. We cannot afford to gamble with the future of Canada for political ends on this issue.

I think we must start a hard-pushed publicity campaign to foster Canadianism. We should make full use of our schools, our radio and our press to do this. People in this country to a large extent are Scotch-Canadians, Irish-Canadians, French-Canadians, Polish-Canadians and every other sort of hyphenated Canadians. What we need in place of that are just plain Canadians, and in order to get that we must teach Canadianism. The thing will not come of itself. The proposal of the government to adopt a Canadian flag and Canadian citizenship is a step in the right direction. That will help materially in getting people to think of themselves as Canadians. There has been too much harking back in this country to racial origins, and this has retarded the growth of a national spirit.

I know this from my own experience. I am of Scotch descent, and although my forefathers came to this country well over a hundred years ago, as a boy I was taught to think of myself as a Scotsman. Until the age of nineteen or twenty years I referred to myself as a Scotch Canadian whenever the matter came up. That sort of thing is fairly typical of the majority of people in Canada, but it is an attitude of mind which must be broken down if true national unity is to be secured.

Before concluding, there is another question about which I should like to say a few words, the trans-Canada highway. The hon. member for Medicine Hat introduced the subject in his speech a few days ago and said that he hoped the hon. member for Calgary West and I would support the project. I want to assure him that we support him most strongly, and will press for the adoption by this house of the ideas contained in a report on the subject prepared by the Calgary board of trade, from which I should like to read a few extracts, as follows:

> Canada requires an adequate highway system built around a hard-surfaced trans-Canada highway equal to any one of the many excellent transcontinental highways in the United States, otherwise Canada stands to lose her favourable balance of trade and economic world position through the loss of tourist traffic.
> Past experience has taught us that many provincial governments are not financially able to construct highways of such high standards through sparsely populated areas, and if we depend on the provinces to build such a highway system it is not likely same will ever be completed.

And again:

> We propose that the dominion government should embark on a programme similar to the United States federal aid programme, providing approximately ten per cent of the money being spent in the states, namely $50,000,000 a year, for a number of years, on a dollar for dollar basis with the provinces, and thus guarantee the expenditure of at least $100,000,000 a year on approved hard surfaced highways in Canada. We believe an adequate system of highways including a trans-Canada highway would not only satisfy and keep a large percentage of Canadian motorists at home, but attract sufficient motorists from the United States annually to more than repay our annual expenditure for such highways.

The Calgary board of trade is preparing a brief on this subject of a trans-Canada highway. When it is presented to the government I hope its recommendations will receive very serious consideration.

Mr. H. R. ARGUE (Wood Mountain): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne I want to say what many hon. members have said, that I too am a new member. As some of the other new members have had difficulty in speaking, I am sure I shall be excused if I have even more difficulty, because I happen to be the youngest member in this house. I hope I shall be able to equal the enviable record set by the other honourable young members. Those young members who have spoken have given the lie to the contention held in many quarters that a man must have graying hair and must limp in here on a cane before he is sufficiently mentally developed to make a real contribution.

A number of hon. members have referred to their constituencies, and I trust I shall be pardoned if I give the house some information about the constituency I represent. I represent the constituency of Wood Mountain which is situated in southwestern Saskatchewan. This constituency is composed of people of many nationalities. I was somewhat taken aback when I heard reference made to the apparent conflict between the different nationalities in Canada. I should like to tell the house that the people of all nationalities living in my constituency have learned to live harmoniously together.

I am afraid I shall not be able to boast of the great grandeur of my constituency or of the metropolises situated therein. It is largely an agricultural constituency, and there are only two towns, Assiniboia and Gravelbourg, which can boast a population of over one thousand people. The constituents of Wood Mountain are not wealthy, and I think hon. members will have guessed the reason why. They are largely farmers, and the farmers of Canada have never received their fair share of the national income.

Another reason is that we are situated in what might be called the dry belt of the west. Because of climatic conditions we suffer periodic crop failures. But let us have no illusions; that part of the west is still a great agricultural area. It has contributed in no small measure to the large quantities of meat and butter and grain that have been used to feed our gallant allies. Wood Mountain constituency can boast of one of the largest credit unions in Canada, the Lafleche credit union. Credit unions in Saskatchewan are growing up like mushrooms because the banks have failed to satisfy the needs of the farmer.

I should like to digress for a moment and say something about banks. As most hon. members know, the banks have the privilege, and they follow it in practice, of lending ten times as much in bank credit as they have in actual cash. Chartered banks also have the privilege of discounting so-called gilt-edged securities with the Bank of Canada. By this means they are able to lend many times the amount of bank credit compared to their actual cash. In 1893 bank assets in this country totalled 302 million dollars; bank assets in 1943 totalled 5,150 million dollars. Bank assets for the last fifty years have increased at the rate of 35 per cent per year.

Banks were first organized for the business of making loans. When they were in business in the early years of this country their assets were composed almost entirely of loans, but starting about the year 1930 the structure of bank assets has changed enormously, until to-day, of the over 5,000 million dollars of bank assets, something over 2,700 million dollars are invested in government bonds and industrial stocks. The banks have not been able to survive in what we have been led to believe to be free enterprise. They are to-day a leech on all the people of Canada to the extent that they have that amount of investments in dominion government bonds and industrial stocks. The banks are no longer content to control merely the currency, the lifeblood of the nation; they want to own and control the whole Canadian economy. We of the C.C.F. believe it is time that the people of Canada owned the banks, and not the banks own the people as they do at the present time. For that reason I would suggest to the government that they take into very serious consideration the question of giving to the credit unions the full privileges and rights of the chartered banks. If that is done the people of Saskatchewan will have their own banks and will no longer have to go hat in hand to the banking institutions of Canada.

I might add that the banks are not to-day satisfying and have not satisfied since 1930 the credit needs of the people of Saskatchewan, and in particular the farmers. In 1926 there were 427 branches of the chartered banks in Saskatchewan. According to the 1943 report in the Canada Year Book, the branches of the chartered banks in Saskatchewan number now 213. That is, over half of the banks in Saskatchewan have closed their doors since 1926. The people of Saskatchewan are not sorry that they have closed their doors, but we do want to have banks of our own, and we can have them if the credit unions are given the full privileges of the chartered banks.

There is one part of government financial policy to which I should like to refer, and that is income tax. First I want to assure this house that we in this group are not opposed to the principles of income taxation. We believe that those best able to pay should pay. But we believe that the burden of the income tax has become too difficult to bear for those in the lower income brackets. Consequently, as the leader of this group suggested in his first speech in this new parliament, we feel that the income tax exemptions should be raised to $1,200 for a single man and to $2,000 for a married man.

A word as to how the income tax affects the farmers. In 1939, when war broke out, the farmers of Saskatchewan and of almost all parts of Canada had just come through a very serious economic depression. Consequently the farmers of Saskatchewan have been labouring under a terrific load of debt. According to the present income tax law, a man cannot count as an exemption from his income the amount he pays off on his mortgage. We believe, Mr. Speaker, that the difficulties and hardships and the economic depression which the farmers suffered in the hungry thirties should be considered in the income tax law, and that the law should be revised so that the amount of principal which the farmer pays off his mortgage shall be exempt from taxation.

There is another aspect. We believe very strongly, particularly those of us who come from areas in which crop yields fluctuate tremendously, that the average farmer's yield for one year or even two years is not good enough as a base for calculating income tax. The farmer's yield should be averaged over a period of at least five years, and on that basis the income tax should be calculated. I am sure I speak for all the members of this group when I say that we intend to do everything in our power to see that the inequitable income tax laws are amended so that the common man in this country shall have a chance to make a living and maintain his family in decency.

A word about professional agriculturists. We have from time to time in this debate heard that many of our scientists are underpaid, and that there is great danger that we shall lose them to the United States. I assume that the scientists spoken of were chemists, physicists and engineers. I want to put in a plug for agricultural scientists. I happen to be myself, a graduate of an agricultural university. We in Saskatchewan know in a very real sense the benefits that come from research in agriculture. Professional agriculturists have recently given to us rust-resistant wheats, smooth-awned barleys, and royal flax. We now anticipate that in the not distant future we shall have a sawfly-resistant wheat. I would suggest to the government that the salaries of agricultural scientists be increased so that we may retain in Canada those now here and give some encouragement to young farmers to follow what I believe to be an essential and noble profession.

I should like at this time to express my pleasure at the unanimity shown by all speakers in the hope that we shall get a real measure of social security. There should be increased benefits in the way of provision for health, old age pensions, jobs for the workers and houses for the people. I am sorry to say, however, that the government's method of handing over the house-building programme to private enterprise has already failed. We in the C.C.F. believe the measure of prosperity which Canadians have had during the war, when two millions of our best workers were taken out of the production of consumer goods, gives an insight into the kind of Canada we can have if our economy is organized and planned so that its basis is production for use and not for profit. I would press for a comprehensive house-building programme, and in doing so may I suggest that all the slum conditions are not in our largest cities. I venture to say that every town in Canada has a shortage of houses. I protest against the slum conditions in which many farmers are forced to live. The government should formulate a comprehensive house-building programme which will guarantee to every family a decent house compatible with the real wealth which Canada can produce.

I want now to make reference to the newly announced government policy of a floor price on wheat basis No. 1 northern at Fort William. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) assured the house that the $1 per bushel for wheat is but the initial price, but the history of floor prices of agricultural products has been that the floor price becomes in effect the price the farmer receives. I am sure the government believes that the price of wheat in the near future will fall to $1 a bushel, or if not, why was the floor set so low?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not want to interrupt, but may I just make this correction? I did not say one dollar was the initial price. I said one dollar is the lowest initial price that can be set under the policy. At present the initial price is $1.25.

Mr. COLDWELL: At the moment.

Mr. GARDINER: And until it is changed it remains at that.

Mr. ARGUE: Pardon me; $1.25 is the initial price for the crop delivered this year, but the assurance we had was that $1 per bushel would be the lowest initial price until 1950.

Mr. GARDINER: That ever will be set, but it may not be set lower than $1.25.

Mr. ARGUE: Oh, yes; but judging from the government's record in the past we are afraid that $1 per bushel will in fact be the price. Another thing I should like to add to that is that $1 per bushel is not on all the bushels of wheat—necessarily—that a farmer can raise, but on the authorized deliveries, and we have had no assurance as to what those authorized deliveries will be. Consequently, if the government should see fit to decide that five bushels per authorized acre is the total amount of wheat a farmer can market in one year, this government will certainly assure economic death to all farmers in western Canada. We in the C.C.F. have always contended that the farmer should receive for his products a price based on parity, a price in line with the prices of goods a farmer has to buy. The farm management department of the University of Saskatchewan calculates that parity to-day is more than $1.40 per bushel. The government, instead of raising the price of wheat near parity, has announced a floor price very much lower than parity. The price which a farmer pays for fuel, for machinery, for interest on mortgages is relatively fixed. These are "stick-y" prices, and if in the future—and we of this group certainly hope it will not be the case—the prices of agricultural products fall, the farmer facing fixed costs will find it almost impossible to survive.

We hear a good deal of talk from the government about social security, about public works programmes timed to prevent depression, but in its policy of agriculture it is dealing a death blow to security and prosperity. It is saying in effect, "We herald a new depression with a floor of only $1 per bushel for wheat." If labour is to be forced to take wages lower than those of the last few years, and if the farmer is to receive a reduced income, I am convinced that the government's scheme of timing public investment is doomed to complete failure. We in this group will be satisfied with nothing less than full production, and labour and the farmer receiving their full share of that production.

I want to bring before this house changes which we believe should be made in the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. The act was passed as a measure to alleviate suffering in areas of the prairie provinces and the Peace river which periodically suffer crop failure. That these areas are an important part of our agricultural productive system is well known, because of the large quantities of meat, butter, eggs and grain which have been produced in the war years—quantities which have contributed in no small degree to the successful feeding of the allied armies, and will contribute in like degree to feeding the starving people of Europe. This year large areas in Saskatchewan and Alberta have an almost complete crop failure. I have tried to obtain some statistics as to crop conditions in Alberta, but was unsuccessful. However, the Minister of Agriculture intimated last night that about half the farming area of Alberta is experiencing this year, a crop failure.

Before me I have the last estimate of crop yields coming from the Saskatchewan Department of Agriculture, under date of September 17, and looking over the map I would say, that about half of the area of Saskatchewan is this year experiencing a crop failure to the extent that yields for wheat will be less than ten bushels per acre.

The Hon. L. F. McIntosh, the Minister of Agriculture for Saskatchewan, as reported in the Regina Leader Post of recent date, stated that farm income from grain in Saskatchewan this year will be forty per cent less than last year. Surely a crop failure area of that size, and a drop in farm income from grain to the extent of forty per cent for Saskatchewan, warrants a comprehensive study of the inadequacies of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

There is a common belief that Saskatchewan farms are of enormous size, but such is not the case. In southwestern Saskatchewan the average size of farm is 325·2 cultivated acres, and in the north the size is 143 cultivated acres. The P.F.A.A. payments to be made to farmers in the prairies in any year declared an emergency year, and if the yield is from 4·1 to 8 bushels per acre, is $1.50 an acre for half the cultivated acres up to 400 acres. If the yield is 0 to 4 bushels, the payment is $2 an acre on half the cultivated acreage up to 400 acres. But to calculate the amount of money the farmer will receive under P.F.A.A., let us assume that a farmer is fortunate enough to have a crop failure when 171 townships in Saskatchewan have yields of less than five bushels an acre, that is, when the crop failure clause comes into effect. Let us assume that in the area under five bushels the average yield is half of five, or 2½ bushels per acre. If wheat sells at $1 a bushel at shipping point and harvesting costs are low, the farmer may have something like $1 an acre, or $162 over and above harvesting costs. Then the average farmer in southwestern Saskatchewan, the area of largest farms, would receive $2.50 an acre on 162·6 acres, or $406.50. If besides he has a crop of 2½ bushels an acre he receives a total income from grain and the P.F.A.A. of not more than $569.

Calculating farm operating expenses as three-quarters of the cost of hiring the work done, that is allowing the farmer no wages, then seeding and summer fallowing for the coming year would cost at least $659. This leaves the farmer, then, on operating expenses alone nearly $100 in the red, besides owing the municipality for taxes, owing interest to his creditors, and, what is more important, with no income for himself and his family.

The argument might be put forth that in times of crop failure the farmer can sell some of his live stock and in that way supplement his income. But in years of crop failure shortage of grain and fodder makes the retention of live stock a costly matter. It may well be that the farmer is forced to reduce drastically the numbers of his live stock and still have insufficient moneys from that source to pay for the wintering of his foundation stock. That was the experience of farmers in 1937.

The federal government has of recent date set out its proposals, many of which are admirable, before the dominion-provincial conference. At page 6 of the proposals the government of Canada states:

The achievement of greater stability in the flow of consumption expenditures is dependent, to a significant degree, on the policies that are adopted to protect the basic incomes of the groups whose position is most precarious.

Again, on page 7:

In familiar terms, our objectives are high and stable employment and income, and a greater sense of public responsibility for individual economic security and welfare.

Again, on page 17, speaking of agriculture, the dominion's proposal states:

No industry has made a greater contribution to the Canadian war effort than agriculture. This achievement has left problems of conversion to peace-time conditions comparable to those of manufacturing industry. Many branches of agriculture were greatly expanded in response to war needs and over-all production increased to levels far exceeding those of the past. This accomplishment drew heavily upon agricultural resources, resulting in heavy depreciation of machinery and equipment and great strain on the depleted farm population. The dominion government feels it has a responsibility to assist the industry in making the necessary readjustments to peace-time circumstances and to work in cooperation with the provincial governments, to provide for a greater degree of stability in farm income, and a greater measure of security than has prevailed in the past.

Then on page 28 we find:

A significant volume of social security payments, flowing into the consumer's spending stream, will stabilize the economy of the country as a whole and work against a fall in the national income. Social security payments therefore become, in these circumstances, a powerful weapon with which to ward off general economic depression.

Here the federal government has stated very definitely that it will seek to prevent violent fluctuations in the farm income. It has stated that social security payments will work against a fall in the national income. This is admittedly a good policy, but nowhere in the dominion's proposals, or in the speech from the throne, is there even a hint that the P.F.A.A. payments will be increased. The P.F.A.A. as it is now constituted is wholly incapable of maintaining even a minimum of security for the farmer.

Surely the government would be well advised to do more than pay lip service to social security, and implement comprehensive security for the farmer against crop failure.

I have shown that payments under the P.F.A.A. will not meet even next year's operating expenses, and in no way can it be conceived that the act now provides one dollar towards feeding, clothing and sheltering the farm family. The hard cold fact remains that in time of crop failure the farmer has no security.

[Mr. Argue.]

Speaking of the P.F.A.A., a report submitted in 1944 to the Saskatchewan reconstruction council states:

Of the five years in which the act has been in force, three of the years were more or less average. For the prairie provinces as a whole, one, 1941, was a very poor year, and, one, 1942, was the largest crop on record.

I have made a few calculations from that statement. For the three average years the payments totalled $22,864,272. The average payments for the three years of average crop were $7,621,424. The collections for those three years totalled $7,602,948 and the average collections per year were $2,534,316. The average cost of awards was $5,000,000 a year in round figures. We in the C.C.F. ask that the maximum payment be raised from $2.50 an acre to $6 an acre. This new figure would then cost the government about $15,000,000 a year.

I believe that Canadians have come to realize that prosperity, like peace, is one and indivisible. If labour and small business is to prosper, then agriculture also must prosper. Indeed prosperity in Canada generally depends in large measure on a prosperous agriculture. Prosperity cannot be built on an impoverished agricultural economy. If agriculture in the west is to be prosperous, farmers must be guaranteed an income in time of crop failure sufficient to give the farmer and his family a reasonable living and sufficient to carry on farming operations for another year. The sum of approximately $15 million a year would go a long way toward doing that, and I suggest that that is indeed a small item in the modern Canadian budget.

I should like to mention some proposed changes in the Prairie Farm Assistance Act:

1. That the payments be increased to $6 per acre for a zero to a four bushel yield, payments to be increased to $3 per acre for a 4·1 to eight bushel yield, and that elevator deductions be not greater than three per cent, which is three times present deductions.

2. That the payments be made to include all bona fide farmers to ensure that the man who has borne the expense of seeding and summerfallowing shall receive the payment.

3. That payments be made on an individual yield basis rather than a township yield basis, to ensure that every farmer who has a crop failure receives the full benefit.

4. That the minimum payment when the crop yield is less than four bushels per acre be $500, and that the minimum payment for a yield of 4·1 to eight bushels be $300.

The government has committed itself to a programme of social security, and to a programme that will prevent violent fluctuations in income for the farmer. An adequate Prairie Farm Assistance Act would assure the farmer against a falling income from one source, that is crop failure. A $6 per acre payment in time of crop failure is surely very little. It would mean for the average farmer in the area composed of the largest farms an income of still less than $1,000. Surely such a payment is but simple justice. I would suggest to the government that there is no single piece of legislation so universally demanded and so essential to the farmers of Saskatchewan, Alberta, and to a lesser degree Manitoba. I suggest that the measure I propose is essentially a social security measure. It would prove to western farmers that when the government says that social security measures will be implemented, it means what it says. Farmers demand a substantial increase in the P.F.A.A. payments, at least to the extent of $6 per acre in a year of crop failure. Farmers in the west will not rest content until their demands for adequate protection against crop failure have been met.

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): I wish to make a few general remarks which I hope to elaborate during future debates. First of all, I should like to deal with the criticism or the remarks made by the hon. member for Grey North (Mr. Case). He made them in a very generous and pleasant way and I hope that he will accept mine in a similar spirit. The hon. member said, as reported at page 369 of Hansard:

> I wish to say to my hon. friends that I do not think Canada, of all countries in the world, is in a position to give leadership in monetary reform.

May I say at the beginning that social credit is not only, or even mainly, a system of monetary reform. Social credit is a philosophy of life, and the monetary proposals are designed to make possible a Christian way of life, of individual freedom and individual responsibility.

The hon. member for Grey North went on to say:

> We produce a tremendous volume of goods in this country, and we must find a market for them in the markets of the world. The home market could never consume the amount of goods we produce, because we produce enough for 50,000,000 people. The productive capacity of this nation during the war absolutely staggers human imagination.

I am not quite sure what that 50,000,000 means. I do not think it can be meant that 11,000,000 Canadians produce enough goods for 50,000,000 people because, if you take the total production of Canada in the last year or so, you will find it certainly would not be sufficient to give even the bare necessities of life to 50,000,000 people. It is true that of some articles we produce a great deal more than we can use, and naturally we must find a market for the surplus in order that we may be able to bring back in exchange goods that we do not and cannot produce in Canada. That, of course, is understood, but apparently many hon. members are still of the opinion that there is a necessity for increased exports over imports. As they have said, "we live on our exports." Social Crediters simply reverse that and say that we live on our imports.

We Canadians are not the only people in the world who, under the pressure of war, have stepped up our powers of production. That is true more or less the world over. When I was in England the winter before last I met some prominent manufacturers, and one of them, who was one of the largest producers of aeroplanes in Great Britain, told me that the factories in Great Britain alone could produce in one week the world's peace-time needs for aeroplanes for five years. I think those figures are impressive.

At this time I should like to explain the fundamental difference between the economy of Major Douglas, or social credit, if you prefer that, and the ordinary orthodox economy. I think the basic difference is this, that the orthodox system of economics is founded on the idea that production automatically finances consumption, and that the wages, salaries and dividends distributed in producing, or in connection with whatever is produced, will equal the sum of the prices which must be charged if the producer is to recover all his costs.

Douglas denies this. Perhaps I might put it into the language of Mill, that great orthodox economist. His statement is one which I believe stands as one of the foundation stones of orthodox economics, and goes something like this: It is sometimes asked if there can be a shortage of what is known as purchasing power. Those who ask this question cannot understand what is meant by purchasing power. Every seller is, in the end, a buyer. Could we suddenly double the production of the country we should double the supply of goods in every market, but we should by the same stroke double the demand. Therefore there cannot be a shortage of purchasing power.

Some years ago I put that statement to the committee on banking and commerce, at a time when Mr. Towers was a witness. He said that it was some time since he left school, but that he agreed with it and thought it was perfectly sound. Then I said that I would like to put it in a slightly different form. Every birth in the end is a death. Could we suddenly double the number of children in the country we should double the supply of babies in every nursery, but we should by the same stroke double the deaths. How, then, does the population increase?

That is a perfectly fair statement of Mill's axiom. Mr. Towers excused himself by reason of his modesty for not answering the question. Seriously, however, how does the population increase, when every birth must end in death? Mr. Stevens, who was a member of the committee, answered at once that the birthrate was greater than the deathrate; and, of course, that is the answer to the statement of Major Douglas. It is that the rate of flow of prices is greater than the rate of flow of purchasing power. Once that idea is grasped, it can be seen easily that in normal times—not in war time—there is chronic shortage of purchasing power. It is for this reason that all orthodox governments, or those governments operating under an orthodox system of economics, demand, and plan their economy on increased exports. It is for this reason that they send goods out of the country. The wealth leaves the country, but wages and salaries remain behind. In that way to some extent they get around the chronic shortage of purchasing power.

But every industrialized country is in the same position; they all try to export more than they import. Hence you have tariffs, dumping duties and every other means to keep other people's goods out. That is why they speak of a favourable balance of trade when we send out of the country more than we bring in. The orthodox economist considers that this condition is one which indicates a favourable balance of trade—which as Euclid used to say is an absurdity. So much for that.

Our C.C.F. friends to my right have been criticizing private enterprise. Apparently they place upon private enterprise the blame for our troubles, and say that we should produce for use and not for profit. Well, for the greater part of my life I have been a farmer, and it always seemed instinctive and a self-evident truth that the most profitable thing to produce would be that which would be most generally useful. If you can supply a universal demand, then there is no doubt about your profit; but if you produce somethnig which people do not want, you may have to take a loss.

In criticizing the capitalist system our C.C.F. friends refer to it as a profit system. It is a great deal more than that; it is a system of profit and loss. I know of no other way by which dishonesty, inefficiency and, if you like, stupidity, among producers can be penalized than by allowing them to take a loss when they are inefficient or stupid, or produce something that is not wanted.

A word about nationalization, something which many people seem to think is a cure-all. I suggest that the acid test of nationalization is this: Will it lower production costs without lowering wages? Will it guarantee employment without curtailing individual liberty and freedom? That, to me, is the acid test of any new economic idea.

There is one thing about the C.C.F. I never have been able to understand. Coming from an agricultural community, I have never understood why farmers should "fall" for socialism when, of all people in the world, surely the farmers are the most individualistically-minded people. At hundreds of meetings throughout western Canada I have asked farmers why some of them support a proposed system of socialism. Invariably the answer is, "But of course socialism will not apply to us farmers." I have had a wide experience in the west, and I think I can say that the reason why the C.C.F. party won in Saskatchewan was that they managed to convince the farmers in that province that under a C.C.F. government they would not be socialized. On the other hand in Alberta, where I suggest the people are more wide-awake and better informed, the farmers were convinced that under a C.C.F. government they would be socialized. Therefore they voted for Social Credit rather than C.C.F. candidates. Socialists make an appeal to the masses and I think, I believe the reason is that the mentality of the masses is not the sum of the knowledge, or mentality of the individuals composing the masses; it is merely the lowest common denominator of the mentality of the individuals comprising the masses.

Then we have planning. Socialists seem to think we do not know what we want; we do not know when we want it, and we do not know in what quantities we want it. They say there must be some centralized authority in Ottawa or some other place to tell the people not only what they want but when they want it and when and how they are to get it. Social Crediters cannot agree with that. As a matter of fact, we have the most perfect system of planning in our monetary system.

If we regard money, dollar bills if you like, as economic ballots, so that every time we spend a dollar we are voting for the reproduction of what we buy, then we have what I would call economic democracy. But the supply of money is no longer, if it ever was, controlled by the people as a whole. It is controlled by some tiny minority. We know before the war you could go into a store and see the goods piled on the shelves, and there they stayed because the general public did not have the necessary economic ballots or dollar bills in their pockets to indicate to the manufacturer that he could go ahead and produce some more.

What does social credit propose to do to remedy that situation? I am not going to apologize for saying this again, because there are over one hundred new members who have not heard this before and it will not hurt some of those who have heard it before to hear it again. We propose simply to find out the total production and the total consumption of the country, and the difference between the two would show the shortage of money or purchasing power. We would equate the two by distributing the difference, so as to make them balance, by means of national dividends. I am not going into the ethics or morals of national dividends at this time, but that is the simple proposal.

Of course our opponents will say that when you distribute so many million dollars or a billion dollars, whatever it is, you would then have nothing but inflation and the extra money would be used in paying the extra prices. Douglas is a Scotsman; he is a very great Scotsman, and he knew enough to get around that trouble. He proposed to kill inflation before it started by having part of the dividend, or all of it if that were considered desirable, distributed in the form of price discounts or, as some say, compensated prices.

This simply means that retail prices would be reduced by a given amount, and then the retailer would be compensated the amount he was out of pocket. I remember when that was proposed in this house ten or so years ago. At that time it met with great ridicule, but as a matter of fact that system very largely has enabled Great Britain to carry on during this war. When I was over there I was told that the money paid out to retailers in the form of compensated prices amounted to three-quarters of a billion dollars. Not only was it used in Great Britain, it was used in this country but to a much lesser extent. For instance, the consumer of milk has been able to buy that product for two cents a quart less and the retailers have been compensated. That is pure social credit; that is a compensated price. The only difference is that in war time and under orthodox economics, the money to pay it is derived from taxation. That is necessary because in war time there is too much money floating about. However, in peace time the money for that purpose would be created by the Bank of Canada without debt and without interest.

Just a word on old age pensions. I should like to add my support in the strongest possible way to everything that has been said during this debate in favour of increasing the old age pension. I would not trust my language to say what I really think about the way the old people of this country have been living and are forced to live. It is a national and an international disgrace. I can only hope that when the readjustment is made these old age pensioners will receive at least a decent living pension. I am not going to say how much it ought to be, but I certainly would not have it less than $50 a month and I would not have the age limit over sixty years.

To change the subject a little, I should like to endorse what was said yesterday by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Hlynka). When I was in England the winter before last I spoke to many Polish and other soldiers and refugees, and since then I have read everything I can lay my hands on about this matter. I am not going to say anything at this time except to quote from a statement which was issued not long ago by the former premier of Poland, Mr. Tomasz Arciszewski. He said:

> The government that has been formed in Poland is not new. It consists of sixteen communists and crypto communists under fraudulent party labels. The new premier is a soviet citizen and an official of the comintern for the past twenty years.

And again:

> Poland to-day is ruled by the N.K.V.D.

That is the soviet secret police.

> The Polish army now is controlled by officers of the red army. Thousands of Poles are being deported daily to Siberia because they are Polish patriots—those deported include women and children. As an old socialist I can say that under the regime imposed on Poland by Moscow Polish democracy is doomed and the entire struggle of five years against totalitarianism will become a mockery.

That was a statement issued by a former premier of Poland.

On August 20 last, Mr. Bevin, Foreign Secretary in the British Labour government, speaking of Hungaria, Bulgaria and Rumania, said:

> These governments which have been set up do not, in our view, represent the majority of the people, and the impression we get from recent developments is that one kind of totalitarianism is being replaced by another.

The whole world is now being deluged with details of German atrocities. Those atrocities are not due to the German people as Germans. They are due to the German people as totalitarians, and the result of totalitarianism is the same wherever it controls the lives and fortunes of the people. Propaganda during the war has, of course, been put out for war purposes, and very little truth has been made available to the people of this or any other country. The whole purpose of propaganda is, of course, to confuse the people and to hide the truth, and when it comes to lying propaganda of that kind our C.B.C. need not apologize to anything they have over there in Europe. There has been a steady propaganda day after day, week after week and year after year ever since the war started, to put over the idea of socialism and communism at the expense of our democracy.

I have here a statement issued by the Social Credit Association of Canada, constituency of Vancouver South, from which I quote:

> As the facilities of the publicly-owned Canadian Broadcasting Corporation have been made available to Mr. Elmore Philpott and he has used these to verbally support the armed insurrection of the Trotskyites in Greece, and in addition has openly condemned the actions of Churchill and General Scobie, head of the British army there; and whereas Mr. Philpott has been an avowed advocate of a centralization of power scheme known as federal union, of which Dumbarton Oaks and Bretton Woods are a part; and whereas the facilities of the C.B.C. has not been placed freely at the disposal of the Social Credit Association of British Columbia in order that the other side of the story might be presented to the people, we have therefore taken this, the only means at our immediate disposal, to place before you some essential facts of the power politics of those who crave world dominion and whose propaganda at times has been considered openly seditious.

With regard to the free publicity given by the C.B.C. to the various political parties and their leaders I would say that the free publicity given to the leader of the C.C.F. is out of all proportion to his importance either as a citizen or as the leader of a party. I do not mind saying that I hardly ever listen to the C.B.C. news but what I am informed of Mr. Coldwell's opinion on this, that or the other matter.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. JAQUES: That is all right, but what about the other leaders? I have never heard Mr. Low's name mentioned over the C.B.C., and we have as much right to free publicity as the leader of the C.C.F. I think we might hear a good deal more of the views of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) over the C.B.C. I think his ideas and his proposals should be put before the Canadian people more than they are.

I do not mind how much radio time a party buys. If the C.C.F. likes to buy hours of time, that is all right, for all know that what they are listening to is C.C.F. propaganda, and they are not deceived. But when there is all this free advertising—the C.B.C. is supposed to be absolutely non-partisan, almost ex cathedra—and people hear these ideas put forth day after day, it has an effect in time. Even during the election the Social Credit party, which then had as many members in the House of Commons as the C.C.F.—and we have had a Social Credit government in Alberta for ten years, whereas the C.C.F. have had one in Saskatchewan for only ten months—got only four one-quarter hours, the same as the communists got, a party that was banned during the war for subversive activities. I repeat, we got just the same amount of time as the communists. I understand, and I have heard it on good authority, that the ex-minister of national war services was let out because he opposed this propaganda which has been put over by the C.B.C.

Mr. KNOWLES: Who let him out?

Mr. JAQUES: I can understand that he would object to it. I know I do.

Finally I wish to quote from "The Road to Serfdom", by Professor Hayek, and I hope that every member of this house and everybody outside the house will read "The Road to Serfdom". Professor Hayek says at page 184 of this book:

> And, undoubtedly, not merely the ideas which in Germany and elsewhere prepared totalitarianism but also many of the principles of totalitarianism itself are what exercises an increasing fascination in many other countries. Although few people, if anybody, in England would probably be ready to swallow totalitarianism whole, there are few single features which have not yet been advised by somebody or other. Indeed, there is scarcely a leaf out of Hitler's book which somebody or other in England or America has not recommended us to take and use for our own purposes. This applies particularly to many people who are undoubtedly Hitler's mortal enemies because of one special feature in his system. We should never forget that the anti-Semitism of Hitler has driven from his country, or turned into his enemies, many people who in every respect are confirmed totalitarians of the German type.

I now conclude my remarks, Mr. Speaker, but I hope to elaborate them in future debates as the occasion arises.

Mr. BENOIT MICHAUD (Restigouche-Madawaska): Mr. Speaker, I wish to associate myself with all those who have congratulated you upon your elevation to the high position which you now occupy and which you seem to discharge with such distinction and impartiality.

I also wish to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address upon their splendid performances. At the same time, I apologize to them for having been unavoidably absent while they were speaking.

As a newcomer to this house I did not intend to participate in this debate. But when I see so many young members rising in their places and speaking with such ease, such assurance, and in many cases such eloquence, I feel that I would be remiss in my duty if I did not raise my voice to speak some of the things which I have to say, particularly since nobody from New Brunswick has as yet spoken. In addition, when I look around me I find so much food for thought that I cannot hold my peace any longer. I find, so far as I have been able to make a calculation, that there are ninety-seven new members like myself entering this twentieth parliament; that sixty-one members entered this house during the last parliament, and that fifty-nine more came in between 1935 and 1940. This leaves but twenty-nine members of the present parliament who sat in this house prior to 1935. Political life in this arena appears to be so short that unless one speaks his mind while a new member he may never have another opportunity of being heard.

As a new member, I presume I should introduce myself. I have the honour to represent the constituency of Restigouche-Madawaska, formerly represented by the ex-minister of transport, who is now Chief Justice Michaud of the king's bench division of New Brunswick. Incidentally, another namesake, Mr. Pius Michaud, of Edmundston, sat in this house for eighteen years. Those who sat with him—and I think there are still seven or eight of them—may be glad to hear that Mr. Pius Michaud is still enjoying good health.

At this moment may I remind the house that a part of the riding which I now represent, Madawaska county, was once represented by a gentleman who holds, I believe, a unique record in the history of this parliament. I refer to the late Senator Costigan, who came to the House of Commons in 1867 and sat continually until 1906, when he was elevated to the senate and sat in the senate until 1917, or a total of fifty years in both houses of Parliament. I think that is a record in the federal parliament.

At this stage, I feel I should pay a tribute to my immediate predecessor, who discharged in a most commendable manner his mandate, first as a private member, and then as a minister of the crown. Upon assuming his succession as a member for Restigouche-Madawaska, I feel that he has set for me a very high standard of service and efficiency, a standard which I shall do my utmost to emulate, and in this undertaking I shall welcome the cooperation of every member of this house.

Many hon. members have spoken with gratification of election results in their own constituencies. Others have expressed the view that as a matter of chivalry we should not bring to the attention of the house the fact that one or two or more opponents lost their deposits. I shall heed their suggestion. I wish to say, however, than in my campaign I appealed for an over-all majority over the three opposition candidates, and I am pleased to inform the house that the constituents of Restigouche-Madawaska supported this government in the proportion of fifty-five per cent. For the confidence which they have placed in me so generously I am most grateful; at the same time I consider that I have great responsibilities toward the good hard-working people whom I have the honour to represent. These responsibilities I propose to discharge to the utmost of my ability, and I trust that Providence will make it relatively easy for me to do so.

The people of my riding were satisfied with the present administration and expressed that satisfaction at the polls in no uncertain terms. I cannot illustrate that fact any better than by relating an incident which occurred to me two or three days before the voting. A settler, well known to me for his staunch Tory affiliation, came into my office and said that he wanted to speak to me privately. What he said was short and to the point: "I did not vote for you last summer", referring to the occasion when I was a candidate in the provincial election, "but I am going to vote for you this time. Mackenzie King, that's a good man"; and he went on to tell me in a few short sentences why he thought the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is a good man.

May I also take this opportunity to offer my sincere congratulations to the newly appointed Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Bridges). Thirteen years ago this very day, I was working with him in his office pending my admission to the bar. Two years later he was elected to the legislature of New Brunswick. The Liberals elected on that occasion were so numerous that he did not have a chance of getting into the cabinet. However, on the opening day he was elected, sir, to the honourable position similar to the one you now occupy. The hon. member for York-Sunbury, who served for three years in this war, comes from a distinguished and highly educated family, one held in high esteem all over New Brunswick. His father was chief superintendent of education of New Brunswick for many years, and enjoyed a most enviable reputation. His grandfather on his mother's side was a brilliant jurist who adorned the supreme court of New Brunswick for many years.

While making allowances for differences, I cannot help remarking that the career of the Minister of Fisheries and my own have had many points in common, and thirteen years ago little did we dream that we would be sitting together in this house. We both started teaching school, then drifted into law and finally into politics, provincial and federal. During the few years I practised law in Restigouche county we had occasion to meet in court on opposite sides, and I am pleased to state that I never came across a more loyal and more gallant opponent. Possibly because he is nine days my senior, he always managed to get ahead of me in life, in teaching, in law and in politics, matrimony being the only exception. The new minister has had a very successful career at the bar, and for that reason he should prove to be a valuable addition to the cabinet. I rejoice at his elevation to the responsible position he now occupies, and I wish him continuous success and good luck.

I suppose I should say a few words about my constituency. Restigouche-Madawaska is the largest constituency in New Brunswick. It is the third largest from the point of view of population. It is 210 miles from one extremity of the riding to the other. The main industries are, first, farming, including potato growing to quite a large extent. Incidentally, Senator Pirie, potato king of the British empire, began his phenomenal career by growing potatoes in the parish in which I was born and brought up and now he carries on extensively in my own constituency.

We also have lumbering, including three large pulp mills. Veneer logs are cut and processed in Saint John, New Brunswick, the largest mill of its kind in the British empire. Fishing is also one of our main industries, particularly in Restigouche county where salmon, smelt and lobster fishing is carried on. We have some of the most valuable angling licences in the world. It will be recalled that last summer the Duke and Duchess of Windsor were guests in the Restigouche river district and, according to newspaper reports, they gave a good account of themselves.

May I refer briefly to the record of enlistments from both counties of Restigouche and Madawaska in the present war. Voluntary enlistment was second to none in that part of New Brunswick. I know of no case of desertion which is hanging fire at the present time. I know of only one case of absence without leave, and since I have had no requests from anyone, I have every reason to believe that those who are in trouble with the Department of National Defence are very few. Of this record I am proud. A few days ago when an hon. member representing one of the Winnipeg constituencies was speaking he made reference to the Royal Rifles. I may say that a great many young men of Restigouche county were in the Royal Rifles regiment and a few of them who were well known to me will never return. We all rejoice in the reunions that have taken place or that are about to take place after almost four years of horror, but we must not forget those who made the supreme sacrifice. To this day I know of families who have never heard from their dear ones and do not yet know whether those men are alive.

During the course of the debate reference has been made to the housing problem. We have quite a housing problem in a few of the towns in my riding—Campbellton and Dalhousie for instance—and at this point I would endorse the remarks made by the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. White) some time ago on the recent amendments to the rentals order, whereby owners and purchasers of homes have been denied the right to possession on the giving of notice as in the past. It seems to me that this recent amendment has not brought any great measure of redress; on the contrary it has worked a great hardship in many cases. I am unable to concur in this most extraordinary interference with the civil rights of individuals. The order as it stood prior to July 25 was irksome enough, but it was justified in view of the war emergency, and it had a fairly good effect in bringing about a number of transfers of property. I hope that the matter will be reviewed at an early date and that the order will be amended so as to enable bona fide purchasers to obtain possession of their homes as was the case prior to July 25.

I should like to mention something about the difficulties which I have experienced in New Brunswick in obtaining loans from lending institutions under the housing act. Apparently the lending institutions are not eager to make loans. I have written and in a great many cases have not received a reply. Of late, however, I did receive a reply from one of the companies together with their application form, but on glancing over it I am inclined to think the conditions are so hard that very few people will be able to meet them. For that reason I shall welcome any amendment to the housing act. To my mind the government should finance the building of homes somewhat along the line advocated by George Creed, president of the league for Economic Democracy, in his recent book entitled, "Money, Master or Servant". An editorial along the same lines also appeared in the Liberal Advocate of May, 1944, I believe.

It was my intention to say a few words about my good friends of the Social Credit party who took such an interest in my constituency recently.

An hon. MEMBER: You were not afraid, were you?

Mr. MICHAUD: No. Glance at the results and you will see that there was no reason to be afraid. As early as 1938 Mr. Louis Even organized a huge meeting in my native parish and on that occasion I took the trouble to travel 125 miles to listen to him. From then on I did not pay very much attention to their activities, but I know that for a period of three months prior to the election in Restigouche-Madawaska they carried on a passionate courtship and my constituents were honoured by the visit of none other than the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), the hon. member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Kuhl), and the Hon. Lucien Menard, attorney-general of Alberta. I attended two of their three meetings. I happened to be unavoidably absent from my home town on the third occasion.

I have no time to-day to refer to any of the utterances of these gentlemen in this house, but I wish to make my position clear on a few fundamentals. In the first place, I do not believe that a single member on this side of the house favours full employment as an end in itself. Just a few days ago the hon. member for Jasper-Edson asked us what our aim was as regards full employment. I think we are all agreed that we are seeking full employment as a means to an end, as a means to acquiring purchasing power, but I do not suggest that it is the only way to acquire purchasing power. It is one which cannot and will never be done away with completely. To what extent the acquisition of purchasing power will depend upon employment in the future remains to be seen. It is a fact that working hours have decreased within the past twenty years, and in my opinion they will eventually be further reduced. When I see so much work remaining to be done in Canada, work which cannot be done by machines alone, I cannot conceive the possibility of any substantial reduction in working hours until all useful projects are completed in this country, and I have my doubts whether this condition of bliss will ever be achieved. Just what this full employment should mean in terms of wages or income I am not in a position to say. I cannot give any expression of opinion any more than to say that wages and income should be such as to make possible a substantially higher standard of living than that at present enjoyed by the average thrifty worker. I just wish to add that I firmly believe in the principle that all that is physically possible is financially possible. As I see it, the only limitations to our accomplishments are materials and man-power. If materials and man-power are not sufficient to meet all the demands of the people then priority should be established.

I was very much amused at the remarks of the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Ashby) when he said some time ago that the people from the east are becoming enlightened. I am sorry that he is not in his place at the moment. With his statement I heartily agree. Indeed the people from the east are becoming enlightened, and they proved it quite well on June 11. In the maritimes, out of twenty-six ridings, government supporters carried nineteen. In Quebec there are at least fifty-eight sure supporters out of sixty-five members. Not being very familiar with the geography of Ontario, I am not in a position to say how many Liberals were elected east of Ottawa. By looking at the map I am inclined to think we have quite a few supporters from Ontario east of Ottawa.

Reference has been made to the proposed income tax reduction in Australia. I understand that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) gave some figures on the income tax structure of Australia and New Zealand a year or so ago. According to a statement published in the Toronto Daily Star on June 27, 1944, a married man with two children with an income of $1,200 would pay $96 in Australia and $150 in New Zealand. One with an income of $1,500 paying $24 in Canada would pay $188 in Australia and $229 in New Zealand. Take off twelve and a half per cent from this, and have your choice. I am sure that this government will allow anyone to pay according to the rates in Australia.

We have heard a good deal about living conditions in these countries. I do not mind listening to hon. members from the prairies telling us about their own problems concerning wheat and irrigation projects, and I hope they will bear with us when we talk about our maritime problems. I am not very much interested in hearing about New Zealand or Australia, because I think very few people know exactly what conditions are in those countries. I daresay none of the hon. members who speak in such glowing terms of far distant countries would take the chance of exchanging this country for any one of those foreign lands. I believe that we live in a most wonderful country, possibly the best in the world, and I say it with all the sincerity at my command. Let us not belittle it by comparing it with other lands unless we are positive that such countries are better governed than we are. Let us have faith in our country. It is true that it may not be all that we should like it to be, but I would ask my good friends across the way to stop looking for a depression bear behind every bush. Let us all get together in a true spirit of cooperation and offer constructive suggestions to the government instead of trying to embarrass it.

To my mind there are two big problems confronting this government, namely, housing and unemployment. The speech from the throne discloses that the housing act will be revamped. I am glad to hear that because I think it requires material amendment. According to statistics given by the Department of Labour I believe that we still have more jobs seeking men than men seeking jobs. Apparently labour is unwilling to accept a cut in pay. We had this situation in Campbellton a short while ago when approximately 120 men were out of work as a result of a small shell factory closing down. I believe that most of them have now taken other positions and very likely at reduced wages. All this was done without too much commotion. Naturally the problem is more difficult of solution when a large number of men are involved. In order to arrive at some equitable solution of this big problem, both labour and industry will have to compromise in their demands. In this connection I find an editorial in the Ottawa Journal of September 11 very much to the point. It is long and I shall not trouble the house with reading it, but I wish to emphasize the main ideas contained in it. It suggests that full employment does not mean selected employment. It also suggests to industry not to take advantage of labour, and it concludes with this principle:

It will not be long, however, before the people seeking jobs will outnumber the jobs available. In my opinion, if and when this situation arises, and if private enterprise is either unwilling or unable to cope with the situation of providing jobs, then it will be the duty of the government to come in with enterprises of a public nature. If the lending institutions are not reasonable in granting loans to prospective home builders, then the government should make the money available for the urgent task of home building. If the building of homes cannot take care of all the unemployed, then there are plenty of public works urgently needed; and may I take this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to suggest a few public projects which are badly needed and would be greatly appreciated in my own constituency. First and foremost is the interprovincial bridge between Campbellton and Cross Point. This project has been under consideration for upwards of twenty years. I understand that an interprovincial bridge is generally built under some sort of three-way arrangement between the two provinces concerned and the dominion government. Negotiations between the provinces of Quebec and New Brunswick have taken place at different times in this connection, the latest occurrence being less than a year ago. At that meeting there were two ministers of the New Brunswick government and at least one from the Quebec government, besides provincial members from the two provinces. I take the liberty of bringing this matter to the attention of the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) and I urge that as soon as materials are available the project be given immediate attention. There is no question that the man-power will be plentiful when the steel and other materials can be released.

There is also urgent need for a new post office building in Campbellton. The present one has served its time and could be used to shelter other departments of the government at present located in rented buildings. I do not know whether there is a scarcity of building material for such constructions, but a time will come in the near future when materials will be available. There is one project, however, which in my opinion should not be difficult to undertake, because materials and labour for it are easily obtainable right on the spot. I am referring to the Dalhousie wharf, which is in a deplorable condition. There is plenty of lumber in Restigouche county as well as labour.

A new ferry service was reinstated last spring between that town and the Quebec side. It is urgently needed and should never have been discontinued, after having been in operation for a great many years. But unless some repairs are made to this ferry wharf it will be very difficult for the ferry service to continue with any success. To my mind there is no justification for allowing both wharves to remain in their present state of disrepair, and I warn the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) that I shall never miss an opportunity to bring this matter to his attention unless I receive the assurance that repairs will be undertaken in the near future.

Before resuming my seat I wish to assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I am highly honoured in having the privilege of occupying a seat in this House of Commons with such distinguished citizens from all parts of Canada. Judging from the tone of the remarks which I have heard up to this day, I feel that every hon. member in this house has but one aim and objective, namely, the welfare of the greatest number of his constituents. Unfortunately, we differ, and at times radically, on the methods of approach to achieve our common aim. I shall always try to remember this point in the course of the discussions in this house. If it does occur to me to criticize the views of other hon. members who do not see eye to eye with me on matters of public interest, I wish to assure them that I do not question the sincerity of their motives. In return, I hope that fellow members will do me the same courtesy. With this attitude of mind, I believe that we can tackle with confidence the ardous task ahead of us. By an honest and sincere exchange of views during the coming four or five years, we should be able to make this Canada of ours a land wherein it will be easier to live in peace and contentment.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. W. CHESTER S. McLURE (Queens): Mr. Speaker, you have listened to speeches by hon. members from every province in this Dominion of Canada, save one. As representative of that province I felt it was my duty to say a few words about the garden of the Gulf. Let me state two facts at the beginning of my remarks. Prince Edward Island is the banner province of this dominion, bar none. Prince Edward Island is the province which the dominion government has neglected ever since we came into the union in 1873. During my rambling remarks I shall attempt to give my reasons for making that statement.

In rising to speak on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I do so because this debate affords an opportunity to a member to speak on any subject without his remarks being termed irrelevant. I feel I would be remiss in my duty as a member of this house if I did not offer a few words of congratulation at this time. My first desire is to congratulate you, sir, upon being raised to the position of Speaker of this house by your peers in this chamber. Your appearance, your qualifications and your experience fit you admirably for that position. But I regret that I was the first member of this house to be called to order by Your Honour. However, I bowed to your ruling.

I should like to say to the mover (Mr. Benidickson) and the seconder (Mr. Langlois) of the address in reply that any adjectives which I might use by way of congratulation would be simply a repetition of the fine things that have been heaped upon them. I concur in all that has been said regarding them, but I wish to add that this was a well planned honour to the service men of Canada.

I would have desired the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to be in his place at this moment because I should like to offer him a few words of congratulation. When I entered this house a few days ago and as I looked across to the other side from time to time since then, I could not help noting the pleased expression of the Prime Minister. I could not say whether that was due to his being in the same old position of Prime Minister of Canada, but I did have another thought in mind. I wondered if the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) had piped him in as king of Glengarry.

I wish to offer my sincerest congratulations to the leader of His Majesty's most loyal opposition (Mr. Bracken). May health and strength be granted to him—and likewise to the Prime Minister—to aid him in the great task of restoring responsible democratic government to our dominion. When the Prime Minister was speaking the other day he cracked what was perhaps a good joke about my leader. The Prime Minister said that it took him only two or three weeks to enter parliament after being defeated in his constituency, whereas it took my leader two or two and a half years to get into the House of Commons. I have it on the Prime Minister in two ways. It took me ten years to get back into the house, and that surpassed him. But I did not leave my constituency of Queens because I knew that sooner or later the electors would find out that I was the better man. Had they found it out sooner I would have been delighted.

If time permitted I should have liked to extend my congratulations to the leaders of all groups in the house and also to the young members who have spoken for the first time. All I can say is, congratulations and carry on.

When one returns to this house, after a period of years, one glances around and sees a great many new faces and perhaps regrets that some of the older ones are not here. As I glanced around I saw one of those great masters of the universe, the hand that rocks the cradle, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mrs. Strum). Congratulations. And let me give this old toast in her honour:

> Here's to our lovely women
> Who fill our lives with little bees and honey;
> They break our shocks;
> They mend our socks.
> But, oh, you bachelors,
> Aren't you afraid how they will spend your money?

I wish to make a few remarks on the great and glorious news that flashed around the world during the last few weeks of victory, the cessation from war—victory, with unconditional surrender over the nazi gangsters whose thought was world domination; and victory once again on the Pacific coast over those human rats who thought they were the elect of the world and could destroy our civilization. Now we have a liberated Europe and a controlled Pacific, and I thank the overruling Providence for the victories that have come to our armed forces. I give thanks to those of our nations and to those of the allied nations, to the countless heroes among the men and the women who faced capture, faced shackles, faced crippling injuries and faced death itself to make your freedom, Mr. Speaker, and mine secure. To those heroes of our nation and our allied nations I bow in sincere gratitude. To those who made the supreme sacrifice and passed out of the sight of man on to the paths of glory I have no words adequate to express my thanks and devotion. May we one and all be worthy of the price they paid.

While giving thanks to the Divine Ruler of the universe for our great allied victory, I am inclined to believe, as I read the papers from time to time of the atrocities of the Japs, that the Great Ruler may never fully pardon the American nation or the British nation for not absolutely destroying and driving into the sea those human rats of the Pacific. God forbid that our nation should ever allow one of them to set foot on Canada again. Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, you may think I am bitter, but let those atrocities that have been written up come home to you, and there is not a member of this house, I believe, but will say: Away with those human rats.

I have noticed by the different speeches which have been made in this debate that it is customary for a member to introduce himself to the house. In case hon. members may not know it, may I say that I have the honor to be one of the representatives of that dual constituency of Queens in the Garden of the Gulf. I wish to inform this house that I am the Progressive Conservative, and not the Liberal representative of Queens as the press stated a few days ago. However, I pardon them for a slip of the pen more easily because I happen to be one of the owners of that great standard of news, the Charlottetown Guardian, and I know how easy it is for a writer to make a slip. The Charlottetown Guardian is known for its worthy and careful writing, and it has the slogan "It covers the Island like the dew." Since we are a prohibition province, that means the morning dew, and not rye.

The chief topic in this debate is the address in reply to the speech from the throne and for a few minutes I wish to direct my attention to it. As I read and re-read the speech from the throne, I considered that it was quite academic. It would make good propaganda for a political thesis on war-time doings and the war. The speech from the throne is a governmental document prepared by the cabinet and placed in the hands of His Excellency by his constitutional advisers. Therefore any criticisms of mine or of anyone else's in this house of the speech from the throne do not reflect upon His Excellency the Governor General either in person or in public affairs.

The speech from the throne can best be described as a synthetic speech. Do not mistake me. I do not mean sympathetic; I mean synthetic. Let me draw to the attention of the house one brief sentence, from page 8 of Hansard, which is to be found in the document placed in the hands of His Excellency. It states:

> The government has received a definite mandate from the people of Canada.

To have a definite mandate from the people a government must win a majority of the seats so contested. Did this government win a majority of the seats contested? Decidedly no.

In the speech from the throne it was expected by the people of Canada and their representatives in this house that the government would deal with live issues, issues of the present time, and not the morbid history of past doings or misdoings of a government which does not now represent the majority. Why did the speech from the throne not contain something definite on such subjects as jobs for the jobless, taxation reform, hospitalization for veterans, encouragement for the industries of Canada in order that private enterprise may be able to develop and make jobs for the jobless?

Besides the definite omissions which I have mentioned, here is one more of many omissions. Hon. members all know that sins of omission outweigh by far sins of commission. Here is one great omission. Now that the war is over, the duty which faces this government and parliament in priority over everything else is to remove with all convenient dispatch those block-busters of business, industrial and agricultural production, and free enterprise. The nation has stood for regimentation from 1939 to 1945, for government by control boards of all kinds and descriptions, for government by orders in council. During the past war years a reign of dictators has developed through war-time controls in Canada. Now that the war is over, this must not be permitted to continue, or it will undermine and destroy the rights and liberties for which we have so long struggled. Controls and controllers may have been necessary in some things during the war, and Canadians patriotically stood for them in the interests of an all-out war effort. But now that the war is over, let us not permit these controls and dictatorships, which are insidiously and definitely becoming part of our every-day life to continue. These controls in their particular branches are nothing less than dictatorship. To a large extent they have taken away from us our civil rights and have denied the right of the citizen to appeal to the courts. It should be the first duty of this government and this parliament to see to it that the hard-earned civil rights of the people are restored to them, and that these dictators —or call them what you will as long as you use parliamentary language—shall be scattered to the four winds of oblivion, and responsible democratic government restored to Canada.

It is not my intention to criticize further the speech from the throne. It has been torn asunder, with the government which produced it, by other speakers, and parliament is waiting to learn what the ministers of the crown are going to do.

I said a while ago that, if time permitted, I would refer to my own constituency of Queens county and to Prince Edward Island. First, let me ask this question: what representation has my constituency or my province in the federal cabinet? Here is the answer. The official announcement made by the Prime Minister a few days ago was to the effect that Prince Edward Island, the cradle of confederation, is deprived of representation in the inner councils of the federal government. It was generally believed by the people of Prince Edward Island, when a shuffle of the cabinet was made prior to the election, with the Prime Minister's own statement that every province including Prince Edward Island would have representation in the cabinet, that after the election was over, the Liberal member of the dual constituency of Queens would receive the portfolio of fisheries, a position which, from his practical business experience, he could have filled admirably. But no, Mr. Speaker, we as a province are neglected and left out in the cold. The Prime Minister forgot that when he was looking for a roosting place to enter parliament my province of Prince Edward Island gave him his only opportunity. It is also true that when the Prime Minister was looking for seats for the Hon. Charles A. Dunning and the Hon. J. L. Ralston we gave them our suffrages. But perhaps some hon. member may be saying to himself, or thinking, "Well, Prince Edward Island had good representation with high ranking men in the cabinet." But no, Mr. Speaker, they were mere bagmen, serving their own private interests and had not the interest of Prince Edward Island sincerely at heart. Under the terms of confederation, when a province has elected members of parliament, especially a parliament controlled by men of its own political complexion, it should not be debarred from representation in the councils of the government. But that representation is denied us. Can you call that democracy in any degree?

Let me say a few words with reference to confederation. In 1867 the Dominion of Canada was confederated. The aims and objects of that union were consummated and joined together by a documentary agreement with all classes and creeds, all provinces and races and all territories that went into that union. Confederation had a birthplace and a cradle. It was fitting that my province of Prince Edward Island should be that birthplace, and some time in the future I may have an opportunity to give to this house some of the details of the birth of confederation.

But Prince Edward Island did not choose to join the union in 1867. Why? Because the terms offered were not considered fair and equitable to that province. We therefore remained out of the union and we paddled well our own canoe. Something comes in here that may be of a little interest, namely, the question of unity. We have heard much of late, and especially during the election campaign, of the need of unity in Canada. If we presuppose that men are honestly talking about unity, what is the greatest need today with respect to unity? Simply that we all, in all the provinces, should know what we mean, each in his own province, when we demand a square deal from the government of Canada.

Each province is now a part of the great Dominion of Canada, and my province, as the cradle of confederation, is an essential part. The personnel of my province is the acme of good citizenship since it embraces the four great races of the world: the diplomatic, governing Englishman; the shrewd, canny and industrious Scotsman; the fighting and industrious Irishman; these three great races combined with the joyous, light-hearted, home-loving Frenchman, giving to our province a unity that should be not only greatly admired in that province but greatly desired throughout Canada.

The people of our province live in a land that is worthy of respect and admiration, a land fertile and productive. There is no land more pleasing to the tourist to look upon, a land where the industrious farmer is offered the best soil for farming which is to be found in Canada. All these things, all this beauty in Prince Edward Island, are bathed in the waters of the Atlantic, rich with fish of all kinds, herring, cod, mackerel, lobsters all in abundance, and besides that the great bivalve fish now produced by aqua-farming, the oyster. These are the endowments of Prince Edward Island, and I could mention many more such as the ponds and bays that bring ecstacy and joy to the men who follow the art of the great fisherman Izaak Walton.

Notwithstanding all these endowments, and many more I could mention, which a kind nature has bestowed upon us, we must demand justice, mercy and a fair and square deal from the dominion of which we are a province.

I said a moment ago that our province did not choose to enter confederation in 1867, but after we had been wooed for six years by the dominion the union was consummated in 1873, our province having secured better terms, especially with regard to our transportation. There was this unique clause in that documentary agreement, namely, that we should have continuous, efficient and adequate communication with the mainland. That part of the contract has never been implemented to the full by any government.

Time does not permit me in forty minutes to give all the details of the treatment which my province has experienced in the matter of winter communication. Suffice it to say that until 1910, and even later, the only sure way of continuous communication to and from the mainland in the winter time was by small iceboats provided with runners, hauled and propelled by passengers and crew across the strait of Northumberland, a distance of some nine miles. True, we had during that time such steamers as the S.S. Stanley, S.S. Minto and S.S. Earl Grey, plying in the winter time between Pictou, Nova Scotia, and Georgetown, Prince Edward Island. These boats gave some measure of transportation, but often they were held up for eight or ten days at a time and we had neither mail nor anything else from or to the mainland. Every election, for as long as I can remember, politicians would come to us with the same old promises, although some of the promises had more sugar-coating on them. In the election campaign of 1911 the two great leaders of the two great parties, the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Right Hon. Sir Robert L. Borden, came to our province. They studied our transportation problems, and they realized the injustices we had suffered. The electors of our province at that time were determined to have a definite commitment from either or both of those great men. I might say that Right Hon. Sir Robert L. Borden pledged himself and the party he represented to inaugurate a ferry between Cape Tormentine on the mainland and a point nine miles distant across the Northumberland strait on the Prince Edward Island shore. This place is now named Borden in honour of Sir Robert. What was his pledge? He pledged to give Prince Edward Island a service that was long overdue, and that we should have some continuous winter communication. Accordingly docks were built at Tormentine and Borden and an icebreaking ship was built on the Clyde for this ferry service. This was the first—

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I have to remind him that he has spoken for forty minutes. With the consent of the house he may carry on.

Mr. McLURE: May I continue?

Mr. SPEAKER: If it is the consent of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Continue.

Mr. McLURE: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and hon. members. I said we had our docks built at Borden and Tormentine, and a ship built on the Clyde as an icebreaker. This was the first real attempt to give us justice as a province of the dominion. The docks and boat were built in 1915, and a steamer, the S.S. Prince Edward, demonstrated that continuous winter communication could be solved. This boat has done wonderful service, and let me say to you, sir, that she is still the only boat we have on that ferry service. She has been in the service for thirty long years.

Under the Bennett government we had another good steamer built in 1931, the S.S.

Charlottetown. Hon. members know the fate of this ship in 1941. This steamer has never been replaced. Why? No one knows except it be the ministers of the government opposite. Excuses of the most frivolous kind were given. Some of the excuses were lack of material, no yard space available to construct a ship of this size; but all of those were not good excuses. The government could have built a ship for us in United States yards where they were crying aloud for work at that time. The United States had not entered the war and did not enter the war until five or six months after the S.S. Charlottetown was lost.

Prince Edward Island has been promised a boat since July, 1941, but as yet we have no definite knowledge as to when she will be in service. I may say here and now that I hope to place on the order paper some questions that will elicit an answer of some assurance with regard to this boat.

We are under the greatest handicap of any province in this country. Look for a moment at our freight rates; look for a moment at how we are subjected to delays in the transporting of goods. Let me cite one example, the handicap to which our producers are subjected. It can be pointed out that to take a five-ton truck laden with farm produce from Borden to Tormentine, and to bring back that truck loaded again, probably with coal or something else, another distance of nine miles, costs over $50; I think, to be exact, $50.65. It costs that amount to move five tons of produce a distance of eighteen miles, while on land in the other provinces, and even in our own, to move that truck and freight would cost not more than $4.50.

Our contention is that according to the terms of confederation we, the province of Prince Edward Island, should have the Northumberland ferry treated as a highway, and that whatever charges are to be made for freight over it should be and must be borne by the dominion government.

There is a great deal more that I could say with reference to our transportation problems, but I wish to say that in this house there are a great many men who know Prince Edward Island. I know that any remarks of mine with reference to our transportation problem will have the fullest support of the other hon. member for Queens (Mr. Douglas), the hon. member for Prince (Mr. McNaught), the hon. member for Kings (Mr. Grant), all of Prince Edward Island. It would also receive the unanimous support of a number of hon. members who have visited my province and know the conditions. I should like to mention the men who I know will support us in getting a square deal from this dominion. They are as follows: The hon. member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon (Mr. Black), the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black), the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris), the hon. member for St. John-Albert (Mr. Hazen), the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Ilsley), the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman), the hon. member for Cape Breton North-Victoria (Mr. MacLean), the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. McKay), the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Black), the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks), the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton), the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett), the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Hatfield), the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth), the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. McCulloch), the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Matthews), and the hon. member for Colchester-Hants (Mr. Stanfield), and the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce). Probably there are some other members whom I have omitted.

I would say in conclusion—and I wish to be careful in this—that if the Prime Minister were in his place at the moment I would say to him and to the members of the cabinet, to all hon. members of this house and to this parliament that if you do not know the facts concerning my constituency and province it is to your discredit. We are penalized in our province. Hon. members should know, and will know if I am permitted to speak in this chamber, about the burdensome restrictions, conditions and discriminations under which my province struggles. To hon. members I say that if I have underrated their knowledge, then I crave their pardon. But it is different with the cabinet; if they know, it is to their shame as a government that they do not at once give us justice and a square deal.

Here is something that this government has known during the past six years: the part my province played in an all-out war effort when we were first in enlistments; first in the buying of bonds; first in the buying of war savings stamps; first in contributions to the Red Cross, Russian relief funds and other funds; first in the production of foodstuffs—first in everything for an all-out war effort. On all occasions my province exceeded its quota on a per capita basis, accepting the last census of about 88,000 souls as the figure from which to work.

Much of the publicity from my province has been of a boasting, halting, or apologetic nature, just as if we were on the defensive, and not a part of this great dominion. Why should there be a gradual decrease in our population from 109,000 in 1873 to 88,000 in 1941? Some say that this is on account of the burdensome restrictions, conditions and discriminations imposed upon us; but I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the house that it is owing to the fact that the terms under which we entered confederation in 1873 have never been implemented. The dominion has not lived up to the signed document. My province is not asking any special favour; we are not seeking gifts. But as a province we demand justice, fair play and equal rights through the implementing and the long delayed fulfilment of confederation. If the dominion does not wish to recognize us as a province, then I say, give us justice by our liberty.

Mr. T. J. BENTLEY (Swift Current): Mr. Speaker, I am another one of those new members.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: But do not ask for an hour and a half.

Mr. BENTLEY: I can assure my good friend from the peach country that we from the wheat country are not even as long-winded as they are out there, let alone those in the spud country.

Before proceeding to the few things I should like to say to-night, may I pay my compliments to you, Mr. Speaker, upon your accession to the position of Speaker of the House of Commons. May I go further and congratulate the house upon having acquired so gracious a gentleman as yourself to act in that capacity. As host you have on several occasions, and indeed quite recently, been most tolerant and gracious to hon. members who have overrun their allotted time. I shall try to avoid that this evening, but I may possibly offend in some other direction; and in such event I hope Your Honour will realize that any offence I might commit would be through ignorance, certainly not through intention, and that under such circumstances you will show tolerance.

May I add my word of praise and congratulation to those of other hon. members who have referred to the young gentlemen who moved and seconded the address in reply, from whose observations this long debate has developed. If they continue in public life—and I assume they will—they have many years of great public service ahead of them. I believe the evident sincerity of their utterances bears out that contention.

May I make one further observation in this strain before proceeding farther. It gives me pleasure to congratulate by predecessor from the constituency of Swift Current, Mr. Graham, upon his appointment as assistant to the Clerk of the House. Mr. Graham is a highly respected citizen in that place about which I shall speak later in my speech. I appear as member purely because of a change in political ideas, and not because of anything in his character which would make him unfit to continue as member, so long as he cared to do so.

An hon. MEMBER: Eskimos.

Mr. BENTLEY: We have not any of those up our way.

Many of the speeches have been encouraging to those of us who are new in the house. The general feeling of good will has been helpful. With one exception, I believe those belonging to this group come from western Canada. Perhaps through the fault of no one, there have been times in the past when there appeared to be great division between east and west. Why this should be so, I could never understand. Hon. members from all parts of the house have stated during the debate that they are most anxious to see an end of national divisions among Canadians. My view is that there should be no more hyphenated Canadians, and that we should go even farther than that. Not only should we not recognize English-speaking Canadians or French-speaking Canadians as such, but there should be no such thing as western Canadians and eastern Canadians. Let us all be Canadians, although living in different geographical centres.

Statements along this line have been expresed from all sides of the house, and I have been pleased to see that spirit prevail. Hon. members from all quarters have said, too, that they share the ideas expressed in the speech from the throne. Hon. members in this group join in that expression of agreement.

May I draw the attention of the house to one slight difference between the views held by other groups, and those held by this one. No hon. member from any other group has indicated a willingness on the part of his group to adopt some other methods if at any time during the course of this parliament it becomes evident that such action is necessary to implement what is promised in the speech from the throne. However, my leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), when he spoke in the debate made it clear that this group was prepared to support every measure which, either in whole or in part, will bring about any of the good things foreshadowed in the speech from the throne. He made it clear, too, that this group does not believe that that machinery can be made to operate, or that plans can work properly under the present system of so-called free enterprise, something which in our opinion more nearly approaches monopolistic enterprise.

However, despite our lack of confidence in this free enterprise system, and because of our anxiety to have a prosperous and united Canada, we have indicated our willingness to sink our differences, and to do our best to help make the present machinery work. I have heard no other leader or member of any other group indicate that if time and circumstances prove that the machinery of the government to do the job they said they were going to do should fail or break down, he would be prepared to give up his ideas and try new ones. I am going to explain what I mean by that a little later on. I will exemplify it in connection with one particular item of our national business which is close to western hearts.

Before I do so I wish to introduce myself and my consituency. In the first place I am a Canadian citizen. My people settled in Halifax in 1753 and, so far as I know, since that time all of them were either born here or came over with the United Empire Loyalists or were of some other local North American stock. I am not bragging about that because I had nothing to do with it, but I am not the least bit ashamed of it. In fact I like the old province of Nova Scotia very much.

I was glad to hear some of the speeches that have been made by my fellow countrymen. I am such a Canadian citizen that I suppose I have broken the laws of this country more than most hon. members. But I could not avoid doing so, I had either to lie or to break the law. The law of this country does not permit me to be a Canadian citizen. When I joined the army, which I did last time; when I registered the birth of one of my children; when the census taker came around; when I had my national registration card made out, which by the way I carry all the time, I was asked to give my nationality. In each case I said "Canadian", but the interrogating gentleman undertook to make me name some other nationality. I could have told him Chinese, but I would have been lying because I am not a Chinaman. I could have told him anything but I would have been lying. I refused to give any national category but Canadian. I hope this parliament will put me within the pale of the law so that I do not have to break it or lie any more.

I represent the federal constituency of Swift Current. Some hon. members have said that their constituencies were the best in Canada. Mine is to those who like it; it would not be to those who do not. We are a bald prairie constituency and many of us like it, so we stay there. We do not blame other people from other parts of the country for not liking it. It is a good thing that this is still a free country. You can move from Swift Current to Prince Edward Island if you want to; I think they will still let you go in there. You could certainly go to Prince Edward Island and we are allowed into Alberta. There are many places we could go to, but many of us stay in Swift Current because we like it.

The people there are mostly farmers. There is only one large urban centre and that is not large in the terms of some of the centres in eastern Canada. I believe Swift Current City has a population of possibly 7,000 people now, but normally its population would be between 5,000 and 6,000. Most of the wholesale houses and retail businesses cater to the agricultural trade, except that we are a Canadian Pacific railway terminal with a good C.P.R. payroll. However, the great bulk of our population of 40,000 are farmers or those who are directly serving the agricultural community.

They are good people. Again I will not say on their behalf that they are the best in Canada because they do not want to be classed in that way. They just want to be classed as being as good as the rest of the people of Canada. They just want to be assured that they will have the same opportunities to live their kind of lives with a degree of security commensurate with their ability to engage in enterprising and useful work, which as I have said is farming in the main. I would be doing them an injustice if at any time I claimed for them any greater rights than that. But I do assure you, sir, that we will certainly claim those full rights and I will do my best to see that they are obtained.

We are in the middle of a dry farming area. Like the young hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Argue) who spoke this afternoon and the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. McCuaig) who spoke last night, my constituency is in that area south of the Saskatchewan river. We have some lovely wheat land; we have some fine ranching land and we have some very good mixed farming land if we only had adequate and constant supplies of water. We would be more able to undertake mixed farming or live stock raising if along with adequate supplies of water for the stock we also had sufficient water to assure our being able to raise continuous and adequate quantities of fodder for the live stock.

The prairie farm rehabilitation association has undertaken a project to dam up Swift Current creek at a place called Duncairn. That project will eventually be completed but we hope that eventuality will not be too far away. We hope the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and his P.F.R.A. officials will not forget that there is a vast difference between human time and eternity. We hope sincerely that the 30,000 arces which can be irrigated will be irrigated and that the project will be completed not later than this time next year, as it could be. These are some of our little local problems. I will not weary the house with the many more that we have, although I may deal with them later on. However, I should like to bring to the attention of members of this house another problem that is important to us and to the west.

I am not saying this because we in the west want to chisel something out of other parts of Canada. I am not saying this because we think other hon. members are likely to be antagonistic. We do not understand all the problems of the peach producers of British Columbia, of the apple growers of Ontario, of the industrial workers of Ontario and Quebec and of the fishermen and farmers of Nova Scotia. We do not pretend to. We expect to learn and to learn with sympathy of their problems while we are here. We expect to lend our voice and aid as much as we can or as much as we are allowed to in helping them to improve their position and to solve their problems. We are asking only for the same measure of sympathy and help from the other people in this house.

I mentioned a little while ago that this group does not believe that the present administration at Ottawa have the right ideas or the right machinery to do the job they forecast in the speech from the throne. We are prepared to help them do it. Let me produce some evidence to show why we believe this is so. Purely on the basis of the operating economy of this country and in fairness to all its citizens I wish to submit the following evidence.

We from the prairies of the west got a distinct jolt the other day when the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) announced that the price of wheat for export would be pegged at $1.55 a bushel, basis No. 1 northern at the contract point of delivery, and remember that is Port Arthur or Fort William or Vancouver, not where it is delivered to the country elevator. We have no objection to that, nor will the farmers in the west object to it. As a matter of fact they will respect this government for giving that measure of protection to the people in the old country. Many of the settlers in the west came from some of those old countries or have relatives who were left behind when their parents came over here before they were born. So that they are glad to be able to make some contribution to the requirements of those people and not hold them up or put a gun to their heads because there is a scarcity. We have no objection to that contribution. That announcement did not give us a jolt. The jolt to the chin came when it was announced—not as compensation for foregoing a possible sharp rise in the price of wheat because of the extremities of Europe, because such compensation is not needed, but as compensation for the loss of what might have been a very good market for wheat now—that the government would undertake to see that the price of wheat would not fall below $1 a bushel, basis No. 1 northern, Fort William, Port Arthur or Vancouver from the beginning of next year until the year 1950 on the authorized deliveries.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce, on being questioned in the house the other day, said that there was nothing in the order in council that stated that they were going to operate for the next five years on the quota system. Whether or not he thought that we did not understand the terminology well enough to understand what was meant, he said that in the order in council there was no such thing mentioned as a quota system. In the order in council there are no words about quota system, it is true, but the terms "authorized deliveries" and "quota system" are synonymous in the minds of every western farmer, and the Minister of Agriculture, who is here to-night, knows that is so. It was therefore futile for the Minister of Trade and Commerce to endeavour to make us believe that because there was no mention of the words "quota system" in the order in council it did not mean just that. It says "authorized deliveries," and authorized deliveries are the quota system in the minds of every western farmer who sells wheat.

Mr. GARDINER: Would my hon. friend not admit that that system was first asked for by the Saskatchewan pool?

Mr. BENTLEY: I frankly admit that, and will go into that later. But the point I am making now is that we know that the quota system and authorized deliveries mean the same thing. It means that someone in authority—and this has to be so, and there is no quarrel with it—the wheat board officials presumably—and we hope they are competent officers—will be authorized to tell the farmers each year what their authorized wheat delivery shall be. With the guaranteed price of $1 a bushel below which wheat is not allowed to fall, if the Winnipeg grain exchange is still operating, and if the wheat board is not continuing to take all deliveries, it is quite within the range of possibility, and past history indicates to us that this will be so, that the open market price can conceivably hover around that $1 a bushel, which means eighty-three or eighty-four cents to the bulk of the farmers in western Canada at their local elevator point of delivery for No. 1 northern; and remember that No. 1 northern does not comprise all the grain we deliver because we sometimes get grade 5 and grade 6, and even feed wheat in years of frost, and there is a very heavy spread between the price of No. 1 northern and the lower grades. If the wheat board officials or those in authority say to the farmer this year that he can deliver only six or seven bushels you can readily see, Mr. Speaker, that it will be utterly impossible for the farmers of the west to finance their operations. It cannot be done.

I would point out that we are not opposed to the authorized deliveries or the quota system. I believe that that is the general feeling all over the west. There may be some farmers who do not like it, but I am speaking for the bulk of the farmers who are in the big farm organizations there. Here I should like to point out to the government where they might sometimes learn a little from those institutions. I am not going to tell the government to-night why many of us from the prairie provinces have no longer a great deal of faith in their foresight or ability to foresee for some years ahead, but as the minister has said, a request was made in 1932 by the western farm organizations to have the federal government, then under Mr. R. B. Bennett, set up a wheat board to take delivery of western wheat and market it direct. Mr. Bennett did not see fit then to do that. As a matter of fact, when the first forerunner of that demand from the western farmers came as early as 1930 in a resolution passed by the United Farmers of Canada at Saskatoon, asking for a floor or peg price of 70 cents a bushel for No. 1 northern wheat, Fort William, Port Arthur or Vancouver, Mr. Bennett refused and said that he and his administration had no intention of interfering with the free marketing of wheat. From that time on there was constant debate between the Bennett regime and the officials of the organized producers, and in 1932 the western farmers made their request for a wheat board, with power to set up quota deliveries, so that in years of tremendous surpluses, which we were told was our great bugbear at that time—we were told that we were too good at the job; that we raised too much wheat—the wheat board would accept for delivery that volume which could be comfortably sold on whatever export market our Department of Trade and Commerce could find for us and fix the price of that exportable surplus at something approaching the cost of production as near as could be estimated, and the balance of the farmer's surplus production would be left in the granary on his farm as a very fine safeguard against a future bad crop. If you were a grain farmer, Mr. Speaker, you would appreciate just how comfortable a feeling it give you in a year like this or 1937 if you can look out into your yard and say: Well, the crop has gone, we will not get our seed back, but thank goodness last year or the year before we were able to save 1,500 or 2,000 bushels which were not required on the market that year. It gives a feeling of security to the wheat farmer when he can look at his bins and know they are not all empty.

In that year we asked for the quota system. But the Bennett government did not give it to us. In that same winter we sent to Ottawa a petition signed by 107,000 Saskatchewan citizens. Mr. Bennett and his government would not grant that request. It was not until the dying days of his administration in 1935, when he had to face the whole of Canada in an election, that he finally acceded to the request of the western farm organizations and brought in his wheat legislation. Had he and his administration not been so arrogantly certain that they knew better than a bunch of old farmers what should be done to market their wheat, they would have listened and taken advice from the organized farmers at that time, and undoubtedly one would have thought that the Liberal administration that took over from the Tory administration in 1935 would have learnt that lesson. But no. For the next five years until 1940 the western farm organizations continued to make their representations. I am saying this now to the government across the floor, and I am saying it in all sincerity, and can prove it, if proof is wanted. I shall not have time to do so to-night, but before this session is over I can produce the documentary evidence necessary to prove every statement I make. This organization came to the administration time after time and asked them to operate a wheat board on its behalf to protect the wheat growers of western Canada, but the request was refused time and again. Within a year after the new administration of 1936 took office, the wheat board ceased operating as an active agent in the marketing of wheat, and the peg was held at ninety cents a bushel. Later, in 1938, the price was fixed by the wheat board, through government action, at eighty cents a bushel. The following spring the present Minister of Agriculture came west and told the western people that we could no longer expect to have a pegged wheat board price of eighty cents a bushel; that it was too big a load for this country to carry, that it was costing Canada too many millions of dollars, and that we would have to submit to a drastic reduction, in other words from eighty cents a bushel to sixty cents a bushel, basis 1 northern at the point of delivery at terminal elevators, Port Arthur, Fort William or Vancouver.

Mr. GARDINER: I am sure my hon. friend will agree that the second proposal was an initial payment, not a price; eighty cents was the fixed price.

Mr. BENTLEY: I stand corrected. It was an initial payment of sixty cents through the wheat board, which, deducting an average of sixteen or seventeen cents, would leave the farmers at the point of delivery somewhere around forty-three or forty-four cents at his local point. Again we in the west had to go into action. The officials of organized farmers came and interviewed members of the cabinet here, but the sixty cents a bushel initial payment still stood. Again we had to do the only thing we could—go out and plough through the snow and mud, in the spring of 1939, and get 156,000 names to a petition asking the government not to reduce their payment from eighty cents to sixty cents. Finally, after that petition came here, the payment was reduced not to sixty cents, but only to seventy cents, and was held that way until the winter of 1941-42, when again numerous representations, politely couched, were made to the government by the officials of the organized western wheat growers, to increase the initial payment per bushel from seventy cents to $1 because of the war-time conditions and the already mounting costs of production on the farm. Again we were refused; again we were forced to send a petition, this time signed by 186,000 Saskatchewan people. Business men, professional men, farmers and other citizens took part in this effort and made contributions out of their own pockets to provide the necessary forty-odd thousand dollars to bring 400 western delegates to Ottawa to present that petition to the government.

It should not be necessary for western people to have to go to all that trouble time after time. The government was finally compelled by the logic of events to do the things which it had been asked to do before. Had the government of gentlemen on my right been still in office, it would have been compelled by the same set of circumstances to do as this government has done. Finally we got, not $1 a bushel but ninety cents; even then they would not go the distance. Why? Why would they not agree to $1 a bushel initial payment in the winter of 1941-42, to become effective in the crop year 1942-43? Finally, after much hesitation and after many flutterings of farmers' hearts in the west, we got an announcement that the government would grant us twenty cents increase, making ninety cents a bushel; and I think I am correct in the statement that so far as the Wheat Board Act is concerned the ninety cents initial payment is still in there, even though at the present time the board is making the initial payment of $1.25. Remember again that this was brought about, not because the government had suddenly become sympathetic and wanted to help the farmers, but because the transportation system in war time made it impossible for a farmer or an elevator company to hedge sales of wheat against the future on the Winnipeg grain exchange and be reasonably sure of making delivery against that contract in the month in which the future was taken; and the farther the future was ahead, the less was the prospect at that time of doing so, through nobody's fault unless it be Mr. Hitler's and those who were with him. But it was impossible to lay down the stuff against a contract in the place where the contract is fulfilled in the grain business.

In order to take care of that situation, in order to avoid confusion because of that condition, the government finally brought in legislation stopping trading in wheat futures on the Winnipeg grain exchange, and authorized the wheat board to take deliveries of all wheat delivered in western Canada and pay the farmers the initial payment of $1.25. There was not much complaint about that. We people in the west are pretty realistic.

We are not going to quarrel over all the things that have happened in the past. What I have told you, Mr. Speaker, has been told, not in bitterness, not in any way to make you think we feel inimical to the government because of its past mistakes. I have given you these facts as evidence that they, here in Ottawa with their officials, are not the best judges as to how to conduct our marketing system or of what the agriculturists of the west need as a first payment for the grain they produce.

We want to see good wages. We do not want to have anyone's wages low. We favour improvement of the lot and increase of the incomes of working men and working women. We are heart and soul with every speech and sentiment expressed in this house in support of raising the wages of those in the lower income levels to enable them to secure a comfortable standard of living. We do not want more for the western farmers than would be fair for the community at large. But we do ask that, as labour has its connections and associations with the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) and his department, as no doubt business and professional men have their own organizations, and methods of advancing their interests, the government give the same measure of consideration to the proposals made by the western farm organizations when their officials come here, and not force the farmers always to have to be signing petitions or bringing delegations to Ottawa and otherwise doing things which they do not actually enjoy doing. We out west are peaceful fellows.

Again, I do not think there will be a great deal of opposition, even now, after the "jolt" of $1 a bushel, if the Minister of Trade and Commerce would give us one assurance; and why does he not want to do it? It would not hurt. Both he and the Minister of Agriculture know conditions out there. They come from the west. Why do they not tell this house and the country that for the five-year period they are going to see that wheat does not drop below $1 a bushel; that in that period they will continue the operations of the Canadian wheat board; that the wheat board will take delivery of all wheat so that there will be no speculation in it; that in the payment for this wheat a participation certificate will be issued and the wheat board will market all that wheat direct, as we expect they are going to do with the $1.55 wheat this year; and that they will take the suggestion of the western farm organizations and make arrangements for one of two things to see that the various deliveries at least amount in the total to 280 million bushels to be accepted by the wheat board at this payment of $1 a bushel—not less than 280 million bushels, which the farm organizations believe it is possible to market every year without a surplus being carried over. This would mean approximately from thirteen to fifteen bushels to the acre to be delivered as authorized deliveries, depending on the fluctuations in the number of acres that may be put into crop, around 20 million acres or something aproximating that every year.

Why do the government not do that? That is all we are asking for from the west so far as wheat marketing is concerned. It is not a great request. It is just an assurance that in these very uncertain years, while this transition from war to peace is taking place, the farmers will be given time to collect themselves and, if necessary, to reorganize the inequalities among themselves, to strengthen and improve the understanding of their organization, to improve the relationship between themselves, through their organization, and this government, whichever one happens to be here from time to time; and while that is going on, to give them this assurance that you will hold the price above or at $1 a bushel and that they will do it through the mechanisms I have suggested. If the government will do that I think they will secure the blessing of every member here interested in wheat marketing and of the great bulk of the farmers of western Canada.

Mr. C. W. HODGSON (Victoria, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate, I wish first to congratulate you on your elevation to the chair and, second, to congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on his long term of office and of service to the country. I am sure we all wish him good health to finish out his term of office. Next I wish to congratulate the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Bracken) and to congratulate the people of Manitoba on having seen to it that he was their premier for twenty years. I wish also to congratulate the constituents of his riding on having seen fit to send him to Ottawa to represent and to lead our party. He was very wise, I believe, in not coming into the house on receiving the nomination, because in that period he travelled across Canada, saw all the different parts of the country and made a study of them, meeting people and gaining a wealth of knowledge which will certainly be of benefit to Canada in the future. So far as our party is concerned, it was not suffering from lack of leadership because it was being ably led by my genial friend the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon).

I am somewhat like the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who spoke last night.

He said he came here with a majority vote. I am in the same position. I want to congratulate him on coming here on that basis. He said he had only one opponent. I have him beaten, because I had two and I still came here with a majority vote. My Liberal opponent had been a friend of mine for years and I could not say a thing bad about him. He served the country for ten years prior to this year.

In the house we have 103 new members, and 149 members are here on a minority vote. I believe my hon. friends to my left outstrip us all in that regard, because out of twenty-eight members, twenty-five are here on a minority vote.

In introducing my riding, I may say that I did not know that one could come to the House of Commons and do so much advertising. I will avail myself of the opportunity for a few minutes, but I will make it short. I have the honour to represent the riding which was so ably represented by Sir Sam Hughes, who was our member for about thirty years. He was minister of militia in the last war.

My riding is made up of two counties. Victoria has fertile soil and a climate that is adapted to farming, and the farmers are great producers of hay, grain, meat and dairy products. While I am on this subject, I may say that this year one of my constituents made quite a nice shipment of Holstein cattle to Mexico, thus opening up a new venture in trade along that line.

The county in which I live is Haliburton. I happen to be the first member ever elected from that county either provincially or to the dominion house. It comprises the pre-Cambrian rock area and we have the finest stand of timber, bar none, left standing in Canada to-day. We have also in that rock deposits of uranium, which was the basis of the atomic bomb; in the whole area of Victoria-Haliburton we have the Kawartha lakes and the Trent valley canal system, and in Haliburton county alone we have 559 lakes. We have everything that goes to make a tourist country.

The tourist industry in Victoria county is fairly well developed, but in the north it has just been scratched. It would have been developed more fully if the war had not come along, resulting in shortage of labour and materials, with government regulations putting a stop to buildings in that class of industry.

In this municipality, made up of small villages and small towns, we have the town of Lindsay with a population of 10,000. We have some thirty sawmills, four planing and finishing mills, and so on. We have a large tannery, a large woollen mill and many other small industries, and we have two large chemical plants. We have also the dominion arsenal. This plant is one of the finest in Canada, one of the best equipped in the country. I hope the Minister of Defence (Mr. Abbott) can keep that plant running, and if he cannot, I see no reason why the Department of Reconstruction cannot put in some peace-time industry there.

We have a riding made up principally of private enterprise. We have a lot of good labour. It is a railroad centre, and I take my hat off to labour any day in the week because I have been a labour man myself all my life. The reason why I say they favour private enterprise is that ninety per cent of our farms are operated by their owners, as are all our industries with the exception of the dominion arsenal. We have never had any labour trouble; we have the finest group of labour men that exists anywhere.

Anything I say here or any part that I play in this parliament I feel I should do it as my constituents would want me to do it. Although I was sent here with a majority I consider that I was sent here to represent all the constituents of my riding. That will be my thought and view throughout my parliamentary experience.

I think I would be remiss in my duty unless I said something about the flag. Someone has taken upon himself the responsibility of pulling down the old union jack from this parliament building and sticking up another flag in its place without consulting this parliament. That I think was a mistake. However, probably the time has come when we need a new national flag; but, speaking for myself and for my constituents, we think the old union jack is good enough for us.

I should like to say a word about national selective service and the war labour board. But before I do that I should like to welcome all or any hon. members who wish to visit my riding. They would be only too welcome, and if they do not believe what I say about its possibilities and beauties I ask them to come and see for themselves. If they cannot come let them ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) or the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), because they both had a good look at it in the last election campaign. I welcome them back at any time and I hope that they will not wait until the next election rolls around. In fact I should like to have the Minister of Finance there this fall. Although we may differ on politics at times, we do not differ when it comes to a victory or peace loan. If the Minister of Finance came there and opened the victory loan campaign I might have the honour of introducing him, and I will guarantee him a larger audience than he had when he spoke at Lindsay before June 11 last.

With regard to national selective service, they have been short-sighted and inefficient. That is also true of the war labour board. On August 31, 1942, all the operators and lumbermen received a notice to appear at a meeting in my town under penalty if they were not there. Lists of prices and wage schedules that we could pay to men, both loggers and cutters, were laid down. We tried to live up to this as well as we could, but it was inadequate to fill the bill. I told the board so at that time. However, ten months later, after the operators were put out of business so far as cordwood is concerned, we were paying $3.75 and the war labour board said that we must cut it down to $3.40. The result was that our men left and disappeared into other work, and our organization was broken up so far as producing wood was concerned. At that time I was producing 500 cords of body hardwood a month, and for the benefit of hon. members from the fishing areas on the coast, a cord of body hardwood is the next thing to anthracite coal.

Ten months later I received another notice to meet in the town of Huntsville in an adjoining riding. At that time they told us to go out into the bush and get out cordwood because there was a crisis at hand, and that we could do it at any price. They said to us: "If you have not the money we will finance you; if you have not the men we will give you internees." Well, the house can realize the position I was put in living in a riding comprising people of English, Irish and Scotch descent with a really first-class bunch of workmen in that area. If I had started to bring in internees I do not think I would be here to-day. However, the policy adopted was short-sighted because the operators who were taking out the cordwood saw the crisis coming in January and February, 1942. The government or the department did not see it until June, 1943.

I should like to say a few words on housing, because it affects us too. To-day housing is being handled by two departments of the government. I think one would be sufficient. They have been fumbling the ball more or less back and forth between the two departments. If they had one improved programme of housing they might go through for a touchdown. We do not need wartime housing. If they gave private enterprise half the chances that they gave wartime housing, private enterprise would build more houses and build them better and more economically. We have no wartime housing in my riding, but houses are being built by private enterprise, by soldiers who are coming back from overseas and by citizens. Those houses and that programme are being held up at the present time because of the freezing of materials for wartime housing. Wartime housing is not producing materials of construction; it is stealing them from the producers with the help of the government, and the net result is production of a number of houses at public expense in an uneconomic way at the cost of the building of a greater number of houses by private enterprise at private expense. Wartime housing is not making more labour available; it is only adding competition for the scarce supply existing. The performance of labour on government projects is proverbially less efficient than on private projects. The net result of the intrusion of Wartime Housing Limited is to increase the cost of houses. It has been demonstrated that in the temporary house field wartime housing cannot build as economically as private enterprise. The government would be well advised to release some of these controls and let our returning soldiers, and our citizens go ahead and build their houses.

I have a neighbour living across the road from me. He is not a wealthy man but he gathered together a few dollars to build a house. He started that house in the spring; he worked a lot of the time on it after he had his supper; he worked at night and he finally got the house to the position where he could live in it. He had an order in for windows, doors and the like. He moved in after I had lent him a few windows, and after he had patched up some with paper and so forth. Then he received a notice that his order for windows and doors had to be cancelled owing to government control. That is the situation in many cases, and it is certainly wrong so far as private enterprise or anybody who wants to build a house for himself is concerned.

I could go on and talk for quite a while yet and touch on a lot of other matters, but I have had an opportunity of advertising my own riding and an opportunity of inviting all hon. members to come to my riding at any time and I shall close with these few remarks.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, while we are waiting, and before the question is put, I should like to say briefly that we intend to vote against both the subamendment and the amendment—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Good.

Mr. COLDWELL: —and to vote also against the motion for the adoption of the address.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Not so good.

Mr. COLDWELL: We are going to do so because, if one reads the Progressive Conservative amendment, as amended by the Social Credit party, he will find that it reads this way, and this has not yet been put on the record in full:

> We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that Your Excellency's advisers have:
> (a) failed to demobilize our armed forces on a fair basis and, in particular, have failed to prevent serious disadvantage to overseas service personnel;
> (b) failed to provide a speedy and effective plan of reconversion from war to peace, and failed in particular to join in partnership with labour and industry in devising a workable scheme to provide jobs, with fair wages, for discharged service personnel and war workers;
> (c) failed to take adequate and timely action to meet the ever-mounting housing crisis.

And then, to this the social credit subamendment is attached, and would therefore continue:

> (d) failed to meet the needs of Canada for a prosperous peace and in particular, to provide a means of ensuring that the national production shall be kept at a sufficiently high level to provide every Canadian with a standard of living commensurate with Canada's ability to produce;
> (e) failed to provide this country with an effective and scientific financial policy for distributing to all Canadians their fair share of the national production without increasing the burden of taxation or the national debt.

Now, as we see it, both criticize the government for a series of failures. The word "failed" appears a number of times in both the amendment and the subamendment. But neither the amendment nor the subamendment contains any understandable suggestions to meet those failures. And none of the speeches in support of the amendment or subamendment have offered the government any effective suggestions to meet the criticisms which they both make.

Our subamendment, which I am not discussing, because it was defeated, did that. We suggested that certain fundamental changes must be made, and offered to the house nine different proposals which we believed would assist in meeting the situation. In other words, we tried to place before the house some suggestions and proposals to meet the problems facing us.

The subamendment, which will be dealt with first this evening, among other things condemns the government for failing to provide the country with a scientific and effective financial policy. What do my hon. friends to the left mean by that? What do they actually suggest? In none of their speeches can I find an answer to that question. For example, last week when the hon. member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Kuhl) was speaking he was interrupted by one of the hon. members opposite. I noticed that the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) and the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) both made answer. The hon. member for Lethbridge said, "That is the thing you have to learn", and the hon. member for Peace River said, "Just keep your ears open, and you will hear." These are the replies to similar questions we all invariably receive from hon. members sitting immediately to my left.

Since voting for the subamendment and the amendment merely involves supporting the destructive criticisms of the two parties who have made them, we do not intend to support mere criticsm without some constructive suggestions to meet the criticisms thus made. Moreover, to vote with either of the two parties would mean that we have confidence in them and in their proposals, proposals which have not been placed before the house.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the C.C.F. party in the house I wish to say before the vote is taken that we intend to vote against the subamendment and against the amendment for the reasons I have given, and of course to vote against the main motion because we endeavoured to amend it and because we believe it to be inadequate as it stands, and therefore insufficient to meet the situation which has developed in this country. I am going to leave it at that.

Amendment to the amendment (Mr. Hansell) negatived.

PAIRS

(The list of pairs is furnished by the chief whips.)

Messrs:

Picard — Black (Cumberland)
Grant — Stirling

Mr. ISNOR: I was paired with the hon. member for Colchester-Hants (Mr. Stanfield). Had I voted, I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, before you proceed with the motion I desire to offer a few remarks.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker, I had the floor.

Mr. SPEAKER: I give the floor to the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross).

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The speech at the opening of this twentieth parliament on September 6 did not contain any reference whatever to floor prices. During the days from September 6 to September 19 many hon. members, some of them possessing considerable knowledge of agricultural matters, spoke on the address in reply to the governor general's speech and the amendments thereto, and therefore would not have an opportunity to speak on this matter after the passing of order in council P.C. 6122, copies of which were presented to this house on September 19, and which provided a floor price of not less than $1 a bushel during the five-year period ending July 21, 1950. The government by order in council has instructed the Canadian wheat board to offer wheat for sale for export overseas at prices not higher than the current export price now prevailing of $1.55 a bushel, basis No. 1 northern, Fort William, Port Arthur or Vancouver. One dollar a bushel means approximately eighty cents net to the producers on the prairies, which is considerably below cost of production for the average producer, while during the early stages of this war we asked for at least $1.25 a bushel. That was on the basis of pre-war parity. Since then, the cost of living to farmers has risen approximately twenty per cent and implements of production now cost twenty per cent more than at that time. Farm labour wages have doubled. I have no complaint about that. In the last parliament on several occasions I asked that the same consideration be given farm labourers as was given organized labour and I wish it to be clearly understood where I stand on that point. Yet, instead of increasing the floor price in keeping with the cost, the government to-day, by order in council and while parliament is in session, have reduced the floor price by another twenty per cent.

I well remember a few sessions ago the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), speaking on the question of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, stated that it was his desire to see a family on every half-section of land. I think he will realize that a family on a half-section cannot produce wheat for approximately eighty cents a bushel net. More than that, this will be a very live issue for those members of the armed services now returning who wish to settle on the land.

With respect to cost, I used the chart which was prepared in the last parliament by the department of the Minister of Agriculture. Reference was made this evening to the difficulties the western farmers had in marketing their wheat during 1932. During that same year one of the minister's departmental officials, Doctor Hopkins, an able civil servant, conducted a survey throughout the western prairies, picking out individual farmers and experimental farms. As a result of those findings he prepared his chart. He proved conclusively by those findings that on a quarter-section a man with five horses, threshing hired, had a cost of $1.02 a bushel to produce wheat at eighteen bushels to the acre, which is away above the average of Canadian production. On a half-section the cost to a man with seven horses was 73·5 cents; in the case of a man with a fifteen horsepower tractor and two horses the cost was a little under that, or 66·5 cents; in the case of one section and two men with fourteen horses, the cost was 77 cents.

I do not think I should take up the time of the house in putting that chart on the record; I did so in the last parliament. But these findings by the minister's own department proved conclusively that the most economical farm to operate was the two-section farm, and the official in question investigated farms from a quarter-section up to three sections of land operated with tractors and horses.

Under mass production you can produce wheat cheaper per bushel, but certainly not on a half-section. You must have mass production. In the year prior to the declaration of war a survey was conducted throughout Saskatchewan by the professor in charge of farm management at Saskatoon university. His finding was that, taking into account the cost of production and interest, those people had to have ninety cents a bushel for wheat produced at fourteen bushels to the acre, and that was then a higher production figure than the average prevailing throughout that section of the country.

More than that, there was a chart prepared by Mr. Lattimore, a professor at Macdonald agricultural college, setting forth the acreage of farms by individuals in some of the principal countries at the outbreak of the war in 1939. In Canada the acreage was seventy-six acres on the average; the United States, fifty acres; Great Britain, 30·5; Ireland, 17; Denmark, 14·7; Norway, 14·7; Spain, 12; Sweden, 11·4; Switzerland, 11·9; France, 10; Poland, 5·7; Italy, 5·2.

I think that should be conclusive proof that the minister's desire cannot be realized with the floor price which he has suggested. During the first years of the war, when we were pleading with the government year after year to set at least on a basis of parity $1.25 a bushel for wheat in this country, the Winnipeg Free Press, which conducts the most partisan editorial page of any newspaper in Canada and which I have never seen taking the part of the western agriculturist, chastized, in an editorial during that time the then hon. member for Qu'Appelle, Mr. Perley, the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair), and the member for Souris, myself, for asking for blood money at the expense of the servicemen when we requested an initial price of $1.25 a bushel. When, later on, the government acceded and set the initial price at $1.25, according to the Free Press it was a different story. It was not then a case of blood money; there was no criticism of anything that this government under the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) might do in Canada.

Speaking in this house yesterday on the question of meat for overseas, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), as reported at page 394 of Hansard of September 24, stated:

From the beginning of the war this country tried to do its part in the struggle, and has been most conscientious, I believe, in doing so. We have been obliged and have found it advantageous and in the interests of all concerned to make what might be called partnership arrangements with other countries, particularly Great Britain and the United States.

For many years in the past I have argued that very point with the minister and the government, pointing out that I thought the united nations should have some basis on which to trade, supplying the materials so essential for the prosecution of the war, and yet throughout those years the agricultural producer of this country received less for his products than the producer in any other of the united nations.

In this respect may I say that throughout these war years, while the agriculturists of the United States paid less for implements of production than we in Canada have paid, they on the other hand have received from thirty to fifty per cent more for their produce, especially wheat, cattle and dairy products than the Canadian producers received for his or her products. To-day in the United States wheat is sold for export overseas at a price of $2.10 a bushel at U.S.A. seaboard, and statistics show a significant increase in the wheat acreage of the United States.

Yesterday the Minister of Agriculture, speaking on meat production, is reported at page 408 of Hansard of September 24, 1945, as having said:

> This simply means that a farmer in the west must make a decision, and must have an argument with himself as to whether it pays best to feed barley or to sell it, and that is exactly the position in which we wanted him. The reason is that the farmers of eastern Canada, from lake Huron to the Atlantic, cannot grow sufficient grain with which to feed their live stock. They must get it from western Canada. If we should create conditions in the west under which all the grain was to be kept there, these live stock men in the east would have to go without their barley, and the extent to which they would get out of hog production would reduce production in this country very much more than would be the case if a number of farmers on the western plains decided to sell a certain quantity of barley rather than to feed it.

That statement is an absolute contradiction of statements I have heard the Minister of Agriculture make during the last session in this same chamber. But in answering questions the Minister of Agriculture said that it is more economical to feed grain to live stock on the same farm upon which the grain is grown and produced than to transport the same grain—

Mr. GARDINER: I said that last night, but only slightly better.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I will admit that the Minister of Agriculture is a very fine speaker and quite a rabble-rouser, and I enjoy listening to him in the chamber, but when one reads his statements the following day they do not always analyse the same as they appear when one is listening to his fine flow of words.

Mr. GARDINER: Which may be because I do not read my speeches.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I have listened to speeches delivered by the Minister of Agriculture in this house during the past session when he read every word. He will admit, I think, that with the most efficient feeders on the farms in Canada to-day it requires at least five pounds of grain to make one pound of pork; and if you can feed that efficiently I think you will readily realize the saving in transportation and man-power in this country if your stock is fed on the same farm on which the grain is produced.

During the war years Alberta made great strides in hog production until 1944, when they produced more hogs than any other province in Canada. They also grew the grain feed on these same farms. A great deal has been accomplished along these lines in each of the prairie provinces; but in the past year in my native province of Manitoba hog production has gone back considerably over forty per cent. There is a very great increase in beef cattle, as I have mentioned before in this house, and the producers cannot properly market their live beef cattle. At the present time the price for these cattle is off three cents a pound or three dollars a hundredweight, and as yet the Minister of Agriculture or the government has not allowed us even to ship beef cattle to the markets in the United States, even under permit or otherwise. As I have pointed out before, he has been requested by responsible officials in this country at least to allow them, in the case of heavy runs on the stockyards, a permit by which they might export cattle; and the difference in price, which is often fifty per cent higher than in Canada, might be pooled for the producers on the same basis as was barley and oats exported from this country and the difference in price pooled for them.

During the earlier years of the war, industry, organized labour and others, operated on a cost-plus basis, but not agriculture; this floor price of $1 a bushel for wheat is definitely the first deflation move by the government on agricultural products of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn), that the motion be amended by adding the following words at the end of the said address:

We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that, pending the establishment of a more stable and equitable price structure for Canadian farm products based on parity of income for farmers, immediate consideration should be given to establishing for a period of years floor prices for all basic agricultural products at levels not less than ninety per cent of parity.

Some hon. members may wonder why we are saying, "at levels not less than ninety per cent of parity". As I have argued ever since coming here, in 1940 at the declaration of war, our neighbours to the south attempted to create a parity price for their agricultural producers, based on a given period, thereby assuring them that no matter what happened in the future they would not let the price go below ninety per cent of parity, and that they would strive to keep those prices at parity or better at all times. Therefore that is why we have set that figure in the amendment.

The Minister of Agriculture, in speaking last night, said that 1944 was an abnormally big year of agricultural production in Canada, and that this year with our greatly decreased production that was all we could expect over a period of years in this country. I remember questioning the minister in this house on February 18, 1944, when the United States had asked their people to increase their wheat acreage. I took some time to go over the situation then and pointed out that I thought our people should be asked to increase their acreage of grains of all kinds, and more especially as the people in the United States were doing so. Had that been done, the Minister of Agriculture would not have been able to give as gloomy a picture of our grains on hand in Canada to-day as he did last night.

I shall not take the time to repeat all the remarks I made at that time and the answers which he gave me, but I wish to emphasize this matter at this particular time. Some hon. members on the government side have pointed out that in their opinion there was no urgency about this matter. Let me say to the Minister of Agriculture—and he probably knows what I am about to say because he keeps in touch with his people—I was privileged to be home last week. I was there when the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) announced this order in council. I can tell the house that my neighbours were a disappointed lot of people. They had expected more than that from this government. These people who find great difficulties in marketing their live stock to-day are not given any assurance of over $1, basis Fort William for wheat, which means practically eighty cents to them. Many of them claim that they are going to quit farming as soon as their crop is off this fall. That is the urgency of the situation. More than that, before many days have passed, when we discuss some of the other minister's estimates and difficulties that already prevail to-day with respect to the rehabilitation of our servicemen, and especially those young men who want to settle on farms under the Veterans Land Act, if the government can assure them nothing more than this for the future years they will not be very eager about settling on the land.

The only limit to our realization of to-morrow will be our doubts of to-day. Let us move forward with a strong and active faith.

Mr. JEAN FRANCOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, in the first place I offer you all my good wishes. I am sure that you will follow the tradition of your illustrious predecessor who is now Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen), and of other great Speakers whose presence in this house is still remembered by all.

I welcome all new members, and it has been a pride for me to be a member of the house, as it is now. I have been a member of parliament for twenty-one years, and I have never seen such a large number of bright colleagues as those who have already shown their ability in this debate. I wish the best to all of them on all sides of the house. I am sure that so long as we are working together we shall do our best for the community.

However, I wish to express my regret that two of my colleagues have not returned. One of them was as perfect a deskmate as the one I have now. I refer to the Hon. Cyrus MacMillan, who did more for the airmen than did anybody else. I express my deep regret that he has not come back. I would say the same of Mr. Crete, who represented in the last parliament the constituency of St. Maurice-Lafleche. He was a man of courage, and it is only because of the strength of his convictions that he did not get the reward to which he was entitled. I pay that tribute to those two gentlemen who are still remembered by hon. members who sat here during the last parliament. Besides that, I can tell my colleagues that I shall be only too pleased to cooperate with them, whenever I can.

It is a very good thing that the government has been reelected. Now the war is over, and there is nothing like the good old Liberal party to govern this country. It is my earnest hope that in the very near future some hon. members from the other side will follow the great example that has been given them by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson), whose predecessor was a very great man.

Mr. CASSELMAN: What about yourself? You did the same thing.

Mr. FAIR: And the hon. member for Temiscouata, too.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you. But now I will tell something to my genial friend, who has just said a word. It would be this, that another fervent hope of mine is that now that the war is over the demarcation line between Liberal-minded members and Conservative-minded members will be clearer and more distinct. The mark should be seen by all. Liberal members should stand together for the defence of Liberal principles—and the others may do whatever they wish.

I understand that during the war, because there were Conservatives as well as members of the Liberal, C.C.F., and Social Credit parties in the army, the government could have accepted some suggestions with political background from its opponents. But now there is no reason for that.

My intention was to leave the floor to new members who have shown ability, and who have spoken just as well as have the older members. But now the question is obvious: Are we to sit for a post-war session? Is the war ended, or is it not? I have read in the press that Germany capitulated in May; that Hitler is dead; that Mussolini is dead, and that Japan capitulated a month ago. Are we to continue the war in this country, now that the war is finished in Europe and in Asia?

I am just back from home. Do you know, sir, that there are twenty-six military provosts at Rivière du Loup, my home town, to look after a handful of deserters, men who came from the farms and who should never have been in the army.

I can speak as I do because my county did exceptionally well during the war. Six thousand boys from there enlisted in the three branches of the services. Every time victory loans have been oversubscribed, and sometimes doubled. War organizations have done well. But now that the war is over, we see those provosts disturbing the peace. They are not elderly men, nor are they returned men. They are youngsters of about eighteen years, looking just as young as Baby-face Nelson. They drive their jeeps at a speed of about sixty miles an hour even at night, with their headlight and searchlights burning. Other drivers have to risk going into the ditch when those youngsters come along. They disturb everybody by searching every house to find delinquents.

There are plenty of complaints about those men; and now that the war is over, the general impression is that those people should not infest any constituency, and especially in view of the approaching victory loan. My people are ready to do in connection with the next victory loan, the same as they have already done. It is their hope that the government will pay no attention to the suggestions and insinuations which have come from hon. members opposite, because we realize that they are made with the intention of depreciating the government in the eyes and in the minds of the people.

The reason why Mr. Arthur Meighen is not any more popular in Quebec is precisely because he kept the war going in this country after it was over on the battlefield. I hope, sir, that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), for whom I have great regard and admiration, will see to it that the government takes the necessary steps to stop this, at the earliest possible opportunity, so that people in my constituency who have done their duty may breathe in peace and shall not be disturbed by those youngsters who, I suggest, should not be permitted to stay there any longer.

I have every confidence in the Prime Minister so long as he takes advice from his supporters, not one only but all of them, and so long as he pays no attention to any suggestions that may come from the opposition. Sometimes the C.C.F. are not bad. I hope the Social Crediters will be good in the future and they will be better if they cross the floor like the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. I tell the Prime Minister to be careful of all suggestions with a political lining that are made by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) and others. I had only to mention their speeches in my county to be sure of winning. I know the hon. member; I know also that if he wishes to do well he can, and I hope he will do better in the future.

On motion of Mr. Quelch the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 11.04 p.m.

Wednesday, September 26, 1945.

The house met at three o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REFERENCE TO REMARKS OF MR. POULIOT IN DEBATE ON SEPTEMBER 25

Mr. J. L. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. On page 465 of Hansard the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) is reported as inferring that the member for Comox-Alberni had joined the Liberal party. I should like to correct any false impression that this house may have had from his remark.

An hon. MEMBER: What are you doing where you are?

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): In sharing a desk with a member of the Liberal party on this side of the house I am following the course adopted by my independent predecessor, Mr. A. W. Neill. I believe that I can better represent the people of Comox-Alberni if I am able to hear the proceedings of this house, something that was not always possible in my former location. I am and I shall continue to be an independent.

WHEAT

INTERIM INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT —PRICE CEILING FOR EXPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce what is the present status of the interim international wheat agreement. If it is in operation, are the proposals of the government to place a price ceiling on wheat for export in accord with that agreement? If it is not in operation, what are the reasons therefor?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I think I can best answer the hon. member's question by stating that for the past eight months the Canadian government has been doing its utmost to reach some agreement with the other wheat exporting nations of the world. A conference was recently held in London at which there were discussions, but the conference broke up without any decision being arrived at because of disagreement among the nations participating.

MEAT RATIONING

STRIKE OF RETAIL MEAT DEALERS IN MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. FRED ROSE (Cartier): Will the Minister of Finance inform the house what action the government is contemplating in view of the serious situation in Montreal which has arisen through a strike of the retail meat dealers?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): As the hon. gentleman knows, meat rationing was put into effect for reasons which I think commend themselves to the judgment of this house and of the great majority of the people of Canada. The question in Montreal is whether law and order will be enforced or whether gangs will be permitted to prevent the people of Montreal from getting their food. The enforcement of law and order in the city of Montreal is primarily the responsibility of the local authorities of that city, and the people of that city have every right to expect that the local authorities will assume and discharge that responsibility.

I may add that we do not intend to permit a local disturbance of this kind to prevent us from going ahead with the task to which we have set our hand, and that is the rationing of meat and continuing the rationing of meat for so long as that is required.

Mr. HOMUTH: It is a federal law, not a local law.

Mr. ILSLEY: There has been no violation of the meat rationing regulations in Montreal, so far as I know. The violation has been of the provisions of the law relating to the maintenance of peace and order. It is not connected with the rationing regulations at all. If it were a violation of the regulations, we would of course institute prosecutions.

Mr. HOMUTH: You never did before.

RESEARCH ENTERPRISES

INQUIRY AS TO CONTINUATION OF RESEARCH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. DONALD M. FLEMING (Eglinton): May I ask the Minister of Reconstruction if he has any plans in view for the reconversion of the plant and facilities of Research Enterprises Limited, at Leaside, and for continuation of the type of research carried on at that plant?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I do not see any urgency in the question. I would ask that the hon. member put the question on the order paper.

Mr. FLEMING: But, Mr. Speaker—I have the proof of the urgency right here in my hand—about fifty telegrams.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The Speaker is on his feet.

Mr. HOMUTH: But—

Mr. MACKENZIE: You have to sit down; the Speaker is on his feet.

Mr. HOMUTH: I never stood up.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Not for anything.

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to ask the Minister of Reconstruction if the several thousand employees of Research Enterprises may be given some immediate consideration, as this is a matter of urgency, with regard to the reconversion of Research Enterprises into a plant of a kind that will ensure the employees of some work in the not too far distant future.

Mr. SPEAKER: If I understand the question aright, it is a repetition of the one just asked by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), which I have ruled out of order.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STRIKE AT FORD MOTOR PLANT, WINDSOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Labour if he has any further report to make to the house on the progress being made in the settlement of the labour dispute at the Ford Motor plant at Windsor.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Through the good offices of the Secretary of State, the member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), and the mayor of Windsor, it has been indicated to me that the unions involved desire that efforts be made for the conciliation of the dispute. After consultation with the Minister of Labour for the province of Ontario—for I would point out to the house that this is a provincial dispute at the moment, not a federal dispute—a wire has been dispatched to both the company and the union stating that both ministers have agreed to meet with them on any date convenient to them in order to bring the parties together and get the wheels moving again in the Ford plant at Windsor.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. J. BROOKS (Royal): May I ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs if it is the intention of the government to set up a special committee on veterans affairs at this session of parliament, and if so, at what time we may expect the committee to be set up?

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): The reply is in the affirmative. The intention is at once to set up such a committee, and I shall be asking the various parties and groups in this house for their selections of names for that committee, probably in a day or two.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE IN REPLY

The house resumed from Tuesday, September 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. M. Benidickson for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Ross (Souris).

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take any further part in this debate, but now that the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) has moved an amendment dealing with a subject which is of very great interest to western Canada I feel obliged to make a few comments upon it. His amendment reads as follows:

> We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that, pending the establishment of a more stable and equitable price structure for Canadian farm products based on parity of income for farmers, immediate consideration should be given to establishing for a period of years floor prices for all basic agricultural products at levels not less than ninety per cent of parity.

This amendment is perhaps not worded just as clearly as it might have been, but my interpretation is that it definitely endorses the principle of a parity income for farmers, and with that objective we are absolutely in accord. It also submits that in the maintaining of floor prices not less than ninety per cent of to-day's parity should be established. I take that as the meaning which the hon. member for Souris had in mind in moving his amendment. If that is the meaning, the amendment will receive the full support of this group. I should like to point out that we have on various occasions in this house taken a stand in support of that very objective, as I shall shortly show.

In this house and throughout the country there has in the past been a good deal of misunderstanding as to just exactly what is meant by parity prices. It has been quite a common thing to base parity on the prices over a given period, 1926 to 1929, and some have based it upon the 1913 to 1914 period. But the important thing to note is that in neither of these periods did the income of the farmers represent a parity income. Therefore if we are using the period 1926 to 1929, we can use it only as a temporary expedient to keep us going until such time as we have definitely established the principle of parity income. Of course, by parity income I mean that the income of the farmers should bear the same relation to the national income as the farm population bears to the national population.

We in this party have had on the order paper of this house for a number of years a resolution to that effect. I should like to read it to show that the amendment now before the house is in line with what we have long been advocating regarding parity income. The motion standing in the name of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston), and dated September 6, reads as follows:

Whereas agriculture has seldom received its fair share of the national income of Canada;

And whereas the cost of producing all agricultural products varies considerably from year to year;

Therefore be it resolved, that, in the opinion of this house and in the interest of the nation as a whole, the government be requested to set the prices of agricultural products at such a level that it will guarantee to the farmers of Canada at such yearly percentage of the national income as will have the same relation to the national income as the agricultural population bears to the national population of Canada.

We have had such a resolution on the order paper for several years. The only years within the past century during which prices for agricultural products did maintain a parity of income for the farmer were 1915 to 1919. That basis is seldom mentioned in relation to parity prices. In support of that I should like to quote from a pamphlet which I have in my hand, issued by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and called "What Share of the National Income does the Farmer Get?" On the back page we find a table setting out agriculture's share of the national income. It shows that in 1926 the farmers' income represented 17.8 per cent of the national income; in 1929, 14.6 per cent; in 1930, 9.6 per cent; in 1931, 6.3 per cent; in 1932, 5 per cent. By 1940 it had gradually crept back to 11 per cent. The average between 1926 and 1929 was 16.6 per cent, and from 1930 to 1940, 9.4 per cent. If we turn to page 13 we find a graph which shows the relationship of the farmers' income to the national income. It appears that from 1915 to 1919 the farmers' income represented approximately one-third of the national income, and at that time the farmers constituted one-third of the population; therefore I think it is quite correct to say that during the period from 1915 to 1919 the farmers, representing one-third of the population and obtaining one-third of the national income, received in reality a parity price.

The amendment is aimed at establishing that parity. We all realize that a parity of that kind cannot be brought about overnight. Therefore in the meantime we would establish a floor of at least 90 per cent of existing parity.

I have heard it argued by some hon. members and by some people outside this house that the farmers are not entitled to that type of parity for the reason that a farmer does not need to spend the same amount of time and money in training himself for his job as is required in some other vocations, and that, therefore, it would not be fair to compare the income of the farmer with the income of, we will say, the lawyer or the doctor. If that were true I would say that the farmer more than compensates for the difference by the extra long hours of labour which he puts in, and which are just about twice as many as those of men in any other profession. While labourers generally work from six to eight hours a day, the length of the farmer's work is from ten to sixteen hours a day. Therefore I maintain that he certainly makes up for any lack of training or any less time he has spent in training, by the extra hours of labour he puts in, not for one, two or three years, but during his life until such time as he is too old to work. I said, "if that statement were true," but I am not prepared to admit that it is true. I believe it takes longer to train an efficient farmer than to train a man in any other occupation. The farmer to-day must be skilled in many trades, skilled in combustion engines and power machinery; he must understand their maintenance and how to repair them. He must be a good blacksmith. He must also be skilled in knowledge of plant life and animal life and all that they entail. He must be a general animal doctor, and as the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Ashby) said the other day, must act at times as a maternity nurse. He must also be a competent salesman. Many men who prove themselves to be good farmers as far as the work they do is concerned, fall down on the job of selling their products. In that case they are doing their work, very frequently, for almost nothing. I think all of us who are married will agree that a farmer needs to become a skilled diplomat in handling or humouring an overworked wife. Finally, I would say that he must find ways and means of carrying on in the face of adversity. Anyone who farmed during the thirties knows how at times it seemed an almost impossible task to carry on from one year to another. We persisted, however, in the hope that the next year would be different and that we would be able to "make a go of it."

Coming for a while to a discussion of the question of wheat, I wish to speak of the policy which was brought down in this house by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon). In placing the new policy before the house the minister explained that, owing to crop failures in various parts of the world, the only two countries which would have a large surplus for disposal were Canada and the United States, and that, therefore, they would be in a position to demand a higher price. He also drew the attention of the house to the fact that the wheat will be sold largely to our allies, who are in no position to pay a high price for that wheat; they will have great difficulty in finding the means of payment. Therefore he urged that it was our moral obligation to make that wheat available to these nations at a price not higher than the present one.

We in this group are absolutely in accord with that. Consistently during the war we have advocated Canada's participation in such measures as mutual aid, the billion dollar gift, and UNRRA. We have always emphasized that all the united nations should be willing to pool their production for common use against the enemy, and that so long as the united nations were reducing their standard of living to barely sufficient to maintain the people in a state of decency, there should be no question of inter-allied debts being considered; the contribution should be made as a moral obligation, and no debts should be formed. Unfortunately, as we know, that policy has not been carried out, and the difficulty of inter-allied debts is already coming to the front, as it did after the last war. I am convinced that eventually those debts will be, if not repudiated, put off indefinitely and not paid, because after the last war no nation, with the exception of Finland, was able to pay the debts it incurred, and I do not doubt for a minute that no nation will be able to pay the debts of this war in view of the fact that they are far heavier than they were following the last war.

But the point I wish to make is this. While we agree that the policy enunciated in this regard is a fair one, we insist that when Canada makes that sacrifice and that contribution it should be a sacrifice of the Canadian people and not of any one class of society alone. Why should agriculture be asked to stand the full cost of that sacrifice? Surely the logical thing to do is to pay the farmers the price that can be obtained, sell the commodity to the people who need it, at the current price, and make up the difference between the two figures out of the general revenue fund or any other source which the government sees fit to use. We may differ as to the way that should be done, but that is not the point in question now.

The minister has tried to excuse his proposals on the ground that the government policy will compensate the farmers by guaranteeing a floor price of $1 a bushel for the next five years. But the mere fact that the minister says that it will be compensating them implies that the price may fall below that figure. On the other hand, the government does not know for certain whether the price will fall below or whether it will be above that amount. It may not call for any sacrifice at all. But certainly the government are not in a position to make a guarantee for the next five years, because they do not know whether they will be in power for the next five years; they might go out of power next year, in which event the farmers might be called upon to make the sacrifice for nothing.

But there is another reason why we are opposed to the farmers having to make that sacrifice. It is that we say that the farmers are being called upon to make a double sacrifice. For ten long years the farmers of the country produced at very low prices, and day by day, year by year, they were making considerable sacrifices. Therefore to-day the farmers should be guaranteed a fair price, a maximum price in order to compensate them for the losses they suffered in those ten years, without being asked at the same time to make similar sacrifices in the future as well.

I have already said that high prices are required to-day to compensate the farmers for the losses they suffered during the 1930's. I have no intention of going into what happened in those years, because most of us are quite familiar with the history of those times. It will be recalled that pre-war prices were dominated by export prices. I never could see the justification for that, because before the war, with the exception of wheat, the largest percentage of production was consumed in Canada. I could never see why that small percentage, from five to ten per cent, which was exported should dominate the price of the other ninety-five per cent consumed in Canada; yet that was the case, with the exception of wheat, apples and one or two other commodities.

I recall that wheat in 1932 fell to 19½ cents a bushel, and from 1932 to 1934 it averaged around thirty to forty cents. Unfortunately however, the government were not merely content with wrecking agriculture by allowing prices to fall to those very low levels. They were not content with wrecking agriculture by making farmers accept world market prices. They further penalized agriculture by their fiscal policy. It will be remembered that in those years we were competing with world markets, with Australia and the Argentine. It will be recalled by many hon. members that Australia depreciated her currency twenty-five per cent below sterling, while at the same time in Canada we appreciated the dollar twenty per cent above the pound sterling, with the result that Australia had an advantage of some forty-six per cent over Canada. In other words, when Australia shipped wheat to Liverpool and obtained $100 in return, when that money was converted into Australian funds the farmer there received $125; but when we shipped wheat to Liverpool and the money obtained for it was translated into Canadian funds we found that our farmer received only $80 instead of $100. Thereby our farmers were penalized to the extent of forty six per cent owing to the government's fiscal policy.

I recall that Professor Upgren estimates that when the cost of that policy to western farmers from 1931 to 1936 was worked out it averaged $47 million a year. If you add to that the penalties imposed as a result of tariff policies you have another $32 million, making a total loss of $79 million a year to the farmers as a result of government fiscal policies, and that in addition to the general policy of trying to force export prices upon agricultural products consumed in Canada.

It will be remembered that these low prices continued for several years even after the declaration of war. They continued to the end of 1941. I listened to one hon. member recalling how a delegation came from Saskatchewan protesting against low prices, and shortly after that the price was raised from seventy cents a bushel to ninety cents. Unfortunately, however, just about the time the government increased the price of agricultural products, they made a drastic increase in the income tax.

What happened as a result of these low prices? Since no industry can continue to produce at a price below cost of production, the farmers were forced heavily into debt; up to the time prices were raised, the farmers were still going into debt, and when prices were raised the income tax was drastically increased so that the farmers who were trying to pay off their debts found that their debt payments were increased by approximately thirty-five per cent or more owing to the income tax. By bringing about an increase in the tax at that time the government increased the farmers' debt payments by about thirty-five per cent, and that is not helping the farmers to remedy the situation that came about in those pre-war years.

I am of the opinion that farmers should be entitled to exactly the same type of consideration in regard to losses as some of the other businesses in Canada. Take, for instance, the chartered banks. What is the situation in regard to the chartered banks? They are allowed to set aside annually a certain amount of undisclosed money placed in what one might call a hidden or secret or inner reserve, and the excuse for that action is that the money is set aside to meet possible losses in the future. As a consequence, they pay no income tax on that amount. The reason given is that banking is a very risky business; bankers do not know what may happen in the future and therefore they must build up a reserve to take care of possible losses. I doubt very much whether banking is anything like as risky as farming and, if bankers are allowed to create an inner reserve without paying a tax on it, why should farmers not be allowed to set aside a certain amount of money in a reserve to take care of possible losses in the future.

Again, what do farmers' debts consist of largely? They consist of unpaid expenditures. If a bank is allowed to accumulate money to pay a possible loss in the future, expenditures it cannot meet, there is every justification for the farmer being allowed to pay debts represented by unpaid expenditures without having to pay taxes upon that money. I think there is a real and legitimate claim on the part of farmers for better treatment in that regard, and I am not quite satisfied that the bankers are justified in the claim they make, that the inner reserves are used for the purpose of meeting possible losses. I maintain that those reserves have been used in the past to guarantee profits. Why do I say that? Because during the depression years in the 1930's, as we know, the banks suffered heavy losses. That was emphasized during the hearings of the banking committee last year. If the banks suffered heavy losses during the thirties, evidently they would not be able to pay profits, and yet they paid an average dividend of around eleven per cent right through the depression years. If they were suffering losses during all those years, how could they pay a profit? Evidently the hidden reserves were used not merely to pay their losses but to guarantee a profit to shareholders. I suggest, therefore, that the farmmers have undoubtedly a far better claim to exemption from income tax on the payment of debts, at least those incurred prior to 1942, than the banks have for exemption in respect of money set aside in reserve.

To-day one might well ask what the future of western agriculture is to be if the pre-war policies of this government come back into operation. I would say, if that is to be the case, then agriculture faces a very dark future, and not only agriculture but those men who come back from overseas and take up land. They will be entering into a very hazardous occupation, and no matter how good the new Veterans' Land Act may be, if these veterans in the future are to have to produce at less than cost of production they will go into bankruptcy. That will happen no matter how hard they work or how good a deal they receive under the Veterans' Land Act.

If in the future as in the past the cost of production on large farms is in any way to govern prices for the whole of agriculture, then it must be quite evident that many are bound to go bankrupt. Every small farmer will become bankrupt, because the figures are already on record to prove that it is possible to produce grain considerably cheaper on a large farm of two sections or more than on a half-section, and if we are to base prices on cost of production on the large farm then, the small farmers are bound to go into bankruptcy. What will happen then is that the small farmer will become the hired help of the larger farmer or will drift into the city to swell the relief rolls, as has happened to a great extent during pre-war years. Does anybody consider it desirable that western Canada should become merely an area of large mechanized farms? If that happens it means that community life, the small villages, will go. If the idea is merely to show how efficiently we can produce wheat, and if we are to sacrifice everything else to that, then perhaps it might be excusable, but I think most of us will recognize that human rights are more important than material rights, and that it is desirable from every point of view to maintain the small community.

I believe that the principle of parity of income for farmers should be adopted. As I said at the beginning, I realize that such a policy cannot be put into operation overnight. Until such time as that policy can be put into operation the very least that we can do is to guarantee a price of at least ninety per cent of existing parity. I believe it is fair to say ninety per cent and not one hundred per cent, because we realize that there must be a certain error in computation and it cannot be estimated immediately what the parity will be. That may take several months, so that initially a fair price of ninety per cent could be established and the remainder paid later on when the full facts are available.

When we consider agriculture it is well to remember that when agriculture has prospered in Canada the whole of Canada has prospered, and when agriculture has gone bankrupt it has dragged down with it various other industries throughout the dominion.

I look upon the policy that the minister brought down—and I say this in all kindliness —as the first step to a deflationary policy; and the farmers throughout the west are afraid of that very thing. I remember Hitler said in his book "Mein Kampf", and he used to repeat it time and time again, that if you wanted to bring in a policy to which you knew the people were opposed, never try to bring in the whole policy at once, just bring it in little by little and then the opposition will never think that any one individual step is of sufficient importance to fight. I think that is exactly what the government is trying to do here; they are bringing about reduction step by step and hoping the farmers will consider no one step of sufficient importance to fight.

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I should first of all like to congratulate you on your appointment to your present high office, and also the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne; and with that I would particularly associate those hon. members who have made such splendid contributions to this debate. This is the third parliament in which I have had the honour of sitting, and I cannot recall any opening session in which such splendid speeches were made by new members of the house.

If the house will permit me, I should also like to express a word of congratulation to the Assistant Clerk of the house as a former colleague from Saskatchewan, and commend him for the outstanding manner in which he has carried out his duties thus far.

The amendment moved last evening on behalf of the Progressive Conservative party, as found in Hansard at page 464, reads as follows:

> We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that, pending the establishment of a more stable and equitable price structure for Canadian farm products based on parity of income for farmers, immediate consideration should be given to establishing for a period of years floor prices for all basic agricultural products at levels not less than ninety per cent of parity.

I could not possibly support this amendment. Ever since I have been a member of this house we of the Liberal party, particularly those of us from western Canada, have been contending at all times and in all places that the principle of parity prices for farm products should be accepted. We considered that we had obtained the acceptance of that principle when we finally had the government pass the Agricultural Prices Support Act, subsection 2 of section 9 of which reads as follows:

In prescribing prices under paragraphs (a) and (c) of subsection one of this section, the board shall endeavour to ensure adequate and stable returns for agriculture by promoting orderly adjustment from war to peace conditions and shall endeavour to secure a fair relationship between the returns from agriculture and those from other occupations.

We consider that a definite acceptance on the part of this government and of the Liberal party of the principle of parity prices; there could not be a more striking acceptance of it than having it written into the law of the country. I am not alone in believing that that is what the statute meant. I find I am confirmed in that opinion by a speech made on January 18 last by the president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. This is what he said about the floor prices bill. I quote from page 10 of his speech:

In our opinion the floor prices bill is a more radical reform measure, and likely to be more far-reaching in its effect and ramifications, than any other piece of legislation passed in the interests of agriculture in a long time. The bill sets forth its aim as follows—

He then quotes the section of the act which I have just read to the house, and goes on to say—and it is a most significant sentence, because it is the president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture speaking to his own organization; it is not by any stretch of the imagination a political utterance;

This, we believe, is the first official declaration by a Canadian government that farm people are entitled to a parity of economic returns with non-farm groups; and likewise, the first time it has been incorporated as a definite objective of fiscal policy.

I thought to myself last night: is this the new leadership that we are going to get from the present leader of the opposition? We fight to get the principle of parity prices accepted and written into the statutes of the country, and then we get an amendment moved on behalf of the official opposition that we shall have only ninety per cent of parity. Well, all that I can say about it, Mr. Speaker, is that those improvements were too hardly won to think of paring them down now by ten per cent or at all.

It might be said by my hon. friends that this does not apply to wheat; but when the government adopts that policy in regard to all other agricultural products and states its policy in regard to continuing the wheat board, as it has done, naturally the same principle will be applied to wheat. No other possible action could be followed in that regard. And surely in the fight to establish that definitely—if it still has to be a fight, which I do not think is necessary—it is not going to strengthen our position to suggest that we should be satisfied with ninety per cent of parity. Therefore I think that this amendment was certainly ill-timed and ill-judged.

With regard to the point as to whether or not the recognized farm leaders of this country are satisfied that this government is committed to a principle of parity prices in regard to wheat, and to a fair attitude toward the wheat board, I should like to read from the statements of the leaders of agriculture in western Canada. The first one that I should like to read from is a statement of Mr. Wesson, the head of the wheat pool in Saskatchewan. This is taken from the Leader-Post of September 20, in which he is reported as having said:

I believe that the decision of the government to continue to sell wheat to Great Britain and other importing countries at a price around $1.55 for 1 Northern basis lake head and Vancouver is a fair one. There is not the least doubt in my mind that under present conditions, with a feverish demand for wheat in Europe and dwindling supplies, the price could be much higher at the present time. I hope, however, that in years to come when there may be temporary unwanted surpluses that Great Britain and other countries will recognize this concession and play fair with Canada and other wheat exporting countries by continuing to pay a reasonable price for the amount of wheat they require.

The announcement that the initial payment for the next five years will not be less than $1 per bushel will be generally accepted as satisfactory so long as it is understood that the Canadian wheat board will continue to act as the sole marketing agents for Canadian wheat. However, until such time as there is a reduction in the cost of those things which enter into the cost of production, there should be no reduction in the wheat board's present initial payment of $1.25.

Again I heartily endorse these sentiments expressed by Mr. Wesson; and I think the Liberal party of western Canada will not be found wanting in the future, as in the past, in supporting the wishes of the farmers and in fighting for these things.

An hon. MEMBER: How about the Liberal government in Ottawa?

Mr. TUCKER: If my hon. friend had been here he would know that no one fought for the farmers harder or more effectively than the Liberal group from western Canada in previous houses. Now I should like to read the opinion of Mr. Plumer, chairman of the Alberta wheat pool, in regard to the matter. In the Calgary Herald of September 20 he is reported as having said:

The government policy of fixing wheat prices for a period of five years is a step in the right direction. A staple wheat price is important, but proper relationship of prices is even more so.

That is a statement I endorse most heartily. If there is one thing we Liberals of western Canada have urged upon the government of this country more than anything else, it is that the farmers are entitled to a fair share of the national income; and when the Agricultural Prices Support Act was written into the statutes of this country we thought we had established the efficacy of our work for all the country to see. Mr. Plumer goes on:

Prairie farmers, I believe, will generally approve of the government's policy as announced, providing there is no increase in the price of things that the farmer must buy.

Again we have the principle of parity prices, which is accepted in the statutes of this country as a direction to the board which is to administer these matters and establish those floor prices. I continue:

General reaction of the individual farmer seemed to be that the guarantee of a stated floor price for wheat over the five-year period of not less than $1 a bushel was a step in the right direction and would assure a balanced market for five years at least.

I repeat that there was no suggestion in the government announcement that under present conditions the initial, and therefore floor, price would be less than $1.25, basis lakehead or Vancouver. The only suggestion was that farmers could rest assured that no matter what happened—prices might fall; the prices of the things the farmer had to buy might decrease—the farmers could always rely upon a floor price or initial payment of $1 per bushel. As I understand the attitude of the farmers, it is fair. They want parity prices; they want their fair share of the national income, but also they want to have some idea as to what they can absolutely count on, regardless of what happens in other directions, just as other branches of economic activity want to know what they can count on. So while under present conditions the initial price is $1.25, the farmer may be assured that for the next five years, whatever happens, it will not be lower than $1 basis lakehead or Vancouver, subject to the overriding principle I have mentioned already, which has been written into the law of the land and is the accepted policy of the government.

The United Farmers of Alberta also approve. Mr. Church had this to say:

"The United Farmers of Alberta have consistently sought the establishing of floor prices on all major farm products, and will therefore welcome the announcement of the dominion government of a minimum price for wheat of one dollar a bushel basis Fort William for the next five years. There will be general satisfaction among farmers, particularly in view of the announcement that a price of $1.55 has been set for wheat bought by Britain. It must not be overlooked that the world price has been higher for some time than the $1.25 initial payment being made by the wheat board.

"The U.F.A. believes that stability in the price of farm products will be a great factor in post-war reconstruction and that even if it should require a bonusing policy to maintain that stability all Canada would benefit by it."

Here again we have an endorsation of the policy of the government already written into the statutes of this country.

In concluding my remarks on this subject I should like to say to hon. members from other parts of Canada that, as Mr. Wesson pointed out, it is appreciated in western Canada that under the present unusual conditions we could take advantage of the needs of our customers—though probably we should have to finance it ourselves—and get more from them than $1.55. But I would ask the country to note the attitude of the farmers of western Canada, as represented by their authorized leaders. They do not want to take advantage of the temporary need of their allies and friends overseas. All they ask is that the people overseas should remember, when days may be different, that the farmers of Canada took this attitude, and as the representative of a farming constituency it is an attitude of which I for one am very proud.

I do not intend to spend much time this afternoon on my hon. friends of the C.C.F. party. In all sincerity, however, as a resident of Saskatchewan, I should like to say that they held out to the people of that province the vision of a new era there. They were going to extend and broaden social services, and were going to pay the increased cost not by higher taxation but by going into business and making profits. We are waiting with a great deal of interest for the C.C.F. party to carry out the promises it made to the people of Saskatchewan.

Mr. COLDWELL: Give them a little time.

Mr. TUCKER: They have been in power almost a year and a half now, and with the exception of their horse meat packing plant, their brickyard, their fish filleting plant, the woollen mill, which is not much more than started as yet, and the shoe factory, which they have only talked about so far, nothing has been done as yet that amounts to anything in carrying out their programme.

Mr. COLDWELL: What about the protective legislation the big interests are asking to have disallowed?

Mr. TUCKER: The Liberal party passed legislation to protect the farmers which those so-called big interests also petitioned or urged to have disallowed; my hon. friend should not forget that.

Mr. BENTLEY: Will the hon. gentleman permit a correction?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BENTLEY: I want to tell the hon. member—

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind the hon. member that when an hon. member has the floor there should be no interruption without his permission.

Mr. BENTLEY: I am asking his permission. I just want to ask the hon. member—

An hon. MEMBER: Ask your question.

Mr. TUCKER: The custom in this house is that questions may be asked but a speech should not be interjected into another member's remarks.

Mr. BENTLEY: Does the hon. member know that the horse meat packing plant at Swift Current is not owned by the Saskatchewan government but by a cooperative?

Mr. TUCKER: I knew that, but the C.C.F. were taking so much credit for it that I felt I had to refer to it. If I had not, I would probably have been corrected by some C.C.F. member. They seem to be so proud of some of the things they have done that I feel sure if I had not mentioned it I would have been corrected by five or six members.

I venture to suggest that they will not get anything in the way of profits out of these enterprises with which to expand the social services they have led the people to believe they will get. Outside of that, the only thing they have done is to expand social services at the cost of increased taxation. The Liberal party had a proud record in Saskatchewan in the extending of social services.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. TUCKER: Their record met with the approval of the people for a long time. However, my hon. friends held out a vision of a new way of handling things whereby these services would be paid for in some mysterious way rather than by having to take money out of their pockets, and the people turned temporarily from the Liberal party. But I would point out to hon. members that there are only two C.C.F. members sitting in this house from Saskatchewan who, like my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture and myself, had the support of the majority of the people voting. That does not look as though the people of Saskatchewan have swallowed completely the C.C.F. fantasies that were held out to them.

As I was going to say, the Liberal party were expanding social services in Saskatchewan as fast as the money could be obtained, so that is nothing new. What we have had now from the C.C.F. government there is an increase in the gas tax and an increase in the licence fees for farmers' trucks. I ask hon. gentlemen: is that the new era they had in mind when they held out these glowing promises to the people? This is the thought that is in the minds of the people of Saskatchewan to-day; do the C.C.F. mean what they say when they speak of the new era, when they talk about taking over businesses and making profits in order to advance the social welfare of the people, or are they just talking about it in order to catch votes?

Mr. COLDWELL: If we did not believe it we would join the Liberal party.

Mr. TUCKER: I say to my hon. friends that if we did not have a better record in Saskatchewan than they have, we would not have been returned steadily for twenty-five years. I warn my hon. friends that if they do not get going with their programme and produce some of the things they promised the people, they will not be re-elected time after time.

Mr. IRVINE: Is my hon. friend saying that the farmers of Canada are now receiving ninety per cent of parity?

Mr. TUCKER: I am sorry I did not make myself clear. I said that as I understood the accepted policy of this government it was that the agricultural prices support board, and, by inference, the wheat board also, would see to it that they did get parity at all times. The figures show that they are getting parity on these things. My hon. friend shakes his head, but I can only take the opinion of the statistical experts. That is what they say. If at any time I can be convinced that they are not getting it, I assure my hon. friend I will do all I can to see that it is restored, and I think the Liberal party will support that policy.

An hon. MEMBER: What expert says that?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): No statistics will prove that.

Mr. TUCKER: You made your speech, and I did not think it was a very prudent or good one for agriculture. Let me say to my friends of the C.C.F. that we watched expectantly when the Regina Industries Limited plant was turned over from war production. The people said, "Here is a splendid opportunity for the C.C.F. government to take over a factory and start with a business that is ready to be taken over." Did they do that? No, they did not; they said, "We do not want to have anything to do with it." Right there the people of Saskatchewan marked down a question, "Do they believe in a single thing they are talking about?"

Let me give some advice to my hon. friends, and particularly my genial friend the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). Let them go on with their socialistic programme where they have a chance to do it and not just talk about it in this house. Let them put their theories to the test of actual practice.

Mr. COLDWELL: I always take advice from a good lawyer.

Mr. TUCKER: There is another matter with which I should like to deal shortly, the question of foreign policy. I realize that the situation to-day is a delicate one, and I do not want to say anything that might make it more difficult. However, there are certain things I feel should be said on the floor of this free parliament. First, I do not think the council of foreign ministers representing the five great powers has any right to try to settle the future peace treaties of this world. I know it will be said that the council will just make suggestions, but the suggestions they finally make will lack only formal ratification because the smaller countries will not be able to change them very much if the council has reached agreement.

Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and the other united nations have played a sufficiently great part in winning the victory which has been ours to have the right to have some real and effective say in the settlement of the terms of peace. Further, the present policy is not working out to advantage, because I find the following which appeared in the Daily Herald:

> We repeat our calm conviction that the international situation is more than alarming; it is becoming desperate.

And the following is from the Manchester Guardian:

> Would it not be best if all were to return to the principles of the Atlantic charter which states that the powers (it was endorsed by Russia) seek no aggrandizement territorial or otherwise?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Is that the Herald of Calgary or London?

Mr. TUCKER: The London Daily Herald. I quoted that for the benefit of my hon. friends of the C.C.F. over there. In regard to this whole question of foreign policy, I realize that there seems to be a feeling on the part of the English-speaking world that there is such a passionate desire for world peace that they are determined to let no disagreement creep into the discussions of the future settlement of world affair. Because of our reluctance to express disapproval of some of the aspects of Soviet policy, the Soviet leaders are coming to think, I am sure, that they can make demands that they otherwise would not make, that the governments of the free countries of the world will give way for them, or, if they do not give way, sufficient public opinion will develop to force them to give way.

Mr. FULTON: Apparently the hon. member holds the view that Canada should have an opportunity to have her voice heard. I should like him to explain why this government did not see that this country was represented at the conference that is now going on.

Mr. TUCKER: If my hon. friend knew what was going on, I believe he would find that great pressure was exerted to have the various nations of the British commonwealth represented at these peace discussions. But just as in past times the Soviet objected to the British commonwealth having more than one vote, I think my hon. friend will find that there was objection to the British commonwealth being represented by several votes. My hon. friend has no right to jump to conclusions. I do not think he would suggest that the British government, which I am sure would like to have Canada represented there and have her fair say, would not want that to be done. I think when the record of this thing comes to be written it will be found that the British government was anxious to have the dominions represented there on an equal basis with themselves, but they had to take the five-power conference or nothing. It is very easy for my hon. friend to suggest that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) should have gone over there, but as I read the dispatches he was asked to go over there and sit in the background and have the British representatives speak for all the nations of the commonwealth.

Mr. JACKMAN: Oh, come, come!

Mr. TUCKER: That is as I read the communications, and so far as I am concerned Canada has a right to be represented in the councils of the nations of the world in her own right as a nation, and not to be represented by anybody else. If my hon. friend wishes to have Canada speak through another nation, I believe he does not represent the thought of the Canadian people.

I was going on to say that I think the present situation is a dangerous one. It leads to claims being made that otherwise would not be made.

Mr. JACKMAN: What does Mr. Bevin say?

Mr. TUCKER: I have read the debates in the British House of Commons and know what Mr. Bevin said. I think my hon. friend cannot have read it or he would not be asking that question. The fact remains that it is a dangerous situation, and the sooner we make it very plain to the Soviets that we believe just as much in freedom and liberty now as we did when the Atlantic charter was signed, the better it will be for world peace.

That brings me to another question, and here I should like to associate myself with an hon. member of this house who is other than of British or French origin. I am glad to see him in this house representing one of the important elements of our population, the population of Ukrainian origin. He had every right to get up and show that he felt for his own flesh and blood who he fears and believes are suffering on the continent of Europe. I put it to those of English, Scotch, Irish or French origin, if according to all the news they could get, their own people on the continent of Europe were being crucified, we would, I am sure have heard more from them than what the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Hlynka) said in his most moderate speech.

What is the situation now before the Big Five conference? The west Ukraine comprises a large part of the Ukrainian population of Europe. The granting of the Soviet western boundary at the so-called Curzon line included the Ukrainians in the west Ukraine. At the Yalta conference it was claimed that these people thereby became Russian citizens. Russia claimed that it was agreed that they should be surrendered to the Soviet authorities. Mr. Churchill insisted that the Poles in that area should not be forcibly repatriated, that they should have the right not to be sent back to their homeland and that if necessary they would be granted the protection of the status of a British subject. Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, when I heard that, it made me proud to belong to the British commonwealth of nations.

An hon. MEMBER: The Conservative party.

Mr. TUCKER: My hon. friend says "the Conservative party". I say that it was the people of Canada of all parties who made the great record of Canada in the past six years. Mr. Churchill, at the request of these beset Poles, said that they should have the mantle of British citizenship thrown around them, which was a great compliment to the British commonwealth at least.

But what of the Ukrainians? They were claimed to be Russians, and to-day the demand is that they be forcibly repatriated from the British and American zones in which they are to-day to the number of about one million. When attempts are made to carry out these orders, these unfortunate people, we are told, commit suicide or forcibly resist being handed over to the Soviet authorities. The Ukrainian committee in the United States has addressed a moving appeal to the president of that country to save their kith and kin in Europe from being forcibly repatriated to the Soviet. The Ukrainian committee of Canada has made a submission to our government, from which I quote two sentences:

> We have received information from Europe to the effect that the Soviet Union has demanded the repatriation of those Ukrainian refugees who came from the now Soviet occupied territories east of the Curzon line. In the name of humanity we appeal to the government of Canada to do whatever may be possible to prevent such deportations to the Soviet territories.

What is the situation of these people? We know that in the west Ukraine there were thousands of people who looked to the end of this war to bring them a free Ukraine. They wanted their freedom. They spoke for it and they worked for it. They were against being in the Soviet, and they were against communism—their preachers, their doctors, teachers, leading authors and writers—and for that reason they have been marked down, not as anti-communist but as fascist; for in Europe there is a tendency to say that if a man is against communism or in any way against being incorporated in the Soviet, he is fascist or pro-nazi. I would say to the members of this house that we do not want communism in this country—or most of us do not; we do not want to be incorporated in the Soviet Union, and we would not like it if we were called fascist for that reason. In the hearts of these Ukrainians there beats the love of liberty and the love of country just the same as in the hearts of Canadians, but they are branded as anti-Soviet, and we are told that for that reason they fear to be handed over to the Soviet authorities. They fear what is going to happen to them. Somebody might say: You do not know what is going to happen to them over there. But to use the words of Mr. Churchill, nobody knows what is happening behind the iron curtain that divides Europe to-day, and if the Soviet authorities are not willing to let the representatives of our people and the representatives of the press come in to see what is happening over there, have we any right to doubt these people when they say they fear what is going to happen to them when they are forcibly repatriated?

And so, Mr. Speaker, I would urge this upon the government with all the feeling I possess: Do not let our Canadian troops have anything to do with forcing these people into the hands of those who they fear are going to liquidate them. Surely our great contribution to the fight for freedom was not made to have our troops in any way forcibly repatriate these people. Let them have the same protection as has been freely granted to the Polish people. I honour the representatives of Great Britain and the United States, at the Council of Foreign Ministers, who, we are told in press dispatches, are to-day resisting the demands of Mr. Molotov that these people be handed over.

Once more I see the British people and the people of the United States standing on guard for freedom and liberty, and I am sure that, our government has been making representations to the British government of approval of that policy.

I hope that this debate may be soon concluded so that we can send our own Prime Minister over there to add the voice and support of Canada to the conscience of the world in bringing to pass an era of freedom and liberty which alone will only begin to justify the tremendous sacrifices that have been made to render it possible.

Mr. P. E. WRIGHT (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I find myself in the anomalous position of again addressing the house during this debate after having recommended in my last speech that the debate should be confined to the leaders of the four groups in this house. However that position is brought about through the fact that the recommendation of our leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), that a day or days be set apart for a discussion of this particular subject which is brought up by the amendment of the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross), was not accepted by the government. Later I endeavoured to move the adjournment of the debate to discuss this subject, but you, Mr. Speaker, did not see fit to accept that suggestion. Consequently I find, representing an agricultural constituency, that it is my duty again to take part in this debate and to express my opinion and, through me, the opinion of the people I represent, on this latest amendment presented by the Progressive Conservative party.

I represent a constituency in Saskatchewan which is a mixed farming area. In speaking the other day, I dealt largely with this matter from the point of view of the wheat producer. Probably other members of this group are more qualified than I to speak to this subject from that particular angle, and they have already done so—the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bentley) yesterday and the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Argue) the day before. But as residents of a mixed farming area where at least fifty per cent of our income comes from other than wheat, namely from hogs, honey, seed, and various dairy and other agricultural products, we are vitally interested in the establishment of some reasonable floor not only under wheat but under all the country's agricultural products. We have been promised that for a long time.

The hon. member who has just spoken, the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker), stated that he has always favoured that and that the Liberal party has always favoured it. I should like to remind him of the delegations which have come to Ottawa at various times to try to establish that principle when the Liberal party had the power to establish it, as in 1940, and failed to do so. We certainly were not then getting a parity or a cost of production price; and if the hon. member for Rosthern had brought enough influence to bear on his government to have that accomplished at that time we would feel that he was much more sincere in his speech to-day.

Mr. TUCKER: I should like to ask the hon. gentleman a question. I suppose, in the first place, he is aware that the western—

Some hon. MEMBERS: What is the question?

Mr. TUCKER: I ask the hon. member: are you aware that the western Liberals fought hard to have those representations accepted; do you suggest that a group from western Canada can dictate the policies of the rest of Canada; and do you suggest that if you ever got into office you prairie members would dictate the policy of the C.C.F. party while in office in this country? Just answer those three questions, and then you may have the right to say that I am not sincere.

Mr. WRIGHT: I notice that, in the votes taken in this house on certain resolutions which were introduced by members of the opposition, the western Liberal members did not support their pleas to their own caucus by voting against their party.

Mr. TUCKER: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. TUCKER: On a question of privilege, the time I suppose my hon. friend is referring to is the vote on the second reading—

An hon. MEMBER: That is not privilege.

Mr. TUCKER: I recognize it because it was used through Saskatchewan during the last election. On the government's motion for second reading of a measure to raise the price of wheat from seventy to ninety cents a bushel, an amendment was moved that the bill be not read the second time, but some opinion was expressed favourable to dollar wheat. I just want to ask the hon. member if I did not say on the floor of the house that a vote for that amendment would have defeated the attempt to get the price increased from seventy to ninety cents, and did not his leader say that I was right?

Mr. COLDWELL: That is not my recollection.

Mr. TUCKER: I can show it to the hon. member in Hansard, then.

Mr. WRIGHT: The fact remains that it took a couple of delegations from western Canada to get Liberals to the point where they recognized that parity prices were something that the farmers were really in earnest about; and the recent elections in western Canada have amply demonstrated that to them. We hope they will change their attitude from now on, but evidently it has not been changed a great deal, if we are to judge from this order in council 6122 which was brought down here the other day by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon).

With regard to some of the Liberal promises, I should like to quote what the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) stated with regard to floor prices in a radio address on December 4:

> The government recognizes that farmers are anxious about their post-war prospects. They do not want to face a disastrous fall in farm prices within a year or two after the war. If, to help win the war, the farmers are asked to accept a ceiling on prices, we believe they are entitled to a floor under prices to ensure them against an agricultural depression after the war.

Order in council 6122, which states that wheat may not go below $1 a bushel before 1950, does not say, as the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) stated the other day, that this necessarily means that the floor price will be established at $1 a bushel. Nevertheless, as I said the other day, it has been the experience of agriculture that when these prices, or floors—whatever you like to call them—such as the price which was established the other day, are stated, in any year in which the production is more than the market requires the price immediately goes to that peg and stays there. That is why we are so anxious that this peg should be placed at a level which will give agriculture its cost of production, and as I put on the record the other day, $1 a bushel is not considered by western agriculture to be the cost of production at the present time.

Dealing with another matter which the Minister of Agriculture raised in his speech the other day, that of hog production in this country, he stated that it was a policy of his department to maintain a balance between the price of grain and the price of hogs, which would leave it up to the western farmer to decide which way he would obtain his income, whether he wished to obtain it through the sale of his grain or whether he wished to feed hogs. In western Canada, for a long time, we have been trying to diversify agriculture, and the Minister of Agriculture, as a western member, has stated at various times that we would never become prosperous out there until we could do that. Nevertheless this policy which he announced the other day, the policy of paying the freight from the lakehead to eastern Canada, subsidizes the production of one of the things which I believe we can produce in western Canada.

Mr. GARDINER: What is wrong with that?

Mr. WRIGHT: The feed is being sold here, subsidized by the government.

Mr. GARDINER: We are subsidizing almost everything in all parts of Canada.

Mr. WRIGHT: I will come to the matter of subsidies in a moment if the minister will hold his horses. Hog production is something which is a natural industry in western Canada.

Mr. GARDINER: In the hon. member's section.

Mr. WRIGHT: In all Saskatchewan, not only in the section I represent in the north but even in the dried-out area.

Mr. GARDINER: Where there has not been a crop for three years it is not natural at present.

Mr. WRIGHT: If a proper policy were followed in western Canada, the policy of an ever-normal granary, it would be possible even in the dried-out area to feed regularly a certain amount of live stock and so diversify production there. But the government have never seen fit to institute a policy of maintaining an ever-normal granary in the dried-out areas of western Canada, and this should be done. Hog production is a natural industry as far as western Canada is concerned, and the subsidizing of production in eastern Canada is not a sound policy now that the war is over. We might as well argue that industry should be moved to western Canada and that the government should pay freight on all raw material necessary to transport raw materials there for production in western Canada. One is just as logical as the other.

In regard to this question of subsidies which the minister has mentioned, where do we stand? I would ask the minister a few questions in that regard and I hope he will answer them at some future time.

Mr. GARDINER: Why not answer them right now?

Mr. WRIGHT: The minister may do so if he wishes, but I hope he will do it on his own time rather than on mine. We are exporting bacon to Great Britain and I should like to know just what subsidies are being paid on that export bacon. For instance, is it our agreement with Great Britain that they pay eighty shillings per hundredweight for that bacon and the government absorb the difference between that and the 113 shillings we get at the present time?

Mr. GARDINER: Does the hon. member want the answer now? The highest price the British have indicated they were prepared to pay since 1940 for bacon and ham, was on the basis of eighty-five shillings. That was in the middle of 1941, about June, and we increased the payment—I am speaking from memory—about $3.50 per hundredweight between that and the end of that season in order to make pork products available for Great Britain rather than have them go to the United States. At the present time the amount being paid for bacon delivered at Saint John is about 113 shillings, so that one would probably be justified in saying, although I do not know that there is any way of working it out exactly, that under mutual aid we have been expected to pay about the difference between eighty-five shillings and 113 shillings.

Mr. WRIGHT: That simply shows that bacon is subsidized as far as production in Canada is concerned. We have run into certain difficulties in maintaining our production at the rate even at which we are producing to-day, which is approximately 450 million pounds for export. The minister thinks that should be a fair objective for us in the future, that we should be satisfied if we can obtain that share of the British market. The British market is concerned with two things with respect to its supplies; one is quality and the other is continuity of supply. Those are the two factors in which the British people are most interested and yet, when they look to Canada, they find that, through a policy instituted by this government, we have practically cut our production by thirty-five per cent in one year, and it is still falling. I believe that Great Britain will hesitate about giving us as large a share of its market as we would like to have. The people there are looking to Denmark. During the war years, when our pork production has been decreasing, Denmark, although in the war area, has actually been increasing her supplies and getting ready for the British market. This is what has happened in Denmark. Actually, production fodder was sufficient for a considerable increase in the number of pigs during 1943, and at the end of 1944 the number of pigs reached roughly 2,000,000, or double the number in June, 1942. As soon as shipping tonnage is available for imports of fodder and fertilizer, Denmark could in a very short time resume exports of bacon, butter and eggs on a large scale. There is no doubt that Denmark could then play an important part in preventing starvation in other parts of the continent.

While we have been decreasing production Denmark has been increasing hers and getting ready to go into the British market, and the policy followed by this government is one which we suggested over a year ago would inevitably lead to a decline in production. It has not been a good policy for Canada, it has nor is the policy which the minister suggested yesterday of maintaining so close a balance between the price of grain and the price of hogs in western Canada a sound policy for the production of these commodities in this country.

I come now to the amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for Souris. The hon. gentleman is a practical farmer and I have had a great deal of pleasure in working with him in this house and on committees. Very often I have felt justified in supporting certain things which he has said in the house. I am afraid, however, that I cannot agree with him on this amendment. I do not think the amendment was written by himself. More probably it was written by certain groups within the Progressive Conservative party, which by the way embraces approximately twenty per cent of members from Toronto and district. They probably wrote the amendment rather than himself.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): They had nothing to do with it.

Mr. WRIGHT: I am surprised that he introduced an amendment which suggested that the farmers of Canada should be satisfied with ninety per cent of their cost of production.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The hon. member cannot find any wording in the amendment which says that they should be satisfied. I clearly pointed that out and I said that our idea would be that, in the period of dislocation following the war, no matter what happened the price should never go below ninety per cent. With regard to the statement in reference to the group of Toronto members, I can vouch that no member from Toronto ever saw that amendment until it was presented to the house last night.

Mr. WRIGHT: Let me read the words of the actual amendment. This is what it says:

. . . immediate consideration should be given to establishing for a period of years floor prices for all basic agricultural products at levels not less than ninety per cent of parity.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Not less.

Mr. WRIGHT: For a period of years.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Not less.

Mr. WRIGHT: The hon. member knows as well as I, and the other hon. members from agricultural constituencies, do, and he so stated in this house, that once you set a floor price, every time there is a small surplus prices go down to that floor price immediately, and stay here. The hon. member now suggests that for a period of years we in agriculture should be satisfied with ninety per cent of our cost of production.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, again I must interrupt. I know the hon. member does not want to misrepresent the facts. He was very fair at the beginning of his remarks. He has heard me repeatedly session after session argue with the government about the policy of parity. He is acquainted with what the government said to organized labour, and he distinctly knows the stand we have taken in the past.

Mr. WRIGHT: That is why I am so surprised that the present amendment should be brought in by the hon. member, because he states we should get not less than ninety per cent. For a period of years we of this group have always maintained that agriculture should receive its cost of production. That has been clearly expressed by all agricultural organizations in Canada in their published statements and in their representations to the government. Let me quote from the address of the president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture delivered at Quebec in 1944. This is what he said:

The purpose of such a floor would be to support and stabilize farm prices in order to maintain a proper balance between farm incomes and those of other groups; and secondly, to assure to farm people a satisfactory level of purchasing power which at long last is becoming recognized as basic in national well-being. The value and success of such floors will depend upon how and at what level they are set. This is a matter which will require the careful and constant watchfulness of every branch of our industry.

That is why I am going to move, seconded by the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. Townley-Smith) that all the words of the amendment after the word "address" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that immediate consideration should be given to the establishing of floor prices for all basic agricultural products at parity with other services and products.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, my first words will be to join with other hon. members in congratulating you on the high honour that has been bestowed upon you. I trust and hope that in the years to come the manner in which you discharge your responsibilities will add lustre to the record of those who have preceded you and whose distinguished service is a matter of knowledge to us all.

I also wish to congratulate not only the mover and the seconder, but the other hon. and gallant members from all parts of the house whose contribution to the debate has been of such a high order. It indicates that these young and able men will contribute in peace as they have so gallantly in war.

This afternoon I intend to discuss the amendment and the subamendment, but before doing so there are certain general references I should like to make. In the speech from the throne tribute is paid to our men who have served in the armed forces. Coming as I do from the prairies that have contributed so much to the naval forces of this dominion, I once more ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) that consideration be given to the diminution or remission of sentences imposed, both penitentiary and gaol, upon some of those naval personnel following the Halifax riots. In making that request I am not unaware of the fact that suffering and damage were caused to the people of Halifax. But, sir, these young men, and I refer to three who came from my own province, were on active service for more than two and a half or three years. They are not criminals in the ordinarily accepted meaning of that term. Misguided, ill-guided and free as they were that day from discipline, and admitting that they committed wrong, I would say justice has been done in the period that they have served, and that the people of Canada as a whole would ask that mercy now be tempered with justice.

While I am on this subject I ask the consideration of the government for the numbers of our young men who to-day are undergoing penal servitude as a result of the imposition of sentences by courts martial both abroad and in Canada. Now that the war is over, although we have not been able to find out that it is officially over in Canada although it is as far as hostilities are concerned, the Minister of Justice or the law officers of the crown should review the proceedings in connection with those sentences, to the end that mercy be tempered with the justice that has already been meted out to them.

In this connection, when I refer to Halifax, I would point to the kind of sentences being imposed upon men who during the period of war evaded service but to-day are returning to their homes. I point to one example from my own province, that of a man who was called up in February, 1942, and who absented himself on August 24 of the same year, remaining at large until May 7, 1945. He was then brought before the courts and sentenced to six months imprisonment, for the offence of having refused to serve in the armed forces of this country and having deserted for a period of two and a half years. They gave him six months; he was let out at the end of one month, and to-day he has an honourable discharge because, while he was incarcerated, they found that he was unfit for service. I place that case alongside the cases of these young men, in whose behalf I make the plea to the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General (Mr. Jean) that the time has come to temper justice with mercy.

As I think of these young members who served during the war and whose contribution so far to the debates of this house has been so great, I think of the years during the war when to all intents and purposes representative government and parliamentary democracy as far as legislation was concerned had abdicated in Canada. I believe the return of these men and the quality of their contribution will assure at least one thing, that parliamentary legislative authority will be restored. We in this parliament will demand the end of government by order in council, which to-day remains unabated. We will demand the immediate removal of unnecessary boards. In that connection I think of the war information board, which in my opinion no longer can justify its existence. I speak with the support of Liberal newspapers all across this dominion when I say that too often during the period of the war that board, performing a good service, at the same time was performing a service of propaganda on behalf of the government. I say too, sir, the time has come to remove from orders in council, regulations and statutes of this parliament the denial of the right of the individual to recourse to the courts. I could refer to numbers of these regulations in that regard. I am not going to review them to-day; I will take them up on a later occasion, taking time at the moment only to set out the principle in which I believe. Only recently we find the courts of Ontario, referring to the operations of one board, saying:

> The power of the board was not in any way circumscribed; no limitations were imposed on its exercise, and no standards were set up for the board's guidance. It had a free hand, and was a law unto itself. It might determine its own policy, and expendiency was its only guide.

I believe the time has come to remove from statutes, from orders in council and from regulations any power given to any board to set itself above the courts of this land, although caprice, ignorance or deliberate discrimination has been the reason for the judgments rendered. We have heard much about controllers. Well, the war is over now. Let us bring some of these controllers before a committee of this parliament and ascertain from them why certain of their orders and decisions were made. Let us take the regulations and bring them before a committee of this parliament. I am sure we have enough hon. members who would be willing to serve on such a committee, where the regulations could be analysed and the powers that were exercised reviewed together with the circumstances under which they were exercised. Let this parliament, through this committee, determine which of these regulations shall continue into the days of peace.

Do you realize, sir, that to-day in this country young men returning from overseas are denied their rights under the Veterans Land Act because of the regulations which have been passed pursuant to the powers contained in that statute? Let me give an example. The Veterans Land Act provides that any young man who served under certain circumstances shall be entitled to return and be rehabilitated on the soil. Then regulations were passed, one of which provides that no soldier can qualify to take land under the act unless he has a qualification certificate, and that he shall not be given a qualification certificate unless he had at least two years of satisfactory farming experience prior to the date of his application. In other words the Veterans Land Act is emasculated by a board and by those charged with the responsibility of carrying out the will of parliament. Let me give another example. A young man, having lived on the farm all his life, enlisted at the age of eighteen and went overseas. Upon his return he is denied the right to take land under the Veterans Land Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Oh, no.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Oh, yes; I can give the minister other examples. This indicates one thing, that the board acts without the knowledge of parliament. This is the strongest possible confirmation of the argument I am now endeavouring to advance, that these regulations be brought before parliament so that we may ascertain how in fact they are being carried into effect.

Mr. GARDINER: I would agree that anyone who interpreted the regulations in that way ought to be brought before a committee.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I know whereof I speak; I do not make loose statements in the house.

Mr. GARDINER: Then bring them here. Anyone who gave that sort of interpretation I agree should be brought here and investigated.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am glad I have the support of the Minister of Agriculture, at least. I say that any controls, whatever their purpose, which deny our service men the right to establish themselves in the business of their choice, should be done away with as far as these service men are concerned. As an example, a young man was a butcher before going overseas where he served for five years. He returns and establishes himself in a new town, investing whatever money he has left from his service gratuity. An official advises him—and I have the letter here—that he shall not have a slaughtering licence. He cannot engage in business unless he makes his purchases from the packers. The result is that this man who would have established and rehabilitated himself after service is denied the right that we in this parliament have asserted is his—to be rehabilitated at the earliest possible date.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Who is the letter from?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is from the wartime prices and trade board. When I wrote to the chairman of that board I received a reply in his absence to the effect that there was no record that this man had ever applied, and they did not know where the decision had come from. He applied as far back as August 18, and he is still unable to carry on, unable to carry on because of an interpretation of a regulation on the basis of its legal meaning rather than the spirit of it.

The time has come when a committee of this house should examine the orders that have been made under the provisions of the War Measures Act. I was surprised the other day, when the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) endeavoured to ascertain whether the war was over, that the Minister of Justice indicated that there were certain difficulties which would flow from a decision on that matter and that the council had not as yet decided that important question.

I think it is time to review the orders still in effect under the War Measures Act under which boards are constituted. Under certain of these orders a board may bring a man before them, examine him under oath, deny him the right to have counsel, and then make the person so interrogated liable to criminal prosecution. One such case was reviewed by the court of appeal of British Columbia, and the court indicated it could do nothing about it, that the power was exercisable. Similar powers are being exercised to-day under the Excise Act. A police officer who finds he is unable to secure evidence to convict has the power, with the license of the minister, to bring an individual before an inspector of the mounted police, where he is interrogated under oath, without counsel and without protection, and on his statement there given, may be convicted.

Regulations and orders of this kind should be brought before a committee of parliament so that we may once more assert that no controller, no board, no regulation passed beyond the pale of parliament, shall control the rights and liberty of an individual in this country, while denying him recourse to the courts. There is nothing unfair in that; it is reasonable, it is just. The United States went through the war, but at no time was an individual in that country denied the right of recourse to the courts against irresponsible orders and declarations and controls, particularly those affecting the individual. I summarize by saying that the time has come to demobilize all unnecessary controls and, above all, to demobilize the powers of unregulated and uncontrolled controllers and other individuals who operate beyond the pale of parliament and sometimes beyond the control of parliament.

I pass on to the amendment that has been moved by the hon. member for Souris (Mr.

Ross). As I listened to the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker), as I heard him endeavour to argue his proposition with all his powers of advocacy before the bar, I realized that his arguments were almost insufficient to establish his failure or his inability or his refusal to support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Souris. What does the amendment cover? It indicates that to-day parity prices are not being paid to the farmer. The hon. member said that parity prices are being paid to-day, that he could only take the opinion of those who knew. An hon. member on this side of the house asked a question that was quite easy to answer when he asked, "Who said that?" But there was no reply from the hon. member for Rosthern.

Mr. TUCKER: I object to that statement, I said it was the statistical experts.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am glad we have heard of the statistical experts. I presume those statistical experts would be the experts of the dominion bureau of statistics. I have here the latest statistics issued by the dominion bureau of statistics, being a review of agricultural business issued by the marketing service of the Department of Agriculture. This is the August issue, and it sets out the facts with unerring accuracy. It reveals that there is no parity price being paid to-day for Canadian farm products.

Mr. GARDINER: Where does it say that? Read it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am glad to have some curiosity indicated, and I shall endeavour to satisfy it if the minister will wait just a moment. I am referring to the Economic Annalist, page 50, which gives the annual and monthly index numbers for wholesale prices, living costs and production indexes computed by the dominion bureau of statistics. Usually 1926 is the period taken as 100, and that is the period taken here in the determination of these figures. I am going to give the latest available figures, and I am not picking out one at the expense of another less favourable figure. The May, 1945, index for the wholesale prices of all commodities was 103 as compared with 100 in 1926. The farm products index is given as 104·6, and field products as 94·8. This index covers the wholesale prices of grain, fruits and vegetables. Next is animal products, 121·1, which refers to the wholesale prices of animals and animal products. Then we come down to the cost of the commodities which the farmer has to buy. There are eleven factors which determine the cost of the commodities and services used by the farmer, and in May, 1945, the index figure for those eleven factors was 142·0; based on 1935-39 numbers. I will tell you what they are. The index number comprises eleven factors; farm implements, building materials, gasoline, oil and grease, feed, fertilizer, binder twine, seed and hardware, and in addition, taxes, interest and farm wage rates. In other words, on these statistics, prices for animal products in this country to-day are considerably below parity. In other words, they represent a relationship of 121·1 to 142, and so far as field products are concerned they represent a relationship of 94·8 to 142, clearly establishing this one fact, that to-day, after more than five and a half years of war, with our field product farm prices as high as they have ever been except for beef, they are still considerably below, some twenty-five per cent below in the case of animal and grain products, the parity price on the basis of the return that I have just laid before the house.

Mr. GARDINER: It does not show that.

Mr. TUCKER: If the hon. member will permit a question—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh.

Mr. TUCKER: I was asked questions when I was speaking, but the hon. gentleman does not seem to be willing to return the courtesy.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I have never consciously run away from questions, but at the moment I am answering an argument which I listened to in silence.

Mr. TUCKER: I take it that the hon. member does not want to answer my question.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is the question?

Mr. TUCKER: In view of the fact that the law provides that the board shall establish a parity price, is the hon. member against a 100 per cent parity price and in favour of ninety per cent parity?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is a very proper question, and I will answer it in this way. If to-day we had a ninety per cent parity price, the price of wheat would not be fixed at $1 a bushel. It would be at $1.28.

Mr. GARDINER: It is $1.55 now.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The hon. member for Rosthern made a speech and traversed almost everything, and I listened patiently as he took us from Russia to the horse-meat factories, but now—

Mr. GARDINER: Will my hon. friend agree that parity on wheat is $1.28?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is ninety per cent of parity on wheat, $1.28.

Mr. GARDINER: It is $1.55 right now.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: We are talking about a floor price.

Mr. GARDINER: That is not what the farmer gets. He gets participation.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Let us get back to the terms of the resolution. There is one thing about the hon. member for Rosthern. He legalizes and rationalizes, and he said: We have an agricultural prices support act now wherein the principle of parity was accepted by parliament, and he asks: Are we going to depart from its provisions? What we want, Mr. Speaker, is not only the principle of parity accepted. What we want is the practice of the principle accepted by this government.

Mr. TUCKER: We want 100 per cent parity.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: My hon. friend speaks about what he wants, but I remember that on April 8, 1941, I moved a resolution in this house, which was as follows:

> The government should take immediate steps to create a parity of prices as between agricultural and other products in order to improve the condition of Canadian agriculture and in order that it may receive a just and fair return.

That was in 1941, four years ago.

Mr. TUCKER: And now you have come down ten per cent.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: My recollection is that the hon. member for Rosthern voted "no" to that resolution.

Mr. TUCKER: Because I wanted to keep the government in office. That was most likely to give us parity prices.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Speaker, I never say anything provocative. I maintain with the Canadian Federation of Agriculture that until the principle is accepted that the farmers are entitled to a fair exchange value of the products of the farm with non-farm products, there can be no future for agriculture. I accept the principle of parity, and the western farmer demands it. We say that until this is established as settled policy and until agreement is arrived at, if you will, the farmer should receive at the very least ninety per cent of parity price for his wheat. In other words, he should receive to-day as a basic minimum floor price at least $1.28 a bushel.

Mr. BRACKEN: Instead of one dollar.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER. As my leader says, he should receive $1.28 instead of the one dollar he receives to-day.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

I come to another matter. There is a great difference between the export price that the Canadian government will receive for its wheat and the export price that the United States will obtain. The difference is approximately thirty-five cents. In other words, if we make every allowance in favour of freight, the difference in exchange and the like, the government and people of the United States are selling their wheat for approximately thirty-five cents a bushel more than we are. This disparity has arisen and this sudden fixation of prices has something to do with the international wheat agreement of 1942. Then the nations got together, they got together not only for the present but for the period of the war and after, and they came to certain agreements. They agreed that in the interests of agriculture everywhere in the world and in conformity with the principles of the Atlantic charter, they would join together and stabilize agriculture on the North American continent.

To-day a question was asked of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon). He was asked, what about this? And he indicated that there had been a meeting recently in London. Under the agreement it was provided that there should be a meeting in August of each year and I think we are entitled to more of an explanation than the minister gave us to-day. What happened in London? Why have the United States, Canada and the other nations within the international wheat agreement decided within six months after the end of the war not to follow the principles that bound them together during the war?

Mr. MacKINNON: I know the hon. member does not want to give the wrong impression. In my answer to-day I did not say that they had come to any decision. I said they had been unable to come to any agreement and the meeting was adjourned for the time being.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Although we are not in committee, may I ask the question, when did it adjourn to?

Mr. MacKINNON: I am not sure of the exact date, but my understanding is that the adjournment is until a day shortly hereafter, at Washington.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, Mr. Speaker, this is the whole crux of the situation.

Mr. GARDINER: That has been going on since 1932.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: We have not information on the meeting. What happened? Who opposed it? Who refused to have any agreement between Canada and the United States upon a common price on exports?

Mr. GARDINER: That is something which has been going on since 1932.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I do not care how long it has been going on. I want to know what happened in London that determined that nations which have cooperated side by side in war cease to continue the cooperation which has characterized them during the war with regard to agricultural products. We have a right to that information. I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce should frankly place the facts before the country so that we will understand.

Before I conclude there are just one or two other observations I should like to make. Representing as I do an agricultural constituency in Saskatchewan, I should like to place several matters before the house and the country reflecting what I understand to be the point of view of the farmers.

The first is this: they demand that a reasonable price approximating to parity shall be brought into effect and assured to them as a floor price.

Second, in the matter of live stock, all over this dominion there is the demand that something be done to assure producers of live stock against the falling away of prices which has taken place during the last six or seven weeks. We gave the power in the last parliament for the government to have a board to step in and make purchases whenever the price fell. Has the board been set up? What has that board done? As the hon. member for Rosthern said, parliament incorporated the principle; we now ask the government to incorporate the practice of that act. What are they doing? What are they doing to assure that there shall not be great fluctuations in the price of live stock? Why to-day, having regard to those fluctuations, should the United States market not be made available to a degree to Canadian cattle shipments to that country? All over the Canadian farmer is asking that. The explanation given by the Minister of Agriculture in the March session, as I remember it, was that the United States did not have the killing facilities, so for that reason they did not want our cattle. Following that explanation, I took it upon myself to write to five or six different live stock agents in the United States to ask them whether the people of the United States, and in particular the buyers, would be willing to accept Canadian cattle, and the answer in every case was to this effect: "Yes, we cannot understand why the Canadian government refuses us the opportunity to buy your cattle."

Next I say that if you are going to satisfy the cattle producer, the contention of my honourable leader, made over the last two or three years, should be implemented and there should be established a board of live stock commissioners.

Recently in the province of Saskatchewan a number of farmers asked me this question: why is it, having regard to drought conditions and diminished yields, that the minister in answer to your question said that the government had until November 1 to decide whether or not to declare an emergency year? The conditions are known. You do not have to be a statistician to realize the low yields which prevails to-day in the province of Saskatchewan and the widespread failure of the crops. Why is it that the government does not now make the declaration with regard to the emergency year in order to assure those who find themselves on their farms without sufficient to carry on for the year?

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but he has spoken already for over forty minutes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the consent of the house.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Speaker, I shall not trespass on that courtesy except to say this, that we from western Canada are not here trying to make raids on the treasury. We are trying to assure the opportunity for Canada to be rehabilitated, to assure jobs, which cannot be done if agriculture be permitted to remain depressed in this country. We read, sir, of the difficulties of farmers in other parts of Canada, such as the failure of the apple crop in the Annapolis valley. I, coming from another part of Canada, feel that some measure of assistance, under similar legislation to the Prairie Farmers Assistance Act, should be given to those who have suffered failures in that particular part of Canada. This is a great country; it is going forward. To do something for Canada requires raising and continuing to raise the standards of agriculture. Give the farmers the opportunity of obtaining the things they are entitled to. Give them that opportunity, especially in the light of the suggestions of the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) who has done so much for the prairie provinces. The challenge to us is: build up a demand for industrial products by raising the farmer's income; build up a market for industrial products, thereby assuring jobs in industry as well as a fair standard of living for agriculture.

Mr. F. W. TOWNLEY-SMITH (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, may I introduce myself as another new member, this time a farmer from northern Saskatchewan. Only three short weeks ago I was riding a binder on my farm in the northwest of that westerly province, and I regard with some dismay the change of circumstances, the fact that I find myself on my feet, and I also have to remark that I am somewhat unlucky to-day in that I have to follow three such eloquent speakers. That is a break of the kind I was not looking for.

First of all I wish to say a few words about my constituency. That seems to be a general practice. It is going to be very difficult to avoid repetition, and to say that my constituency is one of the best in the dominion would certainly be repetition, but it would not be true, because it happens that I was chosen by a constituency which goes a long, long way north—north of lake Athabaska. I am told as a matter of fact that the extent of this constituency is some 530 miles north and south and 150 miles east and west. In the last parliament North Battleford was represented by one of the two ladies who sat in the house. Incidentally, North Battleford is misnamed, because the city of North Battleford is not contained in the constituency, and I would suggest to whoever happens to be in charge of this particular matter either that the bounds of the constituency be changed so take in the city of North Battleford or that the name of the constituency be changed, because as it stands the name creates the utmost confusion. I understand that it is not the only case of the kind. There are other constituencies in the dominion that are misnamed.

The north part of the constituency consists principally of lakes, rivers and forests. Not very long ago the canoe and the dog team were the only means of transportation, but since the advent of the aeroplane, journeys are now made a little easier.

Principally the constituency is agricultural. The other day I listened with a great deal of interest to an hon. member to my left as he was making his soliloquy to a sow, and while I do not intend to regale the house with the marital difficulties of my live stock, still I shall have something to say about agriculture.

Coming back to my constituency, the population is varied. The Ukrainian, German, Scandinavian, British and French Canadian races are all found in the constituency, and also of course the Metis and the Indians live in that area. The occupations are as varied as the people. In the most southerly part, in an area of 100 by 150 miles, a general scheme of agriculture is followed. Cereal grains are produced in this area in great quantities. It is one of the good agricultural cereal areas of the province. Live stock production is also practised, and dairying is well established.

Further to the north, as I have said, we have a change in the situation. The terrain is different, and agriculture of the type I have described is not so easy. The areas for growing grains are much smaller, and the people who live in the northerly part must have other occupations in order to make a living. So that we find some lumbering, some fishing; the people in that area have trap lines, and fur to a considerable value is sent out in the winter. Fresh fish is also caught and marketed from the lakes in this northern area—and when I say fresh fish I mean unfrozen fish. It is caught in the winter and transported to railhead and shipped to the United States market. You will readily see that railways and roads are very important in that part of the country. I may say that they are also very short. There are few roads and scarcely any railroads.

In that particular area we have two railroads, or rather the two ends which were built, the middles having been left out. When my colleague, the member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine) was talking about his railway difficulties, he told us that he had the middle. So that is where it went. In any event the brains of the period of 1928 seemed to have supplied his constituency and mine with one railway between us. Now we are hoping, expecting and asking that these railways be completed. At the time my colleague was speaking I was wondering how they managed to get the rolling stock to that piece of railway which did not go anywhere or come from any place. It must have been quite a trick. At any rate, the effect of having this limited mileage of railway, so far as my own particular riding is concerned, is uneconomic and it makes things very difficult for the people who live there.

In a report recently issued, an economic study on land settlement in the representative pioneer areas of northern Saskatchewan, sent out by the department of farm management of the university, we are told that the average distances from shipping points at Meadow Lake, which is an urban district of size in my riding, Loon Lake, a smaller place, and Goodsoil, are from 19 to 60 miles respectively. Sixty miles is a long way to go to a railway. It is entirely too far, and the situation could be corrected by having these lines completed. We hope this will be done at a very early day.

Other forms of communication are also in short supply. I have in mind—besides the railways—roads, telephones, telegraphs and communications of the kind. Pioneers who go into these northerly areas have difficulty enough without having to face this particular variety, and it should be possible for any government to remedy the situation. As regards telephones, when I was travelling through that area, telephones simply were not there. Occasionally, even in villages and small towns, there were none. It may not be any concern of this federal government to erect a telephone line; still I like to call the attention of the house to the fact that the people in that part of the country have no telephones, and they should have them. It is a fact also that the railway lines that are in there are very inefficient. One train a week is probably the general order. One train a week is not enough, because it controls the other services. I have in mind postal services, and one train a week means mail once a week. Furthermore, the health services are also affected; one train a week does not give these people very much chance, if any one becomes ill, either to get the patient out or the doctor in.

Educational facilities are also in want of some adjustment, not only in this riding but in the province as a whole, and I venture to suggest in all the western provinces. I know, of course, this is a matter which is entirely in the hands of the provinces, yet since education is of such vital importance to Canada I do feel that the dominion government should also interest itself in providing some assistance to the provinces for their educational system.

Because Saskatchewan is an agricultural province and has to encounter the greatest of all hazards, the weather, it slips very easily into conditions of distress. Hon. members will recall that not very long ago this western province, owing to a series of disastrous crop failures, was in a condition of near bankruptcy. Because of the particular method employed at that time in financing the schools, the rural school districts of Saskatchewan were called upon to provide in the neighbourhood of eighty per cent of the funds required to operate the schools. The basic grant from the Department of Education at that time was $1.50 a day for two hundred days.

Owing to the crop failures I have mentioned, the ratepayers in a great number of districts found themselves without funds, indeed without food, clothing, seed and things of that nature, all of which had to be provided for them in the form of relief. We therefore find them desperately trying to operate their schools on the $300 grant. They tried that for a number of years. Within limits they actually succeeded in keeping the schools open, but it was largely through the efforts and the good-heartedness of the teachers that this was done. In fact after two, three or four of those disastrous years there was a sum in the neighbourhood of one and a half million dollars owing to teachers in salaries that could not be paid. The teachers' reaction to this was splendid. They kept on teaching; they kept the schools open. Quite a few of them had money sent to them from home to pay their board and buy their clothes. They kept the schools running and the Department of Education of that day let them do it. We now have a much better system of grants and a much more sympathetic government in Saskatchewan, with the result that the educational facilities are gradually being improved. But I should like to point out, Mr. Speaker, that the ideas of the weatherman are still as unpredictable as ever, and the difficulties of getting the children to school are still very great.

As I have said, education is a vital need in this country. We have to aim to make our children good Canadians, not simply just Saskatchewanese, or good Albertans, or good Manitobans, and because of that I feel that the federal government should be prepared to extend some form of financial help to the provinces to assist them in improving their educational systems, and certainly to prevent such a break-down as I have mentioned. This will call for some change in our constitution, but if we can agree that it will do good, then there should not be any great difficulty about that.

May I say a few words in a general way about agriculture? Saskatchewan has long been known as an agricultural province; that is, the greater number of its people are engaged in that occupation, and by far the greater part of its income is derived from agricultural pursuits. Under the new C.C.F. government a number of new industries are making their belated appearance. They were detailed a short time ago by an hon. member across the way. They will undoubtedly add to the welfare of the province. However, for a long time to come agriculture will provide by far the greatest number of jobs and most of the income of the province.

While it is true that most of the people of Saskatchewan choose to make their living on farms, it is equally true that it is one of the most hazardous of occupations, and as a result has unpredictable ups and downs not found in most other industries. Anyone who flirts with the vagaries of the weather, with the possibilities of too much heat or even frost, drought or too much moisture, of insect pests or plant diseases, is taking enormous risks with circumstances entirely beyond his control. Added to this is the questionable condition of the markets at selling time and the great chance that the whole season's operations may prove to have been conducted at a loss. Then the riskiness of farming becomes apparent.

The growing of food supplies and the feeding of the peoples of the world are of vital importance; and I feel that the farmers are among the most important people in our country. It is most unfortunate that they have not received more consideration from those whom they serve. The vital need for food is ever present. Whatever else may be in short supply, the peoples of the world must have food or they will die, so that those who till the earth, plant the seeds, feed the live stock and gather the edible seeds from plants and trees must rank as the most important of our people. I do not say that, Mr. Speaker, to belittle the efforts of those who are engaged in other industries and professions. Their labours should all fit into the general scheme of things, so that all should receive those amenities of life that make for contentment and happiness.

The most important thing so far as agriculture is concerned is to secure and maintain the proper relation or ratio between the things that the farmers produce and the things that they buy. This has been referred to several times as a parity price. I do not know whether parity price is the right term, but certainly this relation has to be secured, and as far as I know, nobody has ever made any effort to do it. We have been told this afternoon about the requirements of parity price; it has been suggested that parity price is absolutely necessary in agriculture, and that legislation has already been put upon the books to achieve that end. But my forty-two years experience on a farm have shown me that we have never had a proper relation between these prices, that no government has ever tried to bring it about. They may have put it on the books, but there is quite a difference between having legislation on the statute books and doing something about it. So far as I am aware nothing has been done about it.

Mr. GARDINER: The sum of $200 millions has been provided under this legislation.

Mr. TOWNLEY-SMITH: Our prices are still all cockeyed. We also have been talking about floor prices, and it has been said these are a means of bringing about parity. I do not see that. I think you can have a floor price under a product and still not be anywhere near parity, still not have a fair relation to other prices. It does not matter very much whether you give me 50 cents or $3 a bushel for my wheat, just as long as I can buy other things in the same ratio. The price can go up or down, it does not matter as long as other prices go up or down to the same extent. That is what I have in mind when I talk about this fair relation between prices.

Canadian farmers have been asked to raise a tremendous number of hogs, principally for export to Great Britain. Many people do not know, and many farmers did not know for quite a while, that there is no guaranteed price for hogs. There still is not. We have a guaranteed price for bacon, yes; the packer is protected in that way. The price of hogs, however, may be and is whatever the packer likes to pay; there is no fixed price. Fortunately the prices of hogs have been kept reasonably high, but even at that a great number of our farmers have not considered that the price level has been maintained in relation to the hog, the price of feed and the cost of labour, and many farmers have gone out of hog production. I very much fear that this year our hog production in the western provinces will be down fifty per cent.

Some years ago I was up in the High Prairie region of the Peace river district, when a farmer came and gave me some figures as to his cost of production. I have his name and address, but I need not give those details now. That was in 1932, one of the bad years; that is a long time ago now. This man had shipped 23 hogs, averaging 218 pounds. Those of us who are in the farming business appreciate that this is just about the weight we endeavour to bring our hogs to when we are feeding them for the best market. His net return for the 23 hogs was $73.15. That is not so bad when you say it quickly, but it works out to about $3.15 each or less than two cents per pound. At the same time he shipped 24 turkeys, totalling 244 pounds, which netted him $3.17, not each, but for the lot, or a little less than 1½ cents per pound. They were sent to a packing plant in Edmonton; I also have the name of that company. Well, men who have gone through experiences of that kind take quite a long time to recover. They do not readily jump into something else and take a chance on such treatment again. I understand the price of wheat recently advanced by some nine cents a bushel, but from questions which were asked the other day I gather that the farmer is not to get that increase for some time, if ever. I hope the purchaser of bread will not be asked to pay it.

Just as long as the proper relationship between the prices of products and commodities is not arranged we shall be in difficulties. We shall have the very rich and the very poor; we shall have shortages and surpluses; we shall have wars and rumours of wars. You see, it does not matter what price we get for our wheat as long as we pay parallel prices, but this mad scramble on the part of every individual to bolster up the price of his product or his goods or his services in order to get enough money to buy what he needs is sending everybody slightly crazy, and will only result in trouble and distress. I would appeal to the government to do something about this bolstering up and levelling off system.

Now may I say a word about the western wheat grower, arising out of the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) on September 19. The lack of understanding and the complete disregard of the conditions under which Canada's export wheat is produced are again apparent in this decision to put a low floor under this product. As already demonstrated, $1 per bushel is not sufficient; it will not cover the cost of production. In support of that statement I would remind the government that not so long ago the largest delegation of farmers ever to move out of their home districts came to Ottawa and interviewed the government in this connection. The minister told us that because his government are so sorry for the nations of the world who at present are short of money, they have decided to let the western wheat growers give these people their wheat at a price which must not go higher than that of September 19. He did not say anything about the price of clothing or, indeed, any manufactured article. I take it that the prices of these commodities are to be, as usual, what the traffic will bear. His government is not sorry enough as yet to help these importing nations clothe their people, or provide them with the goods war has destroyed, at moderate prices. Well, let me say for the western farmer that when it comes to helping anyone he is second to none, and he does not have to be told to do it. But when he is singled out and made to do it; when he realizes that he is to be made to sell his products at less than the cost of production in order that the purchaser may have sufficient funds to pay exorbitant prices for manufactured imports, then he is going to have something to say. Treat us all alike, farmer and manufacturer, and we will give until it hurts; but I protest with all my being at the astounding unfairness of the government's proposal.

Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

At six o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, September 27, 1945.

The house met at three o'clock.

PARLIAMENTARY ASSISTANTS

ANNOUNCEMENT WITH RESPECT TO APPOINTMENT —VETERANS AFFAIRS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I table an order in council under which Walter Adam Tucker, Esquire, M.P., has been appointed parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs, to assist the said minister within and without parliament in such manner and to such extent as the minister may determine.

RAILWAY ACT

POWER TO PROHIBIT SOUND SIGNALS AT CROSSINGS IN OR NEAR CITIES AND TOWNS

Mr. A. R. ADAMSON (York West) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 8, to amend the Railway Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. ADAMSON: The purpose of this bill is to amend sections 308 and 419 of the Railway act.

The amendment grants power to certain municipalities contiguous to or near large cities to pass by-laws prohibiting the sounding of the statutory crossing whistle at specified grade crossings within the confines of such municipality.

The reason for this amendment is that many townships or villages situated contiguous to major metropolitan areas have now become so built up that they constitute a physical part of the neighbouring city or town.

Railways passing through these built-up areas and whistling at the crossings constitute a nuisance and are a real menace to the health and welfare of the residents of such districts.

The amendment is simple in form as it merely adds the words "township or village situated contiguous to or near such city or town" to subsection 2 of section 308 of the Railway act, and the same words to subsection 3, section 419, of the same act, the latter being the penalty clause and contingent on section 308.

Subsection 2 of section 308 will now read:

"(2) Where a municipal by-law of a city or town, or of a township or village situated contiguous to or near such city or town, prohibits such sounding of the whistle or such ringing of the bell in respect of any such crossing or crossings within the limits of such city or town, or township or village, such by-law shall, if approved by an order of the board, to the extent of such prohibition relieve the company and its employees from the duty imposed by this section."

This does not constitute a blanket order permitting all townships or villages to pass prohibitory by-laws, nor does it embrace all grade crossings in the designated municipality, as each crossing must under the terms of the act be approved by the board of transport commissioners, who must be satisfied as to the safety measures taken at each crossing where the whistle warning is to be dispensed with.

I would mention the case of St. Hilaire Village v. Canadian National Railway, where it is shown that relief can only be obtained by an amendment to the act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

ARGENTINA

PROTECTION OF RIGHTS OF CANADIAN NATIONALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct three questions to the Prime Minister in his capacity of Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the news emanating from the Argentine, wherein a state of siege is said to have been reimposed yesterday by which most of the people's liberties have been suspended, will the Prime Minister assure the house that every possible precaution is being taken by the Canadian government through our ambassador to see that the rights of Canadian nationals who may be residing in that country are properly protected and preserved?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The answer is yes.

Mr. GRAYDON: The Prime Minister is unusually brief, and I want to congratulate him upon it. I hope this is the beginning of similar answers of the kind.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

COUNCIL OF FOREIGN MINISTERS—CANADIAN PARTICIPATION—ADMINISTRATION OF JAPAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): May I ask the Prime Minister in his capacity of Secretary of State for External Affairs if the Canadian government has given authority and instructions to anyone to represent Canada's point of view in London while the five power foreign ministers' meeting is in progress, and, if so, what position is Canada taking with respect to the plan for adminstration of Japan which I understand is being discussed by the foreign ministers of the larger powers?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The Canadian government is represented in London at the present time by the acting high commissioner, Mr. Frederic Hudd. So far as I know, plans for administration of Japan are not on the agenda of the present session of the council of foreign ministers.

I might say that I have had notice of a question which the leader of the C.C.F. party intended to ask, and which relates in part to what my hon. friend has just asked. Perhaps, if—

Mr. COLDWELL: It would be perfectly all right.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —the leader of the C.C.F. will ask his question I might supplement what I have just said to my hon. friend.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Has the government made any representation to the council of foreign ministers now conferring in London regarding Canada's right to participate in discussions concerning recommendations regarding the disposition of persons and territories the status and disposition of which is a matter of interest to the Canadian people?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In justice to my friend the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) I should perhaps read the question which he also sent to me and which is as follows:

According to an Associated Press dispatch bearing a London date-line of yesterday, Australia's Minister of External Affairs has publicly demanded that the five power conference of foreign ministers should be either expanded to include all countries whose armed forces contributed to victory over tyranny or else it should be made clear that the present conference is merely advisory and only a prelude to a full-scale peace conference.

Will the Prime Minister indicate to the house whether or not Canada is taking a similar position to Australia in relation to the points so raised by that nation's foreign minister?

The answer I make to my hon. friend is the same as that which I would make to the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation:

The chairman of the council of foreign ministers addressed an invitation to the acting Canadian high commissioner in London on September 14th stating that that morning the council of foreign ministers had agreed to ask the government of Canada whether it wished to represent its view to the council on the question of the Yugoslav-Italian frontier and the future of the city and port of Trieste. The communication went on to invite the government of Canada to nominate a representative if it so desired, to attend a meeting of the council on the afternoon of September 17 to express the views of the Canadian government on these problems.

I understand that communications in similar terms were addressed to the representatives in London of the governments of Yugoslavia, Italy, Australia, India, New Zealand and South Africa.

The acting high commissioner in London was instructed to address the following reply to the chairman of the council of foreign ministers:

The Canadian government, while appreciating the invitation to nominate a representative to attend a meeting of the council of foreign ministers on September 17, does not desire to avail itself of the opportunity to express its views to the council at present on the question of the Yugoslav-Italian frontier and the future of the city and port of Trieste.

The Canadian government is not in a position to put forward specific solutions of the problems of the Yugoslav-Italian frontier, or for that matter of any of the other questions affecting the future territorial boundaries of Italy which are on the agenda of the council of foreign ministers. It is, however, very much concerned with the effect which the peace settlement will have on the general relationship of a democratic Italy to the community of nations. The Canadian government, therefore, hopes that adequate opportunity will be afforded to Canada and the other united nations which have played an active part in the Italian war to consider and discuss the contents of the peace treaty with Italy as a whole at the appropriate stage in its negotiation.

In addition, I might say that the acting high commissioner was instructed to express to the Secretary of State for the Dominions the gratitude of the Canadian government for the helpful and understanding attitude the United Kingdom government had taken with regard to Canadian interest in the discussions of the council of foreign ministers. He was asked to emphasize that our interest, so far as the Italian question was concerned, was not so much in the particular provisions of the treaty as in the general character of the settlement as a whole.

In this entire matter the understanding of the Canadian government, as I have already intimated to the house, is that any draft treaty that results from the discussions of the council of foreign ministers will be of a preliminary character and that there will be an opportunity for Canada, as well as for other interested united nations, to express their views at a later stage.

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not think the answer given by the Prime Minister quite covers what I have in mind. I was wondering whether any representations had been made regarding the disposition of persons and territories. The question I had particularly in mind was this: Is Canada interesting herself in the fate of many of the people who are moving around Europe at the present time, the disposition of whom will be discussed by the foreign ministers in London?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to have that question stand. I will give a further answer to-morrow.

PROPOSED VISIT OF PRIME MINISTER TO UNITED KINGDOM AND EUROPE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I should like to make a statement to the house which will serve in part as a further answer to some of the questions which have been asked on the orders of the day this afternoon. I hope the house will not object to the length of the statement, but it is important, and for that reason I have tried to anticipate and cover some of the questions I thought might be in the minds of hon. members.

In answer to a question by the hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) on Friday of last week, I said that I hoped I could find it possible at an early date to talk over questions of mutual concern with members of the United Kingdom government. I have been waiting until the address in reply to the speech from the throne has been agreed to, to inform hon. members of what I have in mind, and of my present intentions. As my plans have been made on the expectation that, at a first session, the debate on the address would not likely continue longer than three weeks from the opening of parliament, which period expires to-day, I feel I should not delay longer in making to the house the statement I had hoped to make at the conclusion of the debate.

The world is still in a very troubled state. The war is over and the victory won, but the responsibilities that rest on governments are not perceptibly lighter. We have our own task of reconstruction in Canada, but to carry it out as wisely and as well as we should wish it is essential that consultation be had from time to time with members of other governments, facing similar problems, often under more difficult circumstances.

These last months have seen many changes in Europe, brought new persons into responsible office and faced them with new problems. We in Canada are directly concerned with the solutions which they are seeking to these problems. Experience has taught us that the problems of other countries very quickly become our problems as well.

The process of peace-making is obviously going to be difficult and protracted. The task is not one of restoring the world as we knew it before the war. That world has gone. The collective task is to get the new world moving along paths that will lead to peace, happiness and the general welfare. This means finding ways in which the peoples of the world can work together in confidence and cooperation.

In the shaping of the new world order, a good start must be made in the right direction during these next critical months. Decisions that will have to be taken during the coming months may shape and determine the kind of world we are going to live in. I am not thinking primarily of the particular questions that the council of foreign ministers has been considering at its recent meetings. Questions of boundaries, of colonial administration or regional disarmament are important, but, in the last analysis, many of them are of less consequence, even to the countries whose interests they affect most immediately, than are questions of attitudes and objectives. These are, as I see it, the big questions, the worrying questions. They are hard to formulate and harder still to answer. What kind of world do we really wish to live in? What sort of effort are we ready to make to realize it? What do we and what do people in other countries mean when we agree that peace and prosperity are indivisible in this one world? How can we help each other to make our world a free world in which we can give substance to the idea for which free men died?

We should find working answers to these questions and find them without delay; for, on the answers which we in Canada and other countries give to these questions, national policies must be based. It is the answers to these general questions which will determine what we should do about defence; how we can most wisely and effectively maintain high levels of employment and promote a fairer distribution of a larger national income; and how far, as a country, we can go in attempting to assist the economic recovery of our allies and the restoration of the world trade on which our wealth and welfare have depended.

Hon. members will be aware that during the meetings in London of the council of foreign ministers the question of participation by nations of the British commonwealth, apart from the United Kingdom, has arisen on a number of occasions.

The Canadian interest in the meetings of the council of foreign ministers lay not so much in the detailed discussions of particular issues, as, for example, the demarcation of frontiers, as in an overriding concern for the peaceful settlement of outstanding differences, and for consolidating the general organization for the maintenance of international security.

It is important that Canada should not merely be consulted, but that there should be clear recognition of Canada's right to effective participation in the great decisions where questions affecting the general ordering of the future peace of the world are under consideration. During the war, for military reasons, it was necessary to acquiesce in the operation of war-time arrangements under which responsibility for major decisions on the direction of the allied war effort was concentrated in a very few hands. The continued use of methods such as were improvised to meet the urgent strain and hazards of war, whereby private settlements are arrived at between the great powers on issues of general interest, might well become a source of difficulty and even of danger. Every possible precaution should, therefore, be taken to see that in this particular the war-time pattern is not perpetuated in the framing of the peace settlement and in the united nations organization.

It is with these thoughts in mind that I have decided I should, as soon as possible, make an informal and, if necessary, an extended visit to the United Kingdom and western Europe.

Of conditions in Europe generally, I should like to obtain first-hand information from my own observation and inquiries. If I am to have the knowledge of many of the problems which are now upon the horizon, and to be able to speak regarding them with the authority I should like to possess, I feel that I should see for myself something of the changed world in which Canada must make her way and take her part.

The operations of UNRRA, the general conditions of food, clothing and shelter in the war-devastated countries of Europe, are all of concern to Canada as a principal supplying agency under various international arrangements. Apart from the practical working of these arrangements, there is a still greater humanitarian interest which will continue to have a strong claim upon our capacity to help in the relieving of suffering and distress.

I would hope, while in Europe, to have an opportunity to visit areas occupied by Canadian soldiers, and the scenes of battles with which, through the heroic exploits of our fighting men, the name of Canada will ever be associated. I think it is important also that I should visit Canada's embassies and legations, some of which have been established since the beginning of the war, and all of which, in consequence of the war and post-war problems, have had to operate under new and difficult circumstances.

It was on August 24 that Mr. Attlee, in a personal message to myself, stated that he would greatly welcome it if I and other prime ministers of the commonwealth felt we would be able to come to London for purposes of consultation and personal discussion at the opening of the council of foreign ministers. At the same time, Mr. Attlee stated he regretted to have to raise such proposals at such short notice and that the United Kingdom government recognized the great difficulties which this might involve for me and for the other prime ministers. When Mr. Attlee's telegram was received, the present parliament had been summoned to meet on September 6, and it was, as Mr. Attlee himself recognized, not possible for me, because of the opening of the first session of a new parliament to visit London at that time. Until I had met parliament and confidence in the government had been expressed by the House of Commons, it would not have done for me to be absent from Canada. That confidence has been expressed in the votes thus far recorded in the divisions which have taken place on the amendments moved by the Progressive Conservative party, the C.C.F. party and the Social Credit party to the motion of thanks to His Excellency for His Excellency's speech addressed to both houses of parliament.

It is now, therefore, possible for me to take the house into my confidence with respect to the reasons which make it advisable that I should pay the extended visit I have referred to. Having assured Mr. Attlee that I would, at an early opportunity, be glad to talk over with him matters of mutual interest to our governments, I feel I should avail myself of the opportunity which now presents itself for this and the other purposes I have mentioned, and which, if not availed of at this first session, may not be possible in the period between the close of the present session and the next session which will come in the new year. My plans have, accordingly, been made to leave for London early in the coming week.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I do not think this statement should be allowed to pass without some expression from the house. Hon. members have listened with a great deal of interest, and with approval, to what the Prime Minister has said, particularly his reference to the international situation and the necessity for Canada's raising her voice in that regard. As one who was present at the San Francisco conference I can say that I think we all understood that prior agreements among the five great powers were useful. There was a very general feeling that the time had arrived when other nations which had played such an important part in the winning of the war should also be heard. I am thoroughly in approval of what the Prime Minister has said this afternoon, and I can assure him of our support in that particular.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the house listened with keen interest to what the Prime Minister has just said. Speaking as the leader of the group sitting opposite to him, may I say we wholly commend his statement. I want to assure him, too, that his party will receive the very generous co-operation of hon. members on this side while he is away.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, it gave me considerable satisfaction to listen to the Prime Minister's statement this afternoon. I believe no group in the house has been more careful to keep in touch with the world situation than has the Social Credit group, realizing as we do the tragic situation in which the world finds itself to-day, and realizing too that Canada has grown to the full stature of nationhood and should take her position in the world community of nations, a position of responsibility.

I concur in the Prime Minister's determination to go to Europe to find out definitely what the situation is, and to lend his experienced hand in a serious attempt to turn chaos into order and bring about a solution of the world's problems. My congratulations are extended to him, and this group wish him godspeed, safe journey, and safe return.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I should like to express my very warm thanks to the leaders of the different parties who have spoken this afternoon for the approval they have so cordially given to the course which I have felt it was in the public interest for me to take at this time. I can assure hon. members I regret deeply, and shall regret even more deeply while I am away, not being able to be present with other hon. members throughout this first session of the new parliament. I can see quite clearly, however, that unless I take advantage of the opportunity afforded during this first session to take up some of the matters to which I have referred, a like opportunity may not again present itself.

May I say to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) how obliged I am to him for his courtesy in agreeing to extend a pair to me during the time of my absence.

Mr. BRACKEN: I would only add the hope that when the Prime Minister is gone his government will bring in legislation of a type which may not tend to make us feel the necessity of effecting the pair with him.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister, arising out of his statement—one which I believe was asked at the last session. At the approaching conference will there be any discussion of the points raised by the late Mr. Curtin of Australia when he was in Ottawa? I refer to the creation of an empire council to operate after the war for the purpose of bringing about closer collaboration and co-operation with the mother country, including preferential trade, defence, and migration within the empire.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If I heard my hon. friend correctly he referred to an approaching conference. I am not aware of any conference that has been called for the purpose to which he has referred. I believe what I have said answers his question.

BUSINESS VISITS TO EUROPE

FACILITIES FOR FOOD, LODGING AND LIMITED TRANSPORTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. A press dispatch from Paris appearing in the New York Times of yesterday quoted the American ambassador to France as saying that facilities for food, lodging and limited transportation for American business men will be provided through the United States Embassy over there on and after October 1, 1945. May I ask the Prime Minister what steps this government is taking to provide similar service to Canadians on business in France and anywhere in Europe where the army has quarters and messes?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am afraid I shall have to ask my hon. friend to allow the question to stand and I will give an answer later on. I had no notice of the question.

MEAT RATIONING

REQUEST OF MONTREAL BUTCHERS FOR INTERVIEW WITH CABINET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. FRED ROSE (Cartier): I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question. Having been informed by telegram that representatives of Montreal butchers have requested an interview with the Prime Minister and the government to-morrow morning, may I ask whether the Prime Minister will inform the house whether the government intends to receive this delegation and discuss means whereby the strike may be ended?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend sent me a copy of the question. I will read to the house the telegram which I received this morning from Mr. E. Chartrand of Montreal and the reply I have sent. Mr. Chartrand's telegram reads:

1945, September 27 a.m 2 14
Montreal, Que. 26

Prime Minister Mackenzie King,
Parliament Building, Ottawa, Ont.

Montreal butchers whose stores are closed because of meat rationing would appreciate an interview with you and your tribunate—

I take that to mean cabinet.

—on Friday morning at Ottawa. Kindly indicate by wire as to time and place that is agreeable for you to meet at the legation—

I think that means "meet a delegation".

—of twenty-five.

E. Chartrand,
President.
1252 Stanley street, Montreal.

To that telegram I sent the following reply this morning:

Ottawa, September 27, 1945.

E. Chartrand, Esquire,
1252 Stanley street,
Montreal, P.Q.

A delegation of retail meat dealers of Canada has already been received by the Ministers of Agriculture and Finance with the rationing authorities and the questions raised by the meat dealers were fully discussed and certain adjustments were made in the rationing system. If the retail dealers of the organization, of which you are the president, would like to make suggestions of other adjustments to the rationing authorities, any representations will be immediately and carefully considered. In the light of all the existing circumstances, the government considers it would be inappropriate for the cabinet to receive the delegation requested.

DIFFERENTIAL RATIONING FOR MINERS, LUMBERMEN, ETC.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In the light of the serious strike of southern Alberta miners, will the government give consideration to some change in the meat rationing regulations to permit of a more equitable distribution of available meat supplies—recognizing the principle of greater need on the part of those engaged in heavy work such as miners, lumbermen, etcetera?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): A great deal of consideration has been given to the question whether differential rationing, as it is called, is practicable and the decision arrived at is that it is not. The request of the miners in Alberta, at least the group referred to in the question, is that they receive double rations. Naturally if they were to receive double rations, claims would arise from many other groups in various parts of Canada. The question, in so far as lumber camps are concerned, is answered by an arrangement that is made apart from change in the number of pounds per week of meat available. That is, in remote districts where alternative food supplies are not available in large measure, the rationing authorities make available extra quantities of meat, not by way of individual quota but by way of quotas such as a restaurant or some such establishment gets, and the situation is covered in that way. But the specific request here, to allow more pounds of meat per week to certain classes in the community, is deemed to be impracticable. At the same time I may say that the rationing authorities are giving much attention to the problem of how to relieve cases of particular hardship. They have not been able to find any solution to the problem as yet, but it is receiving attention at the present time.

PROVINCIAL LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): May I ask the Minister of Justice a question. On Tuesday I sent him a copy of a telegram which had been sent me by the attorney general of Saskatchewan. Can he give us now the information requested in that telegram?

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): When the original question was put the other day I attempted to answer it from memory, and probably I should not have done so because I find there were some errors in the information I gave the house at that time. Thus I referred to the Dominion Land Mortgage Association and I am informed that it is the Dominion Mortgage and Investments Association. I also stated that information had been given to the attorney general of Saskatchewan almost as soon as the petitions had been received. When I received, later on Tuesday, the telegram addressed to me by the attorney general of Saskatchewan I immediately referred it to the deputy minister of justice and he has supplied me with this information. The petition of the Dominion Mortgage and Investments Association was received early in July. Mr. Carson, of Toronto, acting as counsel for the petitioners, saw the deputy minister of justice just about that time, and there was some discussion as to whether he wanted to add any oral representations to those contained in the petition. What was determined then was that he did not feel that it was necessary that he do so, but if we wished for further elaboration of the representations in the petition he would be available. The petition was then referred to the law officer who deals, as a matter of course, with the examination of all the provincial legislation adopted each year, and who prepares memoranda to enable recommendations to be made to council as to whether or not the legislation should be allowed to have such operation as it can legally have. In considering this legislation an effort is made by the law officers, who have considerable experience in that matter, to study everything that is pertinent to the form and purport of the legislation, whether representations or petitions come in or not. The only additional value there can be in making representations is to focus attention upon something which, in spite of their experience, the law officers might not consider pertinent or consider that it was necessary for them to study and report upon.

It was only when the other petition for disallowance came in from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company specifically requesting a hearing that the matter was dealt with in any other than the routine way. That request was received at the department on September 16. The deputy minister wrote to counsel for the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and to Mr. Carson, as counsel for the other party that had made the representation, on September 18, asking them to send copies of their representations to the attorney general of Saskatchewan, in view of the fact that it appeared they wished to be heard orally. As I say, those letters were written on September 18, and I understand that copies of the representations were supplied to the attorney general on September 20. Those letters suggested that they could be heard if they wished on October 11 and on October 15, as I stated before.

There is not going to be any trial of issues at that time. Council will of course be allowed to make such representations as they see fit to make, and those representations will be considered, together with the legislation itself, as an aid in the preparation of the recommendations that are made in every instance with respect to provincial statutes.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is it not usual to apprise the province that a petition against legislation has been left with the department, and the contents thereof? It seems to me that in an important matter of this kind the respondent province should have an opportunity to study the grounds upon which the petitioners are asking for disallowance, in case there may be some further representations or oral discussion later.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Well, I have not specially inquired as to what was the procedure; I was informed by the deputy minister that the usual procedure had been followed here, and it was merely because a specific request for a hearing had been made—

Mr. COLDWELL: That is not court procedure?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: These are not court proceedings at all. The Minister of Justice does not make a decision; he prepares an opinion to support a recommendation made to council as to whether the legislation should or should not be allowed to have such operation as it legally may have. That is done because of the requirements of the British North America Act, and is done irrespective of whether representations have been made or not.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INAUDIBILITY OF DEBATE—REQUEST FOR INSTALLATION OF AMPLIFIERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): I rise to a question of privilege, with respect to a matter which concerns every hon. member of this house. Since we are accustomed to following the procedure of Westminster I wish to read a few lines which appeared in this morning's press. A Canadian Press dispatch from London says:

United Kingdom members of parliament, in the rebuilt House of Commons, will have loud speakers so they can be heard.

Farther down the article says:

The 456 loud speakers—a concession to modern ways—will be incorporated inconspicuously in the seating and made proof against damage by members.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must point out to the hon. member that his question should be brief and to the point.

Mr. HANSELL: My point of privilege, Mr. Speaker, is that we cannot hear what the Prime Minister and ministers of the crown are saying. I might say to Your Honour that sometimes we cannot hear what you are saying. We can never hear what the leader of the opposition is saying. It seems that we cannot hear what anybody is saying. I doubt, Mr. Speaker, whether you can sometimes hear—you are straining your ear a little bit even now while I am speaking—what we are saying. The press gallery cannot hear; the spectators cannot bear; nobody can hear what anybody is saying.

May I now ask the Prime Minister a question? Since the British parliament leads the way—the Prime Minister is putting his hand to his ear now, which proves my point that the ministers cannot hear—would the Prime Minister give consideration soon, and before he goes away, if possible, to the matter of installing some system of amplifiers in this chamber?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I noticed that when my hon. friend addressed his question to me he dropped his voice so that I would have to strain a little in order to hear him. However, may I say that the house is possessed of its own privileges; it is not a question for the Prime Minister to settle; it is a question for hon. members themselves to settle. No doubt you, Mr. Speaker, will take the matter referred to into careful consideration.

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF STANDING COMMITTEE ON SOCIAL SECURITY, HEALTH, HOUSING AND PUBLIC WELFARE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. DONALD M. FLEMING (Eglinton): I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question, of which I have sent him notice. Will the government give consideration to amending the rules of the house to provide for the establishment of a standing committee on social security, health, housing and public welfare?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I regret to say I did not receive the hon. gentleman's question. However, I will take notice of it as it appears in Hansard and give him a reply later on.

HOUSING

RELEASE OF BUILDING MATERIALS TO DISCHARGED SERVICE PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. A. KIDD (Kingston City): May I direct a question to the Minister of Reconstruction, or in his absence to the Prime Minister or the acting minister? Will the minister kindly inform the house whether immediate steps can be taken to release building materials to discharged soldiers in order to enable them to build or remodel houses or places of business for themselves and their families?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I say to my hon. friend that I will direct the attention of the Minister of Reconstruction to his question, and no doubt the minister will give him an answer in due course.

Mr. KIDD: I have already submitted my question in writing to the minister. Thank you very much.

TAXATION

REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION ON COOPERATIVES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CHESTER S. McLURE (Queens): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. When will the report of the royal commission on taxation of cooperatives be tabled?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): The commission made its report on September 25, which was the day before yesterday, and as yet I have not had time to read that report. I intend to read it just as soon as possible, and then it will be printed and distributed.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION TO WARDS OF CHILDREN'S AID SOCIETY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether consideration is being given to granting the family allowances to wards of the Children's Aid Society. I hope the minister heard me.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman should place that question on the order paper.

Mr. FRASER: But, Mr. Speaker, it would not be answered for perhaps a month or more, and this is very urgent.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not see any urgency in it. It should be placed on the order paper.

HIGHWAY TRANSPORTATION

BONDING OF UNITED STATES TRUCKS TRAVELLING FROM WINDSOR TO NIAGARA FALLS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. D. COYLE (Elgin): I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue when the bonding of United States trucks travelling over highway No. 3 in Ontario, from Windsor to Niagara Falls, will cease.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no urgency in this question, I would suggest that it be placed on the order paper.

Mr. COYLE: I have had quite a few telegrams about this matter.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have given my ruling.

WHEAT

PURCHASE AND SALE BY FOREIGN SPECULATORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. ROSS THATCHER (Moose Jaw): I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether any steps are being taken by the government to prevent foreign speculators from buying Canadian wheat at the $1.55 ceiling price and selling it on the world market at $1.90 or even higher.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I am grateful to the hon. member for giving me notice of his question. The answer is that the government has been fully aware of the possibility of this danger, and, through the wheat board, has taken steps to see that Canadian wheat reaches legitimate users only.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE IN REPLY

The house resumed from Wednesday, September 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. Benidickson for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Ross (Souris), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Wright.

Mr. F. W. TOWNLEY-SMITH (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned yesterday I was discussing floor prices, parity prices, and a proper percentage of the nation's income so necessary to the western farmers. I am sure all hon. members realize there will be some difficulty in establishing those parity prices. However, it can be done. It will be a job for our mathematicians and our research men, but I am convinced they can do it.

The point I wish to make here is that it will be necessary to have those prices established before we can indicate what ninety per cent would amount to. Hon. members in this group do not like the ninety per cent stipulation. We do not see any particular advantage in pussyfooting around with a part of the parity price and we would ask for the establishment of the whole of it. In our subamendment we ask for the establishment of floor prices for all basic agricultural products on a parity with other services and products. The hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) yesterday said that his government was in favour of parity prices; hon. members will find that at page 472 of Hansard. He also said at page 484 of Hansard: We want one hundred per cent. The logical conclusion for one to arrive at would be that the hon. member for Rosthern and his fellow members will vote in favour of our subamendment. But of course, Mr. Speaker, I am only a new member.

There is a feeling prevalent in this country that the farmer to-day is well off and has lots of money in his pocket. That is true within certain limits. It is true, as a matter of fact, that the war, and the war only, has been responsible for the farmer's receiving better prices for his products; but the principal reason that he has money in his jeans to-day is that he has not been able to spend it upon the things which he really requires to buy. If he had been able to buy the machinery he requires and pay for needed repairs to his machinery and paint for his buildings and a host of other things, he would not have this money in his pocket. The farmer himself will receive a surprise, perhaps a shock, when the time comes that he is able to buy the things he requires to reequip his farmstead. As a matter of fact his wealth is superficial, not real. He has the money at the present moment but when he has bought some of these $1,700 tractors and $3,000 combines his money will rapidly disappear. I would like hon. members especially those who have just a passing knowledge of agriculture, to bear that in mind when they hear talk about the western farmer rolling in wealth at the present time. He is a pretty good fellow. He has been very patriotic and loyal and he has given willingly of his sons and daughters and of his dollars to the war effort, and now in his old age he has gone into harness again, with his womenfolk helping him, to see that the production of food is not decreased because of the exodus of so much of his help.

And so, Mr. Speaker, I would say to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon), who made a statement on the price of western wheat the other day: Let us say to the people of devastated Europe and to the people of the low countries: Not only here is wheat but here are flour and foods of all kinds, both in bulk and otherwise; here are clothes; here are machines, boots and shoes, pots and pans, building materials of all kinds, and the prices of all of them are being held down to the level of September 19, 1945.

May I say this about world markets, to which we farmers will have to subscribe and to which we shall have to adjust ourselves. I believe that when the smoke of battle has finally blown away, every country will be compelled to produce that which it can most economically and most easily produce. Thus it may be that in certain parts of Canada which are at the present time extensively engaged in dairying, the harsh winters, the great distance from tidewater and high freight rates will not permit our farmers to compete with countries like New Zealand and Australia, with an outdoor climate that is moderate all the year round, and with their closeness to the sea. It is conceivable that some other country may find that they can produce and get their products on to the world markets more cheaply than we. That possibiliy must be faced, and we must be ready for it, even though the quality of our products is higher.

We have been accused by members in certain parts of this house of having communists as friends. They are no friends of ours, Mr. Speaker. In fact, many of them tried to prevent me from getting down here at all. However, these same communists were advocating a coalition with the Liberals, and so it would be just as logical to refer to them as friends of the Liberals.

Great changes are taking place all over the world, and there is a great change taking place in this country. The poet Tennyson saw that many years ago when he wrote:

> Ring out a slowly dying cause,
> And ancient forms of party strife;
> Ring in the nobler modes of life,
> With sweeter manners, purer laws.

Tennyson saw this thing coming. We in this group, sir, are anxious to help the government in all the legislation which they introduce in this difficult period, if they in turn will show that they are sincere by bringing down legislation that will be helpful to all classes. But there must be no indifference and no complacency. Serious situations will arise calling for careful handling, and it will tax the efforts of all hon. members of this house working together to smooth out these situations and make this great country of ours a good place for all classes to live in.

Mr. M. C. SENN (Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, it has been my custom always when addressing this august chamber to be as brief as possible, and I am going to follow that practice to-day. I had not intended to take part in this debate on the address at all, until the night before last when my colleague the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) introduced an amendment which he asked me to second.

When the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) made his statement in the house on September 19 in regard to setting a floor price for wheat, it was of course not debatable but I did ask him whether the provisions of the order in council applied to winter wheat grown in the eastern provinces, and I was glad indeed to hear his statement that it was not included. One dollar a bushel may have been a fair price at one time for winter wheat, but it is not so to-day. With higher costs of production, higher costs of labour, higher taxes, and other factors that enter into production, it is not profitable to-day to produce wheat in the province of Ontario at $1 a bushel. It is true of course that our eastern crop of wheat does not loom nearly as large as the western crop; we produce only some 25,000,000 bushels in the eastern provinces. On the other hand, the sale of that wheat forms an important part of the income of many farmers in eastern Canada. Moreover, wheat production works very well with their particular crop rotation. For these reasons I should like to see a fair price established for winter wheat in eastern Canada.

Although the minister's statement was of prime importance to the wheat growers of the west, I believe it was equally important to other branches of agriculture than that of growing wheat. I think we must accept this statement as an indication of government policy respecting the farmers' price structure. I regarded it as such as soon as that statement was made, and that is the reason I seconded the amendment of the hon. member for Souris. That my fears in this respect are altogether too well grounded was amply demonstrated, I think, yesterday when the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) spoke on behalf of the government. He said that this was the first step in implementing the provisions of Bill 168, which was passed in 1944 and was called the Agricultural Prices Support Act. He read a certain clause in the act which he said provided for adequate and stable returns for agriculture. But I am afraid that this act is not going to work out as he expected, for it has some important defects.

Unfortunately I happened to be away on the week-end in 1944 when this bill was introduced, and did not have a chance to discuss it and to express my criticisms. But so far as I can understand, it has at least two important defects. The first defect is that the provisions of the bill are only temporary in character. The title of the bill as it was brought down in the House of Commons is, "An Act for the Support of the Prices of Agricultural Products during the Transition from War to Peace." The question arises right away—and I think the farmers of the country are particularly interested in this: What is this period of transition? How long is it going to last? Is it to be one year or two years or perhaps five years; and after that period of transition is over, what is going to happen next? The farmer, more than anybody else in the country, needs permanence and stability. The great thing which has affected the prosperity of farmers in days gone by is that there have been many rapid and violent fluctuations in farm prices, and this bill is to be operative only after prices fall. The board provided in the bill will not step in until such time as it thinks prices have gone below the proper level. The farmer would like to know, I should like to know, and I think everybody in the house would like to know, to what level must prices fall before this bill becomes operative, before the board which has been set up will step in and try to do something with this revolving fund of $200 million which the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is so glad to mention from time to time.

Just in passing I might remark that the time has arrived in at least one branch of agriculture for putting this revolving fund into effect. There has been and there exists at the present time a grave congestion of cattle on our live stock markets, and particularly in our stock-yards. This congestion has caused prices to fall, in some cases to unprofitable levels. It should be the duty of this government and of the board which is set up under this act to provide in some way for these heavy runs, if necessary to take a certain amount of the revolving fund and remove these cattle from the market.

I know the minister made the statement the other day that farmers should be careful to market their cattle and hogs in a more orderly manner. But it is not always possible to do so. When a hog gets to a certain weight it must be marketed, or the farmer loses by reason of a lower price; it passes into another grade and he is using his feed to very little advantage. The same is true very largely of cattle, perhaps for a different reason. When cattle are well finished they should go on the market; but there are times in the fall when the farmer has to raise money, and the only way he can do so is by sending his cattle to the market. He may also be in a position where he has to get rid of these cattle or they will be kept at a loss. In passing I would recommend to the minister and his board that provision should be made now to deal with the congestion of cattle which occurs in our stock-yards and on our markets from time to time, and which could very well be handled by this board and this revolving fund. This is not the first time that this condition has occurred in the fall; as a matter of fact it happens every fall; and some permanent provision should be made by the government or by some suitable authority to see that this does not occur from time to time to the farmer's detriment by reason of its effect in lowering prices.

Farmers should know in sufficient time what prices they are going to receive for their products. They must make their plans a long time ahead. If a farmer is going to market a field of grain, that field must be ploughed, in eastern Canada at least, a year ahead, and I take it that the same is largely true in western Canada. If he is producing hogs or milk or beef cattle he has to make his plans even further ahead; and as I have already said, from time to time, after he has made his plans on the assumption that a certain price then prevailing will continue, he finds that by the time his product is ready to market the price has fallen, fluctuations in price have taken place, and the result is he does not get the returns that he should receive for his cattle and other products.

May I also point out that if reasonable floor prices were established for all classes of goods which the farmer is likely to produce, he is a good enough judge to know whether he can produce those goods at those particular prices. If he cannot produce hogs profitably, perhaps he can turn to beef, or milk, or grain, or some other article for which he is sure he will reap a reasonable reward. But I am afraid that if the price which has been set on wheat by the minister is any indication of the level of prices which are to be set for other classes of farm products, the farmer will be in greater difficulties than ever. On this phase of the matter I still think that bill 168, providing for fair prices in the manner in which the government has seen fit to present it, is unsatisfactory, and that it will not establish parity prices or fair prices to the farmer if the wheat price that has been set is to be the measuring stick by which we must measure what the government will do in all other cases.

Mr. GARDINER: This act does not come in until the War Measures Act goes out, that is, six months after the war.

Mr. SENN: The Act does not apply to wheat, but in any case, whether the bill can be of use at the present time, something should be done to see that prices do not fall unduly.

May I now refer to a certain clause in the speech from the throne relating to agricultural matters and primary industries.

> The maintenance of long-term markets for our primary industries is receiving close attention. The continuing need for foodstuffs, both at home and abroad, will ensure, for some time to come, a heavy demand for the products of our farms and fisheries.

That clause lays stress upon the value of the export market and upon the value of the home market; they are both important to the farmer. I would say however that, if anything, the home market is even more important than the foreign market particularly in eastern Canada. For a great many years, up to a short time ago, nearly ninety per cent of everything the farmer produced in Canada was consumed in Canada in one way or another. The exception to that rule was wheat, and the percentage in the case of western wheat was a good deal larger. However, during the war there were certain classes of farm products that were produced in greater quantities, and we were glad to be able to export them in greater quantities.

The minister brought down a correction of the figures he placed on Hansard the other day when he was speaking. I have taken those figures that were put on Hansard and have made a computation, and I find that for the past eight years, 1938-1945, we have exported about thirty-three per cent of our pork and about twelve per cent of our beef. If I am correctly informed, and I read the question which the leader of the C.C.F. party asked the minister, that included meat sent overseas to feed the troops while there. If those troops come back they will have to be fed here and it will mean that a smaller percentage of our total production will be sent overseas. In addition the minister tried to prove to us, and I believe he convinced us, that if we did not have greater grain production in the near future our production figures in cattle and hogs and other live stocks would go down and go down very rapidly.

Every one will agree, I think, that these years have been years of high production during the war. Taken altogether, production of grains in Canada and everything else on the farm has been much higher than it was prior to that time. We have had bumper crops, and those crops have helped us to maintain the supplies we so much needed. There is one thing I would suggest to the government in passing, and that is that we should if possible try to retain our British market for bacon. It is one of the best we have. If we receive a fair price for our production of bacon, it is one of the most profitable lines the farmer in Canada can follow.

When the Minister of Agriculture was speaking the other day he took credit for establishing floors by means of contracts which he had negotiated with Great Britain, and he claimed, and I think rightly, that the prices set by those contracts set the floor price of farm products in Canada, at least of bacon and beef and perhaps cheese. I would point this out, however. Those contracts were negotiated in a seller's market. The desperate need which Britain had for foodstuffs enabled the government during the difficult times when those contracts were negotiated to get better prices than they might otherwise have obtained. That is one reason why I am afraid of the announcement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

What is the effect of that announcement, in reality, particularly as to certain markets we have? I think the effect of that announcement has been to serve notice on our customers abroad that the government of this country has embarked on a policy of deflation of farm prices. I do not think we can draw any other conclusion than that, and the result will be, I am afraid, that instead of being able to negotiate contracts in a seller's market in the future we shall have to bargain in a customer's market where the customers in different countries will be able to dictate the prices we can obtain for different classes of goods.

It is undoubtedly true, and no one will deny it, that low export prices means low domestic prices. I can recall in a good many instances in days gone by, and not so long ago either, that in certain classes of farm products we had only a surplus of five or ten per cent, and the small price we had to take for the exportable surplus had a direct bearing on the domestic price. That is not as it should be.

The next thing I would point out is this. After all, primary production is the greatest factor in creating buying power in Canada. There are four broad branches of primary production in Canada: farming, mining, fishing and lumbering. Of these I do not think anyone will deny that agriculture is the most important. It is the most important from the point of view of financial returns, and it is most important from the point of view of population. From 28 to 30 per cent of the population of Canada are farmers, but in addition to that there is a large body of people who are engaged in collecting, transporting, processing and marketing our farm products. If you take all these together it is safe to say that they form the largest consuming group in Canada. As such if the farmers of Canada are prosperous and can buy, then other classes in the community will be prosperous, because the farmers will consume to the extent of their ability and income.

I suggest therefore that the first objective of any government should be at this time to fix parity prices. There has been some discussion in the house as to what the term "parity prices" means. I do not intend to give any scientific explanation of the matter. I think a simple sentence will outline what parity really is. It is a fair relationship between farm prices and the prices of goods and services which the farmer has to buy. That is simple enough. Moreover, if the farmer is given a fair price he will produce. There is no doubt about that. He will produce to the limit of his ability. The thing he needs and the thing he should have is this. He should know that he will get a fair price, and that as time goes on, between the time he makes his plans and the time he gets his goods on the market, there is not going to be such a slump that he will be unable to carry on.

I think we all agree at the present time that farmers are enjoying a fair share of prosperity, or at least partial prosperity. The hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Townley-Smith) gave a reason or two for that. The first is that undoubtedly during the war, prices have gone up. Whether the government is going to take credit for that, or whether it is due to something over which nobody in this country has any particular control, I shall leave it to parliament itself to judge. But I do say that even with the prices that prevail, the farmer has not yet had a fair share of the national income. That is true because after price ceilings were set up the government found it was impossible for the farmers to carry on in that way, and they introduced a system of subsidies on different kinds of farm products. I think that in the year 1944 those subsidies amounted to over a hundred million dollars.

Mr. GARDINER: That is just the direct subsidies.

Mr. SENN: Yes; there were others as well. Some were paid by the Department of Agriculture and some by the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, and perhaps some in some other ways as well. I have not yet been able to find out where the division lies, and I should like to have that information. What lines of subsidies are being paid by the Department of Agriculture, and why, and what lines are being paid by the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation?

Mr. GARDINER: Would the hon. member like an answer now? It would take only a minute. The division is that wherever it is intended to increase production it is done in our department; wherever it is intended to cut down the cost of consumption, it is done in the other department.

Mr. SENN: I thank the minister for the explanation, but it seems to me in some cases both principles would apply. Perhaps the division has been made in a way that is suitable to the Minister of Agriculture, if not to both ministers.

The second reason why farmers have enjoyed a modicum of prosperity was outlined by the hon. member who preceded me, namely, that the farmers are finding it impossible to make the necessary repairs on their farms. If one drives through Ontario to-day—I cannot say anything about the other provinces, I do not doubt but that the same conditions prevail—one can see a woeful lack of good buildings and repairs. Because of labour shortages, and because they cannot get materials, farmers have been unable to keep their buildings, fences and machinery in proper repair. They are hoping, now that the war is over, the condition will be changed and they will be able to get more labour and materials. There is only one other thing that they need in the years following the war, namely, an income that will enable them to pay for labour and supplies.

Price ceilings were inaugurated three or four years ago. As I understand it, two main reasons were given for that step. The first was to prevent inflation. I do not think anybody will disagree with that. The second was to avoid disastrous slumps and deflation after the war. Something was said at the time about the deflation and the slump in prices that took place after the first great war. That slump did not occur until two or three years after the war was over. There is no doubt that unless something is done there will be a slump again. The government had evidently forecast that by their announcement on the price of wheat. There is no doubt in my mind at least that if floor prices are to be placed under other classes of farm products on the same basis, using the wheat price as a measuring-stick, the prices that the farmers are to receive for their live stock, dairy products, fruit and vegetables, and all down the line, will not be sufficient to establish a fair relationship between their prices and the prices of goods they have to buy.

May I summarize what I have to say in two or three sentences? The announcement of the government of a floor price for wheat indicates that the government has already embarked on a policy of deflation of farm prices, the policy of lowering prices for agricultural products. It admits that it is powerless to maintain farm prices in the future at levels which will enable agriculture to buy freely and to make the repairs which are so necessary and which have been so long delayed. It also admits that the imposition of price ceilings on agricultural products in the past cannot succeed in preventing deflation of farm prices under peace-time conditions. It further admits that it cannot set prices that will assure the farmer of fair and stable returns and a stable price structure.

I am supporting the amendment which was moved by the hon. member for Souris, because I believe that one situation should be avoided at all costs; unemployment must not be allowed to become general again if it can be avoided. If it is not to be allowed, goods of all kinds must be produced and a market must be found for them at fair prices. The surest way to accomplish this is to maintain the buying power of the primary producer, the farmer, the miner and the fisherman, at substantial levels. To do this I firmly believe that the government must reverse its present policy of deflation as indicated in the statement that the minister made on September 19.

Mr. F. S. ZAPLITNY (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I would not be rising to speak again in this debate had it not been for the introduction of the new amendment and subamendment, and another matter which came up in the house in the last few days. Before speaking to the amendment and the subamendment, I should like to refer to the other matter, which has to do with displaced and stateless persons in Europe.

I wish to associate myself with the remarks of the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Hlynka) and the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) in that regard. There are two points that stand out above all the others and I should like to emphasize them while I have the opportunity in this debate. I might say in passing that both these hon. members made a very good case for what they were talking about, and I wish to take this opportunity to congratulate the hon. member for Rosthern on the promotion he has received, as announced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to-day. I want to say all the complimentary things I can about the hon. member for Rosthern, because later on I may have something different to say.

The two points I should like to bring out are these. First, it appears evident that a great number of people are scattered throughout Europe who find themselves classified as displaced or stateless. That is, they are being shuffled around from one country to another, and there seems to be some evidence that there is a move afoot to repatriate them forcibly. Now, I believe, and I think hon. members will agree with me on this, that one of the great principles of the Atlantic charter was freedom of choice, or self-determination. In that connection I should like to read article III of the Atlantic charter.

Third, they—

That is, Mr. Churchill and the Late President Roosevelt.

—respect the right of all peoples to choose the form of government under which they will live; and they wish to see sovereign rights and self-government restored to those who have been forcibly deprived of them.

That is a principle I believe we and all freedom-loving, democratically-minded people can support, and on this basis I make my appeal. I believe the present government, in every way possible, should make its influence felt on behalf of these people, so that they will have freedom of choice and a certain amount of self-determination. I realize that there are difficulties to be overcome; the task is not easy, but on the other hand I believe we should avoid the use of steam-roller tactics in dealing with human beings. Regardless of the country from which they came originally, these are human beings. We know there are people in Europe who for one reason or another do not wish to return to where they lived before the war. I do not want to go into the political implications, because this is not the place for that, but I do want to bring out the humanitarian angle and the fact that if we are to follow the spirit as well as the letter of the Atlantic charter it will be necessary for us to throw our influence on the side of freedom of choice.

The other point I want to bring out in that connection is the fact that a request, of which I am sure hon. members have received copies, has been made by various Ukrainian organizations across Canada for permission to send direct assistance to their relatives and friends in Europe. I know from personal experience that people who have relatives across the water, whether on the continent or the British isles, are very anxious about their welfare. As an example I should like to remind you of the effort organized by the Kinsmen's clubs during the war to send milk to Britain. For this purpose they established a fund, to which many people cheerfully donated. This milk was used to supplement the assistance being sent through regular channels such as the Red Cross, UNRRA and so on. In this country we have approximately 300,000 people of Ukrainian origin, practically all of whom have relatives living on the continent of Europe. Though I am Canadian born I too have relatives across the water, and I am sure hon. members will appreciate our motives when we ask for permission to send direct assistance to our relatives or those with whom we are acquainted, whose situation we understand, in order to supplement the assistance being provided through regular channels. The request is not made because we have no confidence in UNRRA or the Red Cross; it is only because we feel that in a direct personal way we can assist these bodies which are doing such great work. I hope when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) makes his visit to Europe he will take full advantage of the opportunity to find out everything he can in regard to these displaced persons, so that when he returns the government will be in a position to make some comprehensive statement of policy to guide this house in any future action we may take in that respect.

I should like now to refer for a few moments—and I am going to be brief, because I realize that this debate has gone on for a long time—to the amendment and the sub-amendment. We are asked by the Progressive Conservative group to accept an amendment asking for ninety per cent of parity.

An hon. MEMBER: At least.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I accept that correction; at least ninety per cent. Listening yesterday to the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) speaking to this amendment, I was impressed by the very good case he made, particularly when I realized what a poor case he started with. I rather admired the hon.

member's ability; and what I say about his case is not in any way disparaging to his effort. But he got himself into a curious position. In the first half of his speech he dealt with the removal of controls. He was pretty vehement and decisive about it, and expressed his determination that controls should be removed as quickly and to as great an extent as possible. Then, lo and behold, in the second half of his speech he asked us to accept the principle of parity prices, or at least ninety per cent of parity, which as everyone realizes would entail a great deal of price control. How are we going to remove controls on the one hand and impose or retain controls on the other? At the moment I do not quite see how this can be done. Perhaps at some future time we will have an explanation of that position.

Another question which to my surprise was not dealt with by hon. members to my right in speaking to the amendment is their position on the matter of the grain exchange. As was pointed out by my colleagues here, this question is important. We are definitely of the opinion, and have so stated repeatedly, that our wheat should be handled through the wheat board; we do not want the grain exchange to get its fingers into the pie again. On this point, however, we have not heard an expression of opinion from those to my right. When a group ask the house to vote for an amendment, in effect they ask us to endorse their stand on a certain question. Until we know what that stand is, it seems a risky matter to vote for it. I hope before the vote is taken they will take advantage of this opportunity to tell us just where they stand on the question of the grain exchange.

Another curious thing developed in connection with the amendment, and I should like to bring it to the attention of the house. After the hon. member for Souris, who incidentally is from the same province as myself, introduced his amendment, he was challenged by my colleague the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) as to who had drawn up the amendment. In other words he was asked whose work it was, whose amendment it was. In the interchange that took place the hon. member for Souris replied, if I remember his words correctly, that not one of the members from the Toronto area had even seen the amendment before it was presented in the house.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That was the accusation made by your colleague, that they had probably drafted it.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: That is quite right, and I am not quarrelling with the hon. member's statement. I am merely drawing attention to where that leads us. The fact that in the group to my right there is a fairly heavy representation from Toronto and district, and that none of them as much as saw the amendment before it was introduced in the house, brings up another question. Are they in favour of it? Whose amendment is it? Is the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) in favour of it? He has not said so.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): You will find out.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I hope so. We are asking these questions because we want to know. It is not enough for one member of a group to move an amendment and say in effect, "This is my amendment. The other members had nothing to do with it." We expect a certain amount of team-play in the official opposition.

I should like to refer also to what was said yesterday by the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker). It is unfortunate that after the hon. member laboured so hard and so long yesterday to convince the house that this matter of parity prices is now the law of the land, even going to the extent of quoting the statute, to-day the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) should stick a pin into the balloon and explode it by telling us that this statute does not take effect for some time. However, I take it that it is the intention of the government to make it the law of the land at the first opportunity, and I would commend it to all lawabiding members here. If it is going to be the law of the land, we want to put ourselves on the right side of the law, and vote for the subamendment. That is the only way that we can actually put the principle of parity prices into practice. We understand that most hon. members believe in the principle of parity prices, but that is not enough. Our subamendment puts the matter directly to the house and asks: Are you willing to vote to put that principle into practice? It will be necessary for every hon. member, without hesitation, to place himself on record as to whether he is for or against putting parity prices into practice.

I am glad this opportunity has presented itself to get this matter squarely before the house. I believe the composition of the house is fortunate in this respect, because we are in a better position to do it to-day than we were at the time of the last parliament. I believe hon. members to my left will vote for our subamendment. The only objection I have heard raised from that quarter was as to the difficulty which might be involved in figuring out what one hundred per cent parity would be, and that therefore ninety per cent would perhaps be more logical. But I would point out that unless one knows what parity is in the first place, he cannot take ninety per cent of it. So if they agree to vote for ninety per cent of it, I am sure they will support the subamendment.

This is one time when a subamendment can be supported by all hon. members without question. It is not only a matter of political opinion, it is something which the people of western Canada are watching with great interest. The people in Manitoba, where an election is about to take place, are going to watch very carefully the results of this recorded vote, because, by and large, it is an agricultural province. I am given to understand that the hon. member for Souris has just returned from his home province. Probably he has sounded out political feelings out there, and has decided that it is necessary to take some stand on the wheat question before this debate is permitted to fold up.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Apparently the hon. member has not read Hansard for the last five sessions. If he had, he would have seen my complaints each year.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: If he has taken that stand consistently, I congratulate him upon it. But I must point out that in Manitoba there has taken place a fusion—perhaps confusion is a better word—of the two old parties; and it is therefore somewhat incongruous to find that while here in Ottawa they evidently disagree on everything that comes up, as they go further west they find it possible to engage in an uneasy marriage. If they ever come to the point where they have to dissolve that marriage, I hope they will not bring their divorce bill before this house.

When I began speaking I promised I would not take much time, and I shall live up to my promise. In all sincerity I hope hon. members who have the welfare of farmers at heart will vote for the subamendment as a matter of principle.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member (Mr. Zaplitny) who has just taken his seat has discussed one or two points to which I shall address myself. I am glad to have this opportunity to make an answer, and also to clear up what was said yesterday by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) when he misinterpreted and misquoted our amendment.

Mr. WRIGHT: I read the amendment; I did not interpret it at all.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I shall quote what the hon. member said. When I was at cross purposes with him yesterday, this is what he said:

Let me read the words of the actual amendment. This is what it says:

The hon. member deliberately left out the first four lines of the amendment, and then continued with this part of it:

Immediate consideration should be given to establishing for a period of years floor prices for all basic agricultural products at levels not less than ninety per cent of parity.

As I have said, he left out four lines of the amendment.

Mr. KNOWLES: He read the part that counts.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That part which he left out is as follows:

We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that, pending the establishment of a more stable and equitable price structure for Canadian farm products based on parity of income for farmers—

That is the portion he neglected to read. Then he went on to read this:

—immediate consideration should be given to establishing for a period of years floor prices for all basic agricultural products at levels not less than ninety per cent of parity.

I do not know that the hon. member wanted to do it. However, he certainly misrepresented my amendment and my position, and I think it must have been done deliberately—because he is a pretty able member.

As he said yesterday, we have sat on many committees together, and I have always thought he was one member of the C.C.F. group who would be above that sort of thing; at least, I did, until this time.

Mr. COLDWELL: Will the hon. member explain what the difference is? I should like to know, because I cannot see it.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I should also like to know when the great change of heart came over the hon. member for Melfort. Apparently it took place between the time he spoke earlier in the debate, namely, on September 20, and the occasion of his moving the subamendment yesterday. It is strange that in his remarks of September 20, around a week ago, he asked the government to continue for five years at a floor price of $1.25, and pointed out that that would be fair remuneration to the farmers for their labour and cost of production. Apparently he was satisfied, and his words, to be found at page 330 of Hansard, may be read by hon. members who have an interest. Probably the hon. member will be able to make an explanation some time as to why this change came over him.

Mr. COLDWELL: Let me understand the hon. member; he has accused the hon. member for Melfort of making a deliberate misrepresentation.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is up to the hon. member for Melfort to say so.

Mr. COLDWELL: And now the hon. member for Souris says that the hon. member for Melfort may explain at some other time. He has a right to explain now, if he wishes.

Mr. ROWE: No, he has not.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The words are to be found in Hansard.

Mr. GRAYDON: The leader of the C.C.F. has no right to speak, and cannot claim protection. The hon. member for Melfort might do so—but not his leader.

Mr. COLDWELL: I suggest the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) should rise when he addresses the chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE: What is this—a dog fight?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I have been asked to quote the exact words. They are these, as reported at page 330 of Hansard:

> I believe that this government could have made agreements with those countries for a five-year period and at prices which would mean a better return to farmers than under this legislation. I am sure that $1.25 a bushel is the lowest floor price that should be set for wheat in Canada. That is a price which would give to the average producer a reasonable return for his labour and for the investment which he has in his farm and in his equipment.

Those are his own words.

Mr. WRIGHT: What is wrong with that?

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): I hope the hon. member for Souris will withdraw his statement in which he has accused the hon. member for Melfort of deliberate misrepresentation. That is not in order in debate.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I have quoted the exact words of the hon. member for Melfort on both occasions. However, I bow to Your Honour's ruling, and have no desire to say anything discourteous. I did say that I thought he, of all members, would be above doing that.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): But the hon. member has charged the hon. member for Melfort with deliberately misrepresenting something. That should be withdrawn.

Mr. WRIGHT: I do not see where the quotation the hon. member for Souris has read discloses any misrepresentation at all.

[Mr. J. A. Ross.]

My statement is quite clear. I was not satisfied with the floor price of $1 a bushel and suggested that $1.25 was a much fairer floor price.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I have a lot of confidence in the ability of the hon. member, and withdraw the word "deliberately". I thought he was a fairly able member, and I have pointed out the misrepresentation as it appears in those two speeches.

An hon. MEMBER: Pretty badly balled up.

Mr. KNOWLES: Back up and start over again.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Several hon. members in the group to my left have said that they do not understand what parity is, and how the mechanics of it might operate.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Who does?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): In view of some of the statements made by the hon. member who has just taken his seat, before I can vote conscientiously for the subamendment either he or his leader will have to explain to me how under the wheat board, which they suggest should be continued, they could pay the producer at point of delivery 100 per cent of parity, operate for that crop year, export wheat to every country in the world, sell wheat to millers for domestic purposes, with all the ramifications found in connection with the wheat board, and wind up at the end of the year with the same figure as they paid the producer at the point of delivery. Can they explain what is meant by 100 per cent parity to-day? I have no faith that they can do so. I pointed out in moving my amendment that we urged a floor price of ninety per cent parity as a result of our studies in the country to the south of us, where they have made a very good job of handling the situation by giving their producers during the post-war years a guarantee of ninety per cent parity, and netted to producers thirty to fifty per cent more for their products.

We hear so much theory from the group to my left. One of them asks: If you had 100 per cent parity paid to the producer, where would the money come from? Where does the money come from to pay on the participation certificate?

As to the suggestion that my amendment was drafted by the Toronto members, let me say that we are certainly all agreed in principle, and I think the hon. member's innuendo was unbecoming. Let me tell him that I have far more faith in the Toronto members, the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris), the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol)—

Mr. MacINNIS: And all points west.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I have more faith in all the Toronto members being desirous of helping the producers to procure parity than I have in the group to my left. Let me tell them that this terrible Tory government at Toronto which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) spoke of as being one of the few left in the world to-day did more for humanity in its first year of office than the socialistic Saskatchewan government have done in one year and a half. I know how much concerned I was during the drought years to see that the children of Manitoba should have a chance to get primary education. I felt that the province, or the state should assume more responsibility in that respect, and I am glad to say that the so-called Tory government at Toronto in their first year in office undertook to pay fifty per cent of all the costs of education in the province of Ontario and they have carried that out. Contrast that with the false promises of the premier of Saskatchewan. He promised to abolish the educational tax of two per cent on the cost of living and production, but that tax has not been abolished. They have actually added in taxation to the cost of living and the cost of production in that province, and so I ask hon. members in which party they would put their faith. Until somebody can tell us how the mechanics of this thing can be worked out—

Mr. KNOWLES: Where do you stand on the grain exchange.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): My hon. friend was a member of the last parliament, and he is not so dumb either. In the last parliament the then hon. member for Qu'Appelle, Mr. Perley, and myself moved a resolution asking that the Winnipeg grain exchange be closed. That was before the government had taken action. By the way, let me say that some of my finest friends personally are members of the Winnipeg grain exchange.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is in my constituency.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Then the hon. member had better be careful. My hon. friend made the statement in the house the other day that the ramifications of the Winnipeg grain exchange had been investigated by royal commissions, and they always gave the grain exchange a clean bill of health in the handling of the wheat of this country. When the Turgeon grain commission made its investigation it reported that in its opinion the exchange could render no useful service during wartime.

I did want to clear up some of this misunderstanding, misinterpretation and misquotation on the part of certain hon. members. I do not see why there should be any misunderstanding, for the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch), who is a very able farmer, apparently understood what I meant by a floor price of ninety per cent parity, as hon. members will see if they will re-read his speech. Surely hon. members who professed not to know what parity meant would not be doing that just for political expediency! But several members, including the hon. member who has just sat down, have said that they did not know what parity was, or what the figures were. There was hardly a session of the last parliament when I did not have a run-in with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) over getting parity prices for agriculture. The government took the period 1926-1929—

Mr. GARDINER: We did not take that. The farm federation took it.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I am not talking about the farm federation or about agriculture at this moment. I was going on to say that the period 1926-1929 was taken by the government as a basis for industry and organized labour, and therefore I argued that probably the same thing should be done for agriculture. If that were done, the parity price of wheat would be $1.42 a bushel, and ninety per cent of that would be $1.28 a bushel, which is three cents above the price which the hon. member for Melfort asked for on September 20, five days before he moved his subamendment.

As I pointed out the other day, the cost of living and the cost of production have risen probably twenty per cent during the war. Certainly that is true of the farmer's cost of living and the cost of his implements. So, that, if we add twenty per cent to that figure of $1.42, we get $1.70 a bushel, and ninety per cent of that would be $1.53. Therefore, if you take the same period as was taken for industry and organized labour, ninety per cent of parity either then or now would mean a higher price than the hon. member for Melfort asked for in his speech on September 20.

I have never in my life made any rash promises in either municipal or political affairs in order to gain office. I have never promised anything that I did not believe I could conscientiously carry out if elected to office, and unless the members to my left who have moved the subamendment have some idea how it could be put into force if carried, I think it should be withdrawn. I have given a great deal of study to this question over the past few years, and I will be bold enough to say that there is a lot about it that I do not know. But I do know what is practical in this country and in the United States, and it is because the subamendment that has been moved by my hon. friends to my left is not practical that I ask the house to vote against it and to vote for the amendment which I have moved, which is practical, and which will guarantee to the farmers ninety per cent of parity at point of delivery, and we will hope for the other ten per cent after the year's operation. I think I have cleared up the various points that have arisen in the debate, and again I appeal to every member of the house to vote for something practical and workable by voting for my amendment. Then we shall have a better understanding of the mechanics of this thing after a year of operation.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take part in this debate, and I do not now propose to participate in any discussion of these amendments or the technical means whereby, if passed, they may be put into operation. I rise to bring to the house another thought. Personally I have no particular objections to either of the amendments, because I believe each of them aims at an objective which, in general terms, is a square deal for the farmer with respect to the prices of his products. But what I wish to say is this. Our Conservative friends, through the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross), proposed an amendment. I am not going to read it, but it was presented on the basis of an announcement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon). When the hon. member moved his amendment I said to myself, that amendment is reasonable; it is safe; it is sane; it attempts to attain a certain objective and I regard it as desirable. But I find there is one group in the house that evidently does not agree with me on that, for they suddenly decide to go one better than the first amendment, with the result that the house has been subjected to a discussion and drawn into a sort of political race whereby one political party is trying to outbid another.

We heard the announcement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) this afternoon; we know that we are living in serious times. Personally I do not think that at the present time it graces this house to make motions or amendments which have a lot of political significance to them. Perhaps my friends will not agree with that view, but I have the floor and I am expressing my opinion.

I cannot see anything wrong with the amendment moved by the hon. member for Souris. He is not saying that the farmers should not get 100 per cent parity; he is simply asserting that there should be floor prices for all basic agricultural products at levels not less than ninety per cent of parity. They may go higher, and he is not saying that they should not. So that to my view the amendment is most reasonable. Turning over in my mind the reason for this going-one-better stunt, I am reminded that an election is being fought in the province of Manitoba.

Mr. MacKINNON: When?

Mr. HANSELL: It is being fought right now. Some hon. members are out there, campaigning, and I am just wondering whether this second amendment is not an attempt to initiate, here in this house, the Manitoba provincial election.

Mr. BURTON: Why, then, not ascribe the same purpose to the previous amendment?

Mr. HANSELL: Well, maybe you can. I am not suggesting that both parties have not the right to move amendments; certainly they have. What I am saying is this, is the first amendment a reasonable one? Is it aimed to reach a certain objective? Is anybody going to complain if in the process the objective is reached or the farmer gets even more than the proposed amendment claims for him? All I am saying is that the amendment is reasonable, and I think the house, particularly the opposition, would be in a much stronger position to persuade the government to act along this line if they had looked at the matter on the basis of its value and its objective. Surely there is not a single member in this house who will contend that the farmer should get one cent less than is coming to him, for that is only reasonable; it is only common sense. Surely my Conservative friends are not putting on an amendment which expresses the view that they want the farmer to get only so much and no more. No man with any common sense would do such a thing. My plea is simply that if we want to bring influence to bear on the government let us get together on something which is practicable and desirable instead of splitting forces. The hon. member for Souris has said, why all this confusion? Apparently it is because it is desired to embark on a little political huffing at one another instead of getting down to practical terms. He has said, let us get down to practical things. Well, we will, when we leave politics out of the picture. But just as soon as you bring political sparring into the picture you can throw practical things out of the window.

Mr. WRIGHT: Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege, the hon. member is imputing motives and so, I think, is out of order, and I would ask you to have him withdraw those imputations.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. WRIGHT: He stated that the purpose of our amendment is political.

An hon. MEMBER: It is true.

Mr. WRIGHT: The introduction of the amendment was simply to obtain a square deal for agriculture in this country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. WRIGHT: Mr. Speaker, I ask for your ruling on this matter.

An hon. MEMBER: No ruling is necessary.

Mr. SPEAKER: I should like to hear what the hon. member has to say before I give any ruling.

Mr. HANSELL: I am only appealing for a process of debate and of conduct in this house which will be free from political significance.

Mr. MacINNIS: Oh, such hypocrisy!

Mr. HANSELL: Does my hon. friend want to say something else?

Mr. MacINNIS: I say, switch off the hypocrisy.

Mr. HANSELL: Mr. Speaker, I am imputing no motives. I do not desire to impute any motives, but my hon. friends cannot possibly stop me from thinking what I think, and then I proceed to think out loud. It will be an interesting thing if a man cannot think out loud.

Mr. BURTON: It is, when you proceed to impute motives that are not there.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Speaker, on this point of order, may I call attention to citation 297 in the second edition of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms which reads:

The imputation of bad motives—

An hon. MEMBER: This is not a bad motive.

Mr. KNOWLES: I expected that some hon. members would derive some amusement from this. However, to go on:

The imputation of bad motives, or motives different from those acknowledged—

And so on. All such imputations call for prompt interference; in other words, they call for protection from Your Honour the Speaker. I submit that for the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) to say that either the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) or the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) has introduced an amendment or a subamendment from motives other than those acknowledged by the hon. members themselves, who introduced such motions, is against the rules of the house.

Mr. POULIOT: Speaking to the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I submit that if we are to interpret that rule strictly one must be a mind-reader to know what are the motives of the other fellow. Moreover, it is a very common thing during campaigns to try to promote politics; that is the reason for all campaign speeches. I do not understand how any member of parliament who has been campaigning politically to win his seat on political grounds can unclothe the old man when he gets into the house and become a new man and then consider that politics is a shame, and that it is a shame to talk politics. What does "politics" mean, Mr. Speaker? It has been defined by Aristotle, a famous Greek, who wrote a learned treatise on the subject. He told us that politics was the science of government; and in speaking as he did, the hon. member for Macleod, if he attributed any motive to the hon. gentlemen who moved the motion, insinuated that the mover and the seconder were both imbued with the science of government, which is politics. I cannot understand, therefore, how the mover could complain. It is a great tribute that has been paid him. It is a tribute to his shrewdness and he should not be ashamed of it. He may be ashamed of certain things in his party, but it so seldom happens in the C.C.F. party that members are imbued with the science of government that when the thing is said, especially by a member of the Social Credit or New Democracy party, it has more value. For all those reasons, sir, I believe it is permissible in debate and I hope you will rule accordingly.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does any other hon. member wish to speak to the point of order?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: From what has been said in the house, I do not think that the expression "political sparring" should be ruled out of order. It has been used on different occasions in the house. However, I would suggest that it is the privilege of the hon. member who has used these words to modify them with a view to pleasing the hon. member who has raised the point of order.

Mr. HANSELL: I am always willing to withdraw anything that is offensive. I have never refused to withdraw anything which the Speaker has ruled that I should withdraw and I am sorry if I have hurt the feelings of my hon. friends. But, you know, sir, there is no question about it that people are watching this parliament these days and are beginning to say that in this session parties are commencing to jockey for position. That is already being said in this country. Well, let us nail that lie to the wall, if it is a lie. I simply wish to say that I believe the hon. member for Souris and his advisers around him thought their amendment through. The sincerity with which he spoke and presented his amendment indicated that he was really attempting to give the farmer a square deal. I am not going to imply by that that my C.C.F. friends do not want to give the farmers a square deal. Of course they do. I would be a fool to stand here and say that they did not and I am not saying that. But I am saying that in principle I cannot see any difference between the two amendments.

An hon. MEMBER: Ten per cent.

Mr. HANSELL: No, there is not ten per cent because we have mention of a floor price and it can go higher than that. Therefore I think it is splitting hairs, to say the least, and it tends toward dividing us when we should be united. We in this group have to vote for one amendment or the other, or both. I am going to vote for both, as far as I am concerned. Another thing, when we talk about politics, will any party guarantee that this very debate, these very amendments will not be brought into the discussion in the Manitoba election? Certainly not; they will not guarantee that. If there is any tiny little thread they can reach out for and grasp, making great political capital of it, believe me they will do so. That is politics.

Mr. POULIOT: In Manitoba and British Columbia now, but not in the house.

Mr. HANSELL: I have said enough, and I object to anything that may happen in this house at any time—I am not imputing motives now—whereby any parties try to gain political advantage by these processes. Times are serious; believe me they are. I do not agree very often with the Prime Minister, but I will agree that he has a tremendous burden upon his shoulders to-day. Let us therefore look at things in a practical manner and attempt to solve in a practical way the problems that face the country.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Just before the question is put I feel that I should say a word on the amendments now before the house. I promise, Mr. Speaker, that I shall not delay the house for more than a minute or two. Further I promise that I shall not follow at least one example already set in this debate, that of making a sneak attack on any hon. member or members who have already delivered a speech or made an interjection.

Yesterday the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright), speaking in support of the C.C.F. subamendment, attacked the Conservative amendment on the ground that it only guarantees ninety per cent, or calls for the guarantee of ninety per cent of the cost of production. I have looked over the hon. member's speech very carefully; I have read the amendment most carefully, and thus far I have been unable to find anywhere in the amendment or in the speech of the hon. member for Souris any reference to cost. The ninety per cent refers to parity of price, which includes profits of all corporations. Surely the hon. members of the C.C.F. are not going to argue that ninety per cent of parity, which includes all profits in addition to all costs, is less than 100 per cent of the cost of production. If they are, Mr. Speaker, then why are they constantly saying that profits are more than ten per cent? I contend that if the farmers get at least ninety per cent of parity, as called for in the Conservative amendment, they will receive thereby more than 100 per cent of the cost of production.

In neither amendment do I find so much as a hint of the procedure by which those moving the amendments would give effect to the policy which is advocated. Therefore it seems to me that both are straight resolutions of objectives, and objectives only, and I feel quite sure, that no one in any party in this house could conscientiously disagree with the idea of so ordering our Canadian affairs that farmers everywhere in Canada might be able to obtain their fair share of the national income. Of course, the Liberals and the Liberal government are in a different position from the rest of us. They have to worry about where the money is to come from. That is quite a considerable worry in the light of the many things that they have already committed themselves to do under all the restrictions of our present financial arrangement, and my sympathies are with them too.

Since we are considering a straight matter of objectives, and not methods, the Social Credit group find themselves in sympathy with the C.C.F. objectives. We also find ourselves favourable to the objective of the Conservatives, because they are the same in the end. If, on the other hand, the C.C.F. amendment proposes any more socialism than we now suffer in Canada, then this group could not possibly vote for it, but I fail to see that there is any such suggestion. If the Conservative amendment proposes to add to the already effective burden of debt and/or taxation, then the Social Credit group could not possibly vote for it. Whether any group in this house could ever do all that we want with respect to parity of income for the farmers depends upon what method or technique they intend to apply. In my judgment there is simply no possibility that either of the parties who have moved the subamendment and the amendment now before the house can accomplish this most worthy motive without using the procedure that Social Crediters on numerous occasions have so ably, and I would say, so comprehensively placed before this parliament in times past. In the circumstances the Social Credit group will vote for the subamendment. If that fails to carry, then we shall vote for the amendment. By so doing I want it definitely understood that we are taking two opportunities of indicating our unqualified support of the principle of parity of income for all Canadians.

Mr. JEAN FRANCOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I shall not speak at great length on this subamendment which reads as follows:

> We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that immediate consideration should be given to the establishing of floor prices for all basic agricultural products at parity with other services and products.

All this may be all right theoretically. I am not a statistician, and I am not a farmer, but I live among farmers and I know their troubles. I know that one of their troubles now, and perhaps the worst of all, is lack of man-power on the farms. That is the reason why they have less facilities for transportation and less facilities to cultivate the soil, to harvest, and so on. Therefore, the man-power problem is the most acute on the farm at the present time. I remember, sir, during the early days of the last parliament when a handful of hon. members defended the farmer. We tried to show the importance of the work of the farmer in the war effort. We were not numerous; we were just a small number of members of parliament, and we were looked upon as traitors. I myself was called a friend of Hitler by a Tory member just because I was defending the farmer and trying to rehabilitate him in the minds of our fellow citizens, trying to show that the farmer in cultivating his soil and working on his farm was doing his duty as a good Canadian citizen during the war. Moreover, I established clearly, as did other hon. members, that without the farmer the soldier would have gone nowhere. Well, sir, it is an elementary principle that cannot be denied by anyone. Now that we hear some speeches about leadership, my suggestion is that we should start by primary education.

Some hon. members remind me of those who know how to read by the euphonic method without knowing their alphabet. I know of a girl who works downstairs on the members' stenographic staff. She asked my stenographer where she could get the alphabet. She said: "I read well; I write well; I know my typewriter; I know shorthand, but I do not know the alphabet." It shows the way some people pretend to know so much when they know so little.

In peace time the farmer is praised; the farmer is the king of the land. Hon. members go to the parishes to address the farmers as kings. I am surprised that I did not hear anybody calling the farmer "Your Majesty", he would deserve it. I live among farmers, and I have the utmost respect for them. But how is it that all those hon. gentlemen who are so much interested in the welfare of the farmer did not vote with us when we were fighting the farmer's case? I give credit to some of the older members of the C.C.F. group, though not all of them. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wright) who moved the subamendment never supported us. We tried to show the importance to the war effort of the task being performed by the farmer. Some members of the C.C.F. group supported us, but he never did. Now that the war is over, however, again he becomes the greatest friend of the farmer. He was not a friend in need and therefore he was not a friend in deed.

Mr. WRIGHT: Can the hon. member make any quotation from any speech I made in this house during the last six sessions in which I did not support the farmers in every respect?

Mr. POULIOT: I know that, and I acknowledge it; but when it came to action, when it came time to vote to show that he was a real friend of the farmer, the hon. gentleman never did so. That is the point.

Mr. WRIGHT: On what occasion did I not vote in the way the hon. gentleman has just indicated? Just name one occasion.

Mr. POULIOT: I will do so right away. It was on the first motion I moved to exempt farmers from military service, which was seconded by my very dear friend Mr. Lizotte, then member for Kamouraska. That was in February, 1942; we can get the record.

Mr. WRIGHT: That was the way I voted, and I still agree with it.

Mr. POULIOT: Were we right or wrong?

Mr. WRIGHT: You were wrong.

Mr. POULIOT: Now my hon. friend proves that my statement was correct.

Mr. WRIGHT: And I can prove more than that.

Mr. POULIOT: My hon. friend had the floor; I have it now. I have established clearly that the handful of members who had the courage of their convictions, who were not afraid of insults and outrage, who sometimes rose and voted against the whole house, were the real friends of the farmer because they were suffering for the farmer. That is why I endured the insults that came from Dufferin-Simcoe, when I was called a buffoon and a clown just because I was trying to defend the farmer. I wanted that to stay on record in Hansard to show the humiliation we suffered at the hands of the Tories while defending the farmers. That is the record. The hon. member called me a clown; I called him a fascist, and I repeat it now. All the members of the Conservative party are not of the same mind. Some of them are good old Conservatives who think Queen Victoria is still alive and Edward is still Prince of Wales. They are happy. They probably do not know that automobiles have been built and that people may speak over the radio and be heard for long distances without any wires. They are happy; they belong to the old days. Then there are other Conservatives who belong to our age. They are not unpleasant fellows; they know we have automobiles; they know all about radios and the other new inventions, but they do not believe in them. They still belong to the old days. Then there are some Liberals like the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken). He may tell me that he is a Progressive Conservative. It may be so, but I do not believe in his conversion to Conservatism, because it came too late to be true. He is a likeable gentleman, but as I said before what I fear is the clutching hand which runs the good old Conservative party and makes it not only the Tory party but the party of fascists, and I will explain later what I mean. A fascist is a man who does not see the other fellow's point of view.

Mr. TUSTIN: You have crossed the floor many times.

Mr. POULIOT: My hon. friend is silent so much that he should give a chance to those who dare to speak. If he wants to say something, however, he is always interesting and I will listen to him with pleasure. I have described one of the elements of fascism; and for the benefit of an hon. member from British Columbia, a general who was not here during the last session, I will repeat what I said about fascists. A fascist is a man who substitutes his own will for the law of the land, who believes himself omnipotent and thinks he can run the whole show in the House of Commons. I will tell all marshals, all generals and all provost marshals that they are not so dangerous as they seem. Whether they come with wooden swords or steel blades they do not frighten me at all. I have been here for a long time, and if I feel like it I shall be here for a long time yet. No general will prevent me from coming here as long as my electors wish. I have known other generals who were very fine fellows. Some may be fine fellows, but why do they try to be so unpleasant?

As I have said, Mr. Speaker, I have defended the farmer, and other members have done the same. They have forfeited the crowning of legitimate ambitions by being true to their conscience, and they have the satisfaction of having done their duty. What did I do in those hard times? I will tell you what I personally did for twenty-three counties of Quebec. In the first place I tried to clean out the office of the mobilization board and the registrar's. The chairman of the board, a judge, had to go to Amos in Abitibi for three weeks each month for the sittings of the court. He was sent there by the chief justice, who was in Sir Robert Borden's government during the last war and who never forgave the Liberal who defeated him while he was a minister of the crown. This judge had a few days left each month to come to Quebec city to look over the files, which were piled high on his desk. I admit that he started to look honestly at the files, that he began to study them. Finally, however, after he had examined ten or twelve or perhaps twenty files, what happened? He said, "I have not time to look into them all. These boys must do their training." Many boys whose duty it was to remain on the farm were sent up for military training by that judge, who was replaced on my complaints. But in the meantime he was responsible for grave injustices to farmers' sons and other men who were working in essential industry.

There was another fellow oppointed at that place, because he was a creditor of the first registrar. Because the registrar could not pay this man, he said, "I will appoint you to a good job, and then you will give me some delay in paying my debts to you." This man was incompetent, he was dirty, and he was an abomination. Once I handled the case for three draftees who had been called before the court, and the case really developed into a trial of this man who, it happened, was in charge of the correspondence at the office of the registrar at Quebec city. In court I asked him if 50,000 letters had been put together in one of the lockers without being sorted or placed in the files of those concerned. He replied that there had not been 50,000. Then I asked him how many there had been, whether 25,000 or 30,000, and he said no; that it would be around 15,000.

We hear a good deal about deserters. I have in mind a young man who happened to be the son of a friend of mine. This boy had been operated upon for appendicitis and had not recovered, with the result that he was under the doctor's care. An affidavit was obtained from the doctor to the effect that this boy, when called, could not go to camp and could not report to the registrar or to any other camp authorities. This letter was sent to the registrar's office and, without being sorted, was put in the locker with the other 15,000 or 50,000. The police came to take that boy as a deserter, and I had to explain the case. The medical certificate was sworn to and the letter was registered but, because of the incompetency of this man, it was not on the file. Finally I had the clerk fired, but it took two years to do it And one must stop to think of the trouble to which those people were put during two years of time because this man had been left in charge of the correspondence.

Finally, there was the second registrar. The first one was not a bad fellow, and the second one was a man who had a light tenor voice about thirty years ago. Supposedly he was a barrister from the north, and had been selling mining shares. In addition he played a good game of bridge, in fact, that was his only qualification to be registrar of Quebec district.

Once I wrote him lodging a complaint about a ruling that had been made. This man pointed out to me that there could be no appeal from the board's ruling. I agreed with him that that was the regulation, but pointed out that on the other hand, when I give the board some new information which would indicate that due attention had not been given at first to a case, and that some details had been ignored, such case should be reconsidered. I told him that it was his duty to do so, and that it was only his laziness and idleness which prevented his doing so.

On this occasion I wrote General LaFleche, who was then deputy minister of national war services, pointing out that if the interpretation given to those regulations was the correct one, then all those who make the statement that the farmer had an important role to fulfil during the war were imposters and liars. The answer I received was that the registrar was wrong, that he was a newcomer who did not know his business, and that he had been told to reconsider cases when new points were involved.

I got rid of this man. Every time I complained to him he cried like a crocodile—but that is all he was doing. He was holding a position for which he was incompetent, with the result that other men had to suffer.

There were many times when the chairman of the board did not recognize the lumber industry as essential to the war effort. I have letters in which he told young farmers what their duty was, and always concluded by saying, "You do not know that a war is on." He was speaking like Lake Centre; he was speaking like Parkdale; he was speaking like Hastings-Peterborough—"You do not know that a war is on; you are not carrying out your war effort."

As I said on occasions during the last parliament, the members of the board were ignorant; they could not distinguish a calf from a stallion, and yet they were deciding everything because they were there. Farmers could expect no justice from them. And the judge was there stating, "I have two or three sons in the army. I do my duty; your duty is to enlist." And, mark you, for a judge that was exceptional.

He thought farmers were being granted a favour when they were given a postponement. He did not know that by virtue of the regulations it was their right, and that the farmers were justified in claiming that right to stay on the farm. But many of them were sent for training. Some of those boys have been called deserters, but the truth is that they should not have been called into the army at all. What was done? By getting rid of the chairman and the clerk—possibly a grade four—in charge of the correspondence in the offices of the registrar at Quebec city, and by getting rid of the second registrar, something was accomplished to help those twenty-three counties which constitute the district of Quebec over which that board had jurisdiction.

I turn now to the matter of amendments to the regulations. I give credit to all hon. members, but has any member of the C.C.F. group; has any member of the Social Credit group or has any member of the Progressive Conservative party—the Tory party—done anything to change the regulations so as to show the importance of the farmer's task?

It will be said, in the first place, that agriculture has been described in the mobilization regulations as a seasonal industry. I have had to write articles and memoranda, and take this matter up with the cabinet ministers and especially with my very dear friend, Mr. Lapointe. I brought this matter to the eyes of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) himself, and gained his ear in the matter. I said: "Is it not stupid to call agriculture a seasonal occupation when in my part of the country farmers work from dawn to dusk—and sometimes longer than that."

Now, sir, mark you this: Those regulations were drafted by a Quebec lawyer and a Toronto brigadier, who were reporting to an ex-minister—who is no longer in the cabinet, thank God. The purpose of those regulations was precisely to bring everyone into training. At first they disregarded completely the importance of farming, and of the work of other men who were engaged in essential industry.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker, before the dinner recess I was mentioning what was done to clear up the files at the office of the registrar and the mobilization board in Quebec city. But something else was done by other members of this house. Every time a vote was called for the defence of the rights of the farmers and for the defence of the rights of all those who were engaged in industrial labour, the number of these patriotic members who voted for the defence of those rights varied from five or six to forty or fifty; and most of those who voted for their defence were Liberals, except on a very few occasions.

But something else was done, and it was done by the member for Temiscouata, with the assistance, help, guidance, support and influence of the late minister of justice, the Right Hon. Mr. Lapointe. That is, I secured amendments to the mobilization regulations, which were called at first the national resources mobilization regulations—a very long name.

At the start the draftees were called up for one month, and they were told that they would have to serve for only one month. The postponement at that time was for four months only. When the period of training was extended to four months I succeeded in having the regulations amended to provide for a postponement of six months. Afterwards, when the four months training was extended to the duration of the war I succeeded in having the postponement extended according to pleasure, until further notice. That was something. Every time Colonel Ralston tried to turn the screw to make it tighter, I turned it to the other side to make it looser.

During the last election campaign I stated over the radio from powerful stations like CKAC, La Presse, Montreal, and other stations in Quebec city and elsewhere that I had succeeded in securing from the Liberal government recognition of the rights and privileges of the farmer by vindicating his honour, something I never could have secured from any other party or group, and the more so because the Prime Minister had had the skill and ability and finesse to discard his three former war ministers. I stated over the radio—and that broadcast was listened to throughout the province of Quebec—that I supported the Prime Minister inasmuch as he was willing to continue his cleaning of the Liberal party and get rid of all those of the same political tendencies. Here is what was done by a member of parliament, not only for the farmers of his constituency, not only for the farmers of the district of Quebec, not only for the farmers of the province of Quebec, but for all the farmers of Canada—for the farmers of the constituency of my hon. friend the member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) who has just moved his amendment, just as much as for the farmers of Hastings-Peterborough and other places whence came untrue and unworthy denunciations of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, I am from the province of Quebec. I am a French Canadian and I am proud of it. I will tell you that I have resented deeply the insinuations and the calumnies hurled against my province by some hon. gentlemen in this house. It was unworthy of them and unworthy of this chamber, and when I think of that going on all during the long years of the war I think also of how few stood up for the defence of the rights of the farmer. Only a handful—one handful, not two handfuls, although occasionally there were two handfuls, but that was all, and we did it because whatever might be the name of the political affiliation of those who did it we were liberal-minded. A Liberal is a man who is a lover of liberty, liberty not only for himself but for others also, and all those who defended the cause of the farmer, the cause of the labourer, the cause of the underdog did so because they were liberal at heart.

I had no political motive in defending the rights of the farmer. My idea was to defend the rights of those whom I have learned to respect since my very childhood. I remember my father's friends who came to our home to see him when I was just a little child and the respect that I was taught to have for them because they were those who fed us at all times. If it had not been for what we had done, despite the insults and humiliations that we have received from a small number of members, especially of the Tory party, and from the mover of the motion, who acknowledged the truth of my denunciation this afternoon, we would have had famine in this country, and my hon. friend the mover of this motion, who wants the farmer to sell his produce at a good price, would have starved because he would have been unable to get any help on his farm. He may thank the member for Temiscouata; he may thank the hon. member for Quebec West and South (Mr. Parent); he may thank the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier); he may thank the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Lalonde); he may thank the hon. member for Levis (Mr. Bourget); he may thank the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion) and the former member for Gaspe and others for the fact that he has some help on his land. If that help was not denied to him it was because of the efforts put forth by these Quebec members.

How can we hear talk about national unity when we hear some members say: I am of British descent; therefore I am for conscription. They put it as a racial issue. I do not put it as a racial issue. We put it as a national issue. We wanted to defend those whose work was essential not only to the civilian population but also to the army, and not only to the army but to the united nations. We did it fearlessly; we did it with perseverance. We did it courageously in spite of the insults that we were receiving from men like the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) and others who were always insulting us and defending the farmers only in words; but when it came to action they were slackers; they ran away; they had not the courage of their convictions, if they had any. That is the position.

I will tell you more, sir, if the house is willing to listen to me. I will tell you the story of the amnesty that was ready to be granted by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) and was refused by the former Minister of National War Services. I wonder if the house is ready to listen to it? I will tell you a chapter of Canadian history which is unwritten but which is true, and which hon. members should know in order to appreciate the motives that dictate the political actions of hon. members in this parliament. Injustices have been done to farmers by these whom I have denounced, and rightly so, this afternoon. I denounced them to the department. I notified them first—I always notify them—and when I saw that they were helpless I had to denounce them, first to the deputy minister in charge and then to the minister, and ask redress in so far as they could of the wrong that had been done by these incompetent people.

Of course, many farmers who should have been kept on farms were dragged to the camps because of the stupidity of these public servants and their misunderstanding of public duty in time of war. I came here to Ottawa. I went to the supreme court, which was housing rubbish in a building, the fine corner-stone of which was laid by Her Majesty the Queen. It did not serve for the supreme court, the highest court in Canada, but for garbage. On one of the floors I met General LaFleche, and I said to him, "What I ask of you is an amnesty for all farmers of Canada from October 15 till the new year of 1943 in order to give them the opportunity to come back, to explain their case, and to be treated as though they had not been called before." That was fair, because some farmers were in the forest at the time the first notices were sent to them and they did not receive them. Therefore at the office of the registrar they were treated as incorrigible, as delinquents. The only thing to do was to give them an opportunity to show their good will. I said further, "You should also put advertising in the daily and weekly papers of Canada and broadcast over the radio to inform all those who have not yet reported to the registrar, or who have not yet filed an application for postponement to do so immediately, or not later than the 2nd or 3rd of January, 1943. Then their cases can be examined anew, just as though they had not been called before, and justice can be rendered to all of them." The Minister of Labour was in favour of that, and I am most thankful to Mr. Paul Goulet, the chief of the Selective Service, a most able man, who deserves recognition. I stated the situation to him and he thought the suggestion was all right. What did General LaFleche say? He was about to be appointed a minister of the crown, and he was afraid of the repercussion upon himself of an amnesty to farmers throughout the country. He raised his arms and said, "What! This is a spark that would put the country on fire." I said, "You don't know your business. It is not true. It is not true at all. The farmers need an amnesty now. The lumberjacks who are working in national industry need an amnesty now. Why don't you give it to them?" "Oh," he said, "it is impossible; it is a spark that will put the country on fire." Then I left, and what I did was to go to Montreal with a very dear friend of mine who has done very well in this house, especially when he was over in that corner where there were some members who were broad-minded but unfortunately were in the army. He was in a nest of jingo imperialists, and it required quiet lot of courage for him to rise in his place in the house and vote according to his principles. I refer to Mr. L. P. Lizotte, K.C., then member for Kamouraska. He came with me to Montreal, and there we gathered the French speaking members of Montreal to discuss the situation with them and decide what we were to do about General LaFleche. We had the finest of candidates, a man who would have been elected very easily, a man who was known throughout Canada as a great and broad-minded Canadian, an able speaker and a famous lecturer, a man who now does very well for Canada outside this country by making it known very favourably. So we met together. I see, Mr. Speaker, that I am about to exhaust my forty minutes, but if it is the pleasure of the house I will continue what I have to say.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member will require the unanimous permission of the house. I must point out that he has already spoken for over forty minutes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Continue.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you, sir; and through you I convey my thanks to my colleagues. I want them to know the truth, and I want you to know, Mr. Speaker—well, you know it, but I want my hon. colleagues to know that we exhausted all means to settle the conscription question favourably. Nearly all the French speaking members for Montreal were with us at the Windsor hotel. We discussed the situation and we did not reach an agreement in the first place. Afterwards we met again. I have the authorization of the members whom I name to mention their names; I am not committing any indiscretion. We met the ex-minister of public works (Mr. Cardin), and we asked him if he was ready to fight LaFlèche. He said, "Yes, provided that there is unanimity among you." All were in agreement except one. Therefore the proposal fell to the ground. I could not fight the candidate as I would have liked to.

On the other hand, we prevented the conscription of women. You remember, sir, that in the summer of 1942 women were registered for conscription, and there were some by-elections. I was ready to fight LaFlèche in Outremont, a constituency which, after an interval of five years, is now represented so ably by a new member (Mr. Rinfret). The only thing to do was to secure some kind of protest from the province of Quebec. That is why, when I saw that my hon. friend the present member for Charlevoix-Saguenay was running there as an Independent I offered my help and went there to support him in his campaign; and it is because of the victory of the present member for Charlevoix-Saguenay on December 30, 1942, that women were not conscripted in this country. That is something which few members have done. Other hon. members—and I do not except you, Mr. Speaker—were willing to do something to prevent the conscription of women; but since there was no unanimity the reasonable condition mentioned by the ex-minister of public works could not be fulfilled, and therefore the course I took had to be adopted. That is something. It was not done in Ontario; It was not done in British Columbia; it was not done in any province other than Quebec; and if the women of Manitoba, British Columbia, Ontario and anywhere else have not been conscripted it is on account of the action of Quebec members. We have looked after the women of the whole country.

I see my hon. friend the colonel laughing now. I may tell him a lot about the way camps were kept in New Brunswick, but I will not do so to-night. Let me, however, say this to him. I know he is refractory to argument. I understand his state of mind, and I remember very well that during the last war the men, who did very well, were told that when they returned to Canada they would find a Garden of Eden here. They expected that, and they were told more than that. They were told that they were the only ones than won the war and they were to get this and that from the manufacturers, from the railway men and from everybody else. The Borden government had made them undue promises which it could not fulfil.

Mr. BROOKS: What about the promises that are made now?

Mr. POULIOT: I am not speaking of the men who are returning from this war. I am speaking of those who returned from the last war, one of whom was my hon. friend from New Brunswick.

Mr. BROOKS: He did not return from any war.

Mr. POULIOT: I expected that from the hon. gentleman. We have two gentlemen with Victoria Crosses here, one of whom received his decoration during this war from the hands of the king, and I congratulate him in the same manner as I congratulated Major Paul Triquet, of Temiscouata county, who earned a similar award so nobly on the field of battle. Let me say this to the hon. gentleman. This is an award that comes from the king for gallantry on the battle field, but it does not give anyone any degree of infallibility. It did not give any degree of infallibility to the general from the province of British Columbia who sits next to my hon. friend. Let me say this to the general, who has vanished. I do not know why he has gone, but he has vanished. At any rate, I will say this for his information. There is in this building the holder of a Victoria Cross who has been snubbed by the other Victora Cross holders, and that man is in a very humiliating position. He cleans spitoons in the basement of this building and for a time was the only Victoria Cross holder in the district of Kingston. Who looked after that man? Was it my hon. friend from New Brunswick, who sits here to argue politics all the time? The hon. gentleman may have done nobly on the battlefield but I regret that he does not do so in the house. He did not look after that V.C. Who brought that man before the committee, with his honours and decorations, in order to have him rehabilitated? Was it not the member for Temiscouata? Who mentioned him to General McNaughton during the secret sitting of the house if not the member for Temiscouata? Who asked you, Mr. Speaker, to improve that man's position? You know very well, sir, because you have given him an increase in salary pending the time when his case will have been settled. The member for Temiscouata did that. My hon. friend must remember that during the secret sitting it was not he; it was not any brass hat; it was not any general or any colonel or major or corporal, but plain Jean François Pouliot who asked for a remission on behalf of that young man who saved the lives of so many people when he removed the fuse from a bomb that would have exploded in forty-five seconds and wrecked St. Paul's Cathedral, London.

My hon. friend has a fine record; I do not deny that, and personally I think he is a very fine man, provided that he does not argue too much politics. But when it comes to politics, is it impossible to argue with him? I ask my hon. friend, would he not now be proud to have taken part in the defense of the two men whom I have mentioned? I ask him now, is he ready to go with me to the Speaker's room and cooperate with me in an effort to have that V.C. appointed as personal messenger? Is he ready to do so?

Mr. BROOKS: I have no influence with the government.

Mr. POULIOT: It is not a question of the government; it is a question of the honour of a soldier, and I ask him if he has enough courage to go with a civilian to ask for an improvement in the condition of that man.

Mr. BROOKS: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman is directing his remarks to me, but he has had the courtesy of the house in allowing him to extend the time of his speech and if he is going to use that time to abuse hon. members on this side I think that courtesy should be withdrawn.

Mr. POULIOT: That is enough for now. There will be a little more later on.

Mr. R. W. GLADSTONE (Wellington South): I think, Mr. Speaker, we should dispose of this debate so that the budget may be brought down in order to allow us to plan next year's business. I would urge now, therefore, an early winding up of this debate. I suggest that we get away from generalities and so much talking without legislation, and move on to the pressing matters of the country's business.

This debate commenced twenty days ago and 110 members have spoken. I wish to congratulate the new members on the high standard of their contributions to the debate.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, as a matter of record for readers of Hansard, that this debate arises through a motion to thank His Excellency the Governor General for the speech which he delivered on the opening of parliament on September 6. Amendments to the motion to adopt the address, if carried, would constitute a vote of no confidence in the government. I am sure it would not be the desire of the people of this country that such a situation should come to pass, for the result therefrom would be an appeal to the people in a new election. I am sure the people expect of their members of parliament; the people of every constituency expect of their member, the most earnest and faithful contribution to a solution of the pressing after-war problems that face this nation.

To the motion of thanks five amendments have been proposed. Three have been defeated and two are still before the house. I imagine it would be possible, going through the various departments, to frame five more amendments that would occupy another twenty days of debate. The procedure in the British parliament is that a few of the leaders speak on the motion to adopt the king's address and this occupies usually only two or three days. We have drifted into the practice of moving amendment after amendment, reaching the climax this year in the number of amendments and subamendments that have been proposed.

It is interesting in this connection to note the comments in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms. In the third edition, section 226, at page 95, we read as follows:

> It is a mistake to believe that the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne allows members to raise all kinds of issues on the mere ground that they relate to the general situation of the country. In the times of Sir John A. Macdonald and Hon. Alexander McKenzie, considerable restriction was placed on that debate. Speaking on the address in the session of 1875, Sir John A. Macdonald expressed the following opinion: "The practice of discussing the speech from the throne at great length and of raising endless isues upon it was simply an obstruction to business. It was his opinion that, unless the opposition were in a position to move a vote of want of confidence in the government, which he candidly confessed they were not in a position to do on this occasion, the address should be passed without delay."

Then farther on in the same section I read:

> Speaking again on the address in 1879, Sir John A. Macdonald said: "I am glad the opposition have adopted the English modern system —a very proper one—of passing the address without amendment, and when all the various subjects alluded to in it are dealt with, when the measures proposed are before the house, they and their details can be criticized with a full knowledge and satisfactory explanation with regard to the policy of the government."

I realize that hon. members may wish to take the earliest opportunity of bringing some particular problems before the house. However, it must be noted that such problems usually come up for consideration in some form of legislation, and then comes the opportunity for a detailed consideration and for reaching conclusions.

Mr. Speaker, along with others, I wish to congratulate you on your honoured position in this parliament. I give assurance of my cooperation at all times. Your authority goes beyond the membership on the floor to the thousands of visitors in the gallery during the session. We are always delighted to see so many young people in attendance showing their interest in the affairs of government. I should like to speak a word for the ladies who attend in such large numbers. There seems to be a regulation that the officers may admit only those with heads covered. Those who arrive without hats are refused admittance until they deck themselves with boy friend's scarf or hubby's pocket-handkerchief. Surely in these days of artistic coiffures, of modern beauty parlours, we can dispense with this senseless regulation.

The chief point of my remarks in this debate to-day is that just as new methods were employed during the war, which has just terminated, so should we endeavour in this parliament to find new methods of improving our procedure. The service people have been living in a new world; they have travelled across the country, across the prairies and through the mountains in tens of thousands. In hundreds of thousand they have crossed to Great Britain and the continent. They have visited the people of other lands. They have been in charge of and dependent upon machines of destruction devised by our best engineers and scientists. They have been living in a new world, and I am sure there is no person who has served in the forces but has come back with some new thought, new ambitions and new hope. From them, I imagine, come the hope and the prayer for the fulfilment of the prophecy of old, "I saw a new heaven and a new earth: for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away." While clinging to the old we ought also to be receptive to changes that will promote our efficiency. These times are a challenge to us to get as quickly as possible to essential things and not to waste time on generalities. There is much in this system that we should retain; perhaps there is some of it that should be discarded or improved in places. Private members have a greater responsibility than that simply of voting, and I think as the responsibility of private members is increased we may find a decrease in that much criticized bureaucracy of which we are hearing these days. Therefore I would urge the government to endeavour to utilize the service of private members to every possible degree.

For the benefit of hon. members who have come to this house for the first time I might state that during the session of 1944 a committee was set up to consider the possibility of amending and improving the standing orders of the House of Commons. This committee made a report, a copy of which I have in my hand. It came before parliament, and much time was given to debating the preamble which preceded the definite recommendations. There was so much tension about certain features of the preamble that the whole recommendation was talked out on that day and finally lost its place entirely.

What should have happened is that opportunity should have been given to hon. members to consider the definite amendments that were proposed in the report of the committee. To illustrate, I might quote the comment on standing order No. 37. Standing order 37 reads as follows:

No member except the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition, or a minister moving a government order and the member speaking in reply immediately after such minister, or a member making a motion of "no confidence" in the government and a minister replying thereto, shall speak for more than forty minutes at a time in any debate.

The comment of the committee in connection with this standing order, reads as follows:

When Mr. Speaker is in the chair, a member can only speak once, but there is no limit to the times of speaking when the house is in committee. Under the present rule, a member may make two or three forty-minute speeches during a sitting of the committee which does not last longer than three hours at a time. This amendment provides for a more equitable apportionment of time and allows more members to take part in the discussions.

The proposed amendment of the committee reads:

Provided always that in the committees of the whole, supply or ways and means, no member shall speak more than once on a particular motion, clause or item under consideration, and not more than twenty minutes continuously, but his right to ask questions relating to the subject matter of the said motion, clause or item under consideration shall not be thereby restricted.

The effect of a change of this kind in standing order 37 would not necessarily mean that during a session hon. members would have less opportunity to speak. Rather I think it would result in more subjects being brought up for consideration and in the resolutions of private members having a greater opportunity of being debated, while in general there would be greater opportunity for all hon. members to participate in discussions. My suggestion is that the report of the special committee of last year should be brought to the attention of this parliament by some means or other. Many hon. members have served during the last ten years, and I am sure they have the feeling that some of the suggested changes, although perhaps not all, would be beneficial. I am also sure that after the new members have been here for two or three sessions they, too, will be in agreement with some of the proposed changes. So that I trust the government will find some means of bringing these recommendations up for consideration this year.

Another result of the reduction in the length of time a member is permitted to speak would be that it might be possible to shorten the sessions of this house. I am sure many hon. members feel that when we sit until eleven o'clock it makes a pretty long day, since I judge that most members of parliament work upwards of fourteen hours a day, taking into consideration office work, committee work, and listening to speeches in this house for six hours. Therefore I suggest that the government might consider a proposal to conclude a day's sitting at ten o'clock, instead of eleven. In doing so, we would be giving consideration to the faithful members of the press gallery, who send the news of this parliament to newspapers across the country; for when we continue our sessions until eleven o'clock, I am sure their work goes on into the small hours of morning.

There are many things I should like to mention, but I shall confine my remarks to only one or two points in order to hasten the conclusion of this debate. We are gratified to learn that during this month some fifty thousand members of the armed forces will have been returned to Canada. In this connection I should like to pay tribute to the three departments of defence, to the Department of Transport, to the management of the railways and to the railway employees for the arrangements made to look after returning troops. I have come in contact with a number of men who have returned, and they all speak enthusiastically of the consideration they have received on arriving at Halifax or Quebec. It has been a delight to them to be placed in comfortable sleeping cars, and to be served such splendid meals. I am sure we are all glad that such excellent arrangements have been made for the reception of the men and women of our armed services as they return to Canada.

This country has been prosperous during the last five years. Leaving out of the picture the sorrow that has come to many homes, I am sure most of our people are enjoying such prosperity as they had not known for many years previously. As a result, the number of marriages has increased and many new homes have been set up, which is a matter of gratification to all of us. The effects of the family allowance are already being felt. Testimony is coming in to indicate that the sale of milk, for example, has increased. From some of our schoolteachers I have heard that they have noticed their children wearing better suits and dresses, and many children wearing sweaters where they had none before. But in addition to money the children of our country need direction. We must give thanks to many public-spirited people who give leadership in sports and who in other ways are influences for good, but many people are endeavouring to make money out of influences that are questionable. We must stop the commercialization that lowers the moral stamina of our young people. I believe the nerve-wracking pictures our children see at the cinema and on magazine covers have a bad effect. One newsdealer said to me, "I can sell good detective stories without requiring the books to have covers which encourage children to flourish revolvers or daggers."

Mr. Speaker, we must move to protect Canadian homes against the undermining influence of those who seek to make money, regardless of the harm they do to the rising generation. We should feel alarm at the increasing number of divorce cases. I can understand how ill-mated persons just cannot live together. In such cases I favour one divorce, but not a second or a third.

The great offenders, so far as example is concerned, and so far as their influence on the sanctity of our homes is concerned, are the moving-picture actors and actresses. Canada can well afford to be generous to such people in the matter of holidays. Through our customs branch, in the event of their having second divorces, their films should be barred for one year; and for a third divorce a holiday of two years should be imposed. For the sake of our children, Canada must discourage the growing tendency to break up our homes.

We have provided old age pensions at seventy years, and we are now proposing to increase the payments and to modify the requirements. We give benefits to the blind at forty years. Investigators in connection with old age pensions and mothers allowances find many pitiful cases of persons suffering infirmities, and bed-ridden without hope. I suggest that these people should be made eligible at the age of forty years for the benefits of old age pensions.

Canada has gone a considerable distance toward providing more security for our people. However, there is still one great need. Many people have the benefits of superannuation and pension, and among these would be included such groups as civil servants, railway employees, bankers and many others. But all too often we find that the man who has toiled throughout his best days in a factory is turned out, with no provision for his later years, when he reaches that time in life when his earning power has been depleted. In addition to these, we know of those terrible cases where homes carrying small mortgages are threatened when sickness overtakes members of the families in those homes. Possibly a home must be mortgaged in order to provide proper medical and hospital care for a mother and child afflicted. Very often the result is that that home is never again properly established. Therefore one matter which requires our earnest consideration is that of working out some provision to give security to the homes of so-called common people on those occasions when they require medical and hospital treatment.

I wonder how many Canadians realize the complex considerations of government, those considerations which enter into our dealings with other nations and which have to do with our internal operations. Many things must be purchased from other nations while, on the other hand, we have many other things in surplus quantities which we desire to sell to those nations. We must pay in money that has a recognized value in goods. And so, when the need is created we have a further problem of exchange. Without that exchange problem, with our country operating independently, we might organize our own internal money system pretty much to suit ourselves. We might go on printing money and issuing bonds to an extent where such issues might become voluminous. Then, possibly some group holding radical views might assume power and would scrap all those assets, in order to start over again.

This would not be the method of the people in a free and fairly organized democracy. So I say that our government has many complex problems to deal with. It is reasonably easy and simple to make suggestions calling for expenditures of large sums of money, but it is an altogether different matter to keep everything in balance so as to be fair to all groups in the country and to keep our economy on a solvent basis.

We have been most fortunate in our Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). I am sure all groups in the house will recognize his success in preventing soaring prices during war time. He has our congratulations, and he has our sympathy to-day as he continues his struggle against inflation which he feels, and we feel, would bring such terrible suffering to those with moderate, fixed incomes.

We can also be grateful that during the war we have had in charge of our munitions programme one who had a first-class engineering training, one with exceptional executive ability, and who possesses a spirit of confidence and optimism. That spirit of optimism was never better displayed by the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) than on the occasion when he was torpedoed in mid-Atlantic. I am sure he will continue to display that spirit of confidence in the house, and in his work as Minister of Reconstruction, despite the attempted torpedoings which may come his way from many of those who would criticize unduly.

In conclusion, may I pay tribute to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). I am sure that even among his opponents there is an undercurrent of very warm feeling for the wonderful service he has rendered during the trying days of the war. I believe, too, that most people in Canada have a great deal of confidence in him and in his ability to render service in many ways to other nations of the world as, in joint effort, they attempt to ensure that war shall not come again.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, we have before us an amendment and a subamendment. I wish that the members of the house could all support the subamendment, because I believe it places very simply before parliament what many of us feel should be done, namely, the giving of direct instructions to the government to consider immediately the bringing in of parity prices for farm products.

We have moved that subamendment because we do not like the language of the amendment. I still feel that there is in it phraseology which does cause some misunderstanding. We were told by a former leader of the opposition in this house, the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, on many occasions and at some length, that the written word always prevails. If you take the written word of the amendment it does give rise to the interpretation that was placed upon it by my hon. friend the member for Melfort (Mr. Wright).

As I say, I wish the house could support the subamendment, which is simple, which does not suggest ninety per cent of parity but suggests parity itself. But if the house does not do that, I believe that the amendment offers something better than the principle which is being followed by the government, and if our subamendment is not carried we shall support the amendment.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am rising to speak on the subject of the wheat price policy announced a week or so ago by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) on behalf of the government.

During the course of this debate there has been a good deal of misunderstanding, if not misrepresentation, with respect to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) and with respect to our general position on agricultural prices. I should like to take this opportunity of making clear our position on both.

Before I proceed further, may I take this opportunity of complimenting the leader of the C.C.F. party to my left upon helping to clarify to a small extent the intent of his party which moved an amendment to the amendment because I do not read the same meaning into his party's amendment as evidently he intends should be read.

All I wish to do to-night is to make clear exactly where we stand with respect to the wheat price policy announced by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and perhaps at the same time make clear where we stand on the general question of parity or a square deal for agriculture.

It is three weeks now since parliament convened. At the opening of the session there was read to us a speech from the throne, which is supposed to outline the government's policy for the session and for the near future. That speech from the throne contains no reference to a change of policy with respect to wheat prices. Two weeks later, on September 19, the Minister of Trade and Commerce on behalf of the government announced this new policy, a new policy which has two effects: (1) it prevents the price of wheat to the farmer from rising, as he indicated it otherwise would likely do in the near future; and (2) it may let prices drop lower than the present floor price or the initial price of wheat.

Let me say in this connection, Mr. Speaker, that this party brought in its amendment in no sense of small politics. We happen to be the official opposition. I hope I shall never say anything in this house that will be critical personally of any hon. member opposite. I respect them all. I know the load they are carrying.

But we all have our responsibilities, and I know the members of the government will expect us to carry them out. When we see policies like this announced and we think there is a weakness in them, it is our duty to point out the other side. There was no opportunity to discuss this question in the debate on the address because we had not then been advised of this change of policy. As I said, it was brought in two weeks after the speech from the throne was made. If this policy had been included in the speech from the throne, it, too, would have been included in the amendment which it was my privilege to move. The implication of this new policy is too far-reaching, too filled with ill-consequence to let it go without discussion or without protest. In my remarks to-night I propose to deal with the facts of the situation as we see them.

The question before us now is this. The hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) has moved an amendment to the government's new policy of reducing the floor price of wheat from $1.25 a bushel, which is now the initial price for wheat, to $1 a bushel. His motion was in protest against that reduction.

Mr. MacKINNON: There is no reduction.

Mr. BRACKEN: The hon. member's motion was in protest against that reduction to $1, and in its place his amendment proposed giving ninety per cent of parity, which would mean a floor price of $1.28 a bushel instead of the $1 a bushel which the government has now announced. It is a protest against that reduction and suggests a sound policy of arriving at what would be good practice. Instead of the policy announced by the Minister of Trade and Commerce the amendment proposes to increase the present price from $1.25 to $1.28. As I go along I will explain the details, since the figures are not in the amendment itself.

First let me review the policy announced by the Minister of Trade and Commerce a week ago. The intention was to prevent wheat prices from going up beyond $1.55, and, second, to lower the present floor price, which is now $1.25, to $1—not immediately but for the next five years. I may be asked what is wrong with that policy?

In the first place it asks the wheat growers of Canada to assume a burden that the nation should bear. On a free market, wheat prices would now go up and normally the farmers would get the benefit. But this puts a ceiling price on wheat. The government says: We are going to sell wheat at $1.55 and not higher. They do not let the price go up. Then the government suggests a different floor price policy, which may lead to an unwarranted degree of deflation. When the government brings in a policy saying, we guarantee a floor price of $1 for the next five years, that either means something or means nothing. If it means nothing the government should not have brought it in; and if it means something it means that the government is fearful that the price of wheat will some time in the next five years drop to $1 a bushel or less. This country cannot face the possibility of wheat dropping to $1 a bushel or less in the next five years. At a price now of $1.55 that would mean a drop of one-third. If wheat is to drop a third, cheese to drop a third, hogs to drop a third, fruit to drop a third, where is the high national income going to come from?

Let me refer briefly to the remarks of the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) and the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright), and I know these hon. gentlemen will realize that there is nothing personal in what I have to say. But I shall have to be critical of some of their statements. I think the hon. member for Rosthern left the impression, I hope not intentionally, that our policy means that we stand for only ninety per cent of the cost of production, ninety per cent of parity, on the price of wheat and other agricultural products. This resolution does not bear that interpretation; that is not our policy, and I want to make that fact clear to-night. We stand no more for having agricultural prices at ninety per cent of parity than they stand for having agricultural prices at sixty-two per cent of parity, because that is all that their policy of $1 a bushel is. The government talk about floor prices in this policy of $1 a bushel. That is only sixty-two per cent of parity. We say it should not be sixty-two per cent; it should be at least ninety per cent, and it should not go below that. Ninety per cent is $1.28, and the government's announced policy is $1.

I now want to say a word about the procedure in bringing this policy to the attention of the house. It does not get one very far to criticize procedure; yet it must be said that it was not good procedure for a democratic assembly. What happened? We met here on September 6 and the government brought down the speech from the throne, which is supposed to announce government policy. But before the speech from the throne has been discussed for two weeks the government brings in a new government policy—a policy not mentioned in the speech from the throne—a policy to be passed as a war-time measure in days of peace, a policy determined upon by the government behind closed doors while the house was in session. That seems to be the normal way of doing things under the present procedure. Then it was brought in here one day without notice, brought in here in a manner which denied members the right to discuss it. It is for that reason that this amendment was brought forward one evening when many hon. members thought there might be a vote on this debate.

Let us examine in a little more detail what this policy is. I have under my hand Hansard No. 10, and I shall read at page 289 from the remarks of the minister when he brought in this policy. He said:

I wish to make a brief statement on wheat prices.

The second world war has concluded with Canadian wheat producers in a particularly strong marketing position.

He means that prices are going up.

Not only has the general disruption and bad weather reduced production in the war areas, but the Australian and north African crop failures and a small crop in Argentina have left Canada and the United States as the only countries at present having substantial export surpluses of wheat. This has coincided with the release of pent-up demands in the liberated areas.

In these extraordinary circumstances, Canadian wheat might well command for a limited period very much higher prices in the world market.

Do hon. members get that point?

In these extraordinary circumstances, Canadian wheat might well command for a limited period very much higher prices in the world market.

Wheat has been selling recently at $1.55. Even conservative estimaters predict that it will go to $1.90, and some, even higher. These are the conditions under which this crop in a free market is being sold, and the government comes along now and says: We are going to sell this, because we are controlling it, at $1.55, and it cannot go higher. The minister continues:

It is in the interest of Canada and of Canadian wheat growers that the importing countries should continue to obtain Canadian wheat at prices not in excess of those prevailing at the end of hostilities.

He says it is in the interest of Canada, and he goes on:

Accordingly the government, by order in council, has instructed the Canadian wheat board to offer wheat for sale for export overseas at prices not higher than the current export price of $1.55 per bushel.

At the moment I am trying to get the facts before the house. For a dozen years before the war farmers were getting prices much below parity. Everyone will admit that. The last two or three years we have been getting fairly good prices, and now, when the outlook is that they will go higher, we are denied the right to accept higher prices, "in the interest of Canada". Then he goes on:

In asking Canadian producers to forgo such benefits as might be realized in the short run through higher export prices, the government realizes the paramount need for- -

Listen to this:

—relative stability of income to wheat producers.

Are the farmers going to get stability of income by a lowering of the present floor price from $1.25 to $1. And because the government are doing that it thinks it has to give a quid pro quo, and what is it?

Toward this end, the government undertakes that in the five-year period ending July 31, 1950, producers will receive not less than $1 per bushel basis No. 1 northern, in store Fort William/Port Arthur or Vancouver on the authorized deliveries for each crop year.

Not for all their wheat, but for the authorized deliveries, whatever that is; a part of the crop. Then he goes on. Listen to this:

By providing a long-term floor price of not less than $1 the government will protect producers against the consequences of any sharp reversal in the world wheat position during the next five-year period.

If that means anything, it suggests that they are afraid that the level will be down there or lower. This country cannot contemplate a condition of letting wheat go down to $1 or lower in the next five years; with the burden which this government has put upon the people—and many of us support most of those expenditures—that burden cannot be borne if the national income is to be lowered to anything like the degree which is here contemplated as a possibility. Further:

The government, in adopting this policy of a maximum price for overseas shipments for the present and a floor price for five years, is asking the producers, in their own interests, to forgo exceptional short-run advantages in favour of a long-run stability of income.

What kind of stability of income will wheat at $1 a bushel bring to the farmers? If that sort of deflation is to take place in our whole economy, there is no chance in God's world of this government collecting enough taxes from the Canadian people to carry the services they are proposing for the people of the country. The statement goes on:

Any further increase in wheat prices now would aggravate the problems of economic and political readjustment of the liberated areas to Canada's detriment in future trade with those areas.

I agree with that. I compliment the government on that policy, but I do not compliment it on the policy of leaving the burden on the wheat growers. Then it goes on:

There is a moral obligation not to take advantage of our recent allies in their time of compelling need.

A moral obligation on whom? On the 250,000 farmers or on this nation? Then the minister states:

I wish to lay on the table copies of order in council P.C. 6122.

I should like to refer to that order in council for a moment. This is the order in council which the minister tabled on the very day on which it was passed. I will refer to one clause:

That as a further means of stabilizing wheat prices—

Mark these words "stabilizing wheat prices"

—by a floor price of $1.

That as a further means of stabilizing wheat prices during the post-war period it is the intention that steps shall be taken to ensure that producers will not at any time up to July 31, 1950, receive less than $1 per bushel . . .

Mr. Speaker, stabilizing wheat by such an action as that is all eyewash. It will not stop a deflation which this country cannot afford if it is to carry the services the government has undertaken to assume.

Perhaps at this point I should deal with the remarks made by the hon member for Melfort (Mr. Wright). I listened with interest to what the hon. gentleman had to say in the first part of his address and I was prepared to compliment him on the nature of it, but I must say I was surprised and disappointed when he came to the last part of that speech. I will not say that the hon. member deliberately misrepresented our position or what was in the amendment, but what he said had the effect of misrepresenting it. Here is what the hon. gentleman said, as reported on page 480 of Hansard, and I quote:

I am surprised that he introduced an amendment which suggested that the farmers of Canada should be satisfied with ninety per cent of their cost of production.

That is not in this amendment, and when that fact was brought to the hon. gentleman's attention he made this statement:

Mr. Wright: Let me read the words of the actual amendment.

And this is what he read; he read only part of the amendment:

. . . immediate consideration should be given to establishing for a period of years floor prices for all basic agricultural products at levels not less than ninety per cent of parity.

As I say, he read part of the amendment. I propose to put on the record the other part so that the house and the Canadian people can read them both together. Here is the first part:

We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that,—

I hope hon. members will listen to this.

—pending the establishment of a more stable and equitable price structure for Canadian farm products based on parity of income for farmers,—

Pending that time.

—immediate consideration should be given . . .

[Mr. Bracken.]

Immediate consideration should be given to the advisability of establishing for a period of years floor prices—not parity prices but floor prices, the thing the minister was talking about—for all basic agricultural products at levels not less than ninety per cent of parity.

The hon. member then went on to say, further down on page 480:

The hon. member now suggests that for a period of years we in agriculture should be satisfied with ninety per cent of our cost of production.

That is not in the resolution and the hon. member for Souris never said that. He was talking about floor prices, the same thing the minister was talking about when he brought in the government's dollar floor price plan. After some discussion on the floor of the house the member for Melfort said this:

That is why I am so surprised that the present amendment should be brought in by the hon. member, because he states we should get not less than ninety per cent.

Mr. Speaker, that is the chief reason why I am speaking to-night. I do not think hon. members wanted to misrepresent our position and I do not want to misrepresent it. I want the house to know what it is. We do not expect to upset the government's policy, but when we see a weakness in that policy we must try to present that weakness; and we hope we can present a united front in trying to get the government to raise the figure from $1 to at least $1.28. Then the hon. member for Melfort moved his resolution:

We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that immediate consideration should be given to the establishing of floor prices for all basic agricultural products at parity with other services and products.

If that means anything in connection with wheat it means that he wanted it established at $1.42, because that is what parity is. I wish to compare that statement of the hon. member for Melfort with the statement he made a few days earlier in the debate. Here are his words as reported on page 330 of Hansard:

I am sure that $1.25 a bushel is the lowest floor price that should be set for wheat in Canada. That is a price which would give to the average producer—

I hope that all hon. members are listening to this. I was going to say it pains me as much to read it as I am sure it will pain you in the C.C.F. group to hear it.

That is a price which would give to the average producer a reasonable return for his labour and for the investment which he has in his farm and in his equipment.

The hon. member who moved this amendment, which means, if it means anything, that $1.42 is the floor price, stated only three or four days before that that $1.25 would give to the average farmer a reasonable return for his labour and for the investment which he has in his farm and in his equipment.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: On a question of privilege—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who is speaking—and I do not often rise in defence of the C.C.F.—made the statement that the hon. member for Melfort deliberately misrepresented—

Mr. BRACKEN: I did not.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. GREEN: Sit down.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Don't be foolish; he said no such thing.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: On a question of privilege, I ask that it be read back.

Mr. CASSELMAN: That will be more publicity for you.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): He distinctly covered that and it is the opposite.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I have listened to the hon. member and I could not detect any question of privilege.

Mr. BRACKEN: Mr. Speaker, I have been critical of the statements made by the hon. member for Melfort—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: You made it.

Mr. BRACKEN: —but I am sure he will not charge me with saying that I deliberately misrepresented him.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: You made it.

Mr. ROWE: Why are you his champion?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Never mind.

Mr. FRASER: You are trying to misrepresent.

Mr. BRACKEN: I have one other reference to the statement made by the hon. member for Melfort who moved the amendment to the amendment, and then I shall be through with that part of it. To-day in the discussion on a point of order, he said: "All I want is a square deal for farmers." A few days ago he said that $1.25 would be in effect a square deal. His amendment means $1.42, and it means more than that. He is saying that he wants a floor price and he is going to make the parity price—$1.42—a floor price. Then, under our system, where we have floor prices and ceiling prices, presumably in a time like this when wheat is bringing $1.55 he would get the difference between $1.42 and $1.55, which would be more than a parity.

I am sorry that I have had to take so much time in dealing with his remarks, but I am sure the house will realize that his statement did leave a wrong impression with respect to what our amendment means, and with respect to what we meant it to mean.

I have commented on the way in which the matter of floor prices was brought forward, and I have reviewed the pertinent features of the policy announced by the government. I should now like to examine for a little while more clearly the two main features of this policy. Let me first deal with the prevention of prices going up and then with that of adopting a floor price policy of $1, in place of what is now a floor price policy of $1.25.

There is one other weakness in the statement. It was not the minister's business to do it, but the statement does not cover all agricultural products. Our amendment was meant to establish the parity principle in the floor price for all agricultural products. In a system where you have floor prices and ceiling prices we contend that the floor price should never be less than ninety per cent of parity for all basic agricultural products.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What is parity?

Mr. BRACKEN: If the hon. member will hold his patience for a little while he will learn. I would suggest that if he represents an agricultural community it is about time that he knew what it was.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I got elected again.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BRACKEN: We wanted the house to have an opportunity of approving the principle that as long as we have floor prices and ceiling prices, the principle of making floor price should not be lower than ninety per cent of parity.

The reason the government gives for the first of these two policies, is, as has been mentioned before, that it will prevent prices from going up and thereby help to restore the economy of other nations. I do not disagree with that; I only disagree with the policy of asking one section of the Canadian people to bear that burden. What is the reason given for adopting a floor price of $1. The following words appear in the order in council. I ask the house to listen while I quote them: "to protect producers against any sharp reversal of the world wheat position." If that means anything it means that it is expected there is a considerable chance that wheat will go down below that figure. For a dozen years before the war we had wheat below $1 a bushel. I am sure there is nobody in this house or in Canada who wants to contemplate a condition in this country with wheat and other agricultural products that low. The government says it is a world responsibility to help other nations to reestablish their economy. With that we all agree, but we do not agree that a section of the Canadian people should bear the burden. Then, as a quid pro quo for preventing prices from going up the government offers this as something worth while. And instead of increasing the present floor price it actually lowers it by twenty per cent, from $1.25 to $1.

In effect what the government is saying to the Canadian farmer is that you lose both ways. Prices will not be allowed to go up, but prices may be allowed to go down to as low as $1. That policy is extremely inadequate and unsatisfactory. It is a sop with no substance either to the farmers or to this nation. That policy is, in my judgment, unsatisfactory, because it will not give a fair deal to growers with $1.42 being parity to-day. You are not likely to get parity if you are going to let the price go down to as low as $1 and stop it at $1.55.

I do not need to tell hon. members the condition of agriculture during the last few years when nearly one-third of our people on farms frequently got only one-sixth of the nation's income and sometimes only one-tenth. This policy will not enable farmers to buy the products of industry. I do not need to tell the house that sometimes in the past the Canadian farmers have received only $400,000,000 in a year. Last year they received $1,700,000,000. They can buy the products of industry if we keep up the prices of agricultural products; they cannot if we do not. This policy will not enable agriculture to help maintain employment. If farmers cannot buy the products of industry, then industry cannot employ people. In the past six years, because nature smiled upon us and because for the last two or three years we have had good prices, the farmers of this country received $6,600,000,000. In the six years prior to that they received only $3,300,000,000; I am using round figures in both cases. With $6,600,000,000 they are able to buy the products of industry and help keep our economy functioning in a healthy manner. But this sort of policy—a $1 floor price—will not enable agriculture to maintain a high national income. I need not tell hon. members that prior to the war the farmers of this country, on the average, if they allowed themselves any interest on their capital, in some years made only $1 a day, and in no year made more than $3. Even if they did not allow themselves any interest on capital invested the income for the whole farm family was only from $2 to $4 a day.

This sort of policy—low floor prices—will not enable agriculture to keep up production. The price incentive will, as it did during the war. During the last five years an average of seven million tons more of cereals were produced than during the five years immediately before the war. That was partly because nature was good to us, but the principal cause was reasonably fair prices.

Last but not least, this policy does not tend to create confidence on the part of our people. On the other hand it creates lack of confidence in the whole government programme of reconstruction. If they suggest the possibility of wheat going down by one-third, to $1, what are our hog producers going to think; what are our cheese producers going to think; what are our fruit producers going to think; and if agriculture goes down, where is the hope of employment and where is the hope of a high national income? I do not know what the national income is to-day, but a short time ago some people estimated it at around $9,000 million. If that is to be reduced by one-third, to $6,000 million, and this government asks the Canadian people to pay taxes three or four times as high as before the war, they will never be paid. A reduced national income of that kind cannot carry such taxes, and the government's programme will fail.

From what I have said hon. members will gather what I conceive shall be the objective of a policy of this kind. First of all, it should be equity for producers. We ask no more than that; but we ask that much. Another objective should be stability for the industry. You cannot have stability with prices ranging from $1.55 to $1, any more than a wage-earner of this country can have stability if his wages jump around—$155 now and $100 later. If farmers have low incomes they cannot pay the farm wages now demanded. And a high national income is necessary to a high national production.

I had intended to say a good deal more, Mr. Speaker, but I am reminded by one who is close to me that there may not be many conversions after the first three-quarters of an hour. I am not expecting to make many conversions; all I am trying to do is to make our position clear. In connection with this question of parity; in deciding what is a fair relationship between the prices received by farmers and the prices paid by farmers, one of the best guides to-day is the parity principle. By this we mean that the prices for what the farmer has to sell should bear a fair relationship to the prices for what he has to buy, and should rise or fall approximately at the same rate as the prices of the goods and services he has to buy. That is equity, nothing more or less. This approximate equality has been taken in the United States from a period when agriculture and the rest of the economy was in reasonable balance. The United States uses the years 1910-14 as the base period. Sufficient data is not available in Canada to make these earlier years a scientific base period. I make the suggestion that the committee on agriculture and colonization or a special committee appointed for the purpose should give some study to the selection of a proper scientific base period for Canada. Pending such action, however, I have taken the period 1926-29 as the most suitable period that can be selected in Canada, at least for certain crops. In the case of wheat the average price of No. 1 northern, Fort William, was $1.34 a bushel for the three months of heavy delivery in the years 1926-29. This spring the official indexes show that the prices of things farmers buy, including production, living, taxes, interest and wages, have risen an average of six per cent above the basic period 1926 to 1929. A fair or parity price for wheat would therefore be six per cent higher than the base period, or $1.42 a bushel.

We believe in the parity principle. In the United States they took a period before the war which they considered to be one in which there was a healthy relationship between the prices of agricultural products and the prices the farmers had to pay, and they use that as the base period. If later the prices the farmer has to pay go up they would see that the prices the farmer received would go up also, and that if the prices the farmer had to pay went down, then the prices of their products would go down also. That is what they regard as the parity price principle. That is the policy we adopted at Winnipeg. But I go further than that. They took that base period only because it was the best thing they could have as a guide. A base period is not always the best guide. That kind of parity does not always give a fair deal to farmers. So that we have adopted the policy that farmers should have their cost of production, and should have on top of that, incomes equal to the average of the incomes of other gainfully employed workers in other occupations.

We believe that the parity principle, using the 1926-29 base for most products, could very well be the basis of setting floor prices for the basic farm products. In order to avoid wide fluctuation in prices, we believe that until a rigid parity price structure is brought about we should keep floor prices as high as we reasonably can. That is why we ask that the floor price be raised above the government's announced figure.

Then, to skip a good deal of what I had intended to say, may I leave this word with the house. It is clearly evident that what farmers have received in the past is far below parity, at least until the last two or three years. In 1940 and 1941, even after adding the participation payments, they received thirty-eight cents a bushel below parity. In 1942 they received thirty cents less than parity. It is extremely unlikely that the participation payments for 1943 and 1944 will, with the final returns, reach parity.

I am not going to keep the house any longer. As I resume my seat, I wish to say that we stand only for equity for agriculture. Prior to the last several years the price policy of this country was one of letting prices go as low as they chose or as high as they chose. Now, and particularly since this war, the policy of this government—and I have not objected to it—has been to put on a ceiling price beyond which they will not let prices go, and establish a floor down here below which they cannot go. They set it at $1.25 for wheat, and it is that to-day. But with the government's policy it may be $1 in the future. I believe we shall have greater stability in this country the more we can bring those two figures closer together by raising the floor price and not much stability when the price range is from $1 to $1.55.

When this amendment was prepared, as I have said, it was hoped that all hon. members on this side of the house might feel that they could support it. I would not expect that it would gain the support of hon. members on the other side of the house, because I can quite understand that when the government determines upon a policy it is not likely to accept the ideas of the opposition. So that, to speak frankly, we were not expecting hon. members opposite to support us.

Our position has been—and to some exteut it has been misrepresented—that we want the parity principle established. We do not differ in that respect, on this side of the house. And we want the government's floor price policy of $1 raised to $1.28.

But I do not want hon. members behind me to be misrepresented to their disadvantage. Therefore, I am going to say to my supporters that, having established where we stand on this matter and having brought forward a policy which is sane and fair and, I am sure, appeals to all hon. members as a policy that cannot be misunderstood—I am going to say to hon. members behind me that I shall not object if they choose to support the amendment to the amendment as well as the amendment itself.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I did not expect to take part a second time in the debate, before a vote was taken on the address in reply. But in view of the discussion which has taken place during the last two days, and particularly in view of the speech to which we have just listened, I think it is necessary that I should say something with regard to the agricultural policy of the government, and more particularly with regard to the relation of that policy to parity prices.

We have been discussing parity prices in this house ever since I came to it ten years ago. I do not think a session has passed when we have not had a very full discussion of the matter; and I must say that there has been great difficulty in establishing what most speakers who have used the term "parity" believe parity to be.

As a matter of fact, last night when the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. Townley-Smith) was speaking, I was almost tempted when I interjected some remarks, and when he said that the prices were all cock-eyed, to ask whether he would use that term as synonymous with the term "parity", as it is often used.

Hon. members often try to establish what parity is, and I am pleased that to-night the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) has placed before us what he believes parity to be. He believes parity to be the average of farm prices between 1926 and 1929.

The average price of wheat, as he said, was during that period $1.42. If we wish at this time to accept that definition of parity, every farm product in Canada, or sold in Canada, with the exception of wheat and eggs, has been above parity for some years and is in fact above parity at the present time. I might say that even wheat is above parity to-day. Based upon the definition which is admitted as being the definition of parity for farm products in this farming country, eggs is the only product below. It is true that last night we had a speech from the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) in which he attempted to place an entirely different interpretation upon parity. But since we must have some definition if we are to get anywhere in discussing a question of this kind, then I prefer to accept the definition of his leader, where he has accepted $1.42 a bushel for wheat as being the parity price for that commodity. Let me repeat that on that basis every farm product in Canada is and has been selling for a very considerable length of time above parity prices, with, of course, the exception of eggs.

Now, in making that statement at the beginning I wish to go back over some of the leader of the opposition as they relate the price levels which have been reviewed by to agriculture. Going back to the period upon which he bases his parity figures, the period of 1926-29, we find that farm income in the first of those years was $957,000,000; in the second of those years it was $934,000,000; in the third of those years it was $1,063,000,000, and in the fourth it was $926,000,000—and I hear a friend behind me say, "Four years of Liberal rule." Those are the last four years in which the farmers in the Dominion of Canada enjoyed any such returns for their farm products, either in terms of unit prices for different farm products or in terms of total income to farmers until the Liberals were again in office.

These are the figures for the next period of years: 1931, $445,000,000; 1932, $383,000,000; 1933, $396,000,000; 1934, $485,000,000, and 1935, $511,000,000. This is the full five years of Conservative administration. That was the period of lowest farm income in the Dominion of Canada that we have experienced in the lifetime of the members of this house. Somebody behind me has just asked: Who was in power then? I have to admit that the Conservative party was in power, but I am not going to lay the blame on them for the conditions which existed in agriculture in that five-year period. The only thing I blame them for in connection with that five-year period is that they came before the people of this country in 1930 and declared that they were going to remove unemployment, that they were going to increase the returns to the producers of farm products; yes, that they were going to do these things or perish in the attempt. What I say to-night is that the Conservative party, when they were face to face with the problem in 1930, talked very much as the Conservative party is talking to-night in this house. They spoke in glowing terms of what they were going to do, but at the end of five years in office the people of Canada almost wiped them out of existence and from that time down to the present they have been attempting to get back into their former stride.

Since that period, even before the war our returns for farm products were gradually going up. In 1936 the returns were $578,000,000; in 1937, $645,000,000; in 1938, $664,000,000, and in 1939, $722,000,000. In other words the returns rose from $511,000,000 in the last year of Conservative rule to $722,000,000 in the last year of Liberal rule before the war. I am going to admit, Mr. Speaker, that the change was not entirely due to what happened in the Dominion of Canada. After all we sometimes take ourselves too seriously in this country when we speak about a nation of 11,000,000 people wagging the whole world. We do not wag the whole world; we are not capable of doing so either in economics or in any other sense. But we are all influenced by what is going on in the world, and one of the reasons why we had such a difficult time from 1930 to 1935 was that on the European continent people were acting as a result of experiences which they had had during the years preceding, a period in which we farmers in Canada and in other nations were attempting to impose upon the peoples of the world a policy which did not suit those people who believed in free intercourse, understanding and confidence among the nations of the world.

We, in attempting to carry out that policy in part of that period, insisted that we should be able to place our farm products, particularly wheat, on the markets of the world at any prices that we cared to dictate. During that period we attempted to set up offices on the other side of the ocean and gave the impression we wished to tell people in Britain and elsewhere what they had to pay for our wheat. Well, whether we have great influence on world economics or not, the fact remains that when the world is in the throes of influences of that kind every country is likely to do the wrong thing if it is not careful about the steps it is taking, and we as wheat growers joined with those of other nations in bringing about those conditions throughout the world. I am not speaking of any government but of the line of thought of our people. We were trying to lift ourselves by our own boot-straps, trying to convince ourselves that we could live unto ourselves, that we could sell all the commodities we could produce to our own people, or make demands on others. The result was a change of government in 1930. When I sat and listened to the arguments here to-night to the effect that the Canadian market is the greatest market we have for farm products I could not help hearing an echo of that same kind of policy. Undoubtedly the Canadian market is the best market for a greater part of our farm products. But if we are not able to sell our surpluses, and if they are thrown on to the Canadian market, they will bring about a condition which is not in the interests of the farmers of this country and never could be.

Therefore to-night, when hon. members speak of increased wheat prices in order to build up an argument which might appeal to farmers and take a similar position with respect to other prices, I just recall our experiences during that earlier period. During that first five-year-period for which I have placed farm income on the record we sold on the average 309,000,000 bushels of wheat a year, but in the five-year periods following that we have never been able to sell that much wheat to the other nations. Why? Because of the policies adopted by other countries which persuaded their peoples to undertake the production of wheat themselves or to substitute other products for wheat. The result has been that we have never, even in wartime, been able to get back to the position where we were marketing as much wheat on the continent, through Britain, as we did in the five years preceding 1930.

The policy announced the other day has that fact in mind. I recite the experiences of that period in order to emphasize the importance of the policy upon which we have entered. Someone asked at the beginning of this discussion about wheat: Who asked for this? Who suggested to the government that we have a policy of this kind? Well, I have here—I am not going to take time to read them, although I could read them—all the annual statements of the Canadian farm federation for every year since 1942. That of 1942 reads like this:

> All of the member bodies of this federation from western Canada are on record to the effect that the basic price for the coming year should be not less than one dollar per bushel, basis No. 1 northern at lakehead or seaboard terminals.

In the year 1943 they made an even stronger statement than that. They go on to say that they still advocate the policy of 1942 of establishing a floor of not less than $1 a bushel for wheat. In 1943, later in the season, this government took action with regard to wheat, and in taking that action we set the floor at $1.25 a bushel. It is true, as was stated by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) the other day, that someone had suggested in this house on one or two occasions that the price ought to be $1.25 a bushel, but the only official resolution passed on that point by farm organizations in this country asked for a floor price of not less than $1 a bushel as the basis on which to set wheat prices.

As hon. members will remember, a delegation of 400 western farmers came to the city of Ottawa in January, 1942, and presented that proposal to the government. On that occasion we said that we were not prepared to continue the wheat acreage reduction payments which we were making in western Canada, amounting to some millions of dollars, and also pay $1 a bushel as the initial payment on wheat. After the discussions with them we retained the wheat acreage reduction payments and we payed ninety cents a bushel as the initial payment.

That remained until 1943, when the initial payment was raised to $1.25 a bushel. I have here on record the statement made by the people of the farm federation following that announcement. They complimented the government upon the action we had taken in making the payment $1.25 a bushel. The only occasion upon which they have used $1.25 a bushel as the floor price in connection with their resolutions was in the present year, when they asked this government to retain the initial payment of $1.25 a bushel for the year 1945-46; and this government has done so. In other words, not only have we met the wishes of the farm organizations in Canada with regard to a fair price for wheat, but we exceeded them in 1943. When we exceeded them they asked us to continue that advance payment during the following year.

I recall those resolutions only to call the attention of the house to the fact that, while certain hon. members are raising the question as to whether the farmers will be satisfied with this price, farm organizations declared their belief in it before we undertook it, and farm organizations right across the three prairie provinces, as the hon. member for Rosthern indicated last night, expressed themselves as satisfied with the policy which has been adopted by the government.

Mr. BURTON: Mr. Speaker, I think the Minister of Agriculture is getting slightly mixed. He referred to what the hon. member for "Humboldt" said. I did not speak last night.

Mr. GARDINER: I meant the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker). I was paying the hon. member for Humboldt a compliment he did not deserve. I am glad the hon. member for Humboldt called my attention to it, because I would not want to mislead the people or this house into believing the hon member on this side represents any other seat than Rosthern.

I was saying a moment ago that they had reasons for passing these resolutions in the farm organizations. Those reasons took them right back to the period of time that I reviewed a few moments ago. Someone said—I think it was the hon. member for Souris—this afternoon in reply to an hon. member of the C.C.F. group that there had been an experience with the policy of attempting to make high payments the floor price in connection with wheat. That experience was during the very period of time of which I spoke at the beginning of my speech, when prices of wheat were high. We started in western Canada with a floor price of $1 a bushel under the pool. The farmers were then handling their own pooling of wheat. We held the price at $1 too long. Then we reduced it year by year until finally, I think, we got it down to some seventy cents a bushel. But every year we were reducing it from $1 a bushel down, the wheat pools were taking a loss, and in the end they lost $30 millions and had to come to the government at Ottawa and to the three governments in western Canada in order to get their position taken care of by using the finances of the people of this country.

In every discussion I have had with farm leaders in western Canada, when held in places where we can sit down and talk with regard to them without an audience and base our talks on the experiences in the past, they have called attention to the fact which was called attention to this afternoon by the hon. member for Souris, namely, that it is dangerous to have the initial payment higher than is necessary in order to pay the operating costs of the farmers who produce the wheat. They all agree that we should depend upon participation for our profits. I make that statement in order to repeat that the men who passed these resolutions know the wheat business better than anybody else in Canada. The pools are composed of producers growers of the wheat, and they marketed in the province of Saskatchewan, which produces more than 50 per cent of the wheat grown in Canada every year. The men who market that great volume of wheat have realized from experience the difficulty of setting floors which are too high in connection with the product that they handle, because they know we must have the marketing of agricultural products established on a sound economic basis as well as upon a basis which will give us the highest possible returns for our products. They have suggested, in all their resolutions passed with regard to this matter down to the year 1945, that the basic price or initial payment be not less than $1 a bushel.

Having that before us, the government was placed in a position of having to discuss this question recently in the light of the facts as they now exist throughout the world. Wheat has been gradually going up, but wheat is not the only thing which has been gradually going up.

This government embarked in 1941 upon a policy of attempting to maintain ceiling prices not only upon those things we have to sell but upon those things we have to buy, and I think I can say without fear of contradiction that the majority of men and women from one end of this country to the other, no matter which party in this house they voted for, believe that that policy, as it has worked out from 1941 to the present time, was in the interests of Canada. Under that policy there was one product upon which no ceiling was set, and that was wheat. Ceilings were set on beef, pork, cheese, butter, and every other processed farm product, but not on wheat, although a ceiling was set on other grain. One reason why a ceiling was not set upon wheat was the fact that wheat was then at seventy-eight cents a bushel. Members from the western part of Canada took the position at that time, as we take it now, that you cannot set up in this country an economy based upon seventy-eight cent wheat, and in taking that position and maintaining it and working for it we established the position that there would not be a ceiling set on wheat at that particular time, and not until it passed parity of $1.42.

What is the result of that? The leader of the opposition has said to-night that in his opinion some of the things which have been suggested in the policy that has been announced are good of themselves but, he says—and I agree with him in this—two hundred and fifty thousand farmers, the producers of wheat in western Canada, should not be called upon to bear the burden of utilizing our wheat in order to assist people in other parts of the world, but that all the people of Canada must do that. As I say, I agree with him on that. What did we do, Mr. Speaker? Back in 1941 we said that every person in Canada—it does not make any difference whether he is a banker on St. James street, a farmer in western Canada, or a labourer in the Ford plant—as long as the controls remain upon prices in Canada, can buy his bread based on seventy-eight cent wheat, and no higher. Well, may I say to my hon. friends that when we raised the guaranteed floor on wheat to $1.25 a bushel we said to every farmer in Canada, you are going to be guaranteed $1.25 a bushel for your wheat delivered at Fort William. At the same time we said to every man, woman and child in the Dominion of Canada, you are going to buy your bread based upon the price of seventy-eight cents for wheat and you are going to buy it there as long as controls last.

I call the attention of the house to the fact that that is placing the burden exactly where it belongs. It puts the burden on the treasury of Canada and through the treasury of Canada upon all the taxpayers of the country, whether farmers, or others.

That is not a new policy. That policy has been in existence since 1941. Well, now, on the other farm products, what was done? The price of meat in 1941, in the four-week period which was established as the basis of price control, the price at which meats sold to consumers was higher than it was in the period of 1926-29. The price of many of the other farm products was higher than it was in the period of 1926-29. What did this government do? We established these higher than 1926 or parity levels as the ceilings I should say, when saying that, that the price of live cattle, the price of hogs, the price of other natural products from the farm, unprocessed, was not so high, on some of them at least, as the average price from 1926 to 1929. The government therefore did this. We set a ceiling upon meat; we set a ceiling upon dairy products; we set a ceiling upon the processed products of different kinds. But we said to the farmer, we are going to allow the prices of the commodities that you sell unprocessed to rise up to the levels provided for under the ceilings that are set on meat and other processed products.

And so from 1941, through that year and the next, these primary farm products and some others, cattle, hogs, cheese, butter, went gradually upward until they all passed the average prices of 1926-29, which is parity, or we added subsidies to make them higher.

The other night the leader of the opposition said that we had not increased the price of hogs in the year, 1944 over 1945, other than to add a $3 premium and a $2 premium to the prices which had been paid after prices on grain had been raised up to the levels I spoke of a few moments ago. I corrected that statement in my speech the other day, and I refer to it again only in order to say this, that the only reason why we stopped with seventy-five cents in raising the price of bacon at Saint John in the winter of 1943-44 was the fact that when we added the seventy-five cents we brought the price of that product up to the ceiling as established in 1941, and so we said that rather than break through the ceiling price upon pork we would submit to a policy of putting a premium on high-grade hogs of $3 and $2 and maintaining the price of hogs at a level which did not break the ceiling on pork as it was established in 1941.

There is one thing I cannot understand about the position taken by the leader of the opposition. I opened my remarks the other night with regard to what he had said in the first address with a statement I am going to read again. He says that the reduction in hog production and the going down of production of bacon in 1945 as compared with 1944 is due chiefly to the government's policy of keeping hog prices so far out of line with feed prices as to discourage hog production. Well, to-night he is arguing for the policy of having grain prices higher, while at the same time wheat is the only product which down to the present moment has not had a ceiling upon it; and wheat, as he stated in his previous address, influences the cost of feeds and therefore would influence the cost of producing these bacon products to every farmer in the dominion who produces them.

What I wish to say is this. We cannot argue both ways on these questions. Feed enters into the production of every live stock product we have; when we argue for a ceiling price in one breath—and every member of the official opposition agrees that ceiling prices have been a good thing—we have to admit that these ceiling prices must be held at certain levels throughout certain periods of time; and when they are held on one product they must be held on others if we are to deal equitably with the people of this country.

In dealing with that matter this afternoon the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) raised the question of subsidies, and I made some reference to the fact that we have subsidies on most farm products. We have them put on in two or three different ways, and this brings me back again to the suggestion that all the people of Canada ought to be made to pay, when we bring down policies which result in the giving away of farm products or any other products from this country to the people of some other countries, and not simply one class of the people.

Prices of farm products were not raised in the markets in the manner described by someone this afternoon. We were told that we had to take care, in dealing with this particular question, that we did not create a situation whereby we would lose our markets through raising our prices in the markets of the other countries of the world. I think that statement was made by the leader of the opposition to-night.

It was not the other countries of the world that made these prices. The other countries of the world have been getting assistance under mutual aid, which resulted in our being able to pay our farmers higher returns, and that mutual aid came out of the public treasury, a charge on all the people of the country, making it possible for us to pay about the difference between eighty-five shillings and one hundred and thirteen shillings on bacon to farmers through the packing plants for the hogs that were marketed off their farms. A similar condition exists in connection with cheese, in connection with canned milk, in connection with every product that was provided to Britain and other allied countries under the mutual aid arrangement.

Therefore what I want to emphasize in that connection is that in anything we do with regard to ranges of prices on wheat we are not interfering with something which had been established in some other country in recent years during the war. We are dealing with a condition under which this country, under the able leadership of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), raised funds with which we paid for Canadian products, and then we sent those products to other countries, taking back from our allies what they could afford to pay under the conditions then existing, and charging the rest of it up to the billion dollars of mutual aid which this government provided in order to help our allies during the war.

It might be said and they have said it—I do not need to say it; our allies have said it—that Canada has done a worth-while job in that regard in carrying that policy through during the last three or four years of the war, and we believe that by carrying that policy through we have created a situation which will make it possible for us to market the commodities we produce in this country in countries which believe that they owe something to us because of the service we gave in their period of greatest trial. That is what the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) had in mind when he said in this house the other day that we as a government must give consideration to the effects which any price that may be established for our products at the present time, particularly products we are selling in great volume, have upon the economy of the other allied nations alongside of whom we fought. It is in order that we may maintain the proud position which we hold among the allied nations to-day, of having done everything possible to give service in every way in order to assist in the winning of the war. When we have come to the end of it, it is not our intention to do things which might cause us to destroy the good feeling which we established then.

Let me now touch on the position as it relates to the war period and as it relates to the period before the war and to the future. We have been struggling with this wheat question not only ever since the war started but since 1932, when the government of the day sent a delegation from Ottawa, which took with them representatives from the three western provinces, to discuss our wheat problem at that time. It was the problem of a great carryover of wheat which we desired to sell in the European markets. At that time there was set up an organization which has been discussing our wheat problems ever since. As I said here the other day, when this wheat question was being discussed by someone, we have not succeeded in getting any definite arrangements entered into by the five great wheat-producing countries of the world in their relationship with the great consuming countries of the world. We have had these people together; we have been discussing their problems and our problems. That has all been helpful, but when it came down to getting definite arrangements as to what the price and the acreage were to be we have always been confronted with some difficulties which have usually resulted in lack of agreement—I would not say in disagreement, but in lack of agreement.

I wish to say to the house to-night that if it is ever possible at any time to lay the records of those discussions, which have been held in camera, before the people of the world, and at the same time before the Canadian people, it will be found that in every case the advances made by this country toward the other countries were in a line which, if they had been agreed to, would have satisfied the demands of farm organizations from one end of Canada to the other. One of those demands has been written down by the farm federation on many occasions. They have said, "What we want is a stabilized price for wheat." They said, "We want it stabilized over a period of years." They have said on occasions, "We want a $1 price established." I remember on one occasion that they were saying in one breath they wanted a price established at $1 and in the other criticizing the government at Ottawa because the government would not sign a proposed agreement presented by this commiittee. I went so far as to say this to them: "If you want us to sign the agreement, which is before us at the present time, with the nations of the world, which you have said in one resolution you want, and you want us to accept the price which is in that agreement as the basic price for wheat, then it is lower than $1 a bushel, and the other countries of the world will not agree to its being higher." That was just prior to the war.

Since the war, these discussions have been changed from London to Washington and they have been going on there. What I wish to say to the house is that policies similar to those which have been advocated by the farmers of western Canada with regard to wheat have been submitted to that organization year by year. What the Minister of Trade and Commerce meant the other day when he answered a question from the other side of the house, and when he stated that these countries recently meeting in London had not agreed, was that they had not agreed to a policy which I am sure would have met with the approval of all the farm organizations in Canada.

When that agreement was not reached this government announced its policy in the house the other day. That policy gives us five more years in which to carry on negotiations. That is why the farm organizations, without any coaching on our part, have gone to the press in their own cities of Calgary, Regina and Winnipeg, and said that they are satisfied with the policy that has been announced. Some of them told us clearly that they want us to go ahead and negotiate other steps and arrangements, but there is no way that you can proceed to negotiate steps and arrangements with governments at the present time and hope for any settlement in time to deal with the next crop, let us say, or probably the next crop or two. You cannot depend upon having absolute settlements made among the great number of nations that are involved in this wheat question, while world conditions are what they are.

Therefore what we have said to the people of this country is, that for the present we have asked the wheat board to sell wheat at not higher than $1.55 a bushel. That was the price the market would have paid for our wheat on the last occasion in which we were dealing with the British government just before the policy was announced. Therefore we have said that we are going to sell wheat to the overseas people—we do not say to anyone else—at $1.55 a bushel for the time being. Then we have said that for the next year, down to the end of July, 1946, the initial payment is exactly what it was asked to be by the farm organizations down to that period of time, namely, $1.25 a bushel. Then we have said that in the meantime we are going to carry on with the same policies in relation to wheat and other farm products as we have been carrying on with from 1941 down to the present. And we say—we have not said this in so many words, but I am sure that every member of the government will agree with me when I say it—there is not any intention on the part of the members of this government, or of any one associated with it, to lower the initial payment on wheat below $1.25 a bushel as long as the wheat of this country can be disposed of anywhere at $1.25 a bushel. We are carrying out the policy at the moment just as the circumstances warrant our carrying it out, namely, guaranteeing a floor price of $1.25 a bushel for this year, no matter what happens, and going on with our negotiations with other people as to what the price ought to be, and saying that for the time being, while we are selling wheat overseas to the countries that need our food, we are going to charge them only $1.55 a bushel for it.

I agree with the leader of the opposition that to the extent that we might have got more we are asking the 250,000 farmers who grow wheat to carry that part of the burden for the time being. And we are asked, what are they getting in return for it? We are saying to them that, no matter what happens during the next five years, we are going to see to it that you never have to take less than $1 a bushel for your wheat, basis Fort William. What does that mean? It means that it does not make any difference where wheat goes on the market, if it goes down to fifty cents a bushel we are going to take the money from all the people of Canada to pay the difference between fifty cents and $1. All we are suggesting to the 250,000 farmers is that, while it is $1.55 or more, and while we have ceiling prices on other commodities in Canada, we are going to ask them to permit us to sell whatever wheat we do sell to our overseas allies at $1.55 a bushel during that time. But at the same time we say to them by inference, if not in words, there will not be any ceiling price on your wheat any longer than ceiling prices remain on other commodities in this country. We did not say there was a ceiling of $1.55 for five years. We said there would never be a floor of less than $1 a bushel for five years; but we have said that as long as wheat is $1.55 or more, and as long as there are ceiling prices on other products in this country, since wheat has gone above parity, to $1.55 instead of $1.42, we are prepared to place a ceiling of $1.55 a bushel on what wheat is sold to our allies.

To-day on the orders of the day someone asked whether the government was giving attention to the possibility that someone might start to sell wheat outside this country, into the United States, at higher prices. In reply to that question I say that all the wheat in Canada is delivered to the wheat board, and the wheat board is the only seller of wheat. That board has everything to say, in consultation with the government, as to where wheat is to be sold and at what price it is to be sold; and I can guarantee that there will not be any wheat sold into the United States or anywhere else, other than overseas, while this arrangement exists, at prices which are lower than market prices in those countries, taking into consideration shipping and exchange costs and the duty upon products entering those countries, which has always been done. That position is entirely safeguarded. In other words, we think we are playing the game fairly with the countries with which we are dealing, rather than going back to the "catch as catch can" policies which antagonized our customers in the thirties.

How are we dealing with them? It is true that mutual aid came to an end, but if we want to sell farm products or any other Canadian products to many of these countries at the present time we must be prepared to help finance the sale of such products. At the present time it is not just to say to this house, or to try to leave the impression with the 250,000 farmers of this country, that we are doing something which is not fair to them. We are utilizing all the economic strength of this country, putting it on the lowest plane possible, to try in the first place to benefit all the people in Canada to the greatest extent possible. Keeping that in mind at all times, we are also endeavouring to assist those people who will be wanting our products in future to consume those products at the present time. That does not apply to anything with greater importance than wheat, bacon, beef and all the other products about which we have talked so much in the last few days.

I now come to a question which has been in the minds of most of those who have been speaking, and for a moment or two I shall deal with the legislation of which there has been some criticism; that is, the bill brought in last session to place floor prices under farm products. I wish to emphasize what I said this afternoon in reply to a question, or an interruption of another speech, that this act is not yet operative. The act was passed last session, and everyone who was in the house at that time understood the terms upon which it was passed. This measure was designed to place what we were pleased to call floor prices under farm products. One can read sections of it and give other interpretations to them, perhaps, but if hon. members will read Hansard to see what was said when this bill was introduced in the house they will find that it says this. We proposed to establish a temporary board. We would appoint the permanent chairman and would take two officials out of the Department of Agriculture and set them up at once to do a job. We may be asked, what was that job. We said the job was to determine the relationship between farm prices as they have been since we established ceilings upon prices in Canada, and the prices of other products farmers had to buy; to study that relationship and get it into the form of figures which might be called parity prices or anything you like. In any event they were to establish the relationship which existed between the ceiling prices as fixed during that period, from 1941 down to the end of the war, and have those facts available for the permanent board which was to be appointed when the War Measures Act went out of existence, to take over the administration of this act. Then we said to the board, in section 9 (1) (a), that they were:

to prescribe from time to time, with the approval of the governor in council, prices at which the board may purchase agricultural products in the market.

Then in paragraph (c) they were directed:

to pay to the producers of an agricultural product directly or through such agent as the board may determine the difference between a price prescribed by the board with the approval of the governor in council for such product and the average price, as determined by the board, at which such product is sold in the market during the specified period if such average price is below such prescribed price.

Then in subsection 2, which has been read to the house already by one or two hon. members, there is this provision:

In prescribing prices under paragraphs (a) and (c) of subsection 1 of this section, the board shall endeavour to ensure adequate and stable returns for agriculture by promoting orderly adjustment from war to peace conditions and shall endeavour to secure a fair relationship between the returns from agriculture and those from other occupations.

If I had time I could read again what was read last night by the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker), who stated that the president of the farm federation, in speaking of this legislation at the last annual meeting, had declared that for the first time this act gave Canadian farmers an opportunity to enjoy stable prices, and went on to term the prices provided for under this act as parity prices. And I agree with them. Our hon. friends of the C.C.F. party want prices established for the next period of years. Someone has asked how long that period is to be. If they read Hansard they will find that last year someone suggested it should be four years. We refused to make the period four years, on the ground that it might be ten years. It is whatever period is necessary in order to reestablish agriculture in this country on a sound financial basis at the end of this war. Therefore I say to hon. members to-night that if they want to vote for 100 per cent parity prices all they need do is vote for the policies of the government. Anyone sitting on the other side of the house who, in moving a resolution for floor prices based upon parity, is trying to make the people of this country believe they are moving for something which is not already provided for in the policies of this government, is trying to mislead the voters of this country.

May I say to hon. gentlemen opposite that I agree entirely with the statement made this afternoon by the hon. member for MacLeod (Mr. Hansell), that to indulge in that sort of thing with all the facts before the house is purely and simply playing politics; and I say that knowing that my hon. friends on the other side—

Mr. ROWE: You should know.

Mr. GARDINER: I should know, as my hon. friend says, and I think I do know. And since I do know I want to repeat that that is playing politics, and playing it with a vengeance, by trying to mislead the people.

Mr. GARDINER: What I wish to say is this, that every man who votes against this amendment to-night is voting for parity prices as set up under legislation which the government has already placed upon the statute books. Anyone who votes for the motion to-night is voting for an arrangement of long-term agreements between the countries that use our wheat overseas, particularly Great Britain, and the people and government of Canada—long-term agreements which will establish a stabilized price for our wheat, just as agreements we have had in the last five years have established fair prices and stabilized prices for other farm products of Canada.

Every man who sells hogs knows there never has been a more stabilized price structure for hogs in this country than there has been during the last three years, and particularly the last two. Everyone in Canada knows that, despite what our friends across the way may say, Canada Packers and other packing plants have men out in the province of Ontario at the present time offering over twelve cents a pound for well prepared and well finished beef cattle. That is a higher price than could have been obtained under any policy other than that of the government during recent years. That policy has been one of stabilization.

Mr. ROWE: It is seventeen cents in the United States.

Mr. GARDINER: My hon. friend says it is seventeen cents in the United States. Well, if he went down there to get a shave it would cost him a dollar—and other things in proportion. If he went down there to get a drink it would cost him far more than he pays for it in this country.

We in the Dominion of Canada have controlled prices both on things we produce and on things we consume, and on a very much lower level than they have in the United States. But as long as the level applies right across the board on consumed products as well as on produced products, nobody will be hurt.

In other words, we have stopped our prices from spiralling, and right now we are stopping them from deflating. The leader of the opposition does not need to worry, so long as this government is in power; and apparently the people of Canada did not worry so long as it was in power. They do not need to worry about deflation—or about inflation, either. We have taken care of inflation during the latter part of the war. We will take care of inflation in the years immediately following the war. And when the time comes when deflation begins to bother us, we have the legislation on the statute books to carry us through. We have agreements made with respect to our farm products to safeguard our farm policy against any of the evils of deflation.

The house divided on the amendment to the amendment (Mr. Wright), which was negatived on the following division.

Main motion (Mr. Benidickson) agreed to on division.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the said address be engrossed and presented to His Excellency the Governor General by such members of this house as are of the honourable the privy council.

Motion agreed to.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER

ELECTION OF MR. WILLIAM ROSS MACDONALD, MEMBER FOR BRANTFORD CITY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is one matter of procedure which should be dealt with immediately. The rules of the house provide that as soon as possible after the address has been agreed to a deputy speaker of the house should be appointed, also the committees of supply and way and means established. Through the courtesy of hon. gentlemen opposite the committees of supply and ways and means have already been set up. That was done in order to oblige the government in getting through interim supply.

It will not take me more than a minute or two to read to the house the rule which governs in the matter of the appointment of the Deputy Speaker and to propose an hon. member for that position. Standing order 56 respecting the Deputy Speaker reads as follows:

(1) A chairman of committees of the house, who shall also be Deputy Speaker of the house, shall be elected at the commencement of every parliament, as soon as an address has been agreed on in answer to His Excellency's speech; and the member so elected shall, if in his place in the house, take the chair of all committees of the whole, including the committees of supply and ways and means, in accordance with the rules and usages which regulate the duties of a similar officer, generally designated the chairman of the committees of ways and means, in the House of Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

(2) The member elected to serve as Deputy Speaker and chairman of committees shall be required to possess the full and practical knowledge of the language which is not that of the Speaker for the time being.

Mr. Speaker, I would draw attention to the fact that the hon. member to be appointed to the position of Deputy Speaker must be possessed of the language which is not that of Your Honour, he will therefore be chosen from among the English speaking members of the house. It is desirable that whoever holds the position of Deputy Speaker should possess qualities of mind and temperament similar to your own. He should be courteous, impartial, judicial, possessed of a sense of humour, conciliatory in manner and able to command the confidence and respect of the house in the position which he holds.

The hon. member whose name I should like to put forward is Mr. Ross Macdonald, K.C., of Brantford, Ontario. Mr. Ross Macdonald has been a member of this House of Commons for the last ten years. He was elected to parliament in 1935, 1940 and 1945. He was also a candidate at two previous elections. Mr. Macdonald is a war veteran of the first great war, a graduate of the university of Toronto and of Osgoode Hall, a distinguished member of the legal profession, and may I say, what is important to hon. members of this house, he is wholly familiar with its rules and its procedure and on many occasions in the last parliament, when asked to do so by the Speaker of the house, occupied the chair of the Deputy Speaker, and on occasions the chair of the Speaker of this house. Possessing all the qualities and virtues he does, I hope the house will join unanimously in electing Mr. Macdonald as Deputy Speaker of the house.

I move:

That William Ross Macdonald, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Brantford City, be appointed chairman of the committees of the whole house.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, there may not be many occasions in this house when I can support and agree with the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in the moves he makes. I am glad to say that this is an occasion when I can. It is not my privilege to be personally acquainted with the hon. gentleman who has been nominated to be Deputy Speaker; but on this subject I accept the words of the Prime Minister.

May I say for the members of this party that we extend our sincerest congratulations to the hon. member who has been chosen for that position and that we are sure that he will fill it with distinction to himself and credit to his party. I want to assure him that he will have the utmost cooperation from those of us who sit on this side of the house.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): May I join in those congratulations, particularly because I remember the very happy associations that we had with the hon. gentleman who is named Deputy Speaker when we went to Great Britain in 1941. At that time we appreciated the fact that he was the chairman of the delegation and carried himself with distinction to himself and with honour to Canada. I am quite sure that he will fill the position of Deputy Speaker in the same manner in this house. May I also say that the Prime Minister omitted one qualification which I know that the hon. member has. He has not any ancestors; he is married and he has a family.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): The members of my group have something on me in this respect. I have not had an opportunity of meeting the Prime Minister's nominee. But we are happy to join the Prime Minister in his nomination and to offer our congratulations to the hon. member for Brantford City.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would suggest to the hon. member who has just been elected Deputy Speaker of this house that he should rise and make a graceful bow to all hon. gentlemen who have joined in his election to the important position he now holds.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 11.40 p.m.

Friday, September 28, 1945

The house met at three o'clock.

PARLIAMENTARY ASSISTANTS

ANNOUNCEMENT WITH RESPECT TO APPOINTMENT —DEPARTMENT OF RECONSTRUCTION

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister, who will not be present this afternoon, has asked me to table copy of order in council which I shall read:

His Excellency the Governor General in Council, on the recommendation of the Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King, Prime Minister, is pleased to appoint and doth hereby appoint George James McIlraith, Esq., M.P., parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Reconstruction, to assist the said minister within and without parliament in such manner and to such extent as the said minister may determine.

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE

PARTICIPATION OF CANADA—DELEGATION TO PARIS MEETING

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I table copies of order in council P.C. 6103 providing for the participation of Canada in the Twenty-seventh session of the international labour organization conference opening in Paris on October 15, 1945; also copies of P.C. 6162 appointing the Canadian delegation.

I think perhaps the house would be interested to know those who are going to Paris, and with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall read the names.

The government delegates are: Mr. Gray Turgeon, Vancouver, B.C. and Mr. Alfred Rive, Department of External Affairs; alternate, Mr. V. C. Phelan, Department of Labour. Secretary to the government delegates is Mr. T. L. Carter, Department of External Affairs.

The provincial government representatives accompanying the government delegation—at the expense, of course, of the provincial governments concerned—are: Hon. Antonio Barrette, Minister of Labour, Quebec; Mr. Jean-Pierre Despres, Department of Labour, Quebec; Hon. Charles Daley, Minister of Labour, Toronto; Hon. C. C. Williams, Minister of Labour, Regina.

The employers' delegate is Mr. Harry Taylor, personnel manager of Canadian National Carbon Company and member of the industrial relations committee of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, Toronto. The technical adviser to the employers' delegate is Mr. Allan Ross, of Ross-Meagher, Ltd., Ottawa.

The workers' delegate is Mr. J. Arthur D'Aoust, vice-president, Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, and vice-president of the International Brotherhood of Paper Makers, Montreal. Technical advisers to the workers' delegate are Mr. Birt Showler, vice-president, Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, and president of Vancouver, New Westminster and district trades and labour council, Vancouver; Mr. Norman H. Dowd, executive secretary of Canadian Congress of Labour, Ottawa; and Mr. Alfred Charpentier, president, of the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour, Montreal.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

VISIT OF PRIME MINISTER TO UNITED KINGDOM AND EUROPE—ACTING PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I had two or three questions to direct to the Prime Minister, but perhaps the Acting Prime Minister will answer them. Will he tell the house who will be Acting Prime Minister during the Prime Minister's absence overseas? Who will be the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, and who will lead the House of Commons? Will the Acting Prime Minister also tell the house whether it is the intention of the Prime Minister to appoint additional parliamentary assistants prior to his departure overseas?

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): On behalf of the Acting Prime Minister I should like to reply to the hon. member. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) will be Acting Prime Minister during the absence of the Prime Minister overseas. The hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) will be Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs. The Minister of Veterans Affairs will be acting President of the Council, and the last mentioned gentleman will endeavour to assist and cooperate with his hon. friends the leaders of the various parties, in the direction of the activities of this house.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Acting Prime Minister): The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) yesterday or the day before asked whether the government would give consideration to amending the rules of the house to provide for the establishment of a standing committee on social security, health, housing and public welfare. The answer is this. The government will have to give careful consideration to the question as to whether it is advisable to increase the number of standing committees, at least for the present session. As the hon. member indicates in his question, an amendment to the rules of the house would be necessary for this purpose. The subjects which the proposed committee would deal with are all subjects which could probably be considered appropriately by the standing committee on industrial relations.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

The hon. member for Eglinton also asked me the other day when the report of the national housing administration would be made to parliament. I am informed by the officials of that administration that they expect to have the report completed and in a position to be tabled by the end of next week.

Mr. ADAMSON: As a supplementary question, is it not the intention of the government to reestablish the two special committees that sat in the last house, the reconstruction committee and the social security committee?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is my understanding that those special committees are not to be reestablished.

DIVISIONS—MEMBERS PRESENT WHEN QUESTION PUT AND NOT VOTING—PAIRS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. Citation 68 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, second edition, reads as follows:

> If a member who has heard the question put does not vote, and the attention of the Speaker is directed to the fact, the latter will call upon him to declare on which side he votes; and his name will be recorded accordingly.

I understand that this citation can be invoked only at the time a vote is being taken, so I cannot now ask that anything be done about hon. members who refrained from voting last night. That is not my question of privilege. However, I do feel that if we as members of this house are to cooperate with Your Honour in insisting upon the observance of the rule that all hon. members in their places when the question is put should vote, I should call attention to the fact that a practice is developing which should be corrected.

The situation last evening was this. We realized that some pairing arrangements between government supporters and members of the official opposition had been made, but as far as those of us in this group were concerned we did not know what those arrangements were. When we noted certain hon. members to our right refraining from voting on the amendment to the amendment, we could only assume that they were paired. Later we discovered that this was not the case.

An hon. MEMBER: They were paired.

Mr. KNOWLES: Oh, no; the pairs are not listed in Hansard. I refer to the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) and the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell), who did not vote on the amendment to the amendment and who, as far as the record shows, were not paired. Had I known at the time that they were not paired, I would have called Your Honour's attention to this citation and asked you to have them declare on which side they were voting. As I have said already, it seems to me that if we are to co-operate with Your Honour in insisting upon the observance of what I believe to be a very good rule, namely, that every member present should vote, you might direct the attention of the chief whips to the matter and suggest that either one of two things be done; that when pairing arrangements are made, all the whips be advised of those arrangements, or that any member who is sitting in the house and is paired should indicate that fact after the vote has been taken.

Mr. MACKENZIE: On the point raised by my hon. friend, in the first place there is no such rule in this house. We discussed this matter very thoroughly in the committee that was appointed a year ago to look into certain amendments and changes to the rules of this house. This rule applies in some other parliaments, but it does not apply in this house. There was a far more flagrant breach of the rules of this house last evening, in that some hon. gentlemen came in and took their seats while the vote was being taken. In regard to pairs, parliament knows no pairs.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I ask the minister if he has read citation 69, which says:

The practice has not been changed in Canada where every member who has heard the question put is bound to vote.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes, and we studied that point last year very thoroughly. In the light of all the precedents, usages, customs and conventions of this assembly for many years, it is not the rule of this house.

Mr. KNOWLES: Show me where that is so.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Now that the question of voting has come up I think on a point of privilege I might refer to something which occurred last evening, so that hon. members will not think that in voting I broke a pair I had with the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. McCulloch). I was under the impression that this pair began to-day, and accordingly voted last evening. Apparently the hon. member for Pictou believed the pair began yesterday or the day before. If there has been any misunderstanding I rise simply to say that it was inadvertent, and a mistake on my part. I thought it only fair to say this for the benefit of hon. members opposite, and also that the hon. member for Pictou might understand the circumstances.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): With all due deference to what the minister has said, Mr. Speaker, I should like your ruling on this point, because I quite understand that I was obeying the rules of this house last evening. We had an experience of this nature in the last parliament, and the Speaker of that day certainly indicated that a member was not forced to vote if he had not made up his mind as to which way he should cast his vote. For future reference I should like to have your ruling in the matter.

Mr. IRVINE: Before you give your ruling, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs if he recalls a time some years ago when this very question was brought up. I cannot give the date at the moment; I did not know this matter would be discussed or I should have looked it up. I remember very well, however, that a few of us in this corner were compelled to vote under this very rule. So, unless it has been changed, that certainly was the rule under the Speaker of that day.

Mr. REID: Perhaps I may be allowed to say a word in order to keep the record clear. The hon. member who just spoke did not intimate to the house that on the occasion to which he refers the members who had not voted were named to the Speaker, whereas last evening no one was named as not having voted.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would say to the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) that in England members are compelled by the rules to vote, but in this house there is no rule obliging a member to vote. In answer to the hon. members who have questioned the practice of pairing in the house, may I draw their attention to paragraph 95 at page 49 of Beauchesne, third edition, where we find this:

Although there is no standing order in this regard, either here or in the English parliament, it is customary in both places for a member who has to be absent to agree with another member that he also shall be absent at the same time. Thus these members are "paired" and a vote is neutralized on each side of the question.

There can be no parliamentary recognition of this practice (pairing), although it has never been expressly condemned; and it is therefore conducted privately by individual members, or arranged by the gentlemen known as the "whips" who are entrusted by their political parties with the office of collecting their respective forces on a division.

So I may say that pairing is not recognized officially by our House of Commons.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, just to complete the record: If a rule is not observed, it should be taken out of the book of rules. At paragraph 69, page 25 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, we find this:

> Under ancient custom, refusal to vote was considered a serious parliamentary offence, but the practice was changed in 1906 by the British house adopting a standing order whereby a member is not obliged to vote. That standing order does not apply to the Canadian Commons. The practice has not been changed in Canada where every member who has heard the question put is bound to vote.

And as I understand it, if an hon. member calls your Honour's attention to the fact that a member has been in his seat and has not voted, he is bound to declare himself one way or the other.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I interrupt the hon. member?—just to help him. Since the rule was published there has been a decision by a Speaker of this House of Commons to the contrary effect. I am sorry I have not the reference with me, but that is the fact.

Mr. COLDWELL: Does that alter the rule?—because we have so many decisions. Sometimes decisions have to be made for the convenience of business in the house. It seems to me that if we have rules we should abide by them. Indeed, it seems to me no Speaker's ruling should supersede a written rule under a standing order adopted by the House of Commons.

Mr. MACKENZIE: These are just marginal comments; they are not binding rules. Only the words in the standing orders are binding.

Mr. MacINNIS: They are cited in the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.

Mr. MacINNIS: Then what value has a written citation? Can it be cited one day and have value, and cited the next day and have no value at all?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is done every day, in the courts.

Mr. COLDWELL: That being so, what value has a book of rules of this description? One can find something in one of these books of rules to meet almost any situation which may arise, and to support almost any decision.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. ROSS (Souris): It is like the bible.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I suggest that perhaps this discussion might now come to an end? No doubt it was the purpose of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to make this move for the purpose of drawing special attention to the fact that—

Mr. COLDWELL: No, no.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker will tell my hon. friend when he should speak and when he should not. While I am speaking I have the floor.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): We had the same experience last year.

Mr. GRAYDON: Their purpose has been served, in that they have drawn the attention of the public to the fact that two of our number did not, for various reasons, record their votes last night. I suggest that now the discussion might end—if their purpose has been served.

Mr. COLDWELL: The interpretation placed by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) upon what was said by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is entirely incorrect. I discussed this matter with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and we thought we should have it settled, because some of our new members do not fully understand the rules. We had told them that hon. members were bound to vote, and we think the situation should be cleared up. This was not done to bring before the house what any two members did or did not do—as a matter of fact I wish my hon. friend had not been challenged to name them, because it was not done with that intention at all.

Mr. GLEN: Mr. Speaker, this question has always been somewhat confused in this House of Commons. The hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine) spoke of an incident which occurred at a time when he was a member of the house. He has pointed out that on that occasion the matter was brought to the attention of the house and that the hon. member in question was requested to record his vote. A year ago when we were dealing with a revision of the rules this matter was considered carefully by hon. members of the committee. At that time they did not think they should make a recommendation to the house in this connection. The postion I always took when I occupied the Speaker's chair was that an hon. member who was in the house should record his vote; but if he did not do so the Chair had no power to compel him to do so.

Then, with regard to pairs; as has been already stated, pairs are not recognized in our rules. It is customary, however, between parties, for the convenience both of the house and of its members, that arrangements be made with regard to pairs. But so far as the rules of the house are concerned there is nothing which makes provision for them—although they are recognized by custom in the house.

MARSHAL ZHUKOV

INQUIRY AS TO VISIT TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. According to a White House statement reported in the press, Marshal Gregory Zhukov has been invited to visit Washington and will arrive on October 4. Will the Acting Prime Minister inform this house if consideration has been given to extending an invitation to Marshal Zhukov to visit this country?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Acting Prime Minister): The government has no official information with respect to the proposed visit of Marshal Zhukov, and until it has, I shall not be in a position to answer the question.

FEDERAL DISTRICT

BEAUTIFICATION OF OTTAWA AND SURROUNDING AREA AS NATIONAL MEMORIAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I should like to address the following questions to the Prime Minister, but possibly in his absence the Acting Prime Minister will answer them. I have already given notice of them. 1. Has the government consulted with veterans' organizations throughout Canada to see if they approve a national memorial taking the proposed form of the beautification of Ottawa and the surrounding district? 2. Has the government consulted—

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member should put that question on the order paper.

Mr. MACDONNELL: In deferring to your ruling, sir, may I say that I thought the question was of such immediate and widespread public interest that the government might think it well to answer it now.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must insist. It may be of public interest, but I do not see its urgency.

BUSINESS VISITS TO EUROPE

FACILITIES FOR FOOD, LODGING AND LIMITED TRANSPORTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): May I ask the Acting Prime Minister whether he has an answer to the question I asked the Prime Minister yesterday in regard to business men of Canada travelling in Europe?

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes; I was waiting for an opportunity to answer it. The question submitted yesterday by the hon member for Peterborough (Mr. Fraser) appears on page 494 of Hansard. I should perhaps read it to make the answer pertinent. It is as follows:

> A press dispatch from Paris appearing in the New York Times of yesterday quoted the American ambassador to France as saying that facilities for food, lodging and limited transportation for American business men will be provided through the United States Embassy over there on and after October 1, 1945. May I ask the Prime Minister what steps this government is taking to provide similar service to Canadians on business in France and anywhere in Europe where the army has quarters and messes?

This is the answer which has been prepared by the Department of External Affairs; We are informed that, as a result of discussions which took place some time ago between the state department and the war department, the United States military authorities had been requested to cooperate with the embassy in Paris in working out arrangements for accommodating and assisting United States business men on visits to France. The details of the arrangements were to be worked out in the field between the embassy and the military authorities. Such arrangements as are reported in the press would be in line with the proposals.

Canadian offices in liberated countries have given every assistance to Canadian business men and others who travel to those areas and will continue to do so. As the house is fully aware, food, housing and travel facilities are extremely scarce in liberated territories. The army has been in close contact with the Canadian embassies in France and Belgium on this question and has provided facilities for food and lodging whenever there were facilities available. These arrangements are being expanded.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

COUNCIL OF FOREIGN MINISTERS—PARTICIPATION OF CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yesterday a question was submitted to the Prime Minister, in his capacity of Secretary of State for External Affairs, by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). It appears at page 491 of Hansard, and is as follows:

I do not think the answer given by the Prime Minister quite covers what I have in mind. I was wondering whether any representations had been made regarding the disposition of persons and property. The question I had particularly in mind was this: Is Canada interesting herself in the fate of many of the people who are moving around Europe at the present time, the disposition of whom will be discussed by the foreign ministers in London?

The Secretary of State for External Affairs replied:

I should like to have that question stand. I will give a further answer to-morrow.

The answer I have been asked to make on his behalf is: As stated yesterday in particular relation to the Yugoslav-Italian frontier, the Canadian government has not put forward any representations respecting European boundaries. The government is, however, very much concerned with the effect which the peace settlements will have on future relationships with the community of nations.

As regards displaced persons, Canada has taken an active and responsible part in UNRRA which is the organization charged by the united nations with coordinating the work of caring for and repatriating displaced persons. Canada is also represented on the executive committee of the intergovernmental committee on refugees whose main task will be the care and settlement of persons who will not be able to return to their homes.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STRIKE AT FORD MOTOR PLANT, WINDSOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I should like to ask the Minister of Labour if he has any information to give to the house in regard to the progress made in the settlement of the Ford Motor Company strike.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I had notice of a question of a similar nature from the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Matthews), and as they both cut across the same thing perhaps I might deal with his question and the question of the hon. member for Vancouver East at the same time.

On Wednesday of this week I sent the following telegram to the president of the Ford Motor Company and to the president of Local 200, U.A.W.-C.I.O.

Arthur J. Rheaume, Mayor Windsor, has wired Minister of Labour for Ontario as well as myself as follows: "Telegrams were forwarded to-day urging Ford Motor Company of Canada Limited and union to request intervention of yourself and provincial Minister of Labour in present dispute. Company reply not yet received but union has authorized me by letter to request that you and the provincial minister of labour set a date for a meeting with union and company representatives either at Ottawa, Toronto or Windsor preferably the last mentioned." I have consulted by telephone Minister of Labour Hon. C. Daley for Ontario who is at Kirkland Lake to-day and I hereby invite the president of the company and one other and the president of the union and one other to meet with the Minister of Labour for Ontario and his deputy and with myself and my deputy at Minister of Labour's office Toronto on a date which is acceptable to you both. Arrangements could be made for meeting on Monday October first if this is acceptable or any other day next week. The meeting would be under my chairmanship and purpose would be to discuss the work stoppage with a view of convassing the possibilities of bringing about resumption of work.

So far no reply has been received from the union to the invitation to meet with the representatives of the Ford Motor Company in the presence of the Minister of Labour for Ontario and myself, but I understand from press reports that the union is willing to participate in this meeting.

A telegram was received last night from the president of the Ford Motor Company, which reads as follows:

Your wire twenty-sixth instant received inviting representatives of company to meet yourself and deputy and Hon. Mr. Daley and deputy together with representatives of union. Since and including thirteenth instant union in addition to illegally picketing company's factory premises has by means of mass unlawful picketing forcibly prevented company's office employees official of company and all persons having business with company's office from entering company's main office premises in this city. You will appreciate that without records and office facilities company's office work consequent upon cancellation of war contracts and with respect to reconversion as well as other important business matters which can be dealt with only in the main office is at a standstill. This unlawful deprivation by union of free and unobstructed ingress to and egress from the company's main office premises has been the subject of formal representation by the company to both municipal and provincial authorities but has now continued for fifteen consecutive days. Acceptance of your invitation in these circumstances would in the company's opinion constitute acquiescence in the unlawful action by the union and would invite similar tactics should future differences arise. Upon discontinuance of the above described mass unlawful picketing of main office premises the company and receipt of satisfactory assurance of no resumption thereof I am prepared to meet you in Toronto on October first or other day to be arranged accompanied by two other representatives of the company to discuss as suggested by you the work stoppage with a view of canvassing possibilities of bringing about resumption of work. If meeting arranged consider president of company and two other company representatives should participate and have no objection to equal number of union representatives acompanying union president.

W. R. Campbell, President
Ford Motor Company of Canada Limited.

I should like to make this further observation with regard to the condition which the company lays down before attending the proposed meeting. I would say that the alleged illegal picketing is a matter governed by the provisions of the criminal code, responsibility for the enforcement of which lies with the provincial authorities. I understand that information has already been laid against one employee charged with illegal picketing, and court proceedings are pending. It would be improper, therefore, for me to make any comment at this stage. I have, however, conveyed to the officers of the union the contents of the company's communication.

Mr. J. E. MATTHEWS (Brandon): It is only fair that I should say that the question to which the minister referred when he rose was to have been asked by me on behalf of the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Brown) who is unavoidably absent. It has been fully answered by the minister.

Mr. J. H. FERGUSON (Simcoe North): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Labour. Has an order or direction been given by his department to the selective service in Windsor or elsewhere that employees now on strike at the Ford Company's plant shall not be granted permits to seek work elsewhere?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I have no knowledge of such an order.

Mr. FERGUSON: May I ask the minister another question. If in Windsor selective service is denying permits to seek employment elsewhere—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member has asked this or a similar question already.

Mr. FERGUSON: No; this is an entirely different question arising out of the first one. May I continue?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes.

Mr. FERGUSON: If selective service officials in Windsor are denying Ford employees permits to seek employment elsewhere without the knowledge of the minister, will the minister rescind that order at once?

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not think my hon. friend wants to be clever, but let us be fair with one another. I have been under pressure; I just got into the house, following a late meeting of council. I am not objecting to these questions, you understand, but I gave my hon. friend what I considered to be a fair answer. It may be that even he does not know what he is talking about, you understand.

Mr. FERGUSON: I know the answer or I would not ask you.

Mr. MITCHELL: Just a moment. I listened while you were putting me over the jumps, so you can wait a moment now. It may be that this has to do with open permits, I do not know. But I want to say to my hon. friend that if he is in doubt or if he has a problem, if he will see me I will have Windsor called up and we will find out the exact situation there. Then if a remedy is needed it will be applied.

EFFECT OF STRIKE OF MONTREAL LONGSHOREMEN ON PERISHABLE GOODS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Labour, and his answer to one part of that question will perhaps be sufficient. During the day I have had an urgent long-distance telephone call from one of my constituents who is, perhaps, Canada's largest importer of Dutch bulb stock from Holland. In the Montreal harbour at the moment are two shipments of $50,000 each awaiting transhipment from the Dutch steamer Boskoop. I see you are about to rise, Mr. Speaker, but I assure you I shall establish at once the urgency of the question. The cargo, as I say, is now awaiting transhipment to the Canada Steamship Lines, but the longshoremen have not been working for some days. These goods are of the most perishable nature and there is great urgency about the question which I am going to ask. First of all, have the longshoremen gone back to work, and secondly, if not, what steps does the government propose to take with respect to perishable goods of this kind, which will not stand any lengthy delay in transhipment to other boats?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I may observe, by way of preface to my remarks, that it has been said this was a strike against meat rationing on the part of the longshoremen. I am assured by the officers of that organization that it was a strike against the people who were striking against meat rationing. That may seem peculiar, and I see that my hon. friends are smiling, but you cannot load ships on salads. You have to have solid food. The longshoremen themselves need meat to do the heavy work they have to do. However, I am glad to be able to assure my hon. friend that the strike is over. The first gangs went to work this morning, and we expect the port to be in full operation by to-morrow morning.

HOUSING

RELEASE OF BUILDING MATERIALS TO DISCHARGED SERVICE PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. A. KIDD (Kingston City): May I ask the Minister of Reconstruction if he has an answer to my question of yesterday?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): I was waiting for an opportunity to answer it. I regret that I was not in the house when the question was asked. The hon. member's query was as follows:

Will the minister kindly inform the house whether immediate steps can be taken to release building materials to discharged soldiers in order to enable them to build or remodel houses or places of business for themselves and their families?

Building materials are released automatically when a building permit is obtained. The government has no machinery for release of materials other than through the issuance of building permits, although they can be bought, of course, through the retail establishments in any locality. Permits are given freely for small houses, and usually for alterations of houses. With regard to larger houses the need is carefully assessed in order that available materials may be directed to the smaller type of houses.

As far as shops are concerned, it is not possible at this time to release materials either for building new shops or for remodelling existing ones. We feel that we must get the housing situation in hand before we can extend the territory for which building materials can be released. However, the material situation is improving greatly. It is wholly a matter of manpower. We are still short manpower in the production of foundry products, electrical and other trades, and we are very short indeed of construction labour for the work on the site. The situation, as I say, is improving, and I am hopeful that later this autumn we shall be able to release permits for the remodelling and perhaps the building of shops.

Mr. FRASER: The minister has said that material is not being released for shops. In that case how is it that permits are being granted for large gasoline stations throughout the country?

Mr. HOWE: That is a matter of helping veterans become reestablished. Such permits are granted to veterans. The difference is that ordinarily a gasoline station does not require the type of equipment which is short. The shortage is in plumbing fixtures, and particularly in millwork such as doors and windows. The ordinary gasoline station, which does not require work of this kind, is being authorized to a limited extent at the present time.

WAR AND DEMOBILIZATION

PROVISION FOR APPROPRIATION OF $1,365,000,000 FOR WAR PURPOSES, DEMOBILIZATION, PROMOTION OF TRADE AND INDUSTRY, ETC.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide, inter alia,

1. That sums not exceeding $1,365,000,000 be granted to His Majesty towards defraying any expenses or making any advances or loans that may be incurred or granted by or under the authority of the governor in council during the year ending March 31, 1946, for—

(a) the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada;

(b) the conduct of naval, military and air operations in or beyond Canada;

(c) the expeditious demobilization of the Canadian armed forces;

(d) promoting the continuance of trade, industry and business communications, whether by means of insurance or indemnity against war risk or in any other manner whatsoever; and

(e) the carrying out of any measure deemed necessary or advisable by the governor in council in consequence of the war.

2. That the governor in council be empowered to raise by way of loan under the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, such sum or sums of money, not exceeding in the whole the sum of $1,365,000,000 as may be required for the purpose of defraying such expenses or making such advances or loans, the principal and interest of any such loan to be a charge upon and payable out of the consolidated revenue fund.

3. That the governor in council be empowered to reexpend, advance or loan moneys that may be received by way of refund or repayment of advances, loans or expenditure under the War Appropriation Acts of 1939 (second session), 1940, 1941, 1942, 1943, 1944 and 1945.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I believe that you, sir, and the house are already familiar with the general purpose and nature of this resolution as a result of the consideration of the previous resolution and bill last week, which provided for immediate use a portion of the funds asked for under this resolution.

The form of this resolution is almost identical with those which have been introduced in previous years, asking for authority to introduce a bill designed to provide the appropriation required for war expenditures. There is a difference, however, which hon. members will no doubt have noted, in the detail of the resolution, which is that item (c) of paragraph 1 is a new item, providing explicitly that the funds being appropriated may be used "for the expeditious demobilization of the Canadian armed forces". This specific reference to demobilization will be carried over into the bill, both by the inclusion of the clause mentioned and by appropriate references in the title and preamble. This shift in emphasis to include demobilization is similar to that which took place after the last war in 1919, when parliament passed the Demobilization Appropriation Act. In view of the substantial number and amount of continuing costs of the war other than demobilization proper, I think it is more correct at this time to entitle our bill "The War Expenditure and Demobilization Appropriation Act".

I think it is essential at the beginning to realize that war expenditures proper must continue for some time after the actual end of hostilities. We have still very large bills to pay for the actual costs of equipping and supplying our fighting forces, particularly in the case of the army. Our forces are still mobilized and in many cases still beyond Canada, and they must be provided not only with pay and allowances, but with food, shelter, clothing and various other supplies and services. Some of our forces are engaged in the occupation of enemy territory and costs will continue to be incurred on this account for some time. The process of demobilization and discharge of the forces itself involves heavy expenditures apart from those of gratuities and re-establishment credits. The sudden termination of our war production involves very heavy expenditures in reimbursing contractors for costs which they had already incurred for production that will not now be needed and for other costs of cancelling war contracts. Many of the other more indirect costs of the war must continue, at least for a brief period after the end of hostilities—for example, the cost of the subsidies which are necessary in order to maintain our stabilization policy against the serious threats of inflation arising from shortages created by the war. Many outstanding accounts between Canada and Allied countries, particularly the United Kingdom and the United States have still to be determined in detail and settled.

It is clear, therefore, that quite apart from any future operations, however fast we manage to return to peace-time conditions and however strictly we may limit the incurring of new costs, the government will be faced for some months with heavy expenditures arising from the war. It is, of course, the government's earnest desire, as I am sure it is the desire of all members on both sides of the house, that war expenditures shall be terminated now as soon as possible. I should also state that it is our hope, and I am sure it will be the hope of the house, to return as quickly as possible to the normal peace-time practice of presenting detailed estimates to parliament to be voted in detail, rather than total appropriations to be voted as a whole, which practice has been and is still necessary in war appropriations, where so many uncertain amounts and unforeseen contingencies must be anticipated.

The amount of the appropriation for which the government is now asking is $1,365,000,000. Adding this to the interim appropriation of $2,000,000,000 provided for war purposes by the last parliament in April of this year, we obtain a total for the fiscal year of $3,365,000,000. This total may be compared with total war expenditures for other years, but in doing so it is necessary to include in other years the amounts requested for Mutual Aid and similar purposes, because this year Mutual Aid was included as one of the purposes for which the interim appropriation could be used. It will be noted that this amount of $3,365,000,000 is $1,085,000,000 less than the total of the war and the mutual aid appropriations provided last year. Thus it represents already a very substantial reduction in our war expenditures, despite the fact that it contains very large amounts of bills carried over from previous years and large costs for the termination of war production. Moreover, it will be noted that the amount required for the latter half of this year is very much less than that required for the first half, even though many of the expenditures to be made in the latter half were really incurred during the period of fighting.

Before proceeding to speak of the estimates on which our total appropriation is based, and to note some of the factors affecting such estimates, I wish to emphasize that there is still a great deal of difficulty in forecasting our expenditures accurately, and therefore in making firm estimates even now when the fighting is over and when half the fiscal year is finished. In many cases, of course, our estimating problems are easier because we no longer have to make highly uncertain assumptions about the course of military operations and the amounts of equipment and supplies that will be necessary for them. The remaining new costs to be incurred are largely those connected with personnel, and once the programme of demobilization has been reasonably well established, we can expect to forecast with some accuracy costs of pay and allowances, travelling, transportation, and similar items. On the other hand, a great many of the costs which will be seen in the detailed estimates of the services represent amounts still to be paid in respect of equipment, services and supplies obtained some time ago. In many cases substantial amounts have already been paid by the Department of Munitions and Supply for these items, but the final bills have not yet been presented to and paid by the service departments. In the relatively short time since the termination of hostilities, it has not been possible to calculate with accuracy how much one should therefore allow in the estimates for refunds to the Department of Munitions and Supply accounts, which should be deducted from the total amount required by the government as a whole. In other cases, supplies have been obtained from the United Kingdom and the United States and some payments made on account, but there remains a balance to pay which it is difficult to forecast until final decisions are reached in regard to the details of amounts and prices. Finally, there is the cost of the termination of war contracts, arising from the sudden end of hostilities last month. There has not been time in the last few weeks fully to assess the effect of that happy event upon the costs of war production. Immediately upon receiving word that Japan was prepared to surrender, the government proceeded to cancel thousands of contracts for the production of munitions and other supplies, and, of course, our chief concern was to see that these cancellations were made as promptly and economically as possible. After this has been done, much work is still needed to determine exactly what the costs on all this multitude of accounts will be, and I must confess that in framing our estimates for the amounts required for cancellation of contracts we have had to proceed on the basis of informed judgment of those in the best position to know, rather than on a detailed analysis of accounts which cannot be completed quickly enough for our purpose.

I have stressed these points about outstanding accounts because I believe it is vital for the house to realize, first, that many of the costs still to be paid are in respect of operations now completed, and, secondly, that there is still considerable uncertainty as to exactly what these will turn out to be.

For the convenience of members of the house in the debate on this appropriation, I propose to place on Hansard, if I have the unanimous consent of the house, tables showing the various estimates for departments, which have been prepared and considered by the government in arriving at the figure for the appropriation for which parliament is being asked. The first of these tables is a summary one, listing the amounts required for the various departments, showing also the amounts which it is expected would be charged to active assets and the deduction for the estimated amount that is expected to be recoverable from the munitions production allotment fund of the Department of Munitions and Supply.

War Expenditures and Demobilization Appropriations 1945-46

In all cases we are showing the amounts which have already been allotted to these various departments and purposes out of the interim appropriation granted by parliament in April of this year, and the additional amount which is expected to be required for the remainder of this fiscal year for the settlement of outstanding accounts and for expenditure incurred and paid during the remainder of the year. It will be noted that all about $86,000,000 of the $2,000,000,000 interim appropriation has already been allotted to departments. The totals for the various categories for the year as a whole are also given. While these details, taken all together, add up to a rather formidable table, I think the hon. members will appreciate having this information in this way for convenient reference.

I am also proposing to place upon Hansard at the same time a table of charges to the war appropriations by departments and main categories for each of the past five fiscal years. This record of actual expenditures will, I think, be of considerable use to members in placing in proper perspective the amounts currently required. Those who wish to compare the present appropriation and estimates with previous appropriations and estimates will find those for recent years conveniently set forth in Hansard of February 11, 1944, in the speech which I made in introducing the legislation last year, corresponding to the present legislation. The table is as follows:

Hon. members will note that the amount which the army estimates it will require for the current fiscal year is approximately $1,068 million, which compares with an estimate of $1,535 million for last year and actual expenditures for last year of $1,244 million. I should point out that it has always been particularly difficult to forecast the army's requirements accurately because it has drawn the bulk of the supplies it has currently required from United Kingdom stocks and paid for them as they were used. Consequently its expenditures depended very much upon the actual course of operations, and it was necessary to leave a considerable margin of safety in such items as ammunition, armament, and fighting vehicles. On the other hand, this year the army in particular is faced with a large accumulation of outstanding accounts to be settled for items supplied to it in previous years both from Canadian and United Kingdom sources. This will be quite evident to members if they examine with care the items for the additional amounts required in the balance of the fiscal year in the various categories under army services, where considerable amounts are shown for items of which obviously no substantial future deliveries will now be necessary. Of course, the principal questions of substance in regard to the expenditures which the army will be incurring henceforward are the rates of demobilization and repatriation, and the size and nature of the occupation forces and the continuing army establishment. These are matters which must be left for the Minister of National Defence to explain and to discuss with the house, and I shall therefore not attempt to make any comment upon them except to say that on financial grounds, as well as other equally important grounds, the government has been determined to see that nothing is allowed to stand in the way of the most rapid and most equitable repatriation and demobilization of our forces.

For naval services the amount of the estimate for the current year is approximately $300 million, which compares with an estimate last year of $410 million, and actual expenditures last year of $417 million. It will be noted from an examination of the details in the case of the navy that there are still substantial amounts to pay on outstanding accounts for equipment, ammunition, armaments, vessels and supplies of one sort and another which were obtained during the course of hostilities. The fairly rapid pace of demobilization in the naval services is indicated by the fact that pay and allowances for the last seven months of the year, that is, the additional amounts required for this category, are only about half what they are for the first five months, despite the fact that special factors like clothing allowances and extra leave upon discharge swell the costs of this item.

In the case of air services, the estimate requested, after allowing for recoverable items, is approximately $600 million compared with an estimate last year of $1,090 million and actual expenditures last year of approximately $1,260 million. It will be noted in the case of air services that expenditures for the latter part of the year are substantially below those for the first five months. When one examines the details, the reason for this becomes evident as it shows up in the practical disappearance of the cost of maintenance of overseas squadrons. This is possible because the air force does not have now such large outstanding accounts as the other services have for supplies already received. The reason for this is that the cost of the overseas squadrons is paid monthly and there are not the same outstanding problems in determining the rate of such payments as there are in the case of the army.

I think it is unnecessary for me to make any particular comment on the items for sundry services under the Department of National Defence, which have been estimated for the current year at approximately $17 million as compared with $22 million last year. I should point out, however, that for administrative reasons the responsibility for military relief was transferred to the Mutual Aid board from the Department of National Defence, and consequently the expenditures on, and estimates for, this item no longer appear among the sundry national defence services, as I indicated they would in April of this year. Now that I have made reference to this item, I may well go on to point out that expenditures on it last year are shown at a total of $50 million, and the estimates of the amount required this year are shown to be $34 million, all of which have already been allotted. These expenditures represent the cost of supplies procured in Canada and shipped overseas for distribution by the combined military authorities during the course of military operations and in the zones of military control. They represent a part of the cost of military operations which takes the form of the provision of supplies to civilian populations on whom the military are dependent for assistance and co-operation or for whose maintenance they are responsible during the time they are in control of the territory. The countries receiving such supplies have been requested to pay for them, and it is expected that a large part of the moneys expended in this way will be recoverable.

It will be noted that the estimate for the Department of Munitions and Supply for the current year is $282 million, as compared with an estimate of $183 million last year and actual expenditures last year of approximately $216 million. These figures all exclude the effects of the amount recoverable from munitions production allotment fund and allotted to other expenditures outside the department which is shown separately at the bottom of the summary table. The nature of the expenditures for which this estimate is requested has largely changed from previous years, as now the main item is $175 million to cover the costs arising from the termination of contracts. These termination or cancellation costs are to be covered by one large item in this way rather than by individual items under the various headings appropriate to the use for which the deliveries were intended had the war gone on. Broadly speaking, this item therefore represents the cost of terminating our war production suddenly as a result of the unexpectedly early end of the hostilities against Japan. I should add that this figure does not represent the total cost, as there is also likely to be necessary some writing off of amounts advanced for production out of the munitions production allotment fund. As I have already warned the house, however, any estimate of these termination costs at this time is only an informed guess and it will be some months before we can be sure whether the figure included here is too high or too low.

The costs of Mutual Aid this year have been met from the interim war appropriation passed by parliament in April, as was specifically authorized in that appropriation, as well as from some funds carried over from the earlier Mutual Aid appropriations. Mutual Aid requirements were particularly heavy during the first five months of this current year—indeed, right up until the end of hostilities. Shipments of munitions and other war supplies to allied countries were at a high level in the opening months of the year while hostilities were still proceeding in Europe. After victory in Europe, the need for munitions and military supplies fell off substantially, but a good deal of war production was still required, particularly of aircraft and naval vessels for the war in the Pacific. On the other hand, there was a very drastic decline in the expenditures overseas of the Canadian army and air force, which had been providing the United Kingdom with Canadian dollars to pay for the cost of war supplies required from Canada. Consequently the need for Mutual Aid on the part of Britain remained at a high level during the period of intensive preparation for large scale operations in the Pacific.

In the figures of requirements for the current year for Mutual Aid, I have separated those for UNRRA, which will continue, from those for allied countries to which transfers of supplies as Mutual Aid were terminated as of September 2. The total allotted to Mutual Aid from the interim appropriation was $720,224,000. The amount required to complete our first contribution to UNRRA, in addition to the expenditures last year, is $65,907,000, all of which will, I expect, be spent this year. Deducting this from the total allotment leaves $654,317,000 as the amount required for Mutual Aid to allied countries from this year's appropriation. This figure includes the estimated cost of production of certain items not delivered by September 1, but which will be completed in the expectation that they can be sold. The proceeds of such sales cannot yet be estimated, but they will in due course be credited to our Mutual Aid account.

It will be noted that I have included a figure of $25,000,000 for UNRRA in the further amounts required for the current year but not yet provided. This is intended to enable us to furnish, before the end of our fiscal year, a portion of a second contribution to UNRRA, which the Canadian government has agreed to make, provided that the United States and other contributing nations will also make a second contribution. The total of our second contribution would be the same as our first, that is, one per cent of our estimated national income for the year ended June 20, 1943, which amounts to $77,000,000 in all. It would mainly take the form of contributions of Canadian supplies, but it may be that we will contribute a portion in cash, as we did the first time, to provide UNRRA itself with some funds to meet expenses in Canada and elsewhere. I might add that in fact UNRRA is spending a large amount of its own free funds in Canada, as practically the whole of our first contribution was committed for the purchase of Canadian supplies at a fairly early date this year. I feel sure that all Canadians will be gratified that Canada is able to furnish substantial amounts of urgently needed supplies to the poor and suffering people of Allied countries through this democratic, international organization. The house will, I understand, hear further about UNRRA, if it wishes, during the debate on the war appropriation, and there will be an opportunity to discuss Canada's part in UNRRA.

The amount estimated to be required for the Department of Veterans Affairs is, of course, considerably higher than in previous years. It includes pension costs for the veterans of this war and for various others who have been accorded pension rights similar to the armed services such as merchant seamen, fishermen, civil defence workers, etc. It also includes costs of hospitalization and rehabilitation benefits for veterans. It does not, however, include the cost of war service gratuites and reestablishment credits, which are payable by statute out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund. The amount which we estimate will be required for war service gratuities and re-establishment credits is approximately $240 million, which will, of course, be an expenditure in addition to the appropriation being requested under this resolution and in addition to the amounts specified in the main estimates which have been presented to the house.

It will be noted that only the relatively small amount of $5 million for reconstruction projects has been included in the estimated amounts required this year. This is intended to cover only the costs incurred before the end of March next in projects not directly provided for by other departments, such as public works or housing, and which may be required, it is believed, on a relatively small scale in a few localities to meet the danger of unemployment in those areas of persons who cannot reasonably be expected to move to other areas where work is available and to make a start on some urgent developmental projects. This is in accordance with the general policy explained to the house the other evening by the Minister of Reconstruction. As he explained, there is a large volume of private work ready to go forward as soon as materials and labour can be made available for it. Much of this private investment is necessary if Canadians are going to be able to have steady and remunerative jobs in industry. In addition, all available building materials and, I believe, building labour, are urgently needed now for the building of houses, and we do not wish to utilize our scarce building supplies for public projects that can be deferred until later, when the acute housing demands have been met. So far as one can tell at this time, it appears that total expenditures in Canada, private, public and for exports, will be sufficient to maintain employment as a whole at satisfactory levels, despite the rapid rate of demobilization and the termination of war production. There will obviously be problems in the movement of workers to take advantage of the new demands which are taking the place of the war demands, which have now ceased. I do not myself believe that large expenditures on reconstruction projects will be needed in the next six months to facilitate this process of readjustment. The general policy and philosophy of the government in regard to public investment have, of course, been set forth at considerable length in the proposals made by the government to the dominion-provincial conference on reconstruction, and I do not believe it is necessary for me to enter upon them here. What I do wish to point out is that the provision made in the present appropriation is based upon an appraisal of the situation over the next six months only, and cannot be taken as any guide to the scale of reconstruction expenditures that will later be required.

In conclusion I would like to say a word or two about the general scale and nature of our expenditures for the current year. Adding together the appropriations for war expenditures, the items covered in the main and supplementary estimates, and the items to which I have referred above for gratuities and re-establishment credits, one obtains a total of between $4,600 million and $4,700 million for expenditures in the current fiscal year. To this must be added certain other cash requirements, particularly those for export credits and the financing of the foreign exchange control board, which will bring our total requirements for the year above $5 billion. These are formidable figures. They show that the scale of our financial operations remains at the high levels achieved in the war. They make clear that the task of the Minister of Finance is still a difficult one. On the other hand, they mask to some extent the decline—the rapid decline —that is already occurring in the government's demands upon goods and services of the community. Already the government has cancelled practically all its contracts for purchases for war purposes. The substantial expenditures still to be made on these accounts represent almost entirely settlements in respect of past operations and the cancellation of contracts. At the same time, our armed forces are being demobilized as rapidy as is reasonably possible in all the circumstances. Indeed, I believe that this month the total number of men being released exceeds an average of 2,000 a day. The government is paying these men substantial amounts of deferred pay, of pay for leave upon discharge and clothing allowances, and will continue payments to them for some months in the form of gratuities and reestablishment credits. These men will nevertheless be available for useful employment in other fields. Even our expenditures under the main estimates this year include a much higher proportion than normal of what we may term "transfer payments," which do not represent a demand on the part of the government for either goods or services. This applies to the very large figures both for family allowances and for interest on the public debt, which, taken together, constitute well over half of the total of these estimates.

Bearing these facts in mind. I think it is evident that despite the apparently large totals of government expenditure this fiscal year, the activities of the government are in fact being rapidly curtailed, and supplies and services are being released quickly for use in meeting the demands of Canadian enterprise and Canadian consumers.

I should like before concluding to say a word or two about the scale of our expenditures and other cash requirements in relation to the ninth victory loan. This loan is to be obtained in the latter part of next month and the early part of November. It is to be our greatest victory loan, the climax of the series of outstanding successes which have been achieved in this vital part of our war finance. We have already announced that the minimum objective for the loan is to be one and one-half billion dollars—the largest objective we have ever set. It is natural that many people should be surprised that we should need so much money now that the fighting is all over, and I want to make the reason clear.

In the first place it should be realized that this is really two loans in one—it is intended to cover our borrowing needs for a year, and not for half a year, as previous victory loans have done. This is possible because our expenditures are declining rapidly and we believe we can now get along with one loan—if it is a big one. Our last two victory loans have each produced about a billion and a half dollars, which in each case has met our needs for about half a year. This new loan, which we hope and expect will exceed its objective and yield well over one and one-half billion, is intended to cover our needs for a full year. There will be no victory loan or similar loan next spring.

During the year following this ninth victory loan, and for which it is expected to provide the moneys required over and above our revenues, our expenditures and other cash requirements, including the loans we propose to make to allied nations for reconstruction, will probably amount in all to about four billion dollars. About thirty per cent of this will be for the normal and continuing expenses of civil government. The balance will include the costs of demobilization and rehabilitation of our servicemen, the costs of bringing them home from overseas, the costs of our occupation forces and post-war military forces, part of the cost of terminating war production, and some costs for reconstruction and new post-war development. It will also include hundreds of millions—how many I cannot yet say—for loans to allied nations for supplies urgently needed from Canada during the period of reconstruction. The government intends to ask authority from parliament in this session to make such loans to allied countries on a large scale.

In view of these large requirements I believe we must borrow something approaching two billion dollars for this period. This is a huge amount, even though it is much less than the totals we have borrowed in recent years. Something on this scale is required, however, if the total reduction in our expenditures and cash requirements is not to be reflected solely in our borrowing. It is with these needs in mind that we established one and one-half billion as the minimum objective for the ninth victory loan. I hope and believe that we will be able to exceed this objective by a good margin and thereby obtain from this one loan nearly all the borrowed money we shall require to carry us through until the fall of next year.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I am sure that the house has listened with a great deal of interest to what the minister has had to say. It is not my intention to speak at this time. I had intended to speak for half an hour or more, and will take the opportunity of doing so later. For the information of the house I may say that one of our members, who is very much concerned with the war appropriation measure, has to leave, and I am therefore giving the floor to him. I refer to the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green).

Before he rises to speak I should like to say a word or two with respect to one item mentioned by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), namely, the forthcoming victory loan. Plans for the securing of that loan is the task of the government, but I wish to say to the house at this time that we shall be glad to lend our support to the successful flotation of that loan. With these brief remarks I give the floor to the hon. member for Vancouver South because what I have to say can be said at a later time.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I am very grateful to my leader for giving me this opportunity to speak, and to the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell), who also agreed that I should go ahead.

I propose to say a few words about our defence forces and something about the policy that will be adopted with regard to them. I had intended to make my suggestions when the house is in committee, and I am a little premature in making them now on behalf of my party, but I am sure that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Abbott) and the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Gibson) will understand my reasons for doing so.

We are convinced that it would be in the interests of the house and of the country if the Minister of National Defence would make some broad statement of government policy with regard to Canada's defence forces in the years that lie ahead, rather than making two statements, one for the navy and one for the army, with a third statement to come from the Minister of National Defence for Air. It will be very difficult for the hon. members to give proper consideration to the policy if it comes piecemeal, namely, if the navy policy comes first and then two or three days later the army policy, and finally two or three days after that the air force policy. We should like to know the general picture. It may be that the air force is to be greater, as compared with the other forces, than before the war, or the same may be true of the navy or the army. We should like to have the over-all picture at the opening of the debate if the government can arrange to give it to us.

It seems to me that at the present time the Canadian people are very uncertain as to what the defence policy of this nation should be; perhaps there is some uncertainty in the minds of the members of the house and of the ministry, because it is a very difficult problem to solve. But there are certain facts which should be kept in mind. The first is that our civilization has been saved by our efforts during the last war. That is something we should never overlook. We should also remember that for a whole year the British peoples—I mean the peoples of the different nations of the commonwealth and of the colonial empire—stood alone between our enemies and the destruction of civilization. None of the peoples of the empire have any reason to hang their heads over the part they have played during the war. And of course that is true of Canada. Our fighting power was used to great advantage and was a real factor in winning the war. Our production of supplies and equipment has been splendid, and we have every reason to be proud of the part we have played.

Now Canada and the other nations of the world who believe in freedom are determined that there shall be no more wars; but rather than take the attitude which was taken after the last war by saying, "Now let us forget all about war; there will never be war again," we are determined to defend the peace by force if necessary. I think that is the attitude of every nation that believes in freedom. Canada must play her part in defending the peace. There are other factors, too, which must be kept in mind. There have been extensive scientific developments. I need only mention radar, rocket projectiles and the atomic bomb, which is made primarily from uranium from the pitchblende found in our own Northwest Territories. That fact alone should give Canadians a good deal of concern over our future defence policy. As I say, there have been tremendous scientific developments during the period of the war. Another fact is that Canada is now more vulnerable than ever before. I certainly hope this may not be, but I think we must bear in mind that with all these developments Canada might be the battleground if there should be another war.

Having those facts in mind, various members of the official opposition have given consideration to certain broad principles which we believe can be approved by everyone in this house and which we think will help the Canadian people to crystallize an opinion as to what the defence policy of Canada should be. In the first place we believe that two obligations in regard to defence should be recognized by the house and the Canadian people. The first is that we must be prepared to defend Canada to the very best of our ability. The second is that we must remain in a position to live up to our commitments to the united nations organization. This means that we must be prepared to do our share, by force if necessary, to maintain world peace. We must not get into the frame of mind where we expect somebody else, somebody else's sons, to be responsible for our defence and for maintaining world peace.

That is the first broad principle. The second is that we must not destroy the efficiency of our fighting forces. We on this side of the house are very much concerned for fear that is happening at the present moment. There is a great movement to demobilize, which is a perfectly proper thing to do; but we have met with this situation. Young officers have come in to us. For example, I had a young officer of the navy, with a distinguished career, come to me and say, "I should like to carry on in the Canadian navy. I think it is a grand profession; I think there is a service to be rendered to Canada and to the world, and I should like to stay on. But I cannot find out what the conditions are to be. I do not know what the rates of pay or the pensions are to be; or how many men will be required; as a result I have made up my mind to get out of the navy and go back into business." We had a young battalion commander, twice decorated for gallantry, one of the outstanding soldiers from my province of British Columbia, come in and say the same thing. He wanted to stay in the Canadian army, but he could not find out anything definite and he was not prepared to wait for a two-year period and take a chance on being able then to get back into business. So he decided to get out just as quickly as he could. We have had the same position taken by outstanding men in the air force, and I think it is also true of skilled men in the ranks of all the services. I quite realize the government's difficulty. I know it is frightfully hard to draw up a definite policy at this stage. But there is a time element which enters into the picture, and the human factor must also be considered. Perhaps the better the man is the more determined he will be to get out if he does not have any reasonable assurance that he can make a career in the armed forces of Canada. We all know what happened after the last war, during which the Canadian corps had a record second to none; we were all intensely proud to belong to that corps, and the same was true of the air force and the navy; yet after the war very little attempt was made to maintain efficiency.

Now here we are again with very efficient forces, none better in the world. Let us adopt a policy that will enable us to maintain efficiency even while we have to cut down the size of the services. I do not think we can afford to delay. The same thing is true with regard to equipment and supplies. Let us remain in a position to be able to manufacture, as much as possible, whatever equipment is needed for our forces. We did very well in that regard during the war; let us make sure we can continue to carry on in the same way. If we do not take these steps and trouble does come again, the price of our failure and neglect will be paid with the lives of our sons. They are the men who will have to pay the shot if this house does not adopt a proper policy at this time. Mind you, Mr. Speaker, in advocating efficiency I am not advocating waste. We intend to check very carefully for any waste that may be found in the appropriations, but we believe that efficiency must be the main consideration, certainly during the period which lies immediately ahead, while everything is up in the air and no one can tell what the world situation will be.

Our third broad principle is that the defence forces must be given the help of our scientists. Every facility must be afforded to the defence forces to enable them to keep up to date and to get the most modern improvements, not only in the way of equipment but also in the way of training. During last winter or perhaps early in the spring arctic and sub-arctic exercises were carried out in western Canada by the Canadian army. I believe one exercise was conducted in northern Saskatchewan and one in British Columbia. In the latter province it took place between the main lines of the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National but still it was a sub-arctic exercise. I believe those should be extended; that the forces should be able to carry on further exercises of that type. They should be able to carry on exercises in the Northwest Territories up toward the arctic, up above where these pitchblende deposits are located, and in the Mackenzie river district. They certainly will never be able to do that if the attitude of the house and of the Canadian people is to be the same as it was after the last war. The carrying out of exercises such as I suggest would help open up that northern country. I believe that in due course several hundreds of thousands of people can be settled in northern Canada, and that there can be a great development in that area. This has happened in Siberia, where the Russians have had outstanding success; and there is no reason why in our country Canadians cannot do the same; if the army and the air force working together could carry out exercises of that type it would be a great help in opening up that northern country. There are many other things that could be done if we had efficient forces properly supported by the House of Commons and by the people of Canada.

The fourth broad principle is that there should be the closest coordination in training and in types of equipment among the different nations of the empire, and also with the United States. This must always be borne in mind. A good example of the success of this type of venture is to be found in the British commonwealth air training plan. We cannot stand alone; we must work with other people, and I think the natural thing for us to do is to coordinate our efforts with those of other British peoples and of the people of the United States.

These are the four broad principles we suggest. We believe in them; we are convinced that they are at least worthy of the most careful consideration of the house and the people of Canada. In connection with their consideration, and for the benefit of the defence forces of Canada, we believe it would be helpful if there were set up a standing committee of this house on defence matters.

In the United States house of representatives there is a committee on naval affairs and one on military affairs; I believe that they have similar committees in the senate. We see no reason why we could not have committees of that type in Canada; in such circumstances we would be in a position to call chiefs of staff before such committees, and to find out their reasons for doing certain things and for wishing to have certain plans adopted. In this way, too, we would get the members of the House of Commons and the Canadian people more solidly behind the defence forces. In these modern times the defence of a country involves every man, woman and child. It is no longer a matter of a few trained men; everybody is vitally interested. I am sure great help would come from civilian members who happened to serve on committees of that kind. We ask for support of this suggestion from the various parties in the house.

That is all I have to propose to-day. I repeat the hope that everybody will support us in our submissions. We think the defence of Canada, the constitution, the training and the work to be done by her fighting forces should be above politics, and something to which we should all agree.

May I repeat the request I made when opening, that the Minister of National Defence try to give us an over-all picture when he makes his statement, which probably will not now be made until the first of next week.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has placed before us a most comprehensive outline of the proposed expenditures for the coming year for war purposes and demobilization. It was a lengthy and detailed statement which, of course, will be discussed more thoroughly when the house goes into committee.

May I take this opportunity to congratulate the hon. member who has just spoken. I believe he placed his views before the house in a clear manner, and in a non-partisan spirit which should be appreciated by all of us. In his observations he raised some questions and made some suggestions which are worthy of more than passing consideration.

It seems to me that when we are discussing these estimates on this occasion we should consider them in a manner very much along the lines suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), namely, in the light of the policies we are likely to follow in the next few years. I agree with him that those policies cannot immediately take shape in a concrete form. But at least when we are discussing the problems arising out of defence and demobilization I suggest we should keep in mind the kind of external policy Canada will have to follow in the next few years.

It was that phase of the problem I had intended to discuss this afternoon, because obviously one has had no time to consider the very much detailed and comprehensive financial report which has been placed before the house by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). I should like to say, as the hon. member for Vancouver South implied, that the situation to-day psychologically is vastly different from the situation which we all faced at the end of the first world war. At the end of that war I think many were filled with the idea that perhaps we had seen the last of all the great wars, that we were about to organize some form of collective security which would ensure universal peace for a long time. There was a very high idealism—a Christian pacifism, if you will—which permeated the minds of most men and women of good will in every part of the world and in every party. But in the last ten years there has been disillusionment.

Mr. REID: Not all countries were thinking of peace.

Mr. COLDWELL: I believe there has been disillusionment in the last ten years, and I am speaking of what might be called Christian countries, and men and women of good will.

Mr. REID: Germany was not.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am not including Germany, because no one could include that country as a country having Christian ideals from the rise of Hitler in 1933 to the present. But I believe it is true to say there was that feeling throughout the democratic world. I regret very much to say that to-day to a large degree that feeling is absent; and to a considerable degree I believe that absence can be traced to a feeling of uncertainty with respect to the future. Even those of us who had the privilege of attending the great conference at San Francisco realized while we were there that there were great dangers in the international situation. There were tremendous difficulties to iron out, and we realized that we had to consider the future defence of our various countries and of peace itself very realistically indeed.

Whether we have witnessed, as some of us did, the flying bombs going over London a year ago, or whether we have only read about them and seen pictures in the moving-picture theatres, and whether we have only read of the atomic bomb, I believe we have learned another lesson and know perfectly well to-day that any form of isolation must be entirely removed from our minds. Isolation is not a policy any more—if it ever was. We are all vulnerable to attack from without, in the event of another war. We have to hope and trust and pray that the nations of the world, realizing the danger that besets them, will not again turn to the dreadful arbitrament of war, if I may put it in that way. We have to face the future realistically and do all that must be done for the defence of our own country and our own civilization.

When we have approved the united nations charter we may be in a better position to see what Canada should really do, but until that is done we must consider the defence problems of this country from the point of view of this country and of the allied nations with which this country has cooperated throughout the entire war. I was hoping that by this time the nations of the world would have adopted the united nations charter and that perhaps some of its provisions might be operative now, particularly in so far as the security system was concerned. Under the security council there will be established a military staff representing the general staffs of the five principal powers. That military staff will be obligated to enter into agreements with the various nations that adhere to the charter. Hence we should get some idea of the part that Canada should play in the world security situation. We do not know that at the present time, and consequently we have to gear our policy to what this house, this government and this country believe to be in their interests at the present time. I do not know when the military staff of the united nations will be established, and I do not know when Canada will be called upon to enter into some agreement for the general security of the world.

This is what I really had in mind when I rose to speak this afternoon. In all probability this was the last of what we might call the traditional wars, wars in which great armies moved and men fought in close combat. The rocket bomb and the application of atomic energy to bombs have provided a new phase of warfare and one of which we must take cognizance at the present time.

The hon. member for Vancouver South spoke a few moments ago of the necessity of maintaining our scientific and industrial strength. It is altogether probable that scientific research and industrial strength may be of greater import in the future than our armies. In looking over these estimates I was surprised and sorry to see that there has been no increase in the appropriation for the national research council. Indeed there is a slight decrease in the total amounts in the war appropriation bill and the civil estimates. I think that is wrong. I think any one who knows anything about Canada's part in the development of radar and the development of at least the raw material for the atomic bomb realizes that the young scientists of this country played a very important role in the course of the war. We should see to it that we do not lose these young scientists because, while they may not be our first line of defence, they will be at least our second line of defence in the event of another war. I find that the estimates, civil and war, for the national research council have been decreased from some $5,000,000 to just over $4,500,000, that is taking the two estimates together.

Under the united nations charter raw material and scientific research may be regarded as one of our principal contributions to the world organization. As those who have read the charter will remember, the military general staff will negotiate agreements, not only with regard to the military aid, naval, army and air, which a nation will give, but will decide what that nation should do, in agreement of course with the nation itself, to assist in the enforcement of international decisions or the maintenance of security. We should look very carefully into this phase of the matter in considering the estimates now before us.

As the hon. member for Vancouver South has indicated, when we are considering these estimates we should make a careful study and report of the post-war military organization that this country requires and can best maintain. In other words, I think the country should know from the Minister of National Defence, indeed from all the ministers if you wish, the policy that Canada is to pursue in organization, the allotment of personnel among the three forces and, as I have said already, in the realm of scientific research, industrial training, war-time mobilization and so on.

Let us bear in mind that at the end of the last war there was a disposition on the part of military leaders to think of future wars in the terms of the war that had just ended. That was a very natural disposition, and I do not think there is any profession or trade represented in this house that might not be guilty of the same kind of thinking. We think rather in terms of what we have been doing than in terms of changes in the manner of doing what we should do. I am not singling out the military profession in this particular. In my opinion in the period which will follow this war there may be a danger that methods which are becoming or have become obsolete since August 6 may be the methods which the military leaders of this and other countries may wish to follow.

We remember how France emerged from the last war with probably the most powerful army in the world and then continued to train that army largely—not wholly of course—on the assumption that the war which might come again would be like the war in which France had been victorious with her allies in the period 1914-18. The result was that the more progressive military leaders like de Gaulle, who wished to change the tactics of the French army, were not paid any attention. We know what the result was in 1940, when the French army crumbled before an army which had been organized on a new basis with new and different equipment. Consequently I think the house should bear in mind that there is a disposition on the part of any profession to keep its policies in line with what it has known in the past, and we should exercise care lest we allow that to happen again in our country. We must beware that we do not merely allow the desires and the prerogatives of those who have served us well in high places in the army, navy and air force to dominate our thinking and our programme, because they may again be thinking, not in terms perhaps of personal advantage, but in military terms that are becoming obsolete.

One other fact I should like to mention at this time is this. In dealing with demobilization we have to think of the men who are to-day overseas. We have, for example, large forces in Holland which are being gradually reduced, and Holland to-day is very largely under military government. Perhaps when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) goes to Holland he may find that there is considerable criticism by our Dutch allies of the military government we have established in Holland. I have been told by young men who have just come back from Holland that there is a good deal of discontent with our arrangements there. For example, the Dutch people find that, while they have no transportation, our own military transportation is quite adequate not only for our needs but if used to meet the needs of the population, but there are regulations which do not permit our military in Holland to assist in the transportation of supplies or even the refugee people who are found along the highways. That may be a matter of military necessity, but some young men who have recently returned from Holland fail to understand the situation, and have told me that it is causing a good deal of misgiving among the Dutch and is upsetting some of the splendid relations which exist there. Those of us who were in Belgium and France a year ago—I think it is a year ago to-morrow that we went across to Belgium—will never forget the enthusiasm with which the people of Belgium and France met our car with the Canadian maple leaf painted on it as one of the symbols, and the friendliness with which our boys were greeted everywhere. It would be too bad if we lost that very fine and friendly spirit in the low countries.

The hon. member for Vancouver South suggested that a defence committee of this house be established where matters of defence could be discussed and members would become more thoroughly acquainted with what was necessary and with the policies which were being followed, and could interest the people of the country. I think that is a good idea, but I was going to suggest something a little different. I intended to suggest that we try to establish a non-partisan committee, which would be a mixed committee of civilians and military men, to go continuously into the field of defence. That is not unlike the suggestion which has already been made. Somewhere at least we can find a suitable committee to deal continuously with these matters. That would be helpful. Before the recent war we had too little discussion in this house, and certainly too little discussion before any committees of the house, regarding the necessities with which the country was then faced. That I think was particularly true after Munich. May I remind the house that Munich was hailed by most of the people of this country as a great step toward universal peace. It was at that time that I was jolted into believing that war was coming, but we in this house did not give the attention to the policies behind the naval, military and air force estimates which I think should have been given, nor did we give attention to the external policies which were likely to make military arrangements necessary. I am therefore very glad indeed that the government has seen fit to grant the request which has been made from time to time in this house over the years and to set up a special standing committee to deal with external affairs. In that way the house should be well informed as to what the necessities of the external scene will demand.

I do not think I wish to say very much more this afternoon, but I wanted to bring these points before the house and the minister in the general discussion before we go into details. In the light of the present world situation we cannot neglect them. The united nations charter will be discussed in this house. I do not propose to anticipate that discussion, except to say that I believe there is not a thinking man who reads and understands the dispatches which are coming from Europe, and indeed from all over the world, who does not believe deep down in his heart that the international situation has deteriorated since the united nations charter was adopted at San Francisco. I think when we were there we felt that there was reason to hope that the great powers would understand each other a little better and that the longer the conference continued the better that understanding would become. It looked that way. Watching the news to-day, and reading all that comes to us through the press and in articles from well-informed sources, one is forced to the conclusion that the world is in a desperate condition.

So, then, I say to the minister that we shall go into these estimates with a great deal of sympathy; we shall endeavour to find out what they all mean, and we shall bring before him observations which may sometimes appear, perhaps, to show a very critical spirit. But I assure him and the house generally that in doing so we shall have only one end in view, namely, to make our contribution as a nation to the establishment throughout the world of universal law, order and peace.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I shall not take very much of the time of the house just now to deal in any detail with the estimates which were placed before us a short time ago; but I thought I should say a few words, particularly in response to the suggestions which were made by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green). I felt that the hon. member very skilfully placed before this house a number of principles to which every dynamic Canadian could subscribe.

I feel and have always felt that Canada must be strong, not only in a naval, military, and air force way. These strengths are necessary, to be sure, and we have always in this corner of the house advocated that Canada should be prepared. We have never lost sight of that necessity, and if hon. members will look back over records of sessions during the last ten years they will note that we have been consistent in advocating a strong and a prepared Canada.

We need to be strong economically also, because faith in Canada of a dynamic kind cannot be engendered into our people unless we have ensured the well-being of every family in Canada. That is important, and I would suggest to the government that, while they are making their plans and laying their policies for the years to come, economic strength be given the most earnest and careful consideration along with preparedness in a military way.

I have felt for some years that Canada perhaps has been trying to do too much considering the population that we have had. We need more people in this country. We have a grand country, which is capable of maintaining, I would say, a population of fifty million people, and we cannot be strong and virile until such time as we have increased our population to the extent that it is possible for us to stand forth as one of the first-rate nations of the world in the way of population as well as in strength of natural resources. I do not know whether the government has given any consideration to means by which, during the next few years, the population can be successfully increased. I will not take the time of the house to advocate any particular principle. Perhaps the government have already laid their plans. It may be necessary for us to combine several methods of accomplishing this objective, but surely there is one thing certain, that the population will not increase sufficiently by natural means—through the birthrate—unless and until we remove from our people fear of want. That is the thing which accounts in the main for small families, and I say to you, what is the use of having a strong navy, a strong army and a strong air force to save the country for posterity if there is not going to be any posterity?

We must realize, Mr. Speaker, that methods of war to which we have been accustomed in the past are outmoded; and because those methods are outmoded we must revise our ideas of war. We must revise our ideas of defence, and, I might add, our ideas of security—world security as well as Canadian security. I have heard to-day things which lead me to believe that we have not changed our ideas one particle since before the atomic bomb became a reality. My judgment is that we are up against something in that regard where we have no human experience to draw upon, and therefore we need a new approach, a complete revision of our ideas on security. I hope that this Parliament in the next few weeks will prove itself capable of meeting the new conditions and of revising its ideas so as to be thoroughly prepared for the exigencies of the future.

While we are making Canada strong, we must at the same time be prepared to contribute of our strength to ensure the preservation of Britain. Britain is in danger. Britain is in a serious condition. If Great Britain is destroyed the British commonwealth of nations cannot endure; therefore we must be prepared to contribute of our strength to ensure that Britain will remain strong and virile, and that the British commonwealth of nations will be maintained. For I say to you, Mr.

Speaker, with all the gravity at my command, that the one great barrier in this world to-day against world domination by totalitarianism is the British commonwealth of nations. We must not allow ourselves to be lulled into a sense of false security and into the type of psychology that seemed to prevail among great numbers of the people of the country from 1930 to 1939. We were ostriches, in the main; we hid our heads in the sand so that we would not see what was going on around us.

Many brave words have been spoken since we have learned world facts by experience, and tragic experience at that. Restless and warlike nations will hesitate to attack a strong, virile and well-prepared Canada. Let us therefore keep her in ever-growing strength.

One other thing we should not overlook as we face these estimates, and study and discuss them in the days to come. An important source of strength, it seems to me, in any people, is to keep those people properly informed. A nation that is ignorant of the facts and the truth of the world situation, a nation that is victimized by the worst and most subtle propaganda imaginable, can never have that source of strength to draw upon which was mentioned so often in the old days: "Ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free."

Along with all these other suggestions that have been given, the government ought to take note of the need for watching the sources of dissemination of information in this country, and see to it that the information that is fed to the people is the truth and not subversive propaganda. A strong people can stand the truth and they will react well to it, but if they do not have the truth, the lack of it immediately becomes a source of disintegrating strength. Therefore I say it is necessary for us to keep in mind the importance of getting to our people information so that they can prepare themselves individually and so that they will not be victims of deteriorating propaganda. I say that whatever money is needed to accomplish the worthy objective of making Canada strong in every way, we in this house ought to be prepared to furnish, and without question. The group in this section of the house is prepared to go into the study of these estimates sympathetically and carefully, and to assist the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) to accomplish for Canada the position which I have envisioned in my own mind, and which I am sure that every worth-while Canadian has envisioned in his mind.

Listening to the hon. member for Vancouver South, I was happy to hear the suggestions he made. I am sure that the group in this section of the house are prepared to accept those principles as a working basis for the examination of these particular estimates, and we shall be prepared to extend to the minister every cooperation and help in accomplishing all worth-while objectives.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I rise only for the purpose of placing before the government certain questions with regard to the very important matter that must be determined, namely, is this country still at war? When will the proclamation be made that will terminate war in so far as the powers of the War Measures Act are concerned? Having regard to the proposals that have been brought before the house to-day, it seems apparent that the government of this nation intends to continue the fiction that the war is still proceeding, and will not terminate before March 31, 1946, at least.

But before asking these questions, may I as one who had the very humble position of an observer for the Progressive Conservative party at San Francisco say, after listening to-day to the speech of the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell) and the speech of the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Low)—which party throughout the years has represented no changed policy but has always realized the need of maintaining the British commonwealth of nations as the great instrument for peace and welfare in the world—that their speeches indicate that growing out of San Francisco has come a new feeling among the members of the house in their attitude and relationship to discussions on foreign affairs. Let me say that no greater contribution was made to a united front on the part of the Canadian people than when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) chose to send to San Francisco a non-political delegation representing various parties in the house. Only one error was made. That error was that there was no representative of the Social Credit party at San Francisco, a party which has long espoused such high principles in so far as the empire is concerned.

I came back from San Francisco believing implicitly that the fear of war, both actual and economic, had more or less passed into the realm of history. I heard those great men there; I felt their attitude. I know what the attitude of the Canadian delegation was. Let me say that that delegation did honour to Canada in the contribution they made at San Francisco. I thought I knew the attitude of those other men who represented the different countries of the world. But, sir, when the atomic bomb fell on Japan on August 8 there was an end to an era of man's thinking on international affairs, and I believe an end to man's thinking on life as it had been; for now all realize more than ever as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said this afternoon, isolationism no longer can be the cult or the belief of any political party or of any nation. Therefore I believe that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) should give serious consideration to an increase in the amount that will be expended by the national research council during the next year; because the atomic bomb not only has great dimensions of peril, but also has great dimensions in the improvement of living conditions and in the raising of economic standards everywhere in the world.

Coming from Saskatchewan I am very proud of the fact that a number of young scientists from that province have contributed to the work of the national research council and that prominent leadership was given to Canada by Dean MacKenzie of the university of Saskatchewan. These scientists now have the opportunity, with the knowledge that has been secured in the production of the atomic bomb, to improve conditions in Canada and elsewhere. Certainly, if we were able to spend billions of dollars for war, we should not be niggardly and spend only four and half million dollars in peace for the work of the council so that this council will be able to continue their work on the principles of atomic power to the end that our living standards may be materially improved in the days to come.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would the hon. member permit a question at this stage? Before he finishes his fine address would he mind defining to the house just what he conceives to be the meaning of "isolationism"?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It would take a long time to endeavour to define "isolationism." It represents to me, sir, a state of mind, a psychological reaction, a failure to realize what conditions are in the world. Those are the things that develop isolationism; those are the things that permit nations and individuals not to have full appreciation of what is going on in the world. That is why it is so important at this session of parliament that we do not permit ourselves to be lulled into a false sense of security by reason of what took place at the San Francisco conference, and thereby fail to assure that Canada's defence within this empire shall be properly preserved in the future; for if we wait for a year, two years, three years or five years, the impetus and the experience of this war will disappear and dissipate, and we may again return to that isolationism which characterized so many in the days before the war.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

I am not going into the details of the resolution, but I should like to secure from the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) at this time an answer to certain questions. These questions were outlined some days ago by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), at which time the Minister of Justice answered rather indefinitely that these matters—and I deduce this from his words—and their decisions had grave implications. I think the Canadian people have a right to know these things. They have a right to know whether this government intends to endeavour to carry on in the months ahead under the provisions of the War Measures Act. I am going to read only one or two sections of that act, but those sections indicate that, in fact, the resolution now before the house is in part founded upon the government view that the War Measures Act is still in effect. The resolution provides:

> That sums not exceeding $1,365,000,000 be granted to His Majesty towards defraying any expenses or making any advances or loans that may be incurred or granted by or under the authority of the governor in council during the year ending March 31, 1946, for—
> (a) the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada;
> (b) the conduct of naval, military and air operations in or beyond Canada.

Those words "the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada" apparently are abstracted from the War Measures Act. Let me read section 2 of that act, which provides:

> The issue of a proclamation by His Majesty, or under the authority of the governor in council shall be conclusive evidence that war, invasion or insurrection, real or apprehended, exists. . . until by the issue of a further proclamation it is declared that the war, invasion or insurrection no longer exists.

Section 3 gives the governor in council certain powers. Such things may be done by reason of the existence of real or apprehended war. To-day there is no real or apprehended war, in the opinion of the Canadian Bar Association, with which I think any reasonable person would agree. The section contains these words:

> . . . by reason of the existence of real or apprehended war, invasion, or insurrection deem necessary or advisable for the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada. . . .

Those are the identical words of the resolution. After referring in the preceding sections to the powers which may be exercised by the governor in council in consequence of there being any real or threatened war or insurrection, section 6 goes on to say:

> The provisions of the three sections last preceding shall only be in force during war, invasion or insurrection, real or apprehended.

Does the government suggest that to-day we are in the midst of war? Does the minister suggest that it can continue th operation of the War Measures Act until such time, one year, two years, or three years or more hence, when they may by proclamation declare the war over? This is a matter of grave importance to the people of this country. Are powers being exercised by the government to-day which are beyond the compet nce of the government to carry into effect? The Canadian Bar Association, of which in recent years the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) was the distinguished president, has reviewed this matter at length. It was first discussed in August of last year, and in the report of the association this appears:

> . . . it would appear proper to insist on having immediately after the hostilities have ceased, a proclamation of the governor in council, to declare that the state of war has ended.

That is the considered opinion of a body which I am sure the Minister of Justice must concede understands the situation with respect to that act. It takes this view because it believes that no longer should laws be enacted by regulation or order in council but directly by parliament; by the freely chosen representatives of the people in parliament instead of by controllers and others in similar positions. Coming down to 1945, the Canadian Bar Association made this declaration:

> Your committee is of opinion that the state of war cannot and should not, even by the authority of a statute, be deemed to continue to exist when the war itself is over. Let us make the distinction here between the war emergency itself which is the fact of a state of war, and an economic emergency which, though a consequence following the war, is not the war emergency itself.

Therefore at this time I ask the Minister of Justice to enlighten this house and the country by answering certain questions which I believe are fair and reasonable. The first, to which I have already referred, is this: Is Canada still at war? In that regard, and to the determination of that question, I further ask the minister whether the law officers of the crown have given an opinion on that question. Has it been submitted to them, and what is the nature of the opinion they have given? The next question I wish to ask is this, in the words of the council of the Canadian Bar Association. Is it the intention of the government to continue from month to month to postpone the proclamation of peace in order to continue in effect artificial controls which, while excusable in war where necessary, have no place in a peace-time economy? The next question I ask is this. Are the defence of Canada regulations still in effect? In reading over the expenditures to be made this year, I find that further expenditures are anticipated in connection with the administration of the defence of Canada regulations between now and the end of March, 1946.

These are matters, sir, which are of vital interest. As far as Great Britain was concerned, after the first war and again in May of this year she endeavoured at the earliest possible moment after the end of war in Europe to put a stop to anything bordering on undemocratic controls and the exercise of legislative power by controllers or by the government operating under order in council. She brought into effect an act extending the life of the emergency powers act; and in the old act of 1920 it was provided that His Majesty might declare that a state of emergency continued to exist:

> . . . of such a nature, and of so extensive a scale, as to be calculated, by interfering with the supply and distribution of food, water, fuel or light, or with the means of locomotion, to deprive the community or any essential portion of the community, of the essentials of life.

They extended certain powers, but they also provided that no such proclamation should be in effect for more than one month, unless it was forthwith communicated to parliament, and that for such purpose parliament should be called into session within five days. They also provided that any regulations passed after the end of hostilities should be laid before parliament and should not continue in force after the expiration of seven days from the time they were so laid, unless a resolution was passed by both houses. I suggest, sir, that if the government is going to endeavour to continue to issue orders in council, it should immediately give assurance to the people of Canada that no orders will be passed while parliament is in session; that this array of 60,000 orders in council that we have had during the period of the war, and that are even to-day being issued while parliament is in session, should terminate; and that any orders in council passed should be passed only temporarily, and should be operative only temporarily unless accepted by parliament.

I mention in this connection that while parliament is sitting, and when the war is over in Europe and in Asia, the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board to-day in Vancouver told the people of Canada what is to happen in Canada for the next year. This is what he advised as to what is to take place—and when parliament is sitting:

> 1. Canadians can expect controls on textiles to continue at least until the end of the year.
> 2. Strict rationing of sugar is indicated for at least another eighteen months, perhaps longer.

In other words, we in parliament find in the newspapers what the minister fails to place before us while parliament is in session. Then, next:

> World shortages of food may dictate the "establishment or continuation of rationing and distribution controls well through the transition period".

Here we are in parliament, and this statement is made to the press.

The hon. member for Broadview endeavoured to get an answer to this question: Is the War Measures Act still in effect and are we still at war? And yet, while parliament sits on this 28th day of September, members ascertain from boards what the intention of the government is for the future.

And then, finally:

> So long as price controls remain, the board expects to hold the line on the 1941 price levels, upon which ceilings are based.

Those, sir, are the statements made by the distinguished head of the wartime prices and trade board, made before parliament has found out anything about it, and made while parliament was still in session.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Speaker, the statements about rationing were obviously nothing more or less than statements about world shortages. You would have to ration, if you have world shortages—and that is all those statements amounted to. Then, the statement about holding the line at 1941 price levels has been made before, and made on behalf of the government and by members of the government.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: They have not been made by any member of the government since the end of hostilities. The government made its statements of policy in this house as to what the wartime prices and trade board and other control boards would do while the war was on. And yet to-day, after being in this house for a considerable period of time, we are still expected to get information of this kind outside of parliament from a board responsible only indirectly to parliament. I am sure the Minister of Finance does not agree that there should be any declaration of future policy of this country by any controller or any head of a board while parliament is in session.

Mr. ILSLEY: No; the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board was simply stating what the board would be doing, within the principles of government policy as already stated. The hon. member may think that rationing of sugar, for example, would have to be stated as a separate policy. But the rationing policy just follows inevitably if there is a bad shortage of sugar.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That does not follow inevitably. The board makes decisions under government policy; and that board has no power to pass orders in council in order to continue the policy, unless the War Measures Act is still in effect. That is why I wish to have an answer to that question.

Mr. ILSLEY: The board cannot pass it, even then.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: And neither can the governor in council, except in the case of an emergency, as defined in the Fort Francis case before the privy council.

Mr. ILSLEY: Surely the hon. gentleman does not deny that that emergency exists at this moment.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Bring the matter before parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is now.

Mr. ILSLEY: My hon. friend should be fair about it. If he will look at the speech from the throne he will find this paragraph:

> You will be asked to approve a measure to extend certain specified emergency powers to meet emergency conditions in the period of reconstruction.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is perfectly all right; but I am asking this question now—not when another bill is brought up at a later time. At the present time what is the view of the Canadian government? Are we still at war, within the provisions of the War Measures Act, or are we not? That is the question I am asking.

Mr. ILSLEY: The answer is yes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is that?

Mr. ILSLEY: The answer is yes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: "The answer is yes?"

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is the legal opinion that is given, is it?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is the legal opinion given by law officers of the crown?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: So at last we have the opinion—and it took all that time! The hon. member for Broadview endeavoured to get that information the other day, but he could get no answer to the question. So the opinion given by the law officers of the crown is that the War Measures Act is still in effect and binding upon this country?

Mr. ILSLEY: Certainly.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, Mr. Speaker, I am glad that—

Mr. HOWE: Did you have a different opinion?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I had the opinion of the Canadian Bar Association, an organization which has spent a good deal of time in studying this matter, and one which is composed of the most distinguished members of the bar of Canada, many of whom no doubt are well known to the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) as outstanding counsel. Let me say that their conclusion was the other way.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Where is that stated?

Mr. ABBOTT: Which member wrote the opinion?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I had a list of them with me, and I wish I had it here, because I believe some of them are embryo judges, Liberal supporters about to be appointed.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Or probably would-be Tory judges.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The chairman of the committee was Gustave Monette, K.C., of Montreal.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is why I asked the question.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Surely the Minister of National Defence does not suggest that the following members of the bar, namely, Walter S. Johnson, K.C., Ariste Brossard, K.C., Kenneth M. Martin, K.C., J. E. Rutledge, K.C., Arthur N. Carter, K.C., R. M. Willes Chitty, K.C., W. P. Fillmore, K.C., J. M. Goldenberg, J. J. Saucier, A. C. DesBrisay, K.C., would allow the signing of a report with respect to their understanding of the law to be influenced because a certain man happened to be chairman? That is a strange suggestion to come from the Minister of National Defence, who is a distinguished lawyer—the suggestion that these lawyers would give an opinion which was anything other than the best legal opinion they could give.

Mr. ABBOTT: Oh, I am convinced of that.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: You are?

Mr. ABBOTT: I just asked who had written the opinion.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: As the minister possibly does not know, if he has not read the report—and it was made in August—the opinion was given by all of them.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not a legal opinion; it was advice to the government in respect of policy.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It was advice on a matter of law.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think so—at least not what the hon. member read.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, I have the opinion here, in which the authorities are cited. However, I shall not go into that, because apparently the Minister of Finance has not read it.

Mr. ILSLEY: I was just going by what I heard the hon. member say, when he pointed out that in the opinion of the gentlemen he has named the government should immediately after the cessation of hostilities issue a proclamation. It is advice to the government on a matter of policy.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It indicates that a state of war did not continue beyond the end of hostilities. I conclude by asking the Minister of Justice to let the house and the country know whether or not the war appropriations that are to continue between now and May, 1946, and those appropriations that have nothing to do with the war are merely incidental to and the result of the war, are properly within the provisions of the War Measures Act.

Mr. HANSELL: I notice it is nearly five minutes to six o'clock and I would move the adjournment of the debate. Do I understand that the procedure is to go into committee?

Mr. ILSLEY: If convenient to hon. gentlemen I think it would be better if we did go into committee. We would then move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again. Then hon. members would have great freedom of discussion in committee.

Mr. HANSELL: Will the minister give us assurance now that we shall have an opportunity of discussion just as broad as has been carried on to-day? If so, I would forgo moving the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, yes, just as broad.

Mr. BRACKEN: I had intended saying something on this measure. I do not see what delay or inconvenience will be caused if we do not go into committee until there has been some further discussion.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is all right.

Mr. HANSELL: If that is the case then I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie the house adjourned at 5.55 p.m.

Monday, October 1, 1945.

The house met at three o'clock.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

AMENDMENT OF ACT OF 1944-45

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 9, to amend the Department of National Health and Welfare Act.

He said: The only change proposed by the amendment is to correct a typographical error in the act of last year as printed. It occurs in section 12 and involves the substitution of the word "eight" for the word "nine" in a cross reference to another act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADA PRIZE ACT

PRIZE COURTS AND PRIZE LAW—EXCHEQUER COURT JURISDICTION

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 10, to provide for a prize court and prize law in Canada.

He said: The purpose of the bill is to put in statutory form and perhaps make clearer and more definite what is the common law practice in respect to prize courts and prize law and to replace the order in council which has been in force under the War Measures Act in that regard. I am informed that during the first war the exchequer court as a colonial court of admiralty had jurisdiction as a prize court, and that expired when the old admiralty court act was repealed in 1934. During this war an order in council to give it this jurisdiction was passed under the War Measures Act. It is felt that the jurisdiction of the court should be prolonged beyond the time when the order in council under the War Measures Act will be in force, and this bill is to set out what is the prize law in Canada and to make the exchequer court the court to administer that law.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

AMENDMENT OF CAPITAL REVISION ACT, 1937—SECURITIES TRUST

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 11, to amend the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act, 1937.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

He said: This is a routine and simple amendment of the Canadian Railways Capital Revision Act, 1937. Section 12 of that act provides for the appointment of trustees, and it is therein stated that three of the trustees shall be deputy ministers and two others shall be officers of the Canadian National Railways. By virtue of a reorganization in the directorate one of these positions in the Canadian National Railways, that of vice-president of finance, has been abolished. It is therefore sought by this amendment to set up by way of resolution of the board of directors the two officers who shall be trustees representing that body. There is also a technical amendment which has to do with the three deputy ministers.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

APPOINTMENT OF GEORGE A. TOUCHE AND COMPANY AS AUDITORS

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 12, respecting the appointment of auditors for National Railways.

He said: This is an annual bill which provides for the appointment of auditors for the Canadian National Railways. Since the year 1932 the appointment of the auditors has been by bill in this manner, and for the year 1945 it is sought to appoint George A. Touche and Company as auditors for the Canadian National Railways.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

OLD AGE PENSIONS—NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. How many persons in each of the provinces and in the Northwest Territories were receiving old age pensions as at the latest date for which this information is available?

2. What was the average monthly payment in each province at said date?

3. Does this monthly average include any supplementary amounts paid by the provinces?

4. What supplementary amounts are paid, and what other special provisions are made, by the various provinces?

Mr. CLAXTON:

1. The number of persons receiving old age pensions as at June 30, 1945, is as follows:

Alberta	11,594
British Columbia	15,505
Manitoba	12,427
New Brunswick	12,335
Nova Scotia	14,135
Ontario	58,323
Prince Edward Island	1,881

Northwest Territories	11

2. Alberta $24 13
British Columbia 24 38
Manitoba 24 47
New Brunswick 22 18
Nova Scotia 22 54
Ontario 24 45
Prince Edward Island 18 66
Quebec 23 94
Saskatchewan 24 63

3. No.

4. Supplementary amounts are paid as follows: Alberta, $5 a month to each pensioner; British Columbia, $5 a month to each pensioner; Manitoba, any amount up to $1.25 a month depending on the amount of pension granted; New Brunswick, nil; Nova Scotia, any amount up to $5 a month payable at the discretion of the pension authority, with maximum income limited to $365 a year; Ontario, fifteen per cent of pension based on a maximum pension of $20 a month; Prince Edward Island, nil; Quebec, nil; Saskatchewan, $3 a month to each pensioner.

Certain provinces provide free medical services for old age pensioners. At least three provinces, namely, British Columbia, Saskatchewan, and Ontario, have special plans for this purpose. Some of the other provinces work with the municipalities in order to provide medical care for persons who are unable to pay for it themselves.

Note: The information given in the above answer is based on information supplied by the provinces concerned. Provision by the provinces of supplementary allowances, medical care, etc., falls outside the scope of the dominion-provincial arrangements made under the Old Age Pensions Act.

Certain provinces provide free medical services for blind pensioners. At least three provinces, namely, British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Ontario, have special plans for this purpose. Some of the other provinces work with the municipalities in order to provide medical care for persons who are unable to pay for it themselves.

Note: The information given in the above answer is based on information supplied by the provinces concerned. Provision by the provinces of supplementary allowances, medical care, etc., falls outside the scope of the dominion-provincial arrangements made under the Old Age Pensions Act.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES—PERSONNEL IN CANADA AND OVERSEAS, ETC.

Mr. ROSS (Souris):

1. What was the total number of Canadian troops taken to Europe, with annual figure 1939 to 1945?

2. The numbers recruited on that side?

3. Total fatal casualties in Europe?

4. Numbers discharged in the United Kingdom or elsewhere in Europe?

5. Numbers returned to Canada on courses or other temporary duty and who subsequently returned to Europe?

6. Numbers returned to Canada for category and other permanent reasons?

7. Numbers transferred to other allied forces?

8. Numbers remaining on strength in the Canadian army overseas in the United Kingdom, northwest Europe, and the Mediterranean, May 8, 1945?

1.

Year of Embarkation	Number
1939	15,894
1940	43,221
1941	69,167
1942	66,604
1943	79,445
1944	62,896
1945 to 31 Aug.	35,264
Total	372,491

2. 1,340.

3. 19,917 as at Aug. 31, 1945 (including battle and non-battle casualties).

4. 1,554 to Aug. 31, 1945.

5. See answer to question 6.

Total	282,593

PAYMENTS ON 1943 WHEAT CROP

Mr. ROSS (Souris):

1. Has the 1943 wheat crop been disposed of by Canadian wheat board?

2. If so, when will payments be made to producers on participation certificates and what amount per bushel?

3. If 1943 wheat crop has not been cleared up, when is it anticipated that it will be sold and cleared up?

[Mr. Claxton.]

Mr. MacKINNON:

1. Yes.

2. Although all 1943 crop wheat has been disposed of by the board to shippers and mills, the mills have not yet completed their reports to the board as to whether the wheat was used for domestic, mutual aid or commercial flour sales.

Without this information the board cannot determine the amounts per bushel payable on the 1943 crop participation certificates.

Moreover, final payments in respect of the 1940, 1941 and 1942 crops are still being made, and it is estimated that from 65 to 75 thousand cheques have still to be issued covering producer's certificates which have been lost. A further payment will also be made during the current crop year in respect of barley equalization fees, and also for the export fees received in respect of Ontario winter wheat for last season.

These operations are all in addition to the current work of the board, which is extremely heavy, and it does not appear that the necessary equipment will be available for the purpose of making this payment until the other payments referred to have been released.

It is now anticipated that the 1943 crop payments will probably begin in June or July, 1946.

3. Answered by (1) and (2).

Mr. JAENICKE:

When does the Canadian wheat board expect to make the final payment to farmers in respect of the 1943 wheat crop?

Mr. MacKINNON: Answered by the answer above to the question of the hon. member for Souris.

PRISONERS OF WAR

Mr. REID:

1. How many nazi German prisoners of war are still in Canada?

2. How many prisoners of war of other nationalities are in Canada?

3. How many nazi German prisoners of war have been returned to Germany or their homeland since the surrender of Germany?

4. How many prisoners of war are located in internment camps, and how many are employed in agriculture and other industries?

5. What steps have been taken by the government to return all prisoners of war to their own countries?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

1. There are at present 30,710 prisoners of war of the German armed forces held in Canada.

2. All prisoners of war in Canada are members of the German forces. However, they include some persons of other than German nationality, the majority of these being Austrian.

3. No prisoners of war have been returned to Germany or to any other homeland since the German surrender.

4. As of August 31, 13,073 prisoners of war were employed on farms or at work projects outside prisoner of war camps. The remaining 20,986 are held in the camps. A large proportion of the latter are employed in camp duties.

5. The repatriation of German prisoners of war is not a matter on which the Canadian government can take independent action but will have to be undertaken in concert with the allied control commission in Germany.

*This total includes approximately $189,000 for advertising emergency shelter regulations.

CHARTERED BANKS—TRANSFERS TO CONTINGENT RESERVE FUND

Mr. QUELCH:

1. What was the total of the transfers made to contingent reserve fund from the earnings of each of the chartered banks in excess of their reasonable requirements for each of the years 1940 to 1944?

2. What was the amount that each bank was called upon to pay in additional taxation as a result of these excess transfers in each of the years 1940 to 1944?

Mr. MAYHEW:

1. (a) 1940, nil; (b) 1941, nil; (c) 1942, nil; (d) 1943, in the case of two chartered banks the amount added to their general contingency reserves during 1943 was "in excess of the reasonable requirements of the bank having regard to all the circumstances." At the time these banks published their annual financial statements for 1944 the exact amounts involved had not yet been determined and each bank made an estimate in round figures of the amount to be transferred from general contingency reserves, which amount in the case of one bank was $2,200,000 and in the case of the other $412,000. Subsequently the amounts of the required transfers from general contingency reserves were determined, which amount in the case of the one bank was $1,965,566.14 and in the case of the other $324,000; (e) 1944, nil.

2. (a) 1940, nil; (b) 1941, nil; (c) 1942, nil; (d) 1943, as the result of the above transfer from general contingency reserves the one bank paid additional taxes of $1,965,566.14 plus interest of $57,329 and the other bank additional taxes of $324,000 plus interest of $9,542.50; (e) 1944, nil.

WHEAT PRICES

Mr. FAIR:

What is the average price received each year by the Canadian wheat board for No. 1 northern wheat f.o.b. Fort William for the crops of 1935-36 to 1943-44 respectively?

Mr. MacKINNON:

1935 crop, 85·09577 cents; 1936 crop, no deliveries to the board; 1937 crop, no deliveries to the board; 1938 crop, 61·2662 cents; 1939 crop, 77·29546 cents; 1940 crop, 84·32204 cents; 1941 crop, 91·59995 cents; 1942 crop, $1.09·64994; 1943 crop, not available.*

* The prices for the 1943 crop cannot be determined until the final reports are received from all agents of the board and the ultimate disposition and class of the grain is shown.

ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE

Mr. FRASER:

1. Is the Royal Military College, Kingston, to be opened again as a military college?

2. If so, when?

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is intended to resume the training of cadets in 1946 under conditions which are now under consideration.

MEAT AVAILABLE FOR EXPORT

Mr. SENN:

1. What is the estimated amount of meat Canada will be able to ship, (a) to Great Britain; (b) to other European countries, in the next twelve months?

2. What proportion of this amount will be, (a) pork and pork products; (b) beef and beef products; (c) mutton and lamb?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. It is impossible to provide information on meat exports for the next twelve months since the shipping programme operates on a calendar year basis.

Commitments to the British Ministry of Food for beef and pork are for minimum quantities, and for the year 1946 these are: Beef, 60,000,000 pounds; pork, 450,000,000 pounds.

It is impossible to estimate what the actual deliveries will be with any degree of accuracy so far in advance.

Following the tri-partite food conference in the spring of this year, Canada undertook that in addition to the amount previously contracted for she would endeavour to provide an additional quantity of meat to bring her total shipments for 1945 to the United Kingdom and liberated European countries up to at least the following amounts: Beef, 225,000,000 pounds; pork, 450,000,000 pounds; canned meats, 114,000,000 pounds; total, 789,000,000 pounds.

2. Answered by No. 1.

CANADIAN ARMY—COURTS-MARTIAL

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. How many convictions were registered by courts-martial in the army between 1939 and September 1, 1945, wherein the penalty was (a) death; (b) imprisonment from one year to three years inclusive; (c) imprisonment of more than three years?

2. In how many cases was the verdict of a court-martial reversed or varied in each year during the period 1940 to 1945 inclusive?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. (a) Three, the death penalty being carried out in one case only, the other two being commuted to penal servitude; (b) 2,776; (c) 302.

2. 1940, 18; 1941, 85; 1942, 148; 1943, 259; 1944, 270; 178 (From 1 January, 1945 to 1 September, 1945). Total, 958.

CANADIAN ARMY—OFFICERS LOANED TO BRITISH ARMY

Mr. HAZEN:

1. How many officers of the Canadian army were loaned to the British army during the war?

2. How many of these officers were casualties?

3. How many of them are now with the British army?

4. How many have been discharged since V-E day?

5. What steps have been taken to have Canadian officers, who are now with the British army on loan and who want to be discharged, returned to the Canadian army?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Below is given the information insofar as the loan of officers under the Canadian loan plan is concerned. In addition, other officers have been on loan at various times and for varying periods to the British army. It would take a great deal of research on the part of Canadian military headquarters to determine the exact number of officers who have at some period been loaned to the British army for such duties as operational planning, civil affairs, medical services, etc.

1. Under Canadian loan plan, 673.

2. (a) Battle casualties, 291; (b) ordinary casualties, 56.

3. 175.

4. Struck off strength in Canada, 34.

5. All officers were circulated to find out their wishes after V-E day. Those who expressed a desire to return to Canadian control are being brought back to the Canadian army. (a) if their points are sufficiently high for repatriation then they are returned to Canada on the same basis as if they were serving with Canadian forces, or (b) as they can be absorbed into the Canadian army.

CARGO SHIPS

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. How many "4,700" ton class cargo ships have been ordered built in Canada during the war?

2. (a) At what yards were orders placed; (b) on what date was each keel laid and ship completed for service; (c) what was the cost of each completed; (d) for whom were they built?

3. Have any been sold? If so, (a) to whom; (b) what was the price for each and terms of payment?

4. How many have been managed or operated by the Park Steamship Company, stating the Canadian agents, commissions and fees paid?

5. Who are the other managing and operating firms and agents in Canada?

*PACIFIC COAST MILITIA RIFLES—RIFLES USED IN WAR AGAINST JAPAN

Mr. PEARKES:

1. Has the Minister of National Defence received a request, from or on behalf of the Pacific coast militia rangers, that they be presented with, or permitted to purchase at a nominal price, the rifles they used during the war against Japan?

2. If so, what action has been taken by the government in this matter?

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps I may be permitted to answer this question verbally. The Minister of National Defence has received a great many requests from hon. members on this side of the house asking that the members of this force be allowed to retain their rifles or to purchase them for a nominal consideration. The force, as hon. members from British Columbia know, has rendered very valuable service. They served voluntarily and without pay. In some cases they were issued with service rifles and in some cases with sporting rifles, 30-30 carbines. The matter has been under consideration for some time. It was felt that for fairly obvious reasons they could not be allowed to retain the service rifles; but I recommended a short time ago that they should be allowed to purchase the sporting rifles at a nominal price. I made that recommendation to my colleague, the Minister of Munitions and Supply, with a view to his passing it on to War Assets Corporation, and he agrees that that can be done. The details will now be worked out and arrangements made to allow them to purchase those rifles at a nominal price.

WINNIPEG AIRPORT—MACDONALD BROS. AIRCRAFT LTD.

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. What is the total amount of money invested by the government in plant and equipment at the airport establishment of MacDonald Bros. Aircraft Limited, Winnipeg?
2. What is the total value of contracts awarded this firm during the course of the war?
3. On what basis were these contracts awarded?
4. What is the total amount of profit received by this firm on the contracts indicated above?
5. Is MacDonald Bros. Aircraft Limited at present working on any government contracts? If so, of what nature and what is their value?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Airport, St. James, Man., $1,527,143.52; Robinson St. Plant, Winnipeg, Man., $196,530.72; total, $1,723,674.24.

2. Total sales, exclusive of sales tax, $20,872,957.99.

3. Contracts were awarded on "a fair and reasonable profit" basis the rate of profit to be determined by the minister after government audit.

SICK MARINERS

Mr. MacINNIS:

1. How many vessels paid dues into the sick mariners' fund for each of the calendar years 1938, 1942 and 1944?
2. What was the total amount of money collected in dues from the vessels for each of the above years?
3. Has the sick mariners' fund any other source of income and if so, what amount was received by the fund from such source or sources in the calendar year 1944?
4. What was the total expenditure of the fund in each of the calendar years, 1938, 1942 and 1944?
5. What was the balance in the fund as at December 31, 1944?

Mr. CLAXTON:

1. There is no sick mariners' fund. Duty or dues collected under the authority of Part V of the Canada Shipping Act are credited to the revenue account, consolidated revenue fund. The cost of treatment of sick mariners and of administration of Part V of the Act is charged to funds appropriated each year by Parliament. The total number of vessels which paid dues for the calendar years 1938, 1942 and 1944 were 3,720, 4,427 and 4,285, respectively.

2. 1938, $210,594.97; 1942, $276,373.64; 1944, $201,150.20.

3. There is no other revenue accruing to the government under the authority of part V of the Canada Shipping Act.

4. Total expenditures for the calendar year: 1938, $187,090.98; 1942, $349,593.77; 1944, $239,332.36.

*ADRIAN ARCAND

Mr. IRVINE:

When is Mr. Adrian Arcand to be tried for alleged nazi activities prior to his internment in 1940?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: In view of the large number of inquiries that have come to the department with regard to this question I think I should read aloud the answer that is being made to the question.

The opinions of the deputy minister of justice and of Mr. Gerald Fauteux, K.C., special prosecutor, now tabled, are that it is not advisable that federal authorities proceed further with charges against Adrian Arcand based on his activities prior to his internment. I beg leave to table the opinions where the matter is discussed, and the reasons for the opinions are given. I am making a certain number of mimeographed copies of these opinions available to the gentlemen of the press. If any hon. member wishes to have a copy I shall be glad to furnish it.

Mr. COLDWELL: In view of the public interest would it not be possible to put the opinions on Hansard? I do not know how long they are, but the minister says he has had a large number of requests for them.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I have had a large number of inquiries. It covers five or six pages. I have no objection to its being printed as an appendix—

Mr. COLDWELL: Make it part of the answer.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: —or making it part of the answer to the question.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think that would be better.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Then with the consent of the house the opinions will be made part of the answer to the question.

I have considered the advisability of taking further criminal proceedings against Adrien Arcand, who in May, 1940, was charged, by way of indictment, under sections 39 and 39A of the defence of Canada regulations with having spread and published reports and statements intended or likely to cause disaffection or to be prejudicial to the safety of the state or the efficient prosecution of the war. Before the preliminary inquiry was completed and the accused could be committed for trial, the judge directed that the situation disclosed by the evidence should be brought to the attention of the attorney general of Quebec. The latter in turn communicated with the Minister of Justice, who, with a view to preventing Arcand from acting in a manner prejudicial to the public safety or the safety of the state, directed that he should be detained, and he was so detained until July, 1945.

It may now be stated that Arcand was the recognized leader of an organization known as the national unity party, declared by the defence of Canada regulations to be illegal. The national unity party had objects and ideals very similar to those of the fascist and nazi parties, and there is evidence of some connecting link between members of those parties and Arcand.

Whether or not the national unity party had any real numerical strength or potential possibilities, the prompt action taken by the Minister of Justice effectively quelled the movement, and the purpose of Arcand and the misguided people whom he sought to influence wholly failed. There is no evidence that his activities or those of the party in fact did any injury or in the slightest degree prejudiced the successful prosecution of the war. My information is that since his release from internment Arcand has not been engaged in any political activity and no complaints have been received with reference to his conduct.

To the question whether further criminal proceedings should be taken against Arcand, the following observations of a legal nature would seem to be relevant:

First, responsibility for the prosecution of indictable offences rests with the provincial attorney general, and, while it would be open to federal authorities to proceed with the charges under the defence of Canada regulations with the object of having Arcand committed for trial, I would not advise this course without first consulting the attorney general of the province, since he must assume responsibility for the trial if the accused is committed.

Secondly, defence of Canada regulations 39 and 39A have been revoked, and, while such revocation does not relieve from liability a person who committed an offence prior to revocation, nevertheless in the case of such a stale offence as this the fact of revocation might be expected to affect the course of the trial.

Thirdly, the maximum sentence which could be imposed for the offences charged is five years' imprisonment. Arcand has already been subjected to confinement for a period in excess of five years.

Fourthly, a proposal to prosecute for a seditious offence under the criminal code would be subject to the same considerations as apply in the case of the charges under the defence of Canada regulations, namely, that the provincial attorney general would be responsible since the proceedings would be by way of indictment, and that the offence is stale, and that the accused has already suffered a lengthy period of confinement.

Fifthly, Arcand could not be tried for treason for the reason that any such offence has long since been prescribed by statute. In this connection it should be remarked that the Treachery Act of Canada was only assented to on the 7th of August, 1940, after Arcand was interned, and so would not apply to Arcand's activities prior to internment.

Having regard to the foregoing, I would not advise that further criminal proceedings be undertaken by federal authorities, and in this respect I concur in the view recently expressed by Mr. Gérald Fauteux, K.C., who acted as crown prosecutor at the time the charge was laid against Arcand.

Re: Adrien Arcand, Jos. C. Farr et al
—Further prosecutions.

Dear Mr. Varcoe,

I have examined the brief submitted for opinion, in relation with the above matter.

This brief, I understand, after a recent interview with Inspector C. W. Harvison of the R.C.M. Police is definitely a general outline of the case, and cannot be taken as definite and exhaustive as far as evidence is concerned.

Furthermore, I had a conference yesterday, in Ottawa, with Mr. Robert Forsyth, K.C., of your department, with whom I discussed the matter, and who, I may say, agrees with the views which I now beg to express as follows:

1. The matter during the war:

In the spring of 1940, and as the result of the execution of a number of search warrants, truckloads of documents were seized in various places and in various provinces in Canada.

At that time, more than sufficient evidence was gathered to justify a prosecution under sections 39 and 39A of the defence of Canada regulations. And as a matter of fact, on the 29th of May, 1940, a number of warrants were issued for the arrest of the leaders of the so-called "national social christian party" and "national unity party of Canada".

According to their own publications, their programme, I quote:

"in its main lines, and even in many details, is identical to the programme of the principal corporatist organizations of other countries:

"Fascists of Italy,
Nazis of Germany,
Cuzists of Rumania,
Francists of France,
Fascists of Great Britain,
Guardists of Australia,

Nara-ists of Poland,
Nationalists of Switzerland,
Gadja-ists of Yugoslavia,
Rexists of Belgium,
Fascists of Denmark, Sweden, Norway,
Bulgaria, the Netherlands, Portugal, etc."

The procedures before the court were by way of indictment. In the course of the preliminary inquiry, the presiding judge, after the filing of a number of exhibits, interrupted the procedure, called the attorneys for the prosecution and the defence, for a short conference in his chamber, and immediately after resuming the procedures in court, declared that there was prima facie evidence of a conspiracy against the safety of the state, and suggested that the matter be immediately referred to the attorney general of the province; the inquiry was then adjourned to the following week. This action of the court brought no protests from the defence counsels. (sic)

Accordingly, the matter was immediately referred to the attorney general who, in turn, advised the then Minister of Justice of same and of the extension of the alleged conspiracy beyond the limits of the province of Quebec. An order for internment under section 21 of the D.O.C.R. followed.

The preliminary inquiry was then adjourned sine die.

Later, the question of prosecution for offences under the criminal code of Canada was considered. It was thought that any trial under circumstances then prevailing, would have possibly led to certain agitation and perhaps, and to an unmeasurable extent, defeated the very purpose which the defence of Canada regulations were meant to achieve.

The national emergency prevailing at that time could hardly be met otherwise than by emergency steps which, as stated, were immediately taken.

2. The matter since the cessation of hostilities:

I have been asked to express an opinion on the actual possibility of prosecutions.

For that purpose, I have considered the Treachery Act and the criminal code of Canada.

(a) With regard to the Treachery Act:

To supplement for the inadequacy of legislation on treason, Canada, like England, has adopted at the beginning of this war, the Treachery Act, 4 George VI, chapter 43. This act was assented to on the 7th of August, 1940, consequently after the internment of Arcand and others. The statute having no retroactive effect, cannot therefore have any application in the matter.

(b) The Criminal Code of Canada:

1. Treason and treasonable offences:

I cannot say that the activities of the above group could not reveal evidence of treason or treasonable offences. To express a final and definite opinion, as to a conviction without doubt, would necessitate a more complete and minute examination of the mass of documents seized.

The provisions of our code on treason and treasonable offences have their source in the English statute known as the Treason Act assented to in the year 1351, and are far from suiting modern conditions.

Their enforcement is not, consequently, without difficulty.

For practical purposes, however, our Canadian law as well as the English law provide for a limitation of action, and in both countries, it has always been and still is impossible to prosecute after three years.

Under such circumstances, prosecution for treason or treasonable offences cannot be entered.

2. Drilling:

Drilling was also in the programme of these organizations, and for that reason, provisions of section 99 were examined.

The operation of that section depends upon the existence of an order in council prohibiting training or drilling to the use of arms or for the purpose of practising military exercises, movements or evolutions. I am not aware of the existence of an order in council covering the case.

Be it as it may, these provisions are also subject to a limitation, under section 1140, paragraph "b", subparagraphs "i" and "ii".

In such cases, prosecution may be commenced within six months after the commission of the offence.

3. Seditious offences: S. 134—

I have also given consideration to the question of sedition. Of that, there is evidence. And in such matters, there is no limitation of action.

To decide whether it is in the best interest of Canada and particularly of justice to the accused as well, you may like to consider the exculpatory clause of section 133A—which I do not believe has, in fact, any application in the matter, but is, in law, nevertheless opened to the accused for their defence at trial—and also the fact that the maximum penalty for the offence is two years imprisonment, while the leaders of the movement have actually been deprived of their liberty for a period of five years, more or less.

Our legislation being inspired by the same principles of justice animating the English legislation, you may also consider that the leaders of a like movement in Great Britain, particularly Sir Oswald Mosley, have not been prosecuted after suffering internment.

Our penal laws operate by punishment, the purpose of which is double, to wit: punishment to individuals and deterrent for other people.

In view of the length of internment which is more than twice the authorized maximum sentence for sedition, I doubt what more could be achieved in prosecuting for sedition.

And the judgment given by the civilized nations on the ideologies professed by these groups is and shall ever be far more impressive than a judgment of one of our local courts of Quebec or Ontario against a limited number of individuals irreasonably attracted by and promoting these now universally condemned ideologies and purposes.

It is again a timely question whether the publicity attached to trials by the will of the legislator, would not, in this case, be used to serve a purpose much beyond its true object.

Personally, and if I may be permitted to express an opinion as to the advisability of proceeding for sedition, I honestly believe that the national interest and the Canadian justice would equally be served adequately by following the policy adopted in the very country from which flows our legislation in similar matters.

Yours very truly,

Gérald Fauteux.

GF/NA

P.S.—I have been asked by phone, to further express my opinion on the possibility of a prosecution under sections 39 and 39A of the D.O.C.R. There is no doubt that in view of section 66 of the D.O.C.R., such prosecution can still obtain. I beg to draw your attention on paragraph 2 of section 39B affording a defence more or less similar as under section 133A of the Criminal Code.

BUILDINGS ERECTED AT CANADIAN CAR & FOUNDRY PLANT, AMHERST, N.S.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. What buildings or other structures were erected during the war by the government at the plant of the Canadian Car & Foundry Company Limited, Amherst, Nova Scotia?

2. What was the cost of each such building?

3. Were these buildings under lease to the company and, if so, for what period and at what rental charges?

4. Have any such buildings been offered for sale to the company or to other parties, if so, state the price for each?

5. Is it proposed to offer these buildings for sale through War Assets Corporation or other agency of the government? If so, when?

6. Has the government and the company made proposals to lease any of these buildings for storage of naval supplies and equipment or other materials? If so, for what period and what rental charges?

7. Were the municipal authorities at Amherst consulted in regard to any proposals for sales or leases?

Mr. HOWE:

1. The following buildings were erected during the war by the government at the plant of the Canadian Car & Foundry Company Limited, Amherst, Nova Scotia, and the cost was as follows: Aircraft overhaul depot, $134,206.30; Guard house building, $2,953.00; Cafeteria building, $30,825.00.

2. Answered by 1.

3. No.

4. Yes, to Canadian Car & Foundry Company Limited who intimated their desire to negotiate for the buildings and equipment. Another party has shown an interest in leasing the property with option to purchase. It would be prejudicial to the successful sale of this property to disclose the price offered or the negotiations in detail with either party.

5. It is not proposed at present to advertise these properties in the open market if a proper sale can be negotiated with the present occupants.

6. No proposals to lease for storage has been or will be considered until every effort has been made to sell or lease for industrial purposes.

7. No.

ALTERNATIVE SERVICE WORK CAMPS

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Are persons detained to-day in alternative service work camps?

2. If so, what is the number?

3. What plans, if any, are going forward for the release of such persons?

4. What reasons are given for the continued detention of such persons?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. Yes.

2. 290.

3. It is kept constantly before the men who are occupying alternative service work camps that arrangements will be made to transfer them from the camp at once if they will agree to enter into a contract whereby they will be making contribution to the national welfare.

4. Their refusal to conform to those alternative service regulations under which they may be directed to employment other than in camps.

PAMPHLET "JUSTICE FOR POLAND"

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Has the government distributed any copies of the pamphlet "Justice for Poland" to any army units or personnel?

2. If so, what quantities are involved and when were they distributed?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

MALTON AIRCRAFT PLANT

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Has a contract been concluded for the sale by the government of the Malton aircraft plant?

2. If so, who is the purchaser and what is the purchase price?

3. What are the other terms or conditions of sale?

Mr. HOWE:

1. No formal contract has yet been signed for the sale of Victory Aircraft Company Limited to the Hawker-Siddeley Aircraft Company. Negotiations, which were started prior to V-J day, are however continuing and are substantially complete.

2. (a) Answered by 1; (b) It would be prejudicial to the sale to disclose the price, terms and conditions until the contract has been concluded.

3. Answered by 2 (b).

NEW FLAG ON PARLIAMENT BUILDING TOWER

Mr. CHURCH:

1. On whose instructions is a new flag being flown from the tower of the houses of parliament; who authorized it, and when?

2. Who is in charge of such matters, and of this building?

3. Was such an innovation ever authorized by parliament? If so, when?

4. Who authorized and gave the order to haul down the Union Jack?

5. Have instructions been issued for similar action on other government buildings throughout Canada? If so, at what cost?

6. Why is this innovation carried out without the knowledge or consent of parliament now in session?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. The red ensign is being flown from the tower of the houses of parliament under authority of order in council P.C. 5888, passed on September 5, 1945, copy of which appears below.

2. The Department of Public Works.

3. The red ensign flew from the tower of the houses of parliament from the days of confederation until 1904.

4, 5, and 6. Answered by No. 1.

At the Government House at Ottawa

Wednesday, the 5th day of September, 1945.

Present:

His Excellency

The Governor General in Council:

Whereas the Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King, the Prime Minister, reports that by order in council P.C. 134 of January 26, 1924, authority is given for displaying the Red Ensign with the shield of the coat of arms of Canada in the fly (commonly known as "the Canadian Red Ensign") on suitable occasions from all buildings owned or occupied by the Canadian government and situated without Canada;

That the Canadian Red Ensign was employed by Canadian forces during the present war; and

That, until such time as action is taken by parliament for the formal adoption of a national flag, it is desirable to authorize the flying of the Canadian Red Ensign on federal government buildings within as well as without Canada, and to remove any doubt as to the propriety of flying the Canadian Red Ensign wherever place or occasion may make it desirable to fly a distinctive Canadian flag;

Therefore, His Excellency the Governor General in Council, on the recommendation of the Prime Minister, is pleased to order and doth hereby order that the Red Ensign with the shield of the coat of arms of Canada in the fly (hereinafter referred to as "the Canadian Red Ensign") may be flown from buildings owned or occupied by the federal government within and without Canada;

His Excellency in Council, on the same recommendation, is further pleased to declare and doth hereby declare that it shall be appropriate to fly the Canadian Red Ensign within and without Canada wherever place or occasion may make it desirable to fly a distinctive Canadian flag.

Nothing herein shall be deemed to alter in any way the provisions now in force with respect to the flying of the Blue Ensign with the shield of the coat of arms of Canada in the fly on Canadian naval vessels and other government vessels, nor with respect to the flying of the Canadian Red Ensign on Canadian merchant vessels.

A. D. P. Heeney,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

VETERANS' LAND ACT

Mr. PROBE:

1. How many applications have been made as of September 1, 1945, for benefits under the terms of the Veterans' Land Act, 1942, for (a) small holdings; (b) full time farming; (c) combined small holdings and commercial fishing?

2. How many applications in each of these categories have been approved as of September 1, 1945?

3. How many veteran families were actually enjoying possession of their holdings provided under Veterans' Land Act, 1942, in each of the above categories as on September 1, 1945?

4. How many houses intended for occupation on small holdings under terms of Veterans' Land Act have been completed or building begun as at September 1, 1945, (a) in Ottawa district; (b) Regina, Saskatchewan, district?

5. How many of the small holdings being provided in Ottawa and Regina districts have actually been sold on Veterans' Land Act basis to veterans as of September 1, 1945?

6. What is the basis on which the allocation of the small holdings thus far secured by Veterans' Land Act in Ottawa and Regina districts is made?

7. How many unfilled applications for small holdings benefits under Veterans' Land Act are there as of September 1, 1945, in Ottawa and in Regina?

Mr. TUCKER:

1. Statistical records do not divide applications for qualification into the types of establishment proposed by veterans as original proposals are frequently changed during interview with regional advisory committees. The total number of applications for qualification is 11,343.

2. Number qualified (a) 3,175; (b) 1,694; (c) 60.

3. The number of applications for financial assistance that were approved is (a) 657, (b) 451, (c) 15. A total of 1,123. Reports obtained from all district offices indicate that a total of 811 had signed settlement agreements.

4. (a) Under contract, 140; Construction under way, 82; (b) Under contract, 25; Construction under way, 20.

5. No small holdings, where homes are under construction on subdivided areas in the vicinity of Ottawa or Regina, have been sold to veterans. The number of approved applications for financial assistance submitted by veterans who have been qualified for small holdings in the Smiths Falls region, which included Ottawa, is 22, and in the Regina region 8.

6. A system of allocation of small holdings within subdivided areas is under consideration. The system of allocation adopted will depend on the demand by way of specific application from veterans for homes within particular subdivisions.

The small holdings thus far sold to veterans have been purchase proposals submitted by qualified veterans which, on examination, were found to be suitable and within the scope of the act and regulations.

7. Number qualified for small holdings: (a) Smiths Falls region including Ottawa, 155; (b) Regina region, 30.

Applications for financial assistance to become established on small holdings: (a) Smiths Falls region including Ottawa, 56; (b) Regina region, 9.

Number approved: (a) Smiths Falls region including Ottawa, 22; (b) Regina region, 8.

Number declined: (a) Smiths Falls region including Ottawa, 6; (b) Regina region, 0.

ARMED SERVICES PERSONNEL ON RAILWAY MAINTENANCE DUTY

Mr. PROBE:

1. Were members of the armed forces, while still in the services, detailed for duty on railway maintenance with any railway company in Canada?

2. Have members of the armed services been given leave of absence for the purpose of working on railway maintenance for any railway companies in Canada?

3. If so, (a) how many service personnel were released to each railway for maintenance work; (b) on what basis and at what rates of pay were they engaged on railway maintenance work in Canada?

4. Were the wages which were received by these men paid them by the railway company or were they paid by the Department of National Defence?

5. If paid by the Department of National Defence, did the railway company concerned make up the difference between service pay and the usual pay for that type of work, and to whom was the difference paid?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. Yes.

2. Yes.

	1944	1945
(a) Canadian Pacific.....	250	346
Canadian National...	150	725

(b) (i) Prior to Sept. 8, 1945, soldiers were detailed to perform this work as a duty under the provisions of P.C. 6434 dated August 13, 1945.

[Mr. Tucker.]

(ii) Subsequent to Sept. 7, 1945, soldiers who volunteered to do this work have been granted leave without pay and allowances.

(iii) The wages paid by the railways for the soldier's services: (a) C.N.R., 53 cents an hour less $5.75 a week for board and lodging provided by the railway; C.P.R., 53 cents an hour less $6 a week for board and lodging provided by the railway.

(iv) Prior to Dec. 1, 1944, when P.C. 9148 of 1944 was passed, soldiers detailed for duty on railway track maintenance received their army pay and allowances plus any difference between such pay and allowances and the wages paid by the railways, after deduction of the cost of board and lodging. If, owing to bad weather or other reasons, the amount due from the railway for his services, was less than his pay and allowances, the soldier still received his army pay and allowances.

(v) Subsequent to Nov. 30, 1944, under the provisions of P.C. 9148 of 1944, soldiers detailed for industrial duty in the national interest received only their army pay and allowances including dependents allowance.

(vi) Subsequent to Sept. 7, 1945, a soldier who voluntarily proceeds on leave without pay and allowances including dependents allowance for the purpose of accepting employment with a railway on railway track maintenance receives the wages paid by the railway for such work.

4. At all times the railways paid wages of fifty-three cents (53 cents) an hour, less cost of board and lodging, in respect of all soldiers detailed for duty on railway track maintenance. The total amount payable by each railway was paid to the receiver general of Canada.

Up to, and including Nov. 30, 1944, a soldier engaged in railway track maintenance received full pay and allowances or, alternatively, the wages earned by him for the period and paid by the railway as above, whichever was greater. In either case the amount was paid to the soldier through his army pay account.

Subsequent to Nov. 30, 1944, until Sept. 7, 1945, in accordance with P.C. 9148, dated Dec. 5, 1944, men on industrial duty received only army pay and allowances.

On Sept. 7, 1945, industrial duty, as such, was discontinued. Thereafter soldiers were engaged in civilian industry on a voluntary basis only. They were given leave without pay and allowances from the army and were paid wages at current rates direct by the railways.

5. Answered by No. 4.

PRISONERS OF WAR—GERMAN AND JAPANESE IN CANADA

Mr. PROBE:

1. On what basis and at what rates of pay are German and Japanese prisoners of war at present working for corporations or for individuals in Canada?

2. In what general types of work are these enemy prisoners engaged?

3. Are civilians available in Canada for the type of work now being done by enemy prisoners of war?

4. Is the pay allotted by individuals or by corporations for prisoner of war services paid to the prisoners themselves or to the government of Canada?

5. How many, (a) Japanese; (b) Germans, were absent from prisoner of war camps in employment to corporations or individuals in Canada as of September 1, 1945?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. There are no Japanese prisoners of war in Canada. German prisoners of war so engaged are employed under contract entered into between the Minister of Labour and the employer. The rate of pay which the private employer pays the government for use of prisoners varies with the type of employment, and is based on the estimated value of the prisoners' services in terms of the established rates payable to civilians in like employment.

2. In essential employment for which civilian labour is not available and in areas where security conditions permit. The great majority of prisoners are employed in woods operations or in agricultural work. A small number are employed as unskilled labour in other industries.

3. No.

4. Paid to the government of Canada.

5. (a) See answer to 1; (b) 13,464 prisoners housed in work hostels or on individual farms; 196 prisoners going out to work daily from internment camps.

WAR ASSETS CORPORATION—JEEPS

Mr. McCUAIG:

1. Has War Assets Corporation sold any jeeps up to this date?

2. What is the corporation's policy for disposing of jeeps?

3. Will jeeps be made available for purchase by the public; if so, how and when?

Mr. HOWE:

1. No.

2. The general policy of War Assets Corporation in disposal of motor vehicles is to dispose of them through recognized dealers. When jeeps have been declared surplus by the Department of National Defence and are made available to the corporation, they will come within this general policy.

3. (a) Yes, if and when they are declared surplus and are turned over to the War Assets Corporation for disposal; (b) Answered by 2, and 3 (a); (c) answered by 2, and 3 (a).

VOLUNTEERS FOR GENERAL SERVICE—COMMISSIONS

Mr. McCUAIG:

1. What is the number of persons who volunteered (general service) for the army from each military district in Canada between September 3, 1939, and June 1, 1945?

2. What is the number of persons who were brought into the army under the N.R.M.A. from each military district from the time of its coming into force and June 1, 1945?

3. What is the number of persons granted commissions in the army from each military district between September 1, 1939, and June 1, 1945?

4. What is the number of "other ranks" serving abroad who were granted commissions, giving the military district of enlistment?

1.

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE IN PARIS

Mr. LAPALME:

1. On what date will the international conference of labour be held in Paris?

2. Is Canada to be represented?

3. If so, who is to represent Canada at this conference?

4. Are provincial ministers of labour invited to attend an international conference of labour?

5. If so, are the expenses of such ministers paid by the federal government?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

1. October 15, 1945.

2. Yes.

3. Canada will be represented by a delegation of representatives of the federal government and of Canadian employers and workers

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Mr. J. G. Turgeon and Mr. Alfred Rive will be the Canadian government delegates, with Mr. V. C. Phelan as alternate.

4. The provincial governments have been invited to send representatives to accompany the delegation at the expense of the provinces, as has been the practice since the I.L.O. was set up.

5. No.

HOUSING—LIMITS ON DWELLING UNITS ERECTED BY ANY ONE BUILDER

Mr. NICHOLSON:

What limits, if any, are placed on the number of dwelling units approved by the construction controller for erection by any one builder?

Mr. HOWE: Licences for houses to be erected by an individual builder are governed by the following policy of construction control: (a) for low cost houses being erected as part of an integrated housing project there is no limit; (b) for other low cost houses the limit is 50 units; (c) for higher cost houses, the limit is 5 units.

FEDERAL DISTRICT PROJECT

Mr. NICHOLSON:

1. Who are the technical advisers chosen by the government for the federal district project, and how were they chosen?

2. What opportunity is to be afforded for review and discussion of proposals for the federal district project, (a) by public hearings, (b) by representations from the city of Ottawa and other people residing in the proposed district; (c) by debate in parliament; (d) by authorities set up answerable through a minister to parliament?

Mr. MACKENZIE:

1. The federal district commission is, by statute, the government agency directly responsible for development of the district of the national capital. Its administrative organization includes several technical experts. The technical services of the Department of Public Works are also made use of by the government in this connection.

The chief technical consultant, chosen by the government to advise with regard to the development of the national capital and its surrounding area as a national war memorial, is Mr. Jacques Greber, architect and town planning expert of Paris, France, who was previously employed by the government in this capacity. In addition to the permanent technical experts of the commission and of the Department of Public Works and Mr. Greber, it is probable that it will be necessary to obtain additional expert assistance from time to time with regard to particular aspects of the project.

In the past, various technical experts have been called in to advise the government as to planning and reports have been made such as the Todd and White report of 1912, the Holt commission (federal plan commission) report of 1915, the Ewart plan of 1920, the Wright and Adams report of 1920, and the first Greber report of 1937.

2. (a) Opportunity has already been afforded for review and discussion of proposals by public hearings at the proceedings of the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons, appointed in 1944 to review special problems arising out of the location of the seat of government in the city of Ottawa. The committee considered the question of development of the Ottawa area. At that time representations were made by the city of Ottawa.

(b) Answered in part by above. By order in council P.C. 5634 of August 16, 1945, the federal district commission was authorized to appoint committees to discuss development of the district of the national capital with representatives of municipalities, or private persons, or any other body, within the district.

(c) The same opportunities for discussion of the work of the federal district commission, including that relating to the general plans for the development of the federal district, will be afforded as is given other projects in which the government of Canada is interested.

(d) By order in council P.C. 5943 of September 7, 1945, the Prime Minister, as President of the Privy Council, will report to parliament for the federal district commission.

2. What are the names of the directors, their occupations and places of residence?
3. For what sum was this company capitalized and what amounts have been advanced to it from the public treasury since it came into being?
4. What are the names of the companies, their general fields of operation and the sums of money advanced to each for oil drilling and exploration in Canada by Wartime Oils Limited up to March 31, 1945?
5. What method of recovery is adopted to recover advances made to these companies?

Mr. HOWE:

1. No. The company was wound up as of March 31, 1945. The affairs of the company are now carried on by the field manager, Mr. C. J. Stewart and one stenographer, at the head office in Calgary.

2. The officers of the company were: president, Judge A. A. Carpenter, barrister, Edmonton, Alta.; vice-president, Grant Spratt, vice-president Anglo Canadian Company Limited, Calgary, Alta.; directors, Colonel L. D. M. Baxter, president Osler, Hammond & Nanton Limited, Winnipeg, Man.; A. H. Mayland, president, Gas & Oil Products Limited, Calgary, Alta.; secretary-treasurer, K. J. Morrison, chartered accountant, Calgary, Alta.

3. This was a crown company, all of the shares being held in trust for His Majesty the King. Up to March 31, 1945, there had been advanced under drilling contracts the sum of $3,979,011.72.

4. All of the financing done by this company was for the drilling of wells in the marginal area on the west flank of Turner valley, in the province of Alberta. Advances as of June 30, 1945, by wells were as follows:

Well	Total Advance
Anglo No. 10	$184,118 41
Anglo No. 12	174,370 04
Anglo No. 13	183,489 81
Anglo No. 14	178,307 62
Calmont No. 1A	181,498 60
Calmont No. 2A	155,764 80
Chinook No. 1	193,601 00
Chinook No. 2	194,294 58
Lion-Sunray No. 3	202,894 80
Okalta No. 12	180,607 19
Okalta No. 13	177,786 07
Okalta No. 14	173,354 66
Okalta No. 15	191,538 78

Pacific No. 7	177,850 61
Valley No. 1	176,109 85
Valley No. 2	151,045 97

5. The total production from all wells drilled under financing by Wartime Oils, less one-half of the landholders royalty, less production costs, is paid to the company in reduction of advances made. Up to March 31, 1945, there had been repaid to the company the sum of $608,400.00.

CANADIAN FIRE FIGHTERS CORPS

Mr. MacINNIS:

1. What was the total number of men sent from Canada to the United Kingdom in the Canadian fire fighters corps?

2. What was the average (approximate) length of service for the men in this corps?

3. How many were killed, wounded, injured or died of injuries or illness while overseas?

Mr. McCANN:

1. 408.

2. 2 years, 8 months and 14 days.

3. 3 killed, 5 wounded and 3 seriously injured.

[Mr. Howe.]

HUDSON BAY WATERS AND AIR SURVEY

Mr. KNIGHT:

1. Did the United States government at any time in the years of the late war make a survey of the waters and of the air over the waters of Hudson's Bay and its outlets?

2. If so, did the Canadian government receive a copy of a report resulting from such survey?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

1. Yes. The United States army air forces, with the permission of the Canadian government, conducted aerial surveys of the northern and eastern approaches to the bay and along the west shore of the bay itself during the summers of 1942, 1943, and 1944.

2. The Canadian government has been provided with copies of all aerial photographs taken in the course of these surveys.

WASCANA CREEK, SASK., WATER CONSERVATION PROJECT

Mr. McKAY:

1. Have submissions been received by the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act officials relative to a water conservation project along Wascana creek in the area between Tyvan and Regina, Saskatchewan?

2. If so, what action has been taken thereon?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. Yes.

2. Agricultural investigations and reconnaissance surveys are being made.

LIVE STOCK—SLAUGHTERING CAPACITY OF INSPECTED PLANTS

Mr. McLURE:

1. What is the estimated slaughtering capacity of cattle, hogs, sheep and lambs in all the inspected plants in Canada?

2. Is any attempt made by the Canadian meat board for the orderly receivings and marketings so as to avoid a glut on one cattle market and a scarcity on another?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. The estimated slaughter capacity of inspected packing plants in Canada is as follows: cattle, 45,000 a week; calves, 25,000 a week; sheep and lambs, 40,000 a week; hogs, 200,000 a week.

2. Arrangements have been made whereby the officials of the marketing service of the dominion Department of Agriculture located at the main stockyards throughout Canada, keep the department at Ottawa informed daily with respect to live stock receipts and expected arrivals and on the basis of this information the trade is kept informed with respect to the slaughter capacity at the various packing house centres.

VALCARTIER CAMP

Mr. DORION:

1. What contracts were awarded by the Department of Munitions and Supply, from September 1, 1939, to April 1, 1945, for the erection of buildings, permanent or temporary, at Valcartier camp?

2. What tenders were received by the Department of Munitions and Supply for each such contracts?

Mr. HOWE: 1. Contracts were awarded by the Department of Munitions and Supply, from November 4, 1940 to April 1, 1945, for the erection of buildings, permanent or temporary, at Valcartier camp as follows:

(No contracts were awarded by Department of Munitions and Supply prior to November 4, 1940.

2. Following is the contract number, date of tenders invited, method used, number of contractors invited to tender and number of tenders received. It has been the policy of the department to not give the names of unsuccessful tenderers or the amounts tendered. In 13 out of 14 contracts the lowest tenderer was awarded the contract. In the case of the other contract a very small amount of money separated the lowest tenderer from the second lowest tenderer. The work of the lowest tenderer on a previous job had not been satisfactory and the contract was, therefore, awarded to the second lowest tenderer whose work had been proven on previous projects.

DISPOSITION OF WAR MATERIALS

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. What properties or assets, the ownership and control of which was vested in the crown, as set out in the report issued by the Department of Munitions and Supply on Government-Financed Expansion of Industrial Capacity in Canada as at December 31, 1944, have been sold or disposed of in any way?

2. To whom was each such property or asset sold, and at what price?

3. Which of the above sales were arranged and/or consummated, (a) by War Assets Corporation; (b) by the minister or the Department of Munitions and Supply?

Mr. BLACKMORE:

1. Up to September 15, 1945, how many military (a) jeeps; (b) cars; (c) trucks; (d) machines of other kinds, have been sold by the government to farmers or other private users in each of the nine provinces of Canada?

2. How many military buildings, such as barrack buildings, training school buildings, have been so sold, up to September 15, 1945?

Mr. HOWE: These two questions refer to the internal management of War Assets Corporation. It is proposed that a committee of the house will investigate this corporation, and call before it officers both of the corporation and of the department to go into these matters thoroughly. I may point out that it is customary, where a committee of the house does investigate a corporation such as the Canadian National Railways or the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, that questions are not asked in the house but rather are asked in the committee. Therefore I would request that these two questions be dropped and asked again in committee, where ainswers can be given by officers of the corporation, rather than in the house.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I just bring up one point? In the first place, this committee has not been set up; no notice has been placed upon the order paper so far that it will be set up, and until government policy in that regard has been made known, surely members of the house have a right to ask questions, rather than to follow the procedure now outlined by the minister.

Mr. HOWE: Technically, that is true, but I understand the committee will be announced this week. I could ask that the questions stand, and bring up this point later on. A tremendous amount of work would be involved and the answers to the questions probably would not be satisfactory unless they could be accompanied by an explanation by the officers of the crown company. Another factor is that these questions deal with current transactions, such as the sale of properties. Questions asked in the house are very disturbing to the interests of the government in carrying out such sales. There is no one so skittish as a man about to spend a million dollars in the purchase of a new factory. We have had a good many disappointments, and we do not like to give reports on transactions of that kind until we actually have the agreement signed. Therefore these questions might stand.

Mr. KNOWLES: Do I understand from the minister that it is the intention of the government to set up a special committee to which these matters will be referred?

Mr. HOWE: Provision will be made for setting up the war expenditures committee with reference which will include War Assets Corporation. I presume a special sub-committee will be set up for that purpose.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask if we are to have a repeat performance of what went on during the last few years in the war expenditures committee, with the committee sitting in secret?

Mr. HOWE: I always thought that was up to the committee itself.

Mr. KNOWLES: Since the minister is agreeable it might meet the desire of all concerned if these questions were allowed to stand for another few days.

Mr. SPEAKER: Questions stand.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON VETERANS' QUALIFICATIONS

Mr. McLURE:

1. Has the royal commission on veterans' qualifications been abolished; if so, when?
2. When was said commission appointed?
3. Who were or are the members of said commission?
4. What were their salaries?
5. What were its duties as a commission?
6. In what provinces did they hold sittings?
7. Did they finish their sittings in the province of Prince Edward Island?
8. If not, why were they recalled from Charlottetown to Ottawa?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. No.

2. By order in council P.C. 2486 on April 10, 1945.

3. Wilfrid Bovey, Esq., member of Legislative Council of Quebec, Montreal, P.Q.; D. S. Lyons, Esq., Montreal, P.Q.; Hector Dupuis, Esq., Montreal, P.Q.; J. C. G. Herwig, Esq., Ottawa, Ontario; S. R. Ross, Esq., Windsor, Ontario; F. W. Smelts, Esq., Vancouver, B.C.

4. Each member receives a fee of $20 per diem for each day engaged in the work of the commission, with the exception of Messrs. Smelts and Dupuis who receive no remuneration additional to that payable to them as regional directors of national selective service. All members are paid actual and necessary travelling expenses while absent from their places of residence.

5. To examine into the problems involved and appropriate measures which may be taken to enable members of the armed forces to obtain appropriate credit in re-entering civilian occupations upon discharge, for trades, technical or other educational training or experience gained while in the armed forces and to report to the Minister of Labour thereon together with their recommendations as to what measures are advisable and appropriate in cooperation with the provinces, employers, or trades and labour organizations or otherwise to this end.

6. All provinces.

7. Yes.

8. See answer to No. 7.

HAZELTON, B.C., POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. ARCHIBALD:

1. Who is the present postmaster at Hazelton, British Columbia?
2. When was he appointed?
3. Is the present postmaster a veteran of the 1914-18 war, or of the last war?
4. Was the position advertised in the town of Hazelton? If so, by what means?
5. Were any other applications for the position received?
6. If so, were other applicants veterans of the 1914-18 war, or of the last war?
7. By whom was the present postmaster recommended?
8. What was the revenue of this post office for each of the years, 1942, 1943 and 1944?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier):

1. Mathew Arthur Myros.

2. 22nd July, 1945.

3. Yes (1914-18).

4. No. Notice of the vacancy was sent in accordance with the regular practice to the provincial command of the Canadian Legion.

5. Yes.

6. Yes.

7. Ed. T. Upplewaite.

8. Fiscal year 1941-42, $2,034.37; fiscal year 1942-43, $2,356.27; fiscal year 1943-44, $3,374.30.

CORNWALLIS NAVAL STATION

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. What is the cost of the Cornwallis naval station, at Deep Brook, Nova Scotia, (a) land; (b) improvements; (c) buildings; (d) total costs?
2. What has been the cost for supplies, upkeep and maintenance?
3. How many naval personnel were in training on September 1, 1945?
4. How many, (a) naval personnel; (b) civilians were on the staff and payroll on September 1, 1945?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax):

1. (a) Land, $65,00.00; (b) improvements (grading, services, etc.), $1,974,618.44; (c) buildings, $7,124,025.19; (d) total, $9,163,643.63.

2. From the 1st July, 1943, when directorate of maintenance was set up, to September 1, 1945, the costs for maintenance supplies, upkeep and maintenance, including fuel was $894,999.13. To segregate the costs incurred for supplies, upkeep and maintenance prior to the 1st July, 1943, would involve a tremendous amount of time and work.

3. 623.

4. (a) Naval personnel borne in the pay ledgers of H.M.C.S. Cornwallis on the 1st September, 1945, totalled 11,446.

Note.—H.M.C.S. Cornwallis is now one of the largest Royal Canadian Navy discharge transit centres. Apart from the staff and those under training the majority of personnel borne for pay are in process of being demobilized. Many are on leave prior to final discharge.

Supply and medical personnel required to demobilize these large numbers form part of the present staff. In addition the usual barracks and maintenance staffs are required to accommodate personnel drafted to this establishment for demobilization routine.

(b) 12 Civil servants, 317 hourly rate civilian employees.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. What quantity of fuel was purchased for the Cornwallis naval station, Deep Brook, Nova Scotia, for each of the fiscal years ending March 31, 1943, 1944, 1945 and the current year to date?

2. What was the grade and where produced?

3. What was the cost per ton, the freight, demurrage, commission and total cost of each purchase?

4. From whom were purchases made, and what tenders or alternative bids were received?

5. What was total quantity and delivered cost each year of, (a) Nova Scotia fuel; (b) imported fuel?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Fiscal year ended 31st March, 1943, nil; fiscal year ended 31st March, 1944, 13,698 tons; fiscal year ended 31st March, 1945, 20,-921 tons; 1945-46 to date, 5,934 tons.

2. 1943-44—Two types: Run of mine and slack. Both grades were produced in Nova Scotia.

1944-45—Purchases confined to one grade-slack. All purchases produced in Nova Scotia with the exception of 4,859 tons imported from the United States, at a time when there was no suitable coal in the maritimes and to ensure a supply prior to a threatened strike in the maritime area.

1945-46, to date—Purchases confined to one grade-slack. Produced in Nova Scotia with the exception of 140 tons imported from the United States.

3. 1943-44—1,288 tons at $7.77 per ton f.o.b. Cornwallis; 461 tons at $6.07 per ton f.o.b. Cornwallis; 6,023 tons at $7.07 per ton f.o.b. Cornwallis; 2,156 tons at $7 per ton f.o.b. Cornwallis; 3,246 tons at $4 per ton f.o.b. mine, Westville, N.S.; 524 tons at $2.50 per ton f.o.b. mine, Alma, N.S.

1944-45—1,082 tons at $6.12 per ton f.o.b. mine, Sydney, N.S.; 1,887 tons at $7.62 per ton f.o.b. mine, Sydney, N.S.; 1,371 tons at $8.02 per ton f.o.b. Cornwallis; 4,859 tons at $14.85 per ton f.o.b. Cornwallis; 222 tons at $3.86 per ton f.o.b. mine, Joggins, N.S.; 700 tons at $3.86 per ton f.o.b. mine, Joggins, N.S.; 300 tons at $3.86 per ton f.o.b. mine, Joggins, N.S.; 10,500 tons at $5.40 per ton f.o.b. mine, Westville, N.S.

1945-46—140 tons at $14.85 per ton f.o.b. Cornwallis; 5,794 tons at $5.40 per ton f.o.b. mine, Westville, N.S.

Freight rates were as follows: Alma, N.S., to Cornwallis, $2.10 net ton; Westville, N.S., to Cornwallis, $2.10 net ton; Sydney, N.S., to Cornwallis, $2.60 net ton; Joggins, N.S., to Cornwallis, $2.60 net ton.

Demurrage rates were as follows:

First 48 hours, free; next 24 hours, $1 per car per day; next 24 hours, $1 per car per day; each 24 hours thereafter, $5 per car per day.

The above freight and demurrage rates are standard rates approved by the board of transport commissioners for Canada. No commissions were paid by Naval Service.

4. Purchases were made from the following firms: S. Cunard & Co. Ltd., Halifax, N.S.; Old Sydney Collieries, c/o Dominion Coal Co., Montreal, P.Q.; A. P. Kelly, 436 Barrington St., Halifax, N.S.; Intercolonial Coal Co., New Glasgow, N.S.; Maritime Coal & Power Co., Ltd., Amherst, N.S.; P. Burns & Co. Ltd., Toronto, Ontario.

It was neither practical nor economical to call for tenders on this coal. The department purchased coal direct from the producer and the distributor in the maritimes whenever possible and wherever the coal was available. All prices were set and allocations made by the coal controller.

5. Answered by No. 3.

R.C.A.F.—NO. 8 REPAIR DEPOT

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North):

1. Are R.C.A.F. service personnel being used at No. 8 repair depot in Winnipeg to remodel war planes into civilian transport planes?
2. If so, what rates of pay do such personnel receive?
3. What disposal will be made of the remodeled aircraft?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West):

1. No.
2. Not applicable.
3. Not applicable.

RESEARCH ENTERPRISES—DISPOSAL OF RADAR EQUIPMENT

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North):

1. Have instructions been given for the destruction of any or all parts of radar equipment at R.E.L. plant in Toronto?
2. If so, on whose authority were these instructions given?
3. Did any of the employees ask permission to buy material which is being destroyed?
4. If so, were they granted the opportunity?

Mr. HOWE:

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. Yes. Research Enterprises Limited, however, has no authority to sell any crown property. When and if such is declared surplus and is transferred to war assets corporation for disposal, the rules governing disposal of war materials will apply.
4. No, answered by No. 3.

CANADIAN ARMY OF OCCUPATION

Mr. MERRITT:

1. What was the total strength of the Canadian army of occupation in Europe on the 1st day of September, 1945?
2. Of this total, how many were, (a) NRMA personnel; (b) general service personnel who, when given the opportunity of election, gave as their first preference for further service—service in the army of occupation; (c) general service personnel who gave service in the army of occupation as second preference; (d) general service personnel who gave service in the army of occupation as third preference?
3. How many of the total of 2 (c) and (d) above had served six months or more in the theatre of war during actual operations against the enemy?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. 1,177 officers; 19,088 other ranks.
2. (a) 1,778.

(b) Number who did not wish to volunteer for service in the Canadian far east force (later known as the Canadian Army Pacific force) but indicated a desire for service with the Canadian occupation force; 594 officers; 5,489 other ranks.

(c) Number who wished to volunteer for service in the Canadian far east force but who indicated that if not accepted for that force they desired to serve with the Canadian occupation force: 88 officers; 208 other ranks.

(d) Number who (i) volunteered for service in the Canadian far east force and who indicated that if not accepted for that force they wished to be reallocated in accordance with individual priorities and the requirements of the service or

(ii) did not volunteer for service in the Canadian far east force and who indicated a wish for reallocation in accordance with individual priorities and the requirements of the service: 495 officers; 11,613 other ranks.

3. 4,622 all ranks.

R.C.A.F.—PENHOLD STATION

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

3. Instructions were given to No 2 technical signals unit, Penhold, to route for repair all repairable spares required by the R.C.A.F. and to dispose of the remainder as follows: (a) Repairable spares previously indicated by War Assets Corporation as being saleable, to be shipped to a surplus equipment holding unit for subsequent transfer to War Asset Corporation; (b) Unserviceable airborne spares which War Assets Corporation had indicated as not being saleable to be reduced to their predominant metal and disposed of as produce. Later this instruction was cancelled and superseded by an instruction whereby these spares were also to be held pending further advice from War Assets Corporation as to their disposal.

4. (a) 8,260 lbs. (178 sets) of unserviceable radar equipment; (b) 17,240 lbs. (306 sets) of unserviceable wireless equipment.

RESEARCH ENTERPRISES—RADAR AND OPTICAL GLASS EQUIPMENT

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North):

1. Has any part of R.E.L. plant at Toronto been sold to the Corning Glass Company?

2. If so, what was the sale price?

3. What other bids were received, and for what amounts?

4. Will the R.E.L. plant continue the production of radar and optical glass equipment?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Yes, building No. 14 with services as follows: Lands, 8·185 acres; buildings, one storey, 182 feet by 454 feet; two storey office, 31 feet by 125 feet; lavatory, 27 feet by 27 feet.

2. $150,000.

3. No other tenders were called.

4. This is a matter that has not yet been determined.

VETERANS' LAND ACT—SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. BENTLEY:

1. How many veterans of this war have been settled in Saskatchewan under the Veterans Land Act, in (a) the park areas; (b) the prairie areas; (c) the Swift Current electoral district?

2. What is the largest farm settled on under the act and at what cost?

3. What is the smallest farm settled on under the act and at what cost?

4. What is the average sized farm settled on under the act and at what cost?

5. In each case, what are the locations by land descriptions and nearest trading point?

Mr. TUCKER:

1. Financial assistance approved for establishment on full-time farms: (a) 56; (b) 30; (c) none.

2. Area: 1278·8 acres; Cost: $4,800 for land and buildings, $1,200 conditional grant for equipment; Location: Pt. S.E. 24-13-6-W. 4th; Pts. NE 24-13-6-W. 4th; NW 24-13-6-W. 4th; Pts. 3. Area: 10·92 acres; Cost: $5,000 for land and buildings, $1,000 conditional grant for equipment; Location: Lot 15, map 301, S.D. Y.D.; Trading point: Keremeos, B.C., 2½ miles.

4. Area: 201·85 acres; Cost: $4,071,10 land and permanent improvement, $1,095,46 conditional grant for equipment.

5. See answers to 2 and 3.

[Mr. C. W. G. Gibson.]

AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION—SEPARATE STANDING COMMITTEES

Mr. WINKLER:

In view of changed conditions, will the government consider dividing the standing committee on agriculture and colonization into one on agriculture and one on immigration?

Mr. ILSLEY: The government is willing to give consideration to any changes in the constitution of committees such as those requested, but at the moment it is not obvious to the government what advantage would be gained by making this particular division of functions. Perhaps if the hon. gentleman would communicate with the government, setting out his reasons, the matter could be given consideration.

APPLE PRODUCTION

Mr. ISNOR:

1. What was the total apple production in Canada in 1944?

2. What was the apple production for each of the provinces in 1944 in, (a) barrels; (b) dollars and cents?

Mr. MacKINNON:

1. The total apple production in Canada in 1944 was 5,943,000 barrels.

2. Production and value of apples in Canada, 1944

	Production bbl.*	Value

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

1. Did the officials of the Veterans' Land Act purchase land in Essex county, Ontario, from a Mr. Oliver?

2. What was the quantity of land purchased, and what was its location?

3. What price was paid for this land?

4. How was the value of this land determined?

Mr. TUCKER:

1. Yes.

2. 79·16 acres. Parts Lots 3 and 4 in the 5th Concession (L'Assumption) township of Sandwich West.

3. $20,000.

4. Land was carefully inspected by experienced departmental field officer. His appraisal report was reviewed and property examined by regional advisory committee. Committee recommended purchase at price paid and recommendation concurred in by district superintendent, Veterans Land Act, Toronto.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. MacINNIS:

1. What was the number of wage and salary earners insured under the Unemployment Insurance Act as at June 30, 1945?
2. What was the number of wage and salary earners not insured under the Unemployment Insurance Act as at June 30, 1945?
3. What was the amount to the credit of the unemployment insurance fund as at the same date?
4. How many persons made application for benefits under the act during the year ending March 31, 1945?
5. How many applications were, (a) granted; (b) refused?
6. What was the total amount of unemployment insurance benefits paid for the year ending March 31, 1945?
7. What was, (a) the average time for which benefits were paid; (b) the average benefits paid?
8. What was the number of applications for benefits for the month of July in each year, 1943, 1944 and 1945?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. Estimated 2,282,000.
2. Estimated in armed services 762,000; estimated non-insured wage earners 620,000.
3. $279,820,690.06.

6. $4,980,929.02.
7. (a) 16 days; (b) $30.54.
8. July, 1943, 1,087; July, 1944, 3,106; July, 1945, 10,886.

VETERANS' LAND ACT—PURCHASE OF PROPERTY NEAR RED DEER, ALTA.

Mr. SHAW:

1. Did the Department of Veterans Affairs or any other department of government purchase a block of land adjacent to the city of Red Deer, Alberta, for the purpose of establishing small holdings under the Veterans' Land Act?
2. If so, what was the total acreage purchased and what was the total purchase price?
3. How many small holdings are to be established in this block and what is the total actual or estimated cost of all improvements which will be made prior to sale to ex-servicemen? What will be the total sale price of each small holding?
4. How many applications have been received for the purchase of small holdings adjacent to the city of Red Deer?
5. Is it the policy under the Veterans' Land Act to accept applications for small holdings adjacent to Red Deer from those who did not reside in the Red Deer district at the time of enlistment?

Mr. TUCKER:

1. Yes.
2. Two such blocks have been purchased: (a) 75 acres at cost of $5,625; (b) 61.64 acres at cost of $5,550.
3. Block (a) has been subdivided into 62 lots, Block (b) has not been subdivided. The construction of 25 houses on block (a) has been contracted for at average unit cost of $4,438. Laying of water mains and sewers contracted for at cost of $34,184. Construction of roads under discussion with city authorities. It is not possible at the present time to give total sale price of each small holding.
4. One application for financial aid to become established on a small holding property adjacent to Red Deer has been received and approved. There has been no allocation of properties within blocks (a) or (b).
5. Yes.

ENLISTED MEN ON RAILROAD WORK, M.D. 10

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. Were any enlisted men sent from M.D. 10 to Armstrong, Ontario, for railroad work during August and/or September, 1945?
2. If so, how many men were involved, how long were they detailed to this work, what was the nature of the same, and how many hours a day did they work?
3. What pay did these men receive for such work?
4. What rates were paid by the railroad for such service, and to whom?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. Yes.
2. (a) 70; (b) The men were dispatched on Aug. 11, 1945 and were, originally, to remain until "freeze-up". However, with the change in policy in respect to industrial duty, to a voluntary basis, the detail finished on Sept. 7, 1945. Thereafter, any men employed at Armstrong were there on leave without army pay and allowances; (c) Railway track maintenance; (d) Ten.
3. During the period Aug. 11, 1945 to Sept. 7, 1945: full army pay and allowances including dependents' allowance. See also answer to question No. 2 (b).
4. During the period Aug. 11, 1945 to Sept. 7, 1945: (a) Fifty-three cents each working hour per soldier less $5.75 a week per soldier charged for board and lodging; (b) Receiver General of Canada.

*CEILING ON EXPORT PRICE OF PRAIRIE WHEAT

Mr. COLDWELL:

In view of the announcement to-day that a five-year ceiling is to be placed upon the export price of prairie wheat, are all other exports of Canadian products, including textiles, lumber and pulp to be subject to similar decreases for the long-term maintenance or possible reduction of their war-time price ceilings?

Mr. MacKINNON: It appears to me that this question is based upon a wrong premise, because in my announcement with regard to wheat prices I did not say that there would be a five-year ceiling on wheat prices. In view of that circumstance I suggest that the question be dropped and possibly reworded.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, reworded.

Question dropped.

KHAKI UNIVERSITY IN UNITED KINGDOM

Mr. BRUCE:

1. Has the Department of National Defence established a Khaki university of Canada in the United Kingdom?

2. If so, will the minister give the house full particulars in regard to cost, site, staff and functions?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. Yes.

2. Cost: Costs additional to regular pay and allowances and maintenance of the troops while stationed overseas awaiting repatriation are as follows: (a) Civilian instructors at $12 per day plus expenses; (b) Modification of accommodation to provide suitable studying facilities estimated at $15,000; (c) Text books, etc. from the Canadian Legion War Services.

Site: Leavesden hospital, King's Langley, Hertfordshire, England.

Staff: As of 5 September, 1945: (1) An administrative executive of 7 officers under Brigadier G. E. Beament, O.B.E., B.A.Sc.; (2) Heads of departments to the number of 10 Officers and an instructional staff of 45; (3) Six part time lecturers provided by the university of London.

Note: To assist in the organization of the departments, four professors from Canadian universities spent six weeks at the Junior College. Three of them have returned to Canada.

A small group of civilian professors from Canada have been attached to the staff of Junior college—the number, at present, is four. With the exception of this group, the staff is made up entirely of service personnel.

Function: The object of the Khaki university of Canada is to provide, on a voluntary basis, facilities in certain university studies (including post-graduate studies), and vocational extension for selected personnel of the Canadian Army Overeas, other than the Canadian Army Occupation Force. The primary purpose of these facilities is to assist the student in effecting the process of readjustment involved in entering upon, or resuming university studies or vocational pursuits in Canada after repatriation. Without prejudice to this primary object, and in appropriate cases where the progress made in a particular subject warrants, the secondary purpose is to provide, on a voluntary basis, an opportunity for students to write examinations leading to a credit in such subject at a recognized Canadian university.

It is organized in three branches: (1) The Junior college; (2) University Extension; (3) Vocational Extension.

Re (1)—The Junior college provides opportunity for students to take 1st and 2nd year work in Arts and Science, according to courses offered for extramural study by Canadian universities.

Candidates are recommended by commanding officers to the rehabilitation training selection board of their division, or equivalent formation. The function of the board is to pass upon the candidate's eligibility and qualifications and make recommendation to the authorities of the Junior college. Candidates accepted by the registrar of the Junior college are then posted to the college for a term of three months (with provision in certain cases for a second term). During the term, a student may study not more than two subjects. During his attachment to the Junior college, the student receives pay and allowances of his rank. Rations and quarters are provided.

Re (2)—The department provides opportunity for attachment to British universities in any faculty, or students of 3rd and 4th year standing or those qualified for post-graduate study.

Candidates are screened by a committee at Canadian military headquarters with the High Commissioner of Canada as chairman. On being accepted as possessing the qualifications necessary to profit by attachment to a British university, candidates are certified to the principal of the university of their choice, or, if no vacancies remain at that institution, places are secured at some other university offering the studies desired by candidates. All students attached to British universities receive pay and allowances of their rank together with a ration allowance. They must themselves pay for all tuition and all living costs.

Re (3)—The department provides opportunity for attachment to British technical institutes, agricultural schools, industries, of those deemed qualified to profit by such attachment.

Vocational attachments are on the same terms as those of university attachments, with this exception, that personnel attached to industry or agriculture may receive a nominal honorarium from their temporary employer for work done.

FISH

Mr. WINTERS:

1. What was the total Canadian fish catch in 1943 and 1944?

2. What was the total fish catch for each of the provinces for the same period in dollars and cents?

3. What was the total cod catch in 1943 and 1944?

4. What was the total cod catch for the same period for each of the provinces in, (a) weight; (b) dollars and cents?

Mr. MacKINNON:

1. 12,358,757 cwt. in 1943.
11,743,167 cwt. in 1944.

2. Quantity and value of fish caught and landed in Canada, 1943-44.

Note: In these tables, values are "as landed", i.e. values to fishermen before fish are canned, dried, or otherwise processed. All figures for 1944 are subject to revision.

*WINNIPEG GRAIN EXCHANGE

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia):

Has the government any information with regard to the early reopening of the Winnipeg grain exchange?

Mr. MacKINNON: No.

WARTIME HOUSING LIMITED—WESTERN CANADA

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North):

1. What is the unit cost of houses, (a) built; (b) in process of building, by Wartime Housing Limited in Fort William, Winnipeg, Regina, Saskatoon, Moose Jaw, Vancouver, in 1944 and 1945?

2. Are building specifications for these houses the same in each of the cities mentioned?

3. Were tenders asked for construction of 100 war-time houses in the Elmwood area in Winnipeg?

4. If so, who submitted bids and what amounts were bid?

5. To whom was the contract awarded?

Note: There are two housing projects in Winnipeg, Regina and Moose Jaw during 1945, one in the Spring and the other in the Fall. There was a greater proportion of larger houses in project No. 2 and an increase in the cost of labour.

2. No.

3. Yes.

4. Two contractors, Bird Construction Company and Claydon Company Ltd., tendered on project No. 1 for 100 houses in Winnipeg. The lowest and chosen contractor was Bird Construction Company, amount of tender $293,035.00. It is government policy not to give the amount tendered by an unsuccessful tenderer.

AGRICULTURAL PRICES SUPPORT BOARD

Mr. BARRETT:

1. What is the name, address and occupation of each member of the agricultural prices support board as set up under Bill 168 passed in 1944?

2. What is the salary of each member of the board?

3. Are any of the members of the board engaged in the public service?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. J. G. Taggart, Ottawa, chairman of agricultural prices support board, chairman of meat board; A. M. Shaw, Ottawa, director, marketing service, department of agriculture, temporary member; J. F. Booth, Ottawa, associate director, marketing service, agricultural economics, department of agriculture, temporary member.

2. J. G. Taggart, $8,000.

3. Yes. Mr. Shaw is employed full time as director of marketing service, for which he receives a salary of $8,500. Dr. Booth is employed full time as associate director of marketing service, agricultural economics, for which he receives a salary of $5,220. Mr. Taggart is chairman of the meat board.

*I should like to make some further explanation with regard to this question and answer. The names as set out in the answer to the first question are J. G. Taggart, who has been appointed permanent chairman, and two members of the staff of the Department of Agriculture. These men are appointed only pro tem, and are not permanent members of that board. With that explanation the answer is suitable.

WHEAT PRICES

Mr. BURTON:

1. Did the government confer with any farmer organizations with regard to the setting of the price of wheat, as announced by the Minister of Trade and Commerce on Wednesday, September 19?

2. If so, what organizations, and did anyone on behalf of the organized farmers agree to the price as announced?

Mr. MacKINNON:

1. The government from time to time received the representatives of the various farm organizations on floor prices and individual members of the government have consulted with individual farm leaders. By the nature of the government's announcement on the price of wheat no prior disclosure of the actual terms could properly be, or was, made to farm organizations, the government accepting full responsibility for the terms of the policy announced.

2. Answered by No. 1.

*ASSISTANCE IN ORGANIZATION OF PROVINCIAL CIVIL SERVICE

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. Have any provincial governments asked the government of Canada to provide dominion civil service personnel to assist in the organization of the civil service of such province?

2. If so, what provinces, and what numbers of personnel has each such province requested?

Mr. MARTIN: May I reply to this question orally. The answer to the first question is yes. The governments of Manitoba and Saskatchewan have asked the federal government to lend some of its civil service personnel to assist these provincial governments in connection with classification and advising generally on technical matters. In respect to Manitoba the government has lent one official, and with regard to Saskatchewan consideration is now being given as to exactly what officers the government of Saskatchewan would like to have help them in an advisory capacity.

MEMORIAL CROSS TO FOSTER MOTHER OF SERVICEMAN KILLED IN ACTION

Mr. SHAW:

What consideration, if any, has been given to the amending of order in council P.C. 4210 (as amended by P.C. 2135) to make possible the granting of the Memorial Cross to the foster mother of a serviceman who gave his life while a member of the Canadian armed forces?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The question of extending the award of the memorial cross to foster mothers and others was carefully reviewed in June, 1944 and is was considered inadvisable to extend the scope of issue for the reasons following:

The governing orders in council (P.C. 4210 of 27 August, 1940 as amended by P.C. 2135 of 28 March, 1943) provide for the issue of the cross "as a memento of personal loss and sacrifice on the part of mothers and widows of Canadian sailors, soldiers, airmen or merchant seamen who have laid down their lives for their country during the present war", from which it will be seen that the cross is intended as a recognition of the great sacrifice arising from the closest family ties.

Whereas the sacrifice does not permit of tangible recognition, nevertheless the memorial cross was instituted as a symbol of the personal loss suffered by a mother or widow whose sense of loss is necessarily deeper than that of others, and in order to preserve the underlying sentiment of the award it is felt that it must be restricted in this manner to those bearing the very closest and most clearly determinable ties of relationship.

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. HERRIDGE:

1. How many persons have been appointed to positions in the Department of Veterans Affairs since its inception in 1944?
2. How many positions have been established where the official concerned is in receipt of $3,600 per annum or more?
3. What was the previous army, navy or air force rank held by such persons holding these positions?

Mr. TUCKER:

1. 5,594.

2. 104.

3. Brigadier General 2; Colonel 4; Group Captain 1; Lieutenant-Colonel 10; Wing Commander 7; Major 43; Squadron Leader 4; Captain (Army) 12; Flight Lieutenant 4; Lieutenant (Army) 3; Flying Officer 1; Sergeant 2; Corporal 1; Private 7.

TRADE AGREEMENTS

Mr. BAKER:

1. How many new trade agreements were entered into between Canada and other countries between 1935 and 1940?
2. With what countries were such agreements made and in what year?
3. How many new trade agreements has Canada made since 1940?
4. With what countries were such agreements made and in what year?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

1. Twelve.
2. 1935 United States of America.
   1936 Germany (provisional).
   1937 United Kingdom; Haiti; Guatemala.
   1938 Uruguay (modus vivendi); United States of America.
   1939 Uruguay (2) (modus vivendi); United States of America (supplementary).

LAY-OFFS IN AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRY

Mr. FULTON:

How many workers were laid off in the motor industry of Canada as a result of cancellation of war contracts or of change over of plant equipment from war production to peace-time production types, between V-J day and September 17, 1945, inclusive?

Mr. MITCHELL: Employment in Ford Motors, General Motors and Chrysler Corporation at August 14, 1945, was 25,023; at September 17, 1945, it had dropped to 21,600, thus showing a net decrease of 3,423 between these two dates.

SALE OF WAR PLANTS

Mr. FULTON:

1. How many war plants owned by the Canadian government were sold up to and including September 17, 1945?
2. How many of the war plants thus sold had been fully converted to peace-time production at that date?
3. How many war plants owned by the Canadian government were in process of sale as at September 17, 1945?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Ten.
2. This information is not available in the department.

VETERANS' INSURANCE

Mr. MARSHALL:

1. How many offices for the issuance of insurance policies under the Veterans' Insurance Act have been established in Canada?
2. Where is the office for the province of Alberta situated and who has been appointed to take charge of said office?
3. When was this appointment made, and what salary and other expenses go with the position?
4. Will the terms of the act be extended to cover the wives and families of all returned men?

Mr. TUCKER:

1. No active sales campaign has been anticipated for veterans insurance. Application for insurance may be made through the 19 district and sub-district offices in Canada of the Department of Veterans Affairs or by direct application to the superintendent of veterans insurance, Ottawa.

2. Two district offices are located in Alberta: District office "I", 217, 7th Ave. W., Calgary; District office "R", Redwood Bldg., 11250 Jasper Ave., Edmonton.

The officer in charge of each district office is the district administrator of the department.

3. See answers to questions 1 and 2.

4. This question relates to matters of policy and it is not the government's practice to disclose policy in giving answers to questions.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

PROVINCIAL AIR CONFERENCE AT KAMLOOPS

Mr. FULTON:

1. Has the government received a copy of the proceedings of the first provincial air conference held at Kamloops, British Columbia, on May 24 and 25, 1945?

2. Has the government received a request that consideration be given to the implementing of certain resolutions contained therein with a view to encouraging Canadian commercial aviation?

3. If so, what action has been taken by the government?

Mr. FULTON: Mr. Speaker, I should like to withdraw this question and offer my apologies to the minister concerned. Two days ago I received from the body concerned, on whose behalf I asked the question, a wire asking that it be withdrawn. However, since receiving that wire, I have not had an opportunity to speak to the minister and indicate to him my intention to withdraw the question. I did send him a note this afternoon, which possibly he has not yet had time to open.

Question dropped.

AVAILABILITY TO FARMERS OF ARMY TRUCKS AND TRACTORS

Mr. JAENICKE:

1. Was the sale of army trucks and field artillery tractors to farmers in Markham, Ontario, by the War Assets Corporation, as set forth in a Canadian Press dispatch of September 20, held with the approval of the government?

2. Is it the intention to hold sales of such trucks and tractors on a similar basis in western Canada?

3. Will a priority be given in the purchases of such trucks and tractors?
4. If so, to whom?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Yes.

2. Yes.

3. These direct sales are conducted for farmer purchasers only who are certified by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture.

4. Answered by No. 3.

AGRICULTURAL PRICES SUPPORT ACT

Mr. MARSHALL:

1. Has the government proclaimed section 9 (the section which provides the authority to buy and sell agricultural products and to make deficiency payments) of the Agricultural Prices Support Act?

2. If not, when will this be done?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. No.

2. This is a matter of government policy which will be announced in due course.

RADIO BROADCASTING—STATION CKEY

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Does the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation own stations CBL and CJBC in the city of Toronto?
2. Who are the owners of CKEY?
3. Has CKEY been granted authority or permission to broadcast commercial American network programmes over their facilities? If so, what programmes and what financial arrangements are involved?

Mr. McCANN:

1. Yes.

2. Toronto Broadcasting Co., Limited, 44 University avenue, Toronto, Ontario.

3. Yes temporarily in respect to programs which can not be carried on CBC networks and as supplementary station for certain Dominion network programmes on CJBC. So far RCA Victor—CKEY receives 50 percent network rate after deducting frequency discount.

MOUNTED POLICE PERSONNEL—REGULATIONS RESPECTING MARRIAGE

Mr. CROLL:

1. Are R.C.M.P. personnel not permitted to marry until after they have served seven years on the force?
2. If so, what is the reason for this regulation?
3. Is the R.C.M.P. the only service in which this regulation is in force?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

1. No. The marriage regulations of the R.C.M. Police were modified in April, 1945, by increasing the married establishment from 45 per cent to 50 per cent of the total uniformed strength of the force, which, in normal circumstances, may permit marriage after a minimum service of five years.

2. The reasons for the existing regulations are: (a) To ensure receipt of an adequate salary, in order to maintain a home. (It should be remembered that a Constable of the force does not receive the maximum pay of his rank until his eighth year of service.) (b) Mobility.

3. No. Paragraph 936 of the King's Regulations and Orders, 1939, fixes a married establishment for "other ranks" of the permanent force, Canadian Army.

NO. 6 S.F.T.S. MOWING EQUIPMENT

Mr. LENNARD:

1. Will the mowing equipment at No. 6 S.F.T.S., Dunville, Ontario, be declared surplus and released for sale?
2. If so, when?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West):

1. A survey of all aerodrome maintenance equipment is presently being conducted with a view to ascertaining that portion of equipment, including mowing equipment at No. 6 S.F.T.S., surplus to R.C.A.F. requirements.

2. It is expected that this survey will be completed within thirty days at which time any surpluses will be declared to War Assets Corporation for disposal.

RESEARCH ENTERPRISES BUILDING NO. 14, LEASIDE

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia):

1. Was building 14, Research Enterprises, Leaside, sold?
2. If so, to whom?
3. What was the date of sale?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Yes.
2. Corning Glass Company.
3. June 15, 1945.

PRISONERS OF WAR IN CANADA

Mr. FLEMING:

1. How many enemy prisoners of war are now held in Canada?
2. How many have been returned to Europe (by nationalities)?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

1. 34,051.

2. 1,245 in all. Of these 848 were members of the German armed forces, 302 German merchant seamen and 95 Italian merchant seamen.

DOMINION BONDS PURCHASED BY U. S. CITIZENS

Mr. QUELCH:

What is the amount of dominion bonds purchased by American citizens non-resident in Canada since the declaration of war in each of the years from 1939 to 1945?

Mr. MacKINNON: Total sales of direct dominion issues of bonds to residents of the United States reported by Canadian security dealers and banks to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics follow:

Year	(Millions of Can. $)
1939—Sept. to Dec.	7·8
1940	17·2
1941	15·1
1942	28·0
1943	74·0
1945—Jan. to June	49·6

These figures do not include the sale of new dominion issues in the United States in 1941 and 1943 in connection with the refinancing of some issues redeemed in the United States. There were also issues called for redemption in the United States in 1943 and some purchases by Canadians from non-residents in connection with "switches" in their holdings of outstanding securities.

OTTAWA HOUSING PROJECT NORTH OF CARLING AVENUE

Mr. PROBE:

1. Is the housing project north of Carling avenue, about one-half mile west of McKellar golf club, Ottawa, being sponsored by the Veterans' Land Act?

2. Has the department authorized a "no admittance" sign to this project? Is there a watchman at the entrance and does he allow inspection of this project by veterans and their families?

3. Are continuous inspections being made by land act inspectors of the buildings?

4. What interim payments to contractors have been authorized on this project?

5. What explanation for the collapse of the foundation of the second building from the southwest corner in this project has been received by the department?

6. What percentage mixture of concrete or other binding material is specified for use in the basement of this building? What percentage mixture is being used?

Mr. TUCKER:

1. Yes.

2. No—this is the general contractor's responsibility. A "No trespassing" sign has been erected by the general contractor. A watchman is employed by the general contractor in accordance with the terms of the contract. Inspection has been allowed but is not encouraged as it would interfere with the contractor's operations. Permission would be the contractor's responsibility during course of construction. When houses are completed inspection by interested veterans will be encouraged.

3. Yes.

4. Monthly progress estimates are paid upon submission by the contractor and audit by the treasury department.

5. The foundation did not collapse. A foundation wall was accidentally knocked down by impact of a five-ton tractor and bulldozer working in wet clay in back-filling operations.

6. Standard make of pre-cast concrete block, laid in cement mortar 1 to 3 mix is used for the foundation walls. Strength of block is 100 lbs. per square inch. 2000 lb. concrete is used for wall footings, all as specified.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK—LOANS

Mr. MANROSS:

1. (a) What is the total amount of loans made to date by the industrial development bank; (b) what amount in each province?

2. What was the number of loans made under $10,000, from $10,000 to $25,000, from $25,000 to $50,000, from $50,000 to $100,000, over $100,000, by provinces?

3. What is the amount of losses to date?

[Mr. MacKinnon.]

Mr. MAYHEW: The Industrial Development bank is not a branch of the dominion government but a subsidiary of the Bank of Canada.

Section 29(1) of the Industrial Development Bank Act requires that "the bank shall, within twenty-one days following the end of each calendar month, make up and transmit to the Minister of Finance in such form as he may prescribe, a statement of its assets and liabilities at the close of business on the last day of the preceding month." This statement as at August 31, 1945, appeared in the Canada Gazette of September 22, 1945, and showed Loans and Investments, (excluding dominion government securities) at $711,965,87.

In addition, section 29(2) provides that "The Bank shall make up and transmit to the Minister of Finance at least once in its fiscal year or more frequently if so directed by the minister, in such form as he may prescribe, a classification of its loans and investments and of the loans guaranteed by it." Provision is made for the publication of this statement in the Canada Gazette following its receipt by the minister.

FREE PORTS IN CANADA

Mr. ISNOR:

1. Has a special committee been appointed by the government to study the question of establishing and exploiting free ports in Canada?

2. If so, (a) at whose request; (b) what are the names, addresses and occupations of members of the committee?

3. Is there a member of the committee presently residing in any portion of Nova Scotia? If so, what is his name and address?

4. What are the powers of this committee?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. An interdepartmental committee has been formed consisting of representatives of the departments interested.

2. (a) The city of Quebec has made recommendations to the government that legislation be introduced to provide for the establishment of free ports, and the above mentioned committee has been appointed to report on the matter; (b) J. E. St. Laurent, vice-chairman of the National Harbours Board, chairman; Dr. C. A. Annis, Department of Finance; H. W. Brighton, Department of Trade and Commerce; G. N. Bunker, Department of National Revenue; and a representative of the Department of Munitions and Supply, not yet appointed.

3. No.

4. To study and report on the specific recommendations submitted by the city of Quebec and on the general question of the establishment of free ports in Canada.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES—CHARITABLE INSTITUTIONS

Mr. ISNOR:

1. Are children within the age brackets of the Family Allowance Act, denied the family allowance benefits if living in charitable institutions?

2. Are parents of children living in charitable institutions denied the benefits of family allowance?

Mr. CLAXTON: Payment is made to parents maintaining children in accordance with the provisions of the act and regulations, even though such children may be in institutions; but the act does not permit direct payment to institutions as they are defined in the regulations.

PETITCODIAC RIVER POWER DEVELOPMENT

Mr. HAZEN:

Has a report been received by the government on the proposed Petitcodiac river power development plan?

Mr. GLEN: No. It is expected the report will be received within the next few weeks.

WARTIME HOUSING LIMITED—PROVISION FOR RETURNED SERVICE PERSONNEL

Mr. FLEMING:

1. How many houses have been constructed by Wartime Housing Ltd.?

2. How are they distributed by provinces?

3. How many of them are earmarked for occupation by, (a) returned personnel; (b) families of deceased service personnel?

4. How many houses are, (a) now in course of construction; (b) contracted for, by Wartime Housing Ltd., or under contract with Wartime Housing Ltd.?

5. How are they distributed by provinces?

6. How many of them are earmarked for occupation by, (a) returned service personnel; (b) families of deceased service personnel?

7. What is the contract price of such housing, and by what method is it determined?

Mr. HOWE:

1. 18,992 houses as of September 15, 1945.

2. British Columbia, 2,135; Alberta, 350; Saskatchewan, 50; Manitoba, 400; Ontario, 10,531; Quebec, 2,882; New Brunswick, 400; Nova Scotia, 2,244; total, 18,992.

3. The last 1,287 housing units constructed were earmarked for servicemen's families and any vacancies occurring in the remaining 17,705 units were and are likewise earmarked. Families of deceased service personnel are given first preference when the deceased was the head of the home.

4. (a) and (b) 4,598 houses. A house is considered to be under construction when the contract is awarded.

5. British Columbia, 800; Alberta, 400; Saskatchewan, 600; Manitoba, 450; Ontario, 1,400; Quebec, 578; New Brunswick, 100; Nova Scotia, 270; total, 4,598.

6. All are so earmarked as the need arises. Refer also to answer for question 3.

7. The contract price of such housing now being built under lump sum contracts varies from an average of $2,860.86 to an average of $3,749.73 depending on the location, time of letting the contract and types of houses built. The final cost of cost plus fixed fee contracts can not now be determined since the contracts have not as yet been completed, but the fixed fee per house for these contracts varies from $90 to $125 depending on the number of houses to be constructed under the contract.

The contract price is determined by competitive tenders whenever satisfactory tenders can be obtained. Cost plus fixed fee contracts are awarded only when unsatisfactory tenders have been received or where the urgency of commencing work is such that there is not sufficient time to call for tenders.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK—LOANS

Mr. WRIGHT:

1. What are the locations of the branches of the industrial development bank, and what is the name of the manager of each?

2. How many loans have been made by the bank?

3. What is the total amount of such loans?

4. What amount has been loaned in each province?

Mr. MAYHEW:

1. Montreal, S. R. Noble, general manager; Toronto, J. C. Ingram, supervisor; Vancouver, N. C. Tompkins, supervisor.

2, 3 and 4. The Industrial Development bank is not a branch of the dominion government but a subsidiary of the Bank of Canada.

Section 29 (1) of the Industrial Development Bank Act requires that "The bank shall, within twenty-one days following the end of each calendar month, make up and transmit to the Minister of Finance in such form as he may prescribe, a statement of its assets and liabilities at the close of business on the last day of the preceding month." This statement as at August 31, 1945, appeared in the Canada Gazette of September 22, 1945, and showed loans and investments (excluding dominion government securities) at $711,965.87.

In addition, Section 29 (2) provides that "The bank shall make up and transmit to the Minister of Finance at least once in its fiscal year or more frequently if so directed by the minister, in such form as he may prescribe, a classification of its loans and investments and of the loans guaranteed by it." Provision is made for the publication of this statement in the Canada Gazette following its receipt by the Minister.

WARTIME HOUSING LIMITED—PRIORITIES

Mr. FLEMING:

1. What priorities are now in effect in favour of Wartime Housing Ltd. with respect to the purchase, acquisition of control of building materials of all kinds?

3. Were any subsidies paid to the millers? If so, how much?
4. How much per bushel are Canadian millers paying to the wheat board for wheat being milled for export to-day?
5. Are any subsidies being paid to Canadian millers on wheat milled for export? If so, how much?

EIGHT-HOUR DAY

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Is Canada a signatory to the convention of the international labour organization dealing with the eight hour day adopted at Geneva in 1936?
2. Has the government taken steps to enforce the eight hour day as it applies to merchant seamen sailing on inland and coastal ships?

ARMED FORCES—INDUSTRIAL SECTION AND RELEASES COMMITTEES

Mr. FLEMING:

1. How many men have been granted releases from the armed services on the recommendation of industrial selection and release committees?
2. How were such persons distributed by trades and occupations?
3. How many of such persons had not served overseas?
4. How many of such persons were N.R.M.A. troops?

CANADIAN OVERSEAS FIRE FIGHTERS

Mr. KNIGHT:

What action has been taken by the government in answer to requests that treatment of discharged Canadian overseas fire fighters should be identical with that given to discharged members of the armed forces?

Mr. McCANN: Return tabled.

BOARDS AND COMMISSIONS

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's):

1. What is the total number of employees of the government of Canada, including employees of boards and commissions appointed by federal authority as of the following dates—namely, March 1, 1944; March 1, 1945; September 1, 1945?
2. What is the total amount of salaries, wages and allowances paid to such employees in each of the following months, namely, March, 1944; March, 1945; September, 1945?
3. What is the total number of employees who have been appointed since March 1, 1944, (a) for work not directly associated with the war; (b) for work directly associated with the war?

Mr. MARTIN: Mr. Speaker, the first and second parts of this question should be passed as an order for return. It is quite impossible to answer the third part of the question because many of these employees are both war-time and peace-time employees. I would suggest that No. 3 be dropped.

Mr. SPEAKER: Then it will pass as an order for return, so far as the first and second questions are concerned.

Mr. MARTIN: And the third question would be dropped.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): As the hon. member who asked the question is not here, would it not be proper to allow it to stand?

Mr. MARTIN: I should be glad to accept that suggestion.

Mr. SPEAKER: Questions 1 and 2 will stand as an order for return; question 3 will stand.

RETIREMENT OF CIVIL SERVANTS AT STATUTORY AGE LIMIT

Mr. ROSS (Hamilton East):

1. What is the total number of civil servants who have reached the retiring age?
2. How many in each department?
3. What steps have been taken with respect to the retirement of these persons?

POSTAL SERVICE—WINNIPEG DISTRICT

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. How many postal employees over the retiring age are still being retained in service in the Winnipeg postal district?
2. What was the total number of letter carriers in the Winnipeg postal district as at, (a) September 1, 1939; (b) September 1, 1942; (c) September 1, 1945?
3. How many, (a) letter carriers; (b) other postal employees, from the Winnipeg postal district enlisted in the armed forces for world war II? How many of these have returned to the service?

CANADIAN SERVICE PERSONNEL—LEAVE FOR MORE THAN THREE YEARS' SERVICE

Mr. CRUICKSHANK:

1. Do our R.C.A.F. personnel receive thirty days' special retirement leave for more than three years' service?
2. Do (a) naval and (b) army personnel receive the same leave for equivalent service?
3. If not, what is the reason for the difference?

FERNIE, B.C., HOTELS—GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURE

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East):

1. What total amount was spent by the government in cooperation with the city of Fernie, British Columbia, in the reconstruction of the Napanee hotel and the Queen's hotel, in that city?
2. How many suites were thus provided in each building?
3. How many suites were occupied in each building in each of the months of May, June, July, August and September of this year?
4. Will rentals of above-mentioned suites be set at local rental levels?

SHIPMENT OF FOOD PRODUCTS TO UNITED KINGDOM AND EUROPEAN COUNTRIES

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie):

1. Since June 1, 1945, what quantities of food products have been sent to England, France, Belgium, Holland, Norway, Italy, Greece and other Balkan countries, either as a gift or loan under lend-lease, or by way of sales or otherwise, with details concerning each product and country as well as the mode of payment provided (gift, lend-lease, export credits, ordinary commercial transactions between individuals or governments)?

2. In addition to the quantities of food products already sent, have said countries made application to the government of Canada or attempted to negotiate agreements to obtain additional quantities? If so, what was the nature of such applications, with details concerning each product and country?

3. Apart from negotiations between governments and in addition to the quantities sent, have Canadian merchants or exporters applied for permission to export such products?

4. If so, for what amount of exports to each of these various countries have such permits been required, and in what proportion have same been granted or refused for each country?

HOUSING IN TORONTO

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Since the house met in April this year, what steps have been taken to relieve the serious housing situation in Toronto, (a) for soldiers' families; (b) for civilians?

2. What has been done in 1944 and 1945 to build houses in Toronto for, (a) wartime housing; (b) for civilians, by any government authority?

WARTIME INFORMATION BOARD—STAFF

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. How many persons are, or were, employed by or connected with the wartime information board, (a) as of September 27, 1945; (b) as of 1st of January, 1945?

2. What was the total amount paid to the said officials or employees for salaries and expenses, (a) during the month of January, 1945; (b) during the month of August, 1945?

ORDERS IN COUNCIL

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

How many orders in council have been passed, (a) between September 1, 1939, and May 8, 1945; (b) since May 8, 1945?

LUMBER EXPORTS

Mr. FLEMING:

1. What was the annual volume of Canada's exports of lumber of all kinds, by countries, from 1938 to 1945 inclusive, (a) by measurement; (b) by price?

2. What were the prices paid by the United Kingdom for Canadian lumber of all kinds in each of the said years?

3. Did the timber controller participate in the negotiation of the said prices?

4. Did the Department of Munitions and Supply or any other government department participate in the negotiation of the said prices?

5. Did the Minister of Munitions and Supply or any other government department approve the said prices?

FOREST PRODUCTS

Mr. WRIGHT:

1. What was the total production of forest products in Canada for 1939 to 1944 inclusive, under: (a) pulpwood; (b) ties, pit props, fuel wood; (c) lumber and lumber products; (d) any other items?
2. What were the total exports of forest products from Canada from 1939 to 1944 inclusive, under: (a) pulpwood; (b) ties, pit props, fuel wood; (c) lumber and lumber products; (d) any other items?
3. What was the total production of forest products by provinces for the years 1939 to 1944 inclusive, under: (a) pulpwood; (b) ties, pit props, fuel wood; (c) lumber and lumber products; (d) any other items?
4. What was the total export of forest products by provinces for the years 1939 to 1944 inclusive, under: (a) pulpwood; (b) ties, pit props, fuel wood; (c) lumber and lumber products; (d) any other items?

Mr. MacKINNON: Return tabled.

INCOME TAX—DIVISIONAL OFFICES

Mr. PEARKES:

1. In what cities in Canada are divisional offices of the income tax department located?
2. What were the amounts collected through each office during the past fiscal year?
3. Has the minister received a request from the city of Victoria, British Columbia, that a divisional office be located in Victoria to meet the needs of the taxpayers on the southern portion of Vancouver island?
4. If so, what action is being taken by the government?

Mr. McCANN: Return tabled.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

AMSTERDAM, SASK., POST OFFICE

Mr. NICHOLSON:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, reports and other documents in the possession of the Post Office Department, regarding complaints arising out of the administration of the post office at Amsterdam, Saskatchewan, since January 1, 1940.

RED DEER WATER DIVERSION PROJECT

Mr. QUELCH:

For a copy of any report or reports in the possession of any department of the government on the progress of the survey of the Red Deer diversion project, along with a statement showing (a) the estimated cost of completing this project; (b) when construction will be started; (c) the possibilities of power development.

Mr. GARDINER: I have no objection to any information being brought down which is available, but any information that does exist is in the offices at Regina. It will be necessary for me to get the information from Regina in order to make it available. I am not sure that all the reports will be in shape so that they can be brought down immediately, but whatever reports can be properly brought down will be brought down as well as any information based upon them.

Motion agreed to.

LAST MOUNTAIN LAKE, SASK., WATER LEVELS

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

For a copy of all correspondence, reports and surveys since 1935 in connection with measures that could be undertaken to elevate the level of Last Mountain lake in Saskatchewan, and/or the partial diversion of the waters of the South Saskatchewan river into the valley of the Qu'Appelle river.

CANADA'S ATTITUDE, PRIOR TO 1939 RESPECTING OUTBREAK OF HOSTILITIES

Mr. HAZEN:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, cables and other documents exchanged between His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom and His Majesty's government in Canada from September 1, 1938, to September 15, 1939, relating to the attitude of Canada in the event of an outbreak of hostilities betwen His Majesty and any other power.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The consent of the government of the United Kingdom has been asked for the production of the correspondence that would come within the terms of the motion. I am informed that it would be more convenient if this motion were extended to October 1, because during September, 1939 the matter was dealt with by correspondence and there were exchanges subsequent to September 15, which are required to complete the disposition of the matter referred to in the correspondence. Perhaps the hon. member will have no objection to having the date extended to October 1, 1939, so that the correspondence may show how the matter being discussed was disposed of.

Mr. HAZEN: I have no objection to that, but what I was most interested in was to find out what had occurred up to the outbreak of the war.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It will be subject to the consent of the government of the United Kingdom being obtained for the porduction of the documents in question.

Motion as amended agreed to.

POSTAL SERVICE—LETTER RETURNED FROM TIMMINS TO OTTAWA

Mr. KNOWLES:

For a copy of all correspondence between Mr. A. W. Stewart, of Timmins, Ontario, Mr. E. H. King, postmaster of Timmins, Ontario, and the Post Office Department at Ottawa, with reference to the return to Ottawa of a letter addressed to Mr. Stewart, by the Post Office Department.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

Mr. CASSELMAN:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the governments of Canada, United States and the province of Ontario or between any officials of the said governments from December 30, 1940, to the present time, referring to the development of the international section of the St. Lawrence waterway.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Correspondence tabled.

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY—DISPOSAL OF EQUIPMENT PURCHASED FROM AUTOMOBILE COMPANIES

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

For a copy of all contracts made by the Department of Munitions and Supply for the purchase of, (a) trucks; (b) jeeps; (c) passenger automobiles; (d) station wagons, with (1) General Motors; (2) Ford Company of Canada; (3) Chrysler Corporation, together with a copy of any agreement with the said companies concerning the repurchase or disposal of such equipment.

Mr. HOWE: I suggest that this motion pass subject to the understanding that copies of the master contracts and amendments thereto are tabled now, but not the acceptances of the tenders pertaining to them. The master contracts with the companies mentioned in the motion form the basis on which all automotive vehicles were purchased. The master contracts with the companies mentioned in the motion form the basis on which all motor vehicles were purchased. There are, however, thousands of formal acceptances of tender, all subject to the terms and conditions of the master contracts, the tabling of which from the standpoint of work involved could hardly be justified. There is no agreement with the said companies concerning the repurchase or disposal of motor vehicles.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion subject to the remarks made by the minister?

Motion agreed to.

ESTABLISHMENT OF FREE PORT AT QUEBEC

Mr. ISNOR:

For a copy, in English, of all letters, telegrams, reports and other documents exchanged between the Prime Minister of Canada, the Minister of Justice or other ministers of the cabinet and His Worship Mayor Lucien Borne, Quebec city, from October 1, 1943 to date, in reference to the establishing of a so-called free port at Quebec.

DISALLOWANCE OF PROVINCIAL LEGISLATION—SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

For a copy of all petitions made by any corporation, person or persons, in connection with the disallowance of certain acts passed by the Saskatchewan legislature, namely, the Farm Security Act, the Local Government Board (Special Powers) Act, and the Mineral Taxation Act, and of all correspondence relative thereto as passed between the Department of Justice, the petitioners and the government of the province of Saskatchewan.

[Mr. Knowles.]

HOSPITALIZATION OF VETERANS, P.E.I.

Mr. McLURE:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, reports and other documents in the possession of the Department of Veterans Affairs, exchanged between any person or persons and the said department, or any other department of the government, or between the different departments of the government, during the past six months, relative to hospitalization of veterans in the province of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I have no objection to the resolution passing, subject to the customary reservation regarding confidential documents passing between different departments of government.

Motion agreed to.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

Mr. FULTON:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, memoranda or other documents dated since June 1, 1944, exchanged between the Prime Minister or any member or official of the federal government and the premiers or officials of the provincial governments, relative to the holding of the dominion-provincial conference, the agenda of such conference, the holding of the adjourned meeting on the conference, or any other subject related to the conference.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There is no objection to this motion being passed, on the understanding that it will be satisfactory to produce only the correspondence since August 14, 1944, on which date all previous correspondence was tabled and published as an appendix to the Votes and Proceedings of that day, and that it will not be necessary to produce the voluminous correspondence between federal and provincial officials on such technical matters as the preparation of comparative statistics or correspondence relating to train schedules, hotel reservations and other preparations for the conference, the distribution of documents and so forth, which correspondence is very voluminous and can be of no general interest.

RESIGNATION OF MINISTERS OF THE CROWN SINCE NOVEMBER 1, 1944

Mr. FLEMING:

For a copy of all correspondence between the Prime Minister and any minister of the crown who resigned subsequent to November 1, 1944, regarding the resignation of such minister.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Prime Minister I should like to comply with this order of the house immediately, and I now place the correspondence on the table. In doing so I should like to make clear one point. The government has been advised that that there is a long standing rule that it was under no obligation to table letters of resignation or correspondence relating to resignations of ministers before the general election which resulted in the election of the parliament in which the motion is made. However, there is no disposition on the part of the Prime Minister to take advantage of the rule in this case and I am therefore tabling the correspondence. Included in the correspondence are the letters from the Hon. A. G. L. McNaughton and the Hon. D. L. MacLaren, together with the Prime Minister's replies. To some of the letters of resignation there were no written replies, the replies being made orally.

Motion agreed to.

COLEMAN LAMP COMPANY

Mr. COLDWELL:

For a copy of correspondence, report or reports under the dominion trade and industry commission, regarding a complaint made in 1937 that the Coleman Lamp Company had refused to supply the Merchants Consolidated Limited, of Winnipeg, with their products.

Mr. MacKINNON: The dominion trade and industry commission do not make reports regarding complaints of this kind. The procedure is that the complainant writes to the commission, and the commission in turn write to the alleged offender. This correspondence is carried on more or less in confidence, and I am warned that if the exchange of correspondence were made public it might defeat the objective. If the hon. member will accept the offer of the use of the file in order that he may read it, I shall be glad indeed to make it available to him now.

Mr. COLDWELL: I thank the minister very much, but my purpose in placing this motion on the order paper was rather to get the kind of reply that I have just obtained so that the house would understand the position. I have raised this complaint before in the house. I wanted to have access to the correspondence in the proper way, but was refused. Complaints of this nature made in parliament, or even outside of parliament, should be subject to review by parliament, and the reports should be before us here. That is why I put the motion on the order paper. I shall be glad to see the correspondence, but it does not really meet what I required.

Mr. GRAYDON: What does the minister mean by "more or less" confidential?

Mr. MacKINNON: Just what it says.

Mr. GRAYDON: It does not mean anything.

Mr. SPEAKER: Motion dropped.

Mr. COLDWELL: Under protest.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT

QUESTION OF GRANTING CLEAR TITLES TO LAND HELD UNDER CONTRACT ON MARCH 31, 1944

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River) moved:

Whereas veterans of great war I who settled on land under the soldier settlement scheme as well as their wives and families, have in many instances suffered severe hardships because of purchase of land, live stock and equipment at inflationary prices, and low prices received for farm products brought about by lack of adequate policy for agriculture;

And whereas we are now embarking on another land scheme for veterans of the present war, under a government policy that does not guarantee cost of production, the success of which scheme may be jeopardized by the apparent failure of the former soldier settlement board scheme;

Therefore be it resolved,—that, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration the advisability of giving clear titles to all soldier settlers who on March 31, 1944, held land under contract with the soldier settlement board.

He said: I am very glad to have the opportunity of again taking up this question on the first private members' day made available after the close of the war, which I believe is now finished. I want it plainly understood in regard to what I shall have to say on behalf of the soldiers for whom I am speaking that they are not asking for any charity. I also want it plainly understood that I am not a soldier settler, nor am I in any way indebted to the soldier settlement board.

This question, as I have stated before, is one of long standing, and I hope that in the very near future it will be disposed of to the benefit of those interested and to the credit of the Canadian people.

Some people may feel that there is no justice in this matter. Personally I feel quite differently about it, and before I am through I hope to show that several other Canadians feel exactly the same as I do.

I am bringing this matter up at this time, as I have brought it up in past years, because the men who return from this war and who are going to settle on the land under the present Veterans' Land Act will be in a position similar to that of the veterans of the first great war unless we take care now to see that the old veterans are dealt with as they should have been years ago.

In order to show that these men have some claim, as have the men who are coming back from this war, I am going to read from an address delivered by the late Sir Robert Borden to the Canadian expeditionary force away back in 1917. This may sound old, but in my opinion it forms a basis for the claim that is made by these old soldier settlers. I quote:

> You are the men actually facing the enemy day and night. You are suffering greatly from fatigue, overstrained, and lack of rest. The marvel of it is that men could undergo such a strain without breaking; but you have never yet broken, and history will appreciate that in days to come.
> You are men about to enter one of the most serious engagements that ever faced the Canadian corps. I cannot, at this moment, give any information as to where this attack will be staged; whether it be successful or not, it is to be borne in mind that it will not be an easy success. . . . We feel confident that you will succeed where others failed, for you have never yet failed in anything you have set your hand to, as a Canadian corps.
> You can go into this action feeling assured of this, and as the head of the government, I give you this assurance; that you need have no fear that the government and the country will fail to show just appreciation of your service to the country and empire in what you are about to do and what you have already done. The government and the country will consider it their first duty to see that a proper appreciation of your effort and of your courage is brought to the notice of the people at home, and it will always be our endeavour to so guide the attitude of public opinion, that the country will support the government to prove to the returned man its just and due appreciation of the inestimable value of the services rendered to the country and empire; and that no man, whether he goes back, or whether he remains in Flanders, will have just cause to reproach the government for having broken with the men who won and the men who died.

This matter of granting simple justice to the veterans of great war I is not a new one. I have in my hand a copy of a brief which was presented to the members of the Senate and the House of Commons in 1938, after quite a lot of work had been done by a committee at that time. Let me read one paragraph from the introduction:

> It is only fair to state at the outset that it is our opinion that the large expenditure of taxpayers' money on these remedial measures and for the settlement scheme has failed utterly to accomplish its purpose, viz.—the ultimate ownership, within a reasonable period of time, of his home in the country for which he fought during the war.

That is from the brief presented by the Soldier Settlers Union, with headquarters at Lloydminster, of Saskatchewan and Alberta.

I will not dwell on that, but I have a number of figures which I think it is necessary to place on the record in order that the case of the old veterans will be studied by the many new members we have here, and I hope they will give us the backing which the old veterans deserve. I am asking this because many service personnel have returned from overseas, and there are a number of men elected to this house whose duty it is to see that the men who come back from this war and settle on the land and in other occupations are properly dealt with by the government.

This is not a political matter. The men for whom I am speaking are all Canadians, as are the men who are returning now and who have returned from the recent conflict. The total number of settlers under the old soldier settlement board scheme was 25,017. The total amount advanced by the government of the day for the purchase of land, live stock and equipment was $109,034,331. The rate of interest on that amount was five per cent on current account, seven per cent as soon as the account went into arrears; and I think it will be readily understood that, because of the conditions that obtained at that time, namely, the high prices paid for land, live stock and equipment and the low prices that very soon prevailed for agricultural products, the men went into arrears and as a result were faced with the problem of paying seven per cent interest on their debts.

Here may I say that had the government of the day done its duty it would not have been necessary to pay seven per cent on that money, or five per cent, or even 3½ per cent. It would appear however that the golden calf, or the golden bull as some people call it, had to be worshipped instead of the rights of the men who went and fought for Canada, being preserved. I will give the total principal repaid from the inception of the scheme up to March 31, 1944—and I am making that cut-off because, if we let this thing drag on for a little while, we shall find the old saying coming true, that—

> Old soldiers never die, never die, never die;
> Old soldiers never die; they simply fade away.

That will be realized, I say, and the government will have some more land for sale, perhaps to aliens, and at much less than the amount against it at the present time.

The total amount of principal repaid by everybody under that scheme, that is, the settlers themselves, civilians to whom land was sold after the soldier settler had vacated it, and British families and others, was $50,507,493.20. The total amount of interest was $25,381,060.13, making a total of $75,888,- 553.33. Because of the conditions that existed at that time the government found it necessary to take many methods of reducing the debts of the settlers, in other words of rectifying the unjust contract into which these men had entered. As a result of seven or eight different processes there was a total amount cancelled on account of soldier settler debts of $24,867,637.64 of principal, and interest to the amount of $19,234,239.77, making a total of $44,101,877.41. Up to the end of March, 1944, the cost of administration of the soldier settlement part of the scheme alone amounted to $27,340,763.64. That, I might say, represents an annual expenditure of cost of administration of approximately $1,100,000. The amounts that I have just given total $71,442,641.05.

Then again we have other cancellations that were made necessary because of the civilians, British families and others, who bought this land after the soldier settlers got off. These amounts were as follows: For civilians, principal $2,403,489.46; interest $2,518,264.86; British families, principal $4,485,087.05; interest $3,304,596.49; other families for principal $383,656.07, and interest $294,244.17. These items added together make a total of $7,272,-232.58 for principal, and $6,117,105.52 for interest. The grand total $13,389,338.10.

We now add to this the amounts of cancellations of the soldier settlers, which totals $71,442,641.05, and also the general land administrative expenses of $3,376,548.32. Adding all this together gives us a total of $88,208,-527.47. This is the amount of cancellations and administrative expenses, and we have up to the end of March collected only $50,507,-493.20 in principal and $25,381,060.13 in interest, making a total of $75,888,553.33.

From these figures I think it will be clearly seen that the scheme was a sadly and badly improvised one and impossible right from the start. As I have pointed out on other occasions, the government would have saved money, and the soldier settlers who settled under that scheme would have been saved a whole lot of misery, poverty and punishment, if the government had adopted a scheme of giving them the land without one cent being charged against them.

At the end of March, 1944, the soldier settlers owed a total of $7,715,954.01; the civilian settlers under that scheme owed $6,999,197.40, the British families owed $1,895,-612.66, and others $122,333.98, making a total amount outstanding at the end of March, 1944, of $16,733,098.05. The total amount of arrears owed by soldier settlers at that date was $1,054,269.30; civilian settlers $616,235.77; British families and others $205,794.91, making a grand total of arrears as at March 31, 1944, of $1,876,299.98. At that time there were 6,153 soldier settlers still holding contracts with the board, or approximately 25 per cent of the original number of settlers. At the same time we had 5,715 civilian settlers and 1,163 British families and others, making a total of 13,031 settlers still on the land and holding contracts with the board.

I am not making any plea to-day on behalf of the British families and others. What I am principally interested in is the old soldier settler, but I had to bring in these figures to give a complete picture of the financial standing of the soldier settlement board.

The average original debt at the time these men took up the land was $4,358.40. The average balance owing by the settlers still on the land at the end of March, 1944, was $1,254, which represents 29 per cent of their original debt at the time they settled on the land. The number who acquired title during those twenty-five years is 4,130 settlers, or 16 per cent of the 25,017 who originally settled on the land. I think this should make some people sit up and take notice.

I think it should be noted that a number of the old soldier settlers enlisted for service in the war just ended, and in many cases the reason was not patriotism. In fact I know of some who enlisted who could not make a living on the land for their wives and families, and because of the inducements in the form of dependents' allowances and pay for the soldier himself, many of those men enlisted. I may say that they could not make a living on the land, for different reasons. One of the reasons is that we had seventy cent wheat at Fort William until the first of August, 1942. That meant an average of about forty-five cents a bushel on the veterans' farm in the prairie provinces. Then we had corresponding prices for other farm produce. After these men enlisted, their wives and families were left home to look after the land. Perhaps the crops were not as good as they should have been, and payments were not coming into the board. The then minister of mines and resources, perhaps prompted or prodded by his director of soldier settlement, decided that something must be done about it, and as a result on March 19, 1941, order in council P.C. 138/1936 was passed by the treasury board on the recommendation of the then minister of mines and resources. The effect of that order in council was to permit the soldier settlement board to deduct up to $20 a month from the money paid the dependents of these men who had enlisted for the second time, though that money rightfully belonged to the wives and families of those soldiers, for the purpose of making good the payments to the soldier settlement board. In view of the address made to these men in 1917 by the late Sir Robert Borden I wonder if we as a government were keeping faith with the men who went over and fought, particularly when they offered their services and joined up for the second time.

Then on November 19, 1942, another order in council was passed, supposedly for the benefit of these old soldier settlers. You will note that up to this time they had been given some twenty-three or twenty-four years in which to pay for their land, but were not able to do so. During those years they were giving the very best they had; they were in the prime of life. At the end of that time their land was run down to a certain extent, and their implements and live stock had not improved over the years. So in order to make it possible for them to continue to worship the golden calf, order in council P.C. 10472 was passed on November 19, 1942, providing for the setting up of a committee which, if it saw fit, could recommend to the treasury board that the time for payment of the debt on the land could be extended another twenty years. That meant a total of forty-five years for a veteran of the first great war to pay for his farm. The committee also could recommend to treasury board that the debts of various settlers be reduced, and it had also power to recommend that the interest paid by those settlers who enlisted for the second time might be reduced to 3½ per cent.

Those things were brought about because of pressure put on the settlers by the officials of the soldier settlement board. If anyone wants to get a picture of the conditions under which many of these settlers are living, it will be found that a large number are living alone, putting up with things which Canada should not allow any of its citizens to put up with, and particularly old soldier settlers. Several attempts have been made to get action; I think we all realize that when we are hard pressed we are liable to do something about it. So in April, 1943, the settlers of the prairie provinces called a meeting at Saskatoon, at which I believe four resolutions were passed, and again in November of 1943 a meeting was held in the same city. Among other things, those attending that gathering decided to circulate a petition during the winter. Those men had no money; they had to start out on their own, but by raising nickels and dimes they were able to obtain enough money to send a delegation to Ottawa a little later on.

As a result of their work 12,500 signatures were obtained to a petition, and on May 23, 1944, a delegation of nine, representing that organization, came to Ottawa and met members of the cabinet.

That meeting was presided over by the then minister of mines and resources, who has since gone to a place of rest; and I may add that with the exception of the chairman all the members of the committee expressed the opinion, either privately or publicly, that this thing should be cleaned up. These men were promised consideration, and we expected they would get it; but of course being promised consideration by members of the cabinet does not always mean that the consideration is going to be in the interests of those asking for it. That consideration was promised in spite of the fact that in the May 1944 issue of The Legionary, the official organ of the Canadian Legion, an article appeared dealing with this very matter. In the pages preceding those containing this article we find advertisements dealing with International Nickel, Canada Post Office, O'Keefe's Brewing Company, Canadian Legion cigarettes, and so on. Then on page 10 we see a picture of the governor general and a little girl under which this caption appears:

> Five-year old Carole Louise Hooey, of Toronto, proudly clings to the Distinguished Flying Cross won by her father, the late F/O Gilbert Hooey, who lost his life serving as a pilot overseas.

Then in the lower right hand corner we see a picture of Lieutenant General Sir Richard Turner, V.C., of Quebec City, extending the glad hand of welcome to Major Paul Triquet, whom we had the honour of welcoming here in Ottawa. This is a beautiful setting, interesting and patriotic, for one of the most scurrilous attacks that could be waged against the old soldier settlers by one of our civil servants, who apparently is in good financial circumstances and whose security in old age no doubt is provided for. I am just going to read the opening and closing words. The body of the article deals with figures which are entirely onesided. The article is headed, "Soldier Settlement" and is written by Gordon Murchison, director, Soldier Settlement and Veterans' Land Act. The first paragraphs of the article read:

> Editor, The Legionary—
> During the last several months a number of representations have been received by my minister, the Hon. T. A. Crerar, and by myself from and/or on behalf of an organization formed in Saskatoon last summer and known as the soldier settlers association. This association has declared its policy by a resolution, part of which calls for the cancellation of all unpaid balances due or accruing in the agreements between soldier settlers and the director representing the dominion government. I understand the dominion executive of the Canadian Legion has received similar representations, and so that the situation from the standpoint of the government—

I ask hon. members to note those words—

—and the administration may be placed fairly before the Canadian Legion and the readers of The Legionary, the Hon. Mr. Crerar has authorized me to furnish you with an official statement.

A statement, let me repeat, of arrogance and impudence.

First of all there is lack of evidence that the resolution and representations above referred to reflect the serious views of more than ten per cent of soldier settlers and, knowing the situation as I do, I am sure the great majority of the remaining ninety per cent must feel somewhat humiliated by the publicity being circulated by the few who for reasons best known to themselves and their friends endeavour to paint a dark and gloomy picture. What are the facts?

Before going further I am going to give some of the facts, to disprove some of the information, or misinformation, as you may prefer to call it, contained in this article. Those supporting the request of the old veterans include over 12,500 signers of a petition; the Alberta legislature; the Saskatchewan legislature; the Alberta farmers union; the Saskatchewan association of rural municipalities; the Saskatchewan wheat pool; the United Farmers of Canada, Saskatchewan section; the United Farmers of Alberta and the Alberta branch of the Canadian Legion. In case there should be any mistake about some of the resolutions, I shall read one or two passed by the Canadian Legion at a provincial convention held in Memorial Hall, Edmonton, on June 6 to 9, 1943. This is the first:

Whereas the majority of original soldier settlers, who are still endeavouring to carry on under the soldier settlement scheme have now found it, owing to advanced years and the adverse conditions prevailing in agriculture, particularly the lack of parity prices, increasingly difficult to liquidate their indebtedness to the settlement board,

And whereas the settlers have struggled on through the years of drought conditions and low prices unprecedented in the agricultural history of this country and have now nothing to show for their years of toil and struggle but whatever equity they may have in the land which is liable to foreclosure,

Therefore be it resolved that we now petition the government to relieve the soldier settler of any further payments and that they be given the title deed to their land or, failing this, that a parliamentary committee in conjunction with representation from the dominion command of the Canadian Legion, review the whole situation of the soldier settler with a view to alleviating their present financial difficulties.

The second resolution was as follows:

Whereas it has come to our notice that by order in council the soldier settlement board has been permitted to order deductions made from the pay and allowances of dependents of men now serving in the armed forces to be applied against land and taxes,

Therefore we ask that this order in council, be rescinded immediately, and that any sums of money so deducted be refunded.

In addition to the organizations to which I have referred, we also have the executive of the British Columbia branch of the Canadian Legion, and several others which I shall not take time to list. After giving the side of the story pleasing to the director and the government, the director concludes in this manner.

In the face of the above factual information, what is the logic behind the argument that soldier settlers of record to-day should have their contract indebtedness cancelled, which means in effect legislation into ownership? Do the sponsors of the petition believe that this would be the end of the matter? Do they think for a moment that those who have paid for their farms, and all those who are meeting the terms of their agreements in full and on time or are prepaying their agreements, would stand quietly by and make no demand for a refund? I have received direct assurances that such demands would be made.

In reply to the last argument I have asked for the names and copies of the letters which would justify or back up this claim; and the answer I got in July, 1944, I believe it was, was to the effect that the representations were made in confidence to the director and members of his organization. To my mind the letters are not there, and cannot be produced. Then, to proceed with the quotation:

Do the petitioners behind this movement consider that they alone have rendered service to the state which outshines the service of tens of thousands of other veterans of the last war who have paddled their own canoes during good times and bad but never asked for or received a dollar of state aid toward the purchase of a home?

These are the questions which give some food for thought and illustrate why legislation into ownership involves a great deal more than appears at first glance.

Under the heading "No change" we find this:

In conclusion I am authorized to say that the proposal is not deemed to be in the public interest and, consequently, it is not being entertained by the government. Therefore, the best advice I can offer to the soldier settlers concerned is to get into step with those who manifestly prefer securing title to their farms by complying with the terms of their agreements.

Let me point out here that those old soldier settlers are not in receipt of guaranteed government salaries. They have to fight the elements in producing crops, and after they have done that they have got to fight monopolies on each of the markets on which their produce is sold.

Nothing was done until parliament was prorogued. Then late in August the Minister of Mines and Resources made a radio announcement to the effect that the petitions of the old soldier settlers would not be granted.

In October, 1944, feeling that the Prime Minister did not know the exact situation, I made a special trip to Ottawa, at which time I laid the case before him in his own home in this city. He told me that in the following week the Department of Veterans Affairs would be set up, and that he would turn the matter over to the minister of that department.

I am quite satisfied that the Minister of Veterans Affairs is sympathetically inclined to the granting of titles. If he is not sympathetic, I should like him to tell us now. If he says no, then we shall have some argument at a later time. Apparently he is satisfied that those titles should be granted.

In the next week the department was set up, but nothing has been done up to the present time. As a result of no action being taken, the president and secretary of the settler's organization accompanied me when I visited Ottawa in March of this year, upon which occasion we called upon the Minister of Veterans Affairs and afterwards upon the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Veterans Affairs who apparently had certain objections prepared for him told us that payments were being made, and also that if titles were granted to the old settlers, the new settlers would want free titles also.

I shall deal later with the question of payments; but in connection with the new veterans not wanting to pay up, may I say I would not think the Minister of Veterans Affairs would admit that the new scheme had proved to be a failure, and that the veterans could not pay up; because if they could pay I am quite satisfied that every one, both new and old, would pay. They want to live up to their agreements if at all possible.

After a little while we went on to see the Minister of Finance. While we were received very cordially we did not get very far. He told us that payments were coming in freely, and that he also believed in the sanctity of contract. In connection with payments coming in freely, my comment would be that we have had three good crop years in western Canada, and that prices have been better than they were in other years, both for grain and for live stock. In many instances the families of those old settlers were engaged in war industries, and many of the boys had gone overseas. Well, they were pouring money home to make the old homestead safe for their folks, so that those old people would have a roof over their heads and the boys would have a home to come to when they returned.

Those are some of the reasons. Then, again, dependents' allowances are being used in some cases to make payments. Many of those old settlers and their families went without the necessities of life. One of the delegates who came here in May, 1944 had, shortly before that time, lost his wife. If she had had proper medical attention he would not have suffered that loss.

The fear of eviction will drive many people to do things they would not do otherwise. I think all hon. members can realize the position in which the old settler would find himself if he had no home. Some say, "Oh, well, the soldier settler would not be evicted." Let me contradict that suggestion, because in a return brought down to this house we find that between 1930 and 1942 soldier settlers to the number of 1,006 signed quit-claim deeds. I do not wish anyone to think that they signed those quit-claims voluntarily, because in many cases a good deal of pressure was put upon them, and after signing quit-claim deeds, they got off. And in nearly a thousand cases during the same period, settlers were served with thirty-day notices to get off. That is no worse than the mortgage companies have done —those fellows against whom many of us in this house have railed. Between April 1, 1941, and March 31, 1943, no less than 253 settlers signed quit-claim deeds and 108 settlers were served with thirty-day notices. During the war those men were forced to pay up—or else.

In connection with the sanctity of contracts I want to say that the government made agreements with these men to pay a certain amount for the land. At that time the price of the land was based upon the price of the produce that was being raised on the land. For instance, in many cases wheat was selling at close to $3 a bushel; cows were worth $125 to $150 apiece and horses were worth up to $500 a team and perhaps more. Those are the prices that prevailed at the time those land contracts were made. If the government saw fit to allow those prices to drop down to 20 cents a bushel for wheat, $50 a team for horses and $10 for milch cows, then it was their duty to drop the price of the land in accordance with those prices.

In conclusion I am once more, and I hope I will have plenty of company, asking for clear titles for these men, these old settlers, who held contracts with the soldier settler board at March 31, 1944. In doing that we will be granting nothing more than simple justice. We will be placing human values before money values. To sum up, 25,017 settlers had an average credit of $4,358.40 under the scheme. At the present time 6,153, or 25 per cent, have an average debt of $1,254. A total of 4,130, or 16 per cent, were able to secure titles in twenty-five years. The rate of interest under the old scheme was five per cent on current debts and seven per cent on arrears, while under the Veterans' Land Act it is 3½ per cent or one-half the old rate. Under the present scheme a settler who takes full advantage of the scheme will get a clear grant of $2,320 provided he lives up to the terms of his contract during the first ten years, which is equal to 39 per cent of the total amount of his credit. The average amount owed by the old settlers is only twenty-nine per cent.

Why not give them all a square deal? As I said before, these old fellows were Canadians. I am not speaking of them as being Liberals or Conservatives or of any other political faith. They are Canadians who fought for Canada. The average debt of these old vets is only twenty-nine per cent of original credit extended to them. The shooting war with the enemy is over; let us conclude our war with the old vets, because war it has been for a number of years. The average age of these old settlers is close to sixty years, and to my personal knowledge some of them are over eighty years of age. Yet we are giving these old fellows another term extension of twenty years in which to pay up their debts. Do I see many red faces around here? Can Canada afford nothing better?

The record of payments during the last few years has been obtained at the expense of the health and welfare of the settlers and their families. Coming back to monetary values, we know that during the heat of the war it was costing us more than $16,000,000 a day to send presents to Mussolini, Hitler and Tojo. A total of $7,715,000 will clear off these debts, less than the cost of one-half day of war. If you want to treat it as a direct tax, it amounts to sixty-five cents per capita for the population of Canada. Can we afford it?

I do not feel that I should say very much more about this matter, but there is one thing I want to emphasize. I hope the men who settle on the land under the Veterans' Land Act will not find themselves evicted as many of these old settlers have been. If the land is purchased on the basis of prices being paid for agricultural products to-day, the government should see that credit is made available for the difference between prices that are existing to-day and those that may exist in the future. If that is not done, we will have a bunch of bankrupt veterans of this war. Let it never be said of us:

> We love our nation's heroes dead,
> We very much adore 'em;
> And since they haven't to be fed,
> We build grand tombstones o'er them.

We want our heroes alive; we want them living in the prosperity which this country can very well afford. The welfare of the old vets is inseparably bound up with the future success of those settling under the Veterans' Land Act. Issue those clear titles now and ensure success for the veterans of this war.

Mr. P. E. WRIGHT (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I wish first to compliment the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) upon his persistence in keeping this matter before this house. He did so during the life of the last parliament and he is doing so again in this new parliament. As a matter of fact, one of the results of his persistence was that the minister who was dealing with this particular matter in the last parliament was induced to retire to the senate. I hope the present minister, who I know is sympathetic, will not be forced to make a similar decision before this parliament is over.

This matter is not political; it is a case of dealing with the men of the last war. I intend to deal with it from just a little different angle from that of the hon. member for Battle River. He stated in his opening remarks that he was not a soldier settler and therefore was not primarily interested in the matter from a selfish point of view. I am a soldier settler who settled under the act in 1919. For twenty-three years I made payments to the settlement board. I settled in a part of Canada where ther was the greatest concentration of settlers under the act in all the dominion. I have been intimately connected with these men in veterans' and farm organizations for the past twenty-three years, and I know something about the conditions under which they have lived and endeavoured to pay their debts. I want to deal with the matter more from a humanitarian or personal angle.

The hon. member for Battle River gave some figures which I am not going to repeat. He placed many of these figures on the pages of Hansard during the last parliament and has repeated many of them this afternoon. This matter was raised in the committee which dealt with veterans' affairs in 1941 and at that time various objections were raised by the government. One objection was that we were starting a serious conflict which would require all the resources of Canada, both financial and material, and that it was a poor time to drop payments to the dominion government when the government was entering into financial obligations which would strain its every endeavour. We are now through that period; we have spent millions, if not billions, and that excuse cannot be used.

Another excuse given for not dealing with this matter was that the men who had completed their payments under the act would feel that an injustice was being done and might think that the government should pay back to them some of the money they had paid. As an old settler who has met and talked with many other old settlers, many of whom made a success under the act and met their obligations and many others who failed and took other positions in which they made successes, I believe I can safely say that I do not think there would be one per cent of the old settlers who would object to some alleviation being granted as far as the present debts are concerned. The men who have not been able to meet their obligations and who under the legislation passed recently have had their debts spread over another twenty to twenty-five years have done their best but have met with circumstances over which they had no control which made it impossible for them to meet their obligations. To bear me out in that, I am going to quote extracts from letters which I have received from soldier settlers during the past few years, and I quote them, not to support individual cases, but because they represent a class of case and because the reasons given for failure to meet obligations apply not only to the individual writer but to a large group of soldier settlers.

In the first place, a large number who were settled under the act were settled in the drought area in Saskatchewan, in the Pelliser Triangle, where for years they suffered under drought conditions which made it absolutely impossible for them to meet their obligations under the act. I quote from a letter from one of these men: The amendment which provided dollar for dollar payments was made, I think in 1937, and there were a large number of the soldier settlers in the south of the province who in that year and in the year following were unable to meet their payments because of drought conditions over which they had no control. This soldier settler writes:

> During the drought period a dollar for dollar bonus on arrears was offered. As we had no crops at all we could not take advantage of it, and now when things are a little easier it is discontinued, which is distinctly unfair to the people who need it the most.

Hon. members know that it was 1941 or 1942 before we had a real crop in western Canada and before many of these settlers had a chance to meet their obligations. But in 1941 the dollar for dollar bonus was discontinued. He goes on to say:

> Secondly, the soldier settlement board paid the taxes which were afterwards cancelled, but are still charged against us with accruing interest, placing us in a worse position than civilians.

As the writer states, the soldier settlement board in 1938 or 1939 took over and paid all the taxes owing and charged them against the principal of the loan. A year or so later these taxes were cancelled for civilians but remained a debt so far as the soldier settler was concerned. He goes on to say:

> To illustrate this, my original loan was $1,500. I reduced this to $800 before the drought. It now stands at over $1,700. These figures may not seem very large, but they are to us.

There is another class of settler, those who were unable to meet their obligations because of sickness in their family or their own sickness. I quote from one of these letters, which shows quite clearly the position in which a large number of these settlers found themselves. The writer says:

> Then, seven years ago, came my wife's illness, lasting over three years, with several operations and then her death. This easily added one thousand dollars to my debt and to-day I am paying a housekeeper in wages nearly as much as the payment to the soldier settlement board comes to in a year. Besides my two children, I have my father, nearly ninety years of age, to care for, so I am badly handicapped, and I have fifty per cent disability myself.

This man has a fifty per cent disability. Yet the soldier settlement board, under an order in council passed on March 19, 1941, states:

> The director of soldier settlement has no authority to carry such accounts indefinitely and it is considered desirable to provide for deductions from dependents' allowances to cover local taxes and interest due.

And the board took $10 a month out of this man's pension to meet the payments on his loan.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Shame!

Mr. WRIGHT: Yes. There is another class of case. A great many of our settlers under the old act were settled on unsuitable, marginal land, and because of that fact were unable to meet their obligations to the government. I state these things because they show in a great many cases that "hard core" which the department speaks of, was caused by circumstances over which the soldier settler had no control, such as drought, sickness, unsuitable land.

Another factor which operated against the old soldier settler was lack of capital with which to break his land and bring it under cultivation. The soldier settlement board made a certain allowance for the breaking of the land, but there was so much red tape that many settlers could not take advantage of it. I have letters here which, if I read them to the house, would prove definitely that the red tape which was attached to these loans often made it impossible for the soldier settler to take advantage of them.

Another factor has been the interest rate which was charged on the old loan, six per cent once the payments became overdue, and five per cent on the original loan. This meant that many settlers paid the original loan several times over. Here is a letter which illustrates that point. The writer says:

> As you are aware, there have been several adjustments since the original scheme was introduced. The last adjustment was made in my case in 1939, under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, and then my quarter was revalued at $1,800, although I had paid over $3,000 under the original agreement. Since then, although the price of wheat has been very low, I have been able to keep up my payments, but not when due, viz., October 1. For the last two years it has been impossible, through restricted deliveries and quotas to make payments when due, but the board charge compound interest, which I have refused to pay. It sems incredible that the government should take advantage of this situation to make additional profits, but this is the case. I would point out that since 1939, not including due payment this fall, I have paid the board four payments of each $124.23, some $496, but you will notice I have not reduced the principal yet by $100—some $80 in fact. Surely this would appear to be heavy interest without charging compound interest on top.

That is the position in which many of these old soldier settlers find themselves, and I think it is only simple justice that we in this parliament should take action to relieve them. Under the new land settlement act we have provided much better conditions for the soldiers coming back from this war than were provided under the old act, and in simple justice this parliament should take action to relieve some of the suffering of many of these old soldiers under the old act.

There is another injustice under the old act, and while there are not many cases in which this has happened there are some where the soldier settler under the old act had two quarter-sections of land, one of which he bought through the board and one which he had as a homestead before going overseas. Later, when he came back the board took a mortgage on both pieces of land before they would give him stock and equipment under the act, and in some cases the soldier disposed of one of these quarters to another settler or another individual. Later, this particular individual made application under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act to have his debt reduced and in some cases the board allowed the reduction. Strange to say that reduction was charged back against the old quarter of the soldier settler. That seems to me to be absolutely unjust, because under the old agreement, under the Soldier Settlement Act, the soldier was liable to the board for the full amount of indebtedness; he had disposed of one quarter and later on, perhaps three years after he had disposed of it, that quarter came under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act and the debt was reduced, the amount of reduction being charged back to the original quarter of the soldier settler.

I do not know how many cases there were of this kind but there were some. The fact that there is this old core of dissatisfaction under the old act is causing many of the younger soldiers, younger men coming back from this war, to hesitate about again entering into any agreement with the government in regard to land, and I think it would be to the advantage of the government to clear up this matter immediately and to start with a clean slate under a new act. If they do not do so it will simply mean a lot of grief and trouble to them later on, because in areas where you get a few old settlers who have a just complaint, and a group of new men coming in under the new act, invariably the older men will get in contact with the new men and tell their story and dissatisfaction will arise among the newer group. I am sure the new men who settle under the new act, seeing they are getting a better deal than the old soldiers received under the old act, would not use that as a pry to try to get some further consideration from the government as far as meeting their obligations is concerned.

I hope that the new minister will take this matter into serious consideration. As the hon. member for Battle River stated, a delegation came here over a year ago to interview the government. They were certainly given some encouragement by the government to believe their case would be considered after they had gone home, but they found, through the article which the hon. member has just quoted, and from what took place in the veterans' convention in Vancouver, that their case was being passed up as far as the government was concerned. They again came to Ottawa and placed their position before the government. I do not know what the result of the last interview was. I do not know whether they were given encouragement in that last interview, but certainly they have a just case, and I would urge the government to take that case into consideration and do as suggested in this resolution—cancel the old debt that remains. It is a very small amount in comparison with the expenditures that are made to-day, and I am sure that any action along that line would be appreciated by the old settlers and would be an encouragement to the new men who are returning to settle under the new act.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): In rising to give my support to the resolution moved by the hon. member (Mr. Fair), may I join with the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) in complimenting him for his persistence and consistency over the years in asking for what is requested in this resolution. I have had occasion to meet with soldier settlers, particularly those settled near the city of Prince Albert, where conditions have been such that they have been unable to carry on and to reduce their indebtedness. There they were settled in sub-marginal land for the most part, and many to-day are in a position that is little improved over that in which they were ten or fifteen years ago. Not only do they request consideration along the line of this resolution, but many soldier settlers with whom I come in contact, who are in the same position as the hon. member for Melfort and who have discharged their indebtedness, are asking, in the interests of the morale not only of those who to-day are still delinquent but also of those who are returning from overseas and are desirous of taking up land under the Veterans' Land Act, that consideration be given by the government to the cancellation of the indebtedness that exists.

There were 25,017 returned men who chose to go farming after the last war. Of that number twenty-five per cent remain on the land to-day, and many even since the beginning of this war are being forced, either directly or indirectly, to leave the land upon which they have been settled for a period of twenty-two to twenty-five years. The figures were given in a return tabled in this house, showing that as between the beginning of the war, September 1, 1939, and December 31, 1943, 2,418 settlers either left their land voluntarily, as it is said, or were actually removed as a result of the institution of the law in that regard by the board officials.

There have been reductions in principal and interest, but these reductions have applied not only to the soldier settler but also to the settler who has taken land under the act. The purport of this resolution has received the support of outstanding public institutions in the prairie provinces, including the wheat pool, the Alberta legislature, the Alberta farmers' union, the united farmers of Canada, and the united farmers of Alberta. Whenever there is a legion meeting, a zone meeting, in the province of Saskatchewan, support is given to the request of these men. Therefore, as the hon. member for Melfort says, it is not a partisan matter. It is a matter that cuts right through partisan considerations and it merits and has secured the support of authoritative and responsible bodies all over western Canada.

What are the arguments that can be raised against it? One argument would be that it means the repudiation of the indebtedness of these men, and the cancellation of the terms of the contract. Well, Mr. Speaker, parliament has recognized the principle that where through drought or difficulty or poor prices the farmer is unable to carry on and to meet the indebtedness he may apply under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act for a reduction. As far as the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act is concerned its operation will not meet the needs of the soldier settlers and their peculiar problems.

Another matter which strikes me as of great importance is that while to-day there is a great modicum of their original indebtedness remaining due, there is still a very large expenditure being made in the collection of the accounts outstanding of soldier settlers. I was struck with the figures that were given in a return that was brought down on March 10, 1943, in answer to the question: "What is the cost of administration of the board during the years 1930 to 1942?" We find that in 1930 and 1931 the cost of administration a year was $1,300,327. It amounted to $757,507 for 1935-36, and for 1941-42, with a very small indebtedness proportionately to the amount originally outstanding still due, the government of this country had to expend the sum of $646,446 for administration. That is a very large sum, about $650,000 a year for the collection of an amount that has been reduced to a matter of only a few million dollars. I mention that for this reason, that only recently, in a desire on the part of the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) to alleviate conditions under which these soldier settlers have been operating, extensions have been provided for whereby the indebtedness has been amortized over a period of twenty or twenty-five years. The soldiers who served in the last war are approaching fifty years of age or over. Many will not live to see the day when their indebtedness will be discharged. The administrative expenses will have to be continued throughout those years. In other words, you can multiply twenty-five years more by approximately $600,000, which is the average amount expended in the last few years for administration, and you reach a total of $15,000,000 in all for the collection of an indebtedness but little more than that. There is a consideration that would appeal to the people of the country as a whole. We are simply, by amortizing the indebtedness, going to collect approximately the amount that in that period of time will have been expended in extra administration. On the basis of ordinary good business my submission is that this resolution deserves the support of the house.

There are other grounds upon which it could be supported. Some of them have already been mentioned by the hon. member for Melfort and by the hon. member who moved the resolution. These grounds were set forth in a memorandum that was delivered to the government by the committee of soldier settlers who were here on May 23, 1944. It will not benefit the house to re-read the grounds that were then advanced by these men for the cancellation of this indebtedness. They are known to hon. members. Repetition does not make them any stronger, nor does repetition make them any clearer. I believe, sir, that all over the prairie provinces—and in the main these settlers are in the prairie provinces—and without regard to political persuasion, there is a general agreement, in the interests of those men, in the interests of morale, above all in the interests of removing any suggestion that too often pervades the mind of the soldiers returning from the war just ended that the men of the previous war did not receive a fair deal, and also in the interests of good business, that this resolution should be supported, and I am supporting the intent of the resolution moved to-day by the hon. member.

I have not yet had an opportunity to do so on a previous occasion and before concluding I wish now to convey my best wishes to the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) in the honour he has received in being appointed parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. With his record of service in two wars, with his interest in the welfare of the veterans of this country, with his capabilities as a parliamentarian, I, speaking for the members in this part of the house, say that we compliment him on his appointment, and we wish him well in the work that he will do on behalf of the veterans of this country.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I shall take just a few moments of the time of the house to add my views to those of the other hon. members who have preceded me on this issue, and if the opportunity affords itself, I shall also give my vote in favour of the motion which is now before us.

I cannot imagine any hon. member having very serious objections to the motion. It asks that the soldiers who have survived the economic conflict of the last twenty-five years or so shall at this hour be granted what I think they should have been given at the outset. The most important argument for correcting the mistake which was made at the very beginning is this, that it has cost the people of Canada perhaps more to try to collect the uncollectible than it would have cost us to have made a free gift of land to the soldiers who settled on it. That condition, as the previous speaker pointed out, still pertains. If we continue this policy we shall continue only to badger men who will not be able to meet their obligations, and it will be done at a very high cost to the nation. I believe that we are all looking forward to the birth of a new social order based on social justice, as has been mentioned in the speech from the throne. This is an excellent place for us to begin. If there is any justice in us it should be manifested first toward the men who fought in the first great war and who have, as I have said, suffered so much in the economic conflict which has taken place since then.

To some extent the history of the soldier settlement project has been given by the hon. member who introduced the resolution. Figures have been quoted as to the number of settlers who took advantage of the Soldier Settlement Act, and as to the number of those who were able to meet their obligations and who at last got their title, and the numbers who are still struggling in a vain hope of securing those titles. Figures have also been given as to the amount that has been paid by the government in administrative costs and in other ways. There is no need for me, or for any other hon. member, to take up the time of the house in further reiterating these facts; but I want to bring this to the attention of hon. members. I know they all know it, but it will not do any harm to remind ourselves of it again. Our soldier settlers bought their land and equipment under inflated prices, and they were compelled to sell their products, by which alone they could pay for their land and equipment, at deflated prices. In addition to that, they had to pay a very high rate of interest on their borrowings. It was just as impossible for them to do that as it was for a large percentage of the civilian agricultural population to do so, and they fell by the wayside just as many of their fellow farmers did.

The returned soldier of the last war who fought for his country should have a little bit of it to call his own. I do not know of anyone who has a better right. I venture to suggest that the economic conflict which these farmers have sustained since their return has been more difficult to bear, more grievous, fraught with greater heart-burnings and despair, than the three or four years they fought in the trnches in Flanders, in France and in Belgium. Not only had they to fight the econmic battle, with the assistance of their wives and families, and watch their loved ones suffer deprivation which hurt them deeply; they also had to watch their families fighting with them a losing battle. It is true that four thousand of the twenty-five thousand or so came through, but that is true of every battle. A thousand men may go into a real battle. Four hundred may come through; three hundred may be killed and the remainder wounded. The four hundred were lucky to come through; and the four thousand who came through in this case, in the economic battle, were also lucky. Perhaps in some cases they were better farmers; the chances are they were settled in better communities; they were closer to markets, or they may have had better land. They may have missed the frost or the hail storm or some other hazard of agriculture, and so managed to come through. But there were a great many who did not come through this economic battle; they lost out, and have gone from the picture.

Now some six thousand remain. They are old men and unable to continue to put up the vigorous fight they have been carrying on during the past twenty years. In a great many cases their children, who have been helping them in the past, have grown up and left home to take up jobs and responsibilities of their own. So that these soldier settlers, who are now becoming old men, are being left pretty much alone. I wish to impress upon the minister that if these men in the vigour of youth and with the assistance of their young families have been unable to meet their obligations up to this time, certainly they will not be able to meet them from now on. In view of the fact that the actual cost to the people of Canada will be a paltry sum in comparison with what we have had to expand during the last five or six years, I would urge that these men be now given free title to the land they first strove so hard to win in Flanders and then worked so hard to hold in Canada, the country for which they fought.

Not only are these men getting old and losing the help of their children, who are moving into new pursuits and raising families of their own; we must not forget that the health of these men, which in many instances no doubt was impaired by their service, is growing worse as they grow older. So that the problem becomes increasingly acute for them. It is true, as someone has said, that some are still trying to pay, but I wonder if we stop to ask at what cost they are trying to pay. I know some returned soldiers who would rather die than fail to meet their obligations, but I do not think we should demand the last drop of blood from these men even if they should be willing to continue to make the sacrifices they made in years gone by. As I have pointed out already, most of them never will be able to get clear title. Let us be magnanimous to them; let us remember their service to Canada and give them free title now to the land they have fought so hard to earn. It has been suggested that it would be against the sanctity of contract for us to do anything like that, but surely we have the right to alter a contract ourselves if we so desire. We are not asking these men to violate a contract; we are asking ourselves to draft a new one which will give them free title to their land. It has been said that some who have paid may object. I do not believe that will happen, and if it does there will be very few such cases. But even if it should happen, let it: let them object if they wish. This is a case where we have a right to act in spite of such objections and I urge, sir, what this resolution be passed and that the government act in accordance with the terms.

Mr. T. J. BENTLEY (Swift Current): Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to labour the point. I had expected a little more debate from other quarters of the house either for or against this motion, and left my notes upstairs intending to use them this evening. Consequently I shall be very brief in my remarks, but I should like to emphasize just a few things which, although they have been brought out already, have not been emphasized quite as much as I believe they should be.

The mover of the motion (Mr. Fair) made an excellent address, giving all the figures necessary to convince anyone who is open to conviction, so that there is no need for me or anyone else to recapitulate what he said. The next speaker, the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright), gave a good picture of the actual position of the people outside the financial field. The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) carried on from there, while the last speaker (Mr. Irvine) summarized what had been said previously.

Hon. members have been told already of the organizations throughout the country which have supported this resolution. These include the Alberta legislature, by no means all of whose members are returned soldiers. Hon. members have mentioned also the legislature of Saskatchewan, which is not composed entirely of returned men either. They have mentioned the Saskatchewan wheat pool, not all of whose 165 delegates are returned soldiers. They have mentioned also a very important body, the association of rural municipalities of Saskatchewan, which is composed of men who are councillors and reeves of rural municipalities, men who cannot be called soft-headed or soft-hearted when dealing with the finances in their trust.

Hon. members have supported this resolution for a variety of reasons. One which was mentioned only once during the debate today—and was not then emphasized—is that the plight of these old soldier settlers has an emotional appeal. I should like to be able to draw a picture of conditions; if I were like an hon. member who sits opposite me, I would do so. I would describe some of the homes in which these people have had to live during the years, homes in which they have endured struggles, fighting climatic conditions and sickness in the families.

I should like the house to realize that those chaps went through a terrific strain many years ago. In the light of the war just passed, perhaps our little effort of 1914 pales into insignificance. But do not forget the boys who clamoured around the Glory Hole, the M and N trenches, the boys who were up around Sanctuary Wood, and Ypres, the boys who were down at Regina trench and other places on the Somme; the boys who were at St. Albert, Amiens, Passchendaele, and all those other places. They went through tough times, too. And they come home—many of them—not as vigorous as some might judge from outward appearances.

Those chaps settled on these soldier settlement farms. The percentage who now need assistance is not very great. The financial outlay will not be great because, as other hon. members have said, the cost of collection will use up a great deal of it, anyway. So that the necessity for spending the whole $7,000,000 in doing this is not going to be there.

It has been said by some people, in private conversation—and I believe this statement has been attributed to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), while in conversation with the delegation last spring—that these men should live up to their contracts, and that if they cannot they should apply for veterans' allowances, or should come under some scheme of that kind. People have said to me that that would be better—"Give the old duck his $60 a month, or whatever it will be under the veterans' allowances provisions, and let him live in comfort in some small village."

Well, maybe he would live in great comfort; but remember the necessity for human association. He has lived in his little log shack, or his small farm home. He may have raised a family. That is his home, and he does not want to come in under any veterans' allowances scheme which would make him live away from home. While the soldier settlers are not all of one mind in these matters, yet I believe the great bulk of them are just like you and me. These are the homes they have lived in through all the years; surely now they have earned them.

Those men risked their lives to get that land. Not many years ago in the history of this country a great organization risked money to build a railroad across the country. They got tremendous grants of land to take care, as they said, of the risk they were taking in case the venture did not turn out well. They did not risk anything in the way of life or death. True, there may have been a few shot at with arrows by some Indian who was a little bit too well-filled with fire water. They may even have had to dodge a few stones thrown by some exuberant workman on pay day when the Canadian Pacific railway was being built. However, the risk was not very great, and these people built a great transportation system. They did receive tremendous grants of land. Every soldier settler in the west, and many others besides, know that from the time they cut cordwood at $1.25 a cord, and put it into boxcars on the railway, they were making revenue for one of our great transportation systems. When they sold a pig or a cow or some cream or a few bushels of wheat, they made a further contribution to that transportation system. So, that, even though we gave them title to their land at the present time, we could not say we gave them everything, because they have made their contribution.

Many of them are now old. It has been pointed out that a twenty-year extension of their debt might possibly mean that much less extension on their hope of living, because the worry would probably kill many of them before the twenty years had expired.

I should like to hear other hon. members indicate their support. I realize that many of them are not close to this problem, and we cannot expect them to be as sympathetically inclined as we are. But I believe I can say for the four hon. members who have spoken that we would like other hon. members who are not so well acquainted with the problem to lend their support. We have spoken earnestly and sincerely on behalf of the soldier settlers this afternoon.

Mr. A. J. BROOKS (Royal): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who has just taken his seat mentioned that he would like to hear some observations from other hon. members representing other sections of the country. The remarks to which we have listened thus far have been confined mostly to western Canada. May I point out that we who come from the maritime provinces face a similar problem, although our problem may not be as acute as it has been in the western provinces because we had fewer soldier-settlers.

May I take this opportunity to congratulate the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) who has so consistently brought this subject before the house, and has persisted in his efforts on behalf of the soldier settlers. His has been a worthy cause, and one which I am satisfied should receive the sympathetic attention of the house.

As I said, there are not many of those settlers whose farms are still unpaid left. One hon. member has said that only the hard core remains. I shall not repeat the arguments which have been presented this afternoon. All have been logical and sane, and I believe they will commend themselves to all members. I have known many of the young men who returned from the last war with high hopes of taking part in the farming industry of this country. As we know, many of them have been greatly disappointed. I have in mind three men in my own district who took up land not far from my own town. To-day those farms are abandoned. When this war came along these three men gave up hope of carrying on their farming operations. Some joined the veterans guard, and others found work around the camp at Sussex. They have had a difficult time, just the same as the men in the west.

As has been pointed out, these men bought their farms at very high prices, prices which were perhaps almost double what they should have been. That was a condition of the times. Then, when they bought their stock it cost them possibly twice what it should have cost. I believe that the men who are returning from the war which has just ended, and who are coming back to Canada with the intention of taking up farming, will find the same conditions their fathers found when they returned after the first great war. That will be the condition, if we do not watch very carefully.

For instance, cows are selling to-day for as much as $125 and $150. In a few years there is no doubt that those cattle will bring much lower prices. Farm machinery is costing to-day twice as much as it did some years ago. These are the conditions which made it difficult for men who returned from the last war, and they are the conditions which will make it just as difficult for men who are returning from this war with the intention of taking up farming.

We must remember, too, that the men about whom we have been speaking this afternoon had to go through one of the worst depressions the world has ever experienced. I do not agree, as has been suggested on the floor of the house at different times, that that depression was due to the policies of any political party. Any man with ordinary common sense and judgment must know that it was not; it was a world-wide condition and Canada could not escape any more than any other country.

These men, burdened as they were, tried to make a success of farming under those conditions. However, they could not do so and they abandoned their farms. They were patriotic enough to go overseas during the last war. During the time they have been on their farms they have raised families and to-day their sons are coming back from this war. They would like to see some one of these sons continue on the farm. I was much impressed by the statement made by the hon. member who has just taken his seat that there is sentiment connected with a farm on which a man has lived for twenty-five years, on which he has raised a family, sent his children to school and tried to make a living. That place has become home to his children. These farms should not be abandoned, not only in the interests of the farmers but in the interests of their sons and the country generally.

Just lately I drove through certain sections of Ontario and I was amazed at the number of vacant farms. People are flocking into the towns and cities, a condition which should not be. These men would like to have their sons take up farming again, but they do not want to see them take it up under the burden of debt that they have at the present time.

In my province we have small school districts, and when two or three farms are vacated it becomes difficult for those who are left in the district to carry on. The district loses its taxes, the children are taken away from school, and there is in general a bad effect.

I do not think there is much more that I wish to say this afternoon. I am heartily in accord with the resolution moved by the hon.

member. I feel there is much of justice in it. I have talked to many other veterans regarding it and some few say that we should treat the veterans who have paid for their farms the same as it is proposed these men should be treated. However, I believe if a census were taken of those who have paid for their farms, ninety-five per cent or possibly one hundred per cent would be willing to have justice done to these men who have struggled for so long to bring up their families and provide a home. For many years the hon. member has brought this matter before the house and I sincerely hope that it will receive favourable consideration and that justice will be done.

Mr. G. R. PEARKES (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to indicate briefly my desire to support this resolution. I do so, first, because I am a returned man. These men who took up farms under the soldier settlement board were comrades of mine in the first great war and I feel that justice should be done to them. Therefore I should like to express my support of this resolution which I believe indicates the road to justice.

Second, I rise because I represent another part of the country. I come from Vancouver island, at the opposite end of the country to that from which the previous speaker comes. On that island there are a large number of veterans who settled under the soldier settlement scheme. I know for a fact that these men have had a trying and difficult time. They have honestly done their best to try to make ends meet.

Farming conditions on Vancouver island are not easy. There are no large farms. There are a few dairy farms, but mostly they are fruit, vegetable and poultry farms. These farms are encircled by the forest, and unless the farmer keeps hard at work, day in and day out, nature encroaches on the small clearing that he has made. You see the bracken and the fern growing up very thickly in the pasture. It is not an easy life.

I noticed that when the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) was speaking the other day he called attention to the fact that eggs were the only farm product which was not selling at parity according to the definition of parity as given that night. A great many of these returned men are in the poultry business and, as one can see from that statement, they must be having considerable difficulty as far as marketing their produce at reasonable prices is concerned.

I also endorse the statement that was made that a large number of these men left their farms at the beginning of this war, either for motives of patriotism or because of dire necessity. Many of them felt that they would have a better opportunity of making a livelihood from the grants and pay they would receive for their services to their country. Whether it was from patriotism or because of necessity, they joined up in such organizations as the veterans guard of Canada and they did faithful duty in that corps in the way of guarding outlying forts and prisoners of war.

I think I am correct in saying that these men are not entitled to any consideration under the new Veterans' Land Act because they are considered to be too old and therefore not a good risk. As I understand this resolution, it would put that class of men on a parity with the veterans who will be discharged from this war and who may want to take up land under the Veterans' Land Act. I hope most sincerely that the house will give sympathetic consideration to the resolution.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. L. A. MUTCH (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I should like to declare at once that I am in sympathy with the resolution, if not with its wording, presented by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair). I would be happier in associating myself with this resolution if I did not find in the preamble, the introduction to the resolution, as one so often finds in resolutions presented in this house; namely, that a criticism applied to the original soldier settlement land scheme, a criticism which can be and has been justified by myself and by others, is by inference, or so it seems to me, intended by the mover of the resolution to imply the probability of the failure of the present Veterans' Land Act. The resolution says in its first paragraph:

> Whereas veterans of great war I . . . have in many instances suffered severe hardships because of purchase of land, live stock and equipment at inflationary prices—

That is perhaps well merited as a criticism of the original scheme. The preamble goes on to say:

> —and low prices received for farm products brought about by lack of adequate policy for agriculture.

Implying that policy or lack of it contributed to failure. I am perhaps unique in this house in that I have not in my constituency anyone who is a landowner or landholder, so far as I know, under the original scheme of land settlement. I fancy that the only constituents of mine who have had any connection with that scheme, if there be any, are those who decided that it would not pay and got out of it sooner or later. Because I have no constituents who come within the groups for whom relief is sought by this resolution I can speak freely and without any suggestion that I am addressing myself to them.

In its second paragraph the resolution says:

> And whereas we are now embarking on another land scheme for veterans of the present war, under a government policy that does not guarantee cost of production, the success of which scheme may be jeopardized by the apparent failure of the former soldier settlement board scheme.

There again, I cannot see how the mover of the resolution hopes to win sympathy for those whose cause he pleads by introducing in the preamble to his resolution something which is an issue in current politics, apart from the cause of those whose relief he seeks.

I do not support the resolution with any thought that by doing so we in this house would be conferring any considerable favour, economically at least, on the 4,000 odd whom the member for Battle River described this afternoon as being still condemned to pay for their land. The reason I say that is this; I agree wholeheartedly with what hon. members opposite have said this afternoon about the ridiculousness of the prices paid for the land, and about the machinations of various agencies, civil and political, which resulted in soldier settlers being settled upon some of the least desirable of sub-marginal land at the time this scheme was initiated. That criticism has been developed and is well founded, but to suggest, and by inference it is suggested, that under those conditions had there been an agricultural policy—that agricultural policy is not suggested but is hinted at—a large number of these people might have succeeded in paying for their land is in my own experience something which is open to grave doubt. I can remember farms being sold in that initial period to veterans of the last war who knew very little about farming, and sold to them when there was two feet of snow on the land. It was a good thing, too, for the seller because if there had been only one foot of snow the veteran would have been able to see the rocks. I remember also the inflationary prices that were paid for live stock to go on these farms often by men who hardly knew the business end of a cow. I remember investigations into land transactions in my own province and in other provinces which indicated all too conclusively that no proper selection was made either of the men who were to go on the land or of the land itself. I may be pardoned, if I derive some little amusement out of the circumstances in which some hon. members are now hastening to add their voices to the chorus of those who would give to these settlers who have put a large chunk out of a lifetime on what was often sub-marginal and useless land. Some of them represent groups which were instrumental in permitting the lack of organization which made possible the present situation.

I am a little at a loss to understand why the hon. member who introduced this resolution should imply in his introduction that failure to clear up the admitted injustices of selection and placement; the admitted inflationary prices of that earlier period which have induced almost countless failures and which still contribute to the difficulties of those who as late as March, 1944, were, after repeated demands to give them relief still in arrears, I am at a loss to understand, I repeat, why he should now imply that their situation would have bad effects on the Veterans Land Act which is at present on the statute books.

I am very much interested in that angle, because I am one of those who believe that we have very largely profited from the mistakes of the past. Not only are we guarding against inflationary prices for the land which is to be distributed, but much excellent land has been secured and is being held for the returning veterans of this war at prices which are at least commensurate with the expectation of returns from the land. I am reminded also of the very considerable differences which exist to-day with respect to the selection of the personnel who will go on the land. Perhaps some will regard this as a minor consideration, but I am very much impressed with the fact that in the selection of soldier settlers who shall go on the land under the Veterans' Land Act a great deal of attention is being paid by the selection boards to the desires and opinions of the wives of the men who will secure farms. I should not like anyone to take from my remarks that I feel or have felt that ineptitude of the wives of the men who have not made the grade under the soldier settlement scheme was a major contributing factor in their failure. I know of many instances of women without experience, without any knowledge even of the physical conditions of the part of the country to which they were called upon to go, who have made simply heroic contributions in keeping with the best traditions of the pioneer stock of this country. But I do know something of the western prairies. I know something of the territory which has been settled very largely by these soldier settlers, and I know that any man's chance of success under the circumstances which exist are very considerably enhanced by having associated with him in that enterprise a woman who not only understands what she is to be called upon to do, and to endure, but who is wholeheartedly and enthusiastically behind the project from the beginning.

We are terribly prone, I think, to look to the period after the last war and to say, not only with respect to soldier settlement but with respect to almost every attempt which was made to do something for the returned veterans of the last war, that the whole thing was thoroughly bad. I am reminded that there are at present in this house and have been in the last few parliaments men who under the conditions which then existed did achieve success, so much so that their natural leadership in their own communities eventually brought them to this house. I am reminded, too, that it is not possible by legislation or by grants to take someone who has no aptitude for farming and, by virtue of the fact that society is grateful to him for the contribution which he made in another branch of the public service, namely, the armed services, to ensure his success.

I have not much regard for the sentimental arguments which are sometimes presented. Arguments which have been presented at one time or another when each of the various relief measures has been initiated in connection with the soldier settlement board. I am impressed with the practical nature of the present suggestions. Perhaps it is the Scots blood which flows in my Canadian veins, perhaps it is just a little practical common sense, but I am impressed with the argument that it is futile and silly to throw good money after bad. I am impressed and satisfied with the argument that there is no probability of redeeming those sub-marginal farms under the control of their present owners with profit to the state. I have no hesitation on that ground, if on any other, in supporting the resolution of the hon. member for Battle River in which he says:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration the advisability of giving clear titles to all soldier settlers who on March 31, 1944, held land under contract with the soldier settlement board.

I would support his resolution, I think, if couched in stronger language for the reason which I have given. I am not particularly impressed with the results which I have received from time to time when I have finally prevailed upon those in authority to give "serious consideration" to any matter. The phrase itself smacks of "brush off." However, it is my privilege to stand here and urge with the hon. gentlemen who have done so that consideration be given. I do not believe that in most of the 4,000 odd cases which the hon. member cited this afternoon it will be possible under any other arrangement for men, most of them now in their late fifties, ever to get title to the property which they now occupy. I doubt very seriously if very many of them will be able under present circumstances, and in view of the conditions under which they operate, to make anything even approximating an adequate living for the remainder of their days if we do give them clear title to the property which they now occupy.

I know, however, that there is something in the heart of man which responds to ownership of land. I believe it must be particularly true of one who through good season and bad season over a period of years, under adverse conditions, has striven and stayed with it for the length of time these gentlemen must have done to be still, nearly twenty-six years later, occupying the land which they originally took. I do not think we would be giving away anything. I think we would be bringing satisfaction to some of them, and perhaps we might be paying something in the nature of a tribute to them because they have played an exceedingly important role in the life of our country in the last few years.

It was my privilege to see a great deal of Canada, part of western Canada and all of eastern Canada, during the period of this last war. It was noticeable wherever one went, from one end of Canada to the other, that in almost every community the first man who tried to get into the army in this war was the chap who went through the last war; and right behind him was his son and indeed eventually his daughter.

This country owes a not inconsiderable debt to these men in every community in which they live for the leadership which they showed when the war came and for the leadership which they showed within their communities during the period which some of my friends like to refer to as the hungry thirties. In times of dissatisfaction and stress as well as in times of national peril these men have been the hard rock centre in the community life of every part of Canada.

I promised when I began that I would not resort to sentimental appeals in this matter, and I submit that what I have just said is not a sentimental appeal but simply a statement of fact which will be recognized as such by everyone in the house who has had contact with these families during the last ten or eleven difficult years.

I take it that, because of association of ideas, it is possible at this juncture to refer for a moment or two to the Veterans' Land Act as at present constituted in an attempt to show that a difficulty does exist beween the cleaning up of the soldier settlement board scheme and the present scheme. The hon. member for Battle River this afternoon said that 4,600 original settlers had completed their contract. I do not dispute the figure, but I realize that if to-day we are to go the whole way, for economic or for sentimental reasons, and give title to an almost equally large number who are still attempting to complete their contract, many of them in arrears, this or any other government will be faced with a problem of reconciliation and compensation. I do not agree with the hon. member who said this afternoon that in his view such a concession would not be questioned or resented by those who had completed their contracts. I do not think it is an insuperable barrier, but I suggest to this government, or to whatever government eventually carries out the undertaking called for in this resolution, that they be prepared with a logical and reasonable argument in order to be able to meet the objections that will be brought forward. I am perfectly sure that not only will those who have completed their contracts, but also some of those who were either released from their contract or who broke it themselves, feel, and with some justification, that they would be discriminated against. This situation can be met.

I would point out one other fact which I think must enter into the consideration to be given to this measure by this or any other government, namely, that we are at the beginning of what we conceive to be a bigger and better settlement scheme. The pitfalls and mistakes of the last scheme have been observed and have been reasonably well guarded against in the new scheme. I believe that whoever finally accedes to the request of this resolution should take particular care to establish what the hon. member for Battle River attempted to establish—and I think he did so—namely, that the old scheme was exceedingly unjust, and that in many cases, the circumstances under which those contracts were originally entered into were iniquitous. If that is not done we are going to begin a new scheme, which appears to have most of the elements which make for success, bedevilled with the now prevalent idea that over a period of time the settler may possibly be granted more than is in his original contract.

I do not now argue for the sanctity of the contract, as such, against all circumstances.

[Mr. Mutch.]

I do think it is exceedingly important that sons of farmer veterans, and those chaps returning to-day who wish to take advantage of this scheme, should be made to feel that everything which can be done in the way of security, everything which can be offered in the way of compensation for perseverance and persistence in the keeping of the contract should be offered at the beginning rather than at the end. Realizing as I do that inevitably the security of old soldiers becomes a problem of the federal administration, I also realize the inevitability of change.

I should like to think that the dominion is getting close cooperation from the provinces and from the officials of the provincial governments in the selection of land and in the selection of areas in which land can be bought. This was not the case twenty-five or twenty-six years ago. Some of the provinces are cooperating in that way to-day. Therefore, before I leave the problem of the effect of what happens to the old scheme in its impact on the new scheme, I should like for a moment or two to refer to some of the differences between the two schemes. I refer particularly to the section which permits the settlement of soldiers on small holdings. In my remarks on the speech from the throne a few days ago I said a word or two about the effect of settlement on small holdings near large urban populations. I was very grateful when I saw that in the present regulations the area in which people could take up small holdings had been reduced from one acre to half an acre. I have some knowledge of the amount of work required to cultivate one acre intensively enough to make it an economic asset no matter where the locality happens to be. I was one of those who felt that no one who held a job that was of any consideration at all would be capable of getting full development out of a larger acreage. Therefore it was a matter of pleasure to me—and I think it will make for success of the small holding—when I saw that the acreage required under the plan was reduced to half an acre.

I should like to say one thing about the small holding aspect of this problem. There is a tendency in some parts of Canada and in some communities to hive the small holdings together. My conception of the rehabilitation of the soldier is to fit him once more into the communal life of the country with as little differentiation between him and his neighbours as is humanly possible. For that reason I am somewhat sceptical of the value of the veterans' communities in the small holdings programme. I realize the economic possibilities of that type of development, but if I may issue a word of warning based on experience with relation to the veterans of the first great war it would be to suggest that we walk warily in the establishment of veterans' communities, as such.

I have taken advantage of this resolution in the first instance to express my own personal view toward it and to give my reasons for supporting it, and also to inject into the discussion some other remarks touching on the present scheme. I do not know whether this resolution will be accepted at this time, but I venture to predict that we will not continue over the years to send good money after bad only to continue to make the declining years of these soldier citizens of Canada as difficult as they have been in the past.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, in rising to support this resolution may I do as some other members who spoke this afternoon have already done, compliment the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) upon his determination and insistency in this matter. He has certainly stuck by his guns for some years on this matter of principle toward the settlers under the old Soldier Settlement Act.

Some fault was found by the previous speaker (Mr. Mutch) with the wording of the resolution, which is as follows:

> Whereas veterans of great war I who settled on land under the soldier setlement scheme, as well as their wives and families, have in many instances suffered severe hardships because of purchase of land, live stock and equipment at inflationary prices, and low prices received for farm products brought about by lack of adequate policy for agriculture.

And so forth. I do not think anybody can very well contradict those words, because I well remember those days in 1919 and 1920 when prices of land, live stock and equipment were certainly inflationary. As has been said in 1919, some 25,017 settlers were placed on the land under this act at an expenditure, in round figures, of $109,000,000. The average credit given to each settler was some $4,358. I think the last speaker had his figures slightly mixed up when he spoke of some 4,000 on the land, because there are still some 6,000 who will be affected by this resolution.

During twenty-five years of the settlement only 4,130 settlers, or sixteen per cent, have obtained clear title to their holdings. The total amount in principal cancelled during those years was something over $24,000,000, or approximately twenty-three per cent of the original amount put into the scheme. Up to March 31, 1944, the cost of administration has been something over $27,000,000, or an average of about $1,100,000 a year. As of the same date some 6,153 settlers remained on the land, with an average debt of $1,250, or a total of slightly over $7,000,000.

In 1919 and 1920, as I have said, values of land and live stock were greatly inflated. Perhaps I might cite an illustration in my own county, which is not an isolated case at all. In those years this chap agreed to pay $15 an acre for a half-section of land, and it was not very good land at that. He paid $500 a team for work horses, which were only average horses, $150 each for milch cows, and other live stock and equipment cost in proportion. It is true that on application prior to October 1, 1927, a revaluation was made, allowing forty per cent of the purchase price for live stock purchased prior to October, 1920, and twenty per cent on live stock purchased after that date. Again, in 1933 the settler was given double credit for the amount paid within a certain period, which I believe expired some time in 1941. Under that scheme, for every dollar of arrears or instalments paid by the settler, another dollar would be credited to his account.

During the drought and depression years this chap I mentioned as an example signed away any further claim to his land. Those were very difficult times. No government was responsible for the conditions which existed in this and other nations, but it was impossible for any man on a farm to get the cost of production for the goods he had to sell during those years. This man, along with others, signed away any further claim. When he did that the half-section for which he had agreed to pay almost $5,000 was sold by the board to a civilian for $500, or approximately ten per cent of the amount set out in the agreement for sale. This works out at slightly more than $1.55 an acre. But the man who had signed away his claim was not given an opportunity to purchase at that price.

I was impressed by the remark made by some of the speakers this afternoon, that apparently human values do not count with this administration at this time. I do not believe we should be carried away by feelings of sentiment or anything like that, but we should not forget that during the struggle of the past six years the taxpayers of this country have donated goods worth billions of dollars under Mutual Aid. Just the other day we listened to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) appeal for food for the starving people of Europe, and rightly so, emhasizing the humanitarian point of view. Surely we can apply the same doctrine to those who fought for us in 1914-1918. Many of their sons were among the first to volunteer their services in the last great struggle, and they fought a great battle for us during those years. They are the type of citizens we should encourage in Canada if we want that national unity of which we hear so much in this country to-day. New settlers under the present Veterans' Land Act are given a clear grant of thirty-nine per cent of their total credit of $6,000, provided that they carry out their agreement for a period of ten years. I am happy to think I had the privilege of serving as a member of the committee which brought the present legislation into being. Perhaps it is not all we had hoped for, but I think it is an improvement over the old act, as a result of our experience under that legislation.

I believe these 6,153 settlers, who have laboured for the past twenty-five years and most of whom are now old men, should be granted clear title to their land by the government writing off the 29 per cent of the original debt still remaining. Surely these men are entitled to at least equal consideration, in virtue of their service to this nation, to those coming under the new legislation. This is a time of readjustment, both for nations and for individuals. Old settlers under the board should receive consideration equal to that being shown new settlers under the present act. I am one of those who believe that a proper adjustment for these settlers will mean a great deal to the young veterans now coming back, who are inclined to settle under the present legislation. I know some of these chaps feel a bit discouraged when they think of what their parents had to go through, what with the drought years, the depression and all the rest of it, and they are inclined to try almost anything but farming. I do not believe that is a healthy sign. Experience would indicate that a large portion of our population should be encouraged to live on the land, and that we should have decentralization as much as possible. In that connection the provision in the present act having to do with the small acreage settler, the man who perhaps has a position in a city but who wants to carry on gardening or a small poultry farm, is a very fine feature. In order to encourage the younger veterans to go on the land, and in order to diversify the citizenship of this nation, I believe the government should give immediate consideration to the problems of these 6,000 odd men who come under the settlement act. Apart altogether from sentiment, I believe it would be good business in dollars and cents for the taxpayers of this country, and on these grounds I support the resolution.

[Mr. J. A. Ross.]

Mr. RENE JUTRAS (Provencher) (Translation): Before voicing these few remarks, I wish to join the hon. members who spoke before me in tendering you my most sincere congratulations and in assuring you of the confidence which I and the hon. members of this house place in you. Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to express a wish, which is that the heavy responsibilities that devolve upon you may never take away the smile which has always characterized you and which has gained you such a host of friends.

(Text): I join with those who have preceded me, in asking for sympathetic consideration on the part of the government for those who settled on the land under the settlement board. Every hon. member is fully aware of the great difficulties they encountered and of the many reasons why they found it so hard to get along at that time. Economic conditions were not to their advantage. Also in many instances veterans tried to settle on farms, without having had any experience whatsoever before. I would presume that unfortunately all those have fallen by the wayside before now. Those with whom we are now concerned are the ones who in some way or another have survived the economic chaos of the depression and even the weather which for seven years worked against them, particularly in the prairie provinces. They are the ones who must receive our attention and consideration this evening. That is why I wish to support the suggestion that a special study be made of their case at this time, that this matter be given consideration in the light of conditions as they exist to-day, and that their position should be made as secure as possible for the years to come, even if it means writing off certain sums of money.

The hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) presented his case well, and earns my commendation in that respect. He placed before the house a complete picture, and in his observations even anticipated the objections and answered most of them. I shall not weary the house by repeating what has been said thus far in the debate. I wish, however, that the hon. member for Battle River had worded his resolution somewhat differently, because I am afraid if it were accepted in its present form a wrong impression might leave this house, one which I feel sure would be to the detriment of the veterans.

When I first read the resolution as it appears on the order paper I felt that it conveyed a certain measure of defeatism, and that it may in some way, if misunderstood, harm to some extent the new Veterans' Land Act, which is now being put into operation. If hon. members will bear with me I shall read the first two paragraphs of the resolution as it stands:

Whereas veterans of great war I who settled on land under the soldier settlement scheme, as well as their wives and families, have in many instances suffered severe hardships because of purchase of land, live stock and equipment at inflationary prices, and low prices received for farm products brought about by lack of adequate policy for agriculture;

And whereas we are now embarking on another land scheme for veterans of the present war, under a government policy that does not guarantee cost of production, the success of which scheme may be jeopardized by the apparent failure of the former soldier settlement board scheme.

I know the hon. member did not want to convey the impression that the new Veterans' Land Act did not have a much better chance of succeeding than did the one which existed before. But I am afraid that that impression might be gained by people who would read or hear the resolution as it appears on the order paper. It would be unfortunate indeed if that impression were gained, because I have great confidence in the land settlement act as it stands to-day. I suggest that every hon. member should guard his words and deeds so as to build up a still greater confidence in the new act as it appears on the statute books.

I have many reasons for that contention. First of all, agriculture to-day enjoys the confidence of Canadian citizens as a whole, something which I believe it did not enjoy after the last war. To-day it is recognized by all as a major industry of national importance, and by this I mean that Canadian citizens as a whole realize well that Canada cannot continue on an economically sound basis without having agriculture on an equally sound basis. That fact was brought to the attention of Canadians to a greater extent during this war than it ever was in the past. I feel that to-day there is possibly more public sentiment in the whole of Canada in favour of agriculture than there has ever been before, and there is the general feeling that agriculture should receive the true and sincere support of the whole nation.

I would hope that no hon. member would at any time say or do anything which would tend to hurt or possibly to destroy the public confidence we enjoy at this time. Further, we should do everything we can to encourage progressive young men with farming experience who wish to engage in farming. Let them begin their work with the greatest of confidence.

The Veterans' Land Act as it stands to-day offers a great many new advantages which veterans of the last war did not enjoy. It is not my purpose this evening to review the operation of that act, because the debate is directed to the Soldier Settlement Act which operated following the last war. I would, however, point out a few facts which relate to the Veterans' Land Act, and I do so because of the bearing those facts may have on the resolution as it is now worded.

First of all, one of the chief reasons why many who settled under the earlier scheme failed to make a success of farming was that they did not have the necessary experience, and had not lived in the locality in which they settled. I remember the case of a veteran who settled next to my home. This man came from Ontario; he had never before lived in western Canada and had had no experience whatsoever in farming. The result was that he remained on the farm for only six or seven months and then abandoned the project as hopeless, despite the fact that the land on which he settled was good.

To-day there are still a large number of very good farms in the Red River valley, and it is our hope that the young men of that district will avail themselves of the opportunity to begin operations on those farms. There is no doubt, however, that after having watched the operation of the Soldier Settlement Act which was passed after the last war, many of those young men have not any great amount of confidence in the new act which is now in operation. I take this opportunity to try to point out to all these young men that they should avail themselves of the opportunity now offered to them. The Veterans' Land Act offers them a good, sound business. I believe the capital outlay will be smaller than that required by any other enterprise in which they might want to establish themselves.

As I pointed out before, they certainly have a reasonable chance of success on a farm to-day. There are many reasons why this is so. Unlike the veterans of the last war, they are not being asked to buy land at inflationary prices. Generally speaking, prices of farm land are very reasonable. I know of many pieces of land in the beautiful Red river valley from which I come. I know of several good farms that are available at the present time at most reasonable prices. But what is causing me concern is the fact that young people, even in that particular area, do not seem to be any too keen to settle down on farms at the present time.

These men will have a fairly definite assurance that prices of farm products will remain at a reasonable level and to a certain degree their income will be more or less secured. If they wish to raise large families the family allowances will increase their security. I could go on and enumerate many other advantages, but I think it will suffice to say that to-day agriculture is in a far better position than it ever was. It is in a better position to-day than it was in the past when considered from the security point of view.

I hope that all young veterans who have been brought up on farms or who have had any experience in farming will settle on the land. But this time they should be careful in selecting the land, because that is one of the most important factors if they are to make a success. They should try to settle on land in their own localities, on land that is similar to that upon which they have been brought up; in other words, on land that they know.

I am in full agreement that soldiers who settled under the Soldier Settlement Act should receive periodical consideration from the government. They settled on the land under most adverse conditions which were made worse at times by the weather. These conditions were aggravated still further by the economic collapse which occurred later on. They struggled through, and those who survived deserve a lot of credit and should be given immediate consideration. I feel sure that the minister concerned will try to give them his most sincere consideration and endeavour to see that they are placed in a secure position.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, the resolution before the house is a very important one. This matter has been discussed every year since 1930, when I first came into the house. On many occasions it has been brought up by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) and others. I have two reasons for rising to speak on this occasion. First, I had nine years municipal experience between 1922 and 1930, just when the soldiers were being settled on the land. Believing that with that experience I could add something to the debate, I thought I should do so to-night. Second, there are one or two things I should like to say about the present Veterans' Land Act as it affects the veterans of this war and there are one or two matters I should like to draw to the attention of the minister.

I should like to say to the mover of the resolution that I have always deprecated the fact that quite often a member will introduce a resolution or bring a matter before the house and not always place all the facts of the case before hon. members. On reading the resolution, I was reminded that there are certain districts in Alberta and elsewhere that have suffered in part from the effects of drouth. However, if one reads the resolution he will find that a great deal of the blame if not all—is placed at the door of the government. The government should not and cannot be held responsible for what takes place in drouth areas. I may be wrong, but it is my opinion that if the present boards were in charge of placing settlers it is problematical if many of these dried-out areas would be settled.

The resolution is divided into two or three parts. I do not intend to take the time to deal with all of them. First, may I say that like most hon. members who have spoken I have every sympathy for the resolution proposed, which reads:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration the advisability of giving clear titles to all soldier settlers who on March 31, 1944, held land under contract with the soldier settlement board.

Anyone who listened to the stories told this afternoon and this evening by the hon. member for Battle River and others could not help feeling sympathetic, but I began to wonder whether a voice would be raised on behalf of another class of settler that I have in mind and that I feel sure every hon. member has some knowledge of. I refer to those settlers who in the early years of the soldier settlement scheme worked and battled their way, those settlers whose wives and families in many instances were oftentime denied some of the necessities of life in order that after a time they might obtain titles to their land.

I am not going to raise any objection to titles being given to those who have not been able to obtain them, but I certainly am going to put in a plea for those settlers who in past years have suffered and worked hard in order to get title to their land. What is to be done? Will no one say a word on their behalf? I could mention case after case where the settler, his wife and family have stayed at home, where they have worked hard, where in many instances they have gone without some of the necessities of life, but who now stand with the titles to their farms in their hands. Is nothing further to be done for that splendid class of settler?

May I make it clear that I am not going to object to titles being given to those who have been unable to obtain them because of circumstances which intervened, but I am going to voice a plea for those who have fought hard to get their titles and who in my opinion are just as deserving. This afternoon many instances were given of failures of the last scheme. Every member of parliament could regale the House of Commons with speech after speech on that subject, but conditions to-day are not similar to those of 1921 and 1922. The officials of the veterans land board to-day, from what I know of them in British Columbia, through the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie), know all that took place in those earlier years, and from what I can see they are not repeating the mistakes of those years. They have the benefit of those mistakes to go on, and consequently to-day are preventing many of the same mistakes from occurring. I well remember that in 1921 and 1922 there was a move by the government of the day to get men settled on the land as quickly as possible. I know men of that day who were also just as determined to settle on the land as farmers, some of whom called themselves farmers, and if anyone dared to dispute it they had to be ready for trouble. I remember one settler in particular who after he was settled on a farm was looking forward to the time when he might have to increase his dairy herd and he actually bought a young steer. Although his herd did increase, may I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that it was not because he had bought that particular animal. I know another man who was very angry when asked: Did he know anything about farming? He said: "I was brought up on a farm. My father and grandfather before me were brought up on a farm." Although the board of that day had set a price of $4,000 on a farm this man put up $2,000 more of his own for the place, and he was on it for only a month when he asked his neighbour if he had to plant potatoes every year. But it is no good going back and rehashing the failures.

One thing I do not like in this debate is that the impression may go abroad that all the settlers were failures. Nothing of the kind. True, many mistakes were made by the government. There was a lot of land and stock bought at high prices, and some land was purchased which in my opinion should never have been bought. While there are certain faults in the present scheme, it is a great improvement over the 1922 scheme.

What is one of the complaints being made to-day of the new settlement board in my district? By the way, I have the honour to represent a district with more soldier settlers settled under the last scheme than most of the other districts in British Columbia. What criticism do I get now? I hear farmers, yes, and real estate men too, saying that the government is paying too little for the land bought. Is that not a fine recommendation of the Veterans' Land Act officials, that they are out protecting the men from being robbed by preventing them from paying the high prices of 1922? Let me give an illustration from my own district. I need not mention names, but I could if desired.

A father and son wanted to settle close to my own home two months ago. The father was a veteran of the last war and of this war, and his son had been in the air force in this war. The son wanted a place for which the man who was selling it was demanding $3,000. The Veterans' Land Act officials had looked over the property and said they would allow more than $2,000 for the place. After negotiating with the officials, the son came to see me and he was in a very high-strung frame of mind. The names he was calling the officials of the government for all the red tape, as he called it, were harsh. If he wanted to pay $3,000 for the farm, he should be able to do so, he said. I investigated the matter myself, and this is what I found. I found that it had been purchased a year previous for $1,200, and the present owner was wanting this soldier settler to pay $3,000 for it. The Veterans' Land Act officials, realizing that the owner had made some improvements to the property, were willing to pay $2,000 for the property, but nothing more.

I mention that one instance because the complaints which I have heard under the present scheme are not that land is being bought at too high a price or that the soldiers are being robbed. The complaint is being made by farmers in the district that the land is being bought too cheaply. They feel that such reasonable prices might depress the price of property they themselves might want to sell.

I should liked to have seen, and I proposed this in the house last year, that the soldier be given the land as a gift, or at least without any interest charges. I should like to see that matter discussed when the special committee is set up. I was very glad indeed to note that the Minister of Veterans Affairs has a motion on the order paper to set up a special committee where all these matters can be thoroughly discussed.

I have one or two criticisms, and it might be as well for me to make them now.

I think we had better be careful about where we place the small holder under the Veterans' Land Act. There is a tendency, I believe to settle the veterans on property which is a little too far out from the city and from transportation. In the constituency of New Westminster at the present time they are building in one corner of Richmond municipality seventy-five homes, ten or twelve of which are now ready for occupancy. These homes are each on one acre of land. I think the veterans' land board paid something like $850 an acre for the property. To my mind, one acre of land is far too much for a man to look after who intends to make his livelihood in industry. If he works eight hours a day in the shipyard or anywhere else he certainly cannot do much if any farming after his working hours. The odd one will be found who with the help of his wife and family may perhaps take on some extra work, but generally speaking, if a man is faithful to one master he will not be able to cultivate much on a small fruit ranch or on one acre of garden land. I would suggest to the minister that he review these plots of land, and I suggest that where they are close to the city half an acre of land would be sufficient. The minister has just intimated to me that that is being done, and I am glad to hear it, because I raised the same objection last year and I know whereof I speak as to what the soldier settler can do in the Fraser Valley and in other parts of British Columbia.

I cannot agree with those in the house and many outside who are endeavouring and have endeavoured to place the industrial worker on the same plane with the man who has fought our battles overseas. I am very sorry if I cannot see eye to eye with those who do; to me there is no comparison between the industrial worker and the man who offered his life and fought on the battlefront so that we here may have the life we have. And so I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and through you to the house, that our first charge must be to rehabilitate those who fought our battles. That at least is my thought and it is one of the thoughts I am leaving with the minister. While we shall probably not see what was witnessed in the last settlement under the Soldier Settlement Act, nevertheless we in British Columbia and particularly in the city of New Westminster have started something which, I believe, may be adopted by other cities. The city of New Westminster has the honour to have two men who won the Victoria Cross, and perhaps thinking of the days which followed the last war the citizens set on foot a scheme which, in my opinion is highly commendable. It is the first of its kind in Canada and has a great deal to merit its adoption by other cities. The citizens of New Westminster decided to grant annuities, at the age of fifty, to these two New Westminster boys who won the V.C., and in addition to that they have set up a fund for scholastic purposes to be known under the names of these two V.C. winners. The response was extremely generous and the two holders of the Victoria Cross, one, Major Mahoney, V.C., and the other, Private "Smoky" Smith, will at the age of fifty have an annuity of $100 a month for life, so that, never again, so far as these two are concerned, will there be any fear of their looking for charity or even of seeking jobs as janitors or as a run-about in the House of Commons such as we heard about the other evening. What has been done by the city of New Westminster I commend to other cities which have the honour of having V.C.'s.

I am glad, Mr. Speaker, that a special committee is to be set up to discuss this and other matters affecting our ex-servicemen. I am not sure whether all the provinces have a scheme similar to that of British Columbia, but that province has set aside one million acres in the interior as a free grant of land in which each soldier will share who wishes to settle there, with the result that all soldier settlers who take advantage of that offer in British Columbia will be able to start in without a debt hanging over their heads and with a cash balance of something like $2,300, being a free grant. This is equal to what they would obtain under the dominion Veterans' Land Act if they took up land elsewhere and stayed with the project for ten years, as called for under the regulations. There is no doubt that interest charges were a heavy burden on many if not all of the settlers who took up land under the old soldier settlement board scheme, and while there were many faults, nevertheless those faults have perhaps helped in large measure to lay the foundation for the present act. If the foundation has been laid fairly well it can be still further improved, and I hope the minister will take note of all the suggestions that have been made.

Mr. L. E. BAKER (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): I have been much interested in the remarks concerning veterans of the last war and have listened with interest to the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) and other hon. members who have spoken in this debate. What I am going to say I shall say without bias and it will be non-controversial from the political point of view, because matters concerning veterans are far too important to be put on any political or controversial basis.

I am a new member here and also a veteran of two days' standing, having received my discharge on Saturday. Therefore I do not know very much about veterans' affairs so far as men of the last war are concerned. I know quite a bit, however, about legislation passed with respect to men returning from this war, and I am particularly interested not only in what happens to our present veterans but also in what happens to the veterans of the last war. After all, we are all comrades in arms together, and I must speak without fear or favour, because in the final analysis, should I be called to the bar of that great body known as war veterans, I should have to acquit myself. Therefore I am careful of what I say now.

There is one thing of which I would remind the house. The other day, being a new member and being interested in these matters, I was pleased to hear certain remarks that were made, as reported in Hansard at page 467:

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): May I ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs if it is the intention of the government to set up a special committee on veterans affairs at this session of parliament, and if so, at what time we may expect the committee to be set up?

Hon. Ian A. Mackenzie (Minister of Veterans Affairs): The reply is in the affirmative. The intention is at once to set up such a committee, and I shall be asking the various parties and groups in this house for their selections of names for that committee, probably in a day or two.

I think that is the right way to tackle the matter. I may be wrong, but it seems to me that these things should be worked out properly from the start. If it was not worked out properly from the start the first time—and I am not saying either that it was or that it was not—then more time should have been spent in working out the details. There are about ninety-five new members apart from myself, the majority of whom, I venture to say, do not know very much about the Veterans' Land Act or the Soldier Settlement Act, and therefore it would be a good idea to allow this committee to get down to work and come to some sort of conclusion, because they will have all the details at hand and the committee will be comprised of members from different sections of the house, so that it will be able to arrive at a satisfactory solution. I think, however, that it would be a very dangerous thing to vote in favour of this resolution to-night. Frankly, I am a veteran and I would not support the resolution because I do not know enough about it and the matter is too important. If we pass wise legislation in matters pertaining to veterans I feel sure that we shall have public support. If we do anything hastily and make mistakes we shall not have public support, and I think too much of the veterans and their future to support anything with which I am not thoroughly conversant.

Mrs. GLADYS STRUM (Qu'Appelle): I did not intend to take part in this debate. There seem to have been a great many opinions expressed and a great deal of information and data brought before this house. There are a few things that I as a new member fail to understand when we come to deal with this problem. It is very difficult for a new member to come to this house and find that all hon. members agree that something is desirable and yet nobody wants to tackle it. I think the hardest thing that a new member has to put up with in this house is frustration.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The old members too!

Mrs. STRUM: I do not think we need to have any more royal commissions to deal with what happened to the veterans of the last war. We have the evidence in every community, and anyone who has lived here since the last war, as I have, does not need any royal commission to find out what happened. I submit, Mr. Speaker, the thing that happened to the veterans is the very same thing that happened to everybody else in this country; they were the victims of a set of circumstances with which our governments failed to deal. There are a few things in the brief submitted to the Rowell commission by the Hon. T. C. Davis, who was the attorney general of Saskatchewan in 1937, that have not yet been mentioned, and I am going to bring them to the attention of the house for a few moments.

We have recently dealt with the problem of a floor price for agricultural products. I wish to draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that in the eighteen years between 1920 and 1937 wheat reached $1 a bushel only six times. Only six times in eighteen years did those veterans get what we now say should be the floor price. I should like to draw the attention of the house to the fact that in those eighteen years cattle went as low as $18, $19, $20, $22 a head, and the highest price recorded was $59 a head. I wish to draw the attention of the house to the fact that those veterans who were selling eggs took, according to the report of the Saskatchewan government, as low as seven cents a dozen for the year's average, which meant that those eggs went as low as three cents a dozen when they hit the rock-bottom price in the summer months. I think, we must accept these figures; they are the figures submitted by a Liberal government to a royal commission, and I believe them. I lived through them, Mr. Speaker, and I know what they meant to the family income and to debt. These people have produced enormous quantities of wealth, huge surpluses and gluts, and the worst part of the whole picture was the price failure, not the crop failure. The result was huge burdens of unpaid interest that became principal and finally took the farms out from under the feet of those people who had saved us from the fate of the people of France and Belgium.

If I were a veteran coming into this country to-day and saw a parliament sitting here talking about what each speaker in all parts of the house has called simple justice; "simple justice" everybody says, and yet we sit here and do nothing. I have been warned that is what is called "talking it out." I have been warned that you can talk a measure out so that you do not have to deal with it, and then you do not have to account for your actions. I hope that is not what we are witnessing, although I have a horrible suspicion—if I were a veteran coming back to-day I would feel very jittery to think that the new government was that kind of a government, and that that sort of policy would affect my future in the next few years.

We hear references to family allowances, and that the family allowance is a means of farm security. I think the family allowance is a good thing; I never criticized it. The C.C.F. were the few people who talked about it in the last few years. I did not hear a popular demand in the country for family allowances aside from C.C.F. platforms, when we said that they had started them in New Zealand and that it would help the mother of a family—

Mr. CLAXTON: They were first suggested by the Liberals in this house.

Mrs. STRUM: Perhaps in this house, but I first heard about them, not in Canada but in New Zealand when I visited there in 1939. But there is one thing that many people overlook, namely, that your children grow up; they do not stay under sixteen. And what are you going to do with the bachelors who are farming? What are you going to do with the married couples who have no children? The family allowance is not farm security. The family allowance will not buy underwear for the children, let alone take the place of a crop or decent prices. Therefore I hope that this house will not fail to deal with this thing which is just simple justice.

I am amazed at people talking about the weakness of sentiment. I want to ask the house, did we refuse to use sentiment in 1914, 1915 and 1916? Did we appeal to those boys on the basis of good business? Did we ask them to enlist because there was money in it, or did we appeal to them on the sentiments that were worthy of the occasion? The only reason why I am in this house is that I care what happens to people. I am not interested in the dollars and cents angle of this business. I would not be here if I did not care about people, and the sentiments that move me are the sentiments that have to do with how people live and work, and how governments discharge their obligations. Therefore I move, Mr. Speaker, that the question be now put.

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre): I thought for a moment—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. MAYBANK: I was in some doubt as to whether I was in order when I rose. I did not understand that there had been any motion put before the house and seconded, and that the question which the lady member moved was not properly before the house. Have I the floor?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: There is just one motion before the house.

Mr. MAYBANK: I did not think the hon. member who has just finished made a motion which was seconded, and I did not think there was anything to prevent me from endeavouring to follow in her footsteps, which would be a difficult endeavour. The first thought that arose in my mind—I hope the hon. member will not take offence when I say this—was that there was a possible uncertainty of not obtaining the last word, and that she was endeavouring to effect some insurance that would give her the last word. I have not any objection to a lady having the last word; I think it is only right that she should.

Mr. FRASER: It would not help you anyhow.

Mr. MAYBANK: It would not help, anyway.

Mrs. STRUM: How about a little cooperation?

Mr. MAYBANK: It would not make any difference—

Mr. WRIGHT: Why endeavour to talk it out?

Mr. MAYBANK: I would be quite agreeable indeed to granting her another whack at it if there were any real desire on her part to have the last word.

Mr. Speaker, there are some features about this debate that are reminiscent of old-time revival meetings. I do not think there has ever been a question before the house on which there have been so many affirmative opinions given. It reminds me of a revival meeting in that one speaker after another rises to give testimony. So far as the effectiveness of the resolution is concerned I do not think it makes any difference whether it is or is not talked out, particularly after the display that has been given this afternoon and this evening.

I should like to join with others who have spoken in supporting this resolution, although as I read it there may be some detail in it, some point or another, with which I might disagree. When it comes to the resolution itself, however, I submit that it is in no way objectionable either under the rules and customs of this house or under the method adopted by the government in dealing with these matters. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) is not in his place at the moment; probably he is engaged in the very serious business of preparing the budget. But even if he were here I hardly think he could say there was in this proposal anything in the nature of an attempt to raid the treasury. I would point out that the resolution does not ask that certain moneys be spent; it uses the much more diplomatic method of recommending to the government that they take into consideration the advisability of, in effect, giving clear title to this land, and for that reason I think the government might very well look upon the resolution in a kindly way.

There is no doubt in the mind of any person, I believe, that returned men after the last war were mulcted of untold sums of money by the operation of the Soldier Settlement Act of that time. I have worked with men who for many years were on farms obtained under that scheme, men who struggled until they could struggle no longer in an endeavour to make the payments, and who finally had to give up. I distinctly remember one man who had been on the land for ten or twelve years, paying money year after year on a contract which never, under any circumstances, could he hope to complete. That, of course, was only one case; I know of many others. In the interval between that time and the present many may have obtained title to their land, but many others have given up and lost out after having put a great deal into it. We now have this small number remaining who are in the position described by the mover of this resolution, and it would seem to me to be a matter the government should take into very serious consideration, as to whether they should not give some final relief to these people who have laboured under this disability for so long.

I have not spoken for very long, so that I cannot be accused of endeavouring to talk out this proposition. On the contrary I have probably taken less time than many who have spoken from the opposite side of the house. I do not know that there is anything more that can be usefully said by me at the moment. I suggested in the beginning that this was a matter of simply giving testimony, and I wish to place myself on record as being in favour of doing everything possible that can be done under the circumstances of this case.

Mr. F. W. TOWNLEY-SMITH (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to express myself as being wholeheartedly in favour of this resolution. I suppose nearly everything that can be said about it has been said, but I wish to add just a few words. I happen to have lived among some of these men who took farms after coming back from the first great war; as a matter of fact, four of them were on quarter-sections immediately adjoining my own farm. I watched their efforts; I saw their struggles and understood their difficulties, because they were also mine. They faced the hazards of farming: weather, frost and hail, drought, insect pests, plant diseases; all these encompassed these unfortunate people in exactly the same way as they did the rest of us, but they were quite unable to stand up under the strain. I watched their efforts, their progressive difficulties and their progressive failures. I saw their wives die under the strain. I saw their children attending school ill clad and poorly fed. I watched one generation fail to secure a fair education because of the poverty and difficulties under which their parents were labouring. All this I saw from my own doorstep. These people never had a chance. It is quite true that the fault did not lie entirely with the government. The hazards I have mentioned can never be blamed on any government, but they were there just the same. Probably one reason for the failure of these men lay in the fact that in some districts a quarter-section of land is not an economic farm; the overhead is too high for that acreage.

As I said, four of these men settled around my farm; none of them is there now. They have all gone and others are on those quarter-sections. That was twenty-six years ago, and it does seem to me that if, after struggling with the problem for twenty-six years, these men have been unable to straighten it out, the very least we could do would be to straighten it out for them and give them this land. They are no longer young. When they came there they were ambitious and cheerful; many of them were strong. Now their ages are from fifty to sixty years; and if in the last twenty-six years they have not been able to make a go of it, they will never be able to get straightened out now. Some hon. members have spoken about agriculture being in pretty good shape just now. If they would read their newspapers they would see that western agriculture, particularly in Saskatchewan, is having its own difficulties this year. They would read about two and four bushel crops, and some districts where there are no crops at all. Some areas have been fortunate and are having good crops, but taking the province as a whole conditions are not good.

There is one particular instance I should like to mention. A quarter-section of land was sold to a veteran at the going rate of $25 an acre. After some twenty years the veteran was compelled to leave that land, broken and bankrupt. The same quarter-section was immediately sold to another man by the soldier settlement board for $10 an acre. At $10 in the first place the veteran could have paid for it; at $25 he was unable to do so.

Some hon. members have been distressed over the wording of the preamble. May I suggest to them that they are not voting on the preamble but on the resolution, which reads:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration the advisability of giving clear titles to all soldier settlers who on March 31, 1944, held land under contract with the soldier settlement board.

Hon. members, let us do this thing. Let us give these men one real good break.

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak for forty minutes in connection with this motion.

I am entirely in accord with the principle, and would be glad to support it in every way.

Mr. GLEASON BELZILE (Rimouski) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise for the purpose of speaking on this motion, because I believe that what has been said so far did not touch the matter of principle which underlies the resolution. Without any doubt, our full sympathy goes to all those veterans who, after the first great war, took up land under the Veterans' Settlement Act. Those men, on their return from the war, certainly deserved whatever opportunities the government afforded them, but as I said a few moments ago, we are now dealing more particularly with a matter of principle and I think I am in a most favourable position to discuss it, since there are very few instances of such land settlement in the constituency I have the honour of representing.

The matter of principle which underlies the present discussion seems to be the following: in taking up land the veteran entered with the government into a contract which was perfectly free and quite voluntary. That contract was not forced upon him, it was signed under no pressure; everything was done on a purely voluntary basis. On the one hand, the government offered the veterans definite and distinct advantages, and on the other hand the veterans assumed some obligations, and agreed to terms and conditions clearly laid down in their contracts. Therefore, there is at stake a principle, which is linked up with the sanctity of contracts.

I do not believe we could interfere and ask that contracts that have been entered into in all freedom, and freely accepted by both parties be set aside merely on a resolution asking the government to take into consideration the advisability of giving clear titles to all soldier settlers for their land.

Mr. Speaker, this resolution appears to me as being prompted more by political considerations than by common sense. Indeed, it is only necessary to examine its wording to notice that it represents the present situation as being due to the "lack of adequate policy for agriculture". Of course I am not in a position to go over the whole farming policy of this government or of the liberal administrations which have preceded it, and I do not think this is the proper time to do so, but the least that can be said about the resolution is that it is an evidence of defeatism on the part of the hon. member who has moved it.

The motion before the house, rests on a question of simple justice: either the veteran has met his obligations, in which instance there are no complaints because every one is satisfied; or, he has failed to meet them for various reasons, such as bad weather, unfavourable international marketing conditions, competition and so on, but not necessarily from lack of an effective agricultural policy on the part of this country's government.

In that case, if the government grant a clear title to the veteran whose payments are in arrear, it will appear to me as a clear case of injustice to those who, under similar circumstances, have met their obligations. Then we might be confronted with the somewhat queer procedure of another motion asking the reimbursement of sums paid in by those who have not defaulted. No argument could prevent the moving of a resolution to that effect on the very same grounds. The parties concerned would have the same arguments of sympathy and sentiment; they could base their claims on their status as veterans and the hard times they have experienced. And then, for the second time, we would have to sanction an injustice flowing from the adoption of the motion before the house at this moment.

One thing is certain, the veterans of the first great war and those of the war just ended, do not ask for pity; all they want is fair treatment, nothing more.

Let us suppose for a moment that the present motion be carried. All the borrowers under the federal farm loan scheme, for example, who have defaulted in their payments, could come before the house, and, through another motion, request that their debts be cancelled, for reasons of sympathy, on account of hard times and especially because of the conditions engendered by the failure of the government to implement an efficient farm policy.

In the event the present motion is carried, we shall have established a precedent. Thus, there would be no valid reason to reject a similar resolution. From there on, whatever anyone would be in debt with the government, he could simply have to play on the sympathy and sentiments of the members of the house who would then be bound to grant his request.

Mr. Speaker, I believe sentimentality should be excluded from our discussions; we should take into account not the interest of a particular class of our citizens, but only the general welfare of the whole population. Everyone who would find it impossible to meet his obligations and would be faced with bankruptcy would have the right to apply to parliament for exceptional treatment and thus the House of Commons would become a dispenser of compassionate grants.

I respectfully suggest that the passage of such a resolution would inevitably lead us to state paternalism. Further, it would tend to give the veterans of this war, who are entitled to the advantages provided by the new settlement act, the wrong and false impression that if they fail to meet their obligations all they will have to do will be to come before Parliament in ten or fifteen years hence and request a remission or reduction of their debts. From a business standpoint, it would be creating a bad precedent; and I do not think that we should be moved by sentiment and become soft-hearted. Let us glance into the past and we shall find that the pioneers who came from France and who settled on the old lands of Quebec, on the island of Orleans and in the district of Rivière Ouelle and who, with their bare hands have built a whole country, did not receive any land clearing bonuses, or Government grants or remission of their debts from a paternalistic state; however, they built a whole country with the sweat of their brow, their labour and their devotion to duty.

Mr. Speaker, I feel we should recall the past and consider those facts. Accordingly, on a matter of principle, and disregarding any appeal to sentimentality, I place myself on record as being opposed to this resolution.

Mr. R. R. KNIGHT (Saskatoon City): Mr. Speaker, may I express my sympathy for my colleague, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mrs. Strum), and what she has expressed in her brilliant little speech. I have no particular skill to stand upon my feet for forty minutes and say nothing, or to say those things which have already been said, nor do I intend to acquire such skill through practice. I think everything that can be said upon the motion has already been said. It would appear that hon. members from all sections of this house believe that the veterans of 1914-18 who now remain on the land should be given clear title to the land. We are all agreed; so let this government give it to them. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare (Mr. Baker) has said that as a new member he does not yet understand about such things as the veterans' acts and so on of the last war. I was reminded of Miles Standish whose friend spoke on his behalf and who was told, "Why don't you speak for yourself, John." The hon. member also advised against haste, but I would suggest that eight years of debate on this question should be sufficient, and there are still sixty minutes of this evening left.

Mr. D. K. HAZEN (St. John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the wording of the preamble to this resolution for reasons that I do not think it necessary to state this evening, but with the resolution itself I am in wholehearted agreement. It asks the government to take into consideration the advisability of giving clear titles to all soldier settlers who on March 31, 1944, held land under contract with the soldier settlement board.

Surely no hon. member can object to the government doing that. Surely no hon. member can object to the government reconsidering the whole matter and reviewing the whole subject. Not only do I think the government should reconsider and review the whole matter, but after they do that I hope they will see their way clear to give clear titles to these veterans as the resolution suggests.

I believe that a man should live up to his agreement and meet his obligations, but there are cases when it is quite impossible to do this. I am convinced that the situation in which these veterans find themselves is one of these cases.

I met a delegation of veterans that came to Ottawa in June of last year to present a brief asking that these men be given clear titles. I was more impressed by the men composing that delegation than by their brief. One had only to meet them and talk to them to be impressed by the justice of their claim. One had only to look at them to realize that for years past they had faced a tremendously difficult task, that they had struggled with courage against great odds and had done the best they could under the most adverse circumstances. It was clear that the cards had been stacked against them and that fate had been unkind.

After talking to these men I realized that we could not afford to allow them to leave the land as they were doing. I realized we would be making a great mistake if we let men of their character and their racial origin and their families leave the land and perhaps have it taken over by other persons who might not and probably would not be so willing to come to the defence of their king and country in time of war.

I think the agreements that were entered into could well be changed in favour of the veterans on the ground of mutual mistake. The mistake on the part of the board was that they overvalued the farms in the first instance and sold them to veterans at too high a price. The mistake on the part of the veterans was that they thought the farms would produce a great deal more revenue than they did. The mistake was owing to the fact that the farms had been purchased by the board and sold to the veterans in boom times and in a period of inflation.

This matter does not affect veterans who live in the prairie provinces only, because, as the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) pointed out this afternoon, there are veterans in the maritime provinces who have faced similar difficulties. I could cite instances, although I do not propose to do so this evening. I would urge the government not only to reconsider and review the whole matter but to give these veterans clear title to their lands.

Mr. FERNAND VIAU (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in the discussion on the resolution now before the house as a soldier and not as a veteran, although the title of veteran has been attributed to me by the press ever since I have become a member of the House of Commons. I feel, however, that a veteran is one who has returned from a theatre of war or has experienced action on the battlefield. Although I enlisted as a volunteer, I have never had the privilege, through no fault of my own, to go across the sea and fight with my comrades against the enemy which was trying to deny not only to Canada but to the entire world that peace and freedom which have always been dear to those who live under democratic government. Neverthelss, as a soldier, I feel that I should express my opinion on the resolution now before us.

The resolution asks the government to wipe out a legal debt owing to this country, and as such, it presents a very serious problem which should be given careful consideration, by all hon. members, no matter on which side of the house they sit.

I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) upon his sincerity and tenacity in bringing this resolution before the house. I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) ask that immediate consideration be given to the request as submitted by the hon. member for Battle River. As he did establish himself under the Soldier Settlement Act which was passed by the government in power after the great war of 1914-18, and being thrifty, hard-working and an honest and conscientious farmer was able to pay back his debt to the government, that does not mean necessarily that all the debts still owed to the government for the same privileges that he himself enjoyed after the war of 1914-18 should be wiped off.

I also wish to congratulate the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), whose political career in the House of Commons I have followed closely when an outsider, and for whom I have always had a great admiration for the attitude he has taken in this house in discussing this problem which concern the welfare of Canada's veterans.

It must be remembered that when the government in power after the last war introduced the Soldier Settlement Act, they did so without any experience whatsoever in that field. That was really the first time that Canada had sent troops overseas to join with our allies in defeating the Germans. The government when they passed that act were very sincere and thought they had passed an act from which every veteran of the war of 1914-18 who came under it would benefit, and that no request would be made to have the act amended as has been frequently done from 1922 up until this day.

It must also be remembered that during the period 1918-19 the wheat acreage in this country—I am speaking of western Canada—expanded, but in the southern area of the western provinces there was a large drought area where the board did not allow settlement by veterans who applied to get the full privileges granted by the Soldier Settlement Act. After the war of 1914-18 we had inflation for about a year and a half in Canada, and then the drought areas in western Canada came back. After the great war we still had a very large wheat surplus, but on account of the war ending so abruptly in 1918 there existed no purchasing power in Europe and we were unable to dispose of our agricultural products. That condition was accentuated by the fact that practically all existing governments, thinking they were placing their own economy on a sound basis, increased tariffs as high as Canada did under the regime of the Bennett government from 1930 to 1935. Therefore we were not able to sell our products to the other countries of the world.

In 1922, after many requests for amendments had been received from veterans of the war of 1914-18 who had settled under the Soldier Settlement Act, the government brought in an amendment which resulted in the interest on the debt owed by the veterans being waived for periods of from two to four years, depending upon the settler's date of establishment. Then in 1925 another amendment was made to the Soldier Settlement Act granting a reduction to the soldier settlers of forty per cent of the cost of the live stock purchased prior to October 1, 1920, and a reduction of twenty per cent of the cost of live stock purchased after October 1, 1920, and prior to October 1, 1921.

At a still later date, in 1927—in the meantime there had been a rise in the cost of living and in the cost of all commodities needed by every Canadian—a further amendment was made granting a reduction of the amount by which the price of the purchased farm exceeded 1927 values. That also was of great benefit to the soldier settlers. That was followed in 1930 by a reduction of thirty per cent of all the debts owed to the soldier settlement board.

Hon. members will notice that even though the Conservative government which was then in power was followed by the Liberals, and the Conservative government came back in 1930, an unbiased attitude was taken by all governments in power concerning the debts owed the country by the veterans who settled under the act. From 1930 to 1935 when the Conservative party was in power a remission was granted of one year's interest on all charges and also a dollar for dollar bonus respecting payment of all obligations then owing to the board; that is, for all debts falling due before April 1, 1936, which date was later extended, on further representations, to March 31, 1941.

During the Bennett regime was introduced the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act which granted benefits not only to farmers but also to veterans who had settled under the Soldier Settlement Act, which legislation was brought into force by the Conservative party. I worked under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act and I know of the benefits received by the farmers of western Canada under that act. While I do not want to mention any case, I know of applications filed in the office, where I was assistant official receiver under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, of the benefits gained, when the case was brought before the board of review. The grants given to the veterans were really of great advantage to them. They consolidated the debt owing at the time at which the application was discussed before the board of review, and extensions for payment were granted up to ten, fifteen and twenty years at very low interest rates. But in 1942 there were still a great number of cases that remained unpaid through no fault of the veteran. Some soldiers had already reenlisted in the armed forces of the great war of 1939-1945, and there were others who, owing to sickness and also by reason of wounds received in the war of 1914-1918, or family troubles, or from other social causes, still had to apply to the government to receive certain relief in respect of debts owing under the act. That is why in 1942 the government authorized the treasury board, on the recommendation of the director, to reduce the indebtedness of the settler to the present and prospective value of the land. They were given time to file application until December 31, 1943, and even then, as I have stated, a great number of these settlers had reenlisted in this conflict and as such were unable to file application. But they were still granted the same rights, and recently I was informed that the government had given power to grant an extension; where no applications had been made, owing to no fault of the men; owing to service in this war or sickness, they were given the same privilege as granted those who applied in 1942.

I feel that the amount involved is not very high, but the fact remains that it is still a debt owing just like a debt owing to-day by a farmer who might apply for a mortgage to any company who might advance money to farmers to purchase land, stock, machinery or cattle. I feel that the resolution as worded should never have been brought before the house but that the government must give the matter consideration; and as I have stated, certain action has already been taken in that respect in granting extension to farmers to pay their debts owing to the country in respect of the benefit they received on settling on lands in Canada for their services in the war of 1914-1918. As such the veterans coming back from this war will then feel able to file application and receive the same benefits granted under the Veterans' Land Act which was passed in 1942 as granted to the veterans settled under the Soldier Settlement Act in connection with the war of 1914-1918.

Mr. J. W. MacNAUGHT (Prince): I wish to express one or two sentiments on the resolution introduced so ably by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair). I believe it was the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) who said he represented an island in the Pacific. Well, I come from an island in the east, Prince Edward Island, and I think it might interest the house for me to tell of some of the experiences of veterans who took up land under the Soldier Settlement Act after the last war. I well recall many instances where these men were put on lands valued at three or four times their price. It was impossible for them to make good and they naturally failed.

I do not wish hon. members to misunderstand me. I agree heartily with most of the sentiments expressed this afternoon and evening, but I think the resolution as at present worded is most inadequate. In the first place, a measure of relief such as this should be uniform in its benefits, and the thing that strikes me about this resolution is the great disparity of benefits that will accrue from it. There will be no case where the equity in the land will be the same and therefore each individual will derive a different benefit under the resolution.

In the second place, some of the previous speakers have referred to the annoyances that may be expressed by those veterans who have already got title. Well, what about the poor lad who held on for quite a long while and then gave up? For that reason I submit that the resolution is totally inadequate because the benefits are not equal and fair.

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs): One of the impressions that have been created by some speakers who have taken part in the debate this afternoon and to-night is that previous parliaments have consisted of men who had no interest in the returned soldier and were quite callous to what was happening to him. In fact, one hon. member has given expression to this thought: "I am interested in people and that is why I am here in this house." I have the honour and privilege of speaking now in the third parliament in which I have been a member, and I think I can say to that hon. member that in those other parliaments there were members elected to speak here who were also interested in people and interested in trying to do what was right by the people they represented and particularly by those who fought for our country in the first world war.

I am very glad that an attempt has been made to indicate something of what has been done for the returned soldier since world war I. It has been a popular pastime of some people to pretend that nothing whatever was done for the returned soldier. It has been said so often that I am sure some people have been led to believe that, no matter how carefully parliament has endeavoured to provide for the rehabilitation and reestablishment of the returned soldier of this war, they will also find that they have not been properly looked after. That is a natural assumption to make from the talk that has gone on among so many people in the last ten or fifteen years. However, I do not think the boys who went overseas in the last war are convinced that all the parliaments between the two wars were callous about their condition and did not do the best they could, and that suddenly a new race of men, with one woman added, has come into being here and will make all the difference in this parliament. If the idea is created that parliament is helpless and unwilling to do justice to those who have fought for the country, then a service is not done to parliament in any way, shape or form, and confidence is not created in the ability of this parliament and the willingness of parliament and the government representing it to do justly by those whom we are going to reestablish during the next four or five years.

As has been pointed out in this debate, there is no doubt that the people who set up the Soldier Settlement Act after the last war thought they were setting up an act that would work. They ran into the conditions which are described in the resolution and with which most of us will agree. The preamble to the resolution reads:

. . . have in many instances suffered severe hardships because of purchase of land, live stock and equipment at inflationary prices, and low prices received for farm products. . . .

With that statement I think most hon. members will agree, and as a result the various changes were made which have been enumerated by the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Viau). That is the first point which I would wish to make. All those parliaments were honestly endeavouring to deal with the situation as they found it. One of the things that moved those parliaments was that as between the returned soldiers who took up land under this act there should be an attempt to make adjustments which would benefit as much as possible all, that no adjustment would be justified if it discriminated between one group and another. I am satisfied that the only way we can justify in the eyes of the country any expenditure which we make is if it appears to deal justly with the people who have been endeavouring to pay for their land during the last four or five years. That is one of the things which I am sure will strike home to hon. members, namely, the fact that the man who during the last four or five years has struggled hard to pay for his land and has got clear title will say, if his neighbour next door, who perhaps has thought that ultimately the debt would be cancelled and has paid little or nothing, gets clear title, that he has not been dealt with justly. We then will have that claim made.

Be that as it may, I should like to lay before hon. members the effect of the various improvements which have been made in the situation from time to time and which have been enumerated by the hon. member for St. Boniface. Starting with the year 1922 and going on to the year 1944, these improvements have amounted roughly to $45 million, which were written off the debt of the soldier settlers of this country. The original indebtedness for the capital advanced was roughly $109 million. Therefore almost the equivalent of fifty per cent of the original capital advanced has been written off. I give this figure to do justice to previous parliaments; they were not callous about these things, and they did work for the returned soldier to the best of their ability.

With regard to the present situation, I would draw to the attention of the hon. members the fact that we have on the order paper a resolution which provides:

That a select committee be appointed,

1. To consider all legislation passed since the commencement of the war with the German reich relating to the pensions, treatment, and reestablishment of former members of His Majesty's armed forces and of other persons who have otherwise engaged in pursuits closely related to war.

I take it that this will provide for the setting up of a committee on returned soldiers' affairs, which will be very much like the committees which have sat in the last two parliaments and on which I have had the great honour and privilege of serving. These committees were made up largely of returned soldiers. They were noted not only by the members of all parties on the committees themselves, but by those who watched their operations, as committees which were perhaps the most non-partisan of any which sat on any problem during that period of nine years. I would say this to the new members who come into this house and who are inclined to lecture those who sat here in previous parliaments, that we sat many, many hours and gave very anxious consideration to the representations which were made by the authorized representatives of the returned soldiers throughout the country. Many changes were recommended to the committee, changes which were consistent with the recommendations of those recognized returned soldiers' organizations. These changes were recommended by the committees and accepted by the government. The government has now provided for the setting up of another committee. I believe there are now eighty-four men in the house who have given services to the country in the armed service in the first world war and in this war. Unless we have a committee that is much larger than usual we shall not be able to put all the ex-servicemen on that committee. I am very proud that the government is ready to trust the legislation in regard to ex-service men in large measure to the hands of at least one-third of the membership of this house who have actually served their country in the armed forces.

I am satisfied, Mr. Speaker, that that committee will have a chance to study this whole question; it will have a chance to hear the representatives of the various returned soldiers' organizations in the country, and what they have to say about it. It will have a chance to go into the way the acts have been administered; it will have a chance to examine into whether the officials of the soldier settlement board have discharged their duties with a reasonable amount of consideration for the humanities of the situation. There will be on that committee returned soldiers from all parties and, if it is anything like previous committees, there will be the freest discussion on all those problems. Therefore I would say to the hon. member who moved this resolution that to have it properly considered I think it will be admitted that the place where that can be done will be before that committee where we can get the actual facts, get witnesses in front of the committee and hear what actually has been done.

I would ask the house to consider all the legislation that has been passed in regard to those who served with His Majesty's forces. In that legislation there is order in council P.C. 10472. In that order in council it was provided that any returned soldier could apply to the director of the soldier settlement board for a reduction of his debt. Then the appraisers of the board made a careful examination of the situation. They valued the land and made a report not only on the land but on the chance of the returned soldier paying the debt within a reasonable time; on his health, and on his record during the previous number of years. On the basis of this report the director was able to recommend a reduction which would give that returned soldier a chance to clear himself of debt within a reasonable time, based not only upon the value of the land but upon personal considerations as well. Then the treasury board was given power, on the basis of the recommendation, to write down the debt accordingly.

I understand that that order in council has been given a very liberal application, but the facts in that connection can be ascertained when this committee meets. If it is proved that the policy of the government in this matter has not been carried out liberally it will be the business of this committee to find out the facts and recommend accordingly. In any event, under that order in council an amount of $988,205.54 was written off the debts of the soldier settlers. Under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act a total of $6,808,536 was written off. As I understand the law, any soldier settlement farmer in the prairie provinces who has not applied for and obtained an adjustment of his debts can apply under that act for an adjustment; and anyone who has observed the workings of the boards set up in western Canada under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act will know that they have been very considerate and very liberal in their write-downs of debt.

So that the soldier had the chance to apply to the director of the soldier settlement board or under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act for a write-down of his debt. He also has the right to make a second application under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act if he obtained an adjustment before December 31, 1938. Some people did not apply under either provisions. As I understand the law, they can still apply under the Farmers' Creditors Act, and have the matter of adjusting their debts brought under the machinery of that legislation. I have had a certain amount of experience of the basis on which the officials acting under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act write down debts in regard to soldier settlers. It is not done entirely on the basis of the value of the land. They take into consideration the record of the settler, his proved ability to discharge his obligations and so on, and they have written the debt down to a level where he could hope to be entirely free of debt within a reasonably short time.

Those provisions have been made, but in order to give another chance to those who have not made any application at all to have their debt written down, this government passed an order in council on the 28th of last month. I need not read the entire order in council, but it provided that those who had not applied through no fault of their own could still apply to the director of the soldier settlement board to have consideration given to the writing down of their debt, and gave the treasury board power to write it down.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does the hon. gentleman mean the order in council was passed on September 28?

Mr. TUCKER: Yes, three days ago. The effective part of the order in council reads:

> The undersigned accordingly recommends that the period within which such settlers may make effective application for debt reduction under the aforesaid order in council—

That is P.C. 10472.

> —be amended to March 31, 1946; and that decision as to whether the failure of any settler to make application on or before December 31, 1943—

That was the former cut-off date.

> —was or was not due to reasons beyond the control of any such settler shall be at the discretion of the director of soldier settlement.

With the consent of the house, and in the name of the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie), since I have not read the whole of the order in council I should like to table it.

Bearing in mind all that has been said and what I have just mentioned to the house as to what has been done and what has been provided for, I suggest that a proper approach to this problem would be to say, we will have a committee made up, I expect, almost entirely of ex-servicemen, who will have a chance to go into the administration of these various orders in council and the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. They will be able to look into these cases which are alleged not to have been properly dealt with under the existing machinery. Anyone who has had experience with the trial of cases knows that no judge will act in a serious matter on ex parte evidence, without hearing all sides That is a fundamental principle of British justice, that all sides of a case shall be heard. When I hear hon. members say, "We do not know what has been done; we do not know the actual facts, but we know someone claims to have been mistreated and therefore we are going to make a sweeping decision", then I suggest that at any rate it would do no harm to wait until a committee of this house composed of returned soldiers has had a chance to hear whether or not the returned soldier organizations of this country are in favour of this proposal. It can do no harm to give that committee a chance to look into these cases and see whether the paid servants of the government are not properly carrying out their duties, whether they are actually abusing those who defended this country in the first great war.

These are matters in which I believe we, as members of parliament, should be interested. We should ask to hear both sides before we undertake to act. It has been suggested that this soldier settlement scheme has been an entire and utter failure. Well, I am free to admit that owing to lack of former experience and owing to a desire to put the act into operation too quickly, mistakes were made. It was attempted to settle some 19,000 of these soldiers on the land in a matter of about eighteen months. Now, of course, we have learned by the mistakes made after the last war. From what I have seen of the boys coming back from overseas, they are not going to rush into things quite as quickly as was the case with those coming back after the first great war. I have talked to several returned men recently, and their attitude is that land values may be a little higher now than they will be two or three years from now, that perhaps equipment costs a little more now than it will cost in another year or two. As I understand it, this act will be so administered as to encourage the boys coming back from overseas to take their time before plunging into this proposition; to look around for a piece of land where they feel sure they can make a success, and not go into it until the time comes when they can get their land and equipment at reasonable prices. There will be no attempt to try to get all these gentlemen settled within a period of a year and a half. In other words, there will be an attempt to put everybody into a position where, if he is settled under the Veterans' Land Act, he will have a real chance of success—almost a 100 per cent chance of success.

There is a tendency to suggest that the various measures which this government has put into force, and which, I would draw to the attention of those people who jeer at those measures, have been approved by the people of Canada in the last general election, are not sufficient. I see the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mrs. Strum) laughing at that. I will ask her this question: Did she get half the people of Canada to endorse her attitude toward this legislation?

An hon. MEMBER: Did you?

Mr. MACKENZIE: More than you did.

Mr. TUCKER: I got the endorsation of those who elected me; and I got it on the basis of carefully laying before my people the government's programme, and asking for their endorsation of it. It will be time enough to suggest that the people of Canada did not know what they were doing and to laugh at their decision when we see whether or not those solutions actually work. So far as I am concerned, I am satisfied that they will work. Those who sneer at them and treat them as something only worthy of contempt are taking the attitude, indirectly, that the people of this country do not know what they are doing at the time of an election.

Well, that may be the attitude of my hon. friends in the C.C.F. I have heard the expression by hon. members of that party to the effect that, in this complicated system of government, the people cannot be trusted to decide their own affairs, that they must have boards of experts to tell them what to do, and that if they make decisions they will probably be foolish decisions. That sentiment was actually echoed on the floor of this chamber, when action this government has taken—action which was approved by the people at a general election—was sneered at as being unworthy of consideration and insufficient to meet the need.

As to the question of whether the old Soldier Settlement Act was a complete failure, let me say that I hold no brief for the board which operated under that act. But I do say that we should know the facts. Up to March 31, 1945, there were 5,028 accounts actually paid up under that act. During the past six years 2,436 were paid up, a good portion of those having had adjustments under the various adjustment schemes which were provided in order that they might be paid up.

I would ask hon. members to bear in mind the attitude of one of those people, one among that group of 2,436, who, having managed to pay up his obligation, would turn around to find that this parliament, without any consideration for him, has given clear title to the 4,961 who have not done so.

If the resolution is asking that we do something for that group of returned soldiers who owed money at the outbreak of the present war and still owe money on their contracts, then it certainly should go so far as to ask for something for those who have worked hard, who have taken advantage of the various schemes to write down their debts, and who have cleared their lands and got their titles.

If we are going to do something like this, then let us do it on a fair basis for all. Whatever can be done should be fair to all. I submit that the committee to which I have referred can look into this matter and find out what can and should be done.

I hold in my hand another set of figures which I find most interesting and encouraging. These figures show that the contract instalments due by soldier settlers during the period between 1939-40 and 1944-45 were actually $5,873,242. The payments made during that time were $5,339,054. As hon. members can see, during that time those returned soldiers—men whom some hon. members have held up as being broken down, helpless and hopeless people—have paid off ninety per cent of their obligation during the last six years.

In addition to that, these same returned soldiers who are alleged to be broken down, helpless, hopeless and unable to meet their obligations, have prepaid $2,135,635 in the last five years. These are figures which must be given in fairness to our comrades who were settled on the land and who have made such a wonderful record, by meeting over ninety per cent of their obligations and prepaying almost another fifty per cent thereof in the past five years. I believe it is only fair to show on the floor of this chamber the splendid record of the men who fought in the last war who, to a certain extent, I feel have been put in a poor light by some hon. members this afternoon.

The suggestion is made in the resolution that the new soldier settlement scheme will be a failure. Well, if it is going to be a failure, it is not a good commentary on the foresight and on the ability to plan, not only of the government but of representatives of returned soldiers' organizations throughout the country and members of the House of Commons who sat on the committee which helped to plan the act and made the recommendations which were made effective by the government. Is it to be said or thought that all the conscience, all the good will, all the care and all the prescience sit with one little group in this chamber? That is the assumption which has been preached with a certain amount of success in Saskatchewan, but which has not been accompanied with much success in the rest of Canada.

My feeling is this, that it was preached with success in Saskatchewan because in that province we had had many years of crop failures and difficulties. As I pointed out the other day, great hope was held out for the new era described by the party seeking office. I have no doubt the people thought, Well, in the provincial field we will just see if they mean what they say, and if they are going to do something to bring in this new era. Let me call to the attention of the house again the fact that it was the leader of the C.C.F. who recently said, "Give us time," and that on another occasion a leader of the Conservative party who had promised to cure certain things or perish in the attempt, and after almost two years had failed to do so, said, "Give us time," when he was asked to do what he had promised to do. For the peace of mind of my C.C.F. friends from Saskatchewan I would ask them to remember what happened to the Conservative party in 1935 which held out certain promises and then failed utterly to carry them out.

As to whether this new scheme is bound to fail may I say—

An hon. MEMBER: What scheme? Explain.

Mr. TUCKER: I am going to explain if my hon. friend will restrain himself long enough for me to do so.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Another man looking for time.

Mr. TUCKER: I am referring to the Veterans' Land Act which was passed in 1942. I have already indicated some of the reasons why I am satisfied that that act will be a success. First, there is to be a careful examination into the qualifications of those who apply under the act. An effort will be made to see that they are fully qualified to make a success at farming. If not, courses in farming will be available in order that they may become qualified before they actually go on the land and risk their money.

Then, no attempt will be made to place them on the land within the first twelve months after the war has ended. Time will be taken to make sure that land is obtained at fair prices and that people have a chance to select the land they want. The men will be given help to get settled on good land and an effort will be made to see that exorbitant prices are not paid for such land and for machinery and other items. It was in this connection that veterans of the last war found themselves at a great disadvantage. They paid high prices for land and machinery, and after a period of four or five years they found that the land and machinery was worth only a fraction of what had been paid for them. That was enough to discourage any one.

Another aspect of the matter is the protection given to the veteran in connection with what he will get for what he produces. A floor has been placed under farm prices. As the president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture said, this is the most radical reform measure that has ever been passed by any parliament in Canada. I have great faith in the effectiveness of the floor under farm prices bill, and I have great faith that it will provide real protection to the veterans in the years that lie ahead.

Then we have the Prairie Farm Assistance Act which will protect the veteran farmer on the prairies in the event of crop failure. I often think of the years from 1930 to 1939 when we had crop failure after crop failure in Saskatchewan and what it would have meant had we had the Prairie Farm Assistance Act at that time. Is it any wonder that thoughtful people think of the things that have been done by the present government? Is it any wonder that a good share of them stood by the Liberal party in the last election even though our election system resulted in only two Liberals being elected? However, I would remind my Tory friends that they managed to elect only one, so that there is nothing there about which they can crow. Incidently I will tell them that one of the reasons why that man was elected was, first, that he is an outstanding man and, second, that he assured his electors that he was just as liberal as any Liberal running in Saskatchewan.

There are other grounds, but I have not the time to go into them to-night. I regret that I have not the time. I have not mentioned the Family Allowances Act.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Five minutes more and you will have talked the farmers out.

Mr. TUCKER: I wonder how I came to pass over the Family Allowances Act. I say that feelingly and for reasons which are known to all hon. members. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle spoke feelingly and, perhaps, properly about the poor bachelor on the western plains. However, I could not help thinking that with all the surplus fine young women we are going to have in this country, any man who will not be satisfied to take a wife from that fine group of Canadian women will not deserve any sympathy such as the hon. member for Qu'Appelle has extended. I do not think there will be many returned soldiers who will actually be in that category when they get back from overseas or have been back for a year or so.

An hon. MEMBER: Three minutes.

Mr. TUCKER: Judging by what happened after the last war, I believe a large proportion, an overwhelming proportion of the men who take up land under the act will be in receipt of family allowances. Even a returned soldier cannot hope to have a family and have it grow up in much less than seventeen or eighteen years. During that time most of these men will be in receipt of family allowances which will provide a certain income and a basis for their living, no matter what may happen in the way of crop failure on our western plains.

Mr. MacNICOL: They will have plenty of time to increase the size of their family and get more allowances.

Mr. TUCKER: There may be a lot to be said for that. I have often said that the best immigrant is the one who arrives by way of the stork. I agree with the hon. member for Davenport and I am glad he is taking up this matter as well as the question of irrigation.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind the hon. gentleman that it is eleven o'clock.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, October 2, 1945.

The house met at three o'clock.

CANADIAN INFORMATION SERVICE

TABLING OF ORDER IN COUNCIL—STATEMENT ON ORGANIZATION

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to lay on the table an order in council which establishes the Canadian information service. This service is being set up to provide for the distribution of information about Canada to the peoples of other countries.

The need for such a service has been generally recognized. Canada has a vital interest in international peace and prosperity, and an important part to play in the attainment of these objectives. It is essential, therefore, that our people and country be known and understood abroad.

Those with whom we trade must know our country and its possibilities; those with whom we are associated for the maintenance of world security must know with whom they are cooperating, and what may be expected of our cooperation. In short, both trade and diplomacy, to be carried out successfully, need a background of understanding based on factual information objectively presented.

During the war years Canada's diplomatic representation abroad has had to be increased to keep pace with our increased obligations. In 1939 we maintained only four missions; to-day we have high commissioners in all the capitals of the commonwealth, and ambassadors and ministers in many other countries. At the same time the network of trade commissioners is being increased with a view to giving the utmost help to Canadian trade, which means, in the last analysis, help to every Canadian. All these representatives need to be kept thoroughly informed about what is going on at home.

During the last three years, pioneer work in the way of supplying information abroad has been done through the wartime information board, in conjunction with embassies, legations and trade commissioners. It will be the first duty of the new service to develop adequate reference and information services for all these Canadian representatives abroad. For this reason it was considered advisable to retain an interdepartmental, rather than a purely departmental, service.

The service is to be directed by a committee on which departments and agencies primarily interested in external peace-time information are represented. This committee will be under the chairmanship of A. D. P. Heeney, deputy head of the Privy Council office. It will also include Norman Robertson, Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs; M. W. Mackenzie, Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce; Doctor Augustin Frigon, general manager of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation; the government film commissioner, and the director of the Canadian information service.

Geoffrey C. Andrew, who has been secretary of the wartime information board for more than two years, and more recently has been acting as general manager, has been appointed director of the new service.

I should like to pay a word of tribute to the work which the wartime information board, and before it the director of public information, performed during the war years. The establishment of an information agency was a relatively new venture for Canada. It was a necessary task, and a difficult one, and much useful work has been done. Since V-J day the board has been steadily cutting down its services within Canada. A few days ago the last general manager of the wartime information board, Mr. A. D. Dunton, returned to his peace-time employment as editor of the Montreal Standard. I think it proper to say that he takes with him the thanks and admiration of all Canadians who can recognize a good and difficult job well done.

SEED GRAIN

ANNOUNCEMENT OF SETTLEMENT OF LOAN TO PROVINCE OF SASKATCHEWAN

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I desire to announce to the house that a basis of settlement has been agreed upon with the province of Saskatchewan in reference to the seed grain dispute, so-called, which has been going on between that province and the dominion government. Under this settlement the balance owing the dominion by the province of Saskatchewan in respect of the 1938 seed grain loan will be paid by the province as follows:

$6,626,664.68 to be paid monthly as collected from municipalities and to be paid in full as an obligation of the province by July 31, 1948.

$7,570,123.72 to be paid by the province over a period of eleven years.

Pursuant to this settlement the province will undertake to collect in the immediate future the amount owing by the farmer debtors under the compromise which the province made with them last year. As such moneys are collected from the farmers they will be paid by the province to the dominion. The balance of the total outstanding indebtedness will be paid by the province to the dominion, as I have said, over a period of eleven years and will be secured by non-interest bearing treasury bills of the province.

I may add that a statement substantially to this effect was given to the press last night, but it was reported as indicating that the dominion had undertaken to forgo the collection of some $2,272,000 of the principal. That is not correct. The $2,272,000 has been collected from the province already by way of deductions from payments to the province under the tax agreements, leaving $14,196,788 still due, the settlement of which has been arranged in the manner I have indicated.

The matter, I think, has been settled on a basis satisfactory to both the dominion and the province, and my hope is that future relations between the dominion and the province in regard to this matter will be harmonious and cooperative, and that there will be no further dispute or misunderstanding arising out of the seed grain loans.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask if it is a proper inference to take from this statement, that as a result of this adjustment there will be no loss to the dominion treasury, but that the adjustment is more in the way of postponing the payments due the dominion?

Mr. ILSLEY: And the forgoing of interest accruing from December 11, 1944, on. The principal and interest accruing to December 11, 1944, are all to be paid in the manner I have indicated.

Mr. BRACKEN: Then the government has lost interest for only one month, or less?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, interest spread over various periods. The instalments are spread over a term of eleven years. A fairly large amount is concentrated in the early part of that period, but to the extent that those payments were not made on demand the dominion government is forgoing the interest.

Mr. BRACKEN: Was that just an arbitrary adjustment, or was some principle involved?

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, I may say there were negotiations.

Mr. LOCKHART: What was the total amount forgone by the dominion government?

Mr. ILSLEY: None in the way of principal.

Mr. LOCKHART: But in the way of interest?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know.

Mr. LOCKHART: You should know.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no way of computing it with accuracy, because of the fact that the collections from the farmers are to be paid at the end of each month, as collected. If they are all collected at once, then there will be a smaller amount forgone in the way of interest than if they are not collected so quickly.

Mr. FRASER: May I ask the minister—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. FRASER: —a question in connection with the information board?

Mr. SPEAKER: The statement of the minister is not debatable.

Mr. FLEMING: I should like to ask the acting Prime Minister a question in regard to his first announcement.

Mr. SPEAKER: I just said the statement made by the minister is not debatable.

Mr. FLEMING: This is a question in regard to his first announcement.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not debatable.

WAR CHARITIES ACT

INCLUSION OF WAR MEMORIALS AS PROJECTS ACCEPTABLE FOR REGISTRATION

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National War Services) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 13, to amend the War Charities Act, 1939.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. McCANN: The purpose of this amendment is to enlarge the War Charities Act to include war memorials as projects acceptable for registration. As it is at present constituted, the act governs all appeals, charitable or otherwise, arising out of or connected with the war. It is felt that this interpretation of a war charity fund is not sufficient to bring all types of appeals for war memorials within the provisions of the act. This amendment clarifies the meaning of a war charity fund and ensures that war memorial appeals will require authorization under the act.

Mr. CHURCH: Is the amount under the act reduced or increased as a result of the amendment? It was $12,000,000 last year.

Mr. McCANN: That information will be given when the bill is in committee.

Mr. CHURCH: It should be cut in two; the war is over.

CANADIAN ARMY

DISMISSAL OF EDITOR OF "MAPLE LEAF"—TABLING OF EDITORIALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): During a statement by the Minister of National Defence on September 24 in connection with the dismissal of the editor of the Canadian overseas army newspaper Maple Leaf, he promised to have the editorials in question placed on Hansard as soon as possible. Will the minister be good enough to inform the house if he has received the documents in question, and, if so, when we may expect that they will be tabled, so that they may appear in Hansard?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence): I now have copies of the Maple Leaf containing the two editorials, and perhaps I might lay them on the table of the house.

FAR-EASTERN COMMISSION

CARRYING OUT OF TERMS OF JAPANESE SURRENDER —CANADIAN PARTICIPATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I should like to ask this question of the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has Canada been officially invited to join the new far-eastern commission which will direct the carrying out of the Japanese surrender terms? If so, has Canada accepted? If we have accepted, who will represent this nation on the commission, and where and when will the initial meeting of the commission be held?

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): My information is that discussions looking to the establishment of a far-eastern commission have been under way in London for some time, but have not yet reached the stage where official invitations have been issued.

Mr. GRAYDON: There was some intimation in the press concerning Canada's joining that commission; that is what prompted my asking the question.

NEWSPRINT

PRESS REPORTS AS TO SUSPENSION OF IMPORTS TO BRITAIN FROM CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. News dispatches seem to indicate that the British government has decided to suspend importations of newsprint from Canada. Has the Canadian government received any intimation officially or unofficially from the British government on this point? If so, what steps are being taken by the government to insure the continuance of this trade?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I am grateful to the hon. member for having given me notice of the question. Although the government has received no official notification of this situation, we in the Department of Trade and Commerce have been notified of it unofficially and indirectly. We are now discussing the matter with the United Kingdom government. My department is fully aware of the importance of this matter, and is anxiously looking into the situation.

May I say we are not so deeply concerned with the immediate situation as with the long-term market considerations. As is well known generally, there is at the present time a much greater market for newsprint than we can supply. However, as I have said, we are going into this matter carefully with the United Kingdom government in the long-term interest.

MARSHAL ZHUKOV

INQUIRY AS TO VISIT TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Cariboo): I should like to ask a question of the Acting Prime Minister. It is my understanding from press reports that Marshal Gregory Zhukov is visiting America, and that he will be officially received in New York on Thursday. Is it the intention of the Canadian government to invite this distinguished warrior to visit Canada?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): That question was asked a few days ago. My reply at that time was that the government had no official information respecting Marshal Zhukov's visit. I am sorry that I have not been following the newspapers, and therefore I am not aware of what the hon. member has just said to the house. No plans have been made for extending any invitation to visit Canada, but I shall discuss the matter with my colleagues.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

PACKING PLANTS—THREATENED DISPUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. CHARLTON (Brant): I should like to direct the attention of the Minister of Labour to a matter of vital and immediate concern to the farmers of Canada. In view of the already congested conditions in packing plants across Canada, is the government considering any action to avert a possible labour dispute at present threatening this industry?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I am informed that the situation is well known to the provincial authorities under whose jurisdiction this matter would come. I assume that both employers and employees will avail themselves of the machinery established for dealing with matters of the kind.

NANAIMO MINE WORKERS—MEAT RATIONING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. PEARKES (Nanaimo): Has the attention of the Minister of Labour been directed to a strike of the united mine workers at Nanaimo in demand for double meat rations? Will the government reconsider the question of allowing men who work in strenuous labour projects such extra rations?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I want to thank my hon. friend for giving me notice of the question. I am aware of the strike at Nanaimo, and also of the strikes in Alberta and at the Crowsnest Pass. I believe that 400 are involved at Nanaimo, out of a total of about 9,000. Their demand appears to be for a double supply of meat under the rationing system. I would also like to tell the hon. member that the attitude of the men is in contradiction of the advice given them by the leaders of district 18 of the United Mine Workers of America.

The Department of Labour already has a man at Calgary, which is the headquarters for that district. We hope the good sense of the men will make them realize that the strike is ill advised, and that as a result they will return to work at the earliest possible opportunity.

STRIKE AT FORD MOTOR PLANT, WINDSOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. FRED ROSE (Cartier): In view of the fact that the officials of the Ford Motor Company have refused to meet with members of the union, will the Minister of Labour tell the house what steps are contemplated to help bring this strike to an early conclusion?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): If the hon. member would direct his question to the people who are taking part in the dispute, and ask them what they are doing to bring this strike to a successful conclusion, it would be better. The Ford Motor company, rightly or wrongly—I think rightly—have raised objections to the pickets refusing to permit the management and clerical help to enter the plant. As a matter of fact the plant appears to be in a state of seige. I would ask my hon. friend, who comes from the good city of Montreal, whether he would have any objection if someone set up a picket around his house—remembering always that a Canadian's home is his castle.

As soon as the parties to the dispute come to an agreement I shall be very glad to sit down with the minister of labour of Ontario to make an attempt to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion.

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE

PARTICIPATION OF CANADA—POSSIBILITY OF INCLUDING FEMALE REPRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour arising out of a statement he made on Friday afternoon, when he set out the personnel who would attend the international labour conference at Paris on October 15. In view of the fact that on practically every other delegation there is a woman representative, and having regard to the fact that at this conference social and employment problems will be to the fore, was consideration given to the appointment of a woman as a representative from Canada, and if so, why was a woman not appointed?

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not see any urgency in the hon. member's question. It should be put on the order paper.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I bow to Your Honour's ruling; this, however is a matter which concerns women's organizations across the country, and one which can be decided only at this time, because the conference meets on October 15.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member's question may be one of great importance, but that does not mean that there is any urgency.

FARM IMPLEMENTS

PERMITS FOR PURCHASE OF TRACTORS OR OTHER FARM MACHINERY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance arising from an article which appeared in the Globe and Mail of September 29, stating that farm implements are no longer rationed. Is it not necessary to procure a permit in order to purchase tractors or other farm machinery?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): That question should be placed on the order paper. I had no notice of it.

MEAT RATIONING

GRAVENHURST SANATORIUM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. FERGUSON (Simcoe North): I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether meat rationing is in effect at Gravenhurst sanatorium at the present time.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Meat rationing is in effect everywhere.

Mr. SPEAKER: May I say to the hon. gentleman that I do not see any urgency in his question.

Mr. FERGUSON: It may be a case of life and death.

WAR AND DEMOBILIZATION

PROVISION FOR APPROPRIATION OF $1,365,000,000 FOR WAR PURPOSES, DEMOBILIZATION, PROMOTION OF TRADE AND INDUSTRY, ETC.

The house resumed from Friday, September 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. Ilsley that the house go into committee to consider a resolution to grant to His Majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures deemed necessary or advisable in consequence of the war.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to speak on this resolution, although I did have it in mind that I might ask a few questions when the house had resolved itself into committee of the whole. However, the statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) before leaving for other parts of the world, and the statement of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) which followed in respect to this resolution, along with the subsequent debate, has led me to desire to say just a word.

I think we should recognize that this resolution is important. It asks for permission to call upon the Canadian people for the tidy sum of $1,365,000,000. There was a day when a few million dollars used to stagger us, but now we have reached the stage of astronomical figures; we talk in terms of billions, and it does not seem to bother us. The wide variety of subjects which this resolution covers means that this money can be raised and spent for almost anything the government may desire to spend it on. It may involve even diplomatic relations; it may involve matters of international trade and commerce, the setting up of diplomatic staffs in other parts of the world, and so forth.

I recognize that Canada does not live in a world by itself. Throughout the past few years Canada has gradually come to be recognized as one of the leading nations of the world, at least one of the leading small nations. I am not going to say that some credit is not due to the present Prime Minister in that respect, but I am afraid that when it comes to Canada's position in the world, particularly in the future world, sometimes the subject is talked of with some gloss and rather glibly, and terms are used that have not a great deal of reality. For instance, we hear from many sources, not the least being the lips of the Prime Minister, from time to time that we must cooperate in order to bring about a world community of nations. The words "cooperate", "cooperation" and "good will" are very agreeable terms to use. Perhaps I shall deal with them a little later.

There is another word that is used quite often in a glib fashion, and that is "aggression". When most people talk of aggression they always fancy that it is some other nation that is responsible for the aggression, just as though Germany and Italy and Japan, who just happened to be our enemies in war, are the only aggressors in the world. We must be realistic in the use of these terms.

Another word used quite often is "nationalism". Every man believes in his own country, but when he attempts to put his own country in order, or declares publicly that he believes his first duty is to his own country, he is immediately branded as an isolationist or an ultra-nationalist. Then the old propaganda machine gets going and the mighty and powerful propagandists lash out with their lying tongues against him. Social Crediters have been roasted for their stand, but what they really stand for is readiness to cooperate with the world, but at the same time giving to Canada what rightfully belongs to her.

The Prime Minister was in Edmonton not so many months ago. It happened to be during a political campaign, and I know that what is said during a political campaign always must be taken with a grain of salt. But it was the Prime Minister of Canada who was speaking. As he was in Edmonton, the capital city of Alberta, he could not leave alone the Social Crediters who have occupied seats in this house for almost the last ten years. His speech was recorded by the Canadian Press. By the way, before he attacked Alberta he took a nice little tap at a gentleman by the name of John Bracken. He said:

> I have not been devoting my time as organizer of a political party.

Of course we know what he meant. What had he been doing?

> I wiped out politics when this war began.

That is quite a statement.

An hon. MEMBER: A rich one.

Mr. HANSELL: A rich statement. I really think he was joking with himself when he said that. He went on then to say what the Liberals believed in contradistinction to what we in this corner of the house have proclaimed in this house and out of it. He said:

> The Liberals believe in and are determined to work to their utmost for the greatest measure of effective cooperation among the nations to keep the peace and to promote trade and industry, while the Social Credit party seem determined to uphold what they describe as national sovereignty in its most extreme form.

That is a timely statement. Mr. King went on to say:

> Social Credit members of parliament have consistently ignored the vital necessity of external trade to the prosperity and welfare of Canada, and particularly of Alberta.

Mr. BLACKMORE: A complete lie!

Mr. HANSELL: Yes; nothing was further from the truth than that statement is.

Let me deal for a moment with this charge that we are ultra-nationalists, that the Social Credit party seem "determined to uphold what they describe as national sovereignty in its most extreme form."

Let me ask, Mr. Speaker, what sovereignty is? Sovereignty simply means the freedom of the individual. It means the freedom of the individual to act as an individual soul in his own right and in his own sphere, free from any big bosses at the top. Sovereignty means that a municipality should be able to act freely within its own sphere and that a province should be able to act according to its own will within its own sphere. Sovereignty means that Canada as a nation should be absolutely free to act as its will chooses within its own sphere. That is what we as Social Crediters have been saying. That is what we believe national sovereignty to mean, and I ask, would any man stand up in this house and say that there is anything wrong with that? You may call me an isolationist, a nationalist, if you like; but personally I am proud to be a Canadian. Personally I think that the duty of members of parliament is to tell the people of this country that our first duty is towards them as Canadians—and if that is being a nationalist, then call us nationalists and we shall be proud of it.

The Prime Minister said that we consistently ignored the vital necessity of external trade to the prosperity and welfare of Canada, and particularly of Alberta. The truth is, Mr. Speaker, that over the years we have disagreed with the Prime Minister's particular policy of seeking world markets as the only solution of our internal problems. That is where we have differed with the Prime Minister. I do not like to bring in the hungry thirties, because the term and the references have been worn almost threadbare. But where was the Prime Minister and his government in those days when Canada was richly favoured with a vast abundance of good things, when we had almost everything our hearts could desire, when goods were piled upon our shelves and in our warehouses and in our stores, and yet the people were virtually beggars? What was the aim of the Prime Minister's foreign policy then? He looked around for foreign markets. He said to the world, in effect: Come along, you nations, we have many good things to sell to you here; will you buy?

We might have crept up behind the Prime Minister and pulled his coat-tails and said to him: Mr. Prime Minister, look around. If he had looked around he would have seen thousands of people in Canada on relief and in a state of malnutrition or starvation. What we were trying to do was to pull the Prime Minister's coat-tails a little harder so that he would see these people and so that we could say to him: What are you going to do about these people? Our policy was that you do not have to be entirely dependent upon foreign markets to be able to distribute the goods we have in Canada to our own needy people. The difference between the two parties was this: The Prime Minister wanted to sell Canada to the rest of the world, while the Social Crediters wanted to give Canada to the Canadian people. If that is what the Prime Minister means by saying that we are disinterested in foreign trade, then I will accept the charge; I do not mind it a bit. But I say to hon. members that what we were trying to tell the Prime Minister was this: We can offer our surpluses to the world, certainly we can, and yet at the same time by proper management of our monetary system we can also give to the Canadian people one of the highest standards of living in the world.

The world trade policy of the Prime Minister was simply this, to use a homely illustration. It does not matter how many eggs we have to fry; we must first feed the whole world with eggs before we can be permitted to fry our own. That was just about the Prime Minister's position with respect to foreign trade.

Of course, on that occasion the Prime Minister also had to tell the people of Alberta why we were not included on the San Francisco delegation. I do not say that he stated it as baldly as that. This is what he said, and I am quoting from the same dispatch:

Mr. King said it was true Social Credit members voted for participation in the San Francisco conference, but their position was hedged about with qualifications. He quoted John Blackmore, Social Credit house leader, as saying the only voices raised against the proposals for the San Francisco conference had been those of Social Credit members.

What does the Prime Minister expect from members of parliament? Does he expect us to sit here in our chairs, which apparently we are not to be allowed to take home with us, and to acquiesce in all that he says?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Be little yes-men.

Mr. HANSELL: Yes; does he expect that? If he does, here is one group that he is going to be sadly disappointed in. Did not the Prime Minister say that he wanted the views of the various parties in the house? Well, we gave him our views, and here is something for other groups to think about. I want you to notice the way his statement reads:

He quoted John Blackmore, Social Credit house leader, as saying the only voices raised against the proposals for the San Francisco conference had been of Social Credit members.

Therefore, says he in effect, I will take on my delegation only those who will not oppose me; the only ones that I want with me are those who will say "yes." That evidently is the truth of the situation, based upon the Prime Minister's own statement. I think other groups in the house should resent that statement. If they do not, they lay themselves open to the charge of being yes-men to the Prime Minister of Canada, who perhaps in the end became yes-man to the world's big power shots.

Mr. KNOWLES: The hon. member will recall that the leader of the C.C.F. group voted against the government on the question of the admission of Argentina.

Mr. GRAYDON: No, he did not.

Mr. HANSELL: I take cognizance of that fact.

Mr. GRAYDON: But he did not.

Mr. MacINNIS: He voted against it, anyway, to the extent that he was able.

Mr. GRAYDON: He did not vote against it.

Mr. KNOWLES: All I am asking the hon. member to do is to recognize that the leader of this group was not a yes-man.

Mr. BLACKMORE: He surely was, before he went away.

Mr. HANSELL: He was not on the question of Argentina. But I was going to say that I regard that as a very minor point indeed, because there were other nations which were seeking admission to the San Francisco conference. Let me ask this: Did the same man who objected to one nation raise his voice when the recognized government of Poland were not admitted to the conference?

Mr. JAQUES: No, he did not.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Why?

Mr. HANSELL: There is a principle involved there. However, I did not intend to get into that discussion.

An hon. MEMBER: Neither did they.

Mr. HANSELL: The Prime Minister goes on:

The people of this province who have taken so large a part in the achievement of victory do not, I am sure, want the fruits of victory thrown away in political isolationism and economic nationalism.

We want to nail that charge to the wall as a consummate lie. We never did want to throw victory away by any stand we ever took, and that the people recognize this is shown by the fact that we are the only party in the house every one of whose house members was returned in the last election.

Here is another term which is glibly used. You know, if a person rises anywhere in Canada, particularly in a public place, and especially on the floor of this house, and criticizes anything that Russia does, at once he calls down upon his head the anathemas of the red propagandists who saturate nearly all our worth-while institutions, and he is labelled a fascist. Yes, that is the term which is hung on him. Well, I am not so particularly concerned about what I am called. What I am interested in is what I am, and what I am and what I am called are two different things.

In the first place—and I am saying this because I am leading up to another point—I am a Christian. Not because I was born in England or am a citizen of Canada. I am a Christian because I have explicit and simple faith in the redeeming grace of Almighty God. That is first. Second, I am a Canadian. Being a Christian I must speak the truth in soberness; and being a Canadian I must be loyal to Canada, my country and to the people of Canada.

What I have said brings me to my next point, which relates to this matter of "world cooperation". World cooperation, yes; would anyone rise in this house and say he did not believe in world cooperation? Of course he would not. Would anyone rise and say he was not prepared to work towards world cooperation? Of course he would not. But we must be realistic when we use these terms—"world cooperation", "good will", "world community", "the fuller life", and so forth and so on. For cooperation is not a one way street; it must work two ways. The fact of the matter is that there are two great philosophies struggling for expression and bidding for world recognition. We can talk about a world community and world cooperation, but wherever the world's diplomats meet, be it at San Francisco, Bretton Woods, Dumbarton Oaks, Teheran, Yalta, Potsdam or anywhere else, the one big question is, must God have His way in the world, or must those forces of anti-God have their way in the world? We are not selling peanuts when we go to these great conferences where the world's mighty men meet. Behind the scenes of human activity the greatest battle of the ages is going on. It is a battle for the destiny of worlds of men and nations; it is a battle between the forces of righteousness and the forces of evil. Now when it comes to a matter of cooperation, good cannot cooperate with evil. You had better put that down as a fundamental principle; it cannot be done. That which is Christian cannot cooperate with that which is anti-Christian. Do we want a Christian democracy, or do we want a world with God ruled out? That is the question that should be answered.

The other day the Prime Minister made a statement in the house—and while I am a severe critic of the Prime Minister in his political actions—I do have some respect for him just the same; I am not going to say I have not. I believe he is sincere and desires to do that which is right. Mark you, I will say this too: what I have already said about these forces the Prime Minister knows. My own personal view is that he is cognizant of these things and that he is not insincere in his recognition of them. I do not know, but I do not believe that he told us all that was in his mind when he made his statement in the house the other day.

Mr. FRASER: That would make some reading.

Mr. HANSELL: Well, I do not think that I need any levity at this particular moment. I mean what I say. I believe the Prime Minister is conscientious in respect to those forces, shall I say, of the unknown world, if I can put it that way, and I believe he wants to do the right thing. His intentions may be good. This is what he said in his statement the other day as reported at page 492 of Hansard:

> The task is not one of restoring the world as we knew it before the war.

I am inclined to think that he is going off into ethereal platitudes here, because we could ask him in what way the world has changed and I do not think that he could give us an answer. He says:

> The task is not one of restoring the world as we knew it before the war. That world has gone. The collective task is to get the new world moving along paths that will lead to peace, happiness and the general welfare.

Then farther on he says:

> I feel that I should see for myself something of the changed world in which Canada must make her way and take her part.

It is a very pleasant thing to talk about a changed world, but personally I cannot see that the fundamental and underlying principles that govern this world have changed at all. The only things that have changed so far as I can see, are the geographical and political boundaries. Apart from that, the world philosophies are still intact. The method by which we carry on our foreign trade is still intact. You may make a little adjustment here or a little adjustment there, but there is a great attempt to solidify the world trading facilities under one great and powerful international body, which is attempting to put us back on the gold standard, whereby no nation will be free to trade as it shall choose to trade unless it goes through those channels. And in that regard Canada is in danger of selling out her sovereignty.

How can we have what I should like to call a world Christian democracy? Can a Christian democracy cooperate in any way with totalitarianism? Personally I do not think it can. Jesus denounced the scribes and pharisees as hypocrites, but they were no more hypocrites than our ultra-internationalists who assume a sort of self-righteous attitude, and with their platitudinous phrases about world cooperation attempt to play into the hands of a programme to set up one huge world dictatorship. Can we cooperate with totalitarianism? Can we, as a democracy, cooperate with dictatorship? Dictatorship and totalitarianism mean the loss of freedom. Totalitarianism means force. It means compulsion; it means war; it means murder; it means plunder; it means political and economic gansterism. Therefore I ask the question, can any Christian democracy—if we put down as a fundamental thesis that we are one—cooperate with that?

I hold in my hand a clipping which contains the statement of a great man. This man, speaking before a certain body, said:

> With many of you, I hoped that Russia would work out its own problems and that their government would eventually become a peace-loving popular government with a free ballot which would not interfere with the integrity of its neighbours.

That hope is to-day either shattered or put away in storage against a better day.

The Soviet Union, as a matter of practical fact, is a dictatorship as absolute as any other dictatorship in the world.

Who said that? None other than President Roosevelt, speaking before the American youth conference in Washington in 1940.

What is the record of this totalitarian state?

1. This state provoked, directed and supported civil war and aggression in Spain. They may have claimed the right to do so, I do not know; nevertheless that is what they did.

2. This state concluded a treaty of non-aggression with Germany in August 1939, an act which enabled Hitler to launch his offensive. Perhaps they will say they had a legal right to do so. I am not arguing the point.

3. From September, 1939, until June, 1941, this totalitarian state supplied Germany with various essential materials such as food and oil products.

4. On September 17, 1939, this state committed an act of aggression against Poland, thus violating a treaty of non-aggression concluded with that country.

5. Having occupied part of Poland, this state deported Polish citizens into various remote parts of Russia and confined them to concentration and labour camps under most inhuman conditions, comparable to those prevailing in German concentration camps.

6. Following the partition of Poland this state committed acts of aggression against Latvia, Lithuania and Estonia, deprived them of their independence, and subjected the populations to a rule of terror. Soviet Russia waged a war of aggression against Finland, violating the existing treaties.

7. In all countries of eastern and southeastern Europe Soviet authorities are behaving in a way which does not differ from that of nazi Germany.

I have placed those seven points on record and I ask: Can we as a democracy cooperate with that? Just the other day I picked up the daily paper on my way down to the house and read an Associated Press despatch from Warsaw. I will not read it all, but here is part of it:

War-ravaged Poland is experiencing one of the greatest migrations in her long turbulent history, and two bridges across the Vistula here are the teeming gateways to the east and the west. . . .

[Mr. Hansell.]

From early morning until midnight there is a steady stream of men, women and children carrying all their worldly possessions strapped to their backs, in bags, in suitcases and in sacks.

All faces show lines of strain and work. Scarcely one, whether he is going east or west, has the slightest idea of where he will finally settle. They only know this has to be done, and they tramp on.

I ask: can we cooperate with that? I hear also glibly stated the term "liberation"—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I must inform the hon. gentleman that his time has expired.

Mr. HANSELL: Well, Mr. Speaker, I suppose I shall have to stop. Even if I were given permission to go on it would take me another two hours at least to say all I should like to say, so I shall abide by your ruling. I expect I shall be able to say what I have to say at another time, but I want the house to know that I am not through with this subject.

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, thus far this session it seems to have been a custom for speakers to say they had not intended to take part in the debate, and then to proceed to indicate that, as it may be said of me, they had always intended to do so. I will not make that commonplace beginning, but I will say that I would not take the time of the house at this point if I did not feel that the main matter about which I wish to speak is of very great importance. In introducing the resolution now before the house the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) called attention briefly to the fact that he is asking for an amount of $25,000,000 as a further sum to be set aside for the united nations relief and rehabilitation administration, and it is mainly in reference to the work of UNRRA that I felt I should like to say a few words at this time.

During the years of the war hon. members in all parts of this house recognized the indivisibility of the common cause, and on that basis we were prepared to vote huge sums of money for mutual aid and various other joint purposes, so that we might play our part in the struggle against the common enemy. The thought in my mind, Mr. Speaker, is that we now have before us a common cause, equally indivisible, which is, and I say this advisedly, infinitely greater than was the cause of war. I refer to the cause of peace. The peace we must now win is not merely the absence of conflict, though to achieve that may in itself be a real task. To bring about peace calls for some positive steps. We must tackle immediately the rebuilding of a world that has been ravaged and torn by war, and the task of feeding and restoring to some measure of health and strength peoples all over the world who are suffering terribly from the effects of war.

The hon. member who preceded me (Mr. Hansell) had something to say—in a vein with which I do not agree, though I will not argue the point just now—about freedom, a concept dear to us all. Freedom is indivisible. So long as there is bondage or suffering, imprisonment, hardship, poverty and hunger anywhere in the world, we are not free, no matter how much we may feel that way here in this democratic institution. It is my belief and my earnest hope that this nation, which rose so well to the challenge of the last six years, will rise to the challenge of the peace and do what in my view has not yet been done—that is, put some real life and spark into the noble cause which was launched under those five letters, UNRRA.

Canada made a glorious start. At the first meeting of the council of the governing body, held in Montreal a year ago last month, the director general, the Hon. Herbert H. Lehman, said:

> It is peculiarly fitting that we meet in Canada. This nation has been a tower of strength in working out the arrangements for providing relief and rehabilitation supplies and services. The parliament has made available the full resources asked in the UNRRA financial plan —one per cent of the national income in the year ending June 30, 1943.

From that Mr. Lehman went on to emphasize the point that Canada had given leadership and had pioneered in the concept of UNRRA. The document I have in my hand lists the members of the Canadian delegation. We are proud of the fact that Hon. L. B. Pearson is the permanent chairman of the council. Other representatives of Canada at the meeting in Montreal were the present Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Claxton), the present Speaker of the House of Commons (Mr. Fauteux), Professor H. F. Angus, Mrs. R. F. McWilliams of Winnipeg, Manitoba, and Doctor J. G. Bouchard, assistant deputy minister of agriculture, together with an outstanding panel of advisers and assistants. Perhaps many hon. members will recall the publicity which was given to the meeting of the council in Montreal last fall. I know it sent a thrill through my being to listen to some of the radio broadcasts which were made at that time. I felt that here we were, before the war was over, beginning something that would carry over into the peace the crusading spirit, the realization that we stand or fall together, which was so outstanding during the years of the war.

In his remarks the other day the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) said that during the course of this debate there would be opportunity for discussion of matters relating to UNRRA. I take it from that that one of the ministers will make a report to the house. I know beforehand that when the report is made it will be glowing in its tribute to the work that has been done. My contention is that no matter how glowing that report may be, hon. members will have to admit that we have not tackled the work of UNRRA with anything like the spirit of determination with which we tackled the tasks of the war.

When war broke out we had one ministry of defence, but before long we found it necessary to have three. Then we added to that the ministry of munitions and supply. But there is no separate ministry for the tasks confronting UNRRA, and I suggest that this is a point the government might well take into consideration.

Frankly, the measure of the capacity of our civilization to survive, the possibility of our averting another war, and building a peace that is something more than simply an absence of conflict, depends upon our ability to arise now and do the job of relief and rehabilitation which must be done in the war-ravaged countries of the world, particularly on the continent of Europe.

Hon. members have read of the agony, the suffering and starvation prevalent in the old world. The Minister of Finance, in the impassioned plea he made last week for the support of meat rationing, told us something respecting the needs overseas. These conditions have been portrayed to us on the screen, and right now because of the national clothing campaign which is in progress a certain amount of publicity is being given to this subject. All these efforts are commendable, but they do not begin to scratch the surface of the problem. They do not reveal the kind of imagination we ought to have with respect to the seriousness of this problem of helping to rebuild a world that has been torn by six years of war.

The government might consider the possibility of establishing a separate ministry to deal with this whole problem. At the very least we should have a separate ministry of external affairs, which might deal with these matters in addition to many other problems that now require the attention of a separate department. Such a ministry could give a lead to the people of Canada, one to which

I am sure they would respond, and one which would help them realize that this challenge is just as great as was the challenge of war.

I was pleased to-day to hear the Minister of Finance, in his capacity of Acting Prime Minister, table an order in council setting up a Canadian information service. In saying this I do not necessarily approve the extent to which we now have government by order in council, but I do approve the step taken. I know—at least I suspect—that my hon. friends to the right who belong to the Progressive Conservative party will say that this new organization is just a continuation of the war-time information board, and the chances are that they will oppose it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The hon. member is not a mind reader.

Mr. KNOWLES: Well, I shall leave it to them; but it is not long ago that the hon. member for Lake Centre was asking that the wartime information board be discontinued. I take it that board has now ended its days and has been replaced by the Canadian information service. It would seem that the name is modelled after a similar set-up in Great Britain, where the name "British information service" is used. I hope the government will not listen too carefully to the pleas made by hon. members to my right against these public information institutions. In a democracy we cannot have too much information, and the activities of the wartime information board were all to the good.

In my view such institutions as the national film board and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation should not be limited by suspicion on the part of some on the opposition side of the house that they are used for purposes of political propaganda. Rather they should be given a freer hand to increase the dissemination of information of all kinds, not only in other countries but throughout Canada as well.

One task I should like to see the government give the new Canadian information service, the film board and the CBC, would be one in which those organizations would have a free hand to place before the Canadian people the importance of the task of rehabilitating war-torn Europe. In other words, let us get on with the job of supporting wholeheartedly the work of UNRRA, which got off to such a good start, but which, it seems to me, has been allowed to bog down under officialdom and red tape.

Not long ago Professor Earl G. Harrison, who is dean of the university of Pennsylvania law school, and a former immigration commissioner of the United States, was appointed by President Truman to act on a special committee to investigate conditions under which people are living in Europe, with special reference to the plight of the Jewish people. In his report, which was published, in the New York Times of Sunday, September 30, two days ago, Professor Harrison had a number of comments to make about UNRRA. The report is a lengthy one, and I shall not load Hansard with quotations from it. Professor Harrison makes it clear that UNRRA is trying to do a good job, but that it is handicapped by lack of competent and efficient personnel in the areas in which its work is being carried on. He points out further that it is hampered by a lack of the kind of cooperation which should exist between UNRRA and the military authorities. The whole picture is one of a noble idea failing for lack of the support it should have. All of this underlies the point I am trying to make, namely, that we have not yet had the imagination to see in UNRRA just as great a challenge as we had in the war itself. In fact, the challenge is really far greater.

I am not criticizing the government for anything it has done in connection with UNRRA, and most certainly I am not criticizing the Minister of Finance when he asks for $25 million. That sum is far too small, and my criticism is that we in Canada have not done enough for this organization. It has been treated as a sort of step-child in the hope that somehow it will grow up and be able to do the job assigned to it. The other day the Minister of Finance made this statement about the $25 million he is asking for UNRRA under the terms of the resolution now before the house. I quote from page 564 of Hansard for September 28:

> This is intended to enable us to furnish, before the end of our fiscal year, a portion of a second contribution to UNRRA, which the Canadian government has agreed to make, provided that the United States and other contributing nations will also make a second contribution.

I suppose that that is the way a minister of the crown would put it, and that is the way governments have to act. I do feel, however, that Canada should be not holding back in this fashion and saying; We will do so and so, provided that somebody else does his part.

The fate of civilization depends upon whether or not our generation has the imagination and the capacity to rehabilitate a world which we have had to tear apart by war. I plead with those in authority, with the government and with parliament, to face the seriousness of the question. I urge that we do our best not only here but in our constituencies and throughout the country to arouse interest in UNRRA and other related activities. We have here some of the most glorious opportunities for service ever presented to any generation.

I take second place to no one in my concern for the people of Canada. Hon. members will recognize the persistence with which I have pleaded the lot of old age pensioners, and all citizens of this country whose problems need to be fought on the floor of this house. Hon. members will recall the fights I make for housing, and for the improvement of many adverse conditions found here in Canada. But alongside of that I emphasize the fact that it is useless for us to try to build up our own standard of living and our own situation here in this dominion if we are to let the world go to rack and ruin, as will happen if something is not done about living conditions in the countries that have been torn by war.

As I indicated when I rose, in speaking of the plight of the peoples in Europe I took as my motif the fact that none of us is free so long as there is bondage or slavery anywhere. I want to say a word especially about the plight of the Jewish people in Europe. I have referred already to the Harrison report which was made to President Truman, the full text of which appeared in last Sunday's New York Times. Professor Harrison summed up the plight of the Jewish people in Europe at the present time when he said to President Truman:

> As matters now stand, we appear to be treating the Jews as the nazis treated them, except that we do not exterminate them. They are in concentration camps in large numbers under our military guard instead of S.S. troops. One is led to wonder whether the German people, seeing this, are not supposing that we are following or at least condoning nazi policy.

That is a terrible statement. Professor Harrison gives the details of what he meant. He relates stories of the barbed wire behind which many Jews are still languishing. He describes the horrible plight of these people, hungry, displaced, not knowing where their friends and relatives are, many of them without medical care or adequate clothing. Some of these people, to their chagrin, are forced to wear German S.S. uniforms, with the result that they are subject to all kinds of abuse. Hon. members will have noticed from the press that President Truman was greatly exercised over this report and that he has given orders to General Eisenhower to take immediate steps to see that something is done about the whole situation.

It does seem to some of us that it is a sad state of affairs that this race of people, who have been the pawns of so many cross-currents and conflicts down through the history of mankind, should once again, just at a time when we thought we had finished with the horrors of war and were about to begin to build a new world, find themselves facing such hopeless and pitiful circumstances. I feel that I am only being human in rising in this parliament of Canada to express the hope that something will be done without delay to provide relief for these people from the sufferings they are undergoing.

Professor Harrison makes a number of recommendations in his report. The one he makes most strongly in that President Truman use his good offices to secure the abrogation of the MacDonald white paper of 1939 which prohibited, with a slight exception for five years, Jewish immigration to Palestine. Those who have been following the press on this point will know what has happened in the past few days. They will know that President Truman and Prime Minister Attlee have been in correspondence on this whole matter. We all recognize what a thorny question it is because of the position the Arabs are taking with respect to any change in Palestine policy. Incidentally I hold in my hand copies of an exchange of telegrams between the Mufti of Jerusalem and Hitler regarding the war in north Africa, made at a time when the armies of Rommel were rolling westward. I should like to quote the last sentence in one of the Mufti's telegrams to Hitler. It reads:

> The Arab people will further continue to fight on your side against the common enemy up to ultimate victory.

I suggest that these are not people to whom we should be applying any policy of appeasement; yet I am not one to belittle the tremendous problem facing those who are concerned about the situation in the Balkans, the Mediterranean and the near east. The whole question is one that should lie heavily on the conscience of the world. Hon. members will recognize my wholehearted support of the government now in power in Great Britain, and in saying that I speak for the whole of this group. But we insist that the British government must carry out its pledge to re-open Palestine to Jewish immigration. The leader of this group, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), to-day issued a press release in which he said in part:

> The C.C.F. has officially stated its opposition to the unfair and discriminatory white paper. The permission for fifteen hundred Jews to enter Palestine monthly is pathetically inadequate for their needs. They must be allowed to enter their national homeland in larger numbers. Only in Palestine have they been permitted to build a progressive and cooperative society. Their record there, in terms of both social and economic justice, speaks for itself.

The C.C.F. has sent cables to the Right Honourable Clement Attlee, Prime Minister of Great Britain, and to Morgan Phillips, secretary of the British Labour party, urging that the British government give every consideration to a revised white paper which will provide European Jewry with the freedom to migrate to, and live in the mandated territory of Palestine.

The leader of this group sent that out on our behalf, and I take this occasion to say that we believe the hands of the British government need to be strengthened in this matter. We feel they are right in saying that any action which might result in trouble—I believe such threats are only a bluff, but the possibility has to be faced—should be taken as a joint responsibility by the British people and the people of the United States, perhaps indeed by the peoples of all the united nations. It is because I feel that the British government should have its hands strengthened in its effort to do the right thing in connection with this matter that I raise my voice in this parliament. I dare to assume that most hon. members will agree with me that the doors of Palestine should be opened, and that these people, who, God knows, have suffered down through the years far more than any human beings should have had to suffer, should get some relief from the terrible conditions which they have had to face in Europe during these last few years, and which, sad to say, appear to exist in Europe even at the present time.

I hope that the government of this country will interest itself in this whole matter and, along with the United States, declare to the British government its readiness to stand with them in connection with any policy that that government feels it should take for improving the position of these people.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Would the hon. member go so far as to say that Canada should provide soldiers to fight the Arabs to protect these people, if it should come to that?

Mr. KNOWLES: That is the kind of question which it is difficult to answer because it is hypothetical, for I firmly believe that the position taken by the Arabs is one of bluff.

Mr. MERRITT: Is the hon. member aware that only within the last week the British government has had to send a parachute division to Palestine?

Mr. KNOWLES: I am quite aware of that. I am also aware of the complications that have arisen because of the position taken by certain sections in India with respect to this whole question. I could indulge in a cross-fire argument, Mr. Speaker, but that is something I am anxious to avoid at this time.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I was not being critical at all.

Mr. KNOWLES: I fully recognize that. My reason for trying to avoid argument is that I am trying to put this matter on such a plane that it will command unanimous support. The hon. gentlemen who have questioned me know what their own answers would be, but even so I detected in their words a note of sympathy with the position I am taking, and I pass that sympathy along to the government of the day.

I want to speak for a moment or two about another matter which, although on first thought, it may seem to be unrelated to what I have been discussing, is closely connected with this whole question of our playing some part in relieving the suffering that the war has left in its wake around the world. We cannot play our part simply by a national clothing collection such as we are having this month, no matter how much effort we put into that campaign. If we are to play our part in helping to rehabilitate war-torn Europe we should seek to maintain the level of production in this country at its war-time height, and so I urge again upon the government that it reconsider its whole policy of reconversion and its plans with regard to post-war employment. As I study the government's plans and try to see their point of view, it seems to me that they are thinking too much in terms of the needs of this country solely on the basis of the income that our people have or may have during the next few years. We should be planning our production not only to meet the needs of the people of this country, but also to be able to render some real contribution to the rehabilitation of war-torn countries.

In that connection I think, for example, of a plant like MacDonald Brothers aircraft factory in Winnipeg, which instead of being more or less idle to-day might be used for the making of prefabricated houses for shipment to these countries. It is a tremendous undertaking, Mr. Speaker, if one lets his imagination play upon it, for us to make the kind of contribution that I envisage. But I come back to this. What we undertook in the war was a tremendous task. If the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply had been told in 1939 that under their direction, if you want to put it that way, we would be producing in this country the volume of goods and services and munitions and supplies that we did produce in 1943 and 1944, I doubt that they would have believed it possible for us to do it. But it was undertaken because of the necessity of the task that lay before us. There is now the task of rebuilding the world which we have torn asunder, and we now should be producing with the same determination that we displayed during the war. My contention is that the whole question of what shall be done with war plants, and our plans for reconversion, production and employment, should be worked out not just in terms of our own internal economy, but in terms also of what we can do to meet the needs of the world as they face us at the present time.

I might call to the attention of the government—I shall not take time to go into detail—the representations that have been made by both the major labour congresses in this country on reconversion and employment. I would urge upon the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply—I hope they will not think I am actuated by political considerations, because I am very serious—that Canada play its maximum part in producing sufficient goods and services to help rebuild the world and give us a chance to achieve the peace which we hope will be permanent after all the sacrifices we have gone through during these past six years.

Mr. BLACKMORE: May I ask by what means the hon. member proposes that the government should raise the money with which to buy the products of all these Canadian factories so as to render them available to the peoples of the world, perhaps through some such scheme as UNRRA?

Mr. KNOWLES: The government did not have much difficulty in raising the money, as the hon. member himself has often pointed out to the Minister of Finance, to purchase the supplies required for war. In fact, year after year when the Minister of Finance brought down his budget he simply borrowed the money that was required to balance the budget, partly from the chartered banks and partly from the Bank of Canada. The Minister of Finance himself said many a time—I note that he is in his seat and can correct me if I am wrong—that the huge expenditures of money we were making were not to be regarded as sums taken from a board which had to be put back, but were an index of our greatly increased production. When hon. members to my right and to my left have taunted the Minister of Finance about the size of the national debt, his reply has always been that if we would keep up our level of production we could handle any national debt that might develop under his financial leadership. I have my own ideas which I could go into if there were time, but I simply say that I think that the experience of the war years, even under a Liberal capitalist administration, has shown that it can be done if only we have the will. This is coming dangerously close to a political discussion, but I think hon. members will recognize from the tone of my remarks that I rose to-day not for such a purpose, but to speak on what seems to me is the task before us at this time, namely, that we should be gearing our economic activities, our production and our reconversion programme, not only to improving the standing of living in Canada, but also to playing our maximum part in the rebuilding of a war-torn world.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would I be safe in assuming from the hon. member's reply that he would favour adding to the national debt of Canada at the colossal rate to which we have become accustomed during the war?

Mr. KNOWLES: The hon. member is not safe in assuming that at all. My quarrel with the Minister of Finance is that while I believe his declaration to be true that our huge war expenditures have been only an index of our increased production, he has permitted that index—simply a matter of figures—to be turned into additions to the national debt on which interest has to be paid for all time. That means taking a portion out of the national income each year from now on and giving it to a privileged few, which as I see it is completely unrealistic, and fails to recognize the basic factors in the production of goods and services, which are human labour and raw material.

I have had quite a bit to say about our producing and sending overseas supplies of one kind and another. There is one kind of material, however, which I hope Canada will stop sending to certain countries I could name. I confess, despite the explanations about it in the press which I have seen from the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon), to considerable concern over the shipment of aluminum to Spain this year. I am not going to make an issue out of it at this point, or debate it at length, but I want to put on record the fact of such shipment as it was contained in sessional paper 145 tabled yesterday by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in response to questions which I had placed on the order paper. In this return the minister indicates that from January 1 to August 31, 1945, Canada shipped aluminum in bars, blocks, ingots, sheets, et cetera, to Spain, in the amount of 4,408,500 pounds. That is the fifth largest quantity sent to the various countries to which we exported aluminum this year. I may make it a little plainer: we have exported aluminum to twenty countries thus far in 1945. The largest quantities have gone to the United Kingdom, the United States, Russia and Switzerland, and the next largest is to Spain. Bearing in mind the political situation in Spain, and the experiences we have had with that country over the last number of years; bearing in mind too—I will try to say this with all the reserve of which I am capable, but I feel very deeply about it—the years past when we shipped scrap iron and other war materials to aggressor nations, I cannot but be deeply concerned that already we should be shipping this material, which is so useful in war, to a fascist nation. I hope that some member of the government will explain this, or, better still, indicate to us that it will be stopped. Let us this time refrain from sending war materials to any country which might use them for further aggression.

With that reservation, Mr. Speaker, I urge with all the power that I can that the government, parliament and the country put its shoulder to the wheel and get on with the tremendous task and the great opportunities which are presented to us in the aims and activities of UNRRA.

Mr. E. D. FULTON (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate because I want to discuss one point which has already been raised; but before I come to that particular point, in view of the fact that a week-end has intervened since this debate started, and yesterday was private members' day, I crave the indulgence of hon. members while I run over some of the matters which have been raised, in order to make clear the subject with which I wish to deal.

In introducing this resolution the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) pointed out that we were being asked to approve the raising of a great deal of money, and at the present time the main purpose, as I understood it, was that the defence estimates might be got through.

The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) followed. Speaking, I might say, on behalf of the official opposition, he outlined the four principles which we feel should govern Canada in her attitude toward defence matters. The four principles, I should like to recall to hon. members, were: first, that Canada should maintain sufficient forces to guarantee the defence of Canada and also to enable us to fulfil whatever might be our commitments to the united nations organization; second, that the efficiency of those forces must be our prime consideration; third, that the forces must be allied with scientific developments; fourth, that there should be the maximum coordination of developments and practice with Great Britain and the United States in respect of our armed forces. Finally he suggested that there should be a parliamentary committee on defence along the lines of the military and naval affairs committees of the United States congress, in order that hon. members might be better informed as to the requirements for defence and keep the people of Canada better informed on these subjects.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), I am glad to say, supported in principle all the suggestions which had been outlined by the hon. member for Vancouver South. We had further talks from the leader of the Social Credit group in this house (Mr. Low) and from the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), both of whom spoke in very fine terms of the prospects of peace under the united nations charter. The hon. member for Lake Centre directed the attention of the house to the question whether the moneys which we are to be asked to vote will be expended exclusively under orders in council under the terms of the emergency War Measures Act. He asked the specific question, is the war at an end? Do the provisions of the emergency War Measures Act govern all our actions? That is the point with which I wish to deal this afternoon.

I was going to base my stand on the statement that it is time, in my view, that we restore to parliament all its liberties and its privileges and recover in full the democratic system of government. I must confess that I had some doubts put into my mind in listening to the speech of the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) when we were supposed to be discussing the question of the relief of settlers under the Soldiers Settlement Act, and he discussed Liberal candidates and how it was that he and the other Liberal members for Saskatchewan had been elected; how it was that the hon. member for Lake Centre was elected, and then the question of the size of families and the amounts of payments under the Family Allowances Act; and we even discussed—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. member that that question has been decided.

Mr. FULTON: I defer to your ruling. I was not trying to reopen the discussion; I was merely referring to it in connection with my own point. However, I will pass on to other matters.

Dealing directly with the question of whether or not we should allow ourselves to be governed under the provisions of the War Measures Act, I wish to refer again to the wording of that act. We find these words in section 6 of the act. I should like to explain that after certain powers have been conferred, or perhaps after certain powers exercisable by the governor in council have been outlined in sections 3, 4 and 5 of the act, section 6 goes on to say:

> The provisions of the three sections last preceding shall only be in force during war, invasion, or insurrection, real or apprehended.

I wish to make it clear that it is only during war, invasion or insurrection that the powers exercisable under the emergency War Measures Act can be fairly invoked. How do we decide whether a state of war, invasion or insurrection exists? I shall refer hon. members to the provisions of section 2 of the act which reads as follows:

> The issue of a proclamation by His Majesty, or under the authority of the governor in council shall be conclusive evidence that war, invasion, or insurrection, real or apprehended, exists . . .

The section goes on to say that:

> . . . until by the issue of a further proclamation it is declared that the war, invasion, or insurrection no longer exists.

Therefore we are in this position, that the decision as to whether or not a state of war, invasion or insurrection exists is squarely up to the governor in council, a matter to be decided by the cabinet. I would direct the attention of the responsible ministers and of all hon. members to the fact that it is not a question of whether or not a state of emergency exists; there is no mention of emergency in the act in that connection. It is a question of whether or not a state of war, invasion or insurrection exists.

I should like to remind hon. members again that there is a great deal of significance attached to this question; because if it is decided that a state of war, invasion or insurrection exists, then certain things can be done by order in council, for instance, all the things which are to be done under the provisions of the bill, the resolution for which is now before the house. I should like to read the provisions of that resolution which are to be found at page 546 of Hansard:

> Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:
> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide, inter alia . . .

I shall read only part of the resolution, but I should like to make it clear that the parts I am leaving out do not alter the sense.

> 1. That sums . . . be granted to His Majesty towards defraying any expenses . . . that may be incurred . . . under the authority of the governor in council . . . for
> (a) the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada.

Those are very wide terms. Under the terms of the resolution there is very little that cannot be done by order in council. Consider the wording "the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada". These words give to the cabinet even wider powers than are given to the dominion parliament under section 91 of the British North America Act. I should like to read the relevant words of section 91, which read as follows:

> It shall be lawful for the queen, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons . . .
> To enact these things:
> . . . to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Canada.

We now have it "for the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada." These powers are as wide as, in fact they are wider than, the powers originally given to parliament under the British North America Act. Further, the resolution contains these powers:

> . . . for the carrying out of any measure deemed necessary or advisable by the governor in council in consequence of the war.

If we allow that sort of thing to continue we are completely, and possibly for all time, surrendering the rights of parliament; we are giving to the governor in council powers for making and carrying out any measure deemed necessary or advisable in consequence of the war. That covers everything.

I again read from the terms of the resolution:

> For the expeditious demobilization of the Canadian armed forces.

That is to be carried out by order in council. Do we wish, Mr. Speaker—and I ask hon. members to consider this carefully—to entrust the cabinet with all the power to make every regulation with regard to demobilization? I submit that if we do so we are denying the democratic principle of responsible government. Under that system we are the ones who are supposed to decide on the validity or advisability of any measure introduced by the government of Canada, or any detail of the government of this country. Although under certain circumstances we may be justified in surrendering our responsibilities or handing over our responsibilities for a limited time, we are only justified in handing them over to those who by their attitude and actions show that they themselves are responsible persons and will safeguard the rights and privileges that we ourselves have put into their safekeeping. I suggest to the careful consideration of hon. members that we should not hand over the powers to make final and complete regulations for the demobilization of our armed forces when the minister himself seems reluctant to assume the responsibility of making those regulations, when he seeks as he sought in this house on September 24 to hand over the responsibility to a general of the armed forces. I submit that is putting us in a position where, if we criticize the decisions taken, we are criticizing an officer overseas, not a responsible officer of the department, but an officer in charge of the armed forces. That is a denial of the principle of responsible government, and for my part I am not willing to hand over those responsibilities which I should exercise, if they are to be exercised in that manner.

In considering further the matter of demobilization of our armed forces I would ask this question: For whom did those forces fight, for the cabinet ministers, or for Canada? I think the answer is obvious, that they fought for Canada. Then, I suggest that it is up to us, the elected representatives of Canada and of those armed forces, to see to it that the regulations for their demobilization are approved by us before they are put into effect. If we adopt the other attitude I suggest we are going to allow all matters of defence policy to be determined by order in council.

Here I wish to refer to an incident which took place the other day. I should like to read an article which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of September 29, 1945. The dispatch is dated Vancouver, September 28, and reads:

> Canada's peace-time navy, "much larger" than before the war, will be divided evenly between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, it was announced here to-day by Rear Admiral V. C. Brodeur, R.C.N., commanding officer, Pacific coast.
> Admiral Brodeur said at a press conference the post-war navy will include cruisers, aircraft carriers, destroyers and frigates but no corvettes. Ships, men and training facilities would be divided fifty-fifty basis between the two coasts.

I will not read the whole dispatch, but this officer went on to describe in detail the constitution of the navy. This is the most complete statement of policy to have been made available to this house as yet on the subject of naval affairs; and this statement of policy came not from the responsible minister of the department or a responsible official, but from a naval officer in Vancouver, some three thousand miles away from this building, although the naval estimates were scheduled to come up first and the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) had asked for an over-all statement of defence policy, which as yet he has not received. We were supposed to discuss and consider those estimates; that was our responsibility, but the only clue we are given is in this statement, made in Vancouver.

[Mr. Fulton.]

I realize that perhaps it does not do for a new member to come here and appear to lecture the house or responsible ministers of the crown, and I pause here to make sure to myself that I am not standing up here lecturing. I had certain ideas as to the responsibility of my job when I should come here, and as to the seriousness of that responsibility. I am surprised and alarmed to find that under the present set-up, so long as we have a continuation of this system of government by order in council, however well intentioned may be the motives behind those orders in council, I am not exercising my responsibility; and I feel that I cannot allow this situation to continue without bringing it to the attention of the other members of this house so that we may have an open and frank discussion on this matter and I may be informed in the net result as to whether or not I may have an overdeveloped sense of responsibility. I do not think I have, and that is why I am bringing this matter into the open.

To continue this discussion, this being the situation: the powers which I have described, and which appear in the terms of this resolution, being available to the government, to be exercised by order in council, with the serious consequences I have indicated in the matter of our own handing-over of responsibility, together with the fact that the existence of this situation depends upon the decision by the cabinet as to whether or not war, invasion or insurrection exists, I think we are entitled to call on the cabinet and on the responsible ministers to consider that question seriously and fairly. When the matter was brought up by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) we saw in the attitude of the ministers of the crown indications that they have not considered it either seriously or fairly. The hon. member for Lake Centre read extracts from an opinion given by the council of the Canadian Bar Association. I should like to refresh the memory of hon. members by reading part of that opinion again:

> Your committee is of opinion that the state of war cannot and should not, even by the authority of a statute, be deemed to continue to exist when the war itself is over. Let us make the distinction here between the war emergency itself, which is the fact of a state of war, and an economic emergency which, though a consequence following the war, is not the war emergency itself. If the federal administration feel that there may exist, after the war, in relation to the economic condition of the country, a state of emergency of a most serious character, and national in scope, let them face the issue squarely, and submit to parliament a new law, so as to affirm the existence, or the apprehension, and determine the exact nature, of that new emergency.

Hon. members will recall the attitude adopted by certain ministers of the crown when the hon. member for Lake Centre read that opinion. They will recall the attitude of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Abbott) and also, I think, the inference correctly drawn therefrom by the hon. member for Lake Centre. I should like to read that exchange, referring to page 577 of Hansard.

Mr. Abbott: Which member wrote the opinion?

A little further down:

Mr. Diefenbaker: The chairman of the committee was Gustave Monette, K.C., of Montreal.

Mr. Abbott: That is why I asked the question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Surely the Minister of National Defence does not suggest that the following members of the bar . . .

Then he named a list of distinguished members of the bar.

. . . would allow the signing of a report with respect to their understanding of the law to be influenced because a certain man happened to be chairman?

That is the inference drawn from the attitude taken by the Minister of National Defence which, in considering a constitutional question of this importance, I submit was a most irresponsible attitude. Yet this is a member of the cabinet which is asking to have all these powers, exercisable by order in council, vested in it. I should like to read further from the report of the Canadian Bar Association, this time from the report of the committee on legislation affecting civil liberties, as contained in the minutes of the mid-winter council meeting, at page 33:

Your committee reports that no further progress has been made towards obtaining the privilege of viewing legislation in the form of orders in council and board orders prior to adoption, in order that suggestions for the preservation of public rights might be made. After the experience with order 294 of the rentals administration section of the wartime prices and trade board, where any suggestions along the lines mentioned were invariably ruled out as being interference with policy, it was felt that there was little point in pressing matters as it was obvious that bureaucratic policy and preservation of civil liberties were incompatible. . . .

And further:

Your committee's conclusion must be that there is no hope for relief from this most undemocratic form of dictatorship under the guise of legislation, and that so long as persons having no real responsibility to constitutional forms of government are given the power to regulate the rights of the individual, many of those rights will continue to be subject to the kind of totalitarian rule which the free peoples are fighting to abolish from the world.

That report is signed by R. M. Willes Chitty, in case the Minister of National Defence may be interested. The point I am trying to make here is that responsible persons outside the government, acting in good faith—legal experts—have reviewed this situation and come to certain conclusions. I submit that these conclusions on matters affecting civil liberty should have the most serious consideration of all hon. members of this house, including the members of the cabinet. Therefore I should like to read, for the Minister of National Defence especially, a previous report written while the war emergency existed, and by that I mean while the war was actually going on. This is a report of the same committee on civil liberties, which appears at page 600 of the "Canadian Bar Review" for 1944.

Whatever opinion anyone might have as to any possible abuse by the federal authorities, or their delegated boards, of the wide powers so granted to them, and in spite of the civil encroachments this war legislation has developed against the liberty of the subject, your committee feel that this association ought not to do anything that might appear to antagonize, or even directly criticize, the principle of full control, during the war, of the citizen, his liberty, property and activities, to the extent that the government deem necessary for the safety of the nation. The government alone have full information of the necessities of the hour, and however well informed we, of this association, may be, we should not assume the risk of embarrassing in the least degree the government of the country in the paramount task of winning the war.

That was an opinion written in 1944, while the war was on, by the same body which submitted in 1945 a report at which the Minister of National Defence scoffs. I do not notice the government crying out against the terms of this report, and therefore I imagine it must be most acceptable to them. I should like to draw to the attention of the minister the fact that this report of 1944 is signed by Gustave Monette, chairman.

Possibly the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) will be pleased to know that, in order to relieve him of any anxiety, I do intend to refer to the statement of the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Ilsley) in which he referred to the setting up of the Canadian information board. At the moment I am not referring to the question whether or not some such information service is desirable; I do not refer to that at all. But I do object most strenuously to the manner of constituting that board, while parliament is in session, when the war emergency has passed. I object to doing this by order in council, and without having referred the matter previously to the house.

After what I have said I would repeat the question asked on Friday last, I believe it was, by the hon. member for Lake Centre. I would ask hon. members to bear in mind what I have said, and the attitude which in my opinion should govern in a situation of this kind. This is what we find at page 576 of Hansard where the hon. member for Lake Centre is questioning the Acting Prime Minister:

Mr. Diefenbaker: . . . Are we still at war, within the provisions of the War Measures Act, or are we not? That is the question I am asking.
Mr. Ilsley: The answer is yes.
Mr. Diefenbaker: What is that?
Mr. Ilsley: The answer is yes.
Mr. Diefenbaker: "The answer is yes?"
Mr. Ilsley: Yes.
Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the legal opinion that is given, is it?
Mr. Ilsley: Yes.
Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the legal opinion given by law officers of the crown?
Mr. Ilsley: Yes.

There can be no doubt that in the minds of the members of the cabinet, as represented in the statement of the Acting Prime Minister, we are still at war under the provisions of the War Measures Act, although it must be confessed that we have not yet seen the opinion given by the law officers of the crown.

If this is so, I suggest that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is not of the same opinion as the other members of his cabinet. His actions, his mental attitude and the precedent he has set are entirely different. In substantiation of that claim I would read to hon. members part of the statement made by the Prime Minister when he told us that he intended to go to the United Kingdom and to other countries in Europe. I submit that the statement of principle outlined by the Prime Minister, which influenced him in arriving at his decision to go over there is an exact statement of those principles which should govern us in asking the government of this country to hand back to us those rights which we voluntarily surrendered in war time.

I would ask hon. members to follow those portions of the Prime Minister's speech, which I shall read, to see if they do not agree with me when I state that the parallel is almost exact. Again I cannot take time to read the whole of the speech made by the Prime Minister on that occasion, but so far as I have been able, in respect of each excerpt I have taken care not to alter the general sense. Turning first to page 492 we find the Prime Minister reported as follows:

The world is still in a very troubled state. . . . These last months have seen many changes in Europe, brought new persons into responsible office and faced them with new problems.

[Mr. Fulton.]

I submit that exactly the same is true of Canada. Then he continues:

We in Canada are directly concerned with the solutions which they are seeking to these problems.

We in the House of Commons of Canada are very much concerned with the solutions which are found to our Canadian problems. Hon. members will realize that I am quoting from the Prime Minister's speech and then tracing the parallel which I claim appears.

Then, further down on page 492 he says:

In the shaping of the new world order, a good start must be made in the right direction during these next critical months. Decisions that will have to be taken during the coming months may shape and determine the kind of world we are going to live in.

I submit that exactly the same is true of the situation in Canada. Decisions which are taken in the coming months may determine whether we shall live under a full and free democratic system, or under a system of controls, bureaucracy and semi-totalitarianism.

Then the Prime Minister went on to say that certain questions—

. . . are important, but in the last analysis, many of them are of less consequence, even to the countries whose interests they affect most immediately, than are questions of attitudes and objectives. . . . What kind of world do we really wish to live in? What sort of effort are we ready to make to realize it?

What then, I ask hon. members, is our attitude to responsible government? What is our attitude to democracy? That is the important thing. It is more important even than the fact that something may be done more expeditiously by order in council. That is the frame of mind which induced the Prime Minister to take the serious step of leaving this House of Commons, and going to the United Kingdom.

What sort of effort are we making, what sort of effort are we ready to make to realize the kind of world we want to live in? With deference I would ask other hon. members to apply that question to themselves: What sort of effort are we ready to make to get back the power to carry out those rights and duties that are ours, an effort which I submit we can no longer shirk?

Then the Prime Minister goes on to say:

It is important that Canada should not merely be consulted, but that there should be clear recognition of Canada's right to effective participation in the great decisions where questions affecting the general ordering of the future peace of the world are under consideration.

It is important that parliament should not be merely consulted, but that there should be a clear recognition of our right to take part in decisions affecting our national life. The Prime Minister continues:

During the war, for military reasons, it was necessary to acquiesce in the operation of war-time arrangements under which responsibility for major decisions on the direction of the allied war effort was concentrated in a very few hands.

This is similar to the process of handing over to the cabinet the power of government by order in council. Then he proceeds to say:

The continued use of methods such as were improvised to meet the urgent strain and hazards of war, whereby private settlements are arrived at between the great powers on issues of general interest, might well become a source of difficulty and even of danger.

I submit, finally, that now that the war is over, the continuation of those methods which we voluntarily allowed to be set up for the purpose of winning the war, will certainly become a source of potential danger and difficulty.

I should like to conclude my remarks by saying again that I do not intend to be taken as standing up and lecturing to this house or to the government. But I do feel that, however well intentioned the ministers of the crown may be in continuing to exercise their powers under orders in council, it is the mere fact of the continuation which constitutes the danger, not the motive in the minds of the ministers. I realize, as has been said here so often, that they are under a tremendous burden. They want to get things done expeditiously, quickly and efficiently. For the time being they consider it more efficient to carry on by order in council. We let time go on and the same thing is said again. In the meantime we get into the habit of government by order in council. It seems to be a good method of carrying on government and the ministers become a little more reluctant to part with their powers, but still with the best of motives. That I submit is where the danger lies. I want to make it perfectly clear that I am not questioning the motives of any minister in any of the remarks I have made to-day. I am merely asking the question: Have we not arrived at the stage when we must consider whether a continuation of this procedure offers a greater danger to our final achievement of full democracy than the possible loss of efficiency which may result if we stop government by order in council now?

For myself I am inclined to think the greater danger is in continuing government by order in council. Should the situation which I have in mind ever develop—and it may develop as a result of this practice of government by order in council—then all the sacrifices, all the efforts, all the losses and all the heart-break of the past six years will have been worthless. Therefore I feel justified in taking the time of this house to ask all hon. members to give serious consideration to this question.

(Translation) Mr. Speaker, I spoke briefly this afternoon on the restoration of the powers of parliament. To my mind parliament is the guardian of all our rights, both individual and civil, and even though we may have agreed, under the stress of war to waive our rights voluntarily, nevertheless, at this time when the emergency period has ended, we must insist upon the restoration of those rights and privileges which are inherent in the democratic system; otherwise, we shall be guilty of having betrayed the democratic cause for which we have fought.

I regret very much that my knowledge of the French language is not yet perfect, but I have begun this week to take lessons. Finally, I ask all my fellow-citizens to believe that I voice their feelings or their thoughts when I say that we should uphold our rights so that the Canadian people may enjoy that democratic freedom which is guaranteed to them under the existing constitution.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) (Translation): May I offer my most sincere congratulations to the hon. member who has just resumed his seat. As regards the statement he made when he informed us that he had begun this week to take French lessons, I must say that this is the second occasion on which I have heard him express himself in French in this house and I am sure that he has not begun the study of that language this week only since he has already acquired a fluency on which I congratulate him most heartily. I wish that he may frequently use the French language when participating in the debates of this house.

(Text) Mr. Speaker, I perhaps should offer a word of explanation for the fact that it is now twenty minutes to six on Tuesday evening when I rise to answer some questions that were suggested by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) on Friday afternoon as being proper to be asked. I rise at this time because the hon. member finished his speech just about six o'clock on Friday afternoon; yesterday was taken up with matters which were appropriate to be discussed on a private member's day and when I came into the chamber this afternoon I found that Mr. Speaker had arranged for three hon. members to be heard before I could have an opportunity of making any answer. The delay certainly is not because I did not wish to make an answer. The hon. member asked, as reported on page 573 of Hansard:

When will the proclamation be made that will terminate war in so far as the powers of the War Measures Act are concerned?

Then the hon. member went on to ask if the government suggested that to-day we are in the midst of war. He wanted to know if the minister suggested that it could continue the operation of the War Measures Act for one, two or three years or more hence when the government might by proclamation declare the war to be over. He stated that this was a matter of grave importance to the people of this country, and he wanted to know if powers were being exercised by the government to-day which were beyond the competence of the government to carry into effect.

That certainly is a serious question. It would be a serious situation for the Canadian people if any government undertook to exercise powers for which there was no legal basis. I can quite appreciate the concern that is felt in that regard. However, I think it is proper again to direct attention to the terms of the statute which it was found advisable to enact in 1914 at the time the first great war broke out.

The hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) has expressed his views as to government by order in council, but I am sure that is not just what the hon. member meant. Of course government must be by order in council or by decisions of the ministers composing the council. It is quite a different matter though to have legislation by order in council. I take it that when the hon. member decried government by order in council he meant legislation by order in council. Under the terms of the British North America Act, which states that this country wished to have a constitution modeled upon that of the United Kingdom, it was declared in section 9:

The executive government and authority of and over Canada is hereby declared to continue and be vested in the queen.

That power is exercised by a high officer, styled the Governor General, on advice of the council composed of members responsible to the elected chamber, but the legislative power is to be exercised by His Majesty with the consent of the Senate and the House of Commons. When one complains of government by order in council I take it that what he means is the exercise of legislative powers by the governor in council.

It has been well established that the governor in council has no legislative powers that are not expressly given to him by parliament. He cannot exercise legislative powers without their being powers delegated to him by some act of parliament. This act of 1914 was passed by a government which was formerly composed of some gentlemen still members of the Progressive Conservative party; they submitted to parliament a bill asking parliament in case of war to edelegate to His Excellency in Council legislative powers that otherwise would have to be exercised by the ordinary procedure of bills introduced into one or other of the houses, read three times in each and adopted in the usual form. That parliament decided that that was a wise thing to do and adopted the statute which is now chapter 206 of the revised statutes of 1927.

There had to be some definite point at which the delegation would commence and at which the delegation would end, and that parliament, not the parliament of which the members of the present government were members but the parliament of 1914, said that the delegation would start when the governor in council proclaimed that a state of war existed; that that proclamation would be conclusive as to the starting point, and that the delegation would continue until the governor in council declared by proclamation that the state of war which brought about the delegation had ceased.

There was a proclamation in September, 1939, that a state of war existed, and that proclamation is still in force. Actual hostilities have ceased, but the state of war still exists at the present time, and that state of war created a situation which had to be dealt with by the exercise of the powers which had been delegated for the purpose under the statute.

Hon. members ask: When are these powers to be handed back? They will not be handed back. They will cease to be exercisable certainly when there is a proclamation saying that the war has ended. They will be diminished; they have been diminishing by the cessation of hostilities—

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: If the minister would permit a question at this stage, does he argue that if the government decided not to issue the proclamation for two, three or four years, that delegation under the War Measures Act would be continued?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, I was just dealing with that very thing when the hon. member rose to put his question. I say that even now the extent covered by the delegation has already been diminished by reason of the changing situation which has occurred, and that has been recognized.

The situation is this. Under normal conditions there is a distribution of legislative powers by the British North America Act, and property and civil rights are within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures. But it has been decided that when a state of war arises property and civil rights have to be dealt with under other than their normal aspects; they have to be dealt with in the interests of the security and safety of the state as a whole; and because of that, the ordinary jurisdiction of parliament is enlarged. Parliament at no time can delegate more than it has. When it has, because of a state of war, a wider jurisdiction than it has normally, and it delegates all its powers, it delegates more than it could delegate in normal times. An act such as the War Measures Act could, if it were thought desirable to do so, be passed at any time. I do not think there has been a parliament since confederation that has not delegated some legislative function to the governor in council. The right to delegate does not depend upon the existence or non-existence of war. What depends on the existence or non-existence of war is the enlarged jurisdiction that parliament can exercise during war.

The hon. gentleman has asked whether if a government chose to delay issuing the proclamation, would it continuously be empowered to exercise by order in council the whole of the powers of parliament with the possible exception of taxation and the appropriation of money, because the supreme court in a case which went before it said it was not deciding whether that had been or could be delegated because of the terms of sections 53 and 54 of the British North America Act? But if a government chose to do a thing of that kind it would not be proceeding within the spirit of the War Measures Act.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What recourse would a person have?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: A member of parliament would have recourse by introducing at any time a bill to repeal the War Measures Act. The government is a committee of members of parliament, exercising powers because of the confidence placed in them by a majority in the House of Commons, and with no other right to do anything but the one that is based upon that fact.

I was not present when this statute was drafted. My impression on reading it is that the terms of section 2 were put there, not because it was felt that the powers would be abused, but because it was felt that there would have to be a definite starting point and a definite terminating date and that a government responsible to the House of Commons would properly comply with what would be supposed to be the desires of parliament and would make the proclamation at the proper time.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There were only 450 orders in council issued under the War Measures Act in the last war.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If the hon. member will wait, I will give the exact number of orders in council that have been passed.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Under the War Measures Act?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Not necessarily under the War Measures Act, because government has to be by order in council. I think I had better give the figures right away.

From September 1, 1939, up to September 28, 1945, the number of orders in council, including minutes of council, approved by the governor in council, totalled 58,402. During the same period the number of treasury board minutes passed was 36,329. Therefore the total number of formal acts of the governor in council during this period is 94,731.

Treasury board minutes deal almost entirely with appointments, resignations and other personnel matters in the civil service; with payments to firms and persons for services rendered; with remissions of taxes and the like. They represent approximately thirty-six to thirty-seven per cent of the total number of acts by the governor in council.

The total also includes minutes of council passed under the Munitions and Supply Act, authorizing contracts for the supply of goods or services necessary for the prosecution of the war. This group represents forty to forty-five per cent of the total.

About sixteen per cent consists of orders in council and minutes of council authorizing contracts for accommodation, supplies and services for government departments, appointments to senior positions in the public service and other instruments of a purely administrative nature and of no general interest.

The remaining two to three per cent which are of public interest is composed of regulations such as national selective service regulations, wartime prices and trade board regulations, and the defence of Canada regulations and other war-time legislation.

That is the situation. In this country and under our system of government we do by minutes of the treasury board, which are then submitted to the council and get their authority from the approval of the governor on the recommendation of council, and by orders in council, things which under a system like that of our neighbours to the south are done by executive acts. A great many of these are purely formal. All these munitions and supply matters, if they involved a sum of more than a stated amount, had to be authorized by an order in council.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Would the minister permit a question: how many of these orders in council were passed under the provisions of the War Measures Act? I will elucidate that. In the last war the number was 450. Is it not a fact that the number under the War Measures Act during the period of this war is some eight or nine thousand?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not know. I have not had a calculation made, and I do not think it would be possible to make an accurate calculation. There may be that number in which the War Measures Act is referred to, but one would have to examine each one to see whether or not it was an order in council which would stand without the War Measures Act. The War Measures Act is frequently referred to in a recommendation to council as an additional source of authority for the recommendation which is being made, but one would have to examine each of those orders in council, and it would be an onerous task to determine how many would not have validity without the authority derived from the War Measures Act. I can assure the hon. member that I am not just trying to evade the question.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: They were able to do it last time. That was the answer they gave in 1922.

Mr. CLAXTON: But how much inflation was there the last time?

Mr. FLEMING: You mean, inflation in orders in council?

Mr. CLAXTON: No, inflation in prices.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not want to be provocative, but it is a recognized fact that this time the government, rightly or wrongly —rightly, I think, and I am under the impression that the majority of the Canadian people agree—undertook to control prices and to prevent inflation, and that required frequent orders and regulations and frequent modifications of those orders and regulations.

If I may come back to the point with which I was dealing, I would not like the house to remain under the impression that the Canadian Bar Assocaition had taken the stand which has been, I will not say asserted, but referred to, in this house. I do not think that would be fair to the Canadian Bar Association. The association comprises a very large number of eminent jurists who are quite cautious about their individual reputations as sound lawyers, and I do not think it would be fair to them to have it go out to the country at large that their considered opinion was expressed in the extracts which have been cited to this house. One of them was cited this afternoon; I had marked it for calling it to the attention of hon. members, and it contains the recognition at the outset that—

> Whatever opinion anyone might have as to any possible abuse by the federal authorities, or their delegated boards. . . . The government alone have full information of the necessities of the hour, and however well informed we, of this association, may be, we should not assume the risk of embarrassing in the least degree the government of the country in the paramount task of winning the war.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What date was that?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That was the 1944 report prepared by a committee of three, consisting of Mr. Gustave Monette, Mr. Johnson, and Mr. Brossard. That report was submitted and there was some discussion about it in the meeting. The report was not submitted for acceptance, but it was submitted, and Mr. Monette had moved in submitting it:

> That the work of complete scrutiny of federal and provincial legislation should be pursued and completed, with a view not to interfere in the slightest degree with the war effort, but to have our association prepared for sound and firm action immediately after the war, and possibly, in many cases, before the end of the conflict.
> Your committee also feels that the work of complete research and analysis of all material legislation in Canada, and of preparing an exhaustive report of conclusions and suggestions, and of arranging action with the proper legislative authorities, would require, for a considerable time, the full attention of able members of this association. And we recommend the appointment of a permanent secretary or reporter, or committee, to give continuous attention to complete this task, up to the end.
> We also recommend that the provincial committees already appointed be continued in office.

Mr. Monette stated that the report was a very lengthy one—someone said it was thirty-nine pages—and he had only a few copies of it. It was suggested that it be printed or mimeographed as quickly as possible for consideration on the Friday—this was a Wednesday. Mr. E. K. Williams, who is now president of the Canadian Bar Association, rose at that point and said:

> It seems to me that the motion that Mr. Monette made is the only practical motion so far as this association is concerned. I know something of the contents of the report. There are thirty-nine pages of it. The recommendations depend upon the reasoning contained in the report. Now, Mr. Monette will know that I am not speaking critically of the work of the committee, because I think they have done very good work, but I personally would not—and I don't think any other member of this association would—be ready to express a decided view on the various matters contained in the report without the most careful consideration. Every line of it bristles with debatable points.

And a little further down:

I suggest, gentlemen, you should not vote on important matters of this kind on a blind vote to-day.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I have to remark that it is six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

DIVORCE

AMENDMENT OF ACT OF 1930—JURISDICTION OF COURTS IN PROVINCE OF MARRIED WOMEN'S DOMICILE

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon) moved the second reading of bill No. 2, to amend the Divorce Jurisdiction Act, 1930.

He said: In moving the second reading of this bill I do not know that I can make it any clearer to the house or put it in any better way than to read the explanatory note. It is sought to amend section 2 of the act which reads as follows:

A married woman who either before or after the passing of this act has been deserted by and has been living separate and apart from her husband for a period of two years and upwards and is still living separate and apart from her husband may, in any one of those provinces of Canada in which there is a court having jurisdiction to grant a divorce a vinculo matrimonii, commence in the court of such province having such jurisdiction proceedings for a divorce a vinculo matrimonii praying that her marriage may be dissolved on any grounds that may entitle her to such divorce according to the law of such province, and such court shall have jurisdiction to grant such divorce provided that immediately prior to such desertion the husband of such married woman was domiciled in the province in which such proceedings are commenced.

That last sentence is the unfair part of the act sought to be amended. The explanatory note states:

The purpose of this amendment is to vest jurisdiction in the divorce courts of the several provinces to try actions for divorce at the suit of a married woman deserted by and living apart from her husband where the woman has been residing in the province for not less than two years prior to the date of the commencement of such action.

As the law presently stands the woman may bring suit only in the province where the husband was domiciled immediately prior to the desertion. This condition of the law works a great hardship on the deserted married woman who by reason of such desertion may have been forced to move to another province from that where the desertion took place. It is unreasonable that she should have to take her action back to the former.

Let me illustrate. Suppose a woman resident and living in British Columbia is married to a man who comes from Ontario to marry her, takes her back to Ontario and there deserts her. She by force of circumstances must go back to her old home in British Columbia because she no longer has support and maintenance from her husband, he having deserted her. She remains living in British Columbia and has the necessary material or evidence upon which, in ordinary circumstances, to apply for and get a divorce from a court having jurisdiction in such matters.

The provision of the bill as proposed is that if the woman lives for two years in the province to which she has returned, after the desertion of her husband, she may commence her action for divorce in that province. For instance, in the example I have given she would not have to go back to Ontario to commence the action. That is what I ask the house to support.

Mr. JOSEPH ALFRED DION (Lake St. John-Roberval) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, as this is my first speech in the house, I take the opportunity of offering you my warmest congratulations on your election to the high position to which you have been named. Now that I am aware of the fine intellect, of the sense of justice and fairness which you have displayed in carrying out your duties since the opening of the session, I have no doubt that you are eminently qualified to fill the post for which you were chosen and will prove a worthy successor to your illustrious forerunners.

I also wish to congratulate the deputy Speaker elected last Thursday. I am not personally acquainted with him, but judging from the praise showered on him from both sides of the house, I have no doubt he is fully equipped to preside over our debates. I am happy to tender him my most sincere congratulations.

With reference to bill No. 2 before the house, I must say that I am opposed to it for the following reasons: first of all, on legal grounds, then I object to it for social reasons and finally on moral and religious considerations.

To deal first with my objection on legal grounds: as a matter of fact, if we read the amendment submitted to the Divorce Jurisdiction Act of 1930, we find that its object is the extension, to a considerable degree, of the latitude granted those who wish to divorce in Canada.

First, let me quote the act as it is now. It reads as follows:

2. A married woman who either before or after the passing of this act has been deserted by and has been living separate and apart from her husband for a period of two years and upwards and is still living separate and apart from her husband may, in any one of those provinces of Canada in which there is a court having jurisdiction to grant a divorce a vinculo matrimonii, commence in the court of such province having such jurisdiction proceedings for a divorce a vinculo matrimonii praying that her marriage may be dissolved on any grounds that may entitle her to such divorce according to the law of such province, and such court shall have jurisdiction to grant such divorce provided that immediately prior to such desertion the husband of such married woman was domiciled in the province in which such proceedings are commenced.

It is intended to amend this section 2 and here is the text of the proposed amendment:

2. The court of any province of Canada vested with jurisdiction to grant a divorce a vinculo matrimonii shall have jurisdiction to entertain and try an action or other proceeding for divorce a vinculo matrimonii at the suit of a married woman who has resided in such province separate and apart from her husband for not less than two years immediately preceding the date of the commencement of such action or proceeding and on any grounds of entitlement to such divorce provided by the law of the province in which such court is constituted: Provided that she either was before or has been after the passing of this act deserted by and living separate and apart from her husband for a continuous period of not less than two years prior to the date of the commencement of such action or proceeding.

Briefly it means that a woman who has been domiciled with her husband in one of the provinces and who wishes to obtain a divorce merely has to live in another province, for two years to be entitled to apply for a divorce before a court of that province. In regard to the province of Quebec, where there are no divorce courts, a woman from that province might leave her husband, proceed across the boundary line into Ontario, a few miles from the province of Quebec, live there for two years and at the end of this period institute divorce proceedings against her husband in an Ontario court. In other words, this would enable married persons from the province of Quebec, where there are no divorce courts at present, to obtain a divorce in another province. This is my first legal ground against the proposed amendment. We certainly cannot, in this indirect fashion, allow the people of Quebec, where no divorce courts exist, to seek divorce in another province simply by living there for a period of two years, sometimes by common consent of the parties concerned, as is often the case in divorce suits, when there is collusion.

Another reason for my opposition to this amendment is that it concerns the question of domicile which falls under civil rights. Under the British North America Act, the province has exclusive jurisdiction in matters of domicile, it is a field of provincial legislation. In the province of Quebec, this question is dealt with in the provincial civil code. However, the amendment before the house would transfer to another province the domicile of the person seeking divorce. A married woman would only have to go to any province, elect domicile there for a period of two years, and she would then be entitled to take a divorce action against her husband. I claim that a federal measure cannot deal with the question of domicile which is exclusively a provincial field of legislation and that even were parliament to pass this bill, it would be ultra vires, because it would then be legislating on a matter out of its jurisdiction. In the province of Quebec the domicile of a married woman is where her husband has his domicile.

I am opposing this bill from a legal standpoint on two grounds. The first is that it indirectly makes divorce possible for the people in the province of Quebec, there they cannot obtain it before their own courts. The second one is that this involves the question of domicile, a matter which lies solely within the purview of the civil law of each province.

Another ground on which I oppose this bill is that it evidently aims at facilitating divorce, which is a social evil. It may be a necessary evil in some cases, but it is nevertheless an evil, and every evil must be curbed as much as possible but never encouraged. Divorce, as every one knows, entails as a main consequence the disruption of the family. From a social standpoint the family is certainly the backbone of society. The family is what ensures continuity to the individual, and provides for him a link with the past and the future. An outstanding French orator, Jaurès, has said that the individual is tied to life by the immutability of the tomb and by the rocking of the cradles, in other words, by his ascendants and his descendants. Divorce, or the separation of married people, gives the custody of the children to one party or the other, thus destroying the social unit and jeopardizing the very existence of society. It is certainly the worst evil of modern times.

I feel we are right in stating that we should object to all legislation which tends to make divorce easier, more acceptable or more defensible.

I know we will be told there are many wretched couples, especially since the great war when they met and married to live unhappily afterwards because of incompatibility. But must we, for that reason, intensify the evil by making divorce still more easily obtainable, which would increase the number of ill-assorted matches? That means that in five or ten years, even more people will be seeking divorce. Such a method of procedure, far from curbing the evil, is sure to spread it. Therefore, I believe we should oppose all measures which tend to facilitate the granting of divorce in our country.

As a last consideration, divorce, by setting itself against the indissoluble character of marriage is legislation of a purely pagan conception. I submit, therefore, that even if our country has no official religion, we are, nevertheless, a Christian nation. We are not ashamed to state it and I heard it proclaimed this afternoon. Further, daily, at the opening of the sitting, we invoke the Almighty and we express our faith in Christ. When peace was declared the leader of our nation did not hesitate to thank God, to make a confession of faith. If we are a Christian nation, if we abide by principles which distinguish us from pagan peoples, we must of necessity endeavour to prevent the adoption in our country of legislation tending to lead us back to paganism of olden times. History tells us that during the decline of ancient Rome, morals militated against the family and divorce was provided for in the laws. A woman no longer reckoned her age by the number of consuls but by the number of men she had married. Most assuredly, as divorce is made easier to obtain, the morals will become more dissolute and family life which is the backbone of society will be jeopardized to a greater extent.

For all these reasons I object to the proposed amendment: first, from a legal standpoint, it is proposed by indirect means to enable married persons in the provinces where there are no divorce courts to look elsewhere for such courts.

Second, because it involves the question of domicile, a matter which lies solely within the purview of provincial legislatures and because the proposed amendment would be unconstitutional if it were to be passed.

Finally, the third ground, as I said a few moments ago, is that a legislation tending to facilitate divorce would tend to disrupt society in weakening family ties. That is why, having at heart the welfare of my country, I suggest that we should reject this amendment, holding on to the present provisions of the act so that we may ensure the happiness of the nation and the prosperity of the people.

Mr. EUGENE MARQUIS (Kamouraska): (Text) Mr. Speaker, I consider it is my duty to say a few words about this measure. What is the purpose of this amendment? First, it is to facilitate the granting of divorces; second, to create a new jurisdiction for the granting of divorces; third, to oust the jurisdiction of our Quebec civil courts; fourth, to protect private interests to the prejudice of public interests, and fifth, to disorganize the family and society. The effect of the present amendment certainly would be prejudicial to the whole community. The rights of the husband are not protected. On what grounds can he base his defence if he is summoned to appear before a court in another province? It will be impossible for him to subpoena his witnesses. In many cases the wife will allege that her husband has abandoned her. If on the contrary the wife has abandoned her husband, the latter should have the right to prove the facts in support of his defence. Moreover, it would be conducive to serious abuses. The wife would have only to go abroad for four or five years, and then institute an action against her husband. If the common home were in Vancouver, the wife could take her action in Halifax. This would be a great distance from the Vancouver home, and would entail great expense if the husband wished to subpoena his witnesses and appear before the Halifax court.

As a matter of principle, a British subject has the right to be summoned before the court having jurisdiction in the place of his domicile, and there does not seem to be any serious reason for violating that rule. I contend, too, that this measure would disregard family rights. While a mother was abroad, the children might live with their father for some years. No matter what her behaviour might have been, she would have the right to take proceedings against her husband, who has kept the children. Social rights would be in jeopardy. Any measure which facilitates divorce divides the family, destroys the father's and mother's authority, and ruins the children's love.

(Translation) Mr. Speaker, I wish to sum up my arguments as briefly as possible and with my colleague, the hon. member for Lake St. John-Roberval (Mr. Dion), I invoke the main reasons for my opposition to this amendment.

The husband and wife must surely enjoy identical rights in connection with divorce. It cannot be presumed in advance that the husband is in the wrong and the wife in the right or vice versa.

Then, if they enjoy the same right, why presume, in the present amendment, that the husband is in the wrong, by allowing the wife to take action against him in any province of Canada, be it far removed from the home she previously inhabited in the company of her husband? I claim that the object of this provision is purely and solely to facilitate the granting of divorces in this country. There is no other reason, for if a wife be deserted by her husband, if she be forsaken, as it is claimed, if she be deserving of the sympathy of the house and the whole country, it is evident that she will take action in the very place where she can secure witnesses, where her neighbours may give evidence in her favour. She will not seek, at a distance of 200 miles from her home, the protection of an unknown tribunal. It is so clearly evident that it would be pointless to formulate further arguments on the matter.

Moreover, as I said at the outset, the other party, the husband, is thereby denied the opportunity or even the possibility of bringing his witnesses before the court. Were this amendment to be passed, any wife could desert her husband, travel all over the country and after a few years, the husband having then given up all hope of rebuilding his home, she could take legal proceedings against him in some place where he would be unable to send his witnesses, and where it would perhaps be impossible for him to appear before the said court. Therefore, he would be unable to enter a defence plea and he would then lose by default, which would mean the wangling by indirect means, of a divorce that could not have been obtained from a court sitting at the place of residence of both parties.

Mr. Speaker, to all intents and purposes, this brings into being a new jurisdiction. There are the jurisdiction ratione materiae and the jurisdiction ratione personae. It is an absolute right, recognized as well in the province of Quebec as in the others, that a person should be tried before the court of his domicile, and it is one of those rights which is most treasured by a citizen.

Mr. Speaker, I realize that the jurisdiction ratione personae must be respected and cannot be set aside by such an amendment.

Indeed, it is a very subtle amendment. It is said: this poor woman who has been deserted by her husband, why force her to incur expenses and compel her to return to the domicile where she lived with him? Let us allow her to go somewhere else and she will merely apply for divorce in the court of her choice. Well, Mr. Speaker, this goes very far, inasmuch as to-day in the province of Quebec we have no divorce court, we have safeguarded this principle, thank God. Thanks to the efforts of our predecessors in this house civil courts determine the rights of the parties. Under this amendment, the women of the province of Quebec could go to another province where a divorce court has been set up, live there for at least two years and then institute proceedings and obtain a divorce which they could not obtain in the province of Quebec. Further, this would result in granting new jurisdiction to a court of another province, a jurisdiction which it did not have over a person from the province of Quebec and to which in our opinion it is not entitled over persons under the jurisdiction of the province of Quebec.

Besides, and this follows from what I have just said, our courts would be deprived of their jurisdiction, they would be prevented from dispensing civil law in our province. In Quebec it is provided that the husband or the wife may appear before the court of their place of domicile, where in many cases conjugal disputes are settled amicably and family life continues.

If we agreed to this amendment, we would encourage divorce and prevent our courts from exerting the beneficent influence they have wielded in the past. Moreover, this legislation affects private interests, rather than general interest and public order and I believe that in such a matter public interest must be the first consideration. This amendment, whose purpose is to enhance a private interest, tends to facilitate the application of the divorce law which, in my opinion, cannot be accepted in a Christian and well ordered society.

Divorce divides the family. It obviously dissociates husband and wife who will thereafter live apart. Moreover, the children must be considered; they are parted from father or mother and, when remarriage follows with its consequent offspring, we behold incongruous multiple paternities, a state of things which should not exist in a Christian society.

I will go even further, Mr. Speaker, and contend that divorce also disorganizes the community. Family life is at the core of our Canadian society. No distinction is made between races, religious beliefs or other opinions. Here, in Canada, our community life is still based on the family unit which remains the cornerstone of our national structure.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MARQUIS: We still count on the family to ensure the survival of our Christian society, and our Canadian citizens, whatever their religious belief, are devoted to their family and want this social cell maintained in Canada. If we were to let divorce become easier to obtain family ties would become disrupted, paternal authority would be undermined and children would lose that love for their parents which the latter have instilled into them, and this would lead us inevitably and in a short time to atheism.

Mr. Speaker, sublime thoughts have been expressed in this house following the end of hostilities. Several members on both sides of the house have suffered personal losses; several have lost their sons, their relatives in battle. Why? To fight the forces of evil and to defend righteousness.

Right has emerged triumphant in this six-year struggle which unleashed the powers of evil against those of decency, and we may now look forward to an era of freedom and prosperity.

The forces of decency are vested in the family, they are based on love while those of evil are inspired by hatred. The ideology of our enemies rested on hatred while our own was founded on love.

We oppose divorce and roundabout means of promoting it because we favour a Christian society based on the principles of charity and love. If we want the forces of decency to develop, consolidate and flourish in our country, let us set aside this subtle little amendment which some want to insert in our laws. It is a trap which will end by allowing all Canadian citizens straightway to obtain a divorce wherever they may be. I feel convinced that even in provinces where divorce is recognized and where divorce courts are found, all well thinking people regret the existence of such anomalous conditions in our social legislation. I am sure the amendment will come to its natural end and it will not be necessary to add another chapter to this unfortunate legislation.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out that I am concerned merely with the future of my fellow-citizens, those of my own race and of others as well.

As a Canadian citizen, I yearn to see, all over the country, strong united families, where education, under the wise leadership of father and mother who are in full accord is directed to the thorough development of every potentiality and every talent. Let these families remain united, yielding to the full extent of their powers, flourish in a regulated order and we shall then enjoy liberty and happiness in our country.

(Text) Mr. ELPHEGE MARIER (Jacques-Cartier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words about this amendment to the Divorce Jurisdiction Act, 1930. The bill as presented seems very simple, but in my opinion it has some far-reaching consequences. The hon. member for Lake St. John-Roberval (Mr. Dion) has already dealt with the legal rights of the province of Quebec. If my information is correct, I understand that there are only two provinces in Canada without divorce courts, Quebec and Prince Edward Island. If this bill is passed the province of Quebec will be affected. A wife will be permitted to go to Ontario, reside there for two years, then apply to the courts of Ontario for a divorce and in that way escape the jurisdiction of the courts of Quebec the court of her domicile. At the same time her husband would not be given the same privilege.

I am against divorce on religious grounds and because of the evils, both moral and material, that spring from divorce. I do not intend to discuss this bill from that angle, but I do insist that it would be against the civil rights of the provinces. I should like to refer to section 92 of the British North America Act which determines the exclusive powers of the provinces.

(Translation): I shall quote three paragraphs of section 92 of the British North America Act which is entitled: "Exclusive powers of provincial legislatures":

12. The solemnization of marriage in the province;
13. Property and civil rights in the province.
14. The administration of justice in the province, including the constitution, maintenance and organization of provincial courts.

Therefore, under the provisions of sub-section 14 of section 92 of the British North America Act, the province alone has the right to set up divorce courts. And in our province, it has not been deemed advisable so far to create such courts. If our province did not deem advisable to set up such courts, I do not see why a roundabout way would be resorted to in order to give certain citizens of the province the right to evade the jurisdiction of the court of their province by availing themselves of the rights and privileges granted in a neighbouring province. And this is exactly what would take place if the wife could avail herself of the court of a neighbouring province in order to exercise rights which her own province deny them.

In sub-section 12 of the British North America Act, reference is made to the solemnization of marriage. I have always understood that this paragraph reserves to the provinces the right to legislate on such solem-nization as well as to determine the rights of the husband and wife arising from such marriage. This is the reason why there are in the province of Quebec as well as in the other provinces certain laws which control the solemnization of marriage and its consequences. Here again, the proposed amendment would tend to destroy or modify the laws or the obligations which arise from the solemnization of marriage.

Now, sub-section 13, which grants exclusive powers to the provinces concerning property and civil rights in the province would be set aside by the proposed amendment. Indeed, the civil rights of the provinces include right over persons and right over property. To my mind, the right over persons would disappear or rather would be curtailed if a person domiciled in the province of Quebec could get away and after residing two years in another province, could obtain a divorce under conditions and according to laws which are different from those of the province where she is domiciled. Especially in the province of Quebec, the law which establishes the domicile of the wife at her husband's residence would be violated. And not only the law regarding domicile would be violated but also numerous other rights arising from marriage. In obtaining a divorce either in Ontario or in New-Brunswick or in Nova Scotia or in any other province, there would also be another disadvantage for the parties concerned for the court granting the divorce could not affect the rights arising from marriage or the obligations pertaining thereto. Indeed, in our province, the question of joint estate, which does not occur in other provinces, must be taken into account. Therefore, a court of another province could not, in granting a divorce, determine the respective rights of the interested parties and as, in Quebec, divorce is not recognized, they might find themselves in an embarrassing position. After securing a divorce in another province, a person enjoying certain rights in the common estate, would lose her rights on account of the change in its status, because the common estate is not recognized in this other province.

The same principle would apply to gifts and privileges often resulting from marriage and which exist also in other provinces. If the court granting divorce is unable to grant the civil rights enjoyed by the interested parties the clauses included in the marriage contract could not be taken into consideration on account of the divorce granted, because the said court could not deal, in its findings, with the assets of the consorts and furthermore, no court of our province could settle the matter, as divorce is not recognized within its borders.

There is also the status of children. Sometimes, the marriage contract provides that children to be born will be entitled to certain gifts which could not be realized at the time of divorce because, I repeat, the province of Quebec would not recognize the divorce.

But the province of Quebec is not the only one concerned in this matter; in other provinces there are also numerous legislative measures relating to the assets of the consorts in case of separation or annulment of marriage. Several provinces, as I said, would be in the same position when having to determine the rights of spouses.

I need not elaborate further on the anomalous situation that would be created by an unconstitutional law. If the privilege of establishing civil rights belongs exclusively to the provinces, as it is clearly stated in section 92, I do not see how, through an amendment to the divorce act, an individual could be allowed to evade the laws of his province, provided he lived somewhere else for a certain period, while as a matter of fact his true domicile was there.

Therefore, from a constitutional standpoint, the bill should not become law. From the standpoint of provincial rights, and of the consequences which the passing of this amendment might entail in our province, it should not be enacted.

The time when we hear so much about union and brotherhood, speak of organizing to solve so many complex problems with which we are faced, to my mind, I say, such a time is ill-chosen for raising a question as important as that of divorce. A matter of this order might stir up animosity between certain provinces or sections of the country. We should not raise such an issue but instead tend to the serious problems submitted to our attention and which are far more essential to the future of our country that this amendment to the existing divorce legislation whose purpose is to render the decree more easily obtainable and is in the sole interest of a few people under particular circumstances. If there were no other means of redress I would agree that some amendment was needed to provide for the plan mentioned a short while ago by my hon. colleague. The required means, however, are already in existence and will adequately take care of the few exceptional cases in our province where no divorce court is found. I am therefore opposed to this amendment and hope it will be defeated.

Mr. BONA ARSENAULT (Bonaventure): (Translation) Mr. Speaker, to indicate my opposition to the bill under consideration, I wish to add a few remarks to those already so brilliantly made by my colleague.

We, from Quebec, believe that the ties of marriage can only be broken by the natural death of the consorts. As long as both live, marriage remains indissoluble. Such is the fundamental principle enunciated in section 185 of the province of Quebec Civil Code. We, of Quebec, believe that the indissolubility of marriage is at the very foundation of the family, which, as was stated a few minutes ago, is the primary cell of society.

As Christians, we, of Quebec, believe that divorce is opposed to divine law and, as Canadians, we claim that it is in contradiction with natural law, in this sense that the indissolubility of marriage is directly connected with the best interests of society.

The real object of marriage is not only the raising of future generations, but also the protection and education of children.

For this reason, Mr. Speaker, I claim that we should find among the most indomitable enemies of divorce all those who profess to be Christians, all those who think in terms of society, all those who have at heart the lofty interests of the Canadian nation.

If we refer to the figures published in connection with divorce in Canada, we are appalled to realize to what an abyss we are sinking. And we understand that the time has come to alter our course in the right direction, to pull ourselves together, and the only way to accomplish this is to make it harder to obtain a divorce in our country.

In 1901 there were only 661 divorces in Canada, for a population of 5,300,000; in 1911, 1,530 actions were taken and in 1921, the number had climbed to 7,401. Between 1911 and 1921, a period similar to the present one, inasmuch as it was marked by an armed conflict, the troublous times resulted in a five-fold increase in the number of divorces, which climbed from 1,500 to 7,401. In 1941, divorces numbered 14,032 in our country compared to 7,441 in 1931. This is an increase of practically 100 per cent. On the strength of these figures, unless we endeavour to curb this tendency, if the five-fold increase in the number of divorces holds for the period 1941 to 1951 as for that of 1911 to 1921, 70,000 homes will have been broken in Canada in the ten years previous to 1951.

Mr. Speaker, divorce is a national curse; in fact, it is national suicide. To-day every country in the world realizes how much divorce decreases the birth-rate and to what extent it constitutes not only a factor of family disruption and social disorganization, but also a threat of extinction for the population of some countries. Quite recently, on September 27, the British government stated that the numerical strength and even the survival of the British nation were endangered by the increase in the number of divorces and by birth-control. In that white book, published in conformity with a procedure reserved for official statements of major importance, it is explicitly said that there is an ultimate danger, quite real although remote, that the British people may gradually disappear—and that statement is made by the British government itself. That blue book emphasizes that in 1919, for instance, Great Britain had about 16,000,000 people under the age of twenty, while in 1939, twenty years after, she had only 14,000,000. So much for England.

Let us see what happens to-day in godless Soviet Russia. In 1943, the government of Soviet Russia discarded the communist principle of coeducation and reestablished separate schools for boys and girls. Last year—I quote from an article published on July 10 by the newspaper Le Droit of Ottawa—the soviet government itself announced that they——had just taken new measures with a view to ensuring the morality and the survival of the Russian family, threatened in its very existence by the devastation of war and by the ravages, no less serious, of the anti-family policy forced upon the Russians during twenty-five years of communist administration.

I quote further:

The Soviet authorities make divorce more difficult to obtain.

If Russia has come to realize that after twenty-five years of communism she must make divorce more difficult to obtain it is high time that we should realize it in Canada. Again:

Russian couples only had to sign a form and appear for a few minutes before an official in order to obtain the dissolution of their marriage.

That is what we do not want in Canada. It is why I oppose the bill of the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Black). Let me quote in conclusion, a most eloquent excerpt from a paper read by Mr. Léon Mercier-Gouin, now a member of the Senate, before a social congress held in Montreal in 1923. Here are a few lines which will certainly not fail to impress you:

Divorce is a demoralizing factor and it further checks the birth rate.

If there are children, divorce deprives them of the care and moral education they have a right to expect from their parents, for the latter have irrevocably separated and perhaps remarried. Thus the unwanted child is unnaturally divided between father and mother. Separation as to bed and board is a sad evil, sometimes necessary; it is a cruel hardship for a child, but not an iniquitous injustice lacking all possibility of readjustment. Divorce does grievous wrong to tiny tots who did not ask to be born. Their young hearts are withered by this blot which, like cancer, gnaws at their conscience and sensibilities. Divorce destroys the family and thus shatters at its very base the whole social structure.

I maintain that divorce is anti everything that matters: family, society, legislation, contractual obligations, Christianity and nationhood. That is why we oppose it irrevocably.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but as the time allotted for the discussion of government measures has expired, the house must resume where it left off at six o'clock.

WAR AND DEMOBILIZATION

PROVISION FOR APPROPRIATION OF $1,365,000,000 FOR WAR PURPOSES, DEMOBILIZATION, PROMOTION OF TRADE AND INDUSTRY, ET CETERA

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Ilsley that the house go into committee to consider a resolution to grant to His Majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures deemed necessary or advisable in consequence of the war.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Speaker, when the house took recess at six o'clock I was endeavouring to explain what had been done with the report presented in 1944 to the Canadian Bar Association. I have just one further word on that to complete the matter. The motion that had been made contained three recommendations, which are found on page 52 of the report of the annual meeting. He then added:

I therefore move the three last-named recommendations. And as to the rest of the report I move that the report be tabled, received and discussed either here or by the executive committee, to implement what is therein contained.

There was considerable discussion, and finally Mr. James E. Day said this, which is found at the foot of page 59:

Let the committee continue and put the recommendations in concrete form, seventeen suggestions, let these be put in printed form, and let the whole matter of their consideration come up on Friday.

The Chairman: That, ladies and gentlemen, is the amendment.

The amendment was then put to the meeting and on a standing vote was declared lost.

The motion was put to the meeting and on a standing vote was declared carried.

The matter came up again at a meeting of the council of the Canadian Bar Association which was held on the last day of August, 1945. There was no meeting of the association itself, because it would have been contrary to the orders of the controller of transport to have held the meeting.

The report was again taken up and the chairman of the committee proceeded to make the following remarks:

Our committee has also given additional consideration to some of the topics of the main report, and we wish to submit the following for attention:

1. Continuation of controls after the war. There appear to be many who believe that some measure of control, specially in relation to ceiling prices, should be had and continued for some time after the war as a transit and adjustment period policy. Otherwise prices might jump suddenly to extreme limits, and bring a chaotic situation.

2. Should the necessary controls be continued under the War Measures Act?

It is expected by some, feared by others, that the federal government, for such controls as may appear necessary to maintain, will continue to rely on the authority of the War Measures Act.

Now that the war is over, such a course would raise a very serious problem of constitutional law, as to controlling civil and property rights which are in relation to civil law, and fall normally, under the constitution within the exclusive legislative jurisdiction of the provinces.

Authorities are cited to show that it is well established that circumstances, very serious in nature, and amounting to a national emergency, such as a great war or other similarly wide and calamitous circumstances, would justify the federal power, by legislation, adequately to control the liberties, civil rights and property in the provinces.

We then come to the recommendations which are as follows:

Your committee recommend that the proclamation declaring that the war no longer exists be issued as soon as the war with the enemy is really at an end according to the established principles of international law.

Let us make the distinction here between the war emergency itself, which is the fact of a state of war, and an economic emergency, which, though a consequence following the war, is not the war emergency. It may be an economic emergency. The calamity against which we have to protect the nation is not the war itself, or a consequential defeat of our arms, or the invasion by the enemy, but is an economic state of affairs that may be most serious, and that may, or may not be adequately coped with by the provinces. If the federal administration feel that, after the war, and in relation to such economic conditions of the country, a state of emergency exists, of a most serious character, and national in scope, let them face the issue directly and submit to parliament a new law affirming the existence or the apprehension and determining the exact nature of the new emergency.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I appreciate the "hear, hear" from the other side of the house. As a matter of fact, the speech from the throne had been drafted before anything of this became public, and if the hon. members will refer to it as printed on page 8 of Hansard they will find the following:

It is the intention of the government to abolish war restrictions in progressive steps as rapidly as that can be accomplished without occasioning inflation or other economic disturbances. Such controls as are essential to the welfare of our people will be continued for as long as they are necessary.

You will be asked to approve a measure to extend certain specified emergency powers to meet emergency conditions in the period of reconstruction.

As a matter of fact, I have before me a bill with that intent, which was printed evidently before August 28, because the stamp from my office bears the date of August 28, and just as soon as there is an opportunity that bill will be introduced and parliament will be asked to take its responsibility, because it will be a considerable responsibility. It would be a considerable responsibility for anyone to take to sweep out with one fell stroke those controls which have been so effective in preventing inflation in this country. In making that statement I am not departing from principles which were enunciated by the leader of the Progressive Conservative party in a speech he made in Montreal on April 23, 1945, in which he said this:

In thus referring to our war-time controls I do not suggest that these have been bad, or that they were an unnecessary product of autocratic power. Their necessity must be as clear to you as it is to me; but I insist that in assessing their virtues we should think of those controls in terms of the job they were intended to do. If we do that, then I am sure you will not find it contradictory for me to say that existing controls cannot be dropped willy-nilly the instant the job of making war is done. Certainly we must be rid of them as soon as possible, but in some cases they will have to be unwound very carefully and slowly and there will have to be planning to accomplish the unwinding.

That is not my language; that is the opinion of the leader of the opposition; and we find ourselves in company with the privy council in the Fort Frances case in which the following is stated at page 706 of the report.

No authority other than the central government is in a position to deal with a problem which is essentially one of statesmanship. It may be that it has become clear that the crisis which arose is wholly at an end, and that there is no justification for the continued exercise of an exceptional interference which becomes ultra vires when it is no longer called for. In such a case the law as laid down for distribution of powers in the ruling instrument would have to be invoked.

The question of determining at what time it will be proper to put an end to the validity of orders made under the War Measures Act is a matter of statesmanship. We do not pretend that we are the only statesmen in this house. The intention of the government, as stated in the speech from the throne, is to ask all the statesmen in this house to take their responsibility as to the proper time for putting an end to these controls. The matter will be gone into quite fully when the bill comes before the house.

I do not want to take the time at this moment when we are dealing with an appropriation of money that is necessary for purposes directly connected with the war, to discuss the reasons for the continuation of controls which will have to be discussed when the bill announced in the speech from the throne comes properly before the house for consideration; but I would refer hon. members to the reference book on economic controls which was put before the members of the dominion-provincial conference. Once again this is a matter where emergency conditions enlarge the powers of the dominion at the expense of those normally exercised by provincial authorities. The reasons given or suggested for it being necessary to continue that state of the legislation for a time were summarized in this reference book compiled under the direction of the committee on economic controls, of which F. P. Varcoe was chairman and C. Stein, secretary. This book contains submissions from the wartime prices and trade board, the war industries control board and the Department of Labour. The purpose of this material is—

. . . to describe the situation which brought various war-time economic controls into being and to outline the kind of problems which probably will continue to exist in these fields during the transition period.

This summary contains some thirty pages of double column print, to show why some, thinking they were taking the position of statesmen, suggested that careful consideration ought to be given to the possible consequences of too rapidly proceeding with decontrol. The policy the government of Canada submitted to the representatives of the governments of the provinces in that regard is set out on page 9 of the proposals of the government of Canada, which were put before that conference. There hon. members will find a long statement of the methods which the dominion government proposed as being best suited to the progressive elimination of these controls.

Another question which was put and which quite logically follows this portion of my remarks is: have the defence of Canada regulations been repealed? Practically all the defence of Canada regulations which were of substance have been repealed by two orders in council which were published in the war orders and regulations. One was passed on August 16, the day after we heard of the intention of the Japanese government to surrender to the allied powers, and it did away with practically all those provisions of the defence of Canada regulations which interfered with the ordinary liberties of the individuals. The second was passed on September 14, 1945, and was published in the September 24 issue of war orders and regulations. It removed many of the other regulations, leaving subsisting practically only those dealing with protected places or areas, which were necessary because of very important works going on, as for instance at Chalk river, in plants belonging to the government. Other provisions were retained because of our international obligations with respect to the control of tonnage, and the provisions which give special authority for the placing of ships in harbours were also retained. It was felt necessary to retain those provisions for the safety of the men being brought back from overseas. They were passed subsequently to the list of orders in council which were tabled by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) at the opening of the session, which brought the tabling down to June 30, and I would ask leave to table those orders in council now.

Another question which arose and about which I am sure there is much unsatisfied curiosity in my own mind as well as in the minds of others is the date which will be fixed as that from which will run the two years for the refunding of the compulsory savings portion of the income tax, and the refundable portion of the excess profits tax. My understanding is that this date will be announced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) in presenting his budget proposals. Likewise many of the previous controls which were found to be no longer absolutely necessary have been eliminated.

Is there anyone in this house who would have taken the responsibility, either on August 15 or on August 16, or on September 1 or on September 2, of saying the war was at an end, and that everything in our system of controls on which we depended to combat inflation would then come to an end? I do not think a single member of this house would have said at that time, or would say at this time, that it was proper to bring that system down without taking some means to substitute other authority for the maintenance of those controls. That is the manner in which the law officer has advised his colleagues; that is a matter the responsibility for which will be placed before this house as soon as it is possible to introduce and deal with the bill thus forecast in the speech from the throne.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, it would have been well if the minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), who is also Attorney General of Canada, had given this opinion on September 11, the day I raised this question here. Notwithstanding that he read from some correspondence, it is a legal opinion. Ever since confederation it has been the rule in this parliament that the Minister of Justice, who is also Attorney General of Canada, should not give legal opinions in this house, even when he is asked for them. That question has come up on many occasions. The rule I mention has been followed since about 1886, and there are good reasons for it. In this country the courts are subservient to the legislature. One of the principles I have always enunciated is this. The Minister of Justice appoints the judges. One of the cardinal principles of our constitution is that we must have impartial justice and a judiciary free from any interference on the part of the executive. That has been the reason for the rule I just mentioned.

I brought this matter to the attention of the house on September 11 when, in reference to this resolution, in view of the fact that the war was over, I asked if the government did not consider that the War Measures Act had been automatically repealed and annulled, that it had expired through the effluxion of time; and I still believe that is the correct view. At that time I was not brushed aside, as some newspapers said. I am not in the habit of being treated in that way, because I know the facts of the case. At that time the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) replied to me:

> It is the opinion of the Minister of Justice that it is within the constitutional power of this parliament to pass this bill. Moreover, this bill, as I say, follows the precedent of the Demobilization Appropriation Act passed in June of 1919.

This war is totally different from the last one. Such an act as that passed in 1919 is not relevant in the house at the present time. I call the attention of hon. members to the statements made by the Canadian Bar Association, where they have given some opinions which the Minister of Finance has said were only matters of policy. I say they were not They were legal opinions on the whole question

Let us follow this to its logical conclusion In view of what the Minister of Justice said to-night, the whole control system is still in effect, despite the fact that the war is over. The war may be over in London and over in Washington, but apparently it is not over here. They have taken action in Washington in connection with their controls. They have loosened them up, and have given large and small businessmen a chance. Let us follow their example.

Sometimes these controls need rationing. If they are continued large numbers of people will be summoned to law courts across this dominion. We know that many summonses have been issued already, and chiefly in the Toronto district. The charges and fines there seem to be about ten to one, so far as numbers are concerned, when compared with what they are in other cities. There is no equality of treatment at all. When these cases are before the courts the question will be raised whether this parliament has power, in view of the war being over, and the War Measures Act annulled, to follow the practice which it has followed of bringing in resolutions of this kind, followed by bills.

I referred to this matter the night war broke out in September, 1939. I referred to the very same principle which is now involved, and which has been discussed this evening by the Minister of Justice. I pointed out that when Great Britain is at war, Canada is at war, and that when Great Britain is no longer at war, Canada is no longer at war.

Then, on the matter of status, I say we were not at war, although war was declared on September 3, 1939. However, it was not until September 10 of that year that this House of Commons enacted legislation. On September 4 the Athenia was sunk, and I called attention of the house to the fact that we were bound by what had been done, and were at war on September 3, 1939. As a result of that we found out afterwards that under our new system of status we had to wait until September 10, for seven days, and all that kind of thing, before Canada declared war.

All I am saying is this, that no matter what we say or do in this house, this matter will come up in the law courts of the country. It will come before the courts the very moment it is proposed after the war to enforce these controls. The jurisdiction of parliament will be challenged, so far as its legislation in this respect is concerned.

Fines will be imposed and appeals will be lodged. In my view they should be taken right to the supreme court; that is where this matter should go. Under the Supreme Court Act the government of the day, on recommendation of the attorney general, can recommend submission to the Supreme Court of Canada of points such as those raised by me on September 11 and a few days ago in the speech of the very able hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker).

In view of what has been said to-night by the Minister of Justice, surely a clear case has been made out, if there ever was a case made out for reference to the supreme court under the Supreme Court Act. If ever there was such a case, it is this one now before us. The whole question of the system of controls as they are to be permitted in Canada after the war is over should be looked into.

I shall refer to one or two further points, and then I shall have concluded. My first point has to do with paragraphs (a), (b), (c), (d) and (e) of the resolution now before us. We have seen the result of our system of controls in Canada. As I said the other day:

> All kinds of bodies, over the head of parliament, are spending money like water. Every principle for which the British nation struggled in the old land since the seventeenth century has been surrendered to the political caucuses. Parliament itself, which came into being to ensure that taxes shall be voted only by those who have to pay them, has become the institution through which those who do not pay them impose them on others.
> I want to emphasize to the committee that powers of legislation older even than the right of taxpayers to determine the national expenditure have been surrendered, and if we are to continue this sort of thing the power of parliament will be gone forever. Whole spheres of activity, involving the livelihood of every man, woman and child in this country, have been removed from the jurisdiction of the law and of parliament and reserved for the determination of tribunals, irresponsible, irremovable, governed by no control and subject to no appeal.

That is all I object to. If parliament is to be supreme we should observe its rights and privileges. Before going into committee we are told by the various ministers about the succes sof this system of control. In addition to that, some controllers are going across Canada making speeches about which, quite probably, the ministers know nothing. This is done over the head of parliament and while it is in session.

There was some legislation passed after the last war, when parliament was meeting, to require the submission of all these matters to the House of Commons. This has not been done. In addition to that, I contended at the time this war started, during the first ten days of the special session, that we did not need any proclamation or order in council; that war was on from September 3, 1939. We did not need any orders in council such as were passed by parliament on September 10, 1939. We did not need them, because when Great Britain is at war, Canada is at war, and when she is not, Canada is not.

I know it is in the public interest to have the removal of these government controls. There is no business, large or small, in Canada that is not suffering from them. Large business, wholesale business, retail business—all kinds of business have been suffering from these irksome controls.

I should like to draw to the attention of the house what has been done in the United States, because throughout the war it would seem that we followed Washington to a considerable extent. This pamphlet sets out the policy of the federal government in that country, and the measures taken by federal agencies. This booklet, which is issued monthly by the National City bank of New York city, in its September issue sets out what is being done at Washington. This is the action taken by the President of the United States on the advice of his officers, and particularly Mr. Snyder, director of the office of war mobilization and reconversion. It also contains suggestions by Mr. Krug, chairman of the war production board. These men occupy positions which would be the equivalent of positions in our Department of Munitions and Supply.

Perhaps I might say in passing, and before reading from the report, that our parliament might well follow what has been done at Washington in connection with the elimination of these controls and in respect of reconversion. In other countries the test of the ability to recover from a war and to return to a state of prosperity has been found in the capacity to produce goods and to supply them to the population. There is no other measuring stick than that found in the ability to produce, distribute and consume goods and services. If production is insufficient, then the distribution of money, whether in the form of international loans or relief, would be involved. Many industries do not have to reconvert at all, and those that do make their preparations well in advance. Industrial leaders throughout the United States generally know what they are doing and what they are going to do. They are moving forward, in a sense of public responsibility, and because they see vast markets awaiting their products.

Returning to the report of the National City bank, I find this, with respect to the removal of government controls, in the report of Mr. Snyder, approved in August by President Truman:

> Finally, and perhaps most important of all, the policies of the federal government and the measures taken by the federal agencies imply in general that reliance for rapid reconversion is being placed upon the ingenuity and resourcefulness of business men themselves, and not upon schemes for government direction and control. Nothing was more to be feared, either for the transition period or the longer future, than regulations subjecting every major decision of business to the approval of Washington, with the certain result of confusion, delay, mistakes and injustices. But the moves since the surrender have shown that the policy is to free business of interferences with production —in some respects at once and in others gradually—and put it on its own. The first step was to cancel war contracts promptly, in order to cut the cost and stop the waste of war, reduce the inflation danger, free materials, machines and labour for peace time goods, and clear the decks for a fresh start.

[Mr. Church.]

In a short paragraph, the policy of the director at Washington is set out, and this was reported to the president on August 15. It is as follows:

> Nor will we continue the manufacture of useless armaments for as much as one day to cushion the shock. We will not manufacture a single shell, nor a single piece of equipment above absolute minimum military needs, for the purpose of reducing the shock of terminating war work. We will not keep a single soldier or sailor in uniform longer than he is needed by the army or navy, in order to hold down the totals of temporary unemployment. This is the policy laid down by the congress, wholeheartedly carried out by this administration, and backed by the American people.

And again:

> The second step was to remove most of the war-time limitations on production and on the use of materials. Mr. Krug, chairman of the war production board, has moved rapidly, rescinding limitation orders except in the case of certain critically short items, and in general freeing the industries to go ahead without having, as the Truman committe report in 1944 said, "to go to Washington with hat in hand."

This man occupies somewhat the same position as our Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe), and this is what he said:

> It is necessary to get rid of regulations and production limitations as quickly as possible. They automatically put ceilings on initiative, imagination and resourcefulness, the very qualities the country will need most if we are to have a resilient and rapidly expanding economy after the defeat of Japan.
> The danger confronting us, as I see it, is that we will overlook the natural resilience of the economy—the capacity of manufacturers, wholesalers and retailers to readapt themselves to changed conditions and hence quickly to utilize the resources released from munitions production. If we were to attempt in Washington to see that every manufacturer, wholesaler or retailer got his exact share of released manpower or materials, we should be lost in a myriad of rules and regulations. We should get in the way of reconversion rather than speed it.

And again:

> As long as the policies of government are in harmony with these principles, the energies, abilities and experience of millions of business men will be at work, each on his own problems, to get factories retooled and speed production of civilian goods. No other forces that could be exerted in the situation could possibly be as effective.

And again:

The allegation that there has been a "lack of planning" does not stand analysis. Probably there has never been a time when planning, at the level where it counts most, has been as widespread and as ably done.

And further down:

The overwhelming majority of the American people, however, believe that detailed regulation of business in peace time would be wholly impracticable and disastrous in its consequences upon production and employment.

If we are to avoid widespread unemployment the government must release some of these controls and leave large and small businesses free to carry on. I notice in the newspapers that estimates are being made of unemployment. One made by the president of the C.I.O. in the United States is as high as 10,000,000. The same predictions were made at the end of the last war. I notice it is estimated that there will be 500,000 unemployed in Canada. These are rot, and some restraint should prevent the circulation of such predictions. I believe, with the experience gained in the war, the reconversion of industry in Canada will be carried on more rapidly than was the case in the last war. If private business is allowed to function free of control, as is the case at Washington reconversion will be much shorter.

If there is to be any danger of the suffering which occurred in this country after the last war during the first winter occurring now that this war is over, the government should be ready to look after those who may suffer because of lack of shelter, food or fuel.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to detain the house at any great length, but there are one or two things I should like to say. One point was mentioned in the debate and another deals in a general way with the war appropriation. First, I should like to refer to the statement made this afternoon by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell). I do not want the hon. member to feel that I am criticizing him except to say that I think the statement he made this afternoon was unwise, no matter how fundamentally true he may consider it to be.

Because of the gravity of the international situation, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) left the country while parliament was in session. I do not believe we should say anything here that will add to the difficulties of the situation. We all must feel disturbed about the general international situation today. The hon. member for Macleod said that a Christian democracy could not cooperate with a totalitarian state, and then he went on to make it quite clear to which country he was referring. His statement sums up to this: Canada, which I assume is a Christian democracy, Great Britain, the United States and perhaps a number of other countries cannot cooperate with the Soviet Union.

I might pause here to say that if there is anyone in this country whom the people who set themselves as the friends of the Soviet union hate, it is myself. Consequently I cannot be accused of appeasing the Soviet Union. The implication in the statement of the hon. member is that we cannot cooperate. If we cannot cooperate, then there is non-cooperation. If there is non-cooperation, that in my opinion, will lead inevitably to another conflict. We have no recourse but to cooperate. Cooperating is not the same as appeasing.

I think we all admired the minister for external affairs of Australia, the Hon. H. V. Evatt, for setting out, at both San Francisco and London, what he considers to be the rights of the Australian nation, of the Canadian nation and of many other small nations. But I want to go a little farther than that and point out that we found ways to cooperate in war. It was through the cooperation of the Soviet Union with the Christian democracies, if you want to use that word—I have known of Christian totalitarianism—that we were able to defeat our enemies and achieve peace, at least peace in its negative form, namely, the absence of war. Should we say now that we cannot cooperate and bring that peace to the full fruition that we expected? I believe that we should at least try. We certainly should not do anything at the present time that would interfere with that desired end.

I concede to my hon. friend the right to criticize to his heart's content in this free parliament, but while democracy gives freedom, it does something else; it puts the onus of what we say upon ourselves; we must consider what effect our words will have on our country's affairs. I am afraid that in dealing with this, perhaps the last war appropriation, we may run into some difficulty. I have no fear that the appropriation as placed before parliament will not carry, but I believe that a good deal of harm has already been done by the public press and by various individuals both in the government and in different groups in the house in urging that the war is over now and that we should get rid of controls at once. I should like to tell hon. members again that the war is not over and will not be over until we have achieved those things for which we went to war. Those things were: freedom from fear; freedom from war itself; freedom from want. Those things have not been achieved in their full measure or achieved so that we know of a certainty that we have them, and in my opinion those are the things for which the young men of Canada fought and died. Either they died for those things or we lied to them. Let me say again that those things will not have been achieved until we have restored the countries we have liberated. We gave our young men in liberation of those countries; we poured into them our wealth, and now there is a danger that we are going to quibble over the small amount that it will take to help those people to restore their strength and build up their own economy so that they can get on their feet once more and perhaps pay us back, if not in material things, at least in the return to this earth of peace and order. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I would just warn the house and, if I may presume to do so, the country that our help is needed now just as much as it has been during the last five years.

There was a point raised this afternoon by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) in connection with orders in council, and the discussion was carried on from another angle by the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent). I am now an old member of this house, and I have observed over the years how it conducts its business. When I heard the Minister of Justice in his eloquent peroration just a few moments ago I was almost prepared to call myself not an old member of the house but an elder statesman, but I decided that that probably would be going over the verge of modesty and so I will not say it.

I have listened to statements that we have government by order in council, that parliament has ceased to function, and similar phrases. I would just like to tell the members that we must do one of two things. We must either stream-line the procedure of this house, or the government will have no alternative than to legislate by order in council. In the British parliament at Westminster, where the business moves much faster than it does here because they have improved their procedure, they are beginning to realize that there must be a further stream-lining of procedure. We here are faced with the alternative of parliament becoming simply a word factory if we do not stream-line the procedure.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): You are to blame for the word "factory" quite a bit.

Mr. MacINNIS: I admit that, and I am not blaming anyone any more than I blame myself. But I am caught as it were, like the rest of us, in a sort of machine—

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Lots of us are not in that boat.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Mr. MacINNIS: —so long as we have the present procedure, and I do not think I would be doing my duty either to this house or to my constituents or to the country if I just let my hon. friend talk and out of my wisdom did not reply.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Perhaps what I say is more sensible than what you say.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is a matter of judgment, and I would not doubt at all that my hon. friend's judgment is as good as mine. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I think we should give thought to organizing the procedure of this house so that when the government does stop legislating by order in council it may legislate through an improved procedure. That is all I have to say, and I hope that I have not taken up too much time.

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, we have all listened with interest and with respect to the words that have recently been pronounced by the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent). He has told us many things which we know. He has failed to tell us that which we want to know; that is, when the government is going to declare the war at an end. The government is now acting under legislation which permits it to govern by orders in council. The words of the enabling statute are: "by reason of the existence of a real or apprehended war, invasion or insurrection." The house is interested in knowing when the government is going to declare under section 6 of the War Measures Act that the war is at an end.

The reason for this query is not mere vulgar curiosity. It is one that affects every member of the house; it is one that affects the entire population. If government is to be carried on by order in council, if parliament is to be denied its elementary function until it suits some hon. gentleman to say that the war is at an end, it is as well that we should know that is part of government policy.

We are told on the highest authority that emergencies may arise that justify the transfer to the dominion of powers which ordinarily reside in the provinces. The reason and the only reason under the statute which is relied upon to enact these orders in council is the "existence of real or apprehended war, invasion or insurrection." I submit, Mr. Speaker, that there is no existing war or any apprehension of war, invasion or insurrection, and that in consequence the right of the government to enact by order in council legislation which affects the whole country and which stultifies and annihilates parliament has ceased.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) has relied upon the Fort Frances case, and he has told parliament that there is a case in which valid orders in council were enacted after the cessation of hostilities, and that in consequence it is a precedent for the conduct of the government. I have read, somewhat hurriedly I must admit, the decision of the privy council in that case. I do not find that the question now at issue was raised directly. I do find that the law lord who rendered the judgment in that case did say that it was not the function of a court of justice to say, under section 6 of the War Measures Act, when the war had come to an end; I quote now from page 706 of "Law Reports, Appeal Cases (1923)," in which Lord Haldane said:

> It may be that it has become clear that the crisis which arose is wholly at an end and that there is no justification for the continued exercise of an exceptional interference which becomes ultra vires when it is no longer called for. In such a case the law as laid down for distribution of powers in the ruling instrument would have to be invoked. But very clear evidence that the crisis had wholly passed away would be required to justify the judiciary, even when the question raised was one of ultra vires which it had to decide, in overruling the decision of the government that exceptional measures were still requisite.

Therefore, if I have correctly interpreted the words of Lord Haldane, he went no farther than to say that it was not the function of the courts to say when the war was at an end. It was the duty of the government to say when the war was at an end. It is because we believe that that is the duty of the government, that we ask the government to state definitely what everybody knows to be a fact, namely, that there is no longer any reason to fear the "existence of a real or apprehended war, invasion or insurrection."

There may be dozens of crises. There may be an economic crisis; there may be a financial crisis, there may be a social crisis. Such crises may be reasons to introduce other legislation. I would say to the Minister of Justice that it is not very consoling to hon. gentlemen who have come here to take a part, and a full part, in the enactment of legislation, to be told day after day that somebody or some body other than parliament is legislating for the country.

The effort which the opposition is putting forth is toward a return to normal conditions. I am willing to admit with the Minister of Justice that it might have been imprudent to abolish all controls at one fell swoop. There is the widest divergence between such an act and the course that wisdom would suggest and what the law requires, namely that legislation be brought down stating that an emergency other than the existence of war, real or apprehended, or of invasion or insurrection, is to be relied upon for the enactment of further orders in council. I do not think extravagant language makes a case any better than it really is, but does anybody in the country doubt for a moment that the war is at an end? Does anybody question that hostilities have ceased? Under the statute the government was authorized to rule by order in council only so long as there was an existing war. If other emergencies are to be met, let it be stated in a bill submitted to the house what the emergency is; I know of no tribunal more competent and more willing to pass upon that issue than parliament. Parliament after all had a function. It has lost it. For the last six years it has been a mere looker-on. Until a declaration comes from the administration that the war is at an end, and until new legislation is enacted warranting further orders in council, I submit with great deference that the government is acting outside the law, and that there is nothing in the decision of the privy council in the Fort Frances case which runs counter to that statement. Every day we are told that orders in council are passed, which in the normal course of events could only be enacted by parliament. Nothing is more tenacious than the lust for power. Once a man has tasted the blood which enables him to make his wish law to a great number, he becomes inebriated by the draught and finds it most difficult to recede into the position which is properly his. I suggest to hon. members opposite that they should cease making orders in council under the War Measures Act. I make the suggestion with full knowledge of the difficulties of government at the present time. Everybody, whether he sits to the right or to the left of the Speaker, knows that government is now a difficult task, and in so far as I am able to interpret the sentiment of those who sit to your left, Mr. Speaker, they realize the difficulties of government and they do not wish to resort to any petty means to improve their political position. But that being admitted, they feel that it is their duty to insist that the rights of parliament be restored to parliament; that the electorate of Canada, in so far as it has found representation in the house, be allowed to express itself, and that when a measure is about to be enacted it should be subjected to the criticism, and to the betterment which inevitably follows the criticism of parliament.

That sums up my commentary on the statement of the Minister of Justice. His statement was clear but it did not answer the question. His statement was truthful, but it did not give any enlightenment as to the time that the government intends to rehabilitate parliament and do away with the method of government which is one of the ills of war, to which we bowed as a necessity of war, and from which we wish to be relieved now that the war is over.

Mr. H. G. ARCHIBALD (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words about the matter of controls. This subject has always interested me more from the point of view of historical processes than anything else. I have listened to the various speakers. For instance, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) mentioned the other evening that—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I would inform the hon. member that he cannot refer to debates which have previously taken place during the present session.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It has been mentioned here at various times that Manchesterian Liberalism would solve the problem, and to-night we have the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) advancing the position that he did not know when these controls would be lifted, but that they were necessary at the present time. Controls are the very opposite of Manchesterian Liberalism. Manchesterian Liberalism is the right to buy and sell freely before the law. Now we have the state entering into the very keynote of production; government orders regulating trade. The tendency is to increase rather than decrease as the years go by.

The opposition is criticizing the government for maintaining these controls. Yet the former leader of that party, the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, was the first in this country to advance a planned economy from the point of view of the old-line parties. The process that we see will end up with the state ultimately becoming the sole capitalist. That is advanced by such men as Frederic Engels and Karl Marx. It is bound to come about. The necessity for state control came through the war. The government recognizes that a crisis is still with us and this crisis will continue with us as the years go by; therefore we are going to see the absolute continuation of government control within private industry.

It is interesting to me to see what is happening to the social groupings because of those price controls. For example, I have received letters from small meat-packing concerns claiming that under the quota system they cannot get into the export market, and they cannot sell sufficient on the home market to make it pay because they cannot get the meat.

This means that they are dissolved, that they are being wiped out and that the big meat-packing concerns are taking the whole business. The individual commodity is losing all value, and more and more commodities have to be exported in order to make any profit whatsoever. Therefore on the home market we are facing a scarcity and we have the quota system as it is applied in the meat markets. It is applied there by government law,, but actually it is in effect to-day in nearly all industry because they cannot get the material. Clothing stores are under the quota system to all intents and purposes. They cannot sell enough to maintain their position; therefore they go out of business. Consequently we are seeing the liquidation of the small trading class. It is interesting to note the effects that this is having on the political arena. Such groups as can be seen to the left, the C.C.F. and the Social Credit party, are an expression of protest from the small middle class, such as the small working class. This tendency will go on and we shall gain more and more support from that small middle class. Therefore at the present time the government is cutting the ground from under its feet because it is wiping out the very support by which it maintains itself. From the point of view of a socialist I would say, more power to the government, because it is hoisting itself with its own petard.

Mr. G. R. PEARKES (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to make any address such as "Praise God and pass the ammunition" or to enter into any discussion regarding controls. But while the government is considering the questions which have been put to them to-day, I should like to raise one point. I have no desire whatever to be provocative or anything but constructive.

We have just come to the victorious conclusion of campaigns in northwest Europe and in the Pacific. Perhaps I use the word "campaigns" advisedly, because I must admit I am a little confused as to whether or not the war is over. One of the principal lessons we have learned from those victorious campaigns is that it has been essential that there should be coordinated effort between the navies, armies and air forces of the allied nations. A few weeks ago we had the privilege of seeing the models and films of "Mulberry", which was the development of the ports for landing on the coast of France on V-day. I think everyone who saw and studied those models must have been convinced that a vast amount of skilful and detailed planning had been carried out beforehand in order to ensure the success of the men who were fighting on the beaches, because without that forethought no amount of gallantry would have been of any avail. From the earliest inception of these plans soldiers, sailors and airmen worked together as one staff, closeted in rooms, considering every detail of the parts which those three services should play when the great day came. I may say equally that this practice was followed in the great amphibian operations which were carried out in the Pacific theatre of war.

I submit that we are in the planning stage now when we come to consider the estimates of the three defence services, the planning stage in order that we may preserve the hard-won peace during the next two or three years. I know that is referred to as an interim period; I am not suggesting that the planning is going any farther than this interim period, but I suggest that this is an important period and quite possibly a dangerous one. Therefore I would plead that we do not lose sight of the great lesson we learned during the war, that there must be proper cooperation between the navy, the army and the air force as a prerequisite to any success. I do not believe the ministers of the government and their executive officers have been working in water-tight compartments during the preparation of the estimates they are about to submit for this interim period. I am sure they must have progressed beyond those unhappy days when service estimates were prepared behind closed doors, with the greatest secrecy, because one service was competing against the others for what defence funds the government of the day were prepared to make available.

I do not wish to retard the business of this house. On the contrary I believe that the estimates of the services would be considered more efficiently and dealt with more expeditiously if, before we take up these estimates in committee, some member of the government would give us the results of their deliberations and tell us the over-all picture, so that before we consider each individual service estimate we can see what is the defensive policy of the government and make sure that the three services are coordinated. Otherwise we shall be arguing in the dark, discussing this service and that service without having an over-all picture.

Mr. DOUGLAS G. ROSS (St. Paul's): In the beginning of my remarks, Mr. Deputy Speaker, may I congratulate you upon the honour which has been bestowed upon you in your appointment to the position you now hold.

At a time like this, after a period during which conditions have been so disturbed, and when we find the Big Five having a great deal of difficulty, I think we should consider for a few moments what should be the position of Canada. My ancestors, like those of many others in this house, came to this country years ago. People of many nationalities came to Canada, and they came here because of the British traditions which are followed in this country. They wanted to be free; and when you read the history of Canada you find that all our institutions are founded on the freedom of man and on democracy, based on British traditions. For more than a year Britain stood alone against the whole of Europe. No country helped her except the nations of the commonwealth; and, thank God, Canada was one of those nations. I think it is now about time we supported her in the difficult position in which she finds herself to-day. Everything we have that is good, everything that means freedom, comes to us from those traditions which we have had handed down to us and for which our forefathers shed their blood. They are not new; they are old, the foundation of democracy as we have it to-day, and I think the least we can do is to give Great Britain our support in these difficult times.

The world to-day depends on Great Britain and the United States, a country which has followed our traditions. Let us support Great Britain as one of the members of the Big Five. Let us see to it that we support Great Britain and the United States in their fight for freedom.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last the Minister of Finance explained the reasons why he is now bringing forward a proposal to ask for $1,365 million—

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Speaker, just on a point of order, this is a rather important point of order, as the hon. member has already spoken in this debate.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: On Friday the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) did speak. He can speak again only with the unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE: By consent of the house.

Mr. POULIOT: Give him a chance.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Speaker, I have no objection, with the unanimous consent, but—

Mr. BRACKEN: If there is objection to my proceeding I will sit down right now. But I explained when I spoke the other day that I was giving way to the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), who had been called away. I could not say it at the time, but the fact was that he had been called away on account of the death of his father on the preceding day. But I do not propose to go on if there is any objection from anybody in this house.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to unanimous consent; but I must firmly insist that a speaker in this house has no right to speak a second time in debate, without the unanimous consent of the house. I never have heard of that rule being broken in the twenty years I have been in parliament, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I think that is the rule. Of course, in this case, we shall be going into committee, and the leader of the opposition would have an opportunity to speak then.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Unanimous consent.

Mr. GRAYDON: You will surely not cut him off!

Mr. POULIOT: Go ahead.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR NAVAL SERVICES

Mr. GRAYDON: That is about the worst I have seen.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Pretty small onions.

Mr. ILSLEY: I did not refuse unanimous consent.

Mr. GRAYDON: You could not have thought, surely, or you would not have said that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. BRACKEN: Go ahead and make your statement.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Shall the item carry?

Mr. ILSLEY: Before the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Abbott) begins, I wish to make my position very clear in this matter.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): You did.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think it is exceedingly important that no one in this house be allowed to speak, as of right, a second time in debate. I have no objection whatsoever to the hon. member's being given unanimous consent, and I so stated.

[Mr. Bracken.]

Mr. GRAYDON: Not the first time, you didn't.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes, he did.

Mr. ILSLEY: Just a minute. I raised the point as to whether anybody in this house should speak a second time in a debate. And I stated, when someone said "by unanimous consent," that I had no objection to the hon. member's speaking with unanimous consent. I wish to have that made clear, because it is not a matter about which the leader of the opposition should express indignation. That would be entirely unjustified. It is a matter of adherence to a very important rule in this house, the rule which provides that no one has a right to speak a second time in debate, with Mr. Speaker in the chair, except with unanimous consent. But I had no objection to the giving of unanimous consent.

Mr. BRACKEN: Mr. Chairman, since permission has been given the Minister of Finance to make a statement, I might be permitted to say a few words. On Friday, after he spoke, I said only two things. I asked for permission to have the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) proceed, because I knew what the house did not know, namely, that he had been called home because of the death of his father on the previous day; knowing, too, that he would take a prominent part on behalf of this party in this debate.

The only other thing I said was to offer support of the victory loan proposal made by the Minister of Finance. Let me say this other thing, that on purely technical grounds, no doubt the minister and the government are correct, but on grounds of substantial justice they are wrong.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member was not stopped from proceeding, because it was made clear to him that he had unanimous consent of the house to proceed.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, it was. I will not let the impression be given that he was stopped from speaking in that debate. When he talks about grounds of substantial justice he is using language which is entirely unwarranted.

The contents of the speech he made last Friday afternoon are not in issue. The question is whether he made a speech at all or not. I think it is important that the point be made clear. Let us suppose that it is not. Let us suppose that the point had not been raised at all, and that in a future debate in the house some hon. member rises and tries to make a second speech. He may be stopped, and immediately he would say that one rule is being applied to the leader of the opposition and another rule being applied to private members. That would be the first thing that would be said.

If the rules of this house are to be upheld, and especially in a ruling of this kind—and it is a most important ruling—it is my duty as Acting Prime Minister to raise that point, particularly when I coupled with it the clear indication and statement that I had no objection to the hon. member's proceeding, because I said I had no objection to unanimous consent being given. I wish to make that clear, because I am surprised that this matter is being treated in this somewhat emotional manner by the opposition. It is just a simple point of observing the rules of order and decorum in this house.

So far as justice is concerned, the hon. member now has an opportunity to make any speech he wishes. He will have that chance, and he had a chance a few minutes ago.

An hon. MEMBER: No, he did not.

Mr. ILSLEY: But he refused to take it. He had it, by unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): He did not.

Mr. FRASER: Mr. Speaker did not sit down, and he did not give the hon. member a chance to rise.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order.

Mr. FRASER: Mr. Speaker did not sit down.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The business before the committee is this vote of $1,365 million. Shall the item carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Steam-roller.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Just a minute; I would ask the hon. member for Souris to withdraw that statement, please.

Mr. GRAYDON: Nothing wrong with "steam-roller".

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I did not know there was anything wrong with that. I read the remarks which appeared in Hansard for Friday afternoon, where my leader made a few observations in which he said that he was giving way to the hon. member for Vancouver South, who had then been called home because of the death of his father. Then he said a few words about the victory loan which the Prime Minister was launching at a future date, and then sat down. I challenge any hon. member in this house to read what was said on Friday afternoon, and then to interpret it in any other way than that the leader of the opposition was giving way to the hon. member for Vancouver South, and that he would speak again on the resolution stage. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) who had moved that the house go into committee said—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CLEAVER: Why did he not speak before?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Where is the point of order? Who has the floor now?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I do not have to withdraw anything for the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver).

Mr. CLEAVER: The Chair is asking you to withdraw. Are you going to?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): What is the remark the hon. gentleman just made?

Mr. CLEAVER: The Chair has asked the hon. member to withdraw an objectionable remark.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): What have you to do with it. I will bow to the ruling of the Chair at any time. I have no desire whatever to be discourteous in any debate in this chamber, whether the Speaker is in the chair or whether we are in committee with the Chairman in the chair. I will bow to the ruling that is given at any time.

An hon. MEMBER: Even when it is wrong.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Yes, even though it may be wrong. I would like hon. members to read what appears on Hansard and judge whether it was becoming for the leader of the government to object at this stage as he has. I bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, if I have said anything unbecoming to the dignity of this parliament.

Mr. BROOKS: I should like to call attention to what the leader of the opposition said at that time. He said:

> I am sure that the house has listened with a great deal of interest—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BROOKS: I am speaking on a point of order. I continue:

> —to what the minister has had to say. It is not my intention to speak at this time.

The leader of the opposition did not speak at that time. He gave way to the hon. member for Vancouver South. I think the mistake that was made to-night was that the Speaker put the wrong motion. I believe it was the intention of hon. members on the other side to give unanimous consent and I think they expected that the Speaker would put that motion. But the Speaker put the other motion and thus the leader of the opposition could not speak.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN(Mr. Golding): I would point out to hon. members that the incident is now closed and the leader of the opposition has an opportunity to present his point of view in regard to this matter.

Mr. BRACKEN: You may be sure you will hear it. Now that the house with its rules has put us into committee of the whole we propose to hear what the government has to say in justification of these expenditures. I suggest with all deference that it is the responsibility of the government to give that statement now.

Mr. ABBOTT: Mr. Chairman, let me say at the outset that I had a certain personal interest in hoping that the house would give unanimous consent to the leader of the opposition, because frankly I am reluctant to commence my statement with respect to the navy, which I propose to do, at almost twenty minutes to eleven o'clock.

Mr. BRACKEN: I am not responsible for that.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am quite ready to do it, but as I say I would have preferred to start at a time when I could deliver my statement all in one piece, as it were. However, I shall go as far as I can this evening, and the committee can have the deferred pleasure of listening to the rest of my statement at some later date.

It has been the practice in past years during the war to commence the statement with respect to the various service departments with a brief operational summary, and I should like to follow that practice to-night. This is probably the last occasion on which a service minister will make a report on operational matters. The last report of this kind was made by my predecessor, the Hon. Mr. Macdonald, on April 3 which, as the committee will realize now, was not very far from V-E day.

From the beginning of April on the Canadian navy continued its primary function of convoy duty on the north Atlantic, and this was continued until after all danger of German submarines was over. As the committee will recall, two of the U-boats surrendered to our forces, one off Nova Scotia and one off Newfoundland. One was brought into Saint John and the other to Shelburne. Mine-sweeping operations were continued in the channel up to very recently, but our mine-sweepers have now been withdrawn from that duty and are on their way back to Canada.

In addition, during the past four or five months ships of the Canadian navy have been engaged in ferrying operations. Six old river-class destroyers have been employed between the United Kingdom and Canada and between Newfoundland and Canada. In addition, a number of our frigates have assisted in transporting Canadian service men from Newfoundland to Quebec. The anti-aircraft cruiser Prince Robert was in Sydney at the time of the Japanese surrender. She was then and had been for some time operating with the British Pacific fleet under the command of Sir Bruce Fraser. She was able to proceed and did proceed to Hong Kong with the units of that fleet to accept the surrender of that port, at the same time carrying badly needed supplies for our prisoners who were there. She is now at Manila, refueling, still under the command of the commander in chief of the British Pacific fleet. Our latest information is that she will return shortly to Esquimalt, bringing with her a number of prisoners of war. I cannot say definitely when she will be there, but it will probably be in three or four weeks time, according to the latest information we have.

The cruiser Uganda, as the committee knows, was serving with the British Pacific fleet for several months. She went out early in January and participated in several actions, taking part in the bombardment of Shakihimo island and Dublon island and in the engagements off Okinawa. She returned to Canada a few months ago to enable those of her personnel who had not volunteered for Pacific service to be replaced by others. In the circumstances, it turned out that she got back to Canada just about the time of the Japanese surrender.

Our second cruiser, the Ontario, was commissioned in April. After her working out in the Mediterranean she proceeded to the far east, arriving about a month or six weeks ago. At that time she proceeded to Hong Kong where she is at the present time. She has been and will continue for the immediate future under the command of Admiral Fraser, with the British Pacific fleet.

I feel that I should not leave this summary of operational matters without referring to two incidents which do not relate directly to operations but which have been much in the public eye during the last three or four months. I refer particularly to the disturbances at Halifax on V-E day and to the explosion which took place later on in the naval magazine in Bedford Basin. I have no particular comment to make on the V-E day disturbances. As I said in the statement which I issued after the findings of the royal commission had been made known, no one could do other than regret those disturbances, but I am sure that all Canadians will remember that many of the naval ratings who took part in those disturbances were the same men who had earned their country's gratitude for their courage and endurance in the long and arduous Atlantic campaign. The government appointed, as the committee knows, Mr. Justice Kellock a royal commissioner to inquire into the causes of that disturbance. He made his report, which has been tabled in the house, and I have no particular comment to offer upon it. He found in substance that the naval command had not done all that it should have done and that the discipline of the navy in Halifax was not perhaps all that it should have been. But those of us who served in the last war know that one's emotions on the day of victory are likely to run fairly high and that if a thing of that sort is not checked in the early stages it is apt to run to extremes, and that I am afraid is what happened in Halifax.

The findings of the royal commissioner were that the causes were those for which the navy should be held responsible, and the government accepted financial responsibility for the loss to Halifax merchants and residents caused by the disturbances. Personally I hope that it is sufficiently remote in time that the people of the country will realize that there were extenuating circumstances and that the high reputation which the men of the navy have justly earned during six years of war will not be imperiled as a result of the unfortunate incidents of that one day.

The explosion in the Bedford magazine—both of these unfortunate incidents took place shortly after I had been appointed minister—coming as it did so close after the V-E day disturbance, must have made the people of Halifax regret that they were living in a naval port. The consequences of this explosion so far as damage to property was concerned were rather extensive, but fortunately the loss of life was slight. There was only one man killed. He was a naval rating who had been a watchman on the jetty on which the initial fire apparently took place. He was killed, but there was no other loss of life.

Immediately after the explosion a naval court of inquiry was set up, and when the report of that inquiry was received I gave a statement to the press, since the house was not sitting at the time, summarizing the findings. At the same time, with the collaboration of my colleague the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), a committee of explosive experts was appointed, headed by Lieutenant-Colonel Ogilvie, charged with the responsibility of investigating the arrangements at the magazine, of inquiring into the design and location of the present buildings, and of reviewing the circumstances and conditions leading up to the explosion. That committee visited Halifax shortly after the explosion took place. I asked them first to make a preliminary inquiry to ascertain whether in their opinion the steps which were being taken to clean up the magazine area and to dispose of damaged ammunition and the like were being properly taken and were satisfactory. I am glad to say that they reported that in their opinion the steps which were being taken to clear up the danger area and to remove the damaged ammunition were completely satisfactory, and they complimented highly the officers in charge of that work. The committee has now returned to Halifax and is carrying on the main purpose of its inquiry, namely, to inquire into the design and arrangements of the magazine itself and to report whether or not any changes should be made in those arrangements to ensure so far as humanly possible that there would be no recurrence of such an explosion.

In addition to these measures Rear Admiral Brodeur was appointed inspector general of naval ordnance and has been charged with the duty and responsibility of examining naval magazines throughout the country and reporting as to their sufficiency, and in addition reporting on the quantities and methods of stowage of naval ammunition.

I mention those points because in view of the unfortunate explosion in the Bedford magazine I thought that perhaps the people who may live near other magazines may feel that the design or arrangements are not all they should be, and I wanted to make sure so far as possible that every precaution is taken to see that they are. So much for the operations and activities of the navy since the report was made by my predecessor on the 3rd of April last.

On the question of operations may I say that early in the war it was felt that attention should be paid to the matter of making the story of the navy permanently available to the Canadian public. Accordingly, in 1941 a full-time naval historian was appointed to collect material and to write an official history of the navy.

Present plans envisage three volumes. The first volume will cover the period from 1909 to 1939. The second volume will deal with the shore side of the navy after 1939, with particular emphasis on the work of getting the ships to sea properly manned, armed, and supplied and of maintaining them there. The third volume will be devoted to operations and it may be that some of the photographs produced in the navy's photographic section will be used to illustrate the text.

At the time the last report on naval affairs was made to the house by my predecessor on April 3, 1945, the service had reached the peak of its expansion in personnel. It then had some 95,000 men and women on active service both afloat and ashore. Within a period of little more than three months from the time that report was made, both Germany and Japan had surrendered and the need for maintaining the war-time strength of the Royal Canadian Navy was over. Recruiting and training for war were abandoned. The problems of demobilization, rehabilitation and readjustment took their place. It required almost six years to increase the Canadian naval strength fifty-fold. It is expected that by March 31, 1946, the personnel in the service will have been reduced to about 10,000, and that number will include the members of the permanent force supplemented by members of the reserves who engage for service during a two-year period.

The navy's plans for participation in the Japanese war called for the employment afloat of some 13,500 men, plus a reserve pool of some 3,500. Actually, some 38,000 had volunteered for Pacific duty. Of the remaining 57,000 in the service on V-E day, May 7, some would have been required for continuing commitments elsewhere than in the Pacific; the balance were to be discharged.

By mid-August, however, Japan had surrendered and partial demobilization gave way to a policy of general demobilization, based, as in the other services, on the principle of "first in, first out." This principle applies generally but the service must of course reserve the right to retain certain few key men essential to the orderly demobilization and disposal of surplus ships and establishments. In common with the other services, some exceptions to the general rule are necessary to expedite discharges on compassionate grounds, the discharge of students returning to their studies, of farmers, of ex-prisoners of war and the like.

On September 26, more than 19,000 personnel had been discharged from the navy, and almost 22,000 were on leave awaiting discharge, representing in all close to one-half of the total strength as it stood on V-E day. Within the next four months an average of 10,000 should go out each month, and by March 31 next the size of the service in men should be down to approximately 10,000.

Recruiting for the Women's Royal Canadian Naval Service was discontinued early this year. Demobilization of the women's service has been proceeding for some time. Since April 1 of this year, approximately 1,000 W.R.C.N.S. officers and ratings have been demobilized. As of August 31, the total strength of the group was 5,424. Some 50 per cent of this strength will be required until the end of 1945 principally for work connected with demobilization. I should say here, that the work of the Women's Royal Canadian Naval Service in connection with the demobilization organization has proved to be most valuable to the service. By the end of the present fiscal year, however, all W.R.C.N.S. should be demobilized.

The authorized strength of the permanent Royal Canadian navy is 771 officers and 8,003 ratings. The actual strength is 534 officers and 3,383 ratings. It is now proposed to supplement this permanent force by the addition of volunteers from the reserve now on active service who will engage for a two-year period. In due course, it is expected that permanent transfers from the reserves, new enlistments and cadet entries from the Royal Canadian Naval College will supply the men required for the force

The committee may be interested in an outline of the discharge procedure followed by the navy. A man designated for demobilization is drafted from his ship or establishment to a discharge transit centre. The main discharge transit centres are at Halifax, N.S., and Esquimalt, B.C., although there are certain other small centres elsewhere. At the discharge transit centre he undergoes a complete physical examination, including X-ray; blood test; teeth inspection, et cetera. If medical care is required, the necessary arrangements are made with the Department of Veterans Affairs. Gear and clothing on loan is turned in; service papers and records put in order; leave due is authorized and transportation to the naval division nearest his home is arranged.

At the naval division, upon completion of leave, the discharge routine is concluded. All back pay is received; civilian ration books, national registration cards, discharge certificate and war service badge are issued. Rehabilitation grant and plain clothes gratuity are paid and final medical check is made. The application for war service gratuity is completed and if the dischargee lives outside the point where the division is located, he is provided with transportation to his home. Rehabilitation officers and employment counsellors are provided at the discharge transit centre and at naval divisions and are available for advice and help with reference to schooling, employment, references to the re-employment officers of selective service and to the Department of Veterans Affairs.

I turn now from the subject of men to the subject of ships. A very large percentage of the ships in Canada's navy and of the equipment in those ships was produced in Canada by Canadian workmen of Canadian materials. With the exception of the Tribal destroyer building programme which was in progress in Halifax on V-E day, all major warship construction for the Canadian account had been completed. There were a few orders outstanding for auxiliary vessels when Germany surrendered, and these were cancelled immediately.

Before sending out ships to the Pacific war we had to equip them for conditions to be encountered in the tropical waters there. Considerable readjustment was necessary for these vessels which had been serving in cold weather of the north Atlantic. Arrangements were accordingly made to "tropicalize" them.

Upon the surrender of Japan this work was stopped. The effect of this action was to reduce public expenditures but it will of course curtail employment in shipyards which have done great service in the cause of the war at sea.

The Tribal destroyer building programme has not been interrupted. On September 14, H.M.C.S. Micmac, the first Canadian-built destroyer, was accepted by the navy at Halifax. Two more Tribals will be completed in 1946 and the fourth should be available in 1947. All these Tribal destroyers will be of value to Canada's post-war fleet and it is consistent with the government's policy to complete the programme.

At the time of Germany's surrender last May, Canada had the fourth largest fleet actively engaged in the cause of the united nations. In six years there had been a sixty-fold increase in its size, and this increase was a modern record. The fleet on V-E day included some 374 fighting units and over 566 auxiliary craft. Twenty-four Canadian ships of war had been lost up to V-E day, but on the other hand, the ships of Canada's fleet destroyed or assisted in the destruction of seventy-five enemy surface and submarine vessels and in the damaging of forty-three others.

At no time during the European war was there a surplus of naval craft available to the united nations. Canada did all she could to help supply this great need. Early in the war we decided to build naval craft, and we turned our hand to the type of ship which would be of most value for the work which we felt we could do best. That work was convoy, and the naval craft required was the escort ship.

We began with the building of single screw corvettes which proved their value in the emergency. Our shipyards later produced larger escort vessels, notably the frigate. Both corvette and the frigate are in the category of relatively small specialized naval vessels. They proved their worth as the figures on convoys show, but many of them were pretty well worn out when the war ended. Escort craft are not the type of ship which could be retained as the main component of a naval force.

Gradually the Canadian navy commissioned larger warships and at the end of the German war we possessed cruisers, carriers and destroyers as well as escort vessels.

The plans of the Royal Canadian Navy for the Japanese war called for the operation of a modern force of some sixty warships. In this number were to be included two carriers, two cruisers, one anti-aircraft cruiser, at least twelve destroyers, and about forty frigates. It was proposed that the remaining warships of the fleet, with the exception of a few training ships, some ships for patrol on Canada's west coast and the necessary auxiliaries and harbour craft, were to be paid off.

It is now little more than a month since Japan capitulated and the process of paying off ships has developed rapidly. To date 178 ships of war have been de-stored and laid up. These include destroyers, corvettes, minesweepers, converted yachts and motor patrol vessels. In the neighbourhood of 100 auxiliaries and harbour craft have been removed from service. It was originally expected that the navy could dispose of an average of one major and one minor ship of war per day. In point of fact the rate achieved has been three major craft and two minor craft per day.

The end of hostilities has called for the closing down of many bases where there has been a very high level of employment maintained during the war. I am aware that local business interests and local labour groups will be affected by this policy. The committee will realize, however, that it cannot be otherwise. The navy's size will be considerably curtailed and, accordingly, the requirements for the services which these bases provided in war time will no longer exist.

At Halifax, the main fleet base on the east coast will be operated. So, too, will H.M. Canadian dockyard on a scale necessary for the requirements of the base there. The main fleet base on the west coast will be at Esquimalt, B.C., and the scale of its operations will be governed by requirements as they exist from time to time. The principal ammunition depots of the service will be at Renous, N.B., and at Kamloops, B.C. Naval service headquarters will remain in Ottawa. No policy has yet been formulated with reference to the future use of the building which now houses naval headquarters.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. ABBOTT: It would take me about five or ten minutes to finish. I am in the hands of the committee.

Some hon. MEMBERS: It is eleven o'clock.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, October 3, 1945.

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

REQUEST FOR USE OF NO. 32 AIRPORT, SOUTH OF MOOSE JAW, AS MENTAL HOSPITAL

Mr. THATCHER:

1. Has the government received a request from the Saskatchewan government, requesting that the buildings of the former No. 32 airport, south of Moose Jaw, be turned over to the provincial government for use as a mental hospital?

2. If so, what action is being taken by the government?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West):

1. Yes.

2. None. The matter was considered several times but the latest information received shows that this site is no longer required by the provincial government of Saskatchewan for a mental hospital.

SURPLUS CROWN ASSETS

Mr. SHAW:

1. Does crown assets allocation committee and/or War Assets Corporation keep a systematic record in classified form of all crown assets declared surplus to requirements by war plants, the army, the navy, and the air force?

2. Has crown assets allocation committee and/or War Assets Corporation a systematic record in classified form of all crown assets rendered to scrap at Penhold, No. 2 T.S.U.?

3. Is the record referred to in question 2 available to members of parliament?

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. Yes, when surpluses of crown assets are reported in detail. Certain surpluses, however, are reported in blanket form and records are built up as these are taken over by the War Assets Corporation.

2. A systematic record of surpluses rendered to scrap at Penhold No. 2 T.S.U. is available.

3. The record will be made available to the committee or subcommittee of the house to be set up to investigate war expenditures and matters of this kind.

WAR ASSETS CORPORATION—AIRCRAFT WHEELS

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North):

1. Is it the policy of War Assets Corporation to sell materials only in the locality in which they are situated?

2. How many aircraft wheels from Anson, Moths and Faireys have been sold?

3. How many permits have been issued to buy such aircraft wheels?

4. What is the total number of wheels for which permits have been issued?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. No. Surpluses are offered for sale firstly in the areas where they become available, except where they occur in sufficiently large quantities as to permit of national distribution.

2.	Anson	Number
New	Main wheel tubes	2
	Tail wheel tires	946
	Tail wheel tubes	659
Used	Main wheel complete.....	789
	Tail wheel complete	208
	Tiger Moth
Used	Main wheel complete	231
	Tail wheel complete	75
	Fairey Battle
New	Main wheel hubs	16
	Main wheel tires	1,970
	Main wheel tubes	1,966
Used	Main wheel complete	601
	Tail wheel complete	142

3. No permit is issued or required for the purchase of wheels only. Permits covering 8,492 tires and 8,492 tubes have been issued as of September 30, 1945. Records are not readily available to show the actual number of permits issued, as a permit may cover one or more tires and tubes.

4. Answered by No. 3.

PUBLIC SERVICE—NUMBER OF EMPLOYEES IN WAR WORK AND NON-WAR WORK

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's):

What is the total number of employees who have been appointed since March 1, 1944, (a) for work not directly associated with the war; (b) for work directly associated with the war?

Mr. MARTIN: The other day I suggested that because of the impossibility of answering this question, it be dropped. The hon. gentleman was not in his seat at the time and I agreed to let the matter stand until he returned.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I am willing to have the question dropped if it cannot be answered.

Question dropped.

TORONTO POST OFFICE BUILDINGS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What action has been taken to turn over the new mail order post office building to the post office at Toronto?
2. Who occupies this building at the present time, and for what purpose?
3. When will the Toronto post office have the use of this building?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): In March, 1943, representations were made to the Department of National Defence to vacate the city delivery building in order that it might be fitted up as originally intended for postal use. As a result of these representations, approximately one-half of the ground floor was made available. Further representations are now being made to the Department of National Defence that the remainder of the building be made available at the earliest possible date.

PRISONERS OF WAR—BOWMANVILLE BOYS' TRAINING SCHOOL

Mr. STEPHENSON:

1. Was the Bowmanville boys' training school, Bowmanville, Ontario, taken over by the government for a German officer prison camp?
2. If so, on what date, and on what terms?
3. What steps have been taken or are being taken to return this property to the school authorities?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. Yes.

2. These premises were taken over at a nominal rental from the province of Ontario on Nov. 3, 1941, for the period of the present war and six months thereafter and beyond the six months period from month to month for so long as required. Dominion to pay all charges for maintenance and operation of the premises and to restore the premises on termination of the lease to the condition when taken over, reasonable wear and tear only excepted.

The dominion is to reimburse province for salaries of engineers and firemen, $6,175 per annum plus cost of living bonus, and to pay rental for temporary school buildings at rate of $1,260 per annum.

3. These premises have been vacated and declared surplus to requirements of the Department of National Defence and the crown assets allocation committee of the Department of Reconstruction has authorized the Department of National Defence to proceed with termination of the lease and restoration of the premises. Arrangements have now been made with the Department of Public Works of the province of Ontario for return of the property to provincial control and steps have been taken in conjunction with that department for the restoration of the premises to their original condition. It is expected that contracts for restoration will be called for within the next two weeks and that restoration should be started within one month.

VETERANS' LAND ACT—BUILDING MATERIALS

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. Has the board under the Veterans' Land Act a stock of, (a) building materials; (b) bath tubs; (c) other plumbing supplies?
2. If so, what are the values thereof, and how many bath tubs are included in the stock?

Mr. TUCKER:

1. (a) Yes. (b) and (c) No.

2. (a) Approximately $2,306,000; (b) and (c) Answered by No. 1.

*INCOME TAX—REFUNDABLE PORTION

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough):

With reference to the repayment of the refundable portion of income tax for 1942, and with reference to section 93 of the War Income Tax Act, (a) will the time limit for repayment run from 2nd September, 1945, or from some later date to be fixed; (b) if from some later date, when will such date be fixed?

Mr. McCANN: The answer to the first half of part (a) of the question is no, and the answer to the second half is yes.

The answer to part (b) of the question is that the date will in all probability be announced in the budget address of the Minister of Finance.

ARMY PERSONNEL ON EXTENDED LEAVE

Mr. TUSTIN:

1. How many army personnel are on extended leave?
2. Are any N.R.M.A. personnel on extended leave?
3. If so, how many?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. As of 12 September, 1945: 15,938 all ranks (including N.R.M.A.).

2. Yes.

3. As of 12 September, 1945: 8,567.

WARTIME HOUSING LTD.—STAFF-HOUSE FURNISHINGS

Mr. FRASER:

1. What staff-house furnishings such as beds, chairs, couches, linen, etc., have the Wartime Housing Ltd., sold or disposed of?
2. From what staff-house did these articles come?
3. What was the original cost of these articles?
4. What was selling price?
5. To whom were they sold?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. No staff-house furnishings have been sold or disposed of by Wartime Housing Limited except those transferred in bulk, at cost price, to the Department of Pensions and National Health and declared as surplus to our requirements through the Department of Munitions and Supply.

2, 3, 4 and 5. As follows:

From what staff house did these articles come?	What was the original cost?	What was the selling price?	To whom were they sold?
Women's hostel, Kingston, Ont., W.H.L. Project 3....	$71,428 83	$71,428 83	Department of Pensions and National Health through D.M.S. May 5, 1945.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

CANADIAN ARMY—PACIFIC

Mr. TUSTIN:

1. What was the strength of the Pacific army, (a) on June 30, 1945; (b) on September 1, 1945?

2. How many were volunteers from Canada who had no service outside Canada?

3. Is this force now disbanded?

4. If not, when will it be disbanded?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. (a) at 27 June, 1945 (closest strength return date) there were none actually posted to the Canadian army Pacific force; (b) on August 29, 1945, 24,055 all ranks were actually posted to units of the Canadian army Pacific force.

2. Information not readily available and would entail a search of individual documents of all those on strength.

3. Yes.

4. See 3 above.

CANADIAN ARMY—CANADA AND OVERSEAS

Mr. TUSTIN:

1. What was the strength of the Canadian army on V-E day?

2. What is the strength of the Canadian army now?

3. What is the strength of the Canadian army overseas; in Canada?

4. Does the army strength figure include personnel on extended leave?

5. If so, how many are so included?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. 491,942 all ranks.

2. As of 12 September, 1945 (latest return available)—426,135 all ranks.

3. As of 12 September, 1945: Overseas, 210,898; Canada and adjacent territories, 215,237.

4. Yes.

5. 15,938 all ranks.

PENHOLD, ALTA., AIR STATION

Mr. ASHBY:

1. Has the air force station at Penhold, Alberta, been closed?

2. If so, what disposal is being made of the buildings and equipment?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West):

1. Yes.

2. (a) Buildings are being declared surplus to R.C.A.F. requirements; (b) the majority of the equipment has been removed to R.C.A.F. equipment or repair depots. It is expected that all equipment will be cleared from this site by October 16, 1945.

SHIPMENTS OF FOOD AND CLOTHING TO ITALY

Mr. FRASER:

1. Has Canada supplied any food or clothing to Italy and Germany during the last year?

2. If so, what has been supplied and in what quantities?

3. Under what terms were these goods supplied?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1 and 2. Canada has supplied no food or clothing to Germany during the past year through the Canadian mutual aid board or as military relief.

During 1944 and up to Aug. 31, Canada has supplied as military relief destined for the Italian area, the following items:

Item	Quantity (L. tons)	Value
Wheat	382,826	$24,883,690 00
Newsprint	2,629	170,421 00
Pickled Herring ..	1,254	211,960 00
Dry Salt Fish.....	357	156,660 00
Calcium Carbide ..	444	56,000 00
Iron Catalyst	24	15,788 00
Mining Supplies (Explosives, Fuse Blasting Caps) ..	various	165,000 00
Carbon Paper	3,000 boxes	2,205 00
Candles	215,000 only	9,500 00
Clothing	Nil	Nil
Total Value at Seaboard..		$25,671,224 00

While the above items were called forward by the combined civil affairs committee (Supply) for the Italian area, the theatre commander may have diverted considerable quantities of the above items to the Balkans or perhaps southern France, and it will not be known for some considerable time of any such diversions. All of the above figures are in Canadian dollars at seaboard. Any additional charges for ocean freight would only be charged to Canada if shipment went forward in a Canadian flagged boat. In the past, 90 per cent of all Canadian military relief items have been carried either in American or British flagged ships.

3. Under the terms of military relief, the Italian government or any government receiving any of the above stores will be presented with a bill for their cost and payment will be expected.

*REVISION OF STATUTES

Mr. DANIEL:

1. When is the next consolidation and revision of the statutes of Canada to be made?

2. Is a special commission to be appointed for that purpose?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No decision has as yet been arrived at in respect of either of these questions.

VETERANS' LAND ACT—RETURN GRANTS

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. How many of the ex-service men, now on farms, are receiving awaiting return grants?

2. How many of the ex-service men or women, who have entered other businesses, are receiving awaiting return grants?

Mr. TUCKER: Return at October 2, 1945:

1. 807.

2. 374.

MINES AND RESOURCES—SEED GRAIN AND RELIEF ADVANCE ACCOUNT

Mr. BARRETT:

1. What is the present total of the seed grain and relief advance account administered by the Department of Mines and Resources?

2. Of this, how much is principle and how much accrued interest?

3. How much, (a) principal; (b) interest has been collected in each of the last three fiscal years?

4. How much was written off in each of the past three fiscal years?

5. Upon whose recommendation and under what authority are write-offs made?

Mr. GLEN:

1. $6,139,105.14 .

2. Principal, $2,525,263.99; interest, $3,613,-841.15.

3. (a) Principal: 1942-43, $15,312.47; 1943-44, $40,318.77; 1944-45, $70,693.70; (b) Interest: 1942-43, $8,408.58; 1943-44, $29,424.44; 1944-45, $40,884.15.

4. 1942-43, $116,375.12; 1943-44, $100,433.63; 1944-45, $148,052.18.

5. Adjustments are authorized by treasury board, pursuant to section 1, chapter 51-17 George V, 1927.

The recommendations are made by the Minister of Mines and Resources and are based on reports obtained from seed grain adjustment boards.

CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS

Mr. PEARKES:

1. How many conscientious objectors are still compulsorily retained in work camps in Canada?

2. How many of these are Jehovah Witnesses, and in which camps are they located?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. 196 as of October 2nd, 1945.

2. 169 of these 196 are Jehovah Witnesses. They are located in the following alternative service work camps:

Petawawa forest experiment station, Chalk River, Ontario, 29; Riding Mountain national park, Wasagaming, Manitoba, 24; Jasper national park, Jasper, Alberta, 25; Banff national park, Banff, Alberta, 46; Kananaskis forest experimental station, Seebe, Alberta, 16; Kootenay national park, Field, British Columbia, 29.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

SURPLUS WAR ASSETS—ARGENTINA

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Has the War Assets Corporation or any department of the government disposed of any aeroplanes, corvettes, or other war equipment to the republic of Argentina or agency on behalf of Argentina?

2. If so, (a) what type of planes, what quantities and what prices; (b) what number of corvettes, and at what prices?

3. If not, has any government department issued any permits for the export of planes, corvettes, or other war equipment to the republic of Argentina? If so, what are the numbers in each case?

CIVIL SERVICE—ASSISTANT DEPUTY MINISTERS

Mr. TUSTIN:

1. Since January 1, 1940, have any persons been appointed to the rank of assistant deputy minister other than by the civil service commission?

2. If so, what are the names of such persons, and what salary is paid to each?

3. By what method were each of these appointed, and what was the reason for the use of that method in each case?

PAYMENTS FOR TAXI SERVICE, SHERBROOKE, N.S.

Mr. STANFIELD:

What amounts, if any, have been paid by, (a) departments of national defence for navy, army, air; (b) Department of Labour; (c) Department of Munitions and Supply since September, 1939, to the Sherbrooke Taxi Service of Sherbrooke, N.S., and/or to Mr. J. E. Fraser of Sherbrooke, N.S., for taxis, repairs and other services and supplies?

ARMY AND R.C.A.F. EX-WAR PRISONERS OVERSEAS

Mr. BOUCHER:

1. How many ex-prisoners of war of, (a) the Canadian army; (b) the R.C.A.F., are still overseas?

2. When is it expected that all army and R.C.A.F. ex-prisoners will be returned to Canada?

3. For what reasons have these men not been returned to Canada prior to this?

CANADIAN ARMY—UNITED KINGDOM—REPATRIATION

Mr. HENDERSON:

1. What units of the Canadian army in the United Kingdom have been designated for return to Canada before October 15?

2. What units have already arrived in Canada?

3. What percentage of each unit is made up of, or will be made up of, N.R.M.A. personnel?

4. What number of each unit have served with such units for a period exceeding six months?

CIVIL SERVICE—DEPUTY MINISTERS

Mr. BRADSHAW:

1. What are the names of all persons who have been appointed to the rank of deputy minister since January 1, 1944?
2. What are the qualifications of each such person?
3. What salary is being paid to each such person?
4. What was the salary paid to the predecessor of each such person?

FISHERY PRODUCTS

Mr. REID:

1. What was the total value of all fishery products, including fresh and salt water fish products, during each of the years 1930 to the end of 1944 inclusive?
2. What was the total value for each province during each of the above mentioned years?
3. What were the total quantities by weight, in pounds, for each of the various provinces, giving the total quantities and value of, (a) salmon; (b) herring; (c) halibut; (d) cod, of all varieties, during each of the years 1930 to end of 1944, inclusive?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

RADIO BROADCASTING—PORT ALBERNI, B.C.

Mr. GREEN:

For a copy of all correspondence, reports and other documents in the possession of the government, dated during the past three years, referring to or concerning the issuing, extending or transferring of a permit for a radio station at or near Port Alberni, British Columbia.

CROWN COMPANIES

Mr. FRASER:

For a statement showing, (a) the names of all crown companies incorporated since September 1, 1939; (b) the purpose for which each such company was incorporated; (c) the present activities and operations of each such company; (d) the names, addresses, ordinary occupations and salaries of the directors and principal officers of each such company.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S WARRANTS

Mr. FRASER:

For a copy of all governor general's warrants issued between January 1, 1944, and the present date.

CIVIL SERVICE—WAR DUTIES SUPPLEMENTS

Mr. BLAIR:

For a statement showing, (a) the names of all civil servants who have been paid a war duties supplement; (b) the amounts paid to each; (c) the ordinary duties of each such person and the special duties in respect of which the supplement was paid.

Mr. MAYHEW: Parts (a) and (b) can be readily answered, but I would ask the hon. member for Lanark if he would redraft part (c), because it entails the investigation of some 6,500 accounts. This would take a great deal of time and would involve considerable expense. Perhaps his purpose would be met if he would redraft part (c).

Mr. BLAIR: I understand that some of the civil servants are getting considerable by way of additions to their ordinary salaries. This information is important. I will agree, however, to rewrite or to reword part (c) of the question.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Do I understand the whole motion is withdrawn?

Mr. BLAIR: No, just part (c).

Motion as amended agreed to.

DISALLOWANCE OF PROVINCIAL LEGISLATION—ALBERTA

Mr. COLDWELL:

For a copy of all reports of the Minister of Justice recommending disallowance of, (a) an act to amend the Limitation of Actions Act, 1935 (Alberta), disallowed March 25, 1939 (P.C. 676); (b) an act to amend the Limitation of Actions Act, 1935 (Alberta), disallowed October 4, 1939 (P.C. 2949); (c) the Debt Proceedings Suspension Act, 1941 (Alberta), disallowed March 27, 1942 (P.C. 2350); (d) the orderly payment of Land Debts Act, 1941 (Alberta), disallowed March 27, 1942 (P.C. 2350); (e) the Municipal District Act Amendment Act, 1941 (Alberta), disallowed March 27, 1942 (P.C. 2350); (f) the Limitation of Actions Act, 1935, amendment act, 1941 (Alberta), disallowed March 27, 1942 (P.C. 2350).

STEVENSON AIRFIELD, WINNIPEG

Mr. KNOWLES:

For a copy of any plans prepared by the Department of Transport since May 1, 1944, with reference to the enlarging of Stevenson field, at Winnipeg, or a copy of any alterations made in the plan tabled on the above date as sessional paper No. 287 of that year.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

RATIO OF PRICE LEVELS TO NATIONAL INCOME—MOTION RULED OUT OF ORDER

On the order being called:

The following proposed resolution—Whereas agriculture has seldom received its fair share of the national income of Canada;

And whereas the cost of producing all agricultural products varies considerably from year to year;

Therefore be it resolved,—That, in the opinion of this house and in the interest of the nation as a whole, the government be requested to set the prices of agricultural products at such a level that it will guarantee to the farmers of Canada at such yearly percentage of the national income as will have the same relation to the national income as the agricultural population bears to the national population of Canada.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The first resolution under notices of motions stands in the name of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston). I must rule the motion out of order, for the following reasons:

The question of establishing a price structure for basic farm products either at levels of ninety per cent or at parity with other services and products was fully debated on amendments to the address which were negatived on Thursday, September 27.

The hon. member's motion deals also with the percentage of the prices of the same products. In view of the extensive debate which took place on this price question, and the vote given by the house last Thursday, I am afraid that consideration of the motion of the hon. member for Bow River would be a repetition of debate.

Beauchesne's third edition, paragraph 245, page 104, reads as follows:

> It is a wholesome restraint upon members that they cannot revive a debate already concluded; and it would be little use in preventing the same question from being offered twice in the same session if, without being offered, its merits might be discussed again and again.

Therefore I rule that this motion is out of order.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

AGE AND INCOME REQUIREMENTS—PROPOSED INCREASE IN AMOUNTS PAYABLE

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East) moved:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the time has arrived when consideration should be given to amending the Old Age Pension Act by lowering the pensionable age to sixty years, by increasing the amount of the pension so as to enable the recipients to live in health and self-respect, and by deleting the income requirements for eligibility.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of confidence that I rise to open the discussion on this resolution, because I know that members of all parties in this house are agreed that something should be done to improve our old age pension legislation. This feeling has been manifest in this house for a number of years, but nothing has been done. Whether the house is prepared to accept the resolution as it stands on the order paper is, of course, a different matter, because there may be disagreements on this point or that. These, however, can be brought out in the debate.

The resolution resolves itself into three parts. I am asking that the house approve three changes in our old age pension legislation. I am asking, first, that the pensionable age be reduced to sixty years; second, that the amount of pension be increased to enable the recipients of pensions to live in health and self-respect, and, third, that the means test be removed. Those are the three points that I wish to discuss.

I do not think I need labour the first point, that is, the lowering of the eligible age from seventy to sixty years. I am convinced that it is agreed throughout the country and in this house that this is something long overdue. I base, on various grounds, my request that the pensionable age be reduced. So far as I know, Canada is the only important country in the world that has a pensionable age of seventy years. Speaking to a resolution on old age pensions moved in the house in the session of 1938, I put on the record the eligible age in most of the important countries in Europe, in the different countries of the British commonwealth and in countries in other parts of the world. At that time the only countries that had an age limit of seventy years were some of the states in the republic to the south. I do not know whether the states that had an eligible age of seventy years at that time have since reduced the age limit to sixty-five years or lower. I would draw attention to the fact that in New Zealand, and I think in Australia, the eligible age in 1938 was sixty for women and sixty-five for men. However, this age limit has since been reduced in both countries to sixty years for both men and women.

It is a generally accepted policy in almost all of our large industries, and in small industries as well, that employees retire at sixty-five or even at an earlier age. In any industry where the work is heavy, very few people are able to carry on until the age of sixty-five. It is only in industries where people work with their brains rather than with their brawn that they are able to carry on very long after sixty years of age. In the government employ the retiring age is sixty-five. I am informed that there is considerable agitation to make the retiring age sixty years. Even from the government's own point of view, a person has outlived his usefulness after sixty-five years of age. After they have left their employment, whatever it may be, there are few who have put enough by to take care of themselves. Consequently most people must be looked after by some form of charity, by members of their family or by other means.

More than ever this is the age of the young people. Very few businesses will take employees for permanent employment who have reached the age of thirty-five years unless they have some particular experience or skill in a certain line of endeavour. During the depression years, when people over fifty lost their employment, they found it almost impossible to get back into any sort of permanent employment. Those conditions will come again—I do not mean the depression—and many people will find it impossible to get anything but intermittent employment. When we get back into normal production, when we resume our normal course of living, it will be more difficult than ever, because inventions have improved our means of production immensely during the last six years.

If we think in terms of social need and the social welfare of our people we will come to the conclusion that in order to provide security for those who are finishing their life's work and to provide opportunities for those who are beginning their life's work we must have a retiring age at somewhere around sixty.

At this point the question will arise, I suppose, in some hon. gentlemen's minds: Can the country afford to pay pensions to all its citizens when they reach the age of sixty? While the question may not be asked of me, members will no doubt be proposing it to themselves: Have we considered what the cost will be? My answer is that the country can afford to reduce the pensionable age to sixty, and I have considered the cost before answering that question. I will try to show what it would cost in money terms, although I do not think that money terms is the proper way at all in which to look at the question. However, as we measure things in terms of money, I will bring the question down to that basis.

If everyone on reaching the age of sixty were to receive a pension of $50 a month—I think that was the figure mentioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) a few evenings ago—what would the cost be? Of course any figures stated at this time would be only an estimate, and I do not want my figures to be taken as anything more than that.

From figures recently given me by the bureau of statistics I find that according to the 1941 census there were in Canada 1,174,966 persons sixty years of age and over, as of June of that year. If it is of interest to the house, the number of men was 609,466 and the number of women 565,500.

I also ascertained from the bureau of statistics the number of persons over sixty years of age who were gainfully employed at the time this census was taken, and I draw attention to this figure particularly because I think it is significant. Of the 1,174,966 persons sixty years and over, 410,336 were gainfully employed in industry or working for themselves, in farming or some other business. That means that there were 765,000 persons over sixty who were not gainfully employed in 1941. I also draw the attention of the house to the fact that in June, 1941, we were approaching the end of the second year of the war, when employment conditions were improving rapidly, and many persons sixty years and over had been absorbed into production who had not worked very much during the depression years. Let us say that to-day the number of persons in Canada sixty years and over is 1,200,000; the actual figure may be a little more or a little less. To pension or superannuate that number at $50 a month would require the sum of $720,000,000. That is a large sum of money, and before the war, before we began talking in billions instead of millions, he would have been a brave man indeed who would have suggested that we spend that amount on anything whatsoever, and particularly on social services. I remember that in the debate on a resolution similar to this in 1938 the then minister of finance, Hon. Mr. Dunning, referred to the enormous sums of $65,000,000 and $75,000,000. But to-day the government itself is proposing expenditures on old age pensions that will amount two or three years from now—I do not know exactly when they expect their proposal to go into effect—to $230,000,000 or $240,000,000 a year. That figure was mentioned in the dominion government's proposals to the provinces at the recent dominion-provincial conference.

Can we afford to spend that sum of money? But the real question is: Are we able to provide the people of Canada of sixty years and over with goods and services to the value of $720,000,000 annually? On our record during the last two or three years I think we can. I think there is no doubt about it at all. Further, that if we do not do something of the kind we shall have thousands of young men and young women idle in this dominion.

I have at hand the average unemployment figure for 1938, when there were 401,000 persons unemployed in Canada in that year. There would be more people employed in some months than in others, but that was the average unemployment figure for the year. In 1939, the year the war began, the average unemployment figure was 388,000. When people tell me that we cannot afford to spend the amount of money I mentioned a moment ago to provide pensions for people sixty years of age and over, I would ask them to compute the wealth that three or four hundred thousand men and women could produce in the course of a year. What I am suggesting to-day, therefore, is not that we raid the treasury to the extent of $720,000,000 a year but that we so plan and organize the resources of Canada that we can produce that amount of wealth. When we resolve the problem into one of producing goods and services, instead of thinking of it merely in terms of dollars, it is no problem at all.

Hon. members, I suppose, have received the second annual report of the mutual aid board, which was distributed at the opening of the session. This board has considerable authority behind it, and I would like to read to the house the names of the members of the board. Perhaps hon. members already know them, but in order that the solidity of the board may be appreciated, I will give the names.

The chairman is Hon. C. D. Howe, Minister of Munitions and Supply. Other members of the board are: Hon. J. L. Ilsley, Minister of Finance; Hon. J. G. Gardiner, Minister of Agriculture; Hon. L. S. St. Laurent, Minister of Justice; Hon. J. A. MacKinnon, Minister of Trade and Commerce. Also mentioned here is "Hon. A. G. L. McNaughton, Minister of National Defence". I do not know whether he is still a member of the board; however, it really does not matter.

I will now quote two brief paragraphs from this report. On page 1 it says:

> In it a dollar value is set upon the volume of mutual aid goods furnished by Canada during the past fiscal year. But the true worth of mutual aid can no more be estimated in dollars than can the heroism of allied fighting men or the labour of war workers. The real value of mutual aid is that it has been, and will continue to be, a factor in the victories of the allied armies.

So that it is the real value we have to consider in respect of the pensions we can provide for the people of Canada, in the same way as we provided mutual aid. Pensions will give security and comfort and a feeling of general well-being to those who have reached the age of sixty, many of whom would otherwise be in distress.

Turning to page 2 of the report, where it refers to the productive capacity of this dominion, I read:

> A country small in population, Canada has for many years stood high on the list of the world's food-producing and industrial nations. But only during the war have Canadians learned for the first time the true productive capacity of their country. Month after month during the five and one-half years that this nation has been at war production records have been shattered.

Production records were shattered because we geared the production of the country to meet the needs of the war. But it was not difficult to shatter the production record of the depression years. At times during that period, over half a million, yes, six hundred thousand people were unemployed. All the goods and services produced during the war, or goods and services of equal value, could have been produced during that period of depression if we had set for ourselves an objective and geared our economy to meet it.

Again let me say that, with the knowledge of what we can produce, and with the knowledge that what old age pensioners consume is not money, but food and clothing and shelter and fuel and medical care and all those things which go into the social life of each individual, we can provide these things; and surely we are not going to be held back because the figures, which after all are only the way we measure our production, seem to us larger than we have been accustomed to.

Keep in mind that I mentioned the sum of $720 million annually as the amount which would be required. In the mutual aid report to which I have already referred, on page 6, you will find that Canada gave to our allies loans and mutual aid by way of goods and services to the value of $4,500 million. I am not quite clear as to the period which that covers; very likely it was from 1941 to March 31 of this year. About one-third of that assistance was in loans which may be repaid, but two-thirds, or about $3,000 million, was an outright gift. I say again that if we can do that for others, surely we can do it for our own people, the people who produce Canada's wealth and have made of Canada what it is.

I would therefore urge hon. gentlemen to approach this question, not from the point of view of the money concerned, but in the same way as we approached war production. That is, if we have the raw materials,, the labour and the technical skill, the money can be found to put that raw material in the form in which it is required for ultimate consumption.

At about this point someone will want to ask: How are we going to raise the money to pay these pensions? I have no objection to such questions being asked. Shall we raise the money by taxation? Shall we raise it by what my hon. friends to the left call debt-creating loans; or shall we raise it by some other smooth, painless and perfect method? I am not very well versed in the matter of money, but I believe I have a more or less logical mind; I see how things operate, and I have tried to reduce this question to a simple formula, though without, I believe, over-simplifying it. I would say that if we are to provide social services we must make up our minds that they cannot be financed ultimately in any other way than by taxation. For whatever service is provided, if we pay a pension it is paid in terms of money but what it buys is the real payment.

Let us suppose that, instead of 12,000,000, our population consisted of 1,000 persons—I have reduced the proportions in order that we may grasp it—and that of these 1,000, one hundred were over sixty and consequently not producers, that is, under my proposal. Let us suppose that two hundred were under the age of sixteen, thus being also non-producers. We have therefore only seven hundred left. Now it is obvious to me that if the three hundred and the seven hundred as well are to be fed, clothed and sheltered and provided with the necessary comforts and luxuries of life, it can be done only out of the labour of the seven hundred who work.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Half of them would be married.

Mr. MacINNIS: I should hope that there would be half of them married, but the women also would be producing, in a sense. But I was going to go a little beyond that and point out that there would be others who would not be producers. There would be certain civil servants, there would be an army and navy, there would be an air force, there would be criminals, there would be people who would be looking after the criminals in gaol; and all these would be non-producers. Then we would most likely have a senate and there would be members of parliament. Most people take it that we are not producing very much, and sometimes they say we only raise hell. Whether that is true I do not know, but in any case to the extent that you do or do not, you are blamed. You are blamed by your enemies or by the opposition for creating too much hell and by your friends for not creating enough.

What I wish to call attention to particularly is that after all it is production that matters, and you cannot by any system of money manipulation that I know of take the burden of producing for the needs of the whole community off those who do the actual work. What we should be concerned with, therefore, in our social service schemes and also in our taxation is, first, what we get in return for our taxes, and second, how to increase the pool of production out of which taxes will be paid.

That brings me back to the statement I made earlier, that I am not proposing a raid on the treasury. What I am suggesting is that we plan and organize our economy so that we may produce, now that the war is over, wealth in the same measure as during the war, or in greater measure; because we can produce in greater measure since we have more people to do it than we had during the war.

This brings me to my last point, namely, the abolition of the means test. I do not think that anything in connection with old age pensions is more criticized than the means test.

Mr. MacNICOL: Or more unnecessary.

Mr. MacINNIS: Or, as my hon. friend says, more unnecessary. I notice that the government, in the proposals made to the provinces, have recommended that the means test be eliminated for persons over seventy years of age. If the means test is undesirable for persons over seventy, then it is undesirable for persons under seventy. You cannot make the means test palatable under any system whatsoever. I will bring the government itself as my witness on this point. At page 37 of the proposals of the dominion government I find this, under the heading "Deficiencies of the Present Scheme."

> The means test is generally recognized as undesirable after a certain age.

I do not know what bright young man came to that conclusion; he has evidently not reached the age of sixty-five yet.

> It has been noted that about forty per cent of all persons of seventy years of age and over make application, satisfy the means test requirements and receive the pension.

That is to say, forty per cent of the persons of seventy years of age are destitute and consequently satisfy the means test and receive the pension. The statement goes on:

> There is little doubt that a very considerable number in addition are not able entirely to support themselves, but are dependent upon their family, and refrain from applying for pensions because of the embarrassment occasioned by the means test.

Right there you have the argument, the complete argument, for the abolition of the means test in any old age pension scheme.

I notice that my time is almost up. I will conclude by just making one more point. With the proposals made by the government, I think we have made a little progress and there is a considerable social security legislation programme as between the provinces and the dominion; but what I think we should aim at is a coordinated social security programme that would provide for every hazard that a man in modern society is apt to meet.

If hon. members will allow me to refer to New Zealand, I note that they have accomplished that very thing. I have before me a list which I should like to read of the monetary benefits paid under the New Zealand social security programme: Universal superannuation at the age of sixty-five; age benefit at the age of sixty—I should like to elaborate on this, but I have time only to mention each item without comment. Then they have invalids' benefits; widows' benefits, orphans' benefits; family benefits; miners' benefits; sickness benefits; unemployment benefits. Then there is an emergency benefit to meet any case not covered by those I have already mentioned, and besides that they have free medical services, which is a part of the social security plan, so that when a man becomes ill he immediately receives his free medical service. I say "free", but none of these things are free, because we cannot get things free. In New Zealand the social security services are paid for to some extent by the five per cent income tax. But a man receives medical attention, hospital care and nursing service, though the doctors are not cooperating fully as yet. Again, a man will get a monetary benefit if he is ill and unable to work; his wife, if he has one, and the members of his family also will receive a monetary benefit. That, I think, is what we should aim at; and may I say that such a programme should be free from any taint of charity. It should come to every citizen as of right, because as a citizen he has given his services to the country.

Mr. P. E. COTE (Verdun): Mr. Speaker, I wish to express my agreement with the aim translated in the resolution moved by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), to better the situation of the old people by improving our Old Age Pension Act.

It is common knowledge that all workers in the community contribute to a greater or lesser degree to the economic welfare of the country, by the extent that they share in the production at large and by the amount that they spend for their own upkeep and that of their dependents. We can all agree, I think, that the citizen of this or any other country can no more be considered an isolated entity than a nation in this twentieth century can consider itself and act as though it were isolated from the rest of the world. True solidarity exists, and rightly so, between the individuals themselves on the one hand and between the individuals and the state on the other. The individual receives some benefit from the toil of his neighbours, and on the other hand he must discharge a responsibility toward those same neighbours. The same applies to the state, which receives benefits from the contribution of the individual to the economic and social life of the country. I feel that the state has an accumulated debt of gratitude and a responsibility to those individuals who have given their all in the development of the country, and that this responsibility should be discharged if and when that is found necessary in view of the particular needs of some of those individuals.

In a few words I should like to review what has been done in Canada for our aged citizens, what has been done by our government to come to the rescue of old people who are destitute or approaching destitution. Since the very beginning of this century the question of assisting our old people has occupied the minds of our social workers and members of parliament. An observer would find that in 1906 the first debate took place in this house in this connection. At that time a resolution was adopted expressing the desire of a majority of the members for the adoption of such legislation. During several sessions following that time similar debates took place with practically the same result. In 1924 a special committee of the house was set up, having as its particular duty to study the details of the whole question. That committee made a report to the house, but the report was not implemented until 1927, when the discussion was resumed and the first act of parliament passed, laying down the principle of old age pensions and calling the provinces into equal partnership with the dominion government on the basis of $20 a month, with a means test which has continued to the present time, although many other improvements have since then been made in that legislation. Under that measure the provinces were left free to increase the amount of pension if they cared to do so, but at their own expense. In the early thirties the proportion of the dominion's contribution was increased to seventy-five per cent and the share of the provinces reduced to twenty-five per cent, and during the course of the war the basic maximum pension was increased from $20 to $25 a month.

In reviewing the history of old age pensions in Canada an observer will note that throughout these years the principle of assisting aged people has been upheld more and more strongly. It has been considered that the state owed this much at least to those who had contributed to the development of the country. One after another the nine provinces agreed on the principle, the last province coming in during 1936; and as a result we can say that the entire population is unanimously in favour of more and more improved old age pensions in Canada.

The resolution of the hon. member for Vancouver East calls the attention of this house to the inadequacy of the present system. I wish to compliment him on this thought, with which I fully agree. Among the constituents whom I have the honour to represent in this house, as among those in every district throughout this great country of ours, there are many cases of hardship among old people who are not treated with sufficient generosity under our present legislation. They are not getting a reasonable reciprocity for their past services to the country. To my mind, therefore, our legislation should be substantially improved.

The first difficulty which presents itself in a discussion in this House of Commons, however, is that we must restrict our debates and our legislation in the social field to matters concerning the welfare of the great masses of the population. That is so, and it will be so when the time comes to choose another basis for the fixation of the age limit in the application of the old age pension.

Parliament has not given any definition of old age or old age pensioners in any legislation of the past, or in any legislation still in force. The only thing by way of definition that the Canadian legislature has given has been a fixing of the age limit at a certain age. Up to now that age has been seventy years, and one must attain it before having a claim to any pension provided by the act.

This basis of payment has been of a somewhat arbitrary nature, because it has not yet been proved in Canada or elsewhere that old age should start at seventy, sixty-nine, or any lower age. The resolution before the house suggests that the limit should be set at sixty years. In doing so, the hon. member who sponsors the resolution lays down the principle that the retiring age of the average citizen in Canada has been set at sixty years.

I readily agree that there are unfortunate cases of hardship in the category of citizens of that age; but I do not feel that there are enough in proportion, to consider that the productive activity of the average citizen in a young and wealthy country, such as Canada, ceases when the age of sixty years has been reached.

If these cases of hardship affecting people of sixty years, or slightly more than that, are not considered an important proportion of the citizens of that category, then I consider that this matter of assistance and the rescue of others should rest primarily with the local governments, including municipal authorities and others.

I think a better case could be made in the advocating of the age of sixty-five years as a pension limit, so far as the dominion government is concerned. This age has been already recognized as a sound basis by the actuaries of most of our insurance companies and by the important financial, industrial and business corporations. They have set the age of sixty-five years as that at which their insured people and personnel might retire on pensions. Then, the federal, provincial and municipal governments, have set the same age of sixty-five years for the purpose of their superannuation and retirement funds.

This government has already accepted the age of sixty-five as a fair basis in the proposals it made to the provinces last August. These proposals provided for a fair ground of discussion with the provinces for the improvement of the treatment already given to the aged people throughout the country. Those between the ages of sixty-five and seventy would be cared for jointly by the dominion and the provinces, through the payment of a maximum pension of $30 a month, representing an increase of $5 over the amount set out in the Old Age Pensions Act. The administration of the pensions of this group is to be left with the provinces and the means test is to be retained so that the pension may be reduced by whatever amount represents the excess income of the pensioner over $125 a year.

In this particular instance I have no great objection to the means test, because I consider that it will affect the intermediate group between those people who do not receive old age pensions, and those who, under the new plan, would be receiving pensions at seventy years without any means test. The dominion proposal calls for only a federal contribution to pensions paid to those seventy years of age and over, on a basis of $30 a month, and without any means test. This would be paid to all residents of Canada who have spent at least twenty years residence in this country. I consider that these proposals by the dominion government to the provinces would cover the situation very well.

This concrete proposal should be of great assistance to the provinces in their study of this question, and in their offer of any amendments or counter-proposals when they reassemble with the federal authorities in, we are told, the not too distant future.

In view of the fact that the provinces are now being consulted in this connection, and that a definite proposal has already been offered by the dominion government, a proposal which represents a substantial improvement on the existing legislation, I submit that the resolution of the hon. member is premature and inappropriate at this time. It deals with a subject which should not have been brought into discussion until the conference with the provinces has been resumed, until those provinces have expressed their views, and until there has been some measure of accord with the dominion government and some reasonable and justifiable conclusion. Those conclusions, I presume, will be brought before the house and the country as preambles to further legislation the government will have to present, if it is to give effect to the results of the conference with the provinces.

There is another feature which I should like to bring to the attention of the house and concerning which I should like to make a few remarks before concluding.

Old age pensions, important as they may be, are nevertheless but a small fraction of the broader field of social insurance or social security. I doubt whether the approach to a question of this kind is well chosen, if it is not studied in constant relation to other measures of social security already on our statute book, or in process of becoming law.

After all, the responsibility of the state is not so much one of providing relief by itself as one of contributing and offering assistance to ensure a maximum of welfare and security to the citizens of the country. In a democracy such as ours the initial and the chief responsibility and initiative in that field should be left with the individual; and that responsibility is passed on from the individual, in a lesser degree, to his family, his social organizations, his municipality and his province. The dominion government should only lend a helpful hand, either by suggesting initiatives to local governments or individuals or by granting financial assistance. In implementing such a policy the central government should always keep in mind that its social legislation has for its aim the preservation and development of the human assets of the country rather than a tendance to reduce them.

Such measures as unemployment insurance, veterans' reestablishment, housing, labour legislation, health insurance, public health services, family allowances and others definitely tend to set a minimum of well-being and increase the expectancy of life and the productive activity of the individual. The more that measures like these can accomplish, the better it will be for the future of the country.

I am all in favour of old age pensions, but not as a direct aim of social security in itself. I favour them to the extent only that they can cover the majority of cases which have not been and could not be taken care of by other measures of social security, such as I mentioned a moment ago. Old age pensions should be considered as the last recourse of the state to remedy a social deficiency. Therefore I consider it a theoretical principle that the state would be making more progress if circumstances could allow it to increase the age limit in proportion and to the extent that other social measures are developed, that medical knowledge gets closer to perfection and that public health services become more adequate. On the other hand, it would be a sign of growing deficiency on the part of the state if the age limit for old age pensions has to be constantly lowered. I do not share the views of those who measure the value of an old age pension scheme by the age which has been set as the limit, without due consideration being given to the general aspect of other social security measures in force in or contemplated by the country. In a word, the best Old Age Pensions Act is not necessarily the one which provides for the lowest age limit.

We have had the good fortune of witnessing a conference between the federal and provincial authorities last August where definite proposals were made to the provinces to help them improve their treatment of the aged. Other social measures were considered as well as the general financial relations between the provinces and the dominion. In view of this conference, in view of the fact that the provinces are actually working on these proposals and preparing amendments and counter-proposals that they intend to submit on the resumption of the conference in a couple of months, I do not think this is an opportune or appropriate time for the House of Commons to consider amending a proposal which was made to the provinces last August.

The provincial authorities are highly authorized representatives of the people to deal with such matters as old age pensions, since this is a matter of their specific jurisdiction. Therefore, while favouring the improvement of our Old Age Pensions Act along the lines of the dominion proposal to the provinces, I am of the opinion that this resolution is premature and inappropriate at this time and should not be adopted.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, there is no more important matter for this parliament to deal with than the subject of the resolution moved by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). To-day we had our first snow flurry on parliament hill. It is going to be a severe winter and many of our population will be without shelter, fuel and food. In 1922, the first year I became a member of this house I moved a resolution regarding this question because I realized the great problem this country faced in connection with its old people. Nothing was done that year. I believe the late former member for Winnipeg North Centre, the father-in-law of the hon. member who moved this resolution, moved a resolution to the same effect. Both resolutions were sent to the industrial relations committee which was then functioning. Recommendations were made to the high court of parliament that some action be taken.

Because of the complicated constitution of this country with federal, provincial and municipal authorities, this problem has never been treated from the commercial and humanitarian aspects. It is the first duty of this national parliament to look after the health, comfort, happiness, welfare and prosperity of its citizens. We have not done that. We have wasted millions of dollars on material things, but so far as human values go we have left these matters largely to the municipalities and home authorities.

I remember when I was in the city hall at Toronto, where most of the social legislation of this country started, a pension scheme was set up for the police and fire departments. I was a member of the police commission at that time when the late Mr. Thomas Bradshaw in 1918 further developed this scheme. The scheme was extended to the school boards and to many other agencies. The whole question of federal old age pensions has been treated largely as charity in its administration.

In Ontario, since the turn of the century grand juries, in carrying out their ancient functions by visiting the gaols of the province, have urged better care of the aged. In almost every gaol they found poor people who were there simply because they were poor or had lost their jobs or were unable to work. Many years ago a house of industry was established in our city and we tried to take these poor unfortunate people out of the gaols of the province. I wish to pay a tribute to the Conservative government of Sir James Whitney, and to other governments of the province, for what was done along this line. But it must be remembered that most of the social work done was started first by municipalities of Ontario.

I am not prepared to say whether the age limit should be sixty-five or sixty years, but I do think something should be done immediately by the government. The resolution divides itself into three parts. First, there is the lowering of the age limit to sixty years; second, there is the increasing of the amount and, third, there is the deleting of income requirements for eligibility.

The third part of the resolution does not go far enough. It should eliminate what I call the means test. I know of one case of a newspaper man, one of the best loved men who ever sat in the gallery here at Ottawa, who died and left a widow. She is in receipt of a small old age pension of $29 a month. This is paid partly by the province and partly by the dominion and is distributed by the municipality.

Some years ago an attempt was made to take care of the veterans of 1885 of the old northwest field force, of which this man had been a member. His widow was entitled to some pension in that connection, but what did they do? They applied the means test. She refused to take the measly pittance which was being offered to those who had saved Canada from being dislocated in 1885; she decided to stay with what she thought was sure, her $29 a month old age pension. With the housing situation as it is she finds that she cannot get a room or two in the city for less than $45 a month.

The present form of old age pension is nothing but charity and it is a disgrace to the Canadian people. On my first visit to the house the other day I found on the order paper a motion to spend over the head of parliament the sum of two or three billion dollars. The House of Commons is not consulted as to how that money shall be spent, and I was surprised and waited in vain for somebody to say something about it on the 11th of September. We voted billions during the war without due consideration. Yet think of the measly way in which we are treating the deserving old aged people of this country! Something must be done. This measly means test should be abolished immediately.

The city of Toronto had a large number of men in the street department whom it pensioned off at $12 a week, without any contribution from any government. The old age pension board in Toronto consists of five persons and they are very fine people. The actual number of Toronto residents receiving old age pensions as of December 31 of last year was 11,044, and the amount paid out in pensions in 1944 was $3,651,449.31. There were also pensions to the blind being paid to 252 persons as of December 31, 1944, and the amount paid in pensions for the blind was $83,778. The city is also required to provide free office space for administration purposes.

But here in Canada you are making a political football of the question. The greatest mistake made by the fathers of confederation was in providing for provincial legislatures. They were created largely for political reasons, not economic reasons, and in old age pension administration we have had nothing but charity for our people ever since with a means test.

I do hope that something will be done about old age pensions at once. One of the reasons I came to Ottawa—I never come here looking for anything because I know I never would get anything—was to help support these humanitarian projects like the old age pension, sickness insurance, soldiers' welfare, and to spread nationally the gospel of these social services which started in the city of Toronto. I want to support all these measures that are related to the health and comfort and welfare of our people. That is my only reason for saying a word on this motion. We have a Department of Health and Social Welfare, presided over by the young minister from Montreal, which is supposed to look after everybody from the cradle to the grave and provide everybody with some kind of handout from the government treasury. One of the glories of the Victorian era was that the people kept the state. Now it is the state that is to keep all the people.

I commend what I have set out on this motion to the government. I do not know where the government is to-day; very few of them are in the chamber. The government spends millions of dollars without the authority of parliament; why cannot it do something about the old age pension now instead of waiting until next Christmas and then handing out relief? Something must be done immediately. I hope that other speakers will be heard from for five or ten minutes each, urging the government to do something now. I am not prepared to say whether the pensionable age should be sixty or sixty-five. But I do say that there should be no means test and that the list of persons eligible should be extended.

Mr. F. D. SHAW (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, exhaustive debate should not be necessary to convince the membership of this house of the desirability of giving unqualified support to this resolution. I propose this afternoon to make my remarks very brief, but my brevity does not come about through failure to recognize the absolute need for an immediate overhaul of the Old Age Pension Act; rather it comes as a consequence of my realization that on many previous occasions the members of this group have placed on the record, their views with respect to old age pensions, and extensive repetition is unnecessary.

An examination of the resolution before us reveals, as the sponsor stated, three things: first, not necessarily the demand but the request for consideration of lowering the pensionable age to sixty; second, increasing the amount of the pension to enable the recipient to live in health and self-respect; and third, deleting the income requirements for eligibility.

I am convinced that if a vote were taken to-day on this resolution, ninety-five per cent of the membership of this house would support it. I say that because I well recall that about a year ago the question was extensively debated in this chamber, and I fail to recall any private member having spoken in opposition to the proposals which were then made. I do recall, however, that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) suggested that the member who at that time was urgently demanding consideration of this question should place a resolution on the order paper or at least make a motion to the effect that these changes should be brought about. The minister knew that at that time it would have been utterly impossible for any private member to introduce a measure on which a vote of the house could be taken.

What is the situation as we find it to-day? The individual Canadian, worn-out, let us say, by the long struggle imposed by economic conditions, finds himself at the age of seventy unable to provide for himself and he makes application for pension. It is a well-known fact that he is looked upon in many quarters with pity, and in certain quarters he is looked upon as an outcast. Then he is examined, and I might add, with suspicion. If he can meet the rigid and severe qualifying regulations that have been established, including proof of virtual destitution, he is grudgingly granted what might well be called charity or a dole. I have yet failed to hear an argument to convince me that it is otherwise. It is a fact that there are hundreds, possibly even thousands, who never apply for the old age pension because they fear the inquisition which follows the application for pension. The whole thing does not finish when the applicant receives the pension. From that time forward he is periodically examined and questioned and checked.

Mr. BRACKEN: And double-checked.

Mr. SHAW: Right, double checked, and investigated and even spied upon. Certainly the individual recipient's life is made miserable, and it is almost a fact that he can hardly call that life his own.

If I were to cite ten reasons for voicing objection to the old age pension provisions as we know them to-day I would include a number of the following:

In the first place I would say that those who sponsor and support the present Old Age Pension Act fail miserably to appreciate the contributions made by so many of those pioneer citizens toward the development of this nation. Moreover, they fail to appreciate the fact that there are thousands in this country between the ages of sixty and seventy who by virtue of circumstances over which they have had no control are unable to earn a livelihood. It is a fact, and it was referred to earlier this afternoon that before the war men of forty, forty-five and fifty were regarded as being altogether too old for many of the types of employment which were available. It would almost seem that under the present system the government in effect are betting that the majority of our people will never live to be seventy. I charge that the present pension amounts which are paid never have and do not now bear any fair relationship to the cost of living.

It comes to my mind at this time that a year ago, during the debate to which I referred previously, the Minister of Finance indicated his belief that, since the cost of living in 1928 was higher than it was last year as reflected in the cost of living index, the pension which was received at that time should certainly provide more in the way of goods and therefore should be quite adequate. What he failed to indicate then was that when the scheme came into effect in the late twenties no one argued that the amounts paid were adequate to provide a decent standard of living for our aged pioneers. It is true that the figure was an arbitrary one. The arguments advanced were that it was somewhat new, that we must proceed with caution, and if conditions led us to believe that at some later date it would be necessary to increase the amounts, that would be done. I would say, too, in virtual condemnation of the present set-up, that it fails also to recognize the existence of a wife where the pensioner is over seventy and the wife is under seventy. This is what we have: a bachelor or a widower upon attaining the age of seventy years, or actually sixty-nine years and nine months, may make application for pension. If he passes all those rigid tests and meets all the rigid restrictions, he may be granted the maximum pension, which in certain cases is $30 per month. But if a married man becomes seventy years of age and is granted the pension, the authorities completely ignore the fact that he may have a wife under seventy years of age, because in the act there is no provision for making payments on behalf of the wife. A married man in his seventies with a wife in her seventies may get the maximum of $60 a month. Now I wonder by what method of calculation or reasoning it can make sense to anyone that we should ignore the existence of the wife if that wife is under seventy years of age.

I say that through our present pension system we fail to recognize the vast productive capacity of this country, and, as a previous speaker stated, that all these people are asking for is a fair share of Canada's production.

I would say, too, that the present scheme fails in another respect. It fails to recognize that if we, as members of the government have stated on recent occasions, are under a moral obligation to provide for the needs of the destitute in other nations, we are also under a moral obligation to provide for the aged pensioners of our own country, the needy of the nation.

This present scheme also fails to recognize, as do those who support it, the complete viciousness of the present means test. I have already said that scores of people have not applied for the pension, even though they need it in the worst way, because they fear that means test and its implications. Only within recent days I have had letters from three persons around the age of seventy-five who have stated, in effect, "We have not applied prior to this time because we did not want them meddling in our personal affairs, asking us why this son or this daughter does not provide for us. We have struggled on, hopeful of paying our way, but now we have come to the end of the road and it is necessary for us to make application."

The present pension system and those who support it fail to realize the effects which might develop as a result of our enabling many of these persons over sixty years of age to remove themselves from the employment stream. This was referred to earlier; I will not take time to elaborate upon it.

Another vicious aspect of the present provisions upon which I would lay particular emphasis is this. The scheme fails to recognize the existence of political misuse, because it is a well-known fact that eligibility and pension amounts are determined in considerable measure by administrative discretion. I would say that that is one of the strongest points of condemnation of the system as it is operating to-day.

In this country we boast, and justifiably so, of our great accomplishments. We boast of the real and potential wealth of this nation, and we boast about its being a Christian civilization. But I wonder if we are not sometimes just a bit ashamed to realize that hand in hand with our boasting we have on the statute books of our nation such a shameful piece of legislation as the present Old Age Pensions Act.

Certain objections have been raised with respect to the making of what might be called radical changes in the present provisions. It will probably be asserted that consideration is being given to a compulsory contributory scheme of old age pensions. I do not propose to take time to express my views about any such proposed scheme. But let me emphasize that while that may be something for the future, we are faced with a serious problem right now. A contributory scheme will not provide for those who are now listed among our needy aged pioneers. Let us indicate our seriousness and our sincerity about the future by making certain most essential changes to bring about immediate results, and let us make those changes at once.

Costs will be thrown in our faces, but it will be a weak and futile avenue of attempted escape. During this war we have astonished ourselves by what we have done as a people. Surely we are not going to say that certain changes in our present Old Age Pensions Act, to do nothing but grant many of our people simple justice, will now be impossible, especially in the light of our great accomplishments in the last few years.

With respect to financing, I should like to make reference to the words of the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), not with the idea of engaging in any controversy over what he has said. I have already indicated that we are supporting the resolution, but I could not help thinking, as he referred to the method of financing, that in order to carry out the proposal he suggested for the distribution of our production it would be necessary to tax from our people every cent which they did not spend.

To-day the government of Canada does not tax from the people, though it comes very close to it, perhaps, every cent they have not spent, but the government borrows and plunges us into debt. We say that there is another method, and we shall have an opportunity at a later time to deal with it in this house. I will not therefore elaborate upon it at the moment. I say, however, that anyone speaking in opposition to this resolution to-day must be prepared to answer two or three questions if he hopes to be at all convincing: Why cannot and should not the eligibility age be reduced to sixty immediately? Why cannot and should not the pension be increased in order to grant the security to which these people certainly are entitled? And a third question would be this: Why cannot and should not that vicious means test be removed? I am of the opinion that no amount of political manœuvering and time-killing debate will solve our problem. The issue is clear, concise and definite. I urge that the government give this house an opportunity to declare itself on this issue this afternoon.

Mr. D. A. CROLL (Spadina): In rising to speak on this question I realize that there has been some difference in the house as to whether the war is over or not. I think we are all agreed, though, that we are now passing through the transition period, at least in its first stages; and the productive machinery, the governmental machinery of the country and the outlook and trend are definitely from war to peace.

I agree with other hon. members in the house that the ultimate goal for all Canadians is social and economic security; but the path there, Mr. Speaker, is not strewn with roses, because to-day we have not only a multitude of new problems but also some old problems, and I am speaking of one old problem. I know something of this problem because I administered old age pensions in the province of Ontario as a member of the government, and under present changing conditions not only must we give consideration to the problem but we must do something about revising the Old Age Pensions Act.

It is only fair to say that the government have been aware of the problems. In 1943, by order in council, the amount was raised from $240 to $300, and in 1944 it was raised from $365 to $425 to pensioners.

Mr. KNOWLES: The total amount allowed.

Mr. CROLL: Yes. But a more prominent place to-day must be given to old age pensions because it is becoming an acute problem. There are a great number of objections to the old age pensions act now on the statute books. The first one is the means test. Because it is unparliamentary I cannot say what I think about that test; but believe me when I say to the house that many worthy people in Ontario have never applied because it meant an investigation of the son; it meant an investigation of the daughter and the son-in-law; it meant an investigation of the man's life, and his pride did not permit him to admit, and he would not admit publicly, that he had lost the economic battle of life. He had further to face the humiliation of turning over to the government his small house as a charge against the money that the government gave him, which in effect brought the government in the final analysis a mere pittance, because after the man passed away the government always made a settlement with the heirs or executors, took whatever they gave and often forgot about it. But the government had to go through the motions. That is unworthy of a country like Canada and unworthy of this government.

So far as the age is concerned, I shall have something to say about that in a few minutes. So far as the amount is concerned, we must not lose sight of the fact that it has been raised from $20 to $25, and that is progress. But that is not the vital point. There are provinces in this dominion that pay an old age pension of $18.63 and there are provinces that pay as high as $29.41; but the province that can afford the $29 usually pays the $18 and the province that has the greater needs cannot afford it. Consequently, it must be a dominion responsibility.

We have this act and we must keep pace with the times. We are living in an increasing tempo of everyday life. We are living at an accelerated and very fast pace, and we in Canada have astounded the world with our scientific development. We are one of the three great powers in the world possessing some very important scientific secrets. In this country not only have we stream-lined production in factories, on the farms, in our forests and fisheries, but we are speeding up that production from day to day and the momentum will continue rather than relax.

Every one of us in the house, excluding the lady member, must remember the horse and buggy and mechanical days, but we must not forget that to-day we sit on the very fringe of the rocket and the atomic power age. The old age pension legislation fits well into the age of yesterday and, as the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) said, the procedure in this house also belongs to that age. The scientists have done a great job, particularly in the last six years, but as yet they have not found a way to make of the body a tireless machine; so the human body wears out. To-day the need is for youth, both in body and in mind, the youth that brings with it not only vitality but strength. In industry at the present time fifty is a questionable age; a man fifty years old has difficulty in getting into most industries. In industry to-day sixty is a difficult age and seventy is an impossible age. That is the problem we have to face. At the present time there are some two hundred thousand pensioners who are not able to cope with the tempo of life or who are incapacitated and cannot maintain the Canadian standard of living. Peculiarly at this time we have an opportunity to do something about this problem, because by the hundreds of thousands young men are returning to the Canada which belongs to them, to pick up the threads and weave the pattern of a life of happiness and security. During the war the oldsters were plying the tools which belonged to the young men. As has been said in this house already, these old people made a valuable contribution to the war effort. They left their homes; they did everything that was asked of them, and now the time has come for the tools to change hands, for the young men to take up the task. Yesterday I read an article in the Windsor Star, dated October 2 and headed "Older Men Stepping Out":

> Many of the older men in some of the larger organizations in Canada are retiring now that the war is over. This makes vacancies by which others step up and there is a general reorganization.
> So many men eligible for retirement within the last three or four years have remained on the job to fill in while the younger men were at war. Now, these younger chaps are coming back and delayed promotions are being given.
> Most of the older men are glad to step out. They have been working hard and are tired. In their last active years they did more than when they were in the prime of their careers. They rose to the emergency and carried on well.

My submission is that we should permit the young men to work and create while the old men rest and enjoy life. We have heard a great deal about money. I expected some of the questions that were asked, but I think we ought to look at it from the point of view of whether or not this is a good investment, whether or not this is purchasing power. These old people spend their money; they are lucky to make it last the month, when they receive only $25 or even $30. In this house we placed upon the statute books a law that has the absolute approval of everyone, that has caught the imagination of this country and that is the envy of our neighbours to the south. I am referring to the family allowances legislation, under which we invest in the youth of this country. At the same time we pay compensation to people who meet with accidents, at any age; but for the inevitable accident of life, old age, we make a pitiful allowance. People who look upon that as charity are mistaken. People who look upon it as a reward are mistaken. People who look upon it as a burden are mistaken. It is a long overdue dividend to the pioneers and builders of this country.

I think the time has come when not only the Old Age Pensions Act but other legislation must be revised in order to keep step with the times. It is true that in private industry some arrangements are made for pensions. Public enterprise also makes some such arrangement, although public enterprise has gone much farther in this direction. But a great many people are in neither of these classes at the present time. They have toiled through the sunshine of their lives, and now in the twilight I think it is the duty of their representatives to see that the clouds do not entirely obscure the sun.

My hon. friend who introduced the motion made reference to the government blue book, which contains a great deal of information. He read paragraph 1 on page 37, and I should like to complete the record. At that page the government places on record its realization of the deficiencies and makes a public confession, which is not a common thing for governments to do. They say they recognize the problem, and there it is; my hon. friends agree to that. But the government go farther and say, "This is what we think ought to be done:

> In developing its proposals with reference to old age pensions, the federal government has given careful attention to the experience of other countries (in particular the plans and proposals now in operation or under consideration in Great Britain, the United States, Australia and New Zealand)—

That ought to make everybody happy.

> —as well as to the economic and social conditions of Canada. In the light of this survey, it appeared that the following principles should be incorporated in the dominion government's proposals.
> (a) The scheme should be nationwide in scope and capable of immediate implementation.
> (b) Benefits should be paid at flat rates and should not in individual cases have to be related to individual amounts or rates of prior contribution.
> (c) Provision should be made for more generous scales of payment and a lower age of eligibility than heretofore.
> (d) To the extent that means-testing procedures may have to be maintained, they should be left as the administrative responsibility of the provinces, who are best equipped to deal with this problem.

Naturally I do not agree with the last point, although if it were left to the provinces I can assure the house that the means test would have gone out the window. It would have gone out the window when I had the department, and I think I can speak for those now in charge. That is progress. It is all very well to say it is only a step in the right direction; but when one reads farther and realizes that the government has as its plan a national old age pension to all people at the age of seventy and, in addition, a pension to those in need between the ages of sixty-five and sixty-nine, it seems to me it is not only a step in the right direction but a hop, skip and jump in that direction. True, it may not go as far as we should like, but we have to face up to it.

[Mr. Croll.]

The crux of the situation lies in the dominion-provincial conference. If we are to deal with these related problems, then we must have the complete, absolute and over-all right to collect income tax, to collect succession duties and to collect corporation taxes. And so long as the provinces will not untie our hands, we cannot write cheques for social services to the extent we would wish.

It is our business to create public opinion in that respect. I think the steps taken by the government at the present time are forward looking and realistic. However, I was completely impressed by what was said by the hon. member who has sponsored the motion. These were his words as I recorded them: "The government does not see its objective, and the government has not planned."

May I point out to him that at this particular time to act in a piecemeal fashion would accomplish only a limited objective. Not only must the government look at old age pensions, but it must look at health insurance and unemployment insurance. A resolution is now offered asking that this insurance be increased by fifty per cent. I have no doubt a number of us will have something to say when that matter is before the house.

Only a few days ago we discussed the question of further allowances to veteran settlers, a matter which will come before the veterans affairs committee. The government must look at these problems in the broadest sense—and not only the government, but each one of us. Those are the things we want. I do not believe we want to have them piecemeal. I believe that by our rising in our places, speaking about these problems and expressing our opinions the government will learn where we stand. Undoubtedly we must have a somewhat broader vision in these matters. If we have responsibility, then we also must have some power.

We must have the right to tax before we have the right to spend. Undoubtedly this is vital to the whole question at the present time, and I agree with it in principle. On the other hand, we must make certain that we view the problem in its widest scope, and as it is related to other social services. Then we must deal with it on that basis.

Mr. NORMAN J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, may I offer my word of congratulation to the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) who has so ably presented views which, I believe, were based on actual experiences he has had, in more ways than one. I must say I was in accord with him when in a sense he criticized the present administration for not having developed and improved the Old Age Pensions Act before this time. I am quite sure the hon. member will acquit himself honourably in this chamber. Those who have had earlier associations with him will agree that he will add much to the discussions in the days to come.

I can readily understand that the introduction of this resolution is only the beginning of much that will be said in the house respecting legislation for the care of persons who have reached the point where they are unable to support themselves. As the days and weeks pass it will be expected that the government will introduce something along the lines suggested in the resolution. In fact, already some notice has been given of future action. The hon. member who moved the resolution has developed in to-day's debate a discussion which may be of guidance to the government in its task.

The Old Age Pensions Act and associated legislation is a dominion-born statute. It was passed, I believe in 1927, in cooperation with the provincial governments and with some minor modifications it has remained on the statute books almost in its original state.

The fact that this statute during those years has been permitted to remain more or less in a static condition is one which might well be criticized. Because of their administrative arrangements with the federal government, and to ensure their provincial autonomy, the provincial governments have exercised certain powers. In turn they have been assisted by the municipalities and by local boards which have been set up in the municipalities. To all intents and purposes the clerks of municipalities have been the media through whom the applications have been developed. Originally the Old Age Pensions Act operated on a fifty-fifty basis. That has been modified to the extent that it is now placed at seventy-five for the dominion and twenty-five for the provinces.

Quite recently the federal government has discovered that it can spend well over $200 million per year to look after the younger citizens of the country, and it has found a way to do that without consulting the provinces to any great extent. The money is paid from the federal treasury to persons who are not expected directly to benefit. If this can be done in one instance, then it is quite probable that ways and means could be found to do it in respect of old age pensions, and in other instances. Ways and means are being found to do these things.

The conference between the federal and provincial authorities is to continue, and flowing from it one would expect further legislation. It is to be hoped that the legislation affecting old age pensions will be changed materially, so that at least the charity feature of the present act will be eliminated.

I do not pretend to have had the vast experience the hon. member for Spadina has had. On the other hand I recall being in his office some years ago at a time when some of us carried municipal responsibilities. I have always remembered his generous attitude and his endeavour to try to meet the problems so as not to humiliate unduly the people who form the most deserving group of citizens in our country. The responsibility now rests upon the federal government. I ask the federal government to tell this house what they are going to pay these persons of either sixty or sixty-five years of age, and what fuller measure of security they are going to give these worth-while residents and citizens of this country. I expect that the new minister, under whose supervision any revision would take place, will tell this house why there has been no revision of this matter up to the present time. I am quite satisfied that he will admit that for many years there have been representations of the strongest kind to the federal government asking for changes in the legislation.

I want to point out to the minister or whoever is going to be responsible for the change that there is one thing that must be looked into. I have tried at times to assist in establishing the age of persons who have resided in this country for many years. Section 18 of the act reads:

> Any pension authority shall have the right for the purpose of ascertaining the age of any pensioner to obtain without charge,
> (b) subject to such conditions as may be specified in the regulations made under this act, from the dominion bureau of statistics, any information on the subject of the age of such pensioner which may be contained in the returns of any census taken more than thirty years before the date of the application for such information.

I know that this matter has been brought to the attention of the federal authorities many times, or at least I am so informed. This information is given only to the municipal authorities. I know of many people who came to this country in 1912, 1913 and following years, from the motherland and other countries. Often they find that the record of their birth has been destroyed, or perhaps it was not established in the first place. These people have lived in this country for thirty years or more, but are unable to establish their exact age. Under the present act, the dominion bureau of statistics is unable to give anything beyond 1911. As a humble representative of one section of this country I know of several instances in which British subjects, by birth or naturalization, who have proven themselves good citizens, were unable to prove their age. If by a modification of the act we can assist them to prove their age and thus get their just rights, it is our duty to do it and we should do it immediately.

I pass on to another phase of the matter that I should like to bring to the attention of the government. To a large extent the federal treasury will have to find the money, and I suppose they will tell us what they propose to do and how much it is going to cost. It seems to me that a broad policy should be laid down. Reference has been made by the hon. member for Spadina and others to the means test. In my opinion this means test is abominable. As the hon. member said, if he had had anything to do with it years ago he would have thrown it out the window. I assume we shall be told what is to be done about doing away with the humiliating experience that these old citizens of the country are subjected to.

Members in every part of the house know of people in the humblest walks of life who by working hard have saved sufficient to buy a little four-roomed cottage. Many such people are faced with the humiliating experience of being deprived of passing that on to a crippled son when they leave this earthly abode. I have had experiences of that kind. If we do not wipe out the means test, we should modify the act so that those who apply for old age pensions will be able to retain a reasonable part of what they have struggled a lifetime to get, and still be given their just rights by way of a pension. I know the government have heard this story for many years, but nothing has been done. We go along in a state of lethargy and do not seem to realize that these people have not been getting their just rights.

An hon. MEMBER: They waited for an election.

Mr. LOCKHART: As someone back here very aptly says, they waited until an election came along. Someone has been asleep at the switch, and it is about time he woke up. This has been placed on the doorstep of the government, and I am simply pointing out some of the things I have experienced. I want them to give full cognizance to what I am saying.

I should like to say a word about the earning capacity of pensioners. A pensioner is allowed to earn $125 a year. He is also given $3 a month as a so-called cost of living bonus; this small pittance is added to his pension, while others in Canada were receiving double and treble that amount in recognition of the increased cost of living. Again I say that the very essence of our citizenship, those who have pioneered and built up this country, were obliged to take less than their just rights.

Again, an old age pensioner is allowed to earn over and above his pittance of a pension only $125 a year. No matter what action might finally be taken by this house on old age pensions after the subject has been duly considered by, I hope, every member, I would ask the government to increase the amount which an old age pensioner is permitted to earn, in addition to the small old age pension he receives, because many of these people still have a lot of activity left in them and still have a great love for this country and would like an opportunity to do what work they can. I should like to see the amount they can earn materially increased, and if the government does not propose to do that, I am going to rise in my place in this house and demand it. I know the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) the other night said that it was not much use for any of us to rise and say what we wanted because everything was cut and dried and we got nowhere anyway. But I say, Mr. Speaker, that at least we can make our views known to the government and let them and the country know that we are alive to the situation which exists.

Another point I wish to bring to the attention of the government is the deductions which are made from the old age pension by reason of a military pension being received. A father and mother in receipt of an old age pension may have been depending on a soldier son who went overseas and was incapacitated or perhaps lost his life on the battlefield or died as a result of service. If the hon. member for Spadina were present at the moment he could cite many such cases. I have one in mind. The government knows all about it because I believe the provincial government of Ontario has brought it to their attention. If not, I shall be glad to furnish the details. This old couple on the death of their son were getting about $25 or $30 a month. They were also paid a mere pittance in the form of old age pension. There were doctors' bills to pay and many other unfortunate circumstances. I have the details here on my desk. To state it briefly, the old age pension they received was adjusted because the act provided that that had to be done. If the minister wants the facts I will give them to him. I shall not take the time of the house to relate them now. It is time that the government woke up to the fact that the people of this country want them to do what is right and fair to the best of our citizens who are now well up in years.

I also wish to bring up the question of proving citizenship in order to get the old age pension.

An hon. MEMBER: That is not in order.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): It is very much in order.

Mr. LOCKHART: Certainly it is because citizenship has to be proved in order to get the old age pension. There are British subjects in this country who have been unable to prove their citizenship. There is no question at all that they have lived in this dominion, some of them for forty or fifty years, and in the case of one that I know of, for sixty years. But certain records have been lost and these people are unable to establish where they were born or what their original citizenship was. They are among the pioneers, the very best citizens of our country. They have been good citizens for thirty, forty and fifty years. There should be some provision in the act whereby these people could obtain whatever pension is paid and at whatever age it is paid, instead of being denied the pension as they are now because of their inability to prove that they are British subjects. The act is definite on that point; they must prove their citizenship. If I am wrong the minister will correct me, but I believe I am right. That is one thing which certainly needs rectifying.

There is another thing that needs rectifying, and to illustrate my point I will cite a case which came to my attention about two months ago. A woman of eighty years of age, keen and active, had been receiving the old age pension, formerly $20, now raised to $28 by reason of the increased cost of living, or supplementary aid or whatever it is called. She went to visit a sick daughter in the city of Detroit. The daughter was lying at the point of death. The act says that the pensioner must not stay outside Canada for more than thirty days. The daughter lay at the point of death, not for thirty days, but for four long months, during which the mother sat at her bedside, administered the medicine and perhaps had considerable to do in bringing about her daughter's final recovery. Because this pensioner had stayed outside Canada more than thirty days her old age pension was cut off, and she has to go through the whole business of applying again. Surely some latitude should be allowed to the provincial governments, which are charged with the administration of the act. But the act itself says that the pension must be cut off if the pensioner stays outside Canada for more than thirty days. There may be many extenuating circumstances which ought to be taken into consideration.

I know of another case, where a father visited his son in Philadelphia, and while there took ill and was in hospital for two and a half months. His pension was cut off.

I ask the minister to consider these cases. Old age pensions will be much discussed at the dominion-provincial conference, and I appeal to the minister now to make sure that these injustices to the best of our citizenship are definitely cured and these inconsistencies rectified. They are injustices done to what I always have felt is the very cream of our citizenship, those who have helped to build up this country and to whom we owe so much. I ask the minister to make sure that when this subject of old age pensions is considered, steps will be taken to ensure that injustices and inconsistencies of the sort I have mentioned are definitely cured.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I join with those who are calling for the vote but I know how little chance there is of the question being put.

Mr. GRAYDON: Don't talk out the motion.

Mr. KNOWLES: Don't worry. I seconded the motion and I shall not be talking it out.

Mr. GRAYDON: You are going to if you do not sit down.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Speaker, as the seconder of the motion it certainly was my intention to speak to it. My interest in old age pensions is well known, and the material on my desk is abundant evidence that I had a good deal to say. However, it has been intimated to me that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Claxton) would like to make a statement before the debate closes to-day. I have offered to yield to him for that purpose, although he may think that what I am going to say in a sentence or two will indicate a rather high price for the privilege I am prepared to accord him. I yield to the minister because I feel that the old people of Canada would like to have some definite statement from the government as to what they may expect in terms of the immediate implementing of the federal government's proposals for better old age pension legislation.

The other night when I was speaking in a previous debate the minister did not altogether like the reference I made to 1948 when

I asked if, perchance, that was to be the year of the next election. I remind him now that when he answered my question in the midst of my speech he did not specifically state when in his opinion the new scale of $30 a month for all over seventy would come into effect. I hope that in the few minutes which are left this afternoon he will answer that question directly. That is why I am prepared to let him speak in my place.

As I have already said, the old people of Canada know very well where I stand on this question. They want to know where the government stands. For that purpose I am glad to yield to the minister, and I hope that he will not "muff" the opportunity I am giving him at this time.

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I deeply appreciate the courtesy extended by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in giving me an opportunity of taking up some of the points which have been discussed this afternoon. I should also thank some hon. members, I think a considerable number, who did want to speak on this subject but who have not had an opportunity. I should have liked to discuss the resolution as thoroughly as I could and put before the house a considerable body of facts and figures which bear on this question and which, I think, we ought to have before reaching a conclusion on it. But time does not permit that to be done on this occasion. There will be other opportunities during the session when we can go more fully into this.

First of all, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) on his maiden speech and welcome him to the house. He has shown, over a long period of years, an interest in social questions, and I am sure that the speech he made this afternoon will be but one of many in which he will contribute greatly to our knowledge, interest, and enthusiastic support of social security and health measures in Canada.

I wish it had been possible for me to say the few words I am going to say without any political note; but the attitude of the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lockhart) and his suggestion that continuously he and the members of his party have been pressing for something to be done in connection with old age pensions which had been constantly and obstinately resisted by other parties in this house, leads me to recall to the house that when the question of old age pensions was first suggested here in 1926 it was resisted by a list of speakers which certainly sounded like the hierarchy of the Conservative party. They included Sir Henry Drayton, the late Mr. R. S. White, Hon. C. H. Cahan, Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, Right Hon. R. B. Bennett and Hon. R. J. Manion. I do not think one will find many speeches since then from that quarter in this field.

Mr. IRVINE: May I correct the minister? I think that if he looks up the debates of 1924 he will find that I then raised the question of old age pensions, and I happened to be on the committee which was appointed by this house in connection with the subject.

Mr. CLAXTON: I read only yesterday the hon. members contributions to the subject. I was referring not to his corner of the house but to hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): In this connection, I have referred to this matter for five sessions, and as recently as last April, and the minister has sat here on several occasions when I have discussed this very matter.

Mr. GRAYDON: He just wants to give us a lecture in ancient history.

Mr. CLAXTON: There may be some exceptions over that long period of time, but I think by and large what I have said is true. I would not have mentioned it had it not been for the attitude of the hon. member for Lincoln.

With regard to the special cases he mentioned, I think it is a fact that every one is a matter of provincial administration of laws and regulations which have been agreed to as between the dominion and the provinces. If he has any special cases I wish he would bring them to our attention and we will follow them up. I thought that on two or three points he was completely inaccurate in his interpretation of the law.

It seems to me that a good many of the speakers to-day have been rushing in a crowd to burst through an open door. The discussion has taken place, if I may say so, in a temper which is wholly satisfactory and entirely constructive, but it has to a considerable degree taken place as though the dominion government had never made its proposals to the dominion-provincial conference. Those proposals must be available to hon. members; they have been distributed; and yet it would seem as though those parts which deal with old age pensions have not received very much attention.

I believe hon. members of every party are in agreement that the Old Age Pensions Act as at present in force is not satisfactory. That is fundamental. In order to do something about it the federal government took the only course possible, namely, to put before the provinces proposals that the present act should be changed. Those proposals will be found at page 37 and following of the dominion government's proposals to the dominion-provincial conference. There will be found a review of the legislation as it exists, some references to legislation in other countries, and then the dominion government's proposals, first, for a national old age pension at age seventy of $30 a month without a means test; and second, for old age assistance to people between sixty-five and sixty-nine years of $30 a month with a means test, to be provincially administered and to be contributed to on an equal basis by the dominion and provincial governments. These two proposals are elaborated there; and the hon. member for Spadina quoted from the proposals the reasons and objects of the federal government in putting them forward.

These proposals have been put before the provinces. They were put before them at the conference which began on August 6, and formed part of a comprehensive body of proposals to deal with post-war reconstruction and the social security of Canada. They were not put forward in isolation; they were the result of years of study and they were comprehensive. Furthermore, they were part of a plan which we are convinced will work, and which is the only plan so far put before the people of Canada of such a nature or of any nature to cover the whole field of employment, reconversion and social security, as well as finance.

When the proposals were put before the provinces they received what I think anyone who was present would regard as a sympathetic reception. Certainly the provinces gave every assurance that the proposals would receive serious consideration, and we in this house can only take it to be the case that they are receiving serious consideration to-day. With that as the situation confronting us at this moment, it seems to me it would be quite inappropriate for this government to make some totally different proposal with regard to anything of a major nature here. The place where we can do it is before the conference and the time to do it is at the conference.

That is not just a technical objection. It is a very serious objection because of this. The plan suggested by several speakers in the debate on the address, and suggested in the speech to-day by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), was for old age pensions to be paid to all citizens on attaining the age of sixty years, at $50 a month without a means test. The estimate which the Dominion Bureau of Statistics has given me would indicate that in the year 1948, $50 a month to every person of sixty years of age and over would cost the federal government $850 million for that year alone. When I tell the house that the total amount raised by personal income tax for the year 1944-1945 is estimated to be 672 million hon. members will see something of the magnitude of the proposal put forward by the hon. member.

In other words, the cost of this proposal would be more than the total personal income tax paid by the Canadian people during the last year. That has a definite bearing on our relations with the provinces. We have with them an agreement under which we have agreed to retire from tax fields by an amount sufficient to enable them to raise certain sums in income taxation. Were we to impose taxes or keep in force taxes of the nature required by my hon. friend's proposals, we could not carry out our undertaking with the provinces.

This proposal is being put forward, too, at a time when I think the great body of the Canadian people would like to see a reduction in income taxation.

Mr. BURTON: Not at the expense of the old folks.

Mr. CLAXTON: That reduction in taxation can be made, and we believe it can be made at the same time as the social security legislation of Canada is put on a footing second to none in the whole civilized world. We believe that can be done and will be done if these proposals are put into effect. But we cannot do that if at the same time we put on our people a burden of taxation which crushes all initiative and which prevents all enterprise from carrying on successfully at a profit. Whether enterprise is carried on publicly or privately, it can make or lose money. It does not make much difference whether it is done publicly or privately from that point of view. But there is the other element. Hon. members and the people of Canada are looking to a great amount of trade after the war as one of the important factors by which we can maintain the very high standard of living we have achieved. We shall not have that trade unless we are in a position to meet prices, and that cannot be done if we have taxation on a scale such as would be required here.

What we have done in our proposals is not to take old age pensions just by themselves and say we will spend $850 million and give old age pensions at the age of sixty years to a lot of people who will not need them anyway. What we have done is to look over the whole economy of Canada and study the situation of the people of Canada in relation to their needs, and we have tried to put together a balanced programme of social security, having regard not only to old age, not only to the provision of assistance for our children, but also to health, unemployment and preventive medicine.

These proposals, which hon. members will find in the green book, have been worked out so as to present a balance, and we believe that the provision of $200 million for old age pensions, payable without proof of need, to everyone at seventy years of age, at the rate of $30 a month, is well within possibilities. We believe that the provision of health insurance, which may cost $150 million to the federal government, is well within possibilities. And these measures, taken with family allowances, which may cost $200 million net, will present to the Canadian people a body of social legislation which, taken with that already in force in the provinces, or under consideration in the provinces, will put Canada in the forefront of the world to-day in the field of social security legislation.

One word in conclusion. A good deal has been said about the old age provisions in other countries. I say to my hon. friends that if the old age pension put before the provinces in the dominion proposals is carried into effect we shall have within Canada the most generous old age pension system anywhere in the world, and I calculate that by dividing the amount of the cost by the number of possible recipients. I say similarly, if my hon. friends will total up the anticipated costs of the social security legislation put forward in these proposals, and add to them the costs of the social security legislation already in force in the provinces and in the dominion, they will see that Canada will be leading the world in its per capita contribution to the welfare of the Canadian people if the present plans are accepted by the provinces and by this house.

As I say, this represents a comprehensive plan. It would not do at this moment to pick out this and change that, and it would not be keeping faith with the provinces. We have put before them in all seriousness and sincerity these proposals; we are willing to carry them out just as soon as they can be agreed to, and we hope they will be carried out. We believe, too, that the surest way of securing what my hon. friends would want would be that they should assist us in presenting these proposals to the people of Canada and to the provinces, so that they will secure the support which we believe they deserve.

Mr. KNOWLES: Will the minister answer the question as to the earliest possible date on which this plan would come into effect?

[Mr Claxton.]

Mr. CLAXTON: I certainly will. The fact is that there has been a misapprehension, gathered from the table on page 39 of the proposals, where the estimated cost of the federal old age proposals is given, based on the 1948 figures. As I told the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre the other night, the reason why the 1948 figures were selected was that that was thought to be the first year when we could safely estimate that there would be a full conversion from war to peace, and most of the figures in the proposals were related in one way or another to 1948. That is the only reason why 1948 was put there. If the provinces agree to the proposals we will introduce old age pensions just as soon as the legislation can be brought in to do it effectively.

Mr. KNOWLES: But when will that be?

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, October 4, 1945.

The house met at three o'clock.

BACON

REQUEST FROM BRITISH MINISTRY FOR INCREASED SHIPMENTS

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, before motions are called I should like to make a statement to the house with regard to a development in connection with food requirements which I think should be made known not only to the house but to the country.

Yesterday, October 3, about noon, I had a phone call from Sir Ben Smith, British Minister of Food. The telephone call was to acquaint me with the fact that the food position in Great Britain at the present time is more difficult than at any time since the beginning of the war, and making an appeal to us to help in any way that we possibly can in connection with supplying one particular kind of food, namely bacon.

He stated in that telephone conversation that unless something could be done during the next two months it would be necessary in Great Britain to reduce the ration from three ounces to two ounces per week. It will be recalled by hon. members that the ration throughout the greater part of the war stood at four ounces, and during a considerable part of it the amount was higher than that. But toward the end of the war it became necessary to reduce the ration to three ounces. It is now suggested that unless within the next two months we can do something to assist, it will be necessary to reduce that ration to two ounces. The cause of this, of course, lies in the fact that Great Britain has been doing everything possible to assist in building up the supplies of food on the continent which are necessary to maintain conditions there.

When that appeal was made I directed the meat board to make a study of our position in Canada, and to communicate further with them in connection with the matter. Through the further communications we have thought it wise to suggest to the British government that an attempt will be made in Canada to increase our shipments of bacon to Great Britain over the next two months.

Our present commitments or allocations require 11,000 tons in October and 11,000 in November. The suggestion is that if we could increase that amount by 3,000 tons in October and 3,000 in November they could continue their three-ounce ration during those two months, and that probably after that they would be able to take care of the situation. We had suggested to them that we would probably find no difficulty in continuing the 11,000 tons for October, and in increasing to 18,000 tons for November. They came back, however, with the suggestion that it would be most difficult for them to carry on throughout November unless we could increase our shipments in October.

So, Mr. Speaker, what I wish to say to the house, and to the people of Canada generally, is that we believe that if we all cooperate we can make these shipments possible. We anticipate no difficulty from the producers, because we are just now entering upon the period of greatest shipments or greatest marketings of farm products, particularly hogs. We believe that while the hog deliveries will be slightly lower than they were a year ago, sufficient hogs will be coming into the market to make these shipments possible. In the next place it will be necessary for us to operate our packing plants to capacity during that period of time; and in the third place it will be necessary to have available the shipping facilities which will take to the point where it is required the fullest amount we can possibly supply to the market. We do not anticipate any difficulty in connection with shipping facilities or with refrigeration. There can be very little difficulty in the matter of getting the facilities necessary in that direction. So we have undertaken to do everything possible to see to it that this bacon is advanced to the British within the next two months in an increased amount of 6,000 tons over and above what we had previously been expecting to ship.

I am sure that in making this known to the house and to the country I do not need to make any further appeal than the appeal that has been made by the Minister of Food in Great Britain. I believe it is not only in the interests of humanity that we should send forward the product, but it is in our own interests as a country which is going to have products to sell that we should be able to meet this, which may be the last, appeal made to us to do something a little in advance of what we thought we would be able to do in order to bring to a most successful conclusion our activities in connection with the supplying of food to the European continent during and after war. I believe that every effort will be made to see to it that this product is sent forward.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the house has listened with interest to this advice from Great Britain as to their requirements for protein food. I am sure also that the house will approve the decision made by the government to try to increase the amount that will go forward. I do not want to raise any contentious issue at this time, but I would point out that this gets us back to our failure to increase production. We increased supplies last spring at the very time when our production was down 45,000,000 pounds a month. I think that is where our chief failure lies. This section of the house will support the minister in his effort to try to have the Canadian people supply this additional amount to the old country.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): All I should like to say is that this section of the house, as the leader of the opposition has put it, will do everything possible to support the minister in the promises he has made.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): This section too, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not want to start a discussion on the matter, but I would like to say that in accepting the kind remarks from the three leaders of the different oppositions I do not wish it understood that I am agreeing with the remarks made by the leader of the official opposition in so far as they refer to production.

Mr. BRACKEN: I did not expect you would.

BRITISH CHILDREN

EXPRESSION OF THANKS ON BEHALF OF GOVERNMENT OF UNITED KINGDOM

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think the house will be interested in hearing the contents of a very gracious telegram which was received on September 30 from the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs. It is as follows:

From the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs

To the Secretary of State for External Affairs, Canada

London, September 29, 1945.

No. 204. Now that almost all the children evacuated to Canada under the children's overseas reception board scheme have reurned to the United Kingdom, I wish, on behalf of His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom, to express our grateful thanks to His Majesty's government in Canada and to all those foster parents, officials, school teachers and private citizens throughout Canada who have cared for these children so generously and sympathetically during the past five years.

It will never be forgotten that in the time of our great need you welcomed our children into your homes, and not only fed and clothed and educated them, but gave them that patient care and thoughtful guidance which only parents or the best of friends can give.

We realize that the responsibility for these guests from overseas must have pressed heavily on the foster parents at times, especially as the strain of war increased and they had to contend with their own anxieties and problems. Their patience, and that of the officials and social agencies, has never failed, and to that has been added kindness and generosity of countless Canadians who have given freely of their skill, their time and their money to make the children's stay both memorable and happy.

For all this inestimable kindness and generosity, I thank you all most sincerely on behalf of the United Kingdom government and of the parents. Some of our boys and girls have elected to make their homes with you, and we are proud to think that a number have served in the Canadian forces. All are bringing back happy memories of their five years in Canada, and links which have been forged as a result of your hospitality between so many homes in our two countries are based upon real affection as well as of gratitude.

Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs.

To that gracious telegram the following reply was sent:

From the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, Ottawa

To the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs, London

No. 227 Ottawa, October 2, 1945.

Your telegram No. 204 of September 29. On behalf of the government of Canada I express to you our cordial appreciation of your message of thanks for the reception accorded in Canada to the children evacuated from the United Kingdom under the children's overseas reception board scheme. Your message is being made public here and I am sure that it will be much appreciated by all those in this country who were associated with the care of the children during the last five years. The imminent dangers which led to the evacuation have passed into memory, we hope never to return. The successful execution of the scheme leaves behind it new and close ties between many families in our two countries and warm friendships which will endure. We are glad that some of those who came to Canada under the scheme will remain with us.

Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs.

WHEAT

STATEMENT ON MARKETING—REMOVAL OF 14-BUSHEL LIMITATION FOR PRESENT CROP YEAR

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, about two weeks ago I made a statement to the house on wheat prices. At that time I should have liked to be able to deal further with the marketing of wheat, but finality had not been reached at that time. To-day I should like to give the house a statement on the very important matter of wheat marketing. It is a little longer than I should have liked it to be, but I want to get the facts in connection with this matter on the record.

Since the crop year 1941-42, the government's wheat programme has included a restriction on the total quantity of wheat to be marketed within any one crop year. In view of the present wheat position, the origin and purpose of the restriction on wheat marketings might be carefully explained.

The following circumstances led to the adoption of a policy of restricting the volume of wheat to be marketed within any one crop year and the volume of wheat to be marketed by any single producer during the same period:

1. In the early years of the war, overseas markets for Canadian wheat were limited and consisted mainly of the requirements for the United Kingdom. Even shipments of wheat to the United Kingdom remained at a fairly low level owing to the submarine menace and the shortage of shipping in those days. There was, therefore, no opportunity to market all the surplus wheat which resulted from the large crops harvested in 1939 and 1940.

2. On July 31, 1940, the carry-over of Canadian wheat was 300 million bushels, and the 1940 wheat crop was estimated at 514 million bushels for the prairie provinces, making total supplies of over 800 million bushels for the crop year 1940-41, with a prospective export market of about 230 million bushels. The 1940-41 programme provided for seasonal delivery quotas but no over-all restriction on the marketing of wheat. Consequently, the government took the necessary steps to see that producers had an opportunity of marketing all of the wheat which they desired to market in the crop year 1940-41. During the crop year, producers delivered 456 million bushels of wheat and at the end of the crop year; very little remained on farms. Marketing of the entire 1940 wheat crop was only possible because arrangements were made to provide temporary storage facilities both at the lakehead and at country elevator points.

When the grain policy for the succeeding crop year, 1941-42, was under discussion, it appeared that the carry-over of wheat at July 31, 1941 would be in the neighbourhood of 500 million bushels, practically all in the licensed storage facilities of this country which in pre-war days had a capacity of some 450 million bushels. This meant that country elevators would be congested at the start of the new crop year and the physical ability to take delivery of wheat was severely restricted.

3. Under these circumstances the suggestion was advanced in western Canada from responsible quarters that the government should permit the marketing of that amount of wheat which could be sold at home or abroad during the crop year 1941, and the stockpile as at July 31, 1941, should be carried as a war-time reserve. This suggestion was accepted by the government, and the 1941-42 grain programme included a restriction of marketings to 230 million bushels—an estimate of the volume of wheat which could be disposed of in domestic and export markets during the crop year 1941-42.

4. Having arrived at an absolutely safe position in respect to quantities of wheat required in the prosecution of the war, it was becoming increasingly evident that war-time demand was gravitating to live stock and live stock products. This demand came not only from the United Kingdom and from our growing armed forces, but from the domestic market which had been expanding steadily. The government, therefore, decided that positive steps should be taken to increase the production of live stock and live stock products, necessitating an increase in feed grain production. To that end the Wheat Acreage Reduction Act of 1941 provided financial benefits for the diversion of wheat acreage to other grains and summer-fallow, which proved to be effective.

The same basic wheat situation and livestock situation continued in Canada in the succeeding years, and the limitation on wheat marketings has remained an important feature of the dominion government's wheat policy in each crop year since 1941-42.

The necessity of this provision is indicated by the following table, which shows the carry-over of Canadian wheat, annual production in the prairie provinces, and total available supplies for the four crop years from 1941-42 to 1944-45:

	July 31, Stocks	New crop	Total supplies
		(Million bushels)
1941-42.....	480	296	776
1942-43.....	424	528	952
1943-44.....	595	268	863
1944-45.....	356	411	767

During this period, carryover figures ranged from 355 million bushels in 1944-45 to 595 million bushels on July 31, 1943. Total supplies of wheat in Canada ranged from 952 million bushels in 1942-43 to 776 million bushels in 1941-42. These figures indicate the extent to which war-time reserves of wheat were continuously carried in Canada and the enormous quantities available in relation to immediate needs. It is obvious that without over-all restriction of marketings a situation might have arisen, and in fact did arise in 1942-43, where it was impossible to take delivery of all wheat offered by producers. The limitation on marketings provided the basis upon which all producers would share alike in any quantity of wheat which could be marketed within any one crop year. Otherwise, marketing opportunity would have been available in the first instance to producers at delivery points where grain storage happened to be more adequate.

Throughout the years under review, and even down to the present crop year, the government has never advocated expansion in wheat acreage, but on the contrary has advocated the maintenance and expansion where possible of the production of live stock and live stock products. This does not mean that the government did not recognize the necessity of maintaining a large volume of wheat for importing countries when the war in Europe ended. The figures which I have quoted indicate the extent to which this objective was kept in mind throughout the years. On D-day about 300 million bushels of wheat were available in Canada with the 1944 harvest sixty days away. On V-E day about 320 million bushels of wheat were on hand, with substantial quantities still to be delivered by producers prior to July 31, 1945, and the 1945 crop not far away. We had these supplies after providing the United States with over 160 million bushels of wheat in 1943-44 to supplement their feed grain supplies.

Early in 1943 the market situation improved largely because of the large imports required by the United States. But at this point a new factor entered the grain picture. This was the difficulty of securing sufficient transportation to move the quantities of wheat and feed grains required in the domestic market and in the export market. Since that time, transportation has been the controlling factor in the volume of wheat and other grains which could be made available for export. In 1943-44, in the fifth year of the war, the railways were called upon practically to double the volume of transportation available for the movement of grain, and even with these increased transportation facilities it was very difficult to keep up with available demand at all times. Since the crop year 1943-44 we have always had to bear in mind that the transportation factor had to be considered as well as the current and prospective demand. Not only were there large quantities of wheat to move, but by this time we were producing large surpluses of feed grains which had to be distributed in deficit areas in Canada and in the United States, and transportation became a vital consideration in the government's grain policy.

When policy was under discussion for the crop year 1945-46 we felt that the transportation situation was such that we would have a carryover of wheat on July 31, 1945, of about 325 million bushels, the equivalent of about a full year's export under the then existing conditions. We thought that a small crop of, say, 300 million bushels would give us total wheat supplies of over 600 million bushels in addition to 150 to 200 million bushels of marketed feed grains, or total supplies which would press upon the capacity of our railroads and port facilities having regard to other forms of war-time traffic which they were carrying. We also realized that if the 1945 crop were a large crop we would have to face extremely difficult conditions in respect to the movement of marketed grain. This fact, accompanied by the intensification of the demand for feed grains and live stock and live stock products, provided ample grounds for retaining the over-all marketing restriction in 1945-46. We also had another important consideration in mind. We knew we had on hand a very large volume of wheat which could be used to meet overseas requirements in case the war ended; all the wheat which Canada, as one of the wheat exporting countries of the world, could be excepted to carry to meet early post-war requirements.

In one respect our calculation of our wheat position early in 1945 was not borne out by subsequent events. V-E day resulted in the raising of exports in the crop year 1944-45 by about 65 million bushels, and the reduction in our July 31 stocks from an anticipated 325 million to 258 million bushels, with, of course, some of the post-war European demand already met. The 1945 prairie wheat crop has turned out to be a crop of moderate size—some 300 million bushels. Whereas we expected wheat supplies of perhaps 650 million bushels for the crop year 1945-46, our total supplies will aggregate about 550 million bushels, with an additional 170 million bushels of feed grains to be marketed and transported during the present crop year. The supply of some 150 million bushels less wheat than we expected early in 1945 will, none the less, tax the capacity of our railroads during the first half of the present crop year, and particularly our ability to move grain through available Canadian and United States ports.

During the present crop year we expect to export about 325 million bushels of wheat, leaving between 75 to 100 million bushels of wheat on hand July 31, 1946. Since V-E day over one-half of the wheat going into Europe has been Canadian wheat, and that percentage will be fully maintained during the present crop year.

The average yield per acre in western Canada this year is not large. Most of the surplus from the 1945 crop will be marketed within the 14-bushel limitation. There are some areas, however, and many producers who will have wheat in excess of the 14-bushel delivery limitation. If the restriction on the limitation on marketings is lifted for the balance of the present crop year, it will probably mean an additional 15 million bushels of wheat available for importing countries during the present crop year. In view of the efforts which this country is making to provide food for Europe, the government feels that if a little more wheat can be provided by lifting marketing restrictions for the present crop year, this action should be taken. It has therefore been decided to remove the 14-bushel limitation for the present crop year.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to make just an observation with respect to the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. His review of the marketings of wheat during the war years has been very interesting, but the point he was leading up to, I gather, is that the restrictions formerly imposed with respect to marketing have been removed.

Mr. MacKINNON: For this crop year.

Mr. BRACKEN: For this crop year. In view of the need of food overseas and in view of the situation now existing in Canada, I think the government's decision in this respect is to be commended.

RAILWAY TRANSPORTATION

STATEMENT WITH RESPECT TO CONTINUANCE OF REDUCED FARE RESTRICTIONS

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): I have received representations from various groups, associations and individuals in connection with the cancellation of reduced rates on railways over the week-end for dominion and provincial holidays, and also for parties of ten or more. I have considered these representations and I should like to make a statement to the house.

For some years it has been found necessary in order to assure the maximum use of railway facilities for the prosecution of the war to suspend or cancel certain reduced fares for holiday and excursion travel which in normal times have been afforded by the Canadian railways to the travelling public.

There are now in force the following orders:

Order in council P.C. 2557 of March 30, 1943, extended to November 15, 1945, which prohibits the sale of reduced fares for dominion or provincial holidays, weekends and parties of ten or more;

Orders of the Transport Controller:

T.C. 01P of June 24, 1942, cancelling special tariffs of reduced rates or fares covering agricultural exhibitions, celebrations, coach excursions, horse races, organized excursion parties and other special fares;

T.C. 02P of July 30, 1942, cancelling bargain fares, eastern to western Canada, prairies to pacific coast, and certain conventions;

T.C. 07P of June 25, 1943, suspending home visitors' fares and summer tourist fares.

The Canadian railways report that the movement of the armed forces is now taxing their facilities to capacity, and that in September the capacity of their equipment was exceeded. I expect that the return of service personnel from Europe to Canada will continue over the next few months in sufficient numbers to require the maximum use of all available railway trains, accommodation and operating crews. The repatriation and demobilization of the armed services place a great strain on the operation of the Canadian railways which during the war years have shouldered the increased burden of transportation demands with vigor and efficiency. Great credit is due the railways for their important contribution to the war effort and final victory.

In addition to this expected movement, a large number of British prisoners of war and internees from the Pacific will travel across Canada, and this will take a lot of railway equipment, but it can be done advantageously by the use of sleeping car equipment returning from the Pacific coast.

During the period of demobilization it behooves the travelling public to refrain as much as possible from unnecessary railway travel on pleasure or for visits to their relaties until after the service movement is finished which will be about the end of next April. During the month of December, I expect that the railways will again be called upon to handle inbound troop movements through the port of Halifax, necessitating longer hauls for equipment. December is ordinarily an unusually heavy month for the railways on account of Christmas holiday travel, and the additional movement of service personnel may tax the railways beyond the capacity of their equipment.

It is with regret that I have to announce that there will be no removal of the restrictions now in effect on reduced fares for railway travel until after January 1, 1946, when the whole question will again be reviewed. I hope to be able to announce the lifting of the restrictions on reduced fares by the middle of January, but of course this will depend upon the traffic conditions prevailing at that time.

CIVIL SERVICE

REVERSION ON NOVEMBER 1 TO PRE-WAR HOURS OF WORK

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, on the second of July last one-half of the extra hour which the members of the civil service had been working during the war was restored to them. It has now been decided that, effective on November 1, the civil service will return to its pre-war hours of work.

The net result of the change will be that the extra hour which the civil service worked during the war will now be returned to them.

In view of transportation difficulties it will be necessary to retain staggered hours of arrival and departure where these are at present in effect, for the time being at any rate.

The government, and I am sure the house generally, wishes to express its wholehearted appreciation to the members of the public service for their work during the war. Many have come to Ottawa from all parts of Canada for several years of strenuous service in the war effort. Many have been loaned by industry; many have left their household duties, or their well-earned leisure hours of retirement, to take their place in civil service ranks.

The permanent civil service has accomplished a splendid piece of work during the war. To all these the government and the house expresses its sincere appreciation and gratitude.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

AGE AND INCOME REQUIREMENTS—STATEMENT OF MEMBER FOR BROADVIEW

On the order for motions:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw attention to a statement reported in the Toronto Globe and Mail of this morning with regard to the debate on old age pensions. The minister said that the figure of $50 a month advocated by the hon. member for Vancouver East would involve in 1948 an expenditure of $850 million. I am quoted as supporting the resolution. I did not. I gave my views as they appear in Hansard. I have been a supporter of the principle of old age pensions since first I came to this house. As regards the age, I said that I would not know whether the minimum should be sixty or sixty-five, and in my opinion a survey should be made. Yesterday I opposed very strongly the application of a means test for the low-paid citizens, and also contended that the list of persons eligible in this class should be extended. I repeat that I have been a supporter of old age pensions since 1921, and I commend to the attention of the government what I have said on this matter.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STRIKE AT FORD MOTOR PLANT, WINDSOR—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time for the purpose of asking leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the adjournment of the house, under standing order 31, for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the strike at the Ford plant at Windsor, Ontario, affecting some ten thousand employees, and the danger of this strike, if not settled immediately, spreading to other automobile plants and affecting a total of some thirty thousand employees and ultimately involving workers in other industrial plants throughout the country. I trust, Mr. Speaker, that if you doubt the urgency of the matter you will use your discretionary power to allow the house to decide.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would like to hear first from the hon. member on what grounds he claims that there is urgency.

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Speaker, on the matter of urgency, this industrial dispute in Windsor is the first of our post-war difficulties in the field of labour relations. The attitude of the government in this regard may determine future labour relations in the very difficult period in the transition from war to peace. The urgency, sir, is on the following grounds. First, the strike has the city of Windsor tied up with ten thousand employees of the Ford Motor company involved. There are some thirty thousand workers in similar plants, under the same union, who have taken a strike vote and are standing by. They decided by a ninety per cent vote at least that if and when it was demonstrated to them that action on their part was necessary they would join the Ford strike, with immediate strike action. I am afraid that if some action is not taken by the government immediately we may find ourselves, perhaps this time next week, with all the automotive industry tied up, and, in addition to that, other plants across this country which are unionized, perhaps utilizing their affiliation, through the congress of labour and other bodies, to take similar action in support of the Ford workers. I have this afternoon some definite proposals to make which would perhaps expedite the settlement of the matter.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not see any urgency just now. There is no riot, there is no trouble of any kind—

Mr. COLDWELL: Are we going to wait for riots?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: —and I believe that the hon. member had and still has the opportunity of putting this particular question to the minister concerned, with respect to the strike, or of putting the question on the order paper. Therefore, not finding any urgency in the motion of the hon. member, I have to rule it out.

Mr. GILLIS: I have no intention, Mr. Speaker, of disagreeing with your ruling. That is your prerogative and I know of no way in which it can be challenged. At the same time, the action you suggest—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GILLIS: The matter of putting the question on the order paper—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

An hon. MEMBER: It is not debatable.

Mr. GILLIS: The matter of putting a question on the order paper or putting a question to the minister would offer no solution.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. With all respect to my hon. friend, this is not debatable.

Mr. GRAYDON: The hon. member might be given this leniency.

Mr. COLDWELL: It is a government ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member knows that rulings of the Speaker are not debatable. I think I have been generous to him in suggesting some means by which he may have an answer to the problem in which he is interested.

Mr. COLDWELL: I very regretfully feel that I must challenge your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MACKENZIE: On a point of order, may I direct my hon. friend's attention to previous rulings of Speakers in this house, notably that given by my hon. friend the member for Yukon (Mr. Black) when he was Speaker. He gave this ruling on February 19, 1932. I will quote the appropriate sections:

Mr. Ralston appealed from the Speaker's refusal to permit an appeal from his decision——on a similar motion to adjourn the house on a matter of urgent public importance. You will find this at page 748 of the third edition of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms.

And the question being put by Mr. Speaker: Shall the ruling of the chair be sustained; it was decided in the affirmative.

Debates, House of Commons, 1932, Vol. I, pages 360-1-2-3-4-5.

When the Speaker's decision is sustained by the house it is a binding rule in the house until it is altered.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, I respectfully submit to you that this house is at all times in control of its own procedure, and that a Speaker's ruling, made under one set of circumstances, must not be considered as indefinitely binding the house for ever; otherwise we shall never be able to do business as private members in this house. I respectfully suggest that we have a right to challenge this ruling, and I am appealing to the house for support of the contention that we are making.

Mr. GLEN: May I be permitted to say, Mr. Speaker, that this matter has been already decided, by the last parliament, on two occasions if my memory serves me correctly.

Mr. COLDWELL: This is a new parliament.

Mr. GLEN: Nevertheless a new parliament is bound by the same rules as the last parliament.

Mr. COLDWELL: Not the same rulings.

Mr. GLEN: Standing order 31, under which this motion was made, states that the member desiring to make such a motion—

—then hands a written statement of the matter proposed to be discussed to the Speaker,—

Mr. COLDWELL: That was done.

Mr. GLEN: —

—who, if he thinks it in order and of urgent public importance, reads it out and asks whether the member has the leave of the house.

I remember one occasion on which the Speaker's ruling was challenged when I was in the chair, and I then pointed out, as has been pointed out by the acting leader of the house, that an appeal had been made by Mr. Ralston against the Speaker's decision. The decision was confirmed on two subsequent occasions, and the house then confirmed it with the standing orders as we now have them. The Speaker has exclusive right to determine whether the motion is in order or not. The point was confirmed in one case by a recorded vote, and I submit to the house that in this case, the standing order being as it is, the Speaker has no option but to rule according to his own judgment, and the house must therefore accept it without appeal.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I on a question of privilege, following the remarks of my hon. friend the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen), make this observation. I think he might also have properly added that the Speaker has an alternative which he did not mention, and that is to submit to the House of Commons the point as to urgency. I know that this is perhaps a little irregular, a little out of order, but it does seem to me that the question of urgency has been sufficiently established and it might at least have been referred to the house. I make that suggestion to Your Honour with great diffidence.

Mr. GLEN: If I may be permitted, I would point out to the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) that on March 27, 1935, a motion was made for the adjournment of the house when Mr. Bowman was Speaker. The motion dealt with the request of mayors and representatives of certain cities and towns in the Dominion of Canada to be heard at the bar of the house, "in order to lay before parliament the critical conditions prevailing"—exactly in accord with the motion that has been made to-day, critical conditions prevailing in a certain locality. In that case the Speaker ruled the motion out of order as not being a matter of urgency.

Mr. GRAYDON: How are we to know whether the cases are parallel or not?

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Speaker, there are three ways in which a question of this kind can be dealt with. I agree that Your Honour has the prerogative of deciding whether the matter is one of urgent public importance, but if Your Honour is under any doubt as to the urgency of the matter, then you may ask members to rise. If you will notice, No. 4 of standing order 31 reads:

> If less than twenty, but not less than five, members rise in their places, the question whether the member has leave to move the adjournment of the house shall be put forthwith, without debate, and determined, if necessary, by a division.

But if, when Your Honour asks the members to rise, twenty or more rise in their places, then Your Honour must call upon the hon. member making the motion to proceed with his discussion.

Mr. GLEN: The hon. member is not reading correctly the meaning of the standing order. In order to have the matter properly before the house may I read section 3 of standing order 31, which is as follows:

> He then hands a written statement of the matter proposed to be discussed to Mr. Speaker, who, if he thinks it in order, and of urgent public importance, reads it out and asks whether the member has the leave of the house.

In that case Mr. Speaker is of opinion that it is urgent, and he asks the house if the hon. member has leave to introduce it. The standing order continues:

> If objection is taken, Mr. Speaker requests those members who support the motion to rise in their places.

This request is made only if objection is taken, and then, as the hon. member says, and as the standing order provides:

> If less than twenty, but not less than five, members rise in their places, the question whether the member . . .

Mr. MacINNIS: Would the minister read the last part of subsection 3, which he did not read?

Mr. GLEN: The last part of subsection 3?

Mr. MACKENZIE: It does not apply.

Mr. GLEN: I have already read it, but I shall read it again.

Subsection 3 reads:

> He then hands a written statement of the matter proposed to be discussed to Mr. Speaker, who, if he thinks it in order, and of urgent public importance, reads it out and asks whether the member has the leave of the house. If objection is taken . . .

By a member of the house.

> . . . Mr. Speaker requests those members who support the motion to rise in their places and, if more than twenty members rise accordingly, Mr. Speaker calls upon the member who has asked for leave.

The hon. member has omitted to notice that if the Speaker has decided that it is urgent, he puts it to the house. If objection is taken by any member of the house, it then becomes the duty of the Speaker to call a vote of those for or against.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is what should have been done in this case.

Mr. POULIOT: May I be permitted—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: I have a right to speak on a point of order. The rules are not drafted in a way to be understood clearly if we take only one standing order. There are some standing orders which complete others, and to understand standing order 31 we must revert to standing order 12. There is nothing in the book which says that at this stage there can be no appeal from the ruling of the Speaker. There is a rule in the book which says that some motions are not debatable, but, sir, let us now take them together in order to be fair to all. My intention is not to speak ex cathedra, but just to appeal to the fairness of the Chair.

This is an unusual case, because a motion to adjourn the house to discuss a matter of urgency changes the agenda or the programme of the whole of the sitting in which it is made. The order of the day must be set aside until the debate on that matter of urgent importance is finished.

Paragraph 1 of standing order 31 reads as follows:

> Leave to make a motion for the adjournment of the house (when made for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance) must be asked after the ordinary daily routine of business (standing order No. 15) has been concluded and before notices of motions or orders of the day are entered upon.

The motion was made at the right time, therefore there is no argument about this. The second paragraph reads:

> The member desiring to make such a motion rises in his place, asks leave to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, and states the matter.

That was done; the only discussion that there might be is about the matter of urgency. Is it urgent or not? All the formalities have been complied with; the only question for the Chair to decide is whether it is an urgent matter of public importance—two things, "urgency" and "importance". Paragraph 3 reads:

He then hands a written statement of the matter proposed to be discussed to Mr. Speaker, . . .

I do not know whether that was done, but I presume it was.

Mr. KNOWLES: It was done at two o'clock.

Mr. POULIOT: I continue with the paragraph:

. . . who, if he thinks it in order, and of urgent public importance, reads it out and asks whether the member has the leave of the house.

That was—

An hon. MEMBER: That was not done.

Mr. POULIOT: Here we come to the crucial point of the matter:

If objection is taken . . .

There was no objection taken; the only objection came from the Chair. Usually it is submitted as a matter of course. I continue:

If objection is taken, Mr. Speaker requests those members who support the motion to rise in their places and, if more than twenty members rise accordingly, Mr. Speaker calls upon the member who has asked for leave.

That was not done, and it is precisely because that was not done that some hon. members appealed from the ruling.

Mr. REID: I wonder if I could ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. POULIOT: Excuse me, please. I have the floor. It is not to be unpleasant, but I am making my argument.

Now let us go back to standing order 12, a most important rule, which has to do with the privileges and rights of hon. members, and which assures the privileges and rights of members of parliament. The first sentence of paragraph 1 of standing order 12 reads as follows:

Mr. Speaker shall preserve order and decorum, and shall decide questions of order, subject to an appeal to the house without debate.

The point is that there is no debate on the ruling of Mr. Speaker, but the house has the right to appeal from it; and if the majority vote for the continuation of the debate on the motion, it is carried on; if not, it stops there. That is the point. I submit, sir, that the rules cannot be taken separately; they must be taken jointly. There is an appeal from your ruling, and I am sure that in all fairness you will act accordingly.

Mr. GLEN: May I be allowed to ask the house to consider standing order 12, which the hon. member has quoted?

Mr. POULIOT: I rise to a point of order. The hon. member has spoken three times on the point of order. He has the right to speak only once.

Mr. MACKENZIE: You had no right to speak at all.

Mr. GLEN: In a debate—

Mr. IRVINE: What is your ruling, Mr. Speaker, on the point of order with regard to the discussion which has taken place?

Mr. GLEN: There is nothing before the Chair.

Mr. COLDWELL: There is an appeal from the ruling.

Mr. GLEN: A ruling has been made.

Mr. COLDWELL: How many times may an hon. member speak? I rise to a point of order. How many times may an hon. member rise to discuss this question?

Mr. CHEVRIER: How often have you broken that rule?

Mr. GLEN: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member takes exception to my speaking now. I submit there is nothing before the Chair. There is a discussion going on in the house with regard to the matter of procedure. The hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) has quoted standing order 12, which reads—

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, may we have your ruling? How many times may an hon. member rise to discuss this matter? We should like to have that ruling, so that we may know in future how to guide ourselves.

Mr. SPEAKER: A point of order was raised by the hon. member, and I understand that another hon. member has a right to answer it.

Mr. GLEN: The hon. member for Temiscouata has referred to standing order 12, which states:

Mr. Speaker shall preserve order and decorum and shall decide questions of order, subject to an appeal to the house without debate.

Then he applies the contents of standing order 12 to standing order 31. But urgency is not a point of order. Urgency is a matter of substantive consideration; it is not a point of order. An appeal may be taken on a point of order, but standing order 31 does not give that right of appeal, because the essence of that standing order is urgency. It is not a point of order; it is a matter for the consideration and decision of Mr. Speaker alone.

Mr. KNOWLES: On the point of order, and I believe there is one before the Chair, may I say that I was seeking to get your eye, Mr. Speaker, at the time you saw the hon. member for Temiscouata, so as to make in my way the argument he presented for your consideration. I should like to add to it now, by way of answer to the objection just made by the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen), an objection which I suggest was not well taken.

The hon. member for Temiscouata called attention to the words in standing order 12 which state that Mr. Speaker shall decide questions of order, subject to an appeal to the house without debate. The Minister of Mines and Resources asserts that that does not apply to standing order 31, because in his opinion the decision Your Honour made on the hon. member's request was not on a point of order. But he himself—the minister—quoted paragraph 3 of standing order 31 a number of times, which has in it these words: "who"—referring to Mr. Speaker—"if he thinks it in order"—and so on. I submit that it was your opinion that the request of the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), seconded by myself, was not in order. That is the crux of the matter now under discussion, namely that the request was out of order.

I know that the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie), who is leading the house, has already quoted decisions made by Speakers in previous parliaments, and has pointed out the fact that those decisions were upheld by votes of the house. But I find nowhere in the book of rules any order to the effect that Speakers' decisions, even if upheld by votes of the house, become rules of the house. It seems to me that the only thing that is binding, or that carries from one parliament to another, is the set of standing orders themselves.

On many occasions I have endeavoured to quote citations contained in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, and have been told that those really do not hold. It has been pointed out to me that only the precise standing orders count. If the citations contained in this book do not count, or do not hold, then surely the decisions of previous parliaments are not binding upon this parliament. I submit it is our right to decide that standing order 12, which gives the house the right of appeal from a Speaker's ruling on a point of order, definitely includes standing order 31, because it says:

> . . . Mr. Speaker, who, if he thinks it in order and of urgent public importance, reads it out and asks whether the member has the leave of the house.

Your Honour has ruled against the motion on the ground that in your opinion it is not a matter of urgent importance, and, taking the words of the standing order, you have ruled that in your opinion it is out of order. I submit the hon. member for Temiscouata is perfectly correct in his contention that the house has a right to appeal from your ruling, and that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) is in order in so doing.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. When this motion was put before the house, as Speaker I had to decide whether or not there was any urgency. Having heard the hon. member, and having heard the motion, I was not quite sure. There was a doubt in my mind, and I gave him an opportunity to show or to prove to me that there was an urgency. My interpretation was that there was no urgency, and as such the motion was out of order.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is the point.

Mr. SPEAKER: Now, standing order 12, which was mentioned by two or three hon. members in discussing my ruling, says:

> Mr. Speaker shall preserve order and decorum and shall decide questions of order, subject to an appeal to the house without debate.

All I say is that in my ruling I did not decide a question of order. My interpretation was as to whether or not there was any urgency. As the question, therefore, is not raised on a question of order I understand there is no appeal.

Mr. COLDWELL: No debate.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I am in accord with the ruling Your Honour has made in respect of the application by the hon. member for Cape Breton South to move the adjournment of the house. In your opinion, which is final, it is not a matter of urgency. The Minister of Mines and Resources has clearly explained the application of the rule which applies. As I see it. the hon. member for Cape Breton South has given Your Honour and the house sufficient reason why it is not a matter of urgency. He said that if he had an opportunity to talk he could suggest some solution for the difficulty at Windsor. The place for him to go with his information is to the Minister of Labour, not to this house. The Minister of Labour is the proper person to whom to refer it.

Mr. COLDWELL: No, it is here; what is the House of Commons for?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think hon. members will agree that I have been most generous to all parts of the house, even to the extent of asking the hon. member to prove to me that there was any urgency. I believe I was generous in giving him that opportunity. I have given my ruling, and we should proceed now with the business of the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Next order.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

SELECTIVE SERVICE

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. How many persons are, or were, employed by the or in connection with the work of selective service, (a) as of September 27, 1945; (b) as of January 1, 1945?

2. What was the total amount paid them by salary and expenses as of each of the said dates?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. The number of persons who are, or were, employed by the or in connection with the work of selective service, (a) as of September 27, 1945, 8,315, plus 929 casuals; (b) as of January 1, 1945, 8,092, plus 412 casuals.

The figures above embrace the staff engaged on unemployment insurance and selective service work. The work connected with the administration of national selective service and of unemployment insurance is so closely related that it is impossible to determine how much of the change is due to national selective service and how much to the normal activities of the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

2. The total paid them by salary and expenses,

(a) for the month of August, 1945:
Salaries	$1,064,794 52
Expenses	46,460 87
	$1,111,255 39
(b) for the month of January, 1945:
Salaries	$ 992,901 79
Expenses	42,287 32
	$1,035,189 11

The figures above include those covering the staff engaged in unemployment insurance and selective service work. It will be noted that a change has been made in the terms of this question and the answers above reply to question No. 2 as if it had read:

2. What was the total amount paid to such officials or employees for salary and expenses, (a) for the month of August, 1945; (b) for the month of January, 1945.

WARTIME PRICES AND TRADE BOARD—PROSECUTIONS

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. How many prosecutions by provinces have been instituted by or under the instructions of the wartime prices and trade board?

2. How many convictions have been secured?

3. How many enforcement and/or investigating officers, by provinces, are employed by or are on loan to the said board in connection with the investigation or enforcement of its regulations?

Mr. MAYHEW:

NATIONAL DEFENCE—DISTRICT AND COMMAND HEADQUARTERS—AUDIT

Mr. BLAIR:

1. Did audits at district and command headquarters of the Department of National Defence disclose inadequacy in the control of recording cash receipts, cheques and money orders?

2. If so, what was the nature of this inadequacy?

3. What remedial action has been taken?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. Yes.

2. The audits revealed that, in some instances, records had not been maintained, and, in other instances, certain personnel had not been bonded, in accordance with prior instructions issued by the department. No defalcations were found.

3. Remedial action was taken by informing the District Officers Commanding of the observations. They, in turn, instructed all heads of branches and divisions to conform to the departmental instructions in future.

STEVENSON AIRFIELD, WINNIPEG

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. Have any plans been made for extending the runways and enlarging Stevenson field, at Winnipeg?

2. Has any date been set for the implementing of said plans?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. Tentative layout plans have been made for enlarging Stevenson field at Winnipeg and constructing longer runways.

2. No.

SHIPMENT OF FEED GRAIN FROM WEST TO EAST

Mr. McCUAIG:

How much money has been spent by the federal government in connection with shipping feed grain from the western to the eastern provinces, from 1940 to date?

*WHEAT FLOOR PRICES—BASIS CHURCHILL

Mr. BOWERMAN:

1. Has the government received a request from the Prince Albert, Saskatchewan, board of trade, that the $1 floor price on wheat be payable, basis Churchill as well as Fort William, Vancouver and Prince Rupert?

2. If so, has the government reached a decision?

3. What is that decision?

Mr. MacKINNON: I have received a request such as is referred to here from the Prince Albert board of trade. After consulting with the wheat board on the matter I intend to discuss it with my colleagues in the government. It is a technical matter about which I cannot give an offhand opinion, but I would hope to have an answer shortly for the hon. member. I would point out that Prince Rupert is not a price-basing point. I wonder if the hon. member would allow the question to drop on my undertaking to give him a reply just as soon as I get it?

Mr. COLDWELL: Was there not a request from Prince Rupert?

Mr. MacKINNON: No. I asked the hon. member what I did because I have no unanswered questions on the order paper.

2. Have any complaints been received regarding cases in which soldiers are involved, being conducted without the soldier having counsel?
3. What has been done since the last session when this matter was discussed in the house, and what action, if any, has been taken?

UNITED NATIONS

FOOD AND AGRICULTURE ORGANIZATION

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure for carrying into effect the agreement for a food and agriculture organization of the united nations to be signed and come into force when twenty nations have notified their acceptance of the constitution set out in the said agreement; and to provide that all expenditures in carrying out the agreement shall be defrayed out of moneys provided by parliament.

He said: His Honour the Deputy of the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

I would like to place myself in the hands of the house with regard to this resolution. In order to explain why, may I say that at the meeting held at Hot Springs, I think in 1943, a decision was made to set up a conference on food and matters pertaining to food. The first meeting of that conference is to be held in Quebec beginning on October 16. It is urgent that between now and October 16 we should become parties to that arrangement by the passing of a measure based on this resolution.

This legislation is made necessary as a result of the fact that more than twenty nations have agreed to become part of that conference—twenty was the figure set at Hot Springs. Twenty-eight countries have asked for the privilege of operating under this arrangement. We hope to bring down the legislation next week. The only reason it was not brought down earlier is that we have been dealing with other matters that had been arranged for at the beginning of the session. I would like to ask the permission of the house to allow this resolution to go into committee and to pass its second reading to that stage to-day, and then whatever discussion we wish to have on the matter could take place on the second reading of the bill, which I would hope to have brought down next Tuesday. It is necessary to pass this resolution, because there is money involved.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): We were led to believe by the leader of the house that the discussion on this matter would take place next Tuesday. Speaking for this party, I may say that we would be entirely agreeable to whatever procedure is necessary to get the measure forward, subject to our being permitted to discuss the matter later. We are not prepared to proceed with any discussion to-day.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That was the understanding I had with the leader of the opposition.

Mr. POULIOT: If hon. members who have observations to make can make them now—

Mr. MACKENZIE: There must be unanimous consent; this is not debatable.

Mr. SPEAKER: This motion is not debatable.

Mr. GARDINER: If there is any objection, of course it will not proceed any further. I understand the leader of the opposition to say that he consents to our going on, so long as the discussion can be held on Tuesday. We were simply getting into such a position that we could have before the house the legislation for second reading next Tuesday.

Mr. COLDWELL: Do I understand the Minister of Agriculture to say that there is to be no statement made to-day? If there is to be a statement, we would wish to discuss it.

Mr. GARDINER: I am prepared to say that there will be no statement. I simply want the house to agree to moving up the resolution the necessary stages so that we shall be in position to have the bill for second reading next Tuesday.

Mr. SPEAKER: The "next sitting of the house" means the next day on which the government will be ready to proceed.

Mr. GARDINER: I want to have second reading of the resolution to-day.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. GARDINER moved that the house go into committee on the resolution.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Mr. POULIOT: I have just one word to say, what I wanted to say before. I have no objection to discussion in committee taking place at any time, nor have I objection to a debate taking place in the house at any time, because that is the business of the committee or the house to decide. But here we have a most difficult matter to consider. We are willing to do something in that regard, but the fact is that this resolution states a future policy. Any member may make a suggestion to be taken into consideration when the bill is being drafted, and the bill can be improved in the light of any suggestions made by hon. members. But when a bill is drafted by the experts of any department—I am not speaking particularly of the Department of Agriculture, because I suffered from this practice when Mr. Bennett was in power, and I tried to do something through the then Secretary of State, Mr. Cahan—we must swallow it whole; there is no possibility of change. That is why I am making this suggestion, not particularly about this measure, which has already been decided upon, but so that in future the discussion take place on the resolution itself. The country may then benefit from the experience of hon. members on all sides of the house and the suggestions they may make.

Mr. CHURCH: This committee should be informed as to just what is being done in connection with this agreement for a food and agriculture organization. Who is to be in charge of it? What do each of the twenty nations contribute, and how is it administered as to China? What food is to be given? A report has been made by the American Red Cross bearing on this matter. I called the attention of the Prime Minister to it in the debate on external affairs in August of 1944, and he said that he would look into it.

My next point is that parliament should be informed of what Canada and the other countries are going to do under this agreement. We shall have to vote the money. Where are the supplies going? From what I have heard, some supplies destined to China did not reach China at all. What about transportation from North America across the seas? Who is in charge of that? School teachers are all right teaching school and in many other ways; in fact, some of our best leaders have been drawn from that class. But we should have in charge of this business someone who has a practical knowledge of food products, live stock, transportation, expert administration, and so forth. I ask the minister who is in charge, because the Prime Minister is not here. I want to see the resolution go through, but I ask that a proper survey be made along the lines I have indicated and that the public be informed, because the public will have to pay. I am in favour of this step to send food and supplies to suffering peoples, but in this matter we should act as business men. We are voting hundreds of millions of dollars; where is the money coming from? It is coming out of current revenue. Parliament should be informed of just what is to be done. In some matters you cannot get any information from the press, and at times we might as well be meeting in secret for all the public hear of this chamber. We are to blame if we pass the resolution without getting this information. It is the duty of the opposition to look into this agreement, to examine, explore, explain and criticize if necessary, and see whether it is in the public interest. I might point out also that the resolution is debatable.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Chairman, may I call attention to what I think the arrangement is, and if there is any dissatisfaction with that arrangement I shoud like to hear from the members. My understanding is that there was a discussion between the leader of the house and the leaders of the opposition groups with regard to when we should discuss this matter, and that it was agreed that we would discuss it next Tuesday. The only question I raised this afternoon was whether the debate should take place on the second reading of the resolution or on the second reading of the bill. It takes a day to introduce the resolution and have it ready for another sitting; then another day to pass it, even if we do not discuss it at all, and then a further day to bring down the bill. Because of the nearness of the conference, if we followed the usual procedure we would have to go into the conference without the legislation, or at all events we would have no opportunity to discuss it here. Therefore I suggested that we decide now whether we should discuss the matter on the second reading of the resolution or on the second reading of the bill, and I understood that the discussion would take place on the second reading of the bill. When we come to the second reading of the bill I shall be prepared to give all the information asked for by the hon. member for Broadview. I have it here before me, and I shall be glad to place it before the house at that time, when every member will be free to discuss the subject matter of the resolution or the bill as freely and as widely as possible. I therefore suggest that the discussion take place on Tuesday, because I do not think the members are prepared to have it take place now.

Mr. COLDWELL: I should like to make just one correction. The minister said he understood that a certain course had been agreed upon by the leaders of the opposition groups. This is the first I have heard of any such agreement. I did see in Hansard that the acting leader of the government had asked that the resolution be advanced one stage, and I think that is the intelligent thing to do. I am not opposing it at all. I think it is the right thing to do under the circumstances.

Mr. MACKENZIE: My hon. friend is correct. Quite unintentionally I overlooked him.

Mr. COLDWELL: Don't do it again.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Certainly not.

Mr. BRACKEN: I do not think there is any major difference of opinion in the house with respect to the procedure that is being taken. I was advised by the leader of the house that the government wished to get this matter advanced, and that there would be full opportunity for discussion next Tuesday I approve this procedure in order to expedite the passage of the measure. I think the minister has made out a case for expediting it. I understand that there will be no limitation but that the fullest opportunity will be given to discuss the measure next Tuesday. On that understanding we approve of passing the measure through these preliminary stages now without further discussion.

Resolution reported.

Mr. Gardiner moved that the resolution be read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. BRACKEN: Might I say one word? In view of the fact that there may be some in the house who may not agree with either the principle or the details of the measure now before us, may we take it for granted that in taking these steps now we are not committing ourselves either to the principle or to the details?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Certainly.

Motion agreed to; resolution read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Gardiner thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 14, for carrying into effect the agreement for a food and agriculture organization of the united nations between Canada and certain other nations and authorities.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INTERNATIONAL CIVIL AVIATION

MEASURE TO AUTHORIZE CARRYING OUT OF PROVISIONS OF INTERIM AGREEMENT

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, for the Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to empower the governor in council to do such things as are necessary or expedient for carrying out the provisions of the interim agreement on international civil aviation, signed at Chicago on the seventh day of December, 1944, or any recommendations of the interim assembly or interim council of the organization, or any committees thereof, made pursuant to such provisions and to provide further that all expenditures in connection therewith be defrayed out of moneys provided by parliament.

He said: His Honour the Deputy Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Mr. CHURCH: Has the interim agreement on civil aviation been tabled? I have never seen it.

Mr. HOWE: I will make inquiries. I do not think it has, but I will see that it is tabled immediately.

Mr. CHURCH: Would it not be better to wait until the Prime Minister returns? It is a very important matter.

Mr. HOWE: I think it is important that the agreement be advanced. The Prime Minister may not be back for some time, and the provisional organization is meeting in Montreal in the next few days.

Motion agreed to.

PENSIONS AND REESTABLISHMENT

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER AMENDMENT OR SUPPLEMENTING OF EXISTING LEGISLATION

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved:

That a select committee be appointed, 1. To consider all legislation passed since the commencement of the war with the German reich relating to the pensions, treatment, and reestablishment of former members of His Majesty's armed forces and of other persons who have otherwise engaged in pursuits closely related to war;

2. To prepare and bring in one or more bills to clarify, amend or supplement the above legislation;

With power to send for persons, papers, and records; to print its proceedings, and to report from time to time to the house;

That the provisions of section 1, standing order 65, be waived in respect to this committee.

And that the said committee shall consist of the following members: Messrs. Abbott, Adamson, Ashby, Baker, Belzile, Benidickson, Bentley, Blair, Blanchette, Bridges, Brooks, Bruce, Claxton, Cleaver, Cockeram, Croll, Cruickshank, Dion (Lake St. John-Roberval), Dorion, Drope, Emmerson, Fulton, Gauthier (Portneuf), Gibson (Hamilton West), Gillis, Green, Hallé, Harkness, Harris (Grey-Bruce), Herridge, Isnor, Jutras, Kidd, Langlois, Lapointe, Lennard, Marshall, Mackenzie, Macdonald (Halifax), MacNaught, McKay, Merritt, Mitchell, Moore, Mutch, Pearkes, Power, Probe, Quelch, Ross (Souris), Sinclair (Vancouver North), Skey, Tremblay, Tucker, Viau, White (Hastings-Peterborough), Whitman, Winkler, Winters, Wright.

He said: When I gave notice last evening of this resolution I informed the house that it was not my intention to debate it at this stage. As hon. gentlemen will observe from the order paper, a committee is suggested for the approval of the house of sixty members, ex-service men of both wars, I think a very able committee, who have a tremendous task of work ahead of them on behalf of this parliament. Hon. members who were here in the last parliament will recall how sincerely and strenuously former committees of this house laboured in our committee rooms, without any trace or tinge of partisanship, and how they in the finest spirit of cooperation produced during the last five and a half years what I consider to be one of the best structures of legislation of its kind in any country of the world.

It has been a tradition of this parliament for the last twenty-five years that committees dealing with veterans' affairs be non-political and non-partisan, and those who were here before remember the work of the various committees—the pensions committee of 1941, the committee on the Veterans Land Act, the committees dealing with canteen funds, returned soldiers' insurance and various other phases of the legislation which is now before us.

Every opportunity will be presented for complete debate when the various reports reach this house and the government introduces its measures for first, second and third reading.

If hon. members will look at standing order 69 they will note that it is quite proper to have amending legislation considered by a committee of this house who will report back to the house, and for the government then to introduce its legislation.

The work of the committee will be, in the first place, to consider all the legislation since 1939, all the orders in council passed since 1939, all regulations which have been passed under statutes other than the War Measures Act, as well as under the War Measures Act since 1939—I think some of them were referred to the other day by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker)—and also to consider the administration of the legislation which we now have partly on the statute books and which we intend, after this committee's work is concluded, to have entirely on the statute books of Canada as a permanent guarantee of security for those who have been overseas, who have fought in the old war and in this one.

Mr. McLURE: Will it be a full-time job?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am afraid it will be a very big job. I think we owe it to those who have served us in both wars to have this legislation in permanent form on the statute books of Canada. I bespeak at the present moment the cooperation of this house in the immediate setting up of the committee. I hope we shall begin our work next Tuesday. We must get down to it as soon as we can, because it is going to take, I am afraid, most of the time of those who are members of that committee.

I am sure that in the committee now to be established we shall receive the same cooperation which we enjoyed in the committees of other years, and that the work will be a monument to the humanity and the industry of this house.

Mr. CHURCH: Would it not be possible to have these various bills and statutes and orders collected into some sort of code? As things are, it is most difficult for a lawyer to refer to them. I commend to the minister and the committee the suggestion that all this material be contained, if possible, in one bound volume.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I went very carefully into that matter with the legal authorities, as it was my own desire also that that should be done. But the best we can do is that, when the various measures are reported back by the committee, and the government introduces legislation accordingly in this house and the house passes substantially in final form and shape the bills submitted to it, either as submitted or amended, there shall be a consolidation of all these statutes in the form recommended by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church).

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): With respect to the terms of reference of this committee, I have in mind a problem which I raised in the house a few days ago, namely, that of many of our returning service personnel who are coming back to this country undergoing detention, men who were given dishonourable discharge, with loss of gratuity, and that kind of thing. Will this committee be in a position to probe that particular matter and bring some recommendation to the house?

Mr. MACKENZIE: My intention, subject to the discretion of the committee, would be that all matters affecting the welfare of ex-service men and women can be considered by this committee.

Mr. A. J. BROOKS (Royal): As the minister has suggested, I do not think we should take much time to debate this resolution. There are one or two points I wish to bring to his attention and to the attention of the house.

First, I congratulate the minister on setting up this committee. It was obvious, I think, that such a committee would be necessary in this parliament, and at this time, now that the war is over.

We have had many veterans' committees since 1916. I think that was when the first committee was set up by parliament to look after pensions. That committee of course began from scratch, and since then many acts have been put on the statute books of the country and many regulations passed having to do with soldiers' affairs. We have had many distinguished men on these committees and looking after soldiers' pensions and other matters since the first great war. Among them I might mention such men as Mr. W. F. Nickle, N. W. Rowell, Mr. Hume Cronyn, Sir Herbert Marler, the Hon. Cyrus MacMillan and the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power), who was chairman of the committee in 1938. These men all did excellent work, but the fact that we now have to set up another committee shows that this type of work is never finished.

We are fortunate, Mr. Speaker, in having in this house a great many returned men. I believe there are eighty-two.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Eighty-four.

Mr. BROOKS: Eighty-four returned men from the two wars, the last war and this one. Those of us who listened to the speeches made by these men from all parts of the house realize that they are going to add very greatly to the ability of this committee, as they have done to the debates and other proceedings of the House of Commons.

One point I wish to make is this, and I hope the minister will consider it. These returned men are all greatly interested in veterans' affairs, and they are all well qualified to discuss the work of the veterans committee. I feel that every returned man in this House of Commons should be given an opportunity to sit on the committee. The minister has spoken of former committees, and I think I am correct in saying that every former veterans committee appointed in this house contained all the returned men in the house. I believe that is correct. A precedent was established. The minister has also said that the proceedings of these committees have been non-political. I have had the honour of sitting on two committees myself, and I can vouch for the fact that the minister is correct when he says that the proceedings have been entirely non-political. I also understood, Mr. Speaker, that when the steering committee was considering the question of setting up a veterans committee in this house the minister expressed his intention of placing all the returned men in the House of Commons on the veterans committee. I would ask the minister now just what changed his mind.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I did not know at the time that there were so many. A committee of eighty-four would be unwieldy.

Mr. BROOKS: The minister says he did not know at the time that there were so many. I wonder—and I do not say this offensively—if it was the fact that he did not know there were so many opposition returned men. I think that is the point, Mr. Speaker. I would point out to the house that of the returned men in the house there are thirty-two on the Conservative side, thirty-five on the Liberal side—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Thirty-seven.

Mr. BROOKS: Ten in the C.C.F., three in the Social Credit and two among the independents.

Mr. MACKENZIE: You missed out two.

Mr. BROOKS: I stand corrected. I understood they were reserve army men and had not served overseas. I may be incorrect in that. The minister may say that such a committee would be too large. My experience has been that only about fifty per cent of the members of a committee can attend its meetings regularly. They have other duties, and not more than fifty per cent is the average. I feel that a committee sitting day in and day out fifty per cent, or forty members, would not be an unwieldy committee or one that could not carry on and do good work.

I do not wish to discuss the many matters that will come before the committee. The minister has truly stated that there are many things for us to consider. I think the most important which this house and the country have to deal with at the present time is the matters of veterans' affairs. As regards those who have been wounded, it is platitudinous to say that they must receive the very best attention which the country can give; and as regards the dependents of the men who died overseas, it is also I am sure the desire of the house and the country that we should pass legislation which will give them their due rights and the best that the country can give.

There is one matter that I should like to say a few words about, and that is the question of hospitalization. There are thousands of wounded men coming back at the present time. I had the honour, the opportunity and the pleasure a year ago of visiting many of our Canadian hospitals overseas, and I wish to take this occasion to pay tribute to the army medical corps for the splendid work it did in connection with those hospitals. I do not think there could have been anything finer. But the point I wish to make is this. As these men come back from these splendid military hospitals, let us see that the hospitals in Canada during the coming years are just as efficient and just as good.

Not long ago I read a criticism by an American colonel of the veterans hospitals in the United States after the last war. He stated, as I have stated now, that the military hospitals were the very finest, but he criticized the veterans hospitals, stating that they were in no way up to the standard that had been maintained by the military institutions. That condition may not have prevailed in this country, although on many occasions I have heard severe criticism of our veterans hospitals. But I will say again that we must give to those wounded men coming back the very finest hospitals the country can provide. We must see that they have the most competent doctors it is possible for us to place in those hospitals, and the best nurses; and other attendants must be efficient. These hospitals will be not only hospitals to these men, but, for many years to come, homes as well, and we must make them not only hospitals but homes.

The minister says the committee will be sitting for some time. I have no doubt it will be sitting for the rest of this session; I doubt if it will be able to complete its work in that time. Many things will happen before the committee makes its report, and there are thousands of young men coming back who will be looking for jobs which must be provided for them. That is something which this committee cannot look after. These young men who are going to college will benefit little, and it will do the country little good, if after three or four years in college they find that there are no suitable jobs or suitable work for them when they graduate. I would ask the minister now: Does he anticipate that amendments will be made to the Civil Service Act? Will that come within the terms of reference of this committee?

Mr. MACKENZIE: The committee will be entitled to make recommendations in regard to civil service preference as affecting veterans.

Mr. BROOKS: So far as that is concerned, it will come within the terms of reference?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Oh yes; the reference is very wide.

Mr. BROOKS: I ask this question because I think that while under the civil service commission the returned men of the last war obtained fair treatment, there were a good many abuses. I notice, and I think it is general knowledge, that a good many of the men who took the civil service jobs took them in the low brackets, and in many cases it was not possible for them to get up to the higher brackets. I believe the Canadian legion has recommended that some system be evolved whereby these men can receive special training and help in order to fit them to advance in the civil service. That is a very good suggestion, and one which possibly might be attended to now before this committee sits, because with all the thousands of men coming back and with the reorganization and reconstruction of the civil service it may be necessary to place many of our returned men at once.

I now come to the matter of appointments which do not come under the civil service. There are many thousands of them in the gift of the dominion, provincial and municipal governments. It has been the practice too often in the past for political expediency and patronage to enter into these appointments from the very highest to the very lowest. Now that the war is over and these gallant young men are coming back, I hope that no questions of politics or patronage will enter into the appointments affecting them. That principle should start from the very highest and apply to all, down to the very lowest government appointments. May I give an example of what I have in mind? Just before the last election there was in the gift of the government the appointment of four senators and one judge from New Brunswick. To those five vacancies not one returned man was appointed. I repeat, returned men should have received consideration. I have no personal objection to the men who were appointed, except from the returned soldier's point of view. They were excellent men, and they may have had some good reason—I am sure some of them had—for not having been soldiers in the last war. However, the point is that there were returned men who were just as well qualified. If I cared to I could mention an hon. member from New Brunswick who sits in this house to-day, who served with distinction in the last war and who had three sons in the war just concluded. This man lost a son and had another one wounded. It was the expectation of the people of New Brunswick, irrespective of politics, that consideration would be given to this returned man when appointments to the senate were made. There is a great principle involved there, Mr. Speaker, and I hope that the government will take these matters into consideration.

I should now like to say a word on the question of housing. I ask the minister whether housing will come within the terms of reference of this committee?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Certainly, if requested by any of its members.

Mr. BROOKS: That also is a matter which can hardly wait for two or three months. I do not wish to labour the point this afternoon; it has been discussed many times. But we all know that veterans' housing is in a chaotic condition in Canada. There are thousands of young men coming back who are not able to buy houses for themselves and their wives. Many of these young men married overseas, and some of them have married since they returned. This matter must receive the immediate attention of the government, and not wait for reference and regulations so far as the committee is concerned.

A few weeks ago I took occasion, with some other hon. members, to visit some of those so-called veterans' houses near the city of Ottawa. I think they are totally inadequate for the purpose for which they are being built. They are too small, and too expensive, as my deskmate the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black) says. I was told that they would cost between five and six thousand dollars. They are little one-storey houses containing two bedrooms. This government passed the Family Allowances Act, for what purpose? As I understood it, it was to encourage the increase of the population of Canada. Are we going to ask our soldiers who come back to this country to live in a house where there are only two bedrooms? One must be taken by the man and his wife. How many children can you put in one bedroom and expect them to be raised in the manner in which children should be brought up?

I must not take up any more of the time of the house this afternoon, but I congratulate the minister on having secured the services of General Burns as head of his rehabilitation branch. I think that is correct?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.

Mr. BROOKS: General Burns is one of the most outstanding soldiers that we have in Canada to-day. I am satisfied that if conditions and rules and regulations permit, he will do a fine job. I would again ask the minister to reconsider enlarging this committee so that it will take in every returned man in this House of Commons. I feel that if he does not do that, the committee will lose the benefit of the advice of some very able men. I wish to assure the minister that so far as the returned men from this part of the house are concerned, I can assure him that he will have the fullest cooperation in this committee, as he has had in committees of the past. If I am not too presumptuous, Mr. Speaker, and knowing the returned men of the other groups in this house, I feel that I can say the same thing for them.

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, there are a few words that I should like to say on this motion. I shall touch on just two matters. First, I should like to ask a question or make an appeal in connection with the terms of reference. The other matter about which I should like to say something is the composition of the committee.

The terms of the reference read in part:

To consider all legislation passed since the commencement of the war with the German reich. . . .

In referring to the motion the minister gave the date, "1939". I should like to know—perhaps he can give me the assurance in the midst of my remarks—whether that will give the committee power to review the Pension Act and the War Veterans' Allowance Act?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: Which were passed prior to 1939?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes, because all have been amended since 1939, and those amendments must come before the committee.

Mr. KNOWLES: Therefore it will be possible—

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is the definite intention.

Mr. KNOWLES: —to review the entire picture.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Absolutely.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am concerned about that because in my capacity as a member, like all hon. members of the house, I have had many sad cases of old soldiers of the last war brought to my attention. I know that our thoughts at the moment are more particularly with the younger men who are coming home from the war just concluded; but on all sides of the house there is a keen desire that we do not forget the old soldiers of a quarter of a century ago. When many of these men try to get consideration for the plight in which they find themselves they find that their last recourse is to the War Veterans' Allowance Act; but there are certain restrictions in that act, notably the designation of what was an actual theatre of war, which bar them from benefits under that act. Many of these cases have been brought to the attention of the minister and his department over and over again. I have seen many of the letters that he has written in which he has said that these matters have been noted and would be considered when amendments to the act were under consideration. I hope that the case of the men of the last war will receive ample consideration from this committee, and that one of the things that the committee will have power to recommend is certain very necessary revisions to the Pension Act and especially to the War Veterans' Allowance Act.

In connection with the need for amending the War Veterans' Allowance Act, I would hope also that the arrangements which have been made with respect to the widows of veterans of the last war will come under review. May I ask that question of the minister now? Will they come under review as well?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I stated clearly, but perhaps not very lucidly, that every single piece of legislation affecting those soldiers passed since 1939 will come under review.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is fine to get these things on the record, because that was not a piece of legislation.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I have said it three times already this afternoon.

Mr. KNOWLES: That was not a piece of legislation; it was an order in council.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That makes no difference. I said explicitly that all orders in council would be tabled and would be the subject of discussion, and also all regulations which were not by way of orders in council. That was stated clearly by me this afternoon.

Mr. KNOWLES: Well, it is clearer still now; we are glad to know it, and I thank the minister for the definite assurance he has given us.

The other point I should like to speak about is in support of the appeal the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) has just made to the minister. I, too, am sorry that the minister did not see fit to stand by his original suggestion that all veterans who are members of the house would be made members of this committee.

I know the members of the committee, if it is set up as the motion now stipulates, will do their work on a non-partisan basis. They will do it as veterans, out of concern for their comrades of the two wars. There is no doubt in my mind as to that. But I submit that they start out with a handicap because of the committee's being set up in the manner the minister has proposed.

The figures have already been given—I do not know whether they have reached Hansard —as to the number of veterans in the various groups in the house. I understand there are thirty-seven in the Liberal party, thirty-two in the Progressive Conservative party, ten in the C.C.F. group, three in the Social Credit group and two among the independents.

But the composition of the committee is to be thirty-three from the Liberal party, sixteen from the Progressive Conservative party, six C.C.F.'ers, three Social Crediters, and two from the eight independents in the house.

That division was proposed in a letter which I. as C.C.F. whip, received from the chief government whip, the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Weir). The letter, referring to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie), states:

> He has asked for a committee of sixty members. On the basis of the arrangement made by the steering committee this would provide for six members from the C.C.F. party membership.

I presume that similar letters went to the whips of the other parties. I quote that paragraph from the letter of the chief government whip only to indicate that the basis taken for the composition of this committee is that which the so-called steering or striking committee had arrived at with respect to another matter, namely that of standing committees.

I submit that has nothing to do with this matter. In fact, as a member of the striking committee I was told in that committee that any decision we made there with respect to the standing committees did not have any bearing upon the composition of other special committees to be set up by the house. However, it is quite clear from the letter I have just read, and also from the names in the motion now before us—and the party designations of the hon. members mentioned are easy to identify—that the basis chosen in this instance is the one arrived at by the striking committee—not, may I say, by unanimous decision—for the standing committees.

That basis, if I may place it before the house, is that the Liberals shall have fifty-five per cent of the membership of all committees, the Progressive Conservative party twenty-five per cent, the C.C.F. 10·8 per cent, the Social Credit group 5·1 per cent and the independents 3·1 per cent.

Against that list of percentages, which total 100 per cent, let me remind the house that the number of members in the various groups in the house entitle those groups to the following percentages on all committees: Liberals, 52·7 per cent; Progressive Conservatives, 27·3 per cent; C.C.F. 11·4 per cent; Social Credit, 5·3 per cent; Independents, 3·3 per cent.

I shall not discuss the matter of standing committees at this time. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, you might rule me out of order if I were to continue that part of the discussion any further. I have brought this information to the house only because this is the first time the matter of committees has been discussed. We are being asked to set up a committee on the basis of a division which was communicated to the whips of the various parties—

Mr. MACKENZIE: I rise to a point of order. I suggest that the hon. member is entirely out of order when he refers to the proceedings of the striking committee, a committee which has not yet reported to the house.

Mr. KNOWLES: I expected that point to be raised. However, as whip of this party I received a letter asking me to submit on behalf of the party—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. The point raised by the Minister of Veterans Affairs is well taken, when he refers to any reference being made to the striking committee before the report of that committee has been brought in. Such reference is not according to the rules of the house, and to that extent the hon. member is out of order.

Mr. KNOWLES: I have been doing my best to avoid any infringement of the rules. However, I submit that if we are not permitted to refer to that committee, then the motion for the setting up of the standing committees should have been made before the one now under discussion. As I have indicated from the letter, part of which I have quoted—

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is not our fault.

Mr. KNOWLES: And not mine, either.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Perhaps not.

Mr. GRAYDON: What kind of buck-passing arrangement have we here?

Mr. KNOWLES: I take it that the other whips received a letter similar to the one I received. It indicates that the basis is to be that arrived at by a committee, the report of which has not yet been made.

I do not wish to develop this point further, except to say that if the minister was not prepared, as he suggested in the first instance, to recommend that all veterans of the house be placed on the committee, then the least he should have done would be to appoint members from the various parties who were veterans in proportion to the strength of those parties in this house.

I say again I have complete confidence that no matter what handicaps face them the veterans who serve on the committee will do a good job on a non-partisan basis, and will fight for the rights of their comrades of both wars. I do say, however, it is regrettable that they should go into a committee which has the handicap of its having been set up on a political basis, with a larger percentage given to one party than that to which such party would be numerically entitled.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Where does my hon. friend get that rule?

Mr. KNOWLES: I am basing my claim on plain, ordinary, logic, simple arithmetic and simple justice.

Mr. MACKENZIE: There is no such rule in this House of Commons.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is what I thought once before this afternoon. If the minister did not want this kind of discussion, and if he did not want the question raised as to the political complexion of a committee as important as this one, he should have done one of two things. Either he should have stood by his original suggestion, and put all the veterans of the house on the committee or, if he had to reduce the size of the committee, then it should have been set up in proportion to the size of the political groups in the house. Perhaps an even better division for a smaller committee would have been to set it up in proportion to the number of veterans in each group in the house. Such a division might not give this group any greater strength. That is not the point. The point I wish to make is that this should not be done on a political basis at all. It so happens that on a percentage basis there are more veterans in the Progressive Conservative group than in any other group in the house. Far be it from me to defend the interests of the Tory party; I am not. This is a matter of principle. I think the veterans should be represented in full on this committee. I notice my hon. friends to the right do not quite know how to take me in saying this, but there it is.

When answering the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) the minister said that the reason all veterans in the house were not made members of the committee was that there were more than he had thought there were. I believe the total is eighty-four and the proposal before us is for a committee of sixty members. I agree that large committees are sometimes unworkable, that you can get better work done by a committee of twenty or fifteen members and sometimes a committee of two or even one is a good idea, if it is the right man. But since the proposal before us is for a committee of sixty, I suggest that the difference between sixty and eighty-four does not justify the argument that the latter number would be too many.

I have no doubt that in recent days I have got under the minister's skin a bit with my persistence in connection with the discussions we have had about committees, much of which could not be repeated in the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE: On either side.

Mr. KNOWLES: I shall not say anything more about that. But despite any hard feeling there may have been, despite the fighting that has occurred about these committees, despite the fact that before we get through this afternoon the discussion may take on a political complexion, I hope the minister will consider the suggestion so well advanced by the hon. member for Royal, which I am trying to support, and change the composition of this committee so that it will include all the veterans in this house.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I am going to be brief in my remarks because I expect to be a member of this committee and I shall have an opportunity of saying what I want to say after we have heard the evidence of the various organizations. I think it is necessary that this committee be set up at the earliest date possible. I wish to congratulate the minister upon having made the scope of this committee so wide open. I understand that it is to deal with all orders in council and all matters having to do with pensions and rehabilitation. In other words, it is to be as wide open as possible.

There has been a great deal of good legislation passed in the last few years, but I think the minister will agree that since so many orders in council have been passed there is much confusion to-day about just what the law is. I think he will agree also that a number of adjustments are necessary in order to make some of the acts work effectively. After we have heard the representations of the various soldier organizations I think we shall be in a far better position to judge as to what needs doing than we are at the present time.

I believe all will agree that the committees of the past have done good work. It has often been stated that the soldiers' committees were the least partisan of any of the committees set up by the house, and I think most people will agree with that. I was sorry to hear the parliamentary assistant to the minister become a little political in his remarks the other night. I hope he will not continue with that stand when we are in committee because, if he does, he knows very well it will make it harder to carry on the business of the committee effectively.

The success of the job of soldier rehabilitation will depend to a large extent upon the success of the programme of the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe). If his programme falls down, then our job will be that much harder. We hope the Minister of Reconstruction carries forward an aggressive programme. As I said before, this committee has a big job to carry out and the sooner it gets at it, the better. Therefore, I shall say no more at this time.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the minister upon the choice of an assistant, who has been a member of this house for a number of years and has shown a knowledge of what he is speaking about. His selection is worthy of praise. The hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) is a veteran; he has broad views on many matters and he is zealous in helping the veterans. The minister did exceptionally well in selecting the hon. member for Rosthern as his right arm in the department.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has spoken about the size of the committee. I wonder if the committee will be of any use. In saying that I do not mean to offend those who will be members of the committee, I say it because of the actions of a board which is composed of outsiders, one being a member of the Quebec legislative council, which is supposed to look after the veterans. It is impossible to get satisfaction for the veterans except by writing personally to the minister. I contend that veterans have suffered injustice.

I am thinking of any young man who was eighteen years of age when he was drafted for overseas service. The war is over; he has come back and he wants to try to get some help. A gratuity of $7.50 a month is supposed to be paid for each month of service in Canada, and $15 a month for each month of service overseas. The gentlemen in charge of the Quebec office were so parochial that they did not even send the necessary forms to the Rivière du Loup office of unemployment insurance and selective service to take care of soldiers coming back from overseas who might be applying for gratuities. These forms were in Quebec but the bureaucrats were so stupid that each time a veteran went to the Rivière du Loup office they had to write to Quebec because that was not a branch office of the Department of Veterans Affairs. One form would be sent for that one man, and then they would have to write for another form for another man. This occasioned considerable delay. I pointed out the absurdity of the matter and it was corrected.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Was that veterans affairs or defence?

Mr. POULIOT: It was veterans affairs. Defence has nothing to do with it once a man is discharged.

Mr. MACKENZIE: But when he applies for gratuity?

Mr. POULIOT: Perhaps I am not using the right expression, for I must confess that I have not read the statute. All I know is what has been said in the house. When a veteran went to the Rivière du Loup office to get what he was entitled to as a veteran he found there were no forms there. Because of the bureaucracy at Quebec it was necessary for the Rivière du Loup office to write for a form every time a man came to that office. I know the minister is full of good will and, if I speak as I do to-day, it is because I want definite instructions given to all bureaucrats to cut this red tape in order that these boys may have a chance to get what they are entitled to as soon as they arrive home. That is the first thing, and I had it corrected.

Here is the second thing. Yesterday the Princess Louise Dragoon Guards were received in Ottawa with the beating of drums and a fine procession. They deserved that, but the boys are not as well received as they deserve to be. At times their parents suffer annoyance and tribulation because of the stupidity of the military police. Take the case of the young man whose case was publicized in the press of yesterday. This was a fine boy from my county who was wounded at the time of the invasion of France. He won the Military Medal, but he told me that the only remembrance he had of France was the blood of his friends who had died at his side. This young man came home with a piece of shrapnel in his kidney. He came to my office, and I read something that had been published in the local paper about him. It was well done, and the parents were pleased. Afterwards this young man had decided to go to Quebec city to be looked after in the military hospital. What happened afterwards? The military police, at two o'clock in the morning, came and awakened his father and mother and searched their home for that young man while he was in the hospital being treated for a wound he had suffered during the invasion of Normandy, where because of his bravery he won the Military Medal. That is not the way to receive the veterans, and I hope that the committee will investigate that case and find out who was responsible for such a stupid order.

We have the most abominable bureaucracy at military headquarters in Quebec city, and if I am told I am not in order in speaking of this matter at this stage when a motion is before the house for the appointment of a committee on veterans affairs, I say that I have a right to speak. I say that the military police had no reason whatsoever to create such a disturbance. It is considered a shame throughout the whole district. Here was a man who had won the Military Medal for his bravery on the battlefield. He risked his life for his country. He comes home, and his father and mother are proud of him. They have other sons in the army too. This week, the night I left home I met this young fellow. He is quite tall but he was pale because of his stay in the hospital. I met him at the railway station and said, "You are not in the hospital?" "No," he said, "I have asked for two days' leave to inform the military police that they will get an uppercut from me if they go to my home again to waken my father and mother." There is a man with guts. He is a fine lad. The minister is not here in his place at the moment, but I say to the house that the ultra-photogenic Brigadier Frou-frou in charge of military district No. 5 should go down on his knees and apologize to the parents of this boy. That is how I look at it. There is no order in the Department of National Defence, and I shall take that matter up in due course. I say now that I do not want the veterans in my county and of my province to suffer from the stupidity of the brass hats in Quebec city. I know them and I had to denounce them in the house.

Why do we have these difficulties over the veterans and why are so many of the boys called deserters? I do not know whether the name of this particular boy is included in the number of those reported as deserters in the sessional paper which was tabled to-day. How many are there? To my personal knowledge many injustices have been done in my constituency. Things have been done which should never have been done. I know the minister is fair; he is big and strong, and I hope that he will use his strength and his power and his influence in the cabinet to protect those lads who come back to Canada and are told in the press that they are heroes; but when it comes to giving them real help, that is hard for them to get. We have plenty of legislation regarding veterans, so much that everyone gets lost in it.

Instead of having a committee of outsiders, whoever they may be, colonels or otherwise, appointed to settle the affairs of the veterans, their affairs should be settled by this very committee on veterans affairs that is to be set up if this motion passes. In my view this is a case where parliament itself should be the supreme court of justice in Canada, where the boys and young men who have completed their service in the armed forces should have a place to go to secure redress of all wrongs. Parliament itself should be that court, and that is what I would like the committee on veterans affairs to be—not just a place to listen to the representatives of the legion or any other military organization. I saw them at work when I was head of the civil service committee, and they came with briefs that were very long and that meant very little. If this parliament wants to keep the respect of the Canadian people at large it must be true to the traditions of the past, not of the recent past, but of the old past, and look at every individual case where injustice has been done or affronts or insults have been heaped upon a man who is worthy of respect.

I am not a veteran, but I have fought enough for veterans and soldiers to have my say on the matter. It is because of my utmost respect for parliament as a great institution of the past that I make this suggestion, and I hope that the members who compose that committee, whether they are veterans of the first war or of the last war, will not snub the little fellow who may have been in any branch of the armed forces and who comes before them to secure justice and to get rehabilitated. What is rehabilitation? It is the right to start life anew after a number of years of service and sacrifice. Some of those boys have lost their chance; they have no opportunity. I just met a lady in the corridor who was very active in Liberal circles. She has a young son who has been four years overseas, and he has been offered a job at $90 a month. That is not enough on which to raise a family.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. POULIOT: The boys who come back from overseas cannot all expect to get jobs from the government. There must be co-operation between the government and industry to rehabilitate all the men who have been in the armed forces, not only those who have served overseas but also those who have done their duty here in Canada, according to the law and the instructions they have received. It would be a great mistake to pay no attention to the boys who have acted in conformity with the law and obeyed all the instructions they have received, who have done their full duty. It is not their fault that they were not sent overseas. Some of them have gone far away; they have travelled across this country. Right at the very time that we had complaints that the trains were overcrowded, we had units in Canada sent travelling across the country from coast to coast and then sent travelling back again from coast to coast. That was going on all the time. It was a racket, to send them all over. I shall not say more about that now because the then minister of national defence has been discarded, but it is true just the same.

I hope that the members of the committee who are veterans of the first war will not snub the young boys, but will help them, and that they will assist the minister by supplying him with scissors to cut red tape, starting at the citadel in Quebec, the big post office building on the hill, where the headquarters of District No. 5 are located, and seeing to it that all these people shall be fired from the army.

I will tell the house another reason why the war is not finished: it is because so many of these people never earned a living in their lives before they got into the army during the war; they want to continue there for a long time; they are swivel-chair heroes. I denounce them, and there is one of them whose picture I will depict in the near future. He is here in Ottawa. He is a pet of a former minister of national defence. If they do what I suggest I shall have the utmost confidence in the wisdom of all the members of the committee which is to be appointed, to send the swivel-chair heroes back home; to confound them with real soldiers would be an insult.

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): I do not intend to take the time of the house to discuss things which I think should properly come before the committee or before the house at a more fitting time. But I wish to make reference to the fact that some objection has been raised to the relative strength of parties on the committee. I can understand the reason for this objection being raised, but I must say that, after twenty-five or twenty-six years of experience on committees dealing with veterans' affairs, I have found in working with members of all political parties that when we enter the field of veterans' affairs we work on a basis of non-partisanship. Regardless of the political faiths of the members of this committee, I am quite sure that every member will think first of the veterans of this country and not of the party to which that member may belong; and I am quite confident and quite happy to leave the investigation entirely in the hands of the committee as now composed.

Mr. D. KING HAZEN (St. John-Albert): This resolution provides that a select committee be appointed to consider all legislation passed since the commencement of the war, relating among other things to the treatment of returned men. When the treatment of returned men is being considered by this committee I hope that it will do all in its power to see that soldiers who have returned from the war suffering from nervous diseases are not placed in provincial insane asylums. I hope that it will see that suitable military hospitals are provided for these men and that they are not put into provincial hospitals which are occupied by the insane and which are sometimes very much overcrowded. I know it is said by some people that these men can get better treatment in provincial hospitals. I question if that is true of many of our provinces. I know that if I were the parent of a man who had returned from overseas suffering from a nervous condition I would not want to see him put into one of those institutions. Returned men should have their own hospitals.

There is another matter to which this committee might give some attention. I am not satisfied that veterans who are patients in our military hospitals invariably get the best of treatment and advice. I have in mind the case of an infantry soldier who was in hospital in Italy. He was brought back to this country suffering from some disease and was placed in one of our military hospitals. He has been there for months, and his condition has not improved, in fact, if anything it is getting worse. I wrote the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) about this matter. He assured me that he would look into it, and I appreciate that he is doing so. But I have seen this veteran on one or two occasions, and I have thought, when I have talked with him and considered his condition and tried to find out something about it, that if I were his father I would be far from satisfied with the treatment that boy was receiving, that I would want to have specialists called in to advise as to the best treatment. I may be mistaken, but I do not think in these military hospitals we have such specialists, and I do not know if provision is made whereby they can be obtained for particular cases. There should be provision that they can be called in, and I would urge the committee to see to it that in military hospitals there be provided or made accessible specialists in cases where particular treatment is needed or in what I may term obstinate cases where the condition of a returned man is not any too well understood by the staff of the hospital.

Those are the only two suggestions which I wish to bring to the attention of the committee at this time, and I hope they will be considered by it.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Cariboo): I have no intention of debating this question. I am very glad a committee is being appointed. I know that its job will be a very difficult one and that it will tackle many and varied problems, and that in the hands of the veterans of this house the problems of the veterans will be taken care of.

I rise rather to ask a question than to discuss the motion. I believe the question was already asked by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), but I was not sure that I understood the minister's answer. There are some young men who are in difficulties. I have discussed one particular case with the minister, so that he will understand exactly the type of case which I have in mind. What I wish to make sure of is, will cases of men who have been court-martialed and are now in Canadian gaols be discussed in this committee?

Mr. MACKENZIE: There are no reasons why they cannot be discussed; but in regard to taking action, I think the only action we could take would be by way of recommendation to the Department of National Defence, which itself would take action, probably by other means.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): May I point out in that connection that the important matter in my opinion is not just that these people have been sentenced to confinement. If I understand the matter aright, they have been dishonourably discharged, which deprives them of gratuities and all the other benefits to which veterans are entitled. That may come about because of a misdemeanour which is just a matter of momentary impulse and the whole of the man's past services may have been forgotten. I think that is what the committee should keep in mind.

Mr. MACKENZIE: My hon. friend is right; but in many statutes already passed by the last parliament benefits are not available to those who have not been honourably discharged. That matter of course could be reviewed by the committee.

Motion agreed to.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STRIKE AT FORD MOTOR PLANT, WINDSOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. F. BROWN (Essex West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour, who I regret is not in his seat at the moment. Perhaps he can answer later in the day or to-morrow. Can the Minister of Labour inform the house as to developments in the proceedings with respect to the strike at the Ford Motor Company plant at Windsor, and other threatened strikes?

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): May I follow that up by putting another question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the gravity of the strike situation at Windsor, will the government or the minister consider the immediate appointment of a controller to take charge of the Ford plant and resume production there, pending the negotiation of an agreement between the parties? I ask the question because of the urgency of the situation.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): It has taken a long time to reach the orders of the day, and the Minister of Labour is at the moment outside attending an important meeting. May I be permitted to bring these two questions to his attention and he will reply at the earliest moment.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT IN VIEW OF PRESIDENT TRUMAN'S MESSAGE TO CONGRESS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Will the acting leader of the house be in a position to make a statement within a few days regarding the St. Lawrence waterway, in view of the message of President Truman to congress yesterday recommending an early start?

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): That will be for the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SUGGESTED COMMITTEE ON REVISION OF RULES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. RODNEY ADAMSON (York West): In view of what happened in this house this afternoon, I would address a question to the acting leader of the house. Will he consider setting up a committee to review and revise the rules of the house?

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): In view of the events of this afternoon the question is timely. I had notice of a similar question from the member for Wellington South (Mr. Gladstone). It is on my desk. Evidently both hon. gentlemen were thinking in the same direction.

In regard to a special committee of the house on standing rules and orders, hon. gentlemen who were here a year ago will recall that in February, 1944, we did establish such a committee and that committee made a unanimous report to this house. Unfortunately the house did not seem to think along the lines of the committee and the report was not adopted by the house. In a matter like this it rests with the house itself whether it wishes to have another committee set up or to discuss further the report of the committee of a year ago. The latter procedure would involve a resolution by a minister of the crown to set aside a special time for consideration of the report of the committee of 1944. I think the former procedure would be preferable. I shall take the first opportunity to confer with the leader of His Majesty's Loyal Opposition and the leaders of the other groups as to what the wishes of their groups are in regard to this matter, and if there is a general feeling in the house in regard to it I will take it up with my colleagues.

ARGENTINA

INQUIRY AS TO EFFECT UPON CANADIAN INTERESTS OF CURRENT POLITICAL DEVELOPMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): May I direct a question to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the aggressive diplomatic position which now appears to be taken by the United States of America toward the government of Argentina, I would ask the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs to inform the house fully of the current political developments in that country, indicating to what extent Canadian interests are affected thereby. I would also ask the minister what steps if any are being taken by Canada in connection with recent developments in the Argentine.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): First of all I wish to thank the hon. member for his kind thoughtfulness in sending notice of this question not only to myself but to the under-secretary of state for external affairs. It makes it very much more expeditious to get answers when that is done. I am sure my hon. friend would not expect one, on brief notice, to make an extended statement on the internal situation in Argentina. The question would call for a statement on current political developments in the Argentine and one could not on brief notice attempt to make an at all comprehensive statement on political developments in that country. I may say that the Canadian ambassador in Buenos Aires is in close touch with developments there. He has presented his credentials and keeps in close touch with what is going on, and in the normal course of his duties he would take such local action as might prove to be necessary if any Canadian interests were being affected. The government is following as closely as possible, from the reports it receives and also in consultation with other governments, the course of events in Argentina, but there is nothing further I would feel it might be proper to say at this time.

ATOMIC ENERGY

INTERNATIONAL COOPERATION FOR CONTROL—DISCUSSIONS BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): May I direct another question to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs. Yesterday President Truman told congress that he would initiate discussions with Canada and Great Britain looking towards international cooperation in the control of atomic energy, and called on the world to outlaw the atomic bomb. In the meantime he intimated that the secret of the new bomb would be preserved within the group of Great Britain, Canada and the United States. Have there been any discussions of a formal or informal nature between the governments of Canada and the United States of America with regard to the points covered by President Truman in his message to congress? If so, does the government of Canada hold views similar to those which he so expressed at that time?

A further question is this: Is Canada proposing to institute a body similar to the United States atomic energy commission, which appears to be clothed with wide and special powers to direct and control atomic energy experimentations? May I also ask, in view of the importance of the subject, when it is anticipated that the discussions, which President Truman mentioned, among this group of powers will be initiated, and who will represent Canada in those discussions?

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): With respect to the last portion of my hon. friend's question, no previous notice had been received and I am not in a position to make any statement at this moment. As to the earlier portions of his remarks and questions, the full context of President Truman's message to congress of yesterday has not yet been received in Ottawa, and I am not prepared to comment upon it until we have an opportunity to examine it closely. I can say now that there have been discussions with officers of the government of the United States over a considerable period dealing with the development and employment of atomic energy. The Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) has been a member of a combined policy committee, which was established in August, 1943, the other members of which were Mr. H. L. Stimson, then United States Secretary of War, Doctor Vannevar Bush and Doctor James B. Conant for the United States, and the late Field Marshal Sir John Dill and Colonel J. J. Llewellin for the United Kingdom. It was a committee of the highest level dealing with the research work and experimentation that were being carried on.

The present representatives of the United Kingdom on this committee are the Earl of Halifax and Field Marshal Sir Henry Wilson. Consideration is being given to the most effective organization to be adopted in Canada for the further study of Canadian policy and activities in this field, and I hope that in this connection a further announcement may be made before long.

UNITED NATIONS ORGANIZATION

DECISIONS OF PREPARATORY COMMITTEE AS TO CHOICE OF HEADQUARTERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): May I ask the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs whether the government has been advised of the decisions taken by the united nations preparatory committee regarding choice of a headquarters for the united nations organization? I ask that question because newspaper reports indicate that the headquarters of that organization is to be situated in the United States. In that connection I make one observation to the minister, namely, that I am not at all satisfied that what I regard as very strong claims for Canada have been pressed as enthusiastically as in my opinion circumstances would warrant.

[Mr. Graydon.]

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): With respect to my hon. friend's question I would not like to say offhand what are the contents of the communications we have received in respect of those preliminary discussions. I should like to take his question as a notice for further inquiry with respect to which I shall make a statement as soon as possible.

AIR FORCE

PRESS REPORT OF STATEMENT AS TO POST-WAR POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. GOLDING (Huron-Perth): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence for Air Services. Does the statement of Air Marshal Breadner as reported in the Globe and Mail of this morning reflect the government's policy in connection with our post-war air force?

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Minister of National Defence for Air): The hon. member was kind enough to send me notice of this question, and I have had an opportunity of looking over the item referred to. I must take this opportunity of congratulating the Globe and Mail on their speedy reporting. The article refers to the speeches made by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Abbott), General Crerar, Admiral Jones and Air Marshal Breadner at the McGill university founders' day dinner. I am now informed that that dinner is taking place to-night, and no speeches have yet been made.

MEAT

EXPORTS TO THE UNITED STATES DURING LAST SIX MONTHS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. E. LENNARD (Wentworth): Since Canadian canned meats are being advertised for sale by New York city retailers, and being sold free of points, will the government advise the house, at the earliest opportunity, what meats, fresh and canned, have been exported to the United States within the past six months?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I shall be glad to accept that as a notice and get the information.

CANADIAN ARMY

DISMISSAL OF EDITOR OF "MAPLE LEAF"—REQUEST THAT EDITORIALS BE PLACED ON HANSARD

On the orders of the day.

Mr. C. C. I. MERRITT (Vancouver-Burrard): I should like to draw the attention of the house to an undertaking given by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Abbott) on September 24, that he would obtain and place on Hansard copies of the Maple Leaf editorials which were the subject of questions on that day. Later, on October 2, two days ago, in response to a request of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) the Minister of National Defence tabled copies of those editorials. The following day, yesterday, those editorials did not appear on Hansard. Consequently I rise to-day to ask that in the absence of the Minister of National Defence, his colleague, the Minister of National Defence for Air Services (Mr. Gibson) might perhaps read those editorials into Hansard in pursuance of the undertaking given by his colleague, or, in the alternative, might move, with the unanimous consent of the house, that the editorials be attached as an appendix to to-day's Hansard.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I shall be very glad indeed to direct the attention of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Abbott) to the hon. member's remarks. My impression is, however—I am not sure that I am correct in this—that the articles in question would need to be read into Hansard before they could be produced. I do not think that tabling of them would authorize their appearing in Hansard. However, I shall be glad to see that the Minister of National Defence becomes acquainted with the observations which the hon. member has made.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): The point is not that the Minister of National Defence be advised, but that these editorials be placed on Hansard pursuant to the undertaking given by the minister. There must be some procedure by which they can get on Hansard, and that is what I asked.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I thought the hon. member's question was that they be tabled.

Mr. BRACKEN: No.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am not referring to the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Merritt).

Mr. BRACKEN: No. I am very clear on this. The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) said that he wanted them put in Hansard, and there was a very clear undertaking that that would be done.

Mr. CHEVRIER: When the leader of the opposition asked the question the other day I thought he asked that they be tabled; that is my recollection.

Mr. BRACKEN: That is not my recollection, but whether it was or not, the undertaking was clearly given by the Minister of National Defence, in answer to a question by the hon. member for Vancouver South, that they would be put on Hansard in the same manner as some other material with respect to the same matter was put on Hansard by the minister. That has not been done; the house expects it to be done. I suggest to the government that they should see it is done by whatever means necessary.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.

Mr. GRAYDON: Before the matter is disposed of—

Mr. MERRITT: Would the hon. member allow me to have the floor, since I brought up the matter? So that the matter may be perfectly clear and in order that there may be no doubt about it at all, I wish to read the reference which appears on page 381 of Hansard:

> Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, I was not intending to carry on the discussion. All I wanted to do was to ask the minister to make sure that he had given his undertaking that he would obtain copies of these editorials and place them on Hansard. That is all I ask.
> Mr. Abbott: I have already given that undertaking, Mr. Speaker.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if it comes to any question of referring the matter to the Minister of National Defence, or any question as to the procedure whereby that solemn undertaking given by the minister may be fulfilled, then I suggest that it is quite within our power to do so by unanimous consent, which, I am sure, the minister would be the first to ask for were he in his place. I suggest that by unanimous consent of the house they be taken as read and placed on Hansard now.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: With respect to the statement of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard as to the procedure which can be adopted at this time, may I say that the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard rose to ask a question. He asked the question. The Minister of National Defence is not in his place at the moment. It seems to me that there has been sufficient discussion of the matter, and the leader of the government has stated that he will bring the matter to the attention of the Minister of National Defence. I do not think we can gain much by proceeding with the argument.

Mr. GRAYDON: On a question of privilege arising out of what was said by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) a moment ago. He made clear what his recollection was of the question which was put by the leader of the opposition when he asked to have those editorials put on Hansard. Perhaps I might turn to page 662 of Hansard of October 2 and read just a sentence or two of what the leader of the opposition said, because I think it is pertinent to the discussion. It is as follows:

> Will the minister be good enough to inform the house if he has received the documents in question, and, if so, when we may expect that they will be tabled, so that they may appear in Hansard?

That is perhaps the reason why the Minister of Transport arrived at the understanding he did.

POSTAL SERVICE

PARCELS TO GREAT BRITAIN—WEIGHT LIMITATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question which could be communicated to the Postmaster General (Mr. Bertrand), who is not in his seat at the moment. I believe this is a matter of urgency, because people are being requested to pack early their Christmas parcels for Great Britain. Will the same facilities be given to persons in Canada wishing to send parcels to Great Britain as according to newspaper advertisements, are now being extended to people sending to the continent of Europe? At this time the limitation is five pounds to Great Britain and eleven pounds to the continent. Could the same facility be given with respect to parcels for Great Britain?

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I shall bring this matter to the attention of the Postmaster General during the dinner recess, so that he may reply to my hon. friend.

Mr. COLDWELL: And may we have a reply from the Minister of Labour at eight o'clock?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I shall try to get in touch with him.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

HALIFAX V-E DAY RIOTS

REMISSION OF SENTENCES OF NAVAL PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Minister of Justice a question arising from a press report in the last few days to the effect that there have been certain remissions or reductions in sentences passed on naval personnel following the V-E day riots at Halifax. Has he any statement to make in that regard?

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): From his familiarity with practice in the department, my hon. friend will know that in respect of short sentences—that is to say, sentences of six months and less—it is not the usual practice of the Department of Justice to advise the exercise of clemency.

But in view of the very favourable reports received from local, judicial and executive authorities, as well as from the armed services, the offences committed in the course of V-E day celebrations have been considered on a special basis, with more than usual leniency. As a result, thus far there have been twelve releases from prison, out of a total of sixteen gaol sentences.

The record shows that of the twelve released from prison out of the total of sixteen, three were ratings of the navy; two were from the merchant marine; four were men who were serving with the army, and three were civilians In connection with the other four, with respect to whom clemency has not yet been recommended, one was serving with the navy, one with the merchant marine, and the other two were civilians. Then, seventeen had been sentenced to terms which required to be served in penitentiaries.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: More than two years.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes, more than two years. Ten of these were members of the armed forces, and seven were civilians. The decision as to clemency in these cases has been under consideration. Of course a special docket is made up with respect to each of these cases, and in connection with these seventeen we are still awaiting reports from the office of the attorney general of Nova Scotia. We hope to have them soon, and to be able then to arrive at some decision in each individual case.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

THREATENED PACKING PLANT STRIKE IN VANCOUVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). Since he is not in his seat at the moment, perhaps he will answer it to-morrow, if not to-night. I have been advised by the cattle growers' association of British Columbia that a packing plant strike is pending or threatening in Vancouver and that there is a possibility the producers will try to sell before the stoppage consequent to the strike occurs. This would be disastrous to the cattle men. Therefore I should like to ask the minister if he has been advised of a possible packing plant strike in Vancouver and, if such a possibility is likely to occur, what he has done or what he proposes to do to settle the grievances before the strike takes place?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I shall be glad to direct the attention of the Minister of Labour to the hon. gentleman's question.

CANADIAN SERVICE PERSONNEL

ARRANGEMENTS FOR BRINGING WIVES AND CHILDREN TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Abbott), or in his absence to his parliamentary assistant. What steps have been taken by his department to speed up transportation from Britain to Canada of the wives and children of the men who were or who have been in Canada's armed forces, so that these wives and children may be in Canada for Christmas.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I think that question should be placed on the order paper.

WAR AND DEMOBILIZATION

PROVISION FOR APPROPRIATION OF $1,365,000,000 FOR WAR PURPOSES, DEMOBILIZATION, PROMOTION OF TRADE AND INDUSTRY, ETC.

The house resumed from Tuesday, October 2, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to His Majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures deemed necessary or advisable in consequence of the war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Golding in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR

Hon. C. W. G. GIBSON (Minister of National Defence for Air): Mr. Chairman, it is customary for ministers of defence when presenting their estimates to make a statement concerning the activities of the various forces.

In making a statement to-day concerning the Royal Canadian Air Force, I realize that this will be the last report to parliament on the wartime activities of the force.

Under the circumstances, for the benefit of the members and also for record purposes, I would like to give a short resume of the war record of the R.C.A.F., its present position and the plans for the future.

My remarks may well be divided under the headings yesterday, to-day and to-morrow.

On August 31, 1939, slightly over six years ago, the Royal Canadian Air Force had a total permanent strength of only 3,048 officers and men. In addition there were 1,013 all ranks in the auxiliary air force.

With the outbreak of war the air force forged ahead—taking on additional commitments and rapidly increasing the number of its airfields and personnel. Strength grew from the 3,048 of September to a peak of 232,585, of which 17,412 were civilians—not in uniform. From this peak the numbers decreased, until on V-E day the total was 181,489, of which 11,015 were civilians. In the intervening period the R.C.A.F. had suffered casualties totalling 21,866, of which 6,615 were fatal, 8,836 have been officially presumed dead, 1,526 are missing, 1,376 were seriously wounded or injured, and of the prisoners two are unaccounted for in Europe, three not yet officially reported upon in the far east, and the remainder were either reported missing and have since been found to be safe, or were prisoners of war either released, escaped or repatriated under the Geneva convention.

The first major step in the development of the air force was the signing of the British commonwealth air training agreement in Ottawa on December 17, 1939, by Great Britain, Australia, Canada and New Zealand. By this instrument the dominion became the operating partner of the most extensive training programme which, up to that time, had ever been developed. The Royal Canadian Air Force acted as general manager in this programme, and as a result of this heavy commitment the main role to be played by the force in the early days of the war was determined. For many months that role was to be mainly training rather than operation, and so it was only a token operational force which was despatched overseas in the early days of the war. It was not until late in 1940 that the original three squadrons were reinforced by the first graduates from the training plan—the first trickle in the flood which was to mount to the tremendous total of 131,553 graduates before the termination of the plan, and of these 72,835 were members of the R.C.A.F. Of the total figure 49,808 were pilots; 29,963 navigators of various categories; 15,673 air bombers; 18,496 wireless operator-air gunners; 14,996 straight air gunners; 1,913 flight engineers, and 704 naval air gunners.

Following the termination of the B.C.A.T.P. agreements on March 31, 1945, a special agreement was entered into with the government of the United Kingdom to provide for the continuation of training for a limited number of R.A.F. personnel at R.C.A.F. schools in Canada. The costs of training these men were borne by the United Kingdom. After V-J day this, too, was concluded and the last graduating class was "winged" on September 7. During the short life of this supplementary plan 1,211 airmen graduated, of which 465 were pilots and 746 navigators and navigators B. All but fifty-seven were members of the Royal Air Force.

The three squadrons of the R.C.A.F. which had been sent to the United Kingdom in 1940 were unable to absorb the ever-growing stream of R.C.A.F. personnel who graduated from the plan, and as a result the vast majority of the early Canadian graduates were posted to R.A.F. units. Throughout the war there were always many more Canadians serving overseas with R.A.F. units than with R.C.A.F. units.

With the large numbers of R.C.A.F. personnel arriving in the United Kingdom the expansion of Canada's operational organization became highly desirable. Differences in pay entitlements, service conditions, trade divisions and other important factors in the life and careers of R.C.A.F. airmen, as compared with personnel of the R.A.F., complicated administration both for the R.C.A.F. and for the R.A.F. Accordingly additional R.C.A.F. units were formed to absorb a percentage of Canadian aircrew, and long before hostilities ceased, forty-eight R.C.A.F. squadrons were fully operational overseas. Under the original plan these were to be R.A.F. units in everything other than name and nationality of aircrew. All groundcrew were to be found by the R.A.F. until such time as sufficient personnel could be released from the B.C.A.T.P. schools and posted overseas. The ultimate aim was of course to have R.C.A.F. squadrons, manned fully by Canadians—both aircrew and groundcrew—by the process which came to be known as Canadianization. Though this goal was never fully reached, at the cessation of hostilities in Europe, the percentage of Canadian groundcrew in our overseas squadrons was uniformly high.

[Mr. C. W. G. Gibson.]

The magnificent record of these Canadian squadrons is now a matter of history, as is the record of the other thousands of R.C.A.F. personnel who did all their operations with the R.A.F.

The most famous of Canada's air formations was of course the No. 6 Bomber group of Bomber command; and the famous Vancouver Pathfinder squadron of the same command. During the last year of the group's operations, under the command of Air Vice-Marshal C. M. McEwen, C.B., M.C., D.F.C., records were broken again and again and the Canadian squadrons established a reputation second to none in Bomber command. During the war the Canadian heavy bomber squadrons carried out 48,927 sorties in 262,982 operational flying hours, and dropped 125,575 tons of bombs on Europe.

They established a record surpassed by no other formation. They produced men in every way worthy to take their places in the hall of fame, alongside the heroes of the first world war.

In this last war, just as in the first world war, Canadians also excelled as fighter pilots. R.C.A.F. fighter squadrons flew 144,851 sorties in 212,148 operational flying hours, and destroyed 1,241 aircraft, probably destroyed 142 and damaged a further 607. The unit scoring the largest number of successes was the famous city of Edmonton squadron, the aircrew of which knocked down 169 Germans, and destroyed 82 flying bombs.

From October 1, 1944, to the termination of hostilities in Europe our fighters flew 26,163 sorties and lost 144 aircraft. But during that period they destroyed 236 enemy aircraft and made 1,600 cuts in vital nazi rail communications. They also destroyed 958 vehicles, 516 railway cars and 92 locomotives and damaged an additional 632 locomotives. In addition they either destroyed or damaged two medium-sized ships, one cruiser, six E-boats, 97 barges and 40 tanks.

Our coastal command squadrons, also, established a magnificent record. Their role was not spectacular, but day after day—night after night—virtually twenty-four hours a day—our men, to use their own expression, "stooged" over the ocean—in all kinds of weather, keeping the sea lanes of the world open for united nations shipping. From this side of the Atlantic our squadrons based in eastern Canada and Newfoundland provided protection for shipping on the northwest Atlantic. Their patrols took them to mid-ocean and frequently required them to be diverted to Iceland, the Shetlands and even to the British isles. During these operations our aircrews flew 25,500 sorties in 175,000 operational flying hours and made 69 attacks on U-boats. It was on this work that the late Flight Lieutenant David E. Hornell won undying fame—and the Victoria Cross.

The R.C.A.F. transport units, formed late in the war, also established records. One Canadian squadron, based in Burma, flew more operational hours, more sorties and carried more freight than any other similar unit in the R.A.F.—and that record still stands.

From the outbreak of war to the 15th of September last, members of the R.C.A.F. were awarded 7,107 decorations including one Victoria Cross, 66 Distinguished Service Orders, 3,481 Distinguished Flying Crosses and 484 Distinguished Flying Medals. I have here a complete list of dceorations and commendations awarded to members of the R.C.A.F. and Canadians in the R.A.F. for services in the war, which I will table at the conclusion of my remarks.

Canadians in the R.A.F. received a total of 356 awards including one Victoria Cross to the late Squadron Leader Bazalgatte, 16 D.S.O.'s, 196 D.F.C.'s and 24 D.F.M.'s.

I shall also table the names of all those personnel decorated subsequent to the list tabled on April 4, 1945.

Following the cessation of hostilities in Europe the R.C.A.F. was called upon to take part in the occupation of Germany. Our quota consists of a force of about 10,000 made up of two heavy bomber squadrons; four fighter squadrons with wing headquarters; three medium range transport squadrons, equipped with Dakota aircraft and, until December 31, 1945, one Liberator long range transport squadron. These transport squadrons are controlled by a wing headquarters based in England. At the present time the transport squadrons, two of which were previously based in India and Burma, are occupied in regular transport duties, including repatriation of liberated prisoners of war and other personnel from the East. The Liberator and two of the Dakota squadrons, based in the United Kingdom are assisting in this work between Karachi and the United Kingdom. Also included in the occupational force are those personnel who are employed on the control commission and for the disarmament of Germany, on both of which tasks certain positions have been allotted to the R.C.A.F.

After the defeat of Germany our attention turned to the Pacific, and a force was mobilized for service in that area. To make up this force eight heavy bomber squadrons from No. 6 group flew across the Atlantic to the east coast of Canada and began training for the new theatre of operations. It had been intended to equip these units with Lincoln aircraft—an improvement on the Lancaster, which had served our squadrons so well in the latter days of the European war—but the early capitulation of Japan, put an end to these preparations, and six of these squadrons have now been disbanded.

The two units still being retained are continuing a programme of training designed to keep them in a state of efficiency. They will form part of the post-war organization of the R.C.A.F. and will provide the necessary defence for our shores in addition to the air sea rescue activities which are part and parcel of all coastal operations.

General demobilization is now proceeding with all possible speed and has of course been materially increased since V-J day. All surplus personnel of the R.C.A.F. are being released on a first in—first out basis, with overseas service counting double.

In addition, where the exigencies of the service permit, personnel may be released on application in the following cases:—

(a) Prospective employers may make application for the release of key personnel to provide for the expeditious and effective reconversion of industry from war-time to peace-time production and the maintenance of maximum employment. In those cases where the industrial selection and release board recommends release, appropriate action is taken by the R.C.A.F. wherever possible.

(b) Personnel in Canada who produce satisfactory evidence that they are entitled to be reinstated in their former employment, in accordance with the terms of the Reinstatement in Civil Employment Act, and who intend to return to such former employment.

(c) Personnel in Canada who provide satisfactory evidence that they will undertake or resume farming operations where there is need of their services. This includes personnel now on farm leave without pay.

(d) Personnel in Canada who intend to proceed with university or other similar educational studies, provided satisfactory evidence is produced that they have been accepted for training at a university or similar institution.

(e) Personnel transferring to other armed forces.

(f) Personnel whose release is authorized on compassionate grounds.

(g) Personnel who have attained their forty-second birthday.

(h) Personnel who apply for release to resume school teaching.

The following personnel are being released regardless of their priority points:

(a) Married personnel of the women's division and the nursing service.

(b) Over-age officers.

(c) Personnel medically unfit for operational flying.

Personnel serving overseas are being repatriated in accordance with their point score which is based on both total length of service and length of service overseas. They are all being released on arrival in Canada with the exception of those in certain administrative ground trades where existing shortages necessitate their continued employment in Canada.

From V-E day to 1st October, 37,907 R.C.A.F. and W.D. personnel were repatriated to Canada from overseas. Of these 6,455 were repatriated from September 1 to October 1, inclusive.

Between V-E day and the official announcement of V-J day 17,556 service personnel had been retired or discharged and the number of civilians employed had been reduced by 1,108. From V-J day to September 30, 37,396 left the service, and during September alone 30,627 passed through the release centres into civilian life, or over 1,000 per day.

At the present time the strength of the R.C.A.F. stands at 124,052 made up of 27,910 overseas and 96,142 in Canada, of which 9,109 are civilians. Of those in Canada 28,071 are awaiting release.

It has been realized that rapid demobilization would be most dangerous unless certain steps were taken to prepare air force men and women for their new role, and to make the transition from service to civilian life as painless as possible. It is hardly necessary to remind the house of the extensive system of personnel counselling, which has been in operation in the R.C.A.F. for many months. Every person being retired or discharged from the Royal Canadian Air Force is interviewed by a personnel counsellor and his or her aptitude for particular civilian occupations is gauged. This is no haphazard matter, but a scientific assessment of the qualities and technical skills of those interviewed so that they may be advised as to the type of employment to which they are best suited.

In addition to the personnel counsellors we have the education officers, who conduct courses in all units, and thus implement the advice of the counsellors. Interested personnel may improve their education or their technical skill and fit themselves for better and more interesting work on demobilization. With these two aids it is safe to predict that a very large percentage of demobilized personnel of the R.C.A.F. have improved their qualifications during their service careers.

Concurrent with the demobilization of personnel of the R.C.A.F. has gone the closing of schools, units and stations. During the peak of the commonwealth air training plan we had 100 schools and 182 other units established across Canada.

Following the termination of the B.C.A.T.P. agreement, schools utilized under the plan have been progressively closed. Of the major training schools, there were still twenty-nine open at V-E day.

Immediately following the cessation of hostilities in Europe steps were taken to reduce the number, and at V-J day the twenty-nine schools had been reduced to seventeen.

The collapse of Japan brought further drastic reductions so that at the moment only four major schools remain open, pending the establishment of an interim force.

Cuts in the operational units have been no less drastic. On V-E day there were twenty-six operational squadrons in Canada made up of twelve bomber reconnaissance, three fighter, three composite, three transport, two communications, two ferry and one operational training. On the 30th of September only nine remained made up of two long range bomber reconnaissance, three transport, one ferry, one communication and two photo squadrons. One of these transport squadrons will be disbanded next month.

Operational stations have also been closed, so that now only five of the original twenty-four remain.

With the closing of stations and disbanding of units much equipment becomes surplus to immediate needs. The amount of equipment to be retained as a reserve is based on an estimate of five years requirements. The stock position at all equipment depots is checked by the procurement branch so that surpluses are ascertained and disposed of. Storage of this reserve equipment is provided at reserve equipment maintenance units established across the country.

In disposing of properties the stations are first placed at the disposal of the other services. If not required for the operations of these departments, the property concerned is declared surplus to requirements and, (a) in the case of leased property, returned to the owners, or (b) if purchased property, turned over to Crown Assets Allocation Committee for reference to other government departments including the Department of Transport, and if not required, turned over to War Assets Corporation for disposal.

Surplus equipment is treated in a similar way.

I should like to make it quite clear that there is nothing sinister in our methods of disposing of surplus equipment or supplies. There appear to be some people who have the impression that anything we no longer require we destroy, and I should like if possible to disabuse their minds of this matter.

In a highly technical force like the air force it is inevitable that scientific skill will constantly produce new and improved equipment. As new developments appear old models become obsolete, and in war time we cannot afford to send our boys into the air with anything but the most modern equipment available.

As a result much equipment becomes surplus to requirements—sometimes because it is obsolete, sometimes because it is worn out or damaged, and sometimes both, but in every case careful consideration is given as to the disposal of this equipment, and disposal of it is made through War Assets Corporation.

While we are still engaged in the process of demobilization it is realized that with the end of the war plans must be prepared for our post-war forces.

No definite decision has yet been made as to the strength and composition of the post-war air force, as until the nature and extent of any commitments that we may have under international or regional agreements have been determined it is obviously impossible to reach any final decision.

In the meantime plans are being prepared to provide Canada with a balanced force which would be capable of rapid expansion should the necessity arise.

The proposed post-war organization will be made up of three parts:

(a) Regular
(b) Auxiliary
(c) Reserve

The regular force should comprise all branches of air force activities including bomber, fighter and transport squadrons, together with the necessary ancillary units, and for this purpose a strength of from 15,000 to 20,000 personnel is planned.

The auxiliary force will be made up of squadrons based at strategic points throughout the dominion and corresponds to the militia units of the army. These squadrons will provide opportunities for our young men to qualify for their wings or to secure training in their groundcrew trades.

The reserve will be made up of qualified air and ground personnel who in an emergency may be recalled for further service. Meanwhile, like the members of the auxiliary force, they will continue their normal peace-time occupations.

In planning for this post-war organization, arrangements are being made to perpetuate squadrons which took such an important part in the downfall of Germany. These will be localized as far as possible in the districts with which they were affiliated during their service overseas.

The production of the atomic bomb will no doubt have far reaching effects on the whole science of war, but whatever its effects may be upon the other services, I consider that it will undoubtedly increase the relative importance of air power.

The new field of atomic energy has introduced a situation which will require increased attention being paid to aeronautical research. This research will be imperative if the R.C.A.F. is to keep in line with changing conditions and —by the pooling of research findings—abreast with the developments in the specialized field of aviation.

With this in mind a division of research and development has been established within the force, which works in close cooperation with the other services and the National Research Council.

One of the most important fields of research for which Canada is especially suited is in the sphere of cold weather operations. Much experimental work was carried on in this direction during the war period, and it will be continued in the days of peace. Information gained in this way is not only valuable to the service but is of benefit to civil aviation generally.

It would perhaps be of interest to hon. members to learn of the work at present being carried on by one of the R.C.A.F. units known as the radio wave propagation unit.

Canada's proximity to the north pole and its consequent position in the auroral region carries with it not only the advantage of being the centre of global airways, but also the disadvantage of giving the dominion a condition involving certain radio black-out spots. This condition is peculiar to Canada. The danger of these black-out spots to navigation can readily be appreciated. In an endeavour to combat this condition a radio wave propagation unit to forecast workable radio frequencies is now in operation. The research is being carried out, and will be continued, to determine the effect of the auroral zone, and to adjust predictions accordingly. Ionospheric recording units, by means similar to radar, record hourly the conditions affecting radio transmissions in the ionospheric layers, that is the space stretching from 40 to 260 miles above the earth's surface. This data is correlated with that of actual operating conditions and analysed. By these means predictions of workable frequencies may be made so that contact may be maintained on all wireless circuits at all times.

As a result it will be possible to ensure the most efficient use of equipment and radio facilities. The importance of this service in the saving of personnel, ships and aircraft cannot be overemphasized.

There is one particular division of the R.C.A.F. of which I want to make special mention, and that is the Women's Division.

While no decision has as yet been reached as to the employment of women in the permanent air force, I should like to express the appreciation of the Department of the outstanding part played by the Women's Division throughout the war.

The Women's Division is the pioneer women's service organization in Canada, and has proved itself equal to every test to which it has been put. Those tests were neither few nor simple. Arduous—and in many cases heavy—work has been undertaken cheerfully, and carried out carefully and efficiently.

Though precluded from flying duties, these women, recruited "so that men might fly" have been of inestimable service to the R.C.A.F. and to Canada. The Department of National Defence for Air joins all of Canada in saying "Thank you" for a job magnificently done.

Pending the determination of the composition of the permanent air force an interim force has been authorized, covering the period to September, 1947. For this force, which will operate under active service status, volunteers are being accepted both from serving personnel and from those who have been transferred to the reserve.

This interim force in addition to providing personnel for our occupation squadrons and home establishment, will also be used as a proving ground for personnel. These two years will give our officers an opportunity to evaluate the fitness of personnel for the peacetime role of the R.C.A.F. and at the same time enable those who join to decide if they wish to make a career in the service.

While persons who do not elect to serve in this interim force will not be barred from appointment to the permanent force, those who do enroll will be in a favourable position for permanent appointment.

In presenting the cash requirements for the R.C.A.F. for the current year, it will be seen that the cessation of hostilities has enabled me to revise my previous estimates and to make material reductions below the requirements for the previous year.

As compared with the sum of over $1,090,000,000 voted for the last fiscal year, the requirement this year is slightly over $598,400,000, or a decrease of 45·4 per cent.

The major saving is made in the commitment for the maintenance of overseas squadrons, where there is a reduction of over $216,000,000.

A comparative statement of cash requirements for the last fiscal year and for this year has been prepared and is available for members of the house.

While, with the coming of peace, reduction in the strength of the R.C.A.F. becomes inevitable, the same spirit of initiative and enterprise within the service will continue to maintain the high standard of performance which is characteristic of the Royal Canadian Air Force.

And now, Mr. Chairman, with your permission I should like to table a list of honours and awards to members of the R.C.A.F. and a list of decorations that have been won throughout the war.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I wonder if it would be the wish of hon. members that this be included in Hansard, with unanimous consent?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): The list is as follows:

Mr. PEARKES: Mr. Chairman, I should like to be associated with the remarks which have just been made by the hon. the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Gibson) in appreciation of the work that has been done by the Royal Canadian Air Force, and the Women's Division of the Royal Canadian Air Force, during this war. I have been extremely fortunate to have been closely associated with that service, although, of course, I was not in it myself. But I count it a high privilege to have been in England during those early days when I saw our Canadian pilots sharing the dangers with their British comrades in breaking up those dense formations of enemy bombers which came over to attack London and the south of England during the years 1939 and 1940. And never was any "forlorn" led with more reckless gallantry in those romantic days of warfare when citadels and fortresses were stormed and breaches were entered than the reckless gallantry shown by that "forlorn" of 1939 and 1940, when they forced the breaches in those formations of enemy bombers which came toward London. Singly or in pairs these fighters went up, and we on the ground stood in amazement. We watched them accomplish the impossible. Those formations of enemy bombers turned and went back to seek their lairs on the continent. Then, as months went by, we saw the great squadrons sally forth from the shores of England and carry a just punishment and revenge to the cities and fortresses of Europe then held by the enemy.

I should also like to say something in appreciation of the work which was done here in Canada, because it has been my privilege to fly many thousands of miles with the Royal Canadian Air Force. I have always received the utmost courtesy and kindness from the aircrews, and I have been tremendously impressed by the skilful handling of the aircraft, the quick decisions made and the coolness of pilots and navigators under the trying weather conditions while flying over the Rocky mountains and in the northern areas of this country.

I also wish to say a word in appreciation of the women's division of the air force and of the magnificent work done by all those who were connected with the commonwealth training plan.

It is my intention to examine this evening the proposals and estimates which have been presented by the minister under four headings: the defence of Canada and our ability to live up to the commitments which we have to assume during this interim period by reason of obligations derived from the united nations agreements; the question of efficiency; that of research, and that of the proposed continuation, in so far as types of organization and equipment are concerned, of following the British commonwealth of nations and United States of America air forces.

Dealing with the defence of Canada and such commitments as we may be called upon to assume during this interim period, I must express profound regret that the government has not seen fit to meet the request which was made in the house last Friday by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) and which was repeated by me the day before yesterday, that before we went into a detailed examination of the various service estimates we should be presented with the general defence policy of the three services. At that time both the hon. member for Vancouver South and myself endeavoured to explain the difficulties under which hon. members would be working if they had to review piecemeal the various service estimates presented. I still maintain that it is impossible efficiently to review the separate service estimates without that over-all picture.

In the first place the strengths of the various services to carry out the roles of the defence of Canada and such commitments as they may be required to carry out under the united nations agreements are relative. For instance, to put it in the simplest possible terms, if we had a large air force and we had all the planes that we required for reconnaissance purposes over the sea approaches of our country we should not require as many surface craft to carry out the patrol work. On the other hand, if we had a very large number of surface reconnaissance craft, then we could reduce the number of our air force reconnaissance squadrons. Further than that, it is quite obvious to everybody, I think, that if we have ships afloat, then we must have bases from which those ships can operate, and those bases must be protected. It is the role of the army and of the air force to protect and to watch the approaches to those bases.

I feel that the three services are so correlated in these respects that we should have been given an over-all statement. Furthermore, when we come to the administrative services of the army, the navy and the air force is there not an opportunity whereby the services, perhaps the medical, dental, pay or commissariat services, might not in some respects be combined instead of there being a separate service for the army, the navy and the air force?

According to the press we have statements from senior naval officers who have told us that certain types of ships are to be in the Canadian navy. The question of carriers was mentioned. If we have aircraft carriers they have to carry aircraft. Who is to supply those aircraft? I have not heard any mention in the minister's remarks about any aircraft being made available to those carriers I do not know whether it is the intention of the government to provide a fleet air arm. How can we make considered comments upon the estimates if we do not have such details? I feel that we cannot expect progress to be made unless we are presented in parliament here with a well thought-out and coordinated plan. I do not mind in the least if people tell me that they have never done that before. There is no use in our trying to adhere to the methods of 1919 or the time-worn formula of twenty years ago. Those will not produce an adequate defence for this country. If I am to believe that the government departments have worked out these estimates in collaboration one with another, then I can only feel that they have shown disrespect, if not contempt, of this house, by refusing to produce statements. If, on the other hand, they have not worked in close collaboration, then a most terrible and fundamental mistake has been made at the very beginning.

I turn now to the question of efficiency. Efficiency must not be destroyed. That, I feel, is a fundamental principle to which we must adhere and upon which we must insist. Dealing with this first under the heading of personnel, let me say that we have been told of the interim force. A hint has been thrown out to-day—and that was the first time I had heard it—that there will be a permanent or regular air force of some 15,000, 20,000 or 25,000 personnel. I have forgotten the exact number.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): It is 15,000 to 20,000.

Mr. PEARKES: I think the young men who to-day are making the decision as to whether they will remain in the temporary interim force would like to have more information regarding their opportunities for seeking a career in that permanent force.

I have heard reports of, and I have seen individuals who have been perplexed and who have wondered whether it is worth while staying on in the interim force, on the off hope that perhaps they may be able to stay on afterwards in the regular air force. They are concerned, because in many cases they have entered, as it were, into a contract with their former employers before joining the services at the beginning of the war. They were promised that when the war was over they would have their civilian jobs back again. If they sign on with the interim force they have the feeling that they are breaking that contract. And if at the end of two years they are not accepted, or the terms of service in the regular force are not acceptable to them, they will have no claim on the civilian jobs they left at the beginning of the war.

Therefore I say that they have waited long for the terms of service which will be announced regarding the regular air force, after the two-year period. I feel that we are wasting good material by not having come out before, and by not making it quite clear to-day as to what the opportunities for a career will be.

I understood the minister to say that the interim force was available for those who were in the Royal Canadian Air Force at the present time, or who had recently left that force and desired to go back. But no intimation was given that any new recruits were being taken into the force. If we are not taking in new recruits; if we are not taking in young men who are anxious to make the R.C.A.F. a career, young men of a type who might become commissioned officers and rise in the service, then we are going to have a gap, a hiatus, and in a few years time, if recruiting is not resumed before that period has elapsed, there will be a serious gap.

I believe I am correct when I say there has been no recruiting this year. If that is so, then the gap is getting wider and wider. We cannot have a Royal Canadian Air Force made up of old men. We must have a steady flow of young men coming in, if we are to keep efficiency to a maximum. I regret that no mention has been made of reopening recruiting for the service.

When I speak of efficiency, let it be understood that I do not want anyone to feel I am advocating extravagance or waste. If there has been any extravagance or waste in the past, there must be none in the future. I would urge all those who are thinking of remaining in the interim force or the permanent force as a future career to realize that they will be expected to do a full day's work. And if they are expected to do a full day's work, then this country must be prepared to pay wages and salaries which a full day's work in any particular craft or trade would command.

Before I leave the question of personnel, and while I am still talking about the possibilities of entering upon a career, may I say I should like to have heard the Minister of National Defence for Air give the committee some idea with respect to his policy in connection with enlisting those who would seek commissioned ranks in the air force.

Within the last week or so the announcement was made that the Royal Military College at Kingston will be opening its doors next year. We know that Royal Roads, the naval cadet college, is in existence on Vancouver island. I should have liked to hear—perhaps the minister will tell us later—what opportunities are offered to those young men who are now leaving school or college and who would like to follow the air force as a career. Is it the intention of the force to establish a special college of its own, or does it intend to receive entries through the Royal Military College, or some other university? I believe the country would like to hear his proposals in that respect.

Passing on to equipment, I would say simply this, that it is our duty—and the minister intimated that it was the department's intention to do this—to retain up-to-date equipment. We must cut our losses, and get rid of any obsolete or obsolescent types.

Mention was made of air fields. The minister said, I believe, that five operational air fields would be retained. I suggest that we should be told where those operational air fields are located.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Operational stations, not air fields.

Mr. PEARKES: Those are headquarters, are they?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): We have other air fields as well, but I said that there were just five operational air stations.

Mr. PEARKES: We should know where those operational stations or air fields will be located. They are linked closely with the other services and there should be no mistake made in locating them. It is important that they should be located, not for political reasons, but purely for strategic considerations. No doubt there will be training stations in addition.

I come now to the detailed statement of figures just presented. I cannot help feeling that the country will be disappointed that there has not been a greater reduction with a further relief from taxation. We have heard about the expansion of the air force. From the financial point of view there has also been expansion. I believe that in 1940-41 the estimates submitted were for $54 million. This has grown and grown until last year the estimates were over one billion dollars. Then we find that there has been a reduction from that maximum figure of forty-four per cent, according to what the minister has told us.

That maximum amount was provided during a year when our armies were preparing to launch an invasion of the coast of France. Maximum air effort and maximum air bombardment were required. It could be estimated that during the months which would follow D day there would have to be continual and prolonged bombing, as in fact there was. There was also the war against Japan which it was generally expected would have to be prosecuted to the best ability of this country as soon as Germany had been defeated. Therefore it was reasonable that a large amount of money had to be made available.

When the estimates were prepared for this year it was known that the war with Germany was nearing an end, but it was also thought that the war against Japan would be continuing for some months after the cessation of hostilities with Germany. Therefore it is reasonable to think that money was provided in order to take care of air operations in Asia. It would seem that these operations would be expensive because of the great distances which would have to be covered. These operations did not develop. So I say the people of the country as a whole will be disappointed when they hear that there has not been more of a reduction than that which has been shown to us to-day.

Within a month of the passing of the estimates last spring V-E day came, and only a few months after that V-J day came. It is not surprising that we find the major reduction in the estimates made in connection with the maintenance of squadrons overseas. I believe the reduction has been in the neighbourhood of $216 million, very nearly half the total reduction. I will go on to examine these various items.

In the figures placed on Hansard the other day we find the money which was voted for the first five months of the fiscal year and the money still required for the remaining seven months of the year. Talking only in terms of millions, without bothering with the odd dollars, I find under pay and allowances that $130 million were required for the first five months, while $139 million will be required for the last seven months. We have been told to-day that there has been a reduction of 54,000 officers and men since V-E day. We shall have to ask the minister to give us a more detailed explanation as to why there is not a further reduction in pay and allowances when so many men have already been discharged from the air force.

The next item is travel, and $9 million was required for the first five months, while $14 million will be required for the last seven months of the year. Here again we know that personnel are being brought back, but I gained the impression that a large percentage of those who were overseas are already back in Canada. While there will have to be transportation provided for a certain number of personnel from the Burma front to England, it seems to me that this amount of $14 million is too large.

The next item is construction, purchase, repairs and operating expenses of properties. During the war years temporary buildings were constructed to house and quarter various units of the Royal Canadian Air Force throughout Canada. Those buildings were well constructed and they have been well maintained. I feel that there is now little necessity for capital expenditures on additional buildings. If it is found necessary to construct any more permanent barracks I suggest that such construction be left and dealt with as a post-war project. There are civilian requirements which should have prior claim to permanent construction for the Royal Canadian Air Force. We are not told in detail how this item is divided between construction and repairs.

The next item is personal supplies and services, including clothing. A total of $7,400,000 was required for the first five months, while $7,600,000 will be required for the last seven months. Again I say that if there has been a reduction of 54,000 men and discharges are going on, why is it necessary to have such a large sum for this item? It may be that the men are obtaining civilian suits with that money, but I was under the impression that that would come out of another department.

Then for communications, signal and wireless equipment; during the first five months $3,000,000, and during the next seven months $12,000,000. Surely there will not be an expansion in the communication services after we have heard of the reductions in the number of stations and in the number of squadrons and units of the forces; and unless it may be that some expenditures in connection with the northwest territories communications are included, I believe we must ask again for a detailed explanation why so much more money is required under that head.

The same remarks apply to ammunition and bombs—$2,000,000 during the first five months and $8,000,000 when for all practical purposes the war is over. Perhaps we are going to build up stocks of bombs and ammunition. Perhaps we require them for training purposes. But it does seem to me that that is a very considerable amount.

The same with fuel costs—for the first five months $6,000,000 and for the last seven months of this year $18,000,000, when we know that there is a large reduction in the number of units and that many aircraft have been destroyed or otherwise disposed of.

The same thing with regard to aircraft, engines and spares—$25,000,000 during the first five months of the year and $46,000,000 during the remaining seven months.

The same remarks apply regarding reduction in personnel and reduction in units.

Then we come to the maintenance of overseas squadrons. There, of course, a big saving has been made.

Finally we finish up with the amusing little item of sundries, printing and stationery, and we see that there is no doubt about it, that the paper war at least is not over.

I am glad that the minister mentioned that a research development division was to be started, but I see no item here for expenditure on research. Is that expenditure to be in addition to the amount which is to be voted in these estimates? Is it to be included in some other estimate, or is it included as part of the various items I have mentioned? Perhaps the minister will be kind enough to explain that.

The minister referred to the atomic bomb, and of course everybody is tremendously interested in any developments along those lines. But there are many other fields in which experiment must be carried on, and I would recommend to the minister a careful study of jet-propelled aircraft and of radio-controlled aircraft. It is perhaps foolish to speculate, but while it may be said that the atomic bomb is going to increase the importance of the air force there must also be taken into consideration the possibilities of radio-controlled aircraft, and it may be no more fantastic than other developments would have seemed a few years ago to suggest that the air forces of the future will be launched from subterranean runways and guided toward their objective without a single airman being on board or in the air.

I should like to compliment the minister upon having started investigations regarding flying and radio control in the northern latitudes. That is of importance and we have a grand opportunity to study conditions in the northern climate. May I also suggest that our own shores are frequently fog-bound, and investigations might well be carried on to see how we can eliminate fog and improve landing conditions when our coasts are fog-bound.

Dealing with the question of radar—and this is harking back to my first statement as to the need for coordination between the three services—I feel that there may be scope to reduce overlapping and duplication in the employment of radar. In the main, air forces are sending their beams into the air to locate approaching aircraft. But radar is also used for the detection of surface vessels, and perhaps if the navy and the air force would get together a big development might be made there.

My time is fast drawing to an end, but before I sit down I should like to ask a question, because we have had no statement regarding the matter. What is the present policy of the government as to following closely along the lines of either the Royal Air Force of Great Britain or the United States air force? There are two widely different views upon that question. There is a great difference between the organization and equipment of the British air force and the organization and equipment of the United States air force, and we may have to make a decision as to which we shall follow. No doubt the government has made a decision as to whether it will follow the Brtiish or the United States system.

In conclusion, I should like to feel that the remarks which will be made while discussing these service estimates will all be prompted by the highest motives, that we members of this house in all parties are determined to do all we can to preserve the peace. There is a feeling among those of us who have seen two world wars that we must make enormous sacrifices to prevent a world war III from coming in our time, because if a world war III does come it seems to me that the means of destruction are so developed that whole civilizations might be wiped out before those means of destruction themselves can be destroyed, and it is one of the ironies of fate that perhaps the means of destruction would be the very last thing to be destroyed.

If by any chance we speak with intensity and perhaps with some emotion, advocating the steps which we consider should be taken in order to achieve the preservation of peace, and based upon such experience or previous study as we have had, I want all hon. members, including those whose experience or study has led them to quite different conclusions from those which I have reached, to feel that while they may have ideas violently opposed to my own, I shall never attribute to any one of them less high motives than I hold myself.

Mr. ALAN COCKERAM (York South): Mr. Chairman, at the beginning of my remarks I should like to pay tribute to those gallant men who served in the Royal Canadian Air Force and those Canadians who served in the Royal Air Force. We in this country owe a great deal to the courage and sacrifice which they showed on our behalf.

In discussing the estimates before this committee, I believe there are certain matters which we should take into account. We have to remember that, as the hon. member for Nanaimo has just said, within a few weeks of the estimates being presented to the house during the last session, V-E day came. Prior to V-E day many men were being transferred to the R.C.A.F. reserve, and there was therefore a paring down in that service at that time. I intend to analyse the figures which are to be presented to this committee in a greater degree than did the hon. member for Nanaimo, because I believe it is time that we in this chamber took account of how the people's money is being expended. We are voting money at the rate of millions and millions of dollars, and we owe it to the taxpayers of this country to see that there is rigid economy in government and in the services for which we provide the money.

Since we came here this evening we have been presented with a statement which paints a very rosy picture of this matter of air-force estimates. In my opinion this is a dextrous transposition of words and figures, having a semblance of face but lacking substance when one analyses it. I propose, taking the figures under the same numbers as the government allots to them, to analyze the monthly expenditures for the first five months of this year, and to show the committee what the government proposes to spend on this service in the remaining seven months. It will be found that in the majority of cases, in spite of the fact that our main war was in Europe, and that the fight we were to undertake in the future was to be a total war against Japan, the expenditures of this department are much greater than they should be. This statement was presented to us to show a very great reduction in expenditures, but we as a committee must remember that the last fiscal year was the greatest expenditure year in the war, and that there has been only one month of war in the estimates we are now to consider.

As to item No. 1, when I average the expenditures I find that we have saved a little on civil salaries and wages. The average monthly expenditure for the first five months was $1,258,924; for the last seven months the estimate is $828,530, or a saving of $430,394 a month.

No. 2, pay and allowances, shows an average for the first five months of $26,006,663, and for the last seven months, an average of $19,913,431, or a saving of $6,093,232 during the later months. I think the minister should tell us if it is the intention to cut down on that figure of pay and allowances as regards the high ranking officers. We know very well that many junior men are being put out of the services, and the same applies to all branches of the armed forces. Where a saving can and should be made is in cutting out the overhead which bogs the whole department down.

No. 3 deals with travel, transportation and freight. In the first five months there was an average expenditure of $1,815,272; it is estimated that the amount for the next seven months will be at the rate of $2,119,487, an increase of $304,215 a month. There may be some excuse for that, because men are coming home, but after all they are being let out of the service fairly rapidly. The minister has told us that 54,000 men have already been demobilized, and that a further 30,000 will be let out in the immediate future.

Item No. 4 is for construction. In spite of the idea held by the people of this country that construction expenses and the cost of camps and military establishments throughout this country pretty well reached their peak a year or so ago, we find that in the first five months there is an expenditure averaging $2,035,892; in the last seven months the expenditure amounts to $2,378,995. Therefore, in spite of the fact that many camps should be empty at this time and that air stations have been closed down, it is proposed to spend another $343,000 of the taxpayers' money a month on that branch of the service.

Under item No. 5, personnel supplies and services, we find that for the first five months there was an average expenditure of $1,484,793 a month; in the last seven months it is estimated at $1,091,107 a month, or a decreased cost of $393,686.

Then there is item No. 6, communications, signal and wireless equipment. Why there should be this great increase I do not know, but certainly we have not been equipping planes to the extent that we did when we were actively engaged in war. We find that for the first five months the figure is $772,895 a month, and in the last seven months that increases to $1,837,120, or an increase in excess of $1,064,225 a month. At a time when all fighting has ceased, when there must have been a great deal of equipment on hand in all these stations, we find they will spend $1,000,000 a month more of the taxpayers' money during the remaining seven months of the year.

Item No. 7 deals with ammunition and bombs. I do not know why in the last seven months of the year our expenses on ammunition and bombs should go up so high, but we find that in the first five months we spent $457,626 a month, while it is estimated that for the last seven months our expenditures will be $1,171,262. When the war will have been over with Germany for practically eleven months we propose to spend $1,000,000 a month more on bombs, and the taxpayers' money goes up in smoke.

We come now to item No. 8, which deals with mechanical transport and marine craft. There is a small decrease here. We spent $232,636 during the first five months, on an average, and it is to be the magnificent sum of $198,336 in the last seven months, a decrease of $34,300 a month.

Then we come to an amazing figure, item No. 9.

That deals with fuel costs for aircraft and marine transport and marine craft. In the first five months of the year we spent an average of $1,203,940 a month, and it is estimated that the expenditure for the last seven months will reach the colossal total of $2,618,239 a month, an increase of $1,414,299 a month.

It is generally known in this country, and certainly it is known to members of this house, that the air training scheme was cancelled many months ago, and that was the branch of the air force where great amounts of gasoline and fuel were used. We did not have that expenditure in the last part of this year, but at the same time costs are to go up for this one item for the remainder of the year, $1,413,299 a month. We talk of social services and wonder where we shall get the money, and still we spend money like this. This money, in my opinion, could be much better spent in providing social services.

We come now to item No. 10, aircraft engines. In the first five months we spent $5,040,827 a month, and in the last seven months we propose to spend $6,668,141, or an increase of $1,627,314 a month. When the aircraft is on the way out we propose to spend more money on maintenance of engines and such things, when we shall not have half the personnel. The whole thing does not add up.

We come now to item No. 11, miscellaneous stores and equipment. In the first five months we spent $481,626, and in the last seven months we propose to spend $565,269 a month, or an increase of $83,000 a month.

In items Nos. 12 and 13 there are substantial decreases. One deals with the suspension of training operations and flying contracts, and the second deals with maintenance of overseas squadrons.

Item No. 14, the sundries item, is the one about which the hon. member for Nanaimo spoke. We spent an average of $225,919 a month in the first five months, and we propose to spend $428,924 on these sundry items in the last seven months, or an increase of $203,005. At a time when the force is rapidly disappearing our sundry expenses are doubled.

It is interesting to take the total war expenditures given on page 549 of Hansard, showing $920,016,936 for the first five months, whereas for the last seven months it is proposed to spend $1,063,167,252. Worked out, this would show that the whole of the government departments of defence will make a saving for the last seven months of the year at the rate of $32,122,351 a month. At a time when we have been spending billions, and when, with the end of the war in Europe, our expenses for shells and fuel, transportation, and to a large extent equipment, came practically to an end—because the government cancelled a lot of contracts—we find that for the last seven months of the year the savings to taxpayers will not exceed much more than $1 million a day.

How is the Minister of Finance to bring about a reduction in taxation? How will he bring in all these social services unless we as members of this house do our duty, the duty which the people expect us to do, namely, to scrutinize to the last dollar every cent we vote in this house.

I should like to give warning to the ministers, especially the defence ministers, that we intend to scrutinize these estimates down to the last dollar. We want to know month by month how many men were in the services at the first of the month and how many were out by the end of the month, how many planes were being flown at the beginning of the month and how many at the end of the month, so that we can see whether the expenditures are warranted or not.

The Minister of Finance in bringing down these figures the other day could not have studied them very well. At page 548 of Hansard the minister is reported to have said:

> Moreover, it will be noted that the amount required for the latter half of this year is very much less than that required for the first half, even though many of the expenditures to be made in the latter half were really incurred during the period of fighting.

With the mass of figures that I have given the committee to-night, I ask whether that statement of the Minister of Finance is an honest one, because it certainly is not borne out by the figures as presented to the house. I have said it before, and I am going to repeat it, that I can see no evidence in this department of government of any attempt to try to improve the situation that faces the people of Canada to-day. The people are paying enormous taxes, and it is the duty of every government official, whether he be an army officer, an airforce officer or a naval officer, or in whatever department of government he happens to be, to see to it that the people get value for the dollars that the government extracts from them. If we continue along the way we are going there will be no dollars to get. I should like to ask the Minister of Finance—he is not in his place at the moment—how he proposes to ease the burden of taxation, as he mentioned many times during the election? How does he propose to do that, unless he gets co-operation from the departments of government, and unless they give us good government with rigid economy so that the people will get value for the dollars spent? The people of Canada will put up money for victory bonds for just so long. I wonder whether the Minister of Finance is satisfied to go into the hole all the time and to keep on borrowing. If that is what he intends to do I think we should fight him. We cannot keep on borrowing, but it appears that is what we shall have to do.

I should like to close my remarks by reminding the minister again that we propose to examine his estimates as we propose to examine the estimates of every department of government. We are not going to vote millions of dollars in a few minutes just to please the government side of the house. This time we are going to have an explanation for the money we spend. Everybody knows that we must raise this money; everybody knows that since the war our national debt has increased enormously. Those of us who are business men—and it does not matter what the size of the business may be—know that there are only two ways in which the government can get this money, namely, by taxation or by borrowing. There must be a tax rate that the people are able to pay. If there is that tax rate there must be a pool from which those taxes can be extracted. I ask the government to have regard to the conditions of the pool where you and I and the average individual in Canada have our money to-day. If the government have regard to that they should see that they do not dry up that pool too quickly.

I am serious when I say this. I believe the Minister of National Defence for Air should stop this debate now, take his estimates back and have them rewritten, because I think they are an insensible bunch of figures to be produced in the house and to ask us to vote. I believe the minister should ask us to go on with some other business and should take these figures back to his high officials and have them reexamined.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I think I had better say something on the point raised by the hon. member who has just taken his seat.

Mr. MARSHALL: I should like to make a few comments before the minister speaks. I believe that the two hon. members who have spoken at great length have been working on the wrong premise from start to finish. At page 551 of Hansard of September 28 are to be found the estimates and the amount already granted. That does not necessarily mean the amount already spent. Consequently I believe, as I have already stated, that the premise upon which these hon. members have been spoken is incorrect. If I remember correctly, the government asked for two appropriations totaling somewhere in the neighbourhood of $2 billion, and the amount that was actually allotted or granted to the air service was $325 million. That amount has been broken down, but this first column does not mean that the amount was actually spent. Would the minister be good enough to break down for us at this time the amount that was actually spent during the first five months of the year out of the amount that we granted as an allocation up to the present time?

Mr. BRACKEN: I think the hon. member who has just sat down is referring to a table at page 551 of Hansard where there are three columns of figures. The first column is "amount already granted". The way I interpret that is that it covers the expenditures for five months and that the second column gives the extra amount which the minister expects will be required for the remaining seven months. Is that correct?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): When the original estimate was put in for this year we were allotted funds for five months, based on the estimates of the previous year. The fact that the average monthly expenditures for the last seven months of the year would appear to be greater than those in the first five months is no indication that our expenditures are increasing, as the hon. member for York South has suggested. When the accounts are actually paid, whether it be early or late in the year, is no indication that a considerable saving is not being made in the department throughout the whole fiscal year.

I have placed on the table, although I do not know whether copies have been distributed or not, a comparative statement showing the cash requirements for the year 1944-45, and also the cash requirements for the year 1945-46 for the various items. This table indicates the over-all saving which is being made in the whole fiscal year, and shows a reduction of some forty-six per cent in the requirements for this year. Of course in the early part of the year we had commitments for large expenditures; the war was by no means over. We had commitments which had to be paid. In many cases they were not paid for in the first five months of the year; consequently they are outstanding and will have to be paid in the second part. I think in dealing with these estimates by far the most satisfactory method is the one we have adopted in the past of dealing with them item by item, and getting an explanation on each item as we reach it, rather than for each hon. member to go through the whole list and deal with his criticism of the various items, without making any progress. If that meets with the approval of the committee I suggest that the Chairman call the items, one by one, and we can deal with them in rotation.

Mr. BRACKEN: With all deference to the minister, may I say that the other day the Minister of Finance gave us this statement of figures. I think the house ought to understand what they are supposed to mean. If the minister will look at page 551 of Hansard he will see what is perplexing the hon. members over here who raised the question, and what is in my mind. Does the first column not mean what the minister thought his requirements would be for the first five months of this year when the amount asked for was $2,000 million? Hon. members are entitled to think that is still what is meant. When the second column is put in, showing the dditional amount required to March 31, 1946, we are entitled to think that is what is required for the last seven months. That is what is the matter with the situation, and that is what these hon. gentleman have been discussing. Maybe the minister could make it clear; what do these columns mean? And if they do not mean anything, why were they given to us?

Mr. JACKMAN: What were they five-twelfths of?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): The first amount voted in the last session of the last parliament was five-twelfths of the requirements for the year, based on the estimates of the previous year. We had not got our estimates for this year ready at the time that that amount was voted.

Mr. MARSHALL: Could the minister tell us, for example, how much money has been actually spent during the first five months of this year on civil salaries and wages? Is the minister in a position to give us that information to-night, so that we can compare his figure with the figure which is shown at page 551 of Hansard, namely, $6,294,610?

The CHAIRMAN: The minister has suggested that the committee might consider the statement item by item. In previous years, before going into the items, a certain latitude has been allowed for general discussion. I am wondering if the general discussion has been completed.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

The CHAIRMAN: Then, would it be agreeable to hon. members to have the committee continue with the general discussion? This would not preclude the asking of questions of the minister. When the general discussion is over we could consider the items individually.

Mr. MARSHALL: In order to guide the discussion along the proper lines I think it is necessary for us to clear up the point as to what the three columns on page 551 of Hansard actually mean.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I should like to give the committee that information. The amount required for the whole year for civil salaries and wages is $12,094,320. The amount voted for the first five months of the year was $6,522,000, and what was actually expended amounted to $6,294,610.

Mr. MARSHALL: Then the figures at page 575 are not correct. The second set of figures the minister gave did not correspond with the figures found at page 575.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): The $6,522,000 was the money voted. The amount shown as being already granted is the amount that has been released by the treasury board from the amount voted.

Mr. MARSHALL: That cannot be correct, because if hon. members will look at page 551 they will find that the total amount we voted for the air force was $325,985,039. We find those same figures at page 549. Under the heading "air services" we find those exact figures. Then, right at the bottom of page 573 is a figure of $2 billion, the amount of the apportionment for the first five months of the year.

Mr. BRACKEN: If I might make a suggestion, I think the minister could clear this up. As I see it, the first column is the allocation of the portion of the $2 billion that was allowed the airforce for these special items. The minister has indicated that he has the actual expenditures for those five months under each of those headings. I suggest that the committee ought to have the actual expenditures under each of these headings for the whole estimates—not only for the estimates that are here, but the actual expenditures from one end to the other in connection with all these estimates.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): The actual expenditures are available for four months. The amount released by the treasury board is for five months. However, I can tell the committee the actual expenditures under each item for four months.

Mr. BRACKEN: If the minister could do that it would help the committee.

Mr. MACDONNELL: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take the time of the committee for only a very few moments, not to discuss figures, but to discuss a principle. I wish to refer to the request made the other day by the hon. member for Vancouver South, which was supported by the hon. member for Nanaimo, a request which I thought was a very reasonable one. It was simply this, that in discussing the items for any of the services we should, if possible, have before us a statement for all the services.

So far as I know that request has never been referred to. It struck me as reasonable, and I should have thought that the common courtesy which is usually practised in this chamber would result in some reference to it. If it is impossible to have that done we should have been told why it was impossible. The reason for it seems to me to be this, that in a consideration of two or three departments which are so closely inter-related it would be desirable to know how they are inter-related, and it would enable us better to scrutinize expenditures. What did we, in fact, get to-night from the Minister of National Defence for Air? We got a statement which made us all very proud of what had happened during the last war. Secondly, we got a statement of the strength of the air force in the future. But we did not get any statement of the strategic position. We did not get any statement, so far as I know, of our relations with our allies, either within the empire or outside it, or with the United States.

We got no statement of the strategic position at all. There was only some reference to our position in North America, up near the north pole, and a reference to certain physical difficulties which that caused in connection with radar. But I submit to the committee that when we look forward to the situation which we face, which in spite of our hopes from the united nations agreement, we all realize, is a very dangerous situation, I submit that we who are here now should not be left to think in a vacuum.

We are told that the airforce will be 10,000 in strength. But I have no way of knowing whether it should be 10,000, or whether it should be the 30,000, which the hon. gentleman who did not make the speech last night is reported to have said.

I should like to submit with great deference —to the Minister of Reconstruction that we who are in this chamber are being very much put into the position into which a group of business men are put if someone came to them and offered them a proposition whereby they are asked to subscribe a large sum of money to a company. Then they are told that this company has close associations with another company, but are not told anything about what those associations may be. In the same way we are told nothing about the business of our enterprise; we are not told what its operations cover; we are not told what its objectives are to be, but we are just asked to put up a large amount of money, and to put it up blindly.

The estimate we are now discussing runs into something like $600 million, and in Muskoka-Ontario we think that is a lot of money. I am sure the Minister of Reconstruction would not put any such proposition before any group of business men to whom he might be trying to sell business; and I submit it should not be put up to us in that way.

I remember hearing the hon. member for Macleod saying the other day—and I greatly regretted hearing him saying it—that we ordinary members were just ciphers, and counted for nothing. I hope that it is not going to be true. We are being asked to act and to vote large sums of money without the slightest idea of what we are doing. As has been already suggested, I suggest with great deference and respect that these figures should be taken back. I do not say this because I want to argue about $5 or $10 here or there, but because I feel that when I come to vote hundreds of millions of dollars I should be given some intelligible basis for why it is being done.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall we consider the first item agreed to?

Mr. MERRITT: I waited until you rose, Mr. Chairman, hoping that the minister was going to reply to the many demands or requests that have been made in connection with this matter. I do not think the present situation is a new one. I believe it is connected with the situation raised during the last few days by the hon. member for Lake Centre and the hon. member for Kamloops. I think the present procedure is exactly in line with what they were complaining about. Like the hon. member for Macleod, I do not wish to be a cipher in this committee. I agree with what the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario said and I had the same thought before he voiced it. If this broad statement could not be given by one of the ministers of national defence, then I think it would be only a courtesy to this committee to tell us the reasons why a statement could not be made.

I do not believe the committee will be satisfied until the minister has considered that request. Everyone in the committee and everyone in the country knows it was a reasonable request. It is being commented upon from time to time by the press and I think it is time it was done. If the minister cannot make a statement he should explain why he could not give us a statement even in its more narrow aspects. This is a matter upon which the minister certainly can speak. I should like to refer briefly to some points upon which I have not been enlightened and upon which I think I should be enlightened if I am to vote sensibly upon these resolutions.

I have one short observation to make with regard to money. Along with other hon. members, I am concerned over the size of this vote, but I am concerned also about another fact. I want to know how much of this vote is for war purposes and how much will be used for a peace-time airforce. That is a very important matter. We are starting off with a great revolution in our airforce, and from the amount of money that is voted in the ensuing year we shall know what kind of airforce we shall have. The amount the government is providing this first year will give us a key to its intentions. We shall know from that what efficiency we may expect from our peace-time airforce.

Putting aside the question of money, I should like to refer to a few other things I expected to hear from the minister. We have been told that the airforce is going to be a force of 15,000 to 20,000 men. We got one little crumb out of his statement, that two of the eight Pacific heavy bomber squadrons are to be maintained. We are told that the remainder of the air force will be made up of bombers, fighters and transport planes. I do not suppose there is an hon. member who would not have known that even if the minister had not told it. Really all we know about this airforce, apart from the occupational force, is that we are going to have two heavy bomber squadrons. I hope we shall not learn of the specific size of our airforce from the newspapers to-morrow morning. We have not had it here to-night. So much for the specific size and the number of squadrons which give us some idea of what we may expect in the future.

There are many more matters to be considered. For instance, there is the question of policy. Is this force to be an operational force, plus a training force, or is it to be what it was before the war, a training force only? That is an important question and I am surprised that the minister did not tell us.

I go on again to mention a few other items. The minister mentioned the size of the regular force and told us there was to be an interim airforce for which people will be allowed to volunteer. This committee and the country want to know whether volunteers are coming forward for this interim airforce. We want to know the success he has had to date in getting recruits for this force, the name of which would drive away almost any recruit. It is a most unhappy name and I suggest to the minister that he change it.

Then we want to know if it is part of the policy to maintain a paratroop training field with the necessary aircraft suitable for that purpose. We have heard a great deal about the atomic bomb and we have heard about rocket and V weapons which are capable of shooting several thousands of miles. No one can say what the effect of that kind of thing will be. If I were charged with any responsibility in this matter I know that one of the things I would require would be paratroops who could be sent back to deal with the points from which these weapons are launched. That would be the best possible defence in the world against the atomic bomb or anything like that which might be in the hands of the enemy.

If we do not go on with paratroop training we shall be omitting one of the most vital things necessary in cooperation between the airforce and the army in any future war. I do not suggest that we have thousands of paratroops or that we have a large establishment, but I think the minister should give us some idea as to what arrangements are being made for th ecarrying on of this type of training. Perhaps he intends to discontinue it for a short time, and perhaps he can indicate to us that within ten months or a year it is the intention of the government to start again with this training.

The minister mentioned that the auxiliary airforce was to be set up again and I was pleased indeed that that is to be the case. Many of us remember the auxiliary airforce that existed before this war. For many years they used Tiger Moths, and it was only in the immediate months before the war that they had any operational type of aircraft. We should like to know from the minister how these auxiliary squadrons are to be equipped. Is preliminary training only to be given so that when war breaks out it will take months before they can become operational, or are aircraft to be supplied which are suited to their skills so that the force will be ready at once, as was the R.A.F. auxiliary during the Battle of Britain, to step right in and meet any threatened danger?

Before I sit down I would ask the minister to make a general statement upon this question, or if he would prefer it, although I do not want to do so, I would be prepared to ask him specific question after specific question until we obtain the information which I believe the committee is desirous of getting. I am not prepared to go on with any of these items until I hear from the minister as to the substance of this airforce and, as the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario said, I am not prepared to go on in a complete and perfect vacuum. Here is a test of the charges that were laid at the door of the government the other day of legislating by order in council. Here is a request that they can easily grant, a request that commends itself to every member of the house. There are two ways of doing this business. One is to sit like an oyster and rely upon the majority to vote everything through. The other is the way which I am sure would commend itself more to all of us, namely, for the minister to stand before his peers in this house to whom he is directly responsible as the people's representatives and tell us what we wish to know, not because he must, but because he wants to take us into his confidence so that we may discharge our duties in an intelligent manner. I offer that alternative to the minister and I should be glad to hear from him upon the points I have raised.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. MERRITT: I sat down expecting the minister to make a reply.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I would be very glad to reply now if hon. members would give me the opportunity.

Mr. MacINNIS: Before the minister replies, may I say that I think we are at cross-purposes. I do not see these estimates in the way that my hon. friends see them. I may be wrong, but, if so, I should like to be shown. That we are considering these estimates when the year is half-way through instead of at the beginning of the year is on account of the peculiar circumstances this year. If we were discussing these estimates last March or last April, we would have before us the estimates for a whole war year, and the government would give us—at least we would ask for it—all the material that was available to enable us to compare the expenditures this year with those of last year. When these estimates were prepared, if I understand aright, they were prepared for a war year. But now the war is ended, and part of the estimates cover that part of the year when we were at war and the remainder are required for the demobilization period and for the maintenance of whatever forces may be retained after demobilization takes place.

What my hon. friends are asking for now is something that could be asked for with a great deal of force when the house meets at the next session, but it does not seem to me possible that they can reasonably ask for or get the information they have been asking for to-night, because I doubt very much whether in the United States or in the United Kingdom or in any other country governments have their plans completely prepared for the armed forces that will be required between now and the next war, which we hope will never happen, or that this government is in a position to know just what forces will be necessary to keep our share of the peace in the new international order that is to be set up. I think that is the situation.

I can see no great difficulty in dealing with these estimates. The minister can tell the committee what the expenditures were in the four months or so for which he has an accounting of the five or six months for which we granted an appropriation. As to the remainder of the year he can, in my opinion, give the committee only a fairly approximate estimate of what will be required for the demobilization of the forces that are to be demobilized and for the forces that will have to be maintained. I do not think we should play with this thing. It is too important. If we do play with it, we shall be kept here and be unable to carry on the work for which this parliament was brought together.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, there are two things to consider. There is the question of audit, and the question of the use of the airforce. In two days the session will have lasted a month. The discussion that has taken place to-night has been the most informative since the beginning of the session, and I congratulate all the members who have spoken. I congratulate the hon. member for Nanaimo upon his change of tone He is older in years than I am but younger in parliamentary experience, and I may tell him that a speech like the one he made to-night will carry him much farther than his first speech in this house.

During the war I looked at the estimates and I was not satisfied with them. I spoke of that to some business men, who could not understand them. I had the support of my very dear friend the hon. member for Davenport, one of the pillars of the Conservative party before he became a Progressive Conservative.

Mr. MacNICOL: I surely have not slipped since, have I?

Mr. POULIOT: A pillar, a great man and a great explorer. Also my very dear friend the hon. member from Broadview, who has done more for the city of Toronto than any other living man. Those two hon. gentlemen supported my contention, and there were even editorials in the Ottawa Journal and in the Vancouver Sun to the effect that the views expressed by those hon. gentlemen were sound. What we suggested was that there should be a detailed account of the expenditures, and that simply because we were spending billions of dollars instead of hundreds of millions was no reason why we should not have vouchers. The point was, to build vaults if the ones which existed at the time were not large enough to contain all that stationery. The argument we made was that it was essential to the business of good government that everything should appear in the public accounts. Even though no one looked at them it was a protection, because those who handled the business would have known that anyone in this country, any man belonging to any party, could have found the details of expenditures in the public accounts. We carried on the fight; we were lone warriors—a Grit with two Conservatives—and we succeeded in getting something. I remember that one of the members for Lambton—Lambton-Kent, I think it was—asked the Minister of Finance if it was upon his suggestion that there had been a change in respect of the public accounts, and he said, "No; I am answering the member for Temiscouata." That is a long time ago. The hon. members for Davenport and Broadview and myself foresaw then what is happening to-day. During wartime very few members had the courage of their convictions about the public accounts. They forgot that the troubles we had in this country one hundred years ago about parliamentary government were on the question of dollars and cents; at that time it was pence and shillings. When it comes to public accounts there is not a citizen in Canada who has not the right to know how the money which comes from the taxes is spent. We fought that fight because we did not want parliamentary institutions to fall into disrepute; we wanted parliament to stand high in the minds of all Canadian citizens. That is the first point.

Of course the sound minds of so many gifted Canadians were blurred in time of war. Their conceptions of the true duties of a member of parliament were clouded, and they thought it was patriotism to vote money blindly. That is what happened. I do not blame the government for that; I blame the whole membership of the house, excepting a few, for having fallen so low through prejudice and passion as to forget the elementary duties of members of parliament. What the new members who were not parties to those debates and discussions are saying now is in fact an arraignment of the past. But they cannot blame the government for that. They may blame Arthur Meighen and R. B. Hanson and all the others who have been leaders of the Conservative party, just as they may blame the leaders of the Liberal party. But my hon. friends of the other groups cannot complain either, because they themselves fell in the trap. Was I not alone in denouncing from my place in the house a man who was connected with big business in Montreal, when he was running the Department of National Defence, and I said that he was a tool of international finance. My hon. friends of the Social Credit group, where were they? Discussing theories. They remind me of the fellow who drives his car and, seeing an obstacle in the way, instead of getting out to remove the obstacle and put it in the ditch, rises in his car and makes a speech to the obstacle: "O obstacle, disappear from my sight; let me proceed farther." They think their eloquence is so powerful that the log or stone will roll into the ditch. They are afraid to call a humbug by name.

Mr. FAIR: The hon. member voted for the "obstacle", did he not?

Mr. POULIOT: Pardon me. Oh, I will describe to my hon. friend the obstacle I had. He came from Montreal; he was a Social Crediter; he was running in Temiscouata county, and he spent half of his time in canvassing in a neighbouring county thinking he was in Temiscouata. His address is Holy Grace street, Ville Marie, Montreal. He went back to Montreal, and we have not seen him in Temiscouata county. But he lost his deposit five or perhaps ten times over; I do not know.

Well, now, hon. members see what it is. My hon. friend who has just spoken is just as gifted as are all the sons of Erin, the emerald of the sea, the island of the saints. But the question is not who is gifted. I concede that my hon. friend is more gifted than I am. But when I was carrying on that fight I was alone; I was alone with two Tories.

Mr. COLDWELL: That too is reminiscent of the emerald isle.

Mr. POULIOT: We were fighting for responsible government, which dates back a long time before good Canadians were divided into Liberals and Conservatives. We were fighting for the principles for which my great-grandfather fought and voted, when he supported the ninety-two resolutions and afterwards helped Robert Baldwin after his fight in York to be elected in Rimouski. The principles for which my grandfather fought and my father fought are the principles for which I have been fighting. The question for me is not so much what happened in the past, but what is happening now and what will happen in the future. There is no use in crying over spilt milk. Everybody is responsible, and the important point is not to perpetuate the argument between those whom Swift—not Swift of the Canada Packers, but Swift the author—called the Big Endians and the Little Endians.

The minister now in charge of the department took it over after the conclusion of the war, and he inherited a very heavy legacy. I cannot understand why a greater tribute was not paid to Doctor Cyrus Macmillan, who was the back-bone of the department for air, for all the good which was done during the time that he was parliamentary assistant. A fine man, most unassuming and devoted to his task, he also honoured himself as chairman of most difficult committees like those on reconstruction and veterans affairs. He was making no noise but he was doing the work nevertheless. He was not alone, however, because there were others in the department, one of them in a swivel-chair, occupying the highest post, a group captain or a squadron leader. At any rate, he occupied the highest post although he was a man of no military training except for a Cook's tour of fifteen days in England. But he is the big bug of the department now, the nigger in the woodpile, an intriguer of the worst kind, a man of the old regime. I tell the committee, and the country will know to-morrow, that the big bug of the former regime is still the nigger in the woodpile in the air department, or one of them. There are eighteen million negroes in the Belgian Congo and I do not know how many there are in the woodpile of the department. But there they are and here we are, and they are flying everywhere, flying to files, flying to the doors, flying everywhere, but flying in Ottawa. And they are omnipotent. They decide about the length of the war.

It is my deep conviction that if the example of that great man who, although unknown in Canada, is well known in Europe, General Henri Guisan, the commanding officer of Switzerland, has not been followed, there is a reason. What did General Henri Guisan do? In the month of August he decided to retire, because the war was over in Switzerland. But here it continued. It is impossible to get boys out of the airforce at the present time. There is one who was employed as a technician with the telephone company down home. He is sick; his health is bad. His family lives down there and he could be useful in the telephone company, but it is impossible to get him out of the airforce, where he does nothing, just on account of some commanding officer who wants to keep all his men around him to show how indispensable he is to the country. And we have to pay prebends to these parasites.

An hon. MEMBER: Brass hats.

Mr. POULIOT: I do not know whether he is a brass hat or not, but he is a parasite, and he is not alone. Here we see them in Ottawa, fellows with absolutely nothing to do, and girls who do nothing but who remain in the air force, because the number must be large enough to justify a continuance of the prebends to some big man, some big powerful man who has waged wars in Ottawa. They waged the war in Ottawa. Just before this war there were veterans of the South African war who were in office in Ottawa and who had waged also the first great war, and now they have been waging the second great war in Ottawa, not moving out of Ottawa. They do not travel on railways or in aeroplanes; they stick to their swivel-chairs. And they are heroes.

Well, sir, it is a serious matter, but there is a ridiculous side to it. Of course it is ridiculous to think of it. We are discussing two things at the same time. We are discussing the burden of taxation, but nobody uses the scissors in the right place to simplify our discussion. You know very well, Mr. Chairman, that so long as we have that large number of parasites in Ottawa and throughout the world—yes, I will say the world, because they are in Europe as well as in Canada—it will be impossible to reduce taxation. What struck me in the argument made by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario was this. Speaking as a business man, he said he did not understand the whole thing. I agree with him. I cannot understand it either.

We are, all of us, complaining of the burden of taxation, and we have reached the point where the people will not be willing to suffer taxation as we did during the war, now that the war is supposed to be over. There is not the same incentive to continue paying taxes, although we shall have the same amount of taxes to pay on account of the expenditures, and that has no raison d'être at all. The continuation of war expenditures for the sake of those who did not go to the war is incredible.

There are two classes of those who did not go to the war and there is one class that deserves less sympathy than all others. That is the class of those who did not go to any theatre of war but who thought it was their duty to send others there; and those fellows are heroes, mark you, because they remained here in Ottawa or Toronto or Montreal or Quebec city or Winnipeg or Vancouver. They were everywhere.

An hon. MEMBER: And they got decorations.

Mr. POULIOT: Surely, by sitting still in their swivel-chairs, and perhaps by turning a little. When they turned to the right they got a decoration and when they turned to the left they got another decoration, because they could not move, so that when they made the least move they deserved a decoration. At this stage of the discussion I challenge all my colleagues to defend the brass hats, but I do not think one will rise in their defence.

Now, sir, can it go on any longer like that? Is it possible for the Canadian people to continue paying taxes, the same amount of taxation, now that the war with Italy, Germany and Japan is over, just as when the war was going on? I cannot believe it. A very important thing was said to my hon. friend the member for Davenport, the hon. member for Broadview and myself, during the war when we were asking for more information, and that was, "Oh, it is a war secret." It was a war secret! Well, are there any more war secrets now in connection with these expenditures, now that the war is over? And these expenditures are the same, exactly the same as when the war was still on. No change was made in them because the brass hats made their calculations to stay as long as possible in office and to continue to be the hidden power behind the throne. That is all. It is no secret; everyone knows it. But does anyone dare to say it? It is the truth acknowledged by everybody, but nobody says anything about it because they may have a friend there or a cousin or an uncle or a brother-in-law; they may have a son; I do not know what, but they may have somebody close to them and they are afraid to condemn that silly practice, just to protect a few friends, or because they are afraid to speak. That is the point. The other day I was unfair to the hon. member for Royal; I was too quick. Sometimes it happens to me. I regret it very much, because I give him credit for being a faithful member of the house. Besides that I cannot forget that he helped me, along with the hon. member for Vancouver South, on the civil service committee. I do not wish to offend any hon. member. Sometimes when I use strong language it is because of the depth of my conviction.

But the time is coming in the very near future when there will be a readjustment of feeling and of mentality, not only throughout the country but perhaps in this house too. It will be the great divide. When I was sitting on the other side of the house I spoke of a union opposition composed of all the elements who were opposed to some fellows who were intriguers of the worst kind and who have since been discarded. I give credit to the Prime Minister for having discarded them. But now, sir, conditions are very serious in this country. The people think a lot, and deeply so. They are worried; they are worried about the future; and they make a distinction between those who are Liberals at heart, whatever their label may be, and those who have not the same understanding of things. I will not say any more about it tonight, but if it is necessary, and in the very near future, something may happen to be the occasion of that adjustment. All party labels may be discarded, may be thrown into the wastepaper basket, and there may be a readjustment not on party lines but on beliefs, on beliefs in the future of this country.

What is the privilege of a member of parliament? It is to be free; it is to be free of all ocular powers in Canada as well as anywhere else. The freedom of parliament is the most essential thing in this country. I consider it so important that I am ready to pass over many things that may displease me so as to find some ways and means to cut down that nefarious bureaucracy to a nonentity. Will it be done? I do not know, but it is a hard task. No one who considers the future of this country may see it in pink. The future is not rose; it is not pink. It will be very hard. We shall have to have the spirit of pioneers to meet our task.

Each member of parliament who was elected on June 11 knew very well that the future would be hard, difficult and most strenuous, and that the hills to climb toward prosperity in this country were very abrupt. It was done just the same. It showed that each member and each candidate—I pay the same tribute to the candidates who were running, except to the imports that came to Témiscouata from Montreal and Quebec city—most of those who were running, and each one of those who was elected faced the future. At the time of their nomination and at the time of their election they knew very well that we were pretty far away from some of the easy times we had known before the war and before the depression, the easy times that followed the first great war and until 1929; far from it. The future is hard, and it will require more courage on the part of hon. members to take the necessary steps to face the future for the benefit of this country than was required when they accepted the nomination sometime before June 11.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It will take intelligence too.

Mr. POULIOT: My hon. friend has it. I give credit to the hon. member for Lethbridge. He is liked by all hon. members. It is not so much a question of intelligence as of character, of determination, and of patriotism. That will be understood only by those who will not be ashamed or afraid to call Canada their country, and to call it their own country in the first place, and who will be good enough citizens to be proud to be good Canadians.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that I may not be able to maintain the high level of debate that has been set by the previous speaker. There are some answers that I should like to give to points raised by various hon. members. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard asked me if I would give some indication as to what forces we were planning in the post-war period. I did not mention it before. It was not that I was trying not to put all my eggs in one basket when I made the report, but I do hesitate to make any definite pronouncement as to what our post-war forces will be, because obviously we cannot determine at the present time what we shall be required to provide. We do not know what international commitments we may have, and what those commitments may require from this country. But at the same time we are working on plans that are subject to change from time to time. In connection with the airforce we are planning at the present time on the basis of ten squadrons, of which four would be bomber reconnaissance, two fighter, three transport, and one photo. In addition to that, we would have communications flights and possibly some other small number of flights of other types of planes.

It may be said that that is not a balanced force. On the other hand we have the auxiliary squadrons that are being planned. That, too, is subject to change because it has been considered that any auxiliary squadron that is to function adequately must have a proportion of permanent force personnel attached to it in order to maintain and care for the aircraft which are on charge with that squadron.

I would hope to have at least in the neighbourhood of twenty auxiliary squadrons. They would probably be fighter squadrons, or equipped with fighter aircraft to a large extent, and, of course, trainer aircraft as well, which would mean that we would not need as many fighter squadrons in our regular air-force in view of the fact that we would have fighter squadrons available from our auxiliary forces.

Then, of course, we have the reserve. I am not making any pronouncement as to what they will be called upon to do, or what we shall be able to do for them. I should like to see the reserve called up and given the opportunity for training each year. However, that is a matter to be decided in the future. I do not wish to be committed to any definite policy either as to auxiliaries or reserves until a considerably later day.

The hour is getting late, and I should like to mention again the question of figures, because it does not seem to me that some hon. members are clear as to what we have shown in the figures we have produced. As I said before, at the last session we got a supply vote of five-twelfths of the amount that had been voted in the previous year. All that money was not expended. While the five months supply that was voted amounted to $453,876,000, the amount that was released by treasury board was $325,985,039. All that amount was not actually paid out in cash, because a large amount of it is still on hand. But it was released by treasury board, and available to be paid out by the airforce.

Mr. HAZEN: Are the words "amount already granted" as they appear in the first column of page 573 incorrect?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): No. That has been granted by treasury board to the airforce; but that does not say that we have actually paid out that much money.

Mr. JACKMAN: How much is on hand?

[Mr. C. W. G. Gibson.]

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): For the four months the actual expenditure amounted to $196,965,237. But the point I wish to make clear is this, that there is no use in going on a month-to-month basis, and averaging out our expenditures according to the amount we have spent in five months of the year. I would suggest that hon. members, from the schedules I have placed on the table of the house, make a comparison of the expenditures or requirements for the year 1944-45 with the amount asked for this year.

In 1944-45 the actual amount was $1,090 million. This year we are asking for $598 million, which is, roughly speaking, about fifty-four per cent of what was voted in the previous year. Consequently, that is the comparison which should be made, and not the comparison as to what we were authorized to spend in five months, or what we actually spent in five months; because it is the overall commitment for the year that gives the indication as to whether we are actually saving money or whether we are being extravagant.

Mr. BRACKEN: What purpose is served by the first column on page 551 of Hansard?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): It just shows the amount released by treasury board to the department.

Mr. BRACKEN: It is no good to us.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): It just tangles us up.

Mr. BRACKEN: I think every hon. member wishes to help the minister to get ahead with his estimates, to a point where he can give us whatever information he has concerning his expenditures. A short time ago some hon. member asked if the minister had the expenditures for five months in connection with the first item, and the minister answered. Then he said at a later time that he had the expenditures only for four months. I suggest that if the minister has the actual expenditures for four months he should give them to us to-morrow. Perhaps that is all he has and all he can give us.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Possibly I can obtain them for five months. I have them with me for four months, and I shall try to-morrow to have them for five.

Mr. BRACKEN: If the minister could give us that, perhaps that is all he could give us.

Mr. FRASER: Mention has been made of the five months; but if the minister will look at items Nos. 9 and 10 he will see that in item No. 10 there is a reduction of $117,066,440 for aircraft, engines and spares, including overhauls. But in item No. 9, which covers fuel costs for aircraft, we find an increase of $4,455,341. In other words, this means that although the department has reduced its aircraft, engines and spares, and the overhauling of engines it is going to use or it has used about ten million more gallons of gasoline.

That does not gibe, and it is one reason why this statement does not work out, when viewed from a business basis. I suggest that to-morrow the minister should give us a proper break-down and tell us how many more aircraft he is using, the amount of gasoline used, and why it is necessary to have an extra ten million gallons of gasoline; because I think that is the way it works out. I believe the gasoline costs fifty cents a gallon, for the 100-octane rating. We should have a proper statement on this item, and on others. Those two do not seem to work out.

On October 22 the victory loan campaign is to be opened. I suggest that it would be to the advantage of the minister and the government to do everything possible to show the people of Canada that there is no waste. If the minister can do that I feel that every man here will go out in that campaign and help to put it over—because we cannot get along without the victory loan. We shall have to show the people just where their money is going.

We cannot ask questions on every item of the estimates to bring out all the facts. The minister should break this down, item by item.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): The increased fuel cost comes about solely because of methods which have been adopted for payment. During the time of the training agreements in Canada the fuel was being secured through lend-lease by Great Britain, and supplied by Great Britain as part of her contribution, so that we did not have to pay for it. Later on, there was a change in the method of providing fuel, and the cost of that item was consequently increased.

However, the actual consumption of gasoline in 1944-45 was 170,907,400 gallons. The estimated amount for 1945-46 is 66,278,800, showing a very great saving in the consumption of gasoline. The increase in that item is owing to the method adopted for payment.

That is why I should like to have the committee go through these items, one by one, so that explanations can be given in logical order. We would not have to go from one item to another and hop about without having full explanations of the various questions brought up. I should like to deal with each question fully when we come to each item.

Mr. FRASER: As I said before, items Nos 9 and 10 go together. That is why we should have extra information in a properly prepared statement. If the minister could prepare another statement for to-morrow it would help a great deal.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, October, 5, 1945.

The house met at three o'clock.

NATIONAL EMERGENCY

BILL TO CONFER CERTAIN POWERS UPON THE GOVERNOR IN COUNCIL

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 15, to confer certain powers upon the governor in council during the national emergency following the war.

He said: This is the bill to which I made some reference in my remarks to the house on Tuesday night. It is in terms somewhat similar to the War Measures Act although more limited in scope. It is designed to remain in force for one year only unless parliament should choose to extend it beyond that period.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Has the bill been printed?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

ALBERTA NATURAL RESOURCES

CONFIRMATION OF AGREEMENTS BETWEEN GOVERNMENT OF CANADA AND GOVERNMENT OF ALBERTA

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 16, to amend the Alberta Natural Resources Act.

He said: The purpose of this bill is to confirm the agreements between the government of Canada and the government of Alberta set out in schedules I and II.

Schedule I: The agreement in schedule I of the bill provides for the settlement of differences which have arisen between the dominion and the province as to the effect of the natural resources transfer agreement and the ownership and control of three developed power sites on the Bow river lying within or adjacent to the Stony Indian reserve. The three sites known as the Horseshoe, Kananaskis and Ghost sites were developed by the Calgary Power Company Limited and are being operated under authorizations issued by the dominion government in the years 1909, 1912 and 1929 respectively, when they were under exclusive dominion jurisdiction prior to the transfer of natural resources in 1930.

The agreement in schedule I provides that the land and water power at the two sites in which the Indian interest predominates, namely Horseshoe and Kananaskis, are to remain under dominion jurisdiction, while the Ghost site, where the provincial interest is substantial, shall be deemed to have passed to the province at the time of the transfer of the natural resources. The Minister of Mines and Resources will issue all three licences which are to replace the existing authorization and will continue to administer the Horseshoe and Kananaskis developments, while the province will be responsible for administration of the Ghost development as soon as the final licence is issued.

Schedule II: Under the Alberta Natural Resources Transfer Act, 1930, certain public shooting grounds and bird sanctuaries were preserved. Many of them have now dried up or are otherwise unsuitable for the purposes for which they were originally set aside. The agreement in schedule II provides that these reservations may be cancelled by agreement between the two responsible ministers concerned with the approval of the governor in council and the lieutenant-governor in council

Concurrent legislation by the dominion parliament and the legislature of Alberta will be necessary.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

RECONSTRUCTION AND SUPPLY

ESTABLISHMENT OF DEPARTMENT TO ASSUME FUNCTIONS OF RECONSTRUCTION AND MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present to the house a bill to establish a department of government under a minister of the crown to be known as the Department of Reconstruction and Supply to which will be transferred the functions of the Department of Reconstruction and the Department of Munitions and Supply, and that provision be made in the bill for the appointment of a deputy minister and officers, clerks and employees of the department.

He said: His Honour the Deputy Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

THANKSGIVING DAY ADJOURNMENT

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved:

That when this house adjourns this day, it stand adjourned until Tuesday the 9th instant.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSING

INQUIRY AS TO USE OF AVAILABLE MILITARY CAMPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. O. BREITHAUPT (Waterloo North): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence which is definitely related to a national housing emergency, particularly as it relates to returning service personnel.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. When a question is put on the orders of the day the hon. member is not allowed to make a statement. The question must be brief and to the point.

Mr. BREITHAUPT: I will put the question now. In view of the very serious housing situation in the city of Kitchener and other towns and cities throughout Canada, is it the intention of the Department of National Defence to adopt a policy of making military camps throughout the country available for urgent housing accommodation as and when these camps are closed for military purposes? What is being done in the case of No. 1 C.W.A.C. camp at Kitchener?

Mr. HUGUES LAPOINTE (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member sent to me in the absence of the Minister of National Defence a copy of his question.

The Department of National Defence is doing all possible to render army camps available for civilian housing, subject to continuing requirements of the army for demobilization. The district officers commanding have been authorized in the event of an emergency to place vacant army buildings at the disposal of civil authorities. This measure is of a temporary and emergency nature only.

From the long term viewpoint whenever a camp becomes surplus to requirements this department takes immediate steps to declare the buildings surplus to the crown assets allocation committee, which has jurisdiction in the matter of reallocation of accommodation between government departments or agencies or for disposal through War Assets Corporation. At the time of declaration of surplus this department brings to the attention of crown assets allocation committee any requests for accommodation by civil authorities or private individuals.

With particular reference to the C.W.A.C. T.C. at Kitchener, the district officer commanding military district No. 1 has been instructed to make any vacant accommodation available to the city of Kitchener in the event of an emergency, as I have just mentioned.

The training centre is being disbanded at 31st October, 1945, and will be declared surplus to requirements immediately, and crown assets allocation committee will then be in a position to make any final arrangements for the future use of the camp, either directly or through War Assets Corporation.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask the parliamentary assistant, if the answer he has just given the hon. member for Waterloo North (Mr. Breithaupt), with regard to the use of government or war-time buildings for emergency housing in congested cities, or in communities in which housing conditions are acute, applies also to Toronto, where the housing situation is nothing short of appalling.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I was informed by the officers of the department that the district officers commanding all military districts had been given authority to make available all vacant accommodation.

QUESTION AS TO PRIORITIES ON BUILDING MATERIALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): The question I am about to ask I do not expect to be answered to-day, because I did not have an opportunity to present it to the Minister of Reconstruction before now. It is a matter which has been raised before. I raise it with all deference, because we are receiving so many representations with respect to it. It has to do with priorities on building materials.

As a member of parliament—and I think this applies to all members of the house—I am receiving urgent representations from business concerns, suppliers of building materials and other individuals desiring to build, or to complete construction of, or to repair, their own houses. The chief source of grievance in these representations is that because of priorities in favour of Wartime Housing Limited, bottle-necks are being created in the building trades. The fear exists that unless some early and reasonable modification is made in the present code of priorities, the purpose of their existence will be defeated and will have the effect of shutting off large sections of private enterprise from the building field. In view of the urgency of this matter, I would like to ask the Minister of Reconstruction if not necessarily now but at the earliest possible date, he would make a statement to this house as to the advisability of making some reasonable modification in present building material priorities.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): There is a great misconception about the matter of priorities. In so far as I am aware, there are no priorities in building materials. There seems to be a theory that we have large stocks of building materials frozen or tied up in warehouses.

I received notice a short time ago of a question. The question was not asked, but I had the answer here. Perhaps it is typical of the situation. The question stated:

> Approximately 700 houses now under construction by private persons or contractors of which 174 are for veterans. This is in addition to houses already completed. Meantime materials furnished for Wartime Housing will not be used for some months and are lying in warehouses while houses under construction by private contractors cannot be finished for lack of priorities on materials furnished for Wartime Housing.

That referred to Calgary. The situation was investigated. The situation regarding the Wartime Housing project in Calgary is this: The roofing, shingles, rock wool and mill-work have all been ordered and are in various stages of process and shipment. Four cars of lumber are on hand and sufficient rough plumbing to build the first twenty houses. Concrete is being poured at the rate of four houses per day. There is, therefore, no hold-up in the project, and the material on hand and in process is definitely not too far advanced for the progress being made.

In other words, Wartime Housing orders material for delivery to fit the completion of the work. No stocks of material are being held by Wartime Housing. Wartime Housing deals on a mass production basis and buys its material in carload lots, which gives it an advantage over the private contractor. Of course it buys wholesale, which is not particularly popular with the local dealers. It has of course the advantage of building a large number of houses which are constructed from the same plans, and also the large-scale buying of a number of identical articles which arises out of that advantage.

I may say also that it is in the unfortunate position of furnishing an excellent alibi for those who do not plan as well as Wartime Housing in the carrying out of their projects, and of that fact advantage is being taken. I do not think there is a house building organization in this country which has not written me that it cannot carry on because Wartime Housing is building; but I think hon. members will hardly regard it as reasonable that Wartime Housing should modify its procedure on that account.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is there actually no priority in respect of veterans' houses over the private building of houses—in this city, for example?

Mr. HOWE: There are no priorities.

Mr. COLDWELL: I have been told by people who asked for lumber that they could not get lumber because of the priority on veterans' houses.

Mr. HOWE: In the case of lumber it is wholly untrue.

Mr. TUSTIN: I wish to ask a question relating to the same matter. I have had several complaints recently from retail lumber dealers who claim that there is a priority operating in the wholesale market and that they cannot purchase these goods to distribute to retailers. Is there any priority given to Wartime Housing in the wholesale trade?

Mr. HOWE: Wartime Housing does its purchasing wholesale. It has the advantage of being a large buyer in the wholesale market which the ordinary house builder does not have. Wartime Housing has the advantage of buying on a large scale.

Mr. JACKMAN: Unfair competition.

Mr. HOWE: Nevertheless I may say to my hon. friend that I presume the purpose of all this is to get houses for veterans, and Wartime Housing is building houses for veterans.

Mr. TUSTIN: Only in some centres.

[Mr. Howe.]

MEAT RATIONING

SPECIAL ADVISORY COMMITTEE OF RETAIL DEALERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I have two questions to direct to the ministry on subjects that have been raised before, but which I now with all deference raise again. One is to the Minister of Finance and the other to the Minister of Reconstruction. I would ask the Minister of Finance what changes in meat rationing have been recommended by the retail meat advisory committee, and what is the attitude of the government in respect to these recommendations.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I can read a statement in reply to the question. It is a bit long and I dislike reading long statements on the orders of the day, but probably there is no help for it.

In replying to the question of the hon. leader of the opposition, of which he was kind enough to give me notice, I should like to say just a word, in the first place, about the position and function of the wartime prices and trade board's advisory committees. The board has about two hundred voluntary advisory committees across the country with which it consults from time to time on problems relating to their particular sections or levels of a trade or industry. It has always been clearly understood both by the board's officials and by the members of these advisory committees that all discussions and exchanges of views at such meetings are confidential. This is because premature or partial disclosure of suggestions relating to possible changes in board regulations would often be confusing or misleading, and also because the board must necessarily accept full responsibility for all administrative decisions reached.

However, in view of the considerable interest in the house and in the country in matters relating to meat rationing, it may perhaps be regarded as not improper if I make a brief statement in reply to the question asked by the hon. leader of the opposition.

I should like to make it clear that there are four or five advisory committees to the board which have a definite interest in meat rationing, from the primary producer right through to the retail meat dealer. During the past three or four weeks the board has been in renewed consultation with all these committees, and in addition the board has received a great many communications suggesting particular modifications in the rationing system. All the views and suggestions have been carefully considered by the senior officers of the board and by the technical rationing officials.

Among its advisory committees the board has had for nearly four years both a national and regional retail advisory committees, but not a national advisory committee composed solely of retail meat dealers. At the conclusion of its meeting with the large retail meat dealers' delegation on September 19 the board invited the Retail Merchants' Association of Canada to nominate a special advisory committee of representative retail meat dealers with which the board could confer from time to time on matters relating to meat rationing. This invitation was accepted and the first meeting of the committee took place on Wednesday of this week.

I should like to make it clear that this was a meeting of the board and an advisory committee, and not a meeting with a delegation that came to present a case. The nature of the meeting was a review of the system of meat rationing in the light of three weeks' experience, and in the course of the discussions, which lasted through the entire day, many suggestions were made by members of the committee and many practical problems were fully discussed. On some of the points put forward there was fairly general agreement, on others there appeared to be a majority view; still other suggestions appeared to relate more particularly to local situations. And the same kind of discussions took place in the meetings with the other advisory committees mentioned above.

Perhaps the most generally held view among the retailers was that such cooked meats as bologna, weiners, meat loaves and jellied meats should be off the ration. The position of the board is that it is not possible to accept this suggestion and still stay within the target of 130-135 pounds per capita consumption. Under our earlier system of meat rationing two years ago most of these cooked meats were off the ration, with the result that during the ten months of rationing their current rate of production nearly doubled, from an estimated rate of about 100,000,000 pounds a year to a rate of nearly 200,000,000 pounds a year. If these cooked meats were off the ration, the board would have to place rigid and complicated quota controls limiting all production at the source, and would also have to reduce the so-called "red meat" coupon values in order to stay within the over-all meat consumption target. This would be even more objectionable to both the secondary meat processors and the retail trade.

The board is, however, taking steps to revise the coupon values of most of these cooked meats, and assuming that they cannot be ration free, this appears the most acceptable alternative to all interested sections of the trade.

The next most general subject of comment by the members of the retail committee was that coupon values for some cuts of meat appear not to be accurately matched with consumer buying preferences, with the result that some cuts of meat appear less readily saleable. On these points there appeared to be a considerable variation in actual experience between individual butchers and between districts. Some members reported little difficulty along these lines, others reported a good deal of difficulty.

The board is carefully reviewing all these detailed suggestions, and while it will take a few days to work out the technical adjustments, I am able to say that the board will be making changes in the coupon values of several of these items which will go quite a long way in meeting the consensus of views developed with the retail advisory committee.

I cannot be precise as to the details or as to the date upon which these changes will go into effect. It will take a few days to work out the details, but I am informed by the board that they will be advertised in the press and in effect by the middle or at the latest the end of next week. Reprints of the revised and consolidated ration charts will be distributed as soon as possible, probably within a couple of weeks.

Perhaps I should add a word about the use of "tokens". The decision to make use of tokens was made in the light of very numerous and widespread expressions of opinion by the retail trade and consumers during the rationing period two years ago, when the need for some sort of "small change" for coupons became apparent. While there are some places where the use of tokens still appears to be something of a difficulty, I think it is now reasonably clear that retail meat dealers in most parts of Canada are finding them a very acceptable improvement in the mechanics of rationing.

Mr. BRACKEN: I thank the minister for this very full statement.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STRIKE AT FORD MOTOR PLANT, WINDSOR

On the orders of the day:

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Last evening just before the dinner recess I was unavoidably absent from the house when questions were directed to the Minister of Labour. I took note of them, however, and would like to answer them now.

The hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Brown) asked:

Can the Minister of Labour inform this house as to developments in the proceedings with respect to the strike at the Ford Motor Company plant at Windsor, and other threatened strikes?

My reply is that there is no change in the situation. The union concerned has not altered its attitude towards the company's objection that its officers are not willing to enter a conference with union representatives and the ministers of labour for the dominion and the province, while the union persists in its policy of picketing the main office of the company and preventing its officers and clerical staff from gaining access thereto. The position of the company has been made known to the officers of the union, and the union's reply thereto was transmitted to the company.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) asked:

In view of the gravity of the strike situation at Windsor, will the government or the minister consider the immediate appointment of a controller to take charge of the Ford plant and resume production there pending the negotiation of an agreement between the parties?

My reply is: It is the opinion of the department of labour of the Ontario government, which is in the direct line of responsibility, as well as the Department of Labour of the dominion government, that the plan of bringing the parties together is the one which has the best hope of successful conclusion of the work stoppage.

THREATENED PACKING PLANT STRIKE IN VANCOUVER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine) asked:

Has the minister been advised of a possible packing plant strike in Vancouver, and if that is an imminent danger what has he done or what does he propose to do to settle the grievance before the strike takes place.

My reply to this question is: I have been informed of a feeling of unrest on the part of packing house workers in Vancouver because the regional war labour board for British Columbia has rejected an application for increased wage rates and a shorter work week. Proceedings on appeal before the national war labour board have just been instituted by the union.

FUEL SHORTAGE IN WESTERN CANADA—ALBERTA AND BRITISH COLUMBIA COAL MINERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. ROSS THATCHER (Moose Jaw): Has the attention of the Minister of Labour been drawn to the acute fuel shortage which is reported developing in western Canada? If so, is the department taking any steps to end the strike of coal miners in Alberta and British Columbia?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I have been informed by Mr. Angus Morrison, who is secretary of district 18 of the United Mine Workers of America in western Canada, that, after a conference with the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Ilsley), he has been in touch with president Robert Livett of the mine workers in Canada, and the executive board is meeting on Monday in an effort to conclude the strike. I hope they will be successful.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INTERIM SUPPLY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Acting Prime Minister): It will be necessary for me to ask the house for another instalment of supply on Tuesday next, that is, one-twelfth of the main estimates. It will be remembered that the house voted one-twelfth shortly after parliament assembled on September 6, and I indicated at that time that it would probably be necessary for me to come back at the end of the month for another one-twelfth. I hope therefore that the leaders of the other parties, and indeed the members of the house, will facilitate the passage of this additional one-twelfth, since it is necessary in order to meet bills that are coming due.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): With respect to the voting of another month's interim supply—of the main estimates, I gather—

Mr. ILSLEY: The main estimates, yes.

Mr. BRACKEN: I may say that under the circumstances in which the house finds itself the official opposition will be glad to facilitate the passage of this measure in every way possible.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): May I say something similar. I realize that the government must have money with which to meet its bills, and we shall not place any obstacle in the way of the granting of interim supply.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): The members in this group will also co-operate with the minister.

THE BUDGET

ANNOUNCEMENT AS TO PRESENTATION ON FRIDAY, OCTOBER 12

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Acting Prime Minister): Another matter I should like to mention is the date of the budget. I have given the question of an appropriate date some thought and it seems to me that the best date would be a week from to-day. I may say that I have arranged to make a trip to western Canada in the following week to speak in the interests of the victory loan, and I should like to present the budget before I go. On the other hand, our progress in the preparation of the budget has not been so rapid that I can advance the date much before, or at all before, a week from to-day, that is to say, on Friday. The question arises about the hour. I think it is important that parliament should adhere to the practice of evening budgets, the presentation of the budget at eight o'clock in the evening, and if the house would be disposed to consent to forgoing consideration of private bills, which might be ready for discussion between eight and nine o'clock on Friday a week from to-day, I will present the budget at eight o'clock one week from to-day.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): With respect to the budget, which the Acting Prime Minister announces he would like to bring down a week from to-day, at eight o'clock in the evening, let me say that if he feels it is in the public interest that it be brought down at that time, we shall be glad to give way in respect of any private members' business in order that his proposal may be carried out.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): As regards the consideration of private bills, I think we should do all we can to meet the wishes of the minister, who has important engagements elsewhere, and we shall be glad to cooperate in that respect.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): The members in this group, Mr. Speaker, will also cooperate with the government in this regard.

POSTAL SERVICE

PARCELS TO GREAT BRITAIN—WEIGHT LIMITATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Postmaster General): Yesterday I was asked a question by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) with reference to the weight of gift parcels being sent to England, which is limited to five pounds. While we are now in a position where we can send parcels of eleven pounds to Belgium and France, the weight of parcels to England is limited by the British government to five pounds and we cannot do anything to correct this situation. The initiative must come from the British government. There is a good deal of misapprehension about this, so much so that I have to-day received a letter from the ministry of war of the United Kingdom with respect to the same question that was asked yesterday by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. As I have said, we cannot do anything, but to the least expression from the government of the United Kingdom indicating that they desire to increase the weight to eleven pounds we shall at once respond.

WAR AND DEMOBILIZATION

PROVISION FOR APPROPRIATION OF $1,365,000,000 FOR WAR PURPOSES, DEMOBILIZATION, PROMOTION OF TRADE AND INDUSTRY, ETC.

The house resumed from Thursday, October 4, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to His Majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures deemed necessary or advisable in consequence of the war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Golding in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Just before we proceed with this resolution, the minister last night suggested that it might be better if we took the items on the sheet that was distributed to hon. members in the order as listed there. If that is the wish of hon. members, we will so proceed. On the other hand, if any hon. members wish to have further discussion before we go into these items I think that they should be permitted to have that discussion. I believe we would make better time if we took the items as they are listed, but that is for the committee to decide.

Mr. MacNICOL: In the course of his remarks yesterday the hon. member for Nanaimo made some reference to aircraft carriers. If Canada has aircraft carriers, has there been an effort made to transfer to the Canadian service the young Canadians serving on British aircraft carriers as flyers or pilots? I am informed that a number of them have been transferred, but that others who have been flying in the Pacific have not been approached and have not been transferred.

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Minister of National Defence for Air): In answer to that question may I say that I am not in a position to speak on behalf of the naval air service, as it comes under my colleague the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services. He will be dealing with that when he continues with his estimates.

Yesterday the suggestion was made that an over-all statement should be made concerning the three defence services. I should like to point out to hon. members of the committee that the estimates that are before the committee at the present time are very largely made up of expenditures that were incurred during the period of the war, and also expenditures incurred in connection with demobilization. The war has been over only a matter of seven weeks, therefore it will be realized that we have not progressed very far in determining what our post-war organization shall be. The atomic bomb was dropped something like eight weeks ago, and will possibly revolutionize defence forces hereafter. As a result, no very definite programme can be produced at the present time.

On the other hand I can well realize that the committee may want to have before it the defence programmes of the three services before passing on the defence estimates. I regret that the Minister of National Defence was called away yesterday and was therefore unavoidably absent, and is not able to be back to-day. I think it can be arranged for him to go on and complete his naval estimates next Tuesday, and possibly continue on from there to make his report in connection with the army, so that the committee will have before it the programmes of the three defence departments before coming to any final consideration of the estimates for each department.

It was suggested that perhaps the programmes of the defence departments were not carefully coordinated. I want to assure hon. members of the committee that estimates are not prepared in watertight compartments by the departments concerned, and have been correlated before being brought in here. In the first place, programmes are prepared in the various service departments. They are then outlined by the various departmental officials and are subject to revision by the defence council, which has on it representatives of the three defence services. That revised programme for each of the services is then considered by the defence committee of the cabinet, and finally approved by the government. Therefore in that way the appropriations of the three services are carefully considered and balanced before they are presented to the house.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

In considering the air force estimates that are before the committee at the present time the question was asked yesterday, what purpose is served by the first column on page 551 of Hansard? The leader of the opposition said: "It is no good to us". The hon. member for Souris said: "It just tangles us up." I should like to explain as carefully as I can the reason for that first column. The heading of that first column is, "Amount already granted." That leaves us the additional amount required to see us through the remainder of the year. The additional amount required is $272,502,077, which is the amount that I am asking the house to approve in committee at the present time. It is quite true that the total amount granted has not been spent. I should like to make it clear that the amount that has been granted has been turned over to the air force. We have some of it on hand at the present time. But the amount that will be required in the final seven months of the year is the amount we have on hand plus the additional amount asked for, amounting to slightly over $272 millions.

I was asked if I would produce a statement showing the actual expenditures made in the first five months of this fiscal year. I have it here, and I shall read it to the committee so that it will appear in Hansard. The total expenditures amount to $238,081,440. They are made up as follows:

Civil salaries and wages	$ 5,478,570
Pay and allowances	111,782,941
Travel, transportation and freight	6,902,051
Construction, purchases, repairs and operating expenses of properties	4,689,630
Personnel supplies and services	3,172,506
Communications	2,545,032
Ammunition and bombs	1,395,464
M.T. vehicles and marine craft	660,659
Fuel cost for aircraft, M.T. and marine craft	7,069,861
Aircraft, engines and spares, including overhauls	4,209,522
Miscellaneous stores and equipment	1,914,400
Flying training contracts	429,706
Maintenance of overseas squadrons	87,291,529
Sundries	539,569
Total	$238,081,440

I should like to refer once again to some of the comparisons that were made in comparing the expenditures as shown in one part of the year as against another part of the year. I should like to make it quite clear that in making such a comparison, to use a homely expression, you might as well take a family budget where the bills come in during the early days of the month and are collected and probably paid toward the end of the month. If you average the expenditures day by day, in the early days of the month they will be low; then suddenly, on the day you pay the bills, the housekeeper will be accused of going haywire and running up terrific expenses in one particular day. That would not be sound. The only way to ascertain whether you are going behind one month is by comparing it with the previous month or with the same month in the previous year, to find out what the over-all expenses were for that period. Consequently it is fallacious to start comparing payments made in one month with payments in the previous month or the months just before that. I would suggest, if it meets the approval of the committee, that we continue to examine this statement item by item, so that any information required on an item may be given as we come to it; and I can assure the committee that the fullest possible information is available.

Mr. POWER: Before we go on to an examination item by item I should like to say a word with respect to the creation of a fleet air arm and to lay before the two ministers concerned, the Minister of National Defence for Air and the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services, certain factors which I believe should be considered very carefully before they embark upon any large undertaking in the way of a fleet arm.

I do not propose in any way to oppose the creation of such an arm. The naval air force did credit to itself, to its country and to the allies during the last war, but I think the attention of hon. members should be called to the fact that in creating a fleet air arm we will be creating a duplicate service. My hon. friend the minister may say that I was minister when the fleet air arm was brought into being, and I shall have to admit that my better judgment was coalesced into acquiescing, in the stress and strain of the war and probably because of the glamorous deeds of the flat tops and aircraft carriers of the Royal Navy. But here is what it means, and this was pointed out at the time. In all probability it means a double set of aerodromes, a double set of training schools, a double set of technical schools to train the technical men, a double set of staff officers to plan—and a great deal of planning goes on in the armed services. I notice the hon. member for Cape Breton South in his place. I am sure he and all his socialistic friends would be only too pleased to be members of the staffs of the armed services, because they spend a very great deal of time planning. It would mean a double set of planners and a double set of designers. I think it is fairly well known to hon. members that the design of the aircraft used by the fleet air arm is not the same as the design of the aircraft used by the army, by the Royal Air Force and by the R.C.A.F. There are perhaps reasons why they should differ in certain respects, but I would point out that the most famous raid made during the war, that of Doolittle on Tokyo, was made with army aircraft.

So it goes, all through the piece. But it means more than additional expenditures. I believe I am justified by the experience in the last war in saying that it means a certain amount of rivalry, a certain lack of harmony as between two very great organizations, the navy and the air force. It is not betraying any secret to say that it was notorious in the United States that the United States navy did not get on with the army, and that situation was particularly glaring with respect to their air services. There have been rumours that in Britain the high lords of the admiralty were even a bit sticky; and that the people of the air force, as perhaps befits a young and growing organization, were a bit cocky, so perhaps they did not get along any too well either. In any case Canada had to furnish training schools for the fleet air arm at Kingston, Aylmer, St. Eugene and I think one or two other places.

Mr. MacNICOL: Was there not a school at Collins Bay?

Mr. POWER: That is Kingston. The fact of the matter is that while there was a surplus of pilots in the R.C.A.F.; while thousands of them were kicking around Bournemouth in England and thousands more were being put on the special air crew reserve here, the fleet air arm was asking for new men to come in for training, because there seemed to be no co-ordination as between the R.A.F. and the fleet air arm. Without opposing the creation of this arm, I am pointing out to this committee—

Mr. MacNICOL: Did the hon. member mean the R.C.A.F. or the R.A.F.?

Mr. POWER: The R.A.F., because a large number of our men were being trained for the R.A.F. My contention is that if some of the men who had been through their elementary and intermediate stages of training had been taken on and given the last phases of training which would be necessary to make them fleet air arm flyers, it would not have been necessary to begin training all over again. I fear that with two great organizations such as the navy and air force competing for recruits, both endeavouring—and this is a legitimate ambition on the part of those within these services—to build up a better organization, in this country we will have a lack of harmony which will not serve the purpose either of the nation or the forces themselves. So I suggest to the two ministers that before we get into the position of creating this fleet air arm; before the inevitable happens, as it will happen in this house and this country, and people say we are paying too much for the armed forces; before we create a duplicate service; before we do an injustice to those who may very properly embark upon a career in the fleet air arm, by perhaps axing them later on, after a few years, we carefully consider not whether we should have men flying from carriers but who shall be responsible for the organization.

In the last war it was possible for the Royal Air Force and the R.C.A.F. to organize observation units, as I think they were called. Hon. gentlemen who are more familiar with what happened overseas than I am will remember that the army desired to have artillery officers trained as observers. We thought it would be easier to take a pilot who had gone through a year and half or two years of flying training and train him to spot for the artillery than to train an artillery man to fly to the place he wanted to be. The discussion did not last very long, and the army won, but eventually, during the course of the war, those observation units came under the control of the air force. So whether it be the R.A.F. or the R.C.A.F. it seems to me it should be possible to reconcile the training, the supply and the organization of men who will fly from battleships or carriers and men who will fly from the ground, without creating a very expensive organization.

If I may do so I would like to suggest to the ministers that they get together the officers of their departments, for there are excellent officers in both departments who know this whole story far better than perhaps anyone in this house knows it. Let them get together and put their cards on the table, because we are starting something new. That was done in the old country after the last war, where there was a controversy which lasted for years. Eventually the big navy people won and a fleet air arm was created; but before embarking on this policy let us give it careful consideration. I think the ministers could discuss it with their officers, and if they cared to have it, there are men in this house who could in an informal way give them all the advice possible. There are men on both sides of the house able to do that. Before any of us get into a controversial argument or wed themselves to a big navy or a navy air arm or a land air arm, let us have all the facts and give them serious consideration.

[Mr. Power.]

Mr. BRACKEN: Mr. Chairman, we have all listened with interest to the remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just sat down. I am not rising to comment on the subject he raised, but I am sure that with the splendid record he had as Minister of National Defence for Air, this house and the country will listen with respect to the statement he has made.

I am rising for another purpose. It is as to procedure in this committee. There is only the one resolution before us. It is asking that $1,365,000,000 be voted for war expenditures and demobilization. Any member may get up and discuss anything that may be included within the details of that appropriation. It seems to me that unless we arrive at some understanding and discipline ourselves, we may very well talk here for a couple of months. As leader of one party I want to say that we are prepared to discipline ourselves and to confine ourselves to a discussion of individual items when we come to them. However, before that time arrives I think a full discussion of the general situation should be open to any hon. member who wishes to speak. I feel also after the experience of last night that I should say something more at this time.

The different ministers of defence have been asked to give us an over-all statement of their policy with respect to defence, but up to now such a statement has not been forthcoming. The Minister of National Defence for Air referred to this request to-day, and indicated that he was not in position to make any such statement except for an interim period. A good many hon. members will be disappointed that we have not heard more. However, he said that the Minister of National Defence—army and navy—would be here at a later time and might be able to supplement what he had to say.

Quite frankly when we reached these estimates last night I felt a good deal of frustration. The tables that were given to us a few days ago by the Minister of Finance either mean something or they do not mean very much. They were taken by me, and I think by most hon. members, to mean that the figures in the first column showed the amounts that had been allocated or voted for the first five months of this year, while the figures in the second column showed the amounts that would be required for the remaining seven months. The minister has now indicated that they do not mean that they have been allocated out of the $2,000,000,000 that was voted last year, but that the treasury board has apportioned the amount to each item. Is that correct?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): The amount that has actually been received by the department concerned and that had been allotted to it during the five months' period.

Mr. BRACKEN: But it was not apportioned out of the $2,000,000,000 voted last year?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): It was the grant actually drawn; the proportionate amount of that $2,000,000,000.

Mr. BRACKEN: As I remember it last night—

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): The $2,000,000,000 has been allocated and granted to the various departments as shown in this table.

Mr. BRACKEN: As I remember, last night the minister intimated that a certain amount had been allocated, first of all for the first item in his estimates. He then went on to say that some treasury board had altered that amount, and that the allotted amount was the figure shown in the first column. What I am getting at is that that column does not mean very much to us. The minister has come along to-day and has given us the expenditures for five months—expenditures for the five months under each of these items. I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver East, however, that that information is not very helpful to us in considering these estimates.

As I look back over the last half dozen years of war I find that this house granted to the government large amounts of money without much question and without much consideration. Now the ministers are relating the present requirements to the amounts voted in the past. Our position is that these total expenditures increased too rapidly and are not decreasing rapidly enough. In view of the situation in which we find ourselves I should like to say something to-day which I had planned to say on an earlier occasion but which I was unable to say for reasons which the committee will understand.

The resolution before us has to do with war expenditures and demobilization. It asks that we approve the granting to the government of $1,365,000,000 for expenditures on these items over a seven months period. On Friday last the Minister of Finance presented to this house a statement in explanation of his request for this appropriation. When he got through we saw what the total was; in fact it had been intimated before. Since that time many hon. members of this house have spoken, including the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell), the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) and others. If I may say so, for moderation and tolerance and non-partisanship I doubt if those addresses have been excelled in this house at any time that I can recall.

A few days ago the Minister of National Defence presented another statement. It was with respect to naval expenditures. When he got through he intimated that he wanted $172,000,000, after indicating that the force would be reduced, if I remember correctly, to 10,000. Yesterday the Minister of National Defence for Air presented his statement in which he indicated that the air force would be reduced to 15,000 or 20,000, and he outlined his idea of what its interim organization should be.

I submit that the government has done itself less than credit in the case it has presented in asking for $1,365,000,000 for seven months. This leads me to deal with one aspect of this measure, the business aspect. The other day the hon. member for Vancouver South dealt with defence policy. He asked for an over-all statement from the government, and he volunteered some constructive suggestions. We are still waiting for that statement. The hon. member for Vancouver South was followed by the members for Lake Centre and Kamloops in criticism of the policy of carrying on, now that the war is over, by order in council under the War Measures Act.

There are four major aspects of the measure now before us to which we might give attention. One is what we might call the remnants of the war expenditures. Another is the welfare of the returning men and of the dependents of those who will not return. The third is defence policy for the future, and the fourth the business aspects of the whole matter. I shall not take more than two or three minutes to refer to the first three.

With respect to the remnants of the war expenditures, obviously our commitments must be met. But in saying that, I think we should also say that unnecessary expenditures and waste must be eliminated. I am sure that the ministers are endeavouring to see that that is done right now. I think also that the huge expenditures of the past should be brought under review, not in closed session, but in open session.

With respect to the welfare of the returning men and their dependents, this has been the subject of earnest consideration by a committee of this house in the past and will be again, as well as in the deliberations of this committee, and I am sure it will receive long and considered judgment by the members. We must try to see that the young men who fought in this war shall not be economically worse off for having done so. Physically they should be restored to the maximum of health that modern medical science can achieve for them. With respect to their adjustment from war-time to peace-time activities, we should see that they are given the training that they missed when they went away, and any additional training we can give them, and that they shall have work suitable to their capacity at reasonable rates of pay on their return.

With respect to the defence policy of the future we shall await a further statement from the government. The member for Vancouver South the other day made some suggestions which received favourable commendation from many sections of the house. Whatever we may decide upon in detail in our plans for the future, I think we must do two things: we must plan to protect ourselves against attack, and we must cooperate fully with other nations to try to see that we are not attacked.

Now I come to the phase of the matter with which I wish to deal in greater detail, the business aspects not alone of this particular measure but of the sum total of them all.

I think at the outset that we should take stock of where we are at to-day. Here we are in the middle of a fiscal year, and we have had no budget—meeting in the middle of the fiscal year with half of a year's money spent without the expenditures having had adequate consideration either by this parliament or the previous parliament; meeting in the middle of the year with civil estimates for six months already passed—five months last winter and one month for which we granted interim supply three weeks ago; meeting in the middle of a fiscal year with war estimates for seven months already voted without much consideration—with five months supply voted last winter and $400 million or the equivalent of two months' interim supply voted three weeks ago; and now here we are meeting in a short session with insufficient time to give to these tremendous expenditures the full consideration they should receive.

It is a most unusual situation. In our judgment, Mr. Chairman, it is an inexcusable situation. It has never happened before, so far as I have been able to learn. It should not have been allowed to happen now; it must never happen again. There is no reasonable defence for our being in this position, discussing expenditures that reach the huge sum of $5,000 million a year, over half of which has been already spent.

What does this measure aim to do? This is the first step in a procedure to make available $1,365 million for seven months for certain purposes. That is a lot of money—$200 million a month—$7 million a day. Since this measure was introduced a week ago $50 million of the Canadian taxpayers' money has been spent under this measure. And that is not all. The civil estimates were laid before us some time ago asking for an expenditure for the twelve months' period of more than $1,000 million. In addition to that there had already been voted last winter the huge sum of $2,000 million for war purposes, making a total of these three items of $4,388 million or the equivalent of some $12 mililon a day. But that is not all either, Mr. Chairman.

At page 565 of Hansard the Minister of Finance indicated that there were other expenditures not included in these amounts. He indicated that there were war service gratuities and reestablishment grants that would amount to $240 million a year, to be added to these other appropriations. On the same page he indicated that export credits and foreign exchange control expenditures would have to be added as well. He did not give the total amount, but he summed up by saying that the total would come to more than $5,000 million for the year in which we now find ourselves.

That figure is large, but it is not all we should be thinking about. What we should be thinking about as well is that this is the people's money we are dealing with, and that when we approve these measures we approve the taxes necessary to raise the money, and we approve the debts necessary to pay for the deficits. It is important that we should realize the full implications of our action. It is only because I feel that these expenditures, which were increased to such tremendous heights under the patriotic impulse of war, are not being reduced fast enough that I have taken these few minutes to bring out some of these points to-day.

My general criticism of the situation in which we find ourselves may be mentioned under four headings.

The first criticism is the disrespect which has been shown to parliament by letting six months go without a budget, by permitting six months to pass without adequate consideration of these tremendous expenditures, and in bringing us here too late to deal adequately with them. Hon. members know very well the reason. Parliament was called to meet here last January 31. It met one day and prorogued the same day; it was called again for March 19, and sat for four weeks or until the life of that parliament expired; and it ended without a budget and without adequate consideration having been given to expenditures. Now, late in the year, with half the money gone, and very little time left to deal with the matter, we are here and are asked to consider and take responsibility for passing these huge amounts.

The second criticism I want to make, and I make it in all seriousness, is that in the manner of bringing these expenditures before the house the government has removed the most effective check it had upon the prevention of waste. We have before us one resolution asking for $1,365 million. When the civil estimates come down for $1,000 million you will have over four hundred different resolutions. When these resolutions pass, no branch of the service can exceed the amount voted under each item. It has not the power to do it, and the only way the government can get any additional money for any such item is by governor general's warrant. But what do we see here? The government brings in one resolution and has provided us with a breakdown to help us consider the total, but it does not carry the breakdown into the bill; so when we are through, the government for this purpose will have $1,365 million in one lump sum into which hundreds, yes, thousands of officials can dip, and the government is at once put on the defensive. The most effective means the government has of preventing waste has been given up by bringing in estimates in this fashion. The government has forfeited the help which might have come from the heads of five hundred or a thousand sections of the service, in each one of which it would have been some responsible official's duty to see that the expenditures were not increased. But now, everybody is against the government; every service there is will want more money; and in spite of the best efforts of the government its expenditures will be greater than they need be had they been brought forward in the way that ordinary expenditures are brought before parliament.

I realize the answer of the government. In war time nobody raised serious objection to the course it followed. But in peace time it ought not to be permitted. I think that is one reason why the expenditures to-day are as high as they are. As I said, under this plan nobody is helping the government to keep the expenditures down. On the contrary, practically the whole public service is against the government. There is perhaps not a service but thinks that its work is good and wants to extend it, so the whole pressure of the officials is against the government. Thus, in spite of the government's best efforts, its expenditures will be higher than they need to be.

The government's practice is not in the interest of the minister himself; it is not in the interest of the government; it is not in the interest of the taxpayer.

I have said that the expenditures are unnecessarily high. Let us take a little perspective of what we are doing.

We have no public accounts before this house. The last public accounts available come only to March 31, 1944, and therefore are eighteen months old. That makes it very difficult for hon. members, even if the expenditures of that time were warranted to pass upon these items now.

Mr. MacNICOL: It makes it impossible.

Mr. BRACKEN: But let us try to get a little perspective of the situation. In the year the war started this government spent $550 million, the next year $700 million, the next year $1,200 million, the next year $1,900 million, the next year $4,500 million, last year $5,300 million. I do not know exactly what it is this year, but the minister indicated the other day that it would be over $5,000 million. Thus the amount in the first year of peace is to be nearly ten times as much as in the first year of war.

Hon. members may not like it; the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) did not like it the other day when I mentioned it; it does not matter; these things must be said. In the last six years this government has spent approximately $20,000 million without adequate consideration by parliament. That is more than was spent by this nation in the whole period of its history up to this war. All of it was spent without any adequate checking up by the government itself or by this parliament.

Because of that huge growth in expenditure, taxes had to be increased. The war-time taxation in 1939 was $300 million, in 1940 $300 million, in 1941 $550 million, in 1942 $1,000 million, in 1943 $1,800 million, in 1944 $2,100 million. I suppose it is even higher this year than it was last year. Last year the total revenue from war-time taxation and other sources was $24,000 million, and that is more than the Canadian people paid in taxes during the first fifty years of the history of this country. Even this large amount paid only half or less than half our total expenditures last year. The balance was raised by borrowing, and how much did we borrow?

In 1939, the year war was declared, the total debt of this nation—in round figures—was $3,700 million, the next year $4,000 million, the next year $5,000 million, the next year $6,600 million, the next year $9,200 million, the next year $12,360 million. I do not know what it amounted to on March 31 of this year, the end of the last fiscal year, but it probably approached $16,000 million. As that is gross debt, it is not quite a complete picture. Perhaps a more accurate statement of the position is indicated by the net debt, but even that has increased very largely—from $3,100 million in 1939 to $3,200 million in 1940, $3,600 million in 1941, $4,000 million in 1942, $6,200 million in 1943, $8,700 million in 1944, and while we have not been given the figures, it is now probably in the vicinity of $11,000 million. In other words, in these six years we increased our total debt from less than $4,000 million to, I suppose, in the vicinity of $16,000 million, and our net debt from something over $3,000 million to approximately $11,000 million.

The other day the Minister of Finance, in presenting his statement, as reported at page 566 of Hansard, said that interest on the debt, together with one of the social services, family allowances, now came to more than half of the total expenditures in the civil estimates. You have them before you, $1,000 million. The minister said that these two items, interest on debt, and the cost of family allowances, came to half or more of the total figure, or in other words as much as the whole expenditure of the government the year before the war.

I mention these figures, Mr. Chairman, because I think we should have them before us when we are considering what we are going to spend from now on. I want to read two or three extracts from the minister's address in introducing this proposal. The first is on page 548. He says:

It will be noted that this amount—

That is, for war expenditures and demobilization.

—of $3,365,000,000 is $1,085,000,000 less than the total of the war and the Mutual Aid appropriations provided last year.

I do not know exactly why the minister mentioned that reduction. It is true it is a reduction in that item. Later he went on to say that there were almost as many additions to the budget as there were reductions in it. You will find reductions in the estimates for the department of defence for navy, army and air. The figures you will find on page 563 of the minister's address. But I wish to read one other item from the minister's address on page 565.

The amount which we estimate will be required for war service gratuities and reestablishment credits is approximately $240 million which will, of course, be an expenditure in addition to the appropriation being requested under this resolution.

I simply want to bring together these different items in the government's proposed expenditures so that we can see the total. Further on, on the same page, he said:

To this must be added certain other cash requirements, particularly those for export credits and the financing of the foreign exchange control board which will bring our total requirements for the year above $5 billion.

Or only a little bit short of the total for last year, in this year, the greater part of which is after the war is over. I want to read another statement on the next page. It refers not to this year, which ends next March, but to the year that follows, the year that ends March, 1947.

During the year following this ninth victory loan, and for which it is expected to provide the moneys required over and above our revenues, our expenditures and other cash requirements, including the loans we propose to make to allied nations for reconstruction, will probably amount in all to about four billion dollars.

In the second year after the war is over the government is now anticipating an expenditure of $4,000 million, which is twice as much as in the war year 1942, three times as much as in the war year 1941, nearly eight times as much as in the pre-war years, namely, $3,500 million more than in pre-war days. And that is for the second year after the war is over.

Mr. HOWE: Does my hon. friend say the second month after the war is over?

Mr. BRACKEN: No, the second year.

A little further on the Minister of Finance makes this statement:

In view of these large requirements I believe we must borrow something approaching two billion dollars for this period. This is a huge amount, even though it is much less than the totals we have borrowed in recent years.

And now listen to this. He continued:

Something on this scale is required, however, if the total reduction in our expenditures and cash requirements is not to be reflected solely in our borrowing.

What does that mean? It means that to the extent that they are short they are going to borrow; that in order to make any kind of reduction in taxation they will make it up by borrowing. No other meaning can be read into that statement. In other words, he says that if we borrow enough we can reduce taxation. Mr. Chairman, I have only one comment to make on that, and it is this. In peacetime, to the extent that we depend on borrowing for financing ourselves, we are not facing the issue squarely, and financing on borrowed money is a concession to the well-to-do.

However, the main point I wish to make is that the minister is obviously making it clear now that in order that there may be some reduction in taxation we shall resort to borrowing $2,000 million in the second year after the war is over.

But I must hurry on. In view of the fact that we have had no public accounts since March 31, 1944, I would ask the government to let us have two or three figures. What has been the total expenditure for the fiscal year 1945? There are only three questions; they are very simple. What has been the total revenue from taxation and other sources for the fiscal year 1945? What was the total indebtedness, gross and net, at the end of the fiscal year?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Ended March 31, 1945?

Mr. BRACKEN: Yes. If the record were brought up to date it would be appreciated. The government may or may not be in a position to give it to the present date, but there is no reason why now, many months after March 31, we should not have the figures at least up to that time.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I did not hear the third question.

Mr. BRACKEN: The total indebtedness, gross and net, as at the end of the last fiscal year. I have outlined the situation. It is only a statement of facts. We either continue those expenditures at a very high rate or we reduce them; it is for the house to decide.

In talking about the $4 billion a year expenditure two years after the war is over, the Minister of Finance intimated the other day that about one-third of it would be for what we call the civil estimates. That is more than $1,300,000,000. As I see the picture that faces us, it will not be $1,300,000,000, it is pretty sure to be $1,500,000,000. When the minister intimates that there will be a total expenditure of $4 billion, and says he is to borrow $2 billion, I am wondering if we are not heading for a civil budget approaching $2 billion. When intimations of this kind are given to us I think it is time that we should take into serious consideration where the voting of these huge sums of money is going to lead us.

There is no use in pointing out a situation like this unless one makes some constructive suggestion. I wish to make some. I hope nobody in the government will take offence at them. We have a duty to perform here; we have to present these matters. We are not allowed to help the government to shape policy; we are not allowed to share with them the responsibility of administration. Whatever other duties we have under the party system, one of them is to try to point out the errors the government is making, and, to make constructive suggestions toward correcting those errors. I have five suggestions I wish to make.

Parliament must meet on time in the future. There is not an hon. member in this committee but realizes that, with the other work the government has brought forward, we have not time to deal with this huge problem effectively.

Mr. HOWE: May I ask what limits our time?

Mr. BOUCHER: The Prime Minister.

M. BRACKEN: Yes, I shall tell you.

Mr. HOWE: We are prepared to sit here in this session until next year.

Mr. BRACKEN: You should have been prepared to come here months ago. As I said, parliament met on January 31 and adjourned the same day, then it did not resume its sittings until March 19, although the government knew that the end of the life of parliament was only four weeks ahead. That was where the first mistake was made.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It sat more days last year than the British parliament.

Mr. BRACKEN: It met on March 19 and prorogued on April 16. That is where the first error was made. The second error was made in not getting us here earlier for the session and now there is talk of having another session meeting shortly after the new year, and the idea is to hurry through this one. No, the mistake was made by the government. There is nothing that we can do now to give us adequate time to deal with these matters.

The second point I wish to make is that there should be no more opening of the public purse for thousands to dip into. That is what this very policy is. When the government brings forward its civil estimates there is not one resolution but 426 or so; and no branch and no department can expend more than the amount that is within each one of these resolutions. The officials in charge of each branch are concerned to see that they do not spend more than that because they have to justify asking for a royal warrant to spend more. All that protection which the ministers and the government have is gone. I sympathize with the government. But its officials are thus all against it. They do not mean to do any harm to the state, but all the state's protection is gone. They are all against you when you should have five hundred or one thousand tried and tested officials there trying to see that these expenditures are not exceeded. By this procedure all that protection is gone.

Nobody raised that question seriously during the war, and I do not raise it too seriously now, although I think in the government's own interest they should have that protection. But I want to give the government fair warning that if it comes forward with requests for these huge amounts in this way next year we shall certainly use all the energy we have to see that it is done in a better way.

My third criticism is that the dictatorial powers allowed the government in war must be taken away in peace. We have had some discussion on that, and I need not go into it in any larger field than what is before us now. It is an easy way for the government to proceed, but it is not an easy way for the government to keep down its expenditures. The government has taken away from itself the best protection it had.

My fourth criticism is that consideration of public expenditures behind closed doors must end.

My last one is that the government must get out of its head that it is a dictatorship.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Oh, oh.

Mr. BRACKEN: I know; my hon. friend may laugh. The government did not deliberately plan to become a dictatorship, but when it gets to be one it likes to hang on to it too long. I suppose we would be acting in the same way if we were over there, and if you were over here you would be saying exactly the same thing that I am saying to-day. If you were saying it you would be correct.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Exactly, we did before.

Mr. MacNICOL: The time you took the buttons off.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order.

Mr. BRACKEN: The government must get it into its head that while a democracy will stand for a dictatorship in war, it will not stand for a dictatorship in peace.

We are going to look upon this government as the custodians of the people's money, the people's taxes. As representatives of the people, like any other hon. members, we intend to try to hold the government responsible for its trusteeship, and it is a very heavy responsibility.

[Mr. Bracken.]

I do not propose to keep the committee any longer. I rose to point out where the government's policies have led us. I did not criticize it too seriously during the war, although with proper controls these expenditures could have been kept down then. But I do criticize it when they are not going down fast enough now, and when from all indications the prospects of getting them down very fast in the future are not bright.

We expect the government to justify these expenditures, and to justify the meagre measure of tax reduction they will bring in because of the size of the expenditures.

Mr. HOWE: I do not propose to reply in detail to the remarks of the leader of the opposition, but in the absence of the Minister of Finance I think I should cover one point. He spoke of the requirements for 1947 being $4 billion. The Minister of Finance made it clear, I think, that this is a cash requirement and not a budgetary requirement. It would include the loans which will be necessary to countries that have been traditional customers of ours, particularly the United Kingdom, France, Belgium, Holland, Norway and our sister dominions. A period will be required before the Bretton Woods agreement can go into effect, and before the international monetary fund can come to the rescue of the financial difficulties in converting currency as between one country and another. In that period we contemplate having to finance purchases in Canada of foodstuffs and other materials for these countries. The cost of such purchases is a cash requirement, but it is not a budgetary requirement. Naturally the money so furnished will be a debt owing by these countries to Canada, just as the bonds that will have to be sold to provide the cash to make the purchases will be a debt owing by Canada to the people of this country who will be the owners of the bonds. I believe that distinction should be made, because I should not like any hon. member to think the budget for 1947 will be $4 billion or anything approaching that sum.

Mr. BRACKEN: Perhaps the minister would permit me a question. Does he really expect that these credits or advances, or whatever they are, will be repaid?

Mr. HOWE: I certainly do.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Louder.

Mr. BRACKEN: I asked if the minister really expected that these credits or advances would be repaid, any more than the advances under Mutual Aid were repaid. He replies that he certainly does. I doubt if anyone else in the house will give that answer to the question.

Mr. HOWE: I am sorry my hon. friend takes such a pessimistic view of the future of the United Kingdom and the great powers of Europe. Mutual Aid was a gift, and there was never any suggestion of a loan or of any repayment in that connection. The first billion dollars provided for aid to Britain was called a gift and was passed as such by this house. Other money was provided in the form of Mutual Aid, which meant that Britain would pay to the extent of her ability, and that the balance would be a gift. That was made clear to the house. Those moneys will not be repaid. To-day, however, we are making loans which call for repayment to several countries. All these are countries which have paid their debts through the ages; and this applies between Canada and the United Kingdom. I cannot be as pessimistic as my hon. friend, if he suggests that the debts now being incurred by these countries will not be repaid. If we take that attitude, I think we must take the view that the world can never recover from this war.

Mr. COLDWELL: I fully agree with one thing said by the leader of the opposition this afternoon. During the several years we have been discussing these war expenditures under a resolution and a bill I have suggested from time to time that we should follow the practice we adopt in connection with our other budgets and estimates; that is, attach to the bill a schedule which would limit the appropriations to the items approved. I understand the difficulties in that connection, and when this method was discussed with the Minister of Finance earlier I reiterated the objection which was raised this afternoon by the leader of the opposition and urged that as soon as possible we should get back to the normal way of doing business and see to it that the estimates were brought down in the usual way both for ordinary expenditures and for what we now term war or demobilization expenditures. I think the argument that has been advanced this afternoon, that the limitations placed upon the departments and officials by the house when the method suggested is adopted, is a valuable safeguard both to the government and to this parliament. We know there are difficulties at the present time, and for that reason we have been inclined not to press the matter during the war years. But now that we have emerged into the peacetime era I think the sooner we get back to the normal way of budgeting our estimates, the better it will be not only for the country but for the government itself.

The other day the Minister of Munitions and Supply said it was planned again to set up the war expenditures committee, to deal with war expenditures and war assets; and I believe that should be done as soon as possible. I think these expenditures should be very carefully examined. The public accounts committee has a different function to perform; it is more concerned with the ordinary civil estimates and expenditures. I do not think there should be any further delay in establishing the committee to which the minister referred and which during the war we have always called the war expenditures committee, in order that we may go into the criticisms that are heard across the country, although sometimes I feel sure, unjustifiably, from what I know of the Minister of Munitions and Supply. The disposal of our war assets properly comes into a discussion of this kind, because those war assets account for a very large percentage of the money with which we are now dealing. In that connection I have just received a telegram which indicates the misgiving or alarm which some of our people are feeling. I should like to place on record this telegram, which comes from Toronto, Ontario, and reads:

> Whereas the Ontario Federation of Agriculture is greatly concerned to hear that the federal government is planning to dispose of the nitrate plant at Calgary to private interest and contrary to proposals submitted by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture it is urged that no action be taken by government until a further meeting with the Canadian federation at which time full disclosure as to costs, markets, benefits to Canadian agriculture, etc., is made and future action planned.

That is signed by V. S. Milburn, secretary of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture, and I take this opportunity to bring it to the attention of the minister. There we have a concrete example. We have made very large industrial expenditures for war purposes, and many of our people are anxious that this house should protect the interests of the country to the greatest possible extent. Where we can use these new establishments for the benefit of the Canadian people they should be so used.

May I say just one other word along the line of what the minister was saying a few moments ago. The Minister of Finance has stated that the $4,000 million is a cash requirement. We know perfectly well that a large part of that amount will have to be used either for Mutual Aid or for loans, as the minister has said. I am quite sure the people of Canada realize that while we can set up all the security councils we like; while we can do everything possible in the way of rearmament among our own nations, still we may not obtain the security the world needs if we allow any of the nations who have been our partners in this war to sink into the mire of want and poverty. I believe the large amount involved this year in the way of loans to potential customers, to our allies during the war, will receive support throughout the country, whatever may be involved in the way of borrowing or taxation or other means of raising the money. But before the house is asked to go ahead and confirm these tremendous expenditures which have been made and are proposed, I believe the war expenditures committee should be set up and hon. members given an opportunity in public to go into all items of past expenditure. That is what the committee should do. Then as soon as possible we should return to the old method of going into the budget proposals item by item, having the details of our expenditures attached as a schedule to any bill or bills that may be required. As soon as possible we should provide for expenditures in the normal way, in order to protect this house, this country and indeed the government itself.

Mr. REID: Without wanting to be accused of diverting the trend of the discussion, I should like to propound a question to the minister. This has to do with the control exercised at the moment by the R.C.A.F. over civil aviation. Just praise has been given to the work done by the Canadian air force and the commonwealth air training scheme, but any one who has read the history of aviation knows perfectly well that had it not been for those good citizens who kept aviation to the fore during the days of peace, who pioneered, shall I say, and laid the basis for the commonwealth air training scheme, the great success which was accomplished during the war by our air forces and the air forces of other countries might not have been so great. There are men on the Pacific coast who are anxious to enter into civil aviation, but information has reached me to the effect that at the moment the R.C.A.F. has direct control over civil aviation. Has the minister given consideration to this question of control by the R.C.A.F. on the Pacific coast and in other parts of Canada?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Civil aviation comes under the Department of Transport. Perhaps the Minister of Reconstruction could speak with regard to the hon. member's question.

Mr. REID: Information has come to me that these boys have to receive permission from the R.C.A.F. in order to be permitted to fly so many miles over and around the airports.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): The R.C.A.F. would have control over the R.C.A.F. airports, but they do not control the activities of civilian flying clubs or civilian flying associations. That would be under the Department of Transport.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Chairman, there are only one or two references that I intend to make, one having to do with the statement by the leader of the C.C.F. that he thought a committee similar to the war expenditures committee should be set up. It was indicated the other day by the Minister of Munitions and Supply that it was the intention of the government to bring in a motion to establish such a committee. I speak now for myself, but I think I speak also for those on this side of the chamber when I say that if such a committee is to be set up, the day of secrecy is over as far as we are concerned.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): And the necessity too.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am glad to have the concurrence of the minister in that regard.

Mr. JACKMAN: Perhaps the war will be over some day.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am glad to have the assurance of the Minister of National Defence for Air that when this committee is set up, the question of security no longer arising, there will be no longer any justification for that committee sitting behind closed doors.

The other day when certain questions were placed on the order paper the Minister of Munitions and Supply asked that they be allowed to stand because this committee was to be set up. Let me say that I do not believe this country will consider that the setting up of a committee can be taken as a substitution for the responsibility of the minister to answer in this house for the activities of the War Assets Corporation. In other words, whether or not a committee is set up, we retain our rights to scrutinize thoroughly, by the means of proper questioning, what has taken place in connection with the War Assets Corporation and to disposal of assets and plants. I notice the minister is laughing. He always laughs when any question is raised as to the necessity of his accounting to parliament.

Mr. HOWE: I just said that the hon. gentleman should pay an entertainment tax if he wants both.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What was the observation?

Mr. HOWE: I just said that if the hon. gentleman wants to be entertained in two sessions he should pay an entertainment tax.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What that means I do not know and I doubt whether the minister does.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend attempted to interpret what I said and I told him what I said.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I always listen to the minister courteously and do not interfere at all, but for some reason, whenever there is an assertion on the part of anyone on this side of the chamber that he as one of the ministers is answerable to this house and to this parliament, he immediately resents it and commences to make remarks similar to the one he has just made.

Mr. HOWE: On a question of privilege, I do not resent it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Last evening the hon. member for Nanaimo asked for an over-all plan. That over-all plan was not given, nor has there been any endeavour to give such a plan to the committee. Dealing with the post-war plans, the minister made this statement, as reported on page 765 of Hansard:
